This Is My Last Breath

by FlyByNightGirl

Summary

☆
War stories, laughter, dances, disasters, stars. Family, fall out boy, falling, nightmares and two broken hearts.

(There's a double love story about two boys with 70 missing years in between - somehow Sergeant James Barnes became The Winter Soldier, and this is how.)
There's a saying... something about people who live on the edge of death. But Bucky doesn't think it applies to them. They don't live on the edge of anything. They can't afford it.

No, instead they live deep in the throes. They live in the very core of it all. They live in the constant ever-wakeful presence of the feared shadowy darkness.

They live in death.

~*~

Brooklyn in the 20s was a rough place for a kid. Brooklyn in the 30s was a rough place for a teenager. The two of them had grown up in the thrumming, beating heart of it and all that roughness made both them a little rough around the edges.

In some ways, they still had it better than the other kids. Because at least through all the roughness and hell of living in the dirty underside of New York, they had each other. Hell, that was better than most humans had, New York or age regardless.

Sometimes Bucky's eyes would catch on Steve - sprawled out across the floor on his stomach, pencil in one hand and a single foot kicked up in the air as he shaded lightly on the sketchpad in front of him - and wonder how the hell he'd earned this as his better half.

Bucky was always stealing glances of Steve drawing. Calm and almost mindless as he swept pencil over the page, white turning gray with the guidance of careful hands. Bucky liked watching Steve draw almost more than he liked the drawings themselves. It was just the only time he got to see Steve peaceful.

He was always picking a fight, or maybe the universe was always picking a fight with him.

Either way, it was storm season in Brooklyn and the sky was picking a fight with everybody. Storm season also meant one of the million flu seasons that'd knock Steve off his feet for a week. The worst of the sickesses were during storm season, all that constant wetness letting the bacteria grow and travel faster.

If they could afford it, Bucky'd stay home to make sure Steve didn't fall too ill. If he got it bad during storm season, the danger was that much worse. But this year they were running too low on money for Bucky to even think about staying home. Steve had broken his wrist a month back and the cost of that had swamped up everything they'd saved.

So, as much as he should be home right now, instead Bucky was hurrying through the streets to get there. He had his collar turned up against the wind, the only threadbare jacket with a collar he owned. He didn't like it much, but it helped to block out the icy gusts of wind notorious to November in New York.

The pavement was already slick, tinted green by the industrial lights flickering from the back of the buildings Bucky was dodging. This way was a shortcut home from the docks, but it was considerably more dangerous too - back alleys in Brooklyn weren't safe no matter who you were. A particularly cold burst of wind whipped at his face and Bucky ducked his head down, cursing at the weather and the world in general.

The edge of their apartment building was just around the next corner and he picked up his pace, cursing again as he slipped slightly on the slick pavement. A low rumble sounded in the distance, storm closing in, and Bucky would probably just beat it home. He could already see it, slamming the door behind him, outta breath as the rain and ice showered down in the streets where he'd just been hauling ass.

He looked down at his feet as he rounded the corner, doing his best not to slip on the ground with worn shoes. Falling would mean getting soaked and damp in this kind of cold storm might be fatal, even to him. At twenty-one he was fit and more muscled than some boys his age, all that manual labor at the docks and stores he could scrounge pennies from. But wet and cold was deadly to anybody this time of year.

Bucky sent up an abortive prayer of thanks to no one in particular that Steve wasn't with him. (If Steve were here he'd yell at Bucky for praying to no one and being disrespectful to religions and Bucky would fight the urge to roll his eyes because then Steve would get on to him even more.)
Despite the Steve-shaped voice of his conscience, he was still grateful Steve was safely indoors and (hopefully) fairly warm. Steve was stubborn but not stupid enough to be outside in weather like this.

The sky thundered again, everything already dark from the black clouds overhead. As the crashing grumble faded, distant voices took over the silence. Instinctive worry and curiosity had Bucky straining to hear the voices on the wind.

"--ad the right to come and interrupt?" A muffled thump. "Little scrap like you, barging in like some superhero?" A crash. "You just don't stay down, do you?"

That was the point Bucky stopped listening. He didn't need to hear anymore, although he doubted he'd be able to over the pounding of his heart in his ears. Steve.

He didn't have time to register the flash of lightning in the sky or the anger that should be consuming him because Steve was such a fucking idiot for being outside in this. The only thing running through Bucky was fear, pure unadulterated fear for Steve and why in the world would he be outside in this icy wind and god, oh god, he couldn't take another beating when his wrist was still fucked up and he wouldn't be able to pick up something to block himself and fuck, Steve.

His feet were pounding the pavement so hard he didn't have time to slip. Cautiousness and protection from the wind be damned, Bucky was just sprinting as fast as he could in the direction of the sounds: the alley beneath the window of their apartment.

Why was it always that alley when it was bad? Maybe he should be grateful that Steve's most notorious spot for getting mauled on was so close to their apartment where he could be properly patched up, but it didn't make him any less terrified every time he came home to that.

See, the reason why Steve kept getting in fights in that place, that particular alley? When he was supposed to be resting or at home he'd go sit by the window for better light to draw: the window with a perfect view to the alley and street below. And of course, because it was an alley in Brooklyn, there was constantly somebody doing something terrible. Thieves mobbing people, stupid schoolboys throwing sticks at the neighborhood stray. (Bucky hated that stray. On the pure principle of how many fights Steve had gotten into over the damn thing.)

And the damn apartment window revealed all of it. So Steve would see some disaster and he couldn't not do something - so he'd go running down the stairs and out into that damned alley and stick his nose in things that only got his nose broken.

Bucky had spent many a restless night debating boarding up the window, but he never did, never even got close. It was the only way Steve could draw, the only lighting they could afford. Besides, even without the tantalizing view, Steve would get himself into trouble elsewhere. At the movies, at the store. It was just especially more common in that alley.

The alley that was just another few feet away. Bucky slowed down a fraction so he could round the corner without skidding and falling over because he couldn't help Steve if he wasn't upright. He held his breath as he turned the corner, a feeble attempt at bracing himself for the sight of Steve on the receiving end of brutal treatment again.

The shadows of the alley opened up as the sickening familiar sound of colliding fists echoed into his ears, sending an involuntary shiver down his spine as he closed the distance. The guy - about Bucky's size, probably a year or two younger - was snarling something, his back to Bucky, blocking Steve outta Bucky's sight. He couldn't even see how bad it was.

In the flash of too-familiar panicked anger, his hands coiled into tight, warped fists, grabbing the attacker's shoulder and ripping him backward so fast he skid on the slick ground too. Then the practiced, heavy punch landed on the guy's cheekbone. He didn't spare the energy to yell, tell the guy to pick on someone his own size; he was too damn mad. Scared. They were kinda the same thing lately, weren't they?

"Get the fuck outta here," Bucky snapped, shoving him towards the open end of the alley. The attacker was more surprised than scared and for a second, it looked like Bucky was gonna have to lay out a real fight. Fine, he'd take the guy right fucking here, beat him to a pulp so he could see what it felt like to lay crumpled on the ground.

Then the guy's eyes went wide and he took off running. Good. Surprising he'd suddenly freaked but - Bucky's head cleared enough to catch the tail-end of thunder. Then the flash. Shit, the storm was already fucking here. The guy hadn't hauled ass because of Bucky - he'd heard the storm and didn't wanna get pelted in the middle of flu season. The dark clouds overhead may as well be raining straight poison, the way they got people sick. Shit. Steve.

Steve was already struggling to stand as Bucky crowded him, hauling up the frail body with hands that were shaking too.

"Steve, Steve, god, fuck, what were you doing out here, you knew it was gonna storm you fucking dimwit, are you okay? Steve? Stevie, look at me. Are you okay?"

Big blue eyes blinked up at Bucky, the corner of one swollen up already. Otherwise his face didn't look too bad, but his arms were clutched over his torso. Fuck, the guy must've been a kicker.

"God, Steve. C'mon, we gotta get inside before the storm hits." Bucky tossed one of Steve's arms over his shoulders, eliciting a full groan of pain as Steve's bruised chest opened up. A wave of nausea hit hard at the sound, but he ignored it somehow. As much as he didn't wanna hurt Steve, they had to go. It'd be a hell of a lot worse if they didn't get inside before the storm.

Steve leaned his weight on Bucky's side; which he never did. Bucky'd always try to help and Steve'd insist he was fine, it wasn't that bad.

This time, Steve wasn't protesting a bit. That scared him more than the frightened curl of Steve's fingers in the back of Bucky's hair.

He didn't have a particularly good sense of weather, but there was a sudden weight in the air around them that was sounding a thousand alarm bells. He could practically hear it, the impending storm in the air. The quivering tension around them, the wind whipping at their bodies as Bucky hobbled them towards the front of the alley. They still had too far, there was too much space between them and the entrance, let alone the door to their building around the corner.

The storm was coming for them. It was coming to take them both. Bucky sucked in a breath, drawing Steve in closer to his side and making the small body yelp quietly.

"Sorry, sorry," Bucky muttered helplessly, pushing their progress faster.

"'S fine, Buck," came back the pained voice that did not sound fine in any definition of the word.

Steve was blinking against the wind like his eyes were about to water and Bucky wanted to tell him to stop, to cover his eyes or something because there was that one year the wind had gotten so bitter that Steve's eyes had watered over and it'd been so cold the tears froze and Bucky'd been terrified Steve was gonna get frostbite and permanently lose his eyes like the kid three blocks over. Bucky had breathed warm air over the pretty blue eyes, lighting up one of their precious rare matches and holding it close to Steve's face, apologizing profusely and holding Steve's head still so he didn't get burnt while Bucky warmed up his skin.

The exact temperature was iffy, but he'd bet it was somewhere in the high twenties or low thirties. Not as cold as it got in the heart of winter, but cold enough to turn rain into ice. Cold enough to freeze pieces of the ground under their sliding feet. But it was still too bitter of a cold to be snow. No snow meant ice and hail and god, they had to move faster.

If they could just get inside fast enough --

The rain came down right as they stepped out onto the sidewalk. One moment it was all crescendo, leading up to the big explosion and then the electricity in the air lit off and buckets opened above their heads. Buckets and buckets, colder than anything Bucky could remember feeling.

Steve whimpered, dry to soaked inside'a three seconds. Bucky cursed and tugged them forward roughly, shaking the rain outta his eyes to see the damn steps. He considered scooping Stevie up and running inside with the tiny body, but there was no way he could tackle the slipperiness with his balance thrown off like that. He'd end up slipping and falling and then they'd both be broken, soaked, and good as dead.

He pushed Steve up the stairs instead, one hand cupping Steve's elbow and the other driving a heavy push between sharp shoulderblades. Steve kept making all these terribly pitiful sounds, making Bucky more and more lightheaded to hear. Fuck, that had to hurt so much. Both of them were shivering all over, water running in rivets down every crevice it could find, plastering their clothes to their bodies and showering their eyelashes with heavy stinging drops. Tiny, light pieces of hail were falling here and there too, nothing enough to so much as bruise, but goddamn it was cold.

This was everything Bucky'd been trying to avoid and of course, it was exactly what got dealt.

The time in between finally getting inside and getting up to their apartment was a blur of helping Steve, slipping and shivering and shaking with teeth clacking and sounds of pain coming from Steve and sounds of scared encouragement coming from Bucky.

The storm was battering the apartment's roof as Bucky kicked the door shut behind them, hands gripping both Steve's shoulders tightly. Steve didn't protest an ounce as Bucky sat him down on the couch, quickly scrounging up all the blankets he could find. Which came to a depressing number of three too-thin ones.

Neither of them'd had the energy to say something earlier, but now that Steve was wrapped up in two blankets and Bucky was scrubbing his hair dry with the third, the silence fell on them the same time the suspended possibilities did.

Bucky froze where he was rubbing the space behind one of Steve's ears, eyes flicking from the damp hair to Steve's cutting gaze. Steve'd been watching him the way he always did when Bucky cleaned him up, blue observing with that bright hesitant light. But now that Bucky was looking back, now that their eyes met and the reality of it sat heavy between them, the situation felt about eighty times more real. Steve was cold, soaked, and beaten up in the middle of the most dangerous season in the year.

"Fuck," Bucky cursed quietly, starting to move the blanket over Steve's hair again. His hands were slower this time, more calculated and less panic-frantic. He had to get Steve dry, as dry as their shitty apartment would let them be.
"I'm sorry, Bu-" Steve started, the name cut off with a wet cough. Bucky's eyes went wider as Steve's hand flew up automatically, cupping over his mouth as another cough wracked his body, shaking his shoulders. Again. And again. Bucky's hand went up too, gripping Steve's shoulder in the only bit of comfort he could give him. His body was shaking with each cough like a ragdoll, force gripping his torso and rattling around like a barrel of monkeys.

Eventually the coughing stopped and Steve curled into himself tighter. That sound, that dyer sound of Steve's coughing. That was the scariest thing Bucky knew.

"You alright?"

Steve nodded slightly, looking extremely miserable. The cold hadn't even set in twenty minutes yet. Which meant it was gonna get a hell of a lot worse.

"Let's get you to bed, yeah?" Bucky scooted closer on the couch, one arm slinging back around Steve's shoulders and the other settling around his waist. That look of stubbornness came over Steve's face like he was actually gonna protest for a second, but instead he deflated against Bucky's side, letting him lift up to their feet. Now that the couch was soaked through and Steve was at least relatively dry, the warmth of the bed might help stop this before it got worse.

The apartment wasn't big enough for the couch to be far from the bedroom, but Steve's knees were shaking by the time they got to the edge of it. Bucky had him plastered close, would be getting him wetter if it weren't for the cocooning blankets. Bucky's teeth were chattering slightly, but he could warm himself up after he made sure Steve was okay.

"Bucky?"

The quiet voice snapped him outta his daze, blinking down worriedly. Steve'd pulled away enough to stand on his own, knees still trembling. He was looking right at Bucky, eyes caught with that focused gaze he normally only reserved for drawing paper.

His eyes were tender, almost sweet as he blinked up at Bucky, looking way younger than his twenty years all wrapped up in blankets and still damp enough to make his hair stick to his forehead.

"Yeah, Steve?" Bucky forced his voice to be as playful as he could, rubbing his hand across Steve's shoulder in some muted effort to warm and comfort him at the same time.

"You, uh. I'm sorry I got you all wet." It was the closest thing to a thank you for saving my ass that Bucky ever got and it normally made him light up like a fool. Today, though, everything was still too wet and cold and precarious for Bucky to smile. They were barely even into this thing, he wasn't going to smile until it was over. Because it would be. It would be over and the cold would pass and they'd make it out fine on the other side.

He wasn't losing Steve like this.

"M'used to your stubbornness by now, punk. I'll be fine," Bucky pushed Steve carefully back onto the mattress, pretending not to think about what he didn't say. Bucky's body may be fine, hopefully would be fine. But Steve might not. And Bucky would definitely not be fine with that at all.

As much as Steve still needed the bruises on his stomach looked at, as much as Bucky was dying to wash the blood carefully away from where Steve's hand had landed on the concrete, being warm right now was a hell of a lot more important than that.

Steve was out like a light before his head hit the pillow. Bucky tucked up the sheets and blankets as tightly as he could, brushing damp hair away from Steve's forehead and sending out another silent prayer to no one at all, not feeling the least bit guilty for it this time.

He could've lost Steve today. He might still lose Steve, if this didn't pass.

It didn't.

Steve woke Bucky up coughing in the middle of the night for the fourth night in a row and Bucky held back tears and scooted outta the bed where he'd had his back pressed to Steve's. He knelt down beside the bedframe, fingers lacing up with cold ones.

"Hey, hey. You're gonna be okay. It's gonna pass." Steve smiled weakly at him for a second before another cough took him and his fingers squeezed tight, trying their damned near best to crush Bucky's through their fragileness. He was more scared of Steve crushing his own bones.

Two days later, Steve wasn't getting any better. Maybe he was getting worse. His temperature was a rollercoaster of highs and lows. His skin was too pale, nearly translucent over his wrists. The coughing fit last night had flecks of blood in it and Bucky had nearly had a heart attack until Steve managed to whisper he'd bit his tongue. Bucky wasn't sure if he believed him. The rattle in Steve's lungs was back. The bruises across Steve's fragile chest weren't healing the way they should've by now.

Bucky was a wreck with worry and Steve was too out of it to even try to reassure Bucky he was fine. The last few pennies Bucky had went to medicine, but Steve still wasn't breathing right. That shallow rasping sound still filled the apartment so loud that Bucky wanted to scream to drown it out before he lost his damn mind.

He had to give up his job at the docks because there was no way in hell he was leaving Steve alone like this.

Steve had shoved lightly at him once, on a good morning that'd had Bucky hoping he was getting better. He'd weakly told him to get outta the house and go work, dammit, and Bucky had rolled onto his back and - very carefully - wrestled Steve into an exaggerated hug while proclaiming in a too-loud voice that the docks weren't nearly so salty as what he had at home.

Steve had squirmed and gasped out a soft laugh, scaring Bucky enough to let go. He'd gotten a soft smile in reaction to his worried face, and floated on a cloud rest'a the day, even singing quietly to himself as he got medicine ready for Steve.

Then of course, that night Steve thrashed and coughed and nearly had an asthma attack, it got so bad. Bucky had to squeeze his hand and place a palm over his heart, eyes locked and quiet, shaky words trying to calm Steve down enough so that he didn't end up on his fucking deathbed.

The hope Bucky had for Steve getting better squashed like a bug. He was still getting worse.

It was the eighth night since the storm and Bucky'd had enough. He whispered a promise to be back soon, then he was jogging down the streets to the too-familiar building down the block. The nurse that worked the front desk looked up as she saw him, her face instantly coating into a very unimpressed but vaguely sympathetic look. She hadn't liked him since he was a kid, but he was an adult now and she was cordial. She liked Steve though, and that was what mattered.
"Mr. Barnes," she said as politely as a thirty-something woman who dealt with sickness and death and poverty everyday of her life could.

"Ms. Jones," Bucky greeted, leaning on the counter with a focus that already had her sitting up straighter. He went right into it, no preamble about the 'weather sucking lately' or otherwise. "Look, I know that I still owe you a bit from the last time, but I didn't come for any more medicine today. Well, maybe, but I have a real important question first. If you could just give your advice, ma'am --"

"Mr. Barnes, calm down. I'm assuming this is about Steve? I can go get the doctor if you need him to come see him."

"No, ma'am, that's fine, I just. He's not getting any better and I don't think it's just a cold anymore and I don't know what to do. I don't know what I can do, because I don't even know what's wrong with him."

"Can you give me a list of symptoms?"

Bucky rattled off the list about the trouble breathing, the coughing, the muscle weakness, the temperature fluctuations. At one point Ms. Jones froze, stopped writing down the list and just looked up at Bucky. Bucky cut off mid sentence, looking back at her.

"What is it?"

"You said that he wasn't coughing up much, correct?" Bucky nodded. "And when he does, it has a greenish tint?"

He nodded again automatically before he froze too. Her voice was shaking a bit and Bucky's entire nervous system narrowed down to this suspended moment. No, no, no. It couldn't be something that terribly wrong, could it? Steve couldn't be-- no, not Steve--

"I'm afraid that sounds like Steve has pneumonia." The world stopped spinning and Bucky almost fell over with it. "I'm so sorry Bucky. I know he's always had troubles with his health and you've always been so kind to look out for him." She had that patented mothering look on her face, like she was about to reach out and pet his arm.

Bucky wasn't listening anymore. He backed away from the desk slowly, not seeing anything in front of him. Pneumonia. That was deadly.

Exhaustion tugged at him, grief and pain and worry all surmounting to take over his senses. His eyes were already shut against tears, so it wasn't long before consciousness slipped from him too.
A soft rubbing over the back of his hand eventually drew him out of the dreamless sleep. He blinked against the rough cotton in his eyes, taking a second to figure out where he was. Bucky's left leg was asleep from being cramped underneath him and it was dark now, dark enough to be night. He'd been asleep for so long and if he didn't have the still-warm presence of Steve's fingers brushing over his hand he'd've probably had an asthma attack of his own. Although he was pretty sure those were called panic attacks if you don't have asthma.

He skirted his fingers back across Steve's, forehead still pressed to the mattress as he took a moment just to feel the soft tight skin stretched over the bones of Steve's hand. Steve was dying. Steve had pneumonia and he might not make it through the night.

"You with me?" Steve's voice asked quietly into the darkness. It was a simple question, just a way to check if Bucky was awake or not. But it made Bucky wanna cry and scream and run and take Steve somewhere where this wasn't their life, where he didn't get triple whammied with bruises, lingering weakness, and freezing cold wetness at the same time. Because fuck, Steve may not be with him at all much longer.

Bucky lifted his head, a rush of cold air hitting his cheeks, streaks down it colder than others. So he'd been crying, then. He had no idea for how long. Maybe since the nurse had told him. Maybe since right now.

Steve looked right at him, his brow furrowing as he recognized the tears on Bucky's face. He already had to have known something was up, Bucky didn't exactly fall asleep kneeling by the bed on a daily basis.

Steve looked right at him with those big blue eyes that looked like the ocean in the summer and Bucky couldn't stop the words from coming out of his mouth.

"You have pneumonia," he breathed, his voice hitching on the last word. Steve's expression flashed, crumpling, eyes shutting as he steeled himself. Bucky stared hopelessly at Steve's face, at the closed eyelids, at the flicker at the hollow of his throat. This was gonna be taken away from him.

Steve was dying.

When his eyes opened back up, they weren't watery like Bucky's were. He looked so strong that Bucky wanted to throw something, wanted to scream at Steve that he wasn't allowed to be okay with someone trying to take him away from Bucky like this.

"Buck," Steve said, sounding like he was in pain. Bucky blinked as Steve nudged his hand. He had Steve's fingers crushed in a death grip, shit. He quickly let go of Steve's hand, making to apologize, but Steve quickly snatched Bucky's hand back before he could say anything.

The movement made Bucky go quiet, staring at their joined fingers. His best friend, his best friend in the whole world was dying and it was Bucky's fault. It had to be, he hadn't gotten there fast enough, he should've stayed home from work when he knew it was storm and flu season and--

"Bucky," Steve said again, stern this time. Bucky blinked back into reality, automatically looking down at their hands to see if he was crushing Steve again. He wasn't. "Bucky, you know this isn't your fault. We knew this was gonna happen eventually. It's just..."

"Just what?" Bucky interrupted. Steve could go out there and be righteous any other day on the planet, but not about this. There was no right and wrong with this, no justice served. Steve Rogers was the best human being on this earth and no amount of misplaced faith would make his death okay. "There's nothing right about this, Steve. You know that. It's not fucking fair."
Steve cringed at Bucky's crude words and Bucky couldn't help the hollow pang of guilt. Here he was kneeling by Steve's deathbed, and Bucky was still managing to annoy him.

Silence fell on them and Bucky bit his lip, blinking back tears as he stared at the wall above Steve's head. He was such a fucking mess. But he couldn't do this. He couldn't do this. It'd been bad before, of course, living the life they did. But Bucky had never actually believed Steve might not make it through the night. But now, the chances of him surviving this...

They were still for a long time, only interrupted by Steve's occasional wracking cough. Bucky cringed every time the terrifying sound echoed in the room, ripping at his heart.

It was probably an hour later before Steve's eyes lit on Bucky's again in the semi-dark. The room was lit up by a soft golden glow from the streetlight outside, illuminating mottled orange.

Steve's eyes were soft, like maybe he understood how Bucky felt and wanted this to be easier for him. There was nothing that would make this easier for him. Bucky was watching a candle get snuffed out, but instead of one breath it was a week in coming, a lifetime in coming as each punch landed on that keen, caring face knocked them that much closer to this moment.

There'd been so many moments since the beginning, so many things they'd done and never had the chance to. How much of that meant to Steve what it did to Bucky? How much of their past would Steve change if he had known it was only leading to this? Here, in a dimly lit tiny room with clouds overhead outside and the only familiar sound the awful cry of Steve's cough.

"Steve?" Blue eyes lit up gold from the outside streetlight as they flashed to Bucky.

"Yeah?" The word still sounded like it hurt to say. This could be it. It could all be over in the next couple of minutes and Bucky had to know. He shifted his weight, leg sparking up with needles from being pinned too long. For the rest of his life, that feeling of coming back from numbness would probably remind him of this moment.

"If we could go back..." Bucky trailed off, blinking back the tears that were still trying to escape down his cheeks.

Go back, back to golden memories of Coney Island and happy mornings with Steve tossing a sketchbook his way. Back to when Sarah had still been alive, sharing a single mug of tea with Steve as Sarah ruffled Bucky's hair, kissed both their cheeks on the way to her night shift. Back to scraped knees instead of scraped hearts (and knees). Back to the way Steve used to laugh at Bucky's wild smile. Back to all the times that weren't riddled with disease and coughing and death, of losing everything they had.

"If we had time for that, would you... would you change anything?" It was a selfish question and Bucky didn't look up as he asked it, staring at Steve's thin fingers. The controlled hands of an artist. The things Steve could create...whole entire worlds. What was Bucky? What was Bucky without the sunshine at his side? He'd never thought about what he would be without Steve. He couldn't imagine being anything without Steve.

Those fingers curled up tighter, lifting Bucky's hand so his eyes were forced up, flicking them to Steve's. Steve looked so damn exhausted, but somehow he had a ghost of a smile on his drawn face.

"Buck," he said, chiding like he was scolding a particularly ridiculous child. Bucky's eyes widened a tad, but he had no idea why Steve was looking at him like he was the biggest idiot of the century.

"If this is it...if this is my last breath," Steve wrestled back a cough, fingers curling harder. "I'm leaving with no regrets."

He smiled that sad, hopeful, sweet look and there was no stopping the tears now as they gathered at the edges of Bucky's eyes, a single one slipping free and sliding down his cheek.

It seemed impossible, but so trademark Steve to somehow be okay with the terrible life he'd had to live. All the fights, all the loss he'd had to suffer.

Bucky couldn't possibly imagine what might make all that worth it. What in the world could be worth all that? Steve squeezed his hand tighter.

"This life might be over, but." He paused, lights catching on the water in his eyes too. "I had you. 'Til death."

The dam broke.

One moment he was frozen on his knees beside the bed and then he was tangled in the sheets, holding onto Steve as his body shook harder than Steve's did when he coughed. He cried into Steve's blond mess of hair and Steve clung back to him weakly.

_I had you, til death._ They had nothing. Bucky'd always thought both of them had nothing. But Steve's bright eyes always saw the world with so much more than his could. Bucky'd thought they had nothing and Steve turned to him with that precious face and told him he had everything, he didn't regret a single thing, because he had Bucky.

There was nothing Bucky had done in his life to deserve this. He didn't deserve Steve. The unquestionable morals, the optimistic heart that smiled at the sun, the battle-fists that threw him into fights he knew he couldn't get out'a, just 'cause it was right.

He didn't deserve to live while this brilliant star faded and blinked out in the dark blanket of Bucky's sky. It wasn't fair. For some reason, Steve'd chosen him when they were kids. For some reason, Steve looked at him and saw what Bucky couldn't in the mirror.

It would break his heart if it didn't make him the happiest person in the world. And he'd always been too damned selfish to change Steve's mind. He'd tried saying he wasn't worth the trouble, but Steve would have none of it. He always told Bucky he never needed anything more, he was lucky with what he had.

Staring at the tragedy and pain of Steve's life, Bucky'd just thrown up his hands. What the hell did Steve feel lucky for?

He felt lucky he had Bucky. Bucky couldn't give him much, but that was something that'd always been Steve's for the taking. He was never leaving. He'd never turn his back on this stupidly perfect little dying punk.

He'd never be so eloquent to say something like that to Steve. He couldn't even say it back. He could only lay here and hold Steve and cry into his hair and make the pillow wet and wish and pray and curse that this was their life.

Time folded and slipped around them like the warm blankets they couldn't afford, holding them to each other as Bucky sobbed and Steve silently waited for his body to shut down.

But somehow, it didn't that night. The waiting and the crying and the promise of death hung over their heads in the dark, but nothing bit. The two of them fell asleep tangled and tired and broken, the sheets and pillows wet, holding each other tighter than they'd ever dared to before. It wasn't like it mattered anyways, because Steve might not wake up in the morning.

A week later, somehow, Steve was sitting up and feeding himself cold soup in bed.

A month later he was pelting Bucky in the back with a snowball.

A year and a half later he got his first rejection slip from the army.

Bucky got a very different kind of letter.

Chapter End Notes

Just so everyone knows: the next chapter jumps directly to Captain America: The First Avenger, in the scene that Steve rescues Bucky from the torture camp in Azzano.

On the note of music; an amazing person made an entire This is My Last Breath playlist on youtube that consists of basically all the songs the fic includes. If you'd like a link to that so you don't have to search for songs, you can find it here!

(Huge shoutout of thanks to every one of you who've made something for, commented on, or simply encouraged this fic - I never could've done it without you.) xx
"Steve." The word sounded like a prayer, like a dying breath and the first gasp of air in a century. His name slipping from that mouth rushed a crushing wave of relief; Bucky was alive and he knew Steve and...something was wrong. His eyes were glossed over, lips curved up in a way he'd never seen before.

The tone finally settled into Steve's head and the wide smile that'd taken over his mouth faded at the edges. The word sounded like a prayer, like a dying breath and the first gasp of air in a century. It ripped something wide open in Steve's heart.

He'd always been the one hauled outta alleys by Buck. Now he was in an all-new-body, hauling Bucky outta POW camps. War, war they'd never seen before, war changed everything. The reversal was twisting something in Steve's stomach because this didn't feel like atonement for all those times he'd been pulled from a fight. It felt like hell.
Worse, though, than the call of Steve's name, disgusting smell around them, word torture thrumming on Steve's tongue: the look on Bucky's face. Unabashed hopefulness, raw relief. Muddled too-much-give, like pushing against a rotted wall that was supposed to be sturdy and solid but instead melted and bowed like a flimsy mattress. Bucky was the strong one, the solid one, and he was looking up at Steve with this loopy smile that should've been comforting but made Steve wanna be sick.

The Bucky he knew would never let himself show that much hope, pure emotion. Always careful, guarded. Wary, smart, strong. Not this, strapped to a table and swaying sickly-green.

He couldn't handle the overload. Mantra of name and serial-number, loose limbs-- Bucky'd be fine. Steve found him, alive, but something was so so wrong. If time wasn't of essence, if he wasn't in uniform and pumped with adrenaline, he might've just curled Bucky in his arms and shattered into a thousand pieces.

"C'mon." Steve helped him off the table, the warmth of Bucky under his hands shaking him outta his head. Bucky looked queasy enough to fall over if Steve wasn't holding onto him, but Steve wasn't planning to let go. Ever.

He'd been told Bucky was dead. Steve absolutely couldn't believe-- no matter what condolences, proof. If Buck was dead, Steve was 100% sure he'd feel it. Distance between them damned, he'd know. But he hadn't felt anything, the world hadn't collapsed and changed colors, so he'd convinced himself Bucky was alive.

And he'd been right. Bucky was here, breathing smiling looking up at Steve like Steve was the goddamned sun. Even though he hadn't gotten here fast enough. His stomach clenched at the leather cuffs that'd been holding Bucky down, the strewn equipment hastily left on tables. Bucky. He'd been tortured and Steve'd barely managed to save him.

"I thought you were dead," he managed, cupping a rough hand on Bucky's jaw. The bone felt same as always - Steve'd memorized the sharp angle by now, drawn it a hundred times. Scanning over the beautiful haunted face, comparing it to the one he'd memorized...Buck's eyes were different. That bright, take-on-the-world fire was gone. His mouth was different, no curving smirk or resting-bitchface to be seen.

Darting gaze, fumbling-joy shifting to confusion. Buck was holding himself with careless fluidity, almost like he didn't think he was awake. They could deal with that later. Right now, Bucky was upright and they had to be walking. Running, if Buck could.

"I thought you were smaller," Bucky slurred in response, maybe attempting for banter and falling flat. Missing that spark. The normally immovable, impenetrable hero of his childhood was shaking on his feet. So much about this was not okay.

A loud noise went off in the corridor, danger sparking with reality and they had to get outta here. Steve took a quick scan of the torture room for anything to take to headquarters. One wall had a map, markers in cities. So this'd been the planning room, too. They'd kept Bucky in here while they planned their war, kept him ready and available in the center of plotting...he probably hadn't had a moment of peace or privacy.

Steve looked away, sucking in a breath. Strange it didn't rattle in his chest, healthy enough to take as much oxygen as he needed. Now he was holding up Buck - who wasn't taking oxygen half as well. Leaning all his weight on Steve, verge of collapsing. Or maybe they'd done something to his feet... as soon as they were out, he was giving Bucky a thorough checkup.

"C'mon," Steve said again, one arm wrapped over Bucky's shoulders and the other holding up his torso as they edged away from the table. Bucky gripped back just as tight, breath catching in little pained noises every time they moved. Steve shut out the sounds, pretending not to hear. It'd destroy him to listen to that; had to focus, get Buck somewhere safe first.

They weren't even out the door before Bucky's shaky voice tried speaking again.

"What happened to you?" he managed, like it hurt every bone to say. It wasn't loopy as before though. Even if he was in pain, at least Bucky was with him mentally. Maybe.

"I joined the army," Steve replied, the joke falling lightly between them. If Bucky was even slightly there, he'd appreciate the light-heartedness. That's how they coped. Steve tugged him faster, shifting as he scoped out the hallway.

The moment Bucky started carrying his own weight, Steve let go to scope ahead, eliminate threats.
Everything was strange, like he'd woken and the world was shifted three inches to the left in a place he'd thought he'd memorized. Bucky was here - Bucky was here - but something wasn't. Not to mention the road inside'd been hectic as hell, but they hadn't run into anyone since.

Nothing was adding up and it was making Steve uneasy, focused on guarding. He almost missed it when Buck spoke up again behind him.

"Is it permanent?" There was a note of concern, maybe pissiness too. Why the hell would Buck be pissed? Steve glanced back for just a moment. Bucky was hobbling, but he was upright, which is what they needed.

"So far," Steve replied distractedly, scanning the walls and floors for a clue to what the hell was going on. Why were all the guards gone?

Then of course, it turned out the place was blowing up. That'd definitely do it for evacuation.

And apparently there was more than one side-effect to a failed serum. Looking at the red skull beneath peeled skin? He didn't have one'a those - didn't even think about it until Buck commented - but that didn't stop him from feeling like there was something trying to crawl under his skin.

Until he turned around and saw Bucky's expression. Straight outta the horror books he loved, staring petrified. Steve followed Bucky's gaze, the retreating bespeckled man beside Schmidt. That was the same guy Steve'd seen running outta the room they'd kept Bucky in. Was that...was that the guy that'd been torturing Bucky?

That man'd been right there and Steve'd ignored him. And now Buck was a damn wreck. Weakened body shaking like a leaf in Central Park. What else'd Steve missed in his hurry to get them out?
Clearly, Bucky wasn't as okay as his hobbling body implied. There had to be other signs he'd ignored - Steve went back over Bucky's questions as he ushered him hurriedly up the stairs.

He'd sounded pretty damn concerned about the serum. Maybe not a quip to lighten the mood. Well, obviously there'd be some curiosity there, Steve came back double his old weight and a foot taller.
The last time Bucky'd seen him, Steve'd been in an entirely different body. But not just curiosity, Bucky seemed genuinely disoriented by it.

Torture wasn't something Steve knew much about, but hallucinations might be a side effect? There was a possibility Bucky didn't think he was real. He'd been stumbling around, almost dreamwalking...

But that didn't make any sense, because why would he've followed Steve outta that room? Steve hadn't given him much of a choice, but still. Bucky wouldn't just let someone take him wherever, would he? That wasn't the Bucky he knew.

Then again, the slumped shoulders and drawn face of the haunted man in front of him didn't look all that much like the Bucky he knew either.

Steve pushed aside the thoughts, bigger worries sliding up to the top. They had to find a way across, now, or they were gonna be stuck.

The only way to cross the pit of fire and explosions was a thin metal support beam. Bucky saw it the same time Steve did, looking at it grimly. It was their only option.

"Let's go. One at a time." Steve reached for Bucky again as he stepped up to the rail, steadying his weight as he hoisted a leg over. Even through layers of tattered uniform, Bucky was warm. Alive.

Steve gripped a little tighter as he looked over the rail. It was so thin, the metal looked like it could barely hold any weight at all.

He was reluctant to let go of the solid hold, but getting Bucky across was the most important thing. Worry etched between Steve's eyebrows as he watched Bucky inch forward, brave and determined balancing carefully on thin metal with floppy shoes.

It was hard to breathe just watching. Then the bar shifted, jolting Bucky's center of gravity. Steve startled, worry lines creasing deeper. He should've just picked Buck up bridal style, carried him across in Steve's arms. If Bucky didn't make it, if he fell...

Steve had no idea what he'd do.

The metal bar shifted again, snapping out a few screws and tilting downward. Oxygen stuck in Steve's throat, unable to breathe as he stared at Bucky's back. Then the supports gave and Bucky broke into a half-run, down the thin line falling falling-- dipping downdowndown...

The support finally snapped. Bucky jumped. Steve's heart stopped. Then Bucky's body slammed into the railing on the other side, adrenaline-filled arms hauling his body over the metal rail.

Worn feet hit solid ground and he swayed. Then he was looking steadily at Steve. Bucky made it. He was okay. Steve's head cleared, exhaling as the world righted itself.

"There's gotta be a rope or something!" Bucky shouted, hands white-knuckling the rail he'd clambered over. Steve'd been paying a hellofalot of attention; there wasn't a rope. There wasn't another way over. But Buck was on the safe side, that was what mattered. Steve'd gotten him (most'a the way) out and that'd been the mission. He'd known going in he probably wouldn't survive this - the idea that Bucky still could was the only consolation he needed to blow up with the factory.

"Just go!" He waved an arm, encouraging on. Buck had to get out, he was what mattered. They were friends, but he could leave Steve behind. Steve wouldn't be able to, but this was Bucky. He'd always been the less needy one. Steeled his voice into the stern order-giving one, just in case, so Bucky'd have to listen, "Get outta here!"

The last word barely left his mouth before Bucky had the rail in a death grip, dark eyes wide and wild as he shouted back,

"No, not without you!"

The words were half-crazed and hands-down the most passionate thing that'd ever left Bucky's mouth. That dirt-smeared, struggling body shaking with the vehemence of his words, pieces of his hair falling over his forehead as his mouth snapped shut around the barking shout.

There was absolutely zero room to argue. Steve'd never seen him more serious. Something deep inside his chest coiled tight, suddenly hard to breathe.

Didn't even have time to think what a fool Buck was - a dedicated fool - before he started scoping a way out too.

Steve'd thought for a moment Bucky could go without him. Apparently he'd been wrong.

That thought fueled him, gaze caught on the broken rail. With explosions destroying the world under their feet; had to move now and had to move fast. Using strength he wasn't the least accustomed to, Steve bent back metal rail, opening a gap to jump through.

It was crazy, but Bucky's panicked eyes ricocheted a new wave of adrenaline and hope through veins. Buck wouldn't leave without him, Steve had to do this. The handsome features were distorted with confusion and fear, but Steve could do this. He could do this.

Backed up far as he could, which wasn't anywhere near far enough for this gap. He could make the jump. He had to make the jump. Bucky wasn't gonna leave without him. And Steve wasn't gonna let him down.

He took off running, giving it his all in few, short feet. Push off and jump, warmth from the fire crackling beneath-- burning the soles of his feet as he flew, everything slowed-down as the railing got closer and closer.

The only thing he could see was fire and Bucky, both exponentially closer every millisecond. He might not make it. Extending arms, angled body and prepared to grab the metal bar like Bucky had.

He underestimated the serum again. His boots just cleared the rail, sending him sprawling forwards with momentum. There was a split second of I made it, I'm alive before he was crashing into Bucky.

They both went tumbling backwards, Steve skidding his feet to try'n stop before knocking Buck to the ground. He caught his footing just as Bucky lost his, then Steve's arms wrapped tight around Bucky's waist and hauled him upright. Their bodies were pressed so hard together that Steve could barely breathe, but Bucky clung back just as tightly.

A sweaty, smelly mop of hair brushed his chin as Bucky buried his face in Steve's neck. Buck was shaking head-to-toe, momentary strength from the jump melting to scared relief. They were so close and real and alive. Both'a them were alive, they were okay, and they needed to get outta here right now.

Because his nose was still pressed to Steve's skin, he could feel Bucky's lips part to say something. As much as Steve would cherish that sentiment or scolding, abandoning the exploding building was still priority #1. Feelings and discussions could come later.

"We gotta go," Steve interrupted before Bucky could start, prying his friend reluctantly outta his arms. Bucky blinked at him and they were off again, down more hallways. This time, Steve kept a steady hand between Bucky's shoulders as they moved. A reminder of Steve's presence (he'd been stupid to think, even for a moment, that Bucky'd leave without him), a support system and a push to move faster.

They turned a corner and there was a door, escape and promise of freedom, safety. An explosion sounded just outside, blue light flashing through the door's window. Steve pushed faster. This time Bucky pushed back against his hand, forcing them a step backwards.
"Steve," Bucky called hopelessly, echoing scared confused lost. Another explosion went off and Bucky flinched, twisting to stare with miserable eyes. Steve's breath caught in his throat and he wanted so bad to do this properly, sit Buck down and help him through whatever was making him tense up like this. But they didn't have time. They simply didn't have time.

"C'mon, Buck, we gotta go. Okay? We're almost out." The look on Bucky's face was absolutely awful, darkened agony. Something equally dark twisted inside his chest - someone'd done this to Bucky and Steve would shatter them into a billion pieces it'd change that.

"Steve?" Bucky asked, curious, like he'd never seen him before. No, no, no. Now was not the time for more confusion. Steve had to get Bucky to cooperate, to come outside without freaking at every blue-fire explosion.

"It's me, Buck. I'm gonna protect you, alright? Just come with me." Pleading, and inadequate. He was so far outta his depth here, no clue what to say. Steve ran his hand comfortingly down Bucky's arm; maybe if words couldn't go through, touch might. And thankfully, he turned complacent under Steve's touch, slipping from scared to the unseeing look from before. Okay, not exactly thankfully then.

Steve's stomach lurched - that was exactly what Bucky'd looked like when Steve first found him strapped to that table, muttering his serial number and rank. But he didn't have time to worry, they might be dead in a few minutes anyways.

He wrapped around Buck's shoulders and chest again, pulling him for the door. Another blue light went off and Bucky cringed, but didn't stop. Okay, so blue-lights were a problem. Steve took mental note and kicked the door open, hauling Buck outside with uncalculated strength. Automatically spun their bodies so the shield on Steve's arm would protect them both.

Bucky was shaking again, cringing and pulling deeper in on himself every time a blue-light went off. The fire wasn't headed their way though, so they might be winning. Actually, they might've just won.

A few stragglers from the base were attempting to fire or run, but one'a the tanks was taking them out. A soldier Steve recognized from the cages was sitting on top, and shouted down into the tank when he saw them. The head of the tank swiveled and took out the last few visible Germans, then another prisoner stuck his head out the top.

"Sarge is okay!" started a shout, which was quickly repeated further down the clearing. Another prisoner in hand-to-hand struggle with a German delivered a final blow then took up the shout too, traveling the word down to the men outta earshot.

It was only a moment before cheers went up, battle-cry-like from the roughened voices and inability to really celebrate in a moment like this. There wasn't happiness on the battlefield, just wins and losses.

Another head stuck outta the tank and Steve took back his comment about the happiness. The guy had a mustache that arched his entire face, a bowler hat atop his head and a wide, ridiculous grin on his face.

"Men! Sarge is alive!" The man shouted, a bit'a Brooklyn twang in the joyed words. Bucky stopped shivering once the tank stopped firing blue missiles, but he was still leaning entirely on Steve, clinging to his clothes like he'd fall off the earth if he let go.

The prisoners from the base - the soldiers Steve'd saved- started to gather around them, everyone conglomerating in the clearing. Which would be great, if the building wasn't still exploding. It might not ever explode externally, but the risk wasn't worth it.

"The building's gonna blow!!" Steve shouted, letting go of Bucky with one arm to wave at the men to move towards the woods. The coverage of the trees was a ways off, but if they could get there they'd be safe.

The man with the bowler hat echoed Steve's words, catching the attention of more soldiers. The whole mass of them - so many, even more than Steve remembered rescuing - surged towards the woods. All except a few, just five men, who came running towards Steve and Bucky instead.

The man in the bowler hat went straight for Bucky's other arm, lifting it up over his shoulder. He pointed at another of the four who'd ran over with him. "We got Bucky -- Gabe and Morita, you go secure that tank. It's gonna be a hell of a lot easier to travel if we've got something with firepower and wheels."

The dark man and the Asian man nodded, taking another brief glance at Bucky, then Steve, giving an appreciative nod before they were headed for the tank.

"Voulez-vous de l'aide?" One man asked him. Steve blinked, pulling Bucky forward with him.

"Dernier, we can't tell much'a what you're sayin' when Gabe ain't around. Go see if you can grab another tank." The Frenchman hurried off, snapping into soldier-mode. Then the fifth spoke up, mustache that made him look like an Italian painter.

"Need me to take over..." The British-accent turned to him, trailing off in implication of asking for Steve's name.

"Captain," Steve provided, just a tad guiltily. He wasn't actually a Captain, but. It was the only thing he really had to hold onto. And these men needed direction right now more than anything - it was as much for them as it was for him. Then he shook his head at the offer, arm tightening on Bucky's shoulder. "And I'm fine. Thanks, though."

The man nodded, falling into step beside them and lifting his gun at the ready, scanning the grounds for any danger. "I'm Falsworth by the way, Captain."

"I'm Dugan," the man in the bowler hat heaved, voice strained from carrying Bucky's weight. "From the 107th."

"So that's how you know Bucky," Steve's voice was a little pained too. More from mental exhaustion than physical exertion, although he had just stormed an enemy base alone. But now, walking alongside these men who'd instantly come to help...it looked like Steve wasn't alone anymore.

"Everyone knows Sergeant Barnes, Captain. If you don't mind me askin', how exactly do you?" Dugan looked at him curiously over Bucky's head.

"Grew up together," Steve replied, the three words kinda...extremely inadequate. They did grow up together, but so much more than that; they protected each other, fought for each other. Bucky understood him like no one else, was there for him like no one else. When his ma died, Bucky had clapped him on the shoulder and practically forced Steve to move in with him. He'd never had to spend a night alone. Buck was always there, through thick and thin, good and the worse. Buck'd been there when Steve caught ill, had taken on extra jobs to pay for medicine. He'd been there when Steve'd almost died of pneumonia, had cried when Steve told him it was alright because at least he'd had the best pal in the whole damn world at his side since the beginning, more than Steve ever could've asked for. More than Steve deserved.

The three words felt more than a little inadequate.

Dugan still let out a low whistle. "That's mighty impressive, coming all the way out here to save your boy. He's a lucky fellow, if he's got someone like you lookin' out for him."

Steve couldn't help the short laugh that escaped his throat. Him, looking out for Bucky. Their entire lives it'd been the other way around and despite all this, he wasn't sure that was about to change any time soon.

Both Falsworth and Dugan looked at him curiously, confused by the laugh. Steve was about to give an aborted explanation when a soft voice spoke up between them.

"More like lookin' out for his ass, 'cos he decides to storm enemy bases in his free time." Bucky huffed out, slurred but a little less haunted. Dugan laughed, big and full-heartedly, but Steve just cut to Bucky's face, which was lifted now.

"You alright?" he pressed quietly. Bucky's eyes shot to the side, glancing at Steve before taking in a shaky breath.

"Been worse," he replied with a strained bit of the chipper smartass Steve used to know. If the words were supposed comfort, they definitely did the opposite. Bucky'd been worse than this at one point. For about the hundredth time today, Steve felt like keeling over and puking up his breakfast.

Just as soon as they hit the safety trees - the last ones - Bucky doubled over and that's exactly what he did. Upright one moment, then wrenched over and hurling the next. Steve quickly wrapped his arms 'round Bucky's bent form, fingers digging into ribs to keep him upright, support his weight. The sound was awful, Bucky's shaking body was worse, but somehow Steve managed to look up at Dugan and Falsworth, tilting his head in indication.

"Go and round up the men to that clearing. It's about three-hundred feet further, but we'll regroup there."

Dugan and Falsworth nodded, then they were off in the direction Steve'd sent them. The other three men from Dugan's party - Gabe, Morita, and Dernier? - were rumbling on the path next to the forest, two in a tank and one in a truck of sorts.

The Asian man waved at Steve and Bucky as he passed by in the truck, concerned as he looked at Bucky's slouching, puking form. Steve waved back, tried to portray some form of we're all okay here. Which hopefully, Bucky was.

The hurling didn't last long, Steve doubted he had much to puke up anyways. Bucky was at least twenty pounds lighter than the last time Steve'd seen him, and he hadn't spare to lose in the first place. Not to mention Steve couldn't see anything beneath his tattered uniform.

Eventually, hands landed on knees and he tried to catch his breath, a few tumbling pained noises.

"Buck? You okay?" Steve asked softly, one hand holding him up and the other rubbing over his back the way Bucky used to for him. Bucky nodded slightly, a hand grabbing Steve's arm as he pulled upright. He wiped the back of a hand over his mouth, eyes on Steve's face again.

"Are you okay?" Bucky asked, deadserious, eyebrows knitted together in that familiar look of concern. Steve almost laughed, just barely managing to keep the incredulous look to a minimum.
"Me? 'Course I'm alright," Steve scoffed, placing both hands on Bucky's biceps and guiding him carefully around the spit-up, started walking them towards the clearing ahead.

"Not 'course," Bucky corrected, and Steve supposed he had a point. Before the serum, it was never "of course." Wasn't like the whole world changed, just Steve's body. Pale-blues glanced back at Steve, expression wavering.

"Are you...what happened?" Bucky whispered again, voice going small and scared as he repeated the question from earlier. Only now Steve could see it clear; positively, absolutely lost.

He'd been so stupid - busy, yeah, but still, if he'd looked -- all right there. In the cellophane attempt at old humor. In the way he couldn't hold eye contact for longer than a few seconds. In the way he was looking at everything with wide doe-eyes. Buck didn't think this was real.

He could explain the serum later, but right now Steve needed Bucky to know where he was - with your Stevie - needed him to understand he was safe now. Steve stopped, holding carefully onto Bucky's arms as he looked over those icy eyes.

"Bucky, it's real. It's me, Steve. Your name is James Buchanan Barnes and we've been best friends since we were too small to go on rides at Coney Island." Steve studied the pretty face, waiting for the quip about how Steve'd still been too small the last time Bucky'd seen him (which was an exaggeration but absolutely something Buck'd say). He waited, pause stretching out as he realized it wasn't a pause at all.

Bucky was staring blankly ahead, lips barely moving, tiny murmurs tumbling out his mouth. Steve had to lean closer to hear the cut words--

"32557038. SergeantJamesBuchananBarnes. 32557038. SergeantJamesBuchananBarnes. 32557--"

Panic gripped hard - couldn't let Bucky fall back to that. The mantra shifted rapid, terrified as Steve tried to physically jog the sense back into him. The murmuring finally stopped somewhere in the middle of the fourth rough shake to shoulders. "Bucky," Steve begged for the tenth time in the past twenty seconds.

Blink, eyes going wide and curious--

"Steve?" He asked cautiously. Steve bit back a sob, reality sinking deep into his bones as Bucky looked up at him with too-hopeful eyes.

Bucky wasn't alright. Not at all.

He gathered Buck into his chest, arms gripping around him tight and squeezing carefully, afraid of his own strength and Bucky's new fragility. Bucky held on back, forehead ducked against Steve's collarbone.

"Yeah, it's me. I got you. You're safe now, Buck. I got you." Steve swallowed thickly around oncoming tears as Bucky relaxed into his arms. There was no immediate threat, not right now. They were 'always' from base and they'd definitely have to start walking soon, but giving the men a moment to catch their breath and gather their weapons and friends was a good idea anyways. They'd have to figure out who among them were too injured to walk, who was comfortable carrying what weapons and driving which vehicles.

Steve had no doubt the men could figure that out themselves. He'd definitely go set his chain of command and make sure everything was in order (and explain who the hell he was) in a bit, but that could wait until Bucky actually knew who he was.
This whole time, he'd been flashing in and out. Scared one moment, determined to stay at Steve's side the next. Disoriented for a few steps, then complacent and letting Steve drag him wherever.

They'd messed up Buck so bad.

Maybe he just needed a warm meal, a few days to let the idea of the serum sink in, a comfortable bed to sleep off the worst of what they'd done to him. And god, if he needed to talk, Steve'd be right there. He wasn't letting Bucky leave his side for a moment, now they were together again.

Well, honestly, it was more like he wasn't leaving Bucky's side.

The grimy face pulled away after a bit, peering up at Steve with guarded eyes.

"You're not like I remember," Bucky accused lightly. Steve clapped a hand on Bucky's bicep, unfamiliar muscle curving underneath his hand.

"You've changed a bit yourself." Steve gave Bucky a weak smile and he tensed for a moment, freezing up before forcing himself to relax, curving a ghost of the smile Steve used to draw all the time.

"I joined the army," Bucky joked, copying Steve's words back to him with the miniature version of his patented smirk.

Steve's mouth curled in an affectionate smile, biting back his retort. It wasn't the answer Steve wanted, but that could wait til they got back to base. Bucky was alive and slowly starting to sound more like himself. The rest? They could figure out.

~~~

The cot in Steve's tent didn't look anything like the table he'd been strapped to, but Bucky still winced as he laid down. Steve was at his side less than a second later, clumsy and too big and fretting much as he always did.

"-cky?" Steve asked worriedly and Bucky blinked. Seemed to catch the tail-end of his name lately.

"Steve," he replied stubbornly, looking over the lines of Steve's new face. It might be permanent. So far, Steve'd said. Or maybe that'd been in one'a the nightmares. Bucky wasn't so sure.

"Buck, you should really see a medic. You were...I found you on..." Steve looked like was about to cry, the word torture hanging at the edge of his lips. Bucky looked away.

"Lots of guys got it worse. I can hold my own." Steve looked reluctant to agree to that, so Bucky attempted a smile and tacked on to the end, "'Sides, I need somethin', m'sure that new rank a'yours can get you in all sorts a'things."

Like the gorgeous brunette agent that couldn't keep her eyes off. No one could keep their eyes off Steve, but Agent Carter looked different. Because, for whatever reason, Steve couldn't keep his eyes off her either.

It was a moment Bucky was pretty sure he'd never forget. Marching up to the base, hardass colonel narrowing his eyes at Steve as an entire wave of men marched in behind them.

The walk back hadn't been easy. He got back feeling in his toes sitting too close to the fire, then Steve was eventually pulling him away from the warmth with a murmur that Bucky was gonna "get a damned sunburn" if he sat that close.
He'd complied. Knew better than to fight. There wasn't any point in thrashing when he was moved - the bonds would hold. Or worse, they'd stick a needle and he'd numb up. Trapped inside like a shark at the aquarium, pounding on glass, peering out, see and feel everything, unable to do the slightest thing. Screams drowned out by the water in his brain.

So he knew better than to fight it as Steve tugged Bucky to his side. He didn't want to be buckled down again or trapped inside his own damned head.

Or, if it was a nightmare, he was never gonna get warm anyways. What was the point?

Steve held Bucky close and whispered stories to him about times when they were kids. He couldn't for the life of him figure out why, except maybe to prove he was actually Steve? It wasn't really another-person-with-Steve's-face that worried him though. It was whether or not Bucky was real. Either his hallucinations had gotten very creative or he was somehow in real life and missed out on somethin' very important. Because this body was not Steve's.

The curves of his chest fit like a puzzle against the slope of Bucky's back during the one night they bedded down on their trek to base.

Bucky hadn't slept, because he was still being restrained. Arms instead of leather buckles. If it was really Steve, maybe he was trying to help. If it was a hallucination, Bucky'd lost his marbles - picturing the table straps as Steve's arms?

It wouldn't be the first time. Although the muscled thing was new - hadn't thought'a that before.

But anyways, he was still half outta his mind the morning of their last day trekking. Time and scraps of food had been good to him though. Strength to shove everything down, numb himself off. If it was a hallucination, so be it.

If he was missing out on a really crucial part of Steve's life - which felt increasingly more likely - so be that too. Bucky'd march next to his best friend. They'd march and Bucky'd throw all his feelings out and be strong. The walk was long, but they marched in step. Synced, same as always.

Steve kept tabs on him the whole time, occasionally reaching over to pat him for comfort. When they reached base though - the final destination - the pat on his lower back from Steve didn't feel as much like comfort as it did like pride. Bucky'd made Steve proud.

The feeling that blossomed in his chest couldn't've been hallucinated. That caring, affectionate smile Steve gave him couldn't be hallucinated. This was real. It was all real.

Bucky steeled himself, looking back away from Steve with determination crossing his features. He could be strong.

He'd been a prisoner of war. He'd been tortured and humiliated. But he'd been saved. He, and thousands of other men, had been liberated.

By none other than Bucky's Steve.

He'd never been more proud. He could burst with it. Everyone knew Steve now - wait, no, everyone knew Captain America; but Steve was still his.

Steve Rogers was Bucky's years before he was anyone else's, and Bucky wasn't gonna let him forget that.

Even as the gorgeous brunette sauntered up to him, drawing a real smile outta his boy. Bucky watched them both, back and forth between their faces.

She stood too close. Spoke too softly, so Steve'd lean closer. She was tough, teasing. Unrelentless.

Beautiful.

Respected.

Bucky'd just lost Steve.

He turned away from the scene, eyes stinging. He was fine. Always figured it'd happen one day. They'd both settle down, live next door with their respective wives and spend evenings together as one big family.

Except that wasn't the life waiting for Bucky anymore. Bucky couldn't go...settle down with some dame now. It wouldn't be enough. He'd been without Steve for so long...and Bucky'd broken so easily without him...he couldn't fathom being apart again.

But it looked like while Bucky was being tortured and holding on to Steve's memory even tighter, Steve'd been falling in love and letting go of Bucky even more.

Bucky had to turn away.

The men were all looking at Steve, looking at the whole scene and waiting. Expectations, orders.

He could hear Steve and the beautiful agent still talking, happy smirk as he said something about calling a ride.

Bucky got a strange, burning urge in his gut. She was standing too close to Steve, her eyes flicking all over his new face. Glancing at his lips. The burning inside Bucky kicked up another notch. Then a brilliant idea flashed - it was probably childish as hell, but the scheme hit him and just the thought sounded so satisfying he couldn't help it.

Before the brunette could respond and fawn over his best friend even more, Bucky interrupted her.

"Hey!" Bucky aimed at the men. Then his attention went back to Steve. Always back to Steve.

"Let's hear it for Captain America!!" He shouted, and the girl took a single step back as Steve's attention broke away from her.

The annoyed set of his jaw cloaked into something warm and tingling as Steve looked over at him. Bucky raised an eyebrow, grinning with a look that Steve couldn't misinterpret.

Yeah, "Captain America". You're an idiot but I still love you.

Okay, maybe not exactly what Bucky was saying with his eyes. But in the back of his mind, he knew that's what he was thinking.

He'd been sure to put the emphasis on the "Captain America," though, so Steve knew exactly how Bucky felt about it.

He could be this redwhite'n'blue hero and Bucky'd stand at his side. Bucky'd support him through all of that, he'd cover his six and he'd step back to give Captain America the spotlight.

But the quirk of his eyebrow, the screw it, what the hell smile held a promise in it.

You may be Captain America to them, but you won't fool me. You're still Steve Rogers and I - even if I'm the only person on the planet who knows - won't let you forget that.

Still you and me, Rogers.

Steve smiled back at him.

As soon as he turned back around, as soon as blue eyes were off Bucky, the mask fell. He'd kept it up all day for Steve and he was just so damn tired.

And now that smile was gone, replaced with the look of worry as Steve hovered over where Bucky was laying on his cot, still trying to convince him to see a medic. Apparently the joking comments weren't deflecting.

Bucky'd always been more patient than people gave him credit for. But there was something pounding his temples, this itching feeling he couldn't shake. Making him restless. If Steve wasn't here, Bucky'd probably be curled in a ball, rocking back and forth. Because even the dim light of Steve's tent was too bright. His body was too exposed, stretched out like this. The room was stagnant around him and he was moving too much. He was so used to being held down by leather, the ability to move left his limbs feeling loose; could fly off any moment.

Steve was here, so he was wearing a brave face. That's how it always was. Just another way to protect Stevie. The day Bucky'd gotten his orders, he'd been chipper as ever. Put on the mask and smiled wide, not giving either an inch of room to think about tomorrow, when they'd be separated. Apart.

So much'd changed since then, and masks weren't so easy to slip into anymore. Sometimes he'd wished for a real one, something to hide behind and not be studied. If Steve couldn't see Bucky's emotions, he couldn't be disappointed. And Bucky's mask was slipping now, it was getting harder every moment to brave through this for him.

The pressure was wearing patience thin. Then Steve pushed one more time - "you really need to see a doctor, Buck" - and the thin string he was hanging from split.

"I'm not gonna lay out on another table for another doctor, Steve. Okay?" Bucky finally snapped. His anger was all directed inwards he'd broken so easily under their hands, Steve should be ashamed of him and he had a feeling Steve knew that. But he didn't have it in him anymore to keep up the façade. He was too goddamned tired.

Steve's hopeful expression crumpled, one hand running down his face as he looked miserably at Bucky. Bucky almost apologized, from the look on Steve's face alone. Defeated, and that was Bucky's fault too.

"God, Buck, I'm sorry. I should've known, I just-- Are...are you okay?" Like this was somehow all Steve's fault. Bucky really wished he had a mask to hide behind right now. Everything was too open. Exposed. Raw. He brought his hands up to cover his face, only realizing they were trembling once they were covering his eyes nose mouth. Steve didn't need to see this.

He sucked in a breath behind his hands, air tasting like dirt and blood on his tongue. Maybe the only thing left of Bucky anymore was skin, dirt, blood.

"Buck?" Steve asked again, a tentative hand coming up to rest over one of Bucky's. The added weight and warmth to his mask was so nice...Steve's hands were big and hard and much much cleaner than Bucky's. They still had blood and dirt on them, sure. But it wasn't polluted and poisonous like Bucky's blood was. Everything about Steve was cleaner than Bucky.

He wondered if Steve'd understand if he asked him to cover Bucky's face with his hands. Probably not. Probably just get more worried. He was just so sick of being unable to turn away. Of being peered down at and poked at and unable to hide, unable to stop looking. He just wanted to stop looking.

One of Bucky's hands lifted a touch, reversing to grab the one Steve'd covered him with. Their fingers interlocked, dirty dark callused ones with sweet white artist's hands. He probably hadn't even killed anybody yet. Bucky never wanted him to have to.

If he asked Steve to come home with him, would he? If Bucky begged him, he'd gotten so good at begging, hadn't he? begging stop, begging for relief. begging for Steve if he got down on his knees, what would Steve say? He might have a chance at getting outta this hellhole. Maybe released on psychological torture. As his single caretaker (the only one who ever cared in the first place), Steve might be able to come with him too. Actually, hell, Steve wasn't even technically in the army, based on the few bits he'd told Bucky on the walk.

But Steve'd never come home with him. He'd feel awful about denying Bucky that, but he wasn't selfish enough. Steve was a godforsaken angel. He'd never leave men to die out here. And now that he had the physical ability to help? Bucky couldn't drag him away if he tried.

And he would, Bucky'd be selfish enough to do that. He'd try. If he thought there was any chance of Steve choosing him over this war, he'd ask. But honestly, Bucky already knew the answer. And he'd deny himself the heartbreak. He was gonna pretend he didn't know the crumpling no.

He might've laid there forever - one hand over half his face, his and Steve's entwined hands awkwardly covering the other half - if he hadn't heard the tiny snuffling sound. If he wasn't a sniper, trained marksmen, the sound would've been too soft. But picking up on shit like that saved people's lives, it was Bucky's job. He heard the sound.

Pulling away the hands from his face and sitting up all at the same time was probably not the brightest idea, but he knew that sound. The oil lamp in the corner of the tent was dimming and the only light around, but it still made Bucky half-blind as he blinked stupidly and tried to focus on Steve's face.

The stark-blue looked up from where they'd been cast down in - what, sadness? shame? sorrow? - water brimming thick black bottom-lashes.

"Steve," Bucky said softly, worriedly, scooting forward on Steve's cot so his knees inter-lapped every other with the no-longer-bony ones. Steve looked away, sucking in a breath and blinking rapidly in attempt to dry the unshed tears. Well, they were having none of that.

He reached up a dirty hand, landing solidly on Steve's jaw and tilting his head to look at Bucky. Steve's bottom lip was trembling (one thing that hadn't changed), so he bit down on it and stared at their entwined hands. It was comforting, Bucky couldn't deny that. It always had been, that physical link to Steve of their touching fingers.

It was nothin' like holding hands with girls, that flirting, fluttering. This was another way to connect to Steve, have him here and solid and real and alive. Mutual promise and a physical representation of how tightly woven, how close their bond was. Nothin' like holding hands with girls.

If someone were to walk in right now, they'd probably get the wrong idea. With Bucky's knees pressed tight to trap Steve's, hand on his jaw and the other interlocked tight. To somebody who didn't know, it might've looked odd. Hell, even Bucky could admit it wasn't exactly normal behavior. Little on the touchy-feely side, even for them. But everything was still raw and painful and Steve was trying not to cry and it wasn't like he could let him start tearing up on Bucky's behalf. Bucky was gonna be okay.

He'd been saved. He'd been rescued. Steve'd come for him. It shouldn't've been possible, but somehow they were together again and they should be damn-near celebrating, not crying like dames.

"I'm sorry, Steve. I'm so sorry." Bucky dug his thumb into the hard angle of Steve's jaw, grounding him. This whole angled-jaw thing was new. Not quite as pretty as LittleSteve's sweet face, but it was nice. More ruggedly-handsome than sweet, Bucky supposed.

"Hell are you apologizing for, Buck? I'm the one who's sorry. I can't...what can I do? There's gotta be something I can do to help you." Steve begged, desperate. That was not what he'd expected. Steve's sympathy, sure. Good-natured teasing, definitely. But this desperation that had Steve wrapping one solid hand around Bucky's elbow...it was new. Really new.

But Bucky did a damn good job tampering down the strange tightening in his chest. His body did that sometimes around Steve, he was used to it. Well; he had been anyways. Hadn't seen Steve in a long time, it'd been months since that tightening feeling. Just had to get used to it again, was all.

"You already did help me, you nut. You got me outta there, remember? I'll be okay." Bucky pulled his hand back from Steve's jaw, maybe a little reluctantly. It was just...solid proof of Steve's existence under his hands. He couldn't hold on forever, though. They were in the middle of a war.

Steve just kept looking at him with that lost-hopeless-puppy-dog look that Bucky was pretty sure he'd learned from that damn stray down the street.

"What?" Bucky accused, crinkling up his nose. His tone'd lightened up - whole body'd lightened up. Steve could do that. It was all the damn sunshine and pure-angel-goodness. Just rubbed off sometimes. Well...got suckedup by Bucky's energy. He didn't actually get any sunnier himself, just stole some of Steve's and warmed himself with it.

What in the world would he be without Steve? In the few months they'd been apart, Bucky hadn't had much time to find out. He'd been much too busy ruthlessly killing people. Besides, he hadn't been without Steve, exactly. Steve sent him a total of four letters, each with a drawing on the back. He hadn't lost Steve. Bucky couldn't imagine what'd happen to him if he did.

"Please, Buck. You know how I hate feelin' useless. Can I help with anything?" Steve squeezed their fingers together tighter and Bucky squawked indignantly, trying to pull his hand back. Steve was goddamn strong now and there was no way Bucky would win that fight.

Then, of course, Steve thought he was hurting Bucky (he was not made outta fucking feathers) and snapped his hand back like he'd burned him, instantly spurting off apologies. Bucky just barely shut him up by lifting a hand in the universal stop motion. He considered slapping it over Steve's mouth for added affect, but the surrender sign sufficed.

"You didn't hurt me, goodness. I'm not that much smaller than you now." Bucky raised an eyebrow, giving Steve a pointed look. Blue eyes shifted to the side with a relieved sigh. Steve had this look on his face no one else in the world could achieve - that relieved-guilty thing he did when Bucky saved him from fights, brought home long-needed medicine. Clasped a hand on Steve's shoulder and told him to move in, dammit, or else Bucky would move all his stuff in the middle of the night and leave Steve with no choice.
That body may be bigger and more...muscular? than the LittleSteve's, but the insides were the exact-same-worrying-punk Bucky'd known his whole life. For some reason, that felt like the best news all day.

"Tell you what. If you really wanna help..." Bucky trailed off and Steve perked up. He literally was a damned golden retriever. "...how bout you take me for drinks tomorrow night? After we give our reports tomorrow and everything? Lord knows we could both use a night out."

Steve smiled, clapping a hand (too hard) on Bucky's shoulder. "I can do that."

"Good," Bucky said, a little weakly. He'd been planning to ridicule Steve a little more, joke about Steve's new acquired fame or maybe his inability to go drinking when he was so tiny, but this whole ordeal'd been kinda draining.

He'd put on enough of a mask to yank them past the conversation where Steve broke down crying about Bucky being tortured and Bucky clammed up, not wanting to relive it over again. Although, if Steve really asked him, Bucky might say what happened. It'd hurt like hell, but lying to Steve might hurt more.

Well, he wouldn't tell him everything. That wouldn't just hurt Steve, that might break him. It'd broken Bucky. But maybe they could talk about it. After drinks, when everything wasn't so just-happened and the world was pleasantly numbed with some alcohol in his system.

They could face anything after a couple of drinks.

~_~~*_~_~

Sleep sounded terrifying in the prospect of everything that'd happened, but he was more tired than he could ever remember being in his existence. Including back when he was working three jobs and staying up all night to help Steve through his illnesses.

He fell asleep with Steve's back pressed to his, both of them laid out on the ground with a blanket underneath and one draped over the top too. It was a hellosalot nicer sleeping arrangements than Bucky'd had in the war before.

The muscles of Steve's back were defined and safe and warm against Bucky's tattered shoulderblades, unfamiliar and strange in a way, but still comforting. If Bucky could draw like Steve could and Steve had asked Bucky to draw him the way he should have been born based entirely on his personality and his insides, this is what Bucky would have drawn. Strong, tall, wholesome and healthy, but not too flashy or proud.

Bucky slipped into unconsciousness while he was still contemplating over Steve's new body. It didn't last long - when he woke up the oil lamp was just about out but still going. He'd been out for maybe half an hour. Steve was a dead log beside him, entirely shut off from the world in his slumber. It wasn't fair.

His eyelids were sandbags, just begging him to sleep. But every time he drifted outta reality and tried to get some legitimate rest, his body kept waking him back up. Up, awake. Down, knocked out for a moment. Then startling awake again. His eyes shot open every time he came back to the world of the living, his breath picking up a notch as temporary panic set in. Then he'd register Steve's back pressed to his and settle back down. He was safe. He was safe. Drift into unconsciousness for another moment. Startle awake. Rinse, repeat.
He probably wouldn't be getting any sleep at all if it weren't for the physical exhaustion in his bones. He couldn't name the last time he slept. They didn't let him sleep on the table. He hadn't gotten anything quality in the trenches. It was too damned cold. Too dangerous. He just volunteered to keep watch all the time. As a Sergeant, it made his men trust him. And with his amazing eye, it was safer for everybody. Nobody ever protested.

Except Bucky's body, which couldn't take all the sleep deprivation. So it kept trying to take him under. And his stupid mind kept waking him back up in states of varying panic.

One shock back awake - probably around three in the morning - hit a bit harder than the others. Bucky's eyes shot open and his breath caught as usual, but his whole body flinched this time, recoiling from some invisible force that'd reached out and touched him in the darkness. The flinch was fairly exaggerated, but Bucky carefully tried to slow his beating heart, get his breathing back to normal before Steve woke up.

"You okay?" came a quiet voice in the darkness. So much for that.

Bucky stared at the canvas of the tent and nodded in the dark. A few seconds slipped by. Maybe Steve would go back to sleep. Then Bucky could try to too, all over again.

The pressure against his back shifted and then one of the big warm hands was curling around Bucky's bicep. Bucky tried to make some of the tension leave his body, but everything was still too high strung. The walls were getting closer, slowly, but Steve didn't seem to be worried about that. Maybe Bucky shouldn't care either.

It was a hell of a lot easier when he just stopped caring. Complacency was a treasure on the torture table.

"Can you look at me?" Steve's voice came again, just as quiet and soft. Like they were in a little bubble. Because outside this bubble, there was no such thing as quiet and soft. Bucky knew that first hand. Why would Steve pretend it was, then? That was cruel. Very cruel.

He flickered his gaze up to Steve's face anyways. He was half leaning over Bucky, one of his legs brushing the back of Bucky's. Even in the dark, his eyes were somehow still piercingly bright.

Steve's breath caught in his throat and Bucky looked at him curiously. What the hell could be wrong now?

The soft fingers unclenched from Bucky's arm, reaching down slowly to brush under one of Bucky's eyes. He followed the finger with his gaze as Steve pulled his hand away, something wet and glistening on it now. Huh. Why was there water on Bucky's face? It seemed like a cruel riddle and his brain hurt too much to try to figure out riddles right now.

Bucky waited, bracing himself for the inevitable scolding. How long have you been up? at the nicest. He didn't want to think about the worse. Steve hated when Bucky stayed out late, stumbling home drunk. Or when he just didn't sleep. That bothered Steve too. Bucky never really understood why. But there was no reason that Steve wouldn't yell at him for it now.

Except that he didn't.

"Buck? I'm here. You're here, with me. You're safe. Both of us are safe. Okay?" Bucky just blinked at Steve. What the hell was that? Maybe he was being condescending? Or maybe he was just trying to remind Bucky of something. It was too late - well, too early in the morning - to handle that much thinking right now.
Bucky just wanted to sleep forever and his stupid head wasn't letting him. It might be easier though, with Steve so warm and close. Bucky could at least try. "Okay," he whispered.

Steve looked at him for another moment, then he laid back down. His hand on Bucky's bicep didn't move. Bucky slipped back into unconsciousness. He woke up about an hour later. It was the longest stretch of sleep he got all night.

But in the light of day, Bucky could be okay.

In the morning, they had debriefings and calculations and all sorts of fun technological stuff. Nothing emotional and nothing physical so Bucky would be fine. When he woke up, he already was.

Neither of them mentioned the night before.

If Bucky had his way, they'd never mention any of it ever again. Forward and forward only. No looking into the past because the only things there were heavy and dark and still just wedged under Bucky's skin. He'd smile and cock his head and everything would be okay.

His best friend was here, stronger than ever, and Bucky'd never had it so good.

~~~

He was a little honored Steve'd come to him for advice about who to have on his team. Obviously, Bucky'd been in the field with these people, so it made sense. It didn't make him any less proud that Steve trusted his judgement that much, just took it in blind faith on Bucky's word alone. Just an added bonus that the group Bucky had pointed out was composed of basically the only men in the army Steve'd befriended so far.

They were a good crowd. Steve mentioned something about them stepping up to help out while they were trying to get outta the lab. Bucky didn't remember that very well, which was probably not a good sign, but he'd nodded along like he knew what Steve was talking about and sent him on his way to ask them to join up. Bucky already knew they'd say yes. He told Steve so, too.

And as Steve came sauntering back in (yes, his walk had subconsciously turned into a saunter), the grin on his face proved Bucky right.

"See? Told you," Bucky teased, trying not to look like he'd been staring at Steve's back, waiting, suspended-- just didn't wanna let Steve outta his sight quite yet. Steve circled behind him to take a seat and Bucky lifted his glass to his lips, trying not to think about how Steve could sit with any person in this room and he still gravitated back to Bucky. He quickly amended his statement more, drawing any bit of attention off himself that he could. "They're all idiots."

Steve smiled a little before turning those eyes - still big and blue and beautiful - on Bucky. Bucky forced himself not to stare back.

"How bout you? You ready to follow Captain America into the jaws of death?" Bucky snorted at the Captain America thing. So Steve had definitely noticed Bucky's smirk earlier when he said it.

But it was easier not to look at Steve now than he thought it'd be. Because as much as they were joking as always, the weight in Steve's voice wasn't messing around. This was the moment Bucky'd been waiting for. Cringing, preparing for. Steve was asking him to fight, asking Bucky to stay with him and try to win this bloody hell of a war.

He stared at his glass for a moment. He could tell Steve no. He could. If he was an entirely different person, maybe. If he'd been born with immunity to pretty blue eyes and soft blonde hair and quick shy smiles instead of a propensity to melt at a flash of any of those things. Let alone all of them at once, aimed in Bucky's direction. He couldn't actually tell Steve no.

Captain America, though...

"Hell no," Bucky said with a ghost of a smile. He had to lay this whole Steve vs Captain America shit to rest right now. If Bucky was doing this, if he was falling back into the fight, Stevie had to know where Bucky stood. Aka he wasn't blinded by the sequins of Steve's new tights. Probably the only person left on earth who didn't see Captain America when they looked at the tall handsome man with the shield. He never would. Bucky'd always see behind the shield. The only one.

Steve's eyes were on him, maybe concerned. Maybe waiting for Bucky to tell him that he couldn't do this, that he had to go back home to Brooklyn because they'd poisoned the blood in his veins and destroyed the core of him. Bucky wasn't gonna say any of that out loud, but he did appreciate the patient silence. That was something Steve was always better at than him.

Was there anything Steve wasn't better at than him? Killing people, so far. If only Bucky could keep it that way.

"That little guy from Brooklyn who was too dumb not to run away from a fight..." Bucky turned his head, gaze catching on Steve's waiting one. It was probably obvious as hell, but for just a second Bucky decided he didn't care how it looked. Some heart-eyed fool, sitting here fawning over Steve. Well, he wasn't really fawning. Just...affectionately gazing.

"I'm following him."

Steve smiled, the abashed-holdingback one. Head ducked, emotions tumultuous at the edges of his mouth. Relief, knowing somebody saw more than the brave soldier, this dramatic symbol. Which Steve was, but he was a hellofalot more too. And they both knew it.

Steve didn't need him like he used to, but for some reason he was sticking around.

That was more of a comfort to Bucky than any sort'a medical treatment could've been.

A few months ago he was sitting at bars and wondering what it'd be like if Steve were here. What Dugan'd think of him. What trees, buildings, people Steve'd wanna draw. Sometimes Bucky used to pretend Steve was just waiting up for him back at base, waiting for Bucky to come home with stories of night while Steve laughed and sketched Bucky's crazy drunken sprawl across the ground.

Now Steve was actually here. They hadn't gone out to battle yet. Hadn't had to face anything but the inside of a debriefing tent and this bar, so the worst was yet to come.

But with the piano and singing in the background and Steve at his side, Bucky was gonna get drunk enough to forget everything but those three words. Steve was here.

"But you're keeping the outfit, right?" Bucky teased, setting down his drink and leaning in a little too close. He swayed backwards, quick, because the tightness-in-his-chest thing was going again and he wasn't sure he could handle it with the number of drinks he was planning to consume.

Steve turned to him again, curving smile on his mouth. Bucky forced himself to look away from Steve's mouth smile, up at his eyes again. Blues were smiling too and that made Bucky smile wider.

"You know what?" Steve studied the poster over Bucky's shoulder - didn't hafta turn to know, he'd seen it plenty while he was waiting for Steve to come back. (They picked the wrong color of blue for his helmet to make his eyes stand out. Bucky would've picked a better blue.) Those eyes were currently looking a little nostalgic, scanning the poster like it stood for all those months he'd spent touring. "It's kinda growin' on me."

"Well, good. I need somethin' to tease you about if you're not thin as a lamppost anymore." Bucky raised an eyebrow, mouth quirking sideways. Steve's smile widened and this glow settled over Bucky's skin, because he'd done that, he'd made Steve smile. It'd been such a regular part of Bucky's life before the war - always trying to get that smile outta the ever-stubborn Rogers - and the fact that he could still do it was amazing.

Of all things to stay, Bucky was relieved, glad, praisingly-thankful this was one'a them.

Behind them, the sudden hush of the bar made smiles die, cautious instinct kicking in. They leaned back in tandem - perfectly synced as always - trying to source the instant atmosphere shift. Bucky saw her first. And pretended his heart didn't sink to the ground.

Because Sarah Rogers was a saint and taught both her boys (Bucky never got over how she called him that) proper manners, they both stood the moment Agent Carter stepped into the room. Bucky may've been a low-life kid working the backstreets of busy Brooklyn, but he knew how to properly treat a dame. Even one he kinda hated.

"Captain," she greeted, stepping forward with long legs slinkier than ever in that tight red dress. She was gorgeous, absolutely stunning in every sense of the word. Voice melted chocolate and normally Steve'd be a mess - Bucky's hardening gaze and clenched fists had nothing to do with the way he responded so smoothly.

"Agent Carter." She stepped closer and Bucky took the opportunity to make her as uncomfortable as possible with a very obvious check-out. He wouldn't do anything rude or vulgar obviously, even if Steve wasn't here. But he wasn't gonna let this dame come waltzing in here like she owned the place. Worse, like she owned Steve. Bucky had the upperhand here and he was gonna damn well prove it.

"Ma'am," Bucky shot as sarcastically as possible without getting a correction from Steve. He nodded and gave her a smile so distasteful she'd have to be blind not to feel offended. She let it glaze off her shoulders though, just turning all her attention and that long, beautiful body back to Steve.

"Howard has some equipment for you to try tomorrow morning." She had this sly way about her that was teetering him on-edge. Fighting the fucking urge to just stand in front of Steve, bar his arms and hiss mine at her until she ran away.

Wow. That was a ridiculous fucking thought.

Steve was his best friend. Bucky just didn't wanna split attention with someone else, right?

They'd always said that they'd get married to dames some day, live next door. If Steve was gonna marry anyone, this Agent Carter looked like she might be the candidate.

Suddenly Bucky wasn't so sure he liked that idea anymore.

"Sounds good," Steve smiled easily. Bucky's eyes couldn't leave his glowing face, traveling all over the new body and trying to pick up familiar signs that might've transferred. He needed to know how Steve was feeling but it was harder to read when there was all this muscle and such in the way. Not that Bucky minded the muscle...or liked it? It was comforting to know Steve was safe. That's all it was. Right? Of cour--

Agent Carter suddenly turned to him, sharp eyes snapping up like she knew the exact words he was thinking. Bucky almost blushed, almost ducked his head and turned tail because it was so not what it looked like. He kept telling himself that it wasn't what it looked like, but then why would it look like that in the first place? So he'd been looking at Steve a little intensely, fine. So he hated this girl that was throwing herself at him, fine. Didn't mean anything.

She'd be so good for Steve. She could give Steve so many things that Bucky couldn't. But it wasn't fair, why couldn't Bucky just give Steve everything--

His eyes cut from Carter to Steve, and cast down in jealousy. Shame. She couldn't take Steve from him, Steve was the sole star in Bucky's sky.

He couldn't be alone again.

How could Steve smile shyly back at her, go galavanting with crushes right now? Why now, when Bucky needed him?

He needed his best friend.

He needed him and he needed to not be alone and he'd been destroyed and cut up and hurt and he couldn't go it alone, how could Steve chose right now to chase some girl?

But it wasn't Steve's fault, he didn't know anything about torture, didn't know how quickly Bucky'd blinked out without sunshine and he just needed a chance at light again--

It was her fault. She was gonna take Steve away from him, Steve was his.

Jealous. God, fuck, something was wrong with him.

Bucky turned his head away from the tension that'd risen in the air. He didn't know if Steve could feel it, if Steve had any idea what was going on. He couldn't do this, couldn't lose Steve again, couldn't watch him marry somebody else.

Fuck, did Bucky just think the words somebody else?

If he wasn't high-versed in panic moments and masking conversations, Bucky probably would've started a panic attack by now. Or ran outside and screamed. His emotions were already shut down, thank god. It was too much to have to function after that table, after everything they'd done to him...everything they promised they'd still do.

Already hiding that, what was one more thing to pile on top? He couldn't watch Steve leave him for someone else, his heart was breaking right on his face--

He needed a hell of a good strategy if he didn't want Agent Carter seeing through him like cellophane. Over here just radiating jealousy and he had to twist that, shape it so that she didn't know what was going on. So Steve didn't-- so Bucky didn't drive himself half-mad.

Calling up every ounce of the Brooklyn Boy he had left, Bucky turned back to them with a shallow version (best he could muster) of that patented smirk on his face. He could do this.

"I can see your top squad is prepping for duty," she was sing-songing, amused mouth towards Steve. Pure laser-focus.

But Bucky was going to win this, he had to have the fucking upperhand here. He didn't give Steve a chance to reply to her quip before he butted in, perfectly chosen words with brutal execution.

"You don't like music?" Accusatory and sugary, egging her to say the wrong thing and already condemning her before she did. There was a reason Bucky Barnes got promoted to Sergeant, and not all that was marksmanship. He was damn clever. He could play the game, always knew what to say. Except around Steve, who called Bucky's bullshit without even glancing his way.

"I do, actually," she said (still managing to keep eye-contact with Steve), voice dropping to add velvet to already melty-chocolate. Bucky fought back the urge to groan and roll his eyes. She was laying it on so fucking thick, any other man would be disgusted. Or have that dress half-off. But Steve stood there with his little grin, looking slightly scandalized but mostly interested.

If she wasn't a dame, Bucky would've punched her by now.

"I might, even, when this is all over --" made-up eyes flashed, sparking red-hot fire. Bucky used to burn bright too, he remembered. He used to shine like that - but he wasn't stupid. He knew Steve didn't like Agent Carter because of the fierce-brunette resemblance. That'd be the most ridiculous thing that flashed across his mind tonight. Steve wasn't like that.

He just wished she wasn't on fire. It wasn't fair, she had so much spark when Bucky'd just lost his. A candle blown out with a rough, smacking breath, right when it finally might've counted.

"--go dancing." She was looking at Steve like she was gonna eat him alive and she'd deflected so smoothly it wasn't fair. At all. But he was Bucky Barnes. And she was just another dame who'd fallen in love with the muscle of Steve's chest, his perpetual smile, bright angelic goodness. She didn't even know the real Steve.

Bucky wasn't gonna lose Steve to that.

"Then what're we waiting for?" Bucky prodded, the idea of dragging her away from Steve roughly the best thought he'd had all night. He wasn't on top of his game and he knew that. His brilliant charming smile was flat with outspoken disgust, but the words were all that mattered right now because it wasn't like she could stop looking at Steve anytime soon.

Bucky asked her a direct question and she answered him without once budging her gaze. "The right partner."

Okay. Okay then fine, fuck her. This chick seriously thought that she could come barging into Steve's life because he was some glittering hero and win his affections because she was gorgeous, smart, the first girl to pay him any mind since the beginning of time? His teeth clenched at the thought of Steve changing himself for this girl, this girl that wanted Captain America, not the precious bold, perfect Steven Grant Rogers that used to flick eraser pieces at Bucky when he got annoying.

She thought that she was the right one for Steve. Her, this girl. Honestly believed that she could--

Bucky was surprised steam wasn't coming outta his ears. Disgust rolled off him in palpable waves as she finally took a step backwards, eyes never leaving Steve's face. "O'eight hundred, Captain."

Agent Carter stepped off with a swirl of red and gorgeous and so so much better than everyone else ever and Bucky wanted to throw things. He wanted to shred things, he wanted to rip doors off their damn hinges and scream. She had no right. She was trying to steal Steve from Bucky and she had no fucking right.

"Yes ma'am. I'll be there," Steve said, hint of blush in his voice. Bucky glared unregrettably at her retreating back. Maybe he could burn a hole right through her if he glared hard enough.
He was too mad to care about the rejection. Too mad to think about anything but how un-fucking-fair this whole thing was.

He'd just gotten Steve back, and it turned out Steve wasn't his to take back at all.

"I'm invisible," Bucky managed, spinning towards running sunshine. It was the first thing he'd said since he'd been rescued that felt honest. (He'd meant what he said about following that little guy from Brooklyn, but even that'd been hesitant because Bucky didn't wanna follow Steve anywhere but back home to Brooklyn.)

Bucky was invisible. Steve's world used to revolve around him, they revolved around each other, and now there was a whole'nother solarsystem tugging Steve's gravity away. Centering his world somewhere else.

And Bucky was invisible.

He couldn't care less that Agent Carter wasn't interested in him. She was interested in Steve and that was way way way more infuriating.

Steve just got him back. Shouldn't he be unable to look away from Bucky? Shouldn't he be giving Bucky those eyes? Red hot, fire in his veins and it wasn't fair, it should be him. The best-friend-lost-and-returned. Not some girl. How could it be some girl?

Hit him all at once; like a fucking train.

He was jealous, really fucking jealous. Plain as day now, to anyone. Hell, the bartender probably could see it from across the room. Bucky was fuming with jealousy and anger and it wasn't right.

Steve'd see through him in a heartbeat if this were a normal day. If Bucky'd never been...captured and they hadn't been apart so long. If Steve wasn't swooning over someone else. If things were like they used to be, Steve'd take one look at his face and hear those two words I'm invisible, and he'd know instantly what was wrong with Bucky.

Jealous. Fucking--

There was always the chance Steve wouldn't react well to that. Steve might hate him for it. Steve might leave him for it.

Things'd changed, but there hadn't been enough time to tell how much. If Steve could still read him, Bucky'd be in deep shit. He wasn't ready for anything near this conversation, let alone right now when he was pissed and volatile and hurting and burning--

So he ran his mouth, couldn't look Steve in the eye through the bullshit - façade weak, weaker than the bones in Bucky's dead limbs.

"I'm - I'm turning into you." The stutter would give him away, god the stutter would give him away. He let out a panicked rush of air, eyes forcibly away. "Th-This is some horrible dream."

Nightmare. Shit, he'd meant to say nightmare. Bucky stared at his feet and held his breath and waited for Steve to call him out. A year ago, Steve'd know instantly. But Bucky wasn't Bucky anymore and Steve wasn't Steve anymore and he just smiled lightly, turning back towards the bar.

"Don't take it so hard," Steve teased, big hand clapping down on Bucky's shoulder. It was supposed to be playful, sure, but none of the other guys touched each other this damn often and for once? Bucky wished maybe it could be what it looked like.
Steve's hand lingered too long and Bucky was a ragdoll. He stared forward, lips parted, the touch warming him all over, calming away the anger in his belly. Edge filed off because dammit, Steve hadn't touched her, hadn't even reached to. But here he was with his hand lingering on Bucky's shoulder like it was the most familiar, okay thing in the world.

"Maybe she's got a friend." Steve smiled. Like the old days. God, if they could go back to the old days. Then his hand was gone and Bucky's body automatically turned to follow the path of Steve's. Barstools, glances, and he quickly snatched Steve's glass. He needed alcohol now. A soft punch landed on his shoulder and Steve gave an indignant hey! that was entirely pointless because they both knew Steve wouldn't drink a drop anyways. It was the stipulation to going out - Steve said he'd only go if he didn't have to drink. The excuse: he didn't want to get sloppy as the new poster child, but Bucky had a feeling it was deeper than that.

If Steve was drunk, he couldn't look out for Bucky. He'd have to be an idiot if he couldn't recognize at least that look on Steve's face.

Another slip of warmth shot through his chest, tightening again, way it did around Steve. What did that mean? Been there forever, he'd never let himself think--

But he wouldn't worry right now, not when another glass scooted his way. Steve's proximity was summer, heat on the Coney Island Pier. The spot on Bucky's arm where Steve'd just punched - left arm, direct center of his bicep - was tingling pleasantly. Like Steve was still there, even though he'd barely lingered. If just his arm was tingling, how amazing would Steve's hands feel between his shaking fingers right now?

Would it be like always? Safe warm precious and the only thing Bucky had to hold on to? Or would it be different, now that Bucky was steaming with jealousy. Possessiveness. Maybe he'd always been jealous, possessive. Hadn't had to face it til now.

If it wasn't so damn scary - don't leave me - he might actually thank Carter for getting his dumbass outta the cloud of denial. But it was too much, too new to do anything but try to inhale.

He just wanted to wrap himself up in Steve like he was a blanket. He wanted to breathe, feel, own nothing but Steve because Steve was the only one that could-- could make him feel safe and comforted and- and loved dammit. Even if it was like a brother. Even if that's all Steve ever saw him as, that was fine. Because - frankly - the idea of anything more was making him shake. Couldn't push this, not when his head was so messy. Maybe his love for Steve wasn't so brotherly after all.

Maybe it never had been. He paled at that, thinking back to all the times his chest tightened, all those times he'd looked at Steve and thought something that might not've been normal. He'd always thought Steve's eyes were so pretty. That his delicate frame was somehow both cute and endearingly tough. He could take a lot, and Bucky admired him for that.

Admiring wasn't exactly lusting after. Oh god, lust. Wow okay he did not need to go there right now.

Bucky tipped back his drink, whole throat lighting up with unpleasant fire as it went down, every drop. God, Steve. Little, tiny, beautiful Steve. And now the big, warm, gorgeous one...

It wasn't fair. Double-whammied - memories of the past dredging up in his gut, forcing him to look at all those times with eyes that weren't so prejudiced while sitting right next to the source of his irrational instability. Steve was here, glancing at Bucky, huffing a breath of laughter as Bucky sat the empty glass back down on the bar. The bartender gave him a sympathetic look and pushed across another.
Bucky had walked in this bar with his eyes steady on Steve, reaching for the one bit of familiarity in a war that'd ripped everything outta his body and stuffed it back in in the wrong order.

He was gonna walk outta here with that last bit of familiarity ripped away from him too. Damn Agent Carter and her stupid thing for Captain America. Damn her. Damn her.

But how long'd this been coming? How long'd this new thing not been new at all? How fucking long had he been hiding from himself?

That was scarier. What if it was true? What if Bucky Barnes was actually a guy who...who felt too much for the little blonde kid he'd grown up sharing beds with?

Steve would hate him.

He'd never say it, too damn polite. But if he found out he'd plaster that awful smile and tell Bucky it was fine, they'd work past it. Temporary reach for comfort in a cold and unfamiliar war. It'd all go away soon, he'd promise Bucky. Maybe even clap a hand on Bucky's shoulder in a weak attempt at how things were before Bucky realized that his world started and stopped with Steve Rogers and that meant more than just friendship, too.

But as nice as Steve'd be about it, he'd be disgusted. He'd be disgusted and disoriented and he'd hate Bucky for taking away the one thing he'd always counted on: Bucky's friendship.

Bucky couldn't do that to Steve. He'd already taken more than his share, he didn't deserve to thwart all the sunshine outta Steve's life.

Worse, he could leave, and Bucky'd be alone. He couldn't be alone again, he couldn't do it, who'd be there to save him, who'd be there to pull him outta the fire, who'd drag him away from that horrible, retched, poisonous, burning place—

Whatever this was.

Steve could never know.

"Buck?" Steve called, his hand landing softly on Bucky's forearm. Bucky stared at the hand for a moment. He didn't flinch on the outside, he knew that, but the sight of someone else's hand on his skin - he froze. Someone was touching him and there was nothing he could do about it, no way he could fight back.

Alone again.

He was gonna be alone--

There was something in his system - must've drugged him, lord, that was heavy stuff. His mouth tasted like whiskey and the world was blurring but maybe the whiskey taste was just how he was coping with the drugs shot into his system.

Abandoned.

They'd drugged him and fuck if he hadn't just had the most vivid dream. He could have sworn he'd felt Steve coming to rescue him.

How the fuck would Steve come to rescue him? Steve was back home in Brooklyn, scrawny ass probably fighting with walls in his spare time because all the bullies were gone off to war. Like Bucky. Stupid fucking war, had him ended up on this table. He'd never see Steve again and that was fine, he was okay with that because eventually he'd be dead anyways, right?

The drugs must've been something new this time. It wasn't the hardest he'd been out. That hallucination was a helloafalot more vivid than the rest of them, but Bucky was an experiment, right? He was an experiment and they'd found something new and damned if it wasn't creative because Bucky'd just had a dream about Steve being taller than him. What the fuck was that?

Maybe they'd let him sleep soon. That one guy - Zoma or something? - said he wouldn't need sleep, not after they were done with him. Bucky just hoped they were done soon.

"BUCKY!!" He was hearing their shouts in Steve's voice now. That was weird. But not that surprising. Maybe they were done, maybe this was the end after all. Maybe he was finally dying, like the rest of them that'd come to the table.

Someone was shaking his shoulders. How could they shake his shoulders when they were strapped down? Maybe they were shaking the table. Disorientation, he knew that one. They did a lot with disorientation. He was supposed to be doing something, he was pretty sure. There was his serial number, he was supposed to say that. But his mouth didn't feel much like working. That happened sometimes. They didn't always get mad, sometimes they made curious faces and said interesting in German.

He didn't want them to hurt him for it this time. He didn't want to hurt anymore. It didn't hurt much, actually. Dizzy, aching. Well, now that he thought about it he wasn't sure it hurt at all. Okay, definitely dying then. He tried prying open his eyes, golden too-bright lights swimming.

There were thick leather straps around his biceps, holding him up. They were thicker than he remembered, and warm - heated over a fire then. It was kinda nice though. If he was gonna die, this wasn't a bad way to go. He tried blinking against gold again, something fuzzy starting to wave into focus.

Was that an angel? An angel'd come to take him to heaven. That wasn't quite right, though. Bucky was pretty sure he wouldn't go to Heaven. He'd killed alotta people. He'd killed too many for an angel to be looking at him like that. That angel looked so familiar. All that sunny hair, eyes direct outlets to summer skies. Glowing, even.

It looked like Steve. The angel looked like Steve. God, Bucky was finally going home from this miserable war.

"Steve," Bucky murmured happily, leaning closer to the angel. Those straps on his biceps were still holding him tight, although he was closer to the Steve-angel now. He wanted to close his eyes again, let the angel take him. He just wanted to see his Steve again. Even if it was only looking down from the floor of heaven. He knew Steve'd be praying upwards every night anyways.

For the first time, a heavy rushing wave of gratitude that Steve was so faithful. If he was praying upwards than Bucky'd see his shining face as he looked up to the heavens and Bucky looked down. They'd be apart, but he'd be able to see Steve so it'd be okay. He'd be okay.

Suspended, waiting for that final blow, the blow to declare him dead. He peeked open an eye again. The angel was still there, mouth moving like it was speaking. Bucky couldn't hear, but he managed to slur out a few words instead.

"You gonna take me to heaven or what?" The angel stopped talking, was looking at Bucky now with its face all twisted up. Bucky wanted to reach a hand and smooth out the sudden worry in the angel's face, but his arms were still pinned. It wasn't quite Steve's face, the jaw was all wrong, but it was close enough Bucky didn't want it to ever look as pained as it did right now. The angel looked like it was hurting more than Bucky was.

"I ain't afraid to die," Bucky clarified for the angel. It looked so worried, Bucky didn't wanna see it worry. He was gonna die and then he could look down on his praying Steve and that was a lot to tell an angel when his throat was all hot and tight, but he still wanted the angel to understand. It was okay. It was okay. Bucky didn't mind dying, "Jus'wanna go home, where they can't hurt me nomore. Just take me, take me and letit all be over. Please?"

Bucky asked nice as he knew how. The angel started to tear up. No, no, Bucky wasn't trying to make it cry. It was such a pretty angel. He felt awful that it was crying because of him.

"No, no. My life don't matter. It's okay, it's okay," Bucky tried to comfort it, moving his arms against the bonds. Huh, they moved with him. He lifted up a hand, thumbing at the angel's cheek where a tear had slipped away.

The angel was talking again, saying something and Bucky could at least hear sound this time. Only sound though, concerned and broken tone, shapes of words floating. The angel looked so upset. He had to try to listen. He focused hard as he could, watching the angel's mouth as he tried to place what order the sounds were in.

Unless the angel really was Steve? That didn't make any sense at all.

"Steve?" Bucky asked again, dubiously. There was no way this could be Steve. It didn't even look like Steve. It sounded like Steve, sure, and it had those same blue eyes. It smelled like Steve.

The angel - Steve? - pulled away quickly, eyes bright and hopeful as they scanned over Bucky's face. Bucky didn't know what the hell they were looking for, but he was pretty sure the angel wasn't gonna find it. He didn't have anything left in him for the angel - Steve - to find.

Okay, something wasn't adding up here. The more Bucky looked at the angel, the more he looked like Steve. Bucky blinked a few times, scanning the surroundings. Holy shit, this was not the torture chamber. He wasn't on a table. He was sitting on a stool...where the hell was he?

"Where am I?" Bucky echoed aloud, not missing the jump of hope in Steve's eyes. It really did look like Steve, in a strange sorta way.

"You're with me, Buck. We're in a bar, okay? We were out celebrating because I got you out. Bucky, it's me. It's Steve. I found you on Zola's table and I saved your lame ass for once, yeah? We got you out, blew up the building. Do you remember?"

Steve was staring at him intently, entire body thrumming with hope. Bucky blinked a few times, trying to figure what the hell Steve was talking about. There was something - puking and limping? Something about an evil lady in a red dress and before that, fire? Lots of fire, a metal beam. A disproportionate Steve across a gap, determined look on his face as he ran towards the pit.

Bucky squinted at Steve, trying to match up the one in his head to the one in fronta him. They "Something...about you bein'a dumbass and trying to jump a fuckin' twenty-foot gap?" Bucky wasn't sure, and it sounded really crazy (especially if Steve was still here, because if he'd jumped wouldn't he be dead?), but a light suddenly shot up all Steve's features, relieved elation covering his face.

"Yeah, yeah, Buck. I made it to the other side. I'll explain everything, I promise. But you're safe, okay? Bucky? Do you understand me?" The straps on his arms shook him and Bucky looked down. Those weren't straps at all. Those were Steve's hands. "Do you understand you're safe now?"

Bucky looked up again. He had no idea what was going on, but Steve looked so sure. Even if it wasn't quite Steve, Bucky could never say no to that determined face. "Yeah, okay," he agreed softly.

Steve breathed out a sigh of relief, glancing over Bucky's left shoulder. Bucky sat obedient as Steve addressed somebody behind him.

"I'm gonna take him upstairs, see if I can't bring him all the way 'round. Thanks, guys, for being there."

There was shuffling behind him and Bucky suddenly didn't feel so safe. Steve was close, warm, so he tipped, pressed his forehead to Steve's shoulder. Darker, safer like this. A hand automatically came up to run fingers gently over the back of his neck. Safe enough to listen in now.

"-ure thing, Captain. He's had it rough, tougher than most the rest of us. But y'know Barnes, he'd break his leg and never tell a soul 'til his body stopped lettin' him walk."

Steve breathed out shakily and Bucky could feel it's path from where they were touching. Steve's shoulder was really comfortable against his spinning head.

"I know, that's what worries me. But you've all been so supportive, I don't know what I'd...thank you. I'll see you all tomorrow?"

"'Course, Captain. You take care." That was a different voice than th'other one. All the voices were real familiar. One sounded like Dugan. Maybe it was. Alotta strange things were happening and Bucky wasn't so sure. Maybe it was the whole squad he'd befriended.

Footsteps started to fade into the background, but they paused a ways off. Probably at a door.

"He's real lucky to have you lookin' out for him, Cap. He's a good guy."

"I know," Steve said softly, still shaky. His hands were steady though, pulling Bucky off the barstool. A heavy arm slung over his shoulders, guiding him forwards. "C'mon, let's get you some sleep, yeah?"

Bucky nodded. Sleep sounded amazing. Vaguely impossible, and not allowed, but amazing regardless.

The room above the pub was small, just a mattress on the ground. War did that. Steve guided him to sit, big hands tugging at his boots. Bucky looked up at Steve and tried to recalibrate the fuzzy images in his head with everything now.

"Who's the lady in the red?" Bucky asked as Steve pushed him gently down onto the mattress. He sat beside Bucky, tugging off his boots too. Bucky laid perfectly still. He'd been placed here. He knew how to stay. "I don't like her very much," he added, crinkling his nose.

Steve looked over his shoulder sharply. "Why not? She's been great to me, Buck. She's the reason I was able to get you out when I did."

"I dunno," Bucky defended quickly, making sure to keep still, stare at the ceiling. Silently debate the nagging feeling he'd had about her. Lots of nagging feelings, he couldn't place-- "She doesn't know you," he finally settled with.

Steve kicked the last boot aside, swiveled to sit cross-legged in his direction. It was a strange look, Steve sitting there in white socks and full uniform, criss-cross applesauce to look at Bucky. He looked cute though.

Bucky looked away sharply at that thought. What the hell?

"Sure she knows me, Buck. Not like you do, but nobody knows me like you do."

"I know," Bucky grumped. That was kinda the whole point. She thought she knew Steve and she thought she could have him but she had no idea, not really.

"I did meet her before the serum, though," Steve added. "I think maybe she even liked me before the serum. It's hard to tell with Agent Carter, honestly. She may not even like me now."

Bucky was still hung up on this serum thing, which he had lots'a questions about. But arms and eyes were getting more and more tired. He'd ask in the morning.

"She sure seemed t'like y'fine," Bucky pouted, a little slurred even to his ears. Steve laughed quietly, mouth quirking sideways into a smile. Took a second to place the unease in his gut, but when he finally did he nearly choked on his tongue. Fuck, he'd messed up. He'd read that book, knew exactly what'd happen - Steve'd jokingly say what, you jealous Buck? and then Bucky would freeze and go red and try to laugh it off but Steve would know.

Bucky wasn't sure what exactly Steve'd know and why it was such a bad thing - couldn't quite remember - but he knew he couldn't let it happen. He'd messed up and it might just ruin everythi--

"Maybe," Steve offered instead, picking at a loose string on the hem of his pants. Bucky let out a breath of relief. Who was he kidding, this was Steve. He was the most oblivious guy on the planet when it came to crushes.

Wait, crushes? What the hell--

He was missing a lot. Could figure it out in the morning though, everything was confusing and too bright and he really wanted to pass out right now.

"You okay, Bucky?" Steve asked softly, glancing back up.

"I dunno," Bucky answered truthfully, forcibly looking at the ceiling. "Don't really remember...just patches, and. I know enough to know you're you, which is why I followed you up here but."

He held his breath, wishing he had permission to turn his head but he'd already done it once, couldn't push-- "Maybe it'll all be back in the morning. I...I don't wanna be wrong. I don't wanna wake up on that table and I don't wanna lose you again and I can't--"

He didn't realize he was shaking - hard - 'til Steve was there, laying on the mattress beside Bucky and scooping him into his chest.

Straps—warm—p-please—safe?—don't—

"I'm not letting go, okay? You can sleep. I promise I'll look over you. I'll die before I let them take you again." Steve's voice had steeled into this solid, serious thing and it was so confusing, the strong arms around his shoulders. But Steve wouldn't let anything hurt Bucky. He promised. So long as Steve was alive, he'd save Bucky.

Even from his own mind betraying him. Blank was terrifying, and Bucky couldn't imagine what he'd do if Steve wasn't—

At least his body was cooperating. Muscles all relaxed, his eyes drooping shut. Like Steve asked. He wanted to sleep, and it looked maybe it was allowed. Then hopefully, morning sunrise would bring him back. And everything'd be okay.

~*_~*_~

When the harsh sunlight hit the back of his eyelids, Bucky groaned. And wow, fuck, he definitely remembered everything. He had a hangover the size of Antartica, but he remembered. Disoriented to hell when he'd fallen asleep, but safe must've finally sunken in. Body and mind worked in the night to stitch him up, weave out whatever'd sent him spiraling into the fuckin' looney bin.

He wasn't on Zola's table, although the psychological damage...must've been worse than he was counting on if everything turned to torture again.

Steve probably thought he was crazy.

Although, in fairness, Steve had a new body. Didn't help with the whole familiar/safe thing. Well, spending a night wrapped safe in the new arms kinda changed that.

Waking up cradled in Steve's arms also did wonders towards highlighting the epiphany from the night before. Raging jealousy, possessiveness. The possibility of more-than-brotherly feelings for Steve. Those were all still there, hovering in Bucky's head and. Great. He'd give anything not to have remembered that.

"Mornin', you alright?" Steve's chest rumbled under Bucky's ear, voice all deep and echoing. Bucky squeezed his eyes shut. Fuck.

"Jeez, Rogers, give me plenty a'time to adjust, huh? Yeah, m'fine. If you count waking up with Adonis arms squishing me half to death as fine."

Steve let go of him instantly, scooting back a foot to properly see his face. Bucky sighed, deflated. He shouldn't've said anything. It was much nicer on Steve's chest.

"Think my arms are as built as a Greek god? Aw, Buck, you always did know how to sweet talk that purty mouth a'yours," Steve teased. Bucky punched Steve in said arm and tried not to think about Steve calling Bucky's mouth pretty. He hadn't meant it like that. Steve lit up like watery sunrise, rolling away playfully.

When he hit the ground - less than a foot from the mattress they'd been laying on - reality sunk back in. Steve's eyes landed on his, laughing smile fading at the edges. "You really okay?" he asked quietly.

Bucky sighed and sat up, running a hand through his hair. It'd taken to falling like a mess over his forehead lately and he hadn't exactly had the chance or incentive to slick it back yet. He should do that today.

"Yeah, Steve. I remember everything. The walk back, 'the right partner,' the whole nine yards." Bucky smirked as he did air quotes around Carter's flirtation last night. Steve made a face, but it didn't last long. He kept looking at Bucky, nervous, awaiting real reassurance. Bucky sighed melodramatically and stood up from the mattress, walking around it to offer a hand to Steve, who maybe really didn't need his help anymore.

"Sorry I wigged out on you, man. It's just...haven't been gettin' much sleep, hit me all at once. And gettin' drunk probably wasn't the best idea. Kinda felt drugged up all over again." Steve's face crumpled concerned again and Bucky waved it off with a hand. "But I'm fine now, really. Got my head back on straight thanks to you, so that's another tick on the list a' stuff I owe ya."

"You don't owe me anything, Buck. You'd do the same thing for me. You did, for years. It's my turn to take care of you now."

"Steve--" Bucky started to interrupt. If Steve seriously thought that, he'd been missing the whole point. But Steve held up a hand, halting the complaint and fixing him with a look.

"Yeah, I know. S'not why you did it, I don't owe you anything. You've told me a million times, and fine, I've got that by now." Bucky huffed. About damn time that sunk into his stupid head. He was always trying to compensate, find work, make it up to Bucky. There was nothing to make up.

Only thing was, that was kinda Bucky's main argument here. So when Steve kept going he didn't have much in the ways of protesting.

"But it's not fair to shut me out, I didn't do that to you. Swap our places and you know you'd be givin me this same speech. Just, please. Buck. Let me do this for you." Steve got that look on his face, that desperate-puppydog-look he'd learned from the goddamned stray. Bucky scowled.

"Let me in that...messy head of yours. Lemme help. You don't have to tell me everything that happened if you don't wanna, but tell me when it starts to come back. As soon as it gets to be too much. Tug my arm and I'm yours, okay?"

Steve could be the king of impeccable wording. He meant his attention would be Bucky's, of course, but that didn't stop it from bouncing around in Bucky's head.

He reached out and tugged Steve's arm, one side of his mouth up in a half-smile. Steve was Not Impressed, raising an eyebrow and staring Bucky down, waiting for an answer. Fine. Apparently turning it into a joke wasn't gonna fly. Sighing, he took a step backwards. That'd been 100% the only reason why he'd tugged Steve's arm. Entirely about making this into a joke, not about making Steve his or anything.

"Okay," he finally relented, making a face and throwing up his hands. It was a tough bargain, tougher than he'd ever know, but this was Steve asking. Bucky was the opposite of immune.

He wasn't gonna spill his guts, though. He wasn't gonna talk about this, or last night, or anything else. He was gonna bury it in the deepest corner of his head and block it away with a siphon of Steve. He'd use the awkward blonde Brooklyn boy to cover up and fill in all the cracks in his head. He was already so saturated with Steve, what could a few more extra Steve-shaped barriers do?

If Steve was on the lookout and Bucky kept him as much in the know as possible, then nights like last night wouldn't happen again. That's what Bucky was agreeing to, really. All he was agreeing to.
"Okay," Steve echoed, a soft smile on his lips. Bucky was not gonna think about his lips. Watched him straighten out his suit, carefully fixing his tie, jacket, pins. He looked good in uniform. Sharp, intelligent. Brave. Just like Bucky knew he was. "So, you ready to tackle this war with me, Sergeant?"

Bucky snorted, picking up his boots from the floor. "Ready as you are, punk."

Chapter End Notes

Okay, the action will be picking up from here. I know this was like 98% mental stuff, but I wanted to set a very clear base before we start exploring.

Thank you again for reading!!

xx
As awful and terrible as war was, it was good for one thing: a distraction. When you're out in the field and getting shot at, it's pretty easy to forget newly realized feelings for your lifelong best friend that you maybe had all along. Focus was imperative, the missions too serious to be compromised by a petty crush. Crush? Was that even the right word? It didn't feel like the right word.

But there was a downside in the daytime distraction, too. Since Bucky could shut out the crazy way his heart beat faster around Steve during daylight hours, it hit even harder when darkness fell. He'd go all day forcing it outta his mind but then they'd bunk up and clean their guns by the fire and Steve would be right at his side, touching Bucky too much and sharing a tent and bigger than life and more beautiful than any dame Bucky'd ever seen. And every night it would hit him hard as it did that first time in the pub - okay, maybe not quite so hard, but the tightness in his chest still came and knocked him off his feet.

He spent his days protecting his best friend and his nights falling for him all over again. It was dizzying, to say the least.

The only thing keeping him from going crazy - as ironic as it was - was Steve. No matter how much Bucky shut out the feelings or let them swallow him, Steve didn't change one bit. He was the same solid, happy, perfect guy Bucky had grown up with. He was so entirely sure of who he was, what he did, what he stood for. Steve looked in the mirror to a flawlessly reflected image of what he saw inside. Pure Steve, 100% himself all the time, and there was nothing better for Bucky to come home to.

Bucky lost his grip on reality, on who the hell he was, divided himself into pieces and floated into nothing and darkness and clawed blindly at the confusing mess of people he'd become. There were all these different Bucky's living inside one body - the punk kid that pranked his teachers;
the overprotective big brother that beat up Steve's attackers;
the ladies-man with a girl on each arm and ten more lined up around the block;
the confused teenager that came home stumbling drunk, pissing Steve off all the time;
the best friend that looped his arm around Steve's neck and pulled him along to rides on Coney Island;
the quiet and respectful young adult who could spend hours watching Steve draw;
the scared kid at basic training with a gun in his hands for the first time and a smoking, perfectly shot target across the field;
the cocky young Sergeant who'd never seen a day of battle;
the caring commander who gave sharp orders in the field that saved lives and earned him the respect of everyone he fought with;
the expert sharpshooter that could kill a man so swiftly, end a life so brutally, no one knew he was coming;
the detached soldier that stopped trying to care about all the people he'd shot;
the courageous friend that'd comforted the rest of the captured 107th, making each night in cages pass faster;
the rebellious, spitting man who'd been strapped to a table kicking and biting;
the scared, screaming mess he'd been halfway through the torture process;
the broken, complacent thing he'd been at the end of it;
the confused, stumbling ghost that was only alive by some miracle;
the painted face over the broken one that pretended to still win over a room, when honestly all he wanted to do was curl up in Steve's lap and never leave.

He was all and none of them, probably the most jumbled mess of a person to walk the earth. But every single version of himself, every personality trait and burning flaw...they all clung to Steve. Steve was the common ground, the glue that held the pieces together so Bucky was still a real person. The stuff of miracles - his smile, constant faith, unbreakable loyalty kept the stitches from snapping.

It was dangerously codependent, but Bucky couldn't remember a time when that hadn't been the case. Long before he'd felt his chest tightening at Steve's smiles, long before he knew what that might mean, long before he realized he was jealous'a Steve's dreamboat gal. Long before any of that, Bucky'd needed Steve like people needed oxygen.

He was the only good part about Bucky. So he held on to Steve with both hands and spent his spare time sewing himself up so that one day, he could let Steve go.

One day he'd have to. The way Steve looked at Agent Carter? One day he'd leave and Bucky wouldn't stop him - Steve deserved his own life. In the meantime, he'd figure how to keep himself from unraveling without Steve holding him together like thread through a vital wound. So far nothing was working.

Steve would disappear in the middle of a mission for five minutes and Bucky would nearly have a panic attack. One time he came back limping with a bloody slash on his forearm and Bucky had nearly killed Steve himself.

Thankfully it was towards the end of a mission, so by the time Steve limped in the enemy hostiles were dead. Which was a really good thing because as soon as Bucky saw Steve dripping blood, he abandoned his post and barreled down the hill cursing every expletive he could think of, mixed in with a lot of you can't do that to me Rogers's.

Steve had been amused, actually. He'd apologized, then shot this look at Gabe and they were both snorting at Bucky, who was red in the face from yelling. All Bucky could think about was Steve coming back with a bulletwound, or not coming back at all, and then what would Bucky be and he'd fall apart and Hydra would find him and drag him back to that table and no one would come for him and he'd scream and scream and no one would hear him, just like the last time he'd been strapped down with heavy leather, the scent of blood surrounding him and --

He'd promised Steve he'd let him know when everything was too much - with the world spinning and Bucky's suddenly lack of ability to breathe, he'd say this was probably that "too much." He'd been bracing his hands on his knees, staring at the ground, while Steve and the Commandos laughed softly above him, jostling each other and making cracks about Barnes's big brother syndrome. Dugan joked about getting Bucky's eyes checked, maybe he was still seeing the little version of Steve and that's why he worried so damn much...

But none of it was sinking in. Bucky couldn't anchor himself, all he could see were dim lights and the glint on the edge of a scalpel and he couldn't move, he was pinned down all over again and his screams were making his voice sore, ripping up his throat until he coughed blood--

Bucky reached out a single, panicked hand for Steve. The other Commandos kept joking amongst each other, their voices fading as they started strolling to their mini camp in the woods. Steve didn't go with them, hallelujah, because Bucky's lungs weren't working and he was gasping now, his fingers brushing the material of Steve's sleeve.

His cheeks heated up as he felt Steve's eyes land on him, but he'd rather parade through France naked than relapse into another torture-nightmare; he could handle the embarrassment of losing his grip on reality if Steve could prevent another night like that one in the pub.

"Buck?" Steve finally asked, sounding concerned. He took a step closer and Bucky's brushing fingertips turned into a full grab, his hand squeezing Steve's arm so hard it might bruise. Steve took half a step backwards, startled at the sudden brutality. Bucky squeezed tighter and hauled himself upright. Everything was still spinning and he was pretty sure he might fall over any second now.

Then, finally, Steve realized something was wrong and a strong arm wrapped around Bucky's waist, catching him as everything started to topple sideways. The world was half leafy-green and half cold-metal and all fire, fire everywhere. Steve's arm was flickering in and out between safe comfort and the bite of a leather strap. He kept chanting this mantra in his head - he'd gotten out, he'd gotten out, he wasn't hallucinating this whole time - and did the best he could to make himself believe it. His brain kept swirling, stuck between deciding whether the table or Steve were the hallucination. If he could convince himself that this -- the forest, Steve -- was real, he'd be okay.

It was so much easier to pretend it was all a dream.

"Bucky. Bucky Barnes. We're in Poland and you were just yelling me for being a stupid ass - and a lot of other words I won't repeat - for running into a building by myself. You were a prisoner of war and I saved you, I got you outta there. Okay? No more tables and no more Zola - all of this has been real. I promise. If you can't hold onto anything else, you have my word it's real. Have I ever lied to Bucky blinked groggily, Steve's eyes coming into focus wayyy too close to his face. They were at kissing distance and it would only take a single movement forward and they would be kissing but -- Steve had asked him a question. What'd Steve said? Oh yeah. Bucky steeled himself, running his tongue over his teeth to shake the feeling that his mouth was made of sandpaper. Words. If he spoke slow enough then they might come out in the right order.

"Yeah...you lied to me about the reason you got beat up in April '39 you punk." Bucky managed, trying to narrow his eyes at Steve. The dark feeling of none of this is real was retreating further into his head. He couldn't make up the way his heart was pounding right now, could he? Steve holding him close, trying to say all the right things without sending him spiraling deeper. Steve was trying so goddamned hard to hold onto Bucky and Bucky felt like a firecracker on Steve's birthday in between his lungs. He couldn't fabricate something that warm and sparkling, could he?

"But I told you the real reason that same night, so it doesn't count. I managed what, an hour of having lied to you before I confessed?" Steve's voice was lighter and more cautious than fit the words, but the topic change was good. Something he could focus on without having to think too hard about the past.

"Mmm. What was it again?" Bucky asked, swaying on his feet a little now. He started taking mental note of his limbs, his fingers, his torso, his neck, his head. He had control of all those things, he could move all those things.

Steve didn't answer him. Instead he took a step backwards, keeping his hand square over Bucky's chest so they were still touching but giving Bucky enough room to move around on his own. He wiggled his fingers and shook his foot and rolled his shoulders. All here, all under Bucky's control. Steve had picked up a hell of a lot on how to help Bucky outta his head since that night he'd freaked in the pub. It was the first time he'd felt himself really starting to slip since then, but Steve was handling it way better than Bucky thought he would.

Well, most of what Steve was doing to help he'd based on what Bucky'd told him about losing touch with reality.

It'd been a painfully awkward conversation and Bucky'd refused to talk for a long time. Until midnight one night, his eyes closed as he carefully detached his memories from the things he was saying so he didn't freak out. Speaking in a numbed monotone, relaying to Steve that touch was grounding and helped - especially when it was Steve. Because I know you, Bucky had amended quickly. And that being trapped and unable to move was gonna make it worse. He needed a reminder of where he was, that he wasn't hallucinating on drugs, that the world with Steve was the real one.

It was dark and Bucky hadn't looked at Steve once during the conversation - but he didn't miss the sharp breaths during and silent tears when it was over. He hated being the one to make Steve cry but he couldn't make the truth disappear. Which was why he never confessed the really bad parts. Or the way he'd eventually caved to their demands, stopped trying to thrash, gone quiet and compliant because it hurt a hell of a lot less. Nothing he could do anyways, right?

But now he shoved it aside with distractions. The war, this emotional whirlpool of feelings for Steve - that he'd yet to label or face in the light of day. The torture was in the past and Bucky had a responsibility to move on. If he was psychologically damaged, he was useless to Steve. Mental injuries were just as dangerous as broken legs on the battlefield.

He was a Howling Commando and he owed it to his team to be okay. They counted on him - he'd saved all their lives more times than anyone bothered counting and they'd returned the favor. They were a unit and there was no room for a weak link. So Bucky buried it all down and didn't let himself be weak.

Until now, apparently, trying to breathe through what had started as rage, turned into a mild panic attack, then completed the circuit with a mental relapse to Zola's torture room in a lab that'd blown up three and a half weeks ago.

The Commandos were probably back to camp by now and Steve's arm was bleeding and he was favoring his right ankle and Bucky was so selfish to freak out when clearly, Steve needed medical attention but was instead worriedly holding onto Bucky.

"Lemme see your arm," Bucky demanded, outta breath. Steve broke into a grin, catching on. Bucky's head had stopped spinning, thanks to Steve, so he could go back to being pissed at Steve for running into buildings alone like a damn idiot. And pissed at himself, this shit was gonna happen all the time the more they got out in the field and Bucky had to learn to handle it without buckling.

Steve stuck out his arm, pulling up his sleeve and grimacing as the hem passed the wound. Bucky stepped closer, lifting Steve's arm to inspect the cut. It wasn't too deep and the edges were already stitching themselves back up. Steve waited patiently as Bucky analyzed it, deciding on the likelihood of infection. Probably not very high. He didn't have to much to worry over with this serum, did he?

"Thank you," he finally said quietly, eyes still on Steve's arm so he didn't have to see the sympathy in those skyblue eyes. Steve knew exactly what Bucky was talking about and it wasn't his arm.

"'Course," Steve answered, a newly-enlarged hand clapping Bucky's shoulder. "Now, let's get back to camp, yeah?"

~~~~~

For the first time in his life, Steve felt like he was actually making a difference. He was taking down Hydra bases and helping military officials plan attacks and he was eliminating bullies and he was helping his best friend past the most traumatic experience they'd ever dealt with.

It was hard to take sometimes, but he'd never back down from helping Bucky. Actually, he was flattered every time Bucky reached for him in the dark. They'd been best friends for as long as Steve could remember, but it was humbling how much trust Bucky placed in his hands now. Not just trust to keep him alive (as always), but trust to let Steve see him so haunted; so sure that Steve could bring him back from that edge. It was a lot of pressure (even though it'd only happened twice now) and Steve was fairly sure he'd muck it up. Do the wrong thing, say the wrong thing, then Buck'd trapped in his head again.

Most of the time, it was like he'd never been tortured at all. Bucky'd gone through hell and how did he handle it? He was the best damn Sergeant the army'd ever seen. He smiled and joked and saved lives every day. He was a fantastic person, so sensible and intelligent that sometimes Steve would stare at him and wonder how in hell Bucky thought he was made for anything less than this.

As strong as he was now, there were these...changes in Bucky that had Steve worrying the nights away. Sometimes he'd look at Steve and quickly look away in pain. Steve had a pretty good idea of why, too. He knew that Bucky had always considered Steve as someone he had to protect - they were family - and Steve had taken that away from Bucky. He didn't think Bucky hated him or anything, but sometimes it felt like Bucky just wanted the old Steve back. That had to be why he kept looking at Steve with a funny expression, one Steve had never seen before. The idea of Bucky doubting him was worse than Steve could handle, but he kept it to himself. Bucky had every right to feel that way. Steve just wished he didn't.

Another thing that'd changed was their physical relationship. Bucky didn't throw his arm over Steve's shoulders anymore, didn't haul Steve's body into his side affectionately. At first Steve had thought it was just taking some time to adjust to the new size difference. But then sometimes when Steve was the one to reach out (Steve was always the one to reach out lately) Bucky flinched away. But it wasn't the discomfort or numbness that glazed over his eyes when he was having torture flashbacks. It was just...awkward. Uncomfortable. Like Bucky couldn't decide whether or not he wanted Steve to touch him anymore.

The whole thing was weird and Steve was honestly perplexed. Something had changed between them, between their dynamic. They were closer than ever, but at the same time Steve had never felt further away from Bucky. There was so much Bucky wasn't telling him, and while it was true that Steve wasn't asking, he really wished he knew what that look was.

There was no point in fretting over it though. Buck was still his best friend, that part hadn't changed a bit. And it was more of a relief than he could ever express how good it was to know that someone saw behind the stripes and spangles.

Steve was honored to wear the flag, honored to be a symbol for a country he'd die for in a heartbeat. But sometimes he wished people would look at him and see that he hadn't changed from the scrawny guy who got picked on in back alleys. And now that he was back at Bucky's side, Steve did have someone who saw all of him. Every single inch.

It was so much easier not to get caught up in the parade of it all when the familiar face and pouty lips were in sight as often as possible. Sometimes Steve could sit by Bucky at the camp's fire and pretend they weren't at war at all - just him and Buck again, breathing in smokey air and sharing relative body heat from their pressed shoulders.

A couple of days after Bucky's second panic attack (Steve couldn't think of another way to refer to them, even though they weren't technically panic attacks) the Commandos made it back to base. They didn't always trek back to base after their missions, but it had been radioed in that they were needed.

Ever since the slip after their last mission - which Steve entirely blamed himself for - Bucky'd been even more lighthearted, prone to joking jabs and laughter. The rest of the men didn't seem to notice anything was off, but he couldn't help but wonder if it was some sort of overcompensation from freaking out. It had to be exhausting, keeping a smile on his face if he didn't mean it. Steve just wanted Bucky to be alright.

Colonel Phillips was waiting for them as they marched their squad in, getting the briefest report of all time before dragging Jim and Gabe to the officer tent. Apparently their previous officers wanted them back in their "own kind." Steve hated how the army was segregated so much, but Phillips was dead set and determined not to give up their spots on the Howling Commandos. As tough as he was, Phillips really was a wonderful Colonel. Steve had faith that he'd have Jim and Gabe back at his side tomorrow.

But with a third of their troops missing, they couldn't head back out on missions until at least noon tomorrow, maybe longer if the fight for his comrades was tough. The rest of the Commandos were given the night and following morning off, told to go "take a damn break from saving the world and get drunk or something."

Dugan and Falsworth and Dernier cheered and split off for the nearest town, even though it was only four in the afternoon. Steve got rushed off to the medical tent to get his wounds checked - per Bucky's instance - although they were already entirely healed. The medic shoed him out and then Steve was standing in the middle of a fairly empty base camp with nothing to do.

He couldn't remember the last time there was no agenda, let alone an entire afternoon, night, and morning of free time. He blinked and looked around the camp, trying to figure out what the hell he was gonna do for the next eighteen hours.

He used to have free time every day back in Brooklyn. What in the world did he do with it all?

Oh. Of course. There were some supplies he needed to borrow from the correspondents' tent.

Ten minutes later with a sharpened pencil, a clipboard, and the white empty back of some generic briefing forms tucked under his arm, Steve just needed one more thing.

"Hey," Steve greeted as he pushed back the flap of a tent and stepped inside. Bucky looked up from where he was cleaning his rifle, looking vaguely surprised to see Steve.

"Hey." A few strands of brown hair had broken free from where Bucky had slicked his hair to the side, brushing against his forehead as he looked back down to snap the scope back on his gun. Steve cleared his throat and tightened his grip on the clipboard under his arm.

"So since we don't have to report back until tomorrow afternoon, I was gonna go out and draw. Did you wanna come with?"

Bucky broke out in a smile - the one that started with the left side of his mouth first - as he looked back at Steve, already setting his rifle down. "Yeah, 'course."

The two of them hadn't had a chance to hang out and be since before Bucky got shipped off to basic. It was almost strange falling into step alongside Bucky with nowhere in particular they needed to go. By silent mutual agreement, they ended up walking north of the base, to the heart of the woods. The trees were the sparser kind that left plenty of room to walk, but enough coverage to block out the rest of the world.

Once they were about a mile away from base, the world around them was only filled with a soft serenity of golden browns and greens. The ground and trees dotted with springy moss, the leaves whispering a soft flutter from the wind. The foliage overhead was thick enough to block out most of the sun, letting the golden rays through in patches of glowing spotlights. The dirt underfoot was plush with enough moisture to make walking entirely silent, although it held a shallow imprint of each step they took, marking the way here and therefore giving them a path back.

In Brooklyn, there was a severe lack of foliage, let alone entire gorgeous wild forests to walk through. Europe was defined with beautiful places and they'd already traveled through enough to see some. But in the course of war, you can't actually see the beauty. A soldier looks at the gorgeous architecture of an enemy building and all they see are escape routes, sniping vantage points, structural weaknesses. It's the only thing they can afford to see. You can't exactly stop and admire something pretty in the middle of a battle of life and death.

But they weren't battling right now, they weren't at war. Their break was too brief to stop being soldiers - it was engrained too deeply - but maybe they could be soldiers and the Brooklyn Boys in awe of Central Park. Of course, manicured trees and sloping grassy plains didn't exactly compare to the raw, visceral beauty of the woods surrounding them now.

The combination of the landscape and the peaceful air - and of course the company - was already putting Steve at ease. At the beginning of their walk everything was quiet enough to almost put him on edge instead, but each footstep brought him closer to the peacefulness of the trees he was walking between. Bucky treaded right on Steve's left, a bit of a gap between their shoulders. They used to walk so close that their shoulders would bump every other step, if Bucky's arm wasn't slung over Steve's shoulders or around his neck.

They hadn't had the chance for that kind of playfulness in their relationship lately and Steve got the sudden strange urge to tackle Bucky to the ground. They could wrestle now, since Steve wouldn't get smushed by the lightest of touches. It'd be a good way to make Bucky unwind, at the very least.

Bucky's sharp-eyed gaze was shifting around from time to time, one hand hovering near the pistol he'd brought with him. There was nothing out here, they were nowhere near enemy lines, but the protective instinct didn't switch off very easily. A cracked twig made Bucky jump and draw his gun on a squirrel, but Steve just laughed at him and Bucky loosened up a bit. The only thing out here with them was nature: that was why they'd picked this direction. To get to these woods at all, you had to pass the base camp.

And between the training soldiers, ColonelPhillips, and Agent Carter, Steve was pretty sure their safety was covered. He'd say it aloud, but he was sure Bucky already knew that. He was being cautious, but he'd settle in to the peacefulness of it all in a little while.

"It's been a while since we've done this," Steve said softly, narrowing the gap between their strides to bump his shoulder against Bucky's. Bucky snorted, letting Steve bounce off him without complaint.

"I don't think we've ever hiked in the woods in France. Unless there's some memory I'm missing and you're not telling?" Bucky shot him a sly smile and it was Steve's turn to huff a breath of a laugh. Bucky always found a way to joke about the most serious of things; it was how he survived. Although in the month since he'd found Buck on that table, he hadn't made a point to mention it himself until now. Maybe the serenity and war-free woods were really making him relax.

"Nah, this is our first time." Steve smiled and Bucky gave him a quick grin before looking away, a bit of red coloring his cheeks. Steve looked at his profile for a moment, trying to figure what that was all about. He had to look away fairly quickly though; running face first into a tree because he was staring at Bucky would be pretty humiliating.

They walked another half-mile in companionable silence, the sunlight shifting shadows around them. There were only a few hours of good lighting left until the sunset. So if he wanted to draw, they should find a campout spot soon. Well, not a campout spot - this wasn't a mission. A...resting place then?

The fairytale moment of finding the perfect clearing and twisting plants shaped like chairs wasn't the kind'a resting spot they needed. Just a couple of trees with patches of sunlight at the bases, enough to illuminate Steve's paper and the subjects around him. It was actually Bucky who spotted a place first, pointing and raising an eyebrow.

There were two patchy sunlight-bathed trees about five feet apart with diameters big enough he'd barely get his enhanced arms around one. More trees in various shapes and sizes surrounded the two thicker ones at random increments, all with twisting roots above-ground, wide enough apart to sit between. Bright enough to see and shady enough to be relaxing and cozy.

Steve plopped down against the tree on the left, leaning his back against the thick trunk as Bucky took the one opposite. The trees were close enough that if they stretched out their legs, Steve's shoes would end up somewhere around Bucky's knees. For now both their knees were drawn up, flat feet on the ground -- with the exception of Bucky's left leg, extended out into the space between them in that lazy sprawl he'd perfected years ago.
Steve kicked off his boots first thing - in case he wanted to mess with Bucky and prop his feet on him later - but Buck just looked at him oddly and kept his boots on. He did take off the navy blue peacoat though, tossing it at Steve to bundle atop of his boots.

"It's a lot louder out here than you'd think, with all the quiet and all." Bucky looked around, taking in the pattern of the landscape. "Wait, that sounded totally confusing --"

"No, no, I get what you mean." Steve looked up from where he'd been clipping the papers more securely to his borrowed clipboard, taking a moment to listen to the sounds around them. The woods gave this initial impression of perfect silence, but if you listened close enough there was an entire orchestra of noises. Wind jingling leaves, the occasional soft call of a bird. Grasshoppers buzzing, tiny squirrel feet pattering along branches. There was a constant array of sound, all natural and quietly soothing.

"It's nice out here." He tapped the back of his pencil to the center of his paper, debating on what little scene to draw. Bucky hummed noncommittally, looking up to the tops of the trees as he checked out all their surroundings. He was more curious than perfunctory now, which Steve was really glad for.

"Yeah, well, while you draw I'm gonna take a powernap. Keeping up with those supersoldier legs wears a guy out." Bucky fake yawned and stretched his arms out, leaning his head back against the tree.

There was thankfully a plethora of acorns on the ground; couldn't help but snatch one to throw at Bucky. It hit square on his sternum, bouncing off his dogtags with a clang.

"Hey!"

"You had that coming." Steve was smiling - again - and this time Bucky returned it without the sassy eyeroll. Then he settled back against the tree again and closed his eyes.

Steve knew exactly what he was going to draw.

The lines of Bucky's face transferred onto paper were familiar in a way not a lot of things felt anymore. The hair was entirely different - the normally slick gelled top had taken to coming more and more disheveled throughout the day. It always looked pristine and artfully sculpted at the beginning of missions, dark hair swirled to the side with an arch at the top that made him look like one of the movie stars back home.

But as the days and nights grew longer, at least a few strands would escape the stiff slopes. The loose pieces would curl slightly on one side of Buck's forehead, making him look debauched enough to be a very...different kind of movie star. It'd be damp with sweat occasionally too, adding to that artfully wrecked image. Buck'd always managed to pull off any look he tried, although Steve couldn't imagine him wearing his hair this tousled in Brooklyn. It wasn't exactly a safe way to dress yourself in a city that big and judgmental.

Right now it wasn't all crazy -- there had been absolutely no order to it at all when Steve'd first found him in Zola's grasp -- but there were quite a few pieces of fallen hair over his forehead. He drew those first. They were new to Bucky's daily look and it fit the new version of him in a way that almost made him uneasy to think about.

War changes people, he'd have to be an idiot not to see that. But it didn't make it any easier to see the once-bright spark of fire in Bucky's lightning blues dull into the sharp eyes of a soldier. He didn't wish for the old Bucky back, not at all, he just worried sometimes that this one wasn't as happy. Well, obviously, they were in a war, but...but Steve wanted Bucky to be happy, was all.

His pencil hovered over the blank face on his paper. The jaw was a little long, the hair maybe a tad too loose. But for some reason, Steve was hesitating to draw the closed eyes and curved down mouth. Bucky had the poutiest lips ever and he'd spent way too many drawings perfecting that unique shape. He'd gotten it down pretty well at one point, but...he wasn't feeling it today.

There was a tension in the corners of his mouth that hadn't been there before. Darker circles under his eyes, tired lines across his forehead. A sharpness to his cheekbones, subtle enough that no one would notice if they weren't so familiar with drawing those lines. It was all too new and a little depressing, how much more stressed and tired Buck looked now.

He'd come back to the face later. Maybe.

Steve started sketching the tree behind Bucky's head, quick aborted strokes because he was thinking too much to be calculative and careful. Sometimes he sketched like this - wild, overlapping lines that eventually resembled some rough form of an object. Other times each curve was purposeful and pretty, sloping and shadowing little pieces of trains or monkeys or buildings or plants.

It was liberating, drawing with such abandon. Realistic drawings were more his forté, but it kinda fit the rough edge of the man across from him.

Steve glanced up every few moments, barely looking at the trees as he studied Bucky's features. The curve of his collarbone across where his shirt was opened up, the rough patches that he hadn't had time to sew. The bright glint of his dogtags against the filtered sun.

He was too occupied with trying to get the angle of Bucky's damn extended leg to notice that his eyes had opened.

"You drawin' me Rogers?" The comment made Steve's eyes snap up in surprise. He had no idea how long Bucky had been awake, although knowing him he probably never took the nap at all. Steve made a face before his eyes traveled back down to Bucky's knee.

"Maybe," he said, pretending it wasn't ridiculously obvious that he was.

"So long as I can see it when it's done." Bucky's eyes were on him in a way that forced Steve to look back up at his face again. He hadn't let Bucky see a lot of the better drawings Steve had done of him for obvious reasons. It always drove Bucky crazy - just let me see, Stevie.

Steve looked down at the drawing in his lap and back up at Bucky. Then did it again. Bucky's eyebrow was arched, still waiting. Finally Steve sighed, sketching in another line in a tree. "Fine. You can see it."

Lips curled up and he made a very-serious come-hither motion with his finger. Steve sighed but got up from the ground, sitting back down beside Bucky and leaning against his tree, knocking their shoulders together as he handed over the clipboard.

Steve rubbed at the graphite on the side of his hand, trying to smear out the gray shadow as Bucky studied his picture. He didn't get nervous showing his drawings anymore; Buck seemed to genuinely like most of them, and even if he didn't, it was his job as Steve's best friend to be trusted with things like that.

Well, not all his drawings.
"I don't have a face," Bucky said, sounding more curious than offended. Steve shrugged, picking an acorn off the ground and spinning it in his fingers. As much as he trusted Bucky with his drawings, sometimes he gave Steve this uninterpretable look that always made him want to run away from Bucky's gaze. So Steve wasn't looking at him, staring down the acorn in his hand instead.

"I didn't get the chance to finish before you were whining to see it," Steve nudged Buck's shoulder as his response. Nothing good would come outta explaining how he was pretty sure Bucky'd changed almost as much as he had. And Steve wasn't sure he'd be able to capture that with a pencil. Or, more accurately, he was more afraid that he would capture it. Then they'd both be stuck with a picture of a broken soldier.

Everything was so much more real once it was down on paper. He could pretend Bucky was as okay as he pretended to be - so long as Steve didn't draw it, didn't prove the haunted soldier his best friend had become.

"Hmm." Bucky turned the clipboard upside down, squinting at the reversed image and Steve couldn't help but laugh. Bucky smiled at the sound and carefully took the sketch outta the clipboard, folding it up and putting it in his pocket before he handed Steve back his clipboard. "I like that one of me sticking my tongue out at you better."

"I drew that when I was ten!"

"And I was eleven. And I looked damn good even back then." Bucky's mouth curved up in a smirk, which Steve's eyes couldn't help but draw to. Then Steve was smiling wider, and Bucky's smirk turned into a full-on, real smile and Steve hadn't seen that smile in such a long time that now he was beaming.

And they were both total idiots, sitting here and smiling at each other and smiling even more because of the other's smile.

It was absolutely ridiculous and soon they were busting up, laughing as Bucky chucked an acorn at Steve for recompensation and Steve ducked, even though he was inches away and had no way to dodge. It hit him on the cheek and he shoved Bucky's shoulder lightly - still extremely cautious with his new strength - which barely made him move at all.

Bucky called him a dame and shoved him back - hard - toppling Steve onto his side. He actually fell all the way to the ground, making a sound of surprise. Apparently there was some serious muscle gain in sniping, cause Bucky'd never been anywhere near that strong before the war. Hell, Steve was pretty sure even Dugan wouldn't've been able to push him down like that. Weird.

But Steve came back up laughing, taking note of the slight lines by Bucky's eyes as he did too - those hadn't changed. Neither had the clef in his chin or the ever-changing eyes. Sometimes - if the lighting was good enough - Buck's eyes were lighter blue than Steve's. But in their old apartment and back-alley Brooklyn, they were brown under the lack of illumination.

The laughter died down after a little bit, both of them settling back against Bucky's tree as the wind rustled around them. It was absolutely gorgeous out here. Steve needed something else to draw.

He peeked around the corner of the tree, looking for a scene that would fit the emotion. The shadows were too dark; he wanted to draw something full of golden streaks of light. He leaned forward to look around Bucky, maybe something over there? Still nothing.

Steve huffed, leaning his head back against the tree in temporary defeat. He'd find something, he just--
His eyes cut upwards, taking in the blowing, shimmering leaves at the top of the tree they were leaning against. The sunlight was cutting through softly, lighting up certain parts golden and other parts dark green. The leaves were small enough to look like coins - he could almost hear their jingle as they fluttered in the wind. It was absolutely perfect.

Drawing the sky framed with the leaves of trees and sunlight wasn't gonna be easy leaning back against the tree like this. Ideally he'd lay on the ground, except all those acorns would not be comfortable at all--

Oh. Duh.

Without preamble or warning, Steve shifted from where he was sitting and plopped his head down on Bucky's thigh. Bucky jumped, cursing, but Steve didn't pay him any mind, lifting the clipboard up with one hand and the pencil up with the other.

"Can you hold the other side?" Steve asked, already starting to sketch out soft lines across the paper. It took a few seconds to process, then a calloused hand took the side of the clipboard, holding it steady for Steve to draw.

"You could have given me some warning or something," Bucky complained, shifting a little so that Steve's head rested more comfortably on his thigh. Bucky was sitting cross-legged, and now Steve was the one with one knee in the air and one leg extended. It was a comfortable position though, definitely comfortable enough to draw.

"Hey Buck, can I lay in your lap? Great, thanks." Steve didn't give a moment's pause between the question and his own answer, smiling a little in that way Bucky always said was 'terrifyingly mischievous.' Surprisingly, Buck didn't come back with some smartass retort at Steve's sassiness. He just got real quiet and let Steve draw in silence.

The sunlight was perfect right now, angled not to blind and bright enough to light everything up like the heavens. It'd be tough to capture that glow without a good eraser, but if he shaded enough around the streaks of light it may end up having the same effect. A rough sketch turned into a rough draft, which started getting filled in with details of glittering leaves, reflected bits of sunshine, dark shadows. The pencil wasn't quite sharp enough to get all the veins in the leaves he'd like to, but the thick still looked nice if he kept it light enough.

Bucky's thumb was pinning Steve's paper to the clipboard, which was actually really helpful to keep it from falling into his face. Except there was a white, thumb-shaped space covering the right side of Steve's drawing. A very obvious, Bucky-shaped space in the middle of Steve's sky. At least the symbolism was fitting. He pondered whether he should ask Buck to move his finger or not.

He liked the idea of having Bucky's imprint in the drawing, but there was a chance that without his thumb covering the white space it might look incomplete. Which didn't fit Bucky at all.

Eventually Steve decided to shade the leaves surrounding Bucky's thumb darker, turning light gray graphite into dark black shadows. A shaded arch around Bucky's finger, branching out and getting lighter further away. Now, once Bucky moved his finger, there'd still be the line of where he'd been. And he could fill in the blank white space with light, swirling leaves with soft edges and lots of sunshine.

It'd be even better than the picture he'd set out to draw, as always.

After a moment of looking over what he'd done so far, Steve lifted his pencil from the paper and jabbed it at Bucky's thumb.
"Ow! Okay, okay jeez. You could have just asked."

"Again with the asking," Steve sighed, starting in on the white space Bucky's thumb had left. Now his thumb was busy smudging the bottom half of Steve's drawing. Steve didn't really mind.

He hadn't been drawing for too long, but thankfully his arm hadn't started to hurt yet. Holding up one half of a clipboard and drawing with the other put a lot of strain on arm muscles. Actually, drawing like this before the serum would've been impossible. He'd have gotten a single leaf in before his arms collapsed at his sides in pain.

It was a little surprising that Bucky wasn't complaining yet either. His arm was holding up the other half of the clipboard, but he didn't seem to mind. Or if he did, he wasn't saying anything. That sounded more like Bucky. He never spoke up when he was in pain - which was why Steve was so damn surprised when Bucky'd actually kept his word and reached out for help when his brain was betraying him.

The incident had been two days ago now, but it was still fresh on Steve's mind. The look on Bucky's face had been awful; he'd stared at him like he couldn't tell if Steve was real or not. And the worse part was that it wasn't even that crazy of an idea. Sometimes Steve felt like he was hallucinating these past months and he hadn't been tortured and drugged.

"What're you thinkin' about?" Bucky asked, brushing a piece of stray hair back into Steve's careful blonde swoop. He blinked up at Bucky, eyes leaving his drawing for the first time since he'd laid his head here.

It was comforting, in a way, to have Bucky be the one towering over him again. Not to mention that Bucky's leg was warm and comfortable under Steve's head. He'd lay like this all the time if it was just the two of them.

"What?" Steve asked, totally zoning out from looking Bucky over.

"You had this awful look on your face. What were you thinking about?" Bucky asked again, bouncing his leg a little. Steve sighed, bringing his clipboard down to his chest to give Bucky's arm a break. There was no way holding it up that high wasn't killing him.

"You," he responded simply as his fingers worried the edges of the clipboard. Bucky made a face, clearly disgruntled that the 'awful look' on Steve's face was because of him.

"Wow, thanks, so sweet." Bucky's voice was dry and sarcastic, the slightest edge of actually offended.

"Well, what happened to you." Steve amended, his voice going a little quiet as he looked back up at Bucky. Bucky looked away, clearing his throat. There was a light stubble under his chin, which Steve'd never noticed until this angle. This would be the weirdest angle to draw at though, so it wasn't like he could say anything about it.

"Oh," Buck finally said, his voice hoarse. Normally he shrugged off the comments about Zola easily, plastered on a but you saved me, Stevie and a too-wide grin that didn't reach his eyes. Hell, Bucky had even reported everything useful from what happened to him to Colonel Phillips, just so they could have an upperhand over Zola's techniques. He hadn't shared all the details with anyone though, no matter how much Steve wanted to know. Bucky always shrugged it off, said Steve was better off not knowing.

Like that wouldn't make Steve want to know about a hundred times more.
But right now, Bucky wasn't shrugging anything off, wasn't joking or smiling it away. He looked caught, and Steve supposed he kind of was. They were in the middle of this really peaceful, raw moment filled with nature's beauty and soft serenity and Steve had barreled through it with the mention of that. He'd caught Bucky off guard and they were too close right now for Bucky to pretend.

"Why won't you talk about it?" Steve asked, quiet enough to be respectful and not demanding.

Bucky turned his head back to look down at Steve, one hand carding roughly through Steve's gelled blonde hair and probably ruining it beyond repair. Well, until he got back to base and could style it again. He was gonna look like Bucky, random strands of hair falling haphazardly over his forehead. Steve couldn't pull off the look like Buck could, but at least they matched now.

Besides, Steve wasn't seriously gonna snap at Bucky about the state of his hair right now when they were talking -- or, rather, not-talking -- about this. Bucky's hand was warm where it was threaded through the stiff gel in Steve's hair, blunt fingernails scratched slightly against Steve's scalp. It felt really damn good.

He slipped his eyes closed, halfway to revel in the feeling of Bucky's hand roughly pushing into Steve's hair, but mostly so that Bucky could have the comfort of knowing he wasn't being watched as he responded. If he responded. Bucky got that way sometimes, never when they were kids but definitely over the past month, where he grew uncomfortable and shifty if people's eyes were on him for too long or during intense moments.

At first, Steve had thought it was something akin to stage fright with the new Captain America's Best Friend fame that was tugging at him. But now, Steve wasn't so sure. He had a nagging feeling that it might have something to do with Zola - Steve was going to destroy that man when they finally got to him - because almost everything different about Bucky now seemed to have changed with that. Well, the war too, but that wouldn't explain the discomfit Bucky felt when people were watching him too intensely. No, Steve could think of plenty of disgusting, terrible things that might make Bucky feel that way and they all made his blood curdle.

"There's nothing to talk about," Bucky finally said, the tense line of muscle in his thigh relaxing the same time his hand softened in Steve's hair, trying in vain to fix the style back to the stiff gelled one Steve'd had before Bucky mauled it. He gave up after a little bit, absentmindedly stroking strands to follow their path.

A few moments into the silence, Steve tentatively opened his eyes to look back up at Bucky. He wasn't wearing one of his fake-smiling-masks for a change, but he didn't look too keen to open up and share either. He just looked back down at Steve with a stubborn expression, eyes guarded from pain.

"Bucky-" Steve tried. Bucky shook his head, repeating Steve's name back to him with a tone that said we aren't talking about this.

With an exaggerated sigh, Steve rolled over onto his side, tucking his nose against Bucky's hipbone. He could feel Bucky's breathing against his forehead, his closed eyes making the scent of Bucky that much stronger. Like was being swallowed up in everything Bucky was as a human being. A glimpse into Bucky's world, a part of feeling him breathe and move and zoned into every ounce of this entire person - the most important person, actually.

He didn't have enough time to be with Bucky without the constant rush, always something wrong. Either Steve was sick or Bucky was on his way to work or off to war or they were both fighting on the battlefield and collapsing from exhaustion at night. There were some distinct memories from when they lived in Brooklyn that Bucky'd been between jobs and Steve was healthy for once and they'd go out and do something wonderful and perfect that Steve would remember forever.

But they hadn't had this kind of peace and quiet in what felt like years. Steve hadn't had the chance to just breathe in everything Bucky and be greedy for once, taking this and wrapping himself up in it like Bucky was the whole universe.

"You don't tell me anything anymore," Steve mumbled into Bucky's shirt, the words only half joking. Okay, maybe not joking much at all, but he said them light enough that Bucky wouldn't feel awful. None of this was Bucky's fault, not in the slightest. Steve was pretty sure Bucky knew that too, or they'd have a lot bigger problems on their hands.

Bucky huffed a muted laugh at Steve's petulant mumbling, still stroking a hand through his hair.
Steve wished Bucky would rub his back too, the way he did when Steve got sick and achy. But Steve wasn't little and weak anymore, he had no reason to need Bucky like that. Except that, obviously, he did. He always had.

"I tell you how great you look in your star spangled uniform," Bucky offered.

"That was one time," Steve complained into Bucky's shirt again, the words coming out more like thawaone'ime. Okay, he'd probably overstayed his welcome in drooling on Bucky's clothes. Steve rolled back over onto his back, blinking up at Bucky as his eyes adjusted to the light. Which was significantly less than he remembered it being. How long had he been daydreaming with his face against Bucky's side?

"Besides, you just asked if I was keeping it. You never once said I looked great in it. Hell, you never even said I looked good in it." Steve made a pouty face and Bucky laughed, his leg jostling Steve's head. Well, it was true. And Bucky knew it too. His laughter curved its way into a pretty smile as he looked back down, mouth opening to speak before he even had time to think.

"Of course you look great in it, it's you," Bucky argued, like that was actually an argument. If Steve hadn't spent years of his life practicing for moments like this, he might have frozen and blushed and blinked up at Bucky with those same doe eyes dames gave him when he kissed them goodnight.
Instead, years and years of practice had a snide retort on Steve's lips before he really let the words sink in.

"Aw, Buck, you sure know all the right things to say. Just how is it that half the army isn't lining up to swoon over you?" Steve teased, resisting the urge to jab his finger into Bucky's stomach in favor of batting his eyelashes girlishly up at Bucky.

He was waiting for the inevitable shove off of Bucky's lap, or the indignant laughter, or maybe an even sharper comment back. Instead Bucky went bright red, his cheeks lighting up with color as his eyes cut away, wide with what, surprise? embarrassment? Maybe Steve had pushed it a step too far.

"Nah, it's just you swoonin' over me, Rogers." Bucky finally said, shooting a sly look in Steve's direction. Okay, so something was off about that whole thing, but Steve could go along with it. At least the teasing he knew how to respond to. (Even if he had no idea what was going through Bucky's head anymore. He used to be able to read Bucky like a book but now it was as much Steve's guess as anybody's.)

"Me and anybody who's ever seen you with a sniper rifle. If they ever let dames on the battlefield, you know you'd have slept with them all by now just based on those 'gorgeous sharpshooter skills.'"
Steve said the last three words in the highest, girliest voice he could, making actual air quotations with his fingers for extra emphasis.
Bucky snorted disbelievingly, his whole face lit up now. The talk about Zola was long gone now, which was a little frustrating. But if not talking about it actually made Bucky feel better, Steve could handle that. For now. He'd give it another month before he started really pushing. But in the meantime, seeing Bucky laugh and smile was about the best thing Steve could ever ask for.

"Whoever said that?" Bucky asked, poking at Steve's shoulder like Steve was the crazy one. Right now, Steve felt like he was.

"I did, thank you very much."

"You don't count," Bucky said exasperatedly.

"I'm the only one that counts," Steve corrected. Bucky made a face at Steve that said vain much? but then he leaned back against the tree again, seeming to think that one over in his head. Steve took the opportunity to study Bucky's profile, committing the lines to memory again for the thousandth time.

"Maybe," Bucky finally relented. Which wasn't much of an answer, but Steve didn't mind all that much.

He looked back up at the sky, the piece that he'd been drawing looking entirely different now. The sunshine wasn't filtering through the cracks anymore, it was pulling off to the side as it sunk down, making everything slowly darker. It wouldn't be the first time they'd slept in the dark of the woods this week, but Steve figured since they didn't technically have to he'd at least ask Bucky if he wanted to go back or not.

"Did you wanna go back to the base?" Steve asked, tilting his head up as he stretched out his arms, body already complaining a little from staying in one place for so long.

"Not unless you do." Bucky checked his side for his pistol, making sure it was still secured and loaded. "I'm fine to stay out here. Or we could catch up with the rest of the Commandos, go join their bar parade at an actual reasonable hour for drinking."

Steve mulled it over, trying to decide what Bucky wanted and wasn't saying, as always. "We'll have plenty of time with the Commandos in the next couple of months. I vote we rough it out here."

"Yeah, it's so rough bunking down in safe territory on soft ground with sufficient weaponry, a warm coat, and a supersoldier at your side." As soon as his sarcastic mouth closed, Bucky pointed across to Steve's tree where Steve's boots and Bucky's jacket had been abandoned. "Speaking of which, can you grab that?"

The navy blue peacoat looked so far away. "Why can't you?"

"Because you're laying on my leg."

Steve huffed, but pushed himself up off Bucky's leg. He rolled onto his stomach, stretching out a hand and just barely grazing the edge of the coat. He strained a little harder and his fingers caught on the hem. He tugged it, snatching it up and sitting up before the coat could get snagged full of dirt and crushed acorns.

After tossing Bucky's coat at him, Steve tugged the laces of his boots so he could put those on too. It had started to get chillier at nights and the more clothes, the safer against the cold. Body warmth was always a good thing too, although the cold didn't get to Steve half as much as it did to Bucky.

They scooted up next to each other again, both of them leaning against the oak. Sundown wouldn't be complete for another twenty minutes at least. Watching the sun sink behind the trees was absolutely beautiful, though. Neither of them said anything for a bit, watching the light fading in what pieces they could see of the sky.

Eventually dusk settled, the trees starting to slip into darkness around them. Steve reached out a hand and patted the ground. The acorns would not be comfortable to lay on at all. As nice as it was under this tree, they needed to find a mossy one if Bucky wasn't gonna complain all night.

"C'mon, let's find somewhere better to sleep than the tree of acorns before the light's all gone." Steve offered a hand out to Bucky, pulling him up off the ground. They double checked they weren't leaving anything behind, then they were off in search of a new tree. It was considerably easier to find a singular mossy tree than two well-lit and reasonably-spaced trees, so they were sitting back down on the mossy ground a few minutes later.

"As much as you're an idiot to throw yourself into this supersoldier thing without even writing me about it, I gotta say it's nice not to worry about you freezing your ass off and dying anymore," Bucky commented, laying down on the ground with his hands behind his head. Steve followed suit, leaving his hands to rest over his stomach instead.

"Yeah, it's good to be able to, you know. Breathe." Bucky snorted. "Although now I have to worry about your sorry ass freezing in the night."

"Okay, just because you're bigger than me now does not mean I'm suddenly as puny as you used to be." Bucky turned his head and fake-glared at Steve. Steve smiled, looking back up at the sky.

"'Spose you have a point. Doesn't mean I don't worry, though."

"Not half as much as I used to, punk. I've been worryin' about you my whole damn life. Little, tiny, stupidly stubborn Steve."

"I'm still just as stubborn when I'm big."

"Yeah, I noticed." They both fell silent for a moment, looking up at the sky. The tree they were under had less foliage at the top, and there was actually a really good view of the night sky. It wasn't quite dark enough yet to see stars, but the navy blue color matched Bucky's coat perfectly. Steve blinked up at the sky, thinking that maybe that was symbolic too. Bucky kinda was Steve's sky, the dark blanket that'd held him and covered him up as Steve tried to shine like a little, blinking star.

"You know, I would pay good money to see Dugan meeting the little version of you." Bucky grinned and Steve shook his head fondly.

"He'd probably freak. And treat me like I was a four year old. All 'I don't want to step on you' and such."

Bucky laughed at that, again. Steve hadn't heard either of them laugh this much, hadn't even smiled this much, since before Buck shipped out. Even if they weren't talking about anything important - weren't even really doing anything important, it was nice just to talk and laugh and smile at the darkening sky with Bucky's warm arm pressed to his.

"What do you think Gabe would say? Or Morita?" And then they were having a full on discussion about the Commandos' reactions to meeting the littler version of Steve.

Then the aimless talking turned to some of their neighbors back in Brooklyn, what they'd be doing right now. Or if Steve and Bucky weren't in the war, what they might be doing right now.

"Well, you'd probably be drawing and I'd probably be laying on the floor, pretending to patch up my work pants while I watched you draw," Bucky mused. Steve looked over at him curiously.

"You used to watch me draw?" It was rather dark now, but Steve could still see the sudden tightness around Bucky's mouth as he pursed his lips, looking away. Embarrassed, again. That wasn't an emotion he was used to seeing on Bucky, but he'd been turning red and looking away quite a lot recently.

"Well, yeah. Not like there's much else to do in that tiny apartment." That wasn't exactly true, but he'd let it slide.

"You could always shine shoes with me," Steve offered. Bucky turned back to look at him, eyes crinkling as the corners of his lips turned up. The comment thankfully broke the tension that'd settled on them.

"And take away your sole purpose in life? Nah, I don't think so." At this angle, the freed strands of Bucky's hair were falling to arch over his eyebrow, threatening to cover one of his icy blue eyes.

Without thinking, Steve reached over and smoothed back the pieces, his fingertips brushing against the pressed line of Bucky's forehead. They were close, too close, their faces less than a foot away. And now they were looking at each other, Steve's fingers pinning back the short fallen strands as his eyes flicked over Bucky's face.

Bucky was searching his features right back, both of them trying to figure out what the other was thinking. It probably only lasted a few seconds, but it felt like a lifetime.

Then Steve took his hand back, pulling away with a sigh as he looked back up at the sky. He could feel Bucky's eyes on him for a few seconds longer, then he rolled to look back up at the sky too.

The silence fell again but this time felt a little different. There had been an electrical current there, some sort of energy pulsing in waves between them. The stars were starting to light up the sky, but they weren't blinking an answer about what was happening.

"Wish we could just live out here," Bucky said softly, slicing through the energy in the air. It fell shattered to pieces around them and Steve sighed. They weren't ever gonna talk anymore, apparently. Not about what was really happening.

"I'd miss being able to do my part." His voice sounded a little like he was giving a speech, but it always kinda had whenever he was talking about anything important.

"You always were too good for your own sake, Rogers."

"No such thing as too good, Buck. Just men and women doin' their job for their country."

Steve was entirely somber, but Bucky huffed a laugh into the night air. Steve glanced at him before looking back at the stars. "What?"

"Nothin', it's just. Preachin' to the choir there, Captain." Bucky had a serene look on his face as Steve shot a look at him again.

He really might be the luckiest man in the world. He had spirit, a wonderful country to fight for, healthy blood pumping through his veins, a position and permission to make a difference in a war of the world, and a loyal man at his side who still just wanted to do good, deep down.

Bucky may hide it sometimes, but he was just as patriotic as the rest of them. He dove into battles head first, fell into stride with the very best of them. He didn't give himself much credit, but Steve could see the passion that Bucky fought with and it amazed him. You could practically see the focus and motivation behind each perfectly executed shot.

Steve just didn't know that Bucky's hadn't jumped into this war guns blazing for America. He fought for something, of course, but it wasn't for the Stars and Stripes. It was all for the man that wore them.

A few hours of stargazing later and they were both too tired to stay up any longer. They curled up on their sides, backs pressed together for warmth.

The cold had settled by now, each breath leaving Steve's mouth in a little puff of fogged air. It wasn't the coldest night yet and Steve really didn't mind the chilliness too much. The strong muscles of Bucky's back pressed up to his were all the warmth he'd need.

Apparently, though, Bucky wasn't quite so warm. It wasn't until he was drifting into sleep that he even noticed the movement. Bucky was shivering, his body trembling slightly everywhere it touched Steve's.

His eyes shot back open as he registered the vibrations. "Are you cold?" Steve asked into the dark. It took a moment or two for Bucky to answer. "No," he said, almost sounding convincing. Well, maybe it'd be more convincing if his body wasn't shaking like an earthquake.

"You sure?" Steve pressed. "Yes," Bucky responded defiantly. If Bucky insisted, maybe Steve was just overreacting. Maybe he really wasn't that cold.

He let it go for a little while, listening for any sort of change. Bucky didn't stop shivering, although it felt like he was trying to hold himself more still.

Ten minutes later and Bucky's teeth started to chatter. "Okay, that's it." Steve flipped over, scooting so that he was facing Bucky now. "Stop trying to be all tough and just get over here."

Steve held out his arms but Bucky didn't scoot backwards, just looked over his shoulder at Steve like he'd sprouted three heads. "I'm not some dame to cuddle, Rogers."

"And I'm not gonna let my best friend freeze to death because he's too damn stubborn, Barnes."

Bucky narrowed his eyes, not seeming convinced in the least. It was maybe just a little inappropriate to sleep like that, Steve could admit. But it wasn't like they'd never done it before.

"C'mon, you used to do this for me all the time when I was sick and cold."

"I'm not sick."

"But you are cold. Now come over here, dammit, before I drag you in myself."

Bucky muttered something about stupid sparkly punks thinking they can get their way because some people dressed them up in tights and put them on a stage, but he finally relented and scooted an inch backwards.

Steve closed the final gap between them, fitting his knees up snugly in the bend of Bucky's, their bodies lining up from head to toe. He wrapped his arms under Bucky's, clasping over his stomach and one of the peacoat buttons.

Bucky seemed hesitant for a moment, ridiculously stiff in Steve's arms. Then he brought his hands down, overlapping Steve's. The tension didn't leave his shoulders, but at least Steve was helping him warm back up because he wasn't shivering anymore.

"This is weird," Bucky finally mumbled, his thumb running over the back of Steve's hand. "I'm supposed to be the one holding you."

"Grow a foot and then we'll talk." Steve's voice was muffled against the back of Bucky's neck.

Bucky poked his hand, a little hard. Steve still wasn't over how crazily strong Bucky was. "Or you could just stop growing."

"I thought I did," Steve mumbled nonsensically, already drifting into the pulls of sleep.

Bucky said something back that Steve didn't catch. Everything was too soft and comfortable for him to stay awake like this. He didn't wanna miss anything important that Bucky might say, but they also needed to rest up for tomorrow.

"G'night, Buck." Steve said softly, the warm world around him sinking down into blissful darkness.

Just before he slipped unconscious, Steve could feel Bucky finally relax in his arms. He sighed and all the tension and fight was gone, both of them mush wrapped around each other.

"G'night, Stevie."

His eyes slipped shut and he dreamt about icy blue stars and warm, navy blue blankets.
There was a surprising amount of cheer when Peggy walked Morita and Jones back to their troop. The other men had to have splitting headaches from how bloody early they went drinking yesterday, but they all seemed quite chipper regardless, bright faces and clapping hands on shoulders, thrilled to have their squad back together.

They were generally more merry than most, although Peggy supposed anyone would be if they got to serve under Captain Rogers. And that wasn't a "crush" talking either, she knew how patriotic and noble Steve made this war. His men were always in the highest of spirits.

Well, not quite all his men.

Peggy eyed Sergeant Barnes, who was steadily refusing to look at her. As always.

"I trust you all didn't drink too much last night to go back out in the field today?" Peggy raised an eyebrow, pursing her lips as the men shrank down half a size under her gaze. She'd be lying to say it wasn't a thrill watching men do that, although she'd come to appreciate the genuine respect of these particular soldiers in a world pitted against women.

"Rogers and Barnes have got their sober eyes on us, if not," Dugan joked. Before straightening a little taller and tacking on a "ma'am."

Peggy cocked an eyebrow, but smiled slightly as her eyes cut to Steve. His mouth curved up a little, ever shy. Or maybe just anxious to be fighting instead of trading small-talk with an agent.

"Very well. Colonel Phillips has your assignment ready." She smiled wider as Steve passed - in a swarm of his troops - and didn't miss the sour expression on Sergeant Barnes' face. She'd have to be completely daft not to see how much he disliked her.

"Dernier!" Peggy called after the troops. Dernier quickly came trotting back. She could have called one of the other men, but Dernier wouldn't be able to tell Steve directly and she doubted he'd bother translating such a conversation through Jones.

"Oui, Madame?"

"Rogers et Barnes étaient avec vous au bar hier, non?"

"Non, Madame. Ils sont allé à la forêt."

"Seuls?" Peggy asked, trying not to sound too curious. She didn't need Dernier reading anything more into this than he already was.

"Oui, Madame."

Peggy nodded curtly, dismissing the confused soldier. "Merci, Dernier."

He hurried off to join the rest and Peggy blinked after their retreating backs. So Steve and Sergeant Barnes hadn't gone out to the pub with the others yesterday.

They'd gone to the woods, apparently.

Alone.

~~~*~

Snipers can't shoot in the pitch black of night. The whole key to sniping is a good eye, being able to see something far off and kill it before it ever knows you're there. In the dark, you can't see that far away. Period. Night fighting is all about your other senses - being able to pick up the energy of another moving body, listening for telltale sounds of approaching enemies. Smelling the blood and the fire as the fight breaks out, only just managing to avoid tripping over dead bodies by their putrid scent.

You can't shoot at shapes in the dark, in case they're your own men. At night it's all about knives and short-range pistols. Fists, if you're particularly unlucky. Even when the fires started, the light was flickering and red and about 800 times more disorienting, not helpful. The orange flickered a distant, confusing glow and made everything look like blood and then the fire spread and you'd have to dodge that too. Bucky hated night missions.

Not to mention that it was freezing, January, and they were in Belgium. Three more things that Bucky hated.

"À l'arrière!" Dernier shouted. Jones had taught them all five phrases in French: to your right, to your left, behind you, duck, and fuck you. It seemed like a pretty decent vocabulary to have, and Bucky had a split second's moment of gratitude before he whipped around, quickly pulling the trigger at the figure behind him.
The Hydra soldier stumbled backwards and dropped to his knees, clutching at the bleeding hole in his ribcage. Ammunition was important not to waste and Bucky cursed for not executing a fatal shot. In fairness, the guy would probably bleed out and die anyways, but he couldn't take that risk. He flipped his gun around in his hand, leaping the gap between them and using the momentum to swing the pistol's handle down on the soldier's head.

His skull cracked from the force of it, instantly splitting and spurting hot red everywhere. Bucky forced himself not to think about how much strength was needed to crack a human skull from just a single swing. It wasn't a normal amount of strength, but he shoved that thought as far back as he could, kicking the guy's sternum to topple him backwards so the dead, bloody body didn't collapse on Bucky's boots.

An explosion went off to the side and Bucky jumped and rolled, breaking into a run as soon as he had his feet under him. There were at least 10 shapes left from what he could see in the flickering firelight and the Commandos only made up five of those since Morita was on watch outside. Bucky kept his center of gravity low as he neared the next one, trying to determine who was who. A few steps closer and the fire reflected off the signature golden Nazi pin. Yahtzee.

Bucky pulled his gun, firing a single shot. More red exploded in the room as the man crumpled, bullet clean through his temple. That left four enemy hostiles and there was no way that the other Commandos weren't killing anyone, was there? Although at second glance, Bucky counted 8 figures running and dodging through the fire. The others had gotten one, at least.

Another shot went off, followed by Falsworth's signature war cry. One dead. Two more to go. Bucky crouched low, because if he was counting that meant others had to be too. There was a cluster of silhouettes just beyond the next set of stairs, so Bucky kept his lowered stance and crept up on the shadows, dodging the spreading walls of fire.

The element of surprise was always an advantage, sniper or not. Even in the field, Bucky had learned to place his feet carefully and silently, rolling from heel to toe as he moved quickly across the floor. He'd gotten so good at quiet that most times he forgot he didn't need to be. He'd accidentally snuck up on Steve and the other Commandos a dozen times each. He'd even managed to surprise Colonel Phillips too, which was something Bucky deeply regretted. He always made a point to be talking loudly whenever he was on his way to see Phillips, just so he'd know Bucky was coming.

It'd probably be easier to just walk louder, but Bucky honestly could not remember how anymore. Unless he stomped around like a maniac, which would probably make Phillips even more sore. So he kept to his silent walking, gliding across the floor with his gun aimed at chest height in front of him.

He ducked behind a rolled wire fence just before he rounded the corner on the silhouettes. The building they were in had been experimenting with new kinds of fences, electrical ones that would zap anyone who came within twenty feet stock full of 2000 jules of electrical energy. None of it was fully functional yet, but the rumor of a partially-functional prototype was floating around.

These Hydra guys were a little terrifying sometimes. The good thing about fighting in the fence factory though was the extreme openness of the place. Nothing was taller than five feet and everything was made of wire, leaving space to see through and count silhouettes. That, and wire wasn't combustible. Otherwise they'd all be blown to bits right now.

Bucky inched closer quietly, listening for whether the three figures were Hydra or Howlers. He readjusted the grip on his gun, droning out the crackling of fire to tune into the conversation.

"Ain't so super now, huh?" The cock of a gun. "Let's see if that supersoldier serum can save you from a bullet in the brain."

Turning the corner and closing the gap between him and the Hydra assailants wasn't something Bucky realized he'd done until he was pulling the trigger, another perfect headshot spraying blood over blonde hair as the Nazi fell over backwards, dead before he hit the ground. Bucky swiveled and pulled the trigger again, the dry click barely registering before he flipped the gun again and brought it down on the other Hydra soldier's head - before the Nazi'd even realized his comrade had been shot.

Both of them, both of the two Hydra soldiers that were left. They'd both had Steve. Bucky didn't even have a chance to see if Steve was okay yet. This fucker had to be dead first. He crumpled with Bucky's first swing and Bucky followed him to the ground, fist driving into the guy's nose. Blood splashed up on Bucky's coat as he hit the guy's face, again. And again. Both fists swinging, one still with the gun in it.

Pistolwhip, punch. Pistolwhip, punch. Bucky didn't even register the point that the Hydra soldier died under his hands. He just kept swinging, mashing in and crumbling bone structure. He could feel the cheekbones crack under his bloody knuckles, felt the bones in the nose snap over and over. It didn't look human anymore. It was never fucking human in the first place.

This thing had put a gun to Steve's head and almost blown his brains all over the room. And Bucky wouldn't even have had the fucking chance to say goodbye there was absolutely nothing fucking alright with that. This thing had almost taken Steve away from him, he'd almost just lost Steve.

"Bucky you can stop," Steve's voice sobbed from somewhere in Bucky's head. Wait, no, that was behind him. Bucky slammed his fist down one more time before he threw himself off the crumpled body, shaking all over as he backed away from it on all fours. His arms could barely hold himself up. God, he was gonna puke.

"Steve," he managed, crawling towards where Steve was still lying in the darkness. The fire was getting closer, they had to get outta here. "Steve?"

"Here, here. Bucky I'm here. J-just help me outta this f-fence." Steve was rolled over on his side when Bucky reached him, hands instantly going to Steve's face. Sparks shot through his fingertips and he cried out in pain, drawing his hands back. Okay, if that's what 'sparks when they touched' was supposed to feel like, Bucky never wanted to do that again, he felt like he just got electrocuted.

Wait, fuck, no. "Fence?" Bucky asked breathlessly, everything still red and confusing and too hot around him. His hands were tingling and shaking.

"F-feet," Steve managed, his face twisting up in pain under the flicker of the firelight. Bucky looked around, eyes darting down to Steve's feet. His boots were wrapped up in a tangle of fence weave, sparks and little pieces of lightning running along it.

"O-oh god, oh god." Bucky rushed down to Steve's boots, tugging at the first wire wrapped over his calf. Electricity shot through his spine and sucked the air outta his lungs. "Fuck," he cursed, steeling himself before grabbing it again and yanking. His hands let go of their own accord, trying to free him from the shock, but he'd gotten that piece outta the way. Okay, if he moved fast enough he could get them all without frying up his insides. Maybe.

Shocks ran through him as he grabbed another, a muffled scream wrenching from his throat as he tugged it off of Steve's ankles and quickly let go. No fucking wonder Steve was on the damn ground. It hadn't made any sense at first, how Steve of all people had managed to get a gun to his head. If you're being electrocuted by a wire bird's nest of electric fence, it was probably a little difficult to get away from that situation.
If anybody else but Steve had been wrapped up in all this electricity for that long, they'd've been fried to a crisp by now. This electricity was amped up high enough to char a human inside of a minute. With each wire he grabbed he fought the urge to scream as the electricity burned into his skin. Bucky's hands and fingers burnt in overlapping black lines, flesh just short of being fried away. It wasn't burning off though, and Bucky wasn't dead yet by some miracle. Or something was wrong with him, as always.

He finally tugged off the last coil of wire, freeing Steve's boots from the lightning shocks. Steve automatically curled up his legs, shaking wildly on the ground. Bucky tried to crawl back over, but the second concrete touched his palms his throat let out a high pitched noise and his hands drew back. Fuck fuck fuck that burned something terrible. He wasn't gonna be picking up anything until he got those treated.

Except Steve, of course, because damn Bucky's hands if they couldn't at least get Steve off the ground and outta this burning building. Although they did have a team of six other people, that would go a hell of a lot faster.

"Dugan!" Bucky shouted into the darkness. "Jones! Somebody help!"

Shouts echoed back from across the room but Bucky couldn't hear them anymore. He scooted up to Steve's face, nudging his jaw with the back of his hand so Steve would turn his head to look back up at Bucky. He looked a little dazed and he was shaking, but he wasn't dead. Steve was okay. Bucky leaned his forehead on Steve's shoulder, shaking with relief and the aftershocks of all the electricity.

Heavy footsteps got closer and there were more shouts. Bucky forced himself to listen, in case they were about helping Steve.

"Oh my god," Jones said, sounding like he was horrified. He'd stopped off just to the left where....where that Nazi that Bucky had pummeled was. Yeah, that was a pretty gruesome sight. Bucky would feel bad for it, should feel bad for it, but he really couldn't give a damn. Jones wasn't gonna get that, although Jones also didn't deserve to have more mangled and bloody, twisted, rearranged faces haunting his nightmares. Bucky felt a little bad about that part. If he could stop the Commandos from having to see the bloody mess he'd made, he would.

"Keep going," Dugan said gruffly, pushing the horrified Commandos past the dead body. Bucky couldn't even lift his head. He needed to know that Steve was alive and okay here, his shoulder trembling under Bucky's forehead.

"Sarge? Sarge what happened?" Jones was crouching down beside Bucky, tugging him gently away from Steve. Bucky rolled backwards, let Jones take him around the shoulders and lift him to his feet. He wasn't close enough to Steve anymore, but if there was anyone else that Bucky trusted Steve's life with, it was the Commandos. He couldn't help Steve much right now with his burnt up hands anyways.

"Electrical fence," Bucky mumbled, lifting his hands up to show Jones why he couldn't lift Steve up himself. Gabe sucked in a breath, turning away from Bucky's hands with a sickened look on his face. Bucky closed his eyes, a wave of exhaustion trying to shove him down.

"Dugan, Barnes's hands are fried. That electrical fence --" Jones let go of Bucky's shoulders with one hand to point at the fence still tangled up a few feet away from Steve, "must've gotten Cap's feet. Look, his boots are all burnt up."

Dugan, Dernier, and Falsworth were attempting to pull Steve to his feet, all three of them groaning as they tried to split the weight. Dugan looked from the fence to Bucky, then back at Jones. "Jesus, Sarge, tryin' to get yourself killed too? That ain't gonna help anybody."

"Le feu est annoncé," Dernier barked, pulling Steve forward a little faster. Jones looked around, translating for the rest of them.

"The fire's approaching. We gotta get outta here." Jones threw one of Bucky's arms over his shoulders and started dragging them both towards the door. Bucky tried to blink against the fire, tried to catch his footing. His body was still shaking and he'd promised himself he wouldn't be the weak link. But here Jones was, helping him out the door when his feet were perfectly fine. It was just his head that wasn't. And his hands. And he was shaking from electricity, but he could walk at least. Maybe.

Bucky tried to tug away, still blinking away pieces of imaginary lightning from his vision. Now it was blood and fire and lightning taking over his eyes. "'M fine, Jones, fine. Go help 'em with S-Steve."

Jones eyed him reluctantly. Bucky finally got his feet under him, taking a few shaky steps to demonstrate that yes, he could fucking walk. God, how could he be so weak when Steve needed him? When they were all depending on him? Finally Jones shook his head and sighed, ducking out from under Bucky's arm so he could go help the others with Steve.

Bucky forced his feet forward, one in front of the other, until they reached the door. He reached out automatically, but stopped last second. He couldn't fucking turn the knob, god he was useless. He couldn't do anything and they were all gonna get trapped in here and die because of him. He always knew he'd end up hurting good people eventually, Bucky had just always hoped he wouldn't even have to. Soldiers made mistakes, shot their own team, but getting everyone stuck because Bucky was so damn weak? At least Morita wouldn't die, right? Wait...

"Morita!!" Bucky shouted, leaning one shoulder on the door. The crew carrying Steve was making it up the last flight of stairs.

Morita opened the door, making Bucky stumble heavily outta it. Clumsy hands caught him just before he hit the ground, saving him seconds away from faceplanting. As much as Bucky pretended to treasure his face, the idea of landing on his hands right now was a hell of a lot worse than a broken nose.

"Jesus, Sarge, what happened?" Morita pulled Bucky upright and Bucky took a few seconds to gain his balance before he took a shaky step back, holding up his hands to motion that he was fine. Which was a bad idea, because Steve was limped outta the door right then, leaving everyone with a perfect view of the (still smoking) black gashes across his palms and fingertips.

"Fucking hell, Barnes," Dugan cursed. Dernier reciprocated in French and everybody paled, going still. Steve could barely lift his head, but he was staring with wide eyes at Bucky's hands. Bucky quickly brought them down to his sides, one of his palms brushing his pants. He winced, jumping as pain shot up his arm from the touch.

Steve was silent, still shaking slightly, just staring at Bucky. Bucky looked away. He didn't regret it, not for one moment. He'd do it again. He wouldn't stop until his hands were fried and he was pulling away fence with just bone. Steve wasn't gonna get that. Steve cared about him, sure, Bucky would be stupid to ignore that. But it wasn't the kind of way Bucky cared about Steve. The way he kind of always cared about Steve, just never had to admit to himself until there was actually someone else in the equation.

Yeah, Bucky had set Steve up with countless dates and dances when they were in Brooklyn. But he spent every time hoping Steve wouldn't like any of them at all. He'd just thought he was selfish and didn't want Steve to start spending time with other people. He just thought he'd miss his best friend too much.

He'd told himself that his entire life and he'd somehow let himself believe it. Until this sudden fiery love between Agent Carter and Steve. It wasn't fucking fair. Bucky didn't even realize it until it was too late. There was nothing he could do about it now.

Well, nothing but try to save Steve's life. No matter the cost.

"Bucky," Steve said, so soft and broken that Bucky tensed up all over. He could take Steve being pissed, but that broken sound of his name? Bucky couldn't handle that.

"Don't." He cut Steve off. "We'll talk about it once you've seen a damn medic, alright?" Bucky didn't turn his head, didn't look back at Steve. He didn't wanna know what Steve looked like right now.

Maybe he'd caught on. Maybe this was where Steve realized that maybe Bucky loved Steve more than Steve loved Bucky. Because Bucky did that for Steve, and that wasn't something Steve would do. Well, he'd try the best he could because he was so damn noble, but. But he wouldn't blindly ruin his best weapon in an attempt to save Bucky's life. Steve wasn't as selfish as Bucky was.

And Bucky had no idea how much his face gave away, but he couldn't risk it. He couldn't risk Steve finding him out, not right now when everything was so raw. Steve had almost died, jesus, he'd almost died. Bullet to the brain. He wouldn't survive that, Bucky was sure. And if that wasn't enough, he'd been electrocuted for god knows how long with that insane voltage and...and it was all way too much.

Bucky turned back around. Steve was looking at the ground, Dugan and Morita each with one of his arms slung over their shoulders. He was getting his strength back enough that he could hobble along with them now, no longer needing to be dragged/carried up flights of stairs. It wasn't that far back to base - thankfully Phillips and Carter had decided to move with them because there was a lot of activity in the area.

It would still be an hour walk though; without the slow paced hobbling and two shaking officers. But they'd make the whole thing in one shot, because that's how they were. Stubborn, tough, and wickedly loyal to Steve. And to Bucky a little, too.

Steve was okay now, Bucky knew that. He was still shaking and his eyes were glazed over in pain and Bucky could definitely relate to that. But he'd almost lost that man right there and Bucky could cry with the overwhelming power of it all.

He fell into step beside Morita, brushing the back of his shaking hand up against the one Steve had thrown over Morita's shoulders. Just a soft touch to let Steve know Bucky was here and he wasn't going to leave. Steve's fingers curled in like he could physically hold on to the feeling of Bucky's touch.

Once they hit woods, the shaking made his feet more unsteady over rocky ground. Jones and Falsworth each forced Bucky into letting them half carry him, one arm slung over each of their shoulders. He hated feeling needy, but Falsworth had insisted they would travel faster this way, which also meant getting medical help faster. So eventually Bucky had relented and their caravan trooped on.

Two officers, trembling from a lethal dose of electric exposure, held up by two Commandos each. A flank of six across, with Dernier in front to scout out any danger. They made the whole trip like that, ended up walking (limping, hobbling?) into base camp in that same formation.

As soon as they crossed into camp a shout went up, alerting the whole place. A few soldiers ran over and hovered, wanting to help but unable to do much. Their team already had everything covered.

"Somebody alert the medic's tent, we've got third degree burns and electrocution damage here," Dugan ordered one of the hovering soldiers. He dashed off to tell the doctors and the Howling Commandos followed, a step at a time.

Bucky had considered insisting walking on his own again, but it'd still slow them down and the sooner Steve saw the doctor, the sooner Bucky would be able to breathe again.

The medics were waiting and ready by the time they reached the tent. Dugan and Morita carried Steve in first, laying him down on one of the cots. Bucky was next, laid down right next to Steve.

They were both going to be okay, Bucky promised himself. They were both going to be okay.

Just outside the tent, the rest of their team were talking in hushed voices amongst themselves when Agent Carter finally marched up.

"Dugan, Falsworth, come with me. The rest of you go start filling in Colonel Phillips on your report." None of them moved immediately, glancing worriedly back at the tent, so she straightened up a bit and curtly added, "Now, soldiers."

The group broke off, three of them headed towards the officers tent while she led the other two to an empty briefing tent. As soon as they were all inside, she gestured for Dugan and Falsworth to sit. Peggy remained standing, arms crossed as she looked down at them.

"What happened? And before you start, I'm not talking about a mission report. I think we'd like to know how you came back with two squad leaders in critical physical condition while the rest of you barely have a damned scratch."

She raised her eyebrows, tapping her fingernails on her arm. Dugan had always seemed a little intimidated by her accent alone, but he looked more than a little intimidated now. The two of them glanced at each other, neither quite sure how to start.

"It was Sergeant Barnes, ma'am," Dugan finally said. "Captain Rogers was in trouble. Barnes jumped in and saved his life. None of the rest of us got there until the damage was already done."

Dugan's eyes cut to the side, shifting uncomfortably in his chair. There was something he wasn't telling her. Peggy turned her eyes on Falsworth, implying he should elaborate.

"The Captain got his legs tangled up in a prototype electric fence and it took him down. Two Hydra soldiers found him and were gonna put a bullet in his brain. Then Sergeant found them and..." Falsworth paused, blinking away the mangled image of the soldier Bucky had destroyed. "...and took them out. Then, uh--"

"Took them out how?" She interrupted. "Two Hydra soldiers with guns to Ste-- Captain's head, and Barnes just took them out?" Peggy pressed sharply and both of the men refused to look at her or each other. They had planned to leave that part out, then. Why? This was war, people died. It wasn't exactly Sergeant Barnes's first kill. She tapped her nails on her arm again, waiting for them to speak up.

"One with a headshot, and the other, he. He beat to death." Falsworth whispered the last part, looking horrified as he stared at his hands.
"With his fists." Peggy confirmed, an eyebrow cocked. They both muttered yes ma'ams. "And this is concerning because..."

"Because he didn't stop, ma'am. He just kept swinging until the guy didn't..." Falsworth trailed off again, eyes glazing slightly as he looked into the distance.

"Didn't what?" Peggy said crossly. This was getting ridiculous, having to prompt every damn word outta their mouths.

"Didn't look human," Dugan finished darkly. Peggy blinked a few times. Well, that was new. They'd all seen plenty of dead bodies by now, it would take a lot to shake men like these. "Most messed up damn corpse I've ever seen. Odds are we're all havin nightmares about it now."

Peggy nodded, almost sympathetic, finally taking a seat across the table from them. There was no need to tower now that they'd decided to start really talking. "And then?"

"Then Barnes saw Cap all tangled up in the electric fence and decided to remove the wires himself. Burnt up his hands something awful, whole place smelt like burnin flesh, but he got Rogers out."

"Then he shouted to us and we came runnin over and pulled them both outta the factory. Barnes resisted anybody's help at first, but he finally let us carry his weight by bribing that it would get Captain Rogers to a medic sooner."

"And Sergeant Barnes told us what we just told you on the walk back. Well, what he could anyways. He was pretty outta it, ma'am."

Peggy leaned back in her chair, analyzing the information in her head. Barnes had turned out more violent than anyone thought he would. He was brave and a good soldier, an excellent marksman. But he was being eaten away by something and it was affecting everything he touched. Peggy could see it, and Steve probably had an idea as well, just not the right idea.

When Peggy first met Steve, she'd never have imagined a man like James Barnes to be his best friend. She'd been more than a little shocked at first, hearing stories about the young, fiery Sergeant. She'd tried to picture the two of them growing up together - the little, stubborn version of pre-serum Steve from somehow befriending the haunted, rough-around-the-edges smirking bastard with a reputation.

Maybe that was half the problem though. Peggy didn't know anything about what Barnes was like before the war. Still, if he'd changed that much, he and Steve wouldn't be friends anymore. And they were definitely friends.

Either way, Peggy was instantly skeptical of Sergeant Barnes, the moment she heard Steve relay his name to Phillips. Curious, though, because what kind of man would be so important to Steve Rogers he'd go on a suicide mission to save him?

She'd actually done some research while Steve was attacking the Azzano Hydra base. She'd pulled half the 107th into interrogation, asking as much about Barnes as she could without arising too many questions from her superiors.

The man they described was a good leader, courageous as hell, but that was the only thing that made him someone Steve would befriend. All the other descriptions?

Cocky, sarcastic, a real ladies man. Some of the men joked that the Sergeant could walk into a bar empty-handed and leave with a woman on each limb. He told wild stories of fights back home in Brooklyn, but always got quiet and closed off when he got letters. He earned the respect of everyone he fought with, but had a bit of a problem with authority.

So, of course, Peggy was reluctant to believe that was who Steve'd endanger his life for. She hadn't believed it at' all, really.

Until she saw them together.

That first day when Steve'd marched back, she'd been so overwhelmed seeing him again that she hadn't bothered to search for Barnes. When a blue-eyed man shouted up a cry - Let's hear it for Captain America - she'd finally turned and seen him.

He was looking at Steve at the time, somber one second then lifting an eyebrow and giving Steve an expression that was so detailed, complex, and brief it would only be understood by someone who knew the language. Peggy could absolutely admit that Sergeant Barnes was attractive, but the way he looked at Steve was much more fascinating to her.

She'd looked back at Steve's face to see his reaction to Barnes's expression and Steve had been beaming. Lit up like Christmas morning, looking at Barnes like he was the moon in Steve's sky.

That's when she'd started to understand. This really was Steve's best friend. Somehow the naive, tiny Steve she'd known was impossibly close to the crazy, wild Sergeant. No one could ever deny that.

It was just a matter of how close.

Peggy sat up a little straighter in her seat and turned her eyes back on the two tired soldiers. She had an interrogation to get back to.

"In your professional opinions, do you believe Sergeant Barnes makes dangerous, irrational decisions in the field?" Peggy asked, keeping her voice neutral. Falsworth looked startled by the question but Dugan shrugged and answered back casually.

"Only regarding Captain Rogers, ma'am. He looks out for all of us - saved my life more times than I can count - but he's got a soft spot for Cap. Can't stand to see him hurt. I don't know if I'd say dangerous, but probably irrational."

Soft spot was an understatement. When they'd first met, Peggy'd had 'a soft spot' for Steve. Everyone had a soft spot for Steve after the serum. Sergeant Barnes didn't just have a soft spot.

Peggy tilted her head towards Falsworth, indicating he should answer the question too.

"He's only really dangerous to people who try to hurt the Captain. Then he's brutal." Falsworth seemed careful in his word choice, hesitating before he chose 'brutal.' That was a better word for mashing a man's face to an unrecognizable mess, she supposed.

"This brutality, it's never been turned on any of you?"

"No ma'am."

"Has it ever been for any of you?"

"...no ma'am, just the Captain."

Again, not that surprising. If Steve looked at Bucky like he held the moon, Bucky look at Steve like he was the entire universe. She had a few other theories though, ones that were at least important enough to test.
"Do you think the cause for this brutality could be in relation to Sergeant Barnes's time spent as a prisoner of war?"

That one got some surprised blinks as the two men looked at each other, then back to her. No one ever talked about that, about how Sergeant Barnes had been laid out and tortured. He acted like he was fine all the time, so everyone was happy to forget. It was important though, people don't bounce back from torture, as much as they pretend to.

"Well, ma'am, that's hard to say. None of us ever saw Rogers and Barnes together before the war, so there's no way to tell if that's just their relationship or something Sarge got from Zola. He's been more violent on the field in general, but. I don't know if I could say that with certainty."

Yes, Peggy was aware how little they knew about Rogers and Barnes's relationship before the war. Phillips hadn't cared, said that good soldiers fought better and died less when they cared about their team. He'd had no problem putting them together on this, and Peggy didn't exactly have qualms with the efficiency either. That didn't stop her curiosity, though.

"Do you think Sergeant Barnes is overly concerned with Captain Rogers' safety?"

"Yes, ma'am."

They both answered in tandem, so immediately that she'd barely finished the question before they agreed. So that was something that'd come up before. She'd dive into that more if she could get away with it, but her questions were already getting suspicious. She could interrogate, but the moment she asked too much this whole thing would shut down or blow up.

She had to ask one more though, even if it was a risk. There was no telling what the men might think she was implying and she definitely didn't want that. She just needed to know where the Howling Commandos stood on the whole situation.

"Have the men ever speculated as to why that is? Why is Barnes so overprotective? She could still be talking about their dynamic as a team, couldn't she?"

Falsworth shrugged. "Barnes has got big brother syndrome. Feels the Captain's his personal responsibility."

"But he doesn't feel that way about the rest of you?"

"He protects us, ma'am. He cares about all of us. Just not the same way he cares about the Captain."

There it was. That last sentence, that's what she'd been looking for. That's what she'd been expecting to hear. She was surprised it took that long to get it.

By the unalarmed, casual looks on both of their faces, they had no idea what'd just been said. No one but Peggy ever seemed to notice, that was the amazing part.

"Thank you, gentlemen." Peggy said as she stood, uncrossing her arms and nodding her head. "You are dismissed."

Dugan and Falsworth both tipped their hats, then walked towards the entrance of the tent together. Dugan leaned over, keeping his voice low, but Peggy was listening closely enough to hear.

"Wow, you'd think she's scouting Barnes out for competition. Like she's afraid he's gonna steal Cap away from her or somethin."
Falsworth laughed quietly, both stepping outta the tent. It was a joke to them, something quickly said for a laugh and then forgotten.

Peggy looked around at the once-again empty tent and thought you have no idea how close that is to the truth.

~~~~~

They looked a little like boxing gloves. Or maybe a mummy, right when they're first wound up tight, too trapped to move. Waiting on the decay of fabric so the stiff boards they're strapped to eventually gave way. Just time, waiting on time. As always.

Bucky stared down at his wrapped hands, wiggling the tips of his fingers experimentally. A sharp burn across two combined with chafing across his broken knuckles had him instantly stopping that. He'd rather be a stiff mummy board with gauze gloves on his hands.

By the time the medics fussed over his hands, the burns weren't smoking or sparking anymore. They still hurt like a bitch, though. They'd carefully turned his hands over, wrapping his cracked, bleeding knuckles. Bucky hadn't even noticed his knuckles splitting from hitting that damn Nazi so many times.

So his whole hands were covered in wraps and ointment. He looked like an invalid, big white bandages over his hands. At least they'd weaved the gauze between his fingers so they looked more like gloves than mittens.

Steve came into their tent a few minutes after Bucky did, finishing up his own report to Phillips. He was walking and talking like normal, for the most part. He was still a little shaky on his feet, still shivered like imaginary shocks were going through him sometimes. But by tomorrow morning he'd be good as new.

Bucky would be more healed than he should be tomorrow, but he was gonna ignore that. Like everything else.

The cot dipped as Steve sat down beside him, the changed angle of the thin cushion tilting Bucky sideways on Steve's shoulder. He'd usually complain, or at least scuff him on the arm and scoot an inch away. Tonight though, after all that mess at the factory, Bucky didn't want Steve to be anything short of pressed up right against him.

He was holding the silence, waiting for Steve to speak first. It was the first they'd been alone since it happened, the first chance they'd had to talk. So Bucky sat, soaking up the warmth of Steve's proximity as he waited for the inevitable scolding.

Steve didn't say anything. Not with his words, anyways. After a minute or two of silence - full of admonition that they were both still alive - he finally shifted his weight, angling his torso to face Bucky as he reached, taking one of the boxer-mummy-gauze-gloves in his hands.

Bucky watched with soft eyes as Steve ran his fingers over the gauze, tracing light fingertips on the layers protecting Bucky's scorch marks. He drew the burn pattern on each of them, having memorized it in the brief moment he'd seen outside the factory. Bucky watched as artist fingers sketched lines onto the bandages, an invisible pencil drawing.

He kept his eyes downcast, on the mess of Bucky's hands. Like with every line he drew over Bucky's hand, he was blaming himself. Apologizing. Not a single ounce of it was Steve's fault. Bucky cleared his throat, eyes flicking up to watch Steve's face.
"Holdin my hand now, Rogers?" Bucky joked lightly, trying to ease some of the guilty tension outta the moment. A soft, barely there smile curled up on the edges of Steve's lips.

"Not like it's the first time," Steve replied, glancing up. Their eyes met in a beat of heavy emotion, both of them caught off guard by how close they were. How caring and sweetly Steve was holding Bucky's bandaged hand in his own.

They'd both tried to joke away the intensity, and it had backfired immensely. The truth in Steve's words hovered in the air around them as they looked at each other, chests on fire. They'd held hands plenty of times, during moments of distress. It was a comfort to both of them, that tangible proof the other was there. Like how siblings did, twining fingers to cross the road when they're little.

Only they'd grown up now, and sometimes they still needed help crossing the metaphorical road. Times got tough, weaving fingers with your best friend for comfort in the face of darkness didn't have to mean anything.

Except that to Bucky, it really really did.

His eyes searched Steve's, looking for some clue to the tension that was high and screeching between them. Steve was searching too, both of them clueless and helpless and standing on the edge of a cliff.

If he leaned forward, tilted his body eight inches forward, he could be kissing Steve. Bucky blinked helplessly at that thought, feeling much too small in his own head.

He still hadn't let himself label the way he felt about Rogers. He couldn't dwell on it, call it anything, because then it would be real and impossible to dodge. But he was thinking about kissing Steve. Had thought about it plenty over the last month. Had wondered what Steve's lips would taste like. Had stared at Steve's mouth from across the room, memorizing the shape of it with his eyes because he couldn't with his mouth.

He still couldn't call it anything though, still couldn't look inside himself like that. His head referred to it as a crush a couple of times, but that was nothing like what it felt like. Steve wasn't some smart, sweet beautiful dame that Bucky was fawning over and cursing himself for weakness. Steve was the liquid that ran through Bucky's veins and Bucky just wanted to have as much of Steve inside him as possible, wanted to consume every bit.

Oh, God, he hadn't even been thinking like that. Like as in Steve's body actually... inside...

Bucky's face heated up in a colorless blush as he stared at Steve. Holy fuck, Bucky was such a lost cause. He was in so, so, deep.

The little piece of sky that was staring at him cut away, carefully placing Bucky's hand on the rough sheets of the cot. Then he was standing and Bucky's body tilted back to normal, his shoulder oddly cold without Steve.

He watched cautiously as Steve walked to the front, pulling the tent flap all the way closed. Then he picked up the flickering lantern on the stool and set it atop a crate, unscrewing the glass lid to change the oil.

Bucky's eyes followed Steve's movements as he rummaged through one of the supplies duffles in search of lighting fluid. As soon as he found the metal container of it, Steve straightened up, sighing like he was running his hand exasperatingly through his hair. Except of course Steve didn't run his fingers through his hair anymore, the slick swoosh to the side was much too important to mess up.

He turned the sigh in Bucky's direction, meeting his eyes again as his fingers etched worriedly over "Jesus, Buck, I can't believe you did that." Steve voiced, sounding exhausted. And a little torn up too. He glanced back down, looking at the metal container as he spoke again. "I'm actually really pissed at you, underneath this whole stupidly-relieved act I have going on."

The last few words had a hint of humor in them and Bucky couldn't help but laugh. Steve said the most wonderfully adorable things sometimes and Bucky's entire insides light up like a firefly. A bit of a smile tugged at Steve's mouth too, maybe because of Bucky's laugh. Bucky liked the idea of Steve smiling because of Bucky's laugh.

The smile turned away, Steve's back to Bucky as he carefully refilled the lantern. He reverted to watching Steve's shoulderblades again. The bones expanded across his back, obvious even through the layers that he was taking a deep breath. Steeling himself for something.

"But seriously, Bucky." Steve turned back to face him, leaning on the lantern crate. His eyes looked positively miserable. "Why'd you have to go and do that? Your hands, they just...you could have died, Buck, you do get that. Right?"

Steve was glaring at him now, arms crossed. Bucky lifted his chin, meeting back the challenge of Steve's eyes.

"What would you have done?" Bucky shot back. It was worded like a comeback, like an answer. It was a question though, underneath all that. One of those questions Bucky probably wasn't ever gonna get answered. Saying it out loud at least felt like he was trying.

Steve narrowed his eyes a little then gave up, sighing as he turned back to the lantern to screw the lid on.

"You know what," Steve muttered under his breath. It was another one of those supposed-to-give answers, but the entirety of it was skewed because Bucky actually had no idea what might've happened if he was caught in that fence.

Would Steve have hurt himself to save Bucky? He definitely wouldn't have wasted precious time beating a guy to death (and beyond), that's for sure.

"Do I?" Bucky responded wistfully, quiet enough that Steve could ignore it and they could move on.

He stood from the cot, aimed for the outside to get some air before they went to sleep. He wasn't about to panic or anything, he just wanted to relieve some of the pressure on Steve. He didn't want his best friend to feel obligated to act guilty for what happened to Bucky when it wasn't Steve's fault.

Steve registered Bucky's words just before Bucky passed behind him, eyes going a fraction wider before he spun around and reached out to catch Bucky's arm. Gently. Buck stopped, nearly stumbling into Steve's chest, looking up at him in surprise. This wasn't part of the plan.

He forced himself not to stare at where Steve's fingers were curled around Bucky's bicep. It actually wasn't that hard to overpass because there were a thousand other things spreading through him like wildfire right now. Their chests were almost touching and Steve's grip on him was light enough not to hold him down but firm enough to let Bucky know he needed to stay. Then there was the whole fact that Steve'd grabbed him in the first place. He wanted to talk about this. He wanted to answer Bucky's question.

That all would've been overwhelming enough to send Bucky off the deep end even without the look Steve was giving him. But god, the look on Steve's face. Bucky was going to melt into a puddle on
"Look, Buck, as mad as I am about you hurting your hands, I--" Steve stopped, sucking in an unstable shot of oxygen. When Steve breathed in, his chest expanded with air and brushed against Bucky's. They were that close. Close enough to touch when they breathed deeply. Bucky had to tilt his chin up to look at Steve. His heartbeat was so loud and crazy in his chest that he was pretty sure Steve could hear it. Actually, no, their chests were touching. Steve could probably feel it.

The idea of Steve feeling Bucky's heartbeat over his own, their bodies syncing to each other, made his head a little woozy. He had to blink a few times to get Steve's gorgeous blue eyes back in focus. They were just so much closer than he was used to. And they were usually pretty damn close.

Steve exhaled lightly, his breath warm as it ghosted over Bucky's nose. There was electricity between them again but this time it wasn't trying to kill them. Well, maybe, Bucky kinda felt like he was dying. This time the sparks in the air were warm and gravitational and Bucky could hardly breathe as Steve's lips parted again.

His voice was soft, like he was gently coaxing as much as he was reminding Bucky of something he should've known his whole life.

"You know if it'd been you in that fence, I'd've done the same thing."

The words floated down to Bucky's head like they'd been placed there directly in Steve's gently sloping handwriting. There wasn't room to doubt Steve's words, not so much as an inkling of space for Bucky to not believe him. Those words, that face, those eyes were so damn sincere that Bucky's heart hurt. His entire chest hurt.

What he was supposed to say to that? There wasn't anything he could say to that. He didn't need to anyways, Steve could see it all written plain and sharp on his face as he looked up, eyes searching.

Steve was all soft edges, tall slopes, angelic blue eyes and the softest blonde hair he'd ever touched. Bucky was hard and angled, sharp cheekbones, cleffed chin, thick dark hair and eyes the color of ice - silver blue where Steve's were the warm blue of the sky, the ocean. They were perfect physical opposites and he'd never felt more at home than he did right now, his chest brushing against Steve's as they breathed.

He'd also never felt more overwhelmed, because Steve was so damn close. His response to Steve's declaration of dedication wasn't the only thing written on his face right now. Open amazement, anticipation. Attraction. He did the damn best could to keep a lid on it. If he ruined this proximity by declaring I lo--

Whatever he was feeling. By declaring that with his expression, he might ruin everything. So he was quiet. Bucky swallowed thickly, trying to get rid of the tingling urge in his mouth. He couldn't. That wasn't even a fucking option. Wasn't anything like an option.

But since when were Bucky's body and his brain in agreement? He didn't want to spoil this, didn't want to destroy everything. But they were just so close and Bucky's alarm system was dismantled the moment he'd felt Steve's air on him and he just had to know, had to see how much danger they were in. He had to see how close Steve's mouth was. Or maybe he had to see what the pretty curve of Steve's lips looked like this close, maybe that's what he meant.

His eyes darted down of their own free will, flicking away from Steve's rich blue and glancing down at the light pink color of Steve's lips. His lungs quit, freezing in his chest like ice. He'd have to move less than four inches. Less than four inches and he'd be tasting Steve, tasting him for the first time.
Bucky's eyes shot back up to Steve's, wide with fear in an abortive, panicked movement because oh god Steve had to have seen him do that. He wasn't sure what he was expecting to see in response; maybe disgust, repulsion. Shock. Surprise, at least. Steve did look a little surprised, but most of his expression was just careful. There was a wall up in his eyes, a barricade to keep Bucky from looking into his soul.

Which meant Bucky had absolutely no idea what Steve was thinking. Except...it didn't look like it was a bad thing. When their eyes met, Steve's lips parted ever so slightly, drawing in a soft breath of air. Bucky was hyper-alert to every movement, to Steve's now parted lips and lord, it would be so damn easy to lean forward.

He had to be reading this all wrong, right? Steve wasn't freaking out, he was actually breathing a little heavy. Anticipation. Maybe his body was betraying him too. Maybe he wanted this too, maybe even if just in his subconscious but oh god oh god this couldn't actually be happening right now. Steve was looking at him like that and Bucky could cry with amazement. Shock. Everything.

So much tension, anticipation, he could cut it with the knife in his boot. He had to do something. He couldn't let this slip by, he'd never forgive himself. But he couldn't lean up and kiss Steve. Not if he wasn't 100% sure how Steve felt. And right now he was kind of at a wishful, disbelieving 23%. Still, twenty three percent chance that Steve wanted to kiss him back. He had to do something. He had to.

Bucky's eyes never left Steve's, his voice dipping low as his lips parted too (so close) and he breathed the words out his mouth.

"You gonna kiss me anytime, Rogers?"

The blue eyes crinkled slightly at the edges, something akin to a smile as they darted back and forth across Bucky's. Everything was frozen but he wasn't cold for once. He wasn't cold at all.

Steve slid his hand up from Bucky's bicep, hot pressure smoothing over his shoulder and settling against the side of Bucky's neck.

"Yeah, just as soon as you put on those high heels a' yours, Barnes. I'll crane my neck if I stoop that low." Steve teased, fingers lightly massaging the back of Bucky's neck. He could die from this touch alone.

"Oh, think you're so funny now that you're tall, huh?" Bucky managed, and his knees were so weak he'd be sinking to the ground right now if Steve's hand wasn't warm and steady on his skin, fingertips beating a pulse into the highest knob of Bucky's spine.

"You love it." Steve's voice was still teasing, still light. His eyes were dark though, pupils blown. Bucky was getting swallowed whole.

"Maybe I do," Bucky challenged. Steve's lips split into a wide, honest smile.

"I knew it. Got you all figured out, Barnes." He could feel Steve's breath on his face and it was all so much he just wanted to close his eyes, breathe in Steve until he never took anything else into his lungs again.

"Prove it." Bucky's voice was nearly a whisper, slightly hoarse from the swirl of emotions pulling through his existence. He blinked up under his eyelashes, feeling like some faint hearted dame with his chin tilted up. Steve didn't look nearly so overwhelmed, glowing and happy and his mouth probably tasted like spun sugar, the look on his face was so sweet.

Steve leaned closer and Bucky stopped breathing again. Their noses brushed and tingles went down Bucky's spine as his eyes slid closed. It felt like they were dancing, they were flirting in sweet slow steps, like the icy moon revolving around the brilliant gravitation of the glowing sun.

Bucky had said prove it and now he was praying to a god he didn't have faith in that Steve was going to prove it by leaning down, connecting their lips. There was a pause, a single moment of suspension.

And then the side of Steve's nose wasn't touching Bucky's anymore, his warm breath drawing further away. Bucky's eyes opened back up, still taking a second to focus because Steve was still so close. His heart wasn't calming down in his chest any.

"That's what pencil sketches are for." Steve smiled, one side a little deeper than the other, and leaned away. The insertion of space between them, but easy and gentle like Steve had gotten everything he needed outta the moment. His eyes were wickedly bright, happier than Bucky'd seen him in a long time.

And Bucky couldn't be more confused. Steve's hand pat his neck once then disappeared and left Bucky's entire spine cold. Steve wasn't freaking out, but he wasn't kissing Bucky either.

He blinked a few times, processing everything they'd said while his head had been full of fog. Steve said he had Bucky all figured out. Bucky said prove it. Steve responded that's what pencil sketches are for. So is that what it meant when Steve drew him? Was he somehow communicating to Bucky how well he knew him?

Fuck, now he was even more confused. He just knew he'd really like for Steve to be kissing him right now and he wasn't. So he'd circle the topic back around, then. And hopefully get more of an answer than a quip about their new height difference.

"That's cheating. I can't draw," Bucky pointed out, maybe pouting a little. Steve snorted and raised an eyebrow in clear disagreement (he always said Bucky was great but Bucky wasn't an idiot. he may be okay with a pencil, but Steve was fucking perfect, Bucky didn't compare), taking a full step backwards. Bucky watched him back away, standing there in confusion. He probably looked like a lost puppy, no idea where to go now that Steve wasn't touching him.

"Can't figure me out either, can you?" Steve teased, turning back to the lantern to finish screwing the top. He was way too messed up right to try to figure out what that was supposed to mean. Bucky backed away and sat back down on the cot, eyeing Steve and waiting, wanting, praying that Steve would follow.

"If I could, you know I wouldda been the one to plant a kiss on you by now," Bucky said, which was probably the truest thing he'd ever admitted out loud.

It was all in light of the teasing, the joking, and Steve huffed a laugh at Bucky's comment, walking the lantern back to its stool and setting it down carefully. The light lit the up tent with that soft, golden, distant glow that made Bucky want to hold Steve and kiss him so slow and sweet and lazy that neither of them moved for days.

"That's cheating," Steve echoed Bucky's words from earlier, making Bucky shiver. He made his way back over to Bucky's cot, a one sided smirk on the mouth Bucky couldn't stop thinking about, talking as he walked. "What if I can't kiss?"

"I'm a pretty good teacher," Bucky offered. Steve plopped down on the cot beside him, toeing off his boots and snorting at Bucky's comment.
"You don't have the patience to be a teacher, Buck." Steve gave him an exaggerated skeptical look and Bucky smiled, ducking his head. He couldn't tell if they were flirting anymore or just teasing. Had they ever been flirting? Had they always been flirting, their whole lives?

Bucky leaned back on his elbows, looking up at the ceiling of the tent with an exaggerated huff of air.

"I have more patience than you'll ever know, Stevie. I've put up with your stupid stunts for this long, haven't I?" Steve looked over his shoulder at Bucky with that stern look on his face again.

"And if you don't try to die saving me, maybe you'll stick around a little longer." He pointed out seriously. Bucky sighed and rolled his eyes. Somehow the whole hand ordeal had been brought up again. He still didn't regret it. And he hadn't died either, had he?

Buckt sat back up, knocking his shoulder against Steve's to catch his attention. The broken worry was back in those beautiful blue eyes and he wasn't going to let Steve do this to himself. He was a great person, but he blamed himself for everything. So Bucky had to nudge him, smile soft at him and get his head back on straight.

"You ain't getting rid a' me that easy, Rogers." Steve just looked at him, hopeful and sad all at once. Bucky's smile faded a little at the edges, praying his eyes weren't giving away everything. Then he sucked in a breath, rewording something he'd told Steve a hundred times, hundred different ways. "I'm sticking around 'til the stars fall from the sky."

There was a brief dangerous moment as they sat in silence and looked at each other. This could go one of three ways, really. They could finally close that gap between their mouths, lean forward and seal the final nail of Bucky's coffin because once he kissed Steve he was never going back, not ever.

Or Steve could start crying. He'd done that before, and it always tore Bucky up. He used to pull Steve into his chest and squeeze him tight, but that might be harder with Steve big now. He may have to figure it out though, because Steve's eyes were wet enough to maybe start watering over.

Or there was option number three.

Silence and a promise laying between them, raw emotions and wounds opened up and exposed. Steve blinked a few times, looking at Bucky as he opened his mouth, his words sweet as honey.

"I didn't know you were a poet, Buck."

Bucky grabbed his pillow before he could think, smacking it down over Steve's head. Steve laughed in surprise and fell backwards, flailing to try to catch the pillow before Bucky could hit him with it again. He got a grip on it and flung it across the room, leaving Bucky ammo-less.

The silence fell again for just a moment, then Steve was looking at him with big doe eyes and Bucky glared, crossing his arms over his chest.

"Shut up," Bucky pouted.

Steve laughed again, tossing his head back as the sound echoed in the tent. Bucky managed to sit and pout for at least ten seconds, then his mouth was cracking a smile at the corner too. How could he not, when Steve was so loud and perfect and beautiful, arms clutched over his stomach as he gasped from laughing too hard, giggles still slipping past the gasps.

"I hate you," Bucky tacked on, the smile on his mouth counteracting his declaration so strongly that Steve knew he meant the opposite.
"I know," Steve said breathlessly, finally sitting up straight again and meeting Bucky's gaze. The smile on Steve's face kept wavering at the corners like he wanted to smile even wider.

If Bucky could have any picture of Steve in the world, it'd be of this moment. Of the look on Steve's face right now because it was more beautiful and shiny and happy than Bucky'd ever seen him. And Bucky had been the cause of it. Somehow, Bucky'd been the one to make that smile.

He didn't need a photograph, then. He'd just spend the rest of his life trying to get that same smile outta Steve. That was all he'd ever need.

Right? He shifted a little, looking away as his mind recapped the past twenty minutes. They'd almost kissed. They'd been about to kiss, hadn't they? There had been something there. There had to have been something there. There was no way that'd been just-best-friend material. Right?

Bucky plopped down on his side. He needed sleep. And an entire bar to drown himself in. Well, what else were the Howling Commandos for? He'd go out with them to some pub tomorrow, get a bit of space. Let Steve stop worrying about Bucky and his hands for three seconds.

And maybe, just maybe, when he was drunk, he could figure this all out. Maybe he'd finally have the courage to tell himself what was really happening in his head. How he felt about Steve.

Bucky swallowed in the dark, already feeling his skin crawl with nervousness at the thought. He didn't want to know. But he had to figure this all out, especially after tonight. God, especially after tonight. What in hell had that all been?

You know what, maybe he'd go to the pub tomorrow and get stupid wasted and just forget. That sounded a hell of a lot easier than summoning the courage for something more.

Bucky could never have something more. Could he?
February was another one of those months that had made Steve uneasy for as long as he could remember. There was something about it that always went wrong. The weather was terrible, he was constantly sick with that last bit of cold before the relieving melting slush. The only thing anyone liked about February was St. Valentine's day. And for obvious reasons, Steve didn't like that holiday at all.

Then there was the whole twenty-eight days thing. That bothered him from the moment he'd found out about it. Why only twenty-eight days? It's not like time just stopped, like the world refused to continue on for whatever reason. And why /that/ month? Why not any other month?
At the time Bucky had just snorted at Steve, dramatically declaring that maybe the world did stop turning that day, Stevie. Steve had always doubted that. And continued to hate February.

They were currently spending this February in Czechoslovakia, planning an attack on a well equipped Hydra base. And based on their Bucky's smooth sailing rate so far, they could definitely use the time to plan. And instead, the Howling Commandos had decided to hit the local pub. Steve had protested at first - mostly on Bucky's behalf - but everyone wanted to go. Especially Bucky.

He'd been a little more interested in his flask lately than Steve was comfortable with. Ever since their last Hydra mission had turned south with the electric fences, Bucky had been leaning heavily on the little metal container of amber liquid. Hell, he'd been acting different the entire month that had passed since that day.

It'd been a wickedly awful experience; lightning pumping through his veins, rendered useless and incapable for the first time since he'd formed the Commandos. That hadn't been the worst though, the worst part of that day was almost losing Bucky. Twice.

Those sniper hands were nearly healed now and Steve was so glad the burns weren't as bad as they'd looked. For Bucky to have healed this quickly, the burned flesh couldn't be nearly as detrimental as Steve had seen them in his head. Now there were bright white lines across his palms and fingers, instead of the flayed, smoking, missing flesh that Steve could've sworn he'd seen.

Then again, he'd been electrocuted at the time, probably hadn't been all there. And he didn't have a chance to see the marks again because the next time he'd seen Bucky, the hands had been wrapped up like boxing gloves. That night. The night that everything had changed. That night had felt like so much progress, Steve had been sure that things would start to slide back into place. Their entire lives, Buck had had a deep-seated reluctancy to share any of what he was feeling or, even more importantly, reach out for help. In fact, Steve was pretty sure Bucky had no idea what asking for help meant.

That night though, Bucky had been honest. Steve had blown off the whole saving ordeal with an "of course Bucky knows I'd do anything for him," to which Bucky had softly responded do I? Steve had never imagined that Bucky wouldn't know that.

This was James Buchanan Barnes. Any man with the honored privilege to serve three minutes by his side would be forever indebted to him by his saving of their life in some way. Anyone so blessed as to befriend him would never find a more loyal and incredible companion. Anyone who's so much as heard of Sergeant Barnes spoke the name with quiet reverence, the utmost respect.

Bucky was everything Steve wasn't. He was a true leader from behind the scenes while Steve waved something shiny in the spotlight. He was such a damn good person that he'd stuck by Steve's side, ignoring all the greener pastures and promises. Back in Brooklyn, he used to walk into a room and light it up so brightly that everyone turned to stare at him like he was some showstopping, stunning dame. Now, when Sergeant James Barnes walked into rooms, rooms reshaped silently to accommodate his quiet, gravitational presence.

He was such a good man that Steve would feel inadequate if it weren't for their shared beliefs. They fought this war for the good of the world and Bucky had so much passion for it that none of his respected reputation amongst the men was deniable.

So yes, of course Steve had been a little surprised when he realized Bucky didn't know that. Even more surprised that he didn't know that Steve would die in a second if it gave the world one minute of longer exposure to the great Bucky Barnes.
He'd been quick to set the record straight too, the best that he could. Grabbing Bucky's arm, giving him no physical room to pull away or protest as Steve gave him the truth, promised Bucky that he felt exactly the same. And he did. He'd die for Bucky a thousand times over. And by the blinking shock and unadulterated relief that crossed Bucky's features, he'd believed Steve and everything.

And then the most incredible thing had happened. Bucky had this irrational fear of ever reaching out for help, regardless of his trust in people. If he was lonely or scared or didn't know how to depend on Steve or let him in, he never had the right words to say it. Which is why it was a hell of a good thing that Steve knew Bucky well enough to figure out what his jilted words really meant.

When Bucky blinked up at him with slightly fearful eyes and asked Steve if he was going to kiss him, Steve had heard it loud and clear. Joking away the physical proximity they had, but showing Steve the trust he was embedded in. Showing Steve that this was okay; that it helped, even. That Bucky needed him here, close and physical, to ground him.

So of course, Steve had joked back, unable to hold in his joy as he realized what Bucky was trusting him with. This was his call for help, the only way he knew how to tell Steve that he needed him. At one point Steve had leaned down, brushing his nose against Bucky's. A silent promise that yes, of course he could be there for Bucky. For always.

So maybe Bucky's methods of asking for mental help and physical proximity were a little strange...Steve could imagine that most people might not quite pull that conclusion away from jokes about kissing when their faces were so close. But that's how Bucky was: he was an extremely sexual being, which Steve had been used to for his entire life. Of course when Bucky joked that was sexual too. He couldn't not, his entire body and mind were this elegant tool carved out for...those things. Bucky had always taken advantage of that and Steve was so so used to it.

And of course, Bucky's joking made the whole thing easier to take. It was a serious conversation laid over with sexual, funny tones and that's basically the epitome of Bucky Barnes. It had been so natural, joking like that, and Steve had honestly thought they'd solved like half of their problems in that single conversation. It'd ended in a pillow fight for Christ's sake, how had that not been the most healing thing they'd done in years?

He'd woken up the next morning absolutely elated that Bucky had asked him for help in his quirky strange little way, Steve's mouth already breaking out into an overjoyed smile the moment he saw his best friend. Bucky had looked briefly confused, then blinked a few times and looked away.

It'd only gotten worse from there.

Steve was heartbroken about it. They'd talked (in so many words) about how Steve could help Bucky now, how Bucky was going to lean on him more and take comfort in their physical friendship and what the hell had gone wrong between that conversation and the next morning? Because Bucky was doing the exact opposite. He was avoiding Steve and that cut him down deep.

Bucky had trusted him, briefly, and somehow Steve had mucked it all up. His most important job was to take care of Bucky and he'd failed and he had no idea why. Just when Steve was so sure they'd found the solution, it felt like they'd ignited a hundred more problems instead.

Then the canteen full of whiskey started to make nightly appearances. Then daily appearances. And Steve had spent the past month since that night worried sick, trying to figure out how to reel Bucky back into trusting him and what the hell he'd done wrong that night to ruin the whole thing in the first place.

They were supposed to be better and okay by now, but they weren't. It was eating Steve up.
The Commandos had been busy all month, so that had at least helped a little. There were a few smaller towns that they'd been asked to hit, then at least a week of planning and prep for the next big base. That's the part the films left out: the days on end spent searching for blueprints to the building, intel on the weaponry made there so they could go in prepared. Time schedules, attack plans, escape routes. The best places to set up camp, the amount of ammunition they would need.

So yeah, they were busy, but it had been an entire month of Bucky avoiding him more and more and Steve was 100% done with that. He had to do something. He wasn't going to lose Bucky to whatever the hell was going on his head.

He'd spent the past few days trying to figure out what to say without pissing Buck off, when to say it. Turns out the opportunity to take action came a lot sooner than Steve was planning.

You don't have to come, Captain, they'd all told him. Even Bucky's voice was mingled in with the other men making sure Steve didn't feel obligated to go. But Steve had insisted on coming to the pub with them because there was no way in hell he'd be gone when Bucky was at risk.

Buck had had a panic attack at the last pub they went to and Steve fully intended to be the support system if it happened again. Besides, they'd needed at least one sober man amongst them so the drunken Commandos didn't make bad decisions or unfixable mistakes.

Which was how Steve ended up with his chin propped boredly on his hand, elbow on the sticky surface of a bar table as his men laughed widely and loudly around him.

They were currently all singing an off key rendition of Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition, Bucky's familiar sound blending in with Dugan's rich tones, Morita's accent. Falsworth swayed a little in his chair, bumping his shoulder against Steve's. Steve smiled a little tightly and scooted his chair a little closer to Jones's.

He'd never sat between two of his men before and frankly Steve felt a little awkward, a little too big and muscular and strange to be amongst these people. It was just that all this time, Steve was used to the comfort of being at Bucky's side. Bucky was the bridge that connected Steve to the rest of the Commandos, the stitches that held them together, the only thing they all had in common. But tonight Bucky wasn't at his side and Steve felt detached from the rest of them. Not unwelcome, of course. Just an outsider.

Around campfires, Bucky's shoulder used to be pressed to his for warmth. Walking as a unit, Bucky was always at Steve's side, their footsteps falling in step with each other automatically. But over the course of the past awful month, Bucky was further and further from Steve's side.

The last time they'd been in a pub, he and Buck had decided to sit together in the back room. Just the two of them, as always. They never got enough time with just the two of them. When Peggy had come to tell Steve about a meeting he had the next morning, she'd had to walk through the entire bar of men to find them. Steve and Bucky just...used to sneak off together like that.

He wasn't sure what he was expecting when they came into the pub today, but it wasn't for Bucky to sit down in the empty chair between Dugan and Morita that was supposed to be Falsworth's. Bucky played it off as some casual, normal thing like he hadn't just disrupted the entire flow of the Commandos. When Falsworth got to the table he furrowed his eyebrows in confusion, then shrugged and plopped down next to Steve. In Bucky's spot. So now they were sitting forever away from each other and Steve wasn't exactly pouting, he was just. Annoyed.

Of course it was for personal reasons of comfort, but there was the whole safety thing about having Bucky so far away. If Bucky started to slip back into feeling like he was being drugged, Steve was too far away for him to reach out to. And Steve seriously doubted that Bucky would reach out to Dum Dum Dugan for help.

So that's where they were. Steve was pouting and worried and Bucky was singing too loudly and too far away and drinking about eight times more than he should be. He was going to be wasted and Steve could not figure out what was eating Bucky enough to make him turn to the risk of losing himself like that.

Praise the Lord and swing into position
Bucky's face was lit up bright, his eyes twinkling as he tilted his head comically and sang the words with exaggerated conviction, Get aboard to be a politician lifting his whiskey to the rest of them in a sloppy toast before he tipped his head back and downed the rest of his glass in one go, Praise the lord we're all between Perdition squeezing his eyes shut tight from the burn before breathing out a heavy breath
And the deep blue sea

Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition and slamming his glass back down on the table. Dugan clapped him on the back, Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition laughing and saying something about "Sarge sure can take his whiskey!"
Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition
Steve refrained from burying his head in his hands.
And we'll all stay free!

Bucky's eyes were bright and his mouth was loose and shiny, tongue constantly wetting his lips as he looked around the table of men, his face happier and more relaxed than Steve had seen since January. His movements were sloppy, he blinked too much, and his limbs started to get in the way of his own body. Wow, he was incredibly, seriously, drunk. The other men were laughing their asses off at the sight of seeing their serious Sergeant fumbling and smiling too wide.

Steve started to sketch the image out in his head, the dull lights of the pub reflecting off their faces as everybody turned their eager eyes on Bucky, mesmerized by the glowing aura and wide smile. It could be something of a painting, the same look of respect and amazement on all of the Howling Commando's faces as they soaked in every word the too-excited Bucky said. He couldn't not draw this when he got back to base.

For a brief moment, Steve wondered if this was what Bucky had been like before Zola's table. Or had the war squashed this out before the torture could? When had that light started to fade to the solemn Bucky that sniped enemy soldiers from a mile away?

Was it in basic training? When he'd proved to be one of the best shots anyone had ever seen, promoted to an officer before he even shipped out? Was it the first time he'd taken another man's life away with a bullet between the eyes? Was it down in the trenches, waking up at night at the slightest sound, nerves and adrenaline dangerously high for weeks on end? Or had he somehow maintained his bright joy through all of that, been the beacon of light for the other soldiers? Had Zola been the one to take this?

Steve didn't know, and he didn't know how to ask either. He just stared, eyes drifting over Bucky's face as he explained something enthusiastically to Gabe, his hand gestures big enough to almost hit Jim every few words.

If someone were to take a photograph of this moment, would the look on Steve's face match the rest of his teammates? Or would his reveal something more? He had a feeling he knew the answer to that already.

Normally he'd be looking down at the table, maybe at a sketchbook if he'd thought to bring one. But tonight Bucky was talking and vibrant and everyone was looking at him, so Steve had the excuse to too. Hell, it'd probably look weird if he didn't. So he kept his eyes floating over Bucky's face, over curves and lines and shadows he'd drawn more than anything else in his life. He was million miles away and Steve had been cut off from that light.

Even his stories somehow managed to leave out Steve's name. Or his presence at all, actually. He hadn't even known that was possible. Every single one of Steve's stories from Brooklyn that was worth telling started with the words "Bucky and I."

But Bucky had an entire night full of stories that had nothing to do with Steve. Crazy happenings at the docks, run ins at all his other jobs. Stories of girls, of red lipstick and curls and dirty kisses in alleys. Bar fights and drinking competitions with his buddies from the docks. Stories from basic training, stories from the first few months at war before the 107th was captured. An entire lifetime of stories. And in all of them, Steve had been home. Drawing, or sleeping, or helping out the neighbors with their laundry for a tiny bit of cash.

Bucky had chapters and chapters in the book of his life sans Steve, but Steve didn't have a single page in his own that didn't have Bucky's name on it, at least in thought.

He'd never realized...Bucky had access to any piece of Steve he could ever want and on the contrary, Steve was missing so much of Bucky. He hadn't been there, didn't know, didn't own all of those little pieces of Bucky. He was missing so much.

And now he'd lost another month with Bucky too. Bucky had been right there and Steve hadn't reached out, hadn't dragged Bucky back to him, hadn't nuzzled down behind Bucky as they slept on the cold ground. And all for what? Because Steve had thought Bucky would come to him? Buck gives him one night - just one - of trust and asking for help and suddenly Steve assumes that Bucky is going to come waltz his way to Steve's side the way he always had?

Times had changed and of course it wasn't like that anymore. Bucky had been hurt; he wasn't going to just show up and throw his arm around Steve's neck the way he used to. It was Steve's turn to do that for him.

He'd been so caught up on making sure that nothing changed between them due to the serum that he'd missed the entire point. Bucky had changed too, maybe more than Steve did, because Bucky had changed on the inside. It's like a gift on Christmas morning. You can change the size of the box and the wrapping paper but it doesn't change what you'll find inside. But if you keep the same box as before and swap the gift inside for something else entirely...it's not even the same present anymore.

Bucky had been needing Steve this whole time and wow, Steve had been a moron not to see that. And it wasn't like Bucky Barnes was going to try to explain to Captain America that he'd been changed more than the serum ever could have done. Especially since Bucky probably felt guilty for it or something ridiculous like that, knowing him.

When Bucky stood up to go grab the next round, he stumbled slightly and all the boys laughed, Bucky included. Then Steve stood up too, crossing around the table with a smile on his face (for once, thank god) and threw his arm around Bucky's shoulders.

Those icy turquoise blues landed on Steve, blinking and looking more sober than they were just due to the surprise.
"You always were a clumsy drunk," Steve smiled, his eyes trying to tell Bucky everything he'd realized, a new kind of promise in his eyes.

"A' least I don' hurl ova everythin' like you do," Bucky slurred back, sounding deeply Brooklyn. It was the best thing Steve heard all night. He threw back his head and laughed, tugging Bucky along with him towards the counter. The entire walk over, Bucky leaned warm and tight against Steve's side, his head all but resting on Steve's shoulder.

"Two pitchers of rum and two pitchers of whiskey, please." The bartender smiled and shook his head like they were crazy, but moved to the other wall to get new bottles out anyways.

"Hey, you alright?" Steve asked, leaning against the counter. Bucky braced himself against it too, staring at the wood between the hands he curled around the edge.

"Yeah, m'fine. I'll b'in tip-top shape t'morrow t'get back b'hind th' sniper rifle, no need ta worry." Bucky was looking anywhere but Steve, obviously uncomfortable. Which wasn't at all the intention, so Steve wrapped a gentle hand over an alcohol-loosened arm, forcing those icy blue eyes on him.

"That's not what I meant. I wasn't asking if a soldier was ready for battle, I wanna know if my best friend is okay." Steve's words made Bucky blink in surprise, eyes wide on Steve's before they cut down - flummoxed and flushed - to the bar. Steve watched the sudden redness and confusion filter into Bucky's skin and with a jolt, another idea lit up in his head. "Wait, is that why you've been avoiding me?"

"I h'vn't been avoidin' you."

"Don't even start with that."

"Then fine. No. S'not..." Bucky trailed off, expression pinched. "T'was stupid, really...don't matt'r much in th' first place. Just...all catchin' up to me, guess."

Steve scanned Bucky's features, deciding whether or not to push. Based on the stubbornness, probably not. "You know you can tell me anything, right Buck?"

"Act'ully I can't," Bucky said flatly as he straightened back upright, the statement made even more final as the bartender smacked all four pitchers down on the bar.

Steve was too taken aback to respond instantly, picking up two pitchers in one hand and swinging his arm back casually over Bucky's shoulders as Buck picked up the other two. He stiffened a little at the contact, so Steve kept his voice as light as possible when he finally responded to Bucky's comment.

"Well I can listen to anything, then. Alright?" Chilled silver eyes turned to look at him again, rich and more like caramel in the lighting, unguarded surprise in those eyes. Bucky hadn't been expecting that, and now he looked a little overwhelmed. Well, it wasn't the most eloquent thing Steve had ever said, but it still made the point loud and clear.

Bucky didn't have to talk if he didn't want to, but if he did? Steve would listen to anything and everything.

Steve shot the bartender a thanks over his shoulder before he walked Bucky back to the table, setting the next round down.

"Alright, Falsworth, get up. You're in Bucky's spot and he's nearing the point of fallin' over anytime soon. Unless one of you want to put the life of our Sergeant in your drunken hands, I recommend" opening up the seat next to me."

Bucky shoved at his collarbone, apparently offended by the implication that he couldn't handle himself when he was drunk. But there was a ghost of a smile, maybe even appreciation in Bucky’s eyes. He was totally a mess when he was drunk and he knew it. All wide eyes and big mouth and wet lips and excited noises and funny faces and lots of tripping over himself. Steve was more than willing to be the one to catch him.

They all sat back down and before anyone could say so much as another word, Bucky was starting in on his next story, words and arms as extravagant and exaggerated as ever.

This time, his story was about Steve.

~~~*~

A few hours later, there was a staggering, happy, very tactile Bucky draped over Steve's side as they made their way back to the little inn they were shacked up in. Czechoslovakia was fairly pretty, with its white stone wall buildings and red orange stucco roofs. Everything was close together and little and condensed on the sides of hills. Tiny inns and closed corridors and softly lit everything.

"Stevie, I swear," Bucky slurred as Steve manhandled him through the doorway of his room. He was ridiculous pliant when he was moved around, enough that something about the way he was acting kept nagging in the back of Steve's head. Something was off, but he couldn't place what it was.
"You're jus' about th' most confusion guy I know."

"How's that, Buck?" Steve asked, pushing Bucky down onto his bed and wishing for a moment that he wouldn't comply so easily. It was a little scary, how Bucky didn't seem to mind being pushed around anymore. It was nothing like how he'd been in Brooklyn. Back then, he didn't even let Steve help him around when he was drunk, always slurring that he could do it himself.

The only really comforting thing was that as pliant as he was, Bucky was needy. That was an awful thing to think and Steve kind of hated himself for it, but at least he could help this way. At least Bucky had two handfuls of Steve's jacket like he couldn't dream of ever letting him go.

"One momen' you back 'way, then you're here an' tryin' ta save me all sweet and pretty." Bucky blinked at him with big beautiful eyes and Steve looked up from where he'd been trying to disentangle Bucky's hands from his jacket.

"Aww, Buck, you think I'm pretty? I'm so honored, thanks. It's always been my dream, to finally get this tall strong body and be called pretty. Instead of, you know. Handsome. Awesome. Strong. Bigger than you."

"Well you prolly are bigger 'an me, now," Bucky pondered, looking off over Steve's shoulder with a contemplative line between his eyebrows. It took Steve a second to catch on to what Bucky was talking about.

"Bucky!" Steve scolded, shoving Bucky's chest so he fell back onto the bed. "Do you ever stop thinking about...that sort of thing? Ever?"

Bucky rolled over on his side, curling his legs up as he looked up at Steve from under the pieces of disheveled hair that had drifted onto his forehead. His lips were parted, open cupid's bows with the most unique slope Steve had ever seen.

"No," he answered simply, reaching up a hand to make grabby motions at Steve. Steve snorted and shook his head.
"You need to sleep this off, Buck. I'll bring water for you in the morning alright? I'll be in my room if you need me." The inn they were in was entirely empty due to the war. The manager was actually the bartender down at the pub, said that they could take however many rooms they wanted. So they'd each gotten their own to spread out in for once, and Steve's was down the hall, the first door by the stairs. Bucky's was at the other end, both of them placed in corner rooms so they could be the closest to the exits, should the need to protect the men arise.

"C'mon, Stevie. Don' leeeave me here." Bucky made a pouty face, the indent in his chin deepening as he frowned. Steve did the very best he could to maintain his poker face and keep from laughing at the sight.

"You need to sleep, okay? You know where to find me if you need me." Steve leaned down and brushed the mess of hair off of Bucky's forehead. Bucky mumbled something that Steve couldn't make out, then his eyes slipped closed. Good.

He checked one more time at the door to make sure Bucky was asleep, then Steve shut it softly behind him and headed down the hall to his own room. The rest of the men weren't in their rooms yet, they'd stayed for a few more rounds at the pub. Bucky had been about to drop from sleepiness though, so Steve had taken him back to the inn two buildings down.

Steve sighed as he closed the door to his own room, taking in the identical setup of the room to Bucky's. He plopped down on the bed, sure to kick his boots off first so he didn't get even more dirt everywhere than he already had. The bed was hard - probably wood covered in a few blankets. All the mattresses had been sent off in the war effort or cut to pieces to use for blankets. Warmth was a hell of a lot more important than cushion or comfort lately.

He'd literally barely laid down when there was a knock on his door. Steve sighed, swinging his legs back over the side and walking on tiptoe over to the door, in his socks and unsure of the sanitariness of the floor. It was probably Dugan or Jones, checking in with Steve to tell him they were all back to the inn now.

Steve swung open the door and was instantly pushed aside by Bucky shouldering his way into the room. Steve threw up his hands and sighed, closing the door behind him so the draft didn't get in.

"Bucky, I told you--"

"Couldn' sleep." Bucky interrupted, sitting down on Steve's bed and placing his boots next to Steve's. Steve ran a tired hand down his face, looking at the man who was now curled up on his bed. Sometimes Bucky Barnes was the most incredible and terrifying Sergeant in the US Army and other times he was a four year old.

"Well now I can't sleep, because you're in my bed. Besides, it's been three minutes. Nobody falls asleep inside of three minutes." Steve raised his eyebrows at Bucky but Bucky didn't budge.

"You do," he responded, shivering slightly. Okay, he had to be faking that. He was trying to get Steve to be sympathetic or something so he would relent and let Bucky sleep in here. Which didn't make sense in the first place, because why would Bucky want to share a bed when they finally had one for each of them?

Unless...unless this was about the flashbacks thing. If Bucky was scared to fall asleep alone when he was this drunk, in case the nightmares came. Maybe this annoying shit was Bucky's way of reaching out for Steve's help. He'd done weirder things. And Steve had promised himself that he'd be here for Bucky now...
"Okay. Fine. You can stay." He absolutely did not feel a rush of joy (Bucky was turning to him for help) as he walked over to the other side of the bed, lying down with his back pressed to Bucky's. As ridiculous as it was how often they did this, it was admittably nice and familiar to have Bucky's warmth and presence safe behind Steve. And besides, it had been weeks since he'd slept pressed this closely to his best friend.

Because apparently tonight was the night of Bucky's immaculate timing, just as Steve's eyes were slipping shut into comfortable sleep, Bucky flipped over. Steve's eyes shot back open as Bucky pressed up against his back and snaked his arms around Steve's waist, knees pressed up against the back of Steve's, something warm and wet brushing the bare skin on the back of Steve's neck.

Steve froze, completely still at the touch. It was one thing to let Bucky sleep in his bed when their backs were pressed together for warmth and solace. It was an entirely different ballgame to let his - very drunk - best friend cradle them together like lovers, pressed too tightly and too intimately.

The last time they'd slept like this, it had been for a reason. Just the two of them, in the woods and in no risk of people walking in and thinking the wrong thing, and Bucky had been freezing his ass off. And sober. Steve had pulled Bucky into his arms that night so that Bucky didn't freeze to death in December in France. It had been a tactical move, not a personal one.

But now, with the hot puff of Bucky's breath on the back of his neck, surrounded by the soft, wet touch of his lips resting on Steve's skin...this wasn't tactical anymore. They'd wake up in the morning and Bucky would be hungover and pissed because he'd been out of his mind the night before and tried to hold Steve in his arms like a dame and Steve hadn't stopped him. Steve couldn't do that to Bucky, not when he wasn't even in his right mind. If it was just the two of them, maybe. Maybe Steve would let it slide. Okay, fine, he'd let Bucky hold him because they were best friends, they were closer than most people could understand without confusing...things. But they weren't alone, it wasn't just the two of them, and Steve had to do something about it.

"Buck," Steve whispered into the darkness. A low hum vibrated against the back of his neck in response and Steve squeezed his eyes shut, fighting the chills that ran down his spine at the feeling, shoving that down as deep as it could go. "C'mon man, you can't koala me. It's not that cold, it's gonna be March in two days."

Warm lips made another sound into Steve's skin. Steve growled in frustration. Bucky clearly wasn't going to just move by getting talked out of it. Making a split second decision, Steve rolled in the circle of Bucky's arms, swift enough that he didn't catch on until they were laying face to face, Bucky's hands still clasped around Steve's middle, over his lower back now.

Okay, this would be crossing about three hundreds lines of their friendship vs Captain America thing (Bucky was only Sergeant Barnes on the battle field and in front of other soldiers, never alone. Steve would never boss Bucky around when it was just the two of them), but Bucky was drunk and half crazy and obviously cold and he wasn't going to listen to anything but Steve's order-giving voice right now. Steve hated to do this, but he didn't have a lot of other options.

"We have a mission to plan tomorrow and I need you at your best which means you need to get some legitimate rest. So let go and roll over, soldier." Steve ordered, the tingling feeling in his gut waiting for a response with something along the lines of yes sir, Captain Rogers. They'd laugh at this tomorrow, right? Or sometime next week? Eventually?

Bucky blinked at him a few times, their faces so close that he could physically taste the whiskey on Bucky's breath. Then the arms let go and Bucky rolled over, his back to Steve as he went quiet.
Steve let out a breath of relief, moving to roll back over himself. Then another thought echoed through his mind at the stillness of Bucky’s body. The terror on Bucky’s face when Steve had first found him. Scared, disoriented. Alone. Ordered.

Okay, so that may have been a shitty thing to do when Bucky was disoriented by all the alcohol. But it was still better than waking up in the position they'd been in; Steve could atone to that. He couldn't just abandon Bucky though, not if he might have been reaching out to Steve in his weird, tactile way. Steve groaned, looking up at the ceiling. Things would be a hell of a lot easier if they didn't have to keep up appearances so people wouldn't talk.

Steve didn't even want to know what people might think. What they might say. What Colonel Phillips and Peggy and the Commandos might think.

But it was still Bucky.

Steve rolled over to face the curled up body, sure to keep at least six inches between Bucky's back and his own chest. Okay, so they couldn't exactly cradle, but they could still touch. Especially if it wasn't obvious.

The hand that was closest to the blankets slid forward, pushing gently under Bucky's ribs. The touch was met with a quick jump of surprise, then the tense muscles in the shoulders relaxed as Steve bent his elbow up, hand sliding over the top of Bucky's clothes to rest between his heart and his left arm, where his left shoulder met the rest of his body. Once Steve's hand was pressed to the place - out of sight to anyone who walked in, due to the way Bucky's body was angled - he made sure to scoot back as far as his bent elbow would allow. He had the entire length of his upper arm to put space between them and Steve felt a little bit like a robot saying hello, his arm making an extended L from his body.

It'd be a lot nicer to hold Bucky's body to his properly, but again. It wasn't safe. Even this could mean that Steve would wake up to Bucky's not-so-thankful punch. But it was some sort of middle ground, cradling Bucky's torso with one arm, wrapping it there for support and presence. Even if the rest of them wasn't touching, it was nice.

Bucky must have thought so too, because he was relaxed again within seconds. With a small, almost hesitant gesture, his right hand curled up over Steve's, fingers overlapping. Their forearms over lapped too, Bucky's right arm over Steve's curved up left. It wasn't much, but it was enough. And warmer, somehow, even though it was just Steve's arm. The peacefulness of it all was incredible, but not near as great as the sense of security was.

They both were asleep within minutes. As soundly as two soldiers in the middle of a war could be. The Commandos raised their eyebrows at Sarge's open bedroom door and Cap's closed one, but nobody said anything. They were close, and Bucky had been pretty drunk. Which meant that if they mentioned anything about it tomorrow, Bucky would be pretty hungover. And pissed. So they kept their mouths shut.

In a war like this one, everyone was safer if they just kept quiet.

~*_~*_~*_~_~

The next few days were a blur of planning and prepping and fighting, taking down the Hydra base in Czechoslovakia and then they were hauling ass across the border into Austria. They reached the Danube River by March 8th and caught a ship there so they could cut up through the country, riding the German border all the way to Belgium. From that point they'd get as far north as possible, look into London or the Danish Straits as the next attack.
But in the meantime, the Howling Commandos were stuck on a boat - thankfully, a fairly large boat - for several days. One of which happened to be a pretty damn important day.

They'd spent more than twenty four hours on the ship by the time the sun rose on March 10th, so they were all pretty familiar with the way things went. Morita kept threatening to get sea sick, Dernier loved the thing, Jones and Falsworth and Dugan were all pretty content just to play cards on the deck. But there was literally nothing they could do until they got off the boat tomorrow evening, so technically it was supposed to be a day to catch up on their rest.

Instead, Steve had a plan. Or two. After all, March 10th was a very important day.

Bucky was the type to rise pretty early, so Steve actually had to set up the plans the night before. Then sneak out of the room they were sharing at like four am just to make sure that they'd get to Bucky before he woke up on his own.

When Steve came knocking on everyone's doors and rounded everyone up on deck, Jacques was grumbling something in French that Gabe muttered an agreement to. Steve didn't have to know French to tell they were complaining about how the sun was still half an hour away from rising, but he wasn't taking any risks on spoiling this because they wanted their beauty sleep. They'd woken up earlier in a hell of a lot worse conditions for a hell of a lot less. They were only complaining because technically, this wasn't a mission. Technically, they were all supposed to be sleeping in.

They could sleep later.

The only person who didn't seem grumpy about being up this early was Morita, who Steve nodded gratefully to. It was probably just because he was too serious and quiet to complain, but still. Dugan rolled his eyes, whispering a complaint about how they might as well damn do this already if they woke up so goddamn early. So Steve had waved them all down to the little cabin room (well, the "cabins" were actually just bunk beds built into a wall with doors over them, basically) that Bucky was still sleeping in, everybody slowly losing their grumpiness as they looked at the door in anticipation.

Steve put his finger to his lips and they all stopped, looking at least slightly excited that they got to make someone even more miserable than they were. It wasn't that early, they just liked complaining. It'd be totally worth the look on Bucky's face anyways.

With a silent turn of the knob, Steve swung the door open wide, letting the cold wind rush into the little bunk the same time their united shouts did.

"HAPPY BIRRTHHDAAYY TO YOOOUUU!! HAPPY BIRR--" Bucky shouted in surprise, jumping half a foot off the bed before quickly drawing his gun out from under his pillow and aiming it at them, eyes wide and hair sticking in eighteen different directions.

Dugan threw his head back and bellowed, Dernier crumpled to the ground with tears in his eyes, Jones had his hands on his knees and his shoulders shaking, Morita was snorting ungracefully into his hand and Falsworth was attempting to keep singing the rest of the birthday song with the rest of the Commandos laughing too hard to join in.

Except for Steve, who had inched forward cautiously and removed the pistol from Bucky's hand. Bucky blinked a few times, like he'd forgotten he'd drawn it. Then he turned his eyes to the rest of the boys, who were still laughing. And at the look on Bucky's face, laughing harder.

"You're all going to hell." Bucky said flatly. Dugan managed a breathy already there in between laughs and Bucky made a half-assed touché face in response. Steve looked on, smiling, as the other boys at least managed to settle down into giggles instead of barking laughs. He hadn't busted up the way everyone else did because he'd seen Bucky that way a hundred times; besides, he never could be too careful with what his face gave away. It wasn't that Bucky's surprise ever stopped being wonderful, it was just that Steve didn't find it so much amusing as he did adorable.

Bucky rubbed a hand down his face, attempting to wake up as he blinked around at everyone. He caught Dernier's point at his hair and resounding snicker, then he was trying to smooth it down with flat, frantic palms. Everyone kept laughing. Bucky finally threw up his hands in frustration.

“Ugh. Who the hell told you it was my birthday?” Bucky accused, glaring at everyone in general. All eyes went to Steve.

Steve quickly emptied the bullets from Bucky's gun he was still holding. Bucky glared double what he had been before, pointing at Steve and dropping his voice lower. Probably for intimidation, although that's not exactly what came across.

“I'm getting you back for this. Watch your back Rogers.” Steve opened his mouth to protest but didn't get the chance before Falsworth interrupted, looking around and grinning at everyone, finally having finished his quiet rendition of the rest of the song.

“You're right Cap, that was entirely worth it.”

“Brilliant plan.” Morita agreed. Bucky finally got off his bed, tackling his combat boots onto his feet.

“Yeah, super brilliant. You guys are such amazing singers I'm shocked you haven't formed a barbershop quartet yet.” Bucky's voice was loaded with dry sarcasm and then everybody was peeling into laughter again. Steve tossed Bucky his gun back - sans bullets - and Bucky made a face but tucked it in his belt.

"Okay, so birthday plans-" Steve started.

"You made plans??"

"You're turning 26! Of course I made plans!"

"Two years older than you, Stevie," Bucky retorted. Steve rolled his eyes and the Commandos all got that funny wide-eyed look they had every time Bucky called their Brave Strict Captain America something as silly and childish as Stevie. None of the rest of them would ever dare to call him that.

"How many times, Bucky? You're not two years older than me, just a year, three months, and twenty five days. I'll catch up again in July, goodness. Do we have to have this conversation every year?"

"Yes," Bucky grinned, making faces at everybody as he passed to walk up the stairs to the deck. "So, what are the plans for my birthday? If it doesn't include cake or drinks you're officially off party-planning crew, Rogers."

~*~

There wasn't cake, but there were plenty of drinks. And cards. Actually, quite a few hours worth of poker games. Then Dernier taught everybody a new card game through Jones's translations and they played that until the sun was high in the sky, beating down on them from overhead.

They all stretched out the best they could on the deck, soaking up the feeble promise of warmth from the sun. If ten degrees above zero could be considered warm in any sense of the word. The boat wasn't exactly big enough to hold seven sprawled out men on deck, so they were all close together enough to share bits of body heat where arms and feet touched.

Everyone was pretty content just to lie there in the quiet for a while. After a bit though, Steve blinked up at the blue sky drifting by overhead and spoke up.

"How bout you tell us a story, Tim? One of the good ones." He shielded his eyes from the sun as he looked over to where Dugan was laying. He looked contemplative for a moment, one arm under his head and his hat on his chest.

"How bout you tell us one, Cap? You never tell stories." Dugan nudged Morita who nudged Steve with his foot.

"Yeah, you should tell us a story, Captain. You don't gotta drink with us, but you can't get outta story telling." Falsworth added.

"Les histoires?" Dernier asked Jones. Gabe nodded, reaching up his hand to smack the side of Steve's boot. Then he reached over and poked Bucky's shoe too.

"Cmon Sarge. Make him tell a story. It's your birthday, he'll do whatever you ask."

"I doubt that," Bucky responded, still looking up at the sky. Steve glanced over at him, resisting the urge to reach out his hand and bump it against the back of Buck's. It would only be another few inches, but Steve refrained anyways.

"Oo, tell us one about Barnes, Cap! It's his birthday after all." Gabe nudged Steve again. Steve sighed, scooting a bit closer to Bucky so he would stop getting nudged and poked.

"Okay, fine." Lazy cheers erupted and died down just as quickly. "I've got lots of stories about Buck."

"All your good stories are about me," Bucky pointed out. And, damn him, Steve couldn't refute that. Of course they were. Steve made a face up at the blue sky in response.

"Definitely an embarrassing one, then. So for Bucky's birthday a while back, I think it was in '39? Bucky comes stumbling home that day at noon, drunk as an ox, staggering all over the place. His face was busted up, lip broken, bleedin all over everything. You know the first thing he says to me?"

"Oh lord almighty not this story," Bucky groaned in complaint.

"Hey! It's a good story!"

"No it's not. And I'm a better story teller anyways. See, how it actually went is that early that day, Steve had gone out to the docks I was working at to bring me something for my birthday. The thing is, this guy named Carter was workin that day and he didn't take to well to tiny Stevie and - man you shoulda seen the look on his face..."

~*~

Like all vacation days, hours slipped by faster and faster. Cards and stories and drinks and laughter and too soon, the sun was getting ready to sink in the sky. The bright had faded to a sunset glow, reflecting off the water like something of a fairytale. They were all sitting on the benches by the hull, jackets wrapped tight against the freezing spray of the water. It was worth it though, even as their hair was wiping in the wind, skin burning from the bitter cold. The whole scene was too beautiful to miss, too beautiful to turn away from.
Dernier was humming something under his breath, just a quiet backtrack to the scene. Everyone had been quiet for some time now, watching the sun sink lower and lower in the sky. For lack of anything better to do, Steve hummed along a few harmonies to Dernier's soft sounds.

"You know, Buck, you mentioned somethin' earlier about a barbershop quartet. I think we'd make a pretty fine one." Steve elbowed Bucky, tipping him sideways slightly. Bucky ducked his head and curved his lips up a little, contemplating the idea as the rubbed the fingers of his gloves together.

"Yeah, brilliant plan, Stevie. After the war, all of us stickin around to sing." He laughed, the sound visualized like dragon smoke in the air against the cold.

"We could still go by the Howling Commandos. It might lower expectations if we keep 'howling' in the name," Dugan offered. That made a few of the boys crack up, leaning back against the sides of the boat as they all pictured it.

"Actually, keeping the name might encourage high expectations," Morita pointed out.

"I can see the papers now...The Howling Commandos: Captain America's famous war regiment and Professional Barbershop Quartet," Jones announced in his radio commentator voice. A few more laughs went around the boat, eyes flicking between the beautiful sunset and each other.

"It's not actually a quartet if there's more than four people," Bucky commented, cocking his head with one of his signature side smirks.

"Alright, Barnes, it's a septet." Falsworth crossed his arms, raising his eyebrows at Bucky. "I think birthday boy doesn't think we have it in us."

Steve tipped his head back and laughed. It had been a joking side comment, but the boys seemed to at least like the idea. Dernier turned to Jones, leaning over Morita.

"J'ai un harmonica? Je le peux récupérer." Dernier offered. Jones snorted but waved him on with his hand. The Commandos watched curiously as Dernier opened up his backpack. He rummaged around for a moment before pulling out a silver harmonica. He looked to Jones, grinning. "Joue un air?"

"Oui! Nous chanterons," Jones responded. Dernier grinned and pulled the harmonica up to his mouth. Jones turned to the rest of them. "Dernier's gonna play a tune and we're all going to sing for Sargeant Barnes."

Bucky groaned and Falsworth pushed his shoulder, tipping Bucky into Steve. Steve caught his shoulder and put Bucky back upright.

"Alrighty, what are we singing?"

"You know Hot Time in Berlin, Dernier?" Dugan asked, looking around at the rest of the eager faces. Everyone but Bucky nodded in agreement and Dernier blew a warm up scale.

"D'accord." The first few notes of the melody started up on the steely harmonica sound, cutting in the cold March air and floating on the wind. Dugan started tapping his foot along, bobbing his head as Jones tapped his fingers on the bench.

Steve leaned over to Bucky's ear, whispering encouragement.

"C'mon, you used to love to sing while I drew. Don't be shy now, Buck." He leaned back away with a grin and Bucky muttered something in Steve's direction, but he was fighting a smile.
Dugan clapped a hand on Jones' back as they leaned together and both began singing. "There'll be a hot time in the town of Berlin." Morita and Falsworth joined in, voices comically high as they sang the backup vocals, "When the Yanks go marching innnn."

The Commandos all pointed to Jones to take the solo, a grin breaking out on his face as his deeper voice echoed out with as much brightness as his smile. "I want to be there boy, spread some joy, when they take old Berlin!"

Steve was still making faces at Bucky, trying to get him to sing, when Dugan got up out of his seat, fighting the wind to come up behind the two of them. Bucky was starting to cave, shaking his head and smiling now. The rest of them all came in with the next verse, untrained voices meshing together into something resembling singing.

"There'll be a hot time in the town of Berlin!" Dugan leaned in close with his head between Steve and Bucky's, one arm over both of their shoulders as he squeezed them together, singing the next part in his loud, overbearing baritone. "When the Brooklyn boys beginnnnn!

Steve tilted his head towards Bucky's, singing exaggeratedly loud, "To take the joint apart, and tear it down, when they take old Berlin!"

Bucky rolled his eyes but finally joined in with the rest of them, his voice and smile blending to match everyone else's.

"We're going to start a row, show 'em how. We paint the town back in Kokomo!" Dugan made his way back to his seat, throwing his arms over Jones's and Falsworth's shoulders. Jones followed suit, pulling Morita and Dugan closer. Dernier kept up the harmonica while the rest of them banded together, singing loudly into the cold wind with everyone's arms over linked over each other's shoulders.

"We're gonna take a hike through Hitler's Reich, change the heil to whatcha-know-Joe...There'll be a hot time in the town of Berlin. When the yanks go marching iinnn." Morita took the next solo, everyone else fading to humming in the background. "How you gonna keep 'em happy down on the farm, after they take Berlin?"

Bucky suddenly shot out of his seat, both hands gripping the edge of the boat, his hair whipping around like crazy as he shouted face first into the wind, "POOR ADOLF!"

Dugan doubled over with laughter and Dernier choked on the breath he was about to put into the harmonica, making Morita start laughing harder as he fell off the seat, which made Falsworth start gasping for air and tear up as Jones tried to fumble to catch Morita and fell himself.

Steve tossed his head back again and laughed, loud and happy and never higher in a war like this one. Bucky's eyes were on Steve when he wiped tears from them and looked back over his comrades, the wide mouth cocked in a Brooklyn-worthy grin. Steve may be the one with all of the ideas, but Bucky was what gave them life.

He lit up all of Steve's plans, was that vital second piece. The person with the idea was important, sure, but it was the second person, the one who initiated the plan and agreed, the backup and support...that was the most important thing Steve could ever have. It was an odd time to think about it, sure, when they were just messing around and singing, but.

But there wasn't a part Steve's life that he didn't need Bucky in. He couldn't imagine what his life would be like now if he hadn't been able to save Bucky. If Bucky wasn't here...Steve had no idea what he'd be without him.
When the laughter eventually died down, their song cut short due to Bucky's outburst, everyone settled back into their seats. A few giggles still drifted in the wind - although if anyone had accused any of the soldiers of the sounds they were making being called 'giggles,' they might not take that so well - as they fell back into a merry silence. Dernier kept his harmonica out, sitting on his lap.

They were all quiet for a minute or two, still grinning as they sat in the glow of the evening. The sun was further down in the sky now, a fourth of it disappearing into the water. The world was more orange and red than bright now, shadows falling over the boat but not on anyone's faces.

"You know, Cap, I didn't know you could sing." Dugan raised his eyebrows, readjusting his hat on his head as he gave Steve a look that said don't even try to deny it. Steve tried anyways.

"I really can't. Barnes can, though."

"Cannot."

"Yes, you can."

"No, that's not fair, that was ages ago--"

"It was like a year and a half ago!"

"Okay, okay," Falsworth interrupted. "Sarge, Captain, how about this. You can both sing for us, and we'll decide who can sing or not."

"No way-" Bucky started, the same time Steve nodded and agreed with "Yeah, alright."

They turned and looked at each other. "What, you scared Buck? Think you can't beat me in a little friendly competition?"

"Fine. You go first." Bucky sat back and crossed his arms, petulant and pouty as he glared at everybody. Steve considered this for a moment before he nodded.

"Yeah, okay. Falsworth is singing with me, though." Falsworth looked mildly taken aback, the surprise on his face making Morita snort. Steve was fairly sure this was the most lighthearted he'd ever seen the man.

"That wasn't in the rules!"

"Neither was me going first!" Steve crossed his arms right back, getting on his feet so he had the upper hand over Bucky. "So this is the stipulation. Unless you wanna back out?"

"I hate you." Bucky shot back.

"I know. Okay, Montie. It's your time to prove you're good for something other than blowing stuff up."

Falsworth rolled his eyes but stood up, slightly wobbly from the rock of the boat before he got his bearings and made his way over to Steve's side. They conversed quietly for a moment, deciding on a song. Well, more like Steve had a song he wanted to sing and was trying to convince Falsworth to sing it with him.

"That song is extremely cheesy," Falsworth whispered. Fairly loudly.

"I like it," Steve argued, not exactly quiet either. Bucky rolled his eyes again. Falsworth finally sighed and relented, waving a hand in Dernier's direction. "Do you know How Deep is the Ocean?"
Dernier didn't respond, just lifted the harmonica to his mouth and began playing again. The melody drifted out in the metallic sound, a few grace notes and embellishments here and there as he started out the slow, sweet song.

Bucky rolled his eyes again, throwing up his hands and talking over the top of Dernier's intro. "This song, Stevie?"

"It's your favorite to sing in the shower," Steve retorted innocently. Dugan nearly lost a rib laughing. Again. At first, all of the Commandos had been extremely surprised every time that Steve made a comment that wasn't pure goody two shoes angelic. The first few times they'd seen him joke around and prank Bucky, they'd blinked in surprise like that was some side to Steve they had no idea could exist. By now though, they still thought it was hilarious but no one was actually surprised by it.

Bucky's cheeks had a bit of a pink tint to them, but that was more likely the bite of the freezing wind than it was embarrassment. He just rolled his eyes at Steve and leaned back, waiting for them to come in with the first verse.

Steve grinned, kept his eyes locked on Bucky's as he opened his mouth to begin singing.

"How much do I love you? I'll tell you no lie. How deep is the ocean? How high is the sky?" The fading light could be deceiving, but it looked like Bucky did go a deeper shade of pink then.

He looked away, flushed, and Steve's eyebrows furrowed a little. That was a little out of character for Bucky; it took a lot to get him uncomfortable. Or embarrassed. Steve couldn't tell which this was, but he just pursed his lips and nudged Falsworth to take the next few lines.

"How many times a day do I think of you? How many roses are sprinkled with dew?" While Falsworth sang, Bucky glanced back over at Steve. Steve cocked his head in a question are you okay? and Bucky nodded slightly, fingers worrying the edges of his right sleeve.

He kept his eyes on Steve though, all throughout the next verse too. Steve didn't stare back because that was a recipe for trouble, but his lips curved up a little at the weight of that gaze on him.

"How far would I travel to be where you are?" Steve sang, his head full of parachuting from planes and planning to walk to Austria if he hadn't been able to catch a ride. "How far is the journey from here to a star?"

Falsworth threw his arm up over Steve's shoulders, tugging Steve down sideways with his smallness. Steve threw one back as they sang the last verse together, over exaggerated this time as they totally hammed it up, vibrato and all.

"And if I ever lost you, how much would I cry? How deep is the ocean? How. high. is the skyyyyy?" Steve squinched his nose to hit the high note at the end and the laughter erupted over the boat again, even Falsworth falling into giggles as Dernier blew a final flourish on the harmonica.

They kept their arms over each other's shoulders for a deep, exaggerated bow. Jones wolf-whistled and even Bucky and Morita were clapping and laughing.

It wasn't like this all the time - it wasn't like this ever, really - but Steve had a feeling if they all made it through the war, they might have a chance for it to be like this. Not the barbershop quartet part - although, maybe just for kicks when they went out to bars - but the fun. The laughing and the joking. They had a good time in their off time, sure, but nothing so crazy as today. Today Steve wasn't Captain Rogers of the Howling Commandos. Today he got to take off the suit and for once, be Steve Rogers from Brooklyn.
"If we all make it out of this war, first thing we're doing is going to some dive bar and singing at the top of our lungs," Steve declared, taking his arm off Falsworth shoulders to clap him on the back. "And then, maybe I'll drink with you all."

Cheers erupted and Steve bowed lightly again, exaggerated arm roll and everything. Then he plopped back down next to Bucky, nudging him with his shoulder. "Your turn, Buck."

With a melodramatic sigh, he got up and crossed the boat with slightly wobbly legs, leaning down to whisper his request into Dernier's ear. Dernier nodded, looking slightly surprised, but put the harmonica up to his lips and looked to Bucky for the cue.

Instead of standing at the opening of their semi circle, Bucky just sat down on the empty bench next to Dernier, looking down at his hands as he nodded at the Frenchman and began to sing.

"The other night, dear, as I lay sleeping...I dreamed I held you in my arms. When I awoke, dear, I was mistaken...And I hung my head and cried." Steve blinked a few times, not sure he'd heard right. Or was seeing right. Bucky's voice was as beautiful as always, but the broken sincerity on his features and the familiarity of the scene that the words were painting made Steve listen a little harder.

"You are my sunshine, my only sunshine. You make me happy when skies are grey." Bucky finally lifted his head, staring off over the water and not looking at anyone as his voice softened a little for the next few words. "You'll never know, dear, how much I love you."

Then, finally, Bucky's eyes were on his, both of them barely breathing as Bucky sang directly to him. "Please don't take my sunshine away."

Steve's head was spinning, the whole world was spinning. It wasn't what it looked like, right? Steve was reading to much into it. It was just a song. Bucky was only looking at him for a confidence boost, right? Steve had always been his biggest fan.

But Bucky's voice was beautiful, he didn't need any bit of confidence. Just as perfect and enchanting as it had always been. When he was like this, Bucky's singing was as soft and sweet as his normal jokes were crude and loud.

Everyone got to open up a new side of them today, everyone got to see a little deeper into each other. They'd all been wonderful friends before this, but Steve would say that day was the turning point between a well-oiled team and inseparable friends. That was the first day they had a chance to be more than soldiers. That day they got to be just men. Friends.

"I'll always love you, and make you happy. If you will only say the same..." Bucky's voice was back to louder now, and Steve had spent the beginning of that verse watching the Commandos' faces, gaging their reactions to Bucky. Of course, everyone was just quiet and watching and enthralled, as always. Well, not the quiet part. That was fairly new.

"But if you leave me to love another..." Steve's eyes snapped back to Bucky, who was actively avoiding looking at Steve at all. "You'll regret it all some day."

Then the chorus came again, the usual bright cheeriness of the song taken with a melancholy edge. Slower than the original he and Buck had heard on the radio in art class, a few different notes thrown in to almost make it into a minor key. Not quite, but just enough to bring an edge of sadness to a song that should be about sunshine.

Steve's heart was pounding ridiculously and he hated himself for it, the way his mind was wandering. It wasn't what it look like, it wasn't what it sounded like. It was never what it looked like between them. Steve just had to calm down, get a grip on his racing heart and damp palms.

"You told me once, dear...you really loved me. And no one else could come between." A dark apartment, the word pneumonia in the air as watering eyes and clenched fingers looked up from their kneeling spot beside the bed and asked if Steve regretted anything. This life may be over, but I had you til death. He'd meant it too, when Steve had told Bucky that. They'd cried themselves to sleep that night.

"But now you've left me. And love another..." A red dress, bright red lips. Distaste in Bucky's voice. The first time Bucky had seen Steve's compass, the way his face had twisted up in some dark emotion. Pain, maybe. Not jealousy. Never jealousy, of course. "You have shattered all my dreams..."

Steve couldn't breathe. It was like he was having an asthma attack all over again, except that his lungs were perfectly healthy. It was just his mind. His heart. They were going to collapse in on him.

"You are my sunshine, my only sunshine," drifting beautifully over the wind, Bucky's eyes glancing nervously between the very last sliver of the setting sun and Steve. "You make me happy when skies are grey."

Just a song. It was just a song. "You'll never know, dear..." overreacting, he was overreacting. "How much I love you." Just. A. Song.

Their eyes met. Bucky's cupid's bow mouth wide open, paused before the last line. Time was frozen over, everything was frozen over. Dernier's harmonica stopped, leaving the last line to be acapella. Steve was fairly sure everyone on this boat could hear his heartbeat it was so loud.

Then, finally, slow and soft and sweet and barely above a whisper, came the line all the men were silent and waiting for.

"Please don't take...my sunshine...away."

Cheers and hollers and incredulous looks from every direction and Bucky smiled, thanking Dernier before heading back over to plop down beside Steve.

He leaned in close and Steve's heart stopped. Then his mouth was ghosting over Steve's ear, the whisper curling its smoke into Steve's skin. "I think I won."

"Mmm, really?" Steve managed so eloquently, the rocking of the boat threatening to make him seasick for the first time since he stepped onboard.

"Yep," Bucky said smugly, leaning back to his side of the bench. Steve blinked.

God, what was wrong with him? He hadn't been this ridiculous for years. This was Bucky, of course it was about the competition. Nothing else. How could Steve worry for a single moment...?

He let out a shaky breath of relief. Maybe all this salt water was getting to his head. He'd always had trouble with the salt water in his lungs, so maybe since the serum fixed his lungs, his head didn't recognize that salt water was no longer dangerous and was still letting it get to Steve's head?

Or...something like that.

Anything but what Steve had been thinking because this was Bucky. Sergeant James Buchanan Barnes. A sudden wave of guilt and shame washed over him. How could he think those things about his best friend for one second? How dare he insult Bucky like that, even in his mind? Especially in his mind.
The last of the worry drained from him, just a slightly empty feeling lined with guilt to replace it. He'd been irrational and ridiculous. And had apparently zoned out of the conversation the rest of the boys were having. Steve focused back in.

"-ote we sing one more for the whole team and call it a night." Dugan was declaring. The men all murmured content and tired agreement. The sun was down by now, just a slightly streaked sky fading darker. It was early, but they hadn't spent all day sleeping like they'd been planning too. So the extra hours would be appreciated by everyone.

"J'ai un chanson," Dernier assured and they all nodded, even though only Jones knew what he was saying. But if it was good enough for Jones to nod, the rest of them trusted him enough to agree.

The harmonica was set to lips again and the brief metallic melody started out over the wind again, grinding slow and sweet and final.

They all looked to each other, everyone's smile haunted by the melancholy of reality catching back up to them, their lives and the war falling back into their minds as the notes drifted over the wind. Dugan's eyes were watering a little already, although that could have been the wind. Steve doubted that though.

When the words started, Dugan and Morita and Jones and Bucky all came in together, Falsworth and Steve taking backup vocals to add on.

"Till then, till then, my darling, please wait for me. Till then, till then, no matter when it will be. One day, I know I'll be back again. Please wait, till then."

He knew Jones had a girl back home, as did Falsworth and Dugan. Morita had mentioned one at first, but a couple of letters later and that was a bust. Dernier had never bothered to get that part of his life translated, although he probably did have a girl.

It was on all of their faces. The loves broken by war and distance and time. Holding on across oceans and battlefields. Painted across their faces like a vivid, broken story.

"Our dreams will live though we are apart. Our love, I know it'll keep in our hearts. Till then, when all the world will be free...Please wait for me."

Steve glanced at Bucky, wondering who he was thinking of to have the same painting across his features. There hadn't been anybody special for years, that Steve could remember. Just lots of girls that didn't work out. But Bucky sure looked like he had somebody in his mind.

"Although there are oceans we must cross, and mountains that we must climb...I know every gain must have a loss. So pray that our loss is nothing but time."

"Till then, let's dream of what there will be." The back of Bucky's hand brushed up against Steve's. Steve pressed back in automatic response. "Till then, we'll call on each memory."

For a couple of soldiers from all over the world stuck in a war together, they didn't sound half bad. In fact, Steve was fairly sure it was the best barbershop quartet he'd ever heard. He was a little partial, though.

"Till then, when I will hold you again," The muscle flicker pulsed against the back of Steve's hand as Bucky's fingers curled. If they were to overlap their hands, they'd be weaving callused fingers together. Neither of them moved. "Please wait, till then."

"Although there are oceans we must cross," They all looked out over the black river, waves crashing the side of the boat from the wind. It might as well have been an ocean. "And mountains that we must climb..."

"I know every gain must have a loss." Steve's eyes cut to Bucky, the peaceful expression on his face as the wind battered at the loose strands on his forehead. He'd never considered himself all that lucky, but he'd gained so much. Always had so much, when he had Bucky. But Steve couldn't lose him, he couldn't live with that. "So pray that our loss... is nothing but time."

Time. Years spent killing instead of drawing and singing and sitting on the steps of their Brooklyn apartment. They were losing time, months of time, and that was the only thing Steve was willing to sacrifice in regards to Bucky. He couldn't stand to lose anything else.

"Till then, let's dream of what there will be," Two houses, next door. Their children calling each other brother and sister, Bucky's baby boy in Steve's lap by the fire. Their wives as best friends, Steve and Bucky sneaking away every Saturday night to do something with just the two of them.

"Till then, we'll call on each memory," Cold nights, the warm comfort of hands entwined, a million blankets. Bucky's brilliant laugh as he throws his arm around Steve's shoulder. The white blank pages of the new sketchbook Bucky bought him shining bright and begging to be filled with sweeping pencil lines.

"Till then, when I will hold you again," Bucky's back to Steve's chest in the woods, pressed warm and safe enough to feel Bucky's heartbeat and every breath. Nights in Brooklyn with the position reversed, his back curled up against the warmth of Bucky's front, a familiar arm looped over his waist. It was in those moments that Steve never felt safer. More real. More alive.

"Please wait," The backs of their hands pressing closer, Steve's thumb running over the side of Bucky's.

The harsh, cold wind whipping around them as their heads turned, eyes met. The last streak of pink in the sky slipping to black. The stars starting to twinkle out of hiding overhead. A beautiful, icy blue silver moon the color of Bucky's eyes washing light all over them. Something deep in those eyes that Steve had never had permission to see before, didn't have the slightest clue to what it was.

"Till then." Their last notes garbled and slipped away in the wind, a whisper in a lover's ear. Steve leaned over, soft smile on his face as he knocked his shoulder into Buck's.

"Happy Birthday, Bucky."

Chapter End Notes

So that was ridiculously fluffy - an apology in advance for the next chapter of definitely not-so-fluffiness Late March they ended up in London, much to Monty's joy. They didn't stay long, although they did have the chance to go to a pub Falsworth used to regular.

In April, they invaded a Hydra castle in the Danish Straits and almost died. They pulled through thanks to Steve, as always. In May they hit another part of Scandinavia, knocked out a couple'a minor bases there. Then took down a bigass submarine. June was fairly nice because they weren't in risk of hypothermia anymore; they spent most of June outside in the woods.

Months fly by and mesh together when nothing changes. Killing and shooting and smoke and nights under open skies around a flickering fire. The same six faces, the same six expressions. All that spark they'd had at the beginning would still burn on the battlefield during a fight, but the nights of singing around the fire and cheering after each exploited base grew fewer with time and weariness. They were still running too fast for the Nazis but not fast enough to outrun the things they'd done.

Quiet nights, Steve would draw by the fireside. He never finished those sketches and he never let Bucky see them, but Bucky didn't push. If they were of him - of the quiet, worn and solemn face that stared back in a rippled reflection - Bucky wasn't sure he wanted to see anyways. He didn't know if he'd recognize the man behind the smoke and blood.

They had it better than a lot of soldiers, Bucky knew that. That was because of Steve. He was so confident and sure and promising that somehow, every single one of them managed to roll out of bed in the morning. Somehow they all found something to keep fighting for.

July and August could barely be called summer, stifling sticky months with the same chilly nights. A fever of the earth, pulsing and dragging them down by their ankles. Bucky could barely breathe some days, everything was so stagnant and stuffy. Not breathing was at least better than freezing to death.

It was one of the thankfully less-stifling August nights that Bucky was on watch, gun propped comfortably at his side as he kept an eye on his sleeping comrades.

Well, almost all. It was probably sometime around eleven when the stick cracked and the ground compressed with heavy boots, alerting red alarms in one swift motion down to the trained pulse in his veins.

As soon as Dugan came marching up over the rise into sight, Bucky relaxed the hand on his gun. Well, half-relaxed. Wasn't due to be off his shift for another hour - and Steve was taking the next one, not Tim. Coupled with the serious look on that face, the 'doe was swaggering up that hill for something else entirely. Great.

"Hey, Sarge. How you holdin' up?" Dugan made his way over, plopping down next to him on the fallen log. Bucky glanced over, vaguely curious as he repositioned the rifle across his lap.

"Fine, thanks. Got plenty'a shuteye earlier, no need to worry 'bout your nightwatch fallin' asleep." It wasn't entirely true because Bucky hadn't gotten sleep earlier, but he definitely wasn't gonna fall asleep on watch either.

But Dugan apparently didn't come up to discuss the integrity of his wakefulness. He leaned over on the log, tapping his finger against the side of Bucky's head. "I meant how you holdin' up there."

Oh. It was a legitimate how are you, not a generic one to pass the time. Dugan was checking up on his mental state. Great. Fuckin' great.

"Y'know how it is." Bucky shrugged. The Commandos were soldiers, they all had nightmares and bad days. And they needed to stop poking Bucky about his. "Nothin' worse than the rest'a you. Why?"

"We're worried about you." Dugan said, that whole gruffly light, not-taking-bullshit tone he'd basically copyrighted.

Bucky scoffed, toeing at the soft dirt with his boot. Everyone worried too much. Steve and Dugan the most, but all them worried way more than he deserved. Just cause he'd been tortured for a couple months didn't mean he was about to goddamned snap.

"Y'been acting off for awhile now." A lifted eyebrow shot his way and Bucky attempted not to tense up all over and failed. "Can't say I remember the last time you made a joke, Sergeant."

"This some sort'a intervention?" Bucky asked, blowing out a stream of air just to watch it not fog up from the lack of cold.
"Nah, Sarge. We're just worried. You're pretty damn important to all of us and nobody wants t'see you hurtin'." Dugan wasn't being gentle - wasn't ever gentle - but those words were a bit too invested to be his own.

"...you keep saying we. This a team effort or something?" That wasn't the best of thoughts; the Commandos conspiring how to talk The Sergeant down from his crazy cloud.

"Everyone's noticed, if that's what you're askin'. And well, y'know Rogers'd never say anything. Wouldn't wanna hurt your pride or such, but he's been getting rough around the edges with his frettin' again."

That was probably true. Steve wasn't the type to ask until it was a risk or a problem. Which it wasn't. He wasn't a goddamned risk. Or a problem.

Hadn't been avoiding anyone. Hadn't violently destroyed any Nazis with his fists lately. Just hadn't been laughing and joking. So he fell into silence more often than not, so what? Didn't have anything to say. Didn't wanna say if he did. None of it'd make sense to anybody anyways, it wasn't like they understood a lick'a what was happening behind the crystal crosshairs.

"So. You wanna tell me what's goin' on in that big noggin of yours?" Dugan pressed, resonating loud in the peace and quiet. The peace and quiet he'd really like to get back to now. Alone wasn't so bad, alone meant he didn't have a damn thing to be scared of but the crystal mirror, and the glass reflection wasn't gonna be pryin' secrets from him anytime soon.

"There's nothin' to tell." Bucky finally looked over, steely eyes challenging him to say one more goddamned thing.

Dugan sighed heavily and cut his gaze to camp, avoiding the hard metal behind icy blue. Didn't wanna be confrontational, but he also couldn't have the boys digging into his head right now.

Apparently he didn't glare hard enough because Dugan was still here, leaning forward to rest his forearms on his knees, hands clasped loosely between, comfortable and patient and he had to fight the childish urge to just reach over and shove the man off the damn bench.

"Barnes, you know you don't gotta hold up a'front for the rest'a us. We all know you've got some stuff goin' on that ain't so pretty. It's not like there's somethin' you can say that'll make us suddenly turn tail and squeal."

Bucky snorted a sadistic laugh because actually, there was plenty Bucky could say to get a hellofalot worse reaction than that. Dugan had no idea. This ran deeper than Zola's torture, now. "Rogers put you up to this?"

He hadn't meant to sound entirely cold, but the words came across pretty bitter. More bitter than he was feeling, because Bucky wasn't feeling much of anything, couldn't feel much of anything. One emotion meant one too many, and what happened when those emotions turned back to the sunshine again--

Dugan wasn't fazed though. Maybe that's why he'd been elected the mouse to navigate the maze of Sarge's psycho thoughts. He didn't exactly cave easy. Instead silver-blue leveled on Bucky's gaze again, mustache scrunching in all that seriousness and sincerity.

"Look, I ain't forgettin' you're a superior rank. And I'd follow you into hell, I would, Barnes. You're a damn good soldier and a hell of a loyal friend. But I ain't gonna sit and watch you deteriorate in front'a my eyes if there's somethin' I can do about it."
"There's nothing any'a you can do about it." This time he finally managed numbed and neutral. Maybe saying it at all was a little brutal, but he was bein' honest, which he owed Tim.

This round'a extended silence came from Dugan's half'a the rotting log. He stared off in the distance, bowler hat a shouting obvious landmark in crosshair's peripherals. Always kinda had been.

Finally Dugan tipped his big head to one side, looked at Bucky from the corner of his eye with the only cautious bone in his body, clearing his throat carefully and starting one more time. Stubborn bastard.

"I know you and Rogers were damn close as kids, grew up together and everything. Gotta be a lot stupider than even I am to downplay that. Anybody who's seen you with him-- the way you two are around each other..."

He trailed off, expression going foggy and distant and Bucky raised an expectant eyebrow, making a point to very obviously adjust the gun in his lap. Dugan snapped outta it, glancing over at him quick before rubbing a hand over his mustache.

"Point is, I know y'both and I get it. Lived in each other's pockets your whole life, had to be weird as hell for him to suddenly be some hotshot, leave you in the dust with us normal folks. Y'veen taking it real well, but some part of you's gotta be against it... 'cause you're fighting this like hell. You talk to him less now than you talked about him durin' that first stint on the frontlines. Things have changed. And I get he's your CO now, but if y'need your best friend, a man like Rogers ain't gonna deny you that. Really just...talk t'him. Maybe he can fight off those nightmares a'yours."

Bucky shot him a sharp look at the last line and Dugan raised his hands in surrender.

"Just tryin' to help. And if you can't talk to him, you know you've got five other guys who've got your back. Any one of us'd be honored to take on some'a the load y'veen carryin. Hell, Dernier'd sit and listen...even if th'only advice he'd ramble back y'wouldn't understand."

The light-hearted jab was just so Dugan, the teasing easy-going guy he didn't wanna shove off logs that the tension dissipated for a second, flit of a curve tugging at one corner of his mouth. They both sat in the quiet for a bit, watching over the camp and the surrounding woods. Eventually the silence started running cold and Dugan shattered it easy, clapped a hand on his knee, softly breaking up all that settling ice. Everything was soft compared to gunshots now.

"Alrighty, I'll leave ya to it then. Just...think about what I said, Sarge. Could do you some good."

The air shifted as Dugan stood to leave, a hesitant pause and the bowler hat was nodding once in his direction before broad shoulders started back for the slope down to camp. Before he could take off, Bucky cleared his throat and the man paused, glancing back at the shadows cutting jagged lines across Barnes' face.

"Thanks. For, y'know, caring and all." The unfamiliar words felt jilted on his tongue, but Dugan smiled wide anyways, full teeth and wide open mouth, the way he laughed. No black cutting lines across his jaw.

"Now all that caring and stuff did come from Rogers." Dugan winked grandly before he started back down the hill, leaving the shadows and cold to settle around Bucky's boots alone.

He didn't like alone. Even when Zola'd been torturing him, there'd always been at least some intern there, studying from the corner. And before that, every minute of his life before that and after that there'd been Steve. He'd never really been alone. Even when he had nothing--
He didn't wanna think about details again - not ever - but maybe. Maybe he should talk to Steve.

Or it could be pointless and make everyone worry a hellofalot more.

Rogers was taking his shift in a halfhour anyway. Might as well...bring it up, right? That's what Dugan was expecting, and if they'd all plotted together. Had to say something, now, or they'd stage another intervention or something and he just. Fuck, okay, he should say something to Steve. Wasn't that hard. They wanted stable? He'd fuckin' show'em stable.

"Sergeant," Steve greeted as he made his way up the hill. Bucky glanced up, palms clenched nervous and damp around the barrel of his rifle.

"Captain," Bucky replied, gaze sweeping over the fading bags under Steve's eyes. One more thing Bucky hated about the serum; could never tell how much sleep Steve'd gotten 'cause it fixed up those tired eyes with tightened skin before he could tell. "You mind if I stick around for a bit?"

"Sure, 'course." Steve sank down to the same spot Dugan had, rippling muscle easing into something comfortable nothing like the way he used to sit, eyes patiently on Bucky as he waited, beautiful features schooled into that angelic look that just glowed all sweet and soft. Bucky looked away.

"Dugan thinks I should tell somebody about my time in Italy," he said, offhandedly as possible.

Steve was quiet for a few moments, the weight of his gaze heating up the side of Bucky's face. "What do you think?"

"I think that'll do jack shit, honestly. S'not like saying it makes it any better." For once, Steve didn't scold him on his vulgar word choice, keeping his voice almost infuriatingly patient.

"It might help to feel like you're less alone," he offered, about ten thousand times more hopeful than he had any right to be.

"I'm a hell of a lot more alone than you think," Bucky muttered. His shoulders and neck were tight, ready to snap, palms still all clammy. With an exasperated sigh, Bucky ran a hand down his face, cursing his stupid head stupid body. "God, I can't even talk about this without freaking out and tensing up like it's happening all over again. I can't--I can't--"

Struggled to find the right words, to somehow talk out loud without falling into a dark pit full of sliced feet and strangely colored needles and leather straps. Finally he just clenched his fists tighter, digging blunt fingernails into skin for clarity.

"I'm a fucking mess, Steve. I'm a mess and I don't know what the fuck I'm supposed to do with it because we're all fucking messes out here. I don't even know what-- what's wrong with me anymore."

"Hey, c'mon." Steve leaned forward a little, trying to catch Bucky's eye. When he finally did, Bucky couldn't bring himself to look away. "Whatever the mess you are, you're mine, okay? Buck, you're never alone. I'll take whatever pieces you wanna give me, mess or not."

Steve had that sincere, naïve Brooklyn boy innocence on his face and Bucky only just managed to roll his eyes instead of tackling the asshole into a hug.

"You're a fuckin' sap, Rogers."

"You love it." Steve declared instantly.
"You love it," Bucky corrected, twice as petulant and young as he felt.

Steve smiled. The hovering storm cloud wasn't lifting on the horizons, but with the sun smiling like that he couldn't keep living in the dim.

"Thanks. I mean I know I didn't say much but. Thanks." Bucky cleared his throat, staring at the closest tree like it was the center of his universe.

It was too dark to see Steve's eyes, but it was a safe bet they were twinkling and sparkling and beautiful right now. Had the color memorized anyways.

"Course," Steve said gently, smile softening from the distance, so far away, nothing between them but years and years and years past--

Young, huh. Didn't feel much like the 26 he just turned. Closer to 30 than 20. God, could be ninety, the way the storms kept making his bones ache. But if he didn't start moving his bones now, he'd rot right here on the log beside Steve, two skeletons turning to dust with years between their bare shoulders and hollow eyes still peering for each other's from the dark.

A quick shift of movement, blonde following him as he stood and Bucky'd disappear into the shadows if he could, but gold kept aiming his way and it was keeping him here, on the edges of the light, and Steve watched him take three steps away, knew he was lingering, would wait forever for the goodbye if he had to.

Finally gold caved, flashing bright under white blue as Rogers smiled him off.

"See you at sunrise, Barnes."

If sunrise ever came, Bucky'd be waiting.

If sunrise ever came.

~~~

The end of September was soaking. Rain fell in heavy, unforgiving sheets, drowning the empty streets. They'd fought their way into this ghost town, half-burnt shell of a city that may've once been beautiful, before the war took away its light and burned down its inhabitants, slaughtered them in the streets and left the bodies to rot in the ditches.

The rain was everywhere but it wasn't enough to wash the stain of destruction from the empty streets. They weren't originally planning to spend the night in crumbling ghost structures, but the rain seeping through skin and infiltrating weapon packs shifted plans pretty damn quickly.

They'd been traveling through the outskirts of the village when the thunder broke overhead, single warning before the bucket flood. Steve shouted and beckoned with an arm - they all took off running for the broken down, abandoned buildings.

Every one of the Commandos was soaked before they reached the road. Bucky couldn't see through the fringe of wet hair plastered to his forehead and dripping in his eyes, couldn't run properly from the puddles sloshing in the soles of his boots.

It felt like years of swimming through the air and battling the violent rainfall before they finally reached some sort of shelter. Steve yanked open the door, gesturing all the men inside hurriedly. Bucky was the last through, Steve following behind with a hand on Bucky's back.
Which he wasn't thinking about at all.

The door slammed shut behind them, pushed harder by the wind, and Bucky had to blink a few times before his eyes started to adjust to the musty darkness of the building. He couldn't see much, but from the black space on the wall and the army of desks it was pretty clear they'd chanced upon an old, one-room school.

Great, school. He'd always just loved these places, gettin' written off as some dumb dandy, separated from Steve like he was the bad influence, unable to run across the room and dote on all those playground scratches--

"Dernier, Jones, start us up a fire. Morita and Falsworth check the perimeter, and Dugan search for any supplies that we can use. Barnes, help me move these desks against the doors. Nobody go outside if you can help it, catching pneumonia is the last thing we need right now."

Everyone split off automatically, falling into the regular step of listening to Steve's easy commands. The confidence and respect Stevie'd gained? Still made'im way too proud sometimes. Right now though, he was too soaking and shivering to be much of anything but miserable.

It wasn't five minutes later when Falsworth and Morita came back with the all clear, Jones and Dernier had a fire going in the fire place, and Dugan brought back a bucket full of chalk, a few battered textbooks, and a couple of children's coats. The doors were barricaded with desks, the large teacher's desk propped sideways to cover the singular window, securing them all inside.

Dugan laid out the children's coats on the dusty floor in front of the fireplace and Bucky had to cover his mouth with his hand to keep from gagging at the beautifully woven bright colors. The children that used to wear those coats were probably dead now anyways, no point in getting all misty.

They'd dragged a few extra desks over to the fire, giving them all a place to sit while they dried off. If they got the coats - only source of a blanket - wet, they all really might catch pneumonia. Bucky'd been down that road once before with Steve and he'd really like to avoid reliving that hell ever again.

"At least the world isn't frozen over yet," Morita mused, dismantling the parts of his gun so they could dry.

"Snow's better than rain, because you can drink it and you don't get damn soaked," Falsworth said, wringing his cap out onto the dusty floor and sending spirals of rich colored wood to cut through the dust. "Besides, it's insulating."

Dugan piped up with something, emptying rainwater outta one'a those big clunky boots. Bucky stopped listening somewhere in the middle of the bantering, settling quietly to perch on one of the desks by the fire, shivering while he waited for the flames to seep warmth and dryness back into his bones.

Steve made his way over to the fire too, shield propped up by the door, dripping rainwater down colorful metal to pool on warped wood. Treacherously beautiful weather...and sauntering boy. Steve's normal perfect wave of blond hair was soaked, matted down to his forehead and giving him the general look of a drowned rat. Bucky almost smiled at the sight.

Then Steve stepped even closer to the flames, both hands ruffling up his hair in an attempt to dry it. The soft blond pieces went from plastered wetness to crazy, fluffy spikes in no time and Bucky's mouth was suddenly mysteriously dry. The tousled hair, flushed chest...it wasn't fair, he didn't mean for his heart to start pounding in his shivering ribcage.
Couldn't help it, his eyes were dragged down of their own accord, scanning over the newly familiar body, hard lines, soft curves. Soaking wet suit clinging even tighter to Steve's frame than usual. Only his gaze drifted further than he was prepared for, cheeks flushing deep red and eyes cutting quickly away from that harshly dipped lower back, rounding into the protruding curve--

Good god, what was wrong with him? Middle of a war, stuck in peril, and he was checking out his best friend. True, he was flawless and soaking and any man would be crazy not to--

No, wait. Any woman would be crazy not to. Not man. Men didn't check each other out. And they definitely didn't flush red from the tight, pretty curve of their best friends ass.

Bucky put a hand over his eyes, shoulders curling down as latent shame pounded in his veins. It was one thing to feel jealous and over protective. He'd been dealing with that. It was one thing to get butterflies in his stomach when Steve shot him that smile. Bucky was trying to deal with that.

He'd even managed to deal with the almost-but-not-kiss. But this? This was something else entirely. Getting all red and flushed by looking over Steve's new muscles, new tight and sculpted body...that wasn't something Bucky was anywhere near equipped to deal with.

Mental things he could get past but physical attraction? No. No no no no.

"Stupid Stark," Steve muttered, making Bucky look up from his hand. Which he instantly, thoroughly, deeply regretted.

Steve was stuck in the middle of peeling his shirt off over his head, the material around his neck too wet and snug to pull over his head. As funny as that sight normally should have been, it also meant that Steve's chest was bare. Naked, golden, glowing muscle.

Bucky couldn't breathe.

"A little help here?" Steve asked, muffled through the blue material. He wiggled his elbows and pulled one more time for good measure and the shirt popped off over his head, making him blink and ruffling his hair even more. He peeled the rest of it off his arms, the material soaked through with rain water. "Never mind, I got it."

Bucky still couldn't move, his eyes glued to Steve's chest. He was overwhelmingly beautiful. More than beautiful, he was...all sorts of other words that Bucky should never be thinking about Steve, never in a million years. It was too late though, Bucky's skin was flushed and his pupils were dilated and his heartbeat was going a million miles a minute.

Steve bent over to lay his uniform out by the fire and Bucky choked on some sound his throat tried to make, his pants suddenly a little tighter. Oh god. Oh god no no no.

This time he buried his face behind both palms, cursing the rain and his body and willing the tightness in his pants back down. He'd just crossed a line he'd never even considered crossing. He hadn't prepared himself for shit like this. Sure, he wanted to kiss Steve sometimes, but he'd never let himself think about...about that. Not while he was sober enough to remember it, anyways.

"You alright, Buck?" A much-too close voice interrupted Bucky's self-deprecating thoughts, his head lifting back up on instinct. And staring directly at Steve. Shirtless, gorgeous, caring glowing sunshine Steve.

"Mm," he responded noncommittally, trying to look anywhere but the defined, chiseled lines of Steve's golden, glowy chest. Why was that making his heart pound? Why couldn't he breathe? Fingers twitching to touch, stomach twisting itself in knots, tangling black knots of rope he could choke out to wrap around his throat, make himself stop breathing forever.

"You're all flushed," Steve said concernedly, eyes flickering over Bucky's face. Yeah, yeah, he'd kinda noticed that. The heat that had crept into his cheeks and chest. He was too busy thinking about that and avoiding Steve's eyes to quite register Steve's next words before it was too late.

"And you'll freeze to death in those soaking clothes." Steve leaned forward and started unbuttoning the big navy blue buttons on Bucky's peacoat. His brain was so overwhelmed with thoughts and Steve's proximity and everything that it didn't catch up to the moment until Steve's fingers had undone more then half of his coat.

Then it sunk in. And Bucky freaked.

He shoved Steve off him, quick and brutal enough to make Steve stumble and almost fall on his ass. His ass that Bucky had been checking out earlier, god. Fuck.

Steve had been half naked and undressing Bucky. Those artist hands had been taking the clothes off Bucky's body. Steve had been stripping him, comfortably and worriedly, planning to get Bucky warm.

His brain was short circuiting. Too much, all of it was too much all at once. Physical, undeniable attraction to Steve and a half-hard erection because of it and Bucky was so f-fucked up and Steve didn't even know it, was trying to help Bucky out when he should have been sprinting in the other direction.

"Bucky?" Steve asked, taking a cautious step closer. Bucky buried his head in his hands again, curling in on himself. Fuck, what was he doing? What was he doing? He couldn't even sit still and let Steve be a friend to him. He was fucking everything up. It had to happen eventually. They couldn't go on forever with Bucky torn apart by feelings he couldn't face and couldn't name.

He'd ruined everything and Steve still wasn't getting that, still was worrying and putting his hand on Bucky's shoulder. Bucky was shivering, even harder now than before. He'd f-fucked up and they were going to hurt him for that. He'd fought back and that always meant more drugs, more pain.

It was all his fault, that test going wrong. He hadn't held still the way they'd wanted him to and now look at him, look at what he's ruined. Who are you? What are you? Tell me what you are.

Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 a total fuck up who ruins everything Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 who can't even let his best friend touch him Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 who doesn't deserve to be touched. Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 Sergeant Ja--

"It's me, it's Steve. I need you to focus on my voice. I'm here with you and I need you to listen to me, okay?" Firm and gentle fingers tugged the hands away from Bucky's face. Cold air hit his skin and there was more wetness on his cheeks than just rain water.

He blinked haphazardly, trying to focus and that wasn't dirty operation lights, golden skin stretched over unfamiliar muscle. Why was-- Steve...oh fuck, Steve.

Bucky scrambled away, sliding backwards on the desk and basically falling off the other side, catching his feet on the ground just before he fell over, bracing his hands on the wood to stay upright.

Oh god oh god oh god, Steve. He backpedaled further, crashing into another desk. He whipped behind that one too, eyes wide as the Commandos all stared at him. Bucky slid down the wall behind the desk, back pressed hard against the rough surface as he tried to catch his breath. Oh god oh god oh god.

"Bucky?" Steve rounded the first desk cautiously, hands up in the air like he was trying to placate a wild animal.

"Don't touch me." Bucky begged, pressing back further into the wall and drawing his knees up to his chest.

"I'm not going to hurt you," Steve promised, a flicker of pain over his features lingering from Bucky's begging.

"Please," Bucky begged again, curling his arms around the top of his knees and dropping his forehead with a thud. It wasn't dark enough, wasn't warm enough, he was soaking the wall through and he was sitting in a settling cloud of dust that erupted by his frantic scramble over here and Bucky just wanted to curl into the darkness and never have to be blinded by the bright again.

Flashes of memories tugged at his head, drugs that made him feel woozy. Drugs that made him lose control of his own body. Drugs that never stopped coming.

He didn't have control over his body now, either. He couldn't stop himself from reacting so strongly to Steve and he was so sick, so messed up, and Steve wasn't getting that, wasn't ever going to get that because he was too perfect and too bright.

Steve was the North Star and Bucky couldn't break the gravitational orbit he'd been stuck in and it was eating him alive because he didn't even have control over it anymore.

If he couldn't control it he was going to lose Steve. He could not physically live with that. Bucky was just pieces without golden blue stitches on all the jagged edges.

Steve was still inching closer, nearly at the next desk now, hands still up in caution.

"We got you out. You're not in that lab anymore, you're safe here with us--"

"I know," Bucky snapped, squeezing his arms tighter around his knees. The soft footsteps edging closer froze in spot.

"What?" Steve asked, sharp, soothing tone breaking in confusion. Bucky lifted his head slightly, barely enough to meet that skyblue but he couldn't.

"I know I'm not in Zola's lab, I know that. I can't escape because it's not the fucking outside world that's trying to get me, it's my own fucking head!" Steve recoiled as Bucky shouted at him, the destroyed look on his face instantly making guilt rise up in his throat like bile and Bucky hadn't eaten enough over the past week to afford puking, swallowing down the urge and tightening the corners of his mouth.

The memories of the torture were sharp as day, clear and vivid and unavoidable now that he'd let himself think of them. He knew they were memories, but that didn't make them any better. Mental replays of torture combined with internal hatred for his own body and mind? Not the best mixture for sanity.

Finally Steve swallowed back whatever lingering freakout was hovering in those calloused hands, lookin' close to hurlin' as Bucky was, lowering into a careful crouch beside the desk he'd cowered behind. "What can I do?"
"Leave me alone," Bucky answered instantly. Steve's face fell but Bucky couldn't bend, he'd never snap back straight. "Let me sleep it off. I'll be okay if I can sleep."

Steve rubbed a hand down his face, expression torn up all terrible and helpless. Bucky held his breath as Steve leaned closer, almost close enough to make him shake, dropping his voice to a whisper. The other Commandos were still frozen and watching, but Bucky could be embarrassed about that later.

"If you have a nightmare, do I have your permission to come wake you up?" Steve asked lowly, words meant only for Bucky's ears. God, he was not a child, he didn't need to be coddled. But waking up from a nightmare usually meant Steve's hands, on his skin, touching him.

Which Bucky didn't want. No, actually, that was the problem, there was a want--

No, no, bad. But. Steve was still his best friend, still trying to do the right thing. Trying to help. That shine-your-shoes make-you-soup soft expression he'd never been able to turn down in his entire goddamned existence. He stared owlishly at that broken please written all over blue eyes and who the fuck was he kidding. Steve could ask him to jump off a building and if he was doing it with that face, Bucky'd take a running start.

Fuck. He finally managed a single nod, sharp, eyes averted, and buried his face in his arms again.

Listened hard as he did on the frontlines, tracking the silent movements as Steve stood back up, reluctant pause to leave him there like that finally outweighed by the shaking request. Then the footsteps were disappearing further and further, taking years with them as thud thud boots crossed too far away and barely the other side of the classroom.

It was cold over here and Bucky was soaking enough to risk pneumonia but he'd been colder all winter and survived it. He'd make a night without the warmth of a fire. Or Steve's back pressed to his.

Couldn't have anything to do with Steve's body right now. He was already going mad, no point in sparking stars into a harsh-burning fire. It was all a big bundle of too much stress and weariness and he had fuckin told himself he couldn't deal with this.

He'd been right.

~*~

"Morita, can I talk to you a moment?" Steve asked quietly, all of their voices hushed so Bucky could sleep in his makeshift barricade against the wall. Morita nodded, getting off the desk he'd been propped against Monty's back on, following Steve to the far wall of the schoolroom.

They were thankfully all dry now, except Bucky. His heavy pea coat was still half draped over him and dripping rainwater into a little puddle every few minutes. As terrible as it was to witness and as much as he wanted to warm his best friend up, Steve wasn't going to risk touching Bucky again.

"What's on your mind, Captain?" Morita asked, voice hushed as he sat down on another desk. There was a plethora of seating in here, although there wasn't anything else useful.

"Sergeant Barnes," Steve answered truthfully. Morita's face molded into a sympathetic, slightly pained one. "It's just...it's never been like this before. He's never shut me out and I don't know what I'm supposed to do."

"I think you're doing the best you can, Cap. He doesn't want anyone near him and you've given him that." Morita glanced sadly over at Bucky's fitfully sleeping form.

"I know, but that's what scares me. It's never been like that before. It got triggered when I was helping him out of his jacket, and that could mean--" Steve paused, forcing himself to take a breath. Morita waited patiently, one eyebrow up and how wasn't he freaking out? "Do you think they ever did anything like that to him? He was fully clothed when I found him, but--"

"Rogers. If anything like that'd happened, he'd be hell of a lot more messed up than he is. Touch used to help, right? Wouldn't make sense if he's been through...that kind'a trauma."

"Yeah, I guess you have a point." Steve paused, glancing up to peer at the huddling, shivering shadow in the corner. Hell. Buck didn't deserve any'a this. "Thing is though, I think he is a hell of a lot more messed up than he's letting on. Maybe not for that reason, but there's something. There's something that's been eating him and he won't tell anyone what it is."

He won't tell me what it is, was basically what that translated too, because if Bucky wasn't talkin' to him odds were he wasn't opening up to Dugan in his spare time either. But why wouldn't he tell Steve? He told Steve everything. Didn't he?

"No offense, Captain, but you worry too much. Sarge is a lot stronger than you give him credit for."

Steve blinked. That wasn't it at all. He knew Bucky was strong as the rest of them. Hell, he'd been through more than all them combined and he was pro'ly the most sane one here.

But Morita had this look on his face and he knew better than to interrupt, not when his team looked at him like that. "You two are just...really close, which isn't a problem, don't get me wrong, but. It skews your judgement sometimes. He's fine. You're fine. We're in the middle of a war and sometimes you look more at each other in battle than you do the enemy."

Steve just stared. Morita took a second to catch onto the wide blues and sudden frozen bones, eyes going wide himself as he realized what he'd just said, backpedaled faster than those girls on doubledates ever had.

"Not that you aren't both incredible soldiers, 'cause you are. Y'just worry too much. Both of you do."

Silence fell back on stiff shoulders as Steve looked down at his hands, turned them over and tried not to think too hard about Morita's accusation. He had a bit of a point. Probably a really good point.

But this was Bucky, Steve couldn't stop worrying if he tried. He cared about all his men, but he'd stormed an entire enemy base alone for the sole purpose of saving Bucky Barnes. Kind'a obvious how much Bucky meant to him. That wasn't something that could be turned off.

"Thanks, Jim," Steve managed anyways, squeezing a tight smile onto his face. Morita nodded, returning the tight smile before weaving his way back across the room to the warmth of the fire.

Steve stayed where he was, sitting on a desk in the cold as he leaned his head against the wall to watch Bucky's sleeping form from all the distance and dust between them. He wasn't ever going to stop caring too much, was he?

~~~*~

It ate his insides every moment his hands twitched to reach out, help only he couldn't, forced himself quiet and passive when all he wanted to do was scream, kick his feet and beg Bucky to just tell him what to do. Instead he watched carefully as he could, ready to jump at the first sign that he was needed. But Bucky didn't so much as pleadingly look his way.
He'd been avoiding all of their eyes since his last panic attack in the schoolhouse. It had been a long eight days. Everyone was more tense than usual because of it, and Steve was stuck with trying to boost the morale of the team while simultaneously planning their next siege.

The stress would probably crumple anyone else - he had a lot of lives in his hands - but Steve didn't have the luxury to let it get to him. He had to be solid for his men and for his best friend. Who was shutting himself out from the world.

Nobody had mentioned Bucky's outburst since it happened, and no one was going to. Steve was dying to see if Buck was okay, but he couldn't push. He'd never forgive himself if he made Bucky bend so far he snapped.

Since he couldn't figure things out with Bucky, he settled for figuring out the perfect plan of action for their next attack. It wasn't on a Hydra base; Colonel Phillips had radioed in a request for them to eliminate a German town the rest of the army wouldn't be able to get to. The Nazi army was using the cathedral as one of their major storage facilities for weaponry and the Commandos had to get close enough to destroy it.

The cathedral was in the very center of a city on the eastern border of Germany, surrounded by stores and houses and roads of twisting alleys. Just getting to the cathedral would be risky as hell, let alone taking the place out. And then making it out of the city and back into Allied territory before they all died. It felt like every mission kept getting riskier and riskier.

Currently, Steve was shacked up in his dimly lit tent, pouring over a map of the city and trying to place where windows might be in houses based on aesthetic, architectural, and functional design. It felt a little futile but he needed to protect their entrance and exit routes from any vulnerabilities, like a civilian with a gun in the window. That, and he needed to find a place to put his expert sniper.

A warmth settled over him and Steve looked up from his map, Bucky's silhouette outlined by the entrance of the tent. Bucky was too quiet on his feet to hear, but Steve's body was in tune enough to recognize the familiar presence before his ears did.

"Barnes," Steve greeted, trying not to show how surprised he was that Bucky'd voluntarily approached. Or how much his chest ached as the surprise settled in. "Anything go wrong on the perimeter check?"

"No, sir. The camp is secure." All but saluting, standing there stiff as a board with those wide shoulders rolled back all professional the way they'd been for...days now, at least. A soldier, 24/7, and all Steve wanted was to go back to the woods in December when they were drawing and laughing and Bucky wasn't slowly wasting away day by day. Or the May before that, squeezing between crowds at a ballgame and watching Bucky shout and cheer and turn that wickedly wide smile on Steve, more alive than he'd been in months.

Forget the war.

"Great. Would you mind taking a look at this?" Steve looked up from the map, tapping it once in indication. Bucky made his way over silently to stand beside Steve, bending just a fraction to see the details of the map.

Steve traced the entrance route he was considering with his fingertip, pointing out different advantages to it as he explained it. Bucky leaned in a little closer, squinting at the map from the dim light of the lantern.

"Yeah, that should work. So long as we keep low and attack at night, the shadows of that alley and that alley should give us time to regroup and take the rest out with more man power."

"Would you mind using your significant man power from a window? Or do you think a rooftop would be safer?" Steve kept his tone light and teasing on the words significant man power and Bucky almost smiled at that.

"Whichever keeps you safer, Rogers," Bucky said, turning his head to meet Steve's smiling eyes.

The moment icy blues landed on his, Bucky froze in his tracks and stiffened like a puppet. Like he was about to freak out again, beg Steve not to touch him. With Bucky's head turned towards him, their faces were close and the rest of their bodies were inches away from actually touching.

Bucky hadn't touched a soul since the Don't Touch Me outbreak. Which ripped Steve's heart in two. If he ever found Zola--

He just wanted to toss an arm around Bucky's shoulders, nudge him by the campfire, excitedly tap dirty wrists when he found something important. He'd had no idea how much they touched until they didn't.

But now they were standing as close as they had been that one night in January, and there was no way in hell he was gonna be the one to pull away this time.

Bucky was staring at him, unblinking, lips parted and shiny. Steve really wished that mouth would just tell him what was wrong. But it wasn't going to any time soon, and what had Steve learned? He had to take the first step. As much as being rejected would destroy him, he couldn't stand it any longer. He just had to.

"Can I...?" Steve asked quietly, voice steady enough to surprise even him. Bucky's eyes widened and he nodded, slightly, almost fearfully.

With very careful hands, Steve wrapped an arm around Bucky's back, spinning him closer, chest to beating chest. Bucky's breath caught in his throat - maybe panicked? Steve held his tongue and paused, cautiously keeping one arm around Bucky's waist to hold him still and steady.

Bucky's eyes were searching everywhere on Steve's face, pupils dilated and breathing heightened. Steve searched right back, looking for any sign of a panic attack. Their faces were closer than they'd been in a long long time - they slept back to back in the field, which was nothing like facing each other like this. The tension in the air was palpable, sparks and energy waves bouncing and ricocheting off goddamn everything.

Steve lifted his other hand, slowly so Bucky could see it coming, and placed it directly over Bucky's heart. The parted lips drew in a soft breath as Steve pressed down a little, fingers curling into the fabric of Bucky's uniform as his palm resonated with a rapid heartbeat. It wasn't dangerously fast, didn't feel panicked as much as...almost excited. Anticipatory.

With that confirmation out of the way, Steve tugged his arm in, pulling Bucky closer. Their chests brushed and Buck had to tilt his chin up to keeping looking at Steve. The hand over Bucky's heart - pounding even faster now - slid behind Bucky's shoulders as Steve leaned forward the rest of the way.

Bucky's head turned slightly to Steve's as Steve pulled him in, so he tilted his head back against Bucky's as he tugged him into the hug. Steve was so used to being the smaller person when they hugged, it was a little strange not to tuck his chin over Bucky's shoulder.

It was a little more strange that Bucky wasn't hugging him back. He was stiff and frozen again, hands down at his sides, not so much as one muscle twitching. Steve squeezed Bucky a little tighter, reveling in the feeling of having his best friend entirely safe in his arms.

Steve closed his eyes, humming softly as he rested his head against the side of Bucky's. Sometimes it felt like the only way he'd ever keep Buck safe was like this, wrapping his body around the slightly smaller one, shielding him from the gray world and red bombs and the haunted screams behind pretty crystal.

"You know, hugs are a two way thing," Steve reminded Bucky lowly, his mouth right by Bucky's ear anyways. Two hands instantly came up, resting lightly at identical heights on Steve's mid back. Well, it wasn't the hug Steve was used to, but Bucky was allowing himself to be touched again and honestly, Steve had missed that comfort. It was colder without Bucky's shoulder constantly pressed to his side.

He really could stay here forever, with the knowledge that Bucky was safe for once because Steve had physical proof of it. He could stay here and run his fingers through Bucky's hair and rub his back and he'd never have to go anywhere else again.

They both let go after a few more seconds, Steve's hands holding Bucky's biceps a moment longer as he drew back, searching Bucky's face. His expression was locked down in an unreadable mask, but he didn't look like he was going to panic any time soon. That was good, right?

"You alright?" Steve asked softly, going for words since Buck's expression wasn't telling him anything.

"Yeah. You gotta stop askin' me that," Bucky gave a weak smile, almost sad at the edges, but Steve's heart fluttered. They were going to be okay.

"I'll stop askin' when you start hugging me back like a normal person." Steve quipped and Bucky rolled his eyes.

"Normal person? You hug all the Commandos during battle plans?" Bucky raised his eyebrows, the words turning into a challenge at the expression.

The cute look was such a change from the solemn, avoiding Bucky that had walked in here Steve could almost hug him again.

"You know you're my one and only, Buck," Steve promised overly sincerely, batting his eyelashes at the young Sergeant.

Bucky smacked Steve's arm with the back of his hand, rolling his eyes again. But then his voice got a little quiet as he leaned back over the map, the few last words hovering in the air between them.

"I better be."

Steve smiled and leaned over Bucky's side, shoulder behind Bucky's again and cherishing the warmth of their proximity as he pointed with his other hand to a spot on the city wall.

"What if we climb over here on our way out? It looks like there might be a blind spot because of that building."

"No, no, it's too far from the cathedral. How about we climb over here, so we can just follow that path around to there and hitch a left..."

~*~
It ended up not mattering where they climbed over the wall, because they didn't climb it at all. They blew a hole through it so that Steve could carry Bucky through the rubble.

The mission started out perfectly: execution was planned, the boys were all ready, the tension from the past week resolved now that Bucky was back to smiling with the rest of them again. They'd gotten enough sleep for once and it wasn't absolutely freezing, just fairly cold. They had the weapons they were going to need, they had the layout of all the paths and roads and alleys memorized.

As soon as dusk began to settle on the city, the Commandos lined up in a crouch just outside the city wall, an old, crumbling one that was more likely to fall down than hold their weight. They had to go over the top to get in though, because the mission had to be entirely stealth until they blew up the cathedral. At that point, it was basically just get the hell out of the city and over the river to the east. But if they got caught before they blew up the cathedral, the whole mission would be screwed. And they'd be POWs again, which Steve was entirely not okay with.

So stealth climbing over the top of a rickety wall it was.

"Careful," Steve whispered as he boosted Gabe up the wall. Gabe nodded, dragging himself up to the top with his arm strength. It was thankfully a fairly thick wall, so he folded himself in half over it and helped pull Dernier up over the top as Steve boosted him up. Dernier dropped on the other side and Steve folded his hands to take Dugan's boot next.

By the time they all dropped on the other side, dusk had turned into dark. Soldiers crouched in the shadows against the protection of their entry wall, scanning around for hostiles while Steve whispered a last-second reminder of the plan. Everyone nodded, then the team split up in two - Bucky, Jones, Dernier, and Dugan taking the left path to the cathedral and setting up in a safe spot to provide whatever backup was necessary while Steve, Falsworth, and Morita took the path to the right and snuck in behind the cathedral, dropping down into the basement to set up explosives.

Morita would cover any hostiles they came across with his fancy Hydra tech and Steve would protect Falsworth with the shield while he set up the bombs in the basement.

Dugan tipped his hat and Bucky gave a two finger salute to Steve before they set off, following Jones and Dernier as they disappeared into the night, creeping along the shadows beneath windows.

"C'mon," Steve beckoned to his half of the team, taking the other fork. Stealth was a lot harder when you carry a large, reflective, brightly colored shield, so Steve had it strapped to his back for now, covered by the men who followed closely behind him.

They stopped at the corners of the cobblestone streets, peeking around corners before running across to the shadows of another row of old stone architectural buildings. The maze of the streets seemed to be quite accurate to the map they'd memorized, so it was only about fifteen minutes before the cathedral was in sight. Bucky's team would be around the front and side of the cathedral, covering as much ground as possible between the four of them in case anything went awry.

The cathedral was lit up with candles in most of the windows, flickerings of light through stained glass windows. It was beautiful in an eerie sort of way, and if this wasn't war than Steve might feel sorry for blowing it up. But this was war, and he hadn't come to Europe for the sight-seeing.

"Eleven o'clock," Steve whispered, crouching in the overhanging doorway of the building across the street from the cathedral. Morita and Falsworth both looked around Steve's shoulder, scanning for whatever Steve had seen. They both nodded as they spotted the cathedral guard, taking his slow, methodical steps back and forth in front of one of the doors. Their entrance to the basement was still another corner away, so if they moved fast enough they could get in without alerting the guard.
It'd be easier to kill him now, but odds were that the sudden death of a guard would raise attention of the rest of the fleet of Nazis.

"Hold off for now," Steve mouthed to Morita. Morita nodded, and they all crept forward out of the shadows. The guard was facing the other direction as they quickly crossed the street to take cover pressed up against the next building's wall. This alley was quite dark, which was exactly what they needed.

The soft sound of a footstep suddenly hit Steve's ears and he spun around to look behind them in dark alley. But Morita beat him to it, bringing his gun down over the stray guard's head. The guard crumpled silently to the ground and Steve let out a breath, turning back towards the cathedral. Just off to the right were the cellar doors, bolted shut with a padlock. It'd break in a single snap of Steve's shield, if they could follow the shadows and avoid the guards' eyes on the way there.

"Ready?" Steve whispered over his shoulder. Falsworth's eyes were wide but he nodded, Morita following suit. Steve signaled with his hand and they all cut out across the grassy plaza, timed to leave the shadows just as the guard turned and begin to walk the other way. The ground was slightly slippery, but if they ran fast enough they'd just make it. Steve rolled into the shadow against the cathedral's lower outside walls, almost flattened by Falsworth who had done the same. All three of them held their breath as they waited to see if the guard had seen him.

The footsteps got closer, closer, than turned away again. They'd made it. Steve breathed out slowly, carefully unstrapping his shield off his back and gripping it in his hand. They'd have to time this too, the sound of the breaking lock. Steve waited and counted until the guard was the furthest away he'd get, than he struck out metal against metal, snapping the lock off the cellar doors.

A clang echoed through the night air and Steve didn't wait to see if the guard had heard, he just ripped open the wooden doors and gestured Morita and Falsworth to drop through. Steve followed last, closing the door behind them with the broken lock still attached.

It took a few seconds of blinking for his eyes to adjust to the darkness, and by then Falsworth was already setting up demolitions around the cellar. There were actually a few weapons down here as well, although most of them were in the ground floor storage room. Which was conveniently located directly above the cellar. By blowing up the cellar roof, the fire should ruin all gunpowder, ignite grenades, and melt down enough metal on the guns or blow up enough pieces to ruin almost all of the supplies they were keeping here.

Personally, Steve thought it was kind of terrible that they would keep weapons of war in a place of God, but then again. This was the Nazis. They didn't have respect for most things that Steve did, and nearly everything they did was more than kind of terrible. So they'd blow up the cathedral and not think twice about it.

The creak of a door made them all freeze, then Steve quickly hurried to the stairs entrance of the cellar, shield out in front of him as he peered around the corner. No one was in sight. He looked back over to Falsworth and Morita, gesturing a question of how much longer. Falsworth held up a single finger, mounting his last explosive to the low cellar ceiling.

The exit strategy was back out the way they came, but once they got back topside they were going to cut off to the side of the cathedral that Bucky's team was on, exit by climbing the wall on that side. Steve lifted the cellar doors just a crack, listening for any guards around. There wasn't a sound.

He pushed the doors up all the way and pulled himself up onto the ground, shield held up in the direction of the pacing guard automatically. The guard wasn't at his post. Steve furrowed his eyebrows, but beckoned to Falsworth and Morita to come out of the cellar anyways.
He glanced around the corner of the cathedral. Still no guards--

A sharp zing echoed through the air as a single bullet bounced off of the metal of Steve's shield. They'd been found. Three more bullets ricocheted off the metal as Steve searched frantically for the direction of the gunmen. There, off by the alley they'd first come through. Directly behind where they were trying to go.

"Go go go!" Steve shouted, holding up the shield and trying to protect all three of them as they sprinted across the courtyard, headed for the plan's rendezvous point. More bullets soared their way but they were moving fast and jagged enough that the only ones that got close were either dodged or bounced off of Steve's shield.

They skid into the darkness of the alley just as fire opened up from another direction. "Go find the others, I'll be right behind you!" Steve shouted over the gunfire. Falsworth hesitated and Steve waved them on with a hand. "Go!"

He didn't wait for an answer before he rolled back out into the plaza, crouched behind his shield as he fired his pistol around it, aiming for chest shots as he took out the guards he could see. Four men went down and the hostile gunfire pattered out to a stop. That couldn't be all of them, they just had to be regrouping now, restrategizing. Which hopefully gave the Commandos time to get the hell out of here.

Steve took off back into the alley, skidding around the first left turn and almost smacking into the wall. It probably would have entirely crumbled under his weight if he had smacked it, so he was pretty thankful he managed to catch his footing and keep running.

The rendezvous point was just up ahead, at the convergence of this alley and the back open lot behind a factory. Steve skidded into the open lot, which was right up against the wall to get out of the city. In particular, the climbing over spot that Bucky had picked.

The lot was empty.

It was purely adrenaline that kept Steve from freaking out and shouting everyone's name. Instead he just kept going, sprinting across the lot, almost starting to sweat from how fast he was running. He'd helped Bucky pick out that spot too, where he'd be protecting above through the eye of his sniper scope. Plans to hell meant get to the last known location of Bucky Barnes.

Steve reached the medical building in another minute and forty five seconds, even though it felt like hours by the time he was racing up the stairs. The corridors were dim and there were a few uniformed bodies dead on the ground here and there, leaving a trail of bloody breadcrumbs on the way to Bucky's stakeout spot.

As Steve neared the top floor, panicked voices washed down over him. One of them sounded like Dugan. Steve ran faster, taking the steps four at a time. When he finally reached the top floor, he nearly busted the door off of its hinges as he blew through it. Instantly, there were six guns pointed in his direction, one of them from a slumped body on the floor that was holding his gun just as steadily.

The guns all instantly went back down the moment they realized it was Steve. He didn't even bother to say anything about it, he just instantly rushed forward and skid on the ground next to the man crumpled on the ground. Everything happened so fast that Steve didn't even register who was down until he cupped Bucky's jaw in his hands.

Bucky's eyes squeezed shut in pain and he yelped as Steve frantically searched down Bucky's body, looking for the wound. No, dammit, they didn't even have time for that. They had to get the hell out
"We only just got him off the fire escape. We were going to carry him out braced on Jones's and my shoulders--"

"We don't have time for that," Steve interrupted, shooting a glance at Dugan that hopefully stood as an apology for interrupting him and not having time to go through this right now. "Everybody, rendezvous point right now, I'll carry him."

"Cap--"

"We don't have time for anything else. Go, soldiers, that's an order!" Bucky made a weak sound of protest as Steve picked him up, followed by a groan of pain. Bucky was a hell of a lot heavier than Steve had been counting on, but he shifted Bucky a little closer to his chest anyways and took off.

The hand that was wrapped under Bucky's knees got slippery and warm within a couple of seconds and Steve cursed. Leg wounds were the fucking worst. It made sense though, since they had been trying to help him walk. Why couldn't it ever be a shoulder wound or something?

Steve had to turn sideways to make it back down the stairs, because he wasn't jumping out of any buildings while he was holding one of his team in his arms. On a particularly rough jolt, Bucky groaned again and tried to make himself a little smaller in Steve's arms, easier to carry.

"'M not some dame, you know," Bucky said through gritted teeth. Steve smiled fleetingly down at him before kicking open a door.

"Really? Then how come I have to keep savin' you like one?" Steve was teasing, but Bucky's face still managed to look pissed off through the pain. Before he could retort though, they were back out in the alley and suddenly surrounded by a band of Commandos.

"What part of get out of here don't you understand?" Steve asked in between breaths as they all took off running for the empty back lot by the wall. Bucky wrapped both of his arms tight around Steve's neck, holding on tight enough that Steve could focus on something besides worrying about dropping him.

Dugan just shrugged, ducking to avoid a low hanging shop sign. "We weren't leaving the Sergeant and you behind, Captain."

As stupid as it was to all go down because one of'em was down, had to admit the Commandos' disobedient loyalty tipped a corner of his mouth up. It was reckless and dangerous - they should've gotten outta here by now, but if they chose to stay of their own free will, Steve wasn't gonna stop 'em now. Team was a team.

"Alright, Falsworth, you wanna help? You and Dernier go blow up that wall, we're not getting Sergeant Barnes over the top of it." They both nodded and sprinted off to get ahead of the group that couldn't move as quickly. Bucky looked over his shoulder at how much faster they could be going and groaned.

"This is ridiculous, Steve, y'all are gonna get yourselves killed 'cause'a me."

"Don't care," Steve replied, his voice in the most stubborn tone he had. "Speaking of which, Dugan, what the hell happened back there? Why the hell is our sniper of all people the one that got shot?"

"Because he was being a dumbass, that's why," Dugan said with a glare in Bucky's direction. Bucky grimaced and stared up at the sky. Steve's arms were killing him - Bucky was only a few inches shorter, only about eighty pounds lighter. Wasn't exactly easy cargo to carry across a city while getting shot at.

"Care to expand upon that? Tell me something I don't know." Steve grimaced and repositioned Bucky again, his hand starting to slip from the blood that was coating it.

"I hate you," Bucky said weakly. Steve and Dugan both ignored him.

But before Dugan could continue his explanation, gunfire started up again, bullets ricocheting off the wall next to them. Dugan cursed and ducked, spinning around to fire back some shots at the hidden enemies. Morita opened fire too, but they weren't moving fast enough to get out without some damage, especially if Steve's shield was outta commission by carrying Bucky.

"Jones! The shield!" Gabe weaved over and wrestled the metal off its holster, holding it up just in time to stop the next wave of bullets that were getting closer and closer in accuracy.

"God, this thing is heavy," Jones complain-shouted, trying to prop it haphazardly behind them as they dodged between small alleys and stretches of abandoned street. Morita's bullets found one'a the shooters, a body falling loudly to the cobblestone behind them. But it wasn't enough, couldn't take long before one of the other shooters hit somebody. Again, apparently.

An explosion went off ahead - Falsworth and Dernier's exit plan - and Steve tried to push his legs a little harder, get them there a little faster without leaving the rest of the boys in the dust. They had an exit strategy now, just needed another dozen shooters to keep the enemies off their tail before they got there.

"Where's your gun?" Bucky shouted over the gunfire, apparently reading Steve's mind. Again. "Left holster," Steve shot back, breathy and panting as it started to catch up to him, undertrained arms carrying a soldier this damn heavy this damn far under rigorous gunfire.

Bucky let go of Steve's neck, hanging on one-armed as he pulled the gun outta Steve's holster and aimed, muzzle propped up over his shoulder. A quick murmured apology and cold fingers started firing off shots, kickback punching hot bruises into his skin despite the thick uniform, blast of each discharge ridiculously loud right against his ear. Bucky was muttering a litany of hushed curses tangled with sorry sorry's but Steve just grimaced and kept running. Trigger pull and trigger pull, focus on the rippling shift of the muscles in Bucky's hand, pressing knuckles instead of bullets firing inches from his jaw.

It felt like an eternity before he'd counted to six, simultaneously relieved and worried because that was all in that clip and that meant Bucky wasn't firing anymore but what about the rest of the shooters-- Oh. There...wasn't anymore gunfire battering behind them, a loud thump of the final body dropping echoing in the alleyway behind them, just in time to round the corner into the backlot clearing. There was smoke tendrilling up from a huge hole in the wall, rock and dust crumbled into a rocky path under the space Falsworth and Dernier had cleared.

Bucky dropped his head to Steve's collarbone with a grimace, eyes squeezed shut tight again and wrist going limp, hand dangling Steve's gun over the back of his shoulder, burst of energy draining outta his body almost as fast as the blood soaking Steve's fingers was.

"Sarge and the Cap through first," Dugan ordered, waving Steve through the rubble and out to the dead grass on the other side. The others followed behind, Jones passing Steve's shield to Dugan, complaining that his arms were getting tired. Steve could definitely relate to that because, right now, he felt like his arms were about to fall off his body from Bucky's weight.
"We gotta cross that river and cut into the woods if we don't want to be followed. We can't get far so we'll have to be silent, but it's our best shot for now."

"Here, let us carry him, Cap." Jones made a move to take Bucky's weight off of Steve's arms but Steve didn't slow down to let him. Safety came before comfort.

"Soon as we get in the woods. We can't slow down now." Steve gritted his teeth against the strain and tried to keep up with the men wading through the shallow river. The icy water sloshed Steve's boots and splashed droplets up the blue pants, sticking even tighter to tired skin. He kept Bucky above the spray though, they didn't need to add freezing and wet to the list of maladies right now.

Risking a glance downwards, Steve's breath caught at the drooping eyelids, pretty features sunken gray as ash with that fiery disposition smoked out. The slippery hand coated in Bucky's blood was dripping into the river, bright red getting swept up in the white and blue swirls. Sure was losing a hell of a lot of blood.

Too much blood.

Just. Don't look down, don't look down and keep going, so long as he didn't let go Buck'd be fine.

The cover of the trees was too scarce to be really helpful, but it was better than nothing. They trekked - quickly - over tree roots and let gravity hurry them even quicker down large slopes covered with moss and rock and overgrowth. A soft, pained sound was pressed into Steve's uniform at every bump for the first half mile of woods before Bucky's noises just eventually stopped, his body rolling with every jolt and shift of his wound. Either that or he'd passed out from blood loss.

The pale face was pressed into Steve's uniform so he couldn't exactly tell if the ice blue eyes were open or not. There wasn't anything they could do to help the pain until they were safe anyways.

About two miles into the trees, a patch of particularly jagged and deep rocks gave way to a sort of small cave, hidden in the side of a hill and covered on most sides by overbrush. Jones pointed it out and they all followed quickly, skidding down the steepness of the hill before Morita cleared a few rocks and they all hustled under the makeshift cover. There wasn't much space and the walls were littered with roots from the tree above them, but the rock overhang cast a deep shadow that was big enough to hide them all, so long as they kept quiet.

Steve laid Bucky down the moment he could, carefully placing his head against a rock. His lips parted to make a sound as Steve slid his arm out from under Bucky's knees, but they couldn't fucking risk getting caught over involuntary noises of pain.

He clamped down a hand over Bucky's mouth, whisper silent apologies with the "s's" taken out. (That was something Bucky had taught him long before the war - it was impossible to whisper the s sound, so you just leave out all s's when you whisper. They finally managed to get one over on Sarah, staying up all night to practice whispering in the "s" free way.)

Icy blues squeezed shut in response, his entire body trembling from blood loss and pain. Now that he finally had the chance, Steve let go of his grip on Bucky's mouth, eyes scanning wildly down his body for the point of entry. His entire right pant leg was stiff with dried blood.

On the inside of his right thigh, just an inch or two above his knee, the material was shredded and ripped open. The glint of bloody metal was embedded in Bucky's skin, red still leaking from the wound.

There was a steady chant of oh god oh god please no, there's too much blood, lord save him, do not
As soon as he swallowed back the urge to cry or throw up, Steve looked up at his men and gestured wildly at them and Bucky. They all looked to each other, hesitating slightly, before Falsworth scooted closer, popping the blade of his knife out. Bucky had the steadiest hands as a sniper, but Falsworth was probably second best. His mouth was tight in a worried, insecure frown as he examined the wound, sucking in a sharp breath at how much blood was still pooling.

Falsworth pointed at Bucky's mouth, indicating he had to stay quiet and that this was gonna hurt like hell. Something to bite down on...Steve pushed up the hem of Bucky's uniform, scrambling to undo his belt. He'd give Buck his own, except the belt with the suit didn't exactly slide free with all the pouches and loops. So quick and shaking fingers - there was a reason Steve wasn't the one digging out the bullet, his artist hands couldn't be steady when he was under stress and this could count as a little more than goddamn stress - Steve unclasped the buckle, lifting Bucky's hips a centimeter to unthread the belt through its loops with a violent tug upwards.

As soon as he had it free, Steve came back up to Bucky's face, coaxing his mouth open with a thumb to the jaw. Bucky took the belt between his teeth without complaint, biting down into the material and breathing through his nose. Falsworth didn't wait a second longer, sinking his knife into ripped skin along the edge of the bullet and tilting it sideways.

Bucky's back arched, crystal eyes squeezing tight as his teeth sunk into the leather belt - hard - but somehow, he didn't make a sound. Steve had to bite his own lip to keep the distressed noises inside his destroyed chest because it was entirely irrational to feel pain shooting up his leg too, his body wasn't Bucky's and their pain wasn't one in the same but try telling that to his brain.

Falsworth changed angles and Bucky's eyes screamed for him, his hands tightening up into near bloody fists. For lack of any other way to help, Steve grabbed ahold of Bucky's clenched fists, wrapping their hands together and squeezing. Steve was here, Bucky was going to be okay. His fingers twisted with Steve's, crushing bruises into both of their hands.

Bucky looked up at him with pleading, pain-glazed eyes and a face as white as paper and he was not going to die. It was just blood loss. A lot of blood loss, but he could pull through. They always did.

The adrenaline rush and trauma shock from earlier when Bucky had managed to grab Steve's gun and dismantle enemies was long gone. He'd crashed from the artificial high, body weak and hurting and Steve would give anything for the bullet to have hit him instead.

Little drops of moisture hovered at the corners of Bucky's shut eyes, unfallen tears from the pain. Steve thumbed them away and Bucky's face squinched up more.

I'm not going to let you leave me, Steve thought in Bucky's direction, words as loud in his head as he dared.

He leaned down over Bucky, pressing their foreheads together and closing his eyes. Bucky's breathing hitched but he squeezed Steve's hands a little tighter in his own.

Steve kept his forehead to Bucky's, awed by his silence and torn apart by his pain. He could only think one thing now, one thing as Bucky's grip got weaker and weaker on Steve's fingers.

Don't leave me, don't leave me. Don't you dare leave me.
(The serious injury possible-trigger is that someone gets shot.)

Okay so I haven't left cliffhangers before and I'm sorry I did but I have LOT planned for the next chapter.

Thank you so much for reading! xx
Шесть (Six)

Chapter Notes

The Big Conversation of Pertinence aka the last scene in this chapter I have been waiting to write since forever.

Dialogue and some ideas from: "Til Death" by Barcelona (again)

Also, this beautiful girl I know recommended this song: Hero by Family of the Year for this fic, everybody should go check it out. xx

It was a little surprising when Steve sat down beside Dugan at dinner, wearily folded his hands together and stared at the flames with flickering eyes. The rest of the men fell silent at Rogers' appearance, watching him with careful, concerned eyes.

Dugan set the spoon in his tin of beans and scooted it to Dernier before half-turning, quiet as he waited to see if the emotional Captain was gonna say anything. Apparently not.

"How you doin', Cap?" Dugan finally ventured. At least they didn't have to whisper anymore. Rogers’ hands were shaking and he clasped them tighter together as he noticed.

"Sergeant Barnes is sleeping," Steve said, like that was an acceptable answer. There'd be no point correcting him though, he'd wave 'em off and say he was fine, they should all be worrying about Barnes. Which, yeah, the guy'd been shot. But that didn't mean Cap wasn't kinda freaking out.

"He's a fighter. He'll pull through. Don't you think so, Jacques?" Gabe nudged Dernier, who was looking solemnly at his next spoonful of Dugan's beans.
"Je ne sais pas ce que je pense," Dernier muttered under his breath. Jones made a face and decided he wasn't gonna translate that. The Captain wouldn't take so well to negativity, even if it was "I dunno what I think." Aka he wasn't so sure Barnes was making it through the night.

"So long as it doesn't drop too low below freezing." Steve tossed a stick into the fire. Nobody said anything, there wasn't much you could say to that.

They'd managed to stabilize Barnes in the woods. Well, stabilize was a loose term. Falsworth'd gotten the bullet outta his leg, wrapped up the wound with cloth torn from Morita's shirt. The blood stopped draining like a damned faucet, but he'd already lost a scary amount. The leather belt had permanent teeth marks in it and his limbs were too weak to move on his own, breathing too slow and shallow, eyes glazed over in shock - but he was alive. Technically. Didn't even blink at the tear that splattered on his pale cheek as Rogers held their foreheads together.

It was heartbreaking, Cap losing it like that. The way he looked at Barnes...like someone'd ripped Rogers in half down the middle and told him he'd hafta live like that. Glassy eyes turned pretty quickly into shut ones. Which made Rogers (silently) panic at first, until Dugan managed to calm him down by whispering there was no chance of a concussion, he probably should sleep.

The bloodloss was dangerous - there was no way to tell, but odds were that he'd lost too much. A couple of pints, at least, and that bandage wasn't gonna stop much. It'd already soaked through by the time Steve picked the unconscious Sergeant back up in his arms.

Rogers' arms were trembling though, so Dugan and Jones had forcefully pulled Barnes back, whispering they could take him, that Cap would hate himself if he dropped Sarge outta stubbornness. That'd finally made Rogers sensible enough to let them brace one of Barnes's arms over each of their shoulders, dragging him outta their hiding spot an hour after they'd found it.

The footmen militia from the city had passed overhead while Falsworth was digging the bullet outta Barnes's leg with a knife. They'd all frozen, listening to the voices with guns at the ready. Rogers had clamped his hand of Barnes's mouth and nose to quiet his breathing, melting in apologetic looks. But the Nazis passed right over them without stopping.

Half hour later, they were on their way outta the woods and over the German border. They'd reached safe territory after another hour's walk, slowed down by whichever two soldiers were bracing Barnes's weight. They all took turns, even Rogers, despite his shaking hands and trembling bottom lip.

Now they'd set up a camp and a fire and their tents, just as the coldest part of the night set in. Barnes was inside a tent, sleeping in a pile of all their sleeping bags, cushioning him the best they could. Rogers had insisted on staying with Barnes instead of eating dinner, which was why everyone was surprised he'd emerged from the tent at all.

But here he was, sitting glumly next to Dugan and throwing little pieces of wood into the fire and talking about how Barnes wasn't gonna make it if the temperature dropped too much. Which was true; Sarge lost a shit ton of blood, which didn't go well with cold. Temperatures below freezing made it difficult for blood to circulate and since Barnes didn't have alotta blood left in his body to spare, it was pretty likely his heart would fail or his brain wouldn't oxygenate or his organs would shrivel or about a'hundred other terrible things following that fate.

So yeah, if it got that cold, Barnes might not make it through the night.

They all stared solemnly at the fire now, eyes flicking occasionally to Rogers then back to the flames. Dugan had always known Rogers and Barnes were close - he'd heard countless stories about the tiny version of Rogers before he'd ever shown up to save them in Azzano - but it was heartbreaking to see how much Barnes's injury was affecting him.

He wasn't just deflated, he was...disheartened. In the worst of ways. Not entirely hopeless, obviously, but nowhere near the bright, confident commander they'd all come to know. Barnes once said something under his breath about Rogers being "a goddamned ball of sunshine," and as crazy as that sounded, it fit. Rogers was resplendent and warm in a way not much else was in the war of cold western Europe.

And with that sun behind a cloud, everything felt a little darker, little colder. Rogers lit up rooms, lit up battlefields, and now they all dripped melancholy with his sadness. Not that everyone wasn't worried about Barnes too, because Dugan was 98% sure he'd seen Falsworth with shiny, unfallen tears lining his eyes earlier. They were all worried to hell. There wasn't one of them that didn't respect the shit outta Bucky Barnes.

"He'll pull through," Dugan promised, grabbin' Rogers's shoulder, rocking him with the movement. Rogers breathed slowly, nodded slower. Guarded blue eyes flickered red and orange fire reflections as Rogers looked over, sucking in a breath.

"You mind taking watch tonight? I wanna be there when Buck wakes up." Rogers still looked positively miserable, but of course Dugan nodded. He knew everyone'a them'd take that bullet for Barnes, but Rogers looked like he was seriously wishing it'd been him, twenty times over.

"We're out here if you need us. If either of you need us," Jones reminded as Rogers stood. He nodded again, giving them all the most grateful expression he could manage, then he was off for Barnes's tent again.

Dugan sighed, snagging his beans back from Dernier. Those two. They were gonna be the death of him.

~*~

The lantern flickered, a brief interruption of the golden glow reflecting inside tent walls. The light made Bucky's pale skin absorb gold, face radiating like an angel's. And five years younger, back when he did glow like that from dock work in the sun all day.

The rest of his body was covered in blankets and sleeping bags, every warm item in the Commandos' inventory. They'd insisted on giving anything they could to keep Bucky warm. Keeping him warm meant keeping him alive. Steve'd do anything in the world right now to keep Bucky alive.

And he'd proven that before. He'd jumped out of a plane and stormed an enemy base alone because he'd been deadset on keeping Bucky alive. Because regardless of the letter addressed in his name, declaring Sergeant James Barnes dead, Steve was entirely sure he couldn't be. He'd know if Bucky was dead. He'd feel it inside him. There'd be some sorta physical indication. Something inside his body would break. The world couldn't keep spinning, Steve would know. The entire planet would change if Bucky Barnes left it. He'd never been more sure of anything in his life.

And he'd been right - Bucky wasn't dead then. And he wasn't going to die now.

He sucked in a shaky breath, eyes drifting up to the lantern. Tilted head, chin propped on a curled fist as he sat by Bucky's makeshift bedside. War. He'd never thought it'd take so much from his hands.

A soft sound caught his attention and Steve looked back down, eyes catching on the exotic lips parting to draw a breath. Iceblue blinked up at him, slightly dazed and confused, still dizzy, wide with pain or exhaustion or fear. The clarity sharpened as crystal settled on him, familiar worried face at a cold, hard bedside. Pale, so quiet and pale, pain still fogging the back of shining icyblue. He'd give goddamn anything to take his place.

"Ev'ryone get out safe?" Bucky whispered, voice grating smoke over gravel. A soft and sad curve tugged Steve's lips. 'Course Buck thought'a everyone else first. Steve nodded and ran his hand over the length of Bucky's cheekbone, tracing proof of living, breathing, still alive.

"Dugan told me what happened out there." Steve let his hand stop in Bucky's hair, weaving fingers through the short strands above his ear. Bucky was looking up at him with this quiet, watchful cautiousness and that cracked Steve down a little, eyes threatening to water as he smiled and choked out a shaky, affectionate, "You idiot."

"Had to protect your sorry ass, Stevie," Bucky whispered again, ghost of a smile on his pastel mouth. Steve wanted to press his fingers into Bucky's lips, rub them until they revived their normal wild pink, until they had enough blood in them to make it look like Bucky wasn't dying.

"Your job description doesn't have anything to do with my ass, sorry," Steve tried for the same ghost of a smile and they were both so foolishly gone, sitting here and pretending to ignore that Bucky might not be around for sunrise.

"But my life description does." The words were soft, like Steve was the one who needed the gentle touch. Like Steve was the one bleeding and broken.

Not bleeding; definitely broken when Bucky was looking at him like that.

"You can't keep doin' this to me, Buck." Steve sucked in a breath, pulling his hand out of Bucky's hair and clasping both in his lap. "I thought we agreed you weren't gonna almost-die on me anymore, after you almost fried your insides from that electric fence. And what's this thing with November? Last November, captured. This November, bullet in the leg. You keep near dyin' on me and I'm not sure I can take much more. What's the plan for next year's November, so I can plan ahead emotionally?"

An amused huff through the pale pink cupid's bow lips and Bucky had to be going through hell if he didn't have the energy to joke back.

"How bout next November we have a Commandos Thanksgiving at our place in Brooklyn?" Bucky winced as he shifted, still managing a shadow of that old smile. Steve had to bite his lip to keep the tears from welling up this time.

"Yeah," he forced out, sharp grimace twisted inwards. Thanksgiving in Brooklyn. That boy was gonna break his damn heart. Bucky, who never looked down. Who thought that they were gonna win this war. By this time next year. Who dreamed of the two of'em crossing the familiar dark brick Brooklyn bridge one more time.

It was all Steve's fault. The bulletwound, the continuous trauma flashbacks, everything. Bucky'd had the chance to go home and he hadn't taken it. He'd followed Steve right back into the belly of the beast and it was all his fault.

Wasn't supposed to know about it. Actually, Bucky'd gone to lengths to make sure he didn't. It wasn't that he just didn't tell Steve; he told the doctors not to tell him either.

After Azzano they'd put Buck through a psych eval. Came back clear, but stamped with a major recommendation. Severe encouragement. The doctors, staff, commanders all wanted to send Bucky home as a POW. Psychological injury, honorable discharge. They told him to go home, back to Brooklyn.

But Bucky turned down his one shot, his one chance to be home and safe and mentally stable because Steve had asked him to stay.

Hadn't even found out until after their first mission. He'd overheard Peggy and Phillips whispering about it, and confronted Peggy later. She'd been hesitant to tell him anything, but eventually relented, relayed that Sergeant Barnes was supposed to be sent home as a POW and had turned down the offer.

At the time, Steve was struck silent. Bucky was supposed to be home, not out here killing people. But he'd stayed for Steve, turned into a murderer for Steve. Something about that made Steve feel really warm inside, but mostly really nauseous.

But now Bucky had been shot and that was Steve's fault - in more ways than one - and if Bucky died...

"You takin' back that answer about following me into a suicide mission yet?" Steve asked, trying not to choke on the tears crawling up his throat. Bucky huffed, looking through him at the ceiling of the tent, movements slow like he was thawing from frozen ice.

"Just one suicide mission? Whose squad have you been in?"

It was a joke. Which should be good, Bucky joking meant Bucky might be okay, but the words hit him like a freight train ramming into his chest. Hard. How many times had Steve put Bucky's life on the line? Of course it eventually came to this.

The soldiers used to whisper this tune, this phrase whenever some greenie was still too bright and excited and didn't understand what the hell they were doing out in the first place. Steve had actually never said it to anyone, nor been around any greenies like that (or really any greenies at all), but Bucky had told him about it while he was telling one of his stories from the first few months in the 107th.

We've heard it all before, how we've come to die. Just before it ends, people start to fly. It was always sung in soft, low tones, under breath until the greenies had it implanted in their heads. Honestly, Steve thought it was a little sick, but so was war. Part of it was true though: as much as the films overseas glorified war, made it look honorable and beautiful, there were nights that Steve couldn't sleep so well because of the things they had to do. They'd come over here to die, or to kill. No other options. And yeah, it put you outta your mind sometimes. Yeah, it messed you up. That'd never once deterred him from fighting.

But watching Bucky get messed up...Steve wasn't sure he could do that. Buck lying here under the flickering glow of the lantern, pale and wasting away in the night, shivering to keep the blood pumping through his veins. And after everything Bucky'd ever done from him, the number of times Bucky'd saved his life, this was how Steve repaid him?

"I'm so sorry," he whispered, trying not to cry. Barnes took a bullet to the leg and hadn't shed a tear, Steve had to be stronger than this. He sucked in a shaky breath, gaze cutting away in the dim lantern glow. It was still flickering, light weak but unfailing. Holding on, through the night.

Bucky hadn't answered Steve's question. Hadn't said whether or not he'd change his answer now, about following Steve into the jaws of death.
He had to know.

The ice blue eyes were on him when Steve looked back down, even paler blue than they usually were. Without thinking Steve reached over, wrapped all ten of his shaking fingers around one a Buck's weak, gentle hands. Squeezed the curled fist between his palms, thumb running over the back of cold, rough skin. The pale lips curved up a little, colorless, too close to blue under the golden glow of the tent.

"If we could go back," Steve whispered, harsh in the cold gold, came out even rougher than he felt, fingers curling a little tighter around Bucky's cold hand. "...would you change anything?"

Would he have gone home? Would he have asked Steve to come with him? Would he have never enlisted in the first place? He couldn't take his eyes off of the crystal below him, losing oceans in the pitch black sky, bottom lip trembling as he fought welling tears.

Bucky took one look at him and snorted, raising both eyebrows in high arches.

"C'mon, man, I ain't dyin' on you that easy."

"Humor me." He managed to turn the corners of his mouth up a little, because Bucky was being stubborn as always. But if this was really the last night, Steve couldn't. He couldn't let Buck leave him without knowing, knowing if he forgave him, if Buck hated him for this stupid war, if-- Bucky sighed, wiggling his fingers free from the fist so he could intertwine them with Steve's.

"If this was my last breath, if my life was over..." Bucky squeezed Steve's hand a little tighter, terrifyingly weak and sending chills down his spine, so so cold. "I'm not leavin' with any regrets, Stevie. 'Cause I had you."

The smile that broke out on Steve's face made him duck his head, overwhelmed, bringing Bucky's hands up to his face. Steve rested his forehead on their entwined hands, breathing in and out as slowly as he could to keep from crying and laughing at the same time. It took him a minute to stop the tears from spilling down his cheeks, to get a grip back on his lungs, on his hands, on his stupid heart that was trying to jump outta his chest.

Fuck. Bucky Barnes.

He pressed his lips gently to the place where their thumbs overlapped, soft solid kiss to the joint of mismatched, puzzle-piece hands. Bucky's breath hitched and Steve's gaze cut upwards faster than the slip of a sniper trigger, staring wide-eyed at the beautiful features. Pale lips were parted, ice blue wide as his as they stared at each other in flickering gold.

"You stole my line," Steve accused, a relieved smiling huff falling from parted lips, ghosting over Bucky's fingers as they curled even tighter around his, pressing marks between his knuckles he wanted to keep for the rest of forever.

What else could he say, to follow a confession like that?

* I leave with no regrets because I had you.*

He'd almost forgotten, about the last time they'd had this conversation. Bucky sure hadn't though, reading right back to him that promise, almost word for word. It'd been years ago - he'd had pneumonia, neither of them thought he'd make it through the night and Bucky'd asked him teary-eyed, you regret anything?
Did he regret anything. Jesus, no.

Steve'd answered, no, 'course not. Couldn't, he'd had Bucky 'til death. Which better always be goddamn true, by the way. The memory was kind'a hazy, he'd been so damn sick at the time, but he'd never forget the look on Bucky's face when he'd said that.

He'd do...anything to have Bucky look at him like that again.

"Mm, 'cept the 'til death' part 'cause m'not dying," Bucky mumbled tiredly and Steve's heart lit off fireworks in his chest, beating like the drummer boy's call.

"Better not be. Who else'd abandon their posts and get themselves shot 'cause'a me?" Steve teased carefully, lowering their entwined hands to rest by Bucky's side, fingers still locked secure. Bucky huffed a laugh and tilted his head, eyelids fluttering. He didn't shrug - even though the head tilt was part of that gesture - because moving might pull the dental floss stitches Monty'd sewed up a few hours ago.

"An'body who knows how quick you get yourself int'a trouble..." The words came out a little delayed, slow and further further away. Crystal eyes blinked rapidly, trying to stay open.

He couldn't take back ready to follow Captain America into the jaws of death and he couldn't take back the command that had Bucky covering his six when the bullet lodged in his thigh, but he could soothe his best friend to sleep. Bout the only thing he could do, but for now, it'd have to be enough.

"Get some rest, Buck. I'll be here when you wake up." Steve brushed the fingers of his free hand back through through the disheveled brown hair, smoothing it down the way Buck did before missions.

"Mmm," Bucky said as way of response, then his eyes shut and his hand went lax in Steve's, body slipping back into unconsciousness. Steve watched the sharp features soften out, moment strangely intimate, so close to the pretty face soft in slumber. For Bucky to go through all this pain for Steve and then trust him so much as to fall asleep holding his hand...

It was. It was a lot, was all.

Steve leaned down and pressed a soft, lingering kiss to Bucky's forehead, closing his eyes at the warmth of Bucky's skin under his lips. Proof he was still alive, proof his body was breathing and beating and here and Steve hadn't lost him yet. He sent up a quick prayer of thanks before he sat back again, not missing the hint of a smile on Bucky's mouth that wasn't there a moment ago.

Don't you dare ever leave me. Steve reached over to blow out the lantern, arm stretching uncomfortably to keep ahold of Bucky's hand. Like hell he was ever letting go.

The tent plunged into darkness and he settled onto the cold ground next to the bundled up sleeping body, body facing Bucky's as he curled up close to the pile of blankets that he could.

Sleep wasn't gonna come anytime tonight, and Steve was more than alright with that. He wasn't gonna sleep until Bucky wasn't in danger of dying in the middle of the night. So he'd lay here and watch the rise and fall of that warm chest beneath the blankets, the way Buck used to when he was sick.

Kept his thumb rubbing an insignificant amount of warmth into the back of Bucky's hand, other fingers resting over the quiet thudding pulse. For once, hypersensitive touch was gonna do more than just overwhelm, he was gonna know the moment anything went wrong. And maybe, he'd be able to save Bucky from this.
He'd do anything it took to keep from waking up to ice cold fingers, glazed over crystal. Maybe, when the morning sun broke out its warmth over the top of the tent, Bucky'd still be breathing and his precious heart would still be beating. Steve's would beat in time as he waited for the most beautiful sunrise he'd ever see.

~~~*~

"You think we should tell Agent Carter?" Dugan raised bushy eyebrows, knocking his shoulder into Monty's to catch his attention. The brit snapped outta his daze, gaze cutting away from where he'd been watching Rogers hobble Barnes into the medical tent.

"'Bout what happened?" He clarified, grimace tugging down one side'a his mouth as what happened got brought up again. Not like any of them'd had anything else on their minds for the past day and a half.

"Yeah." Heavy shoulders shrugged, forcing himself to look away from Rogers' hand curled tight in Sarge's collar. "I mean, she seemed pretty concerned about Barnes acting differently 'cause'a the torture thing."

"You think that's what this was? Some sort of...temporary insanity from the torture?"

"No, I don't." Dugan looked grimly ahead, lips pursed beneath his mustache. "I do think Carter wants to know the details, though. And if it's gonna help Sarge, I'll tell her whatever the hell she wants to know."

"She'll probably seek us out anyways...shall we go while the others are indisposed?" They both looked over to the increasingly busy debriefing tent, bustling soldiers mulling and hushed, word about the bullet startin' to spread.

"Might as well. 'Fore Barnes is awake long enough to buck his feet."

Falsworth snorted, mumbling some amused heh, Buck, under his breath as he fell in step with Dugan's boot strides, matching treads cutting through the crowds and stragglers as they aimed for canvas.

"Agent Carter?" Dugan called, peeking his head inside a flap of the closest debriefing tent. A pretty brunette head snapped up and he waved Monty over, ducking to step inside. Carter waved off the other reporting soldier, starting their way with her eyebrows knit in concern, sharp heels somehow still making a bit of sound on the tightly compacted dirt.

"Gentlemen. I assume you've come to relay information?" She asked them, deep brown eyes lit up with that vaguely-terrifying fire. As always. Rogers sure had his sights on one hell of a dame.

"Yes, ma'am," Falsworth answered. "It's about Sergeant Barnes."

A flash of worry, fury, something at the mention of Barnes' name and she was spinning on one'a those heels, waving a hand at the closest table and barely waiting for them to sit.

"Well?" She demanded, crossing her arms as dark eyebrows arched high and impatient. Dugan tried not to shrink in his chair as he removed his hat and offered a matching grimace.

"Well, ma'am, it's a bit of a long story...."

The night was dark enough to give them plenty of shadows as they crept into the center of the city. Barnes led the way, low, impossibly silent as always. Jones and Dernier shared a spirited look as Barnes crouched, signaling to stop. The boys all fell easily into the command of their Sergeant - he'd earned everyone's eternal respect in the Hydra factory, before any of this even started. Taking work from men that couldn't do it, stepping in to keep as many necks off the wire and the wrath of the bitter guards. Stuck 'em together and made 'em get along and never treated anyone different, whether they were Asian or black or couldn't speak english. He'd been the one to make the Howling Commandos into the Howling Commandos in the first place.

And it was those same loyal boys that followed him through the shadows of the city, splitting off into groups of two at one point so they could cover more ground with their backup cover. The locale of Barnes' sniping post was across from the cathedral and from a high enough window, had a fairly decent view. Dugan waited in the alley beside the building, wishing Barnes luck with a silent clap on the shoulder as he mounted the stairs.

With that he waited below Barnes's window, eyes skyward until the familiar tip of a sniping rifle stuck into view. With Barnes secure in his position, only thing left to do was wait. From his assigned position he could see the three figures as Rogers, Falsworth, and Morita darted across the cathedral plaza, disappearing into the shadows against the wall.

There was one problem with Barnes's window that they hadn't been counting on. There was a tree next to the cathedral that made the angle kind of impossible to see beyond the basement doors. The tree obviously wasn't on a map of city streets and buildings, nobody draws in that sort'a thing. It shouldn't've been a problem at all, really, if the mission went according to plan.

But as soon as the three Commandos dropped into the basement of the cathedral, something went wrong. All of a sudden, the guards on the outside of the cathedral all turned their heads, then took off for the other side of the building, blocking them from sight.

Dugan glanced up, but Barnes's rifle was still aimed through the window, still patiently waiting. Then the basement doors shot upwards and Rogers rolled out, curling into a ball behind his shield. A moment of pure silence and the blue helmet peered out, checking in both directions. If it wouldn't give away his position, Dugan would've called out the guards disappeared, that they should take off right now.

And that's when the gunfire hit. It came out of nowhere, bullets started bouncing off of Rogers' shield, source too far away to pinpoint. And 'cause of that damned tree, Barnes couldn't do a damned thing; guards were all on the wrong side'a the cathedral to snipe from the window.

Which, of course, didn't settle for Barnes. One moment Dugan was cursing the enemy gunfire and the next he was startling, gaping upwards at the flash of movement. Barnes wasn't firing. No, instead, he'd rolled outta the window and was currently scaling the fucking fire escape.

To be fair, it did stick out quite a bit further and he'd be able to shoot around the tree.

Only thing was, the fucking fire escape didn't have a lick of protection. From a window, only the gun was really visible. This was Barnes's entire body suddenly exposed, in the open. And it was always everyone's first move to take out the sniper because obviously, they could rack up a shit ton of kills. Which was why snipers don't go out in the damn open.

"What the fuck Barnes," Dugan hissed under his breath. There was no way Barnes was going to hear him from up there and Dugan may as well not get them both killed.

It was Sniper 101 stuff, never ever leave your post to go out in the open. Actually, that was just War 101 stuff. But of course, the moment that Rogers was in danger, Barnes threw all the rules out the window. He'd never risked anybody's life but his own to save Rogers, but still. It was fucking reckless and ridiculous and frankly extremely worrying.

Then the shot fired. And Barnes crumpled above him. Mid-step on one'a the top metal stairs, bullet puncturing the muscle of his inner thigh and just like that he was down, toppling with a sharp cry, nearly falling off the fire escape. Dugan cursed out loud this time and turned tail, barreling straight into the building.

Jones and Dernier were right behind him, tearing into the building seconds after Dugan had. They'd seen Barnes fall - everyone and his brother could see Barnes fall he was out on a fucking fire escape. There was still gunfire on the other half of their team and Dugan could hear Rogers shouting something, but they had a man down and Cap had a damn invincible shield and a supersoldier serum pumping through his veins. They could hold their own for a bit.

As soon as they got inside, a flood of disorganized soldiers started pouring from the doorways. Barnes must've snuck up to the top, cut the time it'd take to kill through. But they had to get to Barnes as soon as possible, so all four of them went kinda nuts slaughtering everythin' in the way of them and their beloved sniper.

They were on the fourth floor when Falsworth and Morita's shouts joined in, extra man-power the perfect boost to tear through the rest a the building. It wasn't a minute later before Dugan and Jones were climbing onto the fire escape, crouching down beside Barnes's body. He was still breathing, thank the lord.

"The hell were you thinking?" Dugan hissed, lifting Barnes's head and shoulders. Jones picked up his legs and Bucky shouted, unrepentant face screwing up in pain. Jones called into the other boys for help, all groaning as they lifted Barnes off the fire escape and tried to maneuver into safety.

"Had...to cover...Stevie..." Barnes gasped between pained pants. Dugan would've smacked him over the head if he already wasn't in a shit ton of pain. "'S m-my job."

"Well it's not gonna be your job if y'bleed out you bastard."

Four pairs of arms finally lowered the trembling body to the floor, Jones crouching down worriedly as Barnes threw his head back and groaned. So much for that recklessness speech now, huh?

Then the door was busted open and they all drew on the intruder, including the goddamn bleeding invalid. And, 'course, soon as they recognized Rogers, weapons dropped and their Captain fucking dashed across the room, freaked out, and they somehow all managed to get outta the city while Rogers carried Barnes's body.

"The whole thing was insane, ma'am." Dugan finished, leaning back in his chair. Agent Carter'd been quiet, listening intently to the story with deceptively pretty hands clasped on the table.

"Lieutenant Falsworth, do you verify this story?" Carter asked, tipping her head at Monty's shallow nod, apologetic grimace.

"You told us to tell you if Barnes ever became a danger to himself or anyone else. I guess getting shot because he was being a dumba-- a, uh...fool, technically counts as that." Dugan pointed out, glancing over at Falsworth for backup.

"I mean, we know he feels he needs to protect Rogers, but. We're concerned about him," Falsworth added.

Carter nodded, looking pensive. She'd been uncharacteristically quiet, none of her normal rapidfire pestering questions.
"Is there anything else?" She finally asked, cocking her head.

Dugan thought about the way Rogers had worn himself thin trying to care for Barnes, the way he'd stayed up all night at his side. After his shift on watch, Dugan had peeked his head in Barnes's tent. Rogers had been lying curled up on his side, squeezing Barnes's hand and staring at him as he slept. It was damn heartbreaking.

Rogers had lifted his head when Dugan had come in, but he'd waved away the curiosity, nodding his sympathy before he backed the hell out of there. Oddly felt like intruding, in a strange way he couldn't place and really didn't wanna either.

"No ma'am," he finally answered. No point try'n to explain it. Just the way Cap and Sarge were.

"Well then, thank you for the information, boys." She pursed her lips, giving them a sharp, semisweet smile. "I believe you have a Sergeant that probably could use your good morale right now. You're both dismissed."

Tipped both their hats to Carter and they bolt outta there quick as they'd come in.

"You think he's gonna be alright?" Falsworth asked under his breath as they cleared the tent, stepped into the chill of the open air. Dugan glanced over at the worried Lt, who was knawin' his lip like Barnes was already half dead.

He'd survived the first night of cold, it wasn't gonna get any worse from here.

"He'll be fine. Only person I know that fights harder than he does is Cap, who might as well be fighting for 'em both anyways, way he's acting." Dugan cocked his head knowingly, fitting the bowler back snugly on his head. Falsworth smiled, a little distant on the horizon as they started for the medical tent.

"If it wasn't so stressful, those two might almost be endearing," Falsworth smiled lightly and Dugan laughed, clapping Falsworth on the shoulder.

"Almost," he agreed absently, running the list through his head, the important one of where he was gonna bed down tonight and if there was any chance of a decent C-ration for dinner.

~*~

Seven days. That's how long Bucky's sentence was. He was supposed to stay in a medical cot to heal for seven days and there was no way in hell he was going to keep still that long.

He ended up lasting about seven hours before he got up. The doctors had put him in a regular sleeping tent, thankfully. Nobody wanted a repeat'a the whole affair that went down in the medical tent.

Bucky really hated doctors. And he really didn't want Steve in there in case he freaked out. But of course, he got both.

He'd refused to see the medics when he'd first been rescued. Wouldn't be able to stand the shock and horror on their faces, seeing his body. Didn't let anyone see underneath ratty clothes for weeks; by then, all the worst of the scars and burns and bruises faded. And now it'd been a year since, so all the marks Zola left on him were gone. Well. The physical marks, anyways.

Still, he hated doctors. And he hated the idea of being weak, broken at all in front of the kid he'd done nothing but try to be strong for. But Steve limped him into the medic tent anyways, instantly spurting off to the doctor the story behind Bucky's gunshot wound and the dental floss stitches and everything.

Honestly, the bullet hadn't gone very deep at all. The worst of it was the blood loss and he was already recovering from that. He was a little dizzy, sure, but Steve was acting like Bucky was dying. Which he wasn't. Well, not anymore.

And then they'd pushed him down onto the cot for the medics to operate. And a switch somewhere inside Bucky flipped.

One moment Steve was holding him to the cot and the next Bucky's hand was around the medic's throat. The soldier made a shocked choking noise and suddenly big hands locked around his wrists, ripping him off and tipping them backwards and de didn't have much balance standing on only one leg, but the sharp tug whipped him around and fast and hard enough to land the punch anyways.

Fist exploding with fire, loud thud and a broken, hurt sound flew out of Steve's mouth and that sound shot the tent right back to reality and all he could see was snap of Steve's head to the side, his knuckles against that high fragile cheekbone and. Steve was hurt. Oh god oh god Steve was hurt.

"Oh god," Bucky whispered, horror lacing his tone and fingertips but he had to reach anyways, hesitating a moment before carefully wrapping his fingers over Steve's wrist, pulling him close as he fell back to the edge of the cot, reached up gentle and terrified to inspect the already forming bruise on the soft golden cheek. "Steve, are you okay?"

"Yeah, I - wow, Buck, you pack a mean punch." Steve flexed his jaw, tracing over the same place Bucky just had, big blue eyes looking at him wide and kinda scared.

For him, not of him, he could tell that much from Steve's expression but he still couldn't take that, the shock settling in over dusty purple--

"Sorry, I...You okay, doc?" He shot his attention to the medic too fast, too obvious, but he really did wanna make sure he hadn't hurt anymore, jesus christ. The doctor nodded, inspecting his own trachea carefully. Bucky swallowed, looking down at his hands. Fuck. He'd just sucker-punched his best friend.

Who had just saved his life.

He was a terrible terrible human being.

"-ou okay, Bucky?" He caught the last half of Steve's question and sucked in a sharp breath, blinking up to look at the looming worry. Why were they asking him if he was okay? He hadn't torn any stitches or anything.

"Fine. You just...surprised me, is all." He attempted a smile that probably paraded as a grimace to the scouring gaze but the longer they spent talking about this the longer he had to be in here and Bucky held the oxygen stale in his lungs, practically shoving himself back onto the length of the cot. He could do this. He had to do this. "Can we get this overwith any time soon?"

The medic looked hesitant, but Bucky curled his hands around the side bars, forced himself still and as nonthreatening as possible. The doctor eyed him cautiously but finally pulled out the little box of tools, leaning into his space with a pair of scissors to cut open the torn pant leg, properly sew up the messy bullet wound.

See, he was fine, he could do this. It wasn't bad at all, he was--
The sewing needle pierced his skin and it was all he could do to reign in the scream. He was okay, he was okay, he was safe. Right? He was...fuck, that hurt. There was so much pain. He couldn't move, he was bleeding, warm and sticky down his leg and he couldn't move, couldn't-- Sharp tang of metal, musty canvas, another harsh bite at the burning slide of a bitter hook slipping into his skin...

Someone was speaking German behind him and Bucky squeezed his eyes shut, wishing for some dust particle of English so he'd at least know the hell were doin' to him. Another flicker of pain shot up his leg and Bucky's mouth couldn't keep shut any longer, head throwing back as lips parted in a silent scream. One of the torture minions had a filthy German hand wrapped tight around his bicep, holding him down and exerting all that power and he just wanted the leather straps to let him go, he just wanted to pain to stop.

The German voices were still floating over him, gritting the edge of his brain, one sharp one getting louder. And closer. Bucky's eyes were still closed but he could feel the warm breath on his ear, how fucking close the voice was as it dripped more words over him and for some reason, it was in a language he understood.

"Tell me where you are right now."

Bucky struggled to find his tongue, he had to speak, better to give the fuckers what they wanted 'cause he'd proven too many times, lashing out never worked and he couldn't take anymore pain right now, he wasn't strong enough.

"No," the voice interrupted, harsh and pissed. Bucky instantly fell silent. Something was wrong, the voice was wrong and he couldn't place it, except that it was too soft to fit the harsh German and he hated them, every single one of the bastards who stuck him with needles and knives but if he focused on the voice hard enough maybe the pain would just stop and. "No, open your eyes Bucky. You're with me, your Steve. I got you out and I'm not ever gonna let them take you again."

Bucky blinked watery eyes open, ignoring how his lashes stuck together with drops of moisture. The beautiful worried face of an angel swam into focus above him. His angel.

"Steve," Bucky breathed in relief. A rush of air passed Steve's mouth as he looked down at Bucky, lips curved up like he was relieved too.

"It's me. Still me. How many times I gotta tell you? I got you out, Buck." Steve ran a tired hand over Bucky's hair, ruffling it up. Another sharp spike of pain went up Bucky's leg and he squeezed his eyes shut, sucking in a breath. He'd gotten shot. He'd been safe from Zola for a year. Steve was here, dropping a soft whisper in his sweaty hair, warm against the crown of his head, so exhausted but still so honest, real, 'I'm always gonna get you out, Bucky."

"Promise?" He whispered, blinking shattered to stare up at that pretty face again. Steve leaned back, softening all sweet around those the angled features, precious and gentle but still locked down so serious, that stubborn expression that got him into more fights than the smart mouth did.

"James Buchanan Barnes. As long as I am alive...I will always save you from that table."

The color of Steve's intense, serious eyes was probably the color of Bucky's soul.

"So just don't go dyin' on me, huh?" Bucky joked weakly, (knowing it wasn't a joke at all - he had no idea what he'd be without Steve but it wouldn't be very pretty) trying to ignore the cold droplets running rivets into his skin from the corners of his eyes to his temples.

One of the soft, strong artist hands smoothed the tears away with thumbs and fingers, brushing away all evidence Bucky was crying. The gesture made Bucky wanna cry a hell of a lot harder, break right into all that tender caring.

"You're the one who's always almost dyin' on me, remember?" Steve asked, kind'a sniffly too. Shit, they were goddamn soldiers, they had to get their shit together.

"Haven't left you yet, Stevie. Ain't plannin' to anytime soon."

"Y'keep saying that. M'not sure I believe you, jerk." Steve sucked in a breath and smiled shakily at him.

"Punk." He smiled at the familiar quip - they hadn't called each other that in this fuckin' lifetime. "We're a couple'a dames, aren't we? Cryin' all the time."

"Nope, just you," Steve piped back. Bucky rolled his eyes. He wasn't gonna argue that.

'Cause honestly, the few tears and mental breakdowns and shouts of pain were...all Bucky's.

Maybe it was 'cause he was forcing himself to work towards a higher level than his body was capable. He had to keep up with Steve in order to protect him but he physically could not step up to that game. Steve had superhuman capabilities and Bucky kept throwing himself at the same electric fences and dangerous situations that Steve did and he was actually...extremely lucky he wasn't dead yet.

He took on the impossible because he had to. Because Steve did. But Bucky's body couldn't take as much as the supersoldier serum could. He was weaker and slower and not stupid enough to test if he could jump outta burning buildings like Rogers did.

The rest of the Commandos were content to do their very regular fighting, that y'know, regular people were capable of. But Bucky couldn't protect Steve with regular. He had to climb out onto the fire-escapes of the world to make sure he could cover his best friend. And it backfired. Maybe that's why Bucky was always the one getting hurt.

Or maybe it was 'cause he couldn't stand to see the potential hovering pain headed in Steve's direction and he'd do anything to put himself in the way of that impending firestrike. As a distraction, a sacrifice. Whatever.

Or maybe his intentions may not be pure as he liked to think they were.

Maybe all of it was 'cause of the butterflies he got in his stomach when Steve smiled.

Maybe it was 'cause Bucky was shooting remarks in Steve's direction all the time that could maybe be flirting.

Maybe it was 'cause there'd been twice in his life when he'd been so sure Steve was gonna kiss him and that was all he'd ever wanted. And he'd been heartbroken the first time when they'd just brushed noses. Defeated the second time when Steve'd pulled him in for a hug instead.

Maybe it was 'cause Steve looked at Agent Carter with the only look he'd never given Bucky; like he could marry her. And she wasn't the one jumping in front of things to save his pretty ass, was she?

Or maybe, worst of all...maybe Bucky didn't mind getting hurt because Steve held his hand with every knife wound and bullethole. Steve gave him all that precious sought-after attention and focus and said the most wonderful things about how he needed Bucky whenever he was about to die.

Maybe his subconscious craved that attention and put him in terrible situations because he was way more selfish and terrible and disgusting than he'd ever want to admit to himself.

"Guess it is just me," Bucky echoed, staring up at the ceiling and wish he could sink through the blood-splattered cot and sink right into the blood-splattered earth.

He was sick, in the head. So so sick and Steve had no idea.

~*~

Seven days was wayyy too long of'a time to stay put. He nearly busted his stitches at the seven hour mark 'cause he'd decided to walk on his healing leg.

Honestly, it hurt like a bitch. Just sitting up had nearly knocked him over because the whole tent was spinning and his head hurt from how dizzy the goddamn canvas and dirt was. Hadn't regenerated all the blood he lost yet, so any tip of his equilibrium and he was down for the count with vertigo.

He managed to get a grip on it though, stumble outta bed on his bad leg and wince and hiss at the pain, barely keeping in the grit sounds. But he was more stubborn than anything else so he hobbled literally all the way across the tent, stooping to pick up the fallen blanket.

Bending over to pick up the blanket was a bad idea because one moment he was grabbing it and the next he was on the ground, shouting out a barked fuck! as he fell.

Steve almost stepped on him as he jumped outta bed.

"What the hell??" Steve swooped down, actual eagle-grabbing-a-sparrow style, big hands all over to try and help him up as Bucky swatted back petulantly because dammit, he was fine. He'd just miscalculated.

But the one trait Steve always beat him on was that damn stubborn head and his leg was throbbing, wasn't like he could fight back as those crazy-muscled arms hoisted under his and dragged him up like a goddamned doll.

"What in the world are you doing out of bed? What part of seven days don't you understand??"

"Your blanket fell off. I didn't want you to freeze to death, Rogers. Sorry for trying to help you," he bit about as sarcastic as he could get and Steve pushed Bucky onto his cot with way more force than necessary.

He wasn't sleeping on Steve's cot, he'd drag himself to his fuckin' own--

"You can't help me when you have a bullet in your leg, dammit!" Heavy palms shoved him back hard enough to bounce against the flimsy mattress and Bucky was about to shove him right the fuck back.

"It's not in my leg anymore, Steve!"

The sound of the tent flap pulling back snagged both their attentions, twin heads turning in tandem as Jones' head poked inside.

"You ladies wanna stop arguin' anytime soon, the rest of us are trying to sleep," Jones raised unimpressed eyebrows and Steve instantly deflated, all that fight draining into puppy-dog apology.

"Sorry, Gabe. Sergeant Barnes was being dangerously irresponsible." Steve shot a glare down at Bucky, crossing his arms over his built chest muscles which Bucky was absolutely not looking at. It took a lot of inner strength for him to look away long enough to roll his eyes but fuckin' roll his eyes he did.

"Well, Cap. Dernier said he'd really appreciate the quiet, so if you two could whisper-shout your constant arguments, we'd all appreciate it."

"Course. Yeah, sorry, we're going right back to sleep anyways." Steve stood there looking super fuckin' guilty and Gabe only smiled a little, gave a two finger salute, and put the tent flap back in place.

The moment that Jones was gone, Steve turned back on Bucky and hissed, "Don't you dare get outta bed again, Sergeant."

"Yes sir," Bucky shot back sarcastically, rolling to face away from his fuckin' motherhen of a best friend with an aggrieved, dramatic sigh. No way in hell was he going to make it lying here for seven days.

The next morning he hollered to Morita from the tent, hoping he was in earshot enough to hear. Steve had gone out to debrief with Colonel Phillips, so technically Bucky could get outta bed, but he didn't want to risk Steve coming back and freaking out.

Morita showed up a few minutes later, after Dernier had fetched him.

"You called, Sarge?"

"Yeah, I hate to do this, but Rogers has me on lockdown. Can you go find Stark and ask him for a crutch or cane I can use to get around for the next six days? I'm going to melt if I have to stay here."

Morita made a sympathetic face, glancing at the meager space of the tent and cringing secondhand at the torture Bucky knew all too well it was gonna be.

"I'll see what I can do."

Then he was left to stare at sloping canvas walls for another hour, slowly counting down the ways he was going to slaughter the next Nazi he saw for making him go through all this boredom.

Finally, Stark pulled back the flap of his therm, ducking his spikey-headed self inside.

"Sergeant Barnes. What can I do for you?"

"How good of an engineer are you?"

"The best," Stark shot back, without a second's hesitation. Bucky didn't need a good engineer as much as he needed someone with supplies and authority, but buttering Stark up was how you got stuff from him.

"Could you make a crutch I could use to walk around without putting weight on my leg? It's just for six days, so it doesn't have to elaborate or anythi..."

Bucky trailed off as Stark brought his hands out from behind his back, already holding out a metal pole with an upside down triangle at the top.
"The flat part here can go under your arm, should be the perfect height to get you around based on the dimensions in your file. It's fairly crude, I'd say, but it only took me a few minutes and I do have other projects I'm working on--"

"Stark. It's great, thanks."

Howard stepped up to hand it over, helping Bucky (unnecessarily) to his feet so he could tuck it under his arm. Then Stark stepped back away, surveying his work and nodding to himself.

It was so strange to think that a year and a half ago, Bucky had taken Steve and some dames out to the Stark expo, seen this same man on a stage with a car that wanted to float through the skies. It felt like a different lifetime.

"Thanks." Bucky moved the pole forward, leaning his weight on it as he hobbled a few feet, trying to get the hang of it.

Honestly, he was guessing he could ditch the stick by tomorrow, but he'd keep up the act for Steve. Besides, it wouldn't do any good to let on how fast Bucky was already healing. He didn't want people to ask questions, try to speculate why. Hell, even he didn't wanna think about why he was in way better shape than a man who got shot three days ago had any right to be.

So he'd keep the crutch around for longer than he needed it. Just to stop the questions and prodding doctors.

And when people asked him why he was already feeling and looking better, he'd chalk it all up high pain tolerance threshold. He was a soldier after all, who'd been tortured. It wasn't an entirely irrational thing to say.

The crutch was weird to use and it made Bucky feel like a total dame - the rest of the broken toy soldiers didn't use crutches. Then again, other soldiers didn't have Steve Rogers breathing his motherfucking concern down their necks.

It also kinda made Bucky like Stark. Even more. The guy wasn't so bad - maybe they could even be friends after the war. Stark liked good whiskey and was always moving a hundred miles an hour. He was confident like Bucky, but he also kinda wanted to help in his weird, egotistical way.

Bucky actually ended up spending three of his seven days of lockdown in Stark's lab. Maybe partially to avoid Steve, but also 'cause the guy worked on some really cool stuff.

He let Bucky test shoot his new rifles and pistols, even let Bucky keep the M1911 he liked so much. Some of the other soldiers had commented on how cool Bucky's crutch was - honestly it hurt more to use the crutch than to walk because walking didn't sting and the crutch was a big, cold metal bar underneath his arm - and how beneficial it could be to other soldiers too. Bucky agreed that it could help out some of the other men who were recovering from injuries and may or may not have mentioned the idea of making more.

They were easier and less likely to break than the pieces of wood the soldiers normally hacked for crutches, at least.

The next morning when Bucky hobbled his way into Howard's lab, the table he'd been sitting at had a sodering gun, big pieces of metal poles, and a dozen of the already formed metal pole triangles.

"I made the triangle pieces last night, but I figured you wouldn't mind sodering the rest of the pieces together while I work on that submarine project." Stark had made it off to be all nonchalant but the guy was an extremely wealthy genius engineer who should be sipping hot chocolate and putting his feet up at home in New York. Instead he was out here, volunteering his work and risking his life to help his country.

Stark may be a bit of a pompous asshole, but deep inside he was a pretty good guy. He hadn't been drafted to come out here. He'd come over on his own, to help the war effort as much as he could.
And as terrible as war was, Bucky couldn't help but respect the guy for that.

So he'd helped make more makeshift crutches for the injured, even filled out the mailing labels to ship them off to other camps.

Never really pictured this when he thought about war. The dim lit dingy desks, scratching away mailing labels while pieces of his pomade kept escaping to curl over his forehead.

But somewhere between befriending Stark, helping out in the lab, drinking the nights away with the Commandos, and being fretted over by Steve, the seven days of bed-rest-hell that was bed rest at all didn't turn out to be so bad.

He'd been basically healed by day 3, but he'd waited until day 8 before he jumped outta bed without the crutch, laughing at Steve and running outside to go exercise because dammit it'd felt like years since he'd last gotten to run and sweat.

He stopped by Stark's lab first, dropping off the crutch with a clap on Stark's scrawny shoulder and a promise of taking him out for drinks at the best place in Brooklyn when this whole war mess was over. Stark had laughed and said he'd love to, then Bucky was off again to run laps around the base.

Steve joined him on the second lap, falling into step on Bucky's right.

"I don't think you're supposed to be running yet," Steve commented between breaths. Bucky shrugged and pushed to run a little faster. He wasn't gonna run all-out 'cause he already ran faster than everyone (excluding Steve) without really trying and he didn't particularly wanna see how fast he could go. He never gave his all in anything but a fight, and only then when the others couldn't see him.

He was stronger and faster and healed quicker than he remembered and he had a feeling he knew why and he really did everything fuckin' possible to never think about it, had to be just dumb fuckin' luck he was up on his feet again, not even breaking a sweat from going this quickly, less than two weeks after taking a bullet to the leg.

"I don't care if I'm suppose to be running yet or not, I was dying with that stupid crutch."

Steve made a non-committal sound and pushed faster, breaking ahead easily. Bucky let him, but pretended to struggle a little harder. It kinda sucked keeping this from Steve when he'd love to see if he could still beat his best friend in a race, but. Steve had an excuse, to be all hyped up and beautiful and Bucky didn't and he. Didn't wanna be the freak.

So he let Steve beat him at the race, then he let Steve beat him to the showers too. Well, what counted for showers in an overseas war.

They were both grinning wide as Steve skid across the wet ground, throwing up his hands like the finishing-race dames with the flags. He shouted a declaration of joyous victory, hands on his knees all winded as he rambled some breathy blame of Bucky's defeat on the idiocy of getting pointlessly shot. Bucky was stuck between breathing hard and trying not to laugh while simultaneously acting more fatigued than he was without going overboard and worrying Steve about overexertion.

It was too much to focus on all at once and Bucky ended up caving, throwing his head back in a laugh at the competitive-serious look on Steve's face. His eyes were lit up like he'd won a year long battle instead of barely beating Bucky at some dumb race to the showers. Steve was damn adorable, that's what.

They both tossed off their shirts and Bucky mentally steeled himself for the...the goddamn violation of Steve's beauty. Wasn't fuckin' fair. But he couldn't think about that, couldn't destroy the glow in Steve's eyes right now, not when they were laughing for the first time in what felt like decades.

Steve's pretty blue eyes glanced over at him, not a shy bone left in that too-big body as he peeled off his pants, exposing all that skin without thinkin' twice about how skinny or bruised he might be. Bucky wondered distantly if he'd stop being shy around girls now too, or was he still the exception? Didn't much like the idea of not bein' Stevie's exception.

Now it was just him left to struggle the rough-cloth army pants over the ridiculously wrapped up gauze concealing the mostly-healed bullet wound. The movement to his right paused as Steve looked over at him, face all motherly and concerned again.

"Do you need help?" Steve asked, taking a step closer. Oh god, yeah, like Bucky needed Steve to help him undress right now. That would be a recipe for fucking disaster if he ever saw one. Not to mention that no one really knew exactly how healed the wound was and he'd like to keep it that way.

"Steve. I'm 26." Bucky deadpanned, looking up from where he was hopping on one foot, trying to wrestle his pants off.

Steve cracked up but left Bucky in peace, stripping and turning into the weak spray of water as Bucky looked the other way. They couldn't afford to wash their hair because there wasn't enough water and frankly it was way too freezing to walk around with wet hair in the middle of the day.

So they both ran a quick bar of soap and a splash of freezing water in the aborted shower-style they'd gotten used to over the past year. It was less than a minute later that they were both dried off with towels and clad back in boxers, silence falling now that the water from the showers was cut off.

They both reached for their discarded shirts at the same time, fingers brushing from how close, sending tingles up his arm that the suddenly clenched fist wasn't helping a bit. Steve looked up, sky-blue eyes landing on Bucky's wide ones. Fuck.

He was entirely naked under those thin boxers and it was about damn time that his outsides matched up to how beautiful his insides had always been.

Then something piercing and emotional clouded over the bright blue as Steve broke eye contact, flicking down the minuscule space between them. Bucky followed the trace further further, all the way to the wet gauze just visible under the hem of his boxers. Oh. His leg, again. Steve was taking a long time gettin' over a simple bulletwound. Hell of a lot longer than Bucky was.

"I'm feeling better, you know," Bucky said quietly. That seemed to break Steve outta his daze, body snapping back up straight as his gaze locked on Bucky's again. He looked so...soft. Just, soft and touchable and warm in all that sunshine and smooth and perfect.

Goddamn angel from heaven, and Bucky could live in the clouds forever but Jesus Christ, everytime he looked in those babyblues he was falling, falling so hard and fast he'd lose an arm if he ever hit the goddamn ground.
And then suddenly those babyblues were a hell of a lot closer.

The world stopped spinning and Bucky was frozen, final image of a soldier in a sniper scope before the life snuffs out for good because suddenly Steve was stepping up to him, fire in his eyes as precious hands came up to Bucky's jaw. It was something between holding him like he was a beautiful precious valuable treasure and holding him like Steve was going to slam him into a wall and give him punishing passionate bruising kisses.

His boxers were not going to be much use of hiding anything if he let those thoughts into his head - Jesus, would Steve push him against a wall?? - so he had to get a handle on himself right the fuck now.

Only Steve was looking at him so intensely, almost pissed, and one of his hands was sliding down to cup the back of Bucky's neck, a little violently. Of fucking course Bucky couldn't breathe.

Desperate, shaking hands came up to grab helplessly onto Steve's biceps, longing for some anchoring point in the goddamn spinning snowglobe off some fucking twisted black and white war movie love scene. This couldn't be real. Only Bucky could never in a million years fabricate the look in Steve's eyes right now.

"I thought you were going to die," Steve said fiercely, his breath washing over Bucky's face. Why did they have to be only in boxers? It was so damn vulnerable like this.

Although, hey, if Steve needed almost-dying as a justification to kiss Bucky senseless, then...

"I always think you're gonna die," Bucky breathed, looking up with searching eyes. Steve's fingers curled tighter on the back of his neck and fuck, fuck, Bucky wanted Steve to leave more than just bruises, wanted permanent proof of Steve's presence on his skin, something dark and blue he could carry with him for the rest of his cursed life.

And gall, they'd always been affectionate, but this? This was killing him. It ate him up inside because every time, every single time he managed to be so sure that maybe for a moment, for a brief moment, there might be more than just the best friend-ness. And he was always wrong because look where they were, impossibly close and still not...whateverthethellhewantedfromSteve. Which he still didn't know exactly what that was. Or have any idea.

He really didn't want to think about it at all, actually. He wanted the last few inches between their mouths to be abolished, for the tension and the blood pumping in his veins to finally explode into something beautiful and eternally warm instead of always on the edge.

For fuck's sake Steve was holding his face in a death grip, inches apart as they stared into each other's eyes, rough thumbs digging into his jawbone and he was so close to just tipping his face up, parted lips falling open wider and pressing up against that slick, pretty mouth, just one more inch--

The sound of boots approaching had them breaking apart faster than lightning, Steve's hands dropping and Bucky's heart pounding as it sunk incrementally lower, again, one more chance missed but he couldn't think about that right now, following Steve's suit and snatching up their respective shirts, tugging back over their heads in tandem right as some Private walked round the corner.

The Private stopped a few feet away, giving them a salute before delivering his message.

"Sergeant Barnes, your presence is requested in the officers' tent."

Bucky raised an eyebrow but nodded curtly at the Private, trying not to think about how obviously red his cheeks must be. He wasn't sure why he felt guilty - they hadn't even been doing anything, only some intense-staring and face-holding. Didn't keep him from blushing like a virgin in a whorehouse, though.

"Officers' tent?" Steve asked, buckling his belt. Bucky shrugged, slipping into his shoes.

"Guess now that I'm not an invalid they wanna chew me out for saving their best soldier. Again."
Steve rolled his eyes and Bucky shot him a wink.

How was it that they could go from the potential of that near-kiss moment to simple-familiar-teasing without a single hitch? It was almost like the near-kiss moments had become regular. Except how could that...?

Or maybe there were no almost-kiss moments and Bucky was either losing his mind or reading a hellofalot more into it. Which was the most rational explanation.

Or he could just. Not explain it. Not think about it. Not worry about it until it happened again, go back to normal in between. That'd worked for him so far, right?

~~~

It was already nearing December - only another week - so the air was crisp and cool as Bucky made his way across the camp. He'd stopped by the tents to grab his blue peacoat and style his hair. The Private hadn't said it was urgent, which meant he thankfully didn't have to dash and actually had the chance to presentable.

Although he was still flushed from the shower, a little outta his head and up in the clouds - but also confused and a little down because Steve might've almost kissed him? Which also meant Steve had managed to not-kiss Bucky again.

He was still sifting details through his head as he rounded a canvas corner to walk into the long rectangular tent. It was more a canvas pavilion than a tent, but whatever. Either way, he was a bit distracted and therefore totally unprepared for the scene that greeted him as he stepped inside the enclosure.

The tent was empty, save one person. Who was sitting on the edge of a desk, arms crossed over her chest as she waited. Bucky startled, eyes widening, before he managed to recover and stand straighter at attention.

"Agent Carter," Bucky said, a touch less hateful and disgusted than he felt inside. Obviously he must not've portrayed the negative well, because Agent Carter didn't so much as a flinch.

"Sergeant Barnes," she greeted, voice calculatingly neutral. Bucky was instantly suspicious.

"Where is--"

"It's just you and I, Sergeant." Peggy interrupted, looking him over with this conscious aura of self-aware power and two shots of deadly, overwhelming grace. Wow, Bucky suddenly found 3 new reasons to hate her.

She stalked behind the table, gesturing for Bucky to join her on the other side. Crossed the tent slowly, wracking his brain for what in the world this could be about.

One deep, silent calming breath as he stepped up to the other side of the desk, debating whether to take the chair or not, when Agent Carter spoke again.
"Sergeant Barnes. Do you know where you are standing?" Manicured hands on the surface, leaning forward to study him, pursed perfectly-red lips.

He didn't get the chance to answer before her expression shut him up, taking the floor again with that wickedly intriguing British accent.

"A year ago, that's where Captain Rogers stood, asking for your name. I was standing beside him when he stormed the place, rain-soaked without an ounce of authority, and demanded Colonel Phillips the fate of a particular man in the 107th. He was quite stubborn too, managed to royally piss off Colonel Phillips at least twice in the conversation.

"Phillips told him you were captured, presumed dead. So, of course, Steve jumped in the nearest jeep and planned to - I quote - 'walk to Austria if it were the only way.'"

Carter had an infuriatingly unreadable expression Bucky grit his teeth against, standing perfectly still, sniper-poised and soldier-stalwart, as though she were simply giving him the coordinates of his next mission.

Underneath that though, Bucky had no idea what the hell was going on. No one'd told him that before - Jesus, Steve, walk to fucking Austria? - and he was torn between yelling at Steve and kissing him for it.

Which seemed to be the two most prominent emotions for Steve lately. Maybe always?

Agent Carter studied him again and he didn't bother looking at her, staring straight ahead in the most strict of respectful positions. She considered this for a moment, then went on.

"I must admit I was quite surprised there was someone in Steve's life so important he'd risk Dr. Erskine's research on a practically suicidal mission to find them. It wasn't until I saw the two of you together that I realized why."

Peggy paused, letting silence fall so she could openly look Bucky over, eyes piercing and stupidly brown and beautiful. After a moment or two, she crossed her arms back over her chest and stalked around the side of the table to stand directly next to Bucky, tilting her chin up and looking at him like he was the one who had to look up.

"Sergeant Barnes, what is the nature of your relationship with Steve Rogers?"

Bucky's stomach dropped, bottoming out at his feet, just like that ride on Coney Island. Only Steve wasn't clutching his arm, looking green and making him throw back his head in a clustered laugh. He'd been so beautiful that night, so delicate and bitchy and happy. Steve, his relationship with Steve, Christ.

He'd taken way too long to answer. He'd been standing in shocked silence and Agent Carter was still looking at him expectantly, eyebrows raised and perfect red lips pursed.

"I-I don't follow your question, ma'am." Bucky finally got out. He at least managed to keep his face blank, thank god, but if she reached out to take his pulse she'd know exactly how damn fast his heart was racing.

"Peggy's eyebrows arched higher, tense silence falling again. She played silence like some interrogators played punches to the jaw - she held all the power, every ounce of control in those moments of pure, anticipatory quiet. She filled it with the stalking step of heeled shoes as she started walking again, circling behind Bucky like a lion stalking prey, stepping up to look at him from the other side.

"I-I don't follow your question, ma'am." Bucky finally got out. He at least managed to keep his face blank, thank god, but if she reached out to take his pulse she'd know exactly how damn fast his heart was racing.

Peggy's eyebrows arched higher, tense silence falling again. She played silence like some interrogators played punches to the jaw - she held all the power, every ounce of control in those moments of pure, anticipatory quiet. She filled it with the stalking step of heeled shoes as she started walking again, circling behind Bucky like a lion stalking prey, stepping up to look at him from the other side.
"The question was in regards to the nature of your relationship with Steve Rogers," she repeated, literally explaining what she meant approximately zero. Bucky had a feeling that was on purpose.

He took a moment of his own silence, still not looking at her as he stared ahead and answered carefully.

"He is the commanding officer of my squad, ma'am. I respect his decisions and have no complaints regarding his leadership style. Have there been concerns from my other team members I should be aware of?"

"Not exactly." Peggy looked at him curiously, her accent crisp as she spoke again. "What is the nature of your relationship off the battlefield, Sergeant?"

She wasn't letting this go. She couldn't seriously be prying at...at that. Even Bucky didn't know exactly what that was. He'd been avoiding that mental conversation with himself for a year, he wasn't exactly planning to have it now. Much less with somebody-fucking-else.

Oh, wait, and that somebody-fucking-else was none other than Steve's future goddamn fiancé, right, yeah, Bucky totally was gonna have that conversation. What the fucking hell, Carter.

"Captain Rogers and I are good friends ma'am. Has this proved to be a problem?"

"Sometimes," she answered vaguely and Bucky's eyes widened. He'd been totally sarcastic with the question but that answer, that was serious as hell. There'd been speculation on their friendship being an issue on the battlefield?

With her gaze never leaving Bucky's face - her interest peaked even more once his eyes'd widened in alarm - Peggy stepped backward and perched on the desk again. Bucky stayed standing. "And was your friendship the same before the war?"

"He was a lot smaller," Bucky replied sarcastically, desperately holding onto the last grip of control he had. His collected and calm facade was slipping and that wasn't gonna have a good ending.

Peggy looked at him, eyebrows raised and unimpressed with the answer. "Would you care to elaborate?"

"Steve's my best friend, ma'am. Would you care to elaborate on the purpose of this questioning?" Bucky snapped back, nerves starting to wane. He wouldn't ever talk back to her in front of other soldiers - as much as he despised her, he still respected the name she'd made for herself as a tough dame in a misogynistic army - but there weren't other soldiers around and Bucky was fed up with being dangled like a mouse on a string.

Peggy didn't look the slightest bit fazed by his outburst. In fact, she looked like she'd been expecting it. Maybe even pushing towards it.

"I'm not completely daft, Sergeant Barnes. I'm well aware of your dislike for me," she started and Bucky honestly didn't intend to react but he automatically snorted at her comment because that was such a serious understatement. Peggy's eyes narrowed dangerously at the sound and Bucky instantly regretted it, face twisting in vague apology.

"--however," she continued pointedly, "that does not give you the authority to lie to me, nor does it give you the authority to be a complete bastard."

Bucky blinked in surprise, finally glancing at her. That curse was strangest thing he'd heard, a soft, feminine, British voice speaking words like that. If he didn't hate her, he might've been in love with her, and that made Bucky hate her about 800x more because of-fucking-course she was perfect for Steve but not the shiny kind'a perfect, the rough-edged sharp, scary kind'a perfect and none of it was fucking fair.

She stared back at him, their eyes meeting for the first time since this whole thing'd started. Bucky didn't turn his body to face her, but he didn't look away either.

"So Sergeant Barnes, I will ask you again. What is your relationship with Steven Grant Rogers?"

This time the question hit him in a different way. The last three words threw sparks on kindling and an angry fire lit up in his chest, because goddamn her she did not have the right to use his name like that, like the whole thing gave her some superior position in Steve's life just because she knew that and she had no right.

That was fucking it. He'd been patient and he'd played along with her stupid game but this was ending now, she had no right to pry and no right to anything about Bucky and Steve.

He spun to face her, taking a single, charged step forwards. She held her ground, but Bucky was fairly sure there was a spark of fear in her eyes, if only for a millisecond.

"You have no right," Bucky started, hands clenching into fists at his sides. "If this is some...twisted way for you to get closer to him, prying information outta his best friend? I'm tellin' you, Steve would never indulge this kinda behavior and he'd probably be disgusted with you for asking."

Peggy stood up from the desk, a sudden wave of anger as she took a step forward too, eyes flashing with a mirrored fire to Bucky's.

Two comets colliding, more alike than either would ever admit, head to head and exploding fire all over the place. A hurricane and a tornado staring each other down with matching sparks of anger and possessiveness and look what a picture they painted - look what a scene they'd created. The two of them versus, unforgiving and stubborn and burning too hot for this to end in any way but a massive explosion of destruction.

"And just what would he think of you if he found out your feelings aren't nearly as innocent as you let on?" Peggy hissed.

Bucky's heart stopped, but he managed to lean forward and bite back a mark a hellofalot more bitter.

"You have no idea what you're talking about." She didn't, the pretty, feisty brunette was throwing out accusations with no clue as to how deep this ran, to how much more this was than some inappropriate feelings. If that's what she was even talking about.

"Don't I?" She shot back, eyes narrowed as she straightened, tone going cold and calculating. "A blind man could see the way you look at him."

No. No, she had no idea where she was going with this. How was this even something you threw around? This was a lot bigger deal than some speculation or curiosity a dame had about some fella she liked. This was the annihilation of somebody's future, the end of Bucky Barnes and the only good thing he had left on this planet. So his respectful manners went out the window - he was pretty sure he had a right, when it came to this. They were in a competition of who could have harsher, more cutting words. And goddamn him to hell if he wasn't winning that fucking competition. "What exactly are you accusing me of?"

"You know perfectly well what I'm saying." Peggy took a single step backwards, careful cautious, distancing herself from a grenade. "Steve Rogers is not just a best friend to you, is he?"
Bucky's hands clenched into tighter fists, blunt nails digging into his skin but not nearly hard enough to keep him sharp. Maybe he was a fucking grenade, because he felt about three seconds away from exploding. How dare she?

He set his jaw, eyes deadly as he glared down at Carter. "I'm not gonna give you anything. You think I don't see what you're doing? You want him for yourself and you're gonna do whatever it takes to get that. You'd get his best friend blue carded just so he'd put you first, huh? Is that it? Making up things so I'm outta the picture?"

"You and I both very well know that's not what this is about. I know you have issues with my feelings for Steve--"

"Issues??" Bucky barked a laugh, because seriously, issues? He hated her and she knew that, the whole damn planet knew that. Except maybe Steve, because he was way too sunshiny to notice the battle between the dark moon and the deceptive stars going on right in his same sky. "I sure think he'd have issues if he knew what you were trying to do to my military career."

"This is a lot bigger than a blue card, Sergeant Barnes. I wouldn't do that to this army, I'm not selfish enough to take away one of the greatest assets we have over a crush. And I wouldn't do that to Steve, you know very well how I feel about him."

"You use him because it makes you look good! You're the damn photograph in his compass and it puts your face on the silver screen!" Bucky threw up his hands, not really intending to mention the compass thing but it'd destroyed him the first time he'd seen it and yeah, he hadn't exactly let that go.

"You really think this is about fame?" Peggy stepped up close to him again, boiling now underneath her cool brown reserve. "I'm a woman in the army for godssakes, this is not about fame."

She set her level gaze on Bucky, eyes knowing and so confident that Bucky could be the size of the Eiffel Tower and still feel the urge to cower. "You know what this is about. You keep denying it and denying it, even to yourself. But you know." Peggy paused, her eyes flashing with something akin to anger but about four times hotter red - "This is about Steve. Feelings. This is about love--"

The four-letter L word shot directly into his chest, piercing harder and faster and deeper than the bullet in his leg and the entire world flashed red and Bucky didn't stand a chance against it. Never had.

"I LOVED HIM FIRST!!"

The chorus drop of the song, the momentum piling to the big finale, the drumroll before the firework, the explosion, the grenade, and he wasn't ever gonna dig the shrapnel outta his skin.

Utter glass silence, shattering splinters as his lungs finally caught with a wet, ragged gasp of air.

He stumbled backwards, the back of his legs hitting something solid, autopilot limbs as he fell heavily into the closest chair, staring at nothing. It didn't even sink in then, sitting there, what he'd just said. His eyes cut down to his hands, turning them over to look at them both and they were shaking and his whole body was shaking and he had just..."Oh god," he whispered.

Then common sense kicked in and Bucky looked around frantically, listening for approaching footsteps outside the tent because he'd just shouted that and-- "I cleared off this quarter of camp, nobody can hear us," Peggy said quietly. He didn't have the energy to feel grateful, he just slumped back down in his chair, bringing a hand up to his face. Behind the darkness of his dirty palm, his eyes didn't feel any less on fire. Suspended in shock, world still burning bright and fiery around him but he frozen, stuck. Stuck in disbelief - unreal - that that'd just happened.

How could he have let that happen? How could he have said...that. God, that. His lungs apparently didn't agree with his mouth's outburst because he couldn't breathe, he was going to fucking collapse over any moment. He couldn't open his mouth though, couldn't speak another word. God\textit{fuck} knows what'd come outta his mouth this time.

He tried struggling though breathing for another few moments, then a soft, slightly concerned voice spoke again. "Sergeant Barnes?"

The spell broke at his name and suddenly Bucky rocked forward, both hands covering his face now as he tried to curl into nothing in this stupid metal chair.

"Oh my god. Oh my god." Rock, one-two, a broken sound. His head lifted disbelievingly from his hands, wide, terrified eyes on the evil ground. "I love him. I mean, I've always loved him, but. I \textit{love} him. I'm in love with him." The words kept cutting knives into his insides and Bucky moaned, wild hands running rough fingers through his hair. "Oh \textit{god}, no. I'm in love with him."

He was still shaking and Peggy took a step closer, hesitant as she crouched down beside him. "Sergeant Barnes?" Bucky sucked in a shaky breath, choking on the oxygen as he covered his face with his hands again. "Sergeant Barnes...Look at me. Look at me."

When Bucky didn't respond, Peggy switched to her commander voice, barking out the next word loud enough to make Bucky instantly snap up, even if only outta surprise. "James!"

It was the first time she'd called him by name, even if it wasn't really quite his name. It hadn't been since a little blond kid decided to call him Bucky. But he looked up anyways, eyes red rimmed and bordering on tears as he stared at the woman crouching down beside his chair. "It's alright," she reassured. "It's alright."

"No, no, you don't get it, it's \textit{not}." Bucky straightened up in his chair - every piece of his body was trying to shoot away in a different direction. Peggy straightened too, scooting the other chair over and sitting down too, pretty knees almost bumping into Bucky’s. He didn't pay attention to her, didn't even want to think about her right now, it was too much-- he'd messed up so much. "How could I do this? How could I let this happen?"

"Sometimes things are bigger than our control, James." Peggy's voice was back to her commanding, confident tone and Bucky really had no idea why she hadn't kicked him to the curb yet. "This \textit{is} Steve we're talking about. You'd be mad not to love him."

"If I was a dame," Eyes closing, defeated. "But I'm not. I'm supposed to be his best friend, the guy that pulls him outta trouble and convinces him to ask out dames. Not...not wish he'd be dancing with \textit{me}. I've been playin' this game my whole life, can't remember a time I \textit{wasn't} tryin' to explain away the way I felt about Steve..."
"You've known about this for that long?" A bit of sympathy and amazement snuck into the harsh British tones and this was all too confusing to figure out.

"No, no. I mean, I always felt...more for him than I should, since always. But it wasn't until somebody - you, actually - threatened to take him away that I realized all this time it was...the whole..." Bucky waved his hand impatiently, hating himself a little more every time he said it out loud. "...I love thing."

"That's quite a long time of denial," Peggy leaned forward in her chair, looking so soft and pretty and somehow so much stronger than Bucky as she reached out a lean, firm hand and clasped her fingers over Bucky's closed fist. "Why didn't you ever tell him? You know Steve would never hate you for that."

Bucky stared at her pretty, delicate hand over his and wondered when exactly he'd stopped craving a woman's touch. When it stopped being enough of a sweet distraction that he could be okay and pretend a little longer. When he'd gotten so far deep that is was only ever Steve anymore. He sucked in a breath, still looking at Peggy's hand over his.

"I know he'd never hate me. Well, he'd never say it, he's way too...good for that. But he'd look at me differently...he'd tell me it was fine and it wouldn't be at all because you don't come back from that. Even if I was a dame and it wasn't wrong, you don't come back from telling your best friend you love 'em. He'd act like it wasn't a big deal and I couldn't take that. Because it is a big deal."

He forced himself to swallow, to try and take normal breaths. "I guess, best case scenario, he'd clap me on the shoulder and tell me nothing could change our friendship...."

"Worst case scenario he's appalled and leaves," Peggy finished. Bucky shook his head once, side to side, a sharp no, and closed his eyes, trying to find some kind'a relief from the real world behind closed eyelids.

"No. Worst case scenario he thinks I'm sick. Thinks something's wrong with me, like it's a disease I've been infected with," Bucky paused, his voice dropping to a whisper as his eyes welled up again. "Worst case scenario he tries to fix me."

Peggy went quiet at that. She may be a woman in the army, may've been told she was too weak or delicate or dumb to make it amongst men. But she could prove them all wrong with her sharp wit, brilliant shooting, knockout punch.

Bucky wouldn't get the chance to prove anyone wrong. They could tell him his feelings for Steve were sick and wrong and weak, but how could he ever prove otherwise? How could he ever show anyone that it was about dedication and protection and pure sunshine in the darkest nights?

The soft, slightly gun-calloused fingertips drew back from Bucky's hand as Agent Carter straightened up in her chair, neutral, unreadable expression.

"Is that why you despise me, then? Because I'm allowed to love him when you can't?"

He almost would've laughed, if there was oxygen left in his lungs.

"No. I mean, I don't like you for that, but. That's not why I hate you." Peggy blinked at him and this conversation couldn't get more crazy, he might as well spill it all. His guts were lying on the floor by now anyways. So he stared off into the distance, words drifting under his breath. "He looks at you with the only look he's never given me...Like he wants to marry you."

Agent Carter blinked wide in surprise before she clamped down the emotion. Yeah, Bucky couldn't hate her for that reaction because he'd be excited too if someone told him Steve wanted to marry him.

"You never struck me as the marrying type of man," she smiled at the edges, lighting the tent a little less dim. The clouds weren't parting that easy, but Bucky shrugged.

"Probably didn't strike you as the type'a guy to like fellas, either, huh?"

"Do you? Like other men?" The question was pure curiosity, no judgement; why? Why didn't she think...shouldn't she be disgusted, if he did? If he did.

"Dunno. It's always been Steve." Although it'd been Steve back when Bucky'd dated all those dames, too. Back when Steve was small and condensed and feisty and so beautifully fragile he made dames look bulky. Back when Steve was entirely, purely his.

"And it's not fair, it's not, because he'll never see it. And I'm the only one who's ever gonna be able to love him properly. It's not that I deserve him - because I don't. He deserves a million times better than me.

"And it breaks my heart because I know I'm still the best he could ever have. No one's ever gonna love him right but me and it's not fair because someone as perfect as him shouldn't be stuck with nothing more than a dark shadow at his feet."

Bucky glanced over at Peggy, who was fairly taken aback. Surprised, at very least. So he amended, clarifying - if she really loved Steve, she'd get it.

"I know you say you love him too, but. But he deserves someone who loved him all along. He deserves someone who loved him before he was shiny and huge, someone who knew the tiny firecracker with delicate collar bones and this earth-rattling cough and the brightest fight you've ever seen...

"I know you say you love him, but if you really do, than you know he deserves better than someone who fell for his body and stayed for his heart of gold."

Bucky's gaze cut away, couldn't see the look across those sharp pretty features as it sank in; as much as he hated Peggy (walking in here, anyways), he still felt kind'a awful telling her Steve deserved better.

"James, are you not aware of when I met Steve?" She didn't sound pissed, at least, more of that surprise? "...I knew him quite a bit before the serum. I liked him before the serum."

He stared blankly. He'd thought-- Well. Fuck. That changed everything.

"That night at the bar, where I first realized your feelings, I told Steve I was waiting for the right partner. That was something he'd told me when he was about five-foot-three and frail as my pinky. I liked him plenty before he took the serum - actually, I tried to stop the operation halfway through because I...I couldn't listen to him scream."

She'd known him all along. Bucky wasn't the only one who loved that tiny guy from Brooklyn more than Captain America - Peggy did too. Bucky wasn't the only one anymore.

Bucky wasn't the only one.

It'd been the very center of his reasoning to hate Peggy. She hadn't deserved Steve because she hadn't loved him before this. But now that...she had-- What else did Bucky have to hold on too? He'd been Steve's anchor from the past but Steve could find that in Peggy. She had anything Steve could ever need. Everything he could ever need.
Bucky couldn't compete with that.

(And he couldn't hate her for loving Steve either.)

"You should've stopped the operation while you had the chance," he said quietly. "At least then he wouldn't be over here fighting in Hell."

Peggy sighed, straightening the cuff of her uniform. "This war's the best place for him. We need people like Steve, or it's just battles and bloodshed. He makes this fight something worth fighting for."

"You think I don't know that?" Bucky tipped his head, blue on brown, ever a challenge as he held her gaze and dumped ice water on their feet. "That doesn't make it hurt any less to watch him run into burning buildings and wonder if he's ever gonna come running back out. Could you stomach that, Agent Carter?"

Brown eyes stared unwaveringly into his. If she was a blue-eyed dame, she'd be...scarily like Bucky.
Why?

"He saved your life. Isn't that worth it?"

Bucky looked away. He hadn't deserved to be saved by Steve then and he sure as hell didn't deserve it now. Peggy softened and Bucky wanted to harden against her melting eyes but he couldn't, his heart was aching--

"Steve cares about you, you know. He stormed an enemy base alone just for you. You can't let yourself forget that."

The tears started to well up again - for what, the third or fourth time in this conversation? This ridiculous, impossible, torturous conversation that didn't even feel real. Sitting in a chair next to Agent Carter and confessing up feelings for Steve?

She was being so soft and this was illegal, he couldn't--

"Why're you doing this?" He suddenly accused, scooting his chair a fraction away and staring wide (and watery) eyed at Agent Carter. "What's your angle? Get as much information outta me as possible so you can-- ca-can go tell Steve? Make him hate me? Make hi-him choose between us?"

"I would never make him choose between us," Peggy articulated, quiet and serious, "...because I'm not sure I want to know the answer to that question." Bucky scoffed. Like Steve'd chose him. "And it's quite likely he'd hate me for telling him, too. This is Steve we're talking about."

"Then why? Why quarantine off a tent and drag a confession outta me?" He leaned forward in his chair and the flash in her eyes this time was more pity than fear. What a life he'd come to. "Why?"

A pause and she looked down at her hands, turned them over. Bucky waited. A steady breath - at least her lungs were working, maybe Bucky finally knew how Steve'd felt all those years - and she was being so gentle...

"No one should have to be alone. You were bound to explode sometime or another, and." Dark, rich brown met his and Bucky's breath caught. "--at least I understand the way you feel."
Protecting. Better he scream all this at Peggy than Steve, right? He could respect her for that. He could respect her for all of it. She hadn't been disgusted with him - not externally anyways - when he'd admitted it. She'd even comforted him through her sharp, careful manner. She'd explained to him and let him tear up and freak out and ramble on with all his illegal, disturbing feelings for his best friend. Let him tell her she didn't deserve Steve, even when she did.

It was the highest compliment he could think of. But if anyone did?

She deserved Steve.

"So how do we go forward, now?" Agent Carter waited patiently after the question, hands folded in her lap. It was an interrogation, only she was being a hellofalot nicer than he'd seen her with anyone else.

Funny, how it'd been the opposite walking in.

So much'd been the opposite walking in.

But next? Next he had to find a way to walk out of this tent.

...it might be the hardest thing Bucky'd ever say. About a million times worse than realizing he was in love with Steve. And he'd been avoiding that truth consciously for a year, subconsciously for most his life. This was gonna be so much worse than that.

But he had to say it. He didn't believe in the 'if you love them let them go' nonsense, because that wasn't love. Love was scouring the earth, love was never giving up.

But this love didn't have a choice. He'd never give up on Steve, not ever, but he was giving up on himself. He couldn't give Steve anything more than undying devotion and Steve deserved so much more than that.

Steve deserved the stars and all Bucky could give him was a pitch-black sky.

"If you really did like him before-- if you could see the pure insides before his outsides matched?" Bucky bit his lip, wishing it'd draw blood. Copper'd be a better taste than the bitter in his throat now. He had to say it.

He'd bleed out anyways.

"...I've gotta give him up. It's the only thing I can do."

"James--"

"No. You know it is. He's my entire world. But he deserves so much more than me. He deserves a real life, one with a wife and a family and a home. He deserves the universe, and I can't give him that." The last time he'd smiled was at Steve, in the showers, and now another curled on his lips, the exact opposite kind. Nothing but sadness, sadness and pure, raw truth.

"But I'd be honored to give him you."

Peggy blinked rapidly, eyes cutting away as she ran a careful finger underneath them, trying not to cry.

"He'd marry you tomorrow if it weren't for the war. I know he would. And when he comes to me and asks me if I think he should...I'll tell him the truth. I'll tell him you're the best thing he could ever hope for. The best thing he could've ever gotten outta this stupid war."

"But James," Peggy reached out her hand again, eyes still watery as she wrapped her fingers over Bucky's wrist. "What about you?"

Bucky put his free one atop hers, looking her directly in the eye and holding that gaze.

Two comets that collided, exploded, helped each other pick up the residue. They really were so much alike - the same fire, the same stubborn feelings and cruel words and brilliant smiles. Maybe it should've been a comfort the woman Steve'd marry was so much like Bucky, but it wasn't. He had a feeling it wasn't exactly a comfort to Peggy either.

Two comets collided and there was only space left for one in this sky.

"Promise me," Bucky squeezed her hand, both their eyes wet now. "Promise me you'll never tell him. He can't ever know.

"Please - this is the only thing I'll ever ask of you. You can't tell him. You can't tell Steve. Just please, please Peggy. Promise me you'll love him with every ounce of your heart. But more than that," a ragged breath and he tipped his head like the twist of his mouth didn't mean he was about to cry. "Promise me you'll never tell him that I do too."

A tear slipped down Peggy's cheek, a whisper so quiet he could barely hear. "Of course. I promise. I promise."

One comet to burn brighter and one to melt to water in the ozone.

The tears he'd been holding back for decades came now - silent and flooding and painful - nothing and everything like release.

He curled into himself and Peggy squeezed his hand, let him cry, still and solid beside him. One palm over his ducked face as his shoulder shook. And shook and shook.

Of all things to wish, Bucky wished Sarah were here. He wished it'd been Sarah who'd finally gotten this outta him. He wished she'd sat him down on her rickety kitchen counter when they were young teens and forced it outta him the way she forced manners into him.

When he broke down and cried like this, Sarah would've held him. She'd've held him close and stroked his hair and whispered that it was okay, it was always okay. They'd always understood each other so much, sacrificing everything for Steve. Sarah Rogers would've found a way to make Bucky live with himself, found a way to tell him what he felt for Steve was more than okay - it was a love that meant the world, beautiful and pure. Like the way it felt inside him.

But Sarah Rogers was in her grave, too far to catch the falling tears, and it was the only other woman in Steve's life listening to him cry now. A tight grip on his wrist, a solid, unmovable presence beside him.

Peggy wasn't one for comfort, but she did love Steve and she didn't hate Bucky for loving him too and that was so much more than Bucky could've asked for.

He finally managed to get ahold of himself long enough to suck in a breath, choke out mangled words wet and hoarse with tears.

"T-This has to be it. When I walk out of this tent," he sucked in another breath, halting the rush of blood to his head, "I have to leave this here with you. I won't ever stop loving him and I'm so sorry for that. I wish I could. I wish I could let you two be, but…"

"I understand. It's alright." She squeezed her hand on Bucky's wrist a final time before she drew away, offering him a sad smile, one cheek holding two tear tracks, two promises that she really did understand.

One side of her smile quirked up a bit, something like the half-smile a Brooklyn Bucky used to give.

"If we ever do get married, you can still come over for Sunday dinner." The other side curled up, a pained but real smile now. "Although I'm afraid you simply can't have any dessert."

Bucky couldn't help it, he laughed. That was something he would've done, if positions were reversed. The lighthearted joke, the ridiculous picture she was painting. The relief in his chest at knowing Peggy wasn't gonna kick Bucky outta Steve's life. That apparently he might be invited to Sunday dinners.

"I hate you," Bucky said shakily, the thankful smile on his face screaming the opposite. Peggy pursed her lips and heard him, loud and clear.

This was the woman Steve'd have for the rest of his life. This was the woman to replace him. She was perfect for the job.

And it hurt more than anything he'd ever known.

This was letting himself go, giving Steve everything he could before he gathered up his love and hid it so close in his chest that Steve'd never ever know.

It might as well be Steve's wedding day now, and it was Bucky walking Steve down the aisle to give him away. Peggy looked beautiful, standing there waiting for him.

"You alright?" Peggy asked, standing on steady feet. A few stray tears were still making their way down his face, but Bucky wiped them away quickly and shot up too. He had to go back out into the world and crying wasn't the way he needed to do it. Somehow his knees weren't giving out on him, so maybe he really could do this. He took a breath, steeling himself.

And then he stuck out his hand.

"Thanks, Peggy. He'd...he deserves somebody like you." Peggy's eyes crinkled and she reached out her hand too, grabbing Bucky's in a firm shake. Like a business deal - here, on this line, sign away the other half of your soul.

Before she could draw her hand back, Bucky covered it with his other, both holding onto Peggy's as he looked down at her big brown eyes and swore away his life. "And that's the best compliment I know how to give, ma'am."

"You have my gratitude, Sergeant Barnes," Peggy smiled softly and Bucky let go. With a final nod, she walked back around the desk and picked up a folder, flipping it open. He looked at her another moment - Take care of my darling. This was it. He sucked in a breath and spun on his heel--

"Oh, one last thing, Sergeant." Bucky paused, turned back around as Peggy gave him a pretty, professional nod. "The army appreciates your contributions to our research on Doctor Zola's interrogation methods."

He blinked a few times before he realized what she was saying. The cover, for why Bucky was in here for an hour, tent private. It was a good cover, although honestly Bucky'd rather have an in-depth conversation of every torture method used on him than confessing being in love with his best friend and losing that same best friend all in the same conversation.

He gave Peggy a tight-lipped smile anyways. "Anytime, ma'am."

The sunshine of the outside world was blinding and Bucky instantly lifted a hand to cover his eyes. He was constantly comparing Steve to the sunshine, and that'd be pretty ironically fitting in the situation right now considering he was getting blinded.

He'd barely walked fifty steps before he heard a shout and someone running towards him, so he lowered his hand from his eyes, blinking into the brightness as his vision slowly adjusted.

"Bucky!" And then outta nowhere Steve came rushing to his side, like one'a those golden retriever puppies after a frisbee. "You've been gone for more than an hour! Are you okay? What happened? Have you been crying?"

"Steve, Steve. Calm down." Bucky carefully pried Steve's death grip off his arm. Those warm hands, the ones he used to hold. He almost choked again, just thinking about how that last time they'd been so close - in the showers just earlier today - it'd been the very last time they'd be that close.

No.

Fuck, no, that'd been it, it was over now and--

Oh god.

Had to cut this off now, sooner than later. Cover more than just that conversation, cover a lifetime of hidden looks and sparked touches and--

"I'm. F-fine. We...I just. It was about Zola. And things got kinda intense. But I'm okay, alright? I mean, I might have bruises on my arm now from your death grip, but otherwise I'm good."

Steve breathed out a sigh of relief, mumbling an offhand apology about Bucky's arm. "You know, I, uh. I would've gone with you if you needed somebody there."

Bucky couldn't help but huff a laugh, falling into step next to Steve as they made their way back to their tent.

"Believe me, that was not a conversation you wanted to be at. You know I look awful when I'm crying."

Steve bumped his shoulder. "Nah, Buck. You don't ever look awful."

The familiar warm tingles threatened to expand in his chest and Bucky shut it down, numbing himself because even if Steve had meant that, it didn't matter now.

They could never ever be anything more than best friends.

"Thanks," he said offhandedly, like he was distracted and not really paying attention. The faster they got off the track of teasing each other about things that could be flirting, the better. "Hey, did you see Stark today? I thought of a way he could improve those crutches he's been workin' on."

"No, I haven't." Steve looked at him curiously, all underlying concern. "You sure you alright? You seem-"
"Tired? I kinda am. Think I'll take a nap, actually." They'd reached the slopping canvas of that shared tent, two peeled flaps as they both ducked inside. In sync, again. In sync, always. Bucky blinked into the darkness as his eyes adjusted, praying the few seconds would cover the red around his eyes. Just, focus. Simple. His personal-affects bag was thankfully already packed, he kept it that way.

"You mind if I draw in here while you sleep?" Steve asked, already getting out his sketchbook.

Here it was. Just another one'a those things, but it was too soon. This was all too fresh and Steve was looking at him with those beautiful blue eyes and Bucky was so desperately terribly in love with him.

They needed space.

"Actually, uh," Bucky picked up his bag, looking a little guiltily at Steve. "I was gonna sleep in Falsworth's tent. He uh, said he didn't like bunking alone at base camp. Said it felt weird to be isolated or whatever. I told him I'm sure you wouldn't mind."

Steve's face fell. Bucky's heart broke. But he didn't budge.

"Oh. Okay, yeah. I'll uh. See you at dinner then." Steve looked down dejectedly and Bucky turned around before he changed his mind and ruined everything.

"Yeah. See you at dinner."

He walked back out into the sunshine, only the rays felt pretty damn cold now. Falsworth'd mentioned the lonely thing once, probably seven months ago, and he'd actually been talking about not seeing enough girls when they were at war, but. Bucky needed an out.

"Hey, Montie. You mind if I take a nap in your tent?"

"Uh. Yeah, course, Sarge. Anything wrong?"

"Nah, just wanted some shut eye and figured yours was the emptiest."

Falsworth nodded and Bucky wondered how many lies he was gonna have to tell for the rest of his life.

Falsworth's tent wasn't the emptiest.

Bucky's heart was.
Warning: graphic scenes of violence and death and war in addition to a very heartbreaking almost death yes sorry

Here have this song for our dear troubled Bucky Barnes: Boats and Birds

Also the Howling Commandos theme song: Bullets

And because I am 100% sap here have a video on how to jazz waltz from the 1930s (with the actual dancing footage at the beginning and 6:25)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"You're a fucking idiot, you know that?" Steve flinched at the harsh language, ducking to narrowly avoid the next thwap to his head. "It's been a month and a half since I got shot; I can run circles around your lame ass and I'm pretty sure climbing a tree to get a better view for protecting our team isn't gonna kill me."

"Fine, fine, okay. Sorry I mentioned anything." He held his hands up in surrender, making Bucky glare at him a little harder.

"Fine, fine, okay. Sorry I mentioned anything." He held his hands up in surrender, making Bucky glare at him a little harder.

"You better be. Now, before Rogers interrupted, what were you saying about the back exit, Jones?" Bucky turned back to Gabe, arms crossed in fein annoyance as Steve looked down and smoothed the corners of the map, thinking. True, it'd been a month and a half since the bullet, but anybody else'd be walking with a crutch for at least that long. Maybe for the rest of their life. But Bucky absolutely refused to stay injured. He could probably stop a freight train in its tracks by being pissed at it.

The corners of Steve's mouth threatened to tug up in a smile, but they were going over the mission right now so it was really not the time to be grinning about his stupidly stubborn best friend. He managed to keep the affectionate thoughts on lockdown as Jones explained the best way outta the building - which was where the tree thing from earlier came in.

Trees were dangerous, alright? To snipe from a tree you had to find a branch sturdy enough to hold your entire body weight and not swing in the wind. Then you had to shoot through the leaves and foliage, which was nearly impossible. Not to mention that getting out of a tree was super difficult in the midst of a hurried escape plan. Especially with a sniper rifle strapped to your back.

But apparently mentioning any of this just managed to piss off Bucky, who lately found any precautions to be basically an insult. Ever since he got shot, Bucky'd dived back into fighting twice as hard as before the bullet. It wasn't necessary; they hadn't taken too much time off and he hadn't been slacking at all in the first place. But Bucky was damn dedicated to the cause now.

Lately Bucky had so much vigor in every shot he fired, every mountain he climbed...he had to be fighting for something. Hard.

And the team was better than ever, smiles all around and victories lining up flawlessly in the past month they'd been back in the field. Bucky'd been on the up and up too, ever since he got shot. Ever since his talk about Zola, he'd been...lighter, almost.

Like he'd really gotten the torture off his chest. Almost everything was for the better; he was joking again, bringing up memories from the past now and then. He still put on a serious face as they started a mission, but once most the danger was outta the way he was even making dry comments in the field. It was almost like having the Bucky from Brooklyn back - just older, calmer, more wise.

There was only one negative change since the bullet: he didn't let anybody touch him. Hadn't been able to place it at first, fallen back into the habit of not noticing when they touched. Bucky stitched his wounds, bumped shoulders, threw an arm around Steve for decades. It was so normal, and then it was entirely gone.

But it wasn't the don't touch me breakdown in the schoolhouse. Buck wasn't quiet, wasn't avoiding anyone. Never said anything about it. He just didn't run his fingers through Steve's hair to mess it up, didn't gently touch Steve's hand when he spoke. And when Steve clapped a palm on Bucky's neck, placed a hand on his back or shoulder, Bucky edged away. He always made it casual and cool, simple, easy. Simply didn't wanna be touched.

The only exception was the occasional time he'd smack Steve: backhand to his shoulder, kick to his boot, or - like just now - a thump to his head. It was confusing as hell because Steve had no idea what any of it meant. Why were certain types of touching fine and others weren't? It was strange.

"Steve? You on this planet, Rogers?" Morita nudged him, making Steve blink and look up from the map he'd been staring at.

"Oh, uh. Sorry. Exit plan?" Steve looked around at the other soldiers who were all looking back with amused faces.

"We were talking about the exit plan like, twenty minutes ago." Falsworth deadpanned. Steve paled, blue eyes widening - had he zoned out that long? - and everybody cracked up at the look on his face, Dernier pointing at Falsworth as he threw his head back in laughter.
"C’était huit minutes, peut-être." Dernier giggled and Steve furrowed his eyebrows, looking to Jones. Jones threw up his hands like he had no idea what Dernier said, even though Steve knew for a fact he did. {It was like eight minutes, maybe.} Steve just sighed, folding the map back up as his men laughed around him.

"You musta been thinkin' about someone real special, huh Cap?" Dugan clapped him on the shoulder and Steve's eyes cut to Bucky without thinking, because yeah, he was special. An idiot, but still special.

"Yeah," Steve said softly, still looking at Bucky. Who knew him too well to miss the intention behind that word, lips parting in surprise as he realized Steve had been thinking about him. He was frozen for a millisecond before he reached out and snagged the radio from the jeep's hood, quickly spinning away from Steve and headed in the other direction.

"I call back left!" Bucky shouted, pulling open a jeep door to disappear inside. Steve's gaze followed after him, tracking the sudden disappearance. That was the other weird thing about Bucky, lately. Over the past year, they'd practically melted to each other all these confessions, all this comfort and solace in their friendship finally spilled out and spelled out to hold even closer. But ever since the bullet, Steve so much as looked affectionately Bucky's way and Buck was spinning around, changing the topic entirely.

For as many don't leave me's as they'd shared in that first week after the bullet alone, it was weird to suddenly act like they were...normal. Like Steve might as well be Falsworth - a good friend you'd die for but not one you ever told that to. Everybody assumed everybody knew how everybody felt. But it was weird to be like that with Bucky because he'd always had so much to say.

"Je reclame le siège près de Barnes!" Dernier called out, reaching for the other back door of the jeep Bucky was in. Steve didn't need to understand French to get that phrase either, especially since it consisted of Bucky's name.

"No you don't," Steve interjected, sliding past Dernier and the door he'd opened. Dernier made a face and said something in French that made Jones laugh - a lot - but Steve crossed his arms and didn't budge. There were two jeeps, Dernier would find another spot.

So Steve cocked his head and smiled at him, the classic Captain America poster boy smile that always made everyone laugh. Dernier cursed again and stomped off dramatically to the other vehicle, which was literally three feet away.

"Sometimes I forget you're all children," Dugan grumbled as he swung into the driver's seat of Dernier's jeep.

"You're like six years older than us!" Bucky protested.

"Two years older than me," Falsworth pointed out.

"Yeah, and Dernier's a year older than you," Gabe added.

Dugan just shrugged, starting up the engine. "Children, all of you."

~*~

Morita was driving their jeep - just the three of them - but he'd barely started the engine before Steve leaned over into Bucky's space, his voice low as he raised his eyebrows and spoke. "Can we talk?"

"I'm pretty sure my mouth works, yeah," Bucky sassed back dryly, instantly wishing he picked better wording because he should not be talking about mouths, dammit. But Steve didn't notice, rolling his eyes and scooting a little closer. Bucky scooted a little further away.

"You been alright?" Steve asked, voice low enough that only Bucky could hear over the grumble.
Bucky threw his head back against the seat and groaned dramatically, because good god Steve never stopped asking him that.

"Holy shit, Steve. Yes, I'm fine. My leg is fine. My head is fine. Are you okay? Because I think you need your damn hearing checked. I literally answered this question like, last week."

"That was an entire week ago, I have the right to ask again. Things can change," Steve said defensively.

"But they didn't. I'm good. Now, can we talk about something important, like this mission? Or did you have other useless questions for me?" Bucky raised an annoyed eyebrow and pinned unimpressed eyes on that infuriating boy. He'd gotten to the point that he was cornering Bucky in the back of moving vehicles now, apparently.

Steve hesitated, like he actually had another question for Bucky - what the hell could that be - but decided to shut his trap and leave him alone, leaning forward to ask Morita if they were leading the caravan or Dugan was.

Bucky turned back to look out the side of the jeep, wishing there was another foot between his pounding heart and Steve.

~*~

"Hey, tree-boy, how are you enjoying the bird view?" Steve tapped on the mouthpiece of his walkietalkie, a resounding echo in static over the distance. There was nothing stealth about this mission, so they got to talk throughout it, which was always fun.

"Better than your view, punk. There's a guy waiting at your 3 o'clock but your big head is in the way so I can't get him. Frenchie, step to your left!" A shot rang out as Steve ducked - he wasn't particularly keen to catch one of Bucky's bullets in the head (even though he knew Bucky was the best shot in the army and would never hit Steve unintentionally) it was always good to be safe - but the bullet soared in another direction entirely, taking out an enemy soldier that Dernier had been crouched near.

Steve peeked around the side of the building, taking down the soldier at his 3 o'clock with a single bullet to the forehead. "Thanks for the heads up, tree-boy."

Bucky muttered something over the wire that Steve couldn't pick up, then more shots rang out and his attention averted, rolling across the open space behind his shield to help Jones out with the group of soldiers that just ran outta the building. Most of the Nazis went down with a single blast from Jones's gun, although a few dodged the explosion and tackled up close, the glint of knives flashing through the air to replace heavy metal bullets.

A slit to the ankle made Jones shout, then he kicked the Nazi in the face and brought his gun down on the guy's head, knocking him to the ground but not quite unconscious. "You good, Jones?" Steve asked as he ducked under a bladed swing from another soldier. Knife cuts were never fun, but they all got nicked with blades or stray bullets at least three times over the past year, minor injuries were something they were all pretty used to.

"Fine," Jones gritted out, slamming up against the wall again and adjusting the helmet that'd fallen
"Rogers, eight o'clock," crackled over the line, Bucky's voice concerned even through the metallic filter. Steve covered himself with his shield and crouched behind the pile of debris, waiting for a beat before he jumped out to the side and landed another kill shot in the chest of the next Nazi soldier.

The worryvoice piped up over the line again. "You guys gotta get outta that debris mess, I can't cover you from up here."

"It's you who picked the tree," Steve pointed out, rolling back behind the debris cover.

"Before you decided to lure all the bad guys into places they can hide!" Bucky hissed back.

"You...lure bad guys," Steve responded lamely.

"What is that even supposed to mean?" The exasperated voice complained again.

"It means you're alluring, Barnes," Falsworth said snidely, piping up into the middle of Steve and Bucky's conversation over the wire. Muffled laughter rang out from the little speaker as well as more exasperated sounds - probably Bucky - and Steve had to fight the smile on his face when he spun to pull the trigger on the next soldier lowering a gun his way.

"Ask any girl in Brooklyn, they'll tell you all about how alluring Bucky Barnes is," Steve inputed, the words back in his serious mission-voice - he was pretty sure there were five semi-automatics around the next corner - which apparently made them a hell of a lot funnier because the laughter started up again.

"Yeah, alluring Bucky Barnes and his scrawny blonde friend. It's a package deal," Jones joked, wire covered with loud static for a few moments from a bout of gunfire. As soon as it faded back out, Steve piped up again.

"You don't know how true that was, Jones. Scrawny is an understatement." He jumped around the corner, taking out all five Nazi's with perfect shots to their foreheads. He was breathing heavy now as he ducked into the next shadow, turning his head to talk into the wire. "But I could still kick your ass then, too."

Laughter broke out again, crackling through the wire and around the outside of the building, a double echo.

"Correction: he'd try," Bucky amended. "And then you'd probably break his face and I'd have to come break yours."

"Jones versus Barnes; now that's a fight I'd like to see," Dugan finally joined in. And another exasperated sigh came over the wire, surprisingly not Bucky's this time.

"I'm trying to storm an enemy weapons storage facility, would any of you mind helping? Or is killing German bastards not entertaining enough for you?" Morita whispered seriously through the walkie talkie.

Silence crackled over the line for a few moments, static filled with the soft breaths of seven men.

"Nah, Barnes and Rogers arguing is better," Falsworth finally said.

This time even Steve had to stop and lean against a wall to laugh. Looking back, it was probably the most fun and light-hearted mission they ever went on. It was child's play compared to some of the Hydra bases they'd had to take down; an old weapons facility that a fleet of German soldiers had come across and decided to bunk down in. The building itself wasn't even armed or functional anymore; they were here to eliminate as many soldiers as possible, then take any information available. And considering the time of day they weren't running into a lotta resistance.

He almost felt bad for how easy it was, taking out soldiers with their guards down. But it had been the mission orders and these were bad people - they were murdering thousands, throwing people in concentration camps and treating them worse than animals. Steve had to remind himself of that sometimes, and he never hesitated to pull the trigger.

But despite the internal controversy on how fair the odds were, the mission was ridiculously easy and they spent basically the entire time joking and bitching at each other.

That night, they all sang songs around the campfire and toasted each other's health and futures, tipping back tin cans of watery soup like it was the whiskey they hadn't seen in weeks. It was January again and therefore freezing, tents already setup as the sky bled into darkness. If it was warmer, they might lay out on the ground by the fire, stare up at the stars and talk about nothing at all until everyone was asleep.

Unfortunately, it wasn't warm enough to sleep outside. The cold was harsh, the bitter kind'a winter that normally dashed everybody's spirits and made 'em retreat to sleeping bags before the cold could settle in brittle bones. And just as Steve was about to duck into his tent to do just that, Montie caught everyone's attention, accent echoing as he pointed up at the sky.

"Look! Snow!" He blew at a snowflake that drifted down towards his nose, eyes crossing as he failed and the snowflake landed on the the tip of it. Dugan shook his head, rolling affectionate eyes as he snuffed out the fire with a dirty boot.

"You're British, Falsworth. How is snow even remotely exciting to you?" Falsworth shot him a glare, sticking out his tongue to catch the next flake drifting down slowly.

"I've said it before; it's better than rain because at least it's insulating."

Steve looked up at the sky, watching the white flakes drift down from the heavens. The billows of snow clouds only covered part of the sky, leaving a blank blanket to see sharp pinpricks of the stars. Reflecting off the dying light of their hand-lanterns, the snow itself almost looked like hundreds of stars, falling down from above.

A year ago, he and Bucky had laid out on the cold French ground and stared up at those same stars, bodies curled together and warm in the darkness. Steve's hand had been smudged with graphite from drawing and Bucky had smelt like gunpowder and the whole night had been so peaceful...

How could that much change in a year? And so much stay the same?

He turned his head, gaze snapping to Buck's calm, motionless form. He never had to search for him, he could always feel which direction Bucky was in. It had to be some subconscious thing; his head was well aware of Bucky's walking and breathing patterns -signaled softly, constantly, the angle to wherever Bucky was. In fights that gave them such an advantage, moving instinctually to adjust their lines of sight, keep each other outta harm's way.

But they weren't fighting tonight. Tonight it was just soft sweet gravity.

Those silvery blue eyes were looking up at the sky too, maybe at the snow, maybe at the stars. Maybe at both, and maybe he was thinking about last December too. What Steve would give to "C'mon, Buck, gotta get inside before the snow gets that pretty hair all messed up," Steve reached out to ruffle the dark pomade - kinda liked it better disheveled anyways - because if Bucky wasn't gonna mess Steve's hair up anymore then at least Steve would mess up Bucky's. Buck smacked his hand away before he could touch, but there was the faintest of smiles on his pouty pink lips. His heart was only pounding a little as he pulled back the flap of the closest tent, waving Buck inside before he could see the flush high on cheeks. Barnes made another cross face as he ducked, the sweet joking kind, and Steve had to take a deep breath before he followed into the the tiny sanctuary.

They had slept in different tents for a week after Bucky had walked out of the officer's tent with red-rimmed eyes and a haunted look on his face. But eventually Bucky had come back to his tent, rambled something about Falsworth kicking him out 'cause he liked sleeping alone better after all.

They'd gotten bigger tents anyways, so Falsworth shared with Jones and Dernier now and Bucky was back in Steve's. They'd shared rooms - shared beds, actually - for most of their growing up lives, it was so much easier to fall asleep to the sound of Bucky's breathing.

In a war full of foreign countries and high-tech weapons in too-big hands, a body that had finally started to feel like his own and a mind with a hell of a lot of pressure and troubles, having something as simple and familiar as the presence of your best friend by your side was invaluable.

"Hey Bucky," Steve started, rolling out his sleeping bag. Bucky looked up from where he was straightening out his own, eyebrows raised in silent encouragement to continue. "Would you really take on Jones if he fought the old me?"

"You mean the younger you?" Bucky joked, untying his boots. Steve made a face because yes, that's what he'd meant and Bucky knew that. He sighed when Steve didn't laugh at his joke, mumbling something about being underappreciated for his sense of wit. Steve just sat and waited for a real answer. Finally Bucky kicked off his boot, starting on the next one and not looking over at Steve as he spoke.

"Yes, Steve, 'course I would. I'd take on anybody who fights you, idiot. Why do you think I'm out here?" Bucky kicked off the other boot, slipping socked feet into his sleeping bag and shivering at the cold slide of the material.

Steve didn't move, staring at Bucky as he slowly kicked off his own boots. Bucky still didn't look at him, reaching for the lantern between their sleeping bags to blow it out. Steve reached out to stop him, grab the lantern before the room went dark and he wouldn't be able to see Bucky's face anymore. He wanted to see Bucky's face when he asked this.

Because there was no way in the world he'd heard Bucky right.

But his hand grab was too late and the tent flickered out around them, darkness falling into the little space. Steve let out the breath he'd been holding, slowly releasing the oxygen from his lungs in an attempt to calm the race in his chest. Silence settled in with the darkness, the quiet kind loud enough to drown in.

Steve sat muddy boots aside, unwrapping his toolbelt to prop beside them before sliding into his sleeping bag with the tight Captain America uniform still on. It was cold, better to sleep in as many clothes on as possible. And it definitely wasn't the first time he'd slept in uniform.
The puffy material settled around him and he stared up at the seam of the tent where Bucky's half met his until his eyes were as adjusted to the darkness as they were gonna get.

"Buck?" Steve asked again. Bucky sighed, still awake. Good, Steve knew he wouldn't be asleep yet. Deep breath and he rolled over, studying the sloping profile in the darkness of the night. So clear, even in all this dark, so pitch black the world dipped an octave lower, no light to bounce off of as he spoke, quietly. "You're not just out here for me, right?"

There was only silence from the other half of the tent. No response. He stared a little longer before Steve rolled his head to look back up at the canvas ceiling. "As cheesy as it sounds, you're fighting for America, right? For our country?"

"Goodnight, Steve." Bucky rolled over in his sleeping bag, facing the opposite wall and giving Steve the outline of his broad shoulders, curving down to the tapered waist beneath the sleeping bag.

Steve stared at Bucky's back for a minute or two, watching him breathe and debating opening his mouth again. Clearly, Bucky wasn't in the mood to talk. If Bucky didn't want to talk you couldn't yank it outta him with pliers. He was second in stubbornness only to Steve.

It felt like forever before Steve's eyes finally drifted shut, but the question even infiltrated his dreams, playing on echo repeat as his head drilled the idea over and over.

What was Bucky fighting for?

~~~

For as long as he could remember, nothing made Bucky more pleased than seeing Steve happy. But the idea of seeing him happier with somebody else was the furthest thing Bucky had ever felt from pleased. He was trying - so goddamn hard - to ignore everything that he'd been feeling for years, but the torture wasn't leaving him alone. He had promised to give Steve up, he just didn't know how.

If Steve was the stitches holding him together, it was no wonder Bucky was falling to pieces as he tried to cut those stitches free.

He covered it up with sarcasm and snark and honestly, he felt pretty okay most of the time. He started to feel like himself again, if only because he'd spent years in Brooklyn living in the same hardcore denial he was trying to shove himself back into now. Just like the old days: don't stare too long at Steve and set him up with as many dames as possible and shut down every single thought about how you prayed Steve wouldn't find some dame he actually liked.

He was in full blown Brooklyn-level denial and with it came all the features of the kid he used to be, just older. He was surprised to see that he still had it in him: he was that same joking, smiling guy underneath all the mess he was feeling for Steve and the Zola memories tugging at his head. The more comfortable he got with acting like the younger version of himself, the easier it was to picture them as the same person.

The war had changed him, like it had everyone and everything, but he wasn't an entirely lost cause. He didn't live with reckless abandon anymore because he couldn't afford to, although otherwise he almost felt like Bucky again. Just with a lot more issues, a lot bigger problems, a crazier messed up head.

The biggest problem was that he missed Steve all the time. And between missing him like crazy and hating himself for it, Bucky was trying to distance himself without actually distancing himself. He was balancing on a tightrope wire and constantly in risk of falling, arms out to balance and the huge, imminent fall underneath. Just waiting, waiting, for the ground to come rushing up to meet him. It had to, eventually.

"Bonjour, Barnes," Dernier greeted chipperly as Bucky stepped out of his tent and straightened out his uniform, buttoning the last button on his coat as he sat down next to Dernier at the fire.

"Morning. You know the plan for today?" Bucky dug around in an equipment pack for an C-ration and snagged the can of water heating up over the fire. Dernier shrugged, either not knowing or seeing no point in saying when Bucky wouldn't understand him anyways.

Bucky hummed softly as he poured the hot water into the outside pouch of his breakfast, reading the description on the back and making a face. Military food was all the same, not one bit of it as pleasant as the scraps he and Steve had gotten by on in Brooklyn. That's one thing they don't tell you when you join. Or, well, get drafted. Not that anyone exactly knew that about Bucky, though. Especially not Steve.

Steve. Bucky sighed, placing the green package back by the small fire and looking around the camp. The sun was just skirting the horizon, rising over the world and coloring the snowy ground a blinding white. It'd been a week since Falsworth had pointed upwards at the first snow they'd seen yet this year. Now everything as far as the eye could see was covered in white, the ground at least six inches thick.

It still wasn't a lot of snow, which was kind of surprising. This winter had been cold as hell so far, but there had been a major lack of precipitation. Not that Bucky was complaining.

"Morning, Jones! You know the plan for today?" Bucky asked again as Gabe ducked out of his tent and shivered a bit, pulling a ratty jacket further around his shoulders.

"C'est févier déjà?" Jones asked Dernier, sitting down between Bucky and the frenchman. Bucky sighed. He really shouldda taken French back in school. If he'd known he'd be missing this much conversation, he'd've picked it up before he came to Europe. Not like he'd been planning spending who-knows-how-many years in cold, foreign places where he'd need to know French, but whatever.

"You don't even bother translating anymore, Jones," Bucky complained, rubbing his hands together for warmth. Jones just shrugged.

"I'll translate the next one for you, Sarge," he said distractedly, taking apart the barrel of his gun. Yeah, like he would actually keep up that promise. Bucky checked again - still not done. Damn C-rations's.

A breaking stick made all three of their heads pop up, looking across the fire to see Steve coming out of their tent. He'd tried not sharing and as much as he wanted to stay away, he couldn't do it. He'd crawled back barely a week after leaving.

"Oi, regarde qui c'est, le petit ami de sergent," Dernier piped with a grin. Jones lost it, slapping his knee and bending in half with laughter, eyes almost watering as his laugh echoed around the clearing. Bucky looked between Jones and Dernier and Steve - at least Steve looked as confused as Bucky did - but Dernier was laughing now too, and it just wasn't fair.

"Jones! What the hell did he say?" Bucky demanded, poking Gabe in the side. Gabe skirted further away, still laughing as he dodged Bucky's demand. "Hey! You told me you'd translate the next one!"
"I'm not ever translating that," Jones finally managed between sucking breaths and remaining giggles. Bucky made a face - figured, he'd totally called it - but let it go. It wasn't the first time Dernier said something that sounded like that and Bucky was done trying to figure out what it meant. It wasn't helpful that he could pull the word "Sergeant" out of there, even though that one took him forever too because it sounded more like "sar-john" without the "n" on john.

His attention was suddenly diverted as something warm and heavy pressed up against the side of his calf, making Bucky startle and look down. Steve didn't budge an inch when Bucky jumped, propping an elbow on top of his knee and leaning the length of that heavy body harder against his leg.

There was a plethora of perfectly reasonable places to sit and Steve choose the ground, leaning on Bucky. It wasn't fair. Bucky had half the mind to just offer Steve the stump he was sitting on and go find another one, except that Steve would be super offended. And suspicious. And as much as he'd love to avoid this situation, making Steve ask questions would be a hell of a lot worse situation.

He sucked in a breath and cursed the skies for giving him this life and his stupid heart and head and a best friend that simply would not leave him alone.

"Are you really so cold that you can't find your own space to sit and have to take half of mine?" Bucky finally ventured, because it was sarcastic enough that Steve wouldn't be offended, but would hopefully take the hint.

Then again, this was Steve and he understood subtly even less than he understood women. Although he had certainly lucked out lately in that department, Bucky thought sourly.

"I always have half of your stuff," Steve said, like the whole thing was axiomatic and Bucky was somewhere on planet crazy for even mentioning it. Bucky groaned, but Steve just reached out for Bucky's breakfast and settled back against his leg, tearing open the package.

"How do you know that wasn't Dernier's?" He said, crossing his arms and fighting the urge to kick Steve off of his leg. Steve propped his elbow back up on Bucky's knee, placing the hot plastic on the ground in front of him.

"Because you're the only one who eats this kind." Steve answered, not looking up as he started in on Bucky's breakfast.

"Am not," Bucky said, even though it was likely Steve was right, as always.

"Yeah, you are, because it's disgusting. And no one else would ever eat it but you've got a heart of gold and you always chose it so no one else has to," Steve said, putting another spoonful in his mouth. If it was so disgusting, then why'd Steve taken it? He'd save Bucky half, he always did, but it was still infuriating.

"I don't have a heart of gold. I just hang out with you too much," Bucky grumbled, thumping Steve lightly over the head. Steve made a face but kept on eating Bucky's breakfast.

They couldn't be this close when Steve asked Peggy to marry him. Bucky was already buying time and space with the deal they had set up now. Peggy knew how Bucky felt and she was letting him stay in Steve's life. He wasn't going to push his luck and be all close and physical and comfortable with Steve. He'd asked for more than his share already, he couldn't take this too.

But Steve wasn't taking no as an answer. And it was getting harder and harder to shove space between them. He was giving up faster and faster each time it happened and soon he was gonna snap.

The tightwire rope beneath his feet would just pop and Bucky would go tumbling, tumbling, falling. He could feel it. He just had no idea how to stop it.

~*~

"Hey Steve, you know that summer we got so sunburnt we couldn't sleep for three days?" Bucky asked, checking the rifle strapped to his back before picking up the semi-automatic from Jones's bag and loading a magazine into the chamber.

"You mean the summer you insisted we go down to the beach almost every day so you could meet up with Mary-Lou?" Steve shot him an amused look and picked his shield up out of the snow. Bucky pondered a moment, pulling on the strap for the machine gun.

"Was that her name? But yeah, I'd give just about anything to be that warm right now. I'd take that sunburn over this stupid snow any day." He kicked at the ground to prove his point, snow shooting up and drifting around, fancy white swirls in the wind.

"I dunno, your nose didn't peel off your face." Steve made a disgusted pouty face and Bucky laughed, because yeah, he remembered that. Steve never could take much sun when he was smaller, all pale and thin-skinned. After their fourth day on the beach, his nose had gone from pink to red to that thin skin peeling off. Bucky had laughed a lot and called him Pinocchio for at least a month.

"My shoulders peeled, though," Bucky pointed out, falling into step next to Dugan and behind Steve, everyone falling into triangle formation automatically, even though they had half a mile before they reached the tanks. Soldiers were never off the battlefield.

"Yeah, but they peeled in the shape of angel wings, so it didn't count because it looked cool," Steve argued back, holding up a hand for them to halt. Everybody stopped, falling quiet as they looked around. Steve stayed perfectly still for a moment, listening into the wind. After a few seconds he gave the all clear and they started forward again.

"Still burned, though. And they didn't look that cool." Bucky glanced behind them, a clear track in the snow of their footprints. That was the other sucky thing about snow, besides the terrible cold.

"Cool enough to draw," Steve commented, crouching behind a mound of snow at the edge of an outcropping. The rest of them crouched down next to him and Bucky fell quiet, deciding to use the mission as an excuse not to respond to that one.

He remembered that part of that summer too, maybe even with a fonder smile than Steve's sunburnt nose. He'd come moodily shuffling into the kitchen of their shared apartment, complaining that his shoulders were peeling and he was going through terrible hell in general. Steve had laughed and said he was pretty sure Bucky was making it up for sympathy.

So he'd whipped his shirt off over his head, turning around to show Steve and demand an apology to his honor as a non-liar. Steve had apologized sincerely (even though Bucky had been kidding of course) and stepped forward to trace the angry red skin with careful, gentle fingers. His fingers had been freezing (as always) and it felt kind of amazing so Bucky had just hummed and not bothered to stop him.
They look like angel wings, Steve had commented, showing him by tracing the outline with an obvious finger. Bucky pondered a moment - Steve was exaggerating, as always, it was more like two blobby triangles arching his shoulder blades, but Steve had always been more creative than he was - and shrugged in semi agreement. Can I draw it? the little blond had asked. Bucky had smiled and affectionately rolled his eyes. But of course he'd agreed, under the condition that he didn't have to sit or stand still for too long.

He'd ended up laying shirtless on his stomach, that way Steve could sit on the couch to draw and didn't have to worry about Bucky's fidgeting. So he'd laid there for hours, talking about everything and nothing at all, rambling a million different things in an attempt to get Steve to laugh. Even back then, Bucky's favorite thing in the world was Steve's laugh. Besides, it was nice to lay there with the cold floor on his bare stomach while Steve created whole worlds from simple gray lines in the sketchbook Bucky had bought him.

It was a really good memory - they'd both been happy, and healthy other than the sunburns - and he'd entirely forgotten it until right now. And they were currently on another mission, not exactly the best time to be reminiscing on the past, full of warm smiles and carefree summers. Especially all of his memories about Steve. Who he was trying to stop thinking about 24/7.

Bucky puffed out a breath, watching the air turn to fog in front of his mouth and wondering distantly if his whole body could dissipate into fog and fade away, slip from the pain of sitting right up against Steve's side and knowing he shouldn't be, knowing it was so wrong and he already had so much, how could he possibly be wishing for more?

"Coast is clear," Steve whispered, the words barely out of his mouth before he was vaulting over the snow pile and skidding down the side of the slope. The rest of them were a tad slower getting to their feet, but one by one they all slid down to the road in the deep tracks of the snow.

The ground was frozen underfoot, a thick sheet of ice underneath the inches of snow. Falsworth slipped, reaching out a hand for Dernier but only succeeding in making him skid too. Jones grabbed them both and they all straightened out, inching forward more carefully along the road. Bucky gestured everybody to the side of the road where the snow was deeper; at least it would be less likely to slip on ice over there.

"Are we stealing the tanks or just blowing them up? I'd like a tank of my own right now," Dugan whispered, stepping gingerly over a blank patch of ice. Steve signaled them to be quiet again and they all silenced and inched forward, resisting the urge to peer around Steve's shoulder to see what was going on.

"Four guards, gated entrance. Attack dogs on the left and a ten foot fence with electrical wire across the top." Steve relayed back to them before turning around, giving everyone his encouraging battle face. "Everyone ready?"

"You make it sound so easy, Rogers," Morita sighed, but he hoisted his gun a little higher and nodded. They all looked back to Steve and he nodded at them each in turn, meeting everyone's eyes and making sure they really were all ready. It was such a signature caring Steve move that it almost always made Bucky smile - not today, though. He could smile after this mission was over.

"Keep an eye on each other. On my mark...go!" The seven of them rounded the corner, a perfect triangle with Bucky on Steve's right - right hand man for a reason - and the shield as the emblem out in front of all of them.

It scared Bucky sometimes how easy carrying a machine gun felt. There was something about the instantaneous, nearly guaranteed death that the weapon haphazardly delivered that just made it feel too powerful for any one man. With a sniper rifle, at least it depended on skill and accuracy and patience. You had to work for the kill. But you could give a monkey a machine gun and watch it slaughter thousands. Not exactly Bucky's favorite weapon.

But Nazis were Nazis and Bucky was always going to fight alongside Steve. He'd always be fighting for Steve. That's why he was out here and Steve never needed to know that. It was honorable to fight for your country, but what kind of man fought for his best friend instead? War was hell and war messed you up and this was just the best way he could weather it, justify the lives he'd taken.

The machine gun rattled and jumped in his hands, smoking and absolutely deafening even outside like this. Every human he killed was one less person trying to kill Steve, right? He could tell himself that and maybe he'd sleep fine tonight.

The moment the smoke cleared from their guns, Steve was running forward again and the rest of them hurried to keep up, weapons at the ready as Steve busted the lock on the gate with his shield, kicking open the tall metal fence and waving them all through. The guards, German Shepard attack dogs, and a few stray soldiers were all dead: littering the ground, bleeding out ugly red onto the snowy ground, polluting the white with the screaming sins of the lives they'd taken. Bucky looked away.

Snow made it worse, somehow. It was a winter's war and Bucky was entirely sure that hell made of ice, not fire.

Steve stopped them again, turning amidst the carnage and pointing off orders from beneath his blue emblazoned helmet. Bucky looked at the too-blue eyes instead of the bloody ground because if he was going to hell for something today, he'd rather it be for staring too affectionately at Steve than the sleek, dead dog about a foot and a half from Steve's feet.

"There should be three tanks on the right side of that building - Dugan, Jones, see if you can snag one for our side. If it gets messy, blow 'em all up. Dernier and Falsworth, cover the entrance and make sure we don't have any unwelcome visitors or runners. You last two are with me - we've got the fleet out back to deal with. Rendez-vous in the woods, three miles to the west."

Another hand motion and they were all off, each on missions that should require ten men, at least. They made due with two. It wasn't often Steve and Bucky were in the same group though. Bucky was sniping more often than not, and if they were on the ground, he usually lead the other half of the team.

If they were both needed in the same spot, with the addition of Morita and his havoc-reeking gun, the fleet in the back must be pretty intense.

Peeking around the corner of the last building, Bucky paled and decided to change the word from intense to impossible. He spun back to Steve, hissing in his ear just because they couldn't afford a noise any louder.

"There's like 9 tanks out there! How the hell are we supposed to survive this? We used to have an entire team to take down one, remember?" Bucky wasn't doubting Steve as much as deciding he was nuts and about eight times too dangerously optimistic.

Steve just handed Bucky a grenade. "Do your best, soldier."

He didn't even have time to suck in a calming breath before Steve was charging around the corner, shield in front and pistol firing left and right.
They'd come at the perfect time, the tanks getting ready to deploy and roll out. That meant they were crawling with activity and enemy soldiers - at least five for every one of the machines. There was no way to tell if the tanks had been Hydra weaponized or were simply military grade cannon shooters, but either way they could do a hell of a lot of damage.

That's without counting the two soldiers perched on top of each, ugly machine guns in their filthy hands. By the time Bucky started firing off rounds too, most of the soldiers on top of the tanks were already dead or had jumped to the ground, weaving closer between the huge metal beasts.

Bucky cut off to the left, hand curled around Steve's grenade as he kept his head down and sprinted across the snow, sliding up against the nearest tank, flattening his back to it to use for cover. This mission was fucking nuts.

He held his breath, counted to three, then turned and mounted the side of the tank. He barely made it past the chain wheel system before someone from inside the tank popped out and shouted and Bucky's pistol had to buy the silence back. Of course, a dead soldier falling back through the top of a tank was enough to alert the others because there was more shouting and Bucky had almost reached the top...

Another helmet appeared from the entry hatch and Bucky was close enough to use his fist this time, reeling back to land his fist hard - really hard - on the guy's face, shattering his cheekbone into splinters.

None of the Commandos were paying attention, so Bucky could use all the strength or agility he wanted - although with their odds, he'd probably use them anyways and risk getting caught because better poked and prodded and questioned by his friends regarding why he could shatter cheekbones with a punch than have everybody dead.

The guy screamed in agony and Bucky shoved him back down into the tank, tossing the grenade in after him and slamming the hatch shut. He could still hear a muffled version of the scream as he jumped off the tank, hitting the ground and rolling to absorb some of the shock. His ankles still stung and his calves were screaming at him but Bucky took off in a run anyways, whistling as high pitched as he could to alert Jim and Steve to the grenade warning.

The explosion came only seconds after, lighting up the place with fire and smoke and a lot of shouting. Two sharp, fast, and distinctly different whistles pierced the noise and answered back to him, just a confirmation that both Jim and Steve were still okay. Bucky breathed out a sigh of relief and loaded another magazine in his pistol.

The machine gun had too many stray bullets, which meant a risk of hitting his teammates. So Bucky switched to the familiar handgun, lining up his sights on the figures in hats that he could see moving through the smoke. The soldiers had all piled out of tank number two and that meant Bucky could take them out with just a gun, no explosions required.

The fire of the first tank filled the air with smoke, gray powder covering the air to contrast the white powder covering the ground. All mixed in with leaking red blood and orange, dancing flames. Bucky gave the fire the smallest berth he could stand (it wasn't the warm kind of fire, just the burning bodies kind) and rounded the melting metal to come up behind the next set of soldiers.

His instincts screamed at him but Bucky pulled the trigger until his magazine was empty - ten shots into five soldier's backs, two a piece and probably all lethal on the first one anyways. In their backs.

Sometimes he wished he'd been stuck in the American Revolution instead. At least then there was a code of honor in war, a simplicity that made the whole thing way less nasty. Two perfect lines marching towards each other, waiting and patient and don't shoot until you see the whites of their eyes and that damn strict honor code and following all the rules until they fired upon each other in tandem.

None of this shooting men between their shoulderblades shit. None of this packing thousands away in concentration camps shit. Just honest fighting, was that too much to ask for?

Apparently so, because suddenly the metallic sound of bullets started to bounce off of the twisted burning tank next to Bucky, gunshots aimed for his spine. Karma's a bitch. He spun around and fired - the gun clicked, out of ammo. He cursed, ducked, and spun to the side, narrowly avoiding the next round of offending bullets. It took him less than seven seconds before he had a new mag in, stepping back out into the open to fire off the new rounds at the armed soldiers.

The speed of his gun recovery must have surprised them, neither soldier had the chance to shout before there was a smattering of bullets destroying their shocked faces. An eye split in one, nose completely burned through in another. Faces that stared at him for one more moment, mangled with bullets, before the bodies dropped.

Maybe Bucky liked shooting people in their backs better after all.

Another explosion went off further down the line of tanks and Bucky whistled his pitch in response, alerting his still-alive-ness to everyone, including the residents of the next tank over.

"This never stops, does it?" Bucky asked his pistol with a sigh as he lifted it back up to shooting height, taking out what soldiers he could from this distance. Okay, that was more than just the five from the next tank. It was hard to count with the smoke in the air and the zigzag conglomerate they had goin' on, but the best guess was maybe twelve Nazi soldiers? This wasn't even fair.

Dead bodies were disgusting, but he didn't exactly have an impenetrable shield like his best friend over there with the tights, so everybody else had to make due. Bucky grabbed the nearest slumped body, hoisting it up in front of him to at least block some of the bullets as he inched his way towards the cover of the next tank and some sort of advantage. Or help from that best friend with the shield, if possible.

He backed towards the machine, groaning from the weight of the dead guy in front of his chest. He only had eight bullets left in this mag so it'd be a risky move, but...it might save his life. Bucky kept backing away, lifting his pistol and aiming. Eight shots left - eight out of twelve was a hell of a lot better odds. He couldn't risk killing a soldier only to have the guy next to him grab his gun, double the ammo...he couldn't risk any kill shots at all right now.

He aimed and pulled the trigger, blocking out the screams and trying not to stare at the spraying red onto the snow as he fired off eight shots, each into the trigger hands of the approaching enemies. Guns dropped like hot potatoes as screams commenced - if getting your hand cut hurt, Bucky couldn't imagine getting shot through the thin flesh.

But it meant eight less people who could shoot him and four others who were very rattled. He could kill them all in a moment, once he had the time to stop and reload.

In the mayhem caused by bleeding hands and dropping guns (bonus to that whole dropping guns thing was that if they were loaded, odds are they probably went off and unloaded bullets everywhere, which means soldiers with no workable hands or feet; didn't get much easier to kill than that), he managed to ditch the dead guy shield and finally duck behind another tank to reload.

The good thing about how tall tanks were was that no one really saw you when you were standing next to one. So in the too early relapse of safety, he loaded up both his pistol and the machine gun, glancing back around the edge of the tank as he tucked his pistol back into its holster, checking to see how much damage he'd caused by the hand wounds and incidental gunshots to the ankles.

Only three Nazis were unscathed and heading his way. Perfect.

He angled away from the safety on the side of the tank, plifferating the approaching Nazis with machine gun holes. They dropped like flies and Bucky didn't think a damn thing as he stepped over their bodies to finish off the handless eight he'd snagged earlier. The machine gun bit into them too, destroying what was left at the attempted grasp on life.

A third explosion went off and Bucky barely registered it, whistling the safe-signal without thinking as he counted the number he'd just taken down. Something was off, he was missing one--

There was only that brief moment to think before Bucky was tackled from behind, blade slashing for his throat as a heavy weight landed on his back. Bucky grabbed the wrist holding the knife, snapping it clean in two with a squeeze. A high pitched scream pierced his earlobe and Bucky cringed but followed through with the movement, yanking the wrist down in front of him and flipping the soldier over his shoulder to land hard on the frozen solid ground.

The screaming man hit with a painful-sounding thud, hand shaking and held up in agony. It was too close range to use the machine gun so Bucky reached for his pistol again, cocking it and leveling it on the man's head.

In another scream, that head tipped backwards, the Nazi hat falling off of tight blonde curls. The man rolled onto his back, clutching his wrist still, and Bucky saw it wasn't a man at all. It was a kid, couldn't be older than seventeen. Good-lookin', with those blonde curls and dark blue eyes and a strong jawline, now clenched in pain.

Fuck, it was just a kid. Just a kid stuck in a fight that wasn't his. Stuck on the side that was dying today.

Bucky's hand wavered, thinking back to what Dugan'd said a little while back, another teasing jest they'd all laughed at at the time and didn't stop to think about. Children, all of you.

Children. God, Steve was so young. They put a shiny suit on him and the world of responsibilities on his shoulders, taught him to murder and to lie. He was just a kid, only 25, the biggest care he should have was findin' some dame he could stick with for life. Not saving the goddamned world.

Just two years ago, the two of them were still meetin' up at the movies, for godssakes. The night before Bucky shipped out, they were supposed to go see some film together. Of course by the time Bucky got there Steve was already getting smacked around in the alley out back. He'd actually started to check there first. But seriously, the goddamned movies. They weren't adults. They weren't fucking grown up yet. Children. Just children.

God, they all were, weren't they? Just kids, fresh out of school, home, college. Not even married yet, not even old enough to want kids, let alone have 'em.

How many people had Bucky killed - today alone - that now would never get the chance to even try having kids? They were all dying so young. How could they all be dying so young?

What the fuck was this war for anyways?

Bucky pulled the trigger. Blond curls soaked bloody and he stepped over the body; he'd wasted enough time already. He didn't have the luxury to fret over a 17 year old when there was a 25 year old on this battlefield he had to get to. There was somebody who had to survive this because he'd be the best goddamned Dad on the planet and Bucky had taken so much from the world's future today, the least he could do was pay the world back with another day of living, breathing Steve Rogers.

He would be drowning in debt from all the lives he'd killed if he didn't have the chance to give back the one that mattered the most. Steve was his way out, Steve was Bucky's only chance at salvation.

So long as Bucky kept saving Steve, maybe Bucky could be saved one day.

Too bad he's not yours to save anymore. Too bad he's not yours at all. He never could have been.
What would I be without him. Let him go let him go let him go.

~~~

Snow, covered in red. A trail of blood, following him, winding around his legs, dragging him under, into the dark red inky wet frozen cold snow. Blonde curls, matted and soaked in blood, a grabbing hand and the flickering light of children that would never be. So much red in the snow, so much pain all around him, just red creeping up his legs and torso and neck; trying to slip into his throat, break him, drown him--

Bucky woke up shouting. Gentle hands coaxed him back to lying down, already warm against his skin like they'd been there for a lifetime.

He blinked against the darkness, trying to make out anything about where the hell he was. Freezing cold, dark. Familiar enough to set a warning edge in his bones. Something was bounding his arms...

"C'mon Bucky, don't leave me now. It was just a nightmare, alright? Your awesome best friend pulled you out of it and I'm here now, okay?"

Everything was swimming and kind of strange, but at least Steve's solid, warm hands were on him.
Wait. Steve's hands were on him--

Bucky shoved Steve's arm, rolling out of his grip and nearly knocking over the lantern. Steve made a distressed noise and reached out for Bucky again. Oh, he thought--

"No, Steve, M'fine. I'm good...it's fucking freezing, but I'm good." Bucky sat up and Steve let out a breath of relief, falling back to sit down beside Bucky's sleeping bag again.

"How uh, long was I...?" He asked, a little hesitant 'cause he still had no idea what was going on or what that whole thing had been about...

Had he just freaked out about three different things in a row? He was pretty sure he just freaked out about three different things in a row.

Steve ran a hand through ruffled blonde hair, smoothing it back down into the signature wave. "Not long. You were having a nightmare, so I woke up and tried snappin' you out of it. It took a couple minutes I guess, then you finally started to come back to me. Which I think confused you even more, then you freaked out and jumped away."

So it had been three things in a row then. Nightmare about bloody snow, waking up thinking he was back in Zola's lab again, and then freaking out because Steve was touching him. Great. He was just a poster child for functional and balanced nowadays, wasn't he?

Bucky fought the urge to bury his face in his hands. Steve would just think more was wrong with him, try to help more, but that was the whole point. He couldn't be depending on Steve for stuff like nightmares anymore.

And his stupid body had to stop betraying him. He responded more to Steve's touch than he did his own brain and it wasn't fucking fair. He just really really wished he'd never told Steve that the whole Steve-touching-him thing worked because now Bucky was stuck wishing that truth had been a lie so Steve would let it go and never touch Bucky again.

Well, not never, that was a scary thought...but it was supposed to be never. Bucky had to be okay with it being never. Steve didn't belong to him anymore. Now that was something worthy to have nightmares over.

They sat in silence for a bit longer, Bucky's legs still warm tucked all secure and useless in his sleeping bag. Steve must be freezing. But he didn't move, just looking Bucky over worried until he eventually spoke.

"So, nightmares...I thought those were over when you had that catharsis about Zola." Steve looked at him expectantly and Bucky furrowed his eyebrows. Zola?

"My what?" he asked, running a hand through his hair. Steve raised an eyebrows like Bucky was the crazy one now or something.

"You know...about a week after you got shot, when you had that talk about Azzano?" Steve prompted, head tilting in that uh, hello expression. Which made no sense. He hadn't talked to anybody about Zola...wasn't ever gonna, either. So what in the world was Steve talking about?

Bucky just stared blankly at Steve. Those pretty blue eyes, trying not to think about how pretty they were while simultaneously wracking his brain for whatever the hell was going on about. About a week after he got shot...

Oh! Oh - oh. Yeah, that. That'd been the cover up for his talk with Peggy. Obviously, didn't do a damn thing to catharsize him from fucked up torture memories. Unless you counted a hyperactive attempt not to lose his mind, cause now Steve couldn't be the one there holding him when he got his head back.

"Uh, yeah. Well, apparently that talk didn't stop as much as I'd hoped if you're still here dragging me face first outta nightmares." Key words you're still here, because Steve wasn't supposed to be, that was the entire point of that whole talk, wasn't it?

"I'm always gonna be here to save you from that, no matter how bad it gets." Steve promised, big hand darting out to take Bucky's before he could protest and flinch away. Ugh, why was Steve so stubborn?

"That's the problem," Bucky huffed under his breath, wiggling his hand a little to try'n free it subtly from the warmth of Steve's addictive touch. He wasn't allowed to touch anymore, why wouldn't Steve just get that?

"What?" The fingers clamped down tighter, making a point and forcing Bucky to lift his gaze, look guiltily at Steve's even-more-concerned face. Shit, course he heard that. It wasn't fair, none of this was fair, he wasn't even really all the way awake and Steve totally had the upper hand and--

"What?" Bucky responded in a bout of beautifully smooth eloquence. Steve just raised his eyebrows, hand an unbreakable clasp on Bucky's now. He sighed and gave up fighting it because physically, Steve would always win. Especially since Bucky couldn't use full strength without raising questions.

He threw up his free hand, trying to portray his confusion and tiredness and annoyance all in one motion. "I don't know. I just...I wanna go back to sleep now, if you don't mind letting go of my hand."

Blue eyes searched his in the darkness, looking for whatever it was Bucky wasn't saying. Steve wasn't going to find it. Ever.

With an annoyed huff of his own, Steve practically threw Bucky's hand back to him. Once he was back in his own sleeping bag, the tight air around them softened a little and Bucky could physically feel Steve thaw from over here, sinking back into his soppy, soft self that couldn't stay annoyed with Bucky long enough for Bucky to get away. "I'll be here if you need me, okay?"

Bucky just closed his eyes and tried to breathe. It was only early February but it felt like years since that conversation with Peggy. He was hurting, so much. It wasn't often that Bucky felt he couldn't take it anymore, but...

How could he do this for the rest of his life? How could he spend whoever knows how many years with Steve, watching him happy with someone else? Knowing Steve was so close and not Bucky's anymore.

What happened when Bucky had these same nightmares three years down the road? Steve would still be there. Steve had promised he would save Bucky from Zola's table as long as he was alive and Steve had never broken a promise to Bucky.

Steve would spend the rest of his life saving Bucky and Bucky would spend the rest of his life wishing he could stop needing the only thing he could never call his own.

There wasn't anything Bucky could do but keep fighting; he had to push harder, fight smarter. They had to be as normal as possible. Best friends, just best friends, never an inch more. Bucky had to learn, had to fight for this. Keep Steve at his side without giving him his heart.

But Bucky had no idea how to do that. Steve had always had his heart. It was too late to take it back.

~~~*~

It was February again and Steve didn't like this one any better than last year's.

"Didn't we go out drinking last February too?" He complained, trudging along behind Dugan as the pub's door swung open to the loud, excited group of Howling Commandos.

"We actually go drinking all the time, you just never come with us," Falsworth pointed out. "And February is cold, whiskey helps out with that. How often are we in a town with a functioning pub?"

"Besides, we don't have a mission to prep for this time, Cap. Which means you can kick back and drink with us." Jones nudged him and plopped down in the corner booth, sliding around the wide U to sit in the middle.

"I'm fine, thanks," Steve said dryly because they were always getting after him to get drunk and Steve knew, from experience on his twenty-first birthday, that getting drunk never ever ended well. He'd been a hell of a lot smaller then, but he had a feeling his drunken attitude wasn't going to change any from the last time he'd gotten drunk and sworn to never again.

The only person who never pressured Steve to get drunk was Bucky, who'd been there to witness the fabulous spectacle last time and was probably not too keen to relive the night of Steve curling up in his lap and clinging to his shoulders like a koala bear. Except now if he tried to climb into Bucky's lap, it would be a lot less of the tiny-adorable-best-friend kind of embarrassing and lot more like what-the-hell-is-Steve doing kind of embarrassing. Not exactly Steve's shining moment, or really Bucky's either.

Bucky was in high spirits tonight though, sliding into the extended booth across from Steve with a genuine smile on his face. He rubbed his hands together in excitement, leaning over Morita to ask Falsworth something as Steve tried not to stare. Everything had just gotten progressively more confusing and it was tearing up his insides in this conflicted battle of wanting to be elated and wanting to just be really cautious and afraid all the time.

Not counting the nightmare a few weeks ago, Bucky had been in great shape since they all got back out on the field. The nightmare hadn't even messed him up that much. He'd been fine in the morning, right back to the joking, smiling Bucky that they'd all gotten used to over the past two months. The rest of the Commandos just rolled with every one of Bucky's mood shifts, joking with him or being careful around him back in the days that he freaked out at everything.

Those days of freaking out would be entirely of the past if it weren't for the damn touching thing Bucky still hadn't gotten over. The rest of them were pressed shoulder to shoulder in the curving booth in the corner, but Bucky had an inch between his shoulder and Morita's and Dugan's. It was of his own doing and nobody questioned it, except for Steve.

He just wanted Bucky to be 100% okay, as perfect and okay inside as he deserved to be. So he'd kind of been pestering Bucky - just a little - over the past couple of months, trying to edge his way into Bucky's trust and space so that he'd eventually either get pissed and shout at Steve the reason why he was physically distant or cave and let Steve clap him on the shoulder again.

So far, neither had occurred, but Steve was patient. Their friendship was almost back to normal, just that final little bubble of space around Bucky that needed to be popped. He'd figure out how to pop it eventually.

"Aight, sober-boy, since you ain't drinkin' you can go and get the next round," Dugan tipped his head towards the counter, grinning wide at Steve. Steve sighed dramatically, but rounded up the empty glasses from the table.

"Tree-boy and sober-boy, I like it," Jones pushed his glass closer to Steve with a devious smile. "It's cute."

Steve snorted and looked over to Bucky, who went bright red. "That was forever ago!" Bucky complained, looking down at the table and making a pouty face. It was cute.

He snagged the last empty glass from the table, heading over to the counter and whistling softly to the jazz over the jukebox. He hadn't heard live music in such a long time. That's something else they should all do, once the war was over. Go out and hear some real jazz. Maybe, just maybe, Steve would get drunk then.

"Here we go ladies, next round's on me," Steve passed the new drinks back out to everyone, earning a few thank you's and a few laughs.

"They're all on you, you're the only one with an ounce of money," Morita tipped his head in appreciation and brought the glass back to his lips. Steve threw up his hands with a you got me expression and more laughter echoed out around the table, even joined by a bright, content smile from Bucky.

Dernier scooted out of the booth so Steve could slide back in behind him, his ankle brushing against Bucky's boot as Steve settled into place across from him. The boot moved away, but Bucky shot him a one-sided smile before turning his attention back to his glass.

"You know, I was thinking," Steve leaned forward, elbows resting on the table as six pairs of bright eyes turned on him. "After we win this thing, we should go out and see a really good band live. It's been a long year of jukeboxes and harmonicas."

"J'aime mon harmonica!" Dernier protested, a hand over his heart in faked heartbreak. Steve clapped his shoulder and smiled, lifting his own glass of water in a toast to Dernier's wonderful harmonica playing. The others joined with their lifted glasses, all pitching in with a few words of agreement to go see some real jazz after the war.

With the signature dim lights setting that familiar golden atmosphere, Steve settled back into the seat as more conversation started up from different places of the table. Most of their drinking conversations included stories of other times people had gotten drunk and it was just pure luck that no one had thought yet to ask whether or not Steve had ever been drunk before.

"You still good with your kiddie juice, Cap'n?" Dugan leaned across the table, poking Steve's glass to get his attention. Steve rolled his eyes at the goodnatured teasing, still half listening to Morita's and Bucky's conversation about Stark's engineering ideas.

"He's actually a really cool guy," Bucky was saying, sliding his finger around the rim of his glass. "Underneath the rich pompous asshole thing everybody's got him pegged as. After the war we'll see if I can't convince him to come drinkin' with us."

"Speakin' of pegged," Dugan interrupted, his attention on Steve again. "How's Agent Carter doin', Rogers?"

"Oh, you think you're so clever with that name pun, huh Dum Dum?" A side of Steve's mouth quirked up as Dugan laughed, slapping a hand on Jones's shoulder and spreading the laughter further.

"Actually, I was referin' to how you're whipped," Dugan replied in that same laughing tone. Steve opened his mouth in mock offense, playing along with the game.

"I am not whipped!"

"Oh you so are," Falsworth agreed. Steve made a more exaggerated expression of offense, turning to Bucky.

"I am not! Back me up, Sarge," his mouth broke out in a smile as his eyes met Bucky's, then quickly wilted at the look on Bucky's face. His icy blue eyes were frozen, staring ahead with a blank look tinged with misery. Steve reached across the table, carefully taking Bucky's wrist into his hand.

"Buck?"

Bucky snapped out of it, blinking at Steve once before coming to reality and snatching his hand back, stuffing it in the pocket of his blue peacoat.

"Sorry, spaced out. What were we talking about?" Bucky looked around the group, cheeks faintly tinged with a pink blush. Jones leaned over Dugan to answer.

"Captain and his lovely lady Agen--"

"I love this song!" Steve interrupted, smacking a hand down on the table. Everybody paused, straightening up a little to listen to the trumpets of the intro and forgetting their torment of Steve about Peggy. Somebody commented something about the singer but Steve wasn't paying attention, just looking back at Bucky. "Sergeant Barnes, come dance with me?"

Bucky snorted and looked away, swirling around his drink before tipping it back. When he sat the glass back down, and glanced over at Steve again, Steve was still looking at him, eyebrows raised. Bucky's eyes went huge and he nearly dropped his glass as he realized Steve was still waiting for an answer. "You actually...yeah, no. No way. Nice try."

"C'mon, you love to dance," Steve teased, smiling brightly as Bucky's eyes managed to go even wider.

"No," he said again, shaking his head in disbelief and leaning back against the cushion of the booth. Bucky looked pretty adamant against it, but the more Steve thought about it the more he decided it was a really good idea. If he could get Bucky to dance with him, he'd catch Bucky in a happy environment so they could talk. That, and it would mean that Bucky couldn't keep flinching away every time Steve so much as brushed him. Dancing was physical, and the two of them hadn't been dancing in forever.

Well, they'd never actually danced in public, but a couple of army guys and tired locals wasn't exactly the public. It didn't even count, really. They were in the middle of war and there wasn't a dame in sight. Besides, Bucky had taught Steve plenty about how to dance back in their apartment in Brooklyn. It'd be just like old times.

"In the name of waltzes in the Brooklyn apartment?" Steve pulled out the puppy eyes, nudging Bucky's empty glass with his finger just because he couldn't actually reach Bucky himself.

"So you can dance, Rogers!" Falsworth nudged him with an excited look and Steve shook his head no, eyes never leaving Bucky's.

"Not really, but Bucky can and he used to try to teach me." With impatient hands Steve shooed Dernier out of the end seat so he could slide out and stand up. Dernier obliged, everyone looking up at Steve as he stood up next to the table and tilted his head towards the empty dance floor with a dare in his eyes. "Come show everyone how much fun you used to be."

"I'm still fun!" Bucky protested, waving his arm in protest and nearly knocking over Dugan's drink. Dugan scooted it out of Bucky's reach. He looked apologetically at the glass then back up to Steve, making a face and smoothing his hair back down. "I just don't like dancing when there's no one else on the dance floor."

"And I don't like Valentine's day, but here I am, celebrating with everybody." Steve spread his arms out wide, making another impatient gesture with his hand for Bucky to join him. Bucky didn't budge.

"Valentine's day was technically three days ago," Morita pointed out. Steve shot him a look and he shut back up.

"Fine, then I don't like this entire month," Steve glared a little at Morita again before looking back at Bucky "and look who hasn't complained once yet this year. I need this to make this wretched month tolerable. Do it in the name of how much February sucks."

"You're not over hating February yet?" Bucky asked, drumming his fingers on the table. Steve shifted his weight, still standing and waiting for Bucky.

"Hating February?" Jones asked, looking over to Bucky. Bucky jumped on the opportunity, leaning forward onto the table to explain and avoid responding to Steve's pushing requests to come dance.

"He has this thing - just hates February for some reason. The whole month, but doesn't have a single reason why. Just says he has this 'bad feeling' about it." Bucky used actual air quotes, crooking his fingers before bringing one of them up to his temple and twirling it in a circle, tilting his head in Steve's direction. Right, like Steve was the crazy one.

"I'm standing right here. And you're dodging the request." Steve made a don't think I don't see what you're doing face and Bucky scowled. He was just all full of pouting today, wasn't he? Steve held out his hand in invitation, properly asking like a gentlemen should. Like the way Bucky had taught him. "C'mon. Dance with me."

"No. No, I'm not going to." Bucky crossed his arms, looking terribly stubborn with his familiar gelled hair and blue coat and cleft chin.

Thankfully, Steve's backup finally decided to join in and help. The Commandos all started poking at Bucky too, cajoling him and trying to push him out of the booth. Morita was sitting on the end cap so he switched over to sit on the side of the table Steve had just left from, so they could push Bucky out of the booth if need be.

Steve watched with a smile on his face, hand still outstretched towards Bucky.

"We live in a dangerous business. This may be the last date you ever have the chance to go on," Falsworth pointed out, tilting his head towards Steve. Bucky was more than a little taken aback at his wording choice, his jaw dropping as his eyes widened.

"It's not like there's any dames around to chose from," Dugan pointed out, sweeping a big hand at the near empty bar to prove his point. Steve jumped on the opportunity, quirking his mouth up in a one sided grin and leaning closer.

"Besides, even if there were dames around I bet none of 'em would be as pretty as you, Buck." Steve said it as sincerely as possible and the rest of the Commandos fell into various surprised laughter. The strangest look crossed Bucky's face as he blinked up at Steve.

"Okay, now I'm definitely not going with you."

"Nope, you're going," Jones said definitively, pushing Dugan so he'd push Bucky. Bucky slid about six inches closer to the edge of the booth, grabbing onto the table and the back cushion to keep from falling out of the seat.

"Both of you need to lighten up. You just worry about each other all the time, always afraid the other's gonna die," Jones finished with a pointed look in both of their directions.

"And neither of you are dead yet, so go enjoy the lives of the people you fret over so much." Morita added, with the same half-annoyed scolding look. (Did they really fret over each other that much?)

"Allez, s'amuser!" Dernier added, throwing his hand up in the air as his input of agreement.

And with the final encouraging holler, Dugan pushed Bucky the rest of the way across the slick cushion seat of the booth. He fell directly out of it, stumbling to catch himself on the back of the seat before Steve scooped him up and pulled him upright.

Bucky fumbled but Steve threw a tight arm around Bucky's waist, tugging Bucky to his side and not intending to let go.

The Commandos broke out in cheers, all raising their glasses to Steve and Bucky. Steve laughed and Bucky scowled but didn't try to break free, just ran a hand over his hair again to smooth out the mess it hadn't become and made a face at his teammates.
"I hate you all," Bucky informed them with that deadpanned tone of his, pushing halfheartedly at Steve's chest but giving up after a single shove.

"What's new?" Morita grinned.

"Have fun, kids." Dugan added with a wink.

"Yeah, get him to lighten up," Jones pointed, the direction of his finger kind of vague from the alcohol in his system.

"Which one of us?" Steve asked, already starting to pull Bucky towards the dance floor.

"Both!" Falsworth shouted. Steve laughed and turned around, his arm loosening around Bucky's waist as he walked him to the counter where the bartender was already waiting with a few records spread out on the surface.

Bucky groaned as he realized there was yet another person in on the scheme of trying to get him to dance and Steve just smiled wider.

"Do you have any waltzes? From the '30s, if you can." Steve requested and the bartender snatched up one of the records with a wide smile, taking it over to the turntable and setting the needle.

"You dip me and I'm ending you," Bucky warned, letting Steve lead him to the middle of the empty dance floor. "I am not some dame."

"Good thing, too," Steve commented, taking Bucky's hand in his own and lifting it to chest height, sure to extend their arms away from their bodies like Bucky had told him so many years ago.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Bucky asked, putting his other hand on Steve's shoulder reluctantly. Steve would normally take the girl position, except that Bucky was shorter now and it really was based on height.

"That I'm glad you're not a dame," Steve replied. "Now let's dance."

The first step forward threatened to topple them both over already because they both stepped forwards, successfully stepping on each other's feet.

"Dammit, Bucky, you are shorter and you have to step backwards," Steve complained, pulling Bucky closer and toeing his foot back to take the proper step of the girl's dancing technique. It took a few seconds for Bucky to catch on, then Steve motioned to smooth it out, swinging Bucky into the first three step spin.

"I only know how to be the guy," Bucky muttered back, looking a little stiff as Steve lead them into another three step sequence.

"But you still used to dance with me." Steve pointed out and Bucky sighed, unrelenting from his stiffness. In fact, Steve was a little insulted Bucky was so resilient.

"And what, I have to depend on Dugan to get you to waltz with me now?" Steve asked with raised eyebrows. Bucky's feet stuttered but he caught himself before Steve tripped over him and they fell back into the triplet pattern of their feet.

They circled around a few more times, floating to the beat and steadily in sync now as they danced across the floor. Then Bucky finally spoke up, taking the opportunity to look over Steve's shoulder instead of at him.
"Shit, Steve. It's just been hard for me," Bucky said softly under his breath, a quiet admission that felt too detached to be as personal as the words were. Steve looked sharply towards him, not expecting an answer and definitely not expecting that one.

"What has?" Steve asked, his response paused to integrate the question best into the three step. That way the talking and the dancing coincided, so hopefully more of one would lead to more of the other. They must have been quite a scene, two tall and fairly built men in uniform, speaking in hushed tones as they waltzed across an empty dancefloor in an old pub hardened by war.

Bucky sighed, the warmth of his breath battering against Steve's collarbone as the tension left his shoulders. "Nothing. Let's just dance."

Steve hesitated a moment, considering pressing the topic. But then Bucky leaned a little closer, the tension in his shoulders deflating. That was good enough for him.

Now that Bucky wasn't so stiff, Steve moved the hand on Bucky's waist to wrap around his lower back, pulling their chests closer and heartbeats flush against each other.

At the possessive move Bucky turned his eyes up to the ceiling, mumbling something under his breath that Steve didn't quite catch, although it sounded kind of similar to why me?

They hadn't touched like this in a long time, hadn't danced together in longer. If he honestly thought Bucky was that against it, Steve would never make him do something he wouldn't want to do. But this was for the greater good of their friendship. Touching and being close again. Besides, it was just a dance.

And it was nice, it really was. Bucky's familiar hand back in Steve's, the calluses real and grounding in the most wonderfully human of ways. The hand on his shoulder was grounding too, gripped just tight enough to hold Steve close but not tight enough to claim Steve for his own.

Dancing like this should feel ridiculous, but if anything, it felt sweet, Like they were young and innocent all over again, laughing like maniacs as they stumbled their way around the tiny apartment, Bucky crooning out some tune he'd heard pouring out of the diner across the street.

Not to mention that this was the first time Bucky had let Steve really touch him since the bullet. It was just comforting, having Bucky a physical, tactile presence under his hands. If the proof of Bucky was there and something he could feel, reach out and touch, it meant he was safe. It was the only time Steve completely stopped worrying - he had nothing to worry about when Bucky's shoulder was pressed to his, when Bucky's arm was around his neck. When they were dancing across an empty floor, holding each other tight as they swung from one two three.

He'd been missing something, and this was it. The two of them, close and tight again, the piece that settled into place in his chest. Steve was fairly sure he could spend the rest of forever just waltzing in Bucky's arms. There were a hell of a lot worse futures to picture than having Bucky this close for forever. Even if he couldn't stay quiet for half that long.

In the middle of a sweeping change of directions, Steve squeezed Bucky's hand a little tighter and spun them a little faster, catching Bucky off guard so Steve could see an honest reaction when he asked the question.

"Are you out here for me?"

It was out of nowhere, no preamble or explanation. It wasn't even worded specific enough to describe what he was asking, but Steve had a feeling Bucky already knew.
Bucky turned his head, looking at Steve with just inches between them. He wasn't freaking out anymore, wasn't pushing Steve away or breaking down. He just looked at Steve with clear eyes that Steve barely had to look down to see, they were so close in height.

"You already know the answer to that question," Bucky answered quietly, wrapping his forearm tighter behind Steve's shoulder and pulling Steve into the next step of the waltz a little harder.

Steve let Bucky guide them for a moment, just so he could think. Bucky wasn't fighting this war for America, for his country, for freedom and honor.

He was fighting it for Steve.

But why?

Their entire lives, Bucky had been sticking up for Steve. But James Buchanan Barnes was not a natural born soldier. He was a lover.

He loved life and he loved women and he loved to dance - he couldn't even hide that now, Steve could feel him starting to enjoy the slow triplet spin - and he loved the sunshine something fierce.

They were here in the cold and Steve had never felt more at home jumping behind enemy lines and Bucky was probably just as homesick as Steve was happy. Steve was a soldier. Bucky wasn't.

But he was fighting for Steve and Steve had no idea why.

Steve looked over at Bucky again. Bucky glanced back, his expression still neutral. Not blank, just...calm. There was a resignation there that Steve had never been a part of, some internal agreement Bucky had with himself that Steve was nowhere near understanding.

But Bucky just looked so peaceful, Steve couldn't bring himself to dig deeper. Not now, not tonight. Maybe later, when they were just getting off the lines, blood pumping hot and hearts pounding with adrenaline, when the right words would just slip out because they always tended to do that when death was on your heels.

For now, Steve would just dance and let Bucky keep that reason for himself. One day, Bucky would tell him why. Until then, Steve could wait.

"Okay," Steve agreed, because Bucky was right. Steve did know the answer to that question, even if he hadn't been able to let himself admit it until now. Then he cleared his throat, taking control back over the dancing and pulling Bucky in a new direction entirely. "Next question."

"Are we dancing or playing confessional?" Bucky asked, a bit of a smile on his face as he followed Steve's feet with his own. The song had switched sometime while Steve was lost thinking, but it was still a waltz so they kept going on as if nothing had changed at all. It almost felt like nothing had, like they really could be back in the Brooklyn apartment again.

"Both," Steve declared determinedly and Bucky huffed a soft laugh but kept dancing without protest. "Now, next question."

Bucky waited, watching Steve out of the corner of his eye as Steve decided on his wording, choosing it carefully so Bucky got what he was asking without being offended.

"You've been more...physically distant lately, but it's been consciously, so I know you have a reason why." One, two, three, step, two, three. "What's the reason?"
Bucky huffed a laugh, picking up the pace of their dancing a little as the faster chorus of the song echoed over the tavern.

"Is there anything you don't notice?" Bucky asked, a hint of amusement in his tone.

"No answering questions with questions," Steve reminded, poking Bucky in the side with the hand on his back. Bucky jumped just a tad, flicking Steve on the shoulder in retaliation.

"Okay. Well." Bucky pondered a moment, settling his hand back on the back of Steve's shoulderblade, each step of his dancing feeling a little lighter as they spun around each other's boots. This really was good for them. Talking, breathing together, close and safe and dancing. What more could he ask for?

Bucky finally settled on an answer, eyes looking out over Steve's shoulder, the sides of their faces close. "I'm going through a phase. Still trying to figure things out."

The words floated between them for a moment, the weight of saying even this not going missed. Steve cocked his head, leaning it against the side of Bucky's for a moment, just touching their temples together. It was just a simple affectionate gesture, a movement to show he understood and he was here for Bucky.

From the position Steve couldn't see Bucky's eyes flutter closed, lips parting in overwhelmed emotion as he fought the urge to cry. It was such a simple gesture and Bucky could only think what if we could be this way forever. But forever with Steve wasn't his.

One two three, spinning over each other's feet. So tightly close and promisingly safe, like they were kids again and real adults for once, forever and never because this wouldn't ever be something Bucky could keep.

"If you ever need help figuring things out--" Steve started, his voice soft and quiet against Bucky's ear. Steve was almost sure he felt Bucky shiver in his arms, then that beautiful lilting voice interrupted him, too loud for the moment as he took back control from Steve, pulling them back to the center of the dance floor as he spoke.

"Actually, I think I can eventually figure things out, but you..." It was a good thing Bucky was holding on to him tight because Steve was entirely unprepared for the dip. One moment he was upright, listening to Bucky talk and the next he was looking up at Bucky's wide grin, his back parallel to the floor and leg held up by a firm hand.

Steve's eyes went the size of saucers, his balance entirely thrown off and his head even more so. The overwhelming surprise more prominent than anything as he blinked up, registering that he was in fact being dipped like a dame. The triumphant look on Bucky's face was priceless and he couldn't help it, Steve threw back his head, the tavern turning upside down entirely as he opened his mouth and laughed.

More cheers and laughter broke out, upside down shapes from a table in the corner making a lot of noise. Oh yeah, they were being watched by the Commandos. Steve entirely forgot they were there.

Bucky pulled Steve back upright (he was so much stronger than Steve remembered) and settled him onto his feet, both hands on Steve's upper arms as he swayed a little, trying to regain his balance.

"...keep harassing me," Bucky finished with a grin and the delay by the unexpected dip made Steve blink confusedly, trying to remember what Bucky had said.

"I don't harass you," Steve said, blinking down at Bucky. Bucky laughed, rubbing his palms up and down Steve's arms once before entirely letting go, taking a step back. Everything instantly sunk a few degrees colder.

Steve's eyes followed Bucky's shoulderblades as he turned, still smiling, and started the return walk to their table. At the edge of the dance floor Bucky stopped and turned around, eyes locking instantly on Steve's and either not noticing that Steve's gaze had been following him or just not caring.

"Oh, and Steve? Apparently height doesn't actually matter all that much. Because you still managed to be the dame in the end." Bucky winked, then spun around on his heel and walked back to the corner both, arms spread wide as the Commandos cheered, clapping him on the back and laughing, congratulating him on getting one up on Steve.

Maybe Steve was still a little dizzy from the dip or maybe he was going through withdrawls from being so close to Bucky after so long apart and then having to be apart again, but either way his head was flashing, his brain in knots and confusion as he tried to process everything that just happened.

After standing alone in the middle of the dance floor for a few moments, Steve decided he wasn't going to figure anything out any time soon, and now wasn't exactly the time to try to process it all.

Bucky was fighting this war for him and Steve didn't know why. Bucky didn't want to be touched - said it was a phase, he was working through something (that Steve also didn't know what was) - but the moment that Steve was touching him his entire body relaxed and he loosened up like it was exactly the kind of comfort that he needed.

And apparently, Bucky was an even better dancer than Steve thought because he switched between the two roles like a pro, letting Steve guide him then pulling Steve along to his own pace and dipping him like a dame.

Which shouldn't have really been possible, because all of Steve's new muscles weighed a ton and Bucky had been supporting them all without so much as straining. Could that all be from army training?

It was just too much to process at once and Steve gave up fairly quickly, deciding all those questions could be answered later.

He nodded his thanks to the bartender / disk jockey who'd provided the music. The man just waved Steve on with a smile.

He was still kind of floating in that pondering headspace as he sat back down, on the edge seat of the booth this time. The Howling Commandos cheered him on, too.

"Not half bad," Morita grinned, patting Steve's shoulder.

"I'm surprised you didn't drop him on the dip, Barnes." Dugan tipped his glass at both of them before clinking it to Bucky's empty inanimate one.

"Nah, I wouldn't let Steve fall," Bucky shot a one sided smile his way before reaching across the table to take Steve's glass of water and down the whole thing in a single tip.

"Steve gave the rest of the Commandos a small smile, trying to figure out how his ploy to get both of them dancing and loosened up had done wonders for Bucky but left Steve feeling more confused and out of the loop than ever.

At least Bucky was clanking glasses, telling stories and laughing. The whole point was to make Bucky smile, which he had. That much still made him feel warm inside, but everything else?
Steve just really wished they were dancing again. It had ended too soon and all he wanted to do was lean up against Bucky's side again.

He kicked his feet out under the table, ankle of his boot brushing against Bucky's, holding his breath to see if Buck would tangle their feet together or not.

With a soft, almost apologetic smile, Bucky moved his boots away.

Steve sighed. Baby steps, right? He'd moved a mountain today and he wasn't going to stop climbing slippery slopes until he got to the peak of what Bucky was "figuring out." Then they'd be fully back to normal, two impossibly close Brooklyn kids again.

In the meantime, Steve had better prep for the climb.

~~~

"I hate mountains," Bucky bitched, trudging up through the snowy ground, wishing he could wrap his coat tighter than the buttons already were. "They're obtrusive and pointless and they take days to climb."

"It's more like an hour," Dugan supplied, climbing up the slope a few feet behind Bucky. Bucky just made a face and kept stomping his way up through the snow.

As always, Steve seemed entirely unfazed by either the weather or the mountain, trekking ahead of the pack and cutting a trail through the thick snow for the rest of them to march on shallowly.

"Is it snowing even more?" Jones complained, looking up at the sky and clouds above them. Bucky looked up at Steve, about five feet ahead, whose styled blond hair was dusted with white, sparkling flakes.

He looked kind of like an angel.

"Yep," Bucky bit out a little bitterly, pretending it was the snow he was pissed at and not his own stupid self.

"But at least it's--" Falsworth started.

"S'il vous plaît, ne parle pas," Dernier groaned.

"--insulating," Falsworth finished.

Less than two steps later, a distinctive smacking sound and a shout made everybody turn around. Falsworth was glaring at Morita, who'd pegged him in the back with a snowball.

Bucky snorted and turned from the antics, back to trudging drearily along the never-ending hike up the mountain. Having a snowball fight sounded like wicked fun right now, but it was a time sensitive mission and they couldn't delay.

After, Bucky mused. He'd even instigate it, make everybody join in with proper teams and snowball forts, call it a celebration. Because of all the missions they'd been on so far, this was the one Bucky cared about this most: the one that needed celebrating at its completion.

They were finally going to get Zola.

"Hey Steve, we almost there yet?" Bucky asked, taking a few big steps to walk up next to Steve instead of behind him. Their shoulders didn't touch, but Bucky stayed as close as he could without touching.

It meant he had to trek through the deep, freshly fallen snow now, but with double the number of paths being made, maybe they could move up the mountain twice as fast.

Steve glanced over at him, the blonde hair ruffling beautifully in the wind. "You haven't gotten an ounce more patient with time, have you?"

"And you haven't gotten an ounce less stubborn. So here we are, stubborn and impatient climbing a mountain in the snow on the last day of the month you hate."

"It's a leap year," Steve said absently and Bucky made a face. Okay, so tomorrow was the last day of February, then. Of course Steve had to be right.

In the eleven days since they went dancing, everything had been...great, actually. Now that Steve was at least a little more understanding, the two of them had settled into a careful, easy homeostasis. Standing and sitting next to each other, close and constantly rotating around each other without actual being pressed together.

It was the best kind of compromise because it meant Bucky could stay at Steve's side without his head going in all kinds of crazy directions. Steve's skin against his - even through layers of uniform - kind of cut off rational brain functioning. Bucky couldn't think or make decisions because his brain just insisted on reverting back to the days in Brooklyn, the two of them lazing on the couch, his legs in Steve's lap as Steve drew or they talked. Or worse, it'd cut back to the past year, his heart racing every time Steve so much as smiled his way.

But if they kept close and didn't touch, Bucky could keep his head on his shoulders and still be with Steve. It may not be a permanent solution, but it was working for now.

"What time's the train coming?" Dugan asked Jones behind them, voices caught and whipped away by the wind, just like everything else on this damn mountain. "Should pass by in about half an hour." It wasn't snowing too badly, just a light drift that seemed to be getting less and less the further up they climbed.

"Think we'll make it to the top by then?" Dugan's voice dropped quieter this time, almost like he didn't want Bucky and Steve to hear him. Bucky heard anyways.

"We'll make it," Steve promised, a little more serious today than he'd been in the past few. As soon as they'd gotten the word that their next mission was Zola, Steve had shut down into full soldier mode. Bucky hadn't seen him this focused and sure of a mission since before he got shot.

It was personal to Bucky, yeah, but it was kind of personal to all of them. As much as they were a bunch of misfits from around the world, they were also a team and they all cared about each other enough to all hate Zola with the same passion Bucky did.

"Especially if you all pick up your feet instead of throwing snowballs," Bucky pointed out, his legs starting to strain a little from keeping pace with Steve.

Something cold and heavy thudded between his shoulderblades, an explosion of snow against his back making Bucky jump. There was an instantaneous splattering of laughter as Bucky spun around to glare indignantly at whichever Commando had thrown the snowball. Thing was, they were all laughing - even Steve - so he had no way of telling who had thrown it. Not like it mattered, anyone of them would have.

"I'm getting you all back after this train thing," Bucky swore, spinning back around to follow Steve.
up over a rock cropping. The snowball battle he'd been planning earlier looked like it may be more of snowball war. They'd have to make teams, set up rules...

"Yes sir, Sergeant," Dugan replied, still laughing. Bucky shook his head and smiled. He'd get his revenge once they got Zola, especially if he had Steve on his team. In the meantime, there was still a mission they had to get to.

The top of the mountain was nearing, the cold snow in the air just on the ground now, crunching and shifting underneath boots. Thankfully the wind wasn't whipping around like earlier, when it'd been hard to breathe from the air alone. Now it'd calmed down enough to make the last stretch up the steep slope as tolerable as a freezing slope in whipping wind could be.

The boys had fallen quiet for the rest of the trip, everyone inside their own heads and just focusing on the willpower to get up the mountain without expending too much energy. They still had a mission once they got to the top. The climbing was actually the easy part.

When they'd first gotten the assignment, there had been talk on whether or not it was a good idea to send Bucky in. Emotionally compromised, someone had said. He's already got a dangerous streak and we need Zola for information, not dead. The talk had all pissed Bucky off (which was probably the point) but he'd kept quiet, just sitting in his seat and looking to Steve for direction.

Of course, Steve had blown up. Civilly, that is.

"Excuse me sir, but Sergeant Barnes happens to be one of the most reliable men in this army. He not only keeps a cool head in the field, but also has saved hundreds of lives of fellow soldiers fighting for this country. He stayed to continue that record, despite psychological and physical torture, which is more than anyone else here could say. And I am entirely confident in his abilities to successfully complete this mission without the slightest hitch."

Bucky had kind of just sat there and blinked because that was 110% not how he saw it. Like, at all. Of course he wasn't going to make the mission personal - Steve probably hated Zola more than Bucky did, knowing him. And okay, technically everything Steve had said wasn't exactly lying, it was just. Really stretched.

Unless that was actually how Steve saw him?

Which wasn't right, because Bucky had shot some kid in the forehead just the other day in the field, he didn't deserve any of the respect that Steve was pinning to his name. He was a murderer and a scary good one at that. Not to mention that he wasn't quite fighting for his country.

But Steve had been met with the same agreeing, apologetic nods he always was and all mentions of Bucky being too emotionally charged to take the mission had dropped. And two days later here they were, climbing up a mountain to snag a ride on a train that Zola may or may not be in. The benefits of intersecting travel plans was always, of course, that they could be entirely flawed and the trek up the mountain could be for nothing. Bucky really hoped it wasn't.

"Okay, here we are. Radio can probably set up there, that spot looks fairly flat. What's our ETA, Morita?" Steve called and Bucky pulled himself up the last set of rocks, climbing onto the flattened outcropping that had more than enough room for them all to stand. The tension line that Stark had promised would be here was just overhead, exactly like they'd planned.

"Seven minutes, Cap." Morita followed Bucky up, heaving down the gigantic backpack that carried their hijacking radio and all the rest of the technological equipment. The rest of the Commandos shuffled up onto the flat part of the mountain, a few gazes catching curiously over the edge, peering and shivering at how far down the ground was.

"We're depending on Stark technology to race you guys down this wire onto a moving train?" Falsworth asked, looking worriedly at the tension line. Bucky looked up too, debating the sturdiness. It was thicker than he'd thought it be.

"Hey, Stark technology hasn't failed us yet, has it?" Bucky adjusted the rifle strapped to his back, checking his belt for ammunition and his pistol. The snow had stopped entirely, the ground just barely dusted this high up the mountain. That whole saying about being too cold to snow or whatever. Wasn't that a lovely thought, too cold for even the winterish hell of snow.

"I'm less worried about the wire than I am about how much it's going to suck ziplining down it," Bucky added, joining the boys looking out over the edge of the cliff. Falsworth made a noncommittal sound, pulling out his pair of binoculars worriedly. Jones and Morita were behind them, setting up the radio and checking into the Hydra frequency they'd hacked. Dugan was scouting, rifle out as always. There wasn't much to do but wait.

He stepped up next to Steve, the wind blowing slightly as he gazed out over the length of the wire, the corner of his mouth curling up in a smile as he glanced over at Steve.

"Remember when I made you ride the Cyclone on Coney Island?" Bucky asked, a soft smile on his face as he surveyed the cliff, attempting to judge the distance to the ground from here based on the size of the tracks. It was really damn far.

"Yeah, and I threw up?" Steve replied, his tone making Bucky smile and the memory apparently still pretty clear with the face he was making. It probably hadn't been the shining moment of their friendship, but Coney Island was Coney Island, that meant just as much disaster as joy.

Steve had been reluctant as hell to get on the ride, making up a whole range of excuses to get out of it, but Bucky had cajoled and begged and given Steve the best puppy eyes he had. He just didn't want to go alone, was all. Or maybe he just really wanted to see the look on Steve's face as the ride dropped them into the twist.

Finally Steve had relented because he always caved at Bucky's pleading, didn't have a single bad bone in his body. Bucky had practically bounced up and down in the line waiting, spurting off all sorts of random facts about how it had been built in '28, did Steve remember what they'd been doing in '28? (They'd spent a lot of that year in Sarah Rogers's kitchen, playing around her feet with the sticks they used to pretend were cars.)

Once they strapped in, Steve's eyes were as wide as saucers, looking at Bucky like he was falling off a cliff instead of going into a rollercoaster. "I-Is it possible for your heart to beat out of your chest?" Steve had asked, his seventeen year old logic adorable even if he knew it wasn't true. Bucky had laughed and reached across the seat, placing his hand on Steve's chest so his heart was beating rapidly under Bucky's palm. "Needs to be going about 3 beats faster," Bucky mused, tapping his fingers over Steve's chest. Steve had swatted his hand, shoving Bucky back into his half of the seat as Bucky threw back his head and laughed cheerily.

Then the ride had lurched, making them both squeal with surprise and grip the bar across their laps. Steve lasted about six seconds before his hand went from the bar to Bucky's hand, squeezing it so tight that Bucky had actually had a Steve-shaped bruise from having his fingers all crushed together. Not that he'd minded.

They both screamed at the drop. Loud. Louder than Bucky had ever screamed, probably. At the end their hair was sticking in a thousand directions and Bucky was making incredulous gasping sounds, trying to find himself in his body again as he turned to Steve. Who promptly ran for the trashcan by the grass, a hand over his mouth.

Bucky followed just a step behind him, still gasping with amazed sounds as Steve hurled into the trashcan, his entire dinner (which admittedly hadn't been much) coming back up in choking wretched sounds. Bucky had rubbed one hand over Steve's back and used the other to hold his floppy bangs off his forehead, even though it was kind of unnecessary, it still felt good to have Steve's warm forehead under his palm and he'd imagine Steve felt the same. "I'm s-sorry," Bucky finally gasped, pressing his own forehead to Steve's shoulder as he tried to catch his breath back, still gasping through the half-laughing.

Steve's thin artist hands had gripped the sides of the trashcan tight enough to make his knuckles white, his head hanging as he mumbled a half-hearted "I hate you." Bucky's body tried to laugh more and he ended up just gasping for the breath he'd had knocked out of him, the desperate trying-to-breathe-sounds eventually even making Steve crack a smile through the pain and humiliation of chucking up his entire stomach after a rollercoaster ride. Steve hadn't let that one go for years.

"This isn't pay back, is it?" Bucky looked up at the wire, thinking about the glow of that night and the bruises on his hand from Steve's grip, the pouty face he'd given Bucky when he'd tried to buy Steve cotton candy to make up for the Cyclone. Now though, the comment made Steve smile, turning to Bucky with that happy grin of his that still made Bucky's heart flutter.

"Now why would I do that?" Steve asked, and Bucky huffed a laugh and shook his head at the all-innocent and All-American facade fronting the mischief underneath. They both knew perfectly well how much Steve liked good ol' fashioned revenge.

Speaking of revenge, they both turned in unison as Jones looked up from the radio he and Morita were tuning into, relaying back what he was hearing about Zola.

"You were right, Doctor Zola is on the train." Bucky's face steeled down from the reminiscing smile he'd had on earlier, fighting the urge to cringe at the name. Steve had told everyone he could be professional about this and he could. (He just really hated that people called Zola a doctor - there was no science in the things he'd done to Bucky's body.) Both Bucky and Steve stepped away from the cliff and back to Jones, who was still listening to the single headphone he had pressed to his ear. "Hydra dispatcher gave him permission to open up the throttle. Wherever he's going, they must need him bad."

This was it, then. The big moment. Bucky turned his head, looking over at Steve. Steve turned to meet his eyes at the same time, their gazes locking on each other. There was something in Steve's eyes, some form of silent communication that Bucky knew he should be able to understand.

But maybe the past year had screwed over his judgement, because what it looked like Steve's eyes were saying...they couldn't really be saying that. It looked like those blue eyes were staring into his with some sort of promise. We can do this. I'm here for you, we're all here for you. And of course, the twisted part of Bucky's mind had to add in the three words he'd never heard out loud. I love you. He wondered what they'd sound like coming from Steve's lips. If that was what they looked like coming from Steve's eyes.

Maybe. Maybe it was the best friend kind of I love you. Was there a best friend kind of I love you?

It felt like time had frozen over because Bucky was perfectly still, just looking at Steve as the soft blonde hair tousled in the wind. Steve's body swayed with the movement, one with the world, the fluidity to Bucky's rigid. Bucky got to be a standby of this beautiful element, the closest thing to perfect that God had ever created. The God that Bucky couldn't believe in but that Steve still prayed to on Sundays.

The moment lasted a hell of a lot shorter than Bucky wanted it to, but he was still grateful for it. Just a few seconds pause from the outside reality, the two of them against the world again. Then Steve was pulling his helmet on, stepping back away from Bucky.

Bucky nodded to himself, because they couldn't spare any more time right now. Besides, he had a lifetime of staring at Steve ahead of him if his brain kept tormenting him so. Might as well not rush it all now. Not when they had other things to do.

Dernier came over with their metal hooks, handing one to Steve first before handing one to Bucky. They looked fairly sturdy, good enough to ride the wire down on. So long as none of them let go. He had a pretty solid grip though, so did Steve and Jones. He wasn't that worried. Just a little.

It definitely wasn't the most dangerous thing they'd done.

"Let's get going, because they're moving like the devil." Falsworth warned, lowering his binoculars and sounding more than a little worried. Moving like the devil didn't exactly sound like all that much fun.

"We only got about a ten second window," Steve called over his shoulder, looking between Bucky and Jones. Then he turned back to the cliff, adjusting his grip on the metal zipliner as he raised his voice a little to be heard over the wind."You miss that window, we're bugs on a windshield."

"Mind the gap," Falsworth reminded them, a bit of his regular teasing smile back on. Bucky caught Falsworth's eye and nodded at him - once and confident - a reassurance that they were all gonna make it through this fine. Falsworth always got worried before the big ones. He smiled a tiny bit at Bucky's nod, grateful for the reassurance.

A shift from Steve turned Bucky's attention back to him, only standing a few inches behind the shield. It was weird, the huge metal circle had felt a little strange at first. But after the past year, Bucky was as used to seeing Steve with his shield now as he had been used to seeing Steve with his sketchpad in Brooklyn.

"Gotta get moving, bugs," Dugan joked, his voice still sounding big and warm despite the harsh wind was trying to eat them alive. Steve readied himself, leaning forward a bit and tightening his grip on the metal handle. Dernier's hand was in the air, ready to signal. Bucky screwed up his face against the wind, wishing it weren't so damn cold.

"Maintenant!" Dernier shouted, lowering his hand down. Steve jumped off the cliff and Bucky's heart stopped for a single moment before the metal caught on the wire and Steve was sliding down to safety. He let out the breath he was holding and swung his own zipliner up over the wire, waiting just a second and a half before Dernier shouted at him too.

Then he jumped, following Steve down the line.

The metal made a strange wooshing sound against the tension wire as they slid down across the gap, what felt like miles under the bottom of his boots. It was a good thing his boots had straps, because otherwise he'd be in his hole-covered socks right now.

The wind whipped something bitter, biting at his face and hands, but he managed to keep himself upright and relaxed as he slid closer to the barreling black snake slithering on the mountain tracks. He took a quick inventory of everything he had, the weight of his semi-automatic strapped to his side and the pistol in its holster, the blood pumping with adrenaline rushing through his veins. Mission mode.

What felt like only seconds after jumping, Bucky was dropping down onto the train's roof, landing in a crouch to keep his balance against the brutal wind. His palms traded out the cold metal of the ziplining bar for the cold metal of the train roof, real and smooth under his hands. They’d made the first step. Now here comes the hard part.

The train felt unnaturally thin as he rose carefully to his feet and pattered forward, following after Steve. Trains really shouldn't have roofs this thin, should they? All three of them walked quickly along the narrow slope, stepping up over windows and staying crouched to maintain balance as they moved. At least they weren't bugs on a windshield yet.

Bucky glanced behind him quickly, making sure Jones was there. All three of 'em were still in the green so far. When he looked back forward, Steve was already mounting a ladder on the side of the train, quickly scaling down it as Bucky crouched at the top. He squinted into the wind; the cold was making it hard to breathe again. Steve pulled open the car door, swinging inside, and Bucky looked up one last time, nodding at Jones who stayed kneeling on the roof for backup. Jones nodded back, a reverent look on his face that Bucky didn't deserve as he swung into the open train door behind Steve.

As soon as they were both on solid ground, Bucky rolled the door shut behind them to block out the cold and the whistling sound of the wind. Solid ground, that was nice for a change.

He looked around the train car, glancing at Steve before taking survey of everything else. Everything looked empty, strangely empty. They both moved forward, Bucky's gun held out in front of him as they split on either side of the middle barrier. There were some sort of crates or cases in here, holding all sorts of things Bucky didn't want to think about. He could still see Steve in his peripherals as they scouted through the car, looking for a sign of movement. Still nothing.

He glanced over to check on Steve, who was stalking low just ahead of him, alert and ready. That was another thing Bucky hadn't gotten used to, and probably never would. Steve being entirely self-sufficient. He didn't need Bucky anymore technically, but Bucky didn't care. Just because Steve could fend for himself physically didn't mean he wasn't a dumbass enough to go picking fights and jumping out of burning buildings. Somebody had to yell at him for that.

So Bucky was still defending Steve from bullies; just countries of bullies now, treating them with a sniper bullet through the brains instead of a punch on the nose in a back alley.

He swung back forward, repositioning the gun on his shoulder and keeping his head low and his footsteps silent. Steve reached the door of the car first, stepping up and looking around in confusion at the emptiness. Something wasn't right. Bucky hung back - he didn't exactly have a gigantic starry shield - and covered Steve's six as Steve stepped through the doorway and into the next car. After a few steps that didn't reveal any sudden gunfire, Bucky started to follow, checking back behind him to make sure they didn't have company. Still clear. It was nerve-wracking.

Just as he stepped up to the threshold to follow Steve, a metal door slammed shut in his face, nearly taking off his fingers. More concernedly, the door just behind Steve slammed shut at the same time, locking them away from each other. He stared with wide eyes through the trapezoid window as Steve rushed to his own window, eyes big and beautiful and scared as his fists came up to either side of the glass, instantly trying to slam the door down. It didn't budge a bit but Bucky didn't have another second left to watch.

A sound behind him made him spin around automatically, heart pumping in his ears and entire body buzzing as he aimed his gun, trying to locate the source of the sound.
Of fucking course Zola tried to separate them. They were better as a team, but Bucky wasn't that same weak beggar Zola had made of him on that table anymore. He could hold his own. So machine gunning the enemy it is. He pulled the trigger, sending a burst of bullets in the other direction. He was almost a little offended that they thought quarantining him from Steve would mean his demise.

Shots fired back from the other side of the train car: two big, blue vaporizing laser beams. Okay, he took it back, he'd really like the advantage of that shield right now. Bucky ducked out of the way and behind a crate of something or another. Holy shit, these guys were trying to vaporize him. He did not sign up for this. Well, actually, he didn't sign up for any of this. The joys of getting drafted. (Okay, he signed up for the second half but who could blame him when it was Steve asking.)

He jumped back out into the open part of the car, machine gun firing at the other side of the car. A few of the bullets finally hit a target, taking down the blue suited guy with some sizable holes in his chest. But the shots kept coming - shit, there was a lot more than one guy in this car - and Bucky scrambled quickly to the crates on the other side of the train, taking cover again to avoid getting zapped into nothing. That had to be the worst death. No body to bury or anything, just dust and a final scream.

More gunfire battered in his direction as he tucked his shoulder behind one of the crates and reloaded his gun with steady hands. Now there were machine gun bullets bouncing in sparks off the corner he was hiding in. Machine guns and blue vaporizing blasts: today was just his lucky day. Determined, he drew in a steady breath and swiveled up over the top of his cover, shooting off a round of bullets. Shit, new angle, they weren't even over there anymore. He ducked back down, spinning on his knees to shoot out from around the side of the crate instead. How many were in here, god? He'd just keep shooting, they all had to die at one point, right? Another Hydra soldier went down, body flopping backwards from the intrusion of metal into his chest.

There better not be this many guys after Steve. Steve had better be kicking ass. With the part of his brain that wasn't trying to stay alive, he zoned in on the sounds coming from the next car over. There were a lot of metallic and crashing noises, but that meant Steve was still alive.

Crouching there against the wall trespassing on a train car zipping through the snowy mountains, Bucky decided that his absolute favorite thing about Howard Stark was that shield he made for Steve.

He kept his breathing as quiet as possible, ducking back low in his corner and listening to his own train car now. There was a soft patter of footsteps headed his way. Just one pair though, it sounded like. The steps weren't falling as heavy as the guy with the blue suits. So machine gun Hydra soldier. Bucky could definitely take him out, so long as he got the shot in first. Only thing was, he was out of machine gun bullets himself. That meant switching to his pistol, which wouldn't be that big of a problem except that the other guy knew Bucky's location, had more ammo, and was hiding behind a lot bigger crates than Bucky was.

Somehow he kept his hands steady, jumping back out from behind the crate as soon as he pinpointed the source of the footsteps, firing off five bullets in quick succession. All of them slid past their target as the guy ducked back between two crates in the center of this train. Bucky slammed back into the other side of the train, ducking behind the crates again as machine gun fire followed just inches behind him, revealing the guy's location again.

Two more shots, fired in the direction of the Hydra guy. No screams or thuds, Bucky was still missing and that soldier was still getting closer. If they could be called soldiers; they looked more like wasps in the uniforms they wore.

Okay, he only had a few more shots left. Should be three, actually. He could do this in three. He was a sniper for god's sakes, he should be able to pull off close range shooting too, right?

With a final burst of energy, he swiveled around one more time, pulling the trigger once, twice, click. Empty. Bucky cursed silently and pressed back into the safety behind the barrier again, sucking in a breath. Shit. That was the last of his ammo. He slid back further against the train wall, sinking down as he realized, as it slowly seeped into his bones the way the cold always had, that creeping sensation that finally just hit all at once. This was it. He was going down today, wasn't he? He couldn't decide if he was glad or extremely regretful that he never told Steve he was in love with him.

A panicked breath escaped his mouth as Bucky pressed his spine to the wall, throwing his head back against the metal gratings of the wall. He should have been more careful with his bullets. Taken a few seconds longer to aim, at least. Packed more ammo, maybe. Found a way to carry another gun. Something. He just didn't want to die. He didn't want today to be his last day with the Commandos. What about that stupid snow fight they were supposed to have after this? Dammit, he should have told Steve.

The locked door by his feet slid open and Bucky startled, jumping at the movement and raising the empty gun like that would help anything at all. Wait, Steve. All of the panic drained out of him and Bucky could have cheered if it didn't give away his position and he wasn't still in the middle of a gun fight in a very serious mission he'd been anticipating for more than a year.

But Steve was here now, holding up his gun in offering before he tossed it in Bucky's direction. Now Steve wouldn't have a gun at all, so Bucky would have protested, except that the firearm was already flying through the air and after all, he wasn't much help to Steve when he was dead. His own gun scattered to the ground as he caught the loaded pistol Steve threw at him, rising to his feet in the same motion as he aimed the muzzle down the train car. Steve barreled forward, shield slamming into a canister that slid straight through the center of the car and into the hiding spot of the gunman, forcing the Hydra soldier to either get beheaded or step out to the side. He chose to step out to the side and Bucky fired, sending a bullet into his neck the moment that he did.

The black wasp head jerked backwards and he crumpled to the ground, the train car falling deadly silent. It was over. Bucky wasn't dead and it was over. By some natural born instinct, he gravitated back to Steve's side instantly.

"I had him on the ropes," Bucky told him, the same phrase the Little Steve used to say every time Bucky came and kicked ass for him. (Literally, most times.)

"I know you did," Steve replied, his tone kind of endearing as he shot Bucky the faintest of grins, their eyes meeting with an electric charge. Pumped through with adrenaline as they stepped back close to each other again, two of us against the world mixed in with a bit of the relieved I am really glad you're alive.

A sudden high pitched whir shattered the moment, Steve recognizing the power-up sound even faster than Bucky did, snapping into soldier mode and spinning around just in time to see one of the blue-suited guys aiming the vaporizer directly at them.

"Get down!" Steve shouted, one of the talented artist hands grabbing onto Bucky's arm and shoving him safely behind Steve. Bucky didn't even have time to think - plus Steve was holding onto him, how was he supposed to think when Steve was in the heartbreaking saving-your-life mode of putting himself between Bucky and danger - before the gun went off, the explosion smacking directly into the shield and exploding even bigger, a bright flash of fire and smoke that disappeared almost instantly as the side of the train blew off, peeling back like one of those sweet summer oranges.
The explosion had blown them both further back into the car and Bucky was the first to blink into the cold air swirling around them now as he picked himself up off the steel ground, instantly looking around for Steve. His breath caught as he registered that Steve was down, fuck, no, Steve was down - but moving, breathing, okay. Bucky's heart restarted because Steve was alive. He was okay.

And mission number one was to keep it that way. If the Hydra agent tried to take down Captain America right now - the way they'd been trying for the past year - there'd be nothing protecting Steve from that. So Bucky had to distract the bastard-with-the-exploding-vapor-gun from Steve's defenseless body.

Okay, so based on the helmets the guys were wearing, odds are they couldn't see all that clearly. The Hydra agent was going to aim for the guy standing and holding the shield, not look around on the ground to determine who's dead or not. So without a second consideration, Bucky reached out and picked up the shield, distracting the guy from Steve as he fired Steve's pistol around the heavy thing.

He got off three shots before the blue gun powered up again, the whirring sound the only warning before a bright burst smacked the shield front and center, two tons of pressure ripping the shield from his hands and throwing Bucky into the air. Standing one second and flying the next, scrambling for some purchase in the blast of air, his hands reaching out to grab the closest unbreakable thing he could touch. Somehow his fingers closed solidly around a steel rail, nearly yanking his shoulders out of their sockets in the processes. His brain took a few seconds longer to catch up with his body before he realized he was hanging off the side of the train, off the orange peel piece that ripped back in the first explosion.

Fuck, it was cold as hell out here. The metal burned worse than anything else cold he'd touched today, the wind was being an absolute bitch, but he was not leaving Steve in there to take on Zola alone. There was only really one solution then, so Bucky held on.

And just like the bright sunny angel he was, Steve appeared only moments later, his helmet ripped off and blond hair flying everywhere in the wind.

"Bucky!" Steve shouted, already edging out onto the ridges of the flayed train wall. The idiot was going to come save him manually, his heeled brown boots just barely finding purchase on the side of the train as he inched out closer to Bucky's rail. Not that Bucky could complain. He wasn't sure what the hell he'd done in his previous life to deserve Steve in this one, but he couldn't think of a single thing that might be worthy of his stupid, optimistic, precious best friend.

With the last bit of strength he had bottled left, Bucky repositioned his hands on the rail, scooting himself ever closer to Steve.

"Hang on," his blonde angel begged, shimmying further away from the safety of the inside of the train and inches closer to dragging them both out of hell. Bucky was helpless to do anything but listen, trying to get as close as he could without his hands slipping. He didn't even want to think about falling right now, that was way too terrifying to grasp.

Bucky flailed out a single hand, no where near close enough to Steve. You know what? The second that they landed on the floor of that train, he was hauling Steve in close and kissing him until they couldn't breathe. Renewed with the thought, Bucky pushed his luck and inched closer. It was a battle, fighting the wind trying to rip him off, the cold trying to freeze him to death. His left hand was bleeding from the impact with the side of the train, which wasn't exactly making this any easier.

"Grab my hand," Steve called out, holding out one red gloved hand in his direction. Okay, maybe when they landed on the floor of that train again he'd haul Steve in close and tell him he loved him instead. And then he'd kiss him breathless. Bucky inched closer and the rail he'd been hanging from started to snap away from the wall. He froze, not wanting to make it pull back anymore. With a desperate prayer Bucky reached out his hand from here, fingers aching to hold Steve's again. They were still too far apart.

They'd always been too far apart. All this time, what was Bucky so afraid of? Hanging off the side of a train, death inches away and reaching for Steve's hand, those desperate blue angel eyes on his...Bucky couldn't remember a single reason not to tell Steve he was in love with him. The pining and the worrying all seemed so silly now, in the stark face of reality. All this time, they should have been together. He should have told Steve such a long time ago. I love you.

He steeled himself, sucking in a breath of the sharp, burning cold wind. Just another shift closer...and something creaked and snapped. Bucky heard the "No!!" of Steve's shout before he even knew he was falling.

The air rushed up to grab him, dragging him down down down. And he screamed, reaching out for Steve. His hand in permanent outstretch, reaching and reaching and there was... nothing there to catch him. Steve's hand wasn't there, he couldn't reach Steve in time, he was never going to grab Steve's hand again and he kept falling. and falling and falling and falling.

The mountain rushed by beside him, faster than the train had been going and he was falling, he was never going to stop falling. His throat was wrecked already, hoarse scream just shredded by the wind the moment it left his mouth.

He stopped screaming halfway down because he couldn't see Steve anymore. He closed his eyes because he couldn't see Steve anymore and he needed Steve Rogers to be the last thing he ever saw.
He couldn't see Steve anymore and he never got to say I love you.

He never got to say I love you. He didn't even scream it going down.

Didn't even scream it going down.

Bucky! No!

He hit the water with a freezing cold smack and everything went black.

~~~*~

The faded green screen was staticky, but he was fairly sure he could see what'd just happened. Could "Doctor, if Captain America gets back aboard, we only have time to send out one more message before they seize the train," the German fretted, fingers poised over the keys like a dancing monkey. Zola stared at the camera-screen trained on the blank place Sergeant Barnes had just been. And fallen.

"Send headquarters our coordinates," Zola ordered. He tapped the blank space on the screen, staring in awe at their luck. This couldn't have panned out more perfectly. Finally, something that they'd won. And this one thing, this one little piece...it might be worth everything they'd lost. Maybe even more.

He turned to the German monkey of a soldier, awaiting the direction of a message to relay. Zola couldn't keep the triumph out of his voice as he gave his next order. This was the answer to all their prayers.

"Tell them that I left behind one of my...belongings in the ravine."

Chapter End Notes

Wow I'm sorry, this is quite a lot of pain. Just awful, really.

On the plus side, have some translations for the French Dernier and Jones are always laughing over:

"Oi, regarde qui c'est, le petit ami de sergent," Dernier piped with a grin. Jones lost it, slapping his knee and bending in half with laughter, eyes almost watering as his laugh echoed around the clearing.

Translated: "Oi, look who it is. The Sergeant's boyfriend..."

On another note, the lovely commenter Erika sent me this song The General by Dispatch because it reminded her of this story. If you feel like getting even more emotional, feel free to go check it out.

Thank you to every one of you beautiful souls who read this, I am just honored to share my story with you all. xx
A song for Steve: xx.

I seriously recommend listening to it. Headphones and closed eyes and just listen. From this incredible Stucky playlist.

Warning: graphic depictions of sorrow and brief graphic missing arms.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

On the 28th of February 1945, Armin Zola was captured by the allied forces. He was held in custody for a month and a half before being released and deemed harmless - although still tracked by the U.S. Government - with the destruction of Hydra.

A lot can happen in a month and a half.

~~~

February 28, 1945

"Doctor Zola, tell your engineer to stop the train. Or I'll stop it for you with this trigger. And I gotta say, I wouldn't weep if you were collateral damage." Jones aimed his sights directly on Zola's head, taking comfort in the shocked sound he'd made as Gabe'd crashed through the roof. He kept his finger out of the trigger guard though, because as much as he was dying to take the shot and wipe the scum of this bastard off the earth...they had specific orders not to kill him. Although more convincing than Colonel Phillips was knowing that as much as he wanted it, this wasn't his kill. If anybody deserved to ice Zola, destroy him for real and for permanent, it was Barnes.

A few rapid words of frenzied German later and the engineer was fumbling with switches, finally pulling a lever to stop their rapid race through the mountains. The movement jerked the train into a lurch, nearly throwing Gabe off his feet as everything jolted and the train finally started to slow: race to gradual crawl to a stop.

Barnes and Rogers better be holding onto something or else they'd be toppling into walls with that sudden jerk. Not that that wasn't a sight Gabe would pay to see, but still.

As soon as the train settled, engine creaking to a halt on the mountainside, Gabe didn't bother wasting a bullet on the Hydra engineer; swung his gun up and busted it down on the black hooded head, letting the guy crumple to the ground. With a shocked sound, Zola quickly backpedaled away, hands in the air and eyes wide behind his owl glasses, making pointless protests for his life.

Gabe just shot him a venomous look and ignored him for the time being, leaving him to flail around the cockpit in some combination of worry and fear. Gabe hoped Zola was terrified for his life. Like the way Barnes had to have been in Zola's clutches a year ago.

Shutting out the ministrations of the doctor, Gabe leaned over the slumped engineer to find the little numbers on the dash of the train. Right...there. Turning the knob on his walkie talkie to switch it into radio mode, he dialed up headquarters. Stark picked up on the other end almost instantly, wickedly professional as he listened to Gabe relay their coordinates, repeating them back over the static to confirm the numbers' accuracy. He'd have an extraction team on the way right now, Stark promised. He'd be there with their biggest Sikorsky H-5 in twenty minutes.

There was a chance Barnes might be right about Stark, he didn't seem half as pompous as everyone made him out to be. He even congratulated Jones on the mission before he cut off the line, over and out. It was a little surprising, but kinda nice. Maybe Barnes had gotten him to soften around the edges. Barnes kinda had that affect on people.

"You're real lucky I'm not allowed to kill you," Jones finally said, switching off the radio and turning around to level his gaze back on the cowering scientist. Zola still had his hands up in surrender, now backed up against the wall in fear.

"Pleez, d-don't--" Zola pleaded as Jones stepped closer, gun in hand. The begging was disgusting and Jones cut him off with a - much gentler than he'd have liked - pistol whip to the head, instantly making the pudgy body crumple to the ground unconscious.

"Bastard," Jones muttered, pulling out his length of rope and crouching down to weave it through a steel bar on the wall. He'd tie up Zola in a knot the doctor couldn't break in a million years, even if he did wake up with all his brain cells. Personally, Gabe wouldn't be all that hung up if he didn't.

Once Zola was bound and dealt with, far too kindly (but to orders - kind of), Gabe straightened and pulled the little box outta his pocket, turning the knob to switch the setting from radio mode back to the Howling Commandos' walkie talkie frequency.

He swung the barrel of his gun around to settle on his back, surveying the room with a final sweep to make sure no one was getting up anytime soon before he turned up the dial and spoke into the quiet static.

"Doe's, you all frozen yet?" Jones asked into the speaker, kicking Zola's slack foot on his way to the door. A few seconds of crackling static before the quality cleared and put through voices.
"How many times I gotta tell you Jones, you can't shorten Commandos to Doe's. We're an army squad, not a pack of female deer." Dugan's smiling voice came crackling over the line, the same teasing jilt in his voice that never seemed to leave. Gabe broke out in a grin, sliding open the cockpit door.

"Well, female deer stuck waiting on a mountain...we've got a tressed and tied Arnin Zola here, complete with Stark's extraction team heading our way in twenty." Gabe reported victoriously, humming a triumphant trumpet call under his breath, walking across the first train car. Where the hell were Sarge and the Captain at?

Cheers erupted over the static, everyone hollering - even Morita - at the warming idea of Zola finally locked up for good. Done and over, the things that'd been haunting Barnes in the night to be no longer. The various shouts all blended together, with the exception of a loud victory! that Dernier shouted at the top of his lungs, probably spreading his arms out wide and screaming the word over the echoing valley below the mountain. Jones laughed, clipping the walkie talkie box to the collar of his jacket as he walked, just able to pick up the excited voices in the background as he made his way through another doorway, the next car showing empty too. What the hell? They should all be celebrating right now.

"Barnes and Rogers are still in the back of the train, but I don't hear gunfire anymore," Jones mused into the speaker, the words met by a few curious mumbles. Jones waited a few beats before switching to French, just to egg on Dernier and annoy the other men at their lack of understanding. "Any bets to what they're up to?"

Dernier laughed loud enough to make the speaker crackle and fizz and everyone else muttered lots of nonsense about French lessons they were never going to take but kept threatening to.

"I wish I could see the look on Sergeant's face when he sees Zola's the one bound up now," Falsworth declared over the wire, the wind from the mountain distorting some of the sound. Jones could definitely agree - just because Rogers was the go-to for Barnes whenever he woke up screaming didn't mean the rest of them didn't hear it too. Every one of them had awaited this day with heightened anticipation.

"Speaking of which, still haven't run into them yet," Jones replied, starting to get concerned. On higher alert now, he entered the next train car and nearly tripped over a body on the ground. He stepped over the bulky suit of the vaporizing-gun soldiers, kinda surprised there had been this kind of gunpower to contend with. Hell, they'd had to have had it bad back here.

And then he heard the sound. Like a kettle boiling over, or a car going too fast with the windows down. Wind, whipping around like crazy, the whole train getting colder with every step Jones inched forward. Okay, now that was weird.

Dugan and Falsworth were discussing something over the walkie talkie but Jones wasn't listening, their voices blurring into background noise as he stepped through the final doorway, the source of the sound and cold finally coming into sight.

The train was fucking blown open. There was a huge gaping hole in the side of it, metal peeled back to the mountain below and no sign of Barnes or Rogers--

Until he saw a body slumped on the floor a foot from the gaping edge. The frame was smaller than either of those two men but still in bright blue, somehow one of theirs. Jones didn't have time to think, just rushed forward; entirely forgetting the other Commandos were still on the line as he skid to his knees next to the body, hands reaching out to check breathing. The pattering in his chest released a little as Jones felt the muscled back moving up and down heavily beneath his palms.
Wait. No, not breathing.

Sobbing.

Every panic and alarm bell was going off in his head as his brain tried to catch up, figure out what the hell was going on. And where the fuck was the other one? With a serious heave to the shoulder, Jones managed to roll the shaking man up on his side.

The body refused to cooperate, a flash of a star on his chest to make Jones's brain finally register Rogers before he curled back in on himself, still sobbing as he turned his face into the ground again. Steve was wound into a little ball so tight and tiny that Jones couldn't help but wonder if this was what he looked like before the serum - tiny, fragile. Helpless, broken.

With another violent shove, Gabe managed to get Steve to curl up on his side, face still tucked down to the floor. Jones cursed under his breath, grabbing Steve's chin to turn his face up, forcing Cap to look at him. The normally stoic, confident face was streaked, flooded over with tears that were still falling. His entire body was shaking, couldn't stop shaking and Jones just stared. This was some twisted nightmare. Maybe, if he weren't human, he might be able to process what the fuck was going on, but Rogers was...

Rogers was crying and shaking and crying and shaking and the wind was rushing around them in a swirl of confusing cold and Jones didn't have a single answer which wasn't going to cut it.

"Where's Barnes?" Jones demanded, one hand shaking Steve's shoulder to snap him out of it, and Steve just broke down bawling, the crying from earlier practically misty-eyes in comparison to the ugly sounds tumbling out of his mouth now. Steve wrenched away from Gabe's grip, his knees curled into his chest, arms tightly wrapped around himself as he shifted so the cold air blowing from the open side of the train threatened to freeze the tears to his face.

Gabe couldn't move, as Steve broke away from him, another painful sob gasping out of trembling, freezing lips as Gabe watched numbly. Just as frozen as the whipping air, couldn't do anything but watch numbly. And then Steve uncurled slightly, uncurled just enough and the next sound he made, the next ten seconds, the sheer desperation and pain and horror, it engraved itself right into Jones's memory and it was never going to leave, not until the day he died.

He reached a hand towards the gaping hole in the train, fingers outstretched like he was grabbing for something precious, the snowy mountain outside inches away, his voice cracking as a single word left his lips, the most pain Jones would ever hear condensed into five letters.

"B-bucky."

Dernier was laughing at one of Dugan's comments and Falsworth rolled his eyes, fiddling with the volume on his walkie talkie while he waited for Jones to get back to them. He'd been really worried about this mission - a bad feeling, he got those before a lotta their bigger trips.

But Barnes had given him this confident look, a simple reassuring nod that they were all getting through this. And if Sarge could be calm and collected about the mission of the man who'd tortured him, Montgomery Falsworth could absolutely collect himself as well and wait patiently on the mountain.

Well, pacing patiently on the mountain, it seemed. But Jones patched through the victory and they were all in great spirits now, waiting for Stark's helicopter to come get them (and for the word on Barnes and Rogers) as they chit-chatted about nothing in particular. He was kinda serious about taking those French lessons though, it'd be bloody helpful when 2/7ths of the team spoke it constantly.

Falsworth kept fiddling with the volume knob on his walkie-talkie as he waited, windy sounds coming over the static, maybe soft voices. He couldn't really be sure, but he wasn't paying much attention either.

It just so happened that he had the volume turned all the way on high when Jones shouted something over the line, the words jumbled and unrecognizable over the rush of loud static. Falsworth quickly turned it back down to a regular volume, opening his mouth to ask Jones to repeat that but never getting the chance before the panicked man shouted back into the speaker again.

"MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN, God, dammit, I need backup I don't even know what I'm supposed to - man down, I-I--"

They were staring at the walkie talkie in Falsworth's hand, all four of them dead silent and unmoving. The words echoed on replay in his head, in all of their heads. It might as well have been Russian that Jones had shouted through to them because Falsworth was fairly sure he didn't understand - couldn't, understand what those words meant in English.

Muffled sounds started coming back over the speaker, bits and pieces of a conversation that Falsworth wasn't the slightest bit privy too. His hand was over his mouth but he didn't know how it got there because he was fairly sure every bone in his body was ice. Frozen.

"St-- look at me, hey - an, you gotta push through thi-- no, c'mon, hey-- ust hold on, help's comi...no, no, I can't let you near that ledge -- ok at me, dammit," Falsworth listened dumbly as the sound of snapping fingers echoed across the walkie talkie. Distantly watching a movie of someone else's life, but about a hundred times worse.

A loud crash and some inarticulate shouts sounded over the crackling static, more broken muffled sounds in Jones's voice. "Fuck, c'm- don't fuckin do this--ook at me S-- ck, you know it's...S-s--god, don-... not your fault -"

A scream shattered over the walkie talkie speaker and they all jumped, Falsworth curling in his shoulders and pinching his arm because he had to be in a fucking nightmare. He couldn't even feel the pinch but the world was too sharp and vivid for this to be dreaming. It had to be. It had to be, this couldn't actually be happening. That scream...

Dugan was the first to finally speak, snatching the walkie talkie out of Falsworth's hand violently enough to crush it. Falsworth looked on with wide eyes, still not feeling real. Dugan lifted the box up, speaking directly into the mesh with the most serious expression he'd ever seen on Dugan's face.

"Jones, what the hell is happening? Who's--"

"Barnes. Barnes is dead. Sergeant Barnes fell off the train and he's fucking gone and I can't get Steve under control. I'm not fucking strong enough to hold him back and if he starts to put up a real fight he's going to overpower me and fucking jump out of this goddamned train looking for Barnes and he's out of his fucking mind and I am so fucking far out of my league right now I don't know what the fuck to do." Jones's frantic, panicked words ended in a choked sob. The sob was followed by another, the quiet echoing pained sounds of continuous crying over the static.

Dugan stared at the device clutched in his fingers, not really seeing it. When he'd yanked it out of Falsworth's hand, he'd had only one question on his mind. He was going to ask who was screaming. Because it didn't sound human. That's what he was going to ask. He'd never even considered--

Sergeant Barnes. Dugan had met him day 1 of the 107th regiment. The most alive, bright kid Dugan had ever seen. Settling down into the most mature, reliable man in the entire damned army. And through every moment of it, his entire being had been focused on one thing, his entire purpose had been so clear and apparent from the start. The thing that he lived for, what lit the spark in his eyes. What grounded him to that dependability.

And he'd come back from his grave to kick Dugan's ass if they let any harm happen to his boy.

"You gotta calm down Steve," Dugan commanded urgently into the speaker, trying to get across how damn important that was in just five words. He broke out of the frozen spell and started moving, a damn hurricane, picking up speed and unable to stop moving now that he'd started, pacing the length of the flat rock terrace so he'd feel a fraction of control.

He'd never called Rogers "Steve" before, maybe once in mocking joke or something. It felt weird as hell in his mouth, like it was almost too personal or something. That's what Barnes called Rogers, not the rest of them. And somewhere in his head, he'd always kind of considered Rogers and Barnes more heroes and less humans.

But listening to shattering screams and cries from the other end of the walkie talkie static...Dugan hadn't heard anything more humanizing in his life.

Steve Rogers was so very very human and apparently so was Bucky Barnes. Well, he'd been human enough to die at least. It seemed impossible, really. But standing in the whipping cold wind at the top of a mountain Dugan was burned into clarity, finally seeing his two best friends for how human they really were. And it was entirely too late for one of them.

"I don't know how," Jones gasped into the speaker, his words wet with his tears and panic.

"Think of what Sarge would have done to calm him down," Dugan tried, pacing a little faster as he realized he was already putting Barnes in the past tense.

Man down.

"I don't fucking know! I can't even say his name without Rogers melting into a fucking potentially-suicidal puddle!"

"Captain wouldn't do that," Falsworth muttered quietly. Dugan looked down at the words, taking a step back as Falsworth repeated himself. "Captain wouldn't do that." Falsworth's arms were wrapped around drawn up knees as he rocked back and forth on the flat piece of rock he was perched on, eyes staring at nothing. "Captain wouldn't do that."

Jeez, they were all going out of their fucking minds. Dugan quickly scanned over the rest of the Howling Commandos, checking on the rest of his team as he realized he was in temporary charge of seven of the most-- six. Six of the most...

He sucked in a breath, forcing his brain to focus on the boys. Morita was sitting silent and numb, unmoving and unspeaking, face blank. Cut-off denial. Okay, that wasn't too dangerous. Falsworth was rocking and muttering, trying not to cry, telling himself all sorts of things to make himself feel better. Active denial. Also not dangerous so long as he didn't snap before they could get help. Dernier was slumped, tears rolling nonstop down his face, staring out into the distance of the mountaints.
And Dugan was total shit because he hadn't been there to help. He still wasn't there to help, he was fucking useless and he had never thought the day had come that he'd have to watch one of his brothers die in the field.

Or worse, not watch it. Hear about it from afar and know there was absolutely nothing you could do while you're stuck on a fucking mountain miles away.

He kicked a rock angrily off the cliff, watching it tumble head over tail before falling and falling and falling. Fuck, like Barnes must have. And knowing Barnes and Rogers' tendency to never leave each other's side if they could help it...Rogers must'a seen the whole thing. No wonder the poor kid was freaking out.

And Jones was freaking out too, panicking and trying to help out Rogers and generally feeling as useless as Dugan was, probably.

It wasn't the first time they'd lost a soldier in this war. It wasn't the first time Dugan had lost a friend to the war either. He'd been on the front line when one of his war buddies got shot in the neck in front of him, watched him bleed out.

But this was Sergeant Barnes. He and Captain Rogers were...the fucking moon and the sun in the goddamned sky. The best two men Dugan had ever known.

And now half that pair was gone and they might lose the other half too, if they couldn't get a handle on this.

"What's happening? Is he calming down?" Dugan demanded into the walkie talkie, entirely uncomfortable with how quiet the other line had fallen.

Jones snorted humorlessly, his voice sounding dead and raspy - cried hoarse - as he answered back into the speaker.

"I don't think he's ever gonna calm down from this, Tim. He's too weak to pull himself off the edge though...I don't think he ever really wanted to die exactly. Maybe. Honestly I think he was more intent on saving Barnes than offing himself."

Dugan closed his eyes and pinched the bridge of his nose. "Jesus Christ. What the fuck are we supposed to do? Is Stark bringing a whole damn team to extract you guys? Because I don't think Stark can exactly lift a panicking supersoldier into a helicopter by himself."

"Radio him to get you guys first," Jones responded tiredly, leaning his head back against the train wall, staring at the gaping hole across from him. He was so fucking exhausted.

It had hit him all at once, an emotional storm of realizing Barnes was dead at the same time Steve rolled over to the edge of the train. He'd radioed in Barnes's death to the other Commandos. (Just six of them, now.) Then there was the panic that had set in as Jones shouted man down, because wherever the hell Steve was in his head at that moment he'd definitely recognized those two words.

And flipped the fuck out.

Jones turned his head and blinked slowly, looking a few feet further down the train car at Steve. He'd overexerted his muscles and probably his brain from all the crying and panicking and thrashing about. Now he was lying in a curled up ball on his side again, staring blankly ahead like a lifeless China doll.

The only thing that made him look more alive than his counterpart were the tears still dripping off his face.

The calm was terrifying, but it was better than when Steve had been rolling around and punching and screaming Bucky over and over - before just plain flat screaming in agony - trying to get over to the edge. Well, the calm wasn't exactly better. Easier to handle.

Gabe closed his eyes again, feeling along his jaw carefully. Steve had lashed out wildly, no finesse or plan in his punches and kicks, just raw pain and open hurt. The lack of intent was probably the only reason Jones was still alive. He was going to have a massive bruise on his jaw and his ribs were pretty battered but he'd escaped nearly unscathed giving the circumstances. Raging, crying supersoldier wasn't exactly the easiest person to wrestle.

Gabe opened his eyes back up at the sound of an engine, some not-numb part of his brain perking up at the sight of another human being. Help was here. It was a damned good thing too, because he was not cut out for handling Steve on his own.

Dugan jumped out of the helicopter - using the giant hole in the side of train as an entrance - not even bothering with a greeting before he rushed to Steve's side, trying to roll him out of the tight ball he'd wrapped himself in again.

Morita hopped out of the helicopter next, heading straight for Jones. He didn't say anything - asked if he was okay with a look. "Yeah, I'm fine," Jones replied tiredly, letting Morita throw an arm around his shoulders and help him up into the helicopter. Falsworth was sitting in one of the chairs, staring at the ground, and Dernier was sitting in another, staring out the window.

Jones plopped down next to them and stared at nothing at all.

A few minutes later, Dugan, Morita, and a soldier Jones didn't recognize all man-handled Steve into the helicopter. Steve stared blankly ahead, face still shining with tears and hair skewed in a thousand different directions. Dugan had at least thought to grab his helmet and shield, tossing them down onto the helicopter floor as they slowly took off. Apparently the extraction team had grabbed Doctor Zola from the front of the train while the Commandos were distracted with getting Steve into the helicopter.

Which was a really good idea because if Morita saw Zola's face right now, he'd bash it in. Any one of them would.

Morita stared out the window watching as the black train slowly grew smaller and smaller, a black speck of death in the stark white snow of the mountains.

They were only in the air for a few minutes before Howard Stark emerged from the cockpit, yanking his pilot helmet off his head and freezing in spot at the sight of all the beaten, broken Commandos.

"So he's really--" Stark started, face distorted with pain and horror.

"Yes," Morita answered, eyes cutting down to the gun in his hands. They were all still armed to the teeth. It was a wonder nothing had happened yet because of it. He looked back up, watching as Stark's face paled, like he was about to pass out. That might be a nice relief from reality, actually.

"Oh god," Stark whispered, a hand coming up to cover his mouth in shock. His eyes darted over each of them, finally landing on Steve.

His hand lowered back down to his side as he took a hesitant step forward, cautiously approaching Steve, who didn't even appear to see him.
"Steve?" Howard asked, crouching down beside him. There weren't enough seats for all of them and Rogers was too difficult to maneuver so they'd put him on the floor, propping him up against a wall.

Steve blinked a few times, eyes finally connecting with the real world as he looked at Stark up close. When he spoke, his voice came out as wrecked as if he'd been crying for days straight. "Howard?"

Stark leaned forward, clapping a hand on Steve's shoulder. "Yeah buddy, it's me. How're you holdin' up?"

Steve just stared at him blankly. Morita was pretty sure he'd only recognized Stark due to how rarely they saw each other. In whatever place Steve was in his head, the Commandos were a regular part of it and he couldn't see them, couldn't turn to them. Or maybe they reminded him too much of Bucky to process. Or maybe Stark was just the first person to approach Steve gently. The rest of them were too shaken to handle Steve right now.

At the look on Steve's face, Stark withdrew his hand, looking nervously at Steve while trying to hold back tears of his own. Morita wondered dimly if Stark had liked Barnes as much as Barnes seemed to like him.

"He's gone," Steve whispered, voice hoarse as a smoker's. Stark made a sympathetic face, biting his lip to keep the overwhelming emotions at bay. "He's gone," Steve said again, the first intelligible words besides Bucky and my fault they'd managed to get out of him.

And apparently they were the only words left in Steve's brain, because a dam broke somewhere and the stunned whispers evolved into miserable shouts and ramblings. "He's gone he's gone HE'S GONE and it's a-a-all my fault he's gone he's gone Bucky's gone he's g-gone, g-gone, gone gone g--"

Stark tried calming Steve down but Steve buried his head in his hands, the words still on repeat but at least muffled now. It ached just to watch him. The movie that had to be playing behind those blue eyes right now...

They'd been best friends forever. Inseparable was literally an understatement. They were more deeply integrated into each other's lives than most married couples Morita knew. Quite unfortunately, they really were the moon and the sun, unable for one to exist without the other.

He couldn't even imagine the kind of pain Steve was going through right now.

No one could have ever prepared for this, for losing Bucky. And losing Steve. Stark backed away from the broken-record that was Steve Rogers now, eyes wider than ever as he stared helplessly around at them. Yeah, join the club.

"Hey, you got a tranq gun? Or monkey gas?" Morita asked, looking up at Stark. Howard blinked a few times, stumbling as he straightened, a single tear slipping down his cheek that he quickly wiped away.

"A-a...what?" Stark asked, trying to suck in a steady breath. "I couldn't--"

"I think he'd probably appreciate being sedated right now," Dugan interrupted, his voice dead and his eyes turning up to look at Stark too. Howard paled a little more, twisting his hands and sniffing as he looked back over at Steve. Steve was rocking now, palms and long fingers still covering his face as he muttered to himself.

And as much as Steve needed the break from his own head before he went fucking nuts...Jones was sporting some pretty heavy bruises. That wasn't something they all needed to share. The sedation was as much for them as it was for Steve.

"Yeah, I'll. I'll be right back." Stark practically ran into the cockpit, more energy in him than any of the rest of them combined. Morita wasn't sure he could run for anything right now.

At least if they drugged Steve up for the ride home, maybe they could all find a way to piece themselves back together. Morita stared out the window and wondered how the hell any of them could be whole again.

~~~

"State your full name for the record, please."

"S-Steven Grant Rogers."

"Age?"

One year three months and twenty five days younger than James Buchanan Barnes.

Intake of air that patchily makes its way through swollen tubes to destroyed lungs. "Twen'y-five."

"Can you tell me how many fingers I'm holding up?"

The fingers were blurry with the waterfalls in Steve's eyes. With rainy days on the window ledge, watery hot cocoa in hand, holey socks in his lap, soft crooning of the sweetest voice - Steve's favorite sound - singing from the other end of the window ledge, golden waterdrops reflecting over icy blue eyes and a sketchbook in his hands.

How many fingers? More than he had left.

"Sev-v-ven?"

"Good. Can you breathe in for me, nice and slow."

He couldn't.

The doctor asked again.

He still couldn't.

"Alright. We'll come back to that. I'm going to listen to your heart now."

There's no point, he wanted to say. It's broken. It doesn't beat anymore. You won't hear a thing.

"Captain Rogers, your heartbeat is reaching dangerously high levels. I'm going to need you to calm down."

Steve blinked at the doctor. Jesus, Stevie, got a temper like a bull. You're gonna drive me mad one of these days, you hear me? Can't stop worryin' about you. You ever gonna spend a day in some semblance of calm?

He couldn't just calm down. He couldn't just calm down.

_Down down down down down._

_Falling._
"No no no no no," Steve moaned, burying his face in his hands. He couldn't breathe, his lungs weren't working, and he didn't care he didn't care at all, let them close up, let his whole body shut down. Pneumonia might as well be taking him again and he wouldn't care, not one bit, because then Steve would see him again.

*Til Death.

"-tain Rogers?" Unfamiliar fingers tried to pry his hands off his face. Steve jerked away, curling his body in half and tucking his forehead against his knees. It was too bright. Everything was too bright. The world didn't deserve to be so bright.

"I thought you said he was sedated," the doctor hissed to his nurse. Steve wasn't listening.

"He is, sir."

"You're telling me his heartbeat was faster at one point? Jeezum Crow. Is his team still waiting outside the tent? Bring 'em in here."

He'd promised. He'd promised Steve that he'd never leave him. He promised Steve he wouldn't die.

"YOU LYING BASTARD!!" Steve screamed, uncurling just in time for Dugan and Jones to grab his shoulders, shove him down onto a medical cot. He only struggled for a few moments, but the five men managed to hold him in some vague direction of down.

Down down down down down

Steve gave up. He deflated, nose squinching up as more tears streamed from the corners of his eyes. His chest was heaving again, up and down with little shakes. The rattle was back in his breathing, but it wasn't the one from his childhood, the dire sound Bucky used to worry about. It was just more sobbing, more pain, more protests from his body. Bucky wasn't here to worry about him anymore.

A callused hand brushed back his hair from his forehead, palm resting over his heated skin to catch a temperature reading. Bucky used to do that, used to check on him and make his little disapproving sounds. Steve whimpered, eyes squeezed shut tight.

"Allez chercher Stark," Dernier let go of Steve's ankle to motion at the nurse. She looked a little confused, so Jones clarified.

"Tell Stark to bring a sedative strong enough to knock Rogers out for the night."

"Good god," Falsworth whispered, squeezing Steve's wrist a little tighter. Steve's bottom lip was trembling.

"B-buackyy," he moaned, tossing his head to the side.

"I can't fucking do this," Morita mumbled, taking a step back from Steve. The rest of them didn't stop him as he backed out of the tent. They understood.

Steve didn't notice, he was in Brooklyn in 1934.

No, it doesn't look nothin' like it. I can't draw like you do, Stevie.

Hey! Give it back! You can't take my sketchbook you bastard!
Bucky! Language!

Come back here!

Steve laughs and runs faster, ducking behind the kitchen counter. Sarah isn't home, so they aren't going to get in trouble for running in the house. Bucky chases after him, cursing as his holy socks slide on the rough wood.

It's not fair, you're so tiny you can run around like a little annoying kitten!

I'm not a kitten you weirdo, you're just slo-oof!

Give it...back...Rogers!

Steve screams and laughs harder, trying to escape from where Bucky's grabbed him around the waist. But it's all too easy for Bucky to pick him up off the ground - just a few inches - and Steve squeals, kicking his feet.

Let me...see your...drawing dammit!

Bucky drops Steve in sheer surprise of the curse word and Steve woops a victory and runs again, scuttling around the couch to sit on the floor and open up sketchbook, flipping to the last filled page.

The picture is of him.

He blinks up at Bucky, who'd come around to stand in front of Steve, hands shoved nervously in his pockets.

Can I keep this? Steve asks, blinking back tears. Bucky looks at him confusedly.

It's no good, Bucky replies.

Steve looks back down at the drawing. He's never seen a picture of him that he liked. Bucky’s drawing makes him look...whole. Bright, almost like the sunshine in a way.

Okay, great. I'm glad you think so, because I'm keeping it. Steve carefully tears the page out of the thin sketchbook, folding it and tucking it inside his jacket, against his heart.

Bucky rolls his eyes. You are such a sap. It's no good, I'm telling you.

Steve just smiles, eyes still a little watery.

Bucky leans over and wipes underneath Steve's eye with his thumb, collecting the unfallen tears with an affectionate shake of his head.

Bucky wasn't here to do that anymore.

No one wiped away his tears now.

~~~*~
February 29, 1945

"What can we do?" Falsworth asked softly, plopping down on the ground next to Steve. He looked up from his sketchbook, blinking as the rest of the Commandos held back the flap of his tent, all standing and waiting, in uniform like Steve was. He'd only come into his tent to change, actually. The sketchbook had been sitting there, black and unobtrusive and waiting to be picked up.

He didn't have a photo album to flip through and he didn't really want one either, not when he had this. Steve had sat down on the ground Indian style, crossing his legs and picking up the sketchbook, running his hands over the cover.

It had been Bucky's parting gift to him. The day he'd gotten back from basic training he'd given it to Steve, despite all of Steve's protests. They're gonna ship me out one day, Stevie. And you better keep me up to date with everything that happens to you, alright? Just draw, and when I come home you can show me your sketchbook and it'll be like I didn't miss a thing at all.

His voice was still so clear in Steve's head, every single version of it. Memories of the young whiny sound as he swung his legs off the counter, telling Steve's mom all about the pretty girl he'd seen at school that day. When he'd gone through puberty, his voice cracking right in the middle of yelling at Steve one time, making them both start laughing and forget whatever fight over Steve's safety they'd been in. The slight Brooklyn tang in some of his vowels as they were teens, the way that edge softened after basic. The older, worried tone of voice he'd spoken with just last year.

The scream as he fell from the train, Steve lunging for him and not being fast enough, not reaching far enough.

Steve's head dropped, a tear falling onto the front of the black sketchbook in his lap. He couldn't even bring himself to turn the first page. All the stories he'd been planning to tell Bucky, his drawings of different city skylines from his USA tour, the sketches that eventually turned into dancing monkeys as he got more and more frustrated with being stuck spinning his wheels.

And of course all the sketches he'd drawn of Bucky in the past year...they were all here, inside this little book that Steve couldn't open. The last year of the life of Bucky Barnes, as documented by Steve Rogers, but he couldn't look at it. Not when he could still hear that scream, echoing in his head over and over and over.

He'd been right about February all along. All of the bad feelings, the distaste and confusion for it. The world really did end on the last day, the 28th. It cut off there because that's the day that the planet stopped turning, that's the day that Steve's entire world came to a close as the greatest thing to ever be his slipped through his fingers on the side of a train.

Bucky wasn't the only one to fall. Steve was already dead, living in some half-real afterlife. Today didn't feel real, nothing but this sketchbook in his hands felt real. Which was fine, because exactly a year from today, this day wouldn't exist. The 29th of February, what an ironic time to mourn.

He blinked, taking a few seconds to focus back in on the sketchbook in his hands. There were more tears streaking the cover now, that Steve couldn't remember crying. His cheeks were cold though, glistening wet again. He hadn't gone an hour without crying yet, since it happened. Since the fall.
Steve sucked in a shaky breath, oxygen catching in his throat against more tears as he rubbed the salty water from the black cover, not wanting it to stain with waterspots. Tearstains would at least be fitting, and it was probably too late to undo the water entirely, so he gave up after a few swipes, letting it fall back into his lap.

He almost didn't believe it. Not just in the shocked sort of way; like it didn't feel real. That scream was real. Steve had been there. That scream had been very very real.

That wasn't why he almost didn't believe it. It was bigger than that.

When Steve had stood in front of Colonel Phillips -this same sketchbook tucked inside his leather jacket- and asked for one name, Sergeant James Barnes of the 107th...he'd been given Phillips's condolences.

He'd been told Bucky was dead.

But that couldn't be right. Steve had known it wasn't right. He'd have known if Bucky had died. He'd have felt it in his core. The world would shift, everything would change. He had been entirely, 100% sure that he would physically feel pain when Bucky Barnes died.

Not just the kind of pain from watching someone you love fall to their deaths and the shock of their absence. The kind of pain like a hole, like something was missing inside Steve's chest. Not just sorrow, but something physical and tangible.

He hadn't felt it when Bucky had been a prisoner of war. The world was still in the same vibrant colors, so Bucky had to be alive. And on that gut instinct, on that one feeling Steve absolutely knew to be true, he'd stormed a Hydra base by himself. And he'd been right. His body had been right, Bucky had been alive, and Steve saved him. He'd saved Bucky because he knew in his soul that Bucky was alive.

And now that he'd seen Bucky die with his own two eyes...

It was killing Steve. It was eating him up because he still didn't have that hole in his soul. The world hadn't shifted. The colors hadn't dimmed. His heart was broken in sorrow but he wasn't in the kind of pain he'd spent his entire life so sure he'd be in when Bucky died.

The piece that he should be missing wasn't gone.

He hated himself for it. He hated himself for it so much because Bucky was dead and the world hadn't ended.

If he hadn't been there to see the fall, Steve would be storming the mountain ravine right now, looking for Bucky. If someone had only told Steve that Bucky was dead, he wouldn't believe them because somehow, his soul was still intact.

He'd been so sure. So sure he'd know, he'd feel it. He didn't. He didn't feel anything but raw, empty pain.

The hole wasn't there and Steve wanted it to be true, wanted Bucky to be alive, but it was impossible for him to have survived that fall.

It wasn't fair, because the world didn't deserve to keep spinning with those same bright colors. It wasn't fair that nothing changed. It wasn't fair that Steve's body was telling him Bucky was still alive.

How was he supposed to live with that?
How was he supposed to live with his body screaming at him that Bucky was still alive, waiting to be found?

Steve had to go find him. He was out there and Steve had to find him and he knew Bucky was alive but he'd seen him fall, he couldn't be.

His body and his soul and his mind was telling him otherwise and Steve couldn't live with that.

He couldn't physically survive this feeling, could he?

If Bucky were here, he'd call Steve a drama queen and he'd laugh, that beautiful sound that filled places and lit them up with the most beautiful glow in the world.

He was never going to hear Bucky's laugh again. Oh god.

A hand came up to cover his mouth from the broken sound ripping up his throat as Steve curled down, squeezing his eyes shut against the new flood of tears spilling over and tried to get a damn grip on himself. Bucky wasn't coming back, there was no one to save him from himself now.

"C'mon, Stevie. Pick your head up. It ain't that bad. It ain't that bad, okay? A warm, familiar voice sounded in his head. He knew the exact expression Bucky would have on if he saw Steve now...the way he'd crouch down next to him, wiping away the tears on Steve's cheeks with his rough palms, chiding Steve to stop crying unless he wanted Bucky to start crying too.

"Buck," Steve choked, lifting a hand to his cheek, placing it over the imaginary one Bucky had cupped to Steve's jaw. His fingers fell through air, landing on his own skin instead of Bucky's. Bucky, who he'd never touch again.

Steve. I need you to be strong now more than ever, man. I swear, I'll come back and haunt your ass if you don't stop cryin' over me like some dame. The Bucky in his head scolded and Steve huffed a laugh because good god, even in his head Bucky was bitchy with his affection.

He blinked the tears away, running his fingers over the edges of the sketchbook. There was so much he'd never told Bucky. All those nights in Brooklyn, looking out over the bridge with Bucky at his side. For the first time since the war started, Steve understood what all the soldiers felt when they wrote about how homesick they were.

"I just wanna go home," Steve whispered, dissipating to nothing with no-one to listen anymore. They should've jumped the tracks together. They should've fallen together. They did everything together in life, that's the way it should've been in death too.

His hands they shook and head it spun. Bucky had found so much in life, he had been the most alive person Steve had ever known. Even after he'd been a prisoner of war, he'd come back alive in a different sort of way - a darker, more serious kind that meant he'd met death and come back even more determined to live.

And now he wasn't alive at all.

He just wanted to go back home. He wanted to stand in the middle of the Brooklyn Bridge, Bucky at his side. Looking over the water, eyes following the tension lines, the sweeping architecture of the dark brick. The familiar embrace of the cobblestone streets. The dim streetlights that flickered, the dark alleys with their hidden secrets, the smell of salt and sweat at the docks Bucky used to work.

If he could somehow go back now, to their old apartment, looking out over the view he'd drawn more than anything (besides Bucky)...would Bucky's ghost find him there? Would Brooklyn take Steve back in, give him back the warmth he'd lost from his core?

Or when Steve was asking to go back home...maybe he meant the home of Bucky's hand in his.

He stared down at the sketchbook, trying to focus on anything but the memories trying to haunt him. The ghost of Bucky's fingers, wrapping tight around Steve's hands. Ever since they were kids, always grabbing on to each other tight. Never letting go.

And Steve had let go.

Fuck, he had let go.

Thankfully, that was the moment that Falsworth stepped into Steve's tent, sitting down in front of him with that question hanging in the air between them. What can we do?

Steve sat the sketchbook back down, sliding it across Bucky's sleeping bag, sniffing and rubbing at his eyes. He was such a fucking mess.

All of the Commandos - only six of them, now - waited patiently as Steve sucked in some ounce of courage through his mouth, pursing his lips to keep his eyes from spilling over again. They were back to watering, and might permanently be.

He looked up at the silent men, at Falsworth sitting beside him, the solemn faces at the entrance to his tent. They'd all lost one of their best friends too. And here they were, trying to help Steve through this because they knew, they knew better than anyone how damn much Bucky meant, how big a piece of Steve's heart was dedicated to him. They had been there for the fights and the laughter and...

Steve blinked back more tears, attempting some form of a smile as he looked up gratefully at his band of brothers. His family.

"You can get me drunk," Steve offered brokenly, the words so full of emotion that he had to bite his lip to keep from losing it and bawling all over again.

No one so much as huffed a laugh at the irony of it. For a year they'd been trying to convince him to join them and now finally Steve wanted to get so drunk he forgot his own name but there wasn't a single thing to celebrate. Falsworth reached over to clap Steve on the shoulder, tugging him to his feet. Steve's body shook and he hated that he couldn't control this, couldn't honor Bucky's death with a respectful quiet sigil. That he was in such shambles. Bucky deserved better, he always deserved better.

He deserved better than this war. He'd enlisted because he knew how much it meant to Steve. He'd come over here and been tortured and isolated and driven nearly mad. The psychological damage had been heartbreaking and intense and Steve had never even been allowed to see the physical damage to its full extent. Whatever it had been, Bucky deserved so much better.

He'd stayed in this war for Steve and he deserved better than that too. If Steve hadn't asked him to stay, Bucky would be alive right now. He could be in Brooklyn, maybe even taking art classes again. Writing Steve letters and drawing him pictures on the back because Bucky never drew enough, always felt intimidated by Steve.

Steve had killed him because he was so damn selfish he'd wanted Bucky at his side. He'd always wanted Bucky at his side and now his best friend was dead because of it. Bucky deserved so so so
If Steve had known Bucky would leave him, Steve would have sent him home. He would have insisted, pulled every string he had to get Bucky on the next flight back to New York. If he had known he'd lose Bucky to his fight, Steve may never have joined the fight at all.

"Where to, Cap?" Dugan asked softly, fingering the keys of a jeep. They could go anywhere they wanted in just one car now, because there was only six of them left. Steve gave Dugan a weak smile that turned down at the edges, everything feeling like it was made of water and ice.

"That bar..." Steve started, thinking back over his memories. He wouldn't be able to go to the last one they'd been at, less than a month ago. Where he and Bucky had danced, where they'd waltzed across the floor together, spinning forever and forever under the golden glow of the dim lights--

He covered his mouth with his hand again to stop the choked sound trying to escape his throat. Two more hands landed on his shoulders, Jones on one side and Morita's on his upper back. This was so fucking hard. How was he ever going to learn to function like this?

"The first one," he finally managed, speaking as quickly as he could to still get the words out in the right order, anticipating the next time that memories of Bucky decided to rip his heart wide open again. "Where I asked you to come fight with me."

"Ending where it started," Falsworth said under his breath, nodding to himself as he opened the jeep door for Steve. The ending. Finished, over, done, no longer. God, the end. The end of the li--

He shut down that thought so fast he was left blinking in reality like someone had hit him with a cold splash of water to the face. Everyone was looking at him worriedly because he was still just standing here and dammit he had to stop spacing out. With shaking legs he stepped up into the jeep - the last time he'd been in the backseat of a jeep, Bucky had been next to him, rolling his eyes like a drama queen as he spouted off more BS about how he was totally fine - and sank into the seat defeated.

Steve's hand clapped over his eyes now, squeezing the sides of his temples and trying to convince himself to calm down, to chill out because this was the end. He had to accept that. Bucky was gone.

"I-I," Steve started, his vocal chords grating and wrecked and hating him almost as much as he hated himself. He'd never get the chance to say this to the person who deserved to hear it the most...but he could say it to the Commandos, to the family that was holding him together right now.

"I'm sorry," Steve whispered again, his bottom lip trembling as he looked to each of their faces. It wasn't enough, he could never say enough. Could never apologize enough. They had put up with his crying and screaming and his punches, had held strong and steady beside him. The best men he'd ever known, standing stronger by his side now than ever. And all while he was a goddamned mess -- Steve, I'm a fucking mess. I don't even know what kind of mess I am anymore. Hey, Bucky, listen to me. Whatever the mess you are, you're my mess okay? You're not alone.

You're not alone.

"I'm so sorry," Steve whispered again, his voice breaking this time as the rain started back down his cheeks.

Five strong pairs of arms came around him, cradling him in the safest hold he'd ever been in and Steve cried, cried and cried, maybe he was never going to stop crying. And his Commandos were never going to let go.

Not like he did.
Howard had patched through the news to her the moment he got off the radio with Dugan. Peggy's hand had covered her mouth in shock, a sharp gasp escaping anyways. She'd been in the strategy room at the time, everyone quietly discussing amongst themselves. All heads turned to her at the sound she made, expressions of surprise and confusion. Her eyes were already watering, so she'd managed an excuse me and hurried out of the room as quickly as three inch heels can allow.

They hadn't let her see Steve the night he got back. She hadn't asked to; she had no place to intrude on...this. On losing Barnes.

Once a group of soldiers had carried a - apparently sedated? - Steve to the medical tent, Howard had come to find her. She'd wiped away the fallen tears by then, had put on a fresh coat of lipstick and done her hair up in tighter rolls. The best defensive mechanism to despair was dressing up, despite how foolish and girly the idea felt.

Stark's eyes had been puffy and red by the time he found her sitting alone in the empty officer's tent. He'd sat down across from her, blinking up at the sky to rid his bottom lashes of the threat of more tears.

"How's Steve?" Peggy had finally asked. Howard had just looked at her for a bit, his hands clasped tightly in his lap.

"Not so hot," he'd replied. "Hell of a lot more messed up than anyone's seen him."

Anyone but Bucky, probably, Peggy thought. She doubted there was a side of Steve that Bucky didn't know. There wasn't a single thing about Steve that Bucky didn't know. And perhaps at one point that had gone both ways...

But now there was something about Bucky that Steve didn't know. That no one in the entire world knew, except for her. She was the soul survivor of the deepest secret Bucky Barnes ever held and the weight of that was unimaginably crushing. Sergeant Barnes had given his life for Steve Rogers. Sergeant Barnes had been so totally, completely, helplessly in love with Steve Rogers. And now Steve would never know.

Unless Peggy told him.

"I think he could really use some comfort, once he calms down." Howard sighed, giving her a side glance. She almost would have laughed, except for there wasn't a single part of her left with capability to do that.

"From me?" Peggy gave Howard a look, because she wasn't the person that Steve would turn to right now if he had the choice. It'd be Bucky, it had always been Bucky. He'd been the guiding North Star for Steve their entire life.

How could she compare to that? How could she possibly hold a candle to what Bucky Barnes had done for Steve? There was a part of her that wanted to believe Steve Rogers loved her, because it felt as though he truly might. But even if he did, even if he wanted to marry her like Barnes had said...it was nothing compared to the rivers that ran between Rogers and Barnes.

No one knew Steve like Bucky did. No one had him all the way. She may have been acquaintances with him before the serum, but she was a lifetime behind Bucky.

Years of dedication, years of something so much deeper than affection. Now that she knew them both, she couldn't imagine Steve without Bucky. She'd counted on never having to. Sergeant Barnes had been so grateful when Peggy told him she still wanted Bucky in Steve's life, regardless of his feelings. But it had been a purely selfish move - she needed Bucky to be what she couldn't be in Steve's life. Bucky gave Steve the understanding and history and reliability and easy companionship that she simply couldn't...

She couldn't compare to that. She was no replacement for Bucky Barnes. How could anyone ask her to be?

But Steve had to have someone to turn to. He couldn't weather this alone and Peggy couldn't think of a single thing more important than helping Steve through this.

"He leans on you, you know." Stark had said, leaning forward to clasp his hands on the table between them. "You're his support team. You've always had faith in him, always stood by his side and given him something to fight for. As much as I don't want to flatter you Peg, you inspire all kinds of courage in a man like that."

She'd just looked away because as much as she'd like to believe that, she couldn't. She'd always had faith in him, yes. Maybe even given him something to fight for, although it would just be adding to the list because Steve was already fighting for so much. And she'd stood by his side in meetings, in mind.

But she hadn't covered his six. She hadn't nearly fried her hands off ripping electrical fence away from his body. She hadn't killed specifically for him, hadn't offered her entire life to him. She hadn't died for him.

Bucky Barnes's shoes were too big for her to fill, but who else would be there to even try?

"I'll see him tomorrow," Peggy had told Howard, her mind already racing with the conversation. If she was taking on Bucky's responsibilities now...

Did she have the responsibility to tell Steve too? Didn't Steve deserve to know that the man who gave his life for him loved Steve in every sense of the word? Didn't Bucky's memory deserve to be honored with that?

*

By the time Peggy found the tavern (for the second time - the last time she'd been in her red dress, watching with a twinkle in her eye as the entire bar fell silent at her presence), she'd spent hours lying awake and thinking about what Barnes had told her. The confession he'd screamed, falling into pieces the moment the words left his mouth.

I loved him first.

He had. Bucky Barnes had loved him first. And Steve had lost Bucky first. Now here she was, a watery wine to replace the rich whiskey of that love. But she'd do the best she could at saving Steve. She owed that much to them both.

The tavern was a burnt out shell of a building, a husk destroyed by fire and war. The rubble shifted treacherously under her heels as Peggy peered inside, stepping over a chunk of wood that may have been a door at some point. The walls still smelled like smoke, the tables overturned and riddled with bullets. It was a poignant place to mourn, in the least.

She walked carefully over brittle boards, surrounded by degradation and death as she looked for Steve. The last time she'd come looking for Steve here, he'd been in the very back room, sitting with only Barnes. An entire bar full of people dying to talk to him and befriend him and thank him and he had secluded himself to the back, just the two of them.

That was the first day she'd realized Bucky was in love with Steve.

It was in the same back room that Peggy finally found Steve again. This time he didn't turn around perfectly in sync with the rough man beside him. He didn't even hear her at first; if she'd been an enemy with a gun he'd be dead. It was the first sign of how far gone he had to be...the best soldier in the world got snuck up on by a woman in heels walking through rubble and not bothering to be the slightest bit quiet.

But Steve did eventually hear her, turning around in his seat. Her breath caught at the look on his face - those confident beautiful blue eyes were swollen and teary, his bottom lip trembling slightly. He looked so positively miserable her heart ached in her chest. He only looked at her for a brief moment before turning his head back down, staring at the table.

Peggy stepped forward, walking carefully as she neared the place of Steve's vigil. He sniffed, leaning forward to grab a bottle of alcohol from the center of the table. It was mostly empty.

"Doctor Erskine said that...the serum wouldn't just affect my muscles. It would affect my cells." Steve's voice sounded like he'd been crying for days. The past two at least. He poured himself a drink as he spoke, filling up the bottom of a glass she had a feeling had already been filled quite a few times. "Create a...protective system, of regeneration and healing. Which means, um..."

He paused and Peggy called upon every ounce of strength she had. Bucky wouldn't break down crying right now, would he? Somebody had to be strong for Steve. The task had fallen to her - quite literally - and she couldn't fail that ghost now.

She managed to keep her tears at bay as Steve finally spoke again, his voice sounding wretchedly, terribly broken.

"I can't get drunk." Steve stared at the glass, eyes watering and so positively heartbreaking. Then he turned his head a little, not quite looking at her as the sorrow in his voice tinged with a deadened version of interest that didn't sound like interest at all. "Did you know that?"

Pity wasn't something in Peggy's usual repertoire of emotions, but she felt so extremely sorry for Steve right now she couldn't even begin to express her sympathies. Of all the times to get drunk, now would be that, and he didn't even have that option of escape.

Somehow, she kept her voice professional as she picked up a fallen chair, perching it by Steve and sitting down to face him.

"Your metabolism burns four times faster than the average person. He thought it could be one of the side effects." Now that she could properly see his face, Peggy took a moment to look at him. His eyes cut away, a watery intake of breath as he stared through the table. She'd never imagined seeing Steve this...broken. Hurting. Guilty.

She gave him a few moments of silence before she decided there was no point talking around it anymore. Barnes was dead and Steve was in so much pain he'd lost every ounce of sunshine he used to tote around and throw at people. Peggy leaned forward, attempting to catch those teary blue eyes so he could see the sincerity she tried to portray through her voice.

"It wasn't your fault," Peggy promised, her mouth tight with sympathy. Steve deflated, brightness downcast.

"Did you read the report?" He said tiredly, like it was an answer instead of a question.
"Yes." Howard had been the one to get her the file. Apparently Steve had to write it all down because every time he tried to debrief they had to stop because he kept breaking down in tears. That he had been there, clinging to the train, watching Bucky fall...she couldn't imagine a worse way to watch someone die.

Steve gave a little of course nod at her admission, huffing a breath and still not looking at her.

"Well, then you know that's not true," Steve managed, the self-deprecating tone about a thousand times worse than the tears in his eyes.

"You did everything you could," Peggy told him, not letting his words echo for a single second before she cut them off. It wasn't Steve's fault. Not an ounce of it was.

Even if Bucky had chosen to jump - which he hadn't, but he would have if it meant saving Steve's life. Even then, it wouldn't be Steve's fault. Because it wasn't Steve's choice, it was Bucky's.

And Bucky was in love with him.

Peggy watched Steve with careful eyes, calculating. There was so much pain there. So much history, years and years of an undying friendship and an unbreakable bond.

This was the moment she had to decide.

A man with a secret big enough to shake the world, keeping it hidden dark and safely away until the moment came that he gave it all up to save that life he loved more than he ever should have. It was a heartbreaking love story, one she'd admittedly spent some time crying over. On Steve's behalf for losing the incredible man that was his best friend and on Bucky's behalf for never getting the chance to tell Steve he loved him.

And on her behalf, because the whole thing was too heavy for her shoulders. This may be the biggest choice she'd ever made. And if she married Steve, it could stand to be the biggest choice of her lifetime. If she was going to tell Steve, she had to tell him now. And if she kept that from him, sealed her lips in silence...that silence would have to be permanent. Every time Steve mentioned Bucky in years ahead, she'd have to keep quiet and take this pit in her stomach all over again.

She'd be haunted by this secret for the rest of her life. Of knowing she had the responsibility to share with Steve the most crucial part of his best friend, to help Steve understand why Bucky had to give Steve his life, his everything. If she didn't, she'd be lying to Steve forever.

But she'd made a promise.

She'd made a promise to a man that had trusted her with everything, his entire life and future and happiness. She'd made a promise to a man who had died for that promise. She couldn't break it now.

She'd keep quiet for Bucky. It was the last thing she could do for him - besides take care of Steve - and of course she'd do it. Keeping this promise was the only thing she could give left to his memory and it was her duty - her honor - to let Bucky's secret die with her.

"Did you believe in your friend?" Peggy leaned forward, her words full of intent and focus. Steve looked to her, looked directly at her for the first time tonight. His eyes were redder than she'd thought. He just looked at her, the words echoing in between them. Did you believe in your friend? It didn't need an answer. They both knew it in their cores.

"Did you respect him?" Peggy pressed, her sincerity unmistakable. Steve looked away again, but she was fairly sure he might be listening to her. Or at least thinking of how much he believed in Bucky, how much he respected him. The proud way he said Sergeant Barnes, knowing that was something Bucky had earned all for himself, long before Steve was anything more than a little artist from Brooklyn.

"Then stop blaming yourself." It wasn't Steve's fault. Steve hadn't done a single thing wrong. His best friend had fallen for him and that wasn't Steve's fault. She may not be able to start her next sentence with because he was in love with you Steve, but she could at least still do honor to the memory of that love. "...and allow Barnes the dignity of his choice."

I LOVED HIM FIRST! I loved him first. You don't understand...he's my entire world.

She could still see the look on his face, hear the passion in his voice...

"He damn well must have thought you were worth it," Peggy finished. She hoped that if there was an after life, Bucky would be looking down on this moment and understand. That he would know she was doing the best she could.

She'd keep his secret forever, but Steve still needed to feel how much Bucky had loved him right now. Bucky had absolutely thought Steve was worth it. She would know. The only one who really knew, and Steve had no idea. For all he knew, she'd never spoken to Bucky at all.

It might as well be that way now, because Barnes was dead and Steve was practically dead too. The sun in his eyes was gone, the hope in his chest that made this war something to believe in.

"I'm going after Schmidt," Steve finally said. There was a movie playing in his eyes that Peggy wished she could see, only it didn't belong to her. And there was a bitter revenge in his voice that didn't - shouldn't - belong to Steve.

"I'm not going to stop 'til all of Hydra is dead, or captured." He tacked on the captured a bit like an after thought. It was a promise of the darkest kind, a promise of death and revenge and blood spilt in Bucky's name. This wasn't about America anymore. This was about avenging Bucky.

But it didn't matter, because this was still Steve. Even the broken Bucky-less version of Steve was the best man she'd ever known. When the end came down to it, he'd still do the right thing. Even if he only chose the right thing for Bucky, too.

And Peggy made - another - promise of her own. Two boys written across the stars and two promises she'd never break.

And she meant it in as many ways as she could, finally accepting what she had to do now. This was the closest she'd ever come to stepping into Bucky Barnes's shoes and accepting his responsibilities as her own.

"You won't be alone."

~~~*~

February 28, 1945

Snow, and red.

The same nightmare, the same red-stained snow.
A nightmare he'd had before.

Except this time it wasn't some curly blonde-headed kid who was bleeding out. It wasn't a conglomeration of black wasps heaped over each other, riddled with machine gun bullets. It wasn't even the minefield of deaths he was responsible for.

It was him.

Everything was so clear it didn't feel real. Watching through a very cold, very detached microscope of his own life. Holy shit, he was fucking cold.

There was a lot of red.

He could still see the blue of his coat, but he couldn't quite figure out where the red was coming from.

Or why the fuck Heaven looked a hell of a lot like the bottom of a snowy ravine.

...oh. Duh. He'd landed himself in Hell. Of course he hadn't made it to Heaven.

Funny, the only ping of sadness he could feel was that now he wasn't going to see Steve again. God, Steve. He better have crawled the fuck back into that train and shot Armin Zola in the face.

Well, no. Steve wouldn't do that. Bucky would, but that was why he was here in Hell, wasn't it?

He was really fucking cold, and he couldn't figure out where all the red was coming from. The sky and the snowflakes were really clear, but whenever he tried to lift his head to focus on the blood in his peripherals, his head filled with sand and pounding and basically he wasn't going to be lifting his head anytime soon.

Steve had told him once that glitter was tiny pieces of glass. The snow looked like glitter but maybe since this was Hell it really was little pieces of glass raining down on him.

Why was he so much colder than the snow? Oh. He was wet. Being wet in the freezing cold was not a good idea at all.

That was weird...he could remember a splash, maybe he'd landed in the river at the bottom of the ravine. Maybe Hell started off wherever you died. And then you laid there in your own personal doom, dead and looking up at snowflakes that had stopped looking pretty the first time Steve had almost gotten frostbite.

They still looked gorgeous in Steve's blond hair, though.

Steve.

It was really cold.

~~~*~

February 29, 1945
It was dark when his eyes blinked back open again. He kept drifting in and out of consciousness, but it didn't feel anything like sleep. Which he supposed made sense, because you weren't supposed to be able to get any rest in Hell. He'd read that somewhere. Or maybe Steve had told him.

Steve had better be okay.

It was a shame he couldn't be a ghost because if he could chose any way to spend eternity, it'd be haunting Steve.

Because he was a selfish bastard that simply could not let Steve go and would rather Steve live with a ghost chasing him down than have Steve be in peace.

There was no way to tell how much time had passed. Or if there even was time in Hell. Bucky wondered if he was going to lay here in the cold for eternity, surrounded with blood.

Was Steve okay?

He'd be pretty upset. Bucky wasn't stupid enough to pretend he wouldn't be. But the Howling Commandos would take care of his boy. And Peggy would take care of him. She better fucking take care of him.

The world kind of spun and then everything shut down black again.

When his eyes blinked open for the sixth time since the first time, he heard a noise. A weird, groaning and crunching noise. Like wheels on snow. Maybe Hell wasn't just lying here forever after all.

Then there were footsteps. God, people walked so loudly, even in Hell. Didn't that drive them insane? To hear themselves everywhere they walked? How did the loud, auditory reminder of their existence not make them want to scream?

A fluffy hat swam into focus, then a face underneath a fluffy hat. An entire torso, looking down at him. Bucky tried to lift his head. It still didn't want to lift. He just blinked. The guy looked kind of startled when he blinked. Maybe he'd expected Bucky to lie silent in his death.

Maybe none of the other guys that ended up in Hell blinked. Bucky didn't know. It was his first time. Well, kind of. His first time officially. There'd been lots of times he'd felt in Hell before. And he was entirely 110% not surprised it was made of ice instead of fire. He'd always figured it would be.

The fluffy hat-guy turned to look at something else, firing off a command in a language that Bucky didn't understand. Then there were hands on his shoulders, lifting him up an inch or two.

Panic shot through his veins and Bucky tried to scream but his body still wasn't connecting with his brain. His mouth didn't open, vocal chords didn't budge. Strange people's hands were on him when he couldn't move and couldn't scream there was no version of this that ended well.

A rough hand cuffed the back of his jacket at the base of his neck, the back of gloved fingers pressed up against the top knob of his spine. If those fingers turned around and pressed they could break his spinal cord connection to his brain. It was terrifyingly vulnerable and more than anything Bucky wanted to scream, wanted to scratch and claw and fight his way out of here. Break bones with his knuckles and just run and run but he couldn't move.

A rough hand cuffed the back of his jacket at the base of his neck, the back of gloved fingers pressed up against the top knob of his spine. If those fingers turned around and pressed they could break his spinal cord connection to his brain. It was terrifyingly vulnerable and more than anything Bucky wanted to scream, wanted to scratch and claw and fight his way out of here. Break bones with his knuckles and just run and run but he couldn't move.

The hand on his jacket lifted him a bit higher, dragging him backwards with a rough tug. The pull on his jacket lifted it an inch above his waistline, his undershirt coming with it. Bitter ice and terrible burning cold flayed his skin, an inch of his skin at the bottom of his back. Like it was getting peeled off from the cold and dragging.

The arm pulling him - fuck, where were they taking him and why the fuck couldn't he move - suddenly tugged him faster with a jerk and Bucky's head tipped forward and that's when he finally sourced the blood.

He was missing an arm.

His left arm, and actually just the bottom half of it, specifically. It was leaving behind a spotted red trail of blood as they dragged him and if he had control of his body he'd be thrashing and screaming and freaking the fuck out right now.

But he couldn't, so he just stared.

Why the fuck would they sever his limbs when he was dead? It was cut off just above the elbow. God, that was scary to look at.

For the first time since he'd fallen off the train, Bucky was a little glad he was dead. He wasn't sure he could handle losing an arm when he was alive.

That was his last thought before everything went black again.

*

When he woke up, he was on a metal table. Now this part, Bucky was very familiar with.

This was Hell.

*

He realized he wasn't actually dead about twelve hours later.

Bucky had been disoriented as hell when he woke up strapped down to a metal table. He remembered getting dragged through the snow, the bloody trail of his arm. Passing out, probably from shock or pain or both. Something about the back of a moving vehicle, lots of shouting with words he couldn't understand. Then waking up in here, under harsh industrial lights.

Blaring bright up above him, whiter than the nice gold lights he was used to. After a few dozen blinks they calmed down from the glare and kind of drifted into the background and he realized it actually wasn't bright in here at all. Here was a room with no windows, longer than it was wide, bigger than the last lab he'd been in. That was all he could tell from looking because his head still wasn't quite cooperating with him.

He could twitch the fingers of his right hand and it felt like he could twitch the fingers of his left too, but he knew that wasn't possible because he didn't have a left hand anymore.

So much for ever being able to snipe again. Although, really, was that the worst thing he'd lose without a left hand? He must lead a very miserable lonely life if that's the biggest change being one-handed was going to do for him.

He'd only just managed to settle the lights from their harsh glare when suddenly the ceiling was moving, everything was moving. The table he was on apparently had wheels and he was getting rolled and this was not fun at all. Especially since he still couldn't tell where they were taking him.
And he still couldn't do anything about it.

The smell hit him first. Fire and smoke and death are three scents that have a very unique property when they're combined, and you don't ever forget that smell. It hit him just before he felt the warmth at his toes.

He'd heard some rumors about some pretty awful things the Nazis were doing to Jews in their creepy camps. He had no idea how much of it was true, but if they cremated him right now and blew his ashes in the air as a black dust to settle over the snow...he'd come back from whatever next ring of Hell they'd sent him to and kick all of their asses.

It looked a little like a casket, or maybe a really large pizza oven like the one in that place on the corner two blocks down from his and Steve's apartment.

He wondered if Steve was missing him. Bucky sure could use a knight with shining shield to come to his rescue right now. But no matter what Steve did for the rest of his life, he'd already totaled up so much good and wonderful that he'd be sent to Heaven, hands down.

Bucky wasn't ever going to see him again and that thought hurt enough that he decided he didn't care he was being put into an oven.

Turns out it wasn't an oven, it was a defroster. He'd been frozen stiff, which kind of made sense since he'd died falling into a frozen river. The cold tingled and dripped away from his fingers and legs and torso, drying out his icy stiff clothes and making his hair all damp against his forehead.

His hair had looked really nice before he fell off the train. What a shame.

They pulled him back out of the oven/defroster before he'd even began to feel warm. But he told his brain to lift his foot experimentally and it rose an inch off the table.

That's when the shouting had started and the leather straps had made their appearance. Bounding down his ankles, legs, torso, wrist, arm.

They'd kept him strapped to the metal table for a while, lots of people in coats and lots of people in fatigues coming in and out of sight. There seemed to be some confusion as to what to do with him, although they couldn't have been confused because he was hooked up to unknown fluids and currently tied to a table, so.

He was also tied down with the exact same leather strap pattern he'd been tied down with in Zola's lab.

Which would make sense, if he was dead and this was Hell. The worst Hell was what you already knew, right?

But then an English guy came in, speaking in hushed tones to another soldier. Up until that point there had been a splattering of languages he hadn't recognized. Now that there were comprehensible words being spoken, of course he listened in.

"How is he even alive?" came the English voice. Bucky would have cocked his head in confusion if he could move. He could open his mouth a few inches and wiggle his fingers now, but the defrosting machine they'd put him in hadn't done as much as he'd hoped.

Of course it wasn't as simple as just being frozen. There was a possibility he was in shock, but again, that wouldn't make all that much sense in Hell.

Except that people in Hell weren't alive, and that guy had just said Bucky was. Alive, that is.

"The river at the bottom of the ravine took some of the fall, the serum took the rest."

River. Ravine. Fall. Serum. The river part made sense, because he could remember hitting water and waking up soaking and freezing on a river bank in the snow. The ravine and the fall part were still quite clear and fresh in his memory. You tended to remember your death.

But the serum thing had him tripping up. The only time he'd heard that word was in context to Steve's supersoldier experiment. So how could a serum "take part of the fall?"

"When the hell did this guy get Zola's serum?"

"That's Bucky Barnes. Hydra got him about a year ago, then lost him after the operations. Until now."

"Fuck, brilliant move on the doctor's part. Shooting up Captain America's sidekick."

Okay, Bucky was not Steve's sidekick, good god.

But shooting up? Operations? Zola's serum? Arnin Zola had a fucking serum?

And suddenly, just like that, it dawned on him.

That thought that he'd been avoiding since Steve had rescued him the first time...how he was stronger, faster, healed better than he should. Could crush bones with his fist, split skulls with a pistol whip. How he could nearly keep up with Steve when they ran. How his burnt up hands had healed entirely inside of weeks.

He'd known something was wrong since day one. He'd known in the deepest part of his head that they'd done something to him. He'd just been way too afraid to even consider what.

A serum. They'd shot him up with some bastardized version of the same stuff that was running through Steve's veins.

He remembered needles - lots of needles - from his time on Zola's table last November. They'd been putting more in him than drugs, they'd been fucking with his cells. Trying to turn him into another Steve.

He suddenly had the overwhelming urge to puke.

Bucky blinked up at the ceiling, not even hearing the next part of the conversation because he was a fucking experiment. He had some terrifying amped up drug pumping through his veins. Into his muscles, into his brain. It wasn't something he could ever scrub out, even if he peeled off his own skin.

But somehow, that wasn't the worst part.

He was an experiment and he had poison in his veins, but he was alive.

He'd survived the fall.

He'd survived the fall.
Bucky did puke then.

*

His body was kind of working now.

The parts of it he had left, anyways.

They'd hosed him down and shoved him - sopping wet - onto another table, strapping down his arm and legs and chest again. He was too weak to try to escape during the transfer, and he was still in enough shock from everything to keep him docile. Or, well, basically a rag doll.

He'd be ashamed of it later, the one chance he had to break free of the bastards and he blew it because he couldn't handle his damn brain enough to pull himself out of shock.

He was entirely detached and numb. There were facts floating in front of him in black and white, words and ideas that he should be embracing and accepting and running with. He stared at the facts in front of his eyes, unmoving and unable to think. There were leather straps holding him down again but he had too much to worry about to even freak out about it yet.

There was too much going on and he might as well be dead for how he was handling it. Shock, unable to process or accept any of the things that were supposed to be true.

He only had one arm.

One arm and one stub, cut off above the elbow. He was alive. He was an experiment, he had poison in his body that was keeping him alive.

So they strapped him back down and they sewed up the bottom part of his stub, not giving him the slightest bit of anesthetic as the needle cut jaggedly through hypersensitive nerve endings. He was grateful though, because the stitched up stump was a hell of a lot better than a ripped-off bloody one with jagged edges and torn red flesh hanging out.

With the same detached, numbed brain he finally figured out where all the confusion amongst his captors was coming from, too.

"He's Zola's project, why are we keeping him here?" another English guy had asked, in the middle of a lab-coated-guy stitching his arm up.

See Zola had his ass captured, and he was kind of the lead torturer and coordinator for these things. Now that Zola wasn't here anymore, nobody could really figure out what they were supposed to do with Bucky. They just had to keep him alive until Zola got back, apparently.

Bucky was hoping more and more every hour that Steve had shot Zola in the face on that train.

He had no idea how much time passed before he overheard the next conversation, two more guys passing by the metal table like Bucky may as well have been a wall ornament.

"I heard they're bringing Reinhardt in to supervise until Zola gets here."

"That bastard's crazy. I thought he only does torture and unique artifact retrieval, though. Not babysitting gigs for Zola's leftover time bombs."

"Well, maybe they're handling this like a unique artifact retrieval. Although my bet's on the torture."

Bucky stared up at the ceiling and blinked and internally cursed everything he could think of in every language he could think to curse in. Which was not nearly as much as he'd like.

They were going to torture him.

He was alive and he was missing an arm and he had a serum like Steve and his body still wasn't responding to his brain all the way and he was fucking freezing cold and he was lying here on a table in the middle of god knows where and he was going to be tortured again soon.

Everything was kind of floating over him right now, like those snowflakes when he'd first woken up. Drifting down, never seeming to hit his face. He was just suspended, disbelieving. None of it could be real.

The idea of dying and being sent to Hell was much more enticing now.

Chapter End Notes

The next chapter is intense apologies ahead of time.
and a warm thank you to everyone who is reading this xx
Chapter Notes

Warnings: for graphic depictions of torture, drowning, suicide, and brief mentions of possible rape (wow yeah sorry)

Songs: Skinny Love by Birdy
9 Crimes by Damien Rice

AND I also made an 8tracks for the songs for the first part of the fic here, hope you guys enjoy.

Disclaimer: so I've been studying the MCU timeline and wow there is a lot of confusion and vagueness. Because while Bucky's death date is in 1944, Steve's is in 1945? In the movie they capture Zola and interrogate him, then leave immediately to attack Schmidt with the information. Not really sure how an entire year could pass during that interrogation. So I'm changing Bucky's death date to 1945 and I know that's a year off but I seriously just have issues with Marvel's continuity errors because they make negative amounts of sense. xx

Important: if you start to read the first paragraph under the ~~~ and are suddenly extremely confused, I promise I will make a whole thing explaining how I've been writing that way all along and I've been dropping hints since the beginning of this fic so just hang in there with me.

ANYWAYS I hope you enjoy.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
On March 1st, the allied forces carried out a meeting (in which everyone was very concerned about the very silent and serious Captain Rogers) to determine the next attack on Hydra forces. Johann Schmidt was declared to be in the last Hydra base in the Alps. At Captain Rogers' unnerving and reckless suggestion, an idea was formulated to "knock on the front door" of the Hydra facility. A plan commenced, most of which took the rest of that day to plan.

On March 2nd, the allied troops led a caravan across Europe to the Alps. It would take them until March 4th to reach the facility. In those two days on the road, Captain Rogers was again, unnervingly, concerningly quiet.

In those same two days, a soldier finally started to grasp his presence on a cold metal table.

~~~*~

March 2, 1945

Of one thing, Steve had always been sure. Just one thing that had never once in his mind been questioned, never once been revoked or altered: It is impossible to be best friends with Bucky Barnes and not be in love with him.

There'd been no huge epiphany, no moment where Steve ran the words I'm in love with my best friend through his head. It'd just...always been there. Since the moment Steve knew what love was, he knew that was how he felt about Bucky. Just never told him, never said the words out loud.

But this was Bucky Barnes - gorgeous and slick with icy blue eyes over a black suit, pouty exotic mouth and a quirked eyebrow under a crooked hat, beautiful jaw and kissable chin and a smile that lit up nations and worlds alike.

Steve wasn't blind.

Obviously though, he didn't love Bucky for his looks. The quirky advice and the happy teasing, the gentle hands on Steve's broken and bruised skin. The warm heart and beautiful principles, the way he was afraid of nothing. He was devoted and kind and rough around the edges in the best way.

Bucky Barnes was oozing life, the down to earth, soot-covered kind of raw, real, human life. All surrounded by a bright, beautiful light that Steve'd always been drawn to like a moth.

Their whole lives. From the trouble-magnet kid to the Brooklyn-rough teen to the respected Sergeant at his side. At first it was childhood affection: Bucky was the brother, best friend, hero, and single happiest memory of Steve's younger years. But the moment that Steve found out the world was filled with different kinds of love, he'd instantly known that what he'd felt for Bucky was the deepest of those kinds.

He'd actually asked his mother if he was allowed to marry Bucky, after she'd told him that marriage meant "choosing to spend the rest of your life with someone because you love them more than everything." When he'd declared that's how he felt about Bucky, Sarah had laughed goodnaturedly, ruffling Steve's hair and telling him that's a different kind of love, sweetheart.

Somehow, Steve didn't think it was.

When he hit puberty, Bucky talked enough that Steve already figured the ideas that were gonna start forming in his head. About all sorts of pretty dames, Bucky told him with a wink. And yes, there were plenty of girls Steve found pretty. But none of them smiled like Bucky did, none of them had eyes as light and crystalized. None of them threw their arm around Steve's skinny shoulders and made him feel like he was more than a stubborn sickly teen.

Bucky was the ultimate. He always had been and honestly, Steve wasn't the slightest bit surprised the first time he looked over at Bucky and realized he wanted to kiss that smiling mouth until they were so out of breath they couldn't kiss anymore.

In the same moment he realized that, Steve realized what it'd mean. Boys weren't supposed to love other fellas like that. And it wasn't that Steve didn't like dames - he did, he really did - they just didn't make his heart pound, his lips tingle and his hands itch to reach out and touch. Bucky did, and that wasn't right.

So the first time he got the urge to kiss Bucky, he decided it had to be the last time too. He was entirely positive he'd never ever fall outta love with Buck; he'd shove it to the side so it was never a problem.

There was nothing he could do about it. Just like his asthma. Two brain defects, no cure. Avoid running too fast for the asthma, don't let his brain bend that direction for Bucky. It was simple, really.

And Steve didn't need anything "more than friends." He was entirely, completely happy with Bucky at his side. So maybe he'd have to be careful about staring too long, about letting Bucky see the sketches of him. Just in case you could see how much Steve loved him (too much) in the fine pencil lines.

By the time they moved in together, he was so used to it he didn't worry anymore. He didn't pine after Bucky because Steve had him. So they didn't kiss or hold each other, fine. Steve wasn't exactly out kissing and holding many people now, was he?

(It was actually one reason Steve ended up being so terrible with dames. He'd spent his entire life shutting down urges to kiss, flirt. They weren't an option; he decided so early on not to let himself think about them. Things like that were off the table for him, not a consideration.)

Because as much as he loved Bucky, Steve knew Bucky wouldn't ever feel that way about a fella and that was fine, Bucky liked girls. So did Steve, so it could work out eventually one day. If he ever found a girl that could hold a candle to his resplendent best friend.

He'd never even thought to tell Bucky he loved him because, well, why would he?

Being in love with Bucky Barnes was just part of his being, made him who he was. Steve'd never hated himself for it either; something was wrong with him, yes, but he didn't hate himself for his asthma, why would he hate himself for this? He actually had to remind himself not to list likes both fellas and dames on his medical history record.

That is, until he'd realized it wasn't a disease. He'd been shoved in a machine, pumped full of a serum that would fix him. And when the serum hadn't cured the way he felt about Bucky, Steve figured maybe it wasn't a disease after all. It was still part of him, but it wasn't a defect. If it was, it would have either disappeared or turned Steve evil. Neither happened.

And nothing changed. Why would it? Steve spent his entire life in love with Bucky Barnes, so what? He loved Bucky and the sky was blue and snow was cold as hell. There was nothing to think about, nothing to confess.

Until now that Bucky was dead. And Steve couldn't help but wonder if maybe he should've confessed.
It was too late now, though. Steve could whisper I love you to Bucky's grave when they won this war. (The empty grave. They'd hand Steve the folded flag, wouldn't they?)

He knew he'd visit that grave (every day), if he survived this. If he made it out alive on the other side. Part of him didn't think he would. Part of him didn't think he'd last past this next battle.

Part of him didn't want to.

That was the worst part of him and Steve stared with dead eyes in a foggy mirror and wondered when he'd turned into the coward that couldn't keep breathing without Bucky at his side.

Steve grabbed his bag and his leather jacket and headed out for the jeep. They told him he wasn't allowed to ride his motorcycle all the way there. It was cold, they said. You're reckless and volatile when you're alone, they didn't say. He heard it anyways.

The back of the jeep was cramped but at least they'd put him with the Commandos. Probably because they figured the HC were the only ones who could sedate him again if he freaked.

He didn't hate them for sedating him. He hated that they felt they had to. He hated that they didn't trust him with himself. Or worse, they didn't trust him with their lives anymore. Steve couldn't tell if they were afraid of him now but if they were, they were doing a damn swell job of hiding it. Of all of it though, he hated himself the most for pushing them to that, for losing control, for needing them to stop him with more drugs in his system.

The blood in his veins was just a Petri dish now. Pump him full of serum here, pump him full of sedative there. The only pure, real Steve Rogers blood left in this world was probably staining some backalley in Brooklyn.

It should've been him. Steve should've been the one that fell. If he could make a deal with the devil and trade their places, he would. It should be Bucky sitting with his boys, laughing and cheering everyone up for the final takedown of Johann Schmidt.

Steve was probably never going to laugh again.

"You alright Cap?" Falsworth asked, pulling his hat over smoothed back hair.

"Ready to fight," Steve responded, pretending it was a sufficient answer and not bothering to attempt a smile. He didn't have to lie to them. They knew how torn up he was. They knew most everything.

The battle plan was solid. It was risky and dangerous and Steve wouldn't have it any other way. They were avenging Bucky, this couldn't be a simple shoot-em-up go round. It had to be near impossible, like Bucky was.

Steve stared out the window of the bumping, moving jeep and decided he knew why Bucky had never told him his reason for being over here - his reason for fighting - was Steve.

There was something undeniably dark about fighting a war and killing people and destroying human lives for a single person instead of your country.

And now, Steve would know.

He doubted Bucky would be proud of him.

~~~
He was still cold all the time because wherever the hell they were apparently didn't know about fire or anything resembling warmth.

Not to mention that metal holds cold temperatures and laying for hours and hours and hours on a freezing slab of it didn't exactly do anything to warm you up.

"If you let me out I'll teach you how to make a fire," Bucky offered to the random foreigner clearing the air from needles. The white lab coat and creepy face mask didn't so much as look his way. Only like three people understood English here, and even they ignored him as though he were just a dog barking away in some corner.

Another lab coat walked over to the first one. He waved his hand in Bucky's general direction, not looking his way as he fired off rapid speak in more words Bucky couldn't understand.

"Does anybody have a translator?" He asked as he flopped his head to the left in exasperation. He quickly looked back though, because he was being very careful to avoid even thinking about the left side of his body.

It was slow going and hard work but he was making his way through all the things he was supposed to be processing. Arm was a no go, didn't even think about it. The impending torture was also in the don't think about box. So was the serum thing.

Actually, everything was in the don't-think-about box besides the realization that he was alive. He was working on that one, accepting it and trying to decide how much it was going to affect his future.

Hopefully, not a lot. When he got out of here, he'd apologize profusely to Steve for scaring him and all the Howling Commandos would go singing in some bar to celebrate because Bucky was actually alive. He was in the same dimension, on the same planet as Steve Rogers. Nothing could make him more hopeful.

He was alive, he was alive and he could deal with everything else in stages. He wasn't back to full strength yet - his body had still dropped deadly distances into a river and washed up on shore to be found a day later - but he could talk and he could wiggle the parts of him that weren't strapped down with leather.

The next step was just to wait until his opportunity; there had to be a point when he'd get through or around the leather straps. He knew how to break the bones in his hand to fold it through those restraints - he'd need his feet to walk though, so he couldn't break those.

As for the rest of the straps, they had to undo them eventually, right? Of course right. Something always had to change. Bucky hummed to himself and waited and formulated a plan.

The change came a lot sooner than he'd been anticipating. It couldn't have been more than a day since his abduction before three soldiers came to his table, looking anywhere but his face.

One of the soldiers began to undo the leather strap across his chest and Bucky's heart started to pound. This was it. If he hurried he might even make Steve's next mission.

Phwip phwip phwip the leather pulled through the loops holding it down. One down. Two to go. Then he'd be that much closer to his freedom. Bucky stared up at the ceiling with eyes hopefully convincingly dead and waited.

The next strap across his lower chest fell to the ground. The hands undoing his straps moved to the top button of his coat, tilting it sideways to-- Bucky's brain caught up and his eyes went wide with panic.

"Leave me alone!" Bucky squirmed, rocking his body back and forth. He still had his arm and hips and feet strapped down, but he could move around enough to make undressing him impossible.

One black suited soldier wrestled his shoulder down, rough hand jarring his left arm into the table. Bucky screamed as the stub of his arm slammed into the table, a hot and heavy rush of pain flooding into his senses and making him nearly go blind with pain.

The hands started up again on his buttons. How dare they strip him. Disgust caved, gave way to a dark pit of rage bubbling in his stomach. Bucky grit his teeth, closing his eyes for a millisecond to shove all the hurt away. He'd had worse.

"Get the fuck away from me," he spit, trying to knock his left shoulder up out of the soldier's grasp. The arm slammed back down again and Bucky growled instead of screaming. He couldn't have them undressing him. He was already freezing, he needed his jacket, and he would really like to not be naked for his torturers. This was not how the last time had gone.

And there was something very important inside his left jacket pocket, he couldn't risk losing that to these bastards.

The gloved fingers started up on his coat again and Bucky lost it. He bucked and squirmed and shouted and screamed and hissed and the hands kept undoing the buttons of his coat.

The last person to undo those buttons for him was Steve, in that classroom right before one of Bucky's panic attacks. Fuck, if Steve could see him now. Steve would come rushing in here like a fucking hurricane, a bullet for every person in between him and Bucky. He'd kill every single one of them and then he'd be hovering over Bucky's body, worry all over his face as steady hands helped Bucky off the table again.

The last button popped out of place and a rush of cold air pushed into the gap between the folds. The soldier ripped his coat open, tearing it at the seam of the shoulder. Bucky snapped his teeth at the hands holding down his shoulder but the distance was too far. Fucking bastards.

He'd kill them. He'd kill every one of them, shove their own filthy hands down their throats. The gloves pushed his jacket over his freed shoulder, the material sliding over the sensitive skin at the messy sutures of his arm. He threw his head back and hollered in rage and pain, throwing himself upwards with a terrible yank to the arm that was still strapped down.

The move knocked one of the soldiers back and he brought his forehead down on another's temple, hearing something crack with the slamming force. The soldier screamed this terrible sound, lunging for Bucky's throat with his hands. The other two soldiers held him back, pulling him away from table and Bucky made quick work of breaking the bones in his hand, wincing and sliding it through the leather material and sitting up in one swift motion.

Everything was bright and swimming but pumping with hope and victory and the adrenaline rush of potential freedom. He didn't have the time to do his coat back up and he reached forward with both hands to undo the straps over his hips and legs, pausing in confusion as only one hand started on the leather strap.

Fuck. He didn't have another hand. That was going to make this a hell of a lot harder. He grit his teeth, pulling the leather away from the buckle with shivering fingers. Only one arm, Jesus that was going to make getting out of here freakin’ nuts. He wasn't ready to grasp that whole arm concept yet.

Although right now, Bucky could get on board with the serum running through his veins. That sounded like something he could really appreciate right now.

He whipped the leather cuff off his hips, sliding down the table to make quick work of the ones over his ankles. He got his right foot free and was fumbling with his left foot when hostile hands suddenly grabbed his shoulders again.

"Fuck, no, you bastards!" Bucky swung out his right arm and hands caught his elbow before it could connect to anything solid, pulling it inverted and forcing his body in half with the movement. He shrieked as his elbow hyperextended, thrashing wildly now against the tears in his eyes.

There were too many hands, more than before, and they yanked Bucky's blue coat off his shoulders. One of the soldiers stepped back with it, pilfering through the pockets as the other six wrestled Bucky back down to the table. Someone's nose snapped at his swinging arm, shattered someone else's wrist, and delivered a hell of a lot of bruises.

They got him strapped back down within minutes. He was screaming out of spite now, out of anger and pain and disgusting rage that filled his vision with red and black shapes.

The soldier found Steve's drawing inside his left pocket and his homing device in the other. They smashed the homing device under their big clunky boots and they made him watch as they burn Steve's drawing. It was the one he kept against his heart, the one of him that Steve had drawn last December in the woods in France.

His head in Bucky's lap, infectious smile and focused hands as he drew and laughed and held Bucky tight against the cold of the darkness.

Bucky watched the paper curl with flames, hot red ashes dropping to the ground as the fire licked over the image of the man he used to be. They were going to burn that right out of him, weren't they?

He didn't cry because he couldn't bring himself to feel the loss. Sorrow wasn't something he had a grasp on right now. No, he was pissed. He was pissed and he was going to tear down this entire fucking place eventually.

No one tried removing the straps again to get off his undershirt. They just cut it open with scissors, sliced it to pieces until he was lying there bare chested in the cold. He spit on the guy holding the scissors and in turn he wasn't so careful as he cut the fabric from Bucky's torso.

Bleeding and bruised and pounding from pain all over, the cold wasn't even kind enough to numb him.

~~~

"Hey, Rogers. Gotta a question for ya," Dugan jogged over to where Steve was leaning against the jeep door, arms crossed. They’d hit something sharp and metal in the road, perforating a tire and forcing the whole caravan to stop.

That was the thing about war; regular dumb stuff would happen, like blowing a tire, and this big epic battle of taking down enemy forces was delayed ten minutes while they hooked up a spare.

It was stuff like this that made the war seen more real, and more ridiculous. Out there in the civilized world, people blew a tire and that was the biggest event of their month, the biggest worry. But in here with the lot of killers and fighters, a blown out tire is nothin', not when you're about to go blow some people's heads off.

"Actually, I've got a question for you too." Steve responded, a bit of a delay. Dugan was looking at him guardedly and Steve pretended not to care.

"Well, I asked first, so...you heard anything about the team Carter's settin' up? It's all just rumors for now, but word is there may be some sort of recruitment eventually." Dugan leaned the underside of his forearm against the jeep and Steve looked off in the distance and wondered if Bucky was finally warm right now.

"Haven't heard anything." Steve kept his voice as interested as he could but he couldn't tell what he sounded like to people anymore.

Grief comes in stages and denial had to come round at one point. Just a seed of doubt and everything is forever altered.

"...But if I do, I'll let you know." Steve amended because he didn't want to offend Dugan. He still wasn't so sure he'd make it out of this alive. There was one thing though, that was keeping him from snipping that thread. "My question, now. After this thing's over, will you come on a mission with me?"

Steve glanced sideways to gage a reaction and Dugan just looked vaguely surprised by the question.

"What kind of mission, Captain?"

"To find Bucky." Steve answered simply. Dugan's face fell. There it was, the instantaneous he's gone out of his mind look that people kept giving him. He half considered just ending it there, but he might actually need Dugan's help for this.

"Before you think I'm crazy, I know he fell. I was there. But I think we at least owe it to him to find a body." Steve uncrossed his arms and Dugan's forehead smoothed out in relief and Steve was sick of lying but it was the only thing he could do left.

Sure, if Bucky was dead his body deserved a proper burial. But that's not what Steve had meant when he said find Bucky.

His soul was still telling him Bucky was alive and he had to do something about it. He'd search the ends of the earth until he found Bucky, dead or alive. He just felt pretty confident that if he searched now, it'd be alive.

"Sure, Cap'n." Dugan clapped him on the shoulder. Steve was going to hell for lying. "Soon as this mission's over, we'll go search that ravine."

"Soon as it's over," Steve repeated. They'd find him. Steve always found him.

~~~*~

No one told him when Reinhardt arrived but Bucky kind of figured it out based on the guys flooding his table with needles and knives and burning iron rods.

~~~*~

March 3, 1945

"What are you gonna do when you get back to London, Montie? Trading in all this fresh, open air for that condensed city smog." Dugan shot Falsworth a grin from the driver's seat, not as easy as it used to be but some semblance of a bright side.

"Oh yeah, I really am gonna miss all the green hills and enemies," Falsworth responded with an eye roll. After a moment of pondering he shifted in his seat, turning to face the center of the jeep so all of the Commandos could see him. "Tell you what. When I get back to London I'm going to stay inside for weeks. Just lay in front of a fireplace, not budge an inch, and eat soup to my heart's content."

"Soup? That's the best you could come up with?" Jones snorted, shaking his head. Falsworth made a face that said he liked soup fine, thank you. The jeep fell silent for a couple hundred feet, then Dernier nudged Jones and fired something off in rapid French. Jones laughed, then translated for the rest of them.

"Jacques says when he gets back to France he's going to marry the baker's daughter, just so he'll have a lifetime supply of fresh bread and pastries to eat to his heart's content."

Everyone smiled; except Steve, who just kept looking out the window. A few glances went his way and the bright looks dimmed down a bit.

"I think I'm going to sign up for that new team Agent Carter's been forming," Morita offered, glancing between the rest of the boys and Steve. Their Captain still didn't respond.

"I've been thinkin' about that too, Jim," Dugan said, the words feeling a little inadequate to fill the silence. The beat lasted a moment too long to be comfortable, then he tilted his head and looked over again. "After that, you headed back to Fresno?"

Morita nodded and Jones snickered. Then he sobered up a bit, looking around the rest of them. "I'm going home too, after the war. And I'll find the best whiskey they make and drink until I don't remember a day of the past two years."

The words sunk in with a wave of uncomfortable silence that settled like a smothering blanket over the jeep. No one ever really talked about how much the war haunted them all. It was the inevitable, but they spent a lot of time pretending they were all untouchable. It wasn't so easy to pretend in the face of Jones's words though, so they all shut down and straightened back out in their seats.

After another few bumps down the dirt road, Falsworth sighed and stared out the window sadly. "I don't think any amount of whiskey will make you forget Dugan's ugly mug."

It took a few seconds for it to sink in for everyone, then surprised laughter bubbled up over the car.

"No matter where home is, we're all still meetin' up after the war, yeah?" Dugan reminded and they all nodded, Dernier and Morita glancing at the still silent Steve.

"And Rogers, you know I'm headed back to New York too if y--"

"I'm not going back to Brooklyn," Steve interrupted. The car passengers all turned and looked at him, most eyebrows arched in surprise. They'd heard enough stories about Brooklyn over the past year and a half to know how much Sarge and Cap loved it. Steve sighed and looked back out the window. "You're talking about going home and Brooklyn ain't home if Buck ain't there."

"Désolée, Cap," Dernier said softly, reaching over a hand to pat Steve's knee. Steve looked down at Dernier's hand, sighed again, and offered everyone a weak smile. Falsworth inputted too, turning around in his seat to see Rogers' face as he softened his expression, speaking as respectfully as he could.
"We know it's been hard since-

"Let's just focus on the mission," Steve interrupted again, too sharp on the corners. Falsworth's mouth snapped shut, his eyebrows knitting together as he turned back around in his seat, crossing his arms over his chest. There wasn't anything they could do, apparently, Steve was just going to sulk.

A cold hand came up to pinch the bridge of his nose as Steve breathed out slow, trying to get his head on straight. This was his family he was barking at, they didn't deserve this.

"Sorry, sorry," Steve murmured sheepishly, feeling fairly awful for the sudden solemn quiet in the car. "It's just that-

"We know, Cap." Dugan said, shooting Steve a small forgiving smile. "It ain't been easy for any of us, and we didn't grow up with him."

"That's not an excuse." Steve huffed a breath, frustrated with himself now. He was overriding all their pain with his. Bucky would be disappointed. Hell, Bucky would probably check Steve's temperature, a big hand smacking to Steve's forehead exaggeratedly, pulling Steve close as he mimed a mother hen, clucking over Steve with not-quite-feigned worry for something so out of character. Steve wasn't the kind of person to be selfish in the face of other's pain. It was just...everything hurt now.

Steve needed to hurt people in return. Just not his comrades, not his team. People like Johann Schmidt, people like Arnim Zola. People who had taken Bucky from him. Those were the people that needed to feel pain, those were the people that Steve was going to slaughter.

In the meantime, someone had to have some semblance of pep for the team. With a tight breath that'd survived him through too many stages, too many times, Steve threw all of his emotions behind a barrier and shoved aside the urge to scream as he tipped his head and looked over his still-patiently-waiting teammates.

"...you know what? I can't wait to kick some Nazi ass."

"That's the Steve Rogers we know." Jones cheered, reaching over Dernier to clap Steve on the back. He gave them a smile that probably shone exactly as much as the one in all the propaganda posters, all but the pointing finger over the dancing monkey tights and everyone seemed just this side of satisfied enough Steve turned, looked back out the window. The expression fell the moment he did.

Apparently even his team needed him to be someone else for now. Steve was fine with pretending for their sake.

~~~*~

They dashed open the soles of his feet first.

Bucky had been expecting it; they did it last time. It was a strategic move as much as it was a torture method. Take out the bottoms of the feet and the ability to run away was significantly less. Because he'd been anticipating it, he closed his eyes just before the blade went in, steeling himself and grinding his teeth in advance against the pain.

He didn't scream. They didn't like that much, made more slashes to cross over the ones they'd just made. The sharp blade slid into his skin, splitting it and peeling it back just enough to expose cold air directly to the inner muscles. It was kind of like getting ice pumped directly into an open cut.
A low sound strained in the deepest part of his throat but it was too quiet for anyone to hear, just for Bucky to feel. He could do this. He wasn't going to break under them this time.

"Where is Captain Rogers?" The vaguely-English-speaking bastard spat at Bucky, holding up the knife dripping with Bucky's blood. Figures, they bring in somebody to talk to him now, after all this time that he'd been looking for some good conversation.

"With your mother," Bucky grit out, edges of his mouth curling up in a bitchy smile.

This time he only had a few seconds to prep, eyes catching the sharp glint of something large and metal being swung directly towards his leg. The hammer collided into his tibia and snapped it clean in half. Well, not clean. The hammer was wide enough that the point of collision shattered that segment of his bone into little shards, sticking into the reverse side of his skin.

The shout that came from his mouth was more pissed off than hurt. It was a low fucking blow to take a hammer to somebody's leg at the first question, like damn.

"Fuck," Bucky gasped, looking up at the dirty, cobwebbing ceiling. "I take it back. No way he'd sleep with somebody who raised their kid to have manners like that."

(Although, really, Steve wasn't the type to sleep with anybody's mother. Who would Steve sleep with? Agent Carter, obviously. But if he hadn't met her, what would his type be? Bucky knew Steve was still a virgin, knew he hadn't actually given anybody the time yet. He'd told Bucky about every single moment in his life that could have even led up to a first kiss, let alone been one. So of course Bucky knew Steve hadn't slept with anybody. The question was just who it'd be if he did.)

It actually wasn't his head that prepared himself for the next blow, it was instinct mixed with the lovely combination of a bastardized serum. The englishman's fist came swinging for his nose and his hypersensitive nerve endings picked up the movement just before his brain did, whipping his head to the side so his cheek and jaw would take the impact of the hardened knuckles.

Fire shot up the side of his face and before he could think to recover the fist landed on his cheekbone again. Bucky blinked back involuntary tears at the double punch. This guy was a total dick. He got a grip on himself and rolled his head across the metal table to look back up at the fuming englishguy.

"Where is Captain Rogers?" The guy fumed again, spit flying over Bucky's face on the "s's." Bucky blinked and squinched up his nose because that was the worst part about having his hands - shit, hand - tied down, he couldn't wipe DisgustoGermanEnglishGuy's spit sputtle from his cheek and nose.

"Currently planning your death, motherfucker." Bucky spit right back. The guy was still fuming, rage practically boiling out of his ears like those cartoons he used to take Steve to sometimes, back in the old days. He didn't strike out at Bucky again though; instead he just held up a hand, gesturing at one of the other standby's.

Somebody got him gloves and a knife, one that was considerably thinner and longer and looked a hell of a lot sharper, too.

Bucky couldn't hold back the pained sounds and muffled screams beneath clenched teeth as the knife dug in between the lines of each of his ribs, tracing over his bare skin with half an inch of blade carving outlines of every piece of Bucky's ribcage. It was almost like how Steve used to draw him, only Bucky had never been this skinny back then and Steve had never carved his body with a fucking butcher knife.
"Where is Captain Rogers?"

"Fuck off," Bucky responded, his vocal chords wrecked from all the sounds he'd been making in his throat. The knife cut its way deeper inside one of his rib lines, wiggling around and tilting to the side with a little sawing motion to cut out a triangle of his flesh. Bucky threw back his head and shouted, shaking all over from the pain.

"Where." The knife was turned around, blunt end of the handle shoving up hard against Bucky's ribcage, attempting to crack it. Bucky groaned and blinked back tears and tried to find some safe place to go in his head.

"Is." The English guy reeled back his hand and slammed it into the same spot again.

"Captain." A fourth slam, harder this time, and Bucky couldn't decide which he hated more, this guy or the way that he said Steve's name.

"Rogers." Fifth time was the charm and Bucky's rib snapped, breaking upwards and scraping against another rib as the world tipped sideways and his head wiped to the side, pain shooting up to electrocute his brain, wet slick red spilling out over his chest from the impact.

Vision was swimming black at the corners and it nearly took him with it but Bucky managed to suck in a panicked breath, grounding himself with the blue sky he knew had to be somewhere up there above the swimming red and gray and black and he just had to hold onto blue enough to speak again.

"C-crawl back to whatever hell you came from, scum," Bucky finally managed. The guy just glared and wiped the knife across Bucky's hipbone, using his body like a towel to clean his own blood off a torture weapon.

"I don't think you understand," the English guy started again in a terribly annoyingly calm voice as he ran his finger along the side of the blade. Bucky rolled his eyes, even just that small movement making him wince from the sparking hell.

"I understand j-just fine. You're not taking no for an answer or whatever th'hell excuse you have. And not to compare myself to a...a dame or nothin', but you're not the first guy I've seen with th-that problem. 'll tell you what, there's this scrap of a thing I knew that's torn apart bigg'r men for less. 'thing is, now his fists are faster than his tongue and he ain't so scrappy."

Not that Bucky spent any significant amount of time thinking about Steve's fists or his tongue. Christ. Maybe he should be.

He sent up an abortive prayer to no one in particular (Steve would scold him) to thank whatever power gave Bucky the most wonderful mental distraction from torture. Nothin' like Steve Rogers to get you through the rough patches. Even when he ain't there, apparently.

"Sergeant Barnes, I'm afraid you still don't understand. This time we're not just playing. This isn't for fun, this isn't even for science. This time it's going to really hurt because this time, we need something from you. You will talk. No more fun. If you don't give us what we want, you're not going to survive another day."

"I'll never tell you anything," Bucky promised breathily, light headed from blood loss. His ribs were still pooling blood everywhere and he could feel his heartbeat in every bruise the guy was making.

"You are an experiment, Sergeant Barnes. We can inflict a lot more pain to you than to normal people." The guy twirled his knife, pressing the tip lightly to the skin above Bucky's navel. "So where are the allied forces hitting next?"

The tip of the knife broke the outer layer of skin. Bucky hissed but managed to keep his glare. With a smirk, the guy twirled the knife again, gouging and twisting a hole through Bucky's flesh. He closed his eyes and ground his teeth against each other.

"I'm. Never. Talking." Bucky grit out, bridges flashing like fire under his marrow.

"Where is Captain Rogers?" The knife flicked up to his sternum, drawing a deep line of red blood with it. A strangled sound made it out past Bucky's lips.

"Do what you want," Bucky spat. "You can't ever get me to talk. You can cut me and beat me and shatter my bones but I'm never giving him up."

Bucky would die a thousand deaths before he let anyone lay a finger on Steve. He had a feeling it was going to come to that, too. Who knows what the serum could regenerate his body from. It looked like these guys were pretty interested to find out.

"Bring the hose," the guy said, stepping a foot away from Bucky. A soft breath of relief escaped Bucky's lips and sharp eyes turned down on him.

With a quick lunge, the knife lodged into the top of Bucky's thigh, all the way in to the hilt. Bucky screamed loud enough to make his own ears ring and the guy laughed as he walked away.

Then the top half of the table dropped out from underneath him, tipping him backwards so suddenly that the wave of nausea did make him puke. He hadn't eaten in a long time so it was just clear stomach fluid now that he had to bat his eyelashes against as it splashed on his face.

By the time the upside down room kind of fuzzed into semi-focus again, all the blood was rushing to his head building up a shit ton of pressure behind splotchy eyes. They were going to waterboard him. Bucky thrashed against the leather straps, hoping for some weakness now that the table was at a new angle. No such luck, everything held tight.

A rag was shoved over his face and Bucky coughed, trying to spit out the foul smell of the rag covering his nose and eyes and mouth. A creak of a turning faucet was the only warning he got before freezing cold water doused over his face.

And just like that he was drowning. He couldn't breathe and there was water in his eyes and his nose and his mouth and the soaked cloth sticking to his skin suffocated him even more as he tried to suck in around the material. He tried to scream and the sound was muffled and bubbly. There was water in his lungs and his limbs stiffened with the sudden realization that this was it, it was over, he was dying now.

I'm sorry I never told you I love you, Stevie, Bucky thought vehemently towards the sky, hoping that one day Steve would forgive him for that.

The rag was ripped off his face. Air and cold hit him all at once and he gasped, lungs burning with the switch from H20 to oxygen. He was probably crying but he kind of felt wet and drippy everywhere, there was no way to tell.

"You ready to start talkin?" The English guy was back, leaning down close by Bucky's face, his spit mixing in with the fluids and water already dotting Bucky's cheeks like disturbing freckles.

"I d-don't know anything," Bucky said truthfully, gasping between the words. "But if I did I wouldn't tell you a word, you bastard."
The English asshole just looked at him for a moment. "Hose him again."

The second time Bucky passed out from lack of oxygen and a panic attack that his body slammed into without warning. The serum in his veins had him conscious again in only fifteen seconds, sputtering and choking and bleeding out of his nose from the pressure breaking his sinus cavity.

"Where is Captain Rogers?" The knife was pulled out of his leg, taking a considerable chunk of Bucky's flesh with it. His speed-healing had already started to stitch up his skin around the metal of the knife, so it was like ripping a vine out of a tree that the vine was embedded in. Bucky screamed again.

"Where is Captain Rogers?"

Bucky gasped and shook, taking a few moments before he could try to stutter out an answer. "Don't you think you've exhausted all the big...torture methods by now, you d-dick?"

"Sergeant Barnes, have you ever heard of a pressure chamber?"

Bucky hadn't. That was alright, he found out anyways.

~~~*~

March 4, 1945

The moment the caravan rolled to a stop, Steve jumped out of the jeep and beelined straight for the truck toting his bike. They'd wasted enough time riding over here and Steve was aching with pent-up emotions and adrenaline. He wanted justice and he wanted it now.

He pulled his helmet on as he jumped into the back of the truck, taking his bike by the handlebars and walking it out of the bed, the back tire slamming the ground as he tipped the bike against the dirt road. As soon as the teams were set up, he was going to go blazing in there, cold wind whipping past him and guns firing at him. Steve could already see it, already feel the buzz in his veins.

"Rogers!" a voice called out from behind him, the same time someone called out "Captain!" to the left. Steve spun around, propping his bike on its kickstand as he turned to the Captain caller first, because Phillips came before the Commandos when it came to orders.

"We're ready for you to roll out," Colonel Phillips told him, tipping his head. Steve nodded and patted the seat of his bike in confirmation that he was ready.

"Just one moment, Colonel." Phillips rolled his eyes but nodded as Steve gestured at the Howling Commandos, who were all standing in formation waiting for Steve's attention. Phillips marched off and Steve turned to his friends, adjusting his helmet a little as he looked up.

The Commandos were all standing on the side of the road, keeping their guns from clogging with road dust, solemn looks on their normally cheery faces.

"Rogers," Dugan started again, glancing at the rest of the men before looking at Steve with a sort of reverence. Something knotted up in Steve's chest as he looked at his boys, all so brave and solid and caring. The best men Steve had ever known.

"Just in case things go sideways...it's been good fightin' with you, Cap." Dugan nodded once at him, a reassurance and a promise, tipping his hat in respect.

Just in case things go sideways. Maybe they knew him well enough to know all of the flaws in his plan. Maybe they knew him well enough to know if it came down to it, he'd fight for their lives but not for his own. Not anymore.

Maybe they knew this might be the end, and Steve's throat clogged up at that thought.

"You've done a hell of a lot more an' save our lives," Jones added quietly, looking between Steve and the conglomeration of soldiers in the distance. There were so many of them out here, but war was bloody and lonely, it ruined strong men and tore apart souls.

They'd made a family of their own amongst something as terrible and destructive as this place. Jones and Morita shouldn't even have been allowed to fight, let alone be given the opportunity to make a difference and save thousands of lives. They'd fought together and they'd saved together and they'd cried and laughed together, all of them.

"Merci," Dernier added. Steve scanned his eyes over them, his heart seizing in his chest.

At one point, Steve had told himself the only thing holding them together was Bucky. It was the one thing they all had in common and Bucky Barnes was the foundation that they built the Commandos on. Now that Bucky was gone, the bond he'd left behind held strong. They had each other in common now, each other to depend on.

"Best man I've ever had the honor of serving," Morita looked solidly at Steve, hoisting his gun a little higher. Falsworth shifted his weight, eyes watery as he tipped his hat to Steve too.

"Sergeant Barnes woulda been proud a' you." Falsworth smiled tearily. Dugan clapped Falsworth firmly on the shoulder, giving him a little comforting shake. Falsworth's mouth tugged down at the corners in a pained smile as he pat his hand on top of Dugan's.

If Bucky was here, he'd roll his eyes and call everybody saps or dames or something. Then he'd tear up himself and wave them all over into a group hug, complaining the whole time and making them all laugh through their tears.

They'd all had the luck to split the pain up seven ways, for a year. They'd leaned on each other and they'd fought together and there wasn't a word that could do that justice.

Maybe Montie was right, maybe Buck would be proud of him. Bucky sure was proud of them.

There wasn't anything Steve could say. He'd never been more touched, he'd never been prouder. He'd never been more honored to serve his people and his country. His Howling Commandos.

In a slow and deliberate movement, Steve lifted his arm from his side, fingers straight and tipped slightly as he brought the tip of his hand to his temple. Everyone had tears in their eyes now as Steve stood and saluted the five best men he'd ever known, the ghost of one more standing beside them.

He held the position for a moment, standing there in the dirt road beside his bike, bright white star on his chest and red white and blue shield strapped to his back, facing the Howling Commandos and hailing the men who had followed him into death. Who were following him there just one more time.

Steve snapped his hand back away from his temple, closing the salute and turning with a final look over his shoulder as he mounted his bike.

He paused with his hand on the handlebars, foot ready to kick start. The sky was lit up behind them, beautiful and glowing, turning the men on the side of the road into near silhouettes as Steve looked at them.
Five men saluted him back.

Steve started the engine and his bike took off, soaring down the road. He leaned in close against the metal frame to fight the wind. The tears in his eyes were either from the bitter cold or the moment, the forever memory etched into his brain of those five salutes. Steve didn't care which it was.

~~~

"Arrogance may not be a uniquely American trait. But I must say you do it better than anyone." Steve glared at Johann Schmidt as the fire-red skin sauntered closer. The only reason Steve wasn't ripping him to shreds right now was for the necessity of the plan. The two wasp soldiers holding his arms certainly weren't what was stopping him.

"But, there are limits to what even you can do, Captain. Or did Erskine tell you otherwise?" Schmidt stopped directly in front of Steve, just a few feet apart. With a well aimed kick Steve could at least send him flying backwards right now. There was sweat beading in Steve's eyes from the angle of his helmet, but he didn't move. He just stood and glared.

This was the bastard that had employed the perpetrator and encouraged the torture and death of Steve's best friend.

"He told me you were insane," Steve responded simply. He wasn't one much for small talk when he was this amped up, this ready to punch and fight and kick and kill.

"Ah." Schmidt responded, almost sadly. The skull of his face morphed into something that looked almost regretful, misunderstood. "He resented my genius, and tried to deny me what was rightfully mine. But he gave you everything."

Steve looked down, just barely holding off on his anger. What was rightfully Schmidts? The lives and countries he'd destroyed were not rightfully his. That sorrowful, lost look wasn't earning an ounce of Steve's sympathy. He didn't care that the reminiscing made Schmidt look tiny and sad - Steve couldn't wait to kill him.

"So. What made you so special?" Schmidt finally bit, his words spit out like they had a terrible taste in his mouth.

Steve huffed a breath, shaking his head once in a small no. Special. Even Bucky knew better than to call him that.

"Nothin'," Steve replied. Schmidt cocked his head, not understanding. He genuinely thought there was something different about Steve, didn't he? Some chemical makeup or brain superiority.

Steve was a fighter, that was all. He had a spark in him of the fighting kind and the tongue to get him into trouble. Just a kid, fighting for his country. For what was right. And now fighting for the home and the best friend he used to call his.

Steve summed up his entire life in the next six words. "I'm just a kid from Brooklyn."

That was exactly the wrong thing to say.

If he hadn't already been the color of tomatoes, Steve would imagine that Schmidt would have turned red with rage as his fist reeled back to punch Steve across the face. The hit instantly throbbed but Steve didn't have the chance to quite register the pain before it was followed by a backhand snapping his head in the other direction. A punch in the stomach completed the deal and the force of it sent Steve down heavily to his knees.
I'm just a kid from Brooklyn.

To Steve, Brooklyn meant Bucky and Bucky was Brooklyn. Steve was just a kid lost without his Brooklyn, the sniper at his side. How many times had Steve been here, on his knees with his arms held in place and a bully pummeling him down to the ground? But Brooklyn always found a way to save him.

Steve coughed, his breathing heavy from the throbbing. He fought it though, fought his body the way he used to have to every day, and managed to look up at Schmidt with a glare even more serious than it used to be. "I can do this all day."

He wasn't Captain America right now. He was Steve Rogers on his knees in front of a bully. Bucky was wrong - war was a backalley. Nothing had changed between today and the last time Bucky had pulled him out of the movie theater's back alley the night before Buck shipped out - suave and gorgeous and terrifying with his cocked hat and raised eyebrow and arm tugging around Steve's shoulders, pressing their sides together impossibly tight with his sweet smile lighting the world.

The Red Skull was still a bully and Steve still hated bullies. And he still needed help taking the big ones down.

He could almost pretend he was waiting for Bucky. He could almost pretend that it was his best friend who was going to come sauntering around the corner, pulling Steve off his knees and punching the face of anyone who dared lay a hand on him.

"Oh of course you can, of course," Schmidt sneered, not understanding the levity behind Steve's words. But it didn't seem to matter anyways, because suddenly Schmidt was pulling a pistol out of his belt, the air filled with the whir of it charging up to kill as he aimed the muzzle directly at Steve's forehead. "But unfortunately I am on a tight schedule."

Steve glared up from his knees, waiting for the Brooklyn sniper to come round the corner. And look it now, here he comes -

"So am I," Steve gritted between his teeth, charm all dropped for pure anger. It wasn't Bucky coming shattering through that glass but it should have been. It should have been Bucky and it wasn't - because of this bastard, because of Zola, and the Red Skull would be fucking destroyed because of this.

Glass shattered and the fight erupted full swing, bullets soaring everywhere. Bucky hadn't come for him, but his boys still had. Steve could hear the distinct comforting sounds of Falsworth's machine gun and Jones's missile launcher, Dugan's shotgun. Schmidt had disappeared and Steve was already starting after the bastard.

"Rogers!" Falsworth shouted from across the room.

"You might need this." Steve turned around as Montie launched the shield at him, spinning through the air from his hand with the practice of a skilled Commando.

They'd all had contests, once. Throwing Steve's shield...

"C'mon, I'm placin' a bet on Jones as the farthest."

"No way in hell! I'm votin' Barnes."

"What? I'm not gonna throw the silly thing. That's Steve's job. What, we're all gonna start wearing "tights now too?" Bucky joked, nudging Steve from where they were sitting together on the sole rock in the middle of the field they were all camped down in.

"It's good practice," Falsworth insisted, weighing the shield in his hand.

"For what?" Bucky asked incredulously, throwing his head back and laughing at them all. Falsworth made a face.

"Aw, you afraid you can't lift it, Buck?" Steve teased, nudging him back. Bucky crossed his eyes at Steve, then lifted a hand to his hair to smooth back the pieces that had fallen out over his forehead. The strands flopped back down seconds later.

"Okay, fine. I'll do it. But if we're placing bets, I'm placing on Dugan."

Food rations and ammunition were placed in a circle as currency and they all lined up, Bucky shaking his head and muttering something about fool kids who get excited at shiny things, but Morita shoved his shoulder and he picked up the shield.

"Here goes," Bucky slung the shield out across the open field they'd found, watching as it spun through the air. It eventually landed in the tall grasses with nothing to bounce back from. Bucky turned around and took a few steps backwards, throwing his arms out with a smug smile spread wide across his face.

Steve leaned back and laughed into the sky, amazed at the beautiful July weather and the even more beautiful boy. Dugan rolled his eyes and shooed Barnes out to go and stand by the spot it had landed. Bucky broke into a run, a blue dart rushing through the swaying yellow grasses.

When he reached the shield, he tossed it back at them, staying in the place he landed so they could measure everyone's toss. He cupped his hands around his mouth and shouted back at them, the wind catching the words and carrying them like music to Steve's ears. "Just don't hit me!"

Of course, Steve won. No one counted that though. So Bucky lost two boxes of ammo to Dernier and Falsworth, both who'd bet on Jones.

It was a heavy shield, admittedly. It did take some practice to toss, and Steve was glad now that they'd had the competition. Otherwise, Falsworth wouldn't be able to send the shield flying perfectly into Steve's hands from across Red Skull's evil lair.

"Thanks!" Steve shouted as he caught it, giving his boys one last nod before he ran out into the hallway. He had a crazy man to catch. Or maybe to run from.

Dernier blew up the door and Morita came in behind him, gun protective and wielded over Dernier's shoulder. "We're in, assault team go!" Morita shouted into the coms.

"Move out!" Phillips shouted to his men.

Dugan, Falsworth, and Jones snagged themselves some vaporizing guns, started charging the hallways with them and giving the Hydra wasps a taste of their own medicine.

It was really such a shame the Commandos couldn't be bantering playfully over the comms like their old missions. This mission was too crazy for that, and the silence from their comrades was a little saddening.

Steve was too busy to notice, chasing Schmidt down the hallway as fast as his legs could take him. Schmidt was running too, reaching behind him to shoot blue missiles that bounced harmlessly off of Steve's shield. Steve was getting closer though. Just as Schmidt began to round the corner, Steve pulled back his arm and hurled his shield. It whirled through the air, spinning in front of him the way it had that day they'd all done the same, they’d all flung the shield across that field in July.

The metal shield lodged in between the sliding doors, holding them open. Steve started forward the same moment that a suited Hydra agent appeared in the hallway, flames pouring out of his guns. For lack of a better spot in the situation, Steve ducked behind an outcropping in the wall, holding his breath against the heat of the fire.

The flames kept coming and Steve cursed all the time he was losing without the ability to get around this guy. Then the splattering of machine gun bullets sounded in the distance and the flames suddenly disappeared. Steve peered around the corner as the flamethrower's body crumpled to the ground.

He came jogging back out in the corridor the same time the rest of his troops did. He hurried forward, intersecting Peggy at the cross of the next corridor. She was holding the machine gun, looking beautiful as always in her leather jacket.

"You're late." Steve told her. She looked up at him with parted lips and Steve stepped closer. They hadn't talked alone since that night at the bar, their conversation about Bucky. She was looking at him with eyes Bucky had always warned him about - she gives you those eyes Stevie, you better kiss her. It's just not right to not to.

He might have, because he just lost the love of his life less than a week ago and some comfort sounded like it'd be a great distraction and Peggy Carter sure as hell deserved better than distraction but he didn't have anything left to give her. All he had left was a heart in two. Or maybe just the adrenaline pumping through his veins.

But now, standing here in front of Peggy...he didn't lean forward. She was looking at him with those eyes but Steve furrowed his eyebrows, thinking. He'd seen those eyes before, on someone else.

Bucky had looked at him like that. He could swear Bucky had looked at him like that. If this was the look you were supposed to kiss someone for...Steve had to be going out of his goddamned mind.

"Weren't you about to..." Peggy thankfully interrupted. Yes, he was about to actually, Steve was about to go avenge his dead best friend. Or, not dead, jury was still out on that one.

"Right," Steve agreed, taking a step backwards and taking off running down the corridor. Head back in the game.

Okay, but had Bucky really ever looked at him like that? Seriously? Had Bucky ever thought about Steve in that way?

No, it was impossible. Steve was...honestly losing his touch with reality. He was overcome with the strange combination of terrible grief and pumping adrenaline and his head was confused, it was that simple.

Deciding to let it go for now, Steve reached up and unlodged his shield from the doors, running through just before they closed again. He came sprinting out into the airplane hanger just in time to see the Red Skull's plane rolling down the runway, preparing for takeoff.

His lungs were starting to catch up to him again, the way they did in Brooklyn when he so much as walked quickly. He ignored his heavy breathing, eyes scanning out over the tarmac. There was a war going on before him, fighting and killing between wasps and soldiers. Steve ran directly through it, taking out as many wasps as possible in the process. A punch here, a slam of the shield there. Taking down whoever he could while getting on to bigger things. As much as he'd love to help, to stay and fight the ground battles, there was a plane trying to get away.

Steve ran straight for a pile of crates, jumping up a few and grabbing onto an industrial chain with gloved hands. He jumped, swinging over machine guns and blue vaporizers, dodging all the shots as the air blew past him. He let go of the chain and dropped on the other side, not losing a second before breaking into a run again.

He was directly behind the plane now, jet engines overwhelming his nose and the heat of running so much and so fast burning up the soles of his boots.

That plane was going too fast, dammit. Pushed harder, harder, but he'd gotten sucked back into the body of Little Steve all over again, never fast enough, always falling a step behind, ten steps behind, beaten and broken and pushing up to his feet one more time but his bones were failing him, his legs were failing him, he couldn't make it, he wasn't gonna make it.

There was nothing left but to stumble, slow to a stop, cursing the serum for making him good but not good enough, until there was suddenly a bright light beside him and a car pulled up on his left, Phillips and Peggy inside.

"Get in," Phillips commanded. And just like that he was off again, launching over the side - internally apologizing to whoever the owner was for getting his dirty feet all over the seat - then Phillips stepped on the pedal and the vehicle roared. They were gaining speed on the plane seconds later, already soaring closer. Phillips pressed a button and then they took off like a rocket, fire shooting out the back and everything. The side of the plane got substantially closer and Steve started to get back up.

"Keep it steady," Steve shouted over the sound of the engine as he stood up in the car, ready to jump out and board the plane from here.

"Wait!" Peggy shouted. Steve turned around and Peggy grabbed a strap of his uniform, pulling him down as she reached up to kiss him. Their lips met, wind rushing around them like a hurricane, and Steve almost didn't think it was real. The moment had caught him entirely by surprise, but after a mental restart he caught on and leaned in, kissing her back. Her mouth was soft on his, didn't taste like cherries or roses or any of the girly things Bucky had always talked about. When she pulled away, Steve's lips were still tingling and he was frozen, looking at her with wide eyes.

"Go get him." Peggy told him, a smile on her face, the one that said the only thing he needed to hear - I believe in you. Apparently Bucky was right; she did like him a lot after all. Steve was aware he probably looked like an idiot, half standing and half sitting and staring at Peggy Carter with his mouth still open. Bucky would be proud. In his disbelief and blinking shock, Steve looked over at Colonel Phillips, just kind of confirming that that had actually just happened. Phillips glanced at him with an amused look.

"I'm not kissing you," Phillips told him snarkily. So it had happened then. Right. Wow. Yeah, okay, back on mission. Saving lives and all that. Avenging his best friend. He shot Peggy a glance, something like a smile in the sorrow of his heart. She smiled back like she knew why he couldn't smile for real right now. That was half the reason he might come to really love her some day. She'd just kissed him and it was a shame Steve had to run off now, but...she was great enough to be more than understanding.

His first proper kiss with someone he wanted to kiss and he couldn't even tell Bucky. He wondered what Bucky would say.
Steve ducked under the blade of the airplane, shield on his back. He had a plane to catch. And this was it, this was the moment that would determine if Steve could save the world or if he'd fall to the ground. There was no one to pick him up if he fell this time, though. There was no more Bucky and that instilled something dark inside him, fueled an anger Steve didn't know he had, and he sprung at the plane.

He landed on the back, hands holding steadfast. Carefully, Steve crawled up through the belly of it, using the rise of the landing gear wheels to take him up. He hauled himself over the rail onto a platform and looked around. And was met the three scariest things he's ever seen.

They were going to try to take Brooklyn away from him again.

A gaggle of henchman came down to intercede and Steve took half them out with easy punches and kicks. He had bigger fish to fry. With quick fingers that used to just be for drawing Bucky Barnes, Steve dismantled the Chicago bomb, sending it out of the plane to go crash somewhere in the ocean and fry actual fish, which was still unfortunate but better than human beings.

Once he handled the bomb-plane situation (Steve wondered if Bucky would have liked planes. They were better than trains. Everything was better than trains.), Steve snagged his shield and mounted the stairs to go face the bastard who'd taken Bucky Barnes from him.

He snuck into the main chamber of the plane, peering around for moment. Everything was eerily quiet and Schmidt was no where to be found. Steve creeped forward, keeping low as he peered at the pilot seat. Schmidt wasn't there, either. Where the hell was he?

The giveaway was the soft whine of a power-up behind him - that was the fatal flaw to those guns, the sound before the blue missile always gave you time to prepare for the shot. Unless, of course, you prepare just fine and it still sends you flying out the back of a moving train.

Steve blocked the shot with his shield easily, glaring at Schmidt with daggers in his eyes. "You don't give up, do you?" Schmidt asked him, that same condescending tone from earlier. It was the signature bully line. Steve had probably heard those words more in his life than any others.

"Nope," Steve said, because this time there was no one there to interject and shout Hey! Pick on someone your own size. Although Steve supposed he and Schmidt were the same size now. That didn't make it any easier to miss the Brooklyn savior swooping down with his invisible wings.

He barreled directly for Schmidt, slamming into him and connecting his fists to any place he could reach. This. Punch. Bastard. Kick. Took. Shield at the throat. Bucky. Everything was red and it wasn't just the flashes of the skull Steve was seeing. He'd never felt this kind of rage before, never wanted to kill like this. Schmidt had killed so many, was planning to kill so many more.

At one point Steve ended up temporarily on the ground, getting kicked in the ribs and it was just like the old days. But he bounced back up to his feet, swinging harder and more pissed because Bucky wasn't here to pick him up off the ground anymore and it was this guy's fault.

They wrestled and hit each other and Steve eventually got Schmidt in a headlock, slamming them down against the plane floor. Schmidt managed to wrestle back away, pushing Steve into the console in the center of the plane and smacking him across the face with his own shield.

The serum had them unfortunately close to equally matched and Steve could not remember ever being in a fight this long. It was sloppy and angry on both their parts - there was no finesse, nothing beautiful in the way they threw fists and kicks. Sometimes fighting was dancing, but only really on Steve's half. As souped up as this guy was, he didn't carry that grace, couldn't dance with his fists. Steve wondered if he'd ever meet someone who could.

In a particularly pissed swing, Steve threw Schmidt into the pilot seat of the plane and suddenly everything shifted as the plane started to nose dive into the ground.

Gravity sent them reeling all over the place but it didn't matter, he didn't care if they were sideways or upside down or falling to their deaths. He just kept hitting and hitting. It was like every bully he'd ever had to face, every look of worried fear on Buck's face when he found Steve bruised and bleeding, Steve was paying them all back now. He might as well be blind in his anger, seeing Schmidt with a thousand faces, a thousand people who had knocked him down. It was his turn.

By the time Schmidt righted the plane they were on opposite sides of it again, but Steve could still hear Schmidt shouting at him from the distance.

"You could have the power of the gods!" Schmidt shot a blue laser right at Steve and Steve ducked quickly to avoid it. "Yet you wear a flag on your chest and think you fight a battle of nations."

His nation. His country. This was about freedom and doing the right thing and avenging incredible people who didn't deserve to die at the hands of psycho bastards. Schmidt fired again, dangerously close and Steve just barely managed to dodge again. His heart was pounding out of his chest because, holy crap, he almost just got obliterated into nothing. Is that how Bucky had felt, clinging to the side of that train? Scared and trapped and barely hanging on?

The shots were getting closer and Steve didn't have a weapon. He wasn't really seeing a way out of this yet and this guy was a psychopath, how in the world was Steve supposed to make it out of this fight alive?

"I have seen the future, Captain!" Schmidt shouted again, firing off another shot. Steve ducked for a third time, trying to evaluate a new strategy that didn't just include getting shot at. "There are no flags!"

"Not my future!" Steve shouted in response. Time to execute that new strategy thing. He jumped, soaring across the cabin of the plane and landing in a roll, shield in front of him to block another blast of obliterating blue. For Brooklyn, Steve thought and he threw his shield with all of his strength directly at Schmidt's chest.

It bounced off and Schmidt went flying straight into the center counsel of the plane. Blue lightning erupted and rippled like a volcano, a stream of bright light escaping into the plane. Schmidt struggled back to his feet, limping over to the blue lightning source.

"What have you done?" Schmidt stared at the blue cube in desperation, reaching for it. Steve watched cautiously - that thing leveled people in pieces, he didn't want to see what the source could do - as Schmidt picked up the blue cube. Lightning sparked and heavens of stars opened up on the ceiling. An entire galaxy, a world above that looked like something out of fairytales. It was gold and blue and kind of beautiful and Steve wondered if that's where Bucky was. Light shot out in a burst from the cube, directly upwards in a stream of brilliant white. Schmidt held up his hand, watching in horror as he began to be sucked upwards with the stream of light, screaming in protest.

Well, if Schmidt was being dragged off there, it definitely couldn't be Heaven. And that meant Bucky wasn't there. Schmidt's body engulfed with white light and Steve dimly wondered when his mind had started to accept Bucky's death as the truth again.
Steve watched as the skies plucked Johann Schmidt from the earth, destroying him, and he only felt a pang of loss that he didn't get to do it himself.

"Sir, he's not scared of us." Reinhardt turned around from his desk, adjusting his round spectacles to look at the private a little closer. The soldier shifted, looking nervous as he elaborated. "He won't talk."

Reinhardt didn't say anything for a moment. He reached out and closed a file on his desk, the words Case 17 written in German across the front. The 17th person they'd tried Zola's serum on, the first one to survive it. The only one to survive it, actually.

The private shifted again and Reinhardt finally spoke, his tone as condescending as he could make it.

"What could you possibly mean? He's been a prisoner of war before, he should snap at the first table he sees." Reinhardt raised his eyebrows over his glasses, very aware of Sergeant Barnes's history. The things they'd done to him should have given him nightmares for the rest of his life.

"He's too strong willed, sir."

"Strong? Last time he broke into a begging, withering mess that could do nothing more than repeat his name and serial number. Are you suggesting that thing in there is stronger than your renowned torture methods?"

The private looked uncomfortable. Good, because he was speaking nonsense. He glanced down at his hands, which Reinhardt just noticed were streaked with blood, presumably Barnes's.

"He's...uncompromisable, sir. We've tried nearly everything and he just won't give up the American's location. He's unfortunately resilient."

That shouldn't be possible. It was a previous torture victim, it should be like slicing through butter that happily spills every secret before the first cut.

"Let me get this straight." Reinhardt took a step forward and the private flinched. Reinhardt's lips curled up a bit in a smile. "You're telling me I give you an already broken prisoner of war and torture victim that has an arm and a half and you can't manage to even scare him?"

"Yes...sir."

"I've got to fucking see this." Reinhardt brushed past the private, ignoring the astonished look on his face as he stormed into the section of the warehouse he hadn't even visited yet.

Barnes was strapped to a metal table, dripping wet and bleeding in enough places to make any other man die within seconds. The moment that he heard their footsteps, his big eyes turned on them, looking a little wild.

"You can't touch me," he told them seriously, looking ridiculously pathetic with just half an arm, the sutures at the bottom of the stub ripped and bleeding. His hair was sticking to his forehead and his bottom lip was split but he didn't look the slightest bit shaken other than the crazed look in his eye.

"You can't touch me," he repeated.

Reinhardt stopped a foot away from the table, looking down through his glasses and speaking simply with that small smile still on his face.
"What in the world makes you think you're going to be able to stop us?"

The prisoner blinked a few times, registering a new face and not seeming the least bit phased. Instead he just spoke again, voice strangely strong beneath the tattered sound of shredded vocal cords. "He's going to come save me, you know. You can't break me because I know he's coming."

"Who?" Reinhardt asked, looking over at the private who'd been in charge of the first round of torture. The private leaned over, speaking under his breath as he filled Reinhardt in on the missing information.

"Captain Rogers rescued him last time he was in captivity, sir."

Reinhardt turned back to Barnes, voice flat and honest. "Captain Rogers thinks you are dead."

"No," Barnes insisted, shaking his head. If the story had been correct from the dispatch they'd gotten, the allied troops all assumed Barnes was dead. They'd seen him fall off a train. That was the genius to the plan, no one was ever going to look for Barnes and therefore the operation couldn't be compromised. Except that Barnes seemed fairly convinced otherwise.

"No, Steve'll know the difference. He'll know I'm not dead, he can tell." Barnes was almost rambling as he spoke, looking even slightly crazier now that his words were off in left field too. "They told him I was dead last time and he came for me anyways. Because he knows."

"He watched you die with his own eyes," Reinhardt reminded him coldly.

"No!" Barnes shouted back, straining against the leather bounds. "No, he's coming! He knows, he knows." Barnes took in a breath, eyes narrowing as he looked at Reinhardt like he was simply a wall in the way of what Barnes really wanted to look at. "He'll feel it in his soul. And he's going to come and slaughter every last one of you bastards for laying a hand on me."

Reinhardt huffed a laugh at the threat. He'd heard plenty about Rogers and his slaughtering skills, but all for this one soldier?

"You have a lot of faith in Captain Rogers. What in hell makes you think you're that important? He has a world to save. A war to fight."

"It doesn't matter. He'll drop it all. He's gonna come and save me. You'll. See. I'm important to him." The words at the end faltered slightly and Barnes's bottom lip quivered a bit. Reinhardt mistook the painful honesty for a sensitive weakness and jumped.

"No, he loves me. And he's coming. He's saved me before and he'll do it again."

Reinhardt scowled and straightened back up. At first he just thought the private had just been torturing Barnes with the wrong instruments. But he seemed ridiculously, irrationally sure in his own words. He honestly believed everything that was spewing out of his mouth and it was all vaguely disgusting how confident he was.

"All of this because some guy saved you once?" Reinhardt gestured angrily at Barnes and Barnes blew up.
One moment he was blinking back tears and the next he was straining against every single one of his leather straps, snapping at Reinhardt with a ferocity and anger that Reinhardt had never seen before in anything, let alone anything human.

"Once??" Barnes shouted, spit flying as he kicked at his bounds. "Do you have any idea how many times in the past year I've woken up on this table you bastard?? Do you have any idea how many times I've thought Hydra has captured me again? And he's. always. there. He's saved me from this same fucking table dozens of times you insignificant fucking Nazi!!"

Reinhardt blinked and stared at the seething prisoner for a moment.

This was a major kink they had never considered. Barnes had had nightmares after all, then. He'd had nightmares a ton, and he'd been...saved? He'd been constantly saved from his nightmares? And now he had this sense of security that he was going to be saved again.

They hadn't counted on that. They hadn't even considered that Barnes might be unbreakable now. All because he was holding on to a string of hope that his - apparently friend - Captain America was going to come for him?

This was going to be a problem.

"...And you think he'll come for you now, after he watched you die with his own eyes," Reinhardt clarified, keeping his voice as disbelieving as possible.

"He will. As long as he's alive." Barnes swore, his eyes unfocused now as he drifted somewhere else in his head. "He promised me that as long as he's alive he's coming for me. He's always going to save me. And YOU CAN'T TOUCH ME BECAUSE HE'S ALWAYS GOING TO SAVE ME."

Barnes started kicking and thrashing after the shout and Reinhardt gestured at the private and the ten soldiers standing by on watch. They all started forward, a soldier grabbing onto each thrashing limb as a few others started to undo the leather straps holding Barnes down.

Reinhardt watched from a distance as Barnes struggled and shouted and refused to give in. This was going to be a problem, a big problem. Crushing someone's body and spirit were easy, but if they had hope? Hope was the first thing you had to take away before you could torture someone.

There was one thing interesting Barnes had said though: He'd given a condition to his saving. As long as Captain America was alive, Barnes would have hope. So if Schmidt found a way to kill Captain America, they'd have a way to break Barnes.

Then again, the only reason Reinhardt was even babysitting the prisoner was for information to kill Captain America. It was an egg or the chicken first situation and that was going to be a problem.

He stepped back a few feet as the soldiers finally wrested Barnes off the table. All ten were trying to help in some way and Barnes was putting up one hell of a fight, even swinging out his stumped arm to hit as he kicked and bit and shouted. The soldiers' gloves were bloody and the whole ordeal looked painful and slippery.

They finally grabbed onto his shoulders and started to drag him away, to the cells Reinhardt had already prepped. He never stopped struggling against them, screaming one final thing at Reinhardt before they dragged him into the hallway.

"YOU'LL NEVER BREAK ME AS LONG AS STEVE IS ALIVE. NEVER."

~~~
Steve stepped up into the pilot's chair, eyes landing on the screen blinking a little triangle to show their flight path. It was headed straight for New York. There were still two bombs on this plane, two explosives that could destroy a city each. They really were going to level Brooklyn for good.

Steve stared ahead at the clouds and wondered what falling felt like.

He flicked a switch to the radio, dialing into the base frequency. "Come in, this is Captain Rogers. Do you read me?"

"Captain Rogers, what is your..." Morita's voice started over the line.

"Steve is that you, are you all right?" Peggy interrupted. Steve almost wanted to smile. That was something Bucky would have done.

They were a bit alike, Bucky and Peggy. He wondered why he'd never noticed before.

"Great, Schmidt's dead." Steve flipped another switch that did nothing, looked for any sort of diffuse button, trying to figure out the plane and the bombs on board but his lack of experience was just leaving him confused.

"What about the plane?" Peggy asked. Steve kept looking around him, because there had to be something that was labeled clearly. Apparently not.

"That's a little bit tougher to explain." Which was a bit of an understatement, because he had two huge bombs on board and no idea how to diffuse or stop them.

"Give me your coordinates I'll find you a safe landing site." Peggy said over the line, her voice in that stern no nonsense tone that was somehow still pretty. Steve looked over at another one of the screens. Oh, god. There were a lot more than two bombs on this plane.

"There's not going to be a safe landing. But I can try and force it down."

Colonel Phillips motioned Morita away from the sound of Steve's voice. The loyal Howling Commando paused a moment, confused. Why would--

Then it hit him. Oh.

He followed the Colonel silently towards the door. Walking, no, floating through water. Through the icy water.

It was his turn now, instead of Jones. His turn to radio in another death, wasn't it?

"I'll get Howard on the line, he'll know what to do," Peggy responded, desperation in her voice now. Steve wished he could make her worry go away but there was nothing left that he could do now.

"There's not enough time. This thing's moving too fast and it's heading for New York." Steve could never let it hit New York. He stared out at the clouds and saw snow, snow drifting down from a mountain peak and cold metal under his hands as he scooted further out, reaching for a bare hand with his gloved one.

He realized it as the words were coming out of his mouth. "I gotta put her in the water."

The words felt alien, like they weren't even his, like someone else was telling them to him. He knew what that meant. He knew what he had to do now and Steve could do nothing but stare at the fluffs of snow wisping by around him and wonder how cold it was going to be.
"Please, don't do this. W-we have time, we can work it out." Peggy begged. Steve looked over at the map again, at the little destructive triangle headed straight for his Brooklyn.

They'd already taken one home away from him, Steve would never let them destroy both.

"Right now I'm in the middle of nowhere. If I wait any longer a lot of people are going to die." How many had already died on his watch? How many people had he reached for and not been able to stop from falling? The most important person, that's the one he couldn't save. Steve couldn't that again.

The only choice left was to join him.

"Peggy," Steve pleaded, trying to make her understand with just the word. She would never really know, not really, why he had to this. But if anyone were ever to understand, it'd be her.

"This is my choice."

She'd told him once: allow Barnes the dignity of his choice. Now he repeated the words back to her, hoped that she'd see that and understand it was the same situation. It was his turn to fall for Bucky. For the country. For the stars and stripes, his red white and blue America.

He pulled the compass out of his pocket, setting it on the dash. He'd always loved that compass. It was a like a locket, in a way. Like a fifteen year old girl with a gold heart around her neck, two pictures inside - one for each half. Except for Steve it wasn't heart shaped, it was an old metal circle to help him find his way.

In one side, Peggy's beautiful picture to inspire him. She'd gone against all odds and she was so strong, she deserved every ounce of respect she ever earned. She deserved to be there. One last time, he looked at her soft smile for the courage he needed.

In the other side of the compass was a needle, always pointing true North. That side was Bucky's half. It didn't have his picture but it didn't need to: Bucky was always Steve's arrow pointing North.

He pushed the controls forward and snow whipped at the glass, whole clouds of it as Steve began his descent downwards. Bucky had fallen reaching up and now Steve was plummeting reaching down. Reaching for each other, always.

"Peggy," Steve asked, his heart beating in his chest. Wind was whipping through his hair and everything was so cold. Just like Bucky. Always following in Barnes's footsteps, even now. Steve had been wrong when he thought they'd be different in death. Nothing ever kept them apart that long.

And just like Steve quoted the night she'd told him to allow Barnes the dignity of his choice, Peggy quoted back her promise she'd made him at the end of that night. You're not alone.

Steve didn't want to die alone.

"I'm here," Peggy promised through the line. The snow clouds were whipping faster and Steve stared at them wide eyed. This wasn't something he'd ever really felt before. Steve was scared.

"I'm going to need a rain check on that dance," Steve managed, the snow breaking away to reveal the bottom of a ravine. Water, coated with ice. He wondered if Bucky had landed in the water when he died.

"All right." Peggy's voice had tears in it and so did Steve's eyes.
She looked down at her hands, trying to breathe through this. He was just like Bucky, wasn't he? They were two pieces of the same puzzle and she had no idea how she'd been lucky enough to be the person they both turned to at the end.

She may be the only person alive who ever knew the love story of two boys from Brooklyn, but she'd die with both of their loyalties held tightly to her chest. She'd been a part of the most beautiful love story she'd ever seen and she'd been loved by Steve and there was nothing better she could ask for.

"A week next Saturday at the Stork Club," Peggy's voice came over the line again. Steve stared at the water, trying to remember all the most important parts of his life. Bucky was in almost all of them.

"You got it," Steve promised. It might be the only promise he'd ever break.

A tear slipped down his cheek. The ice was getting closer. It was going to be so cold.

He wasn't ready to die.

"Eight o'clock, on the dot, don't you dare be late. Understood?" Peggy asked him and Steve was so grateful he wasn't alone right now. He wasn't sure he could do this alone.

But he was coming home. He was scared but he was coming home.

"You know, I still don't know how to dance," Steve told her, a war-oldened bar in his head and Bucky in his arms, their boots stepping one two three one two three; a song he'd never hear again. How many times had Steve told Bucky he didn't know how to dance? How many times had Bucky dragged him out on the floor anyways?

If Steve could pick any way to greet the afterlife, it'd be with Bucky, prim and gorgeous in a slick black suit, holding his hand out to Steve, waiting to pull him onto an empty dance floor.

Peggy smiled to herself, her lips tight as she tried not to cry. She could hear his voice wasn't for her anymore. He was talking to a dead man's ghost and she'd do the best she could to honor them both now as she responded with the words Bucky Barnes would have said.

"I'll show you how," she breathed, wishing she really had had the chance to dance with Steve, just once. She stared into the distance, begging of him one last thing. "Just be there."

"We'll have the band play something slow," Steve offered, watching the ice come up to greet him. It was here. He was here.

This was the end. Of what? Steve just thought the word. Funny how they both started with l and ended with e. Four letters and it all ended here.

"I'd hate to step on your--"

The line turned to static.

"Steve?" Peggy asked. Static came back. She swallowed, trying again, her voice breaking and weak. "Steve?"

"Steve," Peggy tried a final time. Static. He was gone. Just static. She shut her eyes and wished everything could just go black for her too.

Except it didn't go black for Steve.

The nose of the plane hit the ice.

Glass imploded inwards and he managed to lift his arms in time to block the majority of it from cutting his face open. He wasn't sure why he bothered to try, a couple of gouges weren't going to change anything in the long run.

The electronics of the plane sparked and caught into fires that instantly smoked out around him, sending electrical waves through the water and ice and vibrating shocks into his bones.

He'd been electrocuted by a fence once and this was that, only Bucky's hands weren't here to free him from the sparks trying to destroy his brain.

The water rushed through like a tsunami, knocking the breath out of Steve as it hit him square in the chest. He sucked in a final breath and then everything was water and freezing and the oxygen was gone. He blinked his eyes open as soon as he could, everything filmy and blurry under the water.

It was colder than snow, colder than ice, colder than Steve had ever been in his entire life. It was one of those moments that he could physically feel the serum in his cells straining, crying out for warmth.

If he were an ordinary man, he probably would have died on impact.

As it was, he had a piece of glass lodged in his abdomen and a plethora of cuts on his arms that were smarting against the water. If he were ordinary and somehow hadn't died on impact, he'd be dead from the shock of the cold water. But his body was giving him time before it froze, giving him who-knows-how-long before his blood turned to ice in his veins and his heart stopped beating.

In the blurry view Steve whipped his head around, breath screaming and stale in crystallizing lungs as he took in the flickering surroundings. The plane was nose-first, only the bottom half submerged under the sheet of cracked ice. The wet around him was tinged red, blood from his cuts spilling out sluggishly and freezing with the chunks of floating ice. It was getting harder to move.

He could crawl up to the top half, the part of the plane still sticking out over the surface of the ice coat. He could swim around the pilot's chair, up to the surface of where the water met the rest of the plane's internal beams. He could crawl up, slippery and shivering, and pull himself out of the plane and onto the surface of the ice. They'd come and find him eventually, and the serum could keep him alive in the freezing temperatures until then.

Steve hadn't counted on this. He hadn't counted on the plane not sinking, lodging in the ice and giving him the chance to escape.

He'd been so ready to come home to Bucky.

It was freezing.

What would he crawl out for? He'd taken down Hydra, he'd served his country. Peggy was beautiful and brilliant, she'd find somebody else and live life the way she should. Steve would have loved her one day, he was sure of it. He would have loved her but he'd never stop being sad inside. He'd never stop missing Bucky and Peg deserved so much better than that.

What would he crawl out for? The war was almost over. They were winning and the Germans were being taken down and the Commandos would be okay without him. They'd saluted him goodbye.

What would he die for?

James Buchanan Barnes.

Steve closed his eyes and opened his mouth.

Water and chunks of ice flooded into his throat and Steve choked on reflex, lungs seizing heart pounding throat convulsing. It burned worse than fire, worse than the cold numbing tingling of his fingers and hands and feet. His lungs filled with water and his eyes spilled over with tears of pain that the cold water took away, sucked for their own. No one could see you cry in the ocean.

His lungs protested and his cells fought and Steve didn't want to be a coward, didn't want to make this his way out, but he couldn't keep trying to survive when everyone he loved had been ripped away. There was nothing left to live for, not when Bucky was dead. What was life without Bucky? He wasn't Steve Rogers without Bucky and he didn't want to see the man he would turn into in that absence.

Maybe it was selfish. Maybe it was the most selfish thing Steve had ever done but he couldn't find the willpower to pull himself up out of the plane.

He couldn't breathe, his lungs were trying to suck in more oxygen and he couldn't breathe, water was rushing in everywhere. If he wanted to go peacefully, this wasn't anything like serenity. His mind was racing and his body was fighting him, the way it always had, except this time it was fighting to live.

He just wanted to let go but it burned and his brain wouldn't leave him be, just begging and begging for Steve to swim up to the surface. The water pushed at his skin and his muscles but somehow Steve managed to curl up, pulling his legs into his chest and wrapping his arms around them. It was so cold.

Just take me Steve begged, squeezing his eyes shut tighter. The hurt pulled at his heart now and he could feel enhanced cell walls filling with water like those freaky bloated gummy bears in science class and he could just burst, should burst, but the cold creeping in was freezing the water before it could ruin him, the serum was keeping walls just tight enough, liquid at bay and it wasn't fair, it wasn't fair, he still wasn't dying, nothing was going black, and all Steve could do was cry, salt running from his eyes steadily now as he curled in uselessly tighter.

Nothing would save him now, but God wasn't taking him either. He was stuck in Purgatory and he should have died by now but the serum wouldn't let him. It wasn't letting him die and it was so cold.

Bucky, he mouthed into the water, vocal cords lost in the flood.

And suddenly, everything was instantly sharp, lighting every cell in his body, every blood vein and muscle, could feel the oxygen slipping from every single one of them. The clarity demanded that Steve find the surface, break the surface now, and he couldn't do it, he couldn't force himself up. There was still time, too much time, and Steve hated the serum for that. He hated himself for that.

He just wanted to die. He wondered if Bucky had been this cold when he died. He wondered if Bucky would yell at him for taking his own life. He wanted to hear the sound of Bucky yelling at him more than anything.

Take me home, Steve begged to God. He knew that committing suicide landed you in Hell, but he didn't care wherever he went so long as Bucky was there. If Bucky was in Heaven like he should be,
Steve hoped that the lives he saved were enough compensation for taking his own.

If Bucky loved him, why'd he leave? Why did he have to die? Why wasn't Steve allowed to join him?

The water pulled and tugged at him and the plane creaked around him as it settled a few feet deeper in the ice and Steve couldn't stop crying because he'd never been so cold and so alone.

He was so alone.

He just wanted Bucky to come and take him away from this place, away from the sick thing he was doing to himself.

Steve had no idea how long he cried curled up in a ball. It was entire minutes, he was sure of that, but his cells just weren't freezing and his lungs were somehow surviving and his brain hadn't failed him yet and it wasn't fair.

This would be his grave, this plane. This was his coffin, just like Bucky's was in the bottom of a ravine. Steve wondered if the snow had covered his body yet, a white blanket as pure and beautiful as Bucky was.

What was he doing? Steve was the symbol of America. If they ever found his body, it didn't need to be in the weak ball he was curled in. Bucky had died still in uniform and Steve would too, as proudly as one could when instigating their own death. Steve straightened out of his curled form, pulling the shield up to his side, and stuck his shoulder just behind the pilot's seat so his body wouldn't float to the top.

I'm sorry I never told you I love you, Bucky. Steve thought, and everything finally went black.

~~~~~

So he was alive, he was fighting, and he had a serum running through his veins. Bucky had embraced all of those things, managed to start checking things off the list of "shit to process so you can break out of this hellhole."

The serum was as terrible as it was great. It kept him alive, but unfortunately it also didn't let him die. There was a hell of a lot more pain involved with the torture, but he'd made it through the torture too. He'd count what he could for wins. Besides, being faster and stronger was definitely going to help out in his plan to escape.

So the next thing to check off the list was the whole missing-an-arm thing. He didn't have an arm and as much as that sucked, he could live with it. Still felt like he had an arm, which was the weird part. He'd reach for things and no hand would go to grab it. He could still feel tingling in his fingers and he'd heard enough from other soldiers who'd lost limbs that the ghost feelings were totally normal. Ghost pains too, which he got.

But at least he still had the top half of his arm, so there was that to count for. He could probably learn how to shoot a sniper rifle one handed. He'd do it for Steve.

Besides, it was his left arm. He was right handed so it totally could have been a lot worse. His left arm had never been good for much of anything, anyhow.

He wondered what Steve would think. Steve probably wouldn't make a big deal out of it, except he'd ask Bucky if he was okay basically all the time.
Bucky leaned his temple against the filthy wall of the cell and wondered when the hell Steve was going to get a move on and come find him.

On the first day, they lifted a flap on the bottom of the door to the cell and scooted a small metal pan across the ground through it. The pan hit Bucky's foot because the cell was only five foot by five foot, not big enough to lie down in, but tall enough that he could stand without being able to touch the ceiling. It was weird, the layout of it, and entirely windowless. Pitch black metal, the whole thing. He wasn't entirely unfamiliar to isolation, though.

Besides, there was actually a lightbulb in here. They never turned it on and it was too high up for him to reach - that was probably why the ceiling was so high, so he couldn't get the light bulb - but it was still there. He was sure they'd find some use for it eventually.

But anyways, they gave him a pan on the first day. It was a sorry excuse for water and it smelled like piss. Thinking about it, Bucky decided it probably was piss. He didn't drink it.

The next day they gave him a bone, with just a bit of flesh still on it. Raw, like a dog. Bucky didn't even touch it. They weren't going to scare him like this.

He wasn't going to tell Steve about the bone though, he didn't need Steve to suddenly go all crazy revengeful on their asses. He knew how Steve could be sometimes, when he got his head into it. People treating Bucky like he was a dog was definitely going to be one of those things that made Steve go nuts.

Bucky hummed in the dark, waiting for Steve to come and storm the damn place already. He was going to, Bucky could feel it in his bones. Not the one he'd kicked to the corner of his cell, the freezing bones inside his body. His leg was almost healed from the hammer a few days ago, but it still smarted like hell every time he moved it.

Everything did.

Bucky hummed Til Then and smiled to himself because the Commandos were going to throw him a damn party when he got back. It'd be great.

Maybe he'd even convince Steve to get drunk. Last time he had, he'd spent the night in Bucky's lap, clinging to him like a koala bear and it had probably been the cutest thing Bucky had ever seen. He could just picture the serum version of Steve doing the same thing, tripping over Bucky as he tried to stand up to get more beer and landing his huge body drunkenly in Bucky's lap.

The Commandos would howl with laughter and Bucky would snicker and pinch Steve's cheek and Steve would curl down and wrap himself around Bucky's shoulders. The Commandos would break into aww's and Bucky would roll his eyes but rub his hands down Steve's back, call him a dame and tell him he still can't hold his liquor, his Irish roots would be ashamed of him.

Bucky was never ashamed of Steve, though. Steve was a goddamned angel. He was Bucky's goddamned angel.

When Steve finally came for him, when he pulled open that door and gathered Bucky into his arms, Bucky was going to tell him he loved him.

It would be the first thing he'd say.

Peggy was a darling to understand and keep it a secret but Bucky hadn't been ready then. He was ready for Steve to know now. It didn't matter what Steve said, didn't matter how Steve reacted. Bucky would tell him and they could deal with everything else after.
Just as soon as Steve came for him. He was coming, soon. Bucky could feel Steve reaching to him across the distance between them.

Bucky was waiting and Steve was going to save him. Bucky's own sweet guardian angel.

~~~*~

The next day all they gave him was a newspaper.
Chapter End Notes

Just an explanation anybody who was confused: I've been writing from the very beginning of this story as though Steve had been in love with Bucky his entire life. I've been giving hints to the "more than friends" thing since the beginning, which I'll add here:

Throughout, Steve constantly refers to Bucky as "handsome" and "pretty," which were not exactly things that were considered acceptable thoughts in the time period.

Chapter 1:

They were friends, but he could leave Steve behind. Steve wouldn't be able to, but this was Bucky. He'd always been the less needy one.

Chapter 2:

He hadn't let Bucky see a lot of the better drawings Steve had done of him for obvious reasons. It always drove Bucky crazy - just let me see, Stevie.

(Referring to how some of his drawings might show his deeper feelings for Bucky) Bucky's mouth curved up in a smirk, which Steve's eyes couldn't help but draw to.

"What?" Steve asked, totally zoning out from looking Bucky over.

If Steve hadn't spent years of his life practicing for moments like this, he might have frozen and blushed and blinked up at Bucky with those same doe eyes dames gave him when he kissed them goodnight. Instead, years and years of practice had a snide retort on Steve's lips before he really let the words sink in.

Chapter 4:

If someone were to take a photograph...would the look on Steve's face match the rest of his teammates? Or would his reveal something more? He had a feeling he knew the answer to that already.

Bucky was talking and vibrant and everyone was looking at him, so Steve had the excuse to too.

He absolutely did not feel a rush of joy as he walked over to the other side of the bed, lying down with his back pressed to Bucky's.

He never could be too careful with what his face gave away...it was just that Steve didn't find it so much amusing as he did adorable.

Steve glanced over at him, resisting the urge to reach out his hand and bump it against the back of Buck's. It would only be another few inches, but Steve refrained anyways.

Then of course Steve sings Bucky “How Deep is the Ocean”

Steve's heart was pounding...he hated himself for it, the way his mind was wandering. It wasn't what it look like, it wasn't what it sounded like. It was never what it looked like between them...had to calm down, get a grip on his racing heart and damp palms.

He leaned in close and Steve's heart stopped..."I think I won." "Mmm, really?" Steve managed so eloquently...God, what was wrong with him? He hadn't been this ridiculous for years. This was Bucky, of course it was about the competition. Nothing else. How could Steve worry for a single moment...?

Chapter 5:

The cute look was such a change from the solemn, avoiding Bucky that had walked in here Steve could almost hug him again.

Chapter 7:

...but they were going over the mission right now so it was really not the best time to be grinning about his stupidly stubborn best friend. He managed to keep his affectionate thoughts on lockdown...

“You musta been thinkin' about someone real special, huh Cap?” Dugan clapped him on the soldier and Steve's eyes cut to Bucky without thinking.

Steve reached out to ruffle Bucky's hair - he kind of liked it better disheveled anyways.

"Tree-boy and sober-boy, I like it...It's cute." Steve snorted and looked over to Bucky, who went bright red. "That was forever ago!" Bucky complained, looking down at the table and making a pouty face. It was cute.

"Besides, even if there were dames around I bet none of 'em would be as pretty as you, Buck." Steve said it as sincerely as possible and the rest of the commandos laughed in amused surprise.

"You dip me and I'm ending you," Bucky warned, letting Steve lead him to the middle of the empty dance floor. "I am not some dame." "Good thing, too," Steve commented..."What's that supposed to mean?" Bucky asked..."That I'm glad you're not a dame," Steve replied. "Now let's dance."

He'd been missing something, and this was it. Steve could waltz for forever. Could have Bucky this close for forever.

Chapter 8:

With rainy days on the window ledge, watery hot cocoa in hand, holey socks in his lap, soft crooning of the sweetest voice - Steve's favorite sound.

There was so much he'd never told Bucky. All those nights in Brooklyn, looking out over the bridge with Bucky at his side.

Or when Steve was asking to go back home...maybe he meant the home of Bucky's hand in his.

__________

Again, a huge thank you to everyone who is reading.

xx
Warnings for suicide attempts, graphic depictions of violence, torture, loss of humanity, and the general painful horror that comes with the creation of the Winter Soldier.

If you don't want to read the graphic torture scenes of the transformation and would like to skip straight to Steve waking up from the ice, that starts at this chapter and you can just click that link, you won't miss anything that isn't missed in the movies.

Bucky's green vial dream song: Swans by Unkle
The closest thing to the white room sounds: xx
(if you listen on loud with eyes closed and headphones on, you can kind of get the effect of insanity isolation - be forewarned)
And here have this song again but now listen to the chorus and cry because they really are taking Bucky's body my darling :( All I Want by Kodaline

Also I made another 8tracks (for a friend) and while it's not technically for this fic it still fits with the storyline pretty well xx

Disclaimer: so this chapter is written very uniquely - it's split into these little pieces that switch back and forth between conversations of Hydra agents and Bucky's point of view - the psychology information should all be accurate though.

As for the torture scenes: any really graphic pieces will be forewarned with a single " * " and will also close with a " * " so you can skip it if you need to. Any relevant plot points missed by skipping the graphic scenes will be in the end note.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
"How long are we leaving him in isolation?" One of the soldiers asked, tapping the grainy screen with a gloved finger.

"I thought we were supposed to be torturing him," the other soldier agreed, frowning as he peered down at the tiny room flickering on the monitor.

"We are," Reinhardt's voice echoed from the doorway. Both soldiers snapped to attention, spinning to face the officer as he walked slowly up to the screen on the wall, hands clasped behind his back.

"Physical pain would just give him release, now. A distraction from the true pain. He'd welcome it."

Reinhardt smiled, watching the figure on the screen. "There's no need to slice him up. We already broke him. Now we sit back and watch him rip himself to pieces."

~*~

To be a ghost:
Only those who are haunted
Can ever learn to haunt

~*~

The first thing he noticed was how warm it was. Wonderfully warm, which was a rare occasion for him no matter where he was. His eyelids were too heavy to lift and his arms and back were bare, his feet and lower legs too. Whatever he was laying on was rough, scratching at his bare skin, hot and uncomfortable but tender enough that he wouldn't mind lying here for a little longer. Something was trying to wake him though, something important, so he forced himself to tap into his surroundings.

"Buck! Buckyyy, c'mon man." Something small and cold shoved at his shoulder and Bucky groaned but opened his eyes a little, squinting at the bright light.

"Leave me alone, Stevie," Bucky grumbled, shutting his eyes again and trying to ignore the little bouncing sunshine peering down at him. A cold hand pressed to Bucky's cheek and he blinked his eyes open again, vision kind of blurry but the image still unmistakable. Steve was hovering over him, blond hair flopping down around his face like a halo.

Bucky frowned exaggeratedly so that he didn't end up grinning affectionately like an idiot. "Go away."

"No, Buck. C'mon. Get up! You've been layin' there all afternoon."

"Maybe I wanna sleep.""Well maybe I don't want you to sleep." That petulant adorable tone crept into Steve's voice and this time Bucky couldn't help the involuntary grin that snuck onto his face.

"What do you want from me, Steve?" Bucky mumbled, draping a hand dramatically over his face, blocking out the bright light. Steve tugged at his hand and brought it back down to the sand, lazily entwining loose fingers together.

"For you to wake up, jerk. It's your day off, you promised me we could go swimming. And you've been sleeping in the sand for hours. I've already drawn you twice, and the dock too. So c'mon, get up and let's go swimming." Steve used his grip on Bucky's hand to tug at him, pulling Bucky's arm and using the whole of his tiny body's weight to drag Bucky up out of the sand, laughing cheerily at the look on Bucky's face as he snapped up--

His eyes shot open with a sharp gasp, clawing at the ground one-handedly as he scrambled along one of the rank walls, the concrete bitter beneath his fingers. The darkness and freezing cold settled back into his bones, Steve's sweet laughter still echoing in his head.

Steve. Bucky whipped his head to the side, eyes searching in the darkness to find it. The newspaper. It was still there. He stared at it with wide unblinking eyes; at the crumbled edges from where it'd been read over and over, the creases and folds from when he crumpled and threw it, then picked it up again a day later and smoothed it back out with his only careful, shaking hand.

Only moments ago he'd been on the beach in New York and now Bucky didn't know where he was, didn't even know what country. It didn't matter, though. Only one thing mattered now.

"How could you do this to me?" Bucky whispered to the faded photo on the front cover, drawing his knees into his chest and digging his dimpled chin into his (only) forearm. Steve from the propaganda poster stared back at him, fingers in a sideways salute. The picture didn't show the beautiful blue eyes and the soft blonde hair but Bucky saw them anyways.

He closed his eyes and didn't bother to wipe away the tears rolling down his cheeks again. It was amazing that he had enough water in his body to keep crying, but that was the sole thing that hadn't failed him yet.

"You promised," Bucky choked out. The tears made his words muddy.

A year ago Bucky could have counted the times he'd cried on one hand. He'd lost count over the past few days, but he'd cried enough to break that record ten times over. Well, he was guessing it was a few days. There was no way to tell how long he'd been in this room, how long it'd been since they gave him the newspaper.

He couldn't even judge based on his body's patterns because after finding out about the serum, Bucky realized he actually didn't know anything about his body anymore. His own skin and bones had betrayed him. Just another enemy, another force against him.

He was surrounded by enemies and tears and memories and dreams and nightmares and screams that didn't sound human (that he didn't realize were coming out of his mouth until his throat clogged up and stopped working.)

He cried and screamed and lost track of time.

He stared numbly at the walls.

He cradled the photo of Steve.

He talked to himself sometimes.

He only slept so he could dream of Steve's beautiful face.

Most often, the dreams turned to nightmares and memories from Brooklyn twisted and ended bloody. Steve had died behind Bucky's eyes more times than he could count and each felt worse than a knife to the chest.

Sometimes he stared at the door and imagined Steve coming for him, barreling to his rescue. Imagined what would've happened if that plane hadn't gone down.
Imagined what would've happened if he'd told Steve about the serum the moment he'd suspected. If he hadn't held back and kept it a secret even from himself, Steve could've guessed that Bucky would survive the fall.

He might've jumped in after him.

Bucky imagined what would've happened if he'd shouted I LOVED YOU FIRST! to Steve's face instead. He thought about that one a lot, gaged all of Steve's possible reactions. Made a few up of his own that would probably never happen.

Like the words flying loud and fast and pissed out of his mouth - the exact same tone as NO. NOT WITHOUT YOU. - and Steve, blinking staring looking at him, frozen while Bucky tried to catch his breath.

Then Steve would take three big steps across the tent and his big artist hands would come up to cup Bucky's jaw with that same possessive ferocity Steve looked at him with sometimes and then he'd lean down and -

Bucky couldn't let himself imagine past that point. A hundred different scenarios but he couldn't bring himself to do that to Steve's memory. Especially knowing it could never, ever happen.

Not now that Steve was...Not ever.

Steve was gone.

They were all gone. Not all dead - hopefully - but the rest of the Commandos had given up on him too. They weren't going to really look for him, not like Steve would've.

His men had abadonned him here. He needed them. He needed Dugan's clap on the soldier and Falsworth's annoying speech about how insulating snow was and Morita's eye rolls and long-suffering sighs and Dernier and Jones's amused glances between him and Steve.

He needed them to tell him to be strong and he needed someone - anyone - to understand that he wasn't going to ever fucking be okay without Steve. Ever. They knew that, they understood that.

God, Bucky was so damn grateful they'd been there for Steve though. When Steve thought Bucky was dead he had to have been a wreck - Bucky wouldn't fool himself about that. But it wasn't fair, because now Bucky lost Steve and there was nobody to look after him. He was utterly, entirely alone.

When Bucky woke up screaming that Steve was a goddamn liar for leaving him alone out here, there were no Howling Commandos to hold him down.

When he curled around the newspaper bawling and mumbling all the things he'd never told Steve, there were no friends to drag him off to get drunk at a bar.

When Bucky started shaking and whimpering, remembering Steve holding him in those beautiful arms and twirling him round a dance floor, there was no support team to tug him into a hug and tell him he was going to be okay.

He wasn't going to be okay.

~~~

"You can't torture a man who's already broken."
"We are not here to torture him. Zola's orders, apparently he's supposed to be left alone. He's going through 'maximum pain' right now."

"Did he seriously care about that Captain America guy that much?"

"Guess so."

~*_~*_~

He hated that newspaper more than anything. The leer of Steve's propaganda picture, like that photo was supposed to represent the number of lives he'd fucking saved. The red white and blue shit they shoved down everyone's throats to make the war about honor instead of what it was really about.

Which was nothing. Nothing at all. Death, that's all war was. Death and blood and fire.

Other times that newspaper was the only thing that kept him hanging on. He woke up from a nightmare about 20 hours after Steve's death with the worst idea imaginable planted in his head:

For the past year and a half, none of it was real. He'd never gotten out, he'd been tortured and hallucinating this entire time. It made more sense, so much more sense, than what he wanted to believe.

His best friend - a tiny little scrap from Brooklyn - underwent scientific experiments to become some sort of sci-fi superhuman? Just to rescue Bucky? Storm an entire base by himself. It didn't get more crazy or "wishful thinking" than that.

Then of course, a group of men in an army who would never be allowed to fight together forming a band of brothers? A team that was famous and in movies for crying out loud. A Jap and a Frenchman and a Brit and a black man? All fighting in an elite (happy??) group, taking down entire bases with just the seven of them.

And then, the bright red angel that was Peggy Carter? A kickass, beautiful, perfect dame in love with Steve that let Bucky cry on her shoulder about how in love he was with his best friend. That told Bucky it was okay, that once she married Steve he still better come over on Sundays for dinner.

And of course all those moments with Steve - the super Steve in his head - that they'd almost kissed, that Steve had carried him out of a city with a bullet wound in his leg, all of Bucky's advanced healing and Steve's crazy ideas.

Jumping out of buildings. Singing songs on a boat for Bucky's birthday. Holding Bucky in his strong arms. Dancing a waltz on a beautiful old wooden dance floor...

Being tortured by Hydra for a year-plus was more plausible than that.

Hell of a lot easier to believe it was all a dream. A hallucination. His instinct wanted to accept the "just a dream" theory because logic was pointing in that direction. Simple: Bucky was a POW and he'd been on one hell of an acid trip. It made sense (seriously - Steve saving him? since when?) and he would have entirely lost himself in that idea, he would have.

If it weren't for that newspaper. If it had all been a dream, why give him the newspaper? How would they know what he was dreaming of in the first place? If it had all been in his head, they couldn't have printed something as crazy as Steve being a famous supersoldier in tights in the real world.

Bucky was positive he was awake now; he was in enough pain to know that for sure. So that meant the newspaper was real: tangible in his hands.
Proof it had happened. Proof that Steve had been the stupid idiot who signed up for that stupid project and had rescued Bucky's ass at some point. He had gotten out and that stupid propaganda picture was proof of it. Bucky could hold it in his hand and stare and feel and it was proof the whole year was all real.

Which meant Steve's death was real too.

Steve wasn't safe back home in Brooklyn, only fighting the war in Bucky's dreams. Steve was dead.

Bucky hated the newspaper again.

~~~

There was a man drifting in and out of consciousness, mind aching to slip into a coma and body fighting to live. Everything was ice and cold and Steve's cells weren't freezing. He was suspended, but his brain hadn't cut off yet. It was all ice and memories of eyes that matched the ice, brilliant flashing blue.

At least he was coming home to Bucky. At least they were both safe and sound now.

~~~

It started in the corner of a dark room. It was the first moment in his life that Bucky Barnes wanted to be dead more than he wanted anything else.

It wasn't something he'd ever thought he'd stoop to, not even on Zola's torture table. There'd been plenty of times that Bucky'd been sure that dying would be better than the hell he was living in, but he'd never actively wished to end his own existence.

It was sickening, and it was probably highest on the “most ashamed of” list, which was fairly long, including all sorts of things; like losing the one opportunity to escape because he was in shock. Like the shame of being a permanent cripple, a useless discarded ex-soldier with only one arm. Like not being able to face the idea of being a serum-recipient back when it would have ended up saving lives: including his own and Steve's. Like not telling Steve I love you when he had the chance.

But wanting to die beat them all out because - as always - Bucky stepped back and tried to look at it with Steve's eyes. Steve would forgive everything Bucky was ashamed of. He'd forgive it all with that golden heart of his; except wanting to die. Steve would never understand that and he'd certainly never forgive it.

But Steve was gone. Steve was dead, he was dead and he didn't have a say anymore because he left Bucky here all alone and he'd promised, he'd promised.

Damn him, of course, he'd promised he'd come as long as he was alive but now he wasn't and that singular condition had been broken. Bucky didn't want to face a world that didn't have Steve Rogers in it. A world without sunshine was cold and dark and there wasn't much he hated more than those two things.

But even more than he didn't want to live in a world without Steve Rogers, Bucky didn't want a life without Steve Rogers.

He didn't want to know what he'd become without Steve.
All he knew was that when Steve was gone, all of the good was scooped out of Bucky and he was left with nothing but his raw terrible core and something Steve would never be able to forgive.

How could he? There was something dark inside Bucky. He could feel it, he'd always been able to feel it. That black rage that bubbled up in his gut when he came running into an alley to see it wasn't just some bully on Steve, it was an entire gang of them kicking and punching and laughing and little Stevie wasn't breathing.

That rage. It scared Bucky, a lot. The way he'd mauled on those guys had scared him. He was glad Steve was unconscious for it. Real fucking glad. He'd never told Steve about the details - Steve had woken back up on the couch Bucky had carried him to, whimpering and eyes swollen shut. Bucky had just shifted the frozen bag pressed to the swollen places, whispering to Steve that he was okay now. Bucky wasn't going to let anything hurt Steve.

He'd been careful about swooping to the rescue after that - he never chased down the guys that hurt Steve, just gave the minimum number of punches and kicks possible and yelled at them to get the hell out. And it worked for a while, and Bucky eventually stopped being scared of what he'd do to protect Steve.

And then the war came. Basic training was terrifying all over again because he might not have been pissed, but he was deadly with a gun in his hands. So deadly they made him a Sergeant before he even shipped out. That scared him almost as much as the boiling black rage did.

And for the past year and a half, he'd been trying to keep a fucking handle on it. But when it came to Steve, Bucky just couldn't do it. There was something in his core that was so primal and protective that he didn't have the slightest bit of control over it.

He'd bashed a Nazi's face into an unrecognizable, bloody mess for threatening to shoot Steve. A perfectly executed killshot for every enemy that so much as looked Steve's way.

He didn't always have control over himself and now that Steve was gone, that rage was tearing at him and trying to consume him - and the one thing that had kept him in check was gone.

If he waited, if he gave himself time, the murderer in his veins would consume him. He couldn't let that happen, Steve would never let that happen. Bucky had to prevent it, for Steve's sake.

So he scraped. They hadn't given him anything since the newspaper and he didn't need anything else. He'd been creative with his kills since he first started to murder. Bucky Barnes, always thinking outside the box. Shooting enemy's hands, side-stepping avalanches, scraping the edge of his fingernail against the gritty wall, over and over. Again, to the other side.

His nails were short but the sharpened point still formed eventually. Sharp enough to break skin. He knew they were watching him, so he'd have to be quick about it, else they'd interrupt.

One sharp smack to the wall and the bones in his hand broke, violent hiss as he crumpled the shattered pieces against each other, shoved his fingers against the wall hard enough to curl the broken bones in, slide the sharpened point of that fingernail up against his only wrist.

The skin over blue veins broke and the door busted down before the blood even started to drip. An army flooded the tiny room and Bucky screamed and kicked but they dragged him out anyways.

That was the last of his time in free isolation. They kept him chained up after that, three cells down.

~~~
"He's volatile and dangerous. Don't underestimate the American."

"We don't know the full effects of the serum yet. Keep him locked down and drugged up."

"Do you have anything that will make him hallucinate? The boss said we need to keep the brain as active as possible. Well, the nightmares as active as possible."

"Try the light green vials. But you might want to find a bite guard if you want him to keep his tongue."

~~~

It wasn't the warmth that hit him first this time. It wasn't the glow of sunlight on closed eyelids. It wasn't the soft breaths unsettling and resettling the loose strands of hair across his forehead.

The first thing that Bucky really absorbed was the feeling inside his chest. He was more than warm, more than comfortable, more than happy. He was safe. He was loved. It was filling him from every ounce of his soul - he could feel it in his toes, his shins, hips, torso, building up through tired bones and tingling out the tips of his fingers, behind closed eyelids. It was everywhere.

A soft smile curled on his lips and he pressed his fingers in harder, serenity washing over him so sweet he could drown in it. The press of fingers pulled a reciprocating draw, the strong arms over his back wrapped him ever closer, fingers spread wide and possessive to burn over his shoulderblade and lower back.

"Mmm," Bucky hummed, mouth muffled by thin fabric draped over tight muscle. The hand on his shoulder blade dragged up over the top of Bucky's back, callused artist fingers rubbing over the bare skin on the back of his neck before slipping up into his hair, nails scratching slightly against his scalp. His lips parted and a blissful escape of air slipped past, his fingers digging in to find the outlines of those newly-padded ribs, that didn't stick out (thankfully) like they used to.

He traced his fingertips along the ribs like he was painting them himself, memorializing the one thing that had always been so familiar to him. It wasn't often that Bucky felt like an artist but he did now, only a thin layer of unobtrusive fabric between his palms and the masterpiece he was holding. A masterpiece that was his.

"Buck," Steve whispered into the top of Bucky's head. Bucky's soft, contented smile broke out into an immeasurably happy one and he hummed again, burying closer to Steve's chest. The hand playing in his hair swept back down to his neck, fingertips dipping below the hem of his shirt. It was warmer than fire and a thousand times gentler.

With his eyes closed, the rest of his senses were heightened and Steve's touch, Steve's arms around him, Steve's body underneath him, were all so tuned into his head that he could be Steve. They were pressed so close together Bucky didn't care where Steve's body started and his ended. He was entirely surrounded in all things beautiful, his senses filled with something like summer and clouds and sunshine and dirt and everything else beautiful and natural and real.

"Stevie," Bucky mumbled back, running his hands down from Steve's ribs, cataloging muscle and beauty all the way down to Steve's hips and back up again, rubbing care and love into him the way he used to rub warmth into tiny, frozen limbs. Now, the limbs were strong and safe and wrapped all up in Bucky's, legs tangled beneath slivers of sheets that felt like swan feathers.

"Lemme see you," Steve whispered again, his deep gold voice made gentle and silver in the peaceful quiet of the early morning. Bucky nosed against Steve's collarbone one more time, breathing in a full breath of pure Steve, and rolled a little off of Steve's chest. Steve kept one arm braced over Bucky's lower back and Bucky settled in against it, hand sweeping around to press his palm over Steve's heart as he turned his face up.

When he slowly blinked his eyes open, Steve was already looking at him, eyes dazed they looked so mesmerized. The image grew sharper and Bucky's soft smile returned, the edges of his mouth curling as he lost himself in an abyss of beautiful beautiful blue like the sky over Brooklyn.

Steve's hand slid from Bucky's neck to his cheek, cupping his jaw as he searched Bucky's face, only a few inches of white pillow between them. Everything was so perfect and beautiful that Bucky's heart couldn't help but ache. He couldn't lose this, he just couldn't.

"Let me wake up next to you every day, Steve," Bucky breathed, his fingertips curling a bit frightenedly over Steve's heart. The peaceful look on Steve's face sharpened with worry, creases forming between his eyes as he registered the tremors down Bucky's spine.

The hand on his jaw drew back and those artist fingers clamped down solid over Bucky's, holding their entwined hands over Steve's heart as blue eyes stared straight into Bucky's soul. Bucky bit his bottom lip, blinking a little timidly in the face of that intensity. Steve's hand squeezed tighter on his and the arm still half under Bucky pulled him a few inches closer. It was impossibly warmer and safer now and the fear was already slipping away when Steve was looking at him like that.

"I'm never letting go, James Buchanan Barnes," Steve promised him and Bucky locked their fingers tight enough to bruise, dipped his head forward to touch his forehead to Steve's. His eyes shut and ghosted warm air washed over his nose, his lips. "Never."

A shaky breath rolled past Bucky's lips. Steve tugged up their entwined hands, freeing his thumb to brush slowly over the corner of Bucky's mouth.

"I want to go home." Bucky kept the words as airy as he could, the golden sunlight streaming around them still creating a bubble too sweet to break. It was beautiful, everything was just so beautiful. But it wasn't Brooklyn.

Steve didn't answer for a moment, just leaned back away and tilted Bucky's chin up so Steve could look him in the eyes. Bucky stared up, enchanted, because Steve could truly be a painting, his beauty was something of the gods, something of art. And then he spoke.

"I am home. I'm with you." Steve's face was in the most honest, pure expression he owned and Bucky could cry, except that every ounce of him was filled with warmth and there was nothing to pull tears from, not even the happy ones he wanted. He was just made of clouds and love and the beautiful blue that was Steve Rogers.

Steve's callused thumb stroked over Bucky's cheek and Bucky closed his eyes against the feel of it, the words behind it. The promises and the sweetness and everything that was golden and perfect. He let out a shaky breath and the air around them shifted, the warmth in his bones tightening.

It wasn't his idea, it wasn't even something he'd thought to happen next, but suddenly Steve was rolling, up over Bucky to hover, looking down with that gorgeous halo of blonde over his head and his legs still all tangled up in Bucky's. His elbows were pinned on either side of Bucky's head and Bucky's breath cut off in his lungs in the most wonderful way.

Steve was looking at him with this burning expression, his eyes flicking down to Bucky's lips and how was he ever supposed to take in oxygen when Steve was on top of him, looking down like that?
"Steve." A prayer. A dying breath and the first gasp of air in a century. Steve's lips curled up a bit too, his voice as soft and sweet as always, words tumbling out to wash over Bucky.

"I never want to see you again," Steve whispered, his voice so soft Bucky didn't register the words at first. Steve kept looking down at him with that sweet face and Bucky's eyebrows furrowed, confused.

"Steve?"

"I never want to see you again," Steve repeated, like a promise this time. Hot, heavy hands ran down Bucky's sides, roaming over to Bucky's hips, but the sentence wasn't matching the movements of Steve's hand, the softness of his face. Bucky blinked up at the halo'd Steve in confusion, trying to figure out what the hell was going on.

Then without warning, Steve's hands suddenly drew away from Bucky's body. He didn't see what Steve had taken from him until the glint flashed through the air.

Then the blade of his favorite knife was sinking into his chest.

Bucky screamed. Steve kept hovering over him, up on one arm now as he carved the knife down Bucky's sternum. Bucky tried to shut his eyes before the image burned into his brain but he couldn't, for some reason he couldn't shut his eyes, he didn't have a single ounce of control over his body. It was all he could see, Steve's face so peaceful and sweet as he ground the knife through flesh and bone.

Steve carved a bloody star into Bucky's chest.

He carved an x over it.

Bucky couldn't stop screaming. The guards threw a bucket of icy snow in his face and he startled awake, the image disappearing, and he still couldn't stop screaming.

The guards left with their bucket and Bucky was alone again, chained to the wall and chained to the ground and shaking and hurting all over and dripping with melting snow and bleeding from his nose and from his throat.

His vocal chords gave out on him and his screams fell silent and hoarse. He couldn't even curl up in a ball and lose himself, the chains were too tight.

The screams eventually faded into weeping and Bucky hung his head and cried until his body gave up on him too and he dropped into unconsciousness again.

~~~

"Shipment from Zola."

"I thought he was still in captivity."

"They're hung up on Captain America's death and he still has contacts. He left a message and sent a box with very specific instructions. He suspects to be joining us in a few days; however the instructions in the box must be completed before his arrival. He also sent seven men - specialists - that are waiting to see you, sir."

~~~
Bucky didn't budge when they undid the chains around his wrist and ankles. He didn't lift his head when a guard kicked his thigh, told him to get up. He wasn't sure he could voluntarily move if he tried.

"Steve," was all he could manage around swollen lips. The guards kicked him again, harder, and a single tear rolled down his cheek. He'd believed it for a moment. Believed he was loved.

Steve didn't love him. Bucky always thought Steve at least loved Bucky like a brother, but it turns out Steve didn't love him at all because Steve left him here alone to die.

If Steve loved him, why did he leave? Why did he leave?

Eight gloved hands invaded his space and hauled him up off the ground. Bucky was a rag doll, head hanging and limbs dead, disheveled strands of hair flopping over his forehead, too numb for even his bottom lip to tremble.

They dragged his body out of the cell and his bloody heels left trails across the floor. Curses and kicks followed every painful foot they tugged him - it was difficult to get a grip on what was left of his limbs - but he still didn't lift his head as they dragged him down the hallway. The piece of his brain that held his sniper self catalogued the route automatically, something deep inside him still looking for some kind of exit.

It was only a piece of him though, not a big enough piece to matter anymore. Other pieces of his brain took precedence over something as refined as the strategic thinking of a sniper.

He had - at one point - realized that Steve Rogers was the stitches holding him together. He'd been a dozen different versions of Bucky Barnes in his life and Steve had meshed them into one person, somehow he had let Bucky be all of them at once. The mischievous kid and the troubled teen and the Brooklyn beauty and the smartass greenie at basic and the respected sergeant of the 107th and the haunted torture victim and the silent sniper and the protective best friend.

Steve held the pieces of him together, Steve was the thing they all had in common, and now Steve was gone and Bucky was in shambles.

He had shattered and he was all of those people and none of those people and they weren't connected anymore and his entire brain was split into pieces. Sometimes he was the stubborn best friend who refused to believe that Stevie had died on him. The Nazis knew how to print a damn faux paper after all.

Other times he was that broken man on Zola's table and he was just so so scared.

The thing about being broken into pieces, though, was you couldn't possibly hold onto all of them at once.

Especially when people were trying to cut them out. If they wanted to carve away a chunk of Bucky Barnes there was nothing in him to stop them - the soldier part of him wasn't the strongest anymore, now that what he fought for was gone.

Bucky couldn't stop them at all.

They shoved him up onto another metal table, a leather strap fastened over his only wrist, over his elbow. He stared up at the ceiling, miserable and cold; they still hadn't given him a shirt. He was back on the table and he was scared, more scared than he'd been in a long time, but he was kind of relieved too.
They were going to give him something to think about besides Steve. The numbness would keep him safe.

And then gloved fingers started on his belt buckle. The dead eyes flashed and he wasn't a rag doll anymore, the piece of him that had given up slipped away and instantly, he was pissed again. Suddenly and so thoroughly pissed his vision tinted red at the corners.

He was going mad, switching from version to version, piece to piece, emotion to emotion like that. He didn't care.

"Get the fuck off me you sicko," Bucky bit, kicking his bloody bare foot at the closest soldier. Three gloved hands slammed his heel back down on the table, three more gloved hands grabbed his other ankle before he could lift it.

He'd freaked out when they took his jacket from him but now they were stripping him naked and there was still nothing he could do about it. They'd gotten smarter with holding him down, had at least seven soldiers on him at any time.

Serum or no serum, he couldn't take down seven guys with one arm. They figured that much out.

Exposed, vulnerable, freezing, and nothing he could do about any of it. They had 100% full access to any part of his body that they wanted and Bucky was red with rage, humiliation. Pain. Fear.

There were too many emotions to handle.

They wheeled the table into a room he hadn't been in yet. There were lab coats in here, men with face masks like doctors. The same bright industrial lights, same table of tools.

As much as he hated to let them win, Bucky was crying again, silent tears rolling down his cheeks as he stared at the dirty ceiling and wondered what they were going to do to him. At one point one of the doctors covered his lower half with a sheet, but it just managed to fuck with his brain because why would they strip him to cover him back up? Or maybe the doctors didn't want to have to see the nasty gash on his thigh that hadn't healed yet. Everything else had healed, by now. Except his arm, that was still a stump.

The world was spinning now, slightly foggy. Bucky wondered when the last time he'd eaten was.

The labcoats marched to his table. One had an electric saw in his hand. Bucky wondered what the hell that could possibly be for. Not exactly a common torture method.

* *

He found out what the saw was for. He thought he'd screamed and cried himself hoarse by now, but he'd underestimated his vocal chords. He thought the pain would be a distraction from his heartbreak, but he hadn't realized the price of that distraction.

They didn't even sedate him as they sawed off what was left of his arm.

The electric blade started up with a whirring sound that would haunt him for years and Bucky was screaming and begging for them to stop before the spinning even reached his arm. They all had earplugs in to muffle him.
The labcoats still flinched at the blood-curdling shriek when the saw slid through his flesh, ripping back layers of cell and skin and muscle with the first swift slice down.

Blood splashed against the side of his face, against his mouth. His own blood, splattering up against him like a bad graffiti painting. He could barely comprehend the pain through his screams.

Then the saw hit bone. Marrow went flying, little white slivers and shards of periosteum following. The side of his neck took a hit and then he was bleeding even more: sliced open by a jagged piece broken off of his own skeleton. His brain was short-circuiting, trying to simultaneously ignore the grinding blade and get it to stop at the same time.

He passed out from the sheer, delirious pain before he got a single glance at the glint of metal to replace him.

*

~~~

There were twenty-four men in full uniform standing at attention before the metal double doors of the abandoned factory's headquarters. When the doors opened, a bespectacled tiny man limped out and shook the hand of a tall lean bespectacled man. Reinhardt nodded once at Zola, taking his team of seven and leaving the facility. Zola turned to the remaining soldiers, Swiss accent thick as he addressed them from the metal balcony.

"My name is Doctor Arnim Zola and I am one of ze last functioning, remaining heads of Hydra. You have been assigned here because you are ze best your countries have to offer. Zis project is ze most heavily-guarded and important project to ever be executed in Europe. Ze circumstances are more zan dangerous, and I'm sure you have all been filled in on ze details. Before we begin, I must remind you of ze most important key."

"We are not breaking a man anymore. We are creating a weapon. We are creating a masterpiece. Zis will not be torture, zis will be art. Training. Any attempt on Case Seventeen's life will respond in ze termination of yours. Sergeant Barnes is more valuable than the lives of all of ze soldiers in all of your armies. No one will come into direct contact without explicit orders and no one will interfere with ze molding processes. Only ze top of zeir division even know zis project exists, and we have no qualms with ze destruction of zeir lives as well, should it be necessary. Is zis understood?"

Seventeen double arms reached to the sky.

"Heil. Hydra!"

~~~

For the first time since he'd been captured - scratch that, for the first time since he could really remember - the immediate thought when he regained consciousness was not of Steve.

He blinked his eyes open under harsh industrial lights and he didn't turn to look for Steve's sleeping body, didn't sob as the realization of Steve's death hit him all over again.

Something was off. There were lab coats around him with their face masks, one of them close and hovering with a clipboard. His shoulder was burning like a nest of fire ants were attacking him, his body was aching and there was a weird taste in his mouth and he could swear there was pressure on his left arm.

Bucky looked down and lifted two hands into the air. One of them wasn't his, but it lifted when he told it to. Shining shifting plates, an unfamiliar whirring sound as metal shifted. Bucky stared, curling his fingers into a fist and watching the metal curl in a mirror form of his real hand.

They'd ruined him.

The black rage slipped over him like a dark transparent blanket and he reached for the nearest lab coat, watching the metal hand with fascination as wrapped the metal fingers around the scientist's trachea.

He'd kill every single one of them for polluting him like this. And he'd use their own fucking tool to do it with.

The skin of the scientist's neck didn't have a texture, but he could sense touching it. Like wearing gloves, in a way. Touching through something but not actually feeling all the details.

Bucky focused and squeezed, lifting the scientist off his feet as he choked and scrambled wildly against the metal hand. The man couldn't do anything. He couldn't do a single thing about it because the metal was uncompromisable. It was metal, for crying out loud.

And he had control of it.

The rest of the lab coats rushed his way and one of them stabbed a needle in his chest, instantly filling him with some sort of dizzying drug. They must not have had enough time to figure out the dosage yet because Bucky’s eyes didn't flutter shut. Instead he snapped the metal fingers together, crushing the esophagus of the scientist he'd been choking. With a movement that felt too easy, he tossed the dead scientist's body at the next closest one and they both went tumbling down.

Only his hips and ankles were strapped down.

Bucky sat up and yanked back the sheet, ignoring how the shock of sudden cold made his naked body want to curl up and shiver. Everything was spinning from the drug, but he didn't care. The metal hand was clumsy in a way that it was confusing to watch - he felt like he had to mentally tell it what to do, which was clearly not how it worked.

You don't tell your hand to grab a doorknob, you just grab the doorknob. So he tried to focus on the metal hand a little less, just so he could get out of here fast enough.

He ripped back the strap across his hips, breaking the leather and sliding down the rest of the table before ripping back the leather straps on his ankles too. He was out.

Bucky jumped off the table and there was instantly a swarm of lab coats on him, all bearing needles and trying to stick him with one. He had a lot of exposed skin, but they'd given him a weapon now and he wasn't going down without a fight.

He spun in a circle, letting the metal thing swing out and knock over the lab coats like bowling pins. A few dodged it, a few hit the concrete with terrible thuds. Bucky paused, trying to regroup his thoughts, and nearly fell over sideways. Now that he wasn't using his momentum or laying down, his entire left side was way too heavy for his body. Readjusting his center of gravity lower and tipping his body to the right, Bucky eyed the approaching dripping needles. They had no idea who they were messing with.

He shot out a kick at the nearest lab coat's knee and almost fell over from the change in balance. Okay, fighting with the extra weight was almost as bad as fighting without an arm. The scientist he kicked went down, but in the proceeding stumble another scientist lunged at his back, needle raised high and ready to pierce skin.
Bucky swung out the metal thing again and slammed the scientist down to the ground, his skull splitting on the concrete.

Another thud made him spin sharply around, but it was just another lab coat crumpling to the ground. By himself. Odd. Thud. And another. Thud. Another. Each of them with eyes rolling back in their heads before dropping to the ground.

Bucky looked around with wide eyes as the lab coats all collapsed. What in the world? He tipped his head back to look for vents, maybe it was some sort of gas? A few strands of hair had strayed to his forehead and he smoothed them back haphazardly as he looked around.

A soft white memory of ghost artist fingertips, shifting the strands of hair off his forehead.

Bucky crumpled to his knees. He couldn't tell if it was from the sudden hit of Steve again - and the realization of the three minutes he'd gone without Steve on his mind - or the gas that was finally starting to get into his system.

A glint of metal in his peripherals was the last thing he saw before the gas took him completely.

~~~

"Sergeant Barnes," Zola greeted. Bucky blinked against the foggy film over his eyes. He couldn't quite see, everything was fuzzy and spinning, but he could still make out that face. He'd never forgotten it.

If he could move, Bucky would kill him. He'd been dreaming of killing him for more than a year. They all had, every one of the Commandos. Ironic, that they thought Bucky had died the day they had captured Zola.

Bucky had really been hoping that Steve had smashed Zola's face in.

But Zola was here. Steve hadn't killed him, none of the Commandos had. Even the US Military must have let him go. That thought alone was sickening enough to ruin him. None of Bucky's pain had been worth it: his death hadn't even been important enough, reason enough for them to kill this bastard.

And then Zola opened his mouth and everything got about a hundred times worse. That kept happening a lot lately.

"You are to be the new fist of Hydra."

Of course.

Of course they hadn't captured him just for information.

Of course they wanted him to fight. They wanted him to fight for them. The bastards who had killed Steve.

Zola smiled down at him.

Bucky just closed his eyes. This had to be another nightmare.

~~~
They go for his head first. At one point, a month ago, he might have beaten them at their own game. When they'd had him a year ago he broke easier than he'd have liked to admit.

Now, there was no contest. Not really. He didn't have anything to lose anymore.

"Who are you?" The metallic voice asked. (Everything was metallic.)

Bucky was in a perfectly square (metal) room, strapped to a (metal) table and staring up at a perfectly square (metal) ceiling. There were windows on all four walls, windows that showed Bucky his reflection, even though he knew the people on the other side of those windows could see him.

His shoulder hurt enough to have most of his brain occupied with refraining from screaming. Screams meant iron brands with fire now (there were two burns already healing on his side and thigh) and he didn't want to bend over backwards (Steve would be ashamed), but the smart thing to do would be to avoid getting burned again.

"Who are you?" The voice asked again. Someone behind one of the windows, he was sure. Speaking through some sort of device.

The first time they'd asked him that - more than a year ago - he'd sassily replied with just a kid from Brooklyn. They'd pressed and prodded and poked him until he changed his answer. Sergeant James Barnes. 32557038. Over and over and over. Who are you.

He knew this question too well already.

They never hurt him enough to kill him and Bucky hated them for that. The only thing he hated them for more was the newspaper. Which was alright, because he hated himself for the newspaper the most.

It was his fault Steve was dead and he's not stupid, he couldn't deny that.

"Who are you?" The voice sounded pissed now and the question didn't come alone. An electric shock spiraled up from the metal bars impaling his feet, a warning that he needed to answer.

The pieces of him laughed at himself because he knew that a month ago, he'd be fighting back so hard. For Steve. Bucky had always fought for Steve (since day 1) and he'd simply lost that. There was nothing left to fight for, only things to fight against.

"Fuck off," Bucky slurred tiredly because it's what he was supposed to say even if he didn't have a reason to anymore.

The shock bit the insides of his feet again. Bucky tossed his head back lethargically against the table and wondered distantly if he had the strength to bust his own skull.

"Who are you?" The voice asked again. The metal robot.

"Sergeant James Barnes," Bucky rasped. Like he was supposed to.

"Why are you here?"

The first time they'd asked him that he'd shot back because you took me and brought me here, you ridiculous Nazi bastards.

Eventually he'd given them a different answer for that one too. Eventually they'd stopped asking that one, always reverting back to who are you. Bucky couldn't figure out why.
He wondered if the here they were asking him about meant here as in the facility or here as in the war.

"Information," Bucky responded eventually. His left side was heavy. Too heavy, he felt like he was going to fall off the table.

"Who do you serve?"

Your mother. the first time they'd asked, a year ago.
Not you batty Germans. the second time.
The 107th. the third time.
My fuckin' country. the fourth time.

"The United States of America," Bucky said dully to the ceiling.

"Who do you serve?"

They were trying to make him think. Trying to break down to the answer in his soul. Every time he didn't give them what they felt was the full truth, it was an electric shock up through his legs.

"The Howling Commandos," Bucky revised. He hated himself for cooperating but he'd hate himself more if he got killed right after he was given his first weapon.

Well, it could be a weapon. After Bucky got over the urge to hurl every time he so much as looked to his left. It was metal, like everything else cold.

Bucky was metal like everything else cold.

"Who do you serve?" The voice echoed again, words relentless and feet burning hot from the lightning by now. At least he wasn't screaming. Just gasping, tears in his eyes. He didn't really take the time to notice his body's reactions right now though, he was too caught up in his head.

"The Howling Commandos," Bucky repeated, because it was true. He did serve them. They were the only family he had left.

The unseen faces on the other side of the windows must not have been impressed. They asked again.

"Who do you serve?"

Bucky clawed at his brain with invisible hands. He still couldn't budge from being strapped down but if he could he'd sink his sharp nails right into the flesh of his temple, tear out the worms they were trying to stick into his brain.

Who did he serve? Why did he fight? It wasn't America it wasn't his country it wasn't even his team and he hated himself for that.

Who did he serve.

"Steve Rogers," Bucky whimpered, tears blurring his vision again. He sunk his teeth into his bottom lip to make it stop trembling but the shivers wouldn't seize.

It wasn't giving Steve up, he told himself. They couldn't hurt Steve now. Steve was gone. Steve was safe, at least. Bucky had gotten Steve killed but at least he wasn't here. At least they couldn't hurt him.

Something still crumpled painfully in his stomach at the admission. He'd given them Steve's name and his head was swirling with it.

He didn't want to know what they were going to do with that name.

"Who are you?" The voice repeated. Again. The voice wasn't over that one.

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038."

"Who are you?"

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038."

"Who are you?"

But he'd answered it. He'd answered it and they weren't going to leave him alone. This was how he'd ended up mumbling it to himself on repeat last time.

The more times you say something the less meaning it holds.

Repeating his name rank and serial number didn't just give the enemy his information.

It took the information away from him, made it meaningless. Made him meaningless. Nothing.

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038."

"Who are you?"

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038."

"Who are you?"

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038." It came out like a plea this time.

"Who are you?" Unrelenting.

"Sergeant James Barnes, 32557038." A sob.

"Who are you without him?"

The question froze him. A shock rattled the bones in his ankles but Bucky couldn't care.

Who was he without Steve?

Who was James Buchanan Barnes without Steven Grant Rogers?

Who was he?

He wouldn't have been a Sergeant if it weren't for Steve. Probably wouldn't have been in the army if it weren't for Steve. Wouldn't have been an artist. Wouldn't have cared so damn much about everything. Wouldn't have saved lives, wouldn't have fought for anything important. Never would have been Bucky if it weren't for Steve.

When you stripped the Steve from Bucky Barnes, what was left over?"

"Nothing good," Bucky whispered. Mortified. Staring at the ceiling with wide eyes and a shaking body.

"Who are you without him?"

Bucky closed his eyes.

Darkness. There was nothing beautiful inside him that hadn't come from Steve.

"Who are you without him?"

"Who are you without him?"

"Who are you without him?"

"Who are you without him?"

"Nothing," Bucky whispered.

The voice fell silent.

~~~

A knock on the door startled her and Peggy spun around at the sound, glad she wasn't the type of mourner who had to wipe at her eyes.

"Agent Carter?" Dugan asked a little sheepishly from the doorway. Morita had an even more sheepish look on.

"Yes?" Peggy crossed her arms tightly over her chest and raised her eyebrows in a way that hopefully wasn't too sharp.

"We, uh. Wanted to come check on you, ma'am." Dugan flinched as he said it and Peggy had half the mind to snap at them for being presumptuous enough to think she needed 'checking on.'

"That's very kind, Dugan, but I don't need your moral support. Was there anything else you came to discuss?"

Morita shifted on his feet, eyes lowered in some form of respect, or maybe fear. When he looked up though, he seemed fairly confident in his words.

"It just seemed only right somebody come ask. We know how close you were to Captain Rogers, ma'am."

Peggy sighed, letting her arms fall back down to her side. There was something about the Howling Commandos that just made them somewhat endearing in their deadliness.

"Not as close as Bu- you boys, were. How are the men holding up?"

Dugan shrugged. "Morale's pretty low but no one's lost their heads."

"See to it that they don't," Peggy crossed her arms back over her chest again. "Will that be all, gentleman?"

"Actually ma'am...we heard something about a team you might be forming?"
"Are you both interested?" Dugan and Morita both nodded. She waved them at the chairs in front of the desk. They both removed their hats as they sat down, listening intently. Peggy wondered if they had been this respectful before they'd met Steve or if they'd learned it from him. Either Steve Rogers had a brilliant choice in his team or he shaped men more than she thought.

Although she had heard something about the team actually being formed by Barnes...

No thinking about Bucky, or Steve. There was a mission at hand, not a love story to cry over.

"There is a Nazi unique items retrieval and torture specialist by the name of Werner Reinhardt that needs to be hunted down. He had a powerful position in Hydra and is very likely to be involved in top level projects the US Military may be interested in. He's dropped off the grid since Zola was captured, but I need a skilled team to track him down."

Dugan and Morita both looked at each other then looked back at her and nodded.

"What kind of top level projects?"

"Secretive ones, unfortunately. There's a rumor about the manufacturing of a new weapon that is quite concerning. Other than that, I'm afraid we don't know much. Are any other members of your team interested?"

"Falsworth and Dernier are both headed to rejoin their own armies. Jones is goin' back to the front lines, I believe. Just Morita and I are stickin' around."

Peggy pursed her lips, looking down at her shoes for a moment. The best fighters - possibly best men - this war effort had and they were disbanded. Nothing had been the same since Bucky had died, but Steve's to follow...

"That's fairly understandable." She smoothed out her skirt, turning a tight smile on the last two members of the Howling Commandos. "Well, the US Military appreciates your help. I'll contact you with further information."

"Yes ma'am," they said in unison, standing again and nodding in respect. Peggy watched them as they walked back out of the tent, heads high but tired. They all were. There wasn't a single one of their fleet that hadn't been affected by the plane crash.

She wondered if Steve would be disappointed in them all.

~~~~~~~*~

March 18, 1945

The seven steps to breaking a man creating a human weapon.

The meeting room was as unremarkable on the outside as the two men who walked into it, shaking hands over a metal table before they sat down, surrounded by unobtrusive grey walls and an unassuming metal door. But inside that meeting room - and those two appearingly unremarkable men - a plan to shape the century was born.

"Doctor Lagunov," Zola greeted, adjusting his glasses as Lagunov carefully sat his pile of manilla folders on the table between them.

"Doctor Zola. I understand you went to great lengths - as far as Russia - insuring you find the top consultant of my division. I can assure you will not be disappointed in your choice. How can I assist you in your current project?"

"Well, Doctor. I make ze weapons of ze warfront, and zis is my greatest weapon yet. A project a year in ze making zat should last for decades. Ze plan is nearly perfect, but I need some...psychological advice. I cannot begin the physical creation of zis weapon until it is mentally prepared. Specifically, zere need to be certain features retained and others erased; in order to have ze slate I need to work my magic."

Lagunov nodded slightly, sliding the second manilla folder out from his pile and opening it gently, spreading a few papers across the table between them.

"The psychological creation of a man into a machine. It's a fascinating topic, one I have had the fortune of studying extensively. I must say though, there hasn't been a single scientist who has come close to such a creation. The biggest factor isn't the methods used, it's whom they are used on. How confident are you of your subject's ability to morph into something inhuman?"

"Quite confident, Doctare. Zere's something special about zis one." Zola straightened his glasses on his nose and Lagunov slid one of the papers across the table.

"Wonderful. So we shall begin, then. Now the groundwork for the transformation is based on an old philosophical idea introduced by Rene Descartes. He once said that the body and mind are separate entities, composed of different substances, which interact within a living person; sometimes in harmony and other times competitively. The idea is to break apart the body from the mind, while keeping them linked enough that the control of one will give you the immeasurable control of the other.

"So, that brings in the work of Ivan Pavlov - he was able to condition a dog to salivate to the sound of a bell instead of the smell of food. Animals are extremely complex, but they respond to situations according to their nerve pathways conditioned through experience. The conditioning is key. Now, for the convenience of execution, the first stage has been split into seven separate sections. These - steps, if you will - are the best way to achieve the man to machine transformation."

Lagunov pointed at the piece of paper, following Zola's gaze to the words.

"The seven steps go as this:
Один (1): information collection
Два (2): strip to the core of humanity
Три (3): rerouting of emotional connections
Четыре (4): physical and mental awareness
Пять (5): disconnection of mental physical barrier
Шесть (6): destruction of personal identity
Семь (7): assertion of true control

"Now, let me explain just what I mean by these further, Doctor Zola..."

~*~

"Step one: Collect as much incriminating data against the subject as is possible. Find the weaknesses, find out what the nightmares are about, their most secret desire, most terrible memory. Anything that will break them."
"Who are you without him?" The voice asked again.

"What are you to him?"

His eyes squeezed shut and Bucky tried to breathe, tried to find some semblance of calm amidst the cold and the prodding and the electric shocks in his feet and the terrible questions they kept asking him.

They'd let him be, let him sit and rot in his own words and thoughts for what felt like days. Nothing, repeating in his head over and over again on loop. He was nothing without Steve. They'd ripped that out of him.

Then the voice came back out of nowhere, suddenly starting up the questions again. Bucky was just so tired. He wanted it to be over, he didn't want to have to think. He didn't want his brain and his mouth betraying him and betraying Steve but the voice wouldn't stop asking and the rods in his feet wouldn't stop shocking him and his shoulder wouldn't stop burning.

"I don't know," Bucky said, which seemed to be his preferred answer to most of the questions they asked about Steve. They asked a lot of questions about Steve. It wasn't fair. It was like they knew that Steve was his core, Steve was his everything. They were using the beautiful sunshine against him, like dangling a carrot over a donkey’s nose to make it run and it wasn't right because Steve's memory deserved so much better than that.

"What are you to him?" The voice asked again. The wording only ever changed slightly and it still sounded like a robot, but each question was enough to tear a hole into Bucky’s sternum.

He could spend hours thinking about the depth of each question, he could lie here and wallow in his sorrow and the incredible question of what is Bucky to Steve?

His best friend? His childhood playmate? His left hand man? Sure, but that wasn't quite what the question was asking. Bucky knew, because he'd tried all of those answers and apparently it wasn't the one they were looking for. No, they wanted to know how Steve felt about him.

If Bucky was something more. But Bucky wasn't. He wasn't anything to Steve.

"What are you to him?"

"Nothing," Bucky whispered again, the word swallowed up by the sob he'd been choking back. The voice fell silent as he cried, slamming his head back against the table and cursing everything and just pouring tears all over the metal table beneath him.

He was nothing. He was nothing to Steve. His body was nothing and his head was nothing because Steve was gone and what was his purpose supposed to be? What was he living for? Why did he exist if he wasn't here for Steven Grant Rogers?

The soft strands on his forehead that Steve used to fix for him, sweep back with a soft smile on his face, were sticking to him with sweat and probably blood, he couldn't tell where he was bleeding or not anymore.

It didn't matter, though. None of it mattered because Steve was dead.
"How long have you known Captain Rogers?"

"Don't talk about him," Bucky replied tiredly, getting a little sick of all of the questions and metallic voices. He had no idea how long he'd been in here but they'd been asking more and prodding more for what felt like forever.

They kept up that same torture method of shocking him any time they didn't like his answers and Bucky decided it was basically fucking pointless to tell them anything but the truth. They were monitoring his vitals or something, had some sort of lie detector going or at least a few experts on lying standing on the other side of one of the glass windows, watching and waiting for the truth in his answers.

Although he had to admit that most of the time it was pretty obvious when he gave in and told them the truth like they wanted because he basically started crying every time he did; or he just got pissed. Either way, it wasn't too tough to figure out when he was giving in to their stupid questions.

They'd asked him about his family and his life in Brooklyn, but just briefly enough to tell that they didn't want to know, they were just looking for weak spots. So focus turned to the war, prodding him about Steve and all the people he'd killed.

The voice asked him about Steve a lot. Probably because he reacted so strongly to those questions; but he couldn't help it. He couldn't be silent in the face of Steve's death, he couldn't. Which meant they would not leave him alone about it.

"How long have you known Captain Rogers?"

"'M whole life," Bucky muttered, closing his eyes and trying to drift away. A bolt of electricity shot up his ankles (he wasn't allowed to sleep) and he opened his eyes back up.

"Did you join his squad because of your previous relationship?"

"Yes."

"Were you promoted to sergeant because of your previous relationship?"

"N-no, we- I. Before I shipped out."

"Why were you promoted to the sergeant position?"

"Because I was s'posd to be good at killin' you bastards."

"What was the nature of your relationship with Captain Rogers?"

"Will you stop fucking talking about him if I tell you?"

"Were you sexually involved with Captain Rogers?"

Bucky groaned, wishing he could bury his face in his hands. Well, hand. Hand and weird metal thing that was attached to his body.

"Were you sexually involved with Captain Rogers?"

Honestly, Bucky couldn't see why it would matter. Except, right, they were looking for a weak spot. Of course. As always. Being in a relationship with someone who just recently died was kind of a weak spot.

Except, of course, his relationship with Steve had been...complicated at the best, irrelevant at the worst.

Maybe Steve didn't even care that Bucky had fallen. He hadn't come looking. He'd gone and left and he wasn't coming back now, so clearly Bucky had been reading too much into how Steve felt about him. He'd thought Steve at least cared about him, but how could he leave him here if he did?

"Were you sexually involved with Captain Rogers?"

"You're askin' the wrong questions," Bucky mumbled, eyes slipping shut again. Lightning shocked them open again.

"Were you sexually involved with Captain Rogers?" The voice paused and Bucky still didn't answer, just stared up at the ceiling with a blank expression.

"Were you in love with Captain Rogers?"

"If I tell you yes will you call me a homosexual and finally let me die?" Bucky offered hopefully.

"Were you in love with Captain Rogers?" The voice asked, not changing the slightest. Fine.

It was a shame, really.

"Were you in love with Captain Rogers?"

"Who wasn't?" Bucky asked bitterly, staring up at the ceiling and thinking that at least I loved him first didn't hold the slightest bit of weight anymore when nothing mattered. It wouldn't have made a difference anyways, not in the face of pretty red lipstick, perfectly silky hair, a tight red dress and eyes full of fire Bucky used to have.

Fire he was never getting back.

~*~

"Step two," Lagunov slid his finger down, translating the next paragraph of Cyrillic letters. "Strip the subject down to core. Boil away the masks they hide behind, unravel all of the deflection techniques and denial. Turn everything into pure honesty, cut down to the very central part of the beginning and end of each emotion, each thought, each instinct.

"Peel back until everything is open and raw and simple. The very simplest version of a man there can be - a one word core out of a million page novel."

*

The next room they dragged him to was white. The whole thing, ceiling, floor, walls. Whiter than a hospital, whiter than anything he'd ever seen before. It was like one of those asylum rooms, except without the padding they had in the stories.

He thought he'd known isolation. He had no idea.
They left him in there with just his head and this array of sound. Different pitches, different noises. The frequencies were all wrong. Just hearing them the first time made him shiver and clutch at his head.

But they didn't stop. For days.

It was a radio recording, he could tell that much. There were all of these different levels to it, different layers added over each other and it was drivin' him fucking insane.

Some of the sounds were out of hospital machines, it sounded like. Others sounded like war sounds, others he could swear were birds. Beeps and blank static and he couldn't even think with all of that going on.

His brain was short-circuiting and he couldn't form a single coherent thought. He stumbled around harmlessly, broken and confused. The metal thing attached to his shoulder was strapped flat against his body, a tight leather harness that made him one armed again. Something about not giving him weapons. The harness was the only thing on his body when they threw him in the room and locked the door behind them.

He wasn't tied down and when he ran into another white wall for about the fifteenth time in the past minute he decided that was probably the point. He couldn't tell where the walls began and the floor ended and he couldn't tell where his head began and the noises ended and it kind of felt like falling off the train all over again.

Except there was no water to hit at the bottom.

He was just falling and falling and falling and and his hand clutched his head as he curled into a ball on the ground but the noises didn't stop and he got swallowed up anyways.

It could have been minutes or months before the noises finally faded into nothing. His brain didn't pick up on the silence though, he kept on hearing those sounds, agony, rushing through his veins.

They dragged him out by the leather harness across his chest, but he didn't notice. He wasn't seeing the white room door close and he wasn't seeing the hallway they pulled him down. He didn't see anything, he didn't hear or feel anything.

There was just white and everything else was too much, too irrelevant. None of that mattered, not an ounce of it mattered. Even words and screaming were all just...frivolous. Sounds. Everything was noise, just noise.

His eyes shot open when he hit the water. The blast was freezing and suddenly he was gasping, a flood of ice cold rushing down his throat and making him choke. He couldn't breathe and he'd inhaled water and everything suddenly got sharp bright and clear like putting on glasses for the first time after spending an entirely life surrounded by fuzzy shapes.

His brain ached but his lungs ached more and his shoulder was still burning and he struggled, choking and coughing in the water as he tried to swim upwards with one arm, the metal attached to his body trying to sink him in the tank.
Gloved black hands grabbed the leather straps around his chest and dumped him onto the metal catwalk above the tank, water already trying to freeze to his skin from the temperature. The cold of the metal burned his body all over and he sputtered water past his lips, trying to breathe when he just wanted to scream from the pain.

Bucky was fairly sure he was freezing to the metal catwalk, physically attaching to it from the ice and water on his skin. Boots kicked his stomach, making him curl deeper in on himself as he shivered violently, teeth clacking hard enough to fear snapping his own tongue off.

Then it was back to the white noise room.

*

He didn't know how many times he woke back up gasping in a lungful of water but by the time they took him back to the room with the table and the four glass windows, he didn't have any trouble answering the first question they asked him.

Well, he had trouble speaking, but he had no trouble with the answer.

"Who are you?"

"N-noth. Ing."

~*~

"Step three: Reroute all of the dangerous emotions. Turn rage for you instead of against you. Repaint targets in the subject's head. Burn mental safe houses, break down paths of intentions and shift them just enough to work for your benefit."

"What do you know about Hydra?"

Bucky tried to swallow around the blood in his throat. His entire mouth was made of copper and his eyes had little fires lit behind them and the skin on his shoulder still felt like it was peeled open, raw.

"Nassisciencedivizon," Bucky slurred in response, blinking at the ceiling and wondering how many times they'd force him to speak before his vocal chords finally snapped their final shred.

"What do you know about Hydra's goals?"

"Whirl' dom'nation?" he responded, sounding kind of doubtful because it had to have been such a long time ago that he'd been talking about Hydra's goals. Maybe a different lifetime. Probably a different lifetime.

"Hear the truth, Sergeant Barnes. Hear the truth. Hydra is here to save the world from chaos."

"Hydra'sss," Bucky said confusedly, rolling his head a little on the metal and trying to stop the ceiling from dipping down and smushing him.

"Don't bother when he's like that. Just hang it up for the day - he'll still be there tomorrow. Somebody go find the nutrients needle." The voice got distant and Bucky didn't really hear what they were saying, he just stared up at the ceiling and wondered if he'd ever see the sunshine again.

"What do you know about Hydra's goals?"
His body had healed significantly overnight and Bucky was just tired now, back to wishing they’d just end him already.

"Wanna kill a lotta people," Bucky offered, rolling his wrist in the cuffs and trying to count back in his memory to how many times it had been broken now.

"You do, or Hydra does?"

Bucky almost smiled at that one. "Both."

"You don't want to kill us, Sergeant Barnes. You want to kill, but it is not us." He snorted at the metallic words. He had a pretty good idea who he wanted to kill.

He was pissed.

"There is still a world that needs saving. That's what Hydra are here to do: save the world. You want a part of that, don't you?"

Didn't he? Bucky wished he could pretend this was about saving people anymore. Although, really, maybe it was. Maybe all this time Bucky was just trying to save as many people as he could and he got caught in the crossfires and now he was here.

"You don't save anybody," Bucky told them. Is that what they called their torture now? Was that their excuse for the scars on his body? For the tattered, fraying edges of his mind? For the way they were ripping him apart?

"They didn't tell you the truth about us. Hear the truth, Sergeant. We are saving the world from chaos."

Bucky didn't answer. These bastards didn't deserve an answer. He was just too goddamned tired to deal with their mess right now. The only thing he could really feel was how pissed he was, how much his body ached, how much he didn't feel like talking.

"Your army drafts soldiers, pulls boys out of their homes, all for what? To fight against those who are trying to bring balance back to the world? They told you whatever you needed to hear to raise your guns against Hydra. How could you blindly trust the people that pull you out of your home and force you to go fight a war in the cold, away from life and surrounded by fire and death?"

He knew what they were trying to do. It was just that there was a piece of his head, some piece of his brain that wanted to believe it because it actually made a little sense. Everyone's army said they were the good guys, said that the team on the other side of the battlefield were evil and wrong. Of course they'd told Bucky that.

There was a little kid, just a teen with curly blonde hair, holding onto his broken wrist and looking up at Bucky with pleading blue eyes. Bucky pointed his gun at the head of some kid, just some kid, and wondered when the hell he'd started killing people without even asking what the hell they'd done.

That individual kid, what had he done? So his government sucked. Didn't all of their governments suck? What the fuck made the U.S. of fucking A. any more justified to kill than the bastards over here? What made it okay for Bucky to take lives and not some other kid defending his homeland?

"Hydra isn't looking for world domination. Hydra wants world peace."

Peace. Bucky wondered what the hell peace was supposed to look like. It wasn't something he'd ever known before. Imagining a whole world of it...an entire world all just. Okay with each other.

Nobody killing anybody.

Is that what these people wanted? And the US were what, jealous they hadn't thought of it first? Not wanting peace because then they wouldn't be so damn powerful? What?

Or...

or maybe Hydra was trying to turn him against the only thing he had left. Maybe Hydra was trying to make him turn on his home, on his beautiful America, on the ideals of freedom and justice.

"I'm going to rip the heads off of every one of you," Bucky grit out from between his teeth. His head was swirling with the doubt that maybe he'd been on the evil side all along...but Steve had been fighting for America and nothing Steve ever did could possibly be bad--

"You're angry, Sergeant Barnes. If you are angry, be angry at Steve for leaving you."

Leaving you.

He'd promised Bucky. Bucky had been so afraid to trust, so afraid to depend on someone but he'd always depended on Steve and Steve had let him down. Steve had left him.

Bucky was so, so alone.

He was going to be alone forever.

"We aren't the enemy, Sergeant Barnes," the voice told him again. Bucky stared up at the ceiling and decided that maybe they were all the fucking enemy.

Which meant no one was.

No one, nothing. All over again. White and noise, that was all it was, wasn't it? None of it fucking mattered. It was all politics and glitter and noise.

Humans were born into a world of what? Of what? What was the fucking point? What was the fucking point? To kill each other? To give birth more useless people to kill more people?

It was just all. Noise.

~*~

"Step four: Awareness. The brain must be entirely completely aware of the body's presence at all times. This will take months of training, at least. You can begin today, Doctor, but true awareness comes with practice and time.

"You said he has a prosthetic that needs to become second nature, correct? Make him learn to accept the arm as his. Entirely, completely part of his body. Then when we take his body away from his mental possession later, you will own the arm as well. But he has to believe it is his own, first.

"And remember, power and deadliness comes through awareness. This may be one of the most important steps of the process and it certainly must be repeated."
"Sergeant Barnes," the lab coat (Bucky still couldn't call them doctors) greeted him cheerily, snapping a blue face mask over his smiling mouth. Bucky raised an unimpressed eyebrow (because it's what he would have done a few months ago) and pretended to be disinterested in whatever the newcomer was planning to do to him.

"Did you know there are 206 bones in the human body?" The same cheery voice prompted.

"I don't care," Bucky responded, pretending for his own sake that he wasn't desperately lonely of human interaction.

Pretending that he wasn't so broken he couldn't close his eyes without having nightmares about Steve. Pretending that he still could breathe fine, that his chest didn't constrict with pain from broken ribs shielding a broken heart and a broken soul and a lost little kid crying out for the sunshine to save him.

"Well, how about I teach you? Let's learn about every--" the hammer struck the bottom of Bucky's foot, snapping something in half at the impact "--little bone in your body."

Bucky didn't have the luxury to scream; his vocal chords weren't healed fully from the last time he'd shredded them. He'd be spitting copper for days if he screamed now.

"That was your Navicular bone. Sharp, isn't it? Now this is your Cuboid..."

*
He did learn all 206 bones eventually, because it turns out the supersoldiers have the ability to get every bone in their body broken and live through it. It took him a few tries before he got all of their names, but there came a time that he could locate any bone inside his body. Lifting his hand, he could feel the bones beneath his skin, could picture them shifting or snapping behind the layers of muscle. He knew which ones hurt the most to snap, which ones could just be broken with a carefully placed chop of a hand and which needed a sledgehammer.

The exception of course, being his left arm. There were no bones to be broken there, only metal now. It was a long time after the surgery, but they eventually took the leather harness off of his chest that kept the metal thing strapped down. The first thing he did was close the strange metal fingers around his own throat and squeeze. They had him sedated again before he even broke oxygen flow.

When he woke back up the harness was still off, but there was a metal collar protecting his neck from the hand. Sighing in defeat, Bucky turned over the metal hand curiously, clenching and unclenching the fingers, watching the way the metal responded to his brain. It moved like it was his own, like it knew him already.

It was kind of beautiful, in the way that machines are. Bucky rolled the fingers and watched in fascination as the plates shifted and broke apart and realigned themselves. He wondered if that's what his heart looked like now too, little plates of armour shifting and breaking apart as a memory from Steve stabbed him here, a nightmare tortured him there. Maybe the arm was kind of fitting in a way; broken but somehow functional, like Bucky.

The most experience he had with anything mechanical like this was hanging out with Howard and watching him tinker. But now there was a chunk of metal attached to him. It was the first thing they'd given him, next to the newspaper. The only two things to call his own, a battered slip of paper to remind him of what he'd lost and a shiny foreign thing to replace what he'd lost.

It was better than not having an arm, at least. Wasn't it? Bucky turned it over in the light and watched it glint dangerously. It really did fit him. It fit the way he felt all the time - cold, shifting. Broken pieces and waves of emotions and little shutters running through him. Responding to his thoughts but unable to figure out how. An imposter.

But it was his, and he didn't get to say that about a lot. Bucky ran the metal fingers through his hair, shivered at the cold feel of them, and decided to make the arm his own.

~*~

"Step five: Disconnect the body from the brain. This is not an easy process, and he is certainly going to fight against it. Hard. But once you have this, you'll nearly have him.

"The first key to this is disorientation. Make them distrust their own senses.

"A quick recommendation for the tip of the iceberg on this step: have you had the opportunity to study the brain of a ballet dancer? There is a fluid in the brain that tips when we lose our balance, but ballerinas can control it. That is how they spin around in circles so swiftly without getting dizzy. You can train the weapon similarly - dizzying spinning will not only create disorientation and the first part of body and mind disconnect, but will also begin his body's training to peak performance. Imagine a soldier who can control his brain from ever getting dizzy, keep his body from ever becoming disoriented again."

*

They set up the new table in what Bucky had come to mentally refer to as the room 2, or the interrogation room. There was room 1 - that was the cell they'd given him the newspaper in, room 2 - with the four big one way interrogation windows on each wall, room 3 - the white room, and room 4 - the operation room.

His life basically consisted of those four places over the past god-knows-how-long. Sometimes strapped to a metal table, sometimes thrown in by himself so he could wander around and mutter to himself and lose his mind. Or curl up in a corner and cry. Or just lay down in the middle of the floor like he was on the table anyways because he might as well fucking be because this never ended, they never stopped the stupid cycle.

That's why new things almost got exciting. Like the new table, which wasn't really a table. It was more like a little box, with a window so he can see out of it. What he didn't know was that the model was based off of the machine they used to transform Steve during Project Rebirth. Instead he just decided that the vertical coffin thing was strange but again, exciting in the depressing way of how much he hated opening his eyes every day.

The same black gloved hands shoved him inside and closed the top and Bucky blinked, looking around what little he could see of the room and glad his feet were standing on something solid and wondering what the hell they could possibly do to him now.

Then the vertical coffin started to spin. It was slow at first and Bucky watched as one interrogation window gave way to another, then another. Speeding up and speeding up until it was a single line, just a blur of windows, a blur of unseen faces on the other side, watching his coffin spin and spin and spin in the middle of the room.

Just when he thought they couldn't do anything else to him, his brain was seizing and his eyes hurt and it didn't matter if he closed them or not, he was dizzier than he'd been in his entire life. The world was knocking him in a thousand directions and if he wasn't being held in a tight position right now he'd probably be on the walls or the ceiling or something because he couldn't even tell which way was up.

The windows kept rushing by and Bucky - as usual - didn't have anything to throw up. They'd kept him alive by sticking him with needles that had some sort of fluid similar to an IV drip. But the last time he'd actually eaten food had been with the Howling Commandos. He had no idea how long that had been. So he didn't have the choice to hurl, his head just pounded as he moaned, the disorientation making his brain want to explode.

Bucky couldn't stand up when they finally pulled him out of the machine. They left him slumped on the floor and he didn't even try to move. His entire life he'd had an incredible sense of direction, but now he couldn't even begin to guess where the door was, let alone where North or East or South or West might be.

When he finally lifted his head, the perfectly square room didn't give the slightest hint as to which direction he was facing. Everything was the same in every direction he turned and he was in a box in a warehouse somewhere and he might as where be nowhere, because there was no out. He decided he really did not like new things.

He didn't like new things at all.

"You try so hard, Sergeant Barnes. You fight the pain so much. But I have a question for you that I want you to think about."

"You'd think I was b-back in school 'stead of a POW camp, how much you guys are t-t. T-tryin' to teach me," Bucky responded shakily, wishing he meant an ounce of the bite back anymore. He didn't have any spare energy to fight this anymore.

Between trying to block out the physical pain and trying to keep the pain of Steve at bay - which took both arms and full effort at all times, just waiting for the tidal wave to collapse the flimsy wall of denial he was hiding behind - he didn't have any spare mental process left to fight back. He was just trying to stay alive. Or maybe he was trying to die, he couldn't tell anymore.

"This is not a POW camp, Sergeant Barnes. But think about this: why do you fight the pain so much? What pain is there to fight?"

Bucky did laugh, then. If you could call the haunting burst of noise laughing. The sound actually frightened him a little, especially coming out of his own mouth. He shut his lips again pretty quickly.

"No, think about it. There are physical wounds to your body but who ever said your mind had to register that? Who ever said that a touch like this - " prod in the ribcage " - should be tolerable but a touch like this - " shallow knife to the side " - has to be more painful? Pain is a mental process of the brain, Sergeant Barnes."

Bucky blinked numbly a few times at the lab coat. The lab coat waved his hands in the air, a few drops of Bucky's blood on his knife flying as he spoke.

"It's all in your head! You can detach yourself from it. You don't have to feel the pain. It's a brain nerve connection. Just science. You can overrule that. You have control over the processes of your body. Are you saying that this little blade is stronger than every cell in your body, every connection in your mind?"

Bucky stared at the man in the lab coat. "Think about it," the lab coat advised, sticking the knife back into Bucky's side. Bucky opened his mouth to shout, then froze the sound in his throat.

His side was throbbing, the point of intrusion burning as the lab coat started to walk away. Bucky zoned in all of his energy on the bleeding hole in his side, closing his eyes so he could just focus on the sensations running through his body. It felt sharp, like the pain was almost shaped the same way the knife was.

Bucky held an invisible knife up behind his closed eyes, turning it around and inspecting it, projecting his pain onto the sharpness of the imaginary blade.

Then he whittled it down. He whittled away and whittled away at the blade until it was just a stick in his thoughts. The knife was causing the body pain but he didn't have to own that, did he?

He tossed the metaphorical stick aside and opened his eyes back up. His side didn't hurt. The same spiking, sharp sensation was running through his body...but it didn't have to be Bucky's. He wasn't forced to claim this body as his own, was he?

* ~*~

"Step six: Identity destruction. He must unlearn himself. Something that once held importance - such as a name - must become as meaningless as quantum physics is to a child. The connection to a past life must be severed. He must learn to distrust his own thoughts, hate his own memories.

"Give him a name that means nothing. Then give him another. Then give him another. Until he is no one. Until his real name falls into the category of nothing all over again. Then you can call him whatever you please and he won't have an attachment. It will mean nothing.

"A warning though: identity destruction is not permanent. The idea of his initial identity can be triggered back. But if you take his identity away for say - five years, ten? The number of things that could trigger him back get smaller and smaller. Eventually, they should diminish completely. By the twenty year mark, it should be next to impossible to trigger any sort of recognition in him.

"Give him nothing to recognize."

"Come, Собака," one of the soldiers said as they opened the door to his cell. Bucky blinked up at the soldier, already pushing himself off the ground obediently.

"Soh-bah-ka?" Bucky asked in confusion, but he followed. They didn't need to tell him that the name meant dog. The way they said it made it clear enough.

He actually responded to it after a little while. He just got used to it, is all. If they asked him Who are you and he responded with Собака a few times, it was just force of habit. He'd been called worse things.

The name was almost nice, in a way. When they screamed and cursed at him, shouting his new name over and over, the punishment almost drifted over him. So they were yelling at Собака, Собака had done something wrong. And in a way Bucky knew he was Собака, but...at the same time it wasn't
It was just a name and whoever that Собака was tended to piss a lot of people off and he went through a lot of pain and honestly without them shouting Sergeant Barnes in his face, it got a little easier to distance himself from it all. He could just...let go of himself. His body was getting beaten but his mind was getting sharper and eventually Bucky could start to erase himself.

The thing was though, he couldn't decide which one he wanted to be.

Собака may go through a lot of physical pain, but Собака's name had never been shouted by Steve Rogers. He didn't even know what the word would sound like coming off of Steve's lips.

With Sergeant Barnes, it was like Bucky was living in constant fear of someone shouting Barnes! with the inflection that Steve used to. Whenever he was Sergeant Barnes, he had to take all of the pain that came with the people who had said that name. The people who weren't ever going to say it again.

Sometimes, Bucky didn't want to be Sergeant Barnes, he just wanted to drown in Собака. It was easier. Less painful. Собака didn't love Steve any less, so that still threatened to rip him apart from the inside out, but it was still safer.

Eventually he gave up trying to balance the two names during the who are you questions. It was just Собака now. Except, of course, when they asked him who he was without Steve.

Then the answer was still nothing.

~*~

"Step seven: Control. It is not enough to make him fear you. It is not enough to make him respect you. He must rely on you. Give him a leash, but make him beg for it first. He'll be yours, then.

"Once he comes crawling to you for help, then you can begin your weapon creation. If you spend years enforcing these seven steps, his brain will be more than ready to take on any physical training you have in mind.

"For control, you must remember to be the outlet. The savior. The master. Offer to take the pain away. He'll never run away from you again."

It was only so long, he supposed. He should have guessed the weeks or months of running wasn't going to do anything for the long term. He'd been hiding from it, denying it. Focusing on the torture, on the stupid fucking lessons they were trying to teach him for god-knows-why.

He'd been drowning himself in the torture because that was better. He found strength in the number of times they cut him open and he survived. He found distraction in the ways they fucked with his brain.

But it was only so long before it all eventually caught up with him. It was the simplest of things too, the thing that broke the final barrier he'd been trying so hard to keep up. One moment he was gritting his teeth, being dragged down yet another hallway, and the next everything went white.

The gloved hands had pulled him past a door that was ajar today, today of all days when it had always been shut before. Beyond the door was a smoke room, just a little officers room with a radio in the corner. The radio was actually for news of the war and the outside world, but at that moment there wasn't a voice coming over the other end.

Just a three step jazz waltz.

Bucky crumpled with the sheer force of memories, his knees giving as his head suddenly whisked him off somewhere far far away. Steve's arms around him, big boots guiding Bucky across the dance floor. The soft brush of Steve's blonde hair against Bucky's temple as Steve tilted their heads together.

His chest, solid and warm and so so alive against Bucky's. Bucky had never been more at peace because in that moment, it hadn't mattered if he was in love with Steve or not, Steve was safe and thriving, just buzzing with life and beauty. In Bucky's arms, where he belonged.

His world split in two. Someone had blown out the only candle in Bucky's life. His soul light, the one thing that led him home. Brooklyn Brooklyn.

Happy blue eyes, a forgiving smile, the warmest heart. Callused, talented fingers weaving between his. Home. Home. Home.

Steve didn't exist anymore.

Bucky wasn't just alone forever. Bucky could never go home.

Bucky could never go home.

They were confused what to do with him at first. He'd been silent or screaming or cursing or depressed or leaking tears for the entire time they'd had him so far, but it had never been like this.

The tsunami came crashing down and it swept Bucky away. He couldn't uncurl from the ball he'd wrapped himself in, he couldn't stop sobbing. He was reliving Steve's death all over again but time had made it real. It wasn't just a newspaper anymore, it wasn't just words that broke his heart. The weight of Steve's absence had settled in heavy and crushing and Bucky knew now, he knew it in his soul that Steve wasn't coming for him.

The guards eventually just had to pick up the shaking ball Bucky refused to budge from, toss him in the closest cell they could find. Bucky bawled and the superiors held a meeting about what the hell to do with him now.

He's broken, really broken. One of the soldiers told Zola.

I can't imagine what we could possibly do to hurt him now, another imputed.

Zola slid out his file, looking over the seven steps, and smiled to himself. They'd reached the completion of the first cycle. There'd be many more to come, but the first round of breaking down man into machine would be over after this final thing.

It's step seven, now. We will not hurt him any longer. Instead, we will save him.

"Собака?" Zola asked, stepping into the cell. Bucky didn't lift his head.

He didn't need to tell Zola there was nothing they could do to hurt him now. Zola could see it in the shape of his shoulders, in the metal hand that was clenched so tightly in his hair, he was probably pulling some of it out.
"We aren't here to torture you any longer, Собака. Let us help you."

Bucky still didn't lift his head. The curled metal and curled real hands in his hair didn't relax an inch.

"Let us help you," Zola offered again, gently reaching out to place his hand on Bucky's bare shoulderblade.

Bucky lifted his head slowly, looking at Zola with bright red bloodshot eyes surrounded by dark grays and blues from lack of sleep, exhaustion, pain, bruises.

He didn't look human but Zola managed not to flinch away.

"What could you possibly--" Bucky began, voice like shattered glass grinding against gravel.

"We can take it all away. We can make you forget."

Bucky just stared at him with his wild animal eyes.

"We can wipe it out of your memory. If you want. We can take it away. We can help you, Собака. You don't have to feel it anymore."

The metal hand uncurled from his hair, whirring softly as Bucky brought it down in front of him, clenching it tightly and staring at the glinting plates. He brought his other hand up, held them both and looked at his palms.

At the spaces between his fingers where Steve's hands would never be again.

"Just make me forget," Bucky whispered, closing his eyes in defeat.

Zola lifted him gently to his feet and Собака followed the doctor, staring ahead and seeing everything, wishing he could see nothing.

He'd see nothing soon.

~*~

"And when the first stage is over, find a way to suspend him. Still the transformation; leave him stagnant to stew in the progress, let it all sink in. When you bring him back out into the world and start at step one again, he'll already be halfway to ready.

"One last thing to remember, though, Doctor Zola. Never, never forget how deadly your weapon will be when the process is over. More deadly than anything humanity has dealt with before.

"You may make yourself a demon trying to create an attack dog. If he loses his muzzle for a moment, there is no telling what he will kill. What he will become. Keep the collar tight, Arnim Zola.

"And whatever you do, don't lose your grip on the leash."

Four words became more important than who are you. Four words became more important than any other words he was supposed to know in his life.
Four words became the ending and the beginning.

"Put him on ice."

Chapter End Notes

In case you were uber confused, timeline probably took place over a few months. And Bucky's an emotional rollercoaster, but that's kinda how it goes when you lose your mind.

And if you haven't caught onto the Reinhardt reference yet, he's a guy in Agents of Shield that was a pretty integral part of Hydra during World War 2. He was involved in all sorts of top secret projects, I figured being a temporary supervisor of the Winter Soldier project wasn't too far of a stretch.

As for Lapunov, I made him up, no reference to catch there sorry. Just a crazy psychologist philosophical guy.

Hang in there with the tough chapters (or skip them that's okay too) I promise things will be worth it.

(I just really needed to have some understanding of the transformation from Bucky Barnes to Winter Soldier because everyone writes them as two different people and I just really want to show how it's still Bucky - even if he doesn't know it is. It's the same human being and that's easy to forget so that's why I am putting us all through the pain of Bucky's transformation. )

ANYWAYS thank you so much for reading, you are all angels

xx
Одиннадцать (Eleven)

Chapter Notes

Warnings for: psychological torture, brief mention of possible rape, major identity loss, and some physical torture as well (the little * warnings are still in play)

Also, the writing style is kinda crazy, but it's to reinforce the organized analytical "mission" way of thinking.

The playlist for our darling Bucky:
This gorgeous Russian song we all know so well
Who Are You Really - Mikky Ekko
The Road - Hurts
Almost Lover - A Fine Frenzy
A Place Only You Can Go - Needtobreathe

Okay, there are certain times in the fic that if you want to listen along while you read, I've put a little xx that you can open in a new tab at the time when the song would come in. (or listen to the song just before you read that part). If you want.

If you haven't seen Agents of Shield (it's a good show - I vote you watch it) this clip: xx is part of a scene in this chapter. (There are more pieces I use from the episode too but it's not on youtube) If you want to watch the whole episode it's Season 2 Episode 8, Things We Bury.

DISCLAIMER: The majority of this chapter is written from Bucky's POV. He is absolutely unstable; out of his mind to the point that he isn't seeing things the way they are. He literally refers to blatant torture as "pain training." So, if at any point Hydra looks like the good guys, it's b/c that's what he sees. (Hydra are dicks irl fyi)

This also means that the worst parts of the torture - especially the physical parts - his mind is going to exclude. The whole "forget for your own sake" thing. I think a lot of what they did to him would be too much to handle, so his mind simply cuts them out of his consciousness. That said, do enjoy!

xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes
"Psychology as a behaviorist views it is a purely objective experimental branch of natural science. Its theoretical goal is … prediction and control." - Watson (1913)

~~~

July 1945

Werner Reinhardt had heard of Agent Peggy Carter. Most Hydra had - there was an advantage to knowing your enemy. He even knew the two men flanking her as they stormed his base in Austria - it wasn't difficult to recognize members of the Howling Commandos when you'd spent the last month babysitting their sniper.

The two Howling Commandos - James Morita and Timothy Dugan, he was fairly sure - shoved him none too kindly into an interrogation room, a bitterness in their faces that didn't match the joking tones in their voices. It was fascinating, to see the broken pieces of what used to be America's biggest band of heros. And the satisfaction, looking at their faces and watching their grief and knowing they were grieving two dead soldiers, one of which was quite alive.

Probably not quite human anymore, but alive and less than twenty miles away, losing his soul in isolation while these men paraded with their big guns and had no idea they weren't saving one of their own (the only one that would really matter in the end).

So if he had a smug look on his face when Peggy Carter came whipping through the door for his interrogation, there was plenty of reason for it.

"Werner Reinhardt," she greeted. Every movement the woman made was a game, a play to her femininity and power.

She was testing him, he knew, but he had motives of his own. Which, when hinted at, Peggy Carter had no troubles determining.
"You want a deal," she smiled with bright red lips, delicate hands folded on the table and English accent sharp. "How terribly shocking."

"The US Government has recruited many German scientists," Reinhardt pointed out. Recruitment was key - having an insider to the allied forces would do wonders for their projects. Even just his most recent involvement with Sergeant Barnes was dependent on Stark technology, American resources. Who knows who they'd have to sell him to if they didn't have the technology to upkeep the metal arm and cryochambers.

The U.S. was recruiting, and he was one of the best.

"They'll send rockets into space," Peggy mused before her voice turned icy. "Maybe they can strap you to one of them."

The quip was meaningless and Reinhardt ignored it, leaning forward in his chair. "They'll show you parlor tricks. Giving me a second chance could save all of humanity."

To save all of humanity... he would give her the Case 17 project if it meant him walking free. He'd spoil Zola's new weapon in a heartbeat. And yes, maybe stopping it would save humanity. Because once Sergeant Barnes's project was done...it'd be a weapon like no other.

"I've seen all of your home movies," She pursed her lips in thinly veiled disgust. Not all, he corrected in his head. "The bodies left in your wake. The girl you caged up."

If only she'd seen the video of the removal of Sergeant Barnes's arm. Zola had plans for him worse than a cage. But her opportunity to stop that seemed to be slipping.

She leaned forward a final time, eyes as red and hot as her lipstick.

"There'll be no second chances for you."

And of course, she closed her ears, closed her mind, swung out of the room in graceful power. She was admirable for a woman, but Reinhardt knew she'd be back. She was the kind of person that could tell when someone was offering real, solid, life-altering information.

To be fair, it was several hours before the door opened up again.

"So. Curiosity brings her back. Have you come to make a deal?"

"With the devil? I considered it." The room echoed with the sound of sharp footsteps on cement as she walked back to his table. "As you said, the skies might open up one day. Your work would be valuable. But if that day comes, I know who I'd want by my side."

Agent Carter leaned down, placing both of her hands on the table. "It isn't you."

Too stubborn, then. The people that would die now? Blood on her hands for being unable to discover the truths he knew.

"We could learn so much together," Reinhardt told her wistfully, a final teaser to just how much he knew. Peggy Carter let the opportunities of the future slide by her, stubbornness unwavering.

"Instead, we'll forget. Forget you. Forget your work. When I leave, no one else will come. No one to hear your stories, study your deadly artifacts. You'll be buried."

Irrelevancy. The worst fear of a successful man. "I seriously doubt that. Nothing stays buried forever," he bit, which was the first of her clues, ignored.

"For as long as I have a say, you will. Farewell, Doctor Reinhardt."

Sharp clicks echoed again as Agent Carter spun and stalked for the doorway. One last chance now, he had to give her something she couldn't refuse.

The high heels just passed the doorframe when Reinhardt called out, making her pause.

"You will regret this, Agent Carter." Peggy turned back around, giving him a blank expression. Reinhardt curled his lip up, knowing what could catch her attention now. "There's a project I have access to that you would be very interested in."

"A project?" she said dubiously, smile still quirked up and triumphant. "I'm afraid you'd have to do better than that."

"It's quite personal to you, actually. Even moreso to the men you brought with you. A special team called the Howling Commandos?"

That caught her attention. The smile was suddenly gone, replaced with crossed arms and an attempt at disinterest.

"What could you possibly have anything to do with an American squad?"

"Well, not the entire squad," Reinhardt amended, eyeing her from across the room. Peggy shifted uncomfortably and it was Reinhardt's turn to smile victoriously. "Just a certain...lost member."

The arms uncrossed with a sharp look, but tumultuous emotions wavered behind the hardened eyes. "I hate to break it to you, Doctor Reinhardt, but your information is outdated. There are no lost members of the Howling Commandos, only deceased and disbanded."

She feigned disinterest, but she couldn't hide the cringe at the mention of the Howling Commandos. Well, she was the face in the locket of the only dead one.

Then the smile returned, bitter and the corners of bright red. "It was a decent try, though."

"Don't say I didn't warn you," Reinhardt glared. Her smile widened and he hoped the first target on Sergeant Barnes's list was this woman.

"I won't be saying much of all about you, Doctor. Enjoy the view from underground."

~~~

January 1946

They'd thawed him yesterday morning, so he had plenty time to adjust to walking and speaking again. Not that he had anything to say; he kept quiet. It was one of the first things he realized: how little people actually say. The same conversations over and over again, words and condolences that mean nothing, really. A world full of people asking how are you, expecting the same answer and entirely unsure what to do with themselves when given a different one. No one actually...spoke.

How many times had the guards had the same conversations over and over? How many times had they repeated themselves? It was disgusting, really. So many useless meaningless words, so much extra noise.

He wouldn't speak unless it counted. He never wanted to say the same word out loud twice, never wanted to repeat himself ever again. The moment a word is uttered aloud more than once, what did it mean? Nothing, it meant nothing. Repetition of words destroys worth. But repetition of actions creates mastery.

"Собака!" a guard shouted and Bucky looked up, blinking at the light pouring in from the hallway. A few doctors followed guards into the room and he quickly started to get to his feet. One of the doctors snapped his hand in a stop motion, making a tsking noise in Bucky's direction.

Obviously he listened, freezing mid crouch, metal hand propping him off the ground. There was a major gap of information in his head - he didn't know where he was or where he'd been before this - but he knew they called him Собака (which didn't feel like it was quite right) and that if he didn't listen, there would be a hell of a lot of pain. So of course, he froze.

"More efficiently," one of the doctors ordered, waving an annoyed hand at him. He furrowed his eyebrows, confused. The doctor made an impatient sound and pushed Bucky back to the ground with his boot. He landed hard on the threadbare pants he was wearing, blinking a few times to settle the sudden wave of anger that bubbled up in his chest. He didn't have any reason to be mad, but his heart was pumping and his vision was tinted. No point in getting riled up though - complying was easier.

"Get up, but do it more efficiently. Use every muscle in your body to its maximum potential, make it a smooth glide. And for god's sake, balance out your weight." The doctor made another waving motion and Bucky looked down at his metal hand, curling the fingers a little just to hear their quiet sound. It threw him off balance sometimes, but that was the only clue he hadn't owned it very long. Because it sure felt like part of his body.

There were a few other clues like that - pieces of hair kept falling on his forehead and he pushed those back automatically, like his hands were used to it. But he also startled occasionally when the tips of his hair brushed lightly against his ears - so it was probably a little longer than he was used to. And his body still shivered at the cold, so he must not be used to that either. Those were the only clues he had. Everything else was just...blank.

He was a stranger here. Why was he here?

Bucky pulled a careful breath into his lungs, his bare chest expanding against cold air. Efficiency: speed combined with practicality and accuracy. The most efficient way would be using the least amount of muscles possible, but focusing his weight on the stronger muscles so he didn't lose balance. His calf and quad muscles were strong, so were some of the muscles in his lower abdomen. His arms were the strongest obviously, but he wouldn't need to use those. He'd waste more energy pushing off with his hands than he'd gain out of the push.

In a swift motion, Bucky shifted his weight onto his calves and the balls of his feet, engaging his abdominal muscles to straighten out his back as he leaned slightly to the right to accommodate the weight of metal and tightened the muscles in his thighs, pushing upwards. And he was on his feet, standing and solid.

"Better," the doctor said, narrowing his eyes. "But it could be smoother, faster. More powerful." He spun on one uselessly thick shoe and strode out the room, not giving Bucky a moment to respond. "Come, Собака."

Step four: Awareness.
"Breathe. Listen. That is the sound of your existence. That sound belongs to you, you control it. Now erase it. Getting sufficient oxygen is important - but your body does not need the sound. Breathe in through your mouth and destroy the noise. Noise will only hinder you."

There was so much noise in everything. Getting rid of it was like ripping at fascia tissue - endless spiderwebs between every single layer that caved the moment you prodded them away. People made so many sounds, did so many things they didn't bother to notice. Involuntary actions - but that didn't mean they couldn't be controlled. Don't let your body do anything involuntarily, they told him. (Blinking, breathing, moving, so much that he did automatically. Automatically meant noise.) Of course, that didn't count what they did to his body involuntarily.

They may force him into things, but they taught him power too. They gave him more control of his body. In the two days that he'd been out of the ice he was already looking differently at everything. Starting to clear away noise.

Precision, efficiency. Awareness, control. He understood those.

"Freeze, Собака. What are you touching? Just stop and take account of every place your body is touching. Your feet on the ground, the space between the concrete and the arch of your foot. Your elbow touching your hip. Your fingers are curled, the last three of each are pressed together. Pay attention. Feel everything you are touching, individually."

"If you aren't aware of everything you are touching, there will be unwanted noise. Loss of focus. Loss of control. Focus on your hands. Focus on where your fingers are touching. Now don't let them touch. Feel the space between your skin. Feel the energy between your fingers. There is power there. Spread fingers means power, because you aren't crippling yourself by finding comfort in the touch of your own skin. Don't let them touch."

Bucky lifted his hands, palms facing away as he slowly touched the sides of all of his fingers together and spread them apart again. A rush of power flooded his veins as he spread them, told himself he owned and controlled every ounce of the empty space between his fingers.

It was like a domino effect. Every time they opened his eyes to another crutch, he was emancipated. And he just kept seeing more and more things, on his own. Learning himself, learning the way he moved and thought and breathed. (He was pleasantly surprised to find he already walked perfectly silent.)

He didn't have anything else to do, and he didn't know a single thing about who he was supposed to be. So it just kind of made sense to do what they told him. It wasn't all just words though, they really liked to reinforce the cognitive ideas with physical reminders. Stimulus and response, conditioning.

He wished they would just let him look at the sun.

Another doctor came in, this time with a rack of tools to open up Bucky's metal arm. Apparently there was a setting inside that made his left hand fingers metallic, drawing them into each other with a resounding click. It was fairly infuriating, especially when he'd just learned that spreading his fingers gave him sovereignty again.

But if he focused really hard, he could still keep them spread apart. It didn't take long to figure out that was kind of the point of the magnetism - he was forced to focus all of his energy on his fingers and keep them from weakening and curling in to touch each other, scared and insecure.
He couldn't keep depending on his subconscious to find safety nets, making himself smaller or finding comfort in the feel of his own skin and metal. The creatures on the top of the food chain didn't need safety nets. The creatures on the top of the food chain were efficient - he couldn't have any noise, any involuntary movements, any moments of being less than entirely aware of himself and his body and his surroundings.

That was the optimal way to survive. There was no reason to survive at any less than that.

~*~

He didn't sleep much. Some part of him was telling him that he should be sleeping for at least a few hours every day, but he was awake for 62 hours after his removal from ice before they finally sent him to a cell to get some rest.

_No rest for the wicked._

The guard called him Терять when he closed the door and Bucky blinked, wondering what the hell had happened to Собака. He guessed it didn't matter much, because Собака had never quite felt right; although Terri-att didn't sound like it was his name either.

Bucky laid his head on his metal arm and stared at the wall, wondering if there was a more efficient way to sleep. He decided he didn't care all that much - he was tired and honestly the desire to be efficient was fading a bit at the edges.

Slipping into sleep was easier than he'd thought it be. Being forced into sleep through the freezing cold was extremely unpleasant, but lying on the ground wasn't nearly as bad. He was unconscious in moments.

"Buck!" a voice shouted and he turned around, the world spinning and blurry at the edges. He was standing in an empty room with vaulted ceilings, but it looked broken somehow. There were paintings that he vaguely recognized, but most were torn or ripped to the ground. The windows were riddled with bullet holes, light streaming through in filtered rays. Everything was kind of floating but he didn't care, because something inside him settled calm and warm at just the sound of that voice.

A figure floated into view, but Bucky couldn't see any details. It was a silhouette, coming closer, and his hand reached out on instinct. The silhouette got closer and Bucky's heartbeat could pound out of his chest. He didn't know why the voice had shouted Buck, but it felt more like his than Собака or Терять did.

The silhouette reached out his hand as he neared and Bucky strained to reach further, unable to move anything but his hand. There was the sound of wind, whipping fast, but the figure kept getting closer and Bucky was torn between being scared and elated. It wasn't the silhouette or the voice he was scared of, but there was something at the corners of his vision, just out of sight...

Black shadow fingers reached out to touch his and Bucky's breath stopped in his throat. So, so close-

- The shadow turned to smoke. Everything suddenly dropped to freezing - as cold as the ice chamber - and Bucky spun around, trying to find the shadow again. It'd been strangely beautiful, even if he hadn't been able to tell a single feature beyond the shape. Wide shoulders, boots, disheveled hair. And then, gone.

Something moved in the corner of his eye. Bucky spun again, but there was nothing there. Then another movement, closer this time. He automatically lowered his weight in a crouching stance, wobbling from the wavy floor. Everything was waving, slowly losing shape and dexterity and then the floor just dropped and Bucky was falling, falling falling-

His eyes shot open and his body jerked as the dream world suddenly became reality, just before he hit the ground in the dream. But Bucky pushed aside his racing pulse and the jolting panic of the fall, trying to recall the more important part of the dream. There had been a silhouette, a silhouette of something warm and human. It could be wishful thinking, but Bucky had a feeling that figure was part of who he was. It’d called him Buck...

"Buck," he tried out aloud, the word feeling heavy in his mouth. His brain recognized it, but his mouth didn’t. By process of logic then, it was his name. No one spoke their own name much, but they heard it all the time. Still...Buck wasn't quite right. It was his name, but not his whole name...

"Bucky," he said suddenly, sitting up and whipping his head to look at the door. His name was Bucky. There was someone who was supposed to be looking for him. The silhouette in his dream needed him, Bucky needed to get to him. He just didn't know how-

He ran his fingers through his hair in frustration, pushing the escaped strands away from his face. Soft, artist hands ghosted through his hair and Bucky quickly shut his eyes, chasing after the lingering memory. Artist hands, brushing back his hair. Something very blue. Safety.

It was just on the tip of his tongue, he knew he knew those hands. That silhouette...

"Who are you?" Bucky asked the darkness, wishing that the silhouette man would just step out of the shadows now.

Who are you. Who are you. Who are you. Who are you without him. Nothing.

A sudden pain clenched Bucky's chest and he cried out in shock, doubling in half with a hand clutched over his heart. The door slammed open and then there were black gloved hands, dragging him out into the hallway. Bucky looked around in confusion; he didn't know why he was hurting or where they were taking him, but worst of all he didn't know who the shadow man was and he needed to.

All he had were flashing memories - dragging down another hallway, watching the trails left behind by bloody feet. Tears and pain and something else, he was missing pieces. So many pieces.

Straps closed over his ankles and arms and torso and Bucky blinked up at the ceiling, waiting for the punishment to begin. He wasn't sure what he'd done, but they'd tell him. Hopefully they could tell him about the shadow man, too. He had to know.

~~~

"We've got another few solid weeks before the memories will start to really come back. Tell me we've got someone working on the wiping machine. How did someone overlook wiping the part of the brain associated with dreams? This isn't child's play anymore, we can't afford to have slips like that again."

The soldiers nodded, taking the order and exiting the office to go relay the instructions to the lab scientists. Once they were in the hallway, one leaned over, keeping his voice low under his breath.

"How could this much trouble possibly be worth it? That guy's a fuckin’ wreck, I don't know what they see in him."
The other soldier shrugged. "Must be something special about him. The rest of the people they've injected with Zola's serum like, combusted or something. Besides, I can't complain about watching Captain America's big bad sidekick lose his mind. Justice served, right?"

~~~

They kept him on a leash. For most of the time he was in the cells, sometimes even leading him to the pain-training tables with it. Just a chain most of the time, a dirty chain looped around his neck instead of his wrists.

Attack dog, the guards had called him once.

They held the fire, they trained him of his existence, they gave him so much; he would bare his teeth for them if they asked.

Open your mind.

"There is noise in your thoughts. Extra words, unimportant things. If you can clear out the miscellaneous data, you can shine light on the shadows."

Bucky perked up at that. He'd like to shine light in the shadows if it meant being able to see the face of the silhouette man in his dreams. A few more random things had come back to him - something about a baseball game and something about apples. More flashes of the hands from his dream, except pressed over Bucky's heart, or twisted up between Bucky's fingers. Each little touch into that world made him desperately hungry for more.

So he threw every ounce he had into the next round of mental training. Besides, it'd be a relief after the way he'd spent the morning. They'd put him in this machine that looked like a coffin and spun and spun around in circles for what felt like hours before they let him out. Opening his mind sounded much less painful.

"Do you know what we are doing for you?" The doctor asked him. Bucky didn't bother wasting energy to answer or shake his head. He didn't have a lot of energy to spare (he couldn't remember the last time he ate, there were only nutrients needles) and the doctors didn't seem to mind his silence much. If they did, they'd say something. Or slap him.

"We have given you the opportunity to be born again. At birth we are all gifted with 'tabula rasa' - a blank mind. The world mucks up this white slate, pollutes it with error. You are lucky enough to be given a second chance, and we are here to help you, keep you from polluting your tabula rasa."

Bucky blinked at the doctor, not sure if he was expecting a thank you or something. As much as he wouldn't mind being error-free, he kind of wanted to know who he was before he got reborn.

"Терять, you have been studying awareness, Да?" Bucky quickly spread his fingers, cursing himself for getting lazy enough to let the last two touch. The moment that he had focus on his hands again, something settled inside him and he relaxed a bit. Da - they said that sometimes. It was fairly clear it meant yes, but he wasn't sure in what language.

Oi, regarde qui c'est, le petit ami de Barnes ... français, oui?

"You are clearing the extraneous from your body - now we must make your thoughts efficient as well. Some things do not matter to think about and you will be wasting your time and energy even allowing them in your mind. Organize your thoughts so you can destroy the useless ones. For the next hour there will be doctors recording your every thought to help you with this. Just speak exactly what crosses your mind the moment it crosses. It will be a...catharsis."
Catharsis. Bucky wasn't even sure he knew what that meant. But giving his mind ultimate efficiency sounded maddeningly powerful. And helpful, especially if he could control his head. Which meant controlling his dreams.

Besides, he should be grateful, they gave him life. So what if it was a life he never chose.

"Begin, Терять."

~~~

"That has got to be the fastest learning curve I have ever seen. He's fucking...silent man. You can't even hear him when he walks and he's been awake for what, three days now?"

"I don't think we even taught him that. He was already way messed up when we got him. Did you see the lash out from yesterday? It was brutal. Serious rage. I'm pretty sure he killed two of the guards."

One of the soldiers let out a low whistle. "Captain America's boy toy is a hell of a lot more impressive when he's not a slobbering mess."

"Yeah, well, once the memories come back he'll break down again."

"And we're training him until then?"

"Yep. Squeezing in all of the physical training and obedience programming before he can remember again. And then it's wiping him and starting the whole process over, hoping that the training sticks."

~~~

"быстрый! быстрый! Как можно быстрее!" Bucky dropped the clip out of the gun, jamming the next one in and firing off 7 shots in quick succession, each one knocking perfectly into the center of the metal targets.

Faster, faster. As fast as you can.

The moment they'd finished organizing his thoughts it was a bastardized lesson in Russian. He couldn't say a single thing yet because his tongue pretty much refused to cooperate with the strange harsh sounds. But he understood a few commands now - yes, no, get up, faster, speak.

And then it'd been training, more questions, lead around on the leash. Pain training too, which he didn't have as much trouble with as he'd been expecting. They told him not to scream as they slid a knife through his skin and he didn't. It made him wonder if he'd done this before. But there were no scars on his body (with the exception of the raw skin around his shoulder of course).

He hadn't been allowed to sleep since his dream about the silhouetted man and it felt like it'd been a lot longer than 62 hours this time. But he wasn't supposed to think of his dreams - lingering pieces of poison to tug at his mind, they told him. They'd given him a second chance to find true efficiency - he didn't want to ruin that. The shadow man of his dreams was just...the only warm thing since he'd woken.

At least the gun was familiar in his hands, but he found himself wanting something longer, more accurate. Another clue about whoever he was before they'd put him on ice. And there was a memory associated with it too, just a flicker of a headshot through a scope, a salute sent his way from something familiarly blue.
He was a good shot, but it wasn't good enough. They kept pushing him harder, faster. His right arm ached, but there was something comforting in the blank ease as he fired off more ammunition. It wasn't until he’d emptied four clips before he found a stray thought edging at his mind. The accuracy of his shots...had he ever killed anyone before?

Suddenly he felt a little queasy. Blank mind or not, he knew he didn't want to kill anybody. He didn't know anybody who deserved to die.

He considered asking, but they didn't always take too well to his questions. Especially his questions about before he'd been given a new mind. "It is a waste, Терять. How could you have a clean slate if you insist on trying to muddy up your brain with the past?"

He almost let it go. If it weren't for the man, he would've. But he couldn't, not with a ghost hopeless dream like that in his head. So he drowned it out instead, focused hard on everything they asked of him. There were still a few guards who called him Собака, others who called him Терять - he responded to both, did the very best he could to remain efficient. Clear the noise.

Martial arts helped - there was a quiet power behind every guiding palm of Tai Qi, a natural control through every spinning kick of Muay Thai. He had a propensity for it, or maybe it was just the acute awareness of his muscles and his mind that was making him beat his instructors in their own matches.

He was good with knives too - not as good as the guns though, so they spent more time training him with the blades. The first knife they handed him, his mind flashed an image of pulling a similar one out of a blue coat. A blue coat with big navy buttons and something special tucked inside the pocket. He collected them like stones, the little flashes of memories he got back. He put them all in a box in his head and shoved the box in a corner so it couldn't interfere with the efficiency of his thoughts. Simple, his thoughts should be simple. Cut down to the core.

Bucky curled his fingers over the hilt of the knife, reveling in the texture and the gentle spread of his fingers. No, texture didn't matter. It was extra information, something that wouldn't help him. A knife was a knife was a knife was a knife.

Wait, no. Texture shouldn't be included in the mental report at all. Bucky cursed in his head, then cursed himself for cursing because that wasn't going to do anything to help efficiency either.

Okay: mission. He was supposed to throw this knife into the target. He'd taken too long already - быстрый, faster. Да - Da, yes.

It was always faster, better. Every time he failed, the knife got thrown at him instead. It was simple: get better, or get hurt. So he got better.

~~~

"[The purpose of psychology is]...to predict, given the stimulus, what reaction will take place; or, given the reaction, state what the situation or stimulus is that has caused the reaction." - Watson (1930)

~~~

*
He cried out the first time that they electrocuted him. He hadn't been expecting it - he didn't even know what he had done wrong. (Again.)

The wires were wrapped around every part of his body. He hadn't stopped them as they wrapped the coils over his arms and legs and torso, always trusting there was a purpose. There was always something to learn, something to improve his blank slate.

But no one had told him what he was supposed to do, they'd just walked out of the room. Then he'd turned his head to look for instruction and he'd been shocked--

Oh. Maybe...maybe he wasn't supposed to move. Bucky twitched his finger in curiosity. Lightning shot into his veins and he screamed again. His eyes squeezed shut automatically and he took a few moments to reconcile, breathing in pained huffs as he forced himself to stay as still as possible.

He'd felt the lightning before...he was sure of it. There was another memory, black lines of burned flesh across his palms, black rage tugging over his mind. The same rage was threatening to bubble to the surface now, but there was a lesson to be learned.

Be still. So still. Don't so much as expand your chest when you breathed. Bucky could do that.

*

The first time, he managed to avoid electrocution and lie still for an hour. The next time, two and a half. The third time he stood on his feet, straight and tall and still for forty minutes. The fourth time he extended it to an hour. Eventually he could stand perfectly unmoving for three hours. Then he learned to do the same while crouching.

The lightning never stopped burning. His body never stopped screaming every time the electrocution shot through his veins.

Once he'd mastered that, it was on to the next thing to make him perfect. There was a voice in his head (that he didn't have a face to match but he knew he recognized) that told him that it was human to be imperfect. That perfection meant a loss of humanity.

Part of him didn't want to be perfect. Or efficient. He just wanted to remember.

It was like being a butterfly, stuck under a pin. Held up for inspection, preservation. Maybe there had been a time that he could fly, but they were taking that from him now.

It was like losing faith in something he'd never known he'd had. Tugging the soul right out of him, destroying whatever pieces he had left. But as much as he wanted to fight this, as much as Bucky wanted to run away on the breeze and pray to a god the color of blue eyes he didn't know, he still knew this was easier. The pain in his body was easier than the pain of something else - the more they hurt him, the more he knew that.

He left you here to die.

Whatever it was that his mind and body was so afraid of, the electrocution and the dizzying table and the knives and the straps and the drowning tanks and the white rooms and the fires and burns to his skin and the isolation and the pressure room and the degrading terms were all better than what was on the other side of that fence.

He couldn't remember what it was he was running from, but he was running hard. There was something more painful than all of this that would blind him if he let it. So he gave in and he held still and he learned, he learned and absorbed and breathed in every ounce of the new air they forced into his lungs. Self-preservation meant giving in to this, so he didn't have to face the ghost in his dreams. The ghost promised a safety Bucky couldn't remember knowing and he promised a pain worse than anything Hydra could ever do to him. He had to shove the ghost to the darkest places of his mind. Can't you just let me be?

But you can't choose who haunts you when there's no light to scare the ghosts away.

One of the memories he kept secretly tucked away in his mind came a few days ago, after the pain training. He'd been too loud with his voice -- he knew better than to scream, sometimes he just couldn't help it and the doctors hadn't liked that very much. They'd strapped a muzzle over his mouth - attack dog.

The moment the crude muzzle was fitted over his face, Bucky fell silent. It was a natural reaction, but the surprising part was the wave of relief washing over him the moment it was fitted over him.

That's when the memory flashed:

"I'm not going to go lay out on another table for another doctor, okay?" Bucky snapped. His anger was all directed inwards; he had broken so easily under their hands...he just didn't have it in him anymore to keep up the façade. He was so goddamned tired.

A flash of a face, turning away from him as it always was in the memories. Bucky almost apologized, just from the slumped over look of the man. (The only person who was in every one of his memories.) He looked so defeated, and that was Bucky's fault too.

Then the ghost spoke, that same voice all over again:

"God, Buck, I'm sorry. I should have known, I just-- Are...are you okay?" Like this was somehow all his fault. (And that moment, that was where the thought was, the thought that the muzzle suddenly had rushing through him) --

_Bucky really just wished he could have a mask to hide behind right now. Everything was too open. Exposed. Raw. He brought his hands up to cover his face, only realizing they were trembling once they were covering his eyes and nose and mouth. The ghost didn't need to see this._

_He sucked in a breath behind his hands, the air tasting like dirt and blood on his tongue. Maybe the only thing left of Bucky anymore was skin, dirt, and blood._

"Buck?" the silhouette asked again, a tentative hand coming up to rest over one of Bucky's. The added weight and warmth to his mask was so nice...the ghost's hands were big and warm and much much cleaner than Bucky's. They still had blood and dirt on them, sure. But it wasn't polluted and poisonous like Bucky's blood was. Everything about the ghost was cleaner than Bucky.

_He wondered if the ghost would understand if Bucky asked him to cover Bucky's face with his hands. Probably not. The ghost would probably just get more worried. Bucky was just so so sick of being unable to turn his face away. Of being peered down at and poked at and unable to hide, unable to stop looking. He just wanted to stop looking._

One of Bucky's hands lifted a bit off of his face, reversing to grab the one the ghost had covered him with. Their fingers interlocked, dirty dark callused ones with sweet white artist's hands. He probably hadn't even killed anybody yet. Bucky never wanted him to have to.

The memory wasn't half as vivid as Bucky wished it could be - but it still shook him to the core. Every time he saw a flash of the silhouetted ghost it shook him, but that one had been particularly painful.

Because in the memory, Bucky had wanted the mask then, too. Had wanted to hide. The muzzle was comforting because it meant he wasn't exposed anymore; and it was even more comforting because it wasn't the first time he'd felt that way. In the past, he'd been dirty and broken and those soft hands had still wanted him. The silhouetted man still wanted him.

Bucky had been broken and he'd been wanted and that memory haunted him.

"Who are you?"

"Nothing."

"Who do you work for?"

"Hydra."

"Who do you belong to?"

"Hydra."

"What are you?"

"An asset."

"What is your purpose?"

"A weapon."

"Who are you?"

"Nothing."

"Who is he?"

"Who is who?"

Russian came easier than it probably should have. German was even easier than that. Just like with his names, he responded to whatever they spoke to him in. If it was English, he automatically responded in English. The same was for German, Russian.

They taught him the basics in Italian, Spanish, Mandarin Chinese, Japanese, a few Nigerian dialects. They were pleased to find out he already knew the basics of French.

It wasn't the only thing they taught him how to do with his tongue.

Disappearing didn't take as long to learn as they were expecting, either. He was fast and he was smart - everything they taught him only made him smarter. Bucky didn't have the memory of the good marks he'd gotten during school, but his mind hadn't forgotten his eagerness to learn.
He used to drag Steve to science expositions after all. He was creative, intelligent. The only bad marks he ever got were on attitude, of course. He was respectful to his teachers, and happily pranked his classmates. Then, of course, there were all the fights he'd gotten into. Well, more accurately: Steve had (purposefully) gotten into and Bucky'd had to drag him out of.

It actually surprised him the first time they taught him about his arm. He'd never really thought about it - he had two arms, one of them had more armor than the other and should therefore take the worst of the blows. But his arm was special, they told him. It was more than just an arm, it was a weapon.

There were features, training to be done. He had to know the limits of the metal, troubleshoot any issues that may happen in the field before he could get back to Hydra. (They hadn't let him leave yet but he knew once they did, he'd come back. They were the only ones who understood him. He didn't have a single reason to leave for good.)

"Humans have a propensity towards left-handed and right-handedness. This is an error in programming; it makes them weaker on an entire half of their body. You must have perfect control of both."

They strapped his right arm behind his back for a month. He could throw knives just as perfectly with his left arm as he could with his right. He could shoot with both, strangle with both.

When they gave him his right arm back, he didn't rely on it anymore. Favoring his left arm meant stronger power - he had long since balanced out the weight of the metal. It was part of him, the same way a smile that used to quirk up on the right side first used to be part of him.

The metal was one more thing that set him apart from the race - not human; not human.

They'd put him into a drug-induced sleep a few times now, at least twice a week. It wasn't true rest, but it gave his body enough time to regenerate wounds and psychological tiredness. There'd be a point in a few years that being tired wouldn't even be a consideration because processing his own physical ailments would be pointless 'noise,' a lack of efficiency. But for now, he still got weary after days on end spent awake, fighting or training or hurting.

It only took one time, just a simple slip on the dosage. Or maybe he was becoming immune. He didn't know, and it didn't matter because either way, his body found a way to dream.

xx

Golden, that was the first thing he opened his eyes to. The room he was in was glowing, dim lights overhead that cast a dark gold and made everything look soft and warm. Something like sunshine, but gentler and sweeter. Old wood under his hands, a sticky glass a few inches from his hand.

There were blurred faces around him, loud laughter that didn't make him cringe, for some reason. He looked down and his hands felt like embers, glowing hot in anticipation and surrounded by dead ashes. Bucky curled his left hand, curiously cocking his head at the missing sound of the whirr. His fingers weren't made of metal.

A movement through the fuzzy images caught his eye and Bucky looked up. There was another blurred man at the end of the table, standing tall and beautiful, holding out a hand. They were the same hands as the ones he could remember stroking his hair, weaving through the fingers of his own.
"Sergeant Barnes, come dance with me?"

Bucky stared at the silhouetted man of his last dream, but he was in color now. The details of his face weren't quite clear, like he kept turning away every time Bucky tried to focus on his features. But he could see the hands; those were crystal and beautiful. Sergeant Barnes. That was him. He was in the army, his name was Barnes. If his other dream had been right...Bucky Barnes.

Time lapsed around him in a hurricane as the figures of the table shouted and joked, the scene starting to play without him. A shake of his own head, a draw back and pounding heart as he looked at the outstretched hand. Panic, a flush of his neck. The version of him in the dream wasn't taking the hand and Bucky was suddenly entirely not alright with that.

He slid out of his seat and stood, reaching hesitantly for the fingers. There were more sounds behind him - Have fun, kids. Allez, s'amuser! - and Bucky started forward, only to freeze just before their fingers touched.

The last time that he'd reached out to the ghost in his dreams, the ghost had disappeared. Bucky would rather never once touch than have it disappear again. His heart yearned to remember exactly what the ghost's face looked like, why he knew the blonde hair was so soft, where those hands were now.

But then the crystal fingers pressed forward on their own and fire spread through Bucky's body, consuming him and making him glow from the inside out. The room around them shifted, floating by in a world of color and more laughter, the sweet sound of that same familiar voice speaking to him, words muddled by time and distance.

And then they were dancing.

It was a feeling he'd never imagined - the spinning waltz, the empty floor, circling round and round, dizzying in every way that the coffin machine wasn't. Everything was moving too fast to see clearly but it didn't matter, because there was one point of clarity through the one two three one two three of his head and his feet. Someone was holding him safe and warm, arm wrapped over his waist and callused hand in his own. A temple pressed to his, both sets of eyes closed as they spun and danced and danced and everything swirled golden and blue.

The dim glittering lights spun by with streaks of aureate behind them, streaks that grew and feathered out like a careful hand brushing strokes of paint until they were simply lines of soft gold circling around them, a beautiful wake made by the waltz's spin.

Four boots creasing at the toes as they stepped lightly over old floors, the smell of gunpowder and whiskey still thick in the air.

The hand in his tightened slightly and Bucky curled his fingers more in response. Something cold and wet landed on his cheek and Bucky wondered if he'd cried in the past, too.

Another wet, cold dot landed on his hand, then on his nose, and Bucky opened his eyes. The world around them had shifted, gold lights just barely visible in the distance through the whirls of silver snow. The snowflakes were blowing all around them, more vicious than just falling. The man in his arms kept moving them through the snow, the waltz turning slippery but immovable under their feet.

Snow started to accumulate around them, puffing up in powdery swirls as they slid through it without abandon. The top of his spine was wickedly cold, exposed to the wind, but his chest and his hand and every place the dancing figure was touching him was so warm that the cold didn't matter.
The snow got thicker, whipping around them so quickly now that the golden lights were entirely invisible. Everything was white and swirling and spinning and it was all going so fast and Bucky was suddenly saturated with fear that the wind might rip him apart from the graceful silhouette he needed to hold on to.

The soft tones of the song kept drifting over the pull of the wind and Bucky tucked his head in closer against the ghost in his arms, mouth fighting to suck in air against the bitter cold. The ghost didn't seem to even notice the wind, he just kept holding tight and spinning them. Spinning and spinning and the snow was turned red around them, dripping down in icy, bloody flakes and they were still just spinning and spinning and falling, falling--

Bucky woke with a shout (Steve, although he didn't have time to process the word) as a hand smacked across his face, snapping his head to the side from the force of it. He cried out into the darkness and then there was another gruff voice superimposing the gold one drifting through his head.

"Wipe him."

~*~

~~~

~*~

September 5, 1945

The war was over. They had won.

It'd only been six months since their last mission together, since the Howling Commandos had stood in silent shock as Morita relayed the Captain's death. A plane crash. Less than a week after they lost their Sergeant.

They'd gone their separate ways, then. There was still a war to close up, each of their armies could use the final touch of reinforcement.

But there was a rule they'd made - what felt like a lifetime ago, but was only two years - that they'd all meet up when it was over. No matter where, no matter how long it took for them all to get there.

xx

The sun had sunk from the sky by the time the little bell over the door chimed a fifth time, announcing Jones's arrival. He stopped just inside the door, looking around the golden bar for a moment. The bar they'd all met in had been burnt to ashes - so they'd picked the next most important one.

From his spot at the door, Jones could see the corner booth, but instead of the rowdy Commandos, it housed a cheery group of uniformed men and red-lipsticked dames laughing and singing along to the music crooning from the record player.

The record player...Gabe floated his eyes past all the shining faces, turning to the reason they'd chosen this bar. The dancefloor. It wasn't empty now, instead packed full with happy couples and jiving dames. A long time ago, the Commandos had all sat in the corner booth and had the privilege to watch the scene on that dancefloor, empty but for two people.

Two boys, best friends since childhood, dancing and gliding together with an ease that the rest of them would forever envy. It was like two magnets, two halves of the same whole. A dark puzzle piece to juxtapose the light one, army boots more graceful over the old dancefloor than they had any right to be.

It'd been only eleven days before Barnes had fallen from the train. Seventeen days before Rogers had joined him. It'd been the last Barnes and Rogers moment. Jones was just glad they'd gotten to have that before it'd all ended. Sad and bloody.

He found the rest of the Commandos in the back of the bar, all waiting for him in silence. Falsworth was in full uniform, decked out with medals - that was right, it was Lieutenant Falsworth. Morita was in a slouchy suit and tie, Dugan was sans-hat. Other than that, they all looked basically the same as the last time he'd seen them.

Funny, how people from so far apart with so many differences could feel more like family than anybody else he'd ever known.

"Gabe," Dernier greeted, a sad smile on his face. They were the only ones in the entire bar with solemn looks on, the only people mourning instead of celebrating. Jones stuck out his hand, shaking Dernier's and giving him a nod.

Dugan pulled Jones into a one armed hug, Morita and Monty both nodded at him. Their little band of misfits. Missing two, their brightest two.

"We got you a whiskey," Dugan offered, handing Jones a glass of his own. The rest of them already had theirs, held untouched in war-steady hands. Jones tipped his hat in thanks, taking the glass from Tim.

Oh how much had changed since the last time they'd been here.

It was by habit that they formed a half circle, everyone leaving an empty space for the two missing members at the head of their group. After all this time, the two that should have been here today more than any of the rest of them were the only two gone.

Dernier sniffed as they all lifted their glasses and it was only due to the dim lighting that none of them could see the tears in the others' eyes.

With the same practiced synchronization they'd always had, everyone clinked their glasses together, a five-way toast to the realest heros they'd ever know.

"To the Captain," Falsworth said, his voice more solemn than it'd ever been during the war. Captain Rogers - the man who deserved to see the end of this war more than anyone else alive. They all tipped back their glasses and Jones was immensely grateful for the burn of the whiskey down his throat.

Dugan was on one side of him, Dernier on the other, Morita and Falsworth forming the other end caps. It was like finally coming home -

*Til then, Jones thought.

The party spun on around them, joy and laughter and music in full swing. What felt like hundreds of happy, celebrating people. The Howling Commandos stood silent, memories of the past dancing around them.
"Hey, tree-boy, how are you enjoy your bird view?"
"Better than your view, punk. Frenchie, to your left!"

"Jones versus Barnes; now that's a fight I'd like to see."
"I'm trying to storm an enemy weapons storage facility, would any of you mind helping? Or is killing German bastards not entertaining enough for you?"
"...nah. Barnes and Rogers arguing is better."

"Tree-boy and sober-boy, I like it. It's cute."
"Here we go ladies, next round's on me.

"Is it snowing even more?"
"Yep."
"But at least it's--"
"Please, don't say it-"
"--insulating."

"Mind the gap."
"Gotta get moving, bugs."

"MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN, God, dammit, I need backup I don't even know what I'm supposed to - man down, I-I--"

"Rogers didn't make it."

"I can see the papers now...The Howling Commandos: Captain America's famous war regiment and Professional Barbershop Quartet..."

"It's been an honor, Cap. Sergeant Barnes woulda been proud a' you."

They all looked at each other, the weight of the world settling heavy at their feet.

"And to the Sergeant," Dugan added quietly, lifting his glass again. The rest of them followed suit, clinking their drinks together a second time. It would be impossible to leave out Sergeant Barnes.

"Réunis dans vie, réunis dans mort," Dernier offered softly, his words swirling into their circle.

"Together in life, together in death," Jones agreed, touching his glass to Dernier's. The silence fell heavy after that.

The Howling Commandos stayed for a few hours. It was their last few hours together and no one wanted it to be over. With some light coercion of the happy partiers, they got their old corner booth back.

Monty offered a few stories from his time back in London, Dugan and Morita shared a few bits about working with Agent Carter. Dernier had Jones translate a story about how strange it was to speak to his army and actually be responded to in French.

A few of them almost smiled at that.

Eventually, it had to be over. None of them wanted to be the first to leave, but dawn was breaking and the bartender had long since gone.
"Well," Dugan finally said, standing up from the booth. "It's been an honor, boys."

He shook each of their hands. Dernier handed him his bowler hat from the seat and Dugan nodded, fitting it firmly over his head. And then he was gone.

They all left, then. One by one. Handshakes to go around.

And then the sun broke over the sky, lighting up the world in bright color again, and it was over.

~*_~*_~

May 1948

"Выше! Higher, выше!" He pushed his legs to run faster to the end of the catwalk, pushing off at the last moment to force himself as high as he could in the air, curling in a ball to flip in the air and land back on his bare feet in a crouch, thirty feet below the catwalk.

The rush of exhilaration in his veins was temporarily tampered by the shot of pain up his ankles, but the stinging settled down after a few seconds. At least he hadn't broken them this time, that had happened a few days ago and it'd put a damper on his training for long enough to make him restless.

Of course, he'd worked on other things then. Mental exercises, faster reflexes, swimming. The water was always way too cold, dirty and grimy too. He could hold his breath for two minutes and that was nowhere near what they wanted.

They spent a lot of time holding him underwater.

Then there was all of the environment and route training - it was automatic now, the way he checked every place he entered. Find cameras first; guard positions; local weapons; escape routes. There was a constant awareness: everything was a battlefield.

That part almost felt familiar; he used to do this to protect someone important to him. Bucky wondered who he was protecting now....the mission, he was protecting the mission. It wasn't his place to protect himself, just his assets and his identity and Hydra's favorite weapon.

Hydra's favorite weapon went through all kinds of training. Pain training the most. It was important, that they pain-trained his body. He knew that and he tried not to hate it.

But he liked the traceur training. One of the rooms was set up like an obstacle course of sorts - crates and wire fences stacked, chains hanging from exposed beams. It was invigorating to work out the anger and adrenaline on his body.

He'd been angry since he woke up in the machine but he couldn't figure out why. He didn't remember what would have made him angry. He didn't remember much actually, but he didn't really care either.

Who are you? Who are you without him? Nothing. Who are you? Nothing.

His mind was purified, but they'd used the term мягкий переводить. It made him wonder what a hard reset must have been. Until he decided that didn't matter much either. His hands hadn't forgotten their way around guns and knives, he could stay still for an eerily long amount of time, he could remember what they'd taught him in Russian, how important it was to clear his mind and organize his thoughts.

There was an unidentified box tucked in the corner of his mind, but the doctors told him to avoid it.
So he did, ignoring the tug he felt to the tucked away thoughts. It was just curiosity - it had to be. If he ignored it, maybe it'd go away.

He was angry, he ignored the box, and he tried harder and harder to jump higher, spin tighter, land more gracefully.

"Вновь!" the man on the catwalk shouted. Again. Bucky sucked in a breath and took off, running as fast as he could to scale the wall back up to the catwalk. They made him run a lot, stripping the error from residing habits and shaping the way he moved his body. He walked wrong too - they spent a lot of time changing that.

Feet that used to swagger into a room now strode with dangerous purpose, still deadly silent. It was faster, used less energy. He was getting better all the time, getting better and better. Bucky just wanted to be fixed. He wanted to stop feeling all of these emotions in his veins. He wanted to be numb.

Because then maybe he wouldn't keep wanting to dream.

~*~

"The behaviorist, in his efforts to get a unitary scheme of animal response, recognizes no dividing line between man and brute." - Watson (1913)

~*~

They sent him on a trial mission. It was simple and brutal: kill the guard named Fyedka. Mission briefing: subject armed and on duty; pacing the highest catwalks; skittish enough to shoot at creaking water pipes. Silence and deadly force required.

It would have executed flawlessly, only Bucky got his knife pressed to Fyedka's throat and couldn't find a reason to kill him. They'd hurt Bucky if he didn't, but his insides were screaming that this was wrong. He didn't want to kill at all, but there was a sunshine voice in his head telling him he would never kill for no reason.

So he'd lowered the knife. They hadn't liked that very much. He'd paid for it in screams.

The voices asked him why he hadn't done it; and when he'd told them, they'd responded that his reason was the mission. Missions mattered more than anything.

No mercy.

Why did he care? What was the benefit of caring? Where was the logic in caring? Where was the advantage?

Emotions were a weakness. Sentiment was a defect. He had to thread those things out of himself if he was to be indestructible.

Obedience was necessary. Compliance was rewarded. Disobeying meant more and more pain.

The entire world was simple if he didn't let himself be weak. Did he want to be defective?

They told him Hydra was here to save the world from chaos. Who was he to stand in the way of saving the world? That voice in his head - the one that told him not to kill without reason - also said that saving the world was the whole point. Saving the world from bullies was his job. Chaos was a bully, in a way.
So the next time they assigned him to kill another guard, Bucky didn't question it. And walking away with blood on his hands, he decided it probably wasn't the first time he'd killed. The thought made him sad for about four seconds - then he shut that down, locked it away. What the hell was the point of letting weakness into his heart? Where was the logic behind getting emotional? There was no logic. There was no point.

There were two different occasions he recognized the guards they assigned him to kill - the ones that'd come into the cell at night to test obedience training on his knees. He didn't mind shooting them at all. Didn't know if it was a trade off or punishment for the guards or just another way to fuck with his head but. When they doused him in gasoline and asked for the mission report, there wasn't any part of him celebrating their deaths either.

He just didn't care.

~*~

"There's an old saying in the world of assassins: there is always someone better. Your job is to be that someone better."

Russia, Poccus: the perfect place to practice optimum performance in harsh environments. He'd been put on ice and woke back up in the Soviet Union with the world around him a year older and an unfamiliar red star painted onto his arm. The red star was the only change; he observed it, categorized it, and moved on. The thawing process was as painful as usual - Longing, Daybreak, Freight Car - then they shoved him into his first outside mission, barefoot in the snow and ice.

Outside meant looking at the sun for the first time in years; he wasn't sure why it reminded him of someone's laugh, made him want to just stare into the bright light. Let me look at the sun.

Being outside meant an entire new set of challenges: it was a lot harder to disappear, the environment had a lot more to throw at him. He had to pick surfaces to hide footprints, had to be aware of every creak of the wind without losing the keen focus on the movement of every muscle in his body.

The only weapon he had this time was piano wire: hand to hand combat possibly required; takedowns from behind (за) more efficient; silence not optional; exit mission: disappear.

His hair was long enough now that it didn't want to sweep back the way he was used to. The few strands that used to hang over his forehead had turned into entire pieces, hiding his eyes and giving him another change to go with all the missing memories. But the voice in his head was still there, the moment he crouched behind a wall.

Be careful out there, okay? the unidentified voice sung out in his head. Bucky frowned, shutting down the unwelcome comment. Of course he would be careful, cautiousness meant an accomplished mission, a true efficiency.

There was black paint coating his eyes and streaked down his cheekbones - “We can't have anyone identifying you, Мусор.” He'd only blinked in agreement. The new name didn't even feel new anymore. There had been other things he'd been called -Терять, Собака, ...B-Barnes? - he knew that, but he didn't really care. They could call him whatever they wanted, he just made sure to pay attention whenever they were talking. It wasn't the name that mattered, it was the information.

The mission parameters made the entire thing too easy; he was sure he'd been on missions much more dangerous and difficult than this. He didn't know when, couldn't remember a detail, but the bitter cold was familiar and the adrenaline seeping into his bones wasn't making his heart race like it should have (on terms of biological responses), implying he was used to more dangerous situations than the current.

The danger didn't matter though - Bucky returned to the base with the bloody head of the man they'd sent him after. There was reward for his obedience, in this case the opportunity for an ice shower. At first he'd thought the arctic water was another form of pain training, but the ritual - Misogi, it was called - was actually invigorating. His body convulsed at first, shivers and pain sparking along every piece of his skin, but the burn eventually developed into strengthening shocks.

Falling into a frozen river, reaching up a hand to a fleeting train.

When the body attempts to warm itself, the immune system releases more white blood cells and increases testosterone levels - testosterone is one of the main components for building strength. There was also a noticeable increase in energy level: it was easier to take the pain training that came after when his skin was numb and his bones were tingling with renewed energy.

Mission report.

But eventually even the arctic showers weren't considered rewards - there were no more rewards after long enough. He didn't need rewards. What was the point? They hurt him less when a mission went accurately. His only purpose was to make sure a mission went accurately. If he couldn't fight, what was he?

Useless. Human instinct fought irrelevancy and lack of purpose more than anything else.

Hydra held the control and gave him purpose. His system was isolated from the rest of the soldiers, his assets were valued. More than valued, indispensable.

He'd always been good at this, he knew that. But now he would be the best, he'd be the one that shaped the century.

Only one catch: there were ghost fingers tracing over his every time he pulled the trigger. He didn't know who or when or why but he was being haunted - had been haunted for as long as he could remember. (Which, admittedly, wasn't very long.)

The deadliness, the accuracy, the efficiency: they were unsustainable, so long as the voice in his head and the ghost hands and all of the синий kept dragging at his tabula rasa. Poison.

It didn't matter, he told himself. He'd grit his teeth against the wavering gravity at the corners of his mind, shoving out the little flashes that tried to drag him down. He'd go without having to feel anything at all for weeks and then something would trigger and a flood would pour into his head, a thousand things to feel at once.

Sorrow, rage, loneliness, loss. He'd only just fight the urge to scream, resorting to the easiest shut down technique. Find a clock and stare at the seconds hand as it clicks clicks clicks, emotions bubbling up and drowning and click click click the moment the hand hits the 12 it's a power switch. Just - off. Switch off and then it was gone, just like that. Nothing to worry about - no ability to worry with the emotions gone now.

"Mission report?"

Obedience - training. He had nothing to lose, there was nothing to take from him anymore.

Yeah, cause you got nothin' to prove.
It took a lot of practice to get good with bombs; he nearly lost his other arm once. It was only all the reflex training (reflex training was in one of the top five most painful) that had him spinning around to make his left arm take the impact. The doctors were still picking shrapnel out of the panels weeks later.

Electronics and alarms, breaking into places; that came easy. Too easy, like he'd spent most of his life climbing in through windows. A certain window in a ratty apartment in Brooklyn when Sarah Rogers was sleeping from a long shift and would wake if he took the door.

His body was strong, his muscle mass the perfect balance to his weight. Perfection - a goal. Inhuman - didn't matter. He would be perfect. That was the point, wasn't it? Wasn't that what everyone wanted? Hadn't he always wanted it? Blue eyes and a flashing, cocky smile. Little fists, raised to fight. A heart of gold and hair of sunshine and a world at his fingertips: he'd always thought that was what perfect meant. This was nothing like that kind of perfect.

When they fit him for an outfit in black he'd never considered another color. Not just because it wasn't his place to consider and it wasn't in his mind to care anymore; there was a dark purity in black that fit exactly what the insides looked like.

The rage of the past wasn't blind any longer - everything he ever saw and felt was shaped into power, put into maximum use. What once had hindered him now became the ultimate weapon - every piece of him was that way. Fine tuned to optimum performance.

He was Hydra's asset. No, more importantly, he was the asset. The world fell at his feet. His body held more power and was more deadly than any other to walk the earth in the year of 1952.

But it wasn't good enough.

"There's something holding you back, Пустяки." Another name. Another mission, almost perfect. He was brutal and he wasn't merciful. He was brilliant, he saw the world around him and he shaped it into the perfect setting to execute his kill. He'd long since gotten over the longing of freedom as the ice closed up around his metal hand and shut his eyes in his coffin of cold. He should be perfect.

But there was something holding him back, and he knew that. Hydra knew that. Zola, when he could spare the time to come check on him, knew that.

He growled in frustration, slamming his fists harder into the metal punching bag. His knuckles were bleeding again, there were red streaks all around him, but it didn't matter. Pain was an entity of the body and the body he was in was strong, efficient, and entirely under control of his mind. Simple - he chose not to feel the pain. (It worked up to a point - the process that came after the words wipe him was too much pain for even him to control.)

"What's holding you back, Пустяки?" The doctor on the side asked him. He turned instantly, instincts making him obey and answer the question at all costs, no options, no ability to not to.

"Призрак, в моей голове." The ghost in my head. It wouldn't leave him alone. Everywhere he went it was lingering, just beyond his touch. Always reminding him of things, always reaching out to him when he least needed it.

It'd almost compromised a few of his minor missions. He'd only really been on minor missions so far; nobody big enough for the government to notice their death. High level assassinations would come later - no one even knew he existed yet.

He liked it that way. If the world pretended he didn't exist, he got to pretend he didn't exist too.
But the ghost was always there, holding him down to the earth, making him question things that should be second nature by now. Just a flash of blue and suddenly his body was hot all over, hot enough to be on fire, and he wanted to peel the skin off his bones just to escape.

"You cannot let something like that be stronger than you are. This is your weakness, Пустяки. Your achilles heel. It makes you flawed. Human." The doctor spat the word human like it was the most despicable thing on the planet. It was. He would never stoop so low as to be a member of a flawed race.

Bucky curled his hands, looking down at his fingers and spreading them apart. He didn't need to remind himself anymore - he calculated and planned every twitch of his muscles before they began. Even when to blink, when to breathe. It'd taken so much focus and time at first, slowed everything down. But years had given him speed and control, so much more control than a human would have.

"You are living in a war but you fight battles with yourself. How are you ever to win if you don't have complete control of your own mind? You don't feel anything else - why must you feel this?"

It was his last tether; he would have to cut it out of himself. Surgically remove his own heart, because that's where the ghost came from. At first he had thought it was from his mind - but no, it arose from his chest, ghosted to brush back too-long hair and run over broken knuckles with worried sounds.

"You need to let go of that ghost. It is your turn to become the ghost."

It's just a ghost story, no need to be afraid.

"I can cut it out, under suspended sleep." Eyes that used to be wide in wonder, surprise, hurt, were now narrowed and icy, waiting for the command or the needle to send him on to the next stage.

The devil latched to his spine must go. Or maybe it was something beautiful, that was why it couldn't stay.

"Bring the hallucinogens."

~*~

Sleep:

The night was crystal; a sky as perfectly black as Bucky, draped like a blanket over the dim lights reflecting off the harbor. Brilliant pinpricks of white cut through the darkness, glittering stars to shine through the broken spaces of sky.

The wind whipped cold against the back of his neck as he stood on the dock's edge, overlooking the water. There were two bridges in the distance, familiar in the very core of him, even though he couldn't recall seeing them before.

Everything was blue and black and gray, smelled like salt and sweat and the city. He'd been here before, he knew that. But more importantly, he knew the sound of those approaching footsteps.

Bucky turned away from the water, hair blowing disgracefully around his face. The length of it suddenly felt out of place and a metal hand reached up to smooth it back.

The ghost beat him to it. He stared, wide eyed and unabashed at the man in front of him, one big hand holding back Bucky's hair from his face. For the first time in years, the ghost's features were as sharp as his hands. And he was beautiful.

Eyes locked on his, irises blue - that's where that haunting color came from. A military uniform, dark brown and dusted with medals that reflected gently in the starshine. A defined jaw, blonde hair that just invited Bucky to reach up and touch.

The ghost didn't look like a ghost at all. He looked like an angel.

"I'm so sorry," the angel whispered to him. Bucky blinked, the proximity washing him into a state of confusion. (He'd been this close before, he could feel it in his bones.)

"I wanted to save you." The angel's voice spoke again, the same as the one in his head. Telling him not to kill, to be safe. To get enough sleep. That praised his impossible shots, scolded his foolish decisions.

"Save me from what?" Bucky asked, his voice feeling rounder than he was used to, syllables lacking the sharp precision he spoke with now.

The hand pinning back his hair ran a thumb over Bucky's temple, smoothing a warm feeling from his skull down to his spine.

He wanted to ask again, what the angel was apologizing for. What Bucky needed saving from. The only thing he had was Hydra, and they'd saved him from a life of human error. Error - error. He had a purpose here, Bucky had to complete his mission. Not just stare at the soft, glowing angel.

"You must leave," Bucky told it, ignoring the flash of surprise across the angel's features. "You're just...a hopeless dream. I can't have you stay."

"Bu--"

"No. You've haunted me for too long. You have to go." Bucky glared at the angel but it didn't budge, the eyes just softened with the sweetest kind of sadness.

"But I _am_ gone. Why do you think you see me everywhere?"

That didn't make any sense. Unless he meant something else by 'gone'...maybe dead? Maybe this was someone from his past, someone very important, that had died. Left him in the flesh, but not in the mind. It was a possibility, but it still didn't explain everything.

It still didn't explain why he'd held on this long. Why he still wasn't disappearing like Bucky wanted him to.

"Why _do_ I see you everywhere? Who are you?" Bucky accused, taking a step back, closer to the edge of the water. The angel's hand fell to its side, mouth turning down in disappointment.

"I was everything to you." The angel answered quietly. Bucky stared for a few moments before whipping around on his heel, staring out over the water and turning his back on the sunshine glow. He could see his reflection in the water, watched the angel's reflection step closer before he felt the warm hands circling around his waist.

Those arms had been around his waist before, his body knew them like a puzzle piece. A clue towards the mission: a vital piece of information that may change the parameters entirely. He needed a final data point, if he were to rid himself of the angel completely.

Bucky turned his head to the side, looking stiffly over his shoulder at the angel who was resting his chin hooked over Bucky's clavicle. Blue eyes glanced up to his and Bucky held their gaze.

"Were we lovers?" he asked, the words less curious and more accusing. Blue eyes blinked slowly, then the arms around Bucky's stomach squeezed a little tighter as the angel looked out over the harbor.

"Almost," he said softly.

Bucky traced the pattern of the closest bridge with his eyes, surprised he knew the lines of the brick so intimately. He must have studied that bridge before. He couldn't remember the way he used to draw the sloping wires, jutting brick architecture, glittering water underneath.

"I spent a lot of time trying not to think about you," Bucky told him.

"I know," the angel replied. The wind whistled around them like a hurricane, a storm to separate them once more. "Do I have to go?"

"Yes." Every part of him was screaming to say no - he wanted the angel to stay more than anything. But he simply couldn't have him anymore. He had to sacrifice this if he wanted uncompromisable power.

"I'm never going to forget you," the angel whispered, warm breath ghosting over Bucky's neck. Bucky closed his eyes, tightening his hands over the arms around his waist and wishing for the first time that his left could feel more than it did.

"I have to forget you," Bucky whispered back.

The angel circled around to stand in front of him again, tipping Bucky's chin up with a finger as Bucky opened his eyes again. It was such a beautiful image, the golden glow looking down at him with the glittering sky reflected in the water behind him, bridge sloping in the distance.

The air around them froze, cold like his ice chamber and suspended like the years spent inside. The angel leaned forward, hand cupping Bucky's jaw now as gentle lips pursed and pressed tightly to Bucky's forehead.

The gesture might have once swirled something deep from within him, but Bucky was already drifting away from the steady hold of artist hands. Those hands weren't there to hold him anymore.

The opacity of the scene turned down and Bucky watched with distant eyes as the angel faded, dust gathering from his feet, vanishing bit by bit as Bucky watched, silent.

"Goodbye," the voice whispered into the wind, blue eyes disappearing into smoke before him. The feeling in his chest evaporated with the sudden cold on his jaw, waist, forehead. Gone.

Bucky didn't say anything in response. The air was bitter now that he stood alone on the dock. He looked at the bridge one last time before the arching brick faded to smoke too.

And finally, he was saved.

~*_*_~

"They weren't kidding about the assassin. He's freaking...deadly, man."
"He's an assassin," the other guard answered dryly.

"Well, yeah, but. Hey, do you think they're going to have him train other assassins and shit? To be all crazy like him?"

"Does that look stable enough to speak to a human being?? Let alone teach one???"

"...okay, yeah. Fair point. So much for that."

"It wasn't created to make more. It was created to last forever. Besides, I heard this project's been going on for years. It's not every day you get an opportunity like that. They aren't going to waste its training on something like that."

"Also fair point. But if it weren't so damn... dead in the eyes, I bet it could teach the world."

"Pretty sure the only thing it can teach you is how to scream."

~~~

He had a man at gunpoint, waiting for him to enter the code on his safe, where his mission: collect MSRM files was waiting.

The sharp-jawed man looked at him in disgust, finger hovering over the last button to open the steel door. Bucky didn't even flinch as the man opened his mouth, gesturing accusatorily at the four dead Russian bodies on the floor.

"How could you kill your own kind?" The man asked.

"I'm not even your species," Bucky told him, pulling the trigger.

The man crumpled with a bullet in between the eyes and for once, Bucky didn't have the layover memory of a similar shot made in a war a decade ago, no flashing shield at the corners of his vision, no hands reaching out to hold his.

Just.

blank.

He was finally perfect.

~~~

"Howard!" Peggy stalked into the lab, heels clicking sharply over polished floors and making Stark jump, even after all of this time working together.

"Jeez, Peg. I'm working on somethin', you mind? I couldn'ta blow-torched my hand." Howard lifted the goggles off of his face, carefully setting down the twisting metal project on a lab table. Peggy ignored his complaints and held up the file she was holding, snapping it once in the air for effect.

"This is more important," she insisted, sliding the dark folder across the table to him. Howard barely glanced at it, rolling his eyes the way all men did at the idea of paperwork.

"A file, Peggy? What piece of paper could possibly be more impor--"
"It's about Sergeant James Barnes."

Howard's eyebrows went up, the joking smile suddenly disappearing. The two of them had been friends once, Bucky and Howard. She wondered if Stark had ever really cared for Bucky, the way the rest of the world did. Based on his expression, probably. Who didn't?

"I'm listening." Stark picked up the file, opening the covering and glancing a bit sorrowfully at the photo - it'd hit Peggy hard too, that cocky half smile, the crooked hat. It was a version of Barnes she'd never had the opportunity to know. Steve did, her mind provided quite unhelpfully.

"Look at the stamp across the first page." Peggy leaned over the top of the file, pointing a red fingernail at the large boxed mark.

"Missing?" Peggy prompted. Howard still just looked at her, twitching his moustache as he quirked his mouth to the side. She sighed, waving her hand as she continued. "I'm quite sure we have it on good authority - the best authority, if she had anything to say about it - that Sergeant Barnes was killed in action. He died, quite honorably, for his country and protecting his best friend. But we stamp 'MIA' on his file?"

Stark looked back down at the file, nodding slightly to himself. "No, you're right, Pegs. Barnes deserves to have his sacrifice recognized. But I don't think I have the authority to change something like an SSR file..."

As much as she agreed they should get it changed, that actually wasn't what was bothering her the most. The word missing had triggered a memory, a conversation she'd had a long time ago with someone she'd long since forgotten about.

Werner Reinhardt, right after he'd been captured...he'd said something about a "lost" member of the Howling Commandos. Lost, missing - they fit together like puzzle pieces and it made her uneasy. Before she'd joined Shield with Howard, the SSR had stuck her as a code cracker and her mind saw patterns in crystal clear highlights now. And in her line of work, coincidences weren't quite considered.

So it wasn't as exactly a change in the file that she was looking for (although that would be appreciated); it was the reason. Someone had stamped this file as Missing in Action. It was quite possible that wasn't an accident.

"Actually, Howard, I was hoping you could do a little more than that. Could you look into why it was stamped that way in the first place? Or at least who stamped it." Peggy lifted her eyebrows and smiled winningly over the papers between them.

"Why, you planning on crackin' down on some poor intern who's probably moved on to some other job all these years later?" Stark asked amusedly, setting the file back down on the table.

"Something like that," Peggy conceded, briefly debating telling Stark everything. He was the only one who never looked at her like she was crazy - but based on the fact that this was still Howard Stark, she just settled with, "I've got a hunch, is all."

"Well you know how my every goal is to endow your hunches." Stark rolled his eyes and Peggy refrained from kicking him in the shin.

"I'm busy, you know. Trying to save the world, inventing things. Handling a newborn child."
"He's hardly newborn! What is he, three now? Besides. You owe me from that time I cleared your name of being a traitor selling your 'bad babies' to the United States's enemies."

"Fine, fine, I'll look into it." Howard waved his hand and Peggy nodded her thanks, turning to step back out of the lab again. "And Peggy?" Howard called, making her stop in the doorway. "He's four and a half by the way."

She smiled; Howard couldn't fool her, she knew how much he cared underneath his consistent submersal in his work.

"I know. And I knew you did too."

~~~

The year is 1963 and the place is Dallas, Texas.

He'd never been to Texas before but he didn't see the big skies now, didn't feel the hospitable warmth of the November evening. He just waited, perfectly still as he watched through the sniper scope.

Three shots.

A lot of screams. It wasn't his first time back on U.S. soil and it wouldn't be his last. The three shots weren't necessary for a kill; instead, they were necessary for suspicion of another player. Bucky didn't need more than a single shot.

Maybe, if he had let himself, there would be a memory to flash back to: looking through a sniper scope like always, a salute in his direction. But those memories weren't available anymore. They didn't matter anymore. They didn't exist; just like he didn't exist.

He packed up his rifle and he was gone before the screams even stopped.

~~~

"Hello?"

"Hey, Peggy, it's Howard."

"Howard! It's been some time! How are Tony and Maria?"

"Fine fine, they're fine. So listen, you remember when you gave me Barnes's file a few years back and I couldn't get anywhere with it?"

"Yes, of course."

"So I was visiting one of the old SSR bases the other day and they had an entire database set up in the basement. They've been cataloging in all the old forgotten documents from the forties. So of course, I ran Barnes's file through it."
"And?" Peggy prompted, tapping her nails impatiently on the phone.

"And I hit high level security clearance: an official level 8 SHIELD access required. Thing is though, the train incident was back in '45. That's before--"

"Before SHIELD was even formed," Peggy finished for him.

"Exactly," Howard agreed. "So it shouldn't be possible for Barnes's file to have been secluded in the first place."

"Which means a dozen more questions, and another brick wall."

"Basically. But look, I'll see where I can get with the level 8 clearance. They may not even have anything, honestly. But based on all the roadblocks we've hit so far with this thing?"

Howard had that tone in his voice, the one that hinted at his inner thoughts: like maybe they really were on to something.

"You think there's a reason for it," Peggy finished. She could practically hear the nod on the other end of the phone line.

"There's a chance. Either way, it's Barnes. We've gotta look into it."

"We do. Keep me updated?"

"'Course. No promises though, dead ends have been the song for this one."

"Well hopefully that's changing soon."

"Hopefully."

~~~

May 1978, an ex-president this time. Mission: complete. His sixth high-level assassination.

There were whispers now, of a metal-armed ghost. There had been for about five years; just whispers.

Bucky had nothing but power running through his veins. He was deadly. He was perfect.

He hid behind his mask and no one had to know it was a muzzle too.

~~~

"Peggy, it's Stark. Howard. I know we haven't talked in a few years but you should really gimme a call back."

~~~
It was October 1983.

Mission Parameters:
Target: Алиев family
Place of entrance: sunroof, waiting room
Weapons: piano wire, various explosives, fourteen knives, three guns
Requirements: collateral damage may be necessary

Mission Report:
Seven family members terminated; eighteen guards executed; no survivors.

There weren't just whispers of a metal-armed ghost now.

There were whispers of a name.

~~~

"Hi, Peggy. It's Howard Stark again. I know we've got our differences now, but this is bigger than that. This might be bigger than everything. It's about...look, I can't say what it's about over the phone. Just, trust me on this one. I need your help, Peg. The whole world may need your help."

~~~

Haruo Remeliik, the first President of Palau, was shot in the driveway of his home by an unidentified gunman.

To this day, the gunman has remained unidentified.

Bucky didn't even know his target's name that time.

But the target had heard rumors of Bucky's name.

It's a ghost story to tell the little assassin children at night.

~~~

"Carter."

"Stark."

"Thanks for meeting me. Jarvis, don't let anybody past the tenth floor, okay? Seal off the top half of the building and go guard the elevator yourself or something."
Peggy watched with narrowed eyes as Howard deadbolted the metal door behind them, the blinds for the room already pulled. The only light came from a single lamp, illuminating a file on the lavish desk.

"How's Tony?" she asked perfunctorily, sitting down in the chair across from Howard's desk.

"You know how twenty year olds are." Howard dismissed, taking his seat as well. She nodded - she had children of her own, she did know. Not that any of her children were anything like Howard's, but.

"Well, you've got me here, and the tower's locked down. I assume you have something to show me?"

"You're gonna be glad you're sitting down," Howard slid the file across the desk and Peggy picked it up at the corner, tilting it into the light to read the cover. She recognized it in seconds; it was one of only two folders she'd made a point to memorize.

"Sergeant Barnes...you found a way past all of the clearance and false leads, then?" She didn't bother keeping the admonishment out of her voice; both of them had spent plenty of time over the past decades trying to dig up anything on the file to know how absolutely impossible it'd been. Literally every person they asked, every box deeper they tried to unveil, all dead ends and classified's.

"Not quite. I did finally manage to crack a code, pin down one of the reroutes. It took a hell of a lot of lying and possibly some thievery, but I eventually managed to conjure up a document - just a one page report. Go ahead and open it up, it's on top."

Howard waved his hand impatiently and Peggy lifted back the cover flap, pulling out the first paper and reading aloud.

"Request for transfer, temporary project manager. Austria, 1945." Peggy looked up from the file. "Austria? That's where the last Hydra base was, wasn't it? We picked up this...self-righteous German scientist, bastard named Reinhardt."

"The same Reinhardt who told you about a 'lost' Howling Commando, right?" Howard replied grimly, that signature look on his face (and not the cocky one) as he leaned back in his chair.

Peggy looked back down at the file in her hands. Reinhardt. She scanned the paragraphs, freezing as she reached the bottom. Two sets of initials, swung haphazardly over thin lines. "W.R. and A.Z....Oh, my god."

Her hand flew to cover her mouth and Howard rubbed a weary palm down his face. "I know, Pegs, I know."

She just stared a moment, filtering what in the world this possibly meant. The W.R. was clearly Werner Reinhardt, and the A.Z.? She knew of another German scientist - who'd been released from custody about that same time - with those initials.

"Could you find anything on the project? Anything else in correspondence?" She flipped through the folder, making a frustrated sound at how little information they had. Stark reached out like he was going to take her hands, calm her down the way he always used to, but froze and withdrew before he could finish reaching over the desk.

"It was a weapons manufacturing project," he said instead, pointing at the top edge of the paper. "That is, according to the numeric code on that stamp in the corner."
"A weapon?"

"I know, it doesn't make sense to me either. There was one other thing though: a shipment, made in '45, to the same warehouse mentioned on that report."

A shipment. That could tell them everything. Or, it could simply be food rations for guards.

"What was it?" she pressed, flipping through the file again. The rest was the same as every other time she'd read it.

"Still working on that, Peggy. I've been playin' this thing close to the chest, which makes it a hell of a lot harder. If what the file implies is true..."

"...then we may have neglected the rescue of one of the nation's most admirable heroes." Peggy finished for him.

"Exactly. I'll keep you updated as I can Peg, alright? I know you're outta the game now, got your family to worry about."

"Yes, well. Sergeant Barnes was a bit like family to us both, wasn't he?" Peggy pursed her lips, handing Howard back the file.

"I think he was to everybody who gotta meet him." Howard looked down, faraway expression on his face. A familiar pang sharpened in Peggy's heart at the sight. "Kid sure was made outta somethin' good."

"That he was," she agreed softly. Maybe is, if they were lucky. But it'd been so many years...he'd be as old as they were now, if he was still alive. Maybe he'd gotten out, maybe he was living some fulfilled life in France and just decided to never come back to America. If he knew about Steve's death, he wouldn't have had a reason to come back. Loved him first.

"Do you think he's still alive?" Peggy asked quietly, both lost in their heads. Howard sighed, straightening the files on his desk.

"I dunno, Pegs. He fell from a mountain, after all. We can't even be sure that paper means anything. It could be another dead end."

She nodded, looking down at her hands and tangling them together in her lap. How was it that it'd taken them so long to even get this far?

"One last thing, Peg. Just in case I find something on that shipment, I got you a pre-paid cell phone. It's untraceable, and you should be able to crush it under your heels if you have to. If this really is something, we've gotta be careful."

Careful. That day Peggy had nodded, thanked Stark, and they'd briefly hugged before she left the tower and drove her way back home; untraceable, destructible phone in her pocket.

Apparently they weren't careful enough.

~~~

December 16, 1991
She'd known something was wrong the moment she saw the blinking red light on the little pre-paid phone. Peggy held her breath as she pressed a still-manicured finger to the speaker button.

"Peggy, hey. Look, I don't have much time. But I found out what that shipment was and Peg, you're not gonna fucking believe this. The shipment was for a fucking metal arm."

Howard's voice went hollow and airy, words echoing into the air. Peggy's breath caught in her throat. That wasn't...possible. It simply wasn't possible.

"Peggy, listen to me: I know you're freaked right now, I'm freaked right now, but we've seriously gotta backpedal the fuck out of this. Because Peg, I think they might know we're looking. The second someone fucking finds out that we know, Peg, you understand what they are going to do to us-- Just one second, Maria! Did you gas up the car? Look, Maria and I are skipping town for a bit. I've just got this feeling...anyways. Be safe, Peg. And don't fucking dig into that file."

The voicemail clicked silent, echoing ominously. Peggy just stood there, cell phone in her palm.

A metal arm.

It couldn't be.

The timing was fucking perfect.

A metal arm.

The most deadly assassin in the world: a ghost story. She'd heard of him, everybody who was anybody'd heard of him. The three words whispered under tones, talk of metal arms and disappearing figures. The ultimate killer.

Sergeant James Barnes.

The sound that left her lips scared even her, a hand clapping over her mouth as the cell phone dropped from limp fingers, flipping in slow motion to the floor. The moment the clatter echoed across the ground, her eyes snapped down to stare at the fallen device, eyes wide and watering.

Bucky.

The man who'd come crying to her in an army tent decades ago, hopelessly in love with his beautiful best friend.

The man whose cocky smile stared up from that file, hat on crooked and the entire world at his feet.

Steve Rogers' best friend. The man Steve Rogers had thrown himself into battle headfirst for.

Bucky Barnes.

The Winter Soldier.

She brought her heel down on the phone, hard. Crushing it to pieces, stomping and stomping until the heel snapped off her shoe and the phone was long since destroyed. Sergeant Bucky Barnes.

They hadn't even looked for him.
Reinhardt had told her, so many years ago. Warned her... Giving me a second chance could save all of humanity. He'd known, he'd known the plan for Bucky and if she hadn't been so stubborn she would've been able to stop it, to save him --

Somehow, Bucky Barnes was still alive and he was the deadliest assassin in the world. He should be crippled and old but instead he was alive and wielding an advanced technological arm.

Peggy crumpled to the floor, her hands covering her face as the tears started to escape her eyes. It couldn’t be. It shouldn’t be possible. But SHIELD had a tentative file on possible Winter Soldier sightings, possible killings. The first was in the 1950s.

They'd assumed copycat killer, something. But all along, it was somehow Bucky. He'd survived that fall from the train.

She hadn’t even looked.

The moment she'd seen the Missing in Action on his file she should have dug deeper, harder, faster. The file read missing because someone in SHIELD knew. All of this time someone had known, had been inside their ranks and working for the enemy. But what enemy?

Who exactly was the Winter Soldier working for? Who had captured and destroyed Bucky Barnes?

Once, a long time ago, she'd kept a promise for Bucky Barnes. A promise that she swore she'd take to the grave.

And what, she was suppose to take this one too? She and Howard had to do something about this. It was their responsibility. Their duty. This was Bucky. They couldn't just leave him.

She could never just leave him.

Peggy picked herself up off the ground, nudging aside broken phone pieces with her foot and straightening out her skirt. Falling apart now wasn't going to help anyone; let alone the deadly assassin that was one of Stark's oldest friends, one of her oldest comrades. Her biggest responsibility.

Out of habit, Peggy snagged the remote off the couch and flipped on the TV as she sat her bag down, already pulling out a pile of files. She’d need maps, connections, a personal meeting with Fury--

"--rry to report the death of America's favorite billionaire and genius-inventor Howard Stark."

Peggy's eyes snapped up to the television instantly. Papers fell from her hands unnoticed.

A newscover shot, rolling over a scene from the top of a cliff: a smoking pile of wreckage. Stark's favorite car. She couldn't hear anything for a few moments, couldn't see anything but the twisting, smoking metal. Then the anchorman spoke again, words floating over her daze.

"Both Howard Stark and his wife Maria have been announced as fatally injured in the collision. Based on the lack of skid marks on the road, it can be assumed that the brakes on Stark's family car gave out, sending the power-couple off the side of the cliff and into the rock face below..."

One of the things Howard'd said in the voicemail, before he hung up. Maria and I are skipping town for a while. I've got this feeling...

He'd come for them.
The Winter Soldier - Sergeant Bucky Barnes - had killed Howard.

It was too much to take in, so Peggy didn't. She stared at the TV and at the files strewn over her floor and let her mind go blank.

Don't fucking dig into that file. The last words Howard had ever told her.

Once upon a time, a long long time ago, Peggy Carter had made a promise to Sergeant James Barnes. A promise that she planned to take to the grave.

And unless she wanted that grave to be a hell of a lot sooner than she'd been planning, it looked like she had another promise to keep.

No one could ever know.

No one could ever know that James Barnes was the Winter Soldier.

☆

Chapter End Notes

Disclaimer for the psychological and physical training in this chapter: I wrote a longass explanation of the scientific research and ideas behind the past two chapters due to a request on tumblr and you can find the link to that here.

xx

(P.S. GUESS WHO'S BACK SOON?
Our blonde little sunshine.)
Chapter Notes

This is basically the Steve-is-adjusting chapter combined with the Steve-meets-everyone chapter, just so you know.

Disclaimer: I do not hate Tony Stark. Quite the contrary, I think he has a lot deeper plotline that most Marvel fans see. Yes, he can be a dick, but wow he is a lot more than that too. So if it seems like Steve hates him at first, he totally did in Avengers. So. Not my opinions, but Rogers’.

Actually, while I'm saying, I don't hate any of the Avengers. Steve is seeing them through the tainted eyes of someone who lost his best friend less than a month ago and is still traumatized by the war - so he's going to be bitter.

Also: in case you haven’t seen the deleted scene from Avengers I put it in the fic with my little xx link when it comes in. Just so you know.

Warnings for depression, canon typical violence.

Songs for our sorrowful Steve:
Set the Fire to the Third Bar - Snow Patrol
A Sadness Runs Through Him - The Hoosiers
xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
White. A sense of encompassing, piercingly-bright white. Steve blinked, stared up at the ceiling, and could only process the too-clean color above him.

There were sounds too, soft sounds drifting through the room. Recognizable sounds, like voices over a speaker; he was clean, warm, surrounded by too much white, a strange chemical smell, and a radio.

The room was... reality-adjacent. (It turned out later, that the whole world was reality-adjacent.)

Steve looked around, soaking in everything through the confusion. He was lying on a bed in a room that was otherwise empty. There was a radiator by the window, a green panel wrapping the bottom half of the walls. A recovery room, it looked like. Which would mean...he was alive, then.

Besides, there was no way he'd be wearing a shirt this tight in heaven; he had to be in the land of the living.

A quick shot of fear had Steve stretching out his arms a little, checking to feel the muscles rippling underneath his skin. His body was still strong from the serum. A bit of relief edged over his features as he sat up, swinging his legs over the side of the bed. He didn't recognize anything in the room. Where was he now? Glanced over his shoulder, scanned outside the window. Empty gray buildings, no clue to his location, although it maybe looked like New York?

He kept searching for more clues, still overwhelmed with how clean everything was. There was a radio on the dresser by the window and Steve tuned into it now, voices crackling but audible over the wire. It was a depiction of a baseball game. Wait...he knew this game. He knew this game.

It'd been May, 1943 and Bucky Barnes had come barreling home with two tickets in hand and a wild smile, a pep in his step that had him practically bouncing as he tackled Steve on the couch, where he'd been drawing quite peacefully before the soot-smudged boy had jumped on him.

"We're going to a game Stevie!" Bucky'd sing-songed, nudging Steve's shoulder from where his legs were draped over Steve's lap. Steve'd been halfway through shoving Bucky off him when the words sunk in and his eyes lit up, jaw dropping as he looked up at Bucky's shining face.

"A real ball game, you and me. It's gonna be amazing." Bucky shoved the tickets at Steve, exchanging them for the sketchpad in Steve's hands. (Which he closed up carefully and sat down on the coffee table.) Steve had lit up in a smile, tackling Bucky right back. They ended up on the floor laughing, both of them elated in boyish excitement.

And the game itself had been even better. Bucky had thrown his arm around Steve's neck and pulled him along happily as they found their seats, leaning close as they cheered on the game, both of them shouting as loud as Steve's little lungs could allow. Their team'd won and neither of them could keep the smiles off their faces for a week after.

Bucky.

It hit him outta nowhere and suddenly Steve was very much not alright. The room was suddenly crushing him and his overwhelmed lungs starting pumping a hundred times faster. Only one question rushing through his mind now: Where was Bucky?

Thankfully the door had opened at that exact moment, snapping Steve into the present before that trail of thought could escape and drag him under. A nurse walked in, smile plastered over tight lips.

"Good morning," she greeted, her tone of voice putting Steve even more on edge. Her hair was all wrong, her lipstick color was wrong. With a quick glance that almost had him blushing, Steve realized that her bra was wrong too.
It was like everything was shifted. The entire room was off.

She was speaking but everything she was saying was a lie, everything he was hearing and seeing was a lie. He told her so and the nurse stumbled over his accusation and suddenly there were people in black uniforms and then he was busting out of a wall and oh, turned out he was actually in a warehouse because that was not sketchy at all and then he was swinging through doors and he was running and he was running and he was going as fast as he could possibly go but then he just stopped because

Because he had absolutely no idea where the hell he was. There was a crowd pushing around him, mulling and moving and there were so many people he should've been suffocating and there were so many lights and moving pictures and huge screens he should've been drowning but Steve'd been drowning approximately an hour ago in his memory and this was nothing like that, nothing like suffocating either, because he was surrounded and enclosed and overstimulated and there was so so much and he was so so alone.

~~~

Before he'd crashed the plane into the ocean, Steve'd been waiting. Waiting to either find Bucky, or join him. Then the fall had taken them both, but the ice had been crueler to Steve. The ice hadn't let him die, it'd brought him to a new world.

"Where are we going?"

"The future."

But Bucky wasn't here with him, in this new world of the future. What was the point of a future without his best friend? And the worst part about the 70 year gap meant that there was no chance now, of ever having Bucky again. It'd been 70 years and no body'd ever been found: Steve would never be whole again.

Stuck waiting again; waiting for the dust to settle, waiting to get used to jumping images and the twisted, too-colorful future, waiting for a time that he was okay without the beautiful sniper at his side.

They woke him in New York by some twisted fate of irony. It wasn't New York, not really. They even got him an apartment here, in the "quieter" part of town that wasn't full of bustling zombies and flashing billboards on every corner.

The SHIELD agent that showed him to the apartment wore the proudest look. "It's vintage," she told him. "To make you feel more at home."

He was a half, the lighter side of a two headed coin. No amount of vintage furniture and wall decor was gonna make him feel at home when he was a stranger in his own skin all over again.

Honestly, he tried to be polite about the apartment. Made it through the big blank square that took up too much room (a television, the agent said) and the fridge that was too big and took up too much room, the ridiculous size of the apartment in general. He even made it through the too-soft couch and the bed he didn't even want to touch.

He hit his limit at the wall decor.

"What's this?" Steve gestured vaguely at the strange black and yellow thing on the wall. The SHIELD agent perked up, pushing back short black hair from her forehead as she beamed, repeating the same two words he'd heard plenty over the past twenty minutes.

"It's vintage!" She gestured at the shape of it with a small hand. "It's a movie reel."

"It looks like traintracks."

The agent raised her eyebrows axiomatically. Based on the amount of paperwork he'd done earlier, he was gonna guess she'd read his file. So, clearly, she should know. Didn't seem to catch the drift though. Not the only one of them who couldn't catch.

Steve sighed, waving a hand at the wall without looking at the iron lines.

"Unless you want me to wake up every morning crying, I recommend not decorating my apartment with trains." Steve did his best to add humor and a smile to it - lighthearted or keel over from the weight - but the agent's expression only grew even more confused.

"You..." she started, and Steve could practically see the ...don't like trains? forming on her lips as the lightbulb suddenly went off. Her eyes went big as she instantly backpedaled. "Oh. Oh. That bad?"

The words dripped all sympathetic at the end and Steve sighed, shifting his weight and shooting an I'm-trying-I-promise half-smile.

"That bad," he confirmed. She nodded once, gaze cutting awkwardly away as she jotted something down on the clipboard. Steve doubted it was notes about the decor.

"Okay. We can take those down right now." The tight smile returned and Steve did his best to mimic it. To appear more stable than he looked. Felt.

She helped him take the metal thing off the wall and the relief that rushed through him at the loss of a physical reminder was a little ridiculous.

Thankfully, they didn't run into any more horrifying moments. The agent wrote down a few things on her clipboard, sometimes when she thought Steve wasn't looking and others blatantly obvious after something he said.

He had no idea what she was looking for. Or what she'd found. Just paste on a smile until she left him alone again, so he could have a moment to breathe without paperwork and questions and the SHIELD crash course to the 21st century. He needed some time without the swarm. Which took a few hours, but finally the agent let Steve see her to the door.

"If you need assistance at any time, feel free to call. These--" she handed Steve a thick folder from the pile she was holding, "--are for you. Don't spend too long looking over them...it's in the past now. The sooner you come to terms with that, the happier you'll be. Okay?"

She gave him a cheery smile and Steve made a mental note not to recommend SHIELD therapists for anyone ever.

"Yeah, thanks. Have a good evening, ma'am." Steve gave her a little wave and closed the door solidly, leaning against it with a relieved rush of air escaping.

And he was finally alone. With a folder full of files on the one thing he actually cared about in the 21st century: the Howling Commandos.
There was a slight sense of nausea that followed everywhere he went. Like everything was moving too fast, rushing along without him, and Steve was staggering off the ride with no one to rub his back as he hurled in the grass.

It wasn't the changes themselves that bothered him. Of course the world changed, he'd been expecting that to happen eventually. He could embrace change; he'd been dumped into an entirely new body once, for crying out loud. Steve Rogers didn't have a problem with change.

The electronics were overwhelming, that was true. Lights used to be golden flattering soft curvy honey - replaced with fluorescent whites that lit the world harsh mean unforgiving. Streetlamps and store lights were too bright, everything split into atoms with sharp white beams called xenons that destroyed the pigment of everyone's skin and polluted the air with a strangely industrial feel. No longer were bars memorable and golden, no longer did the rainwater on the sidewalks glisten and glitter in dim streetlights.

The absolute worst part though, was the color. There were so many colors. Everything was ridiculously vibrant in a disgustingly fake sorta way. The 40's hadn't been in sepia, or black'n'white like all the movies showed; every one'a Steve's memories were in full colour. No, that wasn't the problem. It was just that the dark green forests of Italy and the brilliant red dresses of dames were different, somehow. The color of green that shouted from his phone was violent; the reds in dresses were synthesized, chemically brighter than any natural dye would make them.

And the buildings. Skyscrapers were blue, storefronts an array of cheap fake shades, street signs so bright it hurt to look if you stared long enough. It almost made Steve wish he did live in black and white. Everything was so focused on clean and bright and if SHIELD wrote down more worried notes about how Steve kept most the lights off in his new apartment, so be it.

At least the darkness hadn't changed. When the lights were out the world could almost be the same. The sounds were different; the temperature was different. It wasn't cold, for one. It wasn't ice - but Steve didn't let himself think about ice much. The timeline in his brain had him drowning in freezing water less than three days ago, so any topic steered in that direction was avoided.

There were quite a few things he was avoiding, actually.

The foremost being all emotions. Especially any that might be associated with curling up and crying.

He didn't have his boys to save him anymore. He didn't have anybody to save him. He couldn't afford to lose himself.

So he didn't. He stared at everything with half-interested eyes, did the best he could to avoid the damn past. It might've worked, barely, if night had never fallen. Everything's lonelier in the dreary of the dark.

Steve laid down on the new marshmallow bed, pulled heavy blankets to his chest, and closed his eyes. He managed to lie still and quiet for about three minutes.

The silence started to really hit after that.

In the war, there'd been moments of quiet. Just the boys all sleeping in their tents, one propped dutifully against a tree keeping watch as the crickets and the dying crackle of fire were the only noises to float through the air.
This was nothing like that kind'a quiet. This kind'a silence was deafening.

He made it another minute staring at the dark ceiling, then he rolled up on his side, pulling the blankets over his shoulders.

He was still falling straight through the mattress. He couldn't handle falling.

Falling and falling and falling away from Steve's outstretched hand.

The first night he was only in bed seven minutes before he sat up and padded across the new apartment - only managing not to run into walls thanks to heightened senses - and threw a blanket down on the floor by the back window.

Steve curled up on the cold ground, blinking into the dark and shivering in the tight tshirt they'd given him. Squeezed his eyes shut and tried to breathe.

It felt like he hadn't prayed in years (actually decades, really), but tonight Steve prayed to God for a comfort he'd only ever gotten from the resplendent man who'd never believed in something higher looking over them.

Steve almost didn't wanna believe, either. If God took Bucky away from him, how was Steve supposed to-- to...

But tonight it didn't matter. Tonight Steve prayed that someone'd find his freezing bones, that his Commandos would come and scoop him up, carry his shivering body to Bucky's waiting, open arms. Tonight Steve prayed Bucky'd cross the distance and decades between them and just come and save him.

And then he only lasted another twenty seconds before the tears started to roll.

Deceased.

Deceased.

Deceased.

And Steve had survived? What the hell for? What was he supposed to do now? America didn't need him. Bucky didn't need him. No one needed him.

He reached under the pillow he'd brought (still too soft), but his hand came up empty. His sketchbook was gone. Everything he had, it was all gone. Build a new life, they told him.

He didn't even have a drawing of Bucky to tuck in his pocket.

Steve sat up again, running tired hands through his hair. Looked like he was gonna have to make a new one.

That night he never ended up sleeping. He turned on the little gold lamp, searched the apartment until he found a pen. Then he apologized to Dugan, flipped over his report, and started to draw. He figured Dugan'd care the least about having the back of his paperwork defiled.

His eyes started to burn around 3am, but Steve didn't stop drawing. Let his hand drift slowly, trying to keep his heart from racing and his fingers from shaking. If he let the weight hit him, he'd either get crushed or lose his mind.

Familiar sloping pretty lips, sharp icy eyes. Hair swept to the side in that pomade he'd had the day he'd fallen from the train. The collar of a navy blue peacoat, graceful shoulders.
After all this time (that didn't feel like any time at all), Bucky's face still came so easily to him. The single most important, most frequent subject he'd ever drawn. It didn't do anything to ease the ache in his soul, but Steve tucked the drawing in his wallet anyways.

It was a week and a day before Fury found him again, told him to report for duty. A week and a day of quiet, of mourning, of adjusting to a world he didn't want to be in. He couldn't find it in himself to smile, not like this.

He showered and he ate and he kept sketching and outside, he was functioning perfectly normally. With the exception of a probably unhealthy amount of time at the gym. It was the only way he could handle the feelings bubbling in his chest...all the stupid things he'd done, all the things he'd never said, a lifetime's worth of regret.

For as long as he could remember, Steve'd been irrationally quick to get pissed. But the anger he felt now? It was all internal and that was worse because there were no bullies he could punch, no Nazis he could kill, no planes to crash into the arctic. It was just him, stuck with everything he hated about himself and everything he'd ruined.

He'd. punch. Let. punch. Bucky. punch. Fall. punch.

The loneliness wasn't even about losing the love of his life. Of course that hurt like hell, but it still wasn't the worst part. Steve'd lost his best friend. His partner in crime. Not counting the five months without Bucky during the USO tour, he'd never had to live without Buck. Without Bucky to look out for him. Without Bucky to come home to. Bucky had always. been. there.

So after a week and a half of not sleeping, not smiling, walking in circles around the same settling sadness (waiting for a storm that was never gonna cease), Steve was actually...relieved to be assigned again.

He'd even have a team. The thought made him choke up a little, thinking of the Commandos, but he'd always been good at teams. There'd be some familiar names, too. Howard's son, for one.

Hell, even Howard was dead. Howard was supposed to be invincible - Steve'd always figured he'd just invent a way to stay alive, even when his time was up. But he was dead - in the most regular of ways, a car crash - and another friend was gone.

Peggy wasn't dead, but Steve couldn't visit her yet. Not when he was like this. She deserved better than that. Deserved better than a mess on her doorstep. She'd lived a life, she didn't need Steve to barge in and ruin what was left of it.

So he stayed isolated. Unbalanced and probably depressed, if the pamphlet SHIELD gave him meant anything.

When Fury interrupted Steve's nightly workout (aka beating-the-shit-outta-the-only-legal-thing-to-beat-the-shit-outta session) with news of an assignment, the first thing he asked Steve was trouble sleeping?

Steve slammed his fists into the punching bag again and thought you have no idea. Instead, though, he answered,

"I've slept for seventy years sir, I think I've had my fill." His fists didn't stop snapping into the punching bag, but thankfully the bottled up memories that flashed between every hit ceased.

Fury strolled closer, voice less consoling and more challenge. "Then you should be out. Celebrating. Seeing the world."
Celebrating. Steve wasn't in celebration, he was in mourning. If he had black in his closet he'd probably dress in it head to toe. He was mourning death, not the newfound life he'd been given. That he hadn't wanted. (Not that he'd ever tell anyone he intentionally chose to sink that plane.)

The swinging fists suddenly felt entirely useless and Steve froze, placing a palm on the synthetic plastic to stop the swing. What was the point? His feet took a few steps backwards without him, then Steve decided he might as well call it quits and started unwrapping his knuckles. Bucky'd kill him if he practiced without wrapping his hands first.

Fury was still waiting on an answer so Steve stared down at his slowly-revealed knuckles, making his way back to the bench, maudlin slipping between the cracks of his façade. "When I went under, the world was at war. I wake up, they say we won."

He turned on Fury, what once would've been challenge shredded to sorrow. "They didn't say what we'd lost."

Steve wasn't just mourning Bucky. He was mourning his country; mourning the ideals of freedom and equality; mourning that people thought they'd actually fixed everything. The 1940s had some terrible segregations and opinions, but at least everyone knew they were there; now people pretended everything was perfect and it was the furthest Steve'd seen from it.

He was mourning a lifetime he'd missed. Never seeing the end of the war, the deaths of his Commandos. Mourning the brilliant colour of a world lit by the beautiful silvery light of the moon.

He was mourning having to face tomorrow.

"We've made some mistakes along the way. Some very recently," Fury said and Steve could pretend he didn't know what this was leading to, but what was the point of that? He was sick of the way everyone in this generation danced around straight answers.

"You here with a mission, sir?" Steve asked bluntly, undoing the wrappings on his other hand.

"I am."

"Tryin' to get me back in the world?" If the words came out bitter - Steve didn't wanna be back in the world - Fury didn't seem fazed. Instead he held out a file in Steve's direction, serious tone and impeachable look on his face.

"Trying to save it."

Steve paused, looking at the outstretched folder. He was being requested on a mission to save the world. He'd been wallowing in loneliness and purposelessness for a week, but now he was being offered a distraction. A possibly quite satisfactory distraction.

Besides, he was still that backalley Steve Rogers. Who would he be to refuse a chance to save the world?

He took the file.

~~~*~

It should be simple; Steve'd worked on teams before.

It wasn't simple.
First person he met: Agent Coulson. Who wasn't actually an Avenger, more the Avenger's...mascot, in a way. Then Steve met Romanoff and Banner. Eventually Stark, Thor, Barton.

The official team was the six of them. (And the lack of a seventh member hit Steve hard all over again, the same way it had the first time he'd fought without the beautiful seventh member, that brilliant pouty sniper.) Every one of the Avengers had a catchy superhero name; but all the Commandos had a nickname too, so at least that part was familiar.

And that was literally the only thing the two teams had in common.

Befriending the Commandos had come easy as breathing. They were Bucky's friends, so Steve wanted them to like him. Steve'd saved their lives, saved Bucky, so they liked him. Simple. Everybody fit into the puzzle with happy, brandished pieces.

There was nothing easy about the Avengers.

Agent Coulson was kind, seemed to really like his job. Even if he was a bit of a fangirl. It was almost USO days again, except instead of a hundred people crowding him, it was one person with the enthusiasm of a hundred. Steve was used to it though, he'd spent five months signing enough autographs to take the blushing comments in stride.

Besides, there was something comforting in someone with such immeasurable approval. Even if Steve didn't feel he'd earned it, Coulson's blind faith was something he found himself repeating in his head, words to hold onto.

"Aren't the stars and stripes a little... old fashioned?" Steve had asked and Coulson'd looked at him, soft smile on his face, all confidence for Steve. Well, for Captain America.

"With everything that's come to light? I think people might need a little old fashioned."

He wasn't just useful, or helpful. Maybe he was needed. Steve hadn't felt needed since the train fall. Especially not since waking up.

And in the face of the Avengers crew, that concept was even harder. Technology fit for aliens, actual aliens themselves, robots and assassins and incredible monsters that could rip apart buildings. Missiles and combat skills and negotiation tactics and flying and lightning and bows and arrows and where was Steve? Steve was taking the stairs.

So in the light of that, the echoing words of I think people might need a little old fashioned were something Steve could latch onto. He'd be needed. There'd be a point he'd be crucial and he'd be there for that. He hadn't found his place in this team yet, but he would.

Meeting Romanoff and Banner was more complicated than Agent Coulson. Steve'd stepped outta the plane onto the airplane carrier, blinking at the bright sunlight as a woman walked into view.

"Agent Romanoff, this is Captain Rogers," Coulson introduced, making a gesture between the two of them.

"Ma'am," greeted Steve. Her hair was almost as red as her shirt, short and practical above her shoulders like Steve was used too, but waves instead of victory rolls.

"Hi," she said back, a bit dismissive as she turned to Phil. Busy, then. Didn't waste time with small talk. "They need you on the bridge, they're starting the face trace."

And then Coulson was gone and Steve was left to walk with Agent Romanoff - Natasha. She was wearing leather like Peggy used to, only black instead of brown, more edgy and modern too. Bright, keen eyes gave him this look and Steve got the instant impression she was waiting for him to make a mistake.

"It was quite the buzz around here, finding you in the ice." She glanced over, every word meticulously picked and prepared.

Steve barely refrained from asking is this a test, 'cause it felt a hell of a lot like one.

"Thought Coulson was gonna swoon," she continued. "Did he ask you to sign his Captain America trading cards yet?"

Amusement, perhaps - she had a funny side somewhere. That, and she was the only one with constant informational awareness. Fury ran everything, but it seemed like Romanoff knew everything.

It was easy to see it. Steve may be a clutz in the presence of beautiful women, but he was still a soldier - he could recognize the face of another fighter. There was nothing ordinary about Natasha Romanoff.

"Trading cards?" he asked.

"They're vintage. He's very proud." She didn't say it condescendingly though; she liked him, maybe even trusted him. It was a testament to both Coulson's character and Natasha's, because it didn't look like she was extending that trust to Steve anytime soon.

Let's just say she wasn't exactly Dum Dum Dugan, who jumped on board and became your best friend under the only condition of opening a tab at the local bar.

There was another man on the tarmac - one Steve recognized from the files - who was currently looking around, hair disheveled, confused, outta place.

"Dr. Banner!" Steve called out. The man turned, looking their way, so Steve was right about that. He held out a hand and Banner instantly took it, shaking a little vigorously while scanning Steve up and down.

"Oh, yeah, hi. They told me you'd be coming." Banner was on edge, waiting, taking in everything but afraid to look too long.

"Word is you can find the cube," Steve offered, knowing doctors were happiest when talking about their work. Doctor Banner nodded slightly, eyes darting back and forth. He was uncomfortable here.

"Is that the...only word on me?" Banner asked, cautiousness mixed with unlying defense. He was testing the waters too, testing Steve. This all counted, these first impressions.

Yet another stark change from the Commandos; it was a good thing they hadn't judged him based on first impressions, because Gabe'd shouted up who are you supposed to be from those metal cages and he'd awkwardly shouted back Captain America? while wearing tights and a helmet stolen from a showgirl.

Yeah, not exactly his shining moment of first impressions. That's why these had to count: if he was getting a new team, whether it was temporary or not, Steve wanted to do it right. And the people of the twenty-first century were, so far, much more sensitive than the crowd Steve was used to.

"Only word I care about," Steve reassured him with a slight nod. The tension didn't ease outta Banner's shoulders, but he looked slightly grateful, nodding and instantly turning the subject to Steve.

So the Hulk thing was a bad topic, something not to approach. Steve could do that, he was familiar with triggers. His best friend had been a torture victim, after all.

Then the next person Steve gotta meet was Loki. The bad guy, the same power-hungry bully Steve'd been fighting since he learned how to speak. He wasn't exactly grateful, but he couldn't deny the thrilling rush as Fury'd turned to him and said, "Captain, you're up."

See, the last time he fought, he'd been avenging Bucky's death. Now, he was back to trying to save the world again. Wearing the stars and stripes. (Which Steve was also more grateful for than he wanted to let on.)

_You're keeping the outfit, right?_

_Yes, Bucky, I am_, Steve thought, snapping a strap across his chest. He hoped if Buck was looking down from heaven, he'd finally start having reasons to be proud'a Steve again. The shield was waiting for him, as heavy and comfortable as always.

If Steve could afford to be sentimental, he might run his fingers over the familiar nicks and scrapes, the bright white star in the center. But if he let one thing get to him, everything might get to him and right now was his time to finally be strong again. To have a purpose again. To be something besides waiting.

He dropped down on Stuttengard just in time to block Loki's first alien blast with the very center of the beloved shield. The blast bounced back and knocked Loki off his feet, giving Steve the advantage of surprise, not to mention the perfect entrance.

"You know, the last time I was in Germany and saw a man standing above everybody else...we ended up disagreeing."

And the rush of power was back. Steve was where he belonged, in full suit, facing down the bullies that hadn't changed a bit over the past seventy years. He still had it in him. He hadn't been sure he could, but hell yes he was made for this.

"I'm not the one who's outta time," Steve smirked, in perfect timing for Natasha's plane to level the bigass guns on Loki's head, giving Steve's punchline all the punch it needed.

"Loki, drop the weapon and stand down," Romanoff's voice warned from the plane. And hallelujah Loki chose not to listen, predictable-evil-villain he was, firing another dangerous blast of energy upwards.

Hell yeah, Steve finally had the excuse to beat up something that'd fight him back.

He dove at Loki with the kinda ferocity he hadn't felt in the new decade. They fought and punched and kicked and spun and Steve's blood was pumping and everything was absolutely amazing.

_Sometimes I think you like getting punched_, a voice scolded in his head. Steve scoffed, slamming his foot into the center of Loki's chest with another breathy comeback _not today_, and thought that Bucky'd been close, but not quite right. Steve didn't like getting punched, Steve liked _punching_.
Then his hand to hand battle was interrupted, loud crazy sounds blaring outta the sky and making them both look up. Cause I shoot to thrill, I'm ready to kill... A star streaked across the sky, fast bright closer closer - an explosion he threw up the shield to block.

And that's how he met Tony Stark. One moment he was kicking ass and then there was a flashy red and gold robot in the square, missiles and guns and god knows what else aimed at the common enemy.

"Mr. Stark," Steve greeted him, a little outta breath.

"Captain," he responded. The military title was a good sign and for a moment, Steve figured he might actually like Stark as much as his father.

Tony even looked a bit like Howard. But then he opened his mouth. Where Howard was all quirked eyebrows and funny faces, Tony was flashy smiles, rude side-comments, and disapproving glares.

There wasn't a reason to dismiss him yet though, so Steve stood beside him in the plane and leaned over slightly to talk under his breath, strategizing with a fellow soldier. They were a team, after all.

"I don't like it." Steve muttered.

Tony responded without looking at him. "What, Rock of Ages giving up so easy?"

"I don't remember it being that easy. This guy packs a wallop." Steve glanced over his shoulder at Loki, who was sitting eerily calm.

"Still, you are pretty spry, for an older fellow." Tony huffed at his own joke, looking Steve over. Steve returned the gaze, calculating. "What's your thing, pilates?"

"What?" Steve asked, not following at all.

"It's like calisthenics. You might have missed a couple things." Tony looked back away, voice flat like he found himself extremely amusing and couldn't give a damn if anyone else did. "You know, serving time as a Capsicle."

The eyes were back on him with an unmistakably condescending look and instantly, Steve was in the back of an alley again.

Holding up a trashcan lid to defend himself against some bully who leered at how tiny Steve was, how he needed that mothering, protective friend of his to tie his shoes for him.

But this was Howard's child, and Steve had to be patient. God, he hated bullies though.

"Fury didn't tell me he was calling you in," Steve replied, a little coldly. He'd been perfectly civil to Tony not 30 seconds ago and this was how Howard's son was gonna respond?

"Yeah, there's a lot of things Fury doesn't tell you." Now his eyes were of steel, directly on Steve's, challenging. Testing. So Tony was against authority, belittled people to inflate himself, a control freak, and relied on flashy entrances to give him a false sense of power.

Natasha said something in the background but Steve was busy staring down Tony, trying to decipher what the hell his problem was. Then the thunder hit, lightning whipping flashes, and that's how Steve met Thor.

The plane shook, a loud thump on the roof rocking them all. Steve instinctively grabbed his helmet, pulling it onto his head the same time Tony folded down his and started walking towards the opening plane belly.

"What are you doing?" Steve shouted over the sound of wind and thunder.

It was at that moment a man swooped in, knocked Tony in the chest with - what was that, a hammer? - and sent him flying backwards, knocking into Steve and flattening them both to the floor with the weight of the metal suit.

The stranger then proceeded to grab their prisoner by the throat and jump back out the belly of the plane, a whip of red cape snapping behind him.

"Now there's that guy," Tony complained, miffed as he hauled to his feet. Steve struggled up right after him, as Natasha shouted,

"Another Asgardian?"

"That guy's a friendly?" Steve shouted over the wind. He really hoped so, because going up against him and that hammer didn't look like fun.

"Doesn't matter. If he frees Loki or kills him, the Tesseract's lost." Tony started back towards the platform and Steve shouted quick before he could jump.

"Stark! We need a plan of attack." Strategy won wars, soldiers that worked together won together. Fighting wasn't about the individual man, it was about the efficiency of a perfectly executed team.

"I have a plan," Tony responded, pausing at the edge of the plane. "Attack."

A jump, flurry of fire and swirling red metal and Steve would sigh in exasperation if he wasn't in the middle of a battle. So this was how Tony was gonna be.

He really wasn't seeing how this could work out, the whole of them as a team. But he'd be damned if he didn't try.

Seconds after Stark disappeared Steve snatched the closest parachute, pulling the harness over his shoulders and strapping it across his chest.

"I'd sit this one out, Cap!" Natasha shouted from the front, her voice strangely kind but still firm. Regardless, Steve'd never run away from a fight.

"I don't see how I can," he responded, tightening a buckle around his waist.

"These guys come from legend, they're basically gods." She looked over her shoulder as she said it, words holding a lotta weight in that tone. But this was still a fight, and he was still Steve Rogers.

"There's only one God, ma'am. And I'm pretty sure he doesn't dress like that."

And with that, Steve jumped out of the plane, foregoing safety and rational, well-thought out decisions.

Bucky was probably yelling at Steve from beyond the grave.

~~~

A few hours later, and the imaginary Bucky wasn't the only one yelling at Steve. Everyone was yelling at Steve, at each other, voices raised and tempers raised and goodness, he'd thought the fighting couldn't get any worse than the Thor-Iron Man-Captain America battle they'd had in the woods earlier.

That'd come to a stalemate pretty quickly, realizing that hammer meets missile meets shield wasn't gonna ever put somebody out on top. And because Steve was used to being the Captain who got the last word, he'd ended that with a snarky "Are we done here?" that both Tony and Thor had deserved.

But no, apparently they hadn't been done, because about a hundred more problems had arisen since then. The more they got to know each other, the bigger the problems.

After the initial introduction to Thor, Steve made a point to observe him a little closer, trying to figure out what his deal was. Thor's voice was strangely soft for a man of his stature, calm in a way that the rest of them (not even Steve) really were.

Steve was used to battles, used to roughing it in the woods with nothing for warmth but Bucky's back pressed to his. But the kind'a battle they were fighting now - one of technology, of aliens - wasn't exactly his forté. Consequently he wasn't as calm as he'd like everyone to think he was.

Or the small fact that the weapon he'd died to protect the Earth from was the exact weapon they were fighting again.

Really, how many sacrifices had been entirely useless?

Then there was the thing between Banner and Stark, which put Steve into yelling-mode. The scientists got along better than the rest of them, but that didn't mean Steve trusted Tony to be understanding of what the hell a trigger was. Tony was pushing the Doctor's buttons and Steve wasn't willing to let that slide.

The good thing about being pissed (which was basically the summary since the whole team got together) was that he did stupid things when he was mad. Or, in this case, stupid and beneficial to the team. Because Tony was a dick, but he had a point about blindly trusting Fury - there was always a chance more was going on under the surface.

If the big Hydra guns he'd found (while snooping - Buck would be proud) were any indication, turned out that Stark was right.

If he thought the team was fighting before, that was children's squabbles in comparison to the storm as Steve dropped a quite familiar Hydra assault rifle on the lab table.

Tony'd just asked Fury What is Phase 2? and Steve was happy to input his findings. "Phase 2 is SHIELD uses the cube to make weapons."

To say he was mad now was an understatement. This was what he'd died for, what Bucky'd died for. And it was happening all over again? Tony was kinda blinking at him so Steve clarified, definitely not gloating that he'd gotten to the bottom of this before Stark and his fancy technology. "Sorry, the computer was moving a little slow."

Fury instantly backpedaled, trying to cover his own ass with some fabricated explanation. "Rogers, we gathered everything related to the Tesseract. This does not mean that we're--"

"I'm sorry, Nick," Tony interrupted, sliding a computer screen towards Fury with a lit up plan of weapon technology etched across it. "What were you lying?"

"I was wrong, Director. The world hasn't changed a bit." The words didn't do the slightest justice to the bubbling anger Steve was holding back.

With perfect timing, Thor and Natasha walked into the lab, instantly sensing the animosity. Well, animosity was an understatement. Fury'd recruited Steve to save the world and instead he was turning it to the state it was in before Steve'd saved it the first time.

"Did you know about this?" Banner shot at Natasha, looking betrayed. Another connection between their team severed, and the blank look on Romanoff's face wasn't doing anything to help.

"You wanna think about removing yourself from this environment, Doctor?" Natasha asked, more an order than a question.

Steve watched cautiously as they argued, judging the anger on Banner's face versus the strange dance Natasha's words were fabricating. He understood why Banner was pissed, he was too, but Steve's anger wouldn't end with half the ship slaughtered.

Finally, the argument turned to the important question, "I'd like to know why SHIELD is using the Tesseract to build weapons of mass destruction."

"Because of him," Fury finally interrupted, pointing an accusing finger at Thor. Thor looked simply stunned, asking a shocked "Me?"

And that lead to another argument about aliens, wars, leveling towns, peaceful proclamations, controlling people - which Steve couldn't stand for.

"You forced our hand," Fury argued, glaring at them all. "We had to come up with somethi--."

"Nuclear deterrent," Tony interrupted, finally inputting with his snark, adding sparks to a fire that was already burning wild. "'Cause that always calms everything right down."

"Remind me again how you made your fortune, Stark?" Fury shot back and Steve couldn't pass up on that opportunity--

"I'm sure if he still made weapons, Stark would be neck deep-" Steve started, before Tony was suddenly interjecting loudly.

"Wait! Wait! Hold on! How is this now about me?" He sounded more shocked than outraged but that didn't stop Steve from turning a glare on him.

"I'm sorry, isn't everything?" He shot back, because he was a twenty-five year old soldier who'd grown up too fast with nothing but a sassy mouth as his weapon for years.

Thor scoffed, giving them all reprimanding looks and the quite rude side comment of "I thought humans were more evolved than this."

_God, Steve, what are you, five?_

"Excuse me, did WE come to YOUR planet and blow stuff up?" Fury glared intensely, Thor only managed to look more indignant.

"Do you always treat your champions with such mistrust?"

"Are you boys really that naïve? SHIELD monitors potential threats," Natasha reasoned in her everyone-is-stupid voice, the word _boys_ so condescending it could've been a curse word.

"Captain America is on threat watch?" Banner raised his eyebrows in disbelief and if that was supposed to be a compliment, Steve didn't take it as one.

He may not transform into something big or shiny or annoying, but he was a war hero who shot people in the face just because his best friend died, he wasn't the innocent fucking angel they all made him out to be.

"We all are," Natasha shot back, but apparently Banner wasn't the only one who thought that Steve was harmless (useless). Tony scoffed, nearly laughing outright as he looked at Steve incredulously.

"You're on that list? Are you above or below 'angry bees'?" Tony raised an eyebrow with that same cocky expression and Steve fought back the urge to growl.

The little ball of bundled up, pissed off fire that'd taken on bullies three times his size in Brooklyn was being sneered at again, the same joke, you just don't know when to give up, do you?

"Stark, so help me god, you make one more wise crack--" Steve placed one menacing step and the nonchalant façade slipped for a single moment as Tony leaned back, eyes widening.

"Threat! I feel threatened!" Tony shouted, back to cocky and eternally-joking to cover back up whatever fear he was actually feeling.

"You speak of control, yet you court chaos!" Thor inputted again from behind them. Steve didn't take his glare off Tony's stupid face.

"It's his M.O., isn't it? I mean, what are we, a team? No, no, no. We're a chemical mixture that makes chaos. We're..." Banner paused, searching for the right word, and the one he chose Steve could not agree with more. "We're a time-bomb."

"You need to step away," Fury pointed at Bruce and he seethed even more, then Tony fucking Stark put his grimy little hand on Steve's shoulder, cajoling again and Steve could seriously punch him.

"Why shouldn't the guy let off a little steam?" Tony prodded, and that was it. Steve shoved Tony off, literally calling on every ounce of strength he had not to start a fight with this bully the way he had with a hundred others.

"You know damn well why! Back off!" It was the last warning Tony was gonna get before Steve was done with words. He'd made a point not to pick fights since the serum - not petty ones with innocent allies he could hurt. But on his team or not, Steve was about ready to make an exception for Tony Stark.

Of course, that was the moment Tony decided to step in close, face just inches away as he glared up at Steve.

"Oh, I'm starting to want you to make me."

If Tony was trying to throw him with physical proximity he was failing - Steve had no problem getting up in Tony's face either, especially if it meant he could be punching it soon.

A smile curved up Steve's mouth and this was about more than getting punched, this was getting to lay out justice on a bully. If he was looking forward more than he should be, so be it.

"Okay, that's how this is going to be." About damn time. Tony thought he was some pristine icon, but this wasn't Captain America that Tony had pissed off, it was Steve Rogers, a kid from Brooklyn with a big mouth and angry fists. What the hell was Tony? "Yeah. Big man in a suit of armor. Take that off, what are you?"
"Genius, billionaire, playboy, philanthropist," Tony replied easily, like he'd practiced in mirrors, mirrors probably lined with diamonds or pictures of his own cocky face. A flaunting media starlet, the kind who didn't fight for anything but his own pocketbook.

Steve leaned even closer, his words biting harshly between them.

"I know guys with none of that worth ten of you."

Men who'd stood in the face of danger every day, who'd saved lives with nothing more in their backpacks than ammo and a harmonica. Men who'd changed the world, changed Steve. The best men to ever live. Steve knew an entire squad without a dime to their name that outshone Tony Stark in the dimmest of lights.

Tony looked a little miffed and Steve just kept going.

"Yeah, I've seen the footage. The only thing you really fight for is yourself. You're not the guy to make the sacrifice play, to lay down on a wire and let the other guy crawl over you." Or strip electrocuting wires from your best friend's feet and flaying the flesh on your palms to save another life. That wasn't something Tony would ever do.

"I think I would just cut the wire," Tony responded, but he was slipping on losing ground. Another smile curved on Steve's mouth, sharper with understanding this time.

"Always a way out..." Steve mused, looking down at Tony and making sure he was well aware of it. Tony didn't know anything about sacrifice, about fighting. He'd never been in a war, never had to reach out a hand for the love of his life and watch them fall to their death, knowing there was nothing he could do, that he was too late, that it was over, this time there wasn't a way out.

"You know, you may not be a threat, but you better stop pretending to be a hero."

Bucky Barnes was a hero. The Commandos were heroes. Incredible people who gave their lives for this country and for what? So people like this spoiled rich kid could make fancy weapons and get away with whatever he wanted because he was bored?

Was this what Bucky died for?

And then the guy has the audacity to put his name right up next to Sergeant James Barnes of the 107th. To consider himself a hero amongst the footsteps of men he'd never compare to. Never.

"A hero?" Tony snapped, final string snapping on the facade, bottlecap popping off in an explosion of smoke and heat. "Like you? You're a laboratory experiment, Rogers. Everything special about you came out of a bottle!!"

You must promise me one thing: that you will stay who you are. Not a perfect soldier, but a good man.

Everything special about him.

A red skull glaring down at him, the same bitterness and jealousy in his voice that Stark had now. What made you so special?

Nothing, I'm just a kid from Brooklyn.

Brooklyn: (noun) backalley fights, sloping bridges; drawings, home; Bucky Barnes.
No, see Stark was wrong. Everything special about Steve didn't come out of a bottle. Everything special about Steve fell off a train and left him here in this future alone. Everything special about Steve came in the form of Brooklyn and eyes of ice, hands warm and gentle wrapped up in his own.

Stark could insult Steve all he liked, but he didn't get to insult the memory of Steve's best friend.

"Put on the suit, let's go a few rounds." Steve replied easily, voice too calm. If Bucky were here this'd be the moment he'd intercede, on the tension in Steve's voice alone. He'd hear that familiar tone and he'd get those beautiful hands on Steve's shoulder and rip him backwards, pressing a hand over Steve's heart as he talked him down, words quiet but insistent. Ever the savior.

Instead, Thor just laughed at them both.

"You people are so petty... and tiny."

Steve bristled - it was a bit of a soft spot for him - and Tony thankfully backed away. Banner didn't miss out on Steve's reaction though, muttering something under his breath Steve didn't hear. He was too busy fuming.

Apparently it was concerning though, because Fury suddenly turned to Natasha, gesturing at her and Bruce. "Agent Romanoff, would you escort Dr. Banner back to his--"

"Where?" Banner interrupted, fuming. "You rented my room."

"The cell was just in case--" Fury started again and Banner wasn't going for that either.

"In case you needed to kill me, but you can't! I know! I tried!"

And just like that, all of the muttering and glares shot silent. Seven gazes turning on Bruce, Steve's breath stopped in his throat. Apparently he had more in common with Dr. Banner than he thought.

"I got low. I didn't see an end, so I put a bullet in my mouth and the other guy spit it out. So I moved on. I focused on helping other people. I was good, until you dragged me back into this freak show and put everyone here at risk!"

Banner was getting more and more upset and the rest of them were getting wider and wider eyed. Steve was already scanning the room, calculating the best way for damage control if Bruce hulked out right now. And actively avoiding thinking about a very avoidable plane crash.

"You wanna know my secret, Agent Romanoff? You wanna know how I stay calm?"

Okay, apparently no one was gonna say anything. But Steve'd really like to prevent mass destruction if possible.

"Doctor Banner," Steve instructed calmly, the same commanding tone he used for broken soldiers and terrifying missions. "Put down the scepter."

It was a direct order and Banner looked down at the words, responding instinctively. The rage in his eyes flitted over to surprise, finally realizing he was holding the weapon.

The computer took that moment to beep a warning and then the crisis of World War Three was averted, Banner put down the scepter and snapped outta his anger without death on anyone's hands.

They were a time bomb. There was supposed to be strength in numbers. Armies weren't won with weapons or technology, they were won by men: a unit, not a bunch of guys with guns.
How could this group of dysfunctional, crazed people ever work together? How could this compare to the team of boys he knew? How could he find a place in a team like this?

The answer was simple really: a common enemy, and somebody had to die. But blowing up one of the engines of the helicarrier was definitely a good start.

Differences could be forgotten when things were exploding.

Steve helped Tony off the ground, "Put on the suit!" an order instead of a challenge. Lifting Tony by his arm and it was purely instinct that had him leading Tony outta the lab with supporting hands. The moment he caught himself with a palm over Tony's lower back, it quickly shot off. Not Bucky.

It was just that he'd helped Bucky off the ground so many times that Steve was used to being close and physical and...he and Tony may be in agreement now, but they weren't ever gonna be comfortable in the way that he and Buck were. Steve was probably never gonna be that comfortable with anyone again.

He shook off the thought, turning back to the mission at hand. As much as he'd love to wallow in misery about Barnes, he had a helicarrier to save and maybe after that, a world to save too.

~~~

The arguing didn't miraculously cease after that, but it lessened. Steve managed to help, make himself useful. There wasn't exactly trust between them yet, but there was mutual agreement.

And there was depth too: Steve realized that maybe Tony had a lot more going on than he'd initially realized. Natasha, too. Even Thor turned out more complex than initial appearances.

It took another semi-fight with Stark before Steve saw the depth, but once he did it was so obvious he scolded himself for not seeing it sooner.

"Sometimes there isn't a way out, Tony." Steve knew first hand that there wasn't always a way out. Even transformed into a superhero with the world placed in your palm, there still wasn't always a way out. People still died. People still fell.

"Right," Tony'd scoffed, turning to walk away from the conversation and the reality of Coulson's death. "How did that work for him?"

"Is this the first time you've lost a soldier?" Steve asked. The puppet-string snapped and Stark spun around, eyes on fire as the mask shattered, only a hell of a lot louder than last time.

"We are not soldiers! I am not marching to Fury's fife!"

Wow. There was a lot of story behind that. A lot. More than a soft spot - a crippling weakness. Tony had a major issue with the soldier ideal. Which was really strange, considering that his father had been best friends with soldiers--

Unless maybe that...? It could be something about Howard. Clearly Howard hadn't been the best father, based on Tony's attitude alone. Steve made a mental note to ask Natasha about Howard and Tony's relationship later.
It would open wonders into the locked doors of why Tony was such an asshole.

With Natasha, there was no pissed outburst to reveal her softer side. In fact, it was the opposite. Shocked quiet, emotional eyes, scared calm--

Just after his conversation with Stark, Steve went to the infirmary to ask Natasha on the mission. She'd been sitting in near reverie, unprepared and strangely unguarded at his entrance.

"Time to go," Steve'd told her. She didn't sneer at the command, but she didn't listen to him unbidingly either.

"Go where?" She inquired, still...off. Steve furrowed his eyebrows, trying to source the change.

"I'll tell you on the way. Can you fly one of those jets?"

And Steve finally met Clint. He walked outta the bathroom, looking at Steve with calm eyes while Natasha looked at Clint with torn ones.

"I can," Barton interjected, assured. Steve looked back to Natasha and she nodded, attesting Barton's loyalty rested with them now.

There was Natasha's weakness: Steve'd seen the way she'd been earlier when someone'd mentioned Agent Barton, but he hadn't known why. Well, he still didn't know why exactly, but clearly Barton made Romanoff emotional and that was a hell of a lot more than anyone else could say.

So he met Clint and got to understand Natasha in the same moment. Plus they had a pilot now.

(Yes, obviously Steve could fly jets, he'd flown a plane. But considering he'd also crashed that plane on purpose, he wasn't exactly looking forward to getting in a cockpit anytime soon.)

"You got a suit?" He asked bluntly, because there were some things about the new century he could get on board with but the sidestepping and circle-dancing delicate words everyone used was not one of them.

"Yeah."

"Then suit up." And they'd both listened to that command. Maybe they'd all come a long way; funny how Steve didn't consider questioning Natasha's judgement now. Maybe it was the circumstances, or maybe that's how it was gonna be.

His faith in their ability as a team wasn't fully restored, but. Maybe they really could do this. They all had something uniting them now, in Phil Coulson.

They had something to avenge. Steve knew all about avenging somebody's death - how much strength that could give you.

So when they all were standing in the middle of the street in New York and Natasha asked the question, "How do we do this?" He finally had the answer.

"As a team," Steve told them.

Maybe it wasn't a backalley in Brooklyn or the freezing cold European countryside and maybe Steve didn't have his Howling Commandos behind him or Bucky Barnes on his six, but he was still Steve Rogers. And he was a leader.

And now it was Steve's turn to prove himself again. Right, cause you got nothing to prove: the veneer Bucky’d always seen through. And best of all, the one he’d pegged as the most reluctant to let him lead was the one who gave him the privilege.

"Call it, Cap," Tony drifted over the coms. Captain America was back, and Steve Rogers got to save the world again, unofficial CO to a team that needed him.

"Alright, listen up. Until we can close that portal up there, we're gonna use containment. Barton, I want you on that roof, eyes on everything. Call out patterns and strays. Stark, you got the perimeter. Anything gets more than three blocks out, you turn it back or you turn it to ash."

Steve paused as Stark picked Barton up, soaring through the air to deposit him on a rooftop. Barton would be their sniper, one'a the best shots alive. He wondered what Bucky would think, no longer having to complain about climbing all those sets of stairs (or trees) to get to his post. And for the first time since he'd woken, Steve found himself smiling at the memory of Bucky instead of wanting to cry.

He'd probably think all Steve's new friends were crazy, but that would be alright. They'd love Bucky, if they knew him. Everybody did. The pang of sadness struck, but it didn't knock Steve over this time. Bucky was gone, but Steve was commanding again, fighting again, saving lives again.

Sergeant Barnes woulda been proud 'a you, Cap. And his new team was gonna be, too.

"Thor, you've gotta try and bottleneck that portal. Slow 'em down. You've got the lightning. Light the bastards up." Thor nodded once and took off as Steve turned to Natasha. "You and me, we stay here on the ground, keep the fighting here. And Hulk?" Banner turned, awaiting his command. They trusted him, every one of them. With this, at least. It was all Steve would ask for.

And so, feeling like himself for the first time since he'd woken defrosted, Steve Rogers felt exactly like himself, and he gave the goddamn command.

"Smash."

~~~

The Avengers: a team. A team who won.

They were all surprised to find out how much they cared for Tony, in the moment they'd thought they lost him. Watching the empty portal bubbled anticipation and regret in his stomach, but Steve'd eventually made the hard call, told Natasha to close it anyways.

That was the fun part of commanding. All the hard calls and deaths were on you, all the blood on your hands.

But then Tony'd come crashing down and Bruce had jumped to save him and Thor had ripped off his faceplate in a hurry to help him and even Steve had been hovering, hand over the glowing light on Steve's chest as he held his breath waiting for some sign of life.

Then Banner had yelled, so loud it startled Tony awake and Steve deflated with relief, a genuine smile on his face for the first time in a month. (With 70 years somewhere in between.)

"What the hell? What just happened? Please tell me nobody kissed me," Tony groaned, startled but undoubtedly also relieved to find out he wasn't dead.

What just happened? They were a team, they'd saved the world. From aliens, which was strange, but Steve was learning new things all the time.
He was a soldier, used to the roughened roads of war. The dirt on his face was the most familiar thing he'd felt in this century. The bleeding wounds and various aches were the first physical comfort since the 1940s. He was soldier, and he was where he belonged, only this time? This time the outcome was a little different.

"We won," Steve breathed, two words he'd never gotten to say in 1945. It tasted as sweet on his tongue as he'd always thought it would.

But Bucky wasn't here to say them with him. Steve went quiet, letting that thought sink in. It was the end, victory, and the only thing he wanted was to share it with that sharp laugh, that little head shake, that warm hand clapping Steve's shoulder.

"Alright. Hey. Alright. Good job, guys. Let's just not come in tomorrow. Let's just take a day. Have you ever tried shawarma? There's a shawarma joint about two blocks from here. I don't know what it is, but I wanna try it."

Shawarma turned out to be better than it sounded, but they were all too exhausted to say as much as a single word the whole time. Which was fine; sitting there at a table in a restaurant was something Steve knew, something else from the past that gotta be part of the future too.

The silence was comforting, the company even more so. They sure as hell weren't the Howling Commandos, but they weren't any less than them either. Just...different. Steve was gonna be getting used to a lot of different.

He was almost looking forward to it.

~~~

The post-victory high lasted for longer than he thought it would. They sent the weapon that'd killed Bucky and the man who'd killed Agent Coulson back to Asgard. Steve had a new set of allies, maybe even friends.

And when the whole thing was over he rode away on his Harley with a smile on his face.

Four days later and he was in the gym again, fists back to pounding plastic punching bags, memories tugging his mind again. What else was he supposed to do?

Natasha showed up at his door a week later.

"Hey. I know you're not okay, so you can either invite me in and we can talk about it or you can pack your things and get in the car." One red-brown eyebrow arched in the dim lighting of the hallway outside his apartment, an expression as blunt as the words. Finally.

Steve blinked at her.

"Well?" she crossed her arms and Steve was still standing in his doorway, hand on the painted wood frame.

"Maybe both?"

The slightest smile perked up on the side of Natasha's face, then she was pushing past him into the lonely, empty apartment, taking stock of everything with curious eyes as she spoke.

"Yeah, okay. So pack, then we talk on the road. Actually, you talk, I listen and tell you when you're being an idiot which is probably a lot of the time." She rifled through the magazines on Steve's
"You like this with all the people you've just met?" Steve called over his shoulder, stuffing his meager belongings in the bag as Natasha wandered around the soon-to-be-ditched apartment.

"We saved the world together. Besides, you're not as stuck up as I thought you'd be."

"Thanks," Steve responded dryly, although he was actually a little proud Natasha approved of him in her sharp, raised eyebrow sorta way.

She offered him a smile as he came back out, grabbing the pile of folders off his table and the clipboard of drawings to complete his packing. Then they were both headed down the outside stairs without ceremony, apartment already forgotten behind as they hit the curb. Natasha opened the back door to a bubble-looking car and Steve tossed in his duffle, climbing into shotgun as she started the engine. And then they were off, whipping fast as Steve watched the blurring lights of New York streak past the window.

"Where are we going?"

"I figured that you've got more goin' on that you're letting on, and I can't imagine how staying in New York would help any of that." Natasha glanced slyly at him, words bold as she watched his face for a reaction. "They might as well have forced you to live in Azzano."

Well if she'd wanted a reaction she got one; Steve flinched like the devil and averted his eyes. She'd read his file then, at least. Good, he wouldn't hafta explain stories he didn't wanna think about.

"Okay, but where are we going?" Steve shifted in his seat, eyes catching automatically on Liberty Island in the distance. He was kinda surprised at himself that he wasn't protesting leaving New York. Maybe he'd been considering it anyways. He'd told the Commandos so, once:

I'm not going back to Brooklyn. You're talking about going home and Brooklyn isn't home if Bucky isn't there.

"What better place for America's Sweetheart than the capital?" Natasha offered, tipped head waiting for a legitimate agreement or veto. Steve raised his eyebrows but nodded, turning to look over the night sky of New York City as it passed by a final time.

"District of Columbia works for me."

"People just call it D.C, so you know."

"Right. Any other things I should know?"

"Hell of a lot more than I can teach you," she snorted. Steve huffed in agreement and Natasha drummed fingers on the steering wheel, soft sound echoing throughout the car. "So how about you start by telling me what's got you acting like the world's saddest national icon?"

"You mean besides the culture shock everyone seems so worried about?" He quirked a smile and she made a little triumphant sound.

"Yes, exactly. I knew it wasn't the whole future thing that was messing you up."

"It's not. I mean, it's a factor, and it's definitely not easy. But um. It's not the. Y'know, changes that suck as much as that...it's that I don't get to share them with. The people I..."
Left behind.

Natasha arched an eyebrow, waiting for him to finish but Steve just trailed off and she nodded slightly, silence settling in the empty space for a moment, two, before Natasha finally leaned over and filled it. "Special lady back in the war?"

Steve sighed, staring out the window. "I don't really wanna talk about it."

Now wasn't the time to spurt off stories and explain how he'd never gotten to tell the love of his life he loved him because he'd been the one to kill him before he'd realized that maybe Bucky had a right to know. Not an easy story to just. Tell, let alone relive. Natasha was kind enough to drag him outta New York and give him an excuse to stop actively avoiding Brooklyn or any of the bridges going there, she didn't deserve getting bled all over with his stories and sorrow.

Steve would rather bleed to death inside.

"Alright, fair. So you're lonely. And now that we saved the world from aliens, I'll bet you're bored, too. You know, I was in a place like that once, and somebody offered me an out." That sounded suspicious coming from an assassin, but Steve nodded to show he was listening.

"Look, not saying you have to, but SHIELD has actually done a lot for me. A lot for most of us. I know you didn't get off to the best start, but the organization's saved a lot of lives. I've got paperwork if you want details, but basically you go on missions, save the world from terrorism, stop wars before they start. It might be a good place for you. And it's always helpful to have something to do."

"I'll think about it," Steve told her.

Which is how, two weeks later, he and Natasha were on their way to his first mission as an unofficial SHIELD agent. He went through training but refused the badge; he wasn't a spy, he was an army captain. Besides, Agent Rogers didn't fit him. Like, at all.

So he kept the Captain but got the job, starting to ease his way back into the world.

June went by in a flurry of paperwork, hiding from the past, and a scattering of SHIELD missions. July 4th snuck around the corner and hit him square in the chest like the star was a three ringed target instead.

He'd had only one rememberable birthday without Bucky at his side - the month after Bucky'd shipped out. It'd been wickedly lonely, just him and a hotel room with nothing but a new unfamiliar body and a yearning for the life Bucky was living without him overseas and he may or may not've teared up as the first fireworks went off.

The next year the Commandos had all made a night of it, staying up to tell stories around the campfire. Bucky'd leaned over at one point, regretful smile on his face as he whispered in Steve's ear. "All these explosions sure don't make you miss the fireworks, huh?" Steve'd thrown his arm over those blue shoulders, tucking his best friend into his side the way Bucky used to do for him. Bucky just said things like that sometimes, things that made the whole war seem extremely terrible in a way that was so real Steve couldn't bear it.

Bucky'd laughed and tried to wiggle free, the way he always did when Steve copied something predominantly Bucky's signature. Most times though, the dynamic between them didn't change and Bucky was still the one tugging Steve down with an arm around his neck.

There was no Bucky to make comments about the bombs ruining the magic of fireworks this year, but it didn't matter. They were ruined anyways.
Steve was all for celebrating America's birthday, but he couldn't bring himself to go to the July Fourth event Tony'd invited him to. He wanted to be alone, in his apartment, without having to placate the pretense of being fine.

He was okay, really. Doing better than before. Just, some nights he couldn't pretend and he wasn't okay, not at all. His birthday happened to be one of those nights.

Natasha called, invited him to go get wasted with her - not an option, even if he wanted to - but he politely declined. As much as he'd love the enlightenment of whatever Romanoff wisdom she wanted to share, his apartment in DC made a lot better proposition of loneliness and staring out the window drawing and imagining Bucky was just on his way home from the docks.

As much as he liked the new apartment SHIELD got him in DC, it wasn't home. Steve hadn't stopped searching for a home, but he didn't think he'd find one anytime soon. So he drew them instead, New York skylines and the bridges of Brooklyn and Buck's pretty face and the army tents they'd share and the cold winter nights of the 1940s.

The fireworks went off outside, loud crashes and whistles and sparkling sounds and flashing colors of light. Steve tried not to think of bombs, of explosions and fires and bullet wounds and bloody days fearing for the lives of his men and the people he'd yet to save and fearing the fate of his country, of every country he set foot in.

Night folded around him like a box instead of a blanket, trapping him under the starry sky, smoke drifting over bright lights and smothering bright blue with distant flashes of red. He sat on a chair by the window until he couldn't stand the sight of smoke anymore and closed the blinds.

It was times like this he couldn't handle it, times like this he wished he'd never been dragged off ice. He didn't belong here.

With a sigh Steve snagged his iPod from the kitchen counter, untangling his headphones as he strode to the armchair in his living room. He'd been working backwards through the decades he'd missed, listening to a bit of everything. You could learn a lot about a time period by its music.

But tonight he didn't care about the world he lived in now, only the one from then. He didn't have the willpower to listen to the songs Bucky used to sing, the songs the Commandos used to sing, but there were a few from the forties that didn't knock him flat.

So he put up his feet on one couch armrest, head on the other, tucked in headphones and closed his eyes, letting the music wash over him and the memories tug him back.

Like all memories from Brooklyn nights, the scene started out golden. The lights were that way, the world was that way, the happy smile turning to him was that way.

"The whole world's celebratin' you today, Stevie," Bucky beamed and threw his arm around the back of Steve's shoulder, pulling him tight to Bucky's side as they strolled down the sidewalk. Steve rolled his eyes, self-consciously brushing bangs from his forehead.

"We're celebrating America, Buck." Those icy eyes looked like caramel in the streetlights as Bucky rolled them, nodding cheekily at a gaggle of girls that giggled as they passed.

"Nope, just you. What do you say we stop for ice cream?"

Steve smiled and poked Bucky in the ribs. "No teasing. You know we can't afford that."

Bucky just shrugged, golden smile spread impossibly wider. "I've been savin' up."
"You--how...no, Bucky, we couldn't--"

"Oh we so can. And we're going to. Right. Now." And Bucky was dragging him into that diner on the water, beaming like the moon while Steve stared at him with unfiltered 15 year old awe. Bucky ordered the smallest vanilla with sprinkles on top and they sat in a booth overlooking the East River, splitting the treat between them.

"This is perfect, Buck. Best birthday gift ever." Steve lit up, grateful, and Bucky ducked his head, almost bashful.

"I actually. Uh. Got you something else." He reached into his inner jacket pocket before pausing, looking up with an exaggeratedly serious expression. "And you're not allowed to not take it."

Steve tapped his feet against Bucky's shin, telling him to hurry up. With another nervous huff, Bucky pulled out a little brown book and slid it quickly across the table. Steve picked it up and flipped open to the title page, expecting a science-fiction novel or something. It was blank.

"Buck, is this..."

"It's for the greater good," Bucky interjected hurriedly. "Because there'll be no more goddamn napkins left in the world at the rate you're using them up."

He only blinked, rifling slowly through the blank pages. "I draw on stray papers and the backs of posters too," Steve said softly, his voice kinda floating because his head couldn't quite process that Bucky'd gotten him an official artist's tool.

"But now you can keep 'em all in one place." Bucky shrugged again, fingers worrying at the edge of a napkin.

"I- thank you so much, Bucky." Steve looked up, eyes just shy of damp with sincerity, and Bucky met his gaze this time, nervousness slipping away.

His pretty mouth curved up and he nodded, the harbor reflecting exploding red'n'blue beside them. "You're welcome, Steve."

The night'd been simple, but purely magic, Steve's first real sketchbook curled in his hands, watching beautiful paint explosions over and under them, not wanting to be anywhere else in the world.

Now the only explosions Steve saw behind his eyes were blue ones, knocking a shield out of precious hands, flying a body out of devilish trains. Always the same, always that train.

The best thing about D.C. was the lack of looping subways and automatic-train-rails. When Steve'd been in New York, he forcefully took them, couldn't be haunted. (Couldn't so much as look at a real train without shaking, but the sleek silent imitations only made him tear up.)

If he kept doing things that hurt, maybe eventually it'd stop hurting. Pretending he was okay enough that he convinced himself it was the truth. Fake it til you make it.

On his birthday, he couldn't fake anything, not when the day was so integrated into the memory Bucky. Eventually, golden memories faded, music drifting hollow.

It wasn't until midnight that he rolled off the couch, pressed his back against the bottom of it and cried himself into restless sleep.

So there were bad days.
Random ones too, days with no meaning on a calendar but regardless shook him to the core. Waking up miserable, unable to leave for his morning run, let alone face the world. Walking wounded.

Exercise was the only way he kept his head. Patterns were easy, fall into the drone and forget about the world. Running+punching+practicing gymnastics = forget how he woke up screaming Bucky's name at least twice this week.

The nightmares were always changing, but there was one that kept repeating randomly for months. It started out like a memory: the Commandos in the woods in Germany, running away from a city with a blown-up cathedral, and Steve was carrying Bucky in his arms. They crossed over rocky ground, soft pained noises escaping Buck's pale lips until they finally found a place to set him down and tend to the bullet in his leg.

Except in the nightmare, Falsworth couldn't stitch it up. In the nightmare, it was too late. When Steve cupped Bucky's face in his hands, whispered to him not to scream, Bucky's eyes would start to fog over.

He's lost too much blood, Jones whispered behind him. The crushing weight of those words hit like an avalanche and Steve ran fingertips over Bucky's cheeks, trying to push color back into his white face.

No no no. You aren't leaving me now. And Bucky would look up at Steve and he'd just fade. His eyes would turn to glass and his chest would stop rising and then he'd simply be dead. No big explosion or final words. Just there one moment, dead in Steve's arms the next. Nothing he could do.

And the worst part was how damn realistic it was. Bucky'd almost died on them that night; just barely survived. So when the dream took him, it felt real. It felt so terribly, horribly real that waking up was the reality-trip. The living room of his apartment was the dream, the war was reality.

Sometimes he wished that were true. Most days he'd rather be back in the war, if he was honest with himself. People were dying then, but at least Bucky'd been by his side.

Once, when she'd picked him up from a morning run, Natasha asked him what he was running from. He told her it didn't matter; it was something he'd never outrun.

So what if he dreamed Bucky was alive. So what if he never told Bucky he loved him. So what if no one could ever know what was eating him up from the inside out. So what if the world'd shifted around him and it still hadn't changed enough. Because even after all these years, all these decades, the world hadn't altered enough and hadn't dimmed enough and Steve's heart was still telling him that Bucky was alive.

It was sickening, really, that he couldn't let it go. He was more sure now than ever of Bucky's death and yet his body kept telling him its other half was out there somewhere. And he hated himself for that.

That was the darkest the thoughts really went, though. He wouldn't let himself stray darker, and he did the damned best he could to limit the thoughts about Bucky and the Commandos.

He couldn't live in the past when he had the future to embrace.

Natasha was constantly dragging him outta the rut too, always sending him stumbling in the direction of pretty, available girls. Like that would actually be a solution to his problem. To be fair, he'd admitted he was lonely. Natasha drew the rational conclusion.

So he went on a few (four) of the coffee dates, although really only so Natasha would shut up for a week. Most of them ended with Steve apologizing, giving awkward smiles, and waving goodbye. One of them ended in a kiss on the cheek but Steve'd just blinked in surprise, apologized for not being 'ready' interested for a relationship, and awkwardly walked away.

Making friends wasn't as terrible, but the only people Steve talked to were the SHIELD teams. He was "Captain America" to everyone else (actually, even to them) and he wasn't interested in a friendship with someone who only cared about the side of him that shot aliens in New York.

Then a couple of months after working for SHIELD, Steve was out on his morning run when he passed another runner. And then he passed him again. And again.

"On your left," Steve huffed out as sprinted past the guy.

"Aw c'mon!" The guy finally shouted, pushing harder to see if he could catch up. Obviously, he couldn't. But Steve rounded back to the tree to meet him after the lap anyways. It never hurt to try and make a friend.

At first it'd been simple, two guys shaking hands. Then it turned out Sam knew he was Captain America, which he admittedly handled way better than most, but he still asked that one question that everyone was always asking.

"Must have freaked you out, coming home after the whole defrostin' thing." Sam was totally nonchalant about it, but Steve still sighed internally. Of course. The only thing anyone ever wanted to talk to him about: the seventy year time gap.

"Takes some gettin' used to. It's good to meet you, Sam." Steve didn't really intend to be dismissive, but he also didn't want to spoil his morning with another hundred explanations. It was just that the "defrosting thing" all anyone asked him about. Steve wished someone would ask him what he thought of the weather, the current state of the union, the healthcare reform bill, anything. Anything but that.

So Steve was walking away from another potential-friend-gone-sideways when Sam's voice called out again behind him.

"It's your bed, right?"

"What's that?" Steve asked, turning around and raising his eyebrows. He wasn't quite sure what Sam had said, but he'd heard the word bed and that was a bit forward, no matter what century you're in. Right? He was fairly sure right.

"Your bed. It's too soft," Sam clarified. "When I was over there I'd sleep on the ground, use rock for pillows like a caveman. Now I'm home lyin in my bed and it's like..."

"Lyin' on a marshmallow, feel like I'm gonna sink right to the floor," Steve finished for him. Man, did he understand that. Even in the few months since the Battle of New York, Steve still hadn't quite conquered sleeping on the thing. On bad nights it was the floor, other times he could brave the couch. But he really couldn't do the bed yet.

Clearly, he and Sam had a little more in common than he thought. And, maybe, Sam was interested in more than Captain America. Sam wanted to know about the soldier; only the hero. Sam really must know something about war if he was asking questions like that.

"How long?" Steve asked him, his attention officially caught.
"Two tours. You must miss the good old days, huh?" This time it didn't sound like a Captain America thing, it sounded like a soldier to soldier talking about two different wars they fought in. For probably the first time since he'd gotten back, Steve didn't really mind the question.

"Well. Things aren't so bad. Food's a lot better, we used to boil everything. No polio's good... Internet. So helpful. Been reading that a lot, tryin' to catch up." He still remembered the days back when he'd get their only pot out and heat up water, ready to boil whatever Bucky brought home. Which, somehow, was always something.

Then there were the meals they'd split during the war, Steve stealing half of Bucky's the way he always did. And then making Bucky eat half of his own so that Bucky didn't starve himself, because he would. Not because he wanted to (Steve was fairly sure), but because he wanted Steve to eat more than he wanted to feed himself. Selfless bastard.

"--vin Gaye, 1972 Troubleman soundtrack - everything you missed, jammed into one album." Sam was telling him. Steve smiled gratefully, digging his notebook out of his pocket.

"I'll put it on the list." Steve hadn't caught the first part (he hadn't spaced out for long though, thankfully), so he wrote down Troubleman on the tiny lines before tucking it back in his pocket. His cell chose that moment to beep an incoming text and Steve unlocked the screen, opening up Natasha's message, smiley face and all.

"Alright Sam. Duty calls. Thanks for the run." Steve stuck out his hand, shook as Sam smiled widely at him. And okay, they'd just met, but if there was a chance of being friends, Steve did it to all his friends and he couldn't just not..."If that's what you wanna call running."

"Aw, that's how it is?" Sam shook his head and Steve smiled, glad to see someone who could joke back.

"Oh that's how it is," he confirmed. Sam nodded, a wide smile that took up his entire face. Steve liked people who could smile like that, no holding back. He returned the smile, even though he didn't smile that wide anymore.

"Anytime you wanna stop by the VA, make me look awesome in front of the girl at the front desk, just lemme know."

"I'll keep it in mind," Steve told him. He might, because maybe he could use a new person to talk to. Natasha was great, but Steve had to be alright around her. She knew he was hurting, but she was too detached to ask why.

It didn't matter, Steve wouldn't tell if she did. This was Steve's burden to carry, not hers. Not anyone's. He had a team and a job and a purpose and a position, a few friends and an apartment that did everything it needed to.

But he couldn't shake the feeling that every night was lonely and cold.

The hurricane I'll never outrun.

~~~

"You do anything fun Saturday night?" Natasha asked, strapping on her parachute. Steve adjusted the comm in his ear, smiling to himself at her constant pestering. If he didn't joke about it, the damage would be too heavy to take.

"Well. All the guys from my barbershop quartet are dead, so no. Not really." Steve turned the smile on Natasha and she looked away with a little grin of her own.

She had no idea how true that statement was. The Howling Commandos - professional barbershop quartet.

Technically, it's not a quartet if there's more than four people, Bucky complained.

Fine, a septet then. I think Barnes thinks we don't have it in us. What do you say boys? Should we prove him wrong?

Steve could drown in those memories, in the promises of you are my sunshine and 'Til Then. No matter when it will be...

"You know, if you ask Kristin out from Statistics she'd probably say yes," Natasha shouted to him over the sound of the rushing (freezing) wind. Steve tuned back in, shaking off the ice tugging his peripherals. Reality was colder than all of those memories.

"That's why I don't ask," Steve shouted back.

"Too shy or too scared?" Natasha's knowing smirk was louder than the wind, louder than the plane engine, and Steve wanted to respond something he never would. Instead he shouted "Too busy--!" And jumped from the plane, filling in --pining over my dead best friend as he soared down to greet the equally freezing water.

~~~

Steve Rogers was built on beliefs, upheld by the statements he held true in his heart. The foremost: he only wanted to do what was right. A second truth: half his soul was nestled in the body of a Brooklyn sniper and he was hollow without it.

As if hollow wasn't enough, the thing that shaped him was falling apart too - he wasn't honoring a death anymore, wasn't honoring a memory, wasn't honoring anything because Steve wasn't so sure about the first truth anymore. Was he still doing the right thing?

Peggy told him they'd rather mucked up the world. He told her out loud he didn't agree, but she knew what he meant.

She knew most everything, honestly. The first time she'd seen him (the actual first time, not all of the Alzheimer's-induced ones since), this look had crossed her face that he'd never be able to describe. Relief, amazement, shock, guilt, disbelief, a thousand others.

After the initial reaction had settled down, she'd asked him how he was doing. He said fine, of course, but this was still Peggy. She scolded him and weaseled a much more sincere answer out of him.

"I miss Bucky. I miss them all, really." Her eyes had softened and Steve looked down at the clasped hands in his lap. "I can't help but wish Buck were here with me."

Her breath caught in her throat and Steve looked up seconds after the flicker of terrified recognition disappeared from her features. ((She could never tell him. Either one of the two secrets. She wished more than anything that she could. She’d been forgetting plenty lately, but she’d never forget the look on Sergeant Barnes' face when he shouted those four words. I loved him first. The haunted chill in Howard's voice as he whispered a metal arm. Steve had more than the right to know. And it killed her, because Peggy couldn't be the one to tell him. But she'd been given another chance to keep him safe; she couldn't fuck that up.))

But, as always, she knew exactly the right thing to say. Keeping Steve believing in himself and his own judgement, but making him question the world around him too.

Is that all you could be? A lab rat or a dancing monkey?

He went to Sam, too, at the VA’s office. Maybe something that might be good for him, a friendship with someone who wasn't expecting a hero; who understood that all along - since the very first fight - Steve had always just been a soldier.

And of course, the added benefit that Sam was a vet therapist. Which meant he didn't only understand Steve, he knew what to say to make the world seem a little better. During his visit Steve caught the tail end of a therapy session, listening in quiet reverie to the stories.

"That's pretty intense stuff," Steve told him, finding Sam after. Sam'd nodded, still in that rational tone that made you wanna listen.

"Yeah, brother. We've all got the same problems. Guilt. Regret." Well Steve certainly knew all about those two.

"You lose someone?" He asked, because that's what Steve felt guilty about. It wasn't a generic question because obviously, fellow soldiers died. It was war. The "someone" was a little more specific than that, and Sam knew exactly what Steve meant by it. Someone special, someone important. Someone whose life was so integrated into your own that you changed when they weren't there anymore.

"My wingman," Sam told him. Me too, Steve thought. The story was terrible, just as bad as the one that played on repeat behind Steve's eyelids. Nothin' I could do. It's like I was up there just to watch [him die].

Die and die and.

"I'm sorry," Steve said. It wasn't enough. I feel that every day, he didn't say. He couldn't say.

"After that I had a really hard time finding a reason to be over there. You know?"

Did he know? It was all he knew. But how was he supposed to tell this man - a new friend, a fellow soldier - that the famous Captain America lost his mind after he lost his best friend? How could he possibly tell Sam that in the end, Steve had chosen to die too? How could he ever admit that?

After Bucky's death, it wasn't just that Steve had a really hard time finding a reason to be over there. He had a really hard time finding a reason to be alive.

He deflected the question, looking away as a flicker of hurt crossed his features, uncomfortably shifting his weight and changing the topic. Kinda.

"Are you happy now? Back in the world?"

Sam was. And then he asked Steve a much harder question than Are you happy? No. Instead, Sam said,

"What makes you happy?"
Steve used to have a hundred responses to that. Now? He just told Sam the truth.

"I don't know."

He didn't have the answer to that question anymore. He'd lost it back in 1945, the same time he'd lost everything. It wasn't an exaggeration when Steve said his world ended that day. It had.

But, once upon a time, someone used to make him happy. Someone used to have the answers, too. Someone used to make Steve sure of himself, sure that despite the teasing and the saving and the bitching and the cleaning of Steve's wounds, someone was proud that Steve always tried to do what was right.

He needed that someone now.

Which was how he ended up (finally) standing in front of a glass panel in the Smithsonian - A Fallen Comrade - baseball cap pulled tight over his head and hands shoved in pockets to keep himself from reaching out to touch. His fingertips didn't want the reminder of the cold, dead smoothness of the glass. The same cold dead way Steve'd left Bucky down in that ravine.

"Best friends since childhood, Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield..."

It was nothing like the drawings Steve had tucked in his wallet. It was nothing like the flashes of memories and dreams always playing in his head. The exhibit and the videos were real, a physical embodiment, a moving picture in front of him. This was more than remembered lines on paper, this was...

This was Bucky Barnes, memorialized and beautiful and laughing, eyes crinkling and shoulders shaking as he glanced at Steve, the screen in clear black and white, starkly contrasted to the color-version in his memory.

He knew exactly what Bucky was laughing at right there. He could remember that conversation as clearly as if it were yesterday. And they'd captured it, that beautiful light had somehow survived all these years apart.

"...Barnes is the only Howling Commando to give his life in service of his country."

Steve stayed longer at the exhibit than he should have.

Tears ate at his eyes as he numbly walked out the building, zipped his Harley down unfamiliar streets.

He rode until the wind took his tears away.

He asked out his neighbor in the hallway when he got home.

The relief that rushed through him when she said no made him feel absolutely terrible.

He snuck in through the window of his apartment, wondering if that laughing beautiful face from the museum today felt this way every time he crawled in through Steve's window when they were kids.

Fury was sitting in the armchair that doubled as Steve's bed sometimes.

Three perfect sniper shots came through the wall and Steve's entire world was shifted in that moment, and he had no idea yet.
Steve looked out the window, calculated the distance, and told his neighbor those words that would change everything.

"Tell them I'm in pursuit."

He'd been in plenty of fights since he'd woken, plenty of fights since the serum, plenty of fights through the course of his life. Steve trained and trained and worked out all his hate and anger and sorrow on punching bags and gymnastic courses and running and for the first time, he honestly might not be running fast enough.

His legs were pumping strong as they could, pounding the ground over and over as he slid around corners and jumped through windows and dented walls and busted through doors and hurdled over gaps and somehow the sniper was still ahead of him, somehow Steve hadn't caught him yet.

The figure finally came into sight, a rooftop and Steve swung back his arm without a single thought and hurled his shield at the escaping assassin. It whistled through the air, dead set on its target, moving fast enough that it actually might behead the guy.

Just before the shield could slice, a dancing spin and a loud metallic clank echoed over the rooftops, stopping Steve's heart. He stared, blood pounding in his ears as his brain absorbed the picture like a camera flash, instantly snapping every detail into perfect clarity in his memory.

Black soot smudged around eyes, a black mask covering the lower half of the man's face, wild strands of long hair obscuring details, a black combat suit and at least two guns from what Steve could see. And then: the metal arm. A shining, silver, unmistakable thing, metal fingers wrapped deftly around the edge of his shield.

The shield looked like merely an extension of the metal arm - and by the way the sniper swung his body and flung the shield right back in Steve's direction, it acted like it too. The surprise at the amount of control the sniper had over the shield was enough to make Steve nearly miss catching it back. His torso took most of the impact and his body skid back at least a few feet from the strength of the throw.

What the hell.

Not only had Steve's toss not even made the sniper budge an inch, he'd thrown it back harder. Steve slid when he caught it, nothing like the clanking epic stop from the metal arm.

It wasn't possible. Steve probably could've thrown a little harder if he hadn't been so hurried, but still. The sniper was...inhumanly strong. And inhumanly fast.

And now, inhumanly gone.

Steve stood on the edge of the rooftop, peering into the night. Entirely vanished, not a single sound or trace of a direction. All in the few seconds Steve'd looked down from catching his shield. Disappeared into thin air.

They had a problem on their hands.

~~~

"I know who killed Fury." Well that made Steve shut up. He raised his eyebrows at Natasha, waiting for her to go on. She looked extremely reluctant, almost... scared, in a way. Smaller, younger than he could ever remember seeing her. Which could be because he was crowding her against a wall, but he'd bet on the horror story.
"Most of the intelligence community doesn't believe he exists." Natasha's eyes darted around, wary like the words alone would bring wrath. "Those that do call him the Winter Soldier. He's credited with over two dozen assassinations in the last fifty years."

"So he's a ghost story." It did sound a little terrifying, but that didn't explain Natasha's reaction, she wasn't the type to beware the boogeyman. Steve's face must've said so, because Natasha gave him a serious look and elaborated.

"Five years ago I was escorting a nuclear engineer out of Iran, somebody shot out my tires near Odessa. We lost control, went straight over a cliff. I pulled us out. But the Winter Soldier was there. I was covering my engineer so he shot him-" Natasha lifted the corner of her shirt. "-straight through me. Soviet slug, no rifling. Bye bye bikinis."

"Yeah, I bet you look terrible in 'em now." Steve gave her an unimpressed look and Natasha only blinked. There was a gravity in her words, making Steve think back to the metal arm, the power that had rippled through the sniper's body as he flung Steve's shield back at him.

Apparently she could read his thoughts too, because she made an unimpressed sound, catching Steve's attention again.

"Going after him's a dead end. I know, I've tried." This was going to be a hell of a lot harder than he thought it'd be. He'd never imagined Natasha saying the words dead end. "Like you said, he's a ghost story."

A ghost. Like Steve wasn't haunted enough already. But at least this ghost was real, at least this ghost wasn't Bucky Barnes lingering in every one of Steve's dreams, the subject of every one of his nightmares. At least this ghost, Steve could take down.

"Well, let's find out what the ghost wants."

~~~

"Where did Captain America learn how to steal a car?"

"Nazi, Germany. And we're borrowing, take your feet off the dash."

A small smile curved up on Natasha's face as she brought her feet down where they belonged. Steve looked back to the road, watching the landscape slide by and trying to make his brain shut up.

Bucky'd thought it was hilarious the first time Steve had to steal a car, had given him shit the whole time he'd been hot-wiring it. Of course, the teasing was whispered and Bucky had been holding a sniper rifle over Steve's shoulder while he worked, but it had still been a moment with Bucky smiling and any moment like that kept haunting Steve's memory, over and over.

He was grateful when Natasha spoke again, although after hearing what she had to say, decided to take back that gratitude.

"Alright, I have a question for you. Which you do not have to answer. I feel like if you don't answer it though, you're kind of answering it--"

"What?" Steve interrupted, turning to look at her.

"Was that your first kiss since 1945?" Natasha had a wicked grin on her face and Steve thought back to the blonde girl he'd taken on that date, the kiss that'd landed on his cheek. Well, it was kinda more like the corner of his mouth, actually. Mostly.
"That bad, huh?" He turned back to look out over the road, his voice lighthearted in the way that a smiling Natasha could always make it.

"I didn't say that!"

"Well it kinda sounds like that's what you're saying."

"No, I didn't- I just wondered how much practice you've had."

"You don't need practice-"

"Everybody needs practice."

"It was not my first kiss since 1945," Steve finally relented, because technically it wasn't a lie. He'd been kissed. Almost on the lips. It counted. "I'm ninety five, I'm not dead."

"Nobody special though?" Natasha pressed, looking over at him again. Steve huffed a laugh. She had no idea.

"Believe it or not, it's kinda hard to find someone with shared life experience." Maybe that said something about him, how he had to share life experience with someone for them to be special. It was just that anyone he'd ever loved or had come close to loving had that.

Especially Bucky, whose entire life had basically been the same life experience as Steve's, except he was beautiful and strong where Steve was sick and small. They'd been through everything together, shared everything. Brooklyn, the war. Only now Steve was stuck in the future and who the hell else had been frozen in time - literally and figuratively - just to wake back up 70 years later?

"Oh, that's alright, you just make something up." Natasha shrugged and Steve glanced over. That was the whole thing. He didn't want to. Sometimes his life felt made up enough when it was the truth, he couldn't add more lies to that.

"What, like you?"

"I dunno, the truth is a matter of circumstances. It's not all things to all people all the time. And neither am I." She had a smile on her face but Steve knew enough about pretending to recognize a mask. There was a tear between just the two identities of Steve Rogers and Captain America, he couldn't imagine handling all the different ones Natasha had.

"That's a tough way to live," he told her, an ounce of sympathy, careful not to overstep. She did it for a reason, obviously, but that didn't make Steve hurt for her any less.

"It's a good way not to die, though."

There were a lot of good ways not to die. Better ways than that. But it wasn't like Steve knew half as much about not-dying as he did about almost-dying, or on one memorably freezing occasion, actually-dying.

His death was the only other thing besides Bucky that he had nightmares about. The freezing water pushing into his lungs, ice surrounding him on all sides, the water around him tinged with blood from the imploding glass of the crash.

But it'd all been worth it, because he'd saved the world. He'd stopped Hydra.

Until it turned out he hadn't.
Seeing Zola's face, hearing his voice again? The man that'd tortured his best friend, the man that'd given Bucky nightmares for a year, that'd taken Bucky's body from him and his own name from him and made him scream out for Steve in the middle of the night, that man was here.

"Your death amounts to ze same as your life."

"A zero sum."

He'd spent years controlling his temper, especially since the serum. He couldn't afford to think violently, couldn't afford to be pissed the way he did when thrown punches didn't hurt anyone. If he hadn't put a lid on his temper, Steve could've done serious damage by now. The strength of the serum mixed with the quick violence of his youth would've never worked.

He'd spent years making sure he didn't hurt anyone accidentally. Even people who deserved it, he was still careful. Tony Stark had insulted him, his company, his life, his best friend, and Steve had managed to keep it bottled in.

He'd spent years keeping it that way.

But that all went to hell the moment the words left Zola's mouth.

A zero sum.

Steve hurled back a fist and slammed it into the glass of the computer screen without thinking, spiderwebs instantly spitting out pieces of shattered green glass. All that time, all the emotions he'd kept locked down, they all flew out the door and for a split second Steve wasn't just dangerous, he was out of control.

The green face of Zola just reappeared on another screen and Steve tried to catch his breath, chest heaving from the adrenaline and anger coursing through his veins. He'd promised he wouldn't ever be violent without thinking. He'd promised and he was losing his grip on that and it was Arnim Zola's fault, the way everything shitty in Steve's life tended to be Arnim Zola's fault.

Zola'd tortured Steve's best friend, killed Steve's best friend, then proceeded to make sure that death was for nothing.

Bucky'd died for nothing. Steve'd died for nothing.

And Steve didn't even know half of what Zola'd done. Right now, he couldn't imagine hating him more. This time tomorrow, he'd have quite a different viewpoint.

The face mocked him, sneering, and it turned out Zola planned to kill Steve a second time. Because inadvertently giving Steve reason to kill himself the first time apparently wasn't enough.

"Admit it. It is better zis way," Zola cajoled and Steve bristled. He might've submitted to dying once but it wasn't happening again, not now. Not when Steve still had to avenge Bucky, not when he still had to make both their deaths meaningful again.

But, maybe, it was too late for even that.

"We are both of us, out of time."

~~~
Mission: Level 6
Target 1: Officer Jaspar Sitwell
Target 2: Agent Natalia Anianovna Romanoff

Time for Mission Completion:
Ten Hours
Parameters:
Targets Terminated
At All Costs
Disregard Collateral Damage

---

"Let me hold the laser pointer pen."

"No, I get to hold it."

"I outrank you. Besides, I have more experience."

"Have you ever even sniped somebody Steve?"

"Actually, I always had someone to do that for me. Which is why it's my-" Steve grabbed the laser pointer pen from Natasha, "-turn."

Natasha rolled her eyes but managed not to push Steve's shoulder as he turned it on, pointing the red dot directly at Jaspar Sitwell's tie.

It was harder to hold steady than he thought it'd be. A newfound wave of respect for Bucky rippled through him and Steve had to shake it off, because they had a mission and thinking about Bucky on missions never ended well for him.

Although he was about to find out Bucky + missions wasn't going to end well for anyone.

---

"What? Are you crazy? That is a terrible, terrible idea," Jaspar Sitwell spit, leaning forward in his seat to glare at Steve in shotgun. Steve was busy ignoring him when the roof suddenly made a soft thump.

He looked up on instinct and Jaspar leaned back in his seat. Then glass was shattering and Steve spun around just in time to see Sitwell dragged out of the window and hauled into oncoming traffic.

It happened so quickly he could barely register - people don't get plucked outta cars and tossed at sems - before Natasha was leaping over the back seat and into his lap. She got Steve in a headlock, pulling him forward just as the headrest behind him exploded in fluff and smoke, where his head'd been only seconds before.

Another shot went off but Sam managed to dodge the bullet for him, all of which were coming through the freaking roof. Finally setting his brain back to functioning mode, Steve quickly yanked the car into park, stopping the tires with a screech and jolting them all forward with the motion. But more importantly, flying their intruder off the roof.
A body soared through the air, upside down but righting itself last second in a half roll, and then there was the metal arm, fingers digging into asphalt and sending up sparks as the assassin slid backwards, long hair flying as his body froze into the perfect hunting crouch, screeching to a stop in front of them.

Steve could only stare as the metal arm unlatched from the road, plates reflecting against the sunlight as they shifted. The assassin slowly straightened up from the ground, each step perfectly planned and executed, lifting every vertebræ of his spine as he stood, brown hair reflecting with golden undertones and falling in soft frames around his face.

Not that Steve was noticing. Or staring. It was just that...

He was beautiful; in that way that deadly things always are.

Even with the black mask (muzzle) covering his face, something about the way he held himself, the fluidity to his movements, the grace that spoke mountains of the deaths to his name, the way he looked at them through blackened goggles as though they were simply bugs in a trap...all of it sent a sharp shiver down Steve's spine.

He was still staring like a loon, entirely enamoured when the Hummer hit them from behind. Seriously, they should've heard it barreling towards them at high speeds, loud engine grumbling and pressing intentionally faster. At the very least, Steve's enhanced hearing should've given him an advantage.

But of course, he was too busy staring. They got slammed from behind, gun falling to the floor and taillights crushed as the Hummer's grill shoved their car forward into rapid motion again.

The Winter Soldier stood in the middle of the road, directly in front of them, waiting. Just, waiting. The car was going to hit him, was going to crush this beautiful deadly thing, but he just waited, silent and terrifying, kept waiting, waiting for the crash, waiting for Steve, 70 whole years of it. And just before the grill crushed his knees, he leapt into the air, swinging up and backwards and then there was another crash, more glass splattering, and it was all happening too quickly for Steve to catch every movement but somehow the assassin was on top of their car again.

Sam stomped the brake and sparks flew but the car didn't slow, nothing was happening, and then the metal hand came through the windshield and they now had zero control over the car. Natasha finally grabbed the gun, started shooting, and the Winter Soldier jumped off their roof and onto the waiting Hummer, heavy combat boots graceful as ballerina slippers.

Steve was still gawking as the assassin rode the hood of the Hummer like it was a surfboard, entirely unfazed by the wind whipping at him or the fact that they were all barreling at high speeds down a busy interstate on top of cars, one of which currently didn't have a steering wheel anymore.

"Shit!" Sam shouted, looking up through the glass hole as he realized the wheel had literally been taken from his hands and they now had zero control over the car. Natasha finally grabbed the gun, started shooting, and the Winter Soldier jumped off their roof and onto the waiting Hummer, heavy combat boots graceful as ballerina slippers.

They were all going to die. He seriously had to do something, had to get his head on straight and fight the damn battle. Who the hell was he to forget the mission, even for a moment? The beautiful assassin was trying to kill them and he'd been sitting here waiting for it to happen, not engaging in the slightest. He was Captain America, he was not going down without a fight. No matter how pretty the killer.

God, when was the last time he'd been so entranced with someone he'd frozen like that? And it had to be a fucking ghost _assassin_ to stun him into silent shock. Of course. Typical Steve Rogers, right, go for the most dangerous thing in the room. Couldn't he be normal _once_?

But god, the assassin was beautiful and _anyways_, he should be focusing on _survival_ right now, his friends needed him, right now. Steve lifted his shield from where it was tucked against the door, tucking Nat against his chest and pulling Sam in too.

"Hang on!" he shouted, ramming his shoulder into the car door and jumping out sideways, just as the car flipped up into the air. It rolled, pieces of metal and tires flying, but the door and shield they'd landed on were thankfully too slow to be flattened by the wreckage, sparking as they deposited onto the highway.

Sam rolled off somewhere along the way and Steve and Natasha only just got off the ground in time to see the Hummer stop ahead, the Winter Soldier jumping off the hood. Steve picked his shield back up and thanked the Lord that he had friends that weren't totally breakable.

He was checking to make sure Nat was okay when a movement drew his eyes to the Winter Soldier again, only this time he was holding a grenade launcher pointed in their direction. And no preamble, no big bad guy speech, just a simple aim and fire and then Steve was shoving Natasha out of the way, curling up in a ball behind his shield because he wouldn't be able to run fast enough.

The explosion hit the star and Steve flew. Air, cold wind, and Steve had the brief moment to recall when Bucky'd done that same thing once, held Steve's shield up to an explosion that'd bounced off the shield fine, but still left him flying out into the cold; except there was no trainrail for Steve to grab, only more glass shattering and everything went dark.

~~~

They couldn't take _all_ emotions out of him. Most, of course, but the basic instinctive ones stayed.

Unless, of course, he was in the chair or on the table. Then he was emotionless and numb and entirely obedient.

But when the red-haired woman _surprised_ him, when she shot her pistol from under the bridge and actually _hit_ his eye goggles, there was definitely emotion.

He ducked behind the barrier of the bridge, raw power pumping through his veins. With a sharp snapping movement, he pulled off the cracked eye goggles, tossing them to the ground.

He was _angry_.

When he whipped back upright he sent a splattering of enraged bullets where the redhead'd been. She was further away now, but for a brief moment he'd fired the machine gun angrily for _vengeance_, because she actually dared catch a bullet on him.

Anger was an emotion that went hand in hand with power. He could feel rage because it gave him an advantage. Because it fit in nicely with the only label for the stuff pumping through his veins: lethal.

No one shot him and lived.

~~~

Steve ducked low, jumped through the bus window, grabbed his shield, and used the ricochet to bounce bullets back at the men with machine guns because somehow, after all these years, people still thought that aiming for the shield would eventually hurt Steve.

They should seriously give a medal to first person that tries to shoot around the damn thing.

He came running onto the scene just as the Winter Soldier landed on a nearby car, gun raised with perfect, unmoving aim where Natasha was hiding. Steve came sprinting for him, shield raised to attack, but the metal arm got there first.

The assassin whirled and then the unbreakable fist was slamming dead center into Steve's shield, an unstoppable force meeting an immovable object; only for the first time Steve was the steady, immovable one being plowed over by the wild, crazy power of the unstoppable.

The echo of the clang was still ringing in his ears as that same hand shoved Steve's shield to the side and a heavy boot connected with the center of his chest, knocking him violently to the pavement.

He fell on his back and instinctively curled up in a ball behind the shield, just in time for a quick splattering of machine gun bullets to patter the star. After a few shots, the assassin apparently figured out he wasn't getting anywhere with that and the firing stopped, giving Steve just enough time to roll across the ground, keeping his body safe behind the metal.

The car was his next shield and Steve ducked behind it to dodge another quick burst from a different kind'a gun. The moment the firing stopped again, Steve vaulted over the hood to kick it out of the assassin's hands, then yet another - pistol this time - was spitting bullets at crazy angles that Steve barely managed to block.

Guns determined useless, the Winter Soldier advanced on him bare-handed and Steve closed the distance between them with the first swing; but the assassin simply dodged, grabbing Steve's shield to throw a punch of his own and that one hit, hard against Steve's cheekbone and followed closely by a second. He barely managed a single retaliation of his own before the shield attached to his arm was spinning, flipping Steve and disorienting him only for a millisecond but long enough that the Winter Soldier somehow--

--had his shield now. Steve couldn't process the transfer but it didn't matter because there was another hit to his chest, and another, and he was stumbling backwards, falling on his ass and carrying his momentum through a backwards roll to land in a crouch.

Time froze, then, as the space between them gave the fight a temporary pause. And there was the Winter Soldier, holding Steve's shield like it was his own, like he'd held it a million times, the exact same way Bucky'd held it before he'd died on the train. Except that the Winter Soldier was looking over the top of his facemask with eyes scary enough for Steve's heart to pound in fear for his own life this time.

Which meant only fighting harder. Steve launched off the ground, running straight for the Winter Soldier just as that incredible arm sent the shield flying back in his direction, fast enough to behead Steve if he hadn't ducked so it could lodge into a van instead.

Something silver glinted through the air as Steve threw the first punch, a countermove with a heavy knife inches from Steve's arm. Every movement was punctuated with the whirring metallic of the arm moving, ever-adjusting to optimum performance. They blocked each other's punches and swings, forearms smacking and bruising and this man was so strong, there was no way he didn't have some kind of enhancement.
Arms both metal and human came flying at Steve, attacks from both sides with a knife swapped and glinting in between and he was barely holding his own, throwing up enough blocks that he wasn't dead yet but he also wasn't getting anywhere.

When he'd fought Schmidt, Steve'd been hoping for an equal match, a fight that would get his blood hot instead of just spilled. Schmidt had the serum too, so they should've been equals, but all Steve could remember was the overwhelming sense of disappointment. Schmidt'd been all kick hits and brutal, wild, misplaced punches relying solely on strength.

Fighting was a dance, if you did it right. If you had the right partner. And fighting the Winter Soldier? It was the first time Steve was at his max, that he was part of something beautiful, a raw, humanistic dance.

It was as close-hand combat as was possible, the deadly ghost assassin of legend against the shining hero icon of America. There was something about the way the Winter Soldier fought that struck Steve as more intelligent and powerful than anything else. There was no misplaced anything, only perfect swing after perfect stab that Steve could barely use his enhanced abilities to keep from intersecting any fatal parts of him.

A particularly brutal hit had the metal arm swinging into his stomach, but the movement gave Steve's body the momentum to land a solid punch of his own (finally) across the face mask, followed by a spinning jump kick that sent the assassin soaring backwards - even graceful as he was flew through the air - and slamming directly into the side of a car, metal crumpling around him.

Steve wasn't going to lose the upperhand now and went sprinting at the car, jumping last second to slam his knee into the Winter Soldier's stomach as he swung his fist towards what he could see of that pretty face again. The metal arm was up and blocking Steve effortlessly, a punch to Steve's chest and then they were moving backwards again, assassin on offense, but Steve took the opportunity of a heavy swing from the metal arm - he moved like the arm was part of him, but the weight distribution still had to be off somewhere - to flip the armored body sideways, rolling the assassin in his arms to slam on the ground.

The Winter Soldier got his feet under him and grabbed Steve's wrist as he swung back upright, balancing just in time to latch a metal hand around Steve's neck. And here they were, face to face and those raging eyes stared at him and Steve went cold as ice, staring, not enough time to notice that the color of those eyes were ice, too.

He couldn't breathe and it wasn't as much the lack of airflow he was concerned about, it was the actual crushing of his esophagus into a useless crumbled thing in his throat. Steve had both hands around the metal, using the grip of black sniper gloves to try to rip his throat free. Metal whirred again and the fingers around his neck tightened as he drew them face to face, noses inches apart as those lethal eyes stared him down with promised brutal death.

The movement was intimate and personal and probably the most terrified and awed Steve'd ever been, all branded into the same rushing heartbeat.

The metal fingers could crush his throat at any moment and if this is what it felt like courting death, no wonder Steve was jumping outta buildings all the damn time.

Then that same hand threw him, shoving Steve backwards and tumbling head over heels over the hood of yet another car. Everything was spinning and he still couldn't breathe. Lungs couldn't decide if it was the squeezed windpipe or.... just something about being held that intimately close to the masked face of the killer that'd set off a hundred sparks in Steve's body.
He barely rolled away in time to avoid the metal fist crushing his head into pavement, splattering asphalt pieces in his eyes as the ground split like an earthquake under the unstoppable hand.

With a quick spin Steve stood, catching his bearings to charge forward again; he couldn't give up now, he couldn't give up ever, and Steve threw up his forearms as blockades to violent, painful metal punches and he was bruised all over and he couldn't really breathe and he was aching but he hadn't felt this alive since 1945.

The side of a van smacked his shoulder and he couldn't remember being shoved but the moment he tried to step forward, a kick to his lower stomach sent his head smacking back into the van and then the glint of a blade reflected in his eyes as yet another knife drilled down towards Steve's head, both metal and human hands driving it and Steve had both his up too, holding onto the wrists of the Winter Soldier and trying to use his strength to keep the knife from indenting his forehead.

Finally he just ducked, body pinned against the van with every inch of the assassin's and Steve's breathing was cut off again as he got both hands on the human arm, tried to shove his way free as the knife slid closer to his head, cutting through the metal side of the van like butter as Steve's feet stumbled between the assassin's black combat boots.

The van wall eventually ended and the movement bent the Winter Soldier just long enough for Steve to wrap both arms around his waist from behind, hauling the assassin over his shoulder, grimacing under the frankly ridiculous weight as the momentum slammed them both into the ground.

Steve was the first to jump up, on his feet and grabbing the shield only seconds faster and then there was another quick punch to the star, the slash of a knife inches from his face. Steve lifted the shield to block a stab from one arm, but the Winter Soldier simply dropped the knife over the side of the shield, grabbing it with the other hand, and landed a solid punch on Steve's cheekbone. He went stumbling backwards, mind reeling at the pain and beauty, the moves the assassin was coming up with, all that deadly creativity.

How fucked up did he have to be to be entranced, enchanted by the only thing in this life so far that actually had a very real shot of killing him?

He blocked the next kick and managed a solid swing with his shield, lodging the edge into the metal arm, denting a panel with the force of it. A terrible short-circuiting sound filled the air and the Winter Soldier was stuck, just long enough to pull the shield out and whip it around under the arm, smacking it directly into his face before Steve jumped up behind him, one hand closing heavy over the facemask and heaving the assassin into the air.

The Winter Soldier flipped and landed on his shoulder, rolling and straightening back up, spine to Steve and one foot almost scuffing the ground in his disorientation.

The facemask was lying on the ground.

Steve paused, breathing heavy, looking at the shoulders of the beautiful powerful assassin and waiting for him to spin around, waiting to see the face of the deadliest ghost in the world.

Then the Winter Soldier cocked his body to the side, head whipping over his shoulder to look at Steve through the frame of wild dark hair around his face.

Icy eyes glared at him and the world went perfectly still. Steve straightened up and he didn't notice this time when his lungs didn't take in oxygen.

He just stared. Because the deadliest ghost in the world was somehow the ghost of Steve's dreams "Bucky?" he breathed, heartbeat pounding and sky closing in and the name as familiar on his lips as it ever was, spinning everything around him into a blur.

The icy eyes narrowed at him and familiar lips parted, five words to end Steve's life all over again.

"Who the hell is Bucky?"

Chapter End Notes

AND NOW WE FINALLY GET TO THE POST-CATWS DRAMA WOOO!!!!

Also: the lovely quote of "Because there'll be no more goddamn napkins left in the world at the rate you're using them up" came from my dear friend who I went running to for flashback inspiration. Just that one line and I was like YES I HAVE THE SCENE NOW. But anyways, thank you so much for that doll :)

Thank you all so much for reading <3 <3

xx
Chapter Notes

Warnings: references to torture, brief religious debates, mentions of possible homophobia (not really though), and possible trigger warnings for food disorders.

If you haven't read the post on the CPR scene in CATWS, that's here and quite relevant xx

So quick editorial note: I'm using the *'s again, but not for torture scenes. Now, a * represents a change in POV because that kind of happens a lot in this chapter.

Also, if you haven't watched Agents of Shield, there is a machine in the MCU universe that is super relevant and I will explain further in the chapter, but if you have watched the show you probably already know what machine I'm talking about. But it is actually canonically part of the Marvel Universe, so I figured I would explain that I'm not totally making things up.

Running Up That Hill - Placebo
This Night - Black Lab

The song Tony plays: Back From the Dead - Skylar Grey

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Drop the shield, Captain! Get down! Get on your knees! Don't move!" People shouted, pointing guns. Steve didn't hear them. The words floated over and he couldn't get down; didn't know they wanted him to.

Eventually some part of his brain must’ve registered, dropping his body to the pavement with a kick to his leg. Just as well, his knees were about to give out. Or maybe they did, maybe that was why he collapsed. He didn’t say anything, couldn’t say anything, lips parted and eyes open but he wasn’t seeing anything either.

Just Bucky's face, whipping around to look at Steve. The unbalanced surprise at his own name, that expression when he’d turned all the way: five words to rip the heart outta Steve's chest, mind outta his skull. Who the hell is Bucky. Who the hell is Bucky.

Bucky was alive. He had no idea who Steve was. Steve was a goddamned stranger to him, Buck would've killed him. Steve was nothing to Bucky but how was Bucky even here?

He couldn't breathe. Bucky was the Winter Soldier. Steve had to repeat it a few times in his head, five new words to make his own. Buck was the Winter Soldier. Buck was a deadly assassin. Bucky was the deadliest assassin, the beautiful thing of legend Steve couldn't stop staring at, the one thing that'd made him feel alive for the first time since February 1945.

How?

He sorted through memories, anything that could've lead to this. First: Bucky hadn't died when he'd fallen from the train. How could he survive? Would Steve've survived? Was it possible Bucky'd been enhanced?

How in hell had Steve's best friend in the entire world, second in command, faithful right-hand sniper and love of his life been a fucking serum recipient and Steve had never noticed?

When could he've gotten it? The only time Steve hadn't been with him was when--

Zola. Buck'd been experimented on. Things he refused to talk about, things he shut away from Steve. In Zola's lab, Bucky'd been stuck full of needles, pumped full of drugs - Steve knew there'd been needles involved, Bucky'd accidentally told him once. After a drunken flashback, pestering Bucky about what'd triggered it and Bucky had - in his hungover groaning - said something about how the body-mind disconnect felt like he was 'drugged up again.'

So Steve'd known needles and drugs were part of the torture. Why in hell had he never searched for Zola's files? The moment he found out they were pumping unknown substances into his best friend, it was Steve's responsibility to find out what. But he hadn't, he'd let Bucky down. Bucky said he was okay, most everyone believed him.

Physically, he was better than okay. So obviously better than okay, how had Steve never noticed? He'd picked up on little things - it'd constantly bugged him how strong Bucky was, how he didn't fatigue like the rest of the boys. That one December they'd slept in the woods, Steve kept wondering how Bucky could hold up his drawing clipboard for hours and not feel the slightest bit tired.

He'd pulled an electric fence off Steve's feet for god's sake. His hands'd been flayed and smoking and...Steve hadn't been imagining it, then. Bucky really had destroyed his hands, they'd just healed superfast. Super serum fast. Then when he got shot in the leg and lost an impossible amount of blood? He'd miraculously pulled through that too - back and running around camp a week later.

All the signs had been there and Steve had turned a blind eye because he was so stupid and he'd had the chance to save Bucky from...seventy years under Zola and he hadn't because Steven Grant Rogers failed the only good thing he'd ever had in his life.
It made sense now, too much sense, that Bucky had some version of the serum all along. That he'd been alive all along. And the kicker that really drove home? The day after the fall, the minute after, yesterday, Steve had that feeling in his gut Bucky was alive and HE DID NOTHING ABOUT IT.

He knew, all this time his soul had known and still, he'd crashed that stupid plane in the ocean because the weight of Bucky's death, apparently not-death, was too much for him to cope.

And so, because Steve had failed, Buck'd been taken captive by Hydra and moulded into the deadliest assassin on the planet. They'd been inches from each other's faces, Bucky had stared right at him, shield and all, and hadn't recognized his best friend since childhood.

Once, a few months ago, Steve'd believed he was in the most pain possible for a human being. He'd watched his friend die and he'd been helpless, lost, broken.

That was a papercut now, in comparison to this. Because some things were a hell of a lot worse than death. The look on Bucky's face alone, when Steve had said his name...Steve would take drowning and ice over this. Ingrained in him forever: the look on the face of the love of his life as Steve said his name and Bucky didn't know it anymore.

"It was him," Steve said quietly, the first three words he'd said since "Bucky?" He was staring unblinkingly at his lap and everyone else was quiet, watching him warily. Steve didn't notice. Nothing mattered. Nothing mattered except Bucky was alive and Steve was nothing to him. "He looked right at me...like he didn't even know me."

No one in the truck believed him. Not entirely. He didn't really blame them.

"How's that even possible? It was like 70 years ago." Sam's words were tinged with disbelief. Steve cringed. He knew it was seventy years ago. He knew it wasn't possible. He should've known. He should've fucking known.

"Zola." Saying it out loud made it about a hundred times worse. Steve still couldn't look up. He couldn't look at anyone's eyes. The last person whose eyes had locked on his were Bucky's. Fuck. "Bucky's whole unit was captured in '43. Zola experimented on him."

The experiments. Bucky'd been a lab rat and Steve'd never pushed. He'd given Bucky all this space and for what? So they could both end up seventy years in the future where the world went to hell and Bucky didn't fucking know who Steve was?

"Whatever he did helped Bucky survive the fall." Zola had fucked with Steve's boy. And Steve'd never even fucking asked. He'd had his chance for more than a year and he never asked, not once, for Bucky to tell him. "They must have found him and..."

...and destroyed him.

"None of that's your fault, Steve," Natasha interrupted, tone indissimissable. The words floated by now, empty sentiments. They didn't know. Natasha wasn't there. Natasha hadn't watched the love of her life fall from a train because she couldn't reach far enough. Natasha hadn't failed over and over and over and Steve didn't even deserve to have Bucky back in his life, assassin or not.

He looked away, unable to meet the eyes of his friends, friends who knew nothing about him, not really. Because throughout this all, for as long as he could remember, it wasn't their voices he heard in his head, it wasn't their advice urging him to do the right thing, it wasn't their hands he dreamed about holding at night.

"Even when I had nothing, I had Bucky."
He didn't care how it sounded. He didn't care how much of his heart it revealed. His heart was in the hands of a Brooklyn sniper who'd run away from Steve in a flash of black smoke and the most overwhelmed look on his face he'd ever seen.

I had Bucky. Bucky was his. He'd always been there, always let Steve love him too much, and never knew. But even when Bucky was dead, even when Bucky was gone, even when Steve's entire world was gone....Buck'd still been there.

Steve had woken with nothing, not even a familiar face. He'd woken with absolutely nothing left in his life except for the beautiful boy in his head, saving him every step of the way. Even when he had nothing, he had Bucky.

And he wasn't giving him up now without one hell of a fight.

~~~

"He's gonna be there, you know." Sam offered quietly, taking a cautious step close. Steve kept looking over the bridge, water below. Quiet and still, soft ripples instead of the tumultuous, churning waves of his mind.

"I know," Steve replied. He was counting on it. Bucky was alive, they'd met again by some twist of fate, and Steve wasn't gonna mess it up this time.

It was Steve's turn to show his best friend how much their promise meant. The words etched into the gravestone of his heart; it'd been the day of Sarah's funeral. Steve dodged Bucky and his folks all day, needing time alone. Mostly because he didn't want Buck to see him cry.

But, of course, he caught up to Steve eventually, followed him up to his door. Tried to coerce Steve to moving in; to leaning on Bucky when the skies were the dimmest. And he hadn't taken no for an answer. He'd pledged and promised to Steve, right there on his ratty porch, that he didn't have to go it alone, Buck would always be there.

The warm, familiar hand tight on Steve's shoulder, shaking him slightly with the weight of it. He couldn't help the small smile that formed on his face, his heart aching with how much he love he carried for that boy. The softness should've passed the moment Bucky pulled back, the energy around them should've fallen back to joking, but it didn't. Not yet.

Bucky had followed Steve inside his apartment, shooting glances at him every three seconds with that beautiful smile still soft and rounded at the corners, like he knew how much Steve was hurting. Well, he did, Buck loved Sarah too. Steve was pretty sure he didn't have to fake an ounce of the sorrow or sympathy.

He'd insisted on helping Steve pack. Steve insisted no, Bucky insisted harder.

They'd moved in together and that first night they'd done just what Bucky promised. Put the couch cushions on the floor like when they were kids, lying nose to nose in the darkness. It wasn't cold enough to pretend he needed Bucky's arms wrapped around him, but their hands were tangled up between their chests anyways, a gentle reminder and a promise of comfort.

"I miss her already, Buck," Steve whispered into the darkness, running his small thumb over the back of Bucky's work-roughened fingers. Bucky repositioned his head on the cushion, scooting closer to tip their foreheads together. Steve closed his eyes into the warmth, breathing in the feeling of Bucky so close.

Knowing he still had this, the night after he'd lost everything else; it was immeasurable what that'd done for him. Steve's life was empty, he had absolutely nothing left...and there was Bucky, still, always.

"I miss her too, Stevie. I miss her too," Bucky whispered back.

The quiet stillness of the night settled around them, a hovering weight of peace hanging over the impending sorrow. They laid together like that for another little while, letting the silence speak for them as Steve drifted on the edge of teary-eyed sleep, just dozing off when Bucky whispered one last thing into the night.

"I'm never leavin' you, Stevie. Promise."

"Look," Sam interjected kindly, "whoever he used to be...the guy he is now? I don't think he's the kind you save. He's the kind you stop."

The Winter Soldier was the deadliest assassin, a ghost story, a legend. Something to tell little assassin children at night, the silent monster on every horizon. The most beautiful fighter Steve had ever seen. And of course, of course he was Bucky. The Winter Soldier may be the kind you stop, but the person under the mask?

"I don't know if I can do that." Honestly, Steve couldn't imagine. Not in a million years. As torn as he'd been lately about right and wrong, as much as he'd been doubting himself? He'd never been entirely lost really, not until right now.

When it came down to it, Steve knew what the right thing to do was. Bucky had killed so many people. He was a murderer in the cold blood and he wasn't gonna stop. But Steve could probably watch Bucky slaughter a dozen men and he'd still reach out to him with open arms, begging Bucky to come home.

This was so far past Captain America's "right and wrong." Cap'd be able to stop the most dangerous killer of the century. Steve Rogers from Brooklyn may've always been about right-and-wrong too, but this was where the line breached. This was where Steve crossed his own morals, his own beliefs, because as much as he believed in the right thing? As much as he wanted to - and needed to - save the world?

He loved Bucky more.

"Well, he might not give you a choice," Sam warned, a little harsh at the edges, splash of water to wake up to the cruel world of reality. But the gentle words he added on stung a hell of a lot more than the idea of Bucky killing him. "He doesn't know you."

Best friends since childhood, Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield...

...Steve?
It's me, it's Steve.
Steve.
I thought you were dead.
I thought you were smaller.

He'd even known Steve then. Bucky'd been half outta his mind with hallucinations, nightmares, drugs, pain. Steve'd been in an entirely different body. He'd grown feet, his jaw had filled out, he actually had muscle mass, they hadn't seen each other in months, the lighting was absolute shit, he had dirt smudged on his face and a helmet pulled over his distinctive blond hair and he was wearing clothes Bucky'd never seen before, was basically an entire person Bucky'd never seen before, and through the drugged haze and the pain and the hallucinations Bucky had still known Steve then.

And seventy years later, against all odds, they'd found each other again. Bucky didn't know him, but-

He turned his head, looked over to Sam for the first time. And decided, in that moment, he knew exactly what he was going to do. With the most conviction he'd ever spoken, Steve made a single promise to the swirling air of dusk.

"He will."

If it took hours, months, years, another lifetime. Bucky would know him. Steve was part of Bucky's soul; there was no way he could lose that part of him forever, it wasn't possible. For the first time in a long time, the confidence rushing through his veins wasn't faked, wasn't adrenaline, wasn't blind faith from strangers and friends.

Right now, in this moment, Steve had absolute faith in himself: his best friend would know him again.

They had a mission to accomplish.

"Gear up. It's time." He started for the van, a spark in his step that made him wanna sprint, run, shoot things, punch and be punched and find Bucky and save Bucky.

"You gonna wear that?" Sam called from behind him. Steve turned over his shoulder and gave Sam a look that'd have Buck laughing if he were here.

"No. If you're gonna fight a war, you've gotta wear a uniform."

(Steve knew where his blue uniform was. It was more padded, more protective, moved with better range. When he'd first been declared a hostage from SHIELD, he and Natasha had ditched the suits for strange hoodies and terrible shoes, and Steve had put his uniform in a duffel bag in a high school gym. He knew exactly where it was and honestly, it was a hell of a lot safer. Especially considering he'd be fighting the most lethal man on the planet.

But this was a fight about Bucky. You're keeping the uniform, right? Steve couldn't let him down. Bucky liked the damn thing.

Besides, something that might trigger Buck's memory back? He'd take an old, itchy and definitely less protective suit any day. And it was only fitting; that was the version Bucky fought beside. They may be fighting each other this time, but at least they were still fighting together. )

~~~

"People are gonna die, Buck."

Cold eyes of familiar ice didn't so much as flicker, half hidden beneath the frame of hair. Something had changed between the wild shock of who the hell is Bucky and the man before him now. Steve wished he had the time to find out what, wished he could sit Bucky down right now in the middle of this damn catwalk and run his fingers through Bucky's new hair and talk to him.

But people were going to die, and Steve had a responsibility.
"I can't let that happen." This had to be his compromise. He had to save the world - Bucky would understand, once he got his memory back. If only he'd just. Trust Steve. Remember. They could take Hydra down together, the way they had in '45. But from the looks of it, Bucky wasn't budging and Steve still had to do this.

If everything went perfectly, without hurting either of them. Saving Bucky's life was as important as saving all the millions of others. It'd just be a lot easier if he didn't have to worry about getting killed in the meantime.

"Please don't make me do this," Steve begged, a final shot in the dark. Bucky narrowed his eyes, lowered a steel gaze. Fine. Steve could take the goddamned challenge. They were both walking outta this, and they were taking Hydra down too.

Steve drew back, paused, apologized to the heavens and whoever else wasn't listening, and hauled his beloved shield at the chest of his best friend.

Of course, the metal arm blocked it, star rebounding, soaring through the air and Steve caught it one-handed, just in time to block two aggressive bullets to the chest.

What awful irony it was; Bucky used to take bullets for Steve - now he was behind the trigger.

On the sixth shot Buck scooped low and a bullet grazed Steve's rib, cutting through his uniform and making him cry out at the sharp burn and instant wet-hot soak of blood. He'd never been shot around his shield before.

He'd never been so perfectly matched before. He'd always known Buck had the strength in him to be this powerful, but everything it must've taken to get here made him wanna be sick.

But god, he was beautiful when he fought. Watching those same brilliant fighting moves and knowing now, that the deadly gorgeous thing was Bucky? Enthralled wasn't exactly the word.

This fight was either going to save them, or kill them both.

~*~

Having to choke Bucky unconscious was simultaneously one of the most difficult and satisfying things Steve'd ever done. On one hand, having Bucky grasp at his arm, making little choked sounds (more pissed than scared), was breaking Steve's heart. On the other hand, having Bucky safely unconscious and outta the fight was the best thing that'd happened to him all day.

Well, that and it was a little satisfying to finally pin that metal arm underneath his leg, overpower the man that'd shot him. And stabbed him. And punched and kicked and just wasn't remembering him.

And then he got shot in the ass.

It surprised him more than anything, but it also hurt like a bitch. He was still gasping at the pain when the next bullet fired for his hand, barely letting go in time to dodge it.

Bucky was back up - shit - and if Steve could get to the center counsel fast enough, all he had to do was insert the chip back in the empty slot and "Charlie--"

Charlie not locked because suddenly Steve couldn't breathe. Fire ripped through his stomach and all his thoughts went sideways as his body went down, sinking ungracefully to the floor and choking on his own tongue, unable to get a single gasp of proper oxygen into his lungs.
Everything was searing and red and there was a hole through his stomach, the white stripes of the flag across his abdomen bloodied red.

If he had to die, Steve would choose to die by Bucky's hand. But not like this, seconds away from saving the world. The insert was a foot above his hand, twelve inches and the mission would be over and then he would be alright to die, so long as Bucky got his ass off the floor and came and held Steve.

But Bucky wasn't going to, he'd have to figure this the fuck out himself.

C'mon, Rogers. Hang in there, okay? I know it hurts buddy, I know. You just gotta hold on for me, alright? What would I do without your punk ass to save all the time? Hey-hey, careful. You're bleeding a lot. Hey - look at me, okay? Look at me. You're gonna be alright. Hold on for me, Stevie. Hold on for me.

Steve reached up, dragged his body as high as he could, hand trembling. Just a few more inches and it'd all be alright. A few more inches and Zola wouldn't be able to touch them anymore. A few more inches and Bucky could be Steve's again.

The chip fell into place. "Charlie lock," he breathed into his mike, and the ground took him in with open arms.

"Okay, Cap, get outta there," Hill warned over the comm, but Steve was still trying to breathe. He lifted his wrist to his mouth, knocking his head back against the wall. Every ounce of his body felt like it was falling apart.

"Fire now," he ordered. Maria instantly started protesting but Steve wouldn't have it. He hadn't just hauled his ass - which also had a bullet in it, by the way - to the chip thing to have his efforts wasted because Agent Hill was getting sentimental. "Just do it! Do it now!"

The first explosion went off with a loud, terrible sound, and Steve's entire body rocked as the helicarrier hit, blowing up the world in a flash of red and orange and black and twisting silver metal.

Bucky.

Through some semblance of the same stubborn stupidity that normally landed him in situations like this, Steve staggered to his feet and grabbed the rail of the walkway, holding up all his body weight to keep from collapsing.

He could finally see Bucky from the vantage point - and the huge metal beam pinning him to the sloped underbelly of the carrier. Well. That wasn't even a question. Steve could never leave Buck down there alone. His body was burning and fighting him - always fighting him - but Steve fought back harder, somehow made it back down to ground level, limping weakly to Bucky's struggling body and fearful, dirty face.

Every last ounce of strength he had went into lifting that metal bar. Bucky hauled himself out and they were both broken and panting, strings of hair sticking to Bucky's face with sweat and heat from the fire exploding around them. Finally.

Steve pinned Bucky with his eyes and held the gaze, words as sure as they'd ever been. "You know me."

The explosions were getting closer but neither noticed. For once, there were more important things than the fire threatening to steal their feet from under them. Bucky tried straighten and Steve moved closer to help, then there was a very angry metal fist colliding with Steve's ribs and Bucky was shouting, livid and laced with confusion.

"No I don't." Now Steve couldn't breathe again. He just barely struggled back to his feet, mouth gaping to take in oxygen and head pounding with the weight of it all.

"Bucky. You've known me your whole life." That time Bucky swung out blindly with his fist and yelled, knocking them both for the ground, shooting more pain through bruises and gaping wounds. But Steve just struggled back up again, because he wasn't giving up.

"Your name is James. Buchanan. Barnes."

"Shut up!" Bucky shouted, metal crashing into fragile bone. This was nothing like their dance on the bridge, this was all wild swings and emotions and flying hair and Bucky was so beautiful and he was bleeding and Steve just wanted to wrap him up in blankets and stitch up the gash on his cheek and hold his hands between Steve's trembling own.

He pulled off his helmet for the same reason he'd worn the red white and blue suit. He needed Bucky to see him, to know him. If Captain America wasn't cutting through to any of Bucky's memories, maybe that blonde kid from Brooklyn would. God knows he had enough cuts and bruises on his face to be recognizable now. Maybe that was all it would take, seeing Steve beat up; the way Buck had for the entirety of his growing life.

A love to span decades, continents apart, and they were finally together again. He wasn't gonna lose Bucky a second time.

Steve would die by that metal hand before he lost Bucky again. He'd do whatever it fucking took.

And as much as it was ripping him apart, he didn't need Buck to know who he was. He could temporarily live with that. What he needed, really needed, was for Bucky to understand how much he meant. Because that could save them. It was the only thing that ever had.

He'd spend his last breath making sure Bucky knew how goddamned much Steve loved him.

"I'm not going to fight you."

Somethin' to prove. The shield that had saved both of their lives so many times, the shield that felt like an extension of his body, it was nothing compared to what Bucky meant. Red-leather fingers pried open and he let go. The starry protection tumbled through a sucking hole in the ground, flipping into the Potomac below. Steve could care less. The shield was his lifesaver, Bucky was his life.

"You're my friend," he promised, from the deepest place in his broken body that could still speak.

Bucky glared, staring him down with intense, unreadable eyes. A split second and he charged forward, tackling Steve to the ground hard enough to knock the air outta his lungs. That wasn't what crushed him.

"You're my mission," Bucky shot back, breathless and breathtakingly beautiful, then that metal fist was connecting with Steve's cheekbone. Something cracked. Metal slammed again and the bruise shot rivets of pain through his skull, unbearable and overwhelming and burning so much Steve couldn't see anything but blur outta his right eye.

But he took the hits, felt the skin on his cheek split, his ears barely registering the rough voice as Bucky punched again and again, each punctuated with a single word. "You're. My. Mission."
Neither of them could breathe and this was where it ended, wasn't it? This beautiful war machine hovering over him, knees pinned to either side of Steve's hips - for however many times Steve'd blocked this fantasy from his mind, none of them went quite like this. But the proximity was more than fitting; it was the only thing he'd longed for earlier, slumped and bleeding out from the bullet in his stomach.

Now, being pummeled to death by the love of his life, so long as Bucky was there and close, Steve would go with him wherever Bucky wanted him to follow.

The metal arm paused, hovering in mid air, and the look on Bucky's face was about as torn apart as Steve's heart felt right now. But he'd go. He'd go with Bucky anywhere.

"Then finish it," Steve choked, his words barely intelligible over the pounding of his heart, the blood in his mouth. Bucky was still paused over him, breathing too heavy, metal fist raised, snarl on his lips and wild fire in his eyes as he looked down at Steve, looked down and that was okay, it was okay, Steve was always going to be there for him. You and me forever.

"Cause I'm with y-you. To the end of the line."

A gravestone for two. Those crystal eyes were wide and watering, precious breathing ragged, everything about him shaken to the core, and he looked so damn beautiful, even now, even with fire exploding behind him, with Steve's mouth filled with blood.

And the metal fist lowered.

It lowered and Bucky'd heard him, Steve could see it in the shining crystal, could feel it in the hand curled over his pounding broken heart. Bucky heard him, Bucky was damn near crying, crying, and the fist lowered. Dropped. Fell.

And it was at that exact moment the helicarrier creaked, crash, and then the fist wasn't the one falling, Steve was.

Falling, falling, falling, reaching up for Bucky, and wasn't it a lovely twist of fate that now it was his turn, it was his turn to die and Steve didn't regret a single thing.

He'd told Bucky he'd loved him with those final words. To the end of the line. That was all that mattered - the look on Bucky's face said it all. James Buchanan Barnes had - in that very moment - truly realized and believed that Steven Grant Rogers loved him and Steve was falling falling

falling

but that was alright, it was his turn now.

He hit the water and everything went black.

~~~
The man wasn't breathing when he pulled him out of the water. It didn't take long to swim from where they'd fallen - well, the man had fallen, he'd jumped - then he was dragging the man up to shore.

He tossed the body down without bothering to be gentle, he was already bleeding and not-breathing and bruised, sand on the shore of a river wouldn't cause further harm.

But he stared down at the body and knew he couldn't let the man die from the water in his lungs and throat. There was something deep inside his chest he couldn't place, but this man was more important than anything else in the world; that was all he knew.

In a moment of vulnerability he knelt beside the body, tipping up the clean-shaven chin to clear airways. With a calculated press of metal he pushed down on the man's chest, just below the dimensional white star. CPR wasn't something he remembered being taught, but the motions of the chest-compressions were instinctual.

More, and the man still wasn't breathing. Carefully cradling the back of the man's head, metal fingers tipped the chin higher. He leaned down, ready to push air from functioning lungs to revive failing ones, when the new hold suddenly had the man choking up water.

Lean back, rolling the man's head to the side so he could choke up water into the dirt instead of drown. The shockingly blue eyes were still closed, but the choking eventually evened out, the worst of the water cleared from his lungs.

With careful footing he straightened back up, slow enough to keep the physical damage from worsening. The man's head rolled upright and he studied the busted face, the mouth that'd spoken to ruin something inside him.

The man had given him a full name. He could do wonders with a full name. The man had said they were friends; he had no idea what to do with that.

The man had laid down his shield and given up his life in honor of that friendship.

He couldn't quite process that.

But he'd find a way to. He'd find a way.

He called the ambulance and gave them the man's location at the first phone he found. He'd been given a mission to take a life, a single life; and instead he'd saved it.

He couldn't remember saving a life before. He couldn't remember failing a mission with no internal repercussions. All he knew was that everything had changed, and that man had changed it with ten words that felt like they were engraved into his organs, carved somewhere deep inside that he couldn't see but he could feel, could feel with every ounce of his blood and bones.

Those blood and bones had a new mission now.

~*~

He found his first answer in a museum.

Walking through crowded New York streets, he observed carefully until he determined all research was done on mobile devices, on screens not unlike the ones he hacked for security bases. He snatched one easily from a back pocket, pressing the unlock button and holding the phone up in the sunlight to determine the placement of fingerprints.

Locating the pattern of the passcode was too easy, then it only took him a few minutes to find a search engine, to type in James Buchanan Barnes. There might be nothing, but public options might give a starting place.

He had the opposite problem. Too much information, none of it necessarily reliable, so he scrolled down the search page until a reliable source caught his eye: a museum.

He'd already placed his uniform and the majority of his equipment in a secure location, dressing as one of the crowd to float under surveillance.

Then he was standing in front of an exhibit, gloved hands shoved in pockets and a baseball cap pulled snug over his head, coat collar turned up as he stared at a piece of glass with the words A Fallen Comrade etched across the top and a dot image of his own face looking back at him.

A screen, a looping video, black and white of the man from the helicarrier - Captain America; Steve Rogers - looking at him, smiling, and then another man, looking back, his eyes crinkled at the corners and mouth turned up and the most unabashed expression of joy across his features, then he was dipping his head, his shoulders shaking as he laughed and laughed and he just stared.

Bucky Barnes.

He was a hero, Bucky Barnes had saved lives, he had fought alongside a man that he'd known his entire life - Best friends since childhood, You're my friend, You're my mission. Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield I'm not going to fight you. You know me. - and somehow, that was him.

Somehow, he had been a hero and he had been taken; he had been believed dead, so Hydra had turned him into their weapon.

They had taken that laughing man and twisted him and squeezed him and looking at that shining, joyful face - and the response of similar joy on Captain Rogers' face - the most familiar of emotions washed through his veins.

Anger overtook his blood as he watched that laugh, again and again, a protective urge bubbling through veins. He had been that happy once. Happiness - something of irrelevance and fairytales - had been his. He'd been Bucky Barnes and someone had decided to destroy Bucky Barnes and they were going to pay.

There was only a single thought running through his head as his lips parted slightly, his eyes glued to the words of the glass exhibit.

"He's not gonna come easy, you know," Sam said quietly. Steve didn't look up from the folder Natasha had just handed him.

"He never has," Steve replied, carefully tugging the tiny black and white photo outta its paperclip, holding it up in the sunlight. He was going to bring sunlight to this face again. "I'm just lucky I got this chance at all."

For once, Steve was doing okay. Bucky was alive. Not only was he alive, he’d recognized Steve - or maybe his words - and he'd chosen not to kill him. Better yet. He'd chosen to save him.

A warm hand patted him on the shoulder. "Alright, well if we're making a mission of it, we're gonna need some supplies."

Steve sighed, tucking the little photo of Bucky with his crooked army hat and crooked smile in his wallet. "I know a guy."

~~~

"Well if it isn't the great Captain himself," Tony greeted without bothering to say hello. Steve sighed into the phone, tucking it against his shoulder as he carefully wrestled Bucky's file into his backpack. He'd read the whole thing later, but he needed supplies to go after Buck first.

He supposed Tony did have a right to be surprised that Steve was calling (he'd only seen Tony once and talked to him over the phone twice since the Battle of New York), but he was too busy for Tony's antics right now. "Look, Stark, I need help. Do you have some equipment I could borrow?"

"I have more toys and gadgets than you could imagine, Cap. What, standard SHIELD issue not doin' it for you anymore? Gettin' bored already?"

"There's nothing boring about helping people," Steve grumbled, swinging his backpack over a shoulder and heading down the stairs of his apartment two at a time. "I've just got something bigger going on."

"Oh, so you finally found a girl. I'm surprised at you Rogers. How'd you find time for that when you were busy blowing up helicarriers over the Potomac?" Stark's voice got all sassy and Steve groaned. This was why he didn't call Tony.

"You heard about that?"

"The whole free world heard about that, Stars-and-Stripes. Just gotta ask, couldn't you have managed to blow up something that wasn't a project I'd contributed to?"

"Maybe you could stop contributing to projects that try to destroy that free world. Okay, look, anyways, can I drop by to pick up some things? I'm on my way to the bus station now..."

"Yeah, yeah, JARVIS will let you in, old man. You bringing your girl? Cause I'm just warning, she may not stay after she meets me--"

"I'll see you soon Tony, goodbye." Steve hung up the phone and cursed Fury for ever introducing him to Tony Stark and then cursed Howard for not still being around so Steve could yell at him or at least complain about his damn son without feeling terrible.

The bus ride from DC to New York was about four hours, giving Steve time to gather what the hell to say to Tony. He was going alone because tickets weren't exactly cheap, and Sam had to pack for the trip anyways. Steve'd swing back by with Stark's personal plane and pick him up later.
He needed more than a plane though, he needed tracking equipment and tranquilizers and communication devices and whatever else he could use to find Bucky as soon as physically possible. With SHIELD in the wind, the only place to go for that was Tony.

The moment Steve stepped into the living quarters of the Stark Tower (being remodeled to the Avengers Tower), the speakers in the walls or the ceiling or wherever suddenly started up a blast of music. It wasn't the first time Tony'd played some stupid song as Steve entered - last time it had been the USO recording of "Star Spangled Man." Today though, Steve didn't recognize it.

He paused, cocking his head to listen to the lyrics. It sounded like a piano piece at first, but then an airy female voice drifted out over the room.

_I never thought that you and I would ever meet again..._

Okay, he hadn't been gone that long.

_I mourn the loss of you sometimes and pray for peace within..._ except Tony wasn't the peace or the praying type. Okay, so not about Tony then, it was still about Steve.

_The word "distraught" cannot describe how my heart has been, But where do we begin now that you're back from the dead?_

Steve cursed loudly and Tony came around the corner, arm over his stomach as he doubled over from laughing so hard.

"You're an asshole," Steve told him, pointing with a very serious finger. Tony laughed harder. The beat had dropped and now those words were repeating over and over again. _Where do we begin now that you're back from the dead? _"Who the hell told you?"

"Natasha," Tony managed, his laughter quieting down. "She said you might come for tracking equipment and I asked why, so that's how I got the whole story on the epic Bromance of the Ages."

Steve wasn't even going to ask what that word meant. He just crossed his arms over his chest, pointing upwards to indicate the stupid song with a very unimpressed face. Another too-fitting lyric drifted over them..._I'm so confused I don't know what to feel, should I throw my arms around you or kill you for real?_

The words must've hit Tony too (how much exactly had Natasha told him?) because he suddenly sobered up, looking almost human for a moment as his voice humbled a little. "So it's really Sergeant Barnes?"

That's right, Steve'd forgot that Buck and Howard were friends. Howard was bound to tell almost as many stories about James Buchanan Barnes as he did about Captain America.

"It is, which is why I'd really appreciate being able to get on the road so I can find him."

"Well, you came to the right place." Tony clapped his hands together, turning to stride into the adjacent room. Steve followed, for once not distracted by all of the robots and strange metals and glowing screens. "I already set out what I think you'll need. Do you happen to know what metal his arm is made out of? If you've got a sample, even a picture maybe, I might be able to run a trace."

"No, nothing. It was probably made in the 1940s though, if that helps. And it's silver, strong...hurts like a bitch." Tony snorted and tapped something on one of the blue screens, swiping it to another one.
Alright, well I'll see what I can find. In the meantime, here's your new backpack. It's got an electric-field-transmitter, a top of the line tracking device that's magnetic so you should be able to just throw it if you get close enough...

The best part about having a team, Steve decided, wasn't the battlefield advantage. That was definitely a benefit, but it didn't compare to the help and support you got off the battlefield. The Commandos had worked so well together because they split up the pain of war, made it more laughing less painful.

And now, the Avengers were using their respective talents to do whatever they could to help Steve, push him on his feet towards Bucky. Nat had gotten him the file, Stark got him equipment. Sam was coming with him, and the phone call from Bruce was exactly what Steve needed on the private jet ride back to New York. (Tony gave him shit for requesting the plane but Steve couldn't depend on public transportation, too slow.)

"Hey Steve, how are you doing?" Bruce asked as Steve shifted in the plush seat, staring uncomfortably out the window.

"I'm doing okay. Thanks for the call, Bruce. I'm guessing you heard too?"

"Yeah, Natasha called everyone, said to be gentle." Steve fell quiet, because that was all he had left to do. "Which I assumed meant it was bad. You wanna talk about it?"

He hummed, watching the blurry green of the world below pass by for a few moments. "I just have a few questions, ones you might be able to help with," he finally relented. Bruce instantly jumped on that, "of course, anything."

"They had him on cryofreeze most of the time, I think. He was awake for some of it, obviously, but he didn't look that much older. Do you know how long it takes hair to grow?"

It sounded like an odd question, but that was really the biggest difference over seven decades and it looked like Hydra hadn't bothered to cut it. Bruce asked for specifics, Steve explained the difference between Bucky's short pomade and the shoulder length he had now.

"Four years, tops, without cutting it. Probably less. If they used the ice to sustain him, its likely he was only out for missions about a week at a time, maybe a month at the most. Which could give you an idea how much time he actually spent awake and not in cryofreeze..."

"...therefore determining how many people he might've killed, how many years he was being tortured," Steve finished flatly. Some distant part of his brain was throwing all kinds of warning signals and red lights at the detached, scary apathy of his own voice but Steve ignored them.

So what if he was speaking in a monotone, isolated from facing reality. So what if he was numb from the inside out. So what if the idea of his best friend getting tortured for years was too much for him to take. So what if Steve wasn't strong enough to handle this, so what if he was losing his fucking mind and pretending he was alright and throwing jokes around and saying the words tortured and Bucky like they were nothing. So. What.

"Thanks, Bruce. I'll keep in touch." Steve waited patiently for Bruce to finish his goodbye, say his condolences, make Steve promise to keep him updated, then he hung up his phone and tossed it aside. He was fine.

But he was gonna get Bucky soon. He was gonna find Bucky and save him and then, maybe then, Steve would be able to breathe.
"You know, you are awful optimistic for a guy that was in the hospital a week ago," Sam commented, sliding Steve's credit card across the counter. The diner checkout lady made bug-eyes at the Stark logo but Steve ignored her and Sam both, leaning on the counter as they waited for their food.

"What are you going to do when we find him?" Sam kept pestering, propping himself up next to Steve. Steve crossed his arms over his chest, watching a quiet squabble between a few locals so he didn't have to look at Sam.

"I'll take him back to my place," Steve said absentmindedly like it was the most axiomatic thing in the world. Really, it was. The squabble was in rapid German - no surprise when you're in Germany - but was quickly dying out, destroying Steve's ruse of a distraction.

"Are you prepared for that, man?" Sam's voice was back to gentle now, like Steve was the one who needed coddling. The only person who needed help right now was Bucky, especially if the state of the first three Hydra bases they found were any indication. "Look, Steve, even if we get him back to okay, he's still gonna have nightmares, flashbacks. At the very least."

"Yeah, and I'll handle it." His sharpest commanding voice. Thankfully the checkout lady took that moment to slid two paper bags across the counter and Steve picked up both their lunches, sliding into one of the tall barstools that overlooked the street. Just in case.

Sam slid into the seat next to him, toes a few inches off the floor. He had that patented worried-friend look and Steve tried not to get annoyed.

"Steve, that kind'a trauma isn't something you can talk your way through." Sam emptied the contents of his lunch onto the table but didn't take his eyes off Steve, eyebrows raised.

He gave Sam a funny look because he may be a little unstable and overly enthusiastic right now, but he wasn't a complete idiot. "Yeah, I know," Steve said slowly.

Sam pulled a skeptical face and Steve pursed his lips, wrestling the drink outta his bag.

"I'm not going in blind, Sam. This is Bucky. I know how he works."

"You know how he responds to being brainwashed for seventy years?" Sam said dubiously. Sometimes he forgot not everyone had read every SSR file on the two of them. Steve took a sip of his drink before setting it aside and swiveling his chair to face Sam directly, because they were gonna clear this up right the hell now.

"I know that he gets more nightmares when it's cold out, that stressful situations like seeing me in danger can get him worked up into a frenzy that slowly slips his resolve. I know he's triggered into flashbacks by doctors, leather, and laying on tables. Certain words too, like his serial number, can make him lose touch with reality. I know that getting drunk leaves him scared due to memories of the drugs."

Steve took a breath and held up a hand before Sam could interrupt, then continued with the same matter-of-fact voice.

"And most importantly, I know how to get him out of a flashback or a nightmare, or a moment where he's terrified and doesn't trust his own senses. He responds to touch, so long as it's not suffocating. His mind recognizes a healing hand as grounding, and it gives him something to latch on to."
Steve finished with another sip of his drink. Sam stared at him for a moment, that incredulous look he gave Steve when he first found out Captain America had a funny side. Ah, that's how it is? Yes, Sam, that's how it is. After a few blinks, Sam apparently caught up, voice finally working again.

"How the hell could you know all that?" He had that kinda awed and disbelieving tone back in his voice and Steve looked down, numbing his head from the memories trying to erupt.

"It's not the first time Bucky's been tortured."

The look on Bucky's face when Steve found him on that table in Azzano, the nights Steve'd jolt awake from Bucky's scream and roll over to the other side of the tent, cupping his face and whispering for him to come back to Steve. The fear of doctors, the way he used to slink across an inn to come sleep in Steve's bed for comfort.

The confusion left Sam's expression and now he just looked a little overwhelmed. He propped his arm on the table and shook his head, both their lunches ignored for the time being. He probably couldn't eat anyways.

"So, human contact brings him back. Alright man, what, just somebody grab his arm and he's okay?"
Sam talked with his hands and Steve wondered absentmindedly if a drunk Bucky still would.

"No, it doesn't work like that. It's just me."

"Meaning?" Sam had the confused look back and it took alotta effort not to sigh.

"As in its only my touch that grounds him, not just anyone." Steve clarified. Just last year he'd been explaining this same thing to the Commandos. They'd all taken it in stride, always been the backup for Steve while Steve held up Bucky. This part, he was good at.

"It...what??" Sam's voice raised a tad in volume but Steve didn't notice. He was looking out the floor to ceiling windows now, scanning the crowd for the figure in black he'd just seen a moment ago. It was probably nothing, but.

His eyes caught onto the man again, a black business suit weaving through the crowds. Unless Bucky turned into a sharp-dressed Filipino overnight, it wasn't him. Steve sighed, gaze scanning lazily over the crowds now.

"Steve, you said this was your best friend, right?" Sam asked slowly, tone nine levels of cautious.
Steve glanced over at him, furrowing his eyebrows.

"Yeah, since as long as I can remember. Why?"

"And it was nothin' else," Sam clarified. He had this look on his face but Steve must've not read this part of the 21st century manual because he had no idea what was going on.

"Sorry, I'm not following where you're going with this."

Sam sucked in a breath, looking hesitant enough to make Steve tense warily.

"You guys weren't...you know. More than friends?" He had a look of very cautious sympathy on his face and it took Steve a moment for the words to register.

When they did he barely kept a lid on it, narrowing his eyes instead of raising his fists. The last time they'd been called that both he and Bucky had come home with more bruises than they could count.
"Are you implying that Sergeant Barnes is a--a- ... after everything he's been through you accuse him of that? " Steve was aware he was seething, raising his voice, but this wasn't something he could keep calm about. His hands were curled in fists in his lap, mostly so he wouldn't break the table with his grip.

"Woah, woah, hold on. You mean you guys really weren't--"

"No! You really could say that about him? He's my best friend." Steve might as well be lecturing Tony, at the rate he was losing his cool. This was just not a topic he could talk about, ever.

"Okay man, but uh. Riley and I were thick as thieves and his touch wasn't...'healing' or whatever." Sam had both hands out in a placating gesture and Steve managed to at least stop yelling, but he was still glaring.

"Look, that's. That's different. Bucky's all I've ever had." The admission made him deflate, sighing and looking down at his hands again, squeezing them tighter as his voice dropped a few notches. "It's not what it looks like."

There was a pause, a moment of silence in air filled by quiet background chatter and floating German voices.

"But you do know what it looks like, right?" The words were still gentle, in that kind make-you-wanna-listen therapist voice and for some reason that made Steve feel about a hundred times worse.

Now it wasn't just scolding or arguing with Tony, Steve's brain reached that point where he was yelling at Nick Fury for compartmentalizing everything and not knowing Steve's best friend was the fucking Winter Soldier.

"What? What exactly? As if he hasn't been tortured enough over the last seventy years, you're adding this on too? Calling him a--a--"

"Wait. Oh my god. This isn't about some..." Sam waved a hand in the air, vague gesture Steve also couldn't interpret, "...homophobic 1940s thing, is it?"

Steve just looked at Sam, waiting for him to go on. Sam's face basically lit up, all the tension and confusion replaced with the patented eager I-get-to-help expression.

"Dude, you know being gay is totally cool now, right? Well, basically. How the hell did you not pick up on that? You've been off ice for like, half a year, man."

Steve had definitely noticed a few things, but he'd been too busy pining over his dead friend who turned out to be not-dead to really pay attention. So he deflected, picking at the label on his drink until the edges peeled.

"But it wasn't okay back then." Which was true, and avoiding the question. But Sam wouldn't stop pestering until he gave some sorta answer, so Steve tacked on, "And Bucky would never."

They both went quiet after that, slowly straightening out in their seats to watch pedestrians again. Steve was still looking for black, or a baseball cap, or anything that might indicate Bucky. The next Hydra base was a few miles from here, but odds were Buck'd attack at sunset or the middle of the night, so they had time.

Sam cleared his throat and Steve listened back in but didn't turn his head, still watching out the window.
"And Bucky would never," Sam repeated quietly. There was a pretty strong emphasis on the name and Steve's breath caught in his throat as Sam paused, both of them anticipating his next words. "What about you?"

What about Steve. All of the years, an entire lifetime of loving Bucky more than everything. What about him.

"I'll be in the car," Steve told him, standing up with a barstool screech, snatching his untouched lunch bag. Sam watched him quietly as Steve strode across the little diner, shouldering open the door and not looking back once.

The outside air hit his face with a blast of cold but it wasn't enough to wake him up from the dream he was living in. His entire life didn't feel real - suspended in some fairytale. Bucky was alive, they were 70 years into the future, the whole universe had flipped upside down; and Steve's deepest insides were getting exposed to the world in the process.

Maybe it wasn't a dream at all. It felt kinda like a nightmare.

~~~

"Alright Wilson, basement clear. I've got six bodies, no survivors, glass punched out on all the computer screens. Over."

"Rogers that," Sam smirked back over the comm and Steve rolled his eyes because he'd never ever heard that joke before. "Level three clear, two bodies, clean headshots through the window."

Steve sighed, going down on one knee next to a mangled scientist. This was their fourth Hydra base so far and for some reason, the scientists in the basement always had the worst deaths. Steve could guess why.

"Where are you, Bucky?" Steve mumbled softly, pressing two fingers to the snapped neck. It was just a precautionary measure, but the moment he touched the skin he froze. The man was still warm.

"He's still here," Steve hissed over the comm. "These bodies are still warm; he's not far. God, Sam, we've gotta find him."

"Shit. Okay Cap, meet me on the ground floor, we've gotta go at him as a unit."

He'd never gone up a flight of stairs faster. The stretch made his abdomen sparkle with pain - his stitches weren't quite as healed as he'd led everyone to believe - but he still made it to the groundfloor of the German factory in a matter of seconds.

The place looked empty, no sign of so much as a shadow. Sam had more flights of stairs than Steve did, but odds were he was sliding down them instead of walking.

The familiar wave of nausea built up in Steve's stomach as he spun around the empty space, looking and searching and trying to keep his knees from giving out. They were so goddamned close Steve's bones were aching with it.

He almost missed the flash of black. The world beyond the window was stuck in that lingering moment before nightfall, roads outside wet and glittering with streetlamps flickering on. The abandoned factory was in one of the endless rows of buildings with gorgeous architecture facades, windows facing over a cobblestone street, alleys signature to Europe cutting around the sides of the building. The black figure emerged from one of the alleys, crossed the street, visible for just one moment before he disappeared again. Steve was running before he could tell his feet to move.
The cold late-October air hit him like a brick but Steve sucked in a heavy breath through freezing wind and ran into the street. It wasn't crowded, but it wasn't empty either, just enough people around that Steve almost lost the figure in black and Sam almost lost sight of Steve.

He shoved past a gaggle of businessmen, apologizing swiftly in German but refusing to stop, cobblestones slick under his feet as he rounded the street corner. The shadow ducked into an alley and Steve's run turned into a sprint. He skidded to a stop in the mouth of the dark alley and had both hands up in placency before the figure-in-black even whipped around to look at him.

"Buck," Steve breathed, heart stopping in his chest. Icy eyes glared at his from over the top of a face mask, an exact duplicate of the one Steve had yanked off him on the bridge two weeks ago. It was startling to cognize Bucky's eyes over the Winter Soldier mask, but no moreso than the gun Bucky had pointed at Steve's chest.

A 1911, Bucky's favorite. The same gun he'd carried back in 1944. It was aimed at Steve and his heart was pounding for an entirely different reason. Did Buck remember?

Sam finally caught up, sliding on glittering cobblestone as he positioned himself behind Steve, tranquilizer gun held steady at the Winter Soldier. There wasn't a lot of skin showing, Sam'd have to shoot Buck's forehead if he wanted a solid hit. It wouldn't be easy; but that was fine, Steve had never wanted to drug him anyways.

"Bucky," Steve tried again, taking a step forward. The hardened eyes over the face mask didn't soften and the gun didn't lower, but it didn't fire either. The dim streetlights of the little German town were casting shadows over everything, but Steve could still make out the expression staring back at him in the dark: blank.

All the vulnerability from the helicarrier was gone, hidden behind the same terrifying, unmoving Winter Soldier persona, the same apathetic mask and wind-blown hair. He still hadn't said a word, just looked at Steve, gun raised.

Steve took a step closer. The gun moved with him, perfecting aim to stay on Steve's chest.

"Rogers, what--" Sam started from the behind him. Steve cut him off with a quick hand-motion and ignored the warning.

"Bucky, do you know who you are?" Steve asked carefully, inching closer. Buck still hadn't fired, perfectly still and aim steady. The last time he'd seen Bucky, there'd been this look in his eyes, this moment where his metal fist stilled in the air and maybe maybe he'd recognized Steve. He'd recognized that promise, that was for sure. Steve wasn't gonna let him forget it. "I'm not here to hurt you. Please, Bucky, let me help you."

Silence. But he hadn't shot Steve either, and Steve was only five feet away now. The closer he got, the more he squashed Sam's opportunity to tranq Bucky, but they had to take the chance that Bucky'd come peacefully. Steve needed Bucky's trust more than anything.

Right now he was looking at Steve with furrowed eyebrows, most recognizable tells covered with black over his nose and mouth. The metal arm was quiet too, for once. Every inch of him was deadly quiet and so still he could be a statue and Steve just needed Bucky to come home.

"Buck, you know me. Us against the world, remember?" Nothing. The expression didn't change in those hardened eyes. Steve inched closer, careful, approaching a caged animal. Except Bucky wasn't an animal, he was just hurting. Alone. "Just come back with me. I promise I won't let them hurt you."
He still hadn't pulled the trigger. On a leap of faith that had Sam hissing behind him, Steve reached forward, hands gentle as they closed around the gun, carefully sliding it from Bucky's grip.

On Bucky's birthday in 1944, the Howling Commandos had scream-sang Bucky awake and he'd pulled his gun on them in surprise. Steve had inched forward, eased the gun from Bucky's grip, and emptied the clip into his palm while the Commandos laughed and cheered at the bewildered look on Bucky's face, the disheveled state of his hair.

It was the same move now that had Bucky's gun in Steve's palms. He'd disarmed the Winter Soldier, Bucky'd let him get close and take the weapon away and maybe they were really gonna be okay--

He only looked down for about four seconds to make sure bullets were dropping outta the clip, but it was long enough. His head shot back up at the metallic sound; just as Bucky's metal arm grabbed onto the fire escape, swung his body upwards, then there was a crash and an explosion of glass as Buck kicked through another window, showering shards over Steve's head.

And then he was gone.

Sam cursed loudly and colorfully while Steve dropped the empty gun and launched himself onto the fire escape, peering through the hole in the window. There wasn't a trace of movement, empty darkness and an open window on the other end, white curtain fluttering in the breeze. Bucky was nowhere to be found.

~*~

"He looked good though, right?" Steve glanced over at Sam from shotgun. His driving privileges had been revoked when he apparently 'drove too slow' because 'looking at every damn citizen you pass' was determined an annoying idea by Sam and every other car on the road. But what if they just drove past Bucky, Steve had to make sure he was paying attention to the pedestrians. Whatever. Sam drove.

"I mean, he was a little thin, but it looked like he was taking care of himself alright. Good enough to knock out Hydra bases before we get there, anyways. It'd be easier to tell if he wasn't in uniform and wearing that stupid mask..."

Steve trailed off, staring out at the crowds because he might not be allowed to drive, but he could still look. Just in case. Sam tapped his thumbs on the car wheel, glancing back and forth between Steve and the road as he contemplated.

*

He was pretty sure Steve was half outta his mind, but that's why Sam was here, right? He could be giving physical backup if Steve wasn't an idiot and ruined their sole chance to take Barnes down. But yeah, Barnes looked way better than Sam'd been expecting.

Wait. Waitwaitwait hold on. Did that--how...

"Yeah, actually...he did look good," Sam said slowly, testing the waters. Blue eyes flicked over and Sam studied them for a moment before turning his attention back to the slow crawl of traffic. "Maybe a little too good. You, uh."

*

Sam gave him this look and Steve tapped his foot, mentally encouraging Sam to hurry up whatever he wanted to say so he could go back to checking the crowd for a black suited assassin. The look on Sam's face changed a little, his patience slipping a bit at something he saw in Steve's eyes. Or maybe around his eyes.

"You wanna explain how your cheekbone is still bruised and your torso is riddled with holes while the Winter Soldier doesn't have a single scratch?" The little inhale between Steve's lips was not intentional, but probably gave Sam the exact answer he was looking for. This was also on the list of conversations he did not wanna have.

Sam just kept going, his tone as close to condescending as his sweet demeanour ever got. "Not even a limp, a bruise, a single mark on him. So. What's up with that?"

"He's an assassin," Steve muttered, not meeting Sam's eyes.

"Yeah, man, he is," Sam agreed. For a very brief moment Steve perked a little with hope that his bullshit excuse just worked. But then, of course, Sam had to open his mouth again. "And you're a super soldier. What the hell happened in that helicarrier fight?"

"I assumed that if you walked away like that - or well, didn't walk away - then the Winter Soldier had to be half dead. At least."

Silence settled in the car and Steve fidgeted. He felt like he was getting lectured by Sarah all over again, or maybe Peggy, or Pepper. People who were very sweet but then suddenly you crossed them and you felt like total shit because you couldn't lie, but you also really didn't wanna have to fess up to the truth.

But, clearly, Sam had already figured out enough of the truth to harp on Steve, so.

"I didn't fight him," Steve said under his breath. Sam heard him anyways.

"You didn't. You didn't what?"

"I couldn't!" Steve deflated in his chair, looking out the window with his arms crossed over his chest and saying defiantly (and a little petulantly), "He's my friend."

"Holy shit. Holy shit." Sam's palm hit the steering wheel and Steve flinched. "You didn't-- have you lost your goddamned mind? Don't answer that. I know the answer to that."

"Look, Sam. I'm not expecting you to get it."

"What, that you risked eminent death because the deadliest assassin in the world is some guy you used to know seventy years ago? What's not to get about that?"

Steve made a hmph sound. Sam pinched the bridge of his nose like Steve gave him the biggest headache ever and he probably did. They rode in silence for a few more minutes, Steve scanning the crowd and Sam at least no longer seething, settling back into the disappointed-and-worried role.

A tight black leather jacket had Steve perking up, following the movement of another figure, before he registered the red hair and green eyes, slumping back in his seat with even more disappointment running through his veins.

"And I'm seriously supposed to believe he's not your ex-boyfriend," Sam finally said, glancing over at Steve again. Steve crossed his arms over his chest again, apologetic look morphing into an instant glare.

"Yes, you are, because that's not something you fucking joke about," Steve hissed, the curse word making Sam jump a little in surprise, but apparently he wasn't letting it go that quickly.

"Ex fiancé? Ex husband? Ex booty call?" At least the words were lighthearted now, which was better than nothing. But this was still something Steve was 300% not talking about.

"Would you stop that?" Steve snapped, palming his forehead and closing his eyes against a lifetime of memories that were trying to resurface now, of all times. Moments in the dark quiet of a Brooklyn apartment and an army tent, shared smiles and soft promises, fleeting hands holding hands and shoulders and his fingertips on Bucky's jaw, Bucky's big beautiful eyes blinking up at Steve. He couldn't afford to think about that right now, or ever, because he'd always read too much into those moments, hadn't he?

"Bucky would never. And don't-" Steve pointed very seriously at Sam "-try to spin this around on me. This conversation topic is off limits."

Sam just gave him a look, one of those skeptical one-eyebrow-raised looks that had Steve sighing and almost apologizing for blowing up, but this was still about Bucky, dammit, Steve couldn't bend on this. He couldn't let this go anywhere it hadn't been seventy years ago. Not when he was still trying to find Bucky, let alone deal with the aftermath of getting him back.

~~~

He watched through his sniper scope from the shadows of a building a block away as Steve Rogers got practically dragged into the gaudy plane with the huge word Stark written down the side.

Mission: Level 6
Target: Howard Stark
Parameters: Appearance of an accident

The details weren't crystal, but he retained the memory of cutting the brake lines on a target named Stark. He didn't know or care if it was any relation to the plane Steve was getting in. Steve was going to back to the United States of America now, likely convinced by the other man that their search was in vain.

He functioned only to take down Hydra. His mission was to avenge the smiling man in the museum exhibit, to rip the hearts outta every Hydra operative he could find and shove it down their throats.

That smiling man used to be him. And fuck if he wasn't going to make those bastards pay for destroying that.

But he'd already ripped apart seven bases, had locations and adequate bombs to send to four others. He wasn't following Steve Rogers to the United States; his next mission was simply in New York. He'd been researching data points from the encrypted SHIELD files that had been released and there was a project he needed to further expand. Access to that file came through an ex-SHIELD agent in New York, so that was why he was on the next flight across the Atlantic Ocean.

They were both in the air back to the USA at the same time and he didn't think about that once because it didn't matter. There was a new mission to plan.

There'd always be more Hydra to shred. He wasn't gonna let them take anything else away from him, even if it was just time. They weren't fucking worth that.

The airport, the street, a baseball cap pulled low over his head and his coat collar up, metal arm concealed in his jacket, walking down crowded sidewalks and blending in underneath the noise the way only he could. The empty subway line underneath 9th avenue, a backpack with the weapons and materials he'd gathered from the bank vault in Washington.

He wasn't as efficient changing into his armour as he should be. Performance error; unidentified source. The mask fit on last, covering his identity and providing the safety of anonymity. If Steve Rogers had recognized him, others might as well. The persona of the legend he had become must be maintained.

The identity of who he used to be may have been discovered, but the lethal assassin he was now wouldn't disappear in the presence of a past. There were still missions: primary being avenging Bucky Barnes. He'd fucking fight every person in the world that had destroyed that smile, he was pissed.

The moment of vulnerability he'd shown during the helicarrier fight was gone; shoved outta his system with time and an emotional washdown. A single decision remained in result; he wasn't going to kill Captain Rogers. He was too pissed to go slinking back to the broken state those words cause I'm with you 'til... had put him in, but killing the man that said them was a fixed limit he knew he was never going to cross.

It wasn't mercy. It was a decision based on instinct. A tactical choice. He did not show mercy.

Traveling through the shadows and subway lines and back alleys and rooftops from 9th avenue to Stark tower was easy, regardless of the daylight hour. Steve Rogers had likely gone home to the District of Columbia and he was the only person that stood a physical threat. So with Rogers three hours away and outta the picture, the emotions (and lack of) floating through him were perfectly balanced, efficient, and as powerful as ever.

Without handlers to control his every move, he didn't deteriorate to weakness. He'd only ever been weak under Hydra's hand; when free of the leash, he was powerful and lethal and dangerous. Now they were permanently gone, and he had no reason to be anything but the machine they set free on missions.

They'd held him back before, with their controlling grip and brainwashed promises. There was nothing to hold him back now. You may make yourself a demon trying to create an attack dog. If he loses his muzzle for a moment, there is no telling what he will kill. What he will become.

It was his turn to destroy now.

Stark Tower security was impeccable, but he was a professional. Regardless, the personal upper floors ran a tighter system and the mission didn't require anything above the third floor. There was one office he needed to visit and the ventilation shafts in the industrial section of the tower were wide enough to fit his shoulders.

Agent Maria Hill was more than a little surprised when he dropped down into her office, black mask no longer muzzle secure over his mouth and nose, gun aimed straight at her forehead. She lowered one hand slowly in the pretense of putting down her pen, and then she had a gun aimed at Bucky too.

He'd have shot her for that - she'd be dead already - if he didn't actually need information from her. The presence of a gun in her hand wasn't going to change anything.

"Sergeant Barnes," Hill said carefully, gun not waverin an inch as she looked at him, still sitting in her chair but in perfect stance otherwise. The name wasn't one he'd heard directed his way - Bucky, Buck, the Asset. 'The Winter Soldier' by the man with Steve, which was something he'd heard spoken a few times but had never connected to himself. He knew Hydra told him he'd shaped the century, and from the pieces that were sporadically coming back he knew that much was true. But they'd given him a name and never told him about it. Why would he've cared?

He didn't care now, although something inside tightened slightly at the directed military title. Another possible performance error; error unidentified. Source: 'Sergeant Barnes.'

"Tell me about Project T.A.H.I.T.I." Filtered through the mask but Agent Hill didn't so much as flinch, like she hadn't heard him at all, knew nothing of those words.

Bucky knew for a fact that wasn't true.

"Your project isn't relevant, I need access to a machine used on Agent Coulson," he amended, moving a micromillimeter closer, and Hill did flinch this time. She had a good poker face, but she was scared of him. That should lead to more expedient results.

"Agent Coulson died during the Battle of New York," Hill said cooly, arms still unwavering from the grip on her gun. If they ended up holding guns to each other all day, he was going to outplay her. She didn't have the strength or the training to maintain the position like he did.

"Where is the machine," Bucky commanded in response, not wording it like a question because it wasn't one, it was a direct order. He couldn't care less if Agent Coulson was dead or not, only the location of the machine mattered. The intel on finding its existence alone had been more difficult than any research he could remember doing.

"I don't know what you're talki--" Hill started, interrupted halfway through her protest by the sudden opening slam of the office door.

He spun and had another pistol drawn - the first still pointed at Hill - to aim at the door as well. Two guns, his arms at a 120 degree angle between them, but head turned towards the intruder now. He'd shoot the whole place down right now if he had to, before he let them take him.

But, of course, the person who slammed open the door wasn't even a SHIELD agent.

"Fuck. You again," Bucky cursed, metal fingers whirring as he relaxed his trigger finger just a fraction on the gun pointed at the door.

"Bucky," Steve Rogers gasped - that was clearly the decided way to greet the lethal Winter Soldier nowadays - in the same heartbreaking, breathy tone that had started this entire mess in the first place.

"You interrupt everything," Bucky told him, using the surprise on both of their faces to inch surreptitiously towards the window.

Steve Rogers wasn't supposed to be in New York, let alone in the Stark Tower on the same fucking day Bucky decided to hold one of its top agents at gunpoint. Rogers looked so damn shocked that Bucky was here - or maybe because he'd finally spoken - that he hadn't moved a single inch from where he'd busted through the door.

Hill must have hit some sort of alert button, or maybe Rogers just went barging into places. Based on the stupid reckless way he'd dropped his shield off of a burning helicarrier, he had the feeling Steve Rogers did stupid reckless things as a habit.

"Buck, I can't let you hurt Maria --" Steve started, that same pleading but righteous voice he'd used when he'd said People are gonna die, Buck. Please don't make me do this.
"Agent Maria Hill has vital information regarding the restoration of my memories," he interrupted flatly, waiting a few seconds for the absorption of information. He could pinpoint the moment Rogers identified with that statement because he suddenly turned to Maria Hill, who looked back at him in return.

Perfect execution and timing and now Bucky was three feet further from them both, only five from the window, two from the ventilation grate he'd dropped from. By the time they both looked at him again he was only one more move away from executing the escape route.

"Bucky, look, just put down the guns and we can talk, okay? Agent Hill will help, I won't let anyone hurt you." Rogers had gotten no less heartbroken in his tone, no less frivolous in his promises.

He was not worried about them hurting him. He'd kill them all before they touched a hair on his head. Elimination of masses was a familiarity. He'd blow up the whole damn tower - himself included - before he let them shove him in another box with a window.

Hydra had created an attack dog and now that the leash was gone he wasn't squeezing back into someone else's collar.

"Don't look for me," Bucky warned through the grates on his mask, then he tossed one of his guns in Agent Hill's direction - instinct would kick in, make her catch it to prevent uncontrolled discharge from a loaded gun instead of shooting him - then he was crashing through the glass window and flipping through the air, metal arm first.

~~~

"C'mon, man, talk to me," Clint said, blunt enough Steve couldn't ignore him. He sighed into the phone, glad Barton couldn't see the state he was in. As much as Tony had researched, the drinks he'd dropped off in Steve's apartment weren't doing much of anything but giving him a headache.

That didn't stop him from drinking them all.

Stressed fingers ran through blonde hair, tipping back his chair to stare at the ceiling. "I guess I just...I wish I could do more, you know? He's not even in his own head and I'm kinda doubting that cognitive recalibration works on seventy years of torture."

Barton snorted, a hundred miles away. He'd already asked if he could come over with pizza about three times in the four minutes they'd been on the phone. Steve kept declining. So he hadn't slept, didn't mean everyone should obsess over how he was...Steve didn't wanna talk about himself. He wanted to talk about Bucky, really, that was it.

"Do you believe in God?" Steve blurted out and Clint took a breath in surprise.

"...not counting Thor? I don't really think so. Do you?"

Steve bit his lip and nodded before he forgot Clint couldn't see him.

"Yeah, I. I keep--keep praying but. But Clint, I just wish I could make some sort'a...deal, to. To trade places with him. Make it me instead...he never should've gone through that. Not him."

Clint made a soft sound and Steve squeezed his eyes shut, trying to keep the tears out. "You didn't get'a meet him, but anybody who knew Bucky'd agree - he's the best damn person I-- ...had it so hard when we were kids, always lookin' out for me, even worse when we were teens. He only enlisted cause I begged him to."
"It wasn't that he didn't wanna help out, he really did, but he kept saying his job was to look out for me first...he finally came to his senses, thank god, and it was so damn hard to watch him go but. Did y'know he got promoted to Sergeant before he shipped out? Best sharp-shooter in the army. Bet he'd've given you a run for your money."

Steve snorted darkly, remembering that actually, Bucky was probably a hell of a lot better now than he even was then.

"Course, he still is a sharp-shooter. He used to be humble about it, but I was so damn proud of that, of how hard he worked, how incredible of a fighter he was...and Hydra took that, they took him and twisted all the amazing things into--into- this machine. He was perfect long before they took him, and Zola - goddamn him - must've seen that, must've seen the same thing we all did. Took Buck away from me before I even got to Azzano...

"And then, after he'd gone through hell, you know what he did? This is the part of the story that never made the exhibits, that no one tells in history books because nobody knows. Even I wasn't s'posed t'know. But thing is, after Azzano, they told him to go home. All the paperwork filled out to send him off with an honorable discharge on grounds of psychological trauma. So you know what he did? He told 'em forget it, flung himself back into battle with one of the most prestigious squads in the army cause he didn't want me to be alone.

"The hell kind'a person does that? Sergeant James Barnes, from the 107th. It's just...it's not fair. It shouldn't've been him. He's the best goddamned man to walk the earth, better than me. Way better than me. He f-fell...that day, because he picked up my shield, was protecting me, and it should've been me, it should've. I'd give anything for it to be me, now, instead. Anything."

He fell quiet, the darkness settling back in around him. Barton breathed over the line for a little while, letting all of Steve's words sink in. He really didn't know what to say - what could you say to something like that? Steve was hurting, immeasurably, and whatever it's going to be fine's he was getting from everyone else clearly weren't working.

Clint cleared his throat, tapping his fingers on the side of his phone as he prepared his words. He meant every one.

"Well. Steve, I..." Clint closed his eyes, wishing he could just shoot Rogers' pain away. Real life never had enemies that easy. "I'll pray for him, tonight. For you. Just so you know. I- call me whenever you need to, okay? I'm here."

There was a muffled sound over the line like Steve was snuffling back tears, then a choked voice whispered back, "Thanks, Clint."

Clint wiped under his eyes and smiled, wondering when the hell his life had become teary-eyed support crew for the legends of museums. This wasn't usually part'a the assassin gig. He wouldn't trade it, though.

"Course. You take care, Rogers."

"I'll try," Steve promised, which was really the best he could do. It felt like just about the only thing left to do.

~~~

Three-and-a-half weeks since last checking in with handlers. Three times the longest outta cryofreeze since 1969. Three-and-a-half-weeks without arm maintenance, nutrient shots, needle-induced sleep.
Without sleep at all. He'd given time to regenerate between missions; moved efficiently, held still, kept at optimum performance to minimize energy loss and physical damage.

Simply didn't have the luxury of closing eyes. Too dangerous. He was vulnerable the moment he broke awareness. Too many revengeful-individuals to risk a moment without perfect control.

It was catching up to him. Fatigue wasn't a concept he'd dealt with in decades. Neither was the responsibility of upkeep - he had no knowledge of the nutritional requirements needed to survive, no ingredient list for the drugs pumped into him in place of foods and water.

This body was failing. Stomach slightly sunken, knocking balance off from perfect equilibrium he'd carried for years. Eyes burned, soles of feet felt like they'd been sliced off, a feeling he knew first-hand.

Internal organs contracted with awful sounds, vision spotty at the edges. This body was failing him and it'd end him too, if he didn't regain control soon. If sleep wasn't located, it'd come involuntarily in the form of unconsciousness and vulnerability would increase substantially enough to insure death.

Unsustainable. The errors were exacerating. Inconsistencies, flaws, noise he hadn't dealt with in decades. Performance errors; source: lack of body regeneration.

There were no more safe houses, bases. He wouldn't bunk up in a Hydra facility if his existence depended on it, which it did in this case. He had nowhere to go, nowhere that was safe. Everyone was looking to seize or shred him.

Everyone except that idiot with the shield who kept insisting Bucky was safe with him. Those words were empty; but there'd been plenty of opportunities to kill him and Steve Rogers was the only one who didn't seem interested in taking them.

Rogers's been willing to die to prove he wouldn't hurt Bucky. All he needed was an hour beneath a roof that wouldn't kill him. Unfortunately, in isolation - the isolation of an attack dog turned on its master and not interested in its country - Rogers' roof was the only roof that qualified.

~*~

Tony'd offered Steve a floor in the tower, but he'd declined. If Bucky ever stopped running away from him, they didn't need the added pressure of dealing with Tony Stark and the high-security minimum-privacy the Avengers Tower offered. So instead he let Sam hole up on his floor in the tower and picked a New York apartment for himself, the closest to Tony's that wasn't surrounded with constant traffic and the bustle that New York seemed notorious for nowadays.

It was light on security, set up a little like his place in DC, except less modern. The left wall of the main room was exposed brick, across from a couch, coffee table, and an armchair with a reading lamp. The bedroom took up the front half of the apartment: just a desk, built in bookshelves, and a bed pushed up against a few windows overlooking the busy New York street.

The u-shaped kitchen was basically part of the living room, only a stretch of counter with bar stools dividing the two rooms. The dining table sat at an angle a few feet from that counter - on the living room side - and was way bigger than he needed; but the whole place felt like it was bigger than he needed. It worked though, so he didn't complain.

The stairs up to his floor were particularly steep today, or maybe his body was just exhausted from running around Manhattan all day looking for Bucky. There'd been no sign of him in a few days, but Steve'd find him somehow.
He just kept running Bucky's words in his head over and over again, trying to figure out how much of Bucky was actually in the Winter Soldier right now. Fuck, you again. The cursing was Buck to a tee - then again, he'd gotten a who the hell is Bucky from the very beginning. You interrupt everything. The sarcastic comment, that was definitely Bucky. But was it just a speech pattern?

His accent was entirely gone - he'd never had a particularly heavy one, but now his words were crisp and clear to the point that it almost didn't sound like Bucky's voice.

Steve was still contemplating that voice - Don't look for me - as he unlocked the apartment door, pocketing his keys after he locked it behind him. He didn't instantly dart for the lights like most people in this century, so it wasn't until he tossed his backpack down on the kitchen counter that he even noticed.

Someone was in his apartment. The realization sparked simply instinct: he grabbed his shield and inched to the edge of the cabinets, back pressed against the dark wood as he peeked around the corner. The pale sliver of light from the far window didn't illuminate much, but the glint off that metal hand was unmistakable.

His heart pounding in his chest for all the wrong reasons, Steve stepped around the corner and set his shield back on the ground. Bucky was sitting at his dining table, face and chest hidden by the shadows and metal arm propped on the surface.

"You're here," Steve said, sounding more like a question than a statement. Bucky didn't move, just looked at him in the darkness with unreadable eyes. Steve felt like he was floating; this couldn't be real. But Bucky was still right there. For some reason, Bucky had finally come to him and Steve just couldn't screw it up this time.

"What can I do?" He'd started forward cautiously, hands in clear sight and moving slowly enough that Buck could stop him if he needed. The metal arm made a soft sound, plates adjusting, and it was just about the sweetest sound Steve had ever heard. "Is there anything you ne-"

"Are you going to kill me?" Bucky interrupted. Steve froze, heart breaking a little more in his chest at the distrustful words. Hadn't Steve proven to him again and again that he could never kill Bucky?

"No, Buck, never. You're my friend." The words had just as much conviction now as they had the first time he'd said them. Steve held his breath as Bucky looked at him a little longer, then some of the tension in his shoulders deflated a little and he stood.

With his eyes on Steve the entire time, Bucky walked carefully towards the window in the living room, keeping the brick wall at his back. Now that he wasn't in the shadows, Steve could see a vague outline of details. He was favoring his left leg and his right arm was tucked carefully against his chest. His cheeks were more sunken than Steve remembered, his eyes looked downright tired, and - thank god - since his mask was finally off, the stubble on his jaw made him look older, the draw of his mouth sadder.

He stopped in the corner of the room, sinking gracefully to the floor and curling on his side with his back pressed to the wall, head pillowed on his right arm, metal one bent protectively over his chest. Steve just stood there, stupefied, as Bucky's eyes closed and long pieces of hair draped over his face.

Buck should've looked young and innocent, but there was something about the position that couldn't help but allude danger, power. It still wasn't hard to see the Bucky he'd slept beside in tents, to mentally push the long hair aside and see that pouty, exotic mouth smirking up at him.

The desire to say something was overwhelming, but Steve kept his mouth shut and his feet silent as he slunk to the couch, watching the intruder's resting body with teary eyes. Bucky'd come to him for a place to sleep, which felt colossal. But the tears were for sorrow too: how damaged did Buck have to be to collapse unguarded in the home of someone he could (possibly) only remember meeting four times?

He didn't have to debate staying awake all night, this was the most important vigil Steve'd ever take. Buck slept the whole night through, perfectly silent and still terrifying in his weak, unconscious state. The only moment he let Bucky outta his sight all night was for the few minutes it took him to find a pencil and paper. He drew by moonlight, selfish and probably half outta his mind, but this may be the last time he ever got to see his best friend and he couldn't imagine not having something tangible to hold on to.

Around seven in the morning, Steve's legs groaned and his eyes burned a little as he rubbed them and got up quietly from the couch, still watching the heap of black from the kitchen counter as he set a kettle on the stove and cracked eggs into a pan. His stove was thankfully quiet, and Bucky must have been more exhausted than Steve had given him credit for because he still hadn't budged since the moment he laid down.

The light of dawn filtered into the apartment, finally bright enough to count what physical injuries might have lead Bucky to his door. His right arm looked entirely off, like the angle at the elbow was wrong. The clothes that had once been tight and solid over his muscular frame were loose around his abdomen and waist. Steve's fists clenched automatically at the idea of Bucky losing weight, failing to take care of himself. But at least he was here now; Steve could take care of him, if Bucky let him.

Which was easier said than done.

It was around nine in the morning when Bucky suddenly shot up, scrambling to his feet with wide eyes and a knife in his hand, chest heaving with confusion. Steve was already there, both hands up, keeping his distance from across the room as he carefully calmed Bucky back down.

"You're safe. We're in my apartment in New York, you've been asleep for about eleven hours, I made you food - you haven't been eating well - there's coffee or tea, and I think you set your broken arm wrong." Steve took a deep breath after his mini speech and the air between them settled into a stalemate; both of them staring at each other from across the living room with arms raised and hair disheveled.

Bucky caved first. The metal arm lowered and the human one slipped the knife back into a pocket. Steve deflated a little and grabbed the plate of eggs and toast off the kitchen counter, sliding it onto the table he'd found Bucky at last night. The icy eyes were still looking at Steve like he was crazy. But when Steve slid a mug of tea across the table too, Buck unfroze completely, walking over to the table like he owned the whole damn apartment.

Confident hands snagged the mug off the table then Bucky's hardened gaze was scanning over Steve's apartment as he lifted the drink to his lips.

*

He probably should say some form of a thank you. His plan to recalibrate his body had worked, Steve Rogers hadn't killed him - no one had killed him - and the rest that he needed was obtained.

Although he had saved Steve's life from drowning in the Potomac River; so they were even, now.

With another quick glance at Rogers (Bucky avoided looking at him as much as possible, something shifted inside him every time he did and he wasn't comfortable with that), he sat the mug back down on the table and contemplated door versus window. Knowing Captain Rogers' security level in SHIELD, his apartment was surely being watched. Window it was.

"Bucky?" Steve called out behind him but he couldn't afford to listen, he just flicked the window up with his metal arm and launched over the edge into the sharp light of the outside world.

Last night had been the riskiest thing he'd done that he could remember. There had been no way to know for sure that he'd be safe under Steve Rogers's watch...except for that somewhere deep inside him, his body was telling him that with Steve Rogers was the only place he really should be.

~~~

The next four days, Steve was going outta his mind. He'd gotten plenty of lectures from Sam and Tony about how damn stupid he was to let a deadly assassin sleep in his apartment, lectures from Pepper and Bruce about how it wasn't safe or fair to either of them to try to go this alone, and a very lengthy talk with Maria Hill about why the hell Bucky was under the impression that she had a way to restore his memories.

Maria was an expert about dancing around answers. She couldn't guarantee that, she said. It was all rumor, Barnes must have misread information somewhere, he must be jumping to conclusions. Steve had strategized with Buck in the war, there was nothing about him that misread anything anywhere. But he got virtually nowhere with her, besides the warning that she wouldn't hesitate to shoot the next time he came barging into her office.

He went everywhere he could think Bucky'd go. There wasn't a single peep of him, not even a Hydra base explosion on the radio or anything.

Steve could barely sleep, just constantly pacing, jumping at shadows, always searching and watching and waiting and praying that Bucky'd come find him again. There were two nights he woke up around three a.m. and called out Bucky's name in the darkness, so sure that the shadow in the corner had to be him. It never was.

The ghost was haunting him again, except now he was real and he kept disappearing and disappearing. He was always just outta reach and Steve was always dreaming that those perfectly clear hands were still here, holding him.

On the fifth day, a local news channel reported that a bank in upper New York had been blown to smithereens and the 'destruction of this historical landmark' would 'forever be mourned by its citizens.' Steve was not mourning anything, instead he grabbed his cell and dialed up Tony, gave him the report to calculate into the pattern they were trying to track of Bucky's hits.

The next night, Steve opened the door of his apartment to a bloody mess in his kitchen. He dropped his keys in surprise and Bucky spun around, sewing needle between his teeth and shirt torn across his left side.

Steve's heart stopped beating for a moment and his entire world narrowed down to the ghost in the flesh. Bucky was here. He had to get a grip on himself.

"Are you okay?" He glanced around the kitchen, the blood-smeared counter and red drops on the tiles. He tried to keep the horror from his expression as eyes widened, taking in the half-sewn gash across Bucky's hip. Buck's human hand pushed the hair outta his face - the same move he used to do to smooth out his pomade - as he looked down at his side.

"Losing efficiency," Bucky muttered, bunching his shirt up a little higher to slide the needle into torn skin and sew together the next stitch. Steve blinked a few times - he didn't really know what to say to that - before he decided fuck it and stepped into the kitchen, walking in a mimic of the powerful confidence Bucky held now.

Bucky's head whipped up to look at him and Steve held out his hand for the needle. "Let me help.
It'll go faster." The world was spinning and Bucky had come to him for help again, but Steve had to get it right this time, he had to find a way to make Bucky stay.

After another moment or two of calculating glares, Buck relented and handed over the needle and string. Steve dropped to his knees, one hand pushing up Bucky's shirt higher so he could properly see the cut. The deepness of it was shocking enough that Steve leaned back, looking up to catch Bucky's eyes. "What did you do?"

"Blew up a Hydra site. They were expecting me," he answered simply, like that somehow explained the gouge in his side. Steve shook his head and started threading the needle, holding his breath to keep his hands from shaking. Bucky was here. Bucky was here.

"Well, it's pretty bad." He kept his eyes directly on the wound, forcing himself not to look up or change the inflection of his voice on the next words. "You should get some sleep while it heals."

Silence responded, heavy enough that Steve eventually forced himself to look back up. Bucky was looking down at him with an expression Steve used to know so well - the fire in his gaze hadn't faded, even if the light behind his eyes was gone now. It was almost like they were back in the war again, fretting over Bucky's injuries while Bucky gave him glares he only half meant, hating to be babied but regretfully appreciative of Steve's presence.

He wanted to make some lame comment about how this was not how Bucky had promised they'd be spending their next November, but the joke would fall flat without the memory to accompany it.

"...what's this thing with November? Last November, captured. This November, bullet in the leg.
You keep near dyin' on me and I'm not sure I can take much more. What's the plan for next year's November, just so I can plan ahead emotionally?"

"How bout next November we have a Commandos Thanksgiving at our place in Brooklyn?" Bucky winced as he shifted a little, but still managed a shadow of his old smile up at Steve. Steve had to bite his lip to keep the tears from welling up in his eyes...

Well they certainly weren't having a Commandos Thanksgiving after all. It was only a year ago for Steve, but how far away was it for Bucky? Did Bucky even have that conversation anymore? Did he have any of their conversations? Did he even know who Steve was?

"Do you...do you remember anything?" Steve whispered, hating how scared his voice sounded in the dark echo of the kitchen. Bucky's gaze quickly cut away, the same uncomfortable movement he always made under scrutiny.

"I went to the Smithsonian," Bucky answered instead, left hand curling up a bit with a soft whirr. "I know who you are."

Steve nodded, unconsciously running a thumb over the skin underneath the gash on Bucky's hip.
Bucky either didn't notice or didn't care. He just kept looking away. It wasn't exactly the answer Steve was looking for, but if Bucky needed space then Steve wasn't going to push. Not about that, not yet.

"Can I get you anything to eat? Have you been eating?" He started back up on the last few stitches, trying to memorize every single breath expanding the body under his hands.

"I don't have a positive reaction to most foods." Bucky's voice sounded like it was reporting something to a commanding officer, leaving Steve to guess what the hell that might mean. Hydra had kept him on fluids, according to the ridiculously brief file Natasha had given him. Which meant he'd probably hurled up anything he tried to eat - Steve did the very best he could to block out the mental image of Bucky puking in some bathroom somewhere, all alone and feeling betrayed by his own body.

"I could cut up some apples, if you want?" Steve bit the string and tied off the final knot on Bucky's stitches, regretfully checking their dexterity with a slight tug on the skin below it. Bucky didn't even flinch at the pain, which was worse than if he'd punched Steve for it.

When he straightened back up, Bucky still hadn't answered, just kept his posture guarded and in constant attack-mode as he leveled Steve with his gaze. "Apples it is, then," Steve said, stepping back to grab a plate from the cabinet.

Bucky watched him from his post in the kitchen with unblinking eyes, arms crossed over his chest and hair falling over his forehead in disarray.

He took four of the apple slices when Steve slid the plate over to him and Steve counted that as a win. He slept sitting up this time, in the same corner with his head tipped back against the brick wall. Steve stayed up all night again, just watching Bucky sleep and running a thousand things through his head of what the hell to say when the sun broke into dawn.

It ended up not mattering what he planned; Bucky left out the window before Steve could open his mouth.

~~~

"How're you holdin' up man?" Sam asked, pushing a cup of coffee into Steve's free hand. Steve lifted his head from where it'd been propped on his other hand, the fingers unthreading from his hair leaving it disheveled. Losing efficiency, he considered saying. Instead he stared at his blond reflection in the dark coffeecup and pictured the shadow behind him taking shape into a certain Brooklyn sniper.

"I'm doin' fine," he managed, lifting the bitter drink to his lips. Sam perched on the edge of the dinner table, crossing his arms over his chest and raising his eyebrows in that yeah, sure, okay expression that said Steve had convinced him zero.

"You know, I can stay, sleep on the marshmallow bed. Just so you have somebody here the next time he comes." Sam had that same kind tone in his voice but Steve just sighed, scooting his chair back from the table. Bucky showing up wasn't killing Steve, it was the morning after when he left that was destroying him.

"Thanks, but I think he'd just stay out until you left." The coffee tasted about nine times too sweet to be coffee and honestly, he missed the disgusting dirt-flecked joe the Commandos used to gamble over.

Steve stood and slide his coffee across the counter so he could lean against the edge and stare off at the window, waiting and wishing for Bucky to appear, even though he'd never come in daytime and certainly never when Sam was visiting.

"Do you wanna talk about it?" Sam offered quietly. There was so much worry in his face that Steve wanted to pick himself outta the rut if that'd make Sam feel better. No one else deserved to carry the weight of Steve's sorrow. But he hurt too much to not say something.

"Talk about what?" he sighed, crossing his arms over his chest. "About how my best friend spent seventy years getting tortured and now only shows up at my door when he's bleeding or about to pass out from exhaustion?"

Felt like he was in his old body again, waiting anxiously in the apartment for Buck to get home from his night out drinking, worried he'd pissed off someone's boyfriend again, maybe ran into one of the bullies Steve had taken on last week again, except with alcohol dulling his sharp fighting skills this time.

Only now he had a lot worse to worry about than bullies. Bucky was in the wind without his own mind, hunted by the government and Hydra and too terrified or stubborn to turn to Steve for help.

"Steve, man, you know none of that's your fault, right?" Sam interrupted his thoughts and Steve looked down, scuffing the toe of his boot on the wood floor.

"Yeah, I know," he said absentmindedly. The edge of his boot left a black smudge on the wood panel and Steve glared at it.

"None of it's your fault," Sam said again and Steve sighed, leaving the floor alone and lifting his head back up.

"I know." He'd been telling himself that over and over since the train fall, since Peggy had forced those words into his brain. It's wasn't your fault. Did you read the report? Yes. Then you know that's not true. But she hadn't let him wallow in his guilt, she'd held his gaze in that decayed bar and told him he had to respect Bucky.

Allow him the dignity of his choice. Steve had always wondered what the power behind that statement was. She'd said it with so much depth, like she'd known something about Bucky's choice that Steve didn't.

But this time, it hadn't been Bucky's choice. It hadn't been his choice at all to be turned into the Winter Soldier.

"It wasn't your fault." Steve looked over at Sam that time, a little curious because Sam'd said that already, three times now, and Steve had already agreed with him twice.

"I know," he replied for the third time, letting his mouth turn up a little tightly at both corners, letting Sam see that he was okay, he knew it wasn't his fault. Maybe the soft smile had been a bad idea, because suddenly Sam got up from the table, taking a few steps closer to Steve.

"It wasn't. Your fault," Sam articulated slowly, and this time Steve couldn't keep the confusion out of his features. The look on Sam's face was so serious, the most serious Steve had ever seen him, like the words he was saying were the most important words in the world.

"I know," Steve shrugged, feigning indifference. Sam could be all intense and everything right now but Steve didn't wanna get dragged down that road. He didn't have the ability to deal with this right now. He had promised he'd always save Bucky from that table and the one time it counted, he hadn't.

Sam stepped up directly in front of him, boxing Steve into the counter and Steve straightened a little, arms still crossed over his chest. "It wasn't your fault."
"I know." The words came out a little clipped this time; he was getting impatient. Steve didn't wanna play whatever stupid game Sam was getting at. Sam was supposed to be a support team, not rile everything up and make it worse.

"It wasn't your fault," Sam repeated, he hadn't even looked for Bucky, stepping closer and that was it, Steve couldn't keep dealing with that patient, serious look on Sam's face.

"Would you stop it? I know." He was brinking on the edge of his temper and Steve didn't wanna lose it, not on Sam who had done nothing but been helpful. Except right now, when he was doing...this.

But he did know. He knew. Goddammit, he knew. Because it was him that didn't try harder to save Bucky, it was him that didn't notice all the signs, it was him who condemned Bucky to this.

It was him- Steve Rogers. (It was actually kinda funny, because he was Captain America, who was meant to be this incredible, brave person who fought for freedom and justice. And Steve- well, he was just a coward who had more blood on his hands than he'd ever be able to deal with.)

"No, you don't get it Steve. It's not your fault." Bucky had been tortured for seventy years because Steve had never fucking asked what happened in that torture chamber. Because he'd never noticed Bucky had been enhanced. Because he'd been too damn wrapped up in himself and the stupid fucking mission to jump in after Bucky when he fell from the train.

"Stop fucking with me, man," Steve warned, his arms uncrossing so he could curl his hands around the edge of the counter, ground himself, try not to be swallowed up by the tone of Sam's voice, the promise he was making, the way he was swearing to Steve -

"It's not your fault," Sam repeated again, bold as brass.

Okay, Steve was getting legitimately angry now. Angry at Sam for whatever the fuck he was doing, angry at his own stupid body that was betraying him like always, letting tears well up in the corner of his eyes. He looked Sam straight in the eye, words as low and commanding as he could make them.

"Not you, Sam," his voice broke slightly over the you and another wave of rage boiled up in his veins. Sam was supposed to be the caring one, the one who made everything easier. Not the one who fucked up Steve's insides. "Don't you do this to me."

Sam took that final step closer, his hand landing heavy on Steve's shoulder, holding his gaze with those overwhelmingly serious eyes. Steve was hanging on the edge of a cliff, waiting for the wind to tip him either way, when Sam's voice dropped to a whisper and the words echoed straight into Steve's soul.

"It's not your fault."

And the dam broke. All of the internal anger and guilt and sorrow and loss, everything that he'd bottled up since the bridge, since they woke him from ice, since the goddamned train just boiled up and over and the resolve Steve had been scrambling with just crushed and he had only meant to push him but his temper forgot he wasn't little anymore and Steve shoved Sam, hard, making him stumble over his feet and crash into the table.

"Don't you dare say it's not my fault," Steve snarled, towering over the table, high-strung and trembling. "Don't fucking dare. You don't fucking know. What, am I just supposed to get away with it because I'm- I'm Captain America and it was for the greater good or whatever the hell excuse I'm supposed to have? Because Bucky was my best friend. He was my responsibility and I let him die."

Steve spun around, hands landing back on the counter again as he tried to catch his breath - calm down, Stevie, it's okay, just breathe with me - except he wasn't having a fucking asthma attack because he was supposed to be fucking fine and Bucky wasn't here to help him because STEVE HAD LET HIM DIE.

The counter crushed underneath his hands, crumbling into dust and sharp shards that instantly sliced open his palms and shot pain signals into Steve's brain, making the whole room tip and leer around him because it was all too much, it was all too fucking much.

He spun back around to Sam, bloody hands clenched in fists at his sides as his brain short-circuited and his body wasn't just betraying him, it wasn't even his anymore, he was just watching from some distant part of his brain as he exploded.

"No, I didn't even let him die, I gave him worse than that, I got him tortured for seventy years and turned into a fucking war machine all because I was so fucking blind and weak and I failed him, I failed him. I loved him and I didn't even ask about the torture and made him go on a fucking suicide mission and I let him slip through my fingers and I couldn't catch his hand in time and you wanna stand here and tell me it wasn't my fault?!!"

He couldn't remember spinning back around again, but then his fist was lodged through the drywall and pieces of paint and dust were swirling through the air and he was coughing and his knuckles were broken, bleeding skin but he couldn't feel it, he couldn't feel any of it, couldn't feel anything but the broken heart in his chest that was making it so hard to breathe he was seeing black spots at the edges of his vision.

Steve shook his hand out, little drops of red flying, but he couldn't feel it, couldn't feel anything, he was just shaking and shaking and he felt like clutching his head and screaming but instead he just quivered like an arrow on a bow, drawn and waiting but exploding and flying at the same time and the room still wasn't standing up straight.

"I killed him. I killed him. I killed him. I killed him and I destroyed him and IT'S MY FAULT. I KILLED THE MAN I LOVED AND I BROUGHT BACK A GHOST!! I RUINED THE ONLY GOOD THING I HAVE EVER HAD IN MY LIFE AND HOW AM I SUPPOSED TO LIVE WITH THAT?!?!!"

His voice was raw, copper on his tongue, his ears were ringing, his chest was heaving with rushed, heavy breaths, and he could feel every pulse of his veins and every beat of his broken, shattered, crumbling heart singing with the adrenaline.

In the disconnect, he didn't hear Sam get up until he was standing in front of Steve again, both hands gently taking Steve's clenched fists, holding all four together in front of them as Steve looked up at him with wild eyes, still shaking, still bleeding, about to explode and punch the wall - or worse - all over again.

Then dark brown eyes caught on his and Sam whispered, softly,

"It's not your fault."

Steve collapsed then, sinking down to the ground with a broken cry. Sam's arms wrapped over Steve's shoulders and Steve curled up as little as he could, tears overflowing and sobs wracking his body as Sam rocked him back and forth over the dusty, bloody tile, murmuring the same occasional It's not your fault.

He hid his face in his arms, cried and shook and cried and cried and this was like watching Bucky fall all over again, except the technicolor memory came in black and white now, another
Bucky, on the bridge, looking at him with wide eyes, lifting a gun to Steve in fear as Steve just stared and stared and Bucky was alive, he was alive now,

His Bucky, the same Bucky, had been transported here to the twenty-first century with him. Maybe there really was nothing he could have done. Maybe the only thing left to do was fix it. Steve couldn't carry this guilt, not if he wanted to bring Bucky home.

"I can't-" Steve choked out, fingers closing tightly over one of the arms wrapped around his shoulders. He couldn't lift his head yet, not when there were still tears rushing down his cheeks, but he'd just pushed Sam into a table and he'd yelled and punched things and he was so so messed up and so not okay and, "I'm so sorry," he whispered shakily. "I'm so sorry. Sam, I'm so-"

"It's okay," Sam promised, still rocking them over the floor. "It's okay. We'll get him back, Steve. I promise. You'll get him back."

You'll get him back. It was Steve's turn now: his turn to come around the corner with his fists raised, his turn to shout pick on someone your own size.

Going back all the way to the beginning, coming around full circle - it was Steve's turn to save James Buchanan Barnes.

Chapter End Notes

The "it's not your fault" scene was inspired by both my lovely Irish friend and the movie Good Will Hunting, which is probably one of the best cinematic / therapeutic scenes ever and can be found here xx WARNING: it is a very intense scene featuring depictions of graphic violence and adult language

Anyways, we have just dabbled into the beginning of our journey and I have some huge things planned, I hope you enjoy! Thank you all so much for reading.
The night air was freezing, as always, but he wasn't bloody, broken, or excessively exhausted. Tired, but not critically. He couldn't place why he was standing underneath Rogers' window, just that he'd been weaving through crowds until he suddenly appeared here, like his boots had chosen the path instead of his mind.

Careless. Inefficient. Performance error. If his cognitive processes were dysfunctional enough to drive him here subconsciously, how many potential threats had he avoided by luck? If his body was falling into automatic patterns, how long before he was dead or captured?
He didn't go inside, that night. Or the next. Or next. It was dangerous that he'd gone at all. Wouldn't allow Steve Rogers to direct his footsteps.

Instead he drifted to the Potomac, found himself kneeling in sand beside the river, eyes shut, other senses heightened. It was foolish to tell himself for any reason but the memory of saving Steve's life here. He told himself anyways.

Jogging memories, digging deeper into a locked mind, and locating Agent Hill's machine were the only priorities; each obviously behind staying alive. And taking out more Hydra when convenient.

But something was burning in his chest. And it wouldn't leave him be. For a week, everytime he found himself outside Steve Rogers' window, he kept running back to the Potomac. He'd been fine, better than fine. He'd been perfect. Then this pain settled inside and no matter what he did, it wasn't going away.

It was useless to keep going to the river. But there was something about slipping under the surface of cold waves, slipping to sweet silence. In the water, he could scrub clean. In the water, he could purge and look up at the sky through golden ripples and ask questions he knew the sky couldn't answer.

Eight days since the last time he'd seen Steve Rogers; the burning in his chest hadn't lessened any. Something could be medically wrong with him, but he couldn't access accurate medication. He couldn't go anywhere; nowhere was safe.

Maybe he needed sleep. He probably needed sleep.

It'd be a confounding error to not enter the window this time. If he avoided Rogers any longer, clearly, it was about more. Which it wasn't. This was about sleep and safety. This was the last time, he told himself.

Bucky went through the window.

Admittedly, it was late. He shouldn't've been surprised Steve Rogers was asleep, although the location of where he slept was more surprising. He'd expected Rogers to be in the bed, as everyone else in the century slept. But upon slipping into the bedroom, he nearly tripped over Steve. On the floor.

It was only his acute sense of awareness that saved him from tumbling to the ground. Instead he froze, carefully stepped over Steve Rogers' sleeping body, and gravitated into the corner of the room where shadows would hide him, incase Steve woke.

The bed was tightly made with hospital corners, as though Rogers'd never bothered to sleep in it. Bucky curled deeper into the corner and wondered why.

The light from the window illuminated the features on Steve's face from this angle, cutting white strips of moonlight and New York streetlights across his jaw and cheekbones. The bruising around Steve's cheek was gone, near-translucent pearly skin. His blue eyes were closed, casting shadows from long eyelashes Bucky'd never noticed before.

He wondered what Steve'd been like, when he was tiny, like the exhibit showed. If his eyelashes'd been that long. If the laughing Bucky Barnes from the museum noticed Steve Rogers' eyelashes, when he was big or small.

As always, after being outta cryofreeze too long, some basic memories were coming back. The most recent missions, the very beginning. A newspaper with a blurry face he couldn't remember anymore. He remembered the bridge now, the first time Steve Rogers'd seen his face and asked Bucky?
He remembered after. He remembered remembering, seeing Steve reach out as he fell, waking with a metal hand and being pissed instead of confused. He remembered telling Pierce but I knew him.

The only other pieces he had were from training; learning, developing, but something holding him back from perfect - Призрак, a ghost. Haunted, but what by?

Other than that, not much'd come back. Only information on Steve Rogers: fight on the bridge, a flash of Steve shouting his name as he fell high and fast and cold.

Memories and ghosts.

He'd come here to sleep, really, he had. But it made him uneasy to fall asleep without Steve aware of his presence. He should wake Rogers, then.

For some reason, he didn't move from his corner. He kept his arms crossed over his chest, fit snugly in full uniform, mask and all.

It was instinct telling him Steve Rogers didn't get much sleep. Something deep inside him that shouted let Steve sleep at all costs - not so deep as those engraved words Steve said on the helicarrier, but deep enough to be from a long time ago. So he'd wait until Steve woke on his own before crashing. It was only fair, that he look over Steve's resting form, Rogers'd already done that for him twice.

His eyes were wandering over titles on wall-bookshelves - categorizing Steve's literature choices - when the silence of the room suddenly shattered.

"Bucky," Steve gasped, shooting upright like a firework, chest heaving, sucking in air. Instantly frozen in the shadows of the corner, knife already in hand by the time he realized Steve wasn't looking in his direction.

Steve hadn't seen him. But he'd just said--

Bucky watched curiously from the corner of the room as Steve's heavy breathing settled down, both hands sliding exasperatedly into sleep-messy blonde hair. He was hunched over now, curled in a ball as he mumbled too quiet to catch.

Why had Steve Rogers awoken with a shout of his name? Didn't know Bucky was here, what was the purpose of calling out...it might not've been intentional?

He had memories of nightmares, from long ago, from before he'd adjusted to drug-induced sleep. He didn't know the nightmares themselves, just that images used to play behind his eyes when he closed them. He didn't have that anymore, but what if Steve did? Did he dream of Bucky?

He could say nothing. Steve would never know he'd been here. He could come back tomorrow night. Or never. He could attempt creating a safe place of his own to sleep, although that sounded frankly impossible. Or...he could alert Steve to his presence.

He didn't have words of his own for this situation, mimicked Steve's once-previous instead.

"Are you okay?" Bucky asked from the shadows, taking a single step forward. Steve startled, scrambling backwards a foot. His hair was wild, eyes wide, but the moment he recognized Bucky the expression of shock didn't widen in fear like he'd expected. Fear: common response.

Instead Steve...deflated, letting out a puff of air and turning up a soft corner of his mouth. Voice rough with disuse, soft words to accompany the soft smile. "Hey, Buck. You startled me."
Bucky had no idea how to respond to that reaction. Steve beckoned at him with a hand, drawing him another foot outta the corner. His question'd never been answered, but he wasn't going to repeat himself. Instead he just looked at Steve, decidedly appreciative of the decision to keep the mask on.

"Have you been in here long?" Steve asked, but more conversational than accusatory. He watched as Steve picked up a blanket from where it'd been thrown off in shock, as he stood and placed the blanket and a strangely-shaped pillow on the tidy bed.

"Approximately thirty minutes," he replied eventually, following Steve outta the bedroom to keep visuals.

"Can I make you tea?" This time Steve's question was almost hopeful and Bucky gave him a funny look that might not've translated over the facemask. But he sat down at the wooden dinner table, noticing Steve's habit to keep lights off and finding himself appreciative of that too.

His silence was taken for yes and Steve set up a kettle in the kitchen, humming softly under his breath. For lack of anything better to do, Bucky listened. Surprised to find he recognized the song.
The words didn't magically appear in his head, but he could hear that same melody in harmonica pitches, unintelligible voices he didn't recognize.

"What is that?" finally asked; purely for informational purposes. Music wasn't important for the past seventy years; useless noise. But for some reason the humming was unobtrusive enough to drift almost-pleasantly.

Steve spun on him with an unreadable expression and an edge of hope in his voice. "Do you recognize it?"

He'd shrug, if it weren't waste of energy. Instead he kept looking at Steve's eyes, deciphering the code beneath them as he responded carefully, words articulated slowly. "It's familiar."

"Hmm," Steve turned to cabinets and pulled out two mugs, setting them on the counter and speaking with his back to Bucky, maybe to give him time to react without Steve's judgement. "I sang it to you, one, back in the war. We were all on a boat...it was for your birthday, actually."

He didn't know he had a birthday. Obviously there was a date he'd been born, but he never considered that celebrations of society were once something that applied to him. To the same laughing, black'n'white him.

The part of his brain that collected data was requesting to ask the date of said birthday, but what was the prevalence? Numbers wouldn't change scattered pieces of memories, but further explanation might.

"We?" Bucky asked, reaching his right hand for the mug Steve slid to him, warmth radiating through his palm, threatening to scald skin if he held long enough. The skin would repair, and the warmth was welcoming, so a burn would be allowed.

"Well, that song was Monty and I, but it was all the Howling Commandos on the boat. Do you--"

"No," Bucky interrupted, because he'd seen in the museum but their faces were no more familiar than his own, short hair and cocky smile. Steve's light expression dampened but he nodded, distractedly reaching for his mug as he sat. The moment his hand slid underneath the handle, Steve hissed, flinching away. Bucky raised his eyebrows over the top of his mask (realizing he wouldn't be able to drink until removed; debating not drinking).

"How are you not burning your hand?" The words were incredulous, possibly rhetoric, but Bucky didn't respond because obviously, if the tea was hot enough to burn Steve, then it was burning him too.

Either his eyes gave away more than he thought or Steve was more attentive than he appeared, because he suddenly reached out and touched Bucky's mug, drawing back with the same swift movement.

"Jesus, Buck, you're gonna burn yourself." Steve reached over and pried Bucky's right hand away from the mug, flipping his palm over in the dim light; enhanced vision wasn't necessary to see the obvious red marks. Then he was glaring at Bucky, holding onto his wrist and lifting Bucky's arm in the air - as though Bucky hadn't tried to kill him with it at least four times since they'd met. "What were you thinking?"

Actually, he'd been thinking that Steve wasn't reckless enough to invite lethal assassins for tea and then grab them and scold them without second thought to possible consequences. If it were anyone else, he'd've killed them on principle alone. Steve would already be dead - again - if it weren't for... whatever reason Steve was an exception.

Instead he yanked his arm back, glaring at Steve's offended expression and deciding that, screw his tea, he wasn't taking the damn mask off. "My skin has a rapid rate of healing," he hissed, wrapping his palm right back around the warmth of the mug.

And - because he must have an actual death wish - Steve Rogers yanked his hand back out.

"I'm not letting you burn your hands up for me again," Steve countered. First of all, this had nothing to do with Steve, second of all, he didn't have to ask Steve permission, and third of all -

"Again?" A demand instead of a question and finally, finally, Steve paled a little. It wasn't fear, but at least now he might be thinking straight enough to realize Bucky was dangerous enough to kill him. Even if he wasn't going to.

"Again," Steve confirmed quietly, a puff of air, looking away, placing Bucky's hand on the table. Just so they didn't have to fight, Bucky didn't bother curling his hand around the mug a third time.

Neither of them said anything again in the time it took Steve to finish his tea and Bucky to run a visual trace for potential bugs in the living room and kitchen. The apartment looked clean from here, but it wouldn't change anything if it wasn't. He needed a place to stay; it wasn't as though the people Steve worked for were gonna cross Steve just to get to him.

Well, they might, but Bucky was still better. He was better than all of them. When he was at optimum performance, anyways. Which he was not currently, considering the edges of exhaustion in his bones.

"You can use the couch, if you want," Steve offered as Bucky stood. He couldn't recall the last time he'd slept on something cushioned, but it might be worth the experiment to determine maximum resting ideals. Since drug-induced sleep was no longer feasible, it was logical to test all available options.

So he sat - sunk - down on the couch cushions, like falling, straight to the floor. The feeling might fade; but falling wasn't an unfamiliar feeling, anyways.

"Do you sleep here?" Bucky asked, running his left hand over the material to determine the likelihood of snagging his arm. Steve shrugged, walking slowly around the couch to sit in the armchair perpendicular, tucking his feet up off the floor as he watched Bucky.
"Sometimes. You're welcome to it whenever you want." There was something hidden underneath that statement but his brain didn't spare the energy to decipher it. Instead he laid down; left arm under his head so he could keep facing the armchair. He was aware Steve watched him while he slept, the last two times he was here. Considering that he'd almost taken Steve's life on multiple occasions, he delved it was fair to be treated with caution.

Because that could be the only reason Steve watched him all the time.

Bucky closed his eyes before Steve could say anything further, easing his muscle tension to relax into a sleepable form. Staying in the mask made breathing difficult, but he didn't like the idea of Steve being able to read whatever he wanted on Bucky's face while he was unconscious.

In the spark of clarity before unconsciousness it occurred; for all the questions he was asking, Steve Rogers probably had the answers. Not just his birthday, but other pieces he was missing; maybe almost all the pieces he was missing. The museum said they knew each other for most their lives.

He'd been searching his own mind, the internet, the world, but he could just...ask. Or stay for longer, because Rogers seemed to bring up the past unprompted.

Obtaining answers was as easy as choosing to stay.

When Bucky woke the next morning, he left before Steve could blink open his eyes from where he'd fallen asleep in the armchair. He didn't need Steve. Steve Rogers knew more about him than he did, and he wasn't alright with that.

~~~

"Wow, well would you look at that. Mr. Captain America has time for one of his old runnin' buddies." Sam's grin was wide enough to span his entire face as he crossed the room and pulled Steve into a one armed hug, clapping a hand on his back.

"Ha ha, very funny. It hasn't been that long since I saw you." Steve shook his head with a smile and leaned against the wall, scanning his eyes over a few veterans in passing.

"Maybe not. But still, you seem to have a habit of showin' up right at the end of these meetings. You do know you could show up at the beginning some time." Sam raised his eyebrows and Steve nodded shallowly, cocking his head to the side.

"Thanks Sam, for the offer. I just don't think it's my thing."

"Don't knock it til you try it. Anyways, what's up with the visit? I'm pretty sure it's not to compare and contrast the VA chapters in New York and D.C. Unless you're coming to ask what it's like living in the Stark Tower, then let me tell you, I am so glad you passed me up on all those morning runs, cause it is entirely worth living in that place. Just the showers alone..."

Steve smiled, shoving his hands in his pockets. "So Tony hasn't been too much of a bother, then?"

Sam waved a hand in dismissal. "Nah, he's pretty cool. He still doesn't remember my name and I don't think he knows I exist half the time, but he leaves my orange juice in the fridge alone. How'bout you? How's the crasher at your apartment doing?"

"Alright, I guess." The sigh deflated and Steve looked around the room at empty chairs, wondering what it'd be like, coming here to officially talk about his problems with Sam. Maybe he could convince Bucky to come...if he could convince Bucky to do anything.
"He showed up two nights ago, but nothing's changed. Well, he recognized a song I was humming, but when I tried to tell him about it he cut me off. Other than that, things seemed pretty, I dunno. Decent." Steve shrugged, gesturing loosely at nothing. "Up until I woke up yesterday morning and he was gone. Just vanished, no sign it'd been anything but some wacked-out dream."

Steve stared at the ground and pretended not to hear Sam's pity sigh. He didn't want pity, he just wanted Bucky to show up for more than sleep, stay for longer than the five hours he spent unconscious.

"I'm sorry, man. But there's gotta be a reason for it, y'know? Maybe he just...doesn't know you." Sam kept his voice all gentle and kind but Steve shook his head, because it wasn't that simple.

"He told me he went to the Smithsonian. So he at least knows who I am, who he used to be. He responds to Bucky, never said anything contrary about calling him that."

"Well, then, maybe that's the problem. He knows who he used to be, who you guys used to be to each other, and he doesn't think he can live up to that expectation. I mean, you guys were...really close, and he's been through hell since that. Maybe he thinks you expect him to be this perfect guy from your memories."

Steve tapped his foot, crossing his arms over his chest and leaning heavier against the wall. It was a good point, if Bucky was afraid Steve didn't want him around the way he was, no wonder he wasn't staying. But it still didn't feel like that was all of it. There was something else, because Buck'd never been one to need approval. He always just. Did whatever he wanted.

"I'll talk to him about it, just to be sure. But I really think it's something else. If he didn't think I wanted him around, he wouldn't show up at all, right? But he still comes over, he just always end up leaving." Steve tried not to sound miserable (or overly obvious) but Sam's eyes were wary, concerned.

"Okay, then. There's something else it could be. I see it all the time in PTSD patients, especially in...uh. Married couples? Not that I'm--" Sam held up in hands in a please-don't-freak-out motion and Steve forced tensed muscles to relax. Anything Sam had to offer, he could at least consider.

Once he determined Steve wasn't gonna blow up at being called a couple, Sam lowered his hands and continued carefully.

"Maybe he's scared of hurting you. You know, like a relapse in the middle of the night, wakes up outta his head and slits your throat sorta thing? Lots of vets deal with that fear, because losing their loved ones by their own hand is the worst thing imaginable. Not to mention the guy's almost killed you a few times already."

Steve made a noncommittal noise, running the idea over. Sam took the silence as an encouragement to elaborate, apparently.

"I mean, I know you trust Bucky Barnes with your life. But what happens if he loses the wheel for a moment, and then the Winter Soldier takes over and kills you? There's a chance, if he feels the same way you do, he wouldn't be able to live with himself after that." Sam shrugged and Steve pursed his lips, blinking distantly.

"You know, I really don't think that's it. The guy that spent the night on my couch was the deadly assassin." Sam kinda made a face at that and Steve made a face back because no, he wasn't changing his mind about letting Bucky stay. "There's not really a wheel to lose; the whole idea of the Winter Soldier is based on control. He has complete restraint over his violence, so far as I'm aware. He isn't afraid of his own power because every move he makes is about controlling it. He's all hyped up on efficiency and danger and whatnot."

Steve'd been thinking that over lately, and the best conclusion he'd come to was that Bucky wasn't afraid of himself, or of hurting Steve. He had too much control over himself, if anything. Sam crossed his arms, stumped expression on his face.

"Well, okay, what's your theory on why he won't stick around?" Why didn't Bucky stay? Why was he giving Steve strange looks and avoiding talking about the past? Why hadn't he killed Steve yet, the only person he was seeming to make a serious exception for? What'd gone through his mind on the helicarrier to make him lower his fist and pull Steve from the Potomac?

"That's just the thing," Steve shrugged. "I don't know."

~~~

Six days passed and he'd told himself last time'd been the final visit, final slink to Steve's apartment. But he had one question, one Steve could answer for him. This would be the last time. It really would.

It was earlier in the day than he'd gone before but waiting until dark was pointless when he knew Steve was home. Scaling the building to Steve's window - the livingroom's that overlooked the alley, not the bedroom's that faced the street - was ridiculously easy, even in the fading light of dusk.

He slipped inside silently, picking out Steve's location and padding through shadows as he kept his ear tuned for Steve's conversation. He was on the phone, spine to Bucky as he sifted through papers on the counter, talking to someone named Bruce.

Bucky was only inside the apartment for about ten seconds before Steve suddenly cut off the speaker, interrupting as he tossed another paper aside.

"Hey, Bruce, I gotta go. Thanks for the call, I'll talk to you later." Steve hung up and sat his phone down on the counter, still not turning around as he reached in the cabinet above his head for a plate.

"Can I cut you up some apples?" Steve asked, and it was only then that Bucky realized Steve was talking to him. How the hell did Steve know he was here? He'd been perfectly silent, Steve hadn't seen him, there weren't any cameras around...

He was still blinking in confusion when Steve turned around, giving Bucky a quick smile before he reached for a knife and started chopping up fruit.

"Do you have cameras?" Bucky finally prodded, because either he had entirely lost his abilities as a trained professional or Steve was psychic. Or, cameras.

"Nope," Steve said, still chopping. The knife rhythmically clink clink clinked against the plate as the apple pieces fell apart. He hadn't moved since Steve'd noticed him, stock-still and reevaluating the situation from the middle of Steve's living room. Steve glanced up at him with an expression that was partially smiling, partially annoyed.

"Your assassin skills haven't been compromised or whatever you're worrying about. You've walked silently since Azzano. Just got used to picking up other signals to know when you're around." He popped one of the apple slices in his mouth and picked up the plate, bringing it into the living room and setting it on the coffee table in front of the couch. After plopping down on the last place Bucky'd slept, Steve gestured at the cushion beside him. "Sit down."
Bucky didn't move, narrowing his eyes and crossing his arms, wishing he'd left the damn mask on. "Azzano. That's the first time I fell under Zola's guidance."

"Torture," Steve corrected, taking another apple piece. The word was blunt and cutting and it made Bucky tighten his arms across his chest. Pain training, he'd told himself. For decades.

"Hey, look, Buck. We need to talk." That long-suffering look cast over Steve's features and Bucky found himself inching back towards the window because he wasn't exhausted enough to go through this. Steve noticed, because suddenly there was a towering supersoldier standing between his feet and freedom.

He could go through Steve if he wanted to. It'd be painful for both of them, but he'd do it, he would. Instead he glared harder and Steve crossed his arms over his chest too, puffing up with righteousness and gesturing at the couch with a tilt of his head.

"Sit down. It's just a talk." The quite-serious words were coated over with a comforting curl of a smile, like Steve knew exactly what was happening in Bucky's head and wasn't judging him for it, was just waiting for Bucky to sit.

With a scowl he absolutely meant, Bucky lowered himself onto the couch cushions. It was still falling through puffy water, but he wasn't gonna cave because of that. He could sit and listen to Steve's "just a talk" if it meant the weird tension would go away and his safehouse wasn't compromised.

Steve perched on the arm of the couch and it was only Bucky's weight on the opposite side keeping it from tipping over.

"I know you're going through a lot right now," Steve started and Bucky evened out his expression into blankness. Facemask or not, he could hide what he was going through from Steve. "...but my apartment doesn't have to be a crashpad for when you're about to pass out from exhaustion."

If he wasn't already sitting perfectly straight, he would've straightened at that, possibly stood, but as it was he just stared. He'd overstayed the welcome of this safehouse; finding another would be imperative and immediate.

"This is the last time you'll see me." The words were clipped and perfunctory because of course, in his consistently exhausted state, he'd been misreading the signals of his safety here. Steve Rogers shouldn't be forced to handle his presence.

The shock that crossed over Steve's face was not the intended reaction. Steve always reacted differently than everyone else and frankly, it was pissing Bucky off how damn unpredictable he was.

"Jeez, Buck, that's not what I'm saying. Of course you're welcome here, whenever. I meant you don't have to only show up when you're hurting." The words were gentle but sure and that wasn't a way to talk to someone who'd tried to kill you multiple times.

"It's a performance error," Bucky snapped. "There is no pain, or dependency. I needed a damn safe place to sleep and you're the only person who isn't trying to kill me."

Steve just looked at him, forearms resting on his knees. Bucky glared back. He wasn't going to let Steve Rogers corral him into a box like he depended on him in any way. He absolutely did not. Beings of lethal perfection did not require assistance of others.

"Look. Just..." Steve took a breath, looking down at the couch between his feet. "Bucky, I'm asking you to stay."
Stay.

Steve Rogers wanted him to stay. Here.

"Why?" Bucky narrowed his eyes again. The question was cutting and immediate and full of disbelief but apparently Steve Rogers had an answer for everything because he looked almost relieved that Bucky was demanding a reason.

"Because. I know you. I know how you are." Right. Of course. Bucky snorted and moved to stand from the couch - Steve reached forward and grabbed his wrist, pulling him back down to the cushion and scooting closer, an electrifying and terrifying six-inches away.

"All I'm asking is for you to hear me out, okay? You can still walk outta here when it's over if you want."

"You couldn't stop me regardless," Bucky shot back. A pained look tightened the corner of blue eyes, then Steve took a breath and let go of Bucky's wrist.

He could leave, right now. He should leave right now. His chest was too tight and that terrible burn inside him that only appeared in relation to Steve still hurt...but maybe he'd never find out what either of those things were if he didn't stay to listen. It wouldn't be a disadvantage to listen. Gaining access to information wasn't problematic.

He didn't say anything, but he did cross his arms over his chest and settle a little deeper into the cushions. Steve let out a breath of relief and settled in too.

"Okay. First off, Buck, I know the past seventy years don't compare to a couple of months, but this-" Steve waved a hand in Bucky's general direction, as though that were articulate enough to indicate his meaning, "-isn't all new. After Azzano, you were..."

He made a face, looking off to the side as he tried to pick the right word. Bucky waited.

"..haunted."

Well if that didn't describe the burning feeling in his chest and the ghosts in his head and his memories and the way he couldn't shake coming back to Steve's apartment, nothing else would.

Haunted by what?

"But, really, even before that. You never had it easy, Bucky. Neither of us did. You've been beating up kids and making tough moral calls and looking after my sorry ass since you were three feet tall. The war made it worse, I think. Zola brought out something you'd been trying to hide." Steve laced his own fingers together in his lap, glancing up from underneath fanning eyelashes every couple of sentences.

"You were silent, walking places. Didn't feel like talking most times. You were always shying away, needing space, like you didn't want people to watch your face or know your emotions. I was always pretty sure it was because you never got any privacy under Zola...but I dunno, you never told me why.

"That was new after Azzano, too. You told me everything - probably too much - when we were younger, but in the war I spent most my time studying you, reading what I could from what little I knew. You always said you knew me too well, but that...it used to go both ways. Not that I'm-- I mean--" Steve let out a frustrated breath and he looked young, perched on the couch with his hands in his lap and his blonde hair in careful spikes instead of crazy disarray.
"Anyways. It was always about doing the safest thing, for you. You've spent half my life yelling at me for doing 'stupid, reckless' things." Bucky almost snorted at that because well, good, because Steve made alotta stupid decisions.

"But the point is...I'm not expecting anything from you, okay? You don't have to hide around me, Bucky, you never have. Whatever's wrong, however you feel, I'll help however I can. That used to mean giving you a lot of space, which I can do now too. I'm not asking you to pour out your soul or anything, I know you need time and there's a lot we have to figure out, I just. I want you to stay. You're my friend."

Bucky blinked. Best friends since childhood...

With a bashful smile Steve ducked his head, slight pink blushing his cheekbones. "You, uh. You told me this once and I don't know if you remember it...you don't have to," he amended quickly, looking up. Bucky just kept watching him.

"I know you're going through a lot. And I know that you're totally capable, I fought you twice, you don't have to depend on anyone, I get that...I know you can get by on your own just fine, but. That's the thing. You don't have to."

Cause I'm with you to the end of the line, pal, an unfamiliar voice in his head filled in. It wasn't Steve's voice, it was heavier on the Brooklyn accent, but it was vaguely familiar.

Being alone was efficient. Until he needed sleep or medical attention. Staying was...

Not permanent, necessarily. He could always leave. Whenever he wanted, pack up and never show up again. Steve wouldn't be able to do anything about it. But he was being given an open invitation to stay, without being pestered. Without having to hold up another end of a bargain.

All you gotta do is shine my shoes, maybe take out the trash... the unfamiliar voice echoed again.

Bucky had no idea who it was, or what that had to do with sharing an apartment with Steve Rogers, but it didn't matter.

It was a strategic choice. He'd have access to more body-regeneration-time if he needed it, he wouldn't have to find a place to hide between missions.

"You only have one bed," Bucky finally said, although it sounded like an admission, a sigh of agreement. A slow smile spread over Steve's features, like he heard the exact same admission Bucky had.

"Good thing I don't use it." One side of Steve's mouth quirked up in a sideways smile, another flash of something familiar. "But if you ever want a bigger place, I've got a friend in the city that kinda has a whole floor for me in his tower, so. No pressure though, we'll go wherever you're comfortable."

Comfort wasn't a consideration; a luxury of noise that'd do nothing to benefit him. But he didn't protest Steve's words, just reached out and snagged an apple slice from the plate on the coffee table.

When Steve jumped off the couch a few seconds later with a ridiculously wide smile on his face Bucky took another apple and wondered what the hell for.

~~~

"Hey, Rogers, before you say no - I have pizza, I haven't seen you in months, and I'm officially done with you avoiding me. Well, avoiding everyone. I'm already on my way over and I swear the aliens could attack New York again right now and I don't even care, I am coming to your apartment and
"Clint! Clint. Listen, thanks, that sounds awesome, but I seriously can't right now."

"Nope, no way. Steve, you are not backing out on me now I will crawl through your vents if I have to dammit--"

"Seriously, Barton, listen to me. Honestly, I appreciate the offer. Just. Not tonight, okay? Or, um. Anytime soon I guess...how about we meet up at the Avengers tower in a few days? During the day? Maybe?"

"Are you seriously gonna blow me off like this? I'm literally in a taxi with six boxes of pizza next to me right now. You can't deny this."

"Shit, Clint, I'm so sorry. Honestly, man. I mean, Sam's always up for pizza..."

Clint tapped his fingers on the phone for a moment, staring out the taxi cab window at the New York traffic.

"Okay, man, this isn't like you. Even Tony wouldn't've shelled me out like that. It's not...are you okay? I'm not talking about the general depression of 'your best friend tried to kill you twice already' either, like do you need help? I can call Bruce. Or ditch the pizzas, we can just talk--"

"Clint. I'm fine. Seriously, I'm fine, I'm just busy. Okay? I'm really sorry about thi--" Steve's hand went over the receiver - but the phone was pressed to the ear he could actually hear out of, so Clint picked up the muffled voice over the line.

"What? No, it's fine. We seriously need to find a food you like besides apples. Just because it's the Big Apple doesn't mean there's an endless supply. Hold on one second..."

"Hey, sorry. I'm back. But look, I gotta go, I'm real sorry about the pizza, and raincheck, okay? Seriously, raincheck. It was super nice of you to- but anyways. Um, thanks and have a great night and bye!"

The phone clicked silent and Clint blinked at the screen. Steve Rogers hung up on him. Denied pizza, even. But that wasn't the part that was making him gape at the phone in his hand.

Steve Rogers had someone in his apartment. Someone spending the night. And he'd either been too embarrassed to say or it was one of those things you couldn't say over the phone when there was some smoking-hot girl in your bedroom listening in...

"Driver! Take me to Stark Tower instead, please." Clint leaned back in his seat and fist-pumped the air.

Steve Rogers was finally getting laid. This was 100% worth getting stood up. Besides, Sam Wilson did like pizza and so did basically everyone in the Stark Tower. What better reason to throw a sans-Steve Avengers party than to celebrate the fact that they were finally sans-Steve for a reason.

He whooped and the taxi driver shot him an annoyed look and Clint didn't care, this was the best turnout of being stood up ever.

~~~

"So now that you're here, what all are you missing out on in the world you've been conquering on your own?" Steve leaned against the counter across from the one Bucky was sitting crosslegged on.
He made a cross face at the question, tucking a strand of long hair behind his ear. Steve tried not to smile and was failing miserably at hiding it behind his mug. The tea was too hot to drink - he wasn't a goddamned dragon like some people who apparently didn't care if they got burnt - but he could pretend for the sake of his uncontrollable face.

He'd been smiling a ridiculous amount over the past three days and Bucky kept giving him this calculating look like he was trying to pry apart Steve's brain and seriously, Steve used to be a lot better at hiding the extensive joy he felt around Bucky but the months apart had him way outta practice. Besides, Bucky wasn't exactly helping, shooting Steve unimpressed looks for the light-hearted remarks he made.

But he did joke back sometimes, even if the jokes were more sharp and sarcastic than actual teasing, but Steve'd take anything he could get.

"Well?" He prompted, because Bucky tended to get over his aversion to talking if Steve kept asking. The piece of hair he'd tucked behind his ear had fallen back out and it took everything in Steve not to cross the kitchen and fix it for him.

He used to smooth out Bucky's pomade for him all the time - too often, probably - but in the nine months since he'd last done it (on his timeline, not Bucky's) a lot had changed and it probably wasn't the best idea to cross the tiles just to tidy up the hair of a deadly assassin who was sitting on his kitchen counter drinking tea.

"If I wasn't here, I'd be executing a mission. Either terminating Hydra agents or researching." Bucky's voice without any trace of an accent was a little heartbreaking, but the disconnected tone was worse. It was Steve's job though, not to let it get to him. He had bigger worries, like getting through to Bucky at all.

"Researching what?"

Bucky looked at him with those cold eyes that could be half the reason he'd been codenamed Winter Soldier (although if it was really based on the Payne poem, it was kind of terrifyingly beautifully fitting) and said the next statement like it was the most axiomatic thing in the world. "Sergeant James Barnes."

"Oh. Well..." Steve let his mouth curve up in a small smile this time, "...I happen to be an expert."

Bucky raised a single eyebrow at him and took another sip of his tea. The artificial coffees and over-caffeinated drinks of the 21st century weren't appealing to either of them, hot chocolate wasn't exactly a daily drink, and they both could use some warm liquids in their bodies after years on ice. So tea it was. And it was deemed healthy and pure enough for Bucky's standards, which were actually pretty difficult to meet.

His stomach couldn't handle anything heavier than fruit and he didn't want anything heavier either. Thankfully Buck seemed to love oranges as much as he had in the thirties, and raspberries were also added to the list of foods to keep around. Steve was afraid to push much else on him right now because he wasn't sure he'd be able to listen to Bucky puke it up without running in the bathroom to rub a hand over his back and he still didn't know where they stood with that.

Or with anything, really. But Bucky was here and that was step one, the biggest step. (Or so he thought.)

"Seriously, anytime between 1917 and 1945, I've got your answers." Steve set his mug down, glancing over the small space of his apartment. It felt like the only place he'd been for the past week was this kitchen and the adjacent living room. They could use some air. "Hey, you wanna go up to the roof? The view's better. Unless you'd rather stay here, of course."

The single raised eyebrow arched higher and Steve'd dare say Bucky almost looked amused. He unfolded his legs and like...glided, to the ground, somehow. There was this puppet-like grace to his movements, an artist's marionette of a dancer tugged by perfect invisible strings.

But could strings of control be cut without losing the tiptoe fall?

Steve brushed the thought aside as Bucky floated past him and snagged a few oranges from the crate.

"Just because I specialize in long-distance sharp-shooting doesn't mean I have a propensity for roofs," Bucky commented, tone dry but there was something akin to brightness in his eyes and Steve found himself dashing ahead to open the door to hide another stupidly-wide smile.

The sun wasn't quite up yet, and while New York never slept, thankfully their neighbors did. Not that Steve should've been worried though, because the moment they slipped into the hallway Bucky kinda vanished in the shadows along the wall. But when Steve reached the stairs, he was still right beside him.

The other residents of Steve's building were all fairly old, or reclusive, and no one else came on the roof ever. Which meant that Steve may or may not have dragged a couch from a garagesale up here.
Inspiring place to draw.

Bucky raised another eyebrow as he saw it, but he walked over, sinking down to the ground in front of the faux red velvet and leaning his back against the cushions. Steve ambled down next to him, drawing his knees up to his chest and distantly missing the way Bucky used to sit with one leg stretched out lazily into Steve's space.

"You can see the Empire State building from here, so sometimes I--"

"When's my birthday?" Bucky asked suddenly, gaze locked on the horizon. Steve only just managed to clamp down on a surprised breath because gosh, he'd never imagined Buck wouldn't remember that.

"March 10th, 1917. Mine's July 4th, 1918 and you always used to crow about how you were 'two years older than me' for the entire three months and twenty five days before I caught up."

Bucky was quiet for a moment, his posture perfect even as he pressed his back to the couch legs.
"You said you could tell me anything that happened between 1917 and 1945, how would you know about when I was born if you weren't yet?"

"Your ma," Steve shrugged. "The couple'a years I missed before we met I got the full run-down from her. She liked to talk about you, and she liked me. Thought I was a good influence on you. She never realized that I was the one starting fights and you were the one stopping them."

He glanced at Bucky from the corner of his eye. Buck's expression was schooled into blankness, but god, he was still so beautiful. The wind was ruffling the hair around his face, sending strands sideways into his eyes every few moments. His hair'd never been this long, but back in the days when he'd slicked it back it'd been pretty lengthy, curving down around his cheekbones after he showered.

"Did you...do you want me to tell you about her?" Steve asked cautiously. Bucky finally looked at him then, icy blue gorgeous as it'd ever been. A few seconds ticked by, air between them charged with energy before the silence broke.
"Tell me about you. Why were you always fighting?"

Steve laughed, tipping his shoulder into Bucky's automatically. He stiffened a little and didn't sway to the side, so Steve ended up bouncing off awkwardly. Buck didn't look miffed though, maybe just surprised, so Steve scooted a few inches closer and started in on his story.

"Well, it wasn't like I fought for no reason. I hate bullies, and in Brooklyn's dirty thirties, there were alotta those. People who were rude to girls, who kicked that dog that lived in the alley next to our apartment, who were disrespectful or just plain mean. I'd always end up in way over my head and then you'd come 'round the corner, crooked smile, sarcastic comments. We'd fight together if I was still standing, other times you'd chase the guys off, or on a few memorable occasions you'd be picking me off the ground, half-carrying me back to the apartment and yelling the whole time about how I was gonna get myself killed one day and then where would you be..."

I'd be here, Bucky thought to himself. Like this. He remembered flashes, little second-long clips here and there, bloody hands fixing up a bloodier cheekbone that was so frail he kept wondering how it wasn't shattered into a million pieces.

He could remember throwing an arm around tiny shoulders. Watching a man in redwhite'n'blue from behind a sniper scope. Clutching a battered newspaper to his chest and crying.

Steve talked, all morning, words that made Bucky Barnes sound like the best kind'a hero. The man Steve was painting...noble, funny, loyal; the man of Steve's memories could barely be real. Like he was almost as good as Captain America was.

But now, he wasn't all light and sunshine. He killed people and he felt more comfortable with a mask over his face and he got pissed too easily. And he still couldn't shake the terrible burn in his chest whenever Steve was around. That didn't sound like the man Rogers was describing.

(He never occurred to him that maybe, Steve didn't see the same man that Bucky had, in the past. Maybe Steve's memories were accurate to him, but the man in them had been in a mask so long that even Steve never saw how much he was hurting.)

Sometime around noon, Steve's excited storytelling tapered off into random, short bursts of scenes as they came to him, words slowing with sleepy blinking. Their shoulders had been pressed together since the sun rose on the left, but staying awake all day and night must've been more tiring than Steve was used to.

Because by one in the afternoon, his head slipped down to Bucky's shoulder and the blue eyes were shut before Bucky could shrug him off.

"Rogers," Bucky whispered, craning his head to try'n see past the tuffs of blonde hair brushing his jaw. Steve didn't open his eyes, dead to the world, so Bucky studied the lax curve of his mouth for a moment before he straightened back up, eyes shifting to the skyline on the horizon.

It was more efficient to let Steve sleep on his shoulder than to wake him and move back downstairs. Besides, he'd had extensive training to stay perfectly still for hours on end. He hadn't exercised that skill this week, now was a good'a'time as any.

And with Steve sleeping on his shoulder like this, Bucky was warmer than any memory he knew.

~~~

He knew the man at the door wasn't Steve the moment the first boot landed in the apartment. Steve walked heavy enough to carry the world on his shoulders but quickly enough to save that world. It was nothing like the bootfall that followed the rattling key-in-the-door late Monday afternoon.

Bucky'd been staying at the safehouse often over the past week. He only left during the day, and then to go track down another base in Jersey. But he was still back by 1am the next morning. Steve'd been waiting up, pensively looking out the window by the time Bucky slipped through it. Then Steve'd gifted him a smile and left him the couch.

Now, Bucky was sitting on the floor, knives laid carefully across the coffee table as he sharpened them one by one. Then the frontdoor opened and unfamiliar boots echoed and it wasn't five seconds later that Bucky was on his feet, 1911 aimed at the intruder in the doorway.

A man was standing a foot inside the apartment, both hands up in a ridiculously unconvincing surrender. He had strangely shaped facial hair, shiny silver (robotic?) cuffs on both wrists and a look on his face like he was the owner of the free-world.

"Oh. Hi...Steve's friend, right? Star-Spangled didn't say he had company." Bucky didn't lower his gun, scanning the stranger's body language. He was tense, wary, but...not scared. More cautious than Steve (everyone on the planet was more cautious than Steve) but not terrified either. Maybe Bucky needed to start intensive training again.

"The only reason you're not dead is because you have a key to Rogers' apartment," and therefore he trusts you, Bucky didn't say, but the man heard anyways. Good, it was easier to refrain from killing Steve's friends if they weren't obviously inadequate. But he didn't lower his gun as he took a single step closer, "Why are you here?"

"To see you," the man answered simply, then his half-assed surrender hands dropped lazily to his sides and he strode into Steve's kitchen. He started opening cabinets and Bucky shifted his weight, crossing to the kitchen and replacing the gun with a knife he twirled swiftly between fingers.

"Do you happen to know where Rogers keeps his alcohol? I gave him an entire liquor cabinet, not even last week..."

"How did you know I was here?" Bucky interrupted, glaring at the rifling intruder from the edge of the counter. The man didn't seem all that phased, turning around to look at Bucky with raised eyebrows.

"I'm Tony Stark," he replied, as though that portrayed a deity of classified information. Bucky gave him an unimpressed look, because names weren't answers. The man - Stark - sighed and crossed his arms over his chest as he leaned against the counter. "And it's kinda obvious when Steve has left his apartment twice in the last week. Since SHIELD went down he's been in his apartment twice. Always out looking for you." Stark shrugged. "So, I figured he found you. Or, well, you found him."

Stark spoke with his hands and seemed to be duly unsurprised by everything he encountered, like each word he had to waste explaining something exacerbated him into a bored, overly cogent asshole.

That, Bucky could relate to.

"You want a drink? I'm having one." Tony turned back to the cabinets, finally opening the correct one and triumphantly grabbing glasses and a tall glass bottle. He uncapped the top, pouring amber liquid and talking again, his back to Bucky. There were so many openings to kill Stark it was embarrassing on his behalf. "Can you get drunk? Cap can't, unfortunately. I'd kill to see him without a stick in his ass."

Stark glanced over at Bucky, holding out one of the glasses. "Well, not actually kill," he amended, the corner of his mouth tilting up in amusement.

The joke wasn't funny and Bucky glared for it, but he took the extended glass anyways. Tony quirked an eyebrow as he took a sip of his own, watching Bucky with a challenge in his eyes. He hadn't had alcohol in decades - it was inhibiting, useless, and caused massive performance errors - but the accelerated cell reproduction in his body would likely keep his body from getting drunk anyways.

Using his right hand so he didn't have to concern with pressure on the fragile glass, Bucky lifted it to his lips and tipped the drink over his tongue. It carried an eruption of burn into his throat, the instantaneous water-loss expanding the blood vessels in his body to falsify a feeling of warmth through his veins.

Either his cells weren't nearly as equipped to deal with this as Steve's were, or the alcohol in that glass was a hell of a lot stronger than vodka. The dizziness came instantly, coursing through him like all the needles and shots he'd been given in the past seventy years were swallowing him again.

His hand darted to catch himself on the counter, not noticing the countertop denting beneath his fingers as his head spun seventy years into the past, dragging his consciousness through a hazy blur to deposit him into a crystal-clear golden scene from another lifetime.

"One more round, how bout it?" a loud man in a bowler hat clapped his shoulder and the world tipped fuzzily for a moment then the most beautiful laugh he'd ever heard washed over him from his left and Bucky turned his head towards the sound.

Steve Rogers was sitting right next to him, suddenly throwing an arm around Bucky's shoulders and drawing him up tight to Steve's side, heat radiating from the tight muscles in a wave of - what was that, comfort? Joy? The beautiful laugh was still trickling past Steve's lips, fading into a soft, affectionate smile as he looked down at Bucky.

"You are so drunk," Steve chided and Bucky blinked, running his tongue around his mouth to identify that yes, that was the taste of alcohol, he'd just been sipping it from a glass in Steve's New York apartment, hadn't he...

"M'not!" protested a strange voice, heavily accented and fairly slurred, but still recognizable: the same person Bucky'd heard in his head saying those things to Steve, the cause I'm with you to the end of the line, pal, the all you gotta do is shine my shoes, maybe take out the trash... voice.

It was coming from his mouth.

"Hey, Sarge, how bout we have a contest then?" Another voice interrupted from the right and Bucky groggily turned his head that way, where a man with a beret and a mustache was giving him a grin. Sarge. Was that him too? Sergeant James Barnes.

"Wha'kinda contes'?" The accented voice stumbled from his lips again and Bucky realized he wasn't the one making the choice to speak; he was watching a memory as the whole version of himself - the happy version? - conversed with the Howling Commandos.

"Fléchettes!" another voice inputted and Bucky's 2014 mind helpfully translated that to darts. Then commotion erupted and people were talking over each other and Bucky couldn't absorb any of the information because everything shut down into tunnel vision - entire being, entire body, was suddenly centered and focused on the man pulling him outta the booth, one hand tight on his bicep and the other pressed protectively against his lower back.

"I can walk o'm'own, Stevie," Bucky's accented voice slurred and Steve laughed again, a brilliant, stunning sound, face radiating more sunshine than Bucky could remember seeing in a person before.

"I gotcha, Buck. Can't have the army's best sniper breaking a wrist from falling over in a bar." Steve winked at him and Bucky's knees melted at the sight and then Steve was laughing more, gathering Bucky up in his arms with a possessive arm slung around his waist. He stumbled straight into Steve's chest, locking his arms around Steve's shoulders, and the part of him inside the memory decided he really didn't wanna leave the warmth of Steve's arms ever.

"Aw, Sarge sure gets cuddly when he's wasted, huh?" Another Howling Commando clapped Bucky on the back, so he tucked his face deeper into Steve's neck, lifting a very heavy arm to flip off whoever'd said the comment.

More laughter and joking burst out behind him and Bucky very reluctantly pulled away from Steve's chest. Steve Rogers was looking down at him like Bucky hung the moon in the sky, eyes pouring over with something so deep that he gasped - in reality - from the expression alone.

Steve's big hands brushed stray strands of hair off of Bucky's forehead and his gaze lightened, then he was pulling Bucky over to the dartboard, one hand still around his waist and Bucky stumbled again but Steve straightened him with another blinding smile and everything was warm and spinning and perfect and --

Someone was holding him, strapping him down at the shoulders, compressing his body into a pressure chamber, warm air brushing over his face and no, Bucky was never letting Hydra fucking brainwash him again, not when he'd finally gotten free, he was never letting anyone grab and take him again.

He swung out his left arm, hard and fast, the world flashing between Steve's apartment kitchen and a bank vault and a golden bar full of laughing men and then there was a startled sound and something breaking and his lungs were convulsing in his chest, his body heaving as he tried to breathe, tried to center himself back to wherever the fuck he was.

He'd lashed out this way before, bank vault after meeting Steve for the first time on the bridge, he'd thrown scientists across the room in an explosion of fury and confusion and then he'd been left with his arms curled threateningly and his body heaving with breath and now--

--only now he wasn't in a bank vault, he was in New York. In Steve Rogers' apartment. Bucky forcibly focused, blinking as memories faded into the back of his mind and he was left with the broken countertop raining sharp pieces to the floor, lodging dust and shards in between the plates of his metal arm.

And then there was Steve's friend, Tony Stark, on the other side of the kitchen, holding himself up with his elbows hooked over the edge of the counter, eyes wide and gasping for air and already bruised along one side.

Bucky blinked. He'd hurt Stark. Stark must've approached to calm him from the memory and the attempting-to-comfort hands triggered the memory of being held down and of course he'd lashed out but how was Tony Stark supposed to know that, how was anyone supposed to know that?
He was a high-level assassin, who the fuck was he kidding? Of course he'd hurt the wrong people, Tony was lucky he was still alive.

Bucky took a step back, ready to take his things and go, what if that'd been Steve, what if he lashed out at the one man he didn't want to kill? He was lethal, he was dangerous. He was compromised.

Performance error:

"Wait," Tony gasped, struggling back to his feet again. Bucky paused and Stark held out a single finger, bending in half to try to get air in his lungs. "Wait, wait. Alright, well, ow. You-" another gasp "-knocked the air out of me, but. Uh, wow, would you let me look at your arm? I'm-

Tony waved an arm around, straightening up the rest of the way. "-kinda an engineer and I've been geeking out about that-" another pointing finger "-but obviously, I get you don't like getting operated on or anything. I mean, I've been in some tough spots in my life, I know-" more explanatory waving hands "-how it can get. But that did kinda just...spark? at the elbow when you flung me across the room, and I can't imagine that'd be good, so."

Tony crossed an arm over his chest and propped his elbow on the arm, resting his chin in his hand. It was an odd pose but it weirdly fit him. He was still breathing a little heavy, but he also looked a hell'ofalot more humble now. And...oddly, more interested. Almost forgiving.

Bucky stared for a moment. Who the hell was this guy?

"Steve doesn't have the tools for that," he finally said, slowly. Tony lit up, clapping his hands together and wincing slightly at the motion.

"Great. Well, I don't live far and I've got a lab with all kinds of toys. There's a car downstairs, if you're interested. No pressure." His hands were up now, both palms out. Then he shrugged, giving Bucky a sly look that couldn't be a good thing. "I mean, unless you want to throw sparks around Cap's apartment until one of his ancient relics catch fire and the whole place goes up in flames and this nice cozy little corner of the world would be ruined and it'd all be because you were just too stubborn to come in and get your tech arm fixed at the house of a very trustworthy friend of Steve's--"

"If I come with you will you stop talking?" Bucky interrupted.

"No promise," Tony gave him a raised-eyebrows look and pointed another finger in his direction. "But you won't catch Steve's place on fire," he offered.

Bucky rolled his eyes. And followed Tony Stark outta Steve's apartment. Stark trotted down the stairs and chatted about how he'd send one of his buddies to replace Steve's counter again-

"-again?" Bucky asked. Then Tony launched into a story about Sam Wilson having called in for it a few weeks ago, apparently Steve'd crushed it during an argument, and Bucky listened distantly as he swung himself into the passenger seat of Tony's flashy red car.

"Jarvis, take us back to the tower."

"Of course, sir," a robotic voice responded. The access panel for the voice wasn't visible and Bucky glanced around, looking for the placement of the speakers. The voice'd said tower...

"The Stark Tower?" Bucky asked, glancing at Tony. He'd slipped sunglasses on and was looking irrevocably smug as his car started zipping through the streets on automotive control. Tony Stark, of course. The plane Steve had borrowed was Stark equipment - that must've come from Tony.
"Well, it's the Avengers Tower now. But yeah, you should be familiar with it. I mean, you broke in a month ago. And shattered one of my windows."

Bucky shrugged, looking back out the window of the car. "Agent Hill has intel regarding the restoration of my memories."

"Maria?" Tony asked incredulously, one hand resting casually on the car's wheel. "Well how about that. She's not really an agent anymore though, you know."

"Sir, would you like me to alert tower security of your incoming visitor?" the robotic voice spoke again. It sounded more personal than the other automotive car systems he was used to, like the words were programmed to be more polite than the standard SHIELD SUV.

"Actually, take us around back. We don't need the paparazzi following us up. Protocol override superhero mode."

"Working on a secret project, are we, sir?"

"Something like that." Tony turned back to Bucky again, fiddling with one of the knobs on his steering wheel. "That's Jarvis, my AI. He's integrated throughout the tower as well, so if you ever need anything - strippers, vodka, red octopus - he can get it for you."

Bucky was going to roll his eyes outta his head. The car took that moment to jerk to the right, then they were disappearing through an alley into an abandoned-looking garage. The ground swiveled beneath the wheels and the car lowered underground; then they were taking off again, sharp lights illuminating the corridor until Jarvis found a parking spot, a few feet away from two sliding glass doors that opened into some kinda testing lab.

Tony stepped out and Bucky followed suit, walking silently behind as doors swung open and Jarvis' voice greeted them again. Tony gave instructions to the AI while Bucky followed him up a rounding set of stairs, one hand over the sheathed knife on his hip.

There was a certain instinctual uneasiness at the way Stark was treating him. Respectfully, like he understood the danger, but recklessly like he didn't care about it. By the time they ascended into another lab - full of screens and much better lighting - the suspicions deemed more relevant than the repair of his arm.

"Why are you placing trust in someone who is a threat to your life?" he finally asked, walking slowly between the shiny metal and discarded robotic parts. Tony glanced his way, picking up tools from one of the tables.

"My life is threatened on a pretty frequent basis. On some more memorable occasions, by your Red-White-and-Blue buddy too. Not that you aren't all intimidating and whatnot, but I figured if you wanted to kill me you'd've done it already." Tony shrugged again, reaching over a table to tap a blue screen, pulling up a file that expanded a cacophony of documents, blurry photographs, and datagraphs.

"This is all I've got on your arm, which isn't a lot, but I should be able to get something done once I find the access panel. You wouldn't happen to know--"

Bucky reached over with his right hand and popped back the plates that revealed the main circuit. Tony clapped his hands together again.

"Great. So, I'm guessing you don't want to do this in a chair...how's the floor?"
Which was how, two hours later, Steve came barging through the doors to Tony's lab to find his best friend sitting crosslegged on the floor in the middle of Tony's lab while Tony sat next to him holding something sparking inside Bucky's arm, humming along to the Classic Rock playing over the speakers.

"What the hell?" Steve skid to a stop, breathing heavy from running all the way from the top floor, where he'd been in a meeting with Pepper all morning. He'd only found out Bucky was here because Jarvis had slipped, asking if Steve knew what Bucky would prefer to drink, because Tony was getting snacks brought down to the lab and Sergeant Barnes hadn't stated his preferences.

"Nice to see you too, old man," Tony replied absently, not moving from his spot on the ground. Bucky looked fairly surprised to see him, eyebrows raising as he flipped hair outta his eyes with a jerk of his head. He didn't look hurt though, or scared, or overwhelmed. A bit of anxiety eased out of his bones because at least Buck was okay, god.

From closer inspection though, it looked like Tony might not've fared as well. His arm was pretty bruised up and his back was stiff, hurt. Considering he'd been perfectly fine the last time Steve'd seen him - which was this morning - he could guess who'd caused the injuries.

"What the hell happened?" Steve reiterated, still kinda puffed up and glowering. He gestured at the two of them - sitting on the floor - and Tony's obvious state of disarray. He hadn't even introduced them. No one knew Bucky was in New York, let alone Steve's apartment, but apparently someone'd figured it out because clearly, Bucky wasn't in Steve's apartment anymore. But seriously, Tony? And something had to have gone down, for Stark to be that beat up.

His tone was not messing around at all, but Stark just snorted at him and kept on poking around in Bucky's arm. The metal fingers twitched and Bucky and Tony both looked down at the hand curiously.

"Hmm, odd," Tony did something else with the sparking tool and Bucky's metal fingers curled up tight into a fist. "You doin' that?"

"No," Bucky responded, sounding just as curious. Another few pokes the fingers uncurled and started twitching again.

Steve threw up his hands. He was gone for four hours and Tony was already trying to steal his best friend.

"You can keep standing there fretting or you can pull up a chair and join us, if you want. Jarvis is heading for snacks, so tell him what you want before they get here." Tony turned away and stood for a moment, typing something onto one of his blue screens. A larger-than-scale three-dimensional projection of Bucky's arm was rotating over one of the tables and Tony set to peeling back the holographic panels of the arm, tracing something with his finger and inputting a blue wire into the projection.

Steve turned back to Bucky, a little lost with all the technology. Bucky's head was tipped back, looking up at him from the ground, so Steve walked all the way over and plopped down beside him, on the right side so Tony could work. Bucky's eyes followed, looking at him curiously like he was trying to measure Steve up against something else in his head.

"What?" Steve asked, nudging Bucky's thigh with his foot. He watched the movement, a little confused, then looked back up at Steve.
"You're here," he said. Steve had to fight the smile that threatened to take over, because yes, of course he was. He'd go anywhere Bucky was, even if it was Stark's annoyingly-technological-lab. There was no avoiding the future when it was spanned out around you in 3D and blue charts and robots.

"So are you. Why is that?" Steve folded his legs out Indian style, propped elbow on knee and chin on hand, gaze on Bucky. Buck looked down under the scrutiny, fringe of dark hair blocking his eyes from view as he tightened a random strap across his calf.

"Stark came by the apartment, offered to operate on my arm. It was failing efficiency, so the logistics were to let him look at it."

Buck lifted his head again, pieces of hair falling in his eyes, so Steve reached forward without thinking, tucking the strands behind Bucky's ear in the same familiar motion - fixing unruly hair a thousand times.

It wasn't until he caught the expression in icyblue Steve realized what he was doing. He'd spent his entire life straightening Bucky's hair; it was basically instinctive now. Except how was Buck supposed to remember that?

He was frozen, staring at Steve, and Steve brought his hand back so fast it might as well've caught fire. He opened his mouth to apologize, then Tony was spinning back around and that idea was quickly discarded in favor of snapping his jaw shut.

Bucky was still openly staring at him, searching his face for something. Steve looked down at his lap, running a distressed hand through his hair. He didn't want to ruin everything they'd been building with one stupid slip-up from the past, fuck, he had to be more careful.

"Sir? Your refreshments await," Jarvis thankfully interrupted and Steve couldn't help the breath of relief. Bucky stood to walk - glide, he could be a dancer with the way he moved - over to the tray. When he came back he had two oranges in his right hand, tossing them both at Steve.

"Can you peel them? I've only got one functional hand." He shook the limp bionic arm to prove his point and Steve nodded, trying not to stare from how strange it was to see the normally-powerful-weapon a dead robot hanging at his side.

The rest of him looked strangely normal, despite the tactical gear he was in, as always. Steve'd offered him clothes on multiple occasions but the only thing he'd gotten were weird looks in response. He had a feeling it had something to do with keeping all the weapons and armor close by, protected and safe. Maybe soon, Bucky wouldn't feel like he needed to be on guard anymore.

And Steve may need to check if Tony had mind-reading equipment, because he took that moment to grab a green smoothie from the refreshments tray and wave a hand in Bucky's direction as he spoke.

"Hey, you mind losing the knife-vest? It'll be easier to get at the shoulder joint."

*

It didn't cross Bucky's mind to protest or disobey, so he started in on the straps across the right side of his body, except he still only had one hand in commission and they weren't coming undone easily.

"Rogers, would you mind?" Bucky asked, glancing down at Steve, who was busy focusing on peeling oranges. He looked up at his name though, blinking a few times in surprise before sitting the orange aside and standing.
"Yeah, no problem Buck." Steve reached over to finish unwinding the first clasp, moving down to the next like he'd done it a thousand times before. Bucky narrowed his eyes, thinking back, and the next memory hit him outta nowhere.

They were in an empty schoolhouse, a fire roaring off to the right, bright children's coats piled up in front of it, and it was freezing.

"You're all flushed," Steve Rogers said concernedly, eyes flickering over Bucky's face. This time, since he knew what to expect, Bucky froze and watched the scene play out, tapping into his own thoughts and emotions as much as he could. Despite the cold, a heat - the flush Steve was talking about - had crept into his cheeks and chest. He was too busy thinking about that (and avoiding Steve's eyes?) to quite register the next words before it was too late.

"And you'll freeze to death in those soaking clothes." Steve leaned forward and started unbuttoning the big navy-blue buttons on Bucky's peacoat. (It was the peacoat from the Smithsonian exhibit - this must be during the war.) His brain was so overwhelmed with thoughts (too many to sort through) and Steve's proximity that he didn't cognize the words until Steve's fingers had undone more than half his coat.

Then it sunk in. And Bucky freaked.

He shoved Steve off him, quick and brutal enough to make Steve stumble and almost fall on his ass. Steve was half-naked (his shirt was dripping by the fire, they must've been caught in rain) and undressing Bucky. For some reason, this was a problem.

His brain was short circuiting. (There were too many emotions too pick out any particular one, but the general feeling of 'fucked up' was pretty clear. That and singular thought that there was something Steve didn't know, but should, that he was trying to help Bucky out when he should've been sprinting in the other direction.)

"Bucky?" Steve asked, taking a cautious step closer. Bucky buried his head in his hands again, curling in on himself. Fuck, what was he doing? What was he doing? He couldn't even sit still and let Steve be a friend to him. He was fucking everything up. It had to happen eventually. They couldn't go on forever with Bucky torn apart by feelings he couldn't face and couldn't name.

He'd ruined everything and Steve still wasn't getting that, worrying and putting his hand on Bucky's shoulder. Bucky was shivering, even harder now than before. He'd fucked up and they were going to hurt him for that. He'd fought back and that always meant more drugs, more pain.

(Because the same thing had happened earlier today, Bucky recognized what was happening the moment that the younger version of himself's brain started to wander - relapse with reality.)

It was all his fault, that test going wrong. He hadn't held still the way they'd wanted him to and now look at him, look at what he's ruined. Who are you? What are you? Tell me what you are.

Sergeant James Barnes 32557038 a total fuck up who ruins everything SergeantJamesBarnes 32557038 who can't even let his best friend touch him SergeantJamesBarnes 32557038 who doesn't deserve to be touched. SergeantJamesBarnes 32557038 SergeantJamesBarnes 32557038 SergeantJa--

(Holy shit, this guy was fucked up.)

"It's me, Steve. I need you to focus on my voice. I'm here with you and I need you to listen to me, okay?" Firm and gentle fingers tugged the hands away from Bucky's face. Cold air hit his skin and there was more wetness on his cheeks than rainwater.

He blinked open his eyes, vision taken up by more golden muscle. Bucky swayed, trying to get his bearings. It didn't look like a metal labroom, but Steve...oh fuck, Steve. (Steve Rogers pulled him outta the flashback - was that usual?)

Bucky scrambled away, sliding backwards on the desk and basically falling off the other side, catching his feet on the ground and bracing his hands on the wood to stay upright.

Ohgod ohgodohgod, Steve. He backpedaled further, crashing into another desk. He whipped behind that one too, eyes wide as the Commandos all stared at him. Bucky crouched down behind the desk, back against the wall as he tried to catch his breath. Ohgodohgodohgod.

He'd rather be on Zola's table than living this hell because then at least he could hate the Germans, instead of himself. Right now Bucky had both tormenting his head though, so it didn't matter exactly which person he was hating. All of them.

(And somehow, this man was the laughing one from the exhibit? That black'n'white, happy, smiling person? He was missing something terribly crucial, wasn't he? How was it possible to be this...crazy and that happy too?)

"Bucky?" Steve rounded the first desk cautiously, hands up in the air like he was trying to placate a wild animal.

"Don't touch me," Bucky begged, pressing back further into the wall and drawing his knees up to his chest.

"I'm not going to hurt you," Steve promised, a flicker of pain over his features lingering from Bucky's begging.

"Please," Bucky pleaded again, curling arms around the top of knees and dropping his forehead to them. It wasn't dark enough, wasn't warm enough, he was soaking the wall through and he was sitting in a settling cloud of dust that erupted by his frantic scramble over here and Bucky just wanted to curl into the darkness and never have to be blinded by the bright again.

(He knew that feeling.)

When he blinked back into reality, Steve's hand was resting heavy over his heart, blue eyes searching his worriedly. The heat of Steve's palm on his bare skin blossomed down through his muscles, bleeding that familiar burn through every inch of him.

"You okay?" Steve asked softly, quiet, words just for the two of them. Bucky looked up at that gentle, caring expression and tried to cognize what it meant, what Steve meant, what the hell that memory'd meant.

The emotions ricocheting through him in the flashbacks? In the first flashback earlier, Steve had brushed his short hair out of his face and then - minutes ago - he'd reached out and done the exact same thing. What the hell did that mean? What the hell did any of it mean?

And fuck, the more he was seeing of Bucky Barnes the less he looked like the smiling, laughing man from the museum and the more he looked like what he saw in the mirror now.

He'd been messed up, in the past. More than just performance errors; he'd been truly dysfunctional.
Was that what Steve was expecting of him now? To be dysfunctional? Bucky wasn't like that anymore. He was perfect. No more mental flaws or handicaps.

"Yes," he answered, simply, because there was absolutely no evidence of the contrary. The moment he answered Steve let out a breath and took a step backwards, hand falling to his side.

While Bucky's memory was consuming his head, he must've been silent this time, complacent as Steve rid him of the vest and shirt. Now the slight chill was making his bare torso shiver as he sat back down, taking a moment to realize how differently he'd come outta that memory than last time.

The first flashback from today, he'd come out swinging at Tony. And seconds ago, he'd been still and calm as he blinked back to the present, just looking at Steve. Why had there been a change? What factors caused it?

He sat there in slight frustration on the floor as Stark started working on his arm again and Steve started handing him orange pieces. His body was acting without him. When his mind was preoccupied it was making instinctual decisions and Bucky didn't appreciate that. There were no involuntary movements of his body; he had complete control. His instincts, even, were supposed to be controlled.

More and more performance errors;

But it didn't feel like he was broken.

*

He was trying not to stare. Thankfully, Buck seemed pretty distracted, taking the oranges Steve was handing him without question, staring at the floor while Tony played with his bionic arm.

The same arm that was attached to his body with scarred, ripped up skin. It looked like the damn thing was poisoning him, tendrils of scars and raised pink flesh spanning out from where the metal was fused with his otherwise beautiful golden skin and honestly Steve wanted to be sick at the sight.

With his armor on, Bucky was pretty damn intimidating. Hair whipping in the wind, eyes hard as ice, knives and guns slotted all over his body, grace and deadliness in every calculated step of his heavy and silent boots.

And now, sitting shirtless on the floor of Tony's lab, he just looked...hurt. Ripped up, compromised by his own greatest weapon. Confused. Smaller, pained, lost somehow.

Steve just wanted to reach out and take Bucky's hands in his, hold him so tight that Bucky knew he never had to be alone again. Steve was never going to let anyone hurt him again.

But he didn't. He handed another piece of orange to Bucky and listened half-heartedly to Tony's chatter about the nature of a certain mechanism in Bucky's arm and tried not to stare at the destroyed flesh of his best friend's shoulder and tried to keep his damn hands to himself.

~~~

"Stark. What can I do you for?"

"You do realize that is not proper English, right Barton?"

"Maybe if anyone actually invited me to shit instead of just calling all the time, I would learn to communicate to your standards. But seriously, what're you calling for? You call me, let's see.
"Never."

"Well excuse me for being a very busy super genius running a multimillion dollar company while simultaneously inventing the newest generation of technological advancements and y'know, saving the world."

"Pepper runs the company."

"Anyways. I just thought I'd give you the opportunity to know, that the most accurate shot in the world is spending all day tomorrow under my roof."

"...I mean, there are way better ways to ask me to come over than that, but I'm flattered, so yeah, I'll hop on a plane tonight--"

"Oh, wait, sorry, did you think I meant you? No, you see, I was talking about the fucking Winter Soldier."

Clint didn't really even have the chance to be pissed about the insult to his sharp-shooting skills. That could be an argument for another time. Although that conversation was not over.

"James Barnes is in New York? And he's just...chill now??"

"Not exactly chill, persay. But I did him the honors of fixing up his arm and he's coming back tomorrow for a checkup recalibration. I got a plethora of specs on the thing though, you should seriously see the intricacy--"

"Tony, frankly my dear, I don't give a damn." He could basically hear the eyeroll over the phone and smirked in response. "But what I do care about - how is Rogers holding up?"

Stark actually went a little quiet at that. Jarvis said something in the background and Tony was much better at muffling phones than Steve was because Clint picked up exactly zero of his response. When he came back Clint was already jiggling his leg impatiently, waiting for a response.

"Cap's acting...weird." Tony finally relented, coming back over the line. "He won't stop staring at Barnes, which is totally understandable when the guy shouldn't even be alive, but they're living together, you'd think he'd get his fill of staring when I'm not trying to give a technological diagnosis. I never even thought that could be a thing, a technological diagnosis...I should really coin that term, it sounds way cooler than medical diagnosis, although technically the arm is part of Barnes..."

"They're living together?" Clint finally managed to squeeze in between Tony's long-winded explanation.

"Yeah, I know, not exactly the smartest idea Cap's had. But what can you expect, the guy is ninety something. Maybe he's getting amnesia...oh, no, wait that would be the lethal assassin living with him. I have a feeling it's like that whole, you know, babynake thing? Where it's more dangerous to get bit by a babynake because they can't control their venom output? That's basically how that whole assassin-without-memories thing has got to be because he doesn't even remember half the brutal murders of his pa-- oh, shit, hi Barnes, I didn't know you were still here."

The phone got cupped into silence again and Clint wasn't just jostling his leg while he waited this time, he was pacing and cursing Tony Stark and that Murphy dick who made that one law about shit going wrong.

"Hey Barton, gotta go, have a splendid night shooting things or whatever you do in the dark hours."
The device beeped off and Clint stared at his phone, showing him the newly-familiar screen of being hung up on.

He really was reconsidering giving the Avengers his cell number.

~~~

"Memories are a funny thing, Sergeant. There's a scientist - here, let me get his name..." Bruce shuffled through the pile of papers in front of him, only half of which Bucky could see on the little blue screen with Dr. Banner's face.

It was something called a Skype call, although Tony went on to explain it was actually a lot better technology than a simple Skype call and Bucky really didn't care, it was simply a benefit to acquaintance himself with more allies from Steve Rogers' life. And finding that both Dr. Banner and Tony Stark had done a lot of research regarding amnesia and brainwashing, it was much more educational than Bucky'd anticipated.

Finally Bruce Banner emerged back into the webcam with a file in his hand and his curly hair in a wild swoop across his forehead. Bucky straightened and watched the screen patiently.

"...Dr. Yadin Dudai. See, he's got this theory on the memory paradox and it's based on the idea that memory is an act of creation and imagination - every time you remember something you're physically recreating a scene in your head from pieces. It's not actually something that's stored, it has to be created new every time. So, there's no such thing as a true memory, only the most recent recreation. And you can't know that any memory is verifiably accurate. So that's where the paradox comes in."

Bruce Banner talked with his hands in rolling motions, kinda like Tony did. Maybe it was a genius-scientist thing.

"The more you remember something, the more times you have to recreate it, the less accurate it becomes. The most honest and clear memories are actually those of amnesia patients. If the memories haven't been accessed over and over and therefore meddled, then the recreation of that scene for you is gonna be alot more accurate than whatever Steve's remembering."

Well.

That explained a lot.

"So all of the flashbacks I've been having, those are real scenes, then? They felt unrealistically clear."

"Yes, that's exactly how it's going to be. Whatever your mind is bringing back - unless, of course, it's an implanted memory - will be the realest version of the truth. The catch to this, though, it's true for all memories. I don't know if you're familiar with the term PTSD, but those memories are going to be alot clearer for you than any other veteran--"

"I'm not a veteran, I'm a soldier," Bucky interrupted. He wasn't done serving. Just because he'd spent a few days at the Stark Tower did not mean his missions were complete or forgotten in any way.

Bruce Banner gave him a look like he was calculating way more from Bucky's words than the conclusion that he was still fighting, but Bucky wasn't gonna take back his statement.

"Okay. Yeah, alright. But you know, flashbacks might turn to nightmares. Or, if it gets really bad, night terrors." Bucky waved a dismissive hand, because he slept as efficiently as he did everything else. He didn't dream. Bruce shrugged, looking down at the folders in his hands. "But if they do, you know you can go to any one of us for help."
For a team of dysfunctional, half-crazy superheroes, they sure were keen to 'help.'

"Stark has been...abrupt." Bucky shifted his weight, crossing his arms over his chest in the stance that he seemed to be taking more and more lately. "He's not as reckless as Steve, but he's not careful with his words either."

Bruce smiled and ducked his head bashfully, a faraway look in his eyes like he was remembering something.

"That's the nice thing about Tony. The rest of them? They only see the tragedy. He thinks...he thinks we're human." Bruce's eyes met Bucky's through the time and space between them, across the Skype call to wherever Dr. Banner was, and for just a moment Bucky wondered if maybe, maybe these people were more alike him than he'd thought.

He thinks we're human.

A real human being.

"I appreciate the research," Bucky started, not really sure what to say next because he had seen plenty of people thank each other but it felt so trivial, surely Dr. Banner was aware of the impact he was making and did he really have to be reminded of it by Bucky?

Noise, more useless words, people repeating the same things over and over for each other's benefit. What was the point?

"You're welcome," Bruce interjected, before Bucky could stumble anymore. He gave Bucky a smile and Bucky ran a hand through his hair, offering Dr. Banner a nod before disconnecting the call.

When he turned back around, Steve was standing in the doorway, leaning against the doorframe.

"I think you're human," he said quietly, the words drifting long and sloping in all the space between them. Bucky hadn't moved, frozen watching Steve, the void of ten feet suddenly twenty, then thirty, and he decided to take a step closer, because he was much too far away and it was an irrational thought and he almost took two steps backwards because of it but no, he wouldn't be weak enough to change his mind.

Steve's eyes were soft, nothing like careful, but nothing like the stupid-reckless either.

"I think you're human," Steve repeated, still leaning in the doorway, watching Bucky.

The way he was looking at Bucky felt familiar, and a wave of unexpected warmth bubbled through him. The same warmth he'd felt when Steve's palm had rested on his chest, but that'd been physical, that'd been a transfer of energy and body heat, why would the same feeling come when they were nowhere near touching?

The situation was teetering on the edge of something dangerous and Bucky almost considered pushing past Steve to avoid it because he didn't know where this was going but his senses were screwing with his head and he couldn't move.

"And I think you're a hero, Buck," Steve finished, words cascading down like waterfalls, treacherous and glinting with sunlight and promise and crashing on rocks below to send up rainbow and silver droplets to spin in the sun and cool off the world and Steve Rogers thought he was a hero.
"I'll be gone for a few days," Bucky told him, then he was brushing past Steve and out into the hallway and into the elevator and he didn't stop to answer Jarvis's questions, just stepped out of the building and slipped away into the dark of the night and let the shadows cover him and the world hide him from the sunlight so he could hide from those words and Steve's warmth and himself, too.

~~~

A few days was apparently six, which was basically a week, so really Steve felt cheated. It was his fault, though. He'd pushed Bucky too far and yes, he knew he was supposed to be giving Buck space. He'd promised he'd give him space and what, two days after he accidentally got introduced to Steve's friends he was pushing titles and heavy words around?

Meeting the rest of the team was surprisingly easier than Steve had thought. Not that he'd expected Bucky to slaughter them all, but he'd anticipated it to at least be difficult. Bucky didn't seemed phased though, not by crowds, not by strangers, not by Tony's robots or the lab or the ridiculous security protocols or the wide blue screens and holographic projections.

It was like Bucky just...didn't care about any of it. Nothing phased him. He took it all in stride, so long as he didn't find it annoying or - what was that word he always used - inefficient.

It would be infuriating if it wasn't breaking Steve's heart.

That didn't stop his broken heart from pounding out of his chest ridiculously when Bucky slipped through the window on the sixth night, somewhere around 7pm.

"You have a good trip?" Steve asked as he got off the couch, maybe a little sarcastic, maybe a little pissed off, but Bucky'd been gone for a week and Steve didn't have a single good day in his absence.

Bucky narrowed his eyes but sat his sniper rifle down on the brick fireplace. Hell, Steve was surprised he'd come back at all.

"Let me guess," Steve continued, kinda slamming his way around the kitchen. Back in Brooklyn 1940 all over again, getting riled up and pissed everytime Bucky didn't come home because he'd been with some girl - or multiple - and gotten stupid drunk and hadn't bothered to show up to the damn apartment until he was broke off his ass three days later. "You're either bleeding or exhausted, and you need a place to sleep."

"Basically, yeah," Bucky responded, just as sarcastically, starting to unload his guns onto the floor. Steve groaned in exasperation because obviously, he wasn't going to tell Bucky to leave. He was stubborn, but he was only pissed because Bucky was gone, he'd never send him off intentionally.

"Bucky, I thought we were over this stage." Steve crossed the room and slipped the firearm between Bucky's shoulderblades out of its holster, setting it down on the floor beside his others. Bucky didn't swat him away from helping, but he didn't thank Steve either.

"What stage?" he asked, like Steve was the craziest person on the planet.

"The stage that you leave all the time and only come back here to lick your wounds. I don't know what you're afraid of-"

"Afraid? I'm not goddamned afraid of anything, Rogers." Bucky spun on him with fire in his eyes and no, that was Steve's line. Buck may be some hotshot legend now, but Steve'd already gone down that road once and it hadn't changed anything between them then, it wasn't changing anything now that the roles were reversed.
He got right up in Bucky's face, six inches between their chests as Steve leaned forward, making his words as damned clear as they got.

"Buck, you were a prisoner of war for seventy years, you'd have to be off your fucking rocker if you think you're just fine."

Icyblue eyes that used to look at him with adoration and affection turned as bitter and cold as the ice that'd trapped them both for so long, then Bucky was hissing back in that tone that'd scare anyone else, anyone but Steve because Tony may just rollover people's pasts but Steve knew. Bucky. Like no one else in the entire goddamned world ever would.

"You're the one who gets nightmares, not me," Bucky pointed accusingly, too pissed to brush the crazy disheveled hair out of his face. Nightmares? Really? Bucky wouldn't even know about those if he hadn't been watching Steve sleep because he never bothered to get rest of his own.

"You don't sleep!" Steve accused back, throwing his hands up. "You crash here what, once a week?"

"I get the exact amount of regeneration time that my body needs, it's not my fault you never trained yours." The words cut deep and cold because that was it, that was the core of the problem.

Bucky didn't see how hurt he was. He didn't see how messed up he was, how far off the reservation from okay. He thought he was functional. And he was, on a surface level, he was still deadly and he had perfect posture and he moved like a goddamned dream but what was the point if underneath that all was a robotic machine?

"That's the whole point, Bucky. Life isn't supposed to be about training." He'd gone from semi-yelling to pissed-exasperated and Bucky'd simmered down a notch in response, looking haughtily up at Steve like he was outta his mind.

"It's not about training, once you know what you're doing. Then it's just efficiency, something you also don't have." Bucky crossed his arms and Steve threw up his hands again because goddammit, Bucky was missing the entire point here.

This wasn't about whether or not Steve was efficient, this wasn't about whether or not Bucky had 'performance errors' or whatever the fuck he'd called them that one time that'd made Steve want to throw things and resurrect Zola just to destroy him all over again.

"Life's not supposed to be about efficiency either, Buck." God, he was so tired of this fight. It may be the first time they vocalized it, but this was the underlying argument behind every glare and unimpressed eyebrow-raise Bucky'd ever shot his way.

Steve sighed, running a hand through his hair and taking a few steps backwards. How were you ever supposed to save someone if they didn't know they were drowning? Bucky'd lost the entire point of what being alive was supposed to be about and it was killing Steve because, really, it was simple.

Their gazes caught again and the corners of his mouth turned up a little, sadly, but Bucky was just so defiant and that wasn't the point of this at all.

"I just want you to be happy," Steve told him. It was the wrong thing to say. Icy eyes widened a fraction, then a bomb went off somewhere and Bucky exploded.

"Happy?? Ты счастлив? Are you happy, Steve? Tell me all about what it's supposed to feel like to be so goddamned happy!" The words were the sharpest he'd ever heard from that mouth and Steve'd heard some bitter things from those lips. Most of them directed at bullies in back alleys, but now the bitterness was turned on him, so pissed off he'd actually reverted to cursing in Russian.

Steve really wished he'd killed Zola when he'd had the chance.

But he couldn't change anything about that now, so he just crossed his arms over his chest and glared back; because this wasn't their first fight. Bucky might not remember how these normally turn out, but Steve was well aware which of the two of them were more stubborn.

"I'll be happy once you're better." It was the truth; Steve may not be in a great place right now, but once Bucky was okay, then there would be nothing to keep Steve from being okay too.

"Better? Better? There's nothing wrong with me!" Bucky shouted, metal arm whirring as his hands tightened into curled fists at his sides. That wasn't a good sign. Steve knew about triggers that made Bucky scared, but he didn't know anything about what'd happen if he pissed him off.

Last week he'd helped Buck out'a flashback (although of what, Bucky hadn't told him) - when Tony'd tried to do the same, he'd ended up flung across the room (which Steve'd weaseled outta Stark by dragging him off by the arm and demanding how he got the bruises). Buck hadn't changed in that aspect - Steve's touch was still what grounded him, what calmed him from his memories and the haunted ghosts swimming through his head.

So, as much as Bucky was pissed and screaming there was nothing wrong with him, Steve wasn't gonna just ignore Buck's flashbacks and avoidances and trying to shut the world out. Not when it was his job to be here. His job to save his best friend now.

"Bucky, I'm just trying to help." Steve took a single step forward and Bucky tensed like a guitar string, mirroring Steve's movement with a step backwards, forcing distance between them. His words were as cold and heartbreaking as the sudden step away.

"I don't need you to fix me." Bucky sneered, gesturing at Steve with a disgusted wave of his hand. "You're a hell of a lot more messed up than I am. You can't even go a fucking day. without losing it. You're the one who's broken, Steve, not me."

Steve was left blinking in his living room while Bucky stormed past him, silent as ever, then the bedroom door slammed and the apartment fell into crushing silence and Steve just sunk to the floor where he was, staring at his closed bedroom door and wondering where the hell he'd gone wrong.

Not catching Bucky from the train, that's where he'd gone wrong. And it seemed like he was doing nothing but making mistakes since.

Chapter End Notes

The doctor that Bruce talks about is a for-real guy, and there is a super interesting podcast here about memories if you wanna listen to that.

Thank you so much for reading as always!! All comments and kudos are super duper appreciated :)
The bed in Steve's room wasn't as offensive as he'd thought it be. Locking himself in Steve's bedroom meant there wasn't much to do besides read the library stacked on the shelves; and he stretched out on Steve's bed to do so. He didn't sleep on it because getting off it took an act of congress and if he needed a quick escape it wouldn't be efficient. So at night he slept on the window seat, head tipped back against the wall and the sounds of New York washing over him, constant drone of noise he turned down like a knob in his head.

During the day he read Steve's books until there were no more to read, then he rifled through the closet until he found something interesting: a little black sketchbook. The drawings were all dated between May and September of this year, so throughout the first few months of Steve's assimilation to the 21st century.

There were buildings, skylines he recognized out the window juxtaposed to ones that were achingly familiar, probably from the 1940s. Scenes of Central Park, Grand Central Station. Pencil sketches of people in battle - the girl from the bridge, Tony Stark, others he didn't recognize. Confused drawings of new gadgets, an adjusting world around him. A few sketches for Captain America suits, one in red, one in blue, one in white with blue accents and red straps. That one had a note next to it in Steve's handwriting, something about never being able to keep it clean.

But Bucky's favorite drawing actually wasn't in the book; he saw it later, two days later, when he finally decided to venture out of Steve's room after their fight.

It wasn't a terrible fight, but he didn't feel like dealing with the aftermath of Steve's pity or nurse syndrome or hurt from Bucky's words. He'd meant what he said; he wasn't broken. Steve was more messed up than he was. He wasn't interested in being 'fixed.'

He needn't have worried though, because as soon as he emerged from Steve's bedroom it became clear the apartment was empty. He re-armed himself in the living room, checking for signs of where Steve had gone. The answer ended up sitting on the kitchen counter, in the form of a handwritten note.

_I'm at Tony's, researching what he puts in his strange green smoothies. I figured we could eat something besides apples for a change. Not that's anything wrong with - I took my bike, but the walk isn't bad, I left a map. Or you can call this number for a car, if you want to join me._

- S.G.R.

The map had a route highlighted in black marker - avoiding all the major roadways and cutting through backalleys to get there. He almost smiled at that, because maybe Steve was getting to know him after all. Or maybe Bucky Barnes had always been the kind to travel through back alleys.

But the best part of the note was the pencil drawing arching down the side, next to Steve's carefully sloping words. It was of Bucky's metal arm, bent slightly at the elbow, plates carefully shaded and detailed. Except instead of the red Soviet star on his bicep, there was a pencil sketch of an apple.

The Apple Soldier. He almost laughed.

He was supposed to be mad at Steve, but instead he found his lips curling up automatically, his body turning a smile on a mouth that hadn't had a use for one in decades.

Carefully folding the note, Bucky unstrapped part of his vest and tucked the paper inside. The moment his fingers slid it into an inner pocket, his mind turned the vest blue, a peacoat, another one of Steve Rogers' drawings in his hands, a lifetime ago.

_The world smelled like forest and graphite, Steve was pressed up warm against his side as though there wasn't plenty of room for both of them. There were acorns, filtering light of dusk, Steve's soft blonde hair, the crisp feel of the paper in his hands. Since the paper was folded, he couldn't see what the drawing was of - but he really, really wanted to know._

The memory faded before he could take any other details from it, then Bucky was strapping his vest back up and grabbing the map from the counter, swinging out of Steve's window to follow the black line before he could lose the train of inquiry or the nerve to ask Steve about it.

He wanted to know what the other drawing he'd kept was. It was vital information; somehow. He didn't know why yet, but not all mission parameters were clear from the beginning. Right?
"Good afternoon, Sergeant Barnes. Can I assist you with anything today, sir?" Jarvis greeted as the elevator doors closed. Normally he'd take the stairs, but Stark's enhanced elevator went fast enough that he didn't feel like punching walls.

"Do you have a visual on Steve Rogers?" Bucky asked, finger hovering over the elevator buttons. The doors slid closed and the seventeenth floor lit up all on its own, already sliding upwards before Jarvis spoke again.

"Captain Rogers is currently on the seventeenth floor, waiting for the arrival of the remaining Avengers members so the Avengers meeting may commence."

"Avengers?" He repeated, folding his arms over his chest and leaning against the wall. Which is how he got the run-down over the length of the ride, images displayed helpfully on the wall to depict the Battle of New York in full detail.

The 'Avengers' team consisted of all the people in Steve's notebook, so their faces were familiar. Hawkeye and Black Widow and Thor and Bruce and Tony. He'd already met three of them, although his encounter with Natasha had been trying to kill her, so that may prove to be a problem.

Turned out the first problem definitely wasn't Natasha. Although really, he didn't think it was as big of a problem as Steve did...

"Rogers?" Bucky called out, stepping out of the elevator and now armed with names and information to store alongside his knives and three pistols.

The seventeenth floor was lavish but modern, a stocked bar to the right and metal stairs and platforms arching above the door, half-open blinds covering floor to ceiling windows, and a giant raised platform in the middle of the room lined with white couches and a silver banister.

Steve was sitting on one of those couches, but the moment he heard his name he shot up with a surprised "Bucky!" Tony was there too, looking at him with raised eyebrows over the projection hovering on the table.

He stepped out from under the alcove, cutting to the left to scale the stairs up to the platform. Halfway up the metal stairs and a faint thwip went off behind him, followed by a soft whistling sound, then Bucky was leaning backwards and snapping his metal arm up, just in time to catch the arrow aimed at his skull.

The tip of it was inches away from his temple but the quick catch with the strength of the metal hand splintered the arrow into a thousand pieces, a few splinters scratching his cheekbone in the millisecond it took for him to spin on his feet and aim one of his pistols at the shooter on the metal beam.

He'd have shot already, if Steve wasn't right behind him, if he wasn't inside one of the most secure buildings in the world. Odds are, if someone was here, Steve knew about it, and if he killed any of Steve's friends that might put a serious damper on the day.

"What the hell was that?!!?" Steve shouted from behind him, before he could open his mouth and ask the same thing. Except probably a lot less nice.

The man on the metal beam swung down, jumping to a platform across the room and starting their way casually. Bucky didn't lower his pistol, watching the shooter and debating non-lethal shots as his brain filtered through information on the man's face, finally supplying a name to the attacker:
Codename Hawkeye; Clinton Francis Barton; high-level assassin, propensity for arrows.

"I wanted to see if he was as good as everyone claims he is," Barton shouted back as explanation, starting down the stairs towards the platform where Steve was glowering.

He was expecting a "Bucky, put the gun down," from Rogers, but actually...it looked like Bucky may be the one to step in with damage control. Steve Rogers was thrumming on the verge of exploding.

"Is this a joke to you??" Steve seethed, fists curled at his sides, then Tony was rolling his eyes and muttering an exasperated "here we go." Either Rogers didn't hear or didn't care about Tony's comment because he was still glaring at Barton, shoulders strung up high with tension. "What the hell made you think that was a good idea? Do you have a death wish? Just because he's not Bruce doesn't mean he won't get pissed off enough to kill you! If you hadn't killed him first!!"

"He's also right here," Bucky supplied, tucking the gun back into its holster and jogging up the rest of the stairs. "And offended, because an arrow isn't going to take down the Winter fucking Soldier, Steve."

"Thank you," Clint rolled his eyes and put the bow down, keeping a healthy distance between himself and the blonde ball of rage as he stuck a hand out to Bucky. "The man I keep getting blown off for. I'm Clint, by the wa-"

"I know," Bucky interrupted, brushing past Barton with a calculating glance before turning all of his attention to the still-pissed Steve. The Sergeant voice from the 40's had long since only spoken Russian when giving commands, but the sharpness of it hadn't failed him yet. "Rogers, pipe the fuck down."

Steve was still glaring at Clint, hardcore, and Tony had started to edge away from him, probably in fear of the wrath of a 240lb supersoldier. Bucky sighed, the situation feeling oddly familiar, like he'd done this a hundred times. He kept himself braced for the hit in case Rogers lost his temper, but for some reason he felt confident Steve wouldn't swing out at him, specifically.

So he sauntered up to Steve's side, grabbing one of his balled up fists and uncurling the fingers manually, prying with cold metal against dangerous strength. It took a few seconds for Steve to catch on to what he was doing and by that time he'd already started forcing the other hand to relax.

Steve's eyes went wide and Bucky moved to drop Steve's hand back to his side when suddenly the fingers tightened again, trapping Bucky's between his this time.

"Are you okay?" Steve asked, voice low and private, words for just the two of them. Bucky looked up at blue eyes, the familiar warmth spreading through him at their proximity, at Steve's fingers tangled up with his own. There was another feeling too, akin to one of the performance-enhancing drugs he used to take...like a prickling heightened sense of awareness beyond even what he usually knew, like every inch of his body that was touching Steve's wasn't just present but burning, on fire.

Before he could pull back his hands his brain tipped sideways in his head and a flood flashed before him, a hundred little clips and moments rapidly evolving and dissolving before his eyes – their hands entwined between their bodies, reaching over at a carnival ride, squeezing tight as they laughed, holding loosely while inspecting damage, clasped elegantly while the world spun around them in the swirls of a dance – then he was deposited back into the present, hands still locked with Steve's.

The worried eyes had become even moreso – ironic, considering the source of Steve's worry versus the actual cause. He'd feared Barton's arrow would upset Bucky when in fact the only thing shaking him was this, their hands clasped together between their chests.
“Aren't I supposed to be asking you that?” Bucky finally responded, drawing his hands back from Steve's and cocking his eyebrow like he hadn't just been bombarded with a hundred memories of holding hands with the supersoldier before him.

“I'm not the one that got shot at,” Steve huffed exasperatedly, shooting another glare at Clint from over Bucky's shoulder. It was considerably less dangerous though, so he let it slide. At least he'd calmed Rogers down before he slaughtered a fellow team member. Although why he'd gotten that pissed on Bucky's behalf was a mystery.

Not near as fucking much as the mystery that Steve had never told him that they apparently spent their entire lives holding hands on a frequent enough basis his fingers still fucking curled at the memory.

Wait. No. Couple hundred memories.

“Jeez, it didn't even have a sharp point!” Barton complained from behind them and Bucky took a step back, then another, shoving distance between him and Steve. They must have created quite the scene, all pissed rage melting into quiet hand-holding. He didn't know what the fuck to think of that.

“Now that crisis has been averted, Barton had his question answered and Cap has stopped whistling like a boiling tea kettle, can we get on with this meeting anytime soon?” Tony gestured at the table, where the blue telescreen flashed an image of Dr. Banner, apparently also waiting.

Deflating, Steve made his way back to one of the couches and sat down, glancing between the three of them – four, if the holographic Bruce counted – and twisted his mouth in confusion. “We're still missing--”

“No anymore,” another voice interrupted. Bucky spun around to witness the swinging-hips smug-smiled approach of the red-haired woman who'd tried to choke him to death with piano wire – Codename Black Widow; Natalia Alianovna "Natasha" Romanoff; Russian assassin, propensity for interrogation.

She was greeted with a chorus of various forms of the name “Natasha,” one of which was simple Tash from Barton. With a wide, pretty smile she greeted them all back, a little wave at Tony, a quick hug from Steve (that he was planning to analyze later), and a suddenly sobered look and deep nod for Clint (also curious enough to further analyze).

Then curly red hair swung and she was facing him, expressions schooled into a careful mask. “James Barnes,” she greeted cautiously.

“Bucky,” he corrected without thinking. Steve's eyebrows shot up about 800 feet and Bucky was pretty sure he looked just as surprised as Steve did. He hadn't ever given himself a name or a title, but everyone else (Steve) called him Bucky instead of James, so it only seemed appropriate to correct her misinformation...

“Alright. Bucky.” She nodded, still on guard. Understandable, he'd shot her through the shoulder. To be fair, she'd zapped his metal arm and cracked his eye goggles. Which may not elicit a bulletwound in other circumstances, but he was a deadly assassin.

“Are you joining us for the meeting, Barnes?” Tony asked, interrupting the calm staring contest between them. He turned from Natasha, looking at Stark with raised eyebrows.

“Meeting about...”

“You,” Clint piped up, sitting cross-legged on the floor beside one couch, rolling a drumstick... between his fingers. The Avengers were holding a meeting in discussion of him. The information would be beneficial. So he found Steve's gaze, which wasn't hard since the blue eyes were basically glued to him every time he was in the room.

“Do you have qualms with my staying?” He didn't need to ask Steve, really, but it was the courteous thing to do when he'd been invited to the tower by Steve and didn't want to impose on any discussions just because he'd come to talk about a drawing. Right, he still had to see about that drawing-- “Course not, Buck.” Steve scooted a few feet on the couch and Bucky took the invitation, sitting down carefully next to him.

“Alright. Now that that's settled, we can start this thing. Romanoff, you said you wanted to-” Natasha interrupted Tony, leaning against a couch and looking directly at Bucky.

"Why did you quit Hydra? Assuming you did."

"Natasha. Would it kill you to have some common courtesy--" Steve interrupted, before Nat raised her eyebrows at him and gave him that face, talking over him in turn.

"No, but he still might kill us-"

"We're literally less than a minute into this meeting and already-" Clint started to say, then Banner contributed from his telescreen, "We won't ever get through this if we argue," and Tony started to point fingers and give his input too, then Steve whistled, high-pitched and loud, and everyone shut up.

"Okay, let's make this simple. Clint, you have no room to talk because you tried to shoot Buck the moment he got here," Natasha raised an eyebrow at that and looked over at Barton, who shrugged. Steve ignored them and continued. "Tony, talking over everyone helps nothing, Bruce - we all appreciate the peacemaking, but let's keep this conversation to a maximum of two people at once. And Natasha, don't be rude."

Bucky snorted and everyone turned to him in surprise. His expression snapped back down into nonchalance and Steve sighed, turning back to Nat and waving for her to continue her line of questioning.

"Barnes. Please tell us why you quit Hydra." She had that smug little smile on her face, but that was the best Steve was going to get out of her so he let it go.

Bucky studied all of their faces for a moment and Steve made sure to keep his supportive but not pressing, all open and sincere and everyone here was so fucking uptight, so stuck in their opinions and righteousness and Bucky shook his head, the urge settling on his tongue like it'd come from under his skin, somewhere he didn't even know yet.

One glance at Steve's face, all the tight lines that weren't there in the museum footage, and Bucky didn't hesitate a moment longer.

"Hydra didn't have apples," he told them. And Steve couldn't help it; he just started laughing. The look on Buck's face had been dead serious - except the dull twinkle of mischief in his eyes that Steve was pretty sure only he could see.
Now everyone was staring at Steve and he clamped down on his laughter, shaking his head with an affectionate smile before waving a hand of apology for interrupting.

He didn't miss though, the quiet whisper from Tony to Bruce, almost too soft for his ears to pick up, but he did anyways. "I think that's the first time I've heard him laugh."

Steve's smile faded a bit at the comment. Not because Tony had said it, but because it was probably true.

"Are you going to make me ask the question a third time?" Natasha asked, eyebrows raised a little. Bucky leaned forward, forearms resting on his knees as he answered.

"I left Hydra because I had a reason to. For sixty years I had no purpose but to execute the mission. I didn't know who I was before Hydra and I didn't care. They handled my upkeep, there was no reason to leave."

"But you were tortured." Natasha cocked her head. Bucky just looked at her.

"Pain training." Steve couldn't help his wince at the words. Bucky ignored him. "I never considered escaping; there wasn't anything to escape from. Then I was given a name and a past and told that there was more to myself than I knew. So I researched, I discovered Bucky Barnes, and I realized the truth about Hydra."

He leaned back, threading his right hand through his hair to push it out of his face. "It pissed me off, so I took a new mission." Bucky's pretty mouth curved up a little on one side, eyes twinkling again. "To...ave
g Bucky Barnes."

Steve groaned and Tony made some indignant sound. Barton and Banner just looked amused.

"And just like that, you're one of the good guys? Assassins don't randomly switch sides." Natasha pointed out, twirling a piece of her curly hair.

"You did," Bucky replied. She made a face and Clint gave Bucky a triumphant grin. "Not saying I'm an Avenging Angel like Rogers. And I'm not going to work for SHIELD. Or anyone. But even with Hydra, I only killed the bad guys. Well, who Hydra said the bad guys were."

"What do you mean?" Clint asked curiously, twirling his drumstick again.

"They told me I was saving the world. The same thing anyone gets told when they fight. You think the bad guys have a different speech about spreading evil or something? Everyone says they're the good guys. Even back in the war."

Steve had really been trying to keep his emotions out of this, but he couldn't stop from looking at Bucky helplessly at that. It was something Buck had always struggled with...Steve could still remember them talking about it sometimes, in dark army tents under the flickering light of a lantern.

Who do you fight for?

Their dance, barely more than a week before Bucky had fallen, Steve had asked him what Bucky was fighting for, why he was over there in the first place.

You know the answer to that.

Bucky had fought for him. He'd been told - they'd all been told - that they were saving the war by killing the Nazis. And Bucky had flat out said once that the American Army was full of shit because they'd say anything it took to get them to kill who they were supposed to.

So Bucky hadn't fought for them. He'd fought for Steve.

And then, when he didn't have Steve anymore... what had he fought for then? Hydra had been forced to tell Bucky he was saving the world in order for him to comply.

Bucky couldn't fight for Steve anymore, so he'd fought for what Steve used to fight for.

He was fine. He was totally absolutely fine he wasn't gonna cry or anything fuck tearing up right, fuck tear ducts and fuck this whole meeting.

Thank god Natasha got back to grilling before anyone could call Steve on the near waterworks. Pretty sure this was the first time in his life he'd been grateful for Natasha's relentless interrogations.

"So we're supposed to magically trust you now?" she said dubiously and the sound that came out of Bucky's mouth at that was terribly distressing.

"No. I don't trust any of you. I don't have reasons to kill you, either. But if you give me one, I will."

"That is super comforting," Clint said dryly. "Ghost assassin legend that'll off us the second we steal his cheerios."

"I don't like cheerios," Bucky offered. Tony looked a little pale. Natasha's eyes were narrowed and Bruce had busied himself in something on the other side of the telescreen in his nervousness. It was definitely time for Steve to intervene.

He clapped Bucky on the shoulder - the one that wasn't scarred - and forced a tight smile at everyone.

"Any of us could kill each other anyways, right? And as for trust, we can work up to that. Not everything has to be done today." Steve let his hand drop off of Buck's shoulder and his stiffness faded slightly.

"But you have been through a debrief?" Nat asked and Bucky raised his eyebrows and shook his head.

"Not interested."

"Not optional," she shot back.

"Woah, woah, let's not get all Russian-assassin on each other." Tony held up his hands to placate them. "Like Rogers said, we'll work everything out. It's not like there's eminent danger to handle right now."

"Besides Barnes," Bruce pointed out helpfully. Steve narrowed his eyes but Bucky didn't seem offended in the least, mask of nonchalance back over his features.

"Still, I'm sure we can work everything out before the next crisis--"

*

The tower chose that exact moment to sound a loud alarm over the room. Everyone pulled weapons except for Steve - who just looked alert - and Tony, who was used to loud-ass clanking interrupting his life.
But the three assassins in the room all had weapons of choice aimed in various directions until Tony swiped something on a screen and the sound died, replaced by Jarvis' vocal rundown of the situation.

"Escaped convicts holding up a jewelry store, sir." Bucky snorted, because that had to be the most dramatic police scanner in the world.

Everyone looked between Bucky and the holographic report that had appeared on the table.

"Now's a good a time as any to test the trustworthy theory, right?" Tony suggested. No one disagreed, and Bucky didn't care either way. He'd kill who he wanted to kill when he wanted to kill them and if they were requesting his services, he'd take the opportunity to brush up on his skills.

Tony shrugged and swiped the holograph away. "Suit up."

Good thing he was already in full armor.

Natasha and Clint opted out because it wasn't exactly a life or death situation and they had no obligation to save the great jewelry stores of New York and plant their face on a headline like Stark always did.

The problem, though, was that Steve wanted Bucky to opt out too. And on the ride over, he found out Steve didn't just want Bucky out of this mission. Steve didn't want him fighting at all.

"This is not negotiable, Rogers."

"You're right, it's not. You just spent the past 70 years under Hydra's thumb and now you want to go out and keep fighting? God, Bucky, out of everyone on the planet, you deserve to hang up the uniform more than anyone else!"

"Is that what this is about? What I deserve? Maybe you should stop making decisions for me and let me do what I want. It's been a while since I've been able to do that."

"Look, Buck, you know I didn't mean--"

"To what, tell me when I can and can't fight, exactly like Hydra did?"

"That's not fair. You know I would never do that to you."

"Then let me do this!" Bucky gestured wildly at the New York streets, indicating the world in general. "This is what I'm made for, Steve. Have you stopped fighting? Why the hell should I? If you can't handle that, I'll find someplace else to stay. But I'm not going to sit on the sidelines because you're squeamish about having me in battle with you."

"It's not that! I trust you, Bucky."

"Then fucking prove it," Bucky snapped back, pushing his hair pissily out of his face with his left hand.

"Fine. We're already on a damn mission together. I just wish you'd think about this--"

"And I wish you'd shut up so I can go over the fucking mission parameters with Stark." Bucky's tone was harsh and Steve looked genuinely offended for a moment, then his eyes just narrowed and he turned away. Good.

"What's the rule on target elimination?" He asked into the comm.
It had been a while since he killed anyone that wasn't Hydra, and it looked like today wasn't that day either. Non-fatal damage, if at all possible. People like to watch the bad guys get cuffed.

He didn't give a damn about what the people liked but when he dropped through the window behind the convicts, he refrained from shooting them all. Instead he threw knives to pin the hands of the further ones and knocked out the closer ones with embarrassing ease. Steve was checking the back room and Tony was on the street to catch any runners, but the whole thing was quite easy.

That is, until Bucky kicked one of the unconscious bodies and the man rolled over to flash a familiar pin featuring a red skull octopus.

It was a setup.

Training, instinct, every synaptic response of his brain set to evacuate mode and he absolutely would have made it out in time. Hydra hadn't gotten him yet, and there was a reason for that. He was uncompromisable.

Except that Steve Rogers hadn't reported over their radio connection yet.

Standing in the middle of a jewelry shop (although the whole thing might just be stage props to draw him in - surely Hydra had noticed his presence at Stark's; most likely by tracking Tony's movements, not his - and planned the distress call that way) - Bucky was frozen for a millisecond, running new mission plans through his head and calculating his options.

There was no way to know if they had the equipment to take him. No way to know how big this operation was. If the whole block was in on it, or maybe the fake-convicts were just looking for confirmation he was in New York so they could set up a bigger plan.

With the math blinking behind his eyes and training tugging his body towards the door, Bucky decided it didn't matter what Hydra had planned. He had to warn Steve Rogers.

What do you fight for, toy soldier? He used to know. Hydra told him he was saving the world; they told him he was shaping against chaos. Before that, in the war, had he fought to save the world then too? Had he fought for the red white blue, like Steve?

What was he fighting for now?

It didn't matter. He wasn't going to leave Steve Rogers here alone.

The next few minutes passed by in a black and white blur. He stormed into the back room, just in time to see Steve putting down his gun, hands up in surrender as another Hydra agent held a knife to a young man's throat - probably the shop owner, or some random citizen. Or, knowing Hydra, one of their own pretending to be a victim.

He didn't hesitate, just shot the Hydra agent between the eyes, making him cripple to the ground and the newly freed young man to close his hands over his ears at the sound. Steve was looking at him with wide eyes but Bucky just stooped to the ground, snatching Steve's pistol up and tossing it back to him.

"The hell were you thinking--" Bucky started, then the cock of another gun interrupted and he spun around, just in time to see one of the bastards on the floor getting up, sights aimed at Steve.

He shoved Steve behind him without thinking, lifting his metal arm to block the bullets. And it did, the first four, then one hit him in his ribcage and a sharp burn exploded through his body but he ignored it, blocking the last bullet with the palm of his metal hand before firing off three rapid shots into the gunman; then shooting quick headshots around the room to any more bodies, just in case.

"As I was saying," Bucky started again, spinning back to Steve, but Rogers was staring at his chest - at the soft spot in his armor, where the bullet had penetrated - with wide eyes, speaking quickly into his comm with panicked words-

"Barnes has been shot, Stark, tell me you've got a 'copter in the area and a fully staffed hospital in the tower, because we can't take him to NY General."

Bucky snatched Steve's wrist, yanking the comm away from his mouth. "I'm fine," he hissed, glaring. Steve's eyes widened more and Bucky could already hear the stupid comeback on Steve's tongue but he didn't care, he didn't want to listen to Steve's worried concerns, especially not when they were in the middle of a setup. "But those douchebags are Hydra, so unless you want more damage than a bullet, we should get out of here right the fuck now."

Then Stark came bursting through the back door, red and gold suit blasting fire out of his feet and hands. "I'll fly him back to the tower, Cap, can you take the car?"

"Go," Steve pushed him in Tony's direction and Bucky rolled his eyes because good god, he got shot all the fucking time this was not a big deal. As soon as he got back to base they'd just give him the metabolism inducer and he'd be--

Except Stark didn't have those drugs, did he? Or any of the usual medical care he was used to. Not like it mattered, because he'd stitch the damn thing up himself before he let a doctor operate on him.

He complained half-heartedly about being treated like a dame while Tony blasted them off to the tower (even though he wasn't sure why he'd chosen the word dame, that word was ancient) then he was being bustled down a tower hallway and really, he wasn't going to let them shove him in a hospital room, even if it was Stark's people.

Steve showed up halfway through Bucky losing his temper. He'd just complained at first, then he'd raised his voice a little, turning serious. Then he started shouting, because he wasn't going to do this, Rogers had fucking promised he wasn't going to force Bucky to see a doctor. But he hadn't swung out yet, he wasn't going to get violent with them if they'd just listen, but they weren't, pushing him onto an operating table, then he shoved one of the white-coated people - not hard - and then, finally, Steve had come bursting into the room.

"Wait, wait, get off him!" Rogers was shouting and Bucky had never been more dizzingly grateful for the stupid overprotective streak and the way that people listened to Steve Rogers. "Bucky? Bucky, I need you to look at me. Where are you at right now?"

He'd been fine. He'd been perfect. Why were they trying to put him under? He didn't want to be wiped again. God, he'd thought he'd fucking escaped this whole scenario. He was strong, powerful, deadly --

Except when they put him in the chair; then it all drained out of him. That was his training, to submit and comply; and really, he should be pissed off and deadly, but he just felt blank and scared.

"Bucky? Bucky, it's Steve. I'm here. Can you look at me?"

He blinked up dejectedly and there was a golden-halo man staring at him. His body shivered, chills running down his spine violently, and then gentle hands were on his shoulders. Holding him down? Pushing him back into the chair? He couldn't tell.

"Steve?" he asked dubiously, eyes glassy and unfocused. Steve bit back the tears and the rage and everything else he was feeling, running his hands gently up and down Bucky's biceps.

"Yeah, Buck, it's me. Can you tell me where you are right now?" God, this was a familiar game. One he'd hoped he'd never had to participate in again, but of fucking course Hydra hadn't weeded this out when they ripped Bucky apart.

Actually, the glassy look in Bucky's eyes was worse than it'd been this time last year, the last time he'd gotten shot and shoved onto a table. He'd lashed out then, bruising both Steve and the medic in the tent and that was decades ago for Bucky but for Steve it was a year ago, just a year ago that they were in this same spot.

Only back then, Bucky had melted into his words, blinked to the present and held Steve's hand tight, eyes watery and teasing, bitchy words trying to cover up his fear. Now he just looked blank, a tinge of fear in his eyes, lax compliance in his limbs.

The pouty lips parted, their usual smirk long gone, filled with confusion and pain now. "Stark Tower hospital ward," Bucky told him, his voice dead like a robot. Steve bit his lip and looked up at the ceiling blinking back the water in his eyes because fuck, how was he supposed to save Bucky from this?

When he looked back down, Buck was as white as a ghost. His eyes were somehow even more fogged, body trembling slightly and dark, damp strands of hair hanging in his face. The pale colour of his skin was terrifying enough in itself, then his head dipped forward, body slumping over.

"Bucky?" Steve called, panicked, catching that precious face between his hands before Bucky could topple over. The firm jaw was scratchy with rough stubble, but otherwise it was the same face he'd always known, the same cheeks his palms used to rest on. I thought you were dead. Only now, he looked like he might as well be.

Steve tipped Bucky's face up, palms frantically running over his cheeks, his forehead (which was too hot), one hand threading back into his hair, pushing the long strands out of his face. The icy blue eyes were half-lidded and his lips were pale and no, no.

"Talk to me. C'mon. Come on, Bucky, hey, hey!" None of Steve's words were making a difference, Buck just slumped into the hand holding back his hair.

The doors burst open and people in white coats swooped into the room and it was instinct that had him stepping closer to Bucky, only letting go with one hand so he could angrily shoo at the doctors.

"OUT!! All of you!" He couldn't even maintain his strong, steady Captain America voice right now, he was too panicked, he was losing Bucky, and the very thing that had set him off in the first place wasn't leaving.

"Captain Rogers, but he needs medical assis-"...

"Out!!" Steve shouted again, gesturing one more time and someone muttered something about Stark then they were all off and the door was closing again and Steve lifted Bucky's chin, pressing his fingertips against a pulse point to read the too-slow heartbeat. "Jarvis, run his vitals, what the hell is happening?"

Thank god for Tony Stark and the fully equipped robot butler - at least Steve didn't have to be alone in helping Bucky.

"It appears, Captain Rogers, that the parasympathetic autonomic nervous system activated expeditiously and the decrease in heartrate is preventing the proper coagulation necessary--"
"English." He felt like an idiot for yelling at a robot but goddammit Stark why make the damn robot too smart?

"Sergeant Barnes is losing blood rapidly because his body is not clotting the wound, due to a dangerously abrupt psychological switch from the adrenaline-filled 'fight or flight' response to the resting, 'calm and sleeplike' response."

Five words into Jarvis' speech Steve was already unbuckling Bucky's vest, yanking off armor and cursing under his breath between apologies because he knew forcefully removing Bucky's clothes couldn't be helping anything but he had to get at that bulletwound now.

He shoved the black suit away from Bucky's upper body and cursed Hydra for fucking with his boy, cursed every single fucking one that'd forced Bucky's body to respond like this. He knew exactly what caused that 'dangerous psychological switch,' it was this fucking chair, it was the doctors, it was the mindset that he had to be obedient and silent when they got him like this.

"Hold on for me, Buck, you gotta hold on." The scars veining from the metal shoulder were no less harsh but Steve barely glanced at them because Jarvis was right, Bucky was still bleeding, when the serum and the time that'd passed should've made the open wound clot over by now. He pressed his hand over the bloody mark - hard - to make it stop fucking gushing, then he was mumbling a thousand more apologies as he pushed Bucky to lay down on the medical table.

"You can kick my ass when this is over, okay? But I just need you to stay with me until then. Listen to my voice, Buck. You can't check out on me now. It's a damn shame Monty isn't here to stitch you up with dental floss like last year in the woods. Guess you'll just have to settle for my shitty sewing skills. But the doct- the medical people left us their supplies when I scared 'em outta here, so we've got real thread this time. You still with me?"

Tony watched through the observation window, arms crossed tightly over his chest and refusing to look at either Clint, Natasha, or any of the hovering, swarming doctors.

"Does Rogers have any medical experience?" He asked Jarvis curtly, staring at the scene in the hospital room. Barnes half-dead and Rogers half outta his mind. He was still running a constant dialogue, something about trees and fire-escapes, but the glassy look hadn't left Barnes's face.

"Disregarding the time spent in medical attention for himself, no sir, Captain Rogers does not."

"Based on the previous pattern of reaction and the current spike of Captain Rogers' emotional state, it is recommended to not attempt interference. The effects of Sergeant Barnes' serum should begin to stabilize his body functionality soon, sir."

"Is Steve's friend in the tower? Send for Steve's friend. He's a doctor of some kind, isn't he?"

"Sam Wilson works at the U.S. Department of Veteran Affairs as a Post-Traumatic-Stress group psychologist, sir."

Tony grimaced as Rogers slipped the needle into bloody skin. Barnes didn't even flinch. "Send him down here anyways, I'm pretty sure some part of this counts as both veteran and PTSD. And there's the whole 'friend' part. Maybe he can get through Cap's thick skull."

"Sam Wilson left the tower at 7:30am this morning, but if he maintains his pattern he should return within the hour. Shall I send him down then?"

"Yeah." He blinked away from the look on Steve's face, from the raw pain in that room that had nothing to do with blood or bullets. "And send down something from the liquor cabinet, too."

~~~

He hadn't been crashing at Stark's pad long enough to get used to the talking robot in the walls, so he may have jumped and cursed when Jarvis told him his presence was requested in the medical ward.

Then he cursed a hell of a lot more when Jarvis told him why.

Sam came running full blast into the outer observation room, skidding to a stop as he almost pummeled into a gaggle of fretting people in lab coats.

"Sam," Natasha greeted, and he'd never been more grateful to see a familiar face.

"Nat, what happened?" He wove around the doctors to plant himself in front of the large window, glancing at the other two men flanking Natasha's sides. Tony Stark, who nodded at him, and a ripped blonde guy he'd never seen before who was standing obviously-close to Natasha.

"Barnes got shot, then went into some kind of overdrive. His body shut down, lost a shit ton of blood," Tony crossed his arms over his chest, gesturing at the window. "Then Cap freaked out and wouldn't let anyone in the room, which was a dumb fucking move, then proceeded to stitch Barnes up himself with his entire lack of medical knowledge."

Sam stared through the observation window, where Steve was collapsed in a chair at Bucky's bedside, head tilted back against the wall and hands bloody, eyes closed to match Bucky's lax, sleeping body.

"How in hell did the Winter Soldier get shot? I've fought the guy, and he can evade machine guns."

"He jumped in front of Steve." The blond guy inputted, sounding a little awed. Sam turned back to the window, getting a good look at the resting assassin, trying to quantify him with the loyal man in Steve's exhibit. The last time Sam had seen him, he'd been aiming a gun in Germany, weary but holding his fire, refusing to hurt Steve. This was a whole other ballgame.

"There is a big difference between not killing someone and dying for them." Sam shook his head incredulously and Natasha cocked her head, red hair bouncing.

"I know. What I can't figure out is why. His training should have had him evacuate the building. Logically, he shouldn't care about Steve at all." Natasha pursed her lips and the blond guy shot her a loaded look that was way too deep for Sam to interpret.

"He's my best friend. I don't think he's forgotten that."

All heads turned to Steve, who was carefully shutting the operation door behind him. They'd been too busy speculating amongst themselves to notice Steve silently crossing the room to come join them.

"Hey, Steve, how're you holdin' up?" Sam stepped over to clap a hand on Steve's shoulder, not missing the way Steve sagged tiredly at the touch.

"I'm okay," he responded softly, and Sam had the sudden impression of the tiny person Steve was before the serum quantified against the one standing before them now.
"Could someone find a glass of orange juice? Buck's gonna need it when he wakes up."

Tony waved a hand at a lingering nurse, who rushed out of the room to fill Cap's request.

"How bout we get you washed up?" Sam put an arm around Steve's shoulders, guiding him towards the door. He looked ready to collapse.

"Bucky shouldn't wake up alone," Steve started to protest, then the blond guy stepped up and gestured at the door.

"I'll sit with him," he offered and Steve nodded mutely. The post-adrenaline crash coupled with exhaustion (the last they'd talked, Steve'd been too worried about Barnes to get proper sleep) was really hitting Steve hard and it was strange, to see how human and...small he looked.

This wasn't Captain America saving the world, it wasn't even Captain Rogers saving his teammate. This was tiny, pre-serum Steve exhausted from the weight of his best friend's trauma.

"I'll run a medical report while you're gone," Tony called, then Natasha mentioned something about researching Hydra's involvement in the jewelry heist and Steve let Sam drag him off to the bathrooms to see if he couldn't at least fix something today.

~~~

"Ебать," he cursed, groaning before blinking open his eyes. Someone huffed amusedly to the right and he rolled his excessively heavy head to determine who.

The moment he moved his brain lit up in protest, spewing everything around him in tinted, swaying colors of the rainbow. "Где--мой друг? Ебать, я усталый..."

"Well, from what pieces of that I could pick out, Steve's washing up from his miracle House moment. And yeah, I know how you're feeling." Barton made a sound of sympathy and Bucky lifted one of his hands, turning over the pallid color in his head.

"How much blood did I lose?"

"A lot," Clint shrugged. "But the whole superhuman thing saved your ass."

"It tends to do that." Bucky moved his hand to his rib cage, feeling over the stitches. So they'd wrapped him up instead of giving him a blood coagulating drug like Hydra always did. He'd known medical treatment would be tough when everyone that knew how his body worked was either dead or evil, so.

"How's your head?" Barton asked and Bucky stared up at the ceiling, noticing his transfer from a medical table to a generic bed, which was considerably less likely to trigger the submissive part of his training.

"It's been worse," he settled for, which was true. Zoning out hadn't been half as bad as it used to be, especially considering that he hadn't been wiped after. How thoughtful.

"I know what you mean," Barton offered offhandedly, not looking at Bucky when he found the strength to turn his head again.

"Loki Odinson, the Battle of New York," Bucky cited anyways. Clint looked a little surprised, then nodded, rearranging himself in the chair.
"I got dragged outta my own head, had to watch as they shoved something else in. My body wasn't my own anymore, the number of people I--"

He stopped abruptly but Bucky knew what he was going to say. Killed. Slaughtered. Ended. It didn't matter. He'd had plenty of dragging himself, although it'd been decades. Sometime around the late 1950s, he stopped fighting it. He wasn't split anymore, he'd absorbed into what they wanted him to be. There was no more 'unmade'; just remade.

"At least you remember all yours," Bucky offered dryly and Clint snorted.

"Yeah, Nat's working on that. She's been following a lead on that machine Hill knows about." Romanoff was helping him? That was surprising, considering the wary looks she gave him.

"Wow. She must really like Steve a lot," he said slowly, eyes on Barton's face to gage a reaction. He had a feeling there was something between the two assassins, although what, he had no idea.

"Most people do," Clint replied wryly, seemingly unphased by the idea. "But I think she's doing it for selfish reasons, so she can bitch you out for shooting her."

"I remember shooting her," Bucky said simply, rolling his shoulders as he looked up at the ceiling again. Everything seemed to be working fine. "To be fair, she zapped my arm and tried to choke me to death with piano wire, I wasn't just going to let her walk away from that."

"Actually, that wasn't the first time you shot her," Clint replied just as casually, and for a moment Bucky wondered if there was a time conversations like this weren't normal.

"Really? How is she still alive?" He was genuinely curious, not boasting.

"She wasn't your target."

Fair enough. He'd thought there was some sort of grudge there, in the passion she'd fought with on the bridge. It was subtle, ridiculously subtle, but she seemed way too familiar with his reputation - it was in her eyes, the way she looked at him, like she knew first hand how dangerous he was.

He actually kind of appreciated it, because with Steve's and Tony's blatant disregard for his lethal assassin training, the entire seventy-year-legend story felt kind of irrelevant. He could still kill them all, even Steve, and the only person who didn't seem to forget that was Natasha.

"Speaking of targets," Barton continued, after a few moments of silence. "I've heard your aim is pretty good. Once you're all healed up, what do you say to a friendly competition?"

"Is Steve still gone?"

"Yeah, I think Natasha stole him to talk--"

"Then let's go now, before he gets back." Bucky sat up from the bed, ignoring the way his head instantly rushed with blood, pounding heavily behind his eyes. Homeostasis would be obtained momentarily.

"Wait, what? You just got shot and nearly died from blood loss..." Clint started to protest. Bucky toed on his boots, foregoing the bloody vest because getting back into it might rip his stitches. It wouldn't kill him to go shirtless.

He paused at the door, looking over his shoulder at Clint while the metal plates of his arm recalibrated, rippling down from his shoulder to fingertips.
"You can either whine or prove you're a better shot than the Winter Soldier, your choice."

Ten minutes later the gun range was littered with bullets, Bucky had found out Clint was deaf in one ear, and had successfully managed not to rip his stitches as he and Barton fired shot after perfect shot. They decided the range in Stark Towers was too easy to have a proper competition and made plans to hold a real one soon.

In the meantime, Bucky was trying to shoot Clint's bow, lodging an arrow and cursing as he tried to pull back the string, only managing a few inches. "This thing is fucking heavy, what's the pull?"

"250 pounds," Clint replied, taking the bow back to demonstrate a perfect snapping succession of whistling arrows across the range. Bucky raised his eyebrows and took the bow again, switching to his left hand, the metal hand drawing the line easy this time.

His arrow hit the line between the center and the second ring of the target and Clint smirked as he cursed. Hydra obviously hadn't supplied him a bow and arrow, and for a first shot, that wasn't exactly bad.

"The metal arm makes one hell of a difference. It must be nice to have indestructible armor attached to you." Clint poked one of the shiny plates and Bucky narrowed his eyes a little, pulling back the draw to send another arrow whistling half an inch closer to the perfect center of the target.

"It's not indestructible," Bucky huffed, docking another arrow. "And I've never thought about it. It's just my arm."

Clint gave him an indecipherable look and picked up the rifle Bucky had sat down, stepping into the next cube to fire off a clip. They fell into silence after that, switching weapons occasionally, the compatible quiet of two people who had more in common than either of them needed to say out loud.

~~~

Natasha and Sam had been force-feeding Steve peanut butter and Ritz because "Tony did not have apt food fit for anyone over fourteen" according to Natasha and the green smoothies "don't count as real food" according to Sam. Tony glared at them briefly before waving a hand and telling Jarvis to stock the pantry according to everyone's files on food preferences.

Personally, Steve was doing fine. Better, anyways. He could actually breathe now. It'd just been so long since he'd lost Bucky like that...and he'd panicked. Thankfully the doctors had all graciously accepted his apologies with apologies of their own - they didn't know about the PTSD, they were just told about the bulletwound, they would be sure to update the files, inform all of the staff.

Steve had thanked them again, apologized again for losing his temper, and sagged down into one of Stark's barstools. Which was when Natasha had slid the peanut butter to him and Sam had slid the crackers. They were watching him with wary eyes but he wasn't going to yell again, or freak out, or have a breakdown or anything.

He was just...so scared. He couldn't imagine losing his best friend again. Hadn't made it through the first time he'd lost Buck and he wouldn't make it through now either. But the world kept shifting under his feet, Bucky kept disappearing, and Steve felt so damn helpless. Like everyday was inching closer to the day that Bucky left him for good and there was nothing he could do about it.

When two energized, slightly-sweaty sharpshooters joined them in the penthouse, the first thing that hit Steve wasn't the stitches or the scared shoulder, it was the heavy, unmistakable smell. He furrowed his eyebrows, swallowing the Ritz in his mouth and talking around the taste.
"Why do you smell like gunpowder?" The whole enhanced-senses thing was kinda a dead giveaway, not to mention that Clint looked suddenly terribly guilty. Bucky cocked one unimpressed eyebrow and grabbed Sam's orange juice outta the fridge.

Sam reached out to stop him, making a distressed sound, but thought better of it and took his hand back to slouch in his chair while Bucky poured himself a glass.

"You worry a lot," Bucky said offhandedly, taking a sip of juice and pushing the hair outta his eyes.
Steve's jaw dropped. Really, they'd gone shooting when Buck'd been in critical condition less than an hour ago??

"I worry a lot??" Steve could feel his temper beginning to boil under his skin because goddammit, he couldn't take this. Acting like he was totally fine, like Steve was the crazy one when Bucky'd been bleeding out--

"When did our roles switch, Rogers?" Bucky sat the glass down and met his gaze with eyes the colour of ice, but for once weren't cold and hard. "I thought I was supposed to be the one yelling at you, for defending that stray dog all the time and getting your ass beat nine ways to Sunday."

"Dog?" Clint asked, and they both ignored him.

"When you started being stupider than me!" Steve sputtered.

"That doesn't have to be mutually exclusive." Natasha pointed out, and they ignored her too.

"Yeah, it's not like what you said is the way it works, I can't just take all the stupid with me," Bucky shot back and Steve's brain short-circuited.

A beautiful boy, hand tipped in a salute, dressed-to-the-nines in an army uniform that fit him perfectly, hat crooked on his head, sincere expression, the sound of Steve's heart breaking as he watched Bucky leave without him.

"You remember that?" Steve's voice had gone all quiet but his head was still spinning.

Because that moment had meant so much, the way Bucky'd wrapped him up in a hug, not caring the slightest bit that they had dates to entertain, that they were in public and hugging was the exact opposite of his reputation but he didn't give a damn, not in that moment. It'd been 1943 and he'd hugged Steve tight to him right in the middle of the damn Queens science exhibit and Steve had wondered if it would be the last time he'd ever see Bucky Barnes and in a way, it had. He'd never been the same after Azzano, after Zola.

"Yes I remember that, your dumb ass decided to sign up a fifth time and then, because apparently five tries wasn't enough to prove a damn point, you signed on to be a damn lab experiment. Of course I remember that."

Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, his hair parted to one side and curving away from his face, making him look like a goddamned angel. Even with the vaguely-cross look on his face.

For once, he was at a loss of words. Bucky seemed to catch on that Steve was just gonna gape at him because he snatched his glass up again, sliding it across the counter behind him before jumping up on the counter himself, sitting down and crossing his legs indian style.

"Actually, the whole reason I came to the tower today was to ask you something." Steve at least managed to close his mouth and stop gaping but god, Bucky was remembering, actually remembering. Bruce had told him the likelihood of Bucky getting his memories back was pretty low, but the ones that did come back would be the most recent ones. Of his years as the Winter Soldier, _maybe_ his years in the war. But the idea that he remembered all the way back to when Steve was small?

Bucky was studying him with sharp eyes, reading his body language and watching Steve stare. Steve didn't even wanna know what conclusions he was drawing. Probably a lot more than he needed to know. Then the pretty curve of his mouth opened again and he fiddled with his glass as he spoke. "You drew me something, back in the war. I kept it, I remember that. Something about acorns...I think we were in the woods?"

If he could change anything about today, it'd be the way he went bright red at those words. And everyone was here to witness; three assassins and a scientific genius all watching as Steve Rogers flushed the color of apples at a few words from Bucky's mouth.

"You remember _that_?" His voice sounded small, high, even to his own ears. Bucky either didn't notice or didn't care, just kept right on talking and running his finger over the top of his glass.

"Partially, that's why I wanted to ask you--"

"How about we talk about it later? Back at my apartment?" _when we're alone_, the silence filled in very loudly for him and Steve cringed at his own words.

Well if he was trying to be subtle, he pulled off the exact opposite; everyone was staring at him now. If Tony so much as _mentioned_ something along the lines of 'draw me like one of your french girls' Steve would probably throttle him. Because it wasn't like _that_.

It was his head in Bucky's lap, nose tucked against that firm stomach, Bucky's fingers threading through his hair, teasing Buck about his gorgeous sniping skills. It was the sweetest starry-sky night fall, Bucky's back pressed to his chest as they slept nestled together, their hands clasped tight even as the sun broke over the horizon.

Not exactly something the whole Avengers team needed to hear.

Bucky was looking at him oddly (he didn't want to know the looks he was getting from everyone else) but he nodded slowly, seeming to understand at least. The metal hand gestured at the elevator as he hopped off the counter, downing the rest of his orange juice in one swing. "Back to the apartment, then."

Carefully avoiding everyone's eyes, he got off his stool and started towards the elevator, hands shoved in his pockets and hoping that everyone would excuse his behavior on the high stress situation of the day.

"Wait, you guys can't go out there like that," Tony called from behind them and Steve spun back around with a barely-repressed sigh. Stark gestured at the window. "It's snowing."

"So?" Bucky asked, his voice in that petulant axiomatic tone again.

"So you're planning to walk around New York in the snow without a shirt on? They say _I'm_ the crazy one. And don't even think about putting the bloody vest back on - probably ever, because it looks like a freaking straight jacket." Tony punctuated his words with an accusing finger and Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, metal whirring softly.

"No, it doesn't."

"Yes it does. You need a new suit, pronto. I could design one, unless you want Star-Spangled over there to... sketch you something else." Tony raised his eyebrows, smirking at his own drawing comment. Steve glared violently.

"Well I'm not particularly interested in tights." Bucky glanced over at Steve, the soft pink mouth curving up in the closest thing he'd seen in a smile since the 1940s. "No offense, but not everybody's got the ass to pull that off the way you do."

Steve's lungs stopped.

Last time, Bucky had said 'you're keeping the outfit, right' because he would never have been that damn outright and now he had literally just said that out loud. The ass to pull that off the way you do. What the hell was that? He'd assume he was dreaming, except that Sam's eyes were huge and Natasha's eyebrows were raised and Tony looked about .3 seconds away from laughing and even Clint was blinking at them both.

He was staring at Bucky in shock but either Buck hadn't noticed he'd - what, hit on Steve? Flirted? or he simply didn't care because he kept rambling on, talking to Tony, arms still crossed over his chest. "And since I'm also not interested to have any more metal on my body than I already have, I think I'll pass on your designs too, Stark. I'll just make my own. I think."

Bucky shot him another glance, this time a confirmation to the wavering I did go to art school I think. (Thursdays at 6pm downtown, bright lighting and graphite smears down Bucky's hand, flicking eraser from his desk to Buck's, Bucky's arms slung over Steve's shoulders on the walk back) Steve just nodded in response, positively mute.

"Your loss," Tony shrugged. "But in the meantime, your closet has clothes that won't make you look like a deadly Russian assassin who can kill people in 107 different ways."

"That's a small number," Bucky replied casually, the same time Steve managed to finally find words and interrupted with "His closet?"

Everyone decided to ignore Bucky's comment and Tony opened the fridge, pulling out Sam's orange juice again. Sam threw up his hands as Tony poured himself a glass.

"Actually yes, Rogers. I turned one of the guest rooms on your floor into Barnes' room, the closet has clothes in his correct size. And color palette, but that was all Pepper."

Steve and Bucky both looked at each other, eyes wide in shared shock and for just a moment, nothing had changed, they were two peas in a pod in some middle school in Brooklyn in the early thirties and everyone called them SteveandBucky because where there was one, there was always the other, in sync against the rest of the world.

Then reality hit, the moment passed, and the world came crashing back eighty years later with continents between them and a lifetime apart for one, still grieving yesterday for the other.

Sam interrupted before Steve could tear up, which he wasn't going to do anyways, but god, when had this become their lives?

"How 'bout I take you? I'm living in the other guest bedroom on that floor, so I can show you around." Sam shrugged and Bucky cocked his head, evaluating, then stepped to Sam's side with a nod. Which left Steve to yell at Clint for letting Bucky shoot weapons, because he had not forgotten about that.

"We'll be back," Sam called over his shoulder, then Bucky was following him down the stairs, not questioning why they weren't taking the elevator.
Halfway down to the floor, Bucky broke the silence between them, even though it wasn't necessarily uncomfortable (which spoke wonders for the guy considering Bucky had almost killed him quite a few times). "What's the plan, pass the puppy like show and tell? I get alone time with everyone so you can all evaluate me privately?"

Sam snorted, pausing to push open a door on an unmarked floor. "Something like that."

The door opened to a short hallway with another few doors that Sam breezed past. He could explore later. A few more feet and the floor opened up, a huge living room with a flat screen TV, a U-shaped couch that could probably fit ten people, and a polished wood coffee table.

On one side was a wall of pure windows, overlooking New York skyscrapers and city streets. On the wall behind the couch was a mirror, a row of dark-wood shelves, and a huge but classy vintage clock. The dining room curved around past the wall, just a glimpse of an old rectangle table and chairs before it slipped out sight as they kept walking. The kitchen was around the next corner, at least twice the size of the one in Steve's apartment. Then the space narrowed back down a little, a bathroom to the left and a wide hallway with spaced-apart doors to the right.

"These are the bedrooms," Sam gestured at the doors, the furthest at the end of the hallway. "And behind the dining room's the other half of the floor. There's two offices, a small workout room, and an empty room that I'm guessing is for Steve to set up his studio."

"Stark got Steve an art studio?" Bucky asked curiously, peeking his head around the corner of Sam's room.

"Yeah. I mean, the guy grew up hearing stories about Cap. He knew stuff like that. Hell, he probably knows more about Steve than I do." Sam laughed lightly and Bucky frowned, because he was about to comment with and I've got you both beat, but he didn't. Not anymore. He had what, ten memories - he had known Steve his entire life - but what's the point if he couldn't remember it?

"Anyways, the bedroom at the end is Steve's, and yours is probably the one right next to his..." Sam walked past a few more doorways leading to mystery places, then swung open an unremarkable white door.

There was a bed pushed up against one wall, a slant-top desk in the corner, and dark black curtains over the windows. Because it was Tony, there was one of the old Captain America propaganda posters hanging on the wall that Bucky rolled his eyes at. And another frame on the wall by the door, which he stepped up close to inspect. It was a collage of newspaper clippings, headlines and grainy photos and little articles, all arranged artfully around a large sepia photo in the center.

It was of the Howling Commandos, glasses lifted and heads tipped back in laughter. Bucky was in the center, one of his hands raised, eyes bright as he told some story, his hair short and disheveled, pieces falling over his forehead. The men around him had their heads thrown back or dipped forward, eyes closed with laughter. Except for Steve. Steve had one arm on the table, looking directly at Bucky, a soft smile on his face that seemed extremely out of place in the rowdy atmosphere of the rest of the photo.

He didn't remember that moment. He didn't remember the story he was telling. And he didn't remember ever catching Steve looking at him like that.

"You okay?" Sam asked quietly, off to the side. Bucky leaned away from the frame, pushing the strands of hair out of his eyes, metal fingers catching on a few knots. That photo was just as painful as the black and white reel at the museum, Steve's affectionate eyes and involuntary smile as the Bucky of the 1940s dipped his head and laughed, shoulders shaking.

"Fine," he said shortly, tearing his eyes away from the thing. Sam was looking at him warily but Bucky ignored him, glancing around the rest of the room to find the closet. He didn't really feel like walking down memory lane any more right now.

There were two french doors on the wall perpendicular to the window and Bucky swung them open, flicking on a light and draining himself into disinterest as he glanced over the clothes.

"You need something warm, right? There's a coat right there." Sam pointed from over his shoulder and Bucky reached out, unlodging the hanger from its rack. The coat was blue with big navy buttons down the front, a little more modern but still clearly recognizable. Navy blue peacoat, like the one he used to wear back in the war.

They both stared at it, then Bucky carefully placed it back on the rack. "I don't think I'm ready for that."

"No rush," Sam agreed quietly, stepping around Bucky's side to grab something else warm. He held up a black hoodie with Steve's shield in the middle and they both rolled their eyes. "Well, it's either this or the gray hoodie with Stark's logo on it."

"Which one will rile Tony up more?" Bucky mused, thumbing through the rest of the closet, blue coat and sepia picture shoved to the back of his mind. Sam outright laughed at that, shaking his head as handed the shield hoodie over.

"You really are as much trouble as Steve said you were," Sam said thoughtfully and Bucky pulled a black (and thankfully blank) tshirt out of the closet too.

"What else did Steve say about me?" Bucky raised his eyebrows as Sam held up his hands, taking a step backwards.

"No way man, I am not starting that conversation."

"But there was a conversation?"

"You're his best friend back from the dead, you think that just slipped by unnoticed?"

Bucky hummed, holding up a red tshirt for about three seconds before deciding it was the least conspicuous thing he'd ever seen and putting it back. "Speaking of back from the dead...I thought I kicked you off a helicarrier with only one wing."

He raised an eyebrow at Sam, glancing up under his eyelashes, and he was pretty sure Sam would have paled if it were possible.

"Not to piss you off and make you wanna do it again, but uh. I guess I'm harder to kill than that?" Sam was cringing at his own words and something odd bubbled up in his stomach, lips curling and when was the last time he'd wanted to laugh at something? His sense of humor was a little twisted now, obviously, if he was amused at poking Steve's friends with the threat of imminent death, only to see the expressions on their faces.

He wasn't going to kill any of Steve's friends. Steve was his safe house. Wait, no, Steve's apartment was his safe house, Bucky corrected mentally.

"I'm not going to push you off anything again. So long as you don't shoot at me with machine guns." It was no big deal, just a confirmation of words, but Sam was looking at him with this expression again and Bucky found himself shifting his weight, uncomfortable. The room suddenly felt way too big.

"Why is that? Not that I'm complaining that you're not killing any of us, but. What changed? One minute you were all 'Heil Hydra' and now we're picking outfits from a Stark-stocked closet?" The words were simple enough and Natasha had asked something similar earlier, but this wasn't a tactile question. He was asking about emotions and that kind of hit like a brick because yeah, Sam was right. A lot had changed. He wasn't any less deadly, or less likely to kill other people, but. He hadn't exactly kept his distance from Steve either.

And, by consequence, Steve's friends.

"I don't have Hydra around to control me anymore. None of you are targets, so therefore you aren't dead." Bucky shut the closet doors, maybe a little too loudly, and threw on the black t-shirt and hoodie, grabbing the other three shirts he'd decided to keep and folding them over his forearm. "It's not complicated."

Sam's eyes had softened and Bucky didn't want pity, goddammit. He was a lethal machine, he was--so far from perfect.

He was still being as cautious as always, still checked escape routes and camera locations, still had three knives and a pistol strapped to his thigh, but when was the last time he'd chosen to blink or regulated his breathing? His body was falling into automatic patterns, involuntary actions, and that meant danger.

He'd been shot today, lost too much blood because his new 'handlers' didn't understand his medical requirements. Except they weren't his handlers, not really. What were they? Steve's team. His friends. Steve wanted Bucky to be his friend too.

What the hell was happening? It was like Steve Rogers was blinding him. Why? What could possibly have been between them in the past to make his body respond to Steve's this way? It ran deeper than his training - look at where he was now. The way he was acting? It was because of Steve, it was overriding the perfect way he'd been before...

Suddenly he really needed to know what happened in that memory in the woods. What that drawing was. What had happened to it. What had made Steve blush red at the thought of it. What had happened in all of his memories, he wanted to remember everything right now.

"Steve's been waiting," he said, an excuse for why he was suddenly rushing out the door, leaving Sam to follow in his footsteps, nearly running to keep up. He didn't want to stand and make choices anymore, he wanted Steve to tell him everything that had happened between them. Everything.

~~~

The snowfall was swirling and gentle, depositing shimmering flakes of white throughout soft, long brown hair. He forced himself not to reach out and touch.

The apartment was warm and the snow melted from Bucky's pretty hair too quickly, before Steve could run his fingers through it. Not like he'd have the nerve to do something like that.

"How are you feeling?" he asked as nonchalantly as possible, shedding his coat and hanging it by the door. Bucky was still in the hoodie with his shield on it, but he kept pulling it snugger around his torso like the bagginess was driving him insane.
"Functionality's immaculate," Bucky replied, starting for Steve's bedroom without a glance his way. "You telling me about that memory now?"

Following the broad shoulders into the room, Steve glanced around the space to calculate the changes since Bucky's time in here. Everything looked exactly the same, like Bucky was never here at all. Sometimes it felt that way too.

Bucky sat down on Steve's bed, heavier than the careful grace he carried in this century. He looked weary, a little pale, and Steve had to bite his tongue to keep from asking if he was alright again.

Instead he sat carefully down beside him, sinking into the dipping mattress and clasping his hands, staring at the floor between his feet as he waited as patiently as he knew how.

"What did you draw?" The words were almost bordering on curious and Steve could just picture the excuses Buck was making in his head - all 'benefit of information' and no 'hey I really just wanna know.'

"It wasn't anything bad. It was of you - we'd gotten the day off, decided to spend the night in the woods because we weren't sick of the outdoors yet. You pretended to take a nap and I drew you, dogtags and messy hair, sleeping against the tree."

His words must have struck something (he hadn't even gotten to the important part yet) because a sudden stillness settled over the room. Bucky might as well be wearing his mask, staring blankly at nothing, expression dead and tone detached as he opened his mouth again. "Did I have a face?"

He shifted his weight towards Bucky then, scooting an inch closer as he really looked him over and replied slowly. "No. I wasn't ready to draw you like that - it was right after Azzano, neither of us wanted proof down on paper of how much you'd changed."

Bucky's eyes were blank, lifeless and silent. Steve wished desperately he still had the drawing, so he could give it to Buck...maybe finish it now, after all this time.

"I don't know what happened to it," Steve admitted. "The Smithsonian might have it, or maybe some antique collector somewhe--"

"No," Bucky interrupted quietly. Steve instantly shut up, opening the silence to the detached man who looked like he would float away if Steve didn't wrap him up in his arms.

He cleared his throat, eyes cutting to the ground, words so quiet Steve almost missed them. "Hydra burned it. I had it from the beginning, kept in my inner coat pocket...over my heart. When they took my clothes they found it, held it in front of me and lit a match."

Steve couldn't respond to that, he turned as China-doll-mute as Bucky had been. His silence left the door wide open and Bucky slipped through one more time, adding an offhand comment that sounded more to himself than Steve.

"I remember they...they made me watch as they burned it, flames curling at the corners and destroying the image of the man I used to be, and the only thing I could think - the only thing I could think was...they were going to burn that right out of me, weren't they? And they did. They did."

The world folded around them even when I had nothing I had Bucky and nothing mattered but the look on Bucky's face, the pained, dejected expression Steve had never seen before, didn't know belonged to another moment of but I knew him.

He wasn't sure he had the words for this situation but that had never mattered before, they'd always been able to say so much more with their eyes and hands and energy than words could ever say. Steve reached forward and prayed that Bucky would remember their private language after all this time.

The moment his hand closed around Bucky's wrist, icy blue eyes shot up from the floor and stared, wide, at Steve. He held the gaze, sliding closer slowly until their knees touched, silence radiating between them as Steve ran his thumb back and forth over the inside of Buck's wrist, the same wrist he'd done this to a hundred times, the arm that Bucky hadn't lost in the fall, the hand that still knew Steve's.

"You got out," he whispered, words he'd told Buck about Azzano a dozen times, words he needed to hear now more than ever. "You broke free from them, Buck. You got out."

Steve had failed him. And so Bucky had saved himself, his own hero, his own avenging angel. He'd broken away from Hydra, overcome decades of conditioning.

But did it count if it was for Steve?

Bucky wrenched himself out of Steve's grip so fast that his fingers snapped together from the sudden emptiness between them. His superserum wasn't quick enough to trace Bucky's movements, then the bed tipped him sideways from the disappearance of weight beside him.

When he spun around Bucky was at the window, one hand braced heavily on the frame, head ducked and veil of hair blocking his face. At least he hadn't left the room, just flew away from Steve's touch, from his words. He wasn't sure what had set Bucky off, but it'd been his fault regardless.

"I'm sorry-" he started, but Bucky's right hand shot out in a stopping motion.

"It's fine," came the curt reply, not meeting Steve's eyes.

The hand was trembling slightly, skin pasty and whiter than it should be. Now that Steve looked closer, Bucky was shaky all over, holding himself up unsteadily against the window. The reaction was a little violent for comforting words, unless the stress had triggered his body to go back into that parasympathetic system or whatever...

"Are you feeling okay? Physically?" Steve added for clarification. The metal fingers curled a little against the window, glass creaking and arm whirring softly.

"Performance error..." he muttered quietly, lifting his head and shaking his hair out of his eyes, flipping his trembling hand over in front of his eyes. When was the last time Bucky had eaten? He'd lost a ton of blood today and it was getting late, even supersoldiers needed their energy refilled.

"You're probably crashing again," Steve offered carefully. Bucky leaned a little more on the metal arm against the window. "Have you had anything to eat? You got shot today, in case you forgot."

So maybe his words went a little bitter at the end, that didn't mean Bucky could just scoff at him, propping his shoulder on the wall to glance at Steve.

"You're not letting me forget. Do you have any idea how many times I've been shot? It's not a big deal."

"I was there one of the times you got shot, in the thigh, and it is a big deal, okay?" Steve crossed his arms over his chest, shifting around on the bed to face Bucky entirely.

"Why are you so freaked out about this?" Bucky shot back, the energy between them escalating up to a fight again like it kept doing, just stuck in this pattern. Steve wasn't going to play into it anymore.
He wasn't going to yell back, he was done fighting Bucky on this.

So instead he got off the bed, making his way over to the window too, where Bucky was watching him with wary eyes. Steve stopped right in front of him, looking down an inch and a half, remembering the days that he'd had to tilt his whole head up to look Bucky in the eyes.

Those days were over. It was Steve's turn now, coming around the corner with Brooklyn wings on his shoulders, the way Bucky had for so many years.

"I want to protect you." Bucky tilted his chin up, glaring softly, and Steve didn't care, he needed Bucky to understand this. If he'd forgotten the things Steve told him on the helicarrier; the vulnerable, overwhelmed look on his face as he realized how far Steve would go to stay with him - Steve was reminding him now. Except without the punching and nearly-dying.

He reached up, placing his palm on Bucky's jaw, the way he had a hundred times before, cupping
Bucky's face in his hand like he was something precious because he was the most precious thing Steve had ever had.

"I need to protect you," he amended, voice barely above a whisper. It wasn't everything, it wasn't the whole truth of it, it wasn't I can't imagine losing you or any of the other things he needed to tell Bucky, but it was a start.

Bucky's metal hand came up to cover Steve's, then the metal fingers were prying Steve's away from his face. "You can't, Steve." The words were softer than they should have been, almost emotional.
Almost. "Let it go."

Let it go? How was he supposed to just let it go? Bucky said Steve couldn't protect him, but. God, he had to. If he didn't - If he lost Buck again -

"You almost died..." Steve choked out, hating himself for the tears in his throat. He didn't want to know who he would become if Bucky left him again. What he would do. He was still haunted by what he'd done the last time...

"Don't exaggerate," Bucky sighed, exasperated, cutting the emotions right in half. "I would have been fine if I hadn't been shoved on that table. You know that."

He was right. Steve did know that. Bucky's body would have been able to handle the wound if he hadn't freaked out about it, insisted on getting him medical attention. He hadn't been thinking, he'd assumed they wouldn't be stupid enough to shove a PTSD patient onto a medical table, he'd assumed everyone would respect Bucky's wishes enough to not trigger a physical shutdown response.

It was his fault Bucky had almost died, because he hadn't been there from the beginning, because he hadn't handled it calmly, because he'd seen his best friend get shot and lost his shit. And Bucky had been protecting him, he'd stepped in front of Steve to catch those bullets and that made it even more Steve's fault.

"I am so sorry for that, Buck. Honestly, I didn't think- I should have handled it better, I know that.
I'm so sorry." Bucky cocked an eyebrow at him and nodded, accepting the apology, moving on, taking a step back from the window and Steve, but it couldn't just close up that easy, there were too many loose ends.

He kept hearing Natasha's words...he'd told her it was because Bucky was his best friend, but they both knew that Buck didn't remember enough to hold that belief. Which meant what?
"But Bucky... why did you jump in front of the bullet?"

He'd only stepped a foot away, had been scanning the street below with half-interested eyes, but he froze at Steve's question.

A month ago, Bucky had been behind the trigger; now he was taking bullets for Steve.

"You were compromising the mission," Bucky said uncomfortably, more like a question than a statement. "If Hydra shot you they could take you in and torture you for a location on me..."

Even Bucky didn't sound convinced with that line of reasoning, shifty-eyed and awkward with his own words. It was a blatantly obvious lie, but why? He was uncomfortable sharing his real reason, then. Steve could handle that. If Bucky didn't want to tell him why, Steve had sworn he'd give Bucky that space. He'd promised to back away if Buck needed him to.

So he just nodded, following Bucky's gaze to look out over the glittering streets below. It was so starkly different from the view of their Brooklyn apartment, but Steve was kind of glad it was.

"You know I'd do the same for you," Steve whispered quietly, a final admission before they put the whole incident behind them. It was an axiomatic thing to say and Bucky didn't need to hear something he already knew, but admitting it out loud made him feel a little better.

"Do I?" Bucky huffed softly, turning away from the window, then his entire body stiffened, eyes slipping shut. Steve reached out to catch Bucky's arm but Buck didn't respond, didn't even notice Steve's presence, just let himself drop into whatever memory was flashing back into his head now.

It was only the second time Steve had seen Bucky like this, the way he'd suddenly just check out - it wasn't for long, and he was a little disoriented after the last one, but he'd slipped back into consciousness calmly with Steve's hand on his chest. Steve held him now, running their conversation back over in his head.

Do I? Oh. Steve had a pretty good idea he knew exactly what memory Bucky was reliving right now.

*

The lines of Steve's bedroom flickered and morphed out, sloping into the golden, gentle lines of the inside of an army tent. As always, Rogers was there, on the other side of the tent.

"But seriously, Bucky." Steve turned to face him, leaning on a crate holding up an old fashioned lantern. He looked as miserable as the Steve in the 21st century had three seconds ago. "Why'd you have to go and do that? Your hands, they just...you could have died, Buck, you do get that. Right?"

Steve was glaring at him now, arms crossed. Bucky lifted his chin, meeting back the challenge of Steve's eyes. (That hadn't changed, at least.)

"What would you have done?" Bucky shot back. He couldn't remember what the conversation was about, but it was pretty clear they were fighting about something Bucky did that had been determined stupid. (So today hadn't been the first time, then.) Steve narrowed his eyes a little bit then gave up, sighing as he turned to an old-fashioned lantern and screwed a part back on.

"You know what," Steve muttered under his breath.

"Do I?" Bucky responded wistfully, quietly enough that Steve could ignore it and they could talk about something else. (That's where the connection was, between this fight and the last one.)
Then he stood, crossing the tent with the intention of slipping outside, getting fresh air and leaving Steve in peace. But just before Bucky passed him, Steve spun around and gently caught Bucky's arm. He stopped, nearly stumbling into Steve, looking up in surprise. This wasn't part of the plan.

Their chests were almost touching and Steve's grip on him was just light enough not to feel like it was holding him down but firm enough to tell him he needed to stay.

Then there was the look on Steve's face. Bucky was going to melt into a puddle on the floor. (That was an unusual reaction, although the blue eyes were lit up with a unique intensity he'd never seen in the 21st century Steve.)

"Look, Buck, as mad as I am about you hurting your hands, I--" Steve stopped, sucking in an unstable shot of oxygen. They were so close that their chests brushed when they breathed and he had to tilt his chin up to look at Steve - but more curiously, his heartbeat was pounding erratically loud and his knees were weak, head woozy like he was physically ill. (Source: unidentified.)

Steve exhaled lightly, his breath warm as it ghosted over Bucky's nose. The thoughts running through his head were of electricity and sparks, the air warm and gravitational and oxygen-depleted because he was having trouble breathing. (Source: still unidentified.)

Steve's voice was soft, gently coaxing as much as he was reminding Bucky of something he should have known his whole life.

"You know if it'd been you in that fence, I'd've done the same thing." (Fence?)

(Is that what Steve had meant? Would Steve jump in front of a bullet for him like Bucky had today? Why?)

His chest was aching, overwhelmed, and the nature of the memory was still too sporadic to extract full thoughts and information from his own brain. He could pick up fear though, anticipation for something, then a single phrase: since when were his body and his brain in agreement? (That dysfunctionality he'd seen in the other memories, the broken pieces that were making the Bucky from the past look more and more like the man he was now.)

Then the memory-Bucky's thoughts shifted and he quickly focused back into the scene, just in time to feel his own eyes dart down until they were locked on the light pink color of Steve's lips. He'd stopped breathing. He'd have to move less than four inches. Less than four inches and he'd be tasting Steve, tasting him for the first time.

The thought hit him like a cold splash of water to the face - dunked, freezing, into a tank, sneering Hydra soldiers peering down at him - and Bucky gasped, reeling as he plummeted from the memory back into the present.

Sometime during the war, he had looked at Steve Rogers and wanted to kiss him.

He had no idea what to do with that new piece of information about himself.

The bedroom of Steve's apartment tipped around him and he was falling forwards, then there was something solid and warm against his chest and sounds washing over him that he couldn't pick out and heavy hands stroking down his back, over his arms.

"-afe, I've got you. I've got you." Bucky's ears finally started translating the sounds into words, warmth cascading over him. He could not remember being trained for this situation. What was this situation?
His brain and his sight and his legs started working again and Bucky straightened a little, hoisting himself up to full height by pushing down on his hands - which were on firm muscle, Steve's chest, both hands trapped between them and he might have just left bruises by collapsing on Steve and had he seriously just fallen?

He blinked upwards and there was the brilliant blue looking down at him, filled with worry (as they always were, it seemed). "You okay, Buck? You back with me?"

With you. God. Their faces were so close. He was still all pressed up against Steve's chest, Steve's arms were around his back, he had to tilt his chin up and they were almost as close as they'd been in the memory and Bucky suddenly found himself unable to breathe.

Source: identified. Steve Fucking Rogers.

He really didn't mean too, it was curiosity, it was his state of overwhelmed confusion, it was the simple urge of comparison. His gaze flicked down to Steve's lips.

They were as soft-looking and gently pink and slightly parted in worry and good god, that's exactly what they looked like in the memory and his heart was pounding because this time it wasn't just the past, this time it was real, this time was happening right now and that blue was relentless and Bucky just stared because he couldn't stop thinking about whether Steve was going to kiss him or not.

System; override. Steve Fucking Rogers.

When Bucky had collapsed forward, he'd been standing close enough to catch Buck's weight, hold him tight and talk him through his shaking as his mind yanked him out of the memory. Steve had thought it was the memory of that night in January, but Buck seemed pretty shaken...

Then he'd blinked up at Steve with his precious icy eyes and just looked so shocked and beautiful that the air escaped Steve's lungs.

And then those eyes cut down to Steve's mouth.

His instinctual reaction was to shove the familiar words through his mind of it wasn't what it looked like. It never was, for them. People didn't understand; they were just close. They'd known each other forever, grew up in each other's pockets--

Only, Bucky didn't remember that anymore. He didn't remember being Steve's best friend. And now he had the expression on his face that Steve had convinced himself he'd only ever seen in his dreams. It wasn't just interest and curiosity, there was a gravitational pull: like every inch of air between them wanted to disappear forever.

So really, who was Steve to say what Bucky wanted? Who was he to say this wasn't what it looked like - he may have known how Bucky felt in the past, but he had no idea how Buck felt when he didn't have a lifetime of memories of Steve as just friends.

Bucky himself had told Steve once - if she gives you those eyes, you better kiss her.

If it was Bucky's own words...

Who was he kidding? Steve had wanted this since he knew how to want and now it looked like it might actually be possible. Fuck excuses. Fuck reasons. What was stopping them now?
Drawing in a careful breath, he lifted a hand to that gorgeous face, palm cupping Bucky's cheek. God. How many times had he wished for this, how many times had he forced himself not to dream of--

He had to.

Steve leaned forward, watching mesmerized as Bucky's eyes slipped closed, lips parted, chin tilted up. His eyes shut too, of their own accord, then the soft puff of Bucky's breath was on his lips and it was less than an inch and Steve could feel it in every single ounce of his body, the world suspended around them, time frozen and carved into history.

He was going to kiss his best friend.

He was going to kiss his best friend.

He was going to kiss his best friend.

Holy fucking shit.

His best friend who couldn't remember being best friends. That one.

Steve drew back so fast, his eyes popping open, that if it weren't for the look on Bucky's face the almost-moment could have been something he imagined. It all happened so fast - one moment their lips were an inch from touching and now Steve was standing a foot away, eyes wide and vocal cords not working, backpedaling further and further away because holy fuck, he'd almost just ruined everything.

Here they were, staring at each other, stuck in the future together where Bucky didn't even know him, not really, and Steve was the worst best friend in the world because he was going to take advantage of that?

This was it; he'd become no better than Hydra: using Bucky and his amnesia for his own benefit. For his own childish feelings that he hadn't been able to shove away and Steve was fairly sure if he was small he'd be halfway through an asthma attack right now.

That pretty head cocked to the side, curious and analytical like the sniper he was, but not cold like he'd been so often lately.

"А...ты мой друг?" It didn't sound harsh, just confused, and that made Steve want to cry because goddamnit, if only Bucky knew. He was supposed to be all good-decisions and role-model but when it came to Buck he just lost his head and Steve was going to lose everything all over again if he didn't get a grip on it and he could Not. Lose. Bucky.

He'd backpedaled almost all the way to the door of his bedroom but he suddenly stopped, shoving his hands in his pockets and somehow making his voice work again. "I'm going to go uh. I should probably...I'm exhausted, I'm gonna go to bed."

It was the worst excuse in the world and the dubious look on Bucky's voice said so, but he didn't do anything to stop Steve. So he spun on a heel, reaching for the doorknob. He couldn't be in this room anymore, but he couldn't just...leave Buck all alone. He paused in the doorway, looking over his shoulder with words devastatingly sincere.

"Wake me up if you need anything."

Bucky didn't reply and Steve shut the bedroom door behind him, walking numbly to the kitchen.
What had he almost done.

He slumped against the kitchen counter, wind knocked out of him like he'd just fought an army of Chitauri. He couldn't handle this. He needed reinforcement. Backup. Ground control.

Steve dug his phone out of his pocket, rubbing a palm over his forehead as he typed out a message.

Hey, you up to teaching remedial Russian anytime soon?

Really, he just wanted to text Nat about how he'd almost kissed his best friend but that was a can of worms he was not planning on opening.

Because Natasha was either lost in silence for months or pestering Steve daily, it was only about thirty seconds before the phone lit up in his hand, her response blinking up on the screen. There's apps for that. :) Spell out the sounds I'll translate.

He'd been way too over his head to remember the quick phrase exactly, but he had the last part he was pretty sure. Moidroog?

Ten seconds later Natasha's reply popped up. My friend.

Steve stared at that text for a moment. He wasn't sure what he'd been expecting, but that wasn't it. Obviously he had no idea what else Bucky had said...but if 'my friend' had been part of it?

That was his job. Bucky needed a friend right now more than anything. He didn't need the complications of Steve's feelings on top of what he was going through.

Steve had repressed those feelings for years. He wouldn't let them destroy him now, not when Bucky was depending on him, not when Bucky needed him more than ever.

But damn, it wasn't fair. Bucky was stunning and incredible and the best thing he'd ever had...and they finally had the incremental chance to be together, in a century that was basically okay with it, without a war to tear them apart, without death constantly on the horizon for them both. He wanted Buck more than ever, but he could never take him like this. It wasn't fair to his best friend.

Thanks, Steve shot back, tossing his phone on the counter. He was already walking out of the kitchen when it lit up again. With a sigh, Steve grabbed it back and read Natasha's text on his way to the couch.

No problem. Now spill.

Spill what? Steve asked, plopping down on the couch and sinking most of the way to the floor.

I'll come over and drag it out of you. Don't test me.

He groaned and tipped his head back against the couch. Of course Natasha would be able to figure out something was up from a few words in a text.

Just B. He's as stubborn as I remember.

Like you?

I'd say he's worse, but he'd kick my ass.

I thought that was my job :)
Except you let yourself get medical treatment when you get shot.

Shot by him. Twice.

Steve made a noise of half-amusement and half-distress because Nat was still hung up on not trusting Bucky. He understood though; she knew a bit about what he'd been through - all of them did, really, in a way. Which was kind of sad, because how much would Bucky had to have been through to share something in common with every one of the Avengers?

I know, he finally texted back. I'm sure he'll apologize eventually.

Doubt it. But I've got good news.

You're sticking around? It might be more complicated if Nat stayed, considering she was still giving Bucky the cold shoulder, but Steve wanted her here anyways. They could work something out. He could really use her friendship right now.

Yes. Not the news. I have a lead on the machine Barnes is after.

The memory machine Bucky had broke into Maria's office for. Natasha must have heard, decided to use her resources to look for it...

Bucky would get all of his memories back.

For one fleeting, sickening moment, Steve's heart dropped in disappointment. Because if Buck got his memories back, they couldn't have....whatever Steve had just stopped in the bedroom.

He was going to hell.

But the moment was gone as quickly as it had appeared. He'd loved Buck his whole life, but what made him think he'd actually ever get a chance with him? The first time he'd seemed remotely interested was when he had amnesia and didn't know Steve from a stranger on the streets.

No. No, he needed his best friend back. Once the idea fully sunk in, of Bucky actually knowing him again? The disappointment all pulverized out of his veins and he was left breathless. His best friend back. He'd rather have Bucky with all his memories and nothing between them all over again than have to live with someone who didn't remember how much they truly meant to each other.

You're a better person than you pretend to be, Steve finally texted back.

Shut up Rogers.

Seriously Nat. Thank you.

Don't thank me til the lead pans out.

Nope. Thank you. A lot. :)

You're a sap. Go to bed.

Yes ma'am. You too.

:)

He stretched over to sit his phone on the coffee table before settling back onto the couch arm, closing his eyes and trying to get comfortable.
It still felt like he was falling.

At least it was an impressive nine minutes this time before he rolled off the side with a sigh, snatching a couch cushion and shoving it onto the floor. He settled on his side, back to the couch, and crashed. Sleep took him fast and hard, exhaustion dragging him down into unconsciousness before he could lay awake all night fretting about what he might have ruined.

As always, the night was never that simple. But for once, it wasn't the bad kind of complicated.

He hadn't been asleep for more than an hour when Steve was drifting back awake, some unknown drawing him into consciousness.

He opened his eyes into icy blue ones. Bucky was lying a foot away, looking at him carefully. The other couch cushion was under his head, metal arm tucked out of sight under his body and hair brushed away from his face. From the angle of Steve's couch cushion, there was virtually no difference between this Bucky and the one of his memories.

There was no way tell how long Buck had been lying there, but Steve didn't really care. He was here. After Steve had freaked out on him. He'd stayed, dragged the couch cushion down beside Steve's, laid on the floor beside him for no other reason than to be here.

"Just like when we kids, huh?" Steve asked quietly, his voice a little low and rough from sleep.

"We used to do this?" Bucky's eyebrows furrowed and instead of making him look terrifying the way it did over his mask, he looked kind of adorable.

"Yeah, we did. The first time, I was five and you were six. You don't remember?" Steve shifted a little, inching a tiny bit closer.

"No. I just thought I'd join you." It wasn't the blazon darling of Brooklyn, but those weren't the words of a stone cold killer either. Well, they were, but it looked like there were more facets to this particular diamond than even Steve knew.

Maybe there should be sorrow at the gap of Bucky's memory, that Bucky didn't remember all the times they'd lain here like this, but Steve decided he didn't care. This might even be better than having that image from the past - this was the Bucky of now, choosing the same things he always had, proof of how much of him was really left in there.

Even if Bucky's brain didn't remember Steve, Bucky's body did. I just thought I'd join you. Steve's lips curled softly, eyes softening.

"I'm glad you did." Bucky crinkled his nose at Steve's sappy words and the expression was absolutely darling. Steve smiled wider, eyes drooping a little in the comfort and safety of the bubble Bucky had created for them. He blinked a few times, voice dropping to a whisper. "Night, Buck."

"Goodnight Steve," Bucky whispered back.

His eyes shut again, and this time Steve fell asleep with a soft smile on his face.

Sometime during the night, their hands entwined in the space between them and neither of them could say who'd started it. Maybe both. Bucky's right and Steve's left, curled up together the way they had so many times. It should have felt new after so much had changed between them. It didn't. It felt the same as it always had.

But for once, Steve didn't have nightmares about Bucky falling, and Bucky didn't think about his exit strategy in the morning.

And they both slept through the night, neither noticing that sometime around midnight, three feet away on Steve's coffee table, the screen of his phone lit up with a single text message.

Found the machine. Looks like your boy's got an appointment to make. Call me.

Chapter End Notes

In case you didn't click the link - hooray I drew something again!

Thank you all a ton - I adore all of the comments and kudos :)

So I know a lot of Stucky fics are about Bucky regaining his memories, or not, and dealing with that. But in the comics he got them back pretty fast and I thought that was awesome, so yes, memories aren't going to be much of an issue anymore.

The storyline is going to focus more on how the boys handle their feelings about each other, like the first part of this fic. And of course, B's identity crisis and such. Getting memories back doesn't actually fix those memories...

And as for the machine I'm talking about, you can read about it here if you haven't seen Agents of Shield.

Anyways, thank you so much for reading, you guys make my whole week xx
Chapter Notes

Sleep Disorder Warning: See the end notes if you have a sleep disorder of any kind. Otherwise, I don't want to spoil.

Other warnings: eating disorders, political discussions (you never know), insanity? identity confusion, doing reckless shit to get hurt, also panic / asthma attack warning? (god this chapter gets kind of nuts), lots of talk about death

Also! Agent Carter references just fyi

Here's your chapterly reminder that Bucky Barnes is not a reliable source of information and he bullshits everything. Just a little something to keep in mind.

And here's where I geeked out on a certain 40's Brooklyn food

Soundtrack:
This Love - Taylor Swift
Sleep - My Chemical Romance
Strong Hand - Chvrches

I also quoted this twitter account: xx (which everyone should go check out it's amazing and hilarious)

AND there's a youtube video that is SUPER GREAT that I didn't make but I really love and I put a link in the chapter where you can go watch it (when it fits in) but if you wanna watch it now or after it's right here: xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
"You sure about this?" Steve asked for the sixth time since this morning. The amused glances had shifted to raised eyebrows then rolled eyes and now Bucky just glared at him for the question.

"I'm just tryin' to look out for you Buck. You know you don't have to--"

"I want to, Rogers. Okay? I want to." Bucky's long hair was hanging in his face as he leaned against the wall, waiting for the go-ahead from Maria.

Natasha had picked them up from the apartment this morning, but the whole crew was here now. It wasn't really necessary and Bucky kept eyeing everyone suspiciously, but nobody was in their right mind today.

He wanted this for Bucky, more than anything, but at what cost? Were twenty something years with Steve worth seventy years of torture? The machine unlodged all memories from the subconscious, restoring each to the true version.

If he filtered 'torture' to 'pain training,' Steve couldn't imagine what kinda horrors were awaiting them after this.

"Sergeant Barnes?" Agent Hill finally called and Bucky pushed off the wall hastily, slipping through the inner doors with Steve on his heels. Everyone else was waiting outside, with the exception of Agent Hill, who knew how to work the theta brainwaves inducer.

There was a chair next to the bed-looking machine that Steve took while Bucky swung himself up onto the machine's platform. It looked like an operating table (Buck's shoulders were stiff in his black tshirt but he was handling himself impressively well), except the headrest had a big encircling part that looked like those X-ray scanners at the dentist. Steve was eyeing it more warily than Bucky was, although the icy eyes were betraying a bit of hesitancy too.

"Alright boys. I don't need to remind you that this machine is level eight classified. If you breathe a word of it outside this room you will be killed, no exceptions. As for the dangers of this procedure..." Maria flipped a page on her clipboard, pulling up the scientific numbers in front of her even though she probably had them memorized.

"...the machine uses theta waves pulsing through the brain to dislodge memories from the subconscious. Any memories that have been altered by either your own mind or outside influence will be reverted to their true form. This is for all memories, including tragic ones. You will get back the crystal clarity of your childhood, but you will also have seventy years in full detail regarding the actual nature of your torture and treatment."

She paused then, looking at Bucky with a little sympathy and a lot of you should seriously consider this. He met her gaze calmly, lifting his chin up.

"I know. I'm prepared for the consequences." He looked so beautifully strong and sure about this; the nobility he'd had since they were old enough to know the word.

"There is a possibility that the complete compilation of these memories will permanently damage your psyche - you may never wake up from the operation, you may lose your mind and require mental institutionalization for the rest of your life. You may lose touch with reality, or your brain may decide it's too much and close off from the rest of the world. You will likely have nightmares, hallucinations, and identity confusion."

Steve was as white as his shirt. He'd known it'd be bad, but the idea of cracking Bucky with his own
"You don't have to do this," he said softly, turning to place his palm over Bucky's hand. "You know you don't have to do this."

"Yes, I do," Bucky replied, not bitter but definitely firm. He gently eased his hand out from under Steve's and Steve took the hint, sighing and turning back to Hill.

She cocked an eyebrow for a moment, then looked back down at her notes.

"Previous patrons who have used this machine went temporarily out of control afterwards. You have been signed into Captain Rogers' custody for the next twenty-four hours to prevent harm to either yourself or the city." Maria flipped another page on her clipboard. "Any questions?"

"Is there any physical damage to his brain?" Steve asked, at the same time Bucky said, "What is the permanence of the memories?"

Maria took the bombardment in stride, turning to Steve first with a "No, the waves are physically harmless," then addressing Buck's. "The machine is not implanting memories into your head, only unlodging those already there. Your memories will be restored permanently and will fade at the rate Captain Rogers' or anyone else's do."

"One last note - the operation itself is emotionally painful and open to subconscious self-harm caused by thrashing and such. Do we have permission to strap you down?"

"No," Bucky shook his head. "That's the fastest way to ensure I'll lose my mind. I've had my head messed with enough to hold still, but I want everyone out of the room anyways, just in case."

"Absolutely not," Steve shot back, grabbing Bucky's hand again. "I'm not letting you do this by yourself."

"I'll be fine," Bucky chided, but he didn't shove Steve's hand off this time. "You can stay until it starts, then I want you out. I'm not playing, Rogers. I'll have you detained if I have to."

It was a low blow, but there wasn't anything he could do about it; detainment was not the kind of atmosphere they needed surrounding this. He'd promised Bucky any space he'd ask for.

"But I'll be right outside that window. Okay?" Steve squeezed Bucky's fingers and Bucky rolled his eyes and nodded. Hill gestured for him to lie down and Steve stood, supporting Bucky's shoulder with his free hand as he laid down.

With his fingers over Bucky's wrist, it was easy to pick up how devastatingly quickly his heartbeat was racing. Those eyes closed as soon as he stretched out on the table and Steve brushed back the hair from his face gently, fingers locked tight in Bucky's.

"You're gonna be fine. I'm right here...Always. Are you doing okay?" A weak nod in return. It was a very different situation from the last time, mainly because Bucky was doing this all on his own, no pushy doctors or frantic energy. "It's gonna be fine, Buck. You ready?"

Another weak nod and Steve closed both his hands around Buck's, squeezing tight and sure. Bucky was so so strong. He'd endured far worse things, was going to be hit with those things again today, but they'd be fine.

"Starting theta memory transfer. In three. Two. One--" the headgear circle lit up and Maria turned a knob on the controller station - which was in a supersoldier proof cubicle a few feet from the and it was barely five seconds later that Bucky's mouth opened with a pained shout.

Steve froze, panicked, and considered ripping the machine in half for a moment. Then there were hands around his biceps, dragging him backwards and away from Bucky, who was shouting and moaning like a mad man. He was too numb to fight the men hauling him out of the room, just staring as Bucky's beautiful lips wrenched open in another shout.

By the time they shoved the door to the room shut and had Steve safely on the other side, he was pretty sure he'd lost the ability to breathe. He bent in half, hands on his knees as his head spun and he tried to get his lungs back in working order.

There were a few pairs of hands rubbing his back and the rough-edged comfort reminded Steve exactly of the Howling Commandos, the way they'd all crowded him with comfort after Bucky's death. Not-death. That painful traumatic incident involving trains and shields.

"He's a fighter, Steve. He'll pull through." Natasha's voice was even more reassuring than her words, which were true, right? Bucky was the strongest man Steve'd ever known. He'd pull through. He'd pull through.

"You need some water, Cap? Barton, would you find water somewhere?"

"I think this is the first time I've missed Jarvis," Clint complained halfheartedly, his voice fading as he walked further away. "Then at least I don't have to take orders from Tony..."

"Hey man, can you straighten up? It'll help your breathing." Sam crouched down next to him and Steve reached out a shaky hand to steady himself on Sam's shoulder.

It'll help your breathing. Back when he used to have asthma attacks, his lungs would fight him then too, and guess who always stepped in and saved him? Bucky would rush over with Steve's inhaler - or if they didn't have the money to refill it, just rush over and wrap an arm around Steve's shoulders, straighten him up from his gasping, choking state. Then he'd carefully tip Steve's chin up, clear the airways, murmur encouragement and it'll help your breathing.

Bucky was getting that memory back right now. That memory and every other one too. More memories than Steve could imagine.

His best friend was coming back to him. He would be hurting, he would need Steve to be strong. He was getting his Bucky back.

With Tony and Sam's help he straightened back up, blinking away watery eyes and focusing his energy back into battle mode, calling on all his strength. He could do this. If Bucky was going through hell - literally - than Steve could take a few miserable moans and shouts.

Clint brought him water and Natasha scrutinized him worriedly while he downed it. They all scrutinized him worriedly. He hadn't had much alone time with his team lately, but he was immensely glad they were here. Even if it wasn't for Bucky's sake, Steve needed the support.

"Be glad you don't have best friends with amnesia," Steve finally managed, attempting and probably failing a smile. Natasha and Clint looked at each other amusedly and Tony clapped a hand on his shoulder.

Out here the sounds were muffled, but every once in a while one would break through the sound barrier and shatter Steve's heart. He kept pacing, which probably wasn't much better than the panicking he'd done earlier, and he was pretty sure his boots were wearing away the integrity of the floor he kept tracking.
Natasha was folded in some impossible pose in one of the chairs and Clint was on his phone, probably watching dog videos on youtube or something equally ridiculous. Tony had excused himself to go get food (more likely he needed out of the stressful environment and Steve would never blame him for that) and Sam was sitting in the chair next to Nat, staring at nothing and probably hearing every one of Bucky's distressed shouts as someone else's.

But Steve couldn't stop pacing. There were five minutes of utter silence from the room that Steve didn't move an inch, listening at the door and ready to barge in any moment. Then the shouting started again and Steve shut his eyes, leaning his forehead on the door and cursing every decision he'd made that had lead them here.

Ten minutes later Sam had pulled him off the door, brought Steve across the room and chatted with him softly about nothing in particular, which didn't help much because Steve was still cringing at the shouts; although they were getting consistently more spaced out now.

He was in the middle of replying half-heartedly to Sam's question about the view from his apartment when Natasha and Clint's quiet murmur in the background vanished and Sam froze, looking over Steve's shoulder. Oh god. His heart was pounding out of his chest.

Steve spun around just in time to get crushed.

From the sound of it, Natasha and Clint both had weapons drawn and Sam shot halfway across the room but Steve didn't care, he didn't care at all because Bucky was in his arms, squeezing him tight. He was frozen for only a few seconds, trying to comprehend the arms wrapped tightly around his back, the cheek pressed warm against his. Metal and human fingertips curled hard against his shoulder blades, leaving bruises. Bucky. God. Bucky was hugging him.

The world crashed down and Steve encircled his arms tight around the broad back, metal chilly against his bicep, clutching Bucky so tightly that neither of them could breathe. He didn't need oxygen. He needed this. Steve ducked his face into the long unruly hair, one hand coming up to grip the back of Bucky's head, to hold him closer as Steve tried not to cry.

His eyes were watering and his voice was probably shaky, but he didn't have anything to say, didn't want to move an inch from where he was right here. Probably ever. They were clinging to each other like the world had ended; which it had, too many times.

Seventy years apart.

An entire lifetime.

Memories of summer sunshine and crystal blue eyes; flickering lanterns in army tents; laughing promises and crinkling eyes; snowy mountains and pelting snowballs; corner cafés and cheap picture shows; talking up all night and falling asleep slumped together; trains and whistling snow and Steve's entire world breaking in half: one to be haunted with memories and one to die with that outstretched hand; ice and cold and silent screams; bridges and knives and who the hell is Bucky and falling to his knees; sketchbook smiles and broken dreams and apples and couches and tears and hell--

--and this love had come back to him.

Bucky had fallen and Steve had crashed and they'd both made it back to each other and everything hit him in that moment, in Bucky's shuddering breaths against his ear and his watering eyes getting Bucky's hair wet and they couldn't hold on to each other tight enough.

"God, you bastard," Bucky finally breathed against his ear, hands splayed across his shoulderblades.
Steve lifted his head a little out of Bucky's hair, eyes still closed and nose tucked against his temple. He could feel Bucky's body expand as he sucked in a breath, trying to get the shakiness out of his voice. "I'm gonna kill you for letting me almost kill you."

Steve barked a shaky laugh, because of course. He'd known it. The first time Buck really remembered him - all of him - and he was scolding. Fuck, he had missed this. He bundled Bucky up a little tighter in his arms, until he couldn't breathe at all, but he was never going to not want this, Bucky here with him.

It was probably another minute before Bucky finally sighed, warmth washing over Steve's neck, then his arms relaxed and he started to pull back. Steve wasn't quite ready to let go yet, but he never would be. So he relented and let Bucky put a few inches between their chests, his palms still secure on Steve's ribcage, Steve's on Bucky's biceps as their eyes met, both teary and smiling.

A single brief pause, and Steve could swear their souls entwined all over again, then Bucky was pulling his hands back all the way, clapping the right one on Steve's bicep congenially as his mouth quirked up in a soft version of his tired smile from the war.

"Sorry I'm being such a dame," Bucky huffed a laugh and wiped under his eyes with his metal thumb. Steve fell in love for the thousandth time.

"No apologizing," Steve scolded, stern through his shaky smile. The crystal gaze was obscured by the long strands of hair in Bucky's face and Steve ran his fingers through the length of it, tucking pieces behind Bucky's ear and probably staring way too much, but he didn't care, he was so damn gorgeous with a smile on his face, even if it was a sad at the edges.

Now that he could fully see him, it was pretty clear who'd exactly walked back out of that machine. This was still the Winter Soldier, but it was somehow the haunted man after Azzano too. Now that he wasn't busy scowling and not-remembering, the similarities to the Bucky of now and the Bucky of then were...scarily similar, really.

"I know it's late afternoon and Barnes only eats apples, but bakeries make the best comfort food arou--" Tony froze at the entryway to the waiting room, big white box in his hands as he stared at Bucky and Steve.

Because Steve's brain still wasn't really functioning, he didn't think to take his hand off of Bucky's cheek until metal fingers pried it off, a bright and totally fake smile on Buck's face as he turned to Stark, giving him a little wave.

"Tony," he greeted. Steve took a moment to look around at the rest of the Avengers, who were in varying forms of shock and wariness. They were all on their feet but it looked like weapons had at least been put out of sight, which was better than nothing.

It was a little annoying that everyone had pulled weapons on Buck the moment he strode out; but they'd thought Bucky had been attacking him. (And to be fair Steve had as well, for about 3 seconds.)

"Sergeant Barnes," Tony responded trepidatiously, holding out the white box in front of him. "I wasn't sure if you'd want an apple pastry..."

"Sure," Bucky replied easily, shooting a smile at Steve and clapping him on the arm one more time before stepping stiffly up to Stark, opening the lid of his box and making a face. "You don't happen to have any Charlotte Russe, do you? It's Steve's favorite."
Steve may or may not have clapped a hand over his mouth to stop the surprised sound from escaping his lips. Sam looked at him funny and Steve lowered his hand, gesturing silently at Bucky and making an oh my god is this real face that included a clenched fist and staring up at the ceiling.

Natasha rolled her eyes, Sam shook his head, and Clint laughed, then Bucky was back at his side, holding out a glazed donut.

"Sorry, Stark has terrible tastes." Bucky deposited the donut in his hand then proceeded to stare at his own apple pastry, picking a piece off the corner and making a face at it.

He looked...uncomfortable, almost. Like there was some pretty intense internal pressure. He'd been given all of his memories back, he'd hugged Steve, so he might think the expectation bar was set at the high level of "Bucky Barnes normal," when that was not the case at all.

Sam had talked it over with him earlier today, pulling Steve aside for a moment to explain that even if this all worked and everything went well, Bucky wasn't the same person he'd been before. No matter how many memories he had, he was still the Winter Soldier, he was still an emotionless assassin who couldn't bring himself to eat anything but fruit and hated talking for too long and got restless if he hadn't killed anything in a few days. Whoever he used to be, versus the guy he is now.

Not counting the fact that every terrible moment from the past seventy years had been shoved back into his head at once, and really, he shouldn't even be upright, let alone expected to eat high-sugar foreign foods.

"Buck?" Steve asked softly and Bucky looked up from where he was picking apart the apple pastry, flicking his hair out of his eyes annoyedly. It was hard to tell how much it was a façade and how much was the truth, but better safe than sorry. "How about we go back to my apartment and talk? It's quiet, I think the couch cushions are still on the floor--"

"Nuh uh. No way, Rogers." Bucky interrupted with a shake of his head and another too-bright smile. Steve crossed his arms over his chest and Bucky straightened up a little taller, playfully knocking his shoulder against Steve's. "We've got a destination booked already, have had for years."

Steve raised his eyebrows and Bucky popped one of the pieces of cooked apple in his mouth, sucking the sticky sugar off of them with an impressive poker face.

"We're gonna back home to Brooklyn, baby," Bucky sing-songed, crossing the room to grab their coats from one of the waiting chairs and shooting a wink at Natasha while he was in the vicinity.

No one had stopped looking at Bucky like he'd grown three heads.

Then he was shoving Steve's coat at him, tapping his foot impatiently as he shouldered his own on. Tony plopped the box of bakery goods down on an empty chair and Clint inhaled three eclairs before Sam could swat his hand and grab one for himself. Under the pretense of squabbling over baked goods, Natasha lowered her voice and leaned closer.

"He just got seventy years of gruesome torture memories shoved back in his head, and we're going to let him be alone with Rogers right now?" Natasha pursed her lips, glancing over her shoulder at Steve, who was taking an uncharacteristically long time to button up his coat.

"Especially when we won't have tabs on where they're going?" Clint added (with his mouth full), reaching for another donut and getting swatted by Tony.

"Do we have a choice?" Sam asked grimly. They all straightened then, looking over at the two supersoldiers. Bucky looked way too calm, listening patiently as Steve murmured something quietly to him, standing close together like they couldn't imagine being further than three feet apart ever again.

"Hey," Steve called out, and they all pretended that they weren't just staring. "I've got my phone on me, but we're headed out. Thank you guys though, for being here. It means a lot."

Natasha stood and quickly crossed the room, pulling Steve down into a brief hug. "Be careful," she whispered in his ear and Steve nodded as he pulled away, giving her a small smile.

"Alright, well, since Rogers is leaving, do I get the extra muffins or..." Clint suggested, already reaching for the box again. Sam snatched it away from him.

~~~

"Okay, so there's this place on Staten Island called Holtermann's that still sells Charlotte Russe, but I'm pretty sure that's the only place in New York that still has 'em. A damned shame, Brooklyn used to obsess over those. Remember in '41, they used to cost a nickel and sometimes I'd stop by that bakery a few blocks down from the apartment after work to bring you one?"

Bucky chattered consistently in the car, sentences strung together sloppily like he used to, but—almost too perfectly. Like he'd carefully chosen every word, controlling every movement and pretending he wasn't. Steve watched him and tried to figure out how to say just one of the things running through his head. Coming up blank, he figured he might as well participate in the simple conversation.

"Yeah. Didn't we get some for my birthday one year? We sat in that café overlooking the East River—"

"Nope, that was ice cream."

"You sure?" Steve asked, furrowing his eyebrows. Bucky snorted, glancing at Steve with a light in his eyes. It looked like a light that belonged in the twenty-first century: too bright, out of place, entirely lacking glow or beauty that light was supposed to have. Something was so wrong.

"Yeah, I'm sure. And Bruce said my memories are clearer than yours, the whole amnesia-phenomenon or whatever. We went out for ice cream on your birthday, Charlotte Russe for mine."

He sounded proud to remember that and Steve hummed because yeah, it was nice to have Bucky recalling which desserts they used to eat when they were kids, but what about the whole, you know, seventy years of torture thing?

The way Buck wouldn't shut up or sit still for more than three minutes (he'd never been this enthusiastic, even when they were kids) was...disconcerting.

Kinda like watching someone skip haphazardly on the edge of a cliff. Or kiss a grenade. Suspended right on the edge of toppling into disaster.

The hovering worry stilted a moment as Steve glanced out the window and suddenly caught sight of the Brooklyn Bridge. His breath froze in his throat, giant brown brick arches and sloping wire lines the exact same as they'd been back then.

Home. Except really, home was sitting right next to him in the back of one of Stark's chauffeured SUVs.

"Hmm." Bucky tapped on the window, looking distantly at the bridge with a foggy, unreadable look on his face. "Almost..."
"Almost what?" Steve asked. The fog instantly cleared and Bucky shot his gaze back at Steve, mouth curving a smile that still didn't feel right.

"Nothing. Whaddu you wanna see first?"

They wandered around Brooklyn for the better part of the day, pointing out buildings and landmarks to each other and making faces at how much everything had changed. Streets that used to be cobblestone lit up dull gold were now arching blacktops with shiny white blinking lights.

Sharp angled buildings and too-bright blocky signs, nothing handwritten, nothing really human. The rowdy, edgy feeling of Brooklyn from the depression had shifted to something smoother, more bohemian. It was trendy in an intentionally off-trendy way - no kids playing in the street, no vendors on corners. Even the alleys looked different.

They walked in sync most of the time, but with a hell of a lot more space between them than they used to. Although, to be fair, still closer than any New Yorker had a reason to.

Bucky had an opinion on everything, or he was at least making up opinions on everything, and Steve barely got a word in likewise. Which was also unusual for their relationship, it'd always been equal banter between them.

It took a little while to figure out the pattern, but by the time the sun was starting to set in the sky, Steve realized that - disregarding the initial bitching out for the helicarrier fight - Bucky hadn't mentioned a single event past July 1943, when he shipped out. If he didn't know better, he'd assume only the pre-serum memories came back.

He wanted to say something about it, wanted to ask Buck how he was coping with his time as the Winter Soldier, but he'd promised space.

After a disappointing visit to all their old apartments (everything had changed too much, only one was still an apartment complex at all), they drifted the streets and ended up on the harbor by the bridge. The old shipping box they used to sit on was long gone, so they sat on the ground and dangled their feet over the edge of the concrete.

"The river even looks different. Muddier, you know?" Bucky mused, stiffly tapping his right hand fingers along his leg.

That was the other weird thing. Before today, Buck had used both hands equally, with an emphasis on the metal one for strength. But he was pretty sure Bucky hadn't used it for a single thing since he'd hugged Steve - like he was pretending it wasn't there, forgotten at his side.

"And by the looks of it, the dock workers are different. No more fifteen-year-olds out there hauling things around."

Steve glanced over at Bucky, wind blowing and disheveling the hair around his face. The lights from the city across the harbor were starting to reflect in the river, a few shining their brilliance in Bucky's eyes.

"I wonder if the dock workers all go drinkin' on Friday nights, keepin' up the tradition like alwa--"

"Bucky?" The glittering reflection of New York across the bay turned to Steve, eyebrows raised and smile all wrong. Initially he wasn't planning to say anything, but he wasn't sure how much longer he could take this.

"You know you don't have to do...this." He gestured vaguely, figuring Buck would know what he was talking about. From the furrowed eyebrows, apparently not. Steve cleared his throat and clarified. "I'm not expecting you to-- you don't have to put up a front."

Bucky just blinked. Steve sucked in a breath and steeled himself, the next words firm.

"This is me, Buck, you know you don't have to fake anything. I'm not asking for you to forget the last seventy years. You don't have to pretend to be...him."

"Him," Bucky repeated flatly.

"Not that I-- It's just. I know you're a different person now, Buck." He was being as patient as he could, using the words Sam had told him, placing the Winter Soldier and Bucky Barnes as two separate people because way too much had happened to--

"A different... It's still me!!" The wind whipped Bucky's hair in his face and the metal hand came up to frustratedly push it away. "It always has been, since the bridge, since before that. I didn't just stop being who I was just because I forgot who you were. Which took a hell of a long time, by the way."

Okay, that was not what he had been expecting. Wasn't this supposed to be the other way around? Wasn't Buck supposed to be all 'I'm not him' and Steve supposed to say 'I know, but I love you anyways?'

Bucky huffed exasperatedly, although at least the fake smile was gone. He looked more like the soldier from the war now, or like the Winter Soldier on his nicer days. (Except they weren't separate people?)

"I just remember everything now, that's the only change. I'm more than my memories; and I'm not a different person. There is no him, Steve. This is me, Bucky Barnes - hi - your best friend." He gave a sarcastic little wave on the hi and normally that'd make Steve smile but instead he blinked confusedly.

"But you've changed so much..." The words were quiet, unsure; this was not how this was supposed to go.

A terrible self-deprecating laugh escaped Bucky's lips, metal fingers running through his hair again. "A hell of a lot less than you know, Rogers."

Whatever that meant.

"...okay, but what's with all the nonstop chatter and fake smiling and enthusiasm? Didn't you spend seventy years--"

"Could I possibly have a day without dwelling on Hydra? I don't know if it's going to last, if I can shove all that to the back of my mind permanently, but I'm sure as hell gonna try." Bucky sighed and pushed himself up off the ground, holding his right hand out to Steve to haul him to his feet too.

They dusted themselves off and Bucky looked out over the water one more time, eyes distant now but expression a hell of a lot more real. "I'm disregarding all performance errors right now, don't stomp on that."

Swallowing everything Bucky said was going to take some time, but he got choked up on that last part.

"Performance errors?" Steve asked hollowly, because of all things for Bucky to hold on to from his time at Hydra, it was going to be the obsession with efficiency?
He just got an odd look as they started walking back to the city. "I'm not going to forego my training now that I remember a time that I wasn't trained. That'd be like you going back to pre-serum on purpose."

Actually, that was a shitty comparison, because there was a difference between chronic health issues and deadly assassin skills.

"Life is a hell of a lot easier when you're efficient, Steve. Hydra made me perfect, then they used me. But I'm not gonna go back to being flawed."

"You were always perfect, Buck."

Not the brightest thing to say aloud when hiding how you feel about a person, but it slipped out of his mouth before he could consider taking it back. But Bucky didn't read too much into it, didn't think about it at all, just tipped his head back and laughed at the fading light of the sky.

"Holy shit, Steve. No. I was not. You have no idea what a mess I was in here." Bucky tapped a finger to his temple. "Since we were kids, man. But it doesn't have to be like that anymore. As much as Hydra are douchebags, they made me strong."

You were always strong, Steve wanted to say, but apparently his opinion didn't count. What happened to the days when Steve's opinion was the only one that counted?

"But enough of that. What do you say we hit the town, find some pub that still serves Irish liquor?" Bucky clapped him on the back and turned as they hit the sidewalk, already strolling down to the bars on seventh.

"Wait wait wait. Don't you think we should maybe hold off on getting wasted for a little while? Last time you tried that, you had a relapse and thought I was a goddamned angel taking you to the afterlife."

Right after Azzano, two years ago now, but the dazed expression and begging words were clear as ever.

Bucky snorted and slowed a little, keeping pace with Steve now. "Not my finest hour. But you've done some pretty questionable things when you get drunk..."

Steve groaned. "Of course you'd remember that. Thank god I can't get drunk anymore."

Bucky turned to him curiously at that. "Wait, really? And you actually tried?"

Okay this was not a conversation he wanted to have. There were quite a few, actually, especially those spanning the gap between the train and the whole crashing-into-the-ocean thing.

"Yeah. After...after you fell."

The quiet admission made them both silent for a few blocks.

Bucky had been so wrapped up in distracting himself from pieces of his own timeline, he'd entirely forgotten about Steve's.

Steve had thought he'd died.

Bucky knew first hand how bad that could be - he remembered that newspaper clear as day. He remembered every second of that but no, no, he wasn't going to let his brain go there. Not today. Not ever, hopefully.

He'd knocked his shoulder against Steve's, giving him a smile that was hopefully less fake than the others he'd been attempting today.

"How bout we go back to your place, instead? Watch a movie or something. We'll go out drinkin' some other time." Steve lit up at his suggestion, already pulling out his phone to shoot off a text for their car.

While they waited, Bucky teased Steve about his pretentious taste and affinity against taxis, which apparently had to do with safety precautions and constantly being stopped as Captain America.

Really, Bucky preferred the armored SUV, couldn't imagine driving in a car that didn't have reinforced windows, especially when he wasn't the one in control of the vehicle. But he needed to talk about something, needed to keep commenting, needed to keep distracting himself with constant noise.

Because he was absolutely terrified that the moment the noise left and silence settled in, seventy years of silence would come crashing down on him at once.

He'd thrown a barrier up in his head for protection, but he had no idea how long it'd last. It crumbled a little every time they fell into silence though - he'd talk himself hoarse about nothing at all before he let that wall come down.

That's why he'd suggested a movie, too. Constant noise and distraction.

Really, the idea of watching frivolous irrelevant fictional characters parade around on screen for two hours of technicolor scene changes and overly dramatic dialogue sounded useless, terrible, and repulsive.

But what else was he supposed to do? He couldn't let this crash down on him. He'd heard Maria's warnings. He might not survive.

As soon as he'd stepped out of that machine, only one thing had been on his mind. He hadn't worried yet about the torture. Hadn't worried yet about a certain revelation in a certain bar right after Azzano. Hadn't worried about anything besides one single word that mattered more than everything in the whole world. Steve.

He finally remembered why Steve was the most important person in the world.

And that person, his best friend, his other half, was waiting for him, chatting quietly to Sam Wilson, his back to the operation room door. And Bucky could not think of a single thing except--

This stupid punk that he'd grown up with, this incredible man he'd winded his life around like a vine squeezing the solid trunk of a tree, he was here and now and _Don't win the war til I get there._

_You got your orders?_

_Thanks, Buck. But I can get by on my own._

You don't have to.
God, he didn't have to.

Bucky was here now and he wasn't ever leaving again and he strode across the room the way he walked down the smushed hoods of cars, crushed Steve into his arms and held on for dear life because he was drowning in the soft golden glow and he never wanted to let go.

Eventually they'd had to step back, face reality, but first he'd bitched Steve out for the helicarrier - and that was not the end of that conversation, he had a lot to say about Steve's reckless abandon, especially in regard to how deadly Bucky was now.

He had a feeling that getting his memories back wasn't going to help that recklessness any, either. Steve probably thought Bucky was as harmless as a butterfly now, but really? He was more dangerous and lethal than ever.

He had complete control over his life. He knew who he was. He could pinpoint the very first time he'd realized the darkness inside of his soul. And it was long before he got drafted.

Hydra had no control over him. Everything they'd taken from him had been given back, and everything they'd gifted him with he'd chosen to keep. If they thought he was lethal before...that was nothing compared to the complete control he had now.

But Steve only smiled wide at him and held open the door of his apartment. Like Bucky was perfectly harmless. He'd never been harmless. But he'd never intentionally hurt Steve (when he knew who he was), so he wouldn't hurt him now, either.

That didn't stop him from sighing exasperatedly at how unaware Steve was of the gravity of that I'm-not-going-to-kill-you pass. The pass that had also somehow extended to Steve's weird colorful friends.

Oh, and he remembered shooting Natasha now. Both times.

Still wasn't repentant about it, though.

Once they were back at Steve's place, popcorn came up, but he still felt kind of queasy after eating a piece of that sticky, baked, soggy sugar mess that Stark had called an apple. The appeal in real apples was the raw purity of their form. Crisp and clean and not polluted. No noise or useless nutrients. All beneficial to his body's functions without being overwhelming enough to make him hurl.

He told Steve no thank you on the popcorn and, of course, that worrying face flitted across his features again.

See, the problem was, he knew now how much he used to love popcorn. Which was great, go him of eighty years ago, but it didn't work with his body now. He felt kind of guilty, like apologizing to himself for not wanting all the things he used to. But people's favorites change all the time; he'd rather hold the memory of how much he used to like certain things than try to force himself to like them again.

Steve kept asking him lots of things, questions for everything. Maybe he'd taken Bucky's comment a few days ago seriously, when he'd snapped to stop acting like Hydra by trying to dictate his life. Which, obviously, this was Steve, he'd shoot himself in the foot before he stepped on Bucky.

Still, the overwhelming push of decisions and choices being shoved at him was a little annoying. He didn't care what movie they watched, seriously. He didn't care where Steve sat on the goddamn couch, he was entirely okay with letting Steve chose what he wanted.
It wasn't that he didn't want anything, because he still had a few preferences (mostly for whatever was the most efficient) and even if he didn't, he could remember the ones he used to have and could just reference those if he needed to.

Eventually Steve stopped pestering him and decided to randomly choose a movie from the list. It didn't matter what it was, neither of them were paying attention anyways. It was still a distraction from silence though, so he wasn't going to complain. Out loud. He was going to internally bitch about it the whole time.

By the time the movie clicked off, it was dark outside, late enough to start getting cold, and exhaustion was wearing down his bones. He'd slept last night, way more than he usually did, but running around Brooklyn all afternoon after the biggest operation of his life had really pushed the whole don't-sleep-for-days thing.

"Buck? There anything I can get you?" Steve's voice was quiet, gentle, but Bucky didn't really feel like opening his eyes. He'd slumped down on his half of the couch, head tilted back against the cushions and legs curled half underneath him. He really didn't feel like moving, he just wanted to sleep.

"A bed that doesn't feel like a marshmallow?" he replied gruffly, sinking down a little more on the couch and probably making his hair stick up in a thousand directions. Steve made a sound of agreement, then there was a hesitant hand on his ankle.

"Did you wanna sleep here?"

"Mmm." Bucky replied, curling his human arm closer to his body. There was another strange sound, then the hand on his ankle suddenly pulled his legs out from underneath him, tipping him sideways to lay down on the couch and stretching his legs out so he was more comfortable. He made an undignified sound at the manhandling but it was too cold and he was too tired to really snap at Steve.

If it were anyone but Steve here, he couldn't imagine going to sleep right now, letting his guard down like this, but he'd been doing this around Steve for a month and the likelihood of Steve killing him was even less than Bucky doing the same, so there wasn't anything to worry about.

Until Steve started to get up.

Bucky's eyes shot open, propping up on his elbows as Steve froze, already half off the couch.

"Where the fuck are you going?"

"You need to sleep and you can't stretch out if I'm on the couch--"

"Yes I can. Put my feet in your lap, it won't be the first time you've slept sitting up." Maybe he should be considerate and offer Steve a more comfortable way to sleep than sitting, but Bucky was not going to fucking fall asleep if Steve wasn't here and he sure as hell wasn't sleeping in that bed of his. Besides, they'd slept in worse ways for lesser causes.

Steve sat back down without protest, swinging Bucky's legs into his lap and turning his torso sideways to prop an arm up over the top of the couch, looking down at Bucky worriedly. "Are you sure? If you just want warmth, I can go find a blanket--"

"Rogers, I'm asking you to stay. Please. Thank you. Goodnight." Bucky closed his eyes again, but not before seeing the flash of a bashful smile across Steve's features. God, how was Steve so fucking beauti-

Not going there. Nope. Sleeping, he was going to get sleep, then he could face everything in the morning. He'd face his memories and he'd start compartmentalizing shit and he'd stay in all day eating apples if that's what it took to figure everything out. After sleep, though.

For Steve's sake, he decided to ignore the thumbs absent-mindedly running over his calves, the fingers curled around Bucky's legs like he was afraid they'd disappear if he let go. And the gentle stroking absolutely did not make him fall asleep within thirty seconds of closing his eyes again.

If only it had been enough to make him stay asleep.

Twenty minutes after midnight and Steve had long since been asleep too, arms resting on Bucky's calves and head tipped back against the couch cushion. The apartment had settled into an eerie stillness, black shadows shifting at the corners of the room, a pale blue-white stripe of moonlight sucking color out of everything it touched.

Perfectly silent, not so much as the tick of a clock as two supersoldiers slept in the darkness, horror waiting to grip through the quiet and rip apart the soft colors of dreams. Suspended glass hanging by a silver string, swinging back and forth as light glinted off the knives in the distance, silence to suffocate in, waiting, waiting.

Then the scream pierced the thick layers of the mute world, dream glass shattering into a thousand pieces.

The terrifying shrill sound yanked Steve out of his dreams, had him scrambling through the darkness and calling out Bucky's name, which was when the first heavy foot violently kicked his thigh, probably already bruising by the time he shot to his feet, wincing from the pain.

The moment Steve got off the couch Bucky sat up, metal arm swinging out into (thankfully) empty air. His eyes hadn't adjusted to the darkness yet and he couldn't see Bucky's face, couldn't see where he was kicking or thrashing. Just in case, Steve took a step back, trying to calm himself down so he could help Bucky.

"Bucky? Buck? Hey, hey, I'm here, it's okay, it was just a nightmare--"

Another shrill scream pierced the air and the metal arm swung out again, hitting his own hip as he thrashed and collapsed onto his back again. It was all happening way too fast and Steve had no idea what was going on. But whatever was happening, he couldn't let Bucky hurt himself.

Calculating the wild swings the best he could, Steve dodged another kick and reached out for Bucky's left arm, hard cold metal colliding with his hand and definitely bruising his palm. It took all of his strength to keep it from hitting either of them, but Bucky's head was still thrashing back and forth and his right arm punched Steve in the chest and okay, he was going to have to seriously restrain him.

In lack of ingenuity or better ideas, Steve dragged Bucky off the couch, wrestling him to the floor and forcing the metal arm under his leg, pinning Bucky against his own chest with an arm wrapped around his throat - not hard enough to choke him, the way he'd had to last time when they'd fought on the helicarrier. It was the same position, just less aggressive, more about keeping Bucky still than actually making him pass out.

Clearly, unconsciousness was something they were going to have a problem with.

"Bucky, Bucky, you gotta snap out of it. Look, it's Steve, it's me. You're in New Yo-" Bucky lurched to the side and Steve struggled, wrestling Bucky back against his chest again, both of them breathing heavy now. The panicking body was soaked through with sweat, sticking to Steve's tight white t-shirt and probably ruining it, but he didn't think to care.

There weren't anymore ear-shattering screams, but Bucky was making these terrified (and terrifying) noises, whimpers and little cries. With his arm around Buck's throat, he could feel his heartbeat pulsing erratically against his forearm, way too fast, jumping all over the place.

"Calm down, c'mon Buck, s'just me, I'm here, I'm gonna protect you, I'm never going to let anyone hurt you again. Please, please, come back to me. Buck. C'mon, you're scaring me. Bucky. Bucky?"

Steve pulled Bucky up a little higher on his chest and clamped his leg down tighter on the metal arm so he could lean to the side and try to catch a glimpse of Bucky's face. His eyes were wide open but staring at nothing, entirely glassy like he wasn't here at all.

The struggling weakened slightly, so Steve slowly released the pressure from around Bucky's throat. He watched carefully, focusing on every movement, trying to grasp his head around whatever the hell was happening. But he missed whatever he was looking for entirely, because suddenly there was a metal elbow in his gut and then Bucky was gone, darting out of his arms and to his feet so fast that Steve couldn't even reach out to grab his ankle.

"Bucky!!" Shouting when all the air was knocked out of him wasn't easy, but it didn't matter because Bucky might as well have been deaf. He scrambled back up to his feet, stumbled over a pillow Bucky had flung when he'd bolted upright the first time, then he was running off in the only direction Bucky could have gone.

Cursing the stupid ability to walk silently - and apparently, run silently - Steve checked the kitchen first, sliding over the tiles in his socks and catching himself on the counter before he fell over. No Bucky. He really shouldn't be running in socks, but he managed not to fall as he ran into the bedroom next, slamming open the door and calling out Bucky's name again. Nothing.

Steve whipped his head around, because his apartment was seriously not that big, and on second thought darted to the front door next, checking the deadbolt and pulling the security chain, just in case. And he'd have known if Bucky went out the window...

That only left the bathroom, and Steve went barging in with the same vehemence as the bedroom, ducking just in time to narrowly avoid getting impaled with a knife. It stuck in the wall where his head had just been, handle reverberating up and down from the force of the throw. Steve instantly put his hands up, finally locating Bucky in the bathtub and inching carefully forward, on full-alert so he could avoid the next knife, which was held tight between Bucky's fingers.

He looked positively wrecked, crouched in the bathtub with his hair sticking to his face in sweaty strands, blinking rapidly, still glassed over and not seeing Steve.

"Hey, hey, it's just me. I'm not gonna hurt you, no one's gonna hurt you. I'm here. Okay? I'm here."

As soon as he was close enough, Steve snatched the knife out of Bucky's fingers, ignoring the shallow cut across his palm in the process. He'd heal. What mattered was his best friend, staring over Steve's shoulder like all the demons of hell were in the hall.

With a quick glance behind him (it couldn't hurt to check), Steve realized that the knife that had almost hit him wasn't the only one in the wall. The door had two lodged in the wood and the wall had three for a total of five, not counting the sixth that Steve had tossed to the ground. What the hell had Bucky been throwing knives at when no one was in here?

A frightened cry had his attention snapping back to Bucky, who was still staring wide eyed behind him, bottom lip trembling and still glassed over. Steve's heart was pounding outta his chest and he'd be having an asthma attack if he were smaller, although scratch that, he couldn't breathe right now anyways.

He had to get Bucky to snap out of this before he killed them both.

In another quick-thinking moment of genius ideas, Steve flipped on the bathspout, cupping his hands full of freezing water and tossing it in Bucky's face. A gasp, shaking shoulders as Buck scrambled away, then his head dropped and body tipped, falling. Just as Steve dove to catch him he shot upright, blinking through the water on his eyelashes.

"You with me? Are you okay? You're safe, Buck, I swear, you're safe." Open palms raised, forcing himself not to cradle Bucky to his chest - he had no idea if that would help or make his best friend run around the apartment chased by ghosts again.

"Where'm. R-reporting mish. No, ple- wha-" Bucky murmured nonsensically, swaying slightly as his pupils dilated and contracted, trying to focus and adjust to the dark bathroom.

"We're in my apartment. You're in the bathtub. You're okay....God, you're okay." Steve slumped against the side of the tub, one hand running through his hair as he breathed too quickly, holding off the pending panic attack. They were both fine. They were both alive. Bucky was extremely disoriented, but his eyes weren't glassed over, he was looking at Steve, even if his gaze was utterly confused.

"That had to have been one hell of a nightmare," Steve breathed, cupping a hand over his eyes to focus his head and get his heartbeat back to rational.

"Night--Nightmare?" Bucky asked, cocking his head and blinking rapidly, like a machine trying to recalibrate.

Steve lifted his head from his hands, staring at Bucky. There was no way Buck didn't remember that. He'd ran around the apartment throwing knives. Clearly, he'd been having a nightmare about something. Maybe the past seventy years they'd just dragged to the surface??

"Where'm. Ca...can I. Bed?"

And he wanted to go back to sleep now?

He'd kept his head up to this point, he really had, but Steve could not do this twice in one night, the idea of it wasn't comprehensible. His stomach probably had permanent metal indentions in it, his thigh was throbbing from being kicked, one hand was already purpling over in a bruise and the other was bleeding from grabbing the knife and his chest was aching from where he'd been punched and his head was the worst of it because the sound that Bucky had made when he screamed.

Dr. Erskine would probably be fascinated to document that Steve could, in fact, have non-asthma asthma attacks after all.

His body forgot he had the ability to breathe and entirely convinced his brain that he was tiny and weak and his lungs weren't working and he was gasping and choking on oxygen. Steve shut his eyes and gulped in useless breaths, reaching out in the darkness but it didn't matter, there was no one here that could help him (especially not the disoriented assassin in his bathtub). He couldn't breathe, he couldn't breathe and god knows he didn't have the comfort of an inhaler because obviously, he was the epitome of physical health, he should be able to get a grip on himself, it was all in his head but it didn't matter, because his lungs were failing him anyways.

Somehow, he ended up with his cellphone in his hand and some distant part of his brain was grateful he'd fallen asleep in pants with pockets. There was a difference between not being able to breathe and not being able to work his thumbs, so Steve got his phone pressed to his ear and ringing between gasping, useless breaths.

Good thing he could go a long time without oxygen, right? As he'd found out when he was drowning. Being crushed in on all sides by freezing cold, water rushing through his body, brain screaming at him to swim to the surface--

"Rogers? What the hell do you wa-"

"Tony, I c-can't breathe," Steve gasped into the phone, slamming his head back against the bathroom wall to try to clear his airways.

"Wait, fuck, what? Like are you being choked to death? Steve?" The sleepy voice on the other end of the line suddenly sounded very much awake.

"A-asthma at-tack I, ah-" he tried gulping in air, his head starting to pound from lack of oxygen. "N-no inhaler, f-fuck, I..."

"Barnes can help you, okay, he's done this before, remember? You guys grew up together, I know he's helped you through these before. Just go get him, okay? He's a good guy, he won't mind, assassin or not. Steve?"

"C-can't, he's. He's hurt, th-that's what-" a whimper he'd be embarrassed about any other time slipped through his lips, eyes squeezing shut as a tear slipped down his cheek, "-what s-set it off."

"Okay. Okay, just listen to my voice, Rogers. You're taking the orders from me now. For a second, anyways. You're okay. He's okay, he's not dead - right? - well, if he was, you probably wouldn't be calling me. Okay. I kind of suck at the whole not-panicking thing so really, stellar choice on friend to call here. But I need to you do exactly what I say, alright? Clear your airways first, tip your head back. You've got to give your lungs all the opportunity they have to start working right again."

He'd already gotten to that point, but Steve was glad Tony was pretending this was actual a physical problem, like he wasn't just fucked up in the head and responding the way he had years ago. Nothing was actually wrong with him, which somehow made it worse, but Tony was thankfully ignoring the fact that it was physically impossible for Steve to have an asthma attack with the serum.

"You clear? Now we're going to breathe, okay? Just in, now...out. Slow and steady, match the way I'm breathing. In...out. Again. You can do this, okay? In...and out."

It took a few more rounds, but gradually his lungs started functioning properly, or at least his head finally agreed that they'd never stopped working in the first place. Three minutes later and he was running his fingers through his hair, breathing in through his nose and out through his mouth, glancing over at Bucky to make sure he was still alright.

Bucky was curled up in the bottom of the tub, eyes closed, ribs rising and falling with each deep breath. He was sleeping again. On one hand, rest was great, and on the other hand if they had a repeat performance of the past half hour before dawn, Steve was actually going to invest in a damn inhaler.

"You good, Rogers?" Tony finally asked quietly over the line, his voice the most serious and caring Steve had ever heard it.

"Yeah." He pinched the corners of his eyes, steeling the headache that threatened to pound his head back into mush. "Thanks, Tony. Seriously, I don't know what I'd've--"
"You'd've been fine. You'd find a way to push through it with that stubborn head of yours. Now, do you wanna tell me why you called at ass-o'clock in the morning with the profound words of Bucky's hurt?"

Actually, Steve was a little surprised Tony hadn't pushed about that more earlier. He'd been patient, for once, and while half the reason he'd called Tony was because he knew he'd pick up regardless of the time, he was glad he'd made the choice.

"It's...god, I don't even know how to describe it."

"Start from the beginning, that tends to be a pretty good spot."

Steve hooked his arm over the side of the bathtub, looking down at Bucky's sleeping form as he relayed the story of the scream, the wild thrashing, the way he'd seemed to calm for a moment in the chokehold before breaking free and tracking around the apartment like he was being chased. The knives in the door and the wall, then finally getting Bucky to wake up with a splash of cold water to the face.

How Bucky hadn't even known what the hell had happened, had been disoriented as hell, and was currently passed out in the bottom of the bathtub.

"I mean, I knew this operation would be risky, Tony. I knew it'd bring up all sorts of memories and I knew it'd be tough. I was ready for nightmares - he's had those for years, I couldn't tell you how many flashbacks and memories I've pulled him out of. But god. The things these people did to him? Hydra had to have destroyed him beyond what any of us could imagine... It's never been like this. Honestly, I'm not sure how I can handle another nightmare like that."

"Nightmare?" Tony finally interrupted. He'd sat in silence for the entire explanation, and from the tone of his voice he sounded pretty shaken up about it too.

"Steve, Barnes isn't just having bad dreams. That wasn't a nightmare. That was a night terror."

The words echoed, bouncing around in his head like beads in a microwave, heating up every inch of him as he turned his eyes back on the collapsed sleeping figure. "Night terror?" He repeated in a whisper, the world tipping sideways enough that he had to grab onto the tub edge again.

"It's caused by over-stimulation by the central nervous system. They're more common in little kids, but adults can have them too. Especially if they've been under high stress, aren't getting enough sleep, have a shitty diet, and are going through traumatic experiences."

Steve made an annoyed humming sound because really, if that was an option, someone should have at least mentioned the idea to him. Actually, no, Steve should have researched everything he could, but how the hell would he have known what to look for? The internet was overwhelmingly vast.

"I don't know much about them, just that it starts with screaming and the bad ones lead to the whole 'being chased' thing. You're only supposed to grab them if they're a threat to themselves - which obviously in this case, he was - and whatever you do, you aren't supposed to wake them up. It just freaks them out and doesn't accomplish anything."

Tony never ceased to amaze him with the amount of information he had stored in that egotistical brain.

"What am I supposed to do, then?" Steve asked, reaching over the side of the tub to peel the sweaty strands of hair off Bucky's face, flipping them back into the rest of his hair. He looked so beautiful and peaceful while he was sleeping, the stark opposite of the terrified screaming and thrashing from earlier.

"Just wait it out, unfortunately. Apparently they go back to sleep after about ten minutes, maybe longer. Just keep the windows and doors locked so he can't get out. People with night terrors can get pretty violent when they're not the deadliest assassin in the world." Tony's flat-lined humor was back, which he found himself actually appreciative of now. Anything that made it easier to swallow the scary words of night terror. "Good news though, he probably won't remember anything in the morning. It depends. Some people do, but most don't."

"Well, I guess that's good. I doubt I could patch up everything by then, though. And the bruises probably won't be gone either, so I'm guessing I'll be getting some questions."

"I'd bet on it. You good now, Cap? Got everything in control on your end? I can send someone over if you want--""

"No, no, I'm fine. I'll be fine. I just want to get some sleep. Thank you though, again, really, it means a lot."

"I was counting on you of all people not to get sappy."

"Yeah, take it up with Bucky, he thinks I'm the biggest sap in the world. Anyways. I hope I didn't disturb your night too much...thanks again."

"You're welcome, Rogers. Now go to bed and call in the morning. Or come over or something. There's a rumor of a movie night, see if Raccoon-Eyes is up to it. Seriously, get some sleep. I hear it's good for old people."

The phone clicked off before Steve could complain about the geriatric joke. He shoved it in his pocket, taking one more shaky breath and wobbling to his feet. He didn't know how long the don't-wake-them rule applied, but he wasn't particularly interested in finding out tonight. So he just scooped Bucky out of the tub, carrying him bridal style out of the bathroom.

His long hair tickled against Steve's arm, head lolled back and body feeling way too small. Odds are there was nothing triggering about the couch, but just in case Steve kicked the pillows that had fallen on the floor out of the way of the coffee table, laying Bucky down carefully and trying not to groan at his bruised and bloody hands.

"Steve?" a low voice mumbled and he froze, carefully sliding his hands out from under Bucky's shoulders. "Why're you carryin' me?"

One icy eye squinted open and Steve couldn't help the soft smile that slid onto his face at the scrunched up nose and furrowed eyebrows. "We'll talk about it in the morning, okay?"

"'Kay." Bucky slid his right hand under the pillow, burrowing a little deeper into it. "Stay?"

The various bruises on his body all protested as he laid down, grabbing another thrown pillow and scooting in close, fingers curling comfortingness around Bucky's metal wrist. "Always."

~~~

Sunlight broke soft and golden through the window, reflecting dust particles in the air and casting a glow over half the living room.

Bucky blinked awake and decided Steve's hair was exact color of winter sunlight. He was sleeping a few inches away, shoulders rising and falling slowly with each breath. His eyelashes were still long as fuck - looking at the shadow they cast down his cheeks, Bucky smiled to himself because even when he hadn't remembered Steve, he'd noticed those damn eyelashes.

His pink lips were lax, barely parted, looking sinfully soft, like they'd just fold plushly around anything that touched them. Sleeping, he looked so gentle and young, like he really was in his twenties, like he hadn't seen war and sickness and death his whole life. For as long as he could remember, the only thing he'd wanted to do was protect this boy from all of the terrible darkness of the world.

This glowing angel, with his stupid too-tight tshirts and his rare striking smile and the ideals settled in his heart. Someone who had sacrificed too much and just kept on giving and giving.

God, Steve was beautiful.

And here he goes again.

Bucky shot up - albeit, perfectly silently - and stared down at his best friend, eyes wide as he forced himself to keep his breathing quiet, even though his chest was heaving up and down. Shit. Shit shit shit.

The summary movie reel in his head helpfully provided a flashing stream of moments, too many moments, since the beginning of time, falling deeper and deeper in love with Steve, realizing he was in love with Steve when he was already two and a half decades into his life, spending a year and a half trying to cope with that, all of the almost-kisses and the not-sures and the declarations in his head and the looks Steve would give him and the moments that couldn't not be flirting--

Two days ago, looking up at Steve with wide eyes after just getting back that flashback about almost-kiss #1 and then being so sure Steve was going to kiss him for real and he hadn't had enough memories to know what a bad fucking idea that was and he'd almost gone along with it and--

Wow, okay, this wasn't going to work out. He wasn't sure he could do this, like at all, and that was going to be a big freaking problem and he had to get out of here, he had to go sort through this where the goddamn source of his pounding heart wasn't four inches away, unfairly gorgeous.

Out. He'd have to be silent, if Steve woke then he'd try to stop Bucky and he wasn't strong enough to fight. He was vulnerable as fuck and if Steve woke up right now Bucky would kiss him, he would, and he really needed to go get his head on straight before he ruined their entire lives.

He had no idea how he thought yesterday that if he didn't face it, it wouldn't be true.

He made it to the window in perfect silence, lifting it and wincing as he looked down at the snow below. Shit, he was still in his tshirt. This was not his day. He glided back across the floor, quietly rolling his feet until he got to the door, grabbed the first jacket he could find - Steve's, the brown leather one, he wouldn't mind - and then he was passing the sleeping body again, holding his breath and praying Steve wouldn't wake up, he was almost there, almost there--

Then he was out the window, closing it back up so the cold didn't get to Steve, and slipping down the wall. Home free baby.

~~~

Gluten-free waffles were not half as bad as they sounded. Natasha still opted for toast, Clint didn't appreciate any of the trail-mix bird food jokes (and actually refused to stay for breakfast because of it), and Wilson was cool for whatever there was to eat.
He'd sat his cell on the table next to his plate, just in case, but the second that he lifted a bite, it rang, and he cursed his own stupid idea before setting down his waffle and scooping up the phone, ignoring Wilson and Romanoff's looks as he took a few steps away from the table, looking out over New York and thumbed the answer button.

He didn't even get the chance to say hello before Steve's (loud) desperate voice came over the line.

"Tell me he's with you." It sounded like a command, although basically everything Rogers said did, and Tony took a second to register that, figure out who 'he' was and do a mental rundown of the breakfast company.

"Sarge? No--" A broken-sounding noise came over the line and Tony instantly pulled it away from his mouth, cupping his hand over the speaker as he fished his keys out of his pocket and threw them at the table.

"Wilson. Rogers' apartment, now."

Sam's chair creaked in complaint as he practically vaulted out of it, snatching up Tony's car keys and taking off in the direction of the stairs. Tony should really fix up those Falcon wings in his lab, Sam shouldn't have to drive for god's sake.

Before he could pull Barnes&Rogers recon mission number two, Natasha snatched the phone out of his hand and shooed him with a hand, barking a sharp order. "Go find Barton, tell him Barnes is missing - Istanbul conditions."

He had no idea what that meant, but he started for the elevator, already getting Jarvis to locate Clint. Natasha lifted Stark's fancy cell phone to her ear, pushing open a stairwell to scale up to the one of the computer rooms. "Steve? What's going on?"

"Nat, Bucky's gone. Just vanished into thin air. He was fine when I put him to bed, but when I woke up this morning he was gone. I should've stayed up, I should've taken him to the tower, I should've..."

"This isn't your fault, Steve."

"No, he had a night terror last night, he woke up screaming and--"

"I know. Stark told us over breakfast. It's still not your fault." Natasha tucked the phone against her shoulder, using both hands to hack into Stark's wifi to locate his secure server. "But you need to stay calm, otherwise we can't find him. Look around your apartment, is anything missing?"

There were a few seconds of silence and the computer opened up all of Stark's internal location software. She started programming in any Red Room requirements and procedures she could think of, any place that she would go. Which, in New York, were unfortunately a lot. She started narrowing down options, still listening as Steve came back over the line.

"No, everything's exactly as I left it. The door's bolted from the inside, the window's closed."

That didn't matter, he'd go through the vents if he needed to. But the word window lit up an idea.

"Okay, what was he wearing?"

"Wearing? I don't think a missing persons report would do any--"
"Rogers. What was he wearing?"

"Uh. Um, he had his knives on him, so he was wearing his uniform pants, and...a black short-sleeved shirt."

"Go check your jackets. I know you've only got like, three."

The slightly-panicked sound of Steve's breathing disappeared from her ear and Natasha crossed a few more options off the list, saving the remaining twenty and initiating a hack into their security cameras.

"My brown leather jacket's gone," Steve finally breathed into the phone. Natasha typed a few more keys and pulled up a wall of security cameras, thumbing through a few.

"Good. Now we know he's likely to be mentally stable. If he grabbed a jacket before going out in the snow, he probably left with a sound mind."

"...the snow! Nat, I can track his footprints! I gotta go."

"Steve wait, you-" the phone clicked off and Natasha glared at the End Call screen for a moment. "...live in New York," she finished dryly to the empty room.

Then she was dialing Wilson's number, not bothering to search Stark's contacts for it because God knows what name he had him under.

"Where are you?" She asked, pulling up security footage of a man in a black hoodie. His left hand was human. Dammit.

"I'm getting out of the car at Steve's now," Sam replied, and for a man who kept insisting he was a soldier and not a spy, he was keeping up remarkably well.

"Have you got a visual on Rogers yet? He's running out into the street to check for prints in the snow."

"It's New York, there's a dozen footprints out of his building alone!"

"I know." She shook her head tiredly. "He's unstable."

"Wait, I see him, hold on." The sounds over the phone became distinctly muffled, the familiar filter from shoving a phone in your pocket when it's on speaker. She waited, listening for the blurry sound of their voices.

"Steve, hey man. Hey, calm down. There's a lot of footprints out here, how about we go back inside and get you some warm clothes? I'm sure he's fine."

"Sam, he's out there somewhere-"

"And he's an invincible super assassin, remember? He's fine. We've got Nat and Clint already looking for him, I'm sure Tony's calling all the people he knows right now. We'll find him. You've just gotta sit tight, okay? Inside. In the warmth, man."

A few more seconds passed then the muffled filter dropped and Sam whispered into the phone again.

"I've got Rogers inside. I think I can contain him, but we gotta find Barnes. Really, he can't be far."
He was.

Bucky was staring out a window, on a bus to Washington DC. He'd picked up a pair of gloves in New York and snatched a hat, so at least he was a little less recognizable. He doubted anyone would bother him though; people had a pretty good sense of emanating danger.

He spent the entire ride over running a hundred different things to say in his head; running over memories, picking apart pieces with the apathy of distance and the clarity of newly-acquainted scenes.

He didn't feel any better by the time he made it to his destination.

The woman at the front desk responded easily to his charming smile, the sob story about his grandmother, then he was through the doors, walking down hallways, and ducking into a room he'd known about for years. He'd had this location programmed in since it had been utilized - just in case Plan A didn't pan out, the Asset was Plan B.

As soon as he closed the door behind him, the old woman turned his way.

"Sergeant Barnes?" Agent Carter's voice was raspy, expression confused. He took a step closer and her sharp eyes cut to his left arm. He knew she knew - it was why she was in here in the first place. There's more than one way to eliminate a threat to Hydra. A pattern of deaths was suspicious...but medically-induced Alzheimer's was well with Hydra's capabilities.

She'd known too much, so she'd been snuffed out of the picture. Who would believe the retired, traumatized ex-agent with dementia?

He could pinpoint the moment that she recognized him - not just as Sergeant James Barnes, but as that file she and Stark had tracked down. The Winter Soldier. Her own personal ticket to losing her mind - a much slower death than Howard's, for a much stronger threat. Seeing her through the eyes of a potential target, Bucky could feel nothing. But pulping that face with the bright, powerful one of his memories...it was nothing but sorrow, sorrow that she had to end up here, sorrow she'd had to chase after him until she found out the truth, until his identity landed her here.

"Peggy," he greeted, taking a step closer. She sighed, deflating in her bed and looking at him with the same steely, unafraid expression.

"So I suppose it's my turn, then?" She asked, the British as strong as ever through the ruin of her vocal cords. Bucky shook his head, taking the chair by her bedside and scooting it closer. He'd bet this was where Steve sat - he'd be able to grab her glass of water on this side. It would be the Steve thing to do.

"I'm not here to kill you, Agent Carter. I don't work for a Hydra anymore." He sat in the chair, scooting a little closer, and she just raised an unimpressed eyebrow at him. Which he deserved, because being a super assassin for seventy years and then just randomly stopping wouldn't make sense in any other situation. "Steve got me out," he clarified.

With that, her face lit up.

"Steve? He found you? Oh my g-damn. I'm so- I'm so glad, James." She reached out one frail, breakable hand, grabbing his left one over the glove. She was so thin, so breakable - one twitch of his metal fingers and he could snap her entire hand in half. He gently placed his hand within her own, the most careful he'd ever been at holding something with the harsh metal.

"You never told him..." Bucky whispered, and by the watery tears in her eyes, he knew she knew.
exactly what he was talking about. (And it wasn't her discovery of the Winter Soldier.)

"I made you a promise." She whispered back.

Striking comets, young hearts and foolish minds and red lipstick and bloody fields and they had been so young, both of them so on fire. Both of them so in love with the sun, a life of glittering explosions and aching power, two fighters burning bright and hot and fast and strong and so incredibly beautiful. The collision of two masses of stars.

I loved him first.

"Thank you," he managed, two pairs of broken sad eyes meeting. Once the highest have fallen the darkness comes too; and in that darkness a light is born to shine again true. Everything had changed from the time he'd first told her that. The whole world had changed.

Two burnt out comets wasting away in the shadows, praying for sunlight to take them away. But he never would have had Steve as long as he did if Peggy hadn't given him that. She'd saved him. She'd kept his secret for a lifetime...there'd never be enough words for that.

And now he was coming to her one last time, part two of his tragedy and nowhere else to go.

"I don't know what to do." His voice cracked, throat tightening, "It's too hard." Peggy's eyes searched his, still so stunningly dark brown against the white pillow.

"You'll never stop loving him, James. I tell Steve he's terribly dramatic, the angel, but you? A love like...the way you feel? You'll never rid...yourself of it. But good god, why would you want to?"

Bucky took a deep breath, shutting his eyes against her words. Every pause, every cough and stumble of her words, it was all his fault. If he'd never gone to her for solace with Steve, they never would have connected, she'd never have looked into the Winter Soldier, she wouldn't know too much, she'd still be healthy and remembering--

"I can't. I can't, Miss Carter, if I did this to you, the woman he loves, what will I do to him?" He opened his eyes back at her, waiting for the shock, for the anger, for the confusion about why he was responsible. Instead she just looked at him with terrible pity in her eyes, understanding like he'd never imagined.

"Sergeant Barnes, I always knew too much. Even if I'd never met you, they'd have put me away." She paused, looking so soft, and he had to blink away water in his eyes, pushing away the crushing emotions. "I wasn't sure if it was SHIELD who'd taken my head from me, but I'd guessed. It's not your fault, dear."

"Jeez, Peg, you really are old. You just called me dear."

She laughed, raspy sound and bright smile the best thing he'd heard since he got back. A smile curved over his mouth too, sad and unfamiliar, and then her laughing turned into coughing and Bucky reached over for her glass of water, handing it to shaking hands and helping her guide it to her lips.

He'd never imagined this, in the 1940s. Peggy had been as immortal as he and Steve had been. There had been foreseeable no end, then. War hovered ominously, but they were untouchable. Like they would never die, not the three of them.

Bucky was just glad as hell that he'd gone first. He wouldn't have been able to watch Steve's sorrow over losing Peggy, wouldn't have lived through watching Steve die.
And now Steve never smiled and Bucky killed people and Peggy was coughing and losing her memories to dementia in a retirement home. Funny how much a single tumble from a train could change everything.

Now that the coughing had subsided, Peggy patted his hand, encouraging him to go on. She made it seem so easy.

"What am I supposed to do? Everything hurts when I love him, it's consuming and terrible and--"

"James. James. That's only when you thought you couldn't have him. You can...h-have him now."

She coughed lightly and he ran his thumb back and forth over her wrinkled skin.

"But what about you?" They'd made an agreement. A lot had changed, but he was a man of his word. He would never take Steve away from Peggy.

"I said my goodbyes," she croaked out. "I let him go, for good, on the Brooklyn Bridge."

Goodbye, my darling.

"It's your turn to hold on tight and say your hellos," she scolded. Bucky looked down at their hands, at the black glove encasing metal and the achingly human fragility, juxtaposed in their stark contrast.

If he held on tight to Steve he'd crush them both.

Bucky sucked in a breath, blinking back tears again. "How the hell'd you ever learn to say goodbye?"

Peggy's mouth curved down disapprovingly, looking immeasurably sad. "Is that what you really want to do?"

Yes, and no, he didn't know. That's why he was here. He finally settled for, "It'd be nice to know how, if it's an option."

"Well...He was dead at the time. And it took me th-thirty years." The piercing brown eyes closed, relieving the memory all over again. "I had a vial of his blood that I poured over the side of the Brooklyn bridge...there's actually. Ahem. Quite a fascinating story that goes with that," her eyes opened again, finding his with a gentle smile. "Maybe I'll tell you some time, if you keep coming back."

"You sayin' you want to see more of me?" Bucky teased, running her words over in his head. Apparently he wasn't going to be able to move on until thirty years after Steve died. But that was the difference between Peggy's strength and his. If Steve died, he'd just follow after.

"Of course I want to see you again, James. I need someone to tell me about your advancements with Steve." Her tone was light and teasing but her face was crinkled with worry, scrutinizing his own.

"I don't...I can't." Bucky stared down at his hand, the same hand that had choked endless people to death, that had almost pummeled Steve to death. "After what I've become...how could I ever...? How could he...?"

With an expression that belonged to a twenty five year old agent and not a tired old woman, Peggy pinned him down with her eyes.

"When you told me you loved him, you meant it. It had been a long time coming...you h-had a lifetime together. Look back at that, at those memories...tell me what you see."
Since the very beginning, they'd been chased by death - Steve's parents, then Bucky's. Steve's health issues, then Steve's fighting. Bucky's defending, the danger of the jobs he took.

But nothing killed them, and like the saying goes, it made them stronger. Stronger together, stronger inside...

Until they owned the Brooklyn streets they walked.

The war came, disaster struck, Bucky had been tortured and Steve pulled him out of death. Then there was a year and a half of being chased by death again, a few times it'd latched onto their boots and they'd always managed to kick it off.

Stronger.

They'd owned the European forests. The battlegrounds were their kingdom.

"The two of us? We ruled the world... we were invincible." He took a deep breath, remembering just how invincible he'd felt holding Steve's shield, seconds before their crowns had been torched forever. "Death was always just around the corner and it never took us - it was almost like we were immortal. Just Stevie and I, my arm around his shoulders..." his eyes slipped closed and the last words sunk into a whisper. "Us against the world."

Silence filled with soft beeping sounds and ragged breaths. He wasn't going to cry. He wasn't.

"You can't give up on something like that. The way you love him...it spanned centuries. It held on through seventy years as a prisoner of war. It's a love of legends. It's the thing of storybooks, of kings."

Kings. Legends. That was all Steve. Bucky had never been noble enough to fit beneath Steve's crown of gold; his was made of thorns. Bucky may have worshipped Steve's life..."But he never loved me like the way I loved him."

"Are you sure?" She asked dubiously, something in her expression suggesting otherwise. Bucky hadn't seen Steve's reaction to his death, hadn't known the world had ended that day. It wasn't Peggy's place to tell him.

"Yes, I'm sure. But even if he did, how could we be together? I'm a murderer, he's...Steve." He made a vague hand motion that he knew Peggy would understand, because she spoke his name with the same reverence it deserved.

"And he loves you, Sergeant Barnes."

"As his best friend."

"As his everything. You could rule the world again, James. The two of you are more powerful than ever...all you have to do is be at his side."

It sounded so simple, but considering the way his heart clenched and his soul melted anytime Steve so much as smiled his way?

"I don't know if I can. There's my programming-"

"And your heart."
"And my heart. God, Peg, I wish this were easy. Can't I just have an easy love? Couldn't I just fall into his arms?"

Even in her scolding optimism, Peggy knew it wouldn't be that easy. Knew that neither one of them would dare risk what was between them when they'd finally just gotten each other back--

Not unless they were entirely sure it was what the other wanted. (But how to discover that if both were so desperate to hide?)

"You know...whenever Steve visits, he always tells me I'm his best girl. Always says it that way. That still leaves room for you. If you can take it."

If he could take it. Bucky would have laughed, if it were anyone but Peg. Instead he scowled, his voice gruff in half-seriousness.

"It's goddamned terrifying."

Peggy huffed a breathy sound of amusement, because no one had dared curse around her in a long time. James Buchanan Barnes was a treasure.

"Love is," she reminded him. "I couldn't be happier it was you though, James. No one in this world deserves to be with him as much as you do."

Him? He didn't deserve anyone, let alone Steve Rogers. He hadn't since the first time he'd lost his temper, lost his mind, filled with black rage and slipped into something less than human, nearly killing a gaggle of bullies who'd beat Steve unconscious.

But maybe that was the point. He'd do anything to protect Steve, which was terrifying, but he'd always had a reason.

And he was left in that spot again - now, he wasn't just the only person on the front to remember that Steve Rogers was more than Captain America. He was the only person in the century who'd known Steve his whole life. The only living piece Steve had from the past.

It was all up to him now.

He had no idea how he was supposed to do this.

His stupid eyes were welling up with tears again and Peggy squeezed the metal fingers, unafraid, powerfully serious as brown eyes locked on his.

"You told me once that you loved him first." Bucky's breath caught in his throat, threatening a sob. Steve had been his. He'd had Steve, he'd loved Steve with every ounce of his body. The passion that had coursed through his veins with that shout, the breakdown of crying, his world beginning and ending all in the same moment.

Peggy closed her eyes tiredly, hand giving Bucky's one last squeeze, voice caught in a raspy whisper.

"And now you get to love him last."

~~~

Clint and Sam had pulled him into a movie marathon of something about space and robots, which was nowhere near distracting enough to keep him from frowning and glancing at the window every few minutes. He hadn't broken down all day, despite everyone treating him like he was made of glass. He was a goddamned soldier, he'd seen Bucky get shot twice. He wasn't about to cry.

He was just really upset. Pissed, at himself, wickedly guilty. Because he'd been stupid enough to let himself fall asleep when Bucky had needed him. He deserved to wake up alone, really. The only concern now was whether or not Bucky was safe, or warm, or scared, or permanently gone...

The window was still empty. Steve sighed, looking at it a little longer as though that would make it suddenly open, Bucky suddenly slip through. Then someone knocked on the door.

All three of them jumped in surprise, staring at the door like it was a portal to outer space. Then the knock came again. Steve vaulted off the couch, crossing the room too quickly and yanking open the handle. And there, in Steve's brown leather jacket and a NY cap, was Bucky, hands shoved in his pockets.

Steve had no idea what his face looked like, but based on the expression on Bucky's, it was concerning. He stepped forward worriedly, gloved hand pressing over Steve's heart. "Hey, hey, what's wrong? Steve? What happened? Are you okay?"

"Am I okay," Steve said slowly, staring disbelievingly. Bucky made a distressed noise and pushed Steve inside the apartment, kicking the door behind them and cupping Steve's cheek with the other glove, forcing him to look Bucky in the eyes.

"What's going on? What did you--" Bucky froze, looking over Steve's shoulder and finally seeing Clint and Sam. His hand shot off Steve's cheek like it was on fire, worried expression sculpting into a more relaxed and slightly confused one. "Hey, why are you guys here?"

"You were gone. You just left..." Steve trailed off, watching Bucky's face as it all suddenly clicked. But instead of softening into understanding he stiffened, taking a step back and raising his chin in challenge.

"I didn't know there was a rule against leaving," he replied sharply, arms crossing over his chest. Steve threw up his hands because really, they were going to have this argument now?

"I thought, after last night--"

"Last night? What the hell happened last night?" Bucky kept glancing between Steve and the guests on the couch who were just watching silently. Everyone stiffened at the mention of last night, though. "Are you telling me I'm missing more pieces of my life?"

"It's called a night terror, most people don't remember them. Stark said he's working on a solution, but we need to get you scanned at the tower...it's a sleep disorder where your body and mind disconnect. You woke up screaming and I tried to calm you down, even held you down, but you got away and ran into the bathroom and started--"

"Throwing knives," Bucky interrupted. As soon as Steve started explaining, flashes started coming back, the screaming, the arm around his throat, the shadows chasing him around Steve's apartment, a splash of cold water in his face, the bathroom tipping sideways and spinning and noises washing over him and darkness and confusion. Waking up in Steve's arms, being laid down on the floor, asking Steve to stay. "Wow. Yeah, that sucked."

"You're telling me," Steve smiled, but it was all kinds of painful at the edges. Bucky dug back through the memory - kicking Steve, the punches, the knife aimed at his head, the hiss as Steve grabbed another knife away from him. It hadn't been his fault, he knew that, and the bruises by now were probably gone by now...but that would explain the bruise on his own hip.

"And when I was gone this morning you thought..."

"That you'd lost your mind and gone running through New York alone? Yeah, that'd be why I freaked out." He breathed a sigh of relief, immeasurably grateful that Bucky remembered, that he wouldn't be alone in that.

"Aw, Steve. I'm sorry." Bucky gave him a wincing smile and glanced over his shoulder, aiming a nod at Clint and Sam. "Thanks for keeping him company, guys."

They both nodded, although Clint was looking at him suspiciously. If they were as good as they were supposed to be, they'd have been looking for him. And not being able to find him probably threw everyone for a loop. Looked like he just kept proving how good he was.

"Yeah man, where were you at?" Sam asked casually, leaning back against the couch as Bucky walked into the living room and Steve followed. It would be impossible to miss the way Bucky froze at that statement, carefully avoiding everyone's eyes as he plopped down on the couch too hard.

"Nowhere," he replied shortly, gesturing at the TV. "What were you guys watching?"

~~~

He hadn't been sick in a long time but he felt like throwing up, looking through the paneled glad outside one of Stark's emptier labs. Tony was being perfectly careful, treating Bucky with the respect of someone who knew first hand how bad PTSD can get. It didn't matter. Bucky checked out anyways, everything falling blank and submissive and scarily compliant. It was eating him up to watch, to see his darling Buck ripped apart to be left only with this as his defense mechanism.

Sam had read up on the four responses (fight, flight, freeze, and fawn), told him all about them, and Steve knew it was how he survived seventy years of torture, he knew it was Bucky's safety mechanism, but watching him so eager to please, so dead to anything but doing what's wanted of him....he still wanted to hurl.

When Tony finally gave him the okay to come in, Bucky was still out of it, staring ahead blankly. Tony had clapped a hand on Steve's shoulder with a quiet, "Careful, Cap. He's fine, reacting might make it worse."

He'd nodded weakly, put his arm around Bucky and shot a short thank you at Tony, who just waved a hand for them to go on their way. As soon as Bucky was in the hallway he started to harden a little, straightening up and looking around.

"Did you want to go back to the apartment?" Steve asked carefully, rubbing his thumb over Bucky's shoulder. Bucky squinted at him and he could practically see the word recalibrating crossing Bucky's features.

Finally he pushed Steve's hand off him, starting for the elevator of his own accord. "Do you know where the gym is in this place?"

He hadn't been explicitly invited to join, so Steve sat on one of the benches with a book propped in his hand and pretended not to watch Bucky train.

It was incredible to witness, really. He'd known the Winter Soldier was good - a legend, the best - but seeing the behind the scenes work that went into it...it was nothing like the kind of training Steve
The closest thing their routines had in common were punching bags - only Bucky did his upside down, long hair flipping upside down adorably as he balanced the inside of his knees on a rafter and pummeled a bag that way. It looked ridiculous, but probably did wonders for balance and stability while working on his arms. It was smart - no, efficient. As always.

By the time Buck came and plopped down across from him on the bench, he was soaked with sweat, metal arm humming and whirring as he stretched out his fingers, curling them and rolling the plates down individually like a shiver.

"Good book?" he asked, still kind of out of breath, right hand slicking his hair back from his forehead to pin it back against his head as he raised his eyebrows at Steve.

"Mmhmm," Steve said noncommittally, pretending to check his page number (it hadn't changed) before closing the book and setting it to the side.

"Funny how it's good without needing to ever turn pages," Bucky responded casually, leaning back against the wall and giving Steve that one-sided smirk that broke hearts and dropped undergarments of all sorts.

Of fucking course Bucky had noticed Steve watching him. He had enhanced hearing, was even more attentive to the environment than Steve was, was a super assassin... it was entirely Steve's fault he got caught.

But before he could respond - how the hell do you respond to that - Bucky cocked his head, sweat rolling deliciously down his temple as the playfulness of his grin slid to pondering. "You know what I haven't had in decades?"

"Hm?" Steve replied, because really, who wasn't reduced to a humming, one-syllable mess when there was a gorgeous, sweaty - so much more built than he remembered - man sitting on your bench.

"A hot shower," Bucky said dreamily, and Steve absolutely did not picture what his own name might sound like in that time of voice from those lips.

Then the clouds faded and sharp eyes snapped to his. "Race you?"

He'd known from chasing the Winter Soldier across rooftops after Fury got shot through the wall that Bucky was fast. It made him no less pissed when he slid through the shower doors a millisecond behind.

"No fair, you're warmed up," Steve gasped, sagging against the wall just inside the immense multi-shower bathroom. Bucky propped himself up with his metal arm, sweaty hair disheveled and sticking up adorably as he tried to catch his breath, "More like worn down."

"At least I beat you last time," Steve conceded, lungs starting to pump oxygen properly again.

"Cause I let you." Bucky rolled his eyes but Steve paused at the comment. So he'd known, then. Back then, Bucky had known he'd been a serum recipient. And he hadn't told Steve.

It hit him like a freight train to the heart.

And he knew what that felt like.

"You remember last time?" Steve asked casually, turning his head to look at Bucky, holding the facade that he didn't feel like dying right now. But he needed to know if that even what those words meant.

Buck rolled his eyes, pushing off the wall and running his hand through his hair, as always. "Of course I do, it was the last time I saw you before..."

There was no point in pushing. If Bucky needed space, he'd promised.

He grabbed the back neckline of his black top, pulled it over his head and shoulders in a swoop and folded it with a flick of his wrist, draping it over one of the benches. The scars on his shoulder were no less jarring and the urge to touch them, to kiss every mark of twisted tissue hadn't faded any but Steve kept his hands to himself.

"Can you get that wet?" he asked instead, gesturing at Bucky's left arm. It was metal after all, and from the sound of it Bucky hadn't been showering himself over the past seventy years, so it was a good precaution to have.

Bucky looked down at the hand solemnly, flexing it and watching the panels break apart and shift together. He sighed, voice emotionless. "No. They only ever deployed me on missions in Texas, where it didn't rain or snow."

Steve furrowed his eyebrows in confusion. Bucky had totally deadpanned that, but the rumors were that he spent a lot of time in Russia? Steve shifted his weight, going for cautious. "...really?"

The laugh in response to that was nowhere near the grandeur of Bucky's usual ones, but the worried tension finally dissipated between them, Steve rolling his eyes at the joke that really wasn't funny and Bucky huffing something about gullible blondes.

Then he started unlacing his shoes, not-quite-smiling and voice back to casual. "No, not really, but they did deploy me in Texas once, in '63."

Steve hummed, trying to remember why that date and state stuck out in his mind. He'd been doing a lot of research lately. Then it clicked and he snapped his fingers, "Wasn't that the year Kennedy..."

"Yep," Bucky replied and Steve ran the story back over in his head. It had been a sniper, and the guy they'd pinned it on was mostly a conspiracy theory. "Oh.

"And that was you?" He tried to keep his cool but Bucky may have killed one of the Presidents of the United States and they were just casually discussing it in the shower room.

"Yep," he said again, absolutely no change between the inflection of the first one. Steve's eyebrows raised but he kept his mouth clamped down, quiet for once.

Bucky stood, barefoot now, and unbuttoned the top of his pants. "Nothin' to say to that, Rogers?"

Mostly, Steve was busy forcing himself not to look below Bucky's shoulders, so it really wasn't his fault when he couldn't come up with anything and offered, "I think he was a bad man?"

The eyeroll he got for his troubles was almost bordering on affectionate. He'd count it as a win. Then the sound of Bucky's pants hitting the floor jarred him out of his light smile and his eyes cut down entirely unintentionally and Buck was still in his boxers, but that didn't stop Steve from finally getting a good look at his physique.
"Thanks, you are so helpful," Bucky murmured, scooping his pants of the ground and folding them, not looking at Steve. Which was fine, because Steve was doing enough staring for the both of them.

"And you are too skinny," Steve shot back, suddenly extremely serious. Bucky froze at the words, looking wide eyed at Steve before looking down at himself.

The air shifted around them and suddenly they were fighting again, Bucky on hard defense and Steve's heart breaking for the thousandth time because Bucky's ribs were too prominent and his stomach was sunken and Steve had seen him that way before, that one winter where Steve had been so sick Bucky kept giving Steve his half of dinner and not telling him about it until Steve caught him changing one day and yelled with his hoarse, scratchy throat about what an idiot Bucky was, then he'd just ended up coughing halfway through and losing effect but he refused to eat for two days after that, shoving all the food back at the too-skinny Bucky until he finally relented and said they could split it evenly again.

He'd do it again, if he had to. It was the cheapest, probably most terrible way out but Bucky cared about Steve's health more than his own and he'd do whatever the fuck it took to get Bucky healthy again.

"Let's not get into this." It sounded like a warning more than a request, but Steve wasn't going to back down that easy.

"Bucky--" he started, already scolding, but he just got cut off with a scowl and sharp words.

"No. I'm fine."

Steve made a frustrated noise and stared up at the ceiling, mostly so he wouldn't see Bucky's sunken form again and start hitting things. Silence settled on them for a few moments, Bucky tense and Steve fuming and trying to figure out how the hell to handle this. "Can I at least convince you to drink Tony's shakes?"

Another few beats of silence, then a sigh and a gruff, "Maybe."

He'd take what he could get. And then pester Tony about how they were going to get maximum nutrient value back in Bucky's body without making him hurl, since he hadn't eaten anything solid except for fruit over the past month.

Probably, the past seventy years. That thought made Steve's stomach churn for the second time today.

"Can you turn on the water for me?" Bucky asked, and Steve was too busy fretting about everything else to think about how strange the request was. He was already running ideas through his head, things that Buck could eat without feeling sick as he walked over and flipped one of the showerheads on, turning the handle to hot and steering clear of the spray.

He didn't want to make Bucky uncomfortable and there was no reason for him to be in here, so as soon as he heard the sound of the rest of Bucky's clothes hitting the ground, Steve headed for the shower room doors, already shouldering it open as he shouted over the sound of the water. "I'll be outside if you--"

"Wait!" Steve froze, closing the door again and turning around, wary not to look below Bucky's eyes because this was not the time. And Bucky already looked uncomfortable, shifting nervously. "Would you...would you mind staying? I just- I don't know, it seems..."

Bucky trailed off making a vague hand motion and Steve nodded, stepping up to the bench where Bucky's clothes were folded. "You don't have to explain. I'll stay."

With a relieved breath, Bucky shot Steve a little smile and stepped into the water. His back was to Steve from this angle and not that that was any better, but if Steve kept his eyes from following the drops of water that trailed down between his muscular shoulder blades, weaving over his ribs and arcing through the slope of lower back and oh god, no.

It took every ounce of his self restraint to look away, to stare down at his hands instead of the beautiful arches of Bucky's golden back, the ripples in his shoulders, the wet hair slicked down and long over the back of his neck. This was why he didn't want to stay. But Buck had asked, that was way more important.

"How are you doing?" Steve finally asked, leaning his head back against the wall and allowing himself a quick glance over. The metal hand was pushing water back through his hair, face tilted up into the spray, steam splattering off his left arm and fogging up the room quicker than usual.

"Okay." Bucky made a noise to substitute for a shrug. He used to shrug a lot, but Steve hadn't seen him do it since he'd become the Winter Soldier. "It's kinda suffocating."

That was not the answer he'd been hoping for. Steve was already half off the bench, ready to jump in the second he was needed. "Shit, Buck, how can I help? What do you need?"

Bucky hummed, kept calmly running his hands through his hair. "If I stop breathing or responding, come resuscitate me."

The words were light enough to ease the worry in Steve's chest and he sat back down, sighing. "I can do that. Is it the water or the steam?"

Bucky's hands were by his sides now, head dipped and water running down his back. He didn't say anything in response, unmoving and scarly silent. "Bucky? Are you okay?"

More silence. Steve cursed and jumped off the bench, skidding over wet ground, his eyes behaving only because Bucky was in trouble, it was below even him to glance down now. The second he reached the spray he pulled Bucky back, spinning him and tipping his chin up, both hands on Bucky's face.

Which had the most amused smile in the world.

"Wow, you really would save me after all," Bucky mused, blinking water out of his eyelashes and looking up at Steve with those mischievous, stupidly beautiful icy eyes.

"Of course I would, you dick." Except holy shit, he shouldn't be talking about dicks right now, in his current position, which was holding Bucky's stupid face while hot water ran over his fingertips and Bucky was naked, vulnerable in front of him.

"Captain America," Bucky announced in his best radio voice, "Come to save the damsel in distress!"

Steve glared at him but it didn't have any heat, because Bucky was pranking him, he didn't have it in him to be pissed. It was how Buck had always dealt with things, since the beginning. This, he was used to. This, he could do.

So maybe he ended up raising his eyebrows sassily, sliding his hands up from Bucky's cheeks to the long hair slicked back from his face. "You are in distress. You haven't even started shampooing your hair yet."
"What? Oh, yeah." He made a pleased humming sound as Steve's fingers pushed over his scalp, the way he always used to when he convinced Steve to give him head rubs. Which was probably only four times, ever, because those humming sounds did not do good things for Steve's psyche. His eyes had slipped closed as he tilted his head a little more against Steve's fingers. "Guess I'm not used to it."

"Clearly."

"Hey!" Bucky made an indignant sound and pulled Steve's hands away, holding his wrists in between them. "Hydra washed my brain, not my hair."

Steve stared at Bucky with wide eyes for about three seconds, then they both broke and started laughing. It was one of those side-grabbing, irrational kinds of laughter that were so much funnier because you shouldn't be laughing and then you laughed harder because why the fuck couldn't you stop and it was basically an endless cycle of painful gasps in between choked laughs. Bucky stumbled to the side just as Steve doubled over, exactly the right time to get mauled by hot shower water, then he was soaking and Bucky was laughing harder, sliding down to the ground.

Eventually, they both got a grip on themselves, although Bucky was still wiping away water from his face in between remaining giggles that had not come from the shower. Steve washed Bucky's hair for him, getting him to tilt his head back so Steve could be behind him, running his sudsy fingers through the wet pieces he'd been dying to touch since he'd seen them.

At one point he spiked Bucky's hair up into the tallest mohawk ever and they were both giggling again, then the shower room fell into silence again as Steve cupped his hand against Bucky's forehead and tipped his head back, washing foam away down the rivets of his back.

By the time he shut the shower back off, Steve was soaked and his clothes were clinging to him uncomfortably, but there was a resting smile on Bucky's face and he didn't mind one bit.

Jarvis offered to request for Sam to bring down two pairs of clothes from their respective closets and they wrapped up in towels in the meantime, one around Bucky's waist and one to ruffle-dry his hair. It fluffed up around his head in pretty curves, light waves of volume that feathered around his face as he parted it to the side, nothing like the sad strands blocking his eyes.

Steve stood behind him with one towel wrapped around his hips and one around his shoulders as Bucky primped in the mirror, messing with his hair and flipping it this way and that. He hadn't come to make suggestions, until Bucky met his eyes in the mirror and asked him what he thought.

"Is it harder to fight when it's long? I feel like it gets in your eyes a lot." Not that he didn't like the long hair...it was just different that what he was used to. Bucky had always been so careful with his hair, had been constantly fixing it since they were just kids.

"Hmm," Bucky pondered, running his hands loosely over the sides and pulling it back into a ponytail that he held with his fingers. "What about that?"

He only just managed not to say it's cute, catching onto his brain last second and settling for, "Whatever you think, Buck."

"Well, I think it's kinda sexy long..." Steve made a choked noise that Bucky smiled at, then he twisted the end of the ponytail into a messy bun and turned his head to the side to see it better in the mirror. "...just so long as I don't part it in the middle. God, I need volume."

"You're a drama queen." Steve told him flatly and Bucky finally turned around, letting his hair fall back to his shoulders. They were close, in just towels, the room still lingering with steam and warmth and this was not a good idea, emotions were too high and they had to joke this away, it was the only option. "Like a dame, really," he added, trying not to notice how Bucky had to tilt his chin up to look Steve in the eyes.

So close, like they might kiss, like they would almost kiss, and that couldn't be an option, it really couldn't.

He took a step back and Bucky followed the movement with guarded curiosity, then he shrugged and ran his fingers back through his hair, glancing at the mirror one more time. "Speaking of which, are there any dames around here I could snag a hair tie from?"

"You could just ask, instead of stealing?" Steve suggested and Bucky gave him that look.

Then a knock on the shower room door startled them both and they jumped away from each other, even though they had been at least a foot apart. It was only Sam with their change of clothes, although he gave Steve a weighted look as he handed them over, eyes darting between Bucky's state of undress and the high flush on Steve's cheeks.

"Shut up," he muttered, taking the clothes and closing the door back in Sam's face. Just in time for Bucky to yank it back open - somehow already dressed - and shoot Steve a smile and a thanks over his shoulder before the door closed again and Bucky's voice fading in the distance, asking Sam something about dames and ponytails.

Steve stared at the closed door and wondered how the hell he was going to do force himself back into pretending not to be in love with Bucky.

~~~

Pepper Potts had been happy to lend (you're welcome, Steve) him a hair tie, even gave him a few hair suggestions that made him quirk his eyebrows. She was cute, super kind, and way out of Tony's league. Stuck out her hand to shake, unafraid and professional and smiling, regardless of the fact that he was lethal and probably unstable. He liked her.

And she called him James Buchanan.

Just like Sarah Rogers used to.

It touched something in his heart, something he'd forgotten, to hear his name like that. Emotions welled up in his chest like a tsunami and he could drown in them, in memories of the past. And it made him suddenly acutely aware of his skin itching, his feet restless and his head pounding to get out again (like always, god, he always had to get out). He'd lose his fucking mind if he let those emotions take him. He had to carve them out. He couldn't handle it.

Steve was off somewhere preparing lunch and really, Bucky should stay, he'd only gotten back last night from his last excursion.

But.

He was losing it. He was losing the perfect control he had, he was losing the grip on his life. Performance error after performance fucking error and he'd been ignoring them all, for what?

Dependency. He'd asked Steve to stay in the goddamned shower room with him. What, like he needed Steve now?
He was perfectly functional on his own. Better than functional.

Steve was making him soft, making him cozy and putting him in danger; even if he didn't intend to.

This was how he survived; he'd been perfect. He'd been strong. And then Steve had put his artist fingers in Bucky's hair and worked wonders and it was like all of that just slipped away from him, leaning into the touch and letting all his training slip and how stupid and how vulnerable.

If he was allowing himself to be weak in Steve's presence, what would stop him from being weak when Steve wasn't there? When it counted? He was still being hunted, by Hydra, by the US government, by Russia, by god knows who else, and he was letting himself giggle in hot showers with the man he was in love with.

Hydra had made him strong. Strong enough not to go through the searing, wrenching pain of loving Steve. Strong enough to fight his own feelings, to barricade his own emotions. It was so much easier to be numb, to shut down his heart into metal so it couldn't flutter.

He had to get out. Had to prove to himself he was still strong.

If he didn't get space from Steve, he'd never be able to clear his thoughts. He had to keep moving, couldn't let himself get too comfortable, because then his guard would break down and then he'd be dead and then there'd be no seeing Steve again, at all, ever.

The thing was, none of the Avengers really knew how wanted he was. They had only a glimpse at the people he'd worked for, at the people and societies and entire countries that wanted him dead.

He didn't need to worry them more by revealing just how bad it was, couldn't risk them putting him under harsh security measures. It'd be easier to instead keep his skills up, not let himself get soft, run and clear his head every few days, the way he'd been doing before he got his memories back.

It was safest for everyone. Especially for Steve.

~*~

"Captain Rogers, I'm afraid I have some bad news, sir. Sergeant Barnes has left the premises."

"He what? Where did he go?"

"I have no way of tracking him, sir. However, it does appear that he took your motorcycle from storage."

"My bike? Well at least that means he's planning on coming back, right?"

"I would hope so, sir. You have a tendency to be emotionally unbalanced when he is gone."

"Yeah, Jarvis, thanks. I noticed."

~~~

When he finally made it up the stairs knocking felt like it'd be frivolous, so he just picked the ridiculous lock and let himself in.

Steve was sitting at the kitchen table, drawing. Bucky closed the door behind him and Steve looked up - he'd be dead by now, if Bucky wanted to kill him. He didn't.

The blue eyes probably would have been pissed, that pretty mouth probably would have yelled or cursed at him if it were any other situation, except instead Steve's pencil fell to the table and Bucky let himself sag against the counter.

Let Steve gather him into his arms. At least they were both bloody now, right?

He blinked in and out of the next few hours, half paying attention to Steve running washcloths over his skin and stitching him up, half running the mission back through his head, locating performance errors and determining future solutions. So many performance errors. He'd still been incredible, but not good enough. Something had been missing.

They were both quiet. The kitchen was red with his blood, Steve's hands were stained. It didn't feel like the old days. It didn't feel like the days when Bucky would come home and scold Steve for getting beat up, worried for his safety and fretting over every cut to his pretty skin. This didn't feel safe like that; more like their whole world was hanging in the balance as Steve patched another bandage of white gauze over Bucky's right arm.

In the two hours between when he arrived and when Steve tucked him into the marshmallow bed, he'd only asked Bucky one thing.

"Why do you keep running away?" It was quiet. Almost...defeated. He couldn't imagine the idea of Steve being defeated.

"What happened to the privacy you promised me?" Bucky asked in return. Steve fell silent.

He didn't protest when Steve guided him into the bedroom, lifted back the sheets on the bed neither of them had slept in, carefully helped him to get on the bed and lie down. Pulling blankets up to tuck around him, slick and cool against his skin.

Bucky stared up at the ceiling, waiting for Steve to leave. Then the bed beside him compressed and the room fell into dark stillness. He hadn't expected Steve to lie down with him, not after the way he'd treated him. The mission had taken four days. That wasn't fair to Steve. But here he was.

It wasn't easy; Steve jerked in and out of sleep for an hour, the painful jumping kind of shallow sleep that had him startling awake and his heart pounding loud enough for Bucky to hear in the quiet. But eventually he slept. They both did.

When morning broke and the streaming sunlight from the window bathed him into wakefulness, he blinked his eyes open slowly to see Steve still lying beside him, on top of the covers despite the freezing December air. He was on his stomach, head turned towards Bucky and pillow bunched underneath him with both arms wrapped under it, hair tousled and worry lines etched into his sleeping form.

Bucky looked at him and wondered if this was the first time in the twenty-first century Steve had slept on a bed the whole night through. Probably.

What was he doing?

He left a note this time when he left. For Steve's sake. It was brief and nowhere near what Steve deserved, but he wrote it anyways. He debated between writing in perfect cursive or perfunctory caps. Maybe it didn't matter, but he had enough handwriting styles to efficiently adapt anyone's identity and he wondered who that should be for Steve.

Eventually he closed his eyes and wrote it, not thinking too hard, because really it didn't matter. What mattered was that he kept messing up. He kept messing up.
Steve was still asleep by the time Bucky made it down to the curb. He decided to walk because he didn't trust taxi cabs and it wasn't far enough to have to steal a car.

It took him longer than he expected. He wasn't entirely healed from yesterday, it was cold and snowing lightly. But it hadn't been a bad winter, the snow was only a few inches deep at best. Even in the graveyard, when he finally got there, all the tombstones were readable, just a dusting of white over the top.

Like the touch of angels atop all of the dead. It didn't take him long to find the particular angel he was looking for. He'd been enough times. Never on his own.

He knelt on the ground in front of the tombstone, the snow cold against his knees, and pressed his metal hand to her name, careful, tracing the letters half-heartedly before letting his hand fall to the ground.

"I always come to you, you know. You've been gone for a long time now and I can't help but drag my problems to you. I wonder what Steve would say if he knew. Did you ever tell him about our talks? I didn't. How do you tell your best friend that the only person who seems to understand you - besides him - is his mom? He'd have given me that look probably...you know the one.

"Maybe it was because you were a nurse. Maybe I was used to watching you work so hard to save people's lives, I always thought you could save mine. I wish I'd known earlier, I wish you could've been the first to hear it instead of Peggy. I know she's a better friend than I could ever ask for...but you knew how LittleSteve got under my skin better than anyone. You should've dragged the confession out of me when I was still young enough to break away from it. How young would that be? When did I start loving him more than the world?"

He sucked in a breath, rocking forward and placing his forehead on the stone, closing his eyes as he breathed in the cool air, the still eerie quiet of the graveyard.

"I don't know what I'm supposed to do," he whispered. "I didn't prove anything. I didn't learn anything. I killed so many people on the last mission...I don't think Steve realized how much of the blood he was washing off me wasn't mine. I was just trying to be strong...how is that strong? Leaving Steve alone? Isolating myself? I'm only strong at his side and I hate that, you know I hate how much I need him."

His knees were soaked through now and starting to get stiff, which would be dangerous to run on in case anyone found him. He lifted his head, blinking away the tears that were freezing to his bottom lashes, and shifted to sit down on the ground, palm on the earth over where the coffin lay, six feet deeper into the ground. His voice was breaking.

"You're not here to call me James Buchanan and tell me to stop being ridiculous. You're not here to tell. To tell me to look out for your boy. I tried, Sarah, I promise, I tried. But I wasn't good enough. Why aren't I good enough?"

The world went foggy as he breathed out, his lungs coated in ice when he breathed in. But at least he was still breathing.

"What am I supposed to do? I don't know what I'm supposed to do." He laughed bitterly into the cold, metal hand making shapes in the snow around him. He used to be an artist, a long time ago. He wondered what that would be like, to create again, instead of destroy.

"Peggy told me all I have to do is stand at his side. I didn't...it seems so much harder than that. But you...you told me something like that once, too. James Buchanan, don't forget the sunshine needs the rain to make it bright. Don't forget the rain needs the sun to set it right. Did you make up the rhymes you always told me? Steve said he thought they were from Ireland, but I don't know. I think you made them up. But I think you meant them.

"Can I do this? Do you think it's really that easy? All I have to do is be by his side? We used to fight together in the war. Do I join him in battle again, is that how I fix this? I'll do anything to have him again. I think you knew that. I think that's why you let me stick around. You couldn't look out for him all the time, but you knew I would. I'm...I'm so sorry I let him down. I'm so sorry I let him die. I don't know how to resuscitate him now, not anymore. This is too big for me to stitch up. Because it's not him, it's me, I'm the problem and I'm the open gash in his heart and I'm so sorry.

"I lost our boy. I don't...I'm not going to do that again. I promise, Sarah, I promise I'm going to try. I'll give it what I can. I'm just...I'm so scared." His hands ran over his face, wiping away tears before his skin started to freeze. "I can't fight this on my own. We were always better fighting together. You think he'll join my side if I ask? I think he wants me to join his. Maybe we can meet somewhere in the middle...you'd know what to say if you were here, you'd give me some story or some proverb or maybe you'd just scold me and give me half your afternoon tea and ruffle my hair and tell me to stop being ridiculous. You know he needs you James Buchanan. You just have to be as stubborn as he is."

He could do that. He could be as stubborn as Steve was.

Just like the old days.

~~~

Finding them was easy. When Staten Island was being held ransom by crazy people who'd stolen Chitauri weapons (and proceeded to drive themselves insane and half-alien mutant with the things) and Earth's Mightiest Superheros were called in with all of their flashing armor and fancy colors, it wasn't hard to miss.

Besides, Bucky had a track record of not missing. Which is why when he finally level the aims on his sniper scope and shot three alien-people with a single bullet, everyone had a pretty good idea who'd joined the fight.

"Bucky?" Steve asked, although he wouldn't have known that Bucky had hacked into their secure communications line and had wired himself into their conversation.

"I lost our boy. I don't...I'm not going to do that again. I promise, Sarah, I promise I'm going to try. I'll give it what I can. I'm just...I'm so scared." His hands ran over his face, wiping away tears before his skin started to freeze. "I can't fight this on my own. We were always better fighting together. You think he'll join my side if I ask? I think he wants me to join his. Maybe we can meet somewhere in the middle...you'd know what to say if you were here, you'd give me some story or some proverb or maybe you'd just scold me and give me half your afternoon tea and ruffle my hair and tell me to stop being ridiculous. You know he needs you James Buchanan. You just have to be as stubborn as he is."

"What the hell? How did you get in my comm? Jarvis, how is he on the comm? What are you wearing?" Tony's red and gold face managed to look as confused-pissy as his voice sounded, even though the hovering robot was technically expressionless.

"We here to talk about fashion choices, Stark?" he replied dryly, snapping a knife from his thigh and whipping it across the street into the forehead of an alien-person who'd been aiming a Chitauri gun at Tony. The alien-person crumpled and Iron Man looked from Bucky to the dead guy, then back to Bucky, then his robot-filtered voice decided,

"He can stay."

Bucky rolled his eyes because it really wasn't up to Stark, then he grabbed the gun from between his shoulder blades and ducked behind a parked car to fire into the next crowd of lunatics with blue weapons.

A plethora of arrows rained down at the same time his bullets did and Bucky automatically looked up, locating Clint in a third story window. Clint gave a little wave, notched another arrow and sent it flying perfectly without looking, then he was pointing at Bucky and talking into the comm. "What's with the face mask?"

A noise behind him made him spin around, taking out another few with guns aimed his way before turning back to Clint's window.

"If you guys recognized me, the rest of the world might too." Another power-up sound from a gun off to his left, another knife in between the eyes of another alien-person. "And it's badass," he added.

Clint laughed and Tony made a disagreeing humming sound and there was a scoffing noise that sounded like Natasha too. Quickly scanning his surroundings, Bucky hauled himself up on top of a van with his metal arm, pulling his 1911 to start popping off headshots at the crowd that had started to swarm in the street.

What he didn't say was that the mask was his protection. That he'd found comfort in hiding behind masks his entire life. That having something over his face, blocking the world from seeing him, letting him stay anonymous, muzzled, was calming. He needed it. But he'd never say that, not even to Steve.

Instead he'd make up whatever bullshit excuse he needed so he could wear the only thing that had a chance at keeping him safe and in control.

"Besides, Barton, Rules of Battle 101. If you're gonna fight a war, you've gotta wear a uniform."

Giant boots that Bucky knew first hand were not fun to get dropkicked with chose that moment to break into his crowd, metal wings expanded as Sam Wilson landed on top of a whole swarm of bastards, knocking the bunched together ones over like dominos.

"I think I've heard that somewhere," Sam commented, swinging his wings out to knock over another group of domino alien-people.

"Yeah, from me," a breathy voice shot over the radio, then the window of the building behind Bucky was shattering, glass raining down on the street and he had his guns aimed at the hurtling object through the sky before he realized it was red white and blue. And stupid enough to still be jumping out of buildings.

Steve landed with a roll on his shield, using the momentum to swing it powerfully into the crowd in frisbee mode, which always made Bucky want to laugh because they'd played frisbee a few times as kids and Steve had sucked then and now that was basically his weapon of choice. Glorified frisbee-thrower.

"Well hi, Steve," Bucky replied, jumping down off the van. He was expecting some witty banter back, maybe an eyeroll, maybe even the cold shoulder because Bucky had been a dick lately and Steve didn't deserve that.
What he was not expecting was for Steve to grab his shield back and come marching over to him, grabbing him by the arm and dragging him off the street.

"What the--" Bucky started, then Steve cut him off, lifting his wrist to talk over Bucky in the comms.

"You guys got it for a minute?"

"Yeah, Cap. No problem."

Steve lowered his wrist from his mouth and Bucky flicked off his comm, yanking his arm free from Steve's grip now that they were entirely out of the battle, standing in some abandoned street square with a fountain trickling happily behind them.

"What the fuck was that?"

"I was just about to ask you the same question!" Steve shot back. "Why the hell are you here?"

"What does it look like? I'm saving your ass." Bucky crossed his arms over his chest and glared over the top of his mask, which he knew was terrifying for most people, but Steve didn't even flinch. To be fair, Bucky had nearly killed Steve while wearing this mask and he hadn't seem scared then, either.

"You can't just show up here! And in case you forgot, last I saw you you were dripping blood and had gashes covering your entire right side? What in the world makes you think you can fight? I'm not going to let you."

Steve crossed his arms over his chest in response and there they both were, in some random empty marketsquare on Staten Island, a few papers fluttering across the ground, the trickling spray of an unremarkable fountain in the background, arms crossed and eyes narrowed at each other, matching glares in opposite uniforms.

"Let's get something straight, Steve," Bucky spat, leaning forward just enough to be intimidating because Steve did have a few inches on him which was not helping his argument.

"By all means," Steve replied sassily, leaning forward too.

"If we're doing this--" he gestured at the empty street around them but he meant their whole lives, everything, the fighting and the domestic scenes and the sharing an apartment and the trying to fit back into each other's lives and he knew Steve knew that's what he was talking about because this was Steve, they'd lost a lot over the past seventy years but their language of understanding each other was not one of them.

"--it's going to be together. We're equals." They'd proven that over and over again. Bucky was faster, Steve was stronger. They were both hot-headed and stubborn you just have to be as stubborn as he is and fought too hard and leaned on each other too much but so long as Steve actually let him be himself, this might work.

"I don't need a guardian angel and I don't need a caretaker. But I'll take a partner in crime. Or, well, since it's you...Not-crime. Crime fighting."

Steve was just staring at him, perfectly quiet. That helmet was still the wrong color blue to accent his eyes. At least some things never changed.

And here it was, the moment that determined whether they were going to grow up and move past this or if Steve was going to try to keep being his mother, which he did not need, thank you very much. He was the Winter fucking Soldier (he decided he really liked that name, even if he hadn't heard it until a few months ago) and he didn't need a babysitter. Best friend, yeah. Fighting partner, yes. Life partner, he wished.

Finally, finally, Steve's steely gaze melted and he threw up his hands.

"Fine."

"God, it's about time." Bucky threw his head back with an exasperated groan and Steve smacked him in the arm. Steve couldn't see the wide smile behind his mask, but Bucky had a feeling he knew it was there.

"Alright. How about we go kick some ass then, Sergeant?" Steve's mouth curved up in one corner and it was Bucky's turn to smack him.

"Yeah, yeah, you just like to rub it in that you outrank me, don't you?"

"You know it."

They jogged to the scene together, but not without pausing around the corner of the building just out of sight of the rest of the team, giving each other a look they both knew and a reassuring nod. Then Steve was rolling out into the street, shield flying out of his hand again, and Bucky spun around and under the toss, firing perfect shots at the remaining enemies.

Steve vaulted onto the nearest car, catching a smarter alien-person with an uppercut while Bucky rolled under a blue blast and snatched Steve's shield out of the air with his metal hand, spinning around in a circle to behead a few bastards before tossing it back up to Steve who caught it mid air, rolling back down in front of Bucky just in time to save him from another blue blast.

With his body still protected by Steve's, he ducked to the side and fired off three shots into the shooter, then they were both rolling in opposite directions, taking out the guys on either side of them before slamming back together, his back protect by red white and blue, Steve's by Bucky's metal arm and perfect aim.

A sharp appreciative whistle came over the comm as Bucky flipped it back on, using one hand to take down three more idiots in windows. He cringed at the sound and Steve cringed behind him so he must have turned his back on too.

"Power couple of the fucking century." Stark's voice was tinged in awe and Bucky couldn't stop his grin at that because yeah, if Sergeant Barnes and Captain Rogers had been a good team back in the day, that was nothing compared to the skills they had now - combined with the their synced fighting style - as the Winter Soldier and Captain America.

He decided he liked it. Even if they weren't a couple, exactly. So maybe it wasn't the Howling Commandos' affectionate tree-boy and sober-boy, but he figured he could deal. After, of course, pretending to be annoyed and use the excuse to show up Stark's apparently superior fighting skills.

Bucky turned to Steve, cocking an eyebrow over his mask. "C'mon, Stevie. Let's show 'em."

By the time they took out the rest of the crazed alien-people with their beautiful, perfect, synced fighting skills, Steve hadn't stopped smiling and Clint was still laughing somewhere up on the rooftops. Bucky decided to count it as a win.
He woke up with a gasp and sweaty hair sticking to his forehead. A warm hand pushed his hair off his skin, pressing his head down into the pillow. Bucky squeezed his eyes closed and tried to make his heart stop pounding, tried to breathe calmly.

Five minutes later and he at least felt alive again, enough to croak out an apology to Steve. "I'm sorry for wakin' you."

"It's fine. I was already up." Steve was propped up against the headboard, hand tiredly carding through Bucky's hair. He allowed it because he had a feeling Steve needed it more than he did, but he wouldn't let himself lay his head in Steve's lap, wouldn't let himself curl up in Steve's arms because god, that would not fix anything.

Steve shouldn't have been up at one in the morning, but Bucky's brain hurt too much to realize that. He was exhausted, his third nightmare in three days since the battle on Staten Island. Steve thought the nightmares had something to do with getting back in the field. Bucky was just grateful as hell he hadn't had another night terror. He'd take bad dreams over hurting Steve and not remembering it.

"What was it about?" Steve asked, like always. Bucky didn't answer, like always.

Tonight though, apparently Steve didn't feel like putting up with his silence.

"Buck, you know you have to talk about it sometime." His words were just as tired as Bucky felt, but that didn't make him want to listen any more. He shoved Steve's hand out of his hair, rolling on his side to face away from Steve.

Really, he wanted to tuck his nose against Steve's thigh and hold onto his leg and let Steve pet his hair until he fell asleep again, safe with Steve's warmth around him. Everything else was so cold.

"Are you seriously going to do this? I thought we weren't going to shut each other out anymore."

That made him roll back over so he could glare at Steve in the darkness. “I said we were equals, that we fight together. That means you can't coddle me.”

"I'm not trying to coddle you! I just want you to talk to me."

"You said you'd give me space if I needed it. So give me space." He glared harder, but with Steve still looking down at him from the other side of the bed, it felt pretty pointless. So he sat up and swung his legs off the side of the bed. "Actually, you know what, I'm going to go sleep on the couch. Maybe the walls won't pester me with things they promised not to."

Then Bucky stormed out of the room and Steve knocked his head back against the wall and cursed himself.

That was probably the worst thing he had ever agreed to.

He'd always given that space, he'd always let Bucky do his thing. He never wanted to overstep, to be clingy, to need Bucky more than Bucky needed him. But this had gotten ridiculous.

There had been a day in the war, back during one of the months that Bucky had been avoiding him for some strange unknown reason. They'd been in some bar with the Howling Commandos and Steve had been pouting because Bucky hadn't sat by him, and he'd finally finally realized that maybe, he'd been wrong.

Maybe he'd been giving Buck all this space when really, it was the opposite of what he needed. He didn't want to be the one to set off the grenade that blew his best friend into pieces, but he couldn't stand by idle as he ate away at himself anymore, either.

What if Steve just kept making the same mistakes? Backing off and giving space over and over when really, Bucky needed to be held and listened to and chased until he finally got it through his thick skull that Steve wasn't leaving him, ever.

What if all this time, Steve had been wrong?

He spent the rest of the night thinking it over, and the next morning making breakfast too. They ate in stagnant silence, but it wasn't the frustrated tension from the night before. Both of them were sorry and both of them knew without having to say it. But there was something Steve did have to say.

He was done making mistakes.

"Bucky? Can we talk?" Steve asked, rounding the corner of the kitchen counter. Bucky was sitting at the dining room table in the same spot he had that first night, except now with one of Steve's sketchbooks sitting in front of him, open to a blank page, pencil in hand.

There wasn't a mark on the page yet, and by the familiar look of frustration on Bucky's face, there probably wouldn't be for some time. At least he was trying. It was Steve's turn to do the same.

"Yeah, Steve. What's up?" He sat down the pencil, looking a little relieved, and Steve slid into the seat across from him, scooting a mug of tea across the table. Bucky took it with his left hand so he wouldn't burn his right, making an appreciative noise.

"I need you to talk to me. I can't do anything when I don't know anything." Bucky sat the mug back down with that lethal glare in his eyes and Steve held up a hand before he could interrupt and ruin everything. "I know I promised you space. But it's not working. You need to let me in."

"We've talked about this," Bucky said slowly, too calmly, like Steve was the fool here.

"No, we haven't talked, that's the whole problem. I don't care if you think you're protecting me from the horrors of what you've done or whatever. This isn't about me and you know it. This is about you, being scared out of your wits to feel any emotion whatsoever."

The mug slammed this time, matched with a glare that he had to fight very hard not to glare back at.

"Why in the world would I possibly want to feel, Steve?" Bucky waved his hand, looking up at the sky for a few moments before getting a grip on himself and numbing his voice, numbing his whole body like it was some sort of dial he could turn down. "I spent so many years feeling pain in my body, and now you want me to accept pain in my mind too? Do you see why I'm not getting the logic in that?"

Well that explained a lot. See, this was why they talked about things. So Steve could understand things instead of feeling like he was always falling and reaching for Bucky's hand and missing over and over again.

"I know you're hurting, Bucky. I know you have more in your head than anyone could ever deal with." Bucky snorted because they both knew what an understatement that was, but it was the perfect opening for Steve's next line. "Which is why you shouldn't have to carry it alone. I'm here. Can't you let me in?"

Bucky stood up abruptly, chair almost knocking over as he stalked across the room, landing somewhere in the living room, just staring out the window. Steve followed, waiting. Bucky was always passing him by. He was always flying away.
He kept leaving, and it hurt so badly every time. It ripped apart Steve's heart every single time because the moment Bucky came back, Steve let himself hope again. Let himself hope that Bucky would stay, that Steve would be good enough for him, that he could do enough things right that Bucky wouldn't pack up and leave him again.

They used to be each other's home. It used to be that Bucky would come to him, not leave him. It used to be that Bucky would put his hands in Steve's and the world would be right.

He'd been blinded by Bucky's beautiful smile, blinded by the icy eyes, had let himself melt past the point of no return such a long time ago he couldn't remember a time he wasn't hopelessly, deeply in love with James Buchanan Barnes.

But who was he kidding? The good guys don't get the girl. Or the love of their ex-brainwashed assassin best friends. Or anything they want. Which had only ever really been Bucky.

He'd thought he could fix the world, he'd thought he could be strong enough and noble enough to save everyone and maybe save Bucky, but he was just a bright star burning out without the darkness of his sky to protect him, to wrap around him at night.

So he wasn't good enough, he wasn't enough reason for Bucky to stay, but he at least deserved to know why, didn't he?

"I've fought for you my whole life, Bucky. Does that really mean so little that you can't even give me this?"

"Steve," he warned, voice low and unbudging.

But no, Steve was not being ridiculous. This was not a crazy request. He was doing this for them, how could he not see that? Everything that had happened to him was Steve's fault and he was trying to make up for that but Buck wasn't letting him.

He said he needed space. But that was what had gotten them into this whole mess in the first place. It had been too easy just to let Bucky stay quiet, give him what he wanted. But that's why it was Steve's fault.

If he had refused that, if he had forced Bucky to open up to him after Azzano? If he hadn't been so scared of what they'd done to his best friend that he was willing to forget it...if he hadn't let Bucky run away from him, they could have prevented all of it.

If he hadn't given him space, Bucky would have felt safe enough to open up to Steve about the drugs, about his suspicions about Zola's serum. He'd known - Steve knew that now, Bucky had slipped when he told Steve he'd been holding back during races. How much had he held back then? There was no way he hadn't known.

But Steve hadn't pushed and so Bucky had never told him and because of that, Steve didn't know to jump in after him when he fell. He didn't know to look for Bucky's body. He didn't know that Bucky would have survived that. He didn't know that Bucky was struggling so much, that he was trying so hard to hide himself from Steve.

If only Steve hadn't given him so much damn space, they could be somewhere in the 1950s, with Peggy on Steve's arm and maybe some pretty waitress on Bucky's and they could all have real lives and Bucky wouldn't have had to face seventy years of torture, of erasing himself, of nightmares and night terrors and always flying away.

"I'm done making the mistake of letting you run away from me," Steve said quietly. Bucky finally spun around, meeting his gaze with fiery eyes.

"You know nothing about it," Bucky accused. He knew nothing about it.

Right, because he hadn't been the one by Bucky's side for as long as he could goddamn remember.

"I know exactly what you do, Buck. I've studied your every move, my whole life. I know you better than you could ever imagine. And I keep letting you shut me out, I've made that same mistake over and over, but I won't this time."

They were staring at each other now, an unstoppable force meets an immovable object, and Steve was strangely reminded of their first fight, the unexpected fire between them, the grace of that dance. This wasn't dancing, this was brawling, but all he wanted to do was dance again, to hold Bucky in his arms where he belonged.

"I guess I thought, that just maybe, you'd chose me. That you'd chose to stay, that I'd be worth the fight, but I'm not and I get that now, I get that you don't think I'm good enough to help you. And hell, I probably deserve that. But I won't let you destroy yourself in the process of leaving me."

"I'm not--"

"I really believed you wanted it, how crazy is that? I believed that you wanted the life I wanted to give you, I believed that you wanted to be equals, to fight together. But you won't even talk to me."

"I can't!"

"I'm not going to let you do this." Steve shook his head, taking a step closer. "I'm not going to let you down again, Bucky. I'm not going to let you down."

"Let me down?" Bucky shouted, suddenly exploding. He glowered, close enough now that Steve could see the tremble in his hands, clenched tight in fists at his sides, the faintest traces of water at the edges of his eyes. And then came the words that crushed every bone in his body.

"Steve, you didn't let me down. You let me fall."

The room span in slow motion as Bucky brushed past him, a single tear escaping down his cheek, and then his retreating back, then the door slammed shut behind him and Bucky was running down the hallway, trying to run faster than his tears, then he was running down the stairs, every jarred step dislodging another piece of his heart.

It was the only thing he could say to shut Steve up.

It was the only thing he could say that Steve would have no words for.

It was the only thing he could say to keep himself from shouting I love you and that one, that would have been unrepairable.

But what he'd just said might have been unrepairable too.

You let me fall.

Bucky wasn't talking about the train. Steve would never know that.
Chapter End Notes

The sleep disorder warning is for night terrors. If this is a trigger please please be careful.

And a song for our ending: Butterfly by Christina Perri

Also, I know this chapter was super Bucky-centric, but the next one we're really going to open up into the PTSD and downhill depression of Steve Rogers my darling.

Thank you everyone, so much, for reading. Ily all.

AND GUESS WHAT this beautiful human being made an edit of that quote which you can find here and I never stop crying aight

xx
Внимания: панические атаки, пищевые расстройства, краткосрочные суицидальные мысли, утопление, религиозная дискуссия

Если в какой-то момент в этой главе кажется, что Steve и anyone в порядке, ясно, что это не так.

Тони делает смешную виниловую запись для парней (не волнуйтесь, все равно все объяснено) и вы можете найти ее здесь. Также есть ссылка на нее (и конкретные песни) в главе. Если вы увидите подчеркнутые слова, это песни.

Также не забывайте, что Глава 4 была просто главой музыкальной излишка с Howling Commandos Barbershop Septet и даже в этой главе музыки больше. Рассчитывайте. У меня нет жалоб или раскаяний.

Также Нью-Йоркцы забывают, что они Нью-Йоркцы, пока не переедут в другие места.

Смотрите конец главы за более подробной информацией на ссылку.

"Если вы не откроете эту дверь за следующие одиннадцать секунд я разрушу ее и вы заплатите за новую," Натша предупредила, и Стив решил, что он подарит каждому ключ от своей квартиры так он никогда не должен будет покидать диван.

Он даже хотел крикнуть kick it down, но старушка через три двери, вероятно, спит и это было бы неуважительным к ее сну. Он знал, какова ценность сна. Если бы он мог быть неосознанно вечно, он бы это сделал.

"Если вы не откроете эту дверь в следующие одиннадцать секунд я разрушу ее и вы заплатите за новую," Натша предупредила, и Стив решил, что он подарит каждому ключ от своей квартиры так он никогда не должен будет покидать диван.

Он даже хотел крикнуть kick it down, но старушка через три двери, вероятно, спит и это было бы неуважительным к ее сну. Он знал, какова ценность сна. Если бы он мог быть неосознанно вечно, он бы это сделал.
He wasn't sure, really, how he made it to the door, just that there was suddenly a red fireball blazing past him and an empty hallway gaping at him like a mirror of his insides and then a slam and the hallway was gone again and he was staring at a blank door.

"Rogers. Snap out of it." When he swiveled back around Natasha was standing right there, arms crossed over her chest and hair a new color of red, darker. More like the colour of blood. She looked kinda pissed, eyes narrowing to glare him down scarily. "Don't make me use cognitive recalibration on you too."

Being hit in the head didn't sound all that bad.

"He hates me," Steve told her, then it was back to dying slowly on his couch. Except Nat got there first and stood crossly in the way.

"I doubt he hates you."

"He hates me," Steve confirmed, plopping down on the floor. If she wasn't gonna move, fine. Whatever. He didn't care. The floor was just as apt to waste away on. "Do you know what he said?"

He looked mournfully up at her, waiting for the excuse to repeat the words out loud, drive the knife a little deeper in his heart. He deserved it.

"It doesn't matter." Natasha shrugged, giving him a look as she sat down cross-legged in front of him. "He makes you happy when he's around and you're impossible when he's not, so we're gonna fix this."

Impossible. It was kind of her to say; he was a faker. He pretended to keep breathing.

"I don't even know where he is." - in his best, most ludicrous Captain America voice.

An announcement: buy your war bonds, folks! A bullet in your best man's gun.

A bullet in Steve's best man's gun - three, to the gut, but they weren't enough.

"He's with Sam. See, that's got to count for something. He crashed at your best friend's place when you guys got in a fight. Not all hope is lost, Steve."

He didn't have much to say to that, so he looked down at his hands, pressing his palms together and wondering distantly if he was strong enough to break his own wrists like this.

"So the opening-up talk didn't go like you planned?"

He'd messed up plans before. Almost got the Commandos killed for it a few times.

This wasn't that.

"He left, I think it's pretty clear how it went."

For a long time he'd thought Natasha knew everything. But sitting across from him with that easy expression and no worry in her eyes he realized she'd been right when she'd said - I only act like I know everything, Rogers. for a trained assassin, she didn't see inside him very well.

Or maybe this wound had been so deep for so long that no one in the world could see it but him.

"Well, wasn't the whole point of that conversation for you to change things? To chase him? How does he know you meant what you said when you're decaying here in your apartment?"
"I'm not decaying."

Natasha quirked her eyebrow and Steve sighed, his shoulders slumping. Maybe his masks were more transparent than he thought. With every breath he deflated further, until he'd deflate all the way eventually, wring out into the tiny version of himself he used to be.

Bucky hadn't hated that version.

"Why didn't you chase after him?"

"He doesn't want me to!" He spread his arms wide, because Nat was acting like this was just so easy but it wasn't, she hadn't seen the look on Bucky's face.

He'd meant it, when he said Steve let him fall. He'd meant it, Steve was sure, he'd studied Buck his whole life, he knew when he was serious about something and he was serious about that.

"Rogers, you're letting him blind you." This was Bucky. Of course he couldn't see. "If you want to change your ways, you have to show him that. Unless you don't want to be close to him again?"

What makes you happy? Sam had asked him.

I don't know, Steve had replied, his smile the perfectly sculpted combination of contemplative and okay.

He'd wanted to scream instead. How many times had he wanted to scream instead?

"It's not that." It's not anything, it can't be anything. "It's just...he's not done running away, Natasha. I don't know if he physically can stop running. Ever."

"Then chase him. Run with him. God knows you're fast enough."

Nat leaned over to shove his shoulder and Steve let his body rock with the movement, her words sinking in.

Run with him.

God knows. What did God know?

But he was fast enough, wasn't he? After all these years, he finally had the means to keep up. More than keep up. Wasn't he supposed to be the one saving Bucky now? He'd let him down - no, let him fall - before, and he finally had a chance to make it right. He hadn't given up on Bucky in the past. Not after all those hard times during the war, not when they were kids, not when a half-dead amnesia assassin showed up at his door. Was he gonna give up now?

They'd had harder times, hadn't they? It didn't matter. Steve may be impossible but Bucky wasn't. Bucky was everything.

You didn't let me down, Steve. You let me fall.

He knew that. He knew that already and he'd deal with it, eventually, he'd apologize, he'd earn forgiveness, he'd find a way to redemption. Or maybe it'd be the thing to finally take him out. But he couldn't do any of that if he didn't hold to his words, stop making mistakes. Run with Bucky.

I'm done losing you, Steve promised in his head, words echoing around because he couldn't, not again. It'd kill him.

Again.
But this time, he couldn't let that happen. Bucky was here, Bucky needed him. He needed to be with Bucky. He let him fall once - but goddammit, he was catching him this time. He was catching him this time.

God knows.

What makes you happy?

Who the hell is Bucky?

It's still me!

Sergeant James Barnes of the 107th, sir. B-A-R--

He hopped to his feet, kissed Natasha's forehead, and ran skidding to the door. He yanked it open with a shout of thanks over his shoulder then Nat was calling after him and he paused in the doorway, turning around and bouncing on the toes of his feet. He could sprint all the way there right now, he was pretty sure.

"If you're gonna be running, you might wanna pack a bag."

She was standing again, sly smile on her face and Steve groaned, stared up at the ceiling, and came running back into the apartment to pack a bag for both him and Buck. Natasha hopped up on the counter - must be a Russian assassin thing - and amusedly watched him pack.

Then he was running out the door again after a proper goodbye hug and he did end up sprinting all the way there.

He couldn't decide if Sam or Bucky looked more surprised to see him. He came barging through the doors to the floor, panting and hairline damp with sweat. Buck swiveled around on his stool, staring at Steve with wide eyes, and Sam almost spit out his water.

"Steve--" Sam started, and Steve didn't even glance at the immense commodities of his Avengers' tower floor, only strode forward to the counter they were sitting at, walking with the kind of confidence The Winter Soldier did. The world was spinning around him, threatening to tip from lightheadedness, but everything had been floating since Bucky left so it wasn't that surprising. He hadn't eaten since Bucky left and the serum didn't work well with that. It was his own fault. Maybe he was half out of his mind.

"You can't run forever," Steve warned, gaze locked on Bucky's as he sauntered closer. The passive surprise quickly darkened at Steve's words, expression narrowing into that lethal, terrifying glare of the Winter Soldier.

"Watch me," Bucky spat, stiff, like he was itching to grab something sharp. Steve kept his head up, the same stubbornness he'd had as a kid - striding across Buck's folks' place to give him a piece of his mind.

"Fine." He stopped a foot away from Bucky's stool, dumping his overnight bag heavily on the counter in front of him. "I'm coming with you."

Icy eyes shot to the bag, shock rippling down his spine. He could feel Bucky's reactions from all the way over here. And Buck honestly thought Steve didn't know him? Fuck no. He wasn't backing down now.
“What?” Bucky finally managed.

“If you're running, you're taking me with you.” He repeated, crossing his arms over his chest and puffing up a bit to loom over the stubborn expression glaring at him defiantly.

"That's not how this works," he hissed, metal fingers tightening agitatedly at his side. Steve took note of it and straightened himself a little taller, settling his stance into the most solid Captain America mode he had.

Buck should know by now. Steve just didn't know how to stay down.

“Yeah, well, that's how it works this time.” He narrowed his eyes, daring Bucky to protest again. He looked positively stunned, gaze flicking between Steve's bag and his face.

Eventually he sagged in his chair, running exhausted fingers through his hair and muttering something under his breath about punk kids these days thinking they can get what they want because they're national icons or whatever.

Steve fought back a grin. The lightheadedness hadn't settled, but he just won round one. Now they were onto the real battle- and he could do this. They were finally getting somewhere. Finally.

"So? Are we going or not?"

~*~

Grab your bag and grab your coat, tell the ones that need to know. We, are headed--

"Yes, I have a car you can borrow. But you can't go road tripping in the winter, it breaks the first rule of road tripping. You know, windows down, wind in your hair?" Tony made a face at them and Steve glanced at Bucky, who cocked an eyebrow in return.

Stark waved his hand around, giving them the how incompetent are you that defaulted as his usual expression most days. "It's December, and it's freezing."

"We've both had colder," Steve deadpanned casually, plastering on a stage smile and waiting for the horror to sink into Tony's eyes.

His expression did not disappoint.

"You two are twisted," he muttered, pulling open a drawer to grab keys. "And terrifying," he added under his breath.

They both heard him and Bucky shot Steve a sly grin that he couldn't help but return.

"Here, Rogers, go pick out one of the Classics. Jarvis will show you where they are. You can't go roadtripping in a plastic car." Steve caught the four pairs of keys Stark tossed his way, scooping up both their duffels and giving Bucky another cautious smile before starting for the elevator.

"Okay Barnes, the other rule to roadtripping? Music," Tony's fading voice explained behind him. "I've got a box of Classic Rock cassette tapes that'll work in the car, or you can take an iPod and an aux cord. None of my vintage cars have an AI system..."

Load the car and write the note.

Ten minutes later and Steve was waiting in Stark's enormous garage, leaning against a cherry red '69 Chevelle with white stripes running down the hood.
Bucky let out a low whistle that was more for the man than the car, but Steve would never have to know. He just had to shove his feelings into the darkest corner of his brain and force himself to be by Steve's side as always.

Maybe the trip was a bad idea. Or maybe it was the perfect opportunity to prove to himself that he could be alone with Steve for however long without jumping his bones or dying in agonizing pain.

That pain in his chest that he'd thought was a performance error when he couldn't remember why he was feeling it. The pain in his chest that as a teen, he'd summed up to hormones and residual possessiveness and worry. The pain in his chest that he hadn't realized the gravity of until Peggy Carter showed up at that bar in that curvy red dress and kicked Bucky's ass nine ways to invisible Sunday.

But that was years past. Even for Steve, it was two years ago. And for him? Two years plus seventy. He could get over it. He could go on a road trip with his best friend and behave himself and sort out (aka squash down) those feelings once and for all.

"You ready?" Steve straightened up and ran a hand over his wild, spiky blonde hair, looking like the epitome of America's boy with his tight white t-shirt and faded jeans and blue blue eyes and wide bright smile and shiny red car propping up his perfect ass.

Bucky did not sign up for this.

"As I'll ever be," he sighed. Then he held out the box in his hand, exchanging it for the keys in Steve's. "And I'm driving."

Steve - surprisingly, for once - didn't protest, just nodded slightly and reached behind him to pry open the red shotgun door, somehow fit those broad shoulders inside the tiny space.

"Did you grab a coat?" Bucky pinned those pretty eyes through the windshield with a look as he started around the front of the car, ducking inside his open door too. Wow, there was a surprisingly large amount of space in here, a lot more than modern cars. That was nice for a change.

"You're worse than Sarah," Steve complained, door slamming behind him as red lips turned down in a pout. "Yes, I grabbed two coats. You're welcome."

"One of us has gotta be responsible," he pointed out, sliding the key in the old-fashioned slot.

"And you think that's you?" Box plopped down at his feet and Steve gave him the most incredulous look Bucky quirked one corner of his mouth to.

"Always has been." Quick flick of his wrist and the engine was rumbling before Steve could shoot back whatever half-assed retort he had and so maybe he was smiling a little in victory as Steve rolled his eyes and settled in his seat, leaning against the door as the shiny vintage peeled outta its lot, wheels spinning as they started for the sunlight.

Maybe this wasn't too bad of an idea after all.

~~~

They took the first highway west out of New York.

It all went to hell from there.

"Steve Rogers, I think you've finally managed to surprise me." Steve looked up from where he'd curled into the seat, counting down the numbers to their exit. Bucky cocked an eyebrow and tilted his head to indicate Steve's legs. "Putting your feet on the dash. What would Tony think?"

"Why do you think I'm doing it?" Steve asked, popping a goldfish in his mouth and sinking further in the seat, crossing his ankles and kicking his feet up higher.

Bucky laughed - kind of - and shook his head like Steve was out of his mind, turning back to the road. He wasn't sitting nearly as comfortably as Steve was, perfectly straight with the seat not even touching his back. Maybe he'd loosen up from the efficiency after a bit. They were still in a pretty congested area, but it took a while before the real roads; before the skyscrapers and the K-Marts and the Subways disappeared into the rearview and the two-lane blacktop turned into the stairway to heaven.

"There anything in that box of Stark's?"

Steve finished chewing his goldfish and stretched out an arm to grab the box from under the seat. The nice thing about the vintage cars was all the room. It fit two supersoldiers easily, even left space for Steve to put his feet up.

He pried off the lid of the shoebox, tossing it into the backseat and picking up the piece of paper on top of the box contents. "A letter from Tony. Great, I'm sure this is all kinds of sarcastic asshole."

"He's not that bad," Bucky argued lightly, glancing over his shoulder to check his blindspot before changing lanes. Steve gave a noncommittal hum in response and started reading the note to himself. "Summary?" Bucky asked when Steve sighed and folded the paper back up.

"Basically there are rules to roadtripping? It all seems kind of pretentious but here-" Steve fished through the box and found the two pairs of aviator sunglasses Tony had left them, handing a pair to Bucky. "Sunglasses, road food, loud music. He made a few mixtapes, and then he left this-" Steve held up a white envelope, "-mysterious package with my initials spelled wrong. Said you'd know what to do with it."

"Howard's kid got your initials wrong?"

"Yeah. It says SGT, and I can't even figure out what stupid reference that's supposed to be."

"Actually, that stands for Sergeant, so I'm gonna guess the envelope's for me."

Steve stared at the letters for a moment, feeling about nine kinds of stupid. Bucky glanced over at his face, then at the envelope, then back at Steve. And promptly started laughing - the real kind, this time.

It took every ounce of strength not to smile like a fool at the sound of Bucky's laugh so Steve pouted instead, mumbling something about having an excuse, he was blonde and ninety five, this wasn't his fault.

Finally the laughter died back down and Bucky tilted his head, looking at the envelope again. "What's in it?"

He slit it open, dumping out the contents into his lap. Which was a single plastic card with a post-it note on it. "J.B.B," Steve read aloud. "I left you a credit card because Rogers is old and doesn't - okay, rude - know how to do anything in the twenty-first century. And don't be honorable with it either, you grew up in the dirty thirties and deserve to spoil yourselves sometimes. Stay in the nicest hotel you can find, do whatever you want - it's on me."
"I told you he's not that bad," Bucky said smugly, snatching the card from Steve. Steve rolled his eyes because he did know how to use a credit card, he just didn't. Often, anyways. He didn't need material items, the twenty-first century was overwhelming and material-obsessed, there was nothing wrong with him.

"Stop pouting," Bucky chided. "And hold the steering wheel so I can put my hair up."

Steve reached over, almost falling in Bucky's lap from the off-balance of his feet still on the dash. He managed not to crash as Bucky wrapped a ponytail into his hair, totally missing two or three single strands around his face, then he shoved Steve back to his side of the car and took the wheel again.

"Anything else in our mystery box?" Bucky's eyes were on the road again, which meant that Steve was staring at him, taking in the sight of his best friend with a messy ponytail, pieces of hair falling out like some kind of sex god. It should make him look like a dame because he'd never seen a guy with a ponytail in the 1940s, but it didn't make Bucky look anything short of exotically beautiful. He could just imagine yanking Bucky's head back by that ponytail, icy blue eyes looking up at him with Steve's hand tight in his hair--

"What? Oh, uh. Sorry. Right, the box..." He was bright red as he cut his eyes away from Bucky, thankful as hell for the aviators he'd slipped on because they'd at least hide the humiliation in his eyes. And the wandering gaze. God. "Um. There are a lot of cassette tapes."

Thumbing through them and glancing over unfamiliar band titles and album names, it was pretty clear they were all made between 1970 and 1989. Nothing really jumped out until he got to the bottom of the box, where one of the cassette tapes had a neon yellow post-it note on the side. He peeled it off, holding it closer to his face so he could read it through the dim light of his sunglasses.

Cap - if you're looking for "shared experiences," the answer's closer than you think.

He read it a few times, trying to figure out what the hell it was supposed to mean and drawing up blank. Until he read the sharpie letters sketched in caps on the side of the mixtape. Popsicle Boyfriends Roadtrip Mixtape.

He was gonna kill Tony Stark.

Really, he should have thrown the thing back in the box. Maybe out the window. Instead he stuck his tongue in his cheek and studied it, turning it over a few times and thinking it over. Tony thought he knew everything about them, had heard stories since he was a kid. But if he thought they were - or could be - dating? It would at least prove his suspicions about Stark were right: all hot air and no real observation. The tape was probably a ton of ridiculous cheesy love songs that didn't fit them at all. Right? This was Tony.

"So...Tony made us a mixtape. Wanna see how well he doesn't know us?" Steve offered, already pushing the tape in the the player. Bucky cocked an eyebrow and made a why not sound, switching the wheel to his left hand so he could turn up the volume dial.

When the first simple piano notes came over the car stereo, Steve should have guessed. When the annoying rock he'd been expecting had violins and sounds of thunder echoing softly in the background, he should have known. When the first drums hit and put the touching 'power' behind the word power ballad, he should have realized.

And when the first lyrics came over the speaker, he should have ejected the damn thing right then.
When I look into your eyes, I see a love restrained. But darlin' when I hold you, don't you know I feel the same?

Instead, he kept on looking at the center console expectantly, popping another goldfish in his mouth and listening to the lyrics with the most dispassionate expression he could muster. Simply listening with vague curiosity and absolutely not thinking about how this tape was made for his non-relationship with Bucky.

And how devastatingly well the first song was seeming to fit so far. 'Cause nothin' lasts forever and we both know hearts can change...We've been through this such a long long time, just tryin' to kill the pain.

Neither of them said anything, listening to the vaguely whiny rockband voice drift over the speakers, loud guitar hits and beautiful ooh'ing harmonies in the background. Then the lead singer crooned If we could take the time to lay it on the line, I could rest my head just knowin' that you were mine, and Steve shifted uncomfortably in his seat.

It had to be a coincidence that this was even remotely similar to them, right? Obviously. Steve was associating his feelings with some generic love song because that's how love songs were.

Everybody needs some time on their own. Don't you know you need some time all alone? The radio sang and Steve glared at it because yeah, Bucky had been thinking that for the past month and no, they didn't need anymore time alone. I know it's hard to keep an open heart, when even friends seem out to harm you...

"Stark picked this?" Bucky finally asked, the first thing he'd said since the song started. Steve made a face at the stereo and shifted in his seat again so he could tilt his head and look out the window.

"Yeah. He did."

So never mind the darkness, we still can find a way. 'Cause nothin' lasts forever, even cold November rain.

And then the song dropped and got all alternative-sounding (yes, he could name different genres of music, he'd been awake for three-quarters of a year) and Bucky seemed to perk up, listening intently with his head cocked to the side.

Then the music faded out into soft sounds of rain and a fading high note and that had been really weird. Like, creepy, in a way. Or maybe he was reading too much into it. It was a generic love song, after all. Tony had made a whole tape, there was no way the next one would be spot on like that.

It was.

But, thankfully, it wasn't heartbreaking. Actually, it was kind of hilarious, and the sad rain-song had disappeared to the back of Steve's mind with loud, repetitive guitar licks. And because it was super catchy and they both had enhanced memories, they were singing along loudly by the time they hit the second chorus of hit me with your best shot's.

When the girl on the speaker sung something about you don't fight fair, Steve reached over and nudged Bucky's shoulder, then they were both cracking up. The giggling hadn't subsided by the next fire away, which Steve may or may not have shouted way too loudly and left Bucky torn with trying to breathe between gasps of laughter and apologizing profusely for shooting Steve on the helicarrier.

Which had apparently slipped his mind until now, too busy burying a hundred memories surrounding the moment. But between the laughter and hilarious, gasping oh my god I'm so sorry's, all of the... tension that Steve hadn't realized was residing between them slipped away, left in the rearview somewhere halfway across Pennsylvania.

He was gonna leave it all in the rearview. They were going on a trip across the US; for once he didn't have to be anybody but Steve Rogers. And maybe, if they turned the music up loud enough and drove down roads empty enough, he could forget all about the look on Bucky's face when he shouted you made me fall.

Bucky was burying things, surviving. He could do it too. Steve had become far too talented at silent weeping.

~~~

First stop was a rest stop a few miles from the Ohio border. Bucky parked the car and shut the engine while Steve unfolded himself from the seat, stepping onto solid ground and stretching his arms over his head. The air was crisp and smelled like impending winter, breath fogging slightly in front of his lips.

He shut his car door with his knee and stretched his arms a little higher, closing his eyes against the sun and feeling his body wake back up as he distractedly finished humming along to the last few bars of Heaven isn't too far away...

Oh, yeah. Turned out he was wrong. Tony Stark knew them way too well.

Or, Steve at least, anyways. It was disconcerting.

Bucky had laughed his ass off to I Remember You, but Steve had not been amused. Especially considering that the lyric right before that was Remember yesterday, walking hand in hand. Love letters in the sands - I remember you. And through the sleepless nights, through every endless day, I wanna hear you say, "I remember you."

So they held hands sometimes. So sleepless nights were a thing. He could blow that off to lyrical luck, if it weren't for the rest of the song consisting of Paint a picture of the days gone by...I'd stare a lifetime into your eyes, time after time you were there for me.

Maybe Tony was simply reading more into it than there was, romanticizing things like Steve's art and the way he used to draw Bucky, the way they'd grown up together.

Then Skid Row sang we've had our share of hard times, but that's the price we paid. And through it all we kept the promise that we made: I swear you'll never be lonely.

And Steve decided, at that point, that Tony Stark either had mind-reading powers, or he'd scientifically found a way to look into Steve's heart and found it was the color of Bucky Barnes's soul.

Basically, the whole mixtape turned out to be a waving flag of Hey! I know Steve Rogers' deepest secret! He's in love with his best friend!

He was gonna strangle Tony. Like, the second they got back. And he felt zero guilt for putting his feet on the dash. Absolutely zero. Asshole deserved a lot worse than bootprints on his car.

But it wasn't like he could freak out and insist they don't listen to the tape. Because then it would give away exactly how close to home the lyrics were hitting. Although by the way Bucky was occasionally shooting surprised looks at the cassette player, maybe some of the lyrics were sticking with him too.
"You comin'?" A choked voice asked from the sidewalk and Steve turned his head, catching Bucky's quickly averted eyes and clearly uncomfortable shifting. He'd ask what was wrong, but he had a feeling nothing good would come of it. Instead he just brought his arms back down to his sides, pulling his shirt back down from where it'd ridden up to make his stomach cold.

He fell into step alongside Bucky on the way to the angular brown building, taking a moment to breathe in the fresh air. It was absolutely beautiful out here, wind whistling softly and ruffling his hair.

"You look like a hardcore biker," Steve commented, nudging Bucky with his shoulder. Between the aviators, Steve's brown leather jacket, and the long hair shoved messily into a ponytail, he could definitely see Buck on a low-riding Harley, something a hell of a lot less pristine than his bike.

"You look like America's boytoy," Bucky shot back dryly, shoving Steve back except way harder, making him stumble to the side indignantly.

"I'm nobody's boytoy!"

"Whatever you tell yourself to sleep at night," Bucky said with a lifted eyebrow, holding open the door for Steve. He walked through without meeting Bucky's eyes because actually, he didn't sleep at night.

Hadn't once, not since Bucky had told him--

"I'm gonna find a map," Steve declared, interrupting his own thoughts and putting some space between him and the devastating man at his side. Buck nodded quizzically and took off for the bathrooms.

There were a hell of a lot of pamphlets and maps and tourists guides and Steve glanced over them all before deciding on the simplest fold-out map he could find. He was standing in the lobby by the doorway and holding the map out wide in front of him, swiveling his outstretched arms to find North, when suddenly there was a hand on his lower back, making him jump.

Steve whipped his head around, startled, and nearly smacked Bucky's nose. "Wha-" he started, then the hand on his lower back was shoving him forward none too gently, basically pushing him through the doorway.

"What weapons do you have on you?" Bucky asked, low and close to his ear and Steve's brain was short-circuiting from the hand pressed on his lower back, let alone the gravely words pressed to his ear, how was he supposed to be thinking about weapons.

Wait, weapons, that was never a good sign with this Bucky. Well, the only Bucky, but the one who'd spent the past seventy years killing people.

"Buck? What's going on?" Steve tried to twist around to face him but Bucky kept guiding him forward, basically pressed up against Steve's back. The touch was almost...possessive.

"Have you not noticed all the jumpsuits?" Bucky hissed and Steve looked around at the other people mingling at the stop. He'd noticed when the wave of orange arrived, but he hadn't really thought about it.

"Yeah, so?"
"So that bus belongs to the county jail and there are a swarm of convicts here, two of which were discussing their recent sighting of Captain America over the bathroom sinks."

"Bucky." Steve stopped in the middle of the parking lot, which was not easy because Bucky was strong, pushing him hard towards the car. He made a frustrated noise as Steve dug his heels in, but Steve just glared harder over his shoulder. "Look, I can take care of myself, okay? I don't need you going all Winter Soldier on some harmless inmates."

He crossed his arms and lowered his gaze, because this was serious. He couldn't have Bucky turning into a killer at the first sight of possible danger.

The hand on his lower back instantly disappeared and the clear icy eyes clouded over with a sharp intensity. "I was protecting you long before Zola, Steve. He didn't instill this -" a sharp gesture of glinting metal "-in me. It was always there."

"That's different, you didn't get violent-"

"Spring 1938."

"...what?"

"I found you in an alley with four boys trying to kick you to death. You weren't breathing. I nearly killed them Steve, and that's not an exaggeration. Was probably one punch away for two of them and the other two I know were hospitalized. You never saw, I made sure you never saw, just carried you home and told you they'd left by the time I got there."

"Buck," Steve whispered, because he'd never known, he'd had no idea Bucky had felt that strongly. He had no idea he'd ever pushed Buck to that...

"And it scared me, the rage I had, the things I'd do for you? Are you telling me you don't remember me destroying that Nazi who'd almost shot you on that electric-fence mission? And that was just the one you saw, Steve. He wasn't the first, he sure as hell wasn't the last."

He couldn't speak. How was he supposed to respond to that?

"If you don't start being more cautious with your own damn life, I'm gonna keep dragging you out of danger. No matter the cost. That's not a threat, it's a promise." Bucky stalked to the driver's side of the car, yanking open the metal door and slamming it behind him heavily.

The only reason he managed to move, to pick up his feet and duck back into the car, was because he was pretty sure Bucky would pull away and leave him here if he didn't.

Neither of them said anything for the rest of Ohio. Steve didn't put his feet up on the dash or turn Tony's tape back on. He leaned his head on the window and stared at the landscape whipping past and ran Bucky's words over in his mind over and over.

He had no idea what was going on in that pretty head, did he?

~~~

One foot in and one foot back.

The silence broke when they stopped to get food, with a hesitant "Do you want anything?" from Steve and a terse "No," from Bucky. Steve didn't open his door, just sat and stared at the dash for a few moments. Bucky hadn't moved either, both of them frozen in fighting mode.
But Steve was more stubborn.

Finally Bucky sighed, tipping his head back against the seat. "I'll take something that's not cooked. And no crackers or bread--"

He had to lean over to shout the end because Steve was already climbing out of the car with a victorious fist pump. The ice between them broken again, Bucky ran his fingers through his hair - forgetting he was wearing a ponytail and dislodging most of it - and muttered another grievance about Steve and his stubborn star-spangled ways.

When he got back with food, Bucky took his mango sorbet with minimal complaint and only eyed everything else Steve had brought him, so he settled back into shotgun happily with his own meal.

With the air between them lighter now, they could forget about the conversation earlier. But if they were fixing things, moving forward and running together like this trip was all about?

"I'm sorry," Steve said abruptly, putting his sandwich down. He got a confused look in return so he shifted in his seat, torso facing Buck. "I think sometimes I keep expecting you to be like you were when we were kids - or how I thought you were - and not like the way you were during the war. After Azzano, when we were fighting and hurting all the time... Cause that was basically this."

He gestured up and down with wide hands and the tiniest of smiles quirked up the side of Bucky's mouth.

"You remember me being this bitchy in the forties?"

"Absolutely," Steve confirmed. It wasn't a lie, the silence and the weird outbursts and the shaking moments and the over-protectiveness, that had been Bucky for the past two years. On his timeline, anyway.

Shaking his head with a real smile on his face, Buck reached over and turned the stereo back on.

It don't pay to live like that.

~~~

Despite Steve's occasional protests, Bucky drove the whole night through. Steve dozed fitfully against the passenger window, texted Natasha that he was still alive, and tried not to think about how freezing he was and how dark the night was outside.

He was in one of his half-dazed but mostly-awake periods when the bottom edges of the sky begin to lighten, a warning streak of pink against dark black stars above. They were somewhere in Illinois or Indiana, couldn't remember passing which sign; but both sides of the road were covered in fields, so it didn't matter much anyways.

It was the middle of nowhere, flat and nothingness for as far as the eye can see, and Steve blinked tiredly, deciding he'd never seen anything like it. Not in Europe in the war, not on the USO tour, definitely not in New York.

The tires of the car hit dirt and all residual tiredness flew out of him as Steve snapped up, reaching for the wheel automatically, assuming Bucky either fell asleep or lost his mind or wasn't paying attention or something, only then the car was parked and Bucky was climbing out and it was way too early for this, he was sleep-deprived and befuddled and groggy.

"Stevie, you comin'?" Bucky hollered from outside the car and Steve pried open his door, composing himself before he fell onto the soft dirt. It was squishy under his boots, like the whole world wanted him to sink, swallow him up so he could sleep forever and forget about the ache in his bones.

But the wind was crisp enough to whip him awake and he held onto the side of the car for a moment, rubbing a hand down his face and dragging his mind into reality, turning his gaze on their surroundings and letting the usual keen observations take over.

It was empty, flat, but somehow kind of beautiful. Like the world stretched on forever, like they could be the only two in it and it wouldn't matter. The whole earth might as well be theirs. The air was cooler than he'd like, peetering sounds of morning crickets sharpening the picture into one of those movie scenes, where the young couple dances in the fields to the morning light and falls asleep laughing at the clouds.

It almost didn't feel real, like places like this didn't quite exist, only Bucky was looking at him expectantly from his spot propped on the hood of the car, waiting for Steve to stop his mini meltdown and come sit down on the hard, cold metal. He did, floated over and thanked the durability of old metal cars, and scooted up on the hood beside Bucky.

Those icy blue eyes were staring at him, concerned, so Steve leaned back on the windshield and stared at the sky. The stars were fading, blinking out of sight as the beautiful dark blanket of the sky shifted into lighter, vibrant colours that felt too impossible to be real. Sunrise, he should be watching the horizon, but all he wanted to do was keep those fading stars from blinking out entirely. It was hard, he knew, to stay lit up bright in a sky that didn't want you anymore.

Five minutes later he was passed out in the first real sleep he'd had since Bucky had severed his heart.

Bucky'd be stupid not to see that Steve wasn't okay, that the chipper smile was trying but fake, that he kept glancing at Bucky like he'd disappear. That he was tired, but wouldn't let himself fall asleep for whatever fear that Bucky might not be around when he woke up. It wasn't until he'd pulled over to watch the sunrise which wasn't necessarily romantic, friends could watch the sunrise together, right? that the pretty blue eyes finally gave up and slipped asleep.

It was his fault, he knew that. He knew Steve would take it hard, what he'd said.

And he hadn't exactly been making it easier since. Bucky sighed, glancing at the precious sleeping boy with his head tilted towards the sky. Yeah, Bucky needed to run, but Steve needed to rest, he needed to find some way to heal. It had always been his job to take care of Stevie, but he'd done nothing except make his life harder since he came back.

It was still him. It was still them. This was still the little kid he'd grown up elbowing and holding innocent hands with. If he disregarded efficiency for a few days - he'd still be cautious - they might not get killed. They'd covered enough ground that any Hydra cells following them were probably at least 24 hours behind. If they'd even been followed. So, he'd drive some more, and then when Steve woke up they'd take 24 hours to not care about running or safety or efficiency. They were coming up on Chicago, he was pretty sure there was an art museum?

Bucky snagged a blanket from the back, silently wrapped Steve's sleeping, shivering body up, and transferred him to the backseat, laying him down carefully with Bucky's hoodie tucked under his head. There was a soft smile on his lips now, tiny and honest and he was so far gone he didn't feel the soft kiss pressed to his forehead, the shaky breath before Bucky closed the back door and started the engine, racing the morning sun to Chicago.

~~~
He was sold the moment he saw the huge stone lion up front. Actually, he was sold the moment Bucky casually mentioned the idea of seeing an art museum. Steve'd had no idea he'd meant the Art Institute of Chicago.

So yeah, maybe he was a little overeager. Bucky's words were "basically jumping up and down" but Steve was pretty sure that was an exaggeration. He was just...bouncing on his toes a little.

"Are you sure? You don't think you'll be bored?" Steve asked for the hundredth time as they started up the beautiful white steps in front of the building. The car was parked in a garage around the block and the whole walk over here he'd been worried Bucky didn't really want to do this - museums had tight security, there would be tons of cameras, it was super public - but Bucky kept insisting he wanted to go, eyes flicking to Steve every few seconds.

"C'mon, Steve. I went to art school, too. Just because I'm in the twenty-first century doesn't mean I've lost all my culture." Steve made a humming noise, distracted by the swirling architecture gracing the top of the huge white arches. It was stunningly beautiful, like some of the European architecture they'd seen in the war, except now they had the time to appreciate it. "Besides, I dragged you off to science exhibits, I'm not complaining about you finally getting your turn."

In a fit of irrational excitement Steve reached over and squeezed Bucky's wrist, his entire face lit up and glowing, eyes crinkling with happiness. Bucky's expression softened as he looked Steve over. "Thanks, Buck. Really, I haven't gotten the chance to do anything like this since I woke up."

Bucky rolled his eyes but Steve didn't miss the curve at the corner of his mouth. "Rogers, it's just a museum. You can gush after we see the art."

If he could, he'd kiss Bucky on the cheek right now, just an appreciative, cute, chaste thing. But he couldn't, so he bounced a little and dragged Bucky up the rest of the steps, fingers still closed over his wrist. He hadn't been shaken off yet, and if it got weird he could excuse it to his childish excitement.

"Wait, wait." Steve paused again as they reached the doors, tugging Bucky over to the side. He hadn't even thought about it until a few seconds ago, seeing the guards at the door and the big gray arch on the inside. "What about your arm? The metal detector--"

"I got into the Smithsonian, I think I can figure out an art museum. Just...you go first, I'll meet you in the French Renaissance section, okay?"

"I'm not gonna leave you here. Why in the world would you want me gone when you get in?" He was legitimately concerned about this, but the expression on Bucky's face was only increasingly more amused.

"Trade secret. No point in being a super epic assassin if people know how you do shit."

"I'm not people," Steve pointed out.

"You're not," Bucky agreed. But he didn't let up, twisting his wrist out of Steve's grasp and pushing him towards the huge glass doors. "Meet me inside, okay? I'll be fine. Promise."

Because he was being absolutely forced into this and it had nothing to do with Bucky having a smile on his face or them finally going to an art museum, Steve relented and absolutely did not bound inside like a puppy, no matter what stories Bucky told about it later.

The art was beautiful. It was everything Steve had ever dreamed of, better, more surreal than he could've imagined.
He was standing in front of A Sunday Afternoon on the Island of La Grande Jette when Bucky appeared next to him, looking considerably tourist-y with his sunglasses on his head holding back his long hair and Steve's bomber jacket folded over his arm.

"It's about prostitutes, you know," Bucky said. Steve snorted and glanced back at the dotwork.

"How d'you know?"

"I paid attention more than you think," he replied haughtily and Steve smiled, taking a step closer to the painting. He had a feeling it was more because Bucky wouldn't forget something like a famous piece of art being about prostitutes, but he wasn't gonna say anything.

"It's amazing, that these are all little dots. When you get close enough they don't even mean anything, just a blur, but the big picture? It's beautiful." His voice sounded cheesily awed even to his own ears, but they'd studied this piece when they were kids and now it was here, big and real and beautiful, the original version a foot away from him.

Bucky was probably rolling his eyes at Steve's awe, but that didn't stop him from prodding Steve and pointing at the painting too.

"The lady has a pet monkey. Can I have a pet monkey?"

"No," Steve declared, taking Bucky by the elbow and leading him down the hallway he'd just come from; he had a lot to say about this painting he'd seen, something about a gothic farmer with a pitchfork? He was pretty sure Buck would have some opinions on it.

"You're no fun," Bucky complained.

"I'm the funnest," Steve corrected. A gaggle of teenagers passing them started giggling and whispering to themselves and Bucky was pretty sure that *Captain America said 'funnest' was gonna be trending on some social media site within the next half-hour."

As if the museum wasn't wonderful on its own, there was a special exhibit called The City Lost and Found: Capturing New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles, 1960–1980. They wandered with wide eyes through the photographic and cinematic pieces detailing streets, pedestrian life, neighborhoods, and seminal urban events. Both of them were left staring at the timeline, the creation of a complex, realistic image of New York; filling in the of gaps of how much had changed since the 1940s.

"It's a shame cameras were so damn expensive back then, or I'd taken about a thousand pictures of Brooklyn. And you, for proof of how damn tiny and stubborn you were." Bucky nudged him with his shoulder and Steve shook his head in fake exasperation.

"The only photo the world has of tiny you is from that military base," Bucky pouted, making a face at the memory. "And you weren't even looking at the camera. Although I wasn't looking at the camera in my military photo either..."

"Yeah, but I have about a thousand drawings of you from the time you were like, six, so pretty sure you've been documented just fine," Steve replied without thinking, too distracted by a unique shot of Harlem to realize what he'd just said.

Until Bucky's eyebrows arched in curiosity and Steve caught the look, replaying his words over in his head. Shit.

"I didn't know you drew me that much." He sounded too surprised to be cocky about it and Steve was glad because yeah, he'd drawn Bucky an embarrassing number of times. Most of the time?
There wasn't a year that hadn't been documented on some scrap piece of paper somewhere.

"I..." Steve started, before realizing he didn't have an excuse that made an inkling of sense. "I didn't have much else to draw?"

Not true, and they both knew it. But Bucky only cocked his head, chewing his lip for a moment. "You want to go check out the sculptures? Apparently they're pretty famous for them."

And just like that the slip was forgotten, Bucky's metal fingers closed over his wrist to drag him past another teenage-sized crowd and the brightness of their twin smiles lit up again as Bucky pointed at one of the small bowls and declared it looked exactly like that one they'd had in their first apartment (before Steve had tripped and broken it).

Then they were laughing and everything was perfect again.

It was beautiful, the whole museum was beautiful, and Bucky even insisted that they eat at the museum's little family bar, scooped wooden stools and crowded chatter around them. And between the ice cream they split with too-long red spoons and the incredible atmosphere, Steve could almost pretend he didn't see the way Bucky kept stiffly scanning the crowds for threats. He was being considerably more rational about it than Steve thought he'd be though. They were in one of the biggest tourist attractions in the country and Buck was managing to keep a running dialogue over ice cream and keep his hands from straying to weapons as he looked over the room.

The whole day was amazing.

They walked the brightly-lit evening streets of Chicago after the museum, shoulders bumping and lingering smiles as they watched people interact, the city come to life once the sun set. Music tumbled out of bars onto the sidewalks, families rushed by, college kids in clumps. They both blushed and avoided each other's eyes as they passed a blonde and a brunette boy holding hands and kissing.

Before they left Chicago, Steve insisted on stopping for pizza. Bucky rolled his eyes a lot and called Steve lots of immature things but Steve shoved his metal shoulder and ordered the deepest Chicago style crust available.

"You know New York crust is the best in the world, why do you bother?" Bucky propped his chin in his hand, looking positively adorable as he raised his eyes at Steve from the other side of the booth.

"Because we've never even had Chicago style! How can you know if you don't try?" Steve used his tongue to capture the straw poking out of the top of his glass, sucking up cold water before straightening back up, tilting his head at Bucky's amused expression. "You are gonna try it, right? Just a few bites?"

Bucky sighed with that look on his face that meant he would shrug if he did that anymore, but when the waitress brought them the thick, steaming pizza he let Steve cut him a slice and slide a plate across the sticky table.

"How are you supposed to eat it? It's too thick to fold in half." He complained, lifting the slice with an overwhelmed look. The waitress glanced between them and pursed her lips.

"New Yorkers?" She guessed. Steve nudged Bucky with his foot and gave the dame an apologetic shrug and hopefully charming smile.

She shook her head with a smile of her own and turned away with a promise to return with more "Do people not fold their pizza in half outside New York?" He wondered aloud, picking up his own piece. Bucky was still glaring distrustfully at his, but his gaze cut to Steve when he spoke.

"I don't know, but I'm sure the waitress would be happy to tell you, giving her the Captain America smile and everything." The words were bitter and Steve had to fight back a laugh, taking a bite of his thick pizza instead.

Neither of them hated it, but Bucky insisted vehemently that New York style was way better. Which could hardly be determined from four bites, but Steve wasn't gonna push. Instead he ate the rest of the slices and paid up at the counter while Bucky excused himself to the restroom.

The girl at the counter was very sweet and talkative, asking him all sorts of questions and laughing delightedly as he stumbled over answers. She seemed harmless, which is why Steve was extremely surprised when the conversation was cut short by a heavy hand pressing into his lower back again.

Bucky looked slightly pale, fingers curling possessively against Steve's jacket. It was his metal one this time, cold through the layers of his clothes, but the weight of it made Steve's entire body light up warm anyways.

At the expression Bucky's face and the repeated motion from earlier, warmth got pushed to the back of his mind and he looked over Bucky worriedly. "You okay? Taylor, this is my friend Bucky, we're--"

"Just leaving," Bucky interrupted, giving the girl a tight smile and guiding Steve away from the counter. Okay, something was wrong, but the tightness in Bucky's shoulders was all off, his free hand wasn't resting over a knife or a gun.

The second they were back on the sidewalk and headed towards the car, Steve swiveled, making the hand drop away from his lower back. "Buck, is everything okay?"

He was scowling, but not glancing behind them. All the mixed signals were terribly confusing. "Yeah, fine."

"Then what was that? I wasn't in any danger." Steve crossed his arms over his chest, still keeping pace with Bucky's fast legs but giving him a pointed look to show he was not impressed with being hurriedly escorted out of places for no reason.

"No, but. She sure seemed to like you," Bucky finally huffed, eyes carefully not meeting Steve's as he pushed open the door to the parking garage and started up the stairs.

"The Captain America thing tends to do that," he replied, unable to keep the amusement out of his tone. Bucky made a funny sound and kept scaling the stairs, looking like a graceful dancer compared to Steve's exaggerated steps.

Why the hell would Bucky care if a girl liked Steve? He'd done his whole protecting thing...was he trying to protect Steve from her? Or was the hand actually more possessive? He was looking too much into this, wasn't he? There was no way Bucky was jealous. This was Bucky. He didn't get jealous. And really, Steve shouldn't ask, but he'd keep on wondering if he didn't. Besides, what was the harm in a little teasing?

Buck held the door open for him once they reached their floor and they fell in step beside each other as they crossed the dark parking garage. That sour expression was still on his face so Steve nudged him, mouth tilted up in a smile. Now was his chance.
"Why, you jealous?"

Bucky glared at him - hard - but didn't say a word. Steve tilted his head back and laughed, the sound echoing around the parking garage and bouncing off dark concrete walls. Bucky glared harder and Steve threw an arm around Bucky's shoulder, pulling him in tight against his side, knocking them together like Bucky always had in the golden days.

"You don't have to worry about me running away with a Chicago girl, Buck. The pizza wasn't that good." Steve's arm hooked around the side of Bucky's neck and Bucky sighed exaggeratedly, like Steve was the most impossible person on the planet and his life was just so hard.

He was smiling for the next twenty minutes.

Then it was back on the road, city lights fading into the rearview behind them as Bucky pulled off the highway and onto a road Steve had read about, something called Route 66. It was too dark to see much, but it looked positively empty, which made it perfect.

Not empty like sheared cornfields, empty like they were on an adventure to the end of the world. Which was kind of fitting, really.

Steve reached over and turned up the stereo as Bucky rolled down the windows, night air whipping cold but their jackets kept them warm enough, the only world existing inside the glow of yellow headlights.

The song was live, started with a cheering crowd and a piano-led melody in the background. A voice - the lead singer presumably, was talking over the sound, thanking the crowd and making comments about the show before the song started. It sounded like it might be a nice song, right up until the lead singer said-

"-not too long ago, back in a place called New Jersey, where we lived."

And then came the riot.

"Turn it off!" Steve shouted, reaching for the dial. Bucky swatted his hand before he could touch it. "We are not listening to a Jersey song."

"The song isn't Jersey, just the band. And it sounds like it might be good," Bucky argued back. Steve lunged for it again and he got swatted harder this time, then Bucky cupped his hand over the stereo knob so he couldn't get to it.

"Nothing from Jersey is good." He absolutely was not whining. "Don't betray Brooklyn now, Buck."

"You're just hating on Stark's music."

"I am not!"

"Prove it, listen to the damn song."

Steve crossed his arms over his chest and made a face, sinking down into the seat petulantly. A chorus of harmonized ooo's had started up and he supposed they sounded fine. For Jersey music.

By the time they hit the second chorus Bucky had already memorized the words, turning it up louder and singing over the top, hands drumming on the steering wheel. "Give me the beat boys and free my soul, I wanna get lost in your rock and rooolll, and drift awaayyy."
Normally, he'd hold his palms over his ears and sing loud obnoxious noises to prove his point and annoy Bucky, only it was the first time he'd sung since 1945 and there was no way in hell Steve was gonna stop listening - or god forbid, stop Buck - anytime soon.

So he slipped out of his tennis shoes and kicked his feet up again, sticking them at the corner of the window so the open wind would wrap around his socked toes. It was cold as hell, but entirely worth the fresh air, the loud music and Bucky singing obnoxiously beside him.

When the final notes drifted through the air, the acapella harmony close that actually sounded pretty great, Steve made a mental note to actually ask Tony for the name of that band. They weren't terrible. For Jersey.

"So does rock and roll free your soul?" Steve asked - only half rhetorically - rolling his head on the seat to give Bucky a pointed look. He got the shrug-noise in return and the usual tick of Bucky's fingers weaving through his hair.

"It's not bad. I like dubstep better."

"Dubstep?" Steve made a disgusted sound, thinking of the records in his apartment, the only music that felt real anymore. Everything else was electronic, filtered, changed in some way, no longer that raw kind of beautiful sound that a certain beautiful boy used to dance to. "Why the hell do you like dubstep? It doesn't even sound human."

"I know." The knowing grin that came with that was a little terrifying, kind of like the look Bucky had given him that first day at the bridge, all scary-Russian-killing-machine and none of the pretty dancing boy from Brooklyn.

But some part of the pretty dancing boy still had to be in there, because it was only another hour before the wheel suddenly cut to the left and they pulled into the parking lot of a decent-looking motel. Which meant real sleep in a real bed, one that was probably not quite as marshmallow-y as the SHIELD provided one in his apartment. Really though, after the past two days, he'd take any opportunity for sleep right now.

Not to mention that Bucky hadn't closed his eyes once for the past 48 hours, and they could definitely use the break.

Steve grabbed the bags from the back of the car while Bucky checked them in at the lobby. He came back holding up a key with a grin.

Really, he shouldn't have been slightest surprised when the door to their room opened and two double beds stared back at him. Why would they share a bed in the first place? This wasn't the war and it wasn't Brooklyn and it wasn't Steve's apartment, laying on the couch cushions on the floor or collapsing in the only bed in the apartment.

They could afford to sleep in separate beds, he never should have assumed they wouldn't.

Dumping their things on the table first, Steve took the bed furthest from the door (although there were only about three feet of space between them anyways), plopping down and kicking his boots to the floor before stretching out, only remembering the aviators on top of his head when they stabbed his ear laying down.

Neither of them had bothered to turn on the lights because the slanted blinds over the window were casting orange stripes across one of the walls and it was enough light to see by, especially with their eyesight. It also meant though, that Steve could watch Bucky's silhouette as he stripped out of the brown leather bomber jacket, pulled his hair out of its ponytail and shook his head to settle it back down in pretty waves and goddamn him.

Then he curled up on his bed, facing Steve in the dark, and they could be back in 1945, laying in their tent with only the dim firelight and soft sounds of the Commandos conversing outside, just Bucky's silhouette in the dark, the most familiar and comforting thing he could cling to in a foreign land and a foreign body.

His body felt like his own now and he was in his country again, but somehow he was more alone than ever.

He dreamed about Bucky falling that night.

The sound of his final scream had been permanently engrained in Steve's head and his dreams didn't let him forget that. Except this time there was another shout inlaid over the scream, Bucky's words to go with the wrenching sound, you didn't let me down, you let me fall.

Watching his body get smaller and smaller as Steve clung to the edge of the train and the ice whipped at him and he couldn't breathe and he never wanted to breathe again.

From his bed three feet away, Bucky had already woken up, startled into consciousness by the first whimper from Steve's lips. He was pretty sure Steve was having a nightmare, but the only other one he'd seen was before he'd gotten his memories back, when he'd been watching Steve sleep and suddenly awake with a gasped Bucky.

This wasn't anything like that. He kept rolling over, making the most pitiful whimpers, like he used to do back when he got really sick. Bucky hadn't heard the fever sounds in years, even on Steve's timeline. But it was unmistakably the same pained, unconscious whimpers of pain.

He hadn't been able to take them then, and he sure as hell couldn't handle the sound from his Stevie's lips now, regardless of his size or muscle content. He stretched his arm across the space between their beds, reaching for the tossing and turning body.

It took a few seconds before Steve rolled close enough, but then his arm was extended and Bucky grabbed onto Steve's hand (with no idea that that was exactly what he'd been dreaming about), hoping the warmth of his skin might be enough to jar him out of the nightmare.

Oh boy, was it.

Steve shot awake, fingers clamping down on Bucky's as he startled up, nearly dragging Bucky off the bed and/or yanking his arm out of its socket. It took all his strength not to faceplant on the ground. "Jesus, Steve, you okay?"

Wide eyes turned on him and the orange light from the window reflected off Steve's wet bottom lashes and fuck, Steve had been crying, Bucky got out of his bed so fast he almost ended up on the ground again. The moment Bucky took a step forward, that blonde head shot down, staring at their twisted up fingers for about three milliseconds before he snatched his hand back, basically throwing Bucky's at him and scrambling backwards over the bed.

Bucky lunged to catch him before he fell off the mattress but Steve caught himself first, getting his feet under him and then the bathroom door was slamming shut and Bucky was left standing in the middle of an empty room with two rumpled beds and a dumbfounded expression on his face.

What the hell just happened?

Since when did Steve shut him out? Since when did Steve have nightmares? Since when did Steve shove Bucky away and go hide in the bathroom to avoid him?

He sunk down on Steve's bed and stared at the bathroom door. He could hear the sink running water, but otherwise the world was quiet and still, just the soft hum of the ancient radiator by the window.

Twenty minutes and no sign of Steve coming back out so Bucky - entirely unintentionally - ended up curling around Steve's pillow and falling back asleep in the middle of Steve's bed, surrounded by the smell of him, the one that had stayed since before the serum.

A turn of the doorknob had him shooting back awake, knife in hand as his eyes adjusted to the darkness of the room. Steve was at the doorway to the outside, in a pair of sweats and a tight fitted shirt, his hair wet. He paused when he saw Bucky, face perfectly unreadable.

"I'm going for a run," he said quietly, then the door closed behind him and he was gone. They didn't talk about it when Steve came back and they didn't talk about it when they checked out of the motel and hit the road again.

But when he cautiously tapped Steve's ankle with his foot under the diner table at breakfast, a smile finally lit up that beautiful face and Steve kicked him back. Which turned into a full-on war of kicking each other and trapping feet between ankles. Then they got scolded by their elderly waiter for acting like children and the moment he was gone they started cracking up and everything was right in the world again.

~~~

Bucky drove and Steve pretended to sketch the road or the dash or the car or anything but what he was really doing, which was trying to capture the perfect swoop of Bucky's hair back into its ponytail. Bucky hummed under his breath and Steve watched the wide open road of America stretch out in front of him like the epitome of the American Dream and the Western Frontier and wondered if anyone in that war knew this was what they'd been fighting for.

There was something immeasurably peaceful about having nowhere to be, about sitting next to Bucky with only two-lane blacktop under them and an open sky above them.

Every state sign they passed Steve snapped a picture on his phone, sent it to Natasha under the pretense of bragging about getting to travel. But really, so she wouldn't send the search squad on them. And so that in case anything happened, she'd have at least a general area to start searching.

But he wasn't worried. It was more for her than for him.

They stopped at an empty park and laid out on the tops of picnic tables and stared up at the sky and soaked in the distant warmth of the sun. Bucky was the only person in the world he could spend time with without pressure of saying a single thing.

The wood of the picnic table got uncomfortable after a little while and he sat up, stretching his arms and reaching over to tap Bucky, wake him up so they could find a water fountain somewhere. He didn't think to be cautious on Bucky's left side because he'd gotten used enough to the metal to mostly forget about it. So, he didn't think about how they'd been laying in the sun and metal heats up like hell in the sun.
Bucky's arm was scalding. Steve hissed and drew his fingers back, opening his mouth in silent pain and shaking his hand out, which wasn't helping the burning fingers at all. "Ow?" He finally managed, refraining from putting them in his mouth because he was ninety five, he should not put his fingers in his mouth when he burnt them.

All he got for his troubles was an amused huff. Like Buck knew perfectly well how much his arm heated up. Well, of course he did, it was his arm.

"That doesn't ever bother you?" Steve asked, poking Bucky again - with the other hand, in his ribcage so he didn't have to touch the arm. Buck didn't bother opening his eyes, flexing his fingers and rolling the plates down his arm in a whirring ripple.

"My arm? Sometimes." It looked like Bucky wasn't moving anytime soon so Steve laid back down, adjusting so the panels of wood would hit his back in different places. He'd just closed his eyes when Buck spoke up again, all nonchalant and lazy-sounding. "It's better than when I had just one."

And he sat right back up. "One?"

Bucky peeked open an eye, saw Steve was serious, and furrowed his eyebrows together like Steve was the crazy one. He probably was.

"Yeah," he said slowly. "Why did you think I have a metal arm now?"

"I thought-- I guess I'd only thought about the change. You used to have a skin arm and now you have a metal one...and I figured it hadn't been easy, based on your shoulder..." Steve trailed off, realizing that they hadn't talked about this once yet, that it was probably rude as hell for him to bring it up, that Bucky used to only have one arm. He couldn't even picture it.

"It wasn't easy," Buck agreed quietly, closing his eyes again. He had that story-telling edge in his voice so Steve laid back down, giving Bucky the privacy to speak without the pressure of being watched. Another few moments passed, filled with the rustle of wind through grass and a few ornate bird calls in the distance. Then the air shifted and Steve's world shifted with it.

"I lost from the elbow down in the fall from the train. I hit the water at the bottom of the ravine, blacked out, and woke up with snow falling in my face and a pool of blood coming from my arm. Hydra stitched it up, right above my elbow, but it was kind of a hack job. Didn't matter much though, they sawed it off later."

The words were so detached that Steve wanted to crawl over to Bucky and pull him into his arms and stroke warmth and love and promises into his skin and tell him he never had to be alone again. But he'd said that once, back in the war, and he'd broken that promise, hadn't he?

"Sawed?" Steve choked. Bucky hummed in confirmation, still laying peacefully dead atop his table.

"I had just the one arm for about a month though, I'd guess. Maybe longer. But when they got the shipment for my metal arm, they had the whole arm, wanted to attach it at my shoulder. They didn't tell me what they were doing at the time, but I'd probably have agreed to it anyways if they did. Fuckin' hated being a cripple."

"A cripple? Buck, you served your country, you're a veteran--"

"No, I'm not, because I'm not done fighting. And yes, I was a cripple, I walked funny and I couldn't pick up anything and I kept reaching for shit with a left hand that wasn't there. The surgery sucked and I passed out from pain at the time and it was all around terrible, but at least I had a goddamned arm again."
Steve stared up at the sky because it was the only thing he could do to keep from crying. He wasn't gonna cry, it wouldn't help anything. He could cry on the inside. It was his specialty now.

But...no. He wasn't gonna let Bucky down anymore.

"You're not a cripple." Not a fight, a declaration.

"Steve--" Bucky started, sounding tired like they'd had this argument a hundred times, even though Steve had never mentioned the arm before.

"Bucky, does my asthma make me a cripple?" Steve interrupted, realizing a second too late that he'd used present tense and holding his breath that Bucky didn't notice. He hadn't exactly told Buck about the panic/asthma attack he'd had after Bucky's first night terror. He wasn't planning to, either. Less things for Bucky to worry about.

"Of course your asthma didn't make you a cripple," Bucky scoffed up at the sky. "You just got born with shoddy lungs."

"And you lost your arm in battle. So you weren't a cripple, you got forced into a robotic implantation--"

"Rogers, look." The cold tone had softened into something apologetic and light. "It's not-- I like the thing, okay? I'm not expecting you to understand that; I know it makes me a freak, but it's as much a part of me as my right arm is. As your asthma was. Besides, it's like something straight out of those sci-fi books I used to read."

There was a smile there, a transformation to the past, two kids on park benches again. He wanted to say that if Bucky liked it, of course Steve did too. That he'd find a way to stop wanting to be sick at the sight of Bucky's shoulder. That he'd stop feeling the cold plates of the metal and hating what happened to his best friend. That it was as beautiful as the rest of him, as shiny-pretty on the outside and deadly in reality. That he wanted to find a way to incorporate the red star on Bucky's shoulder into his uniform, or maybe incorporate his shield onto Bucky's arm.

But the words stuck in his throat, well-bred caution keeping his lips sealed on the important things, his mouth parting with the simplest of versions instead.

"So long as I can draw it," he conceded. Bucky's mouth curved up in a soft, sad smile, but he nodded. Then the quiet and the wind and the rustling grass encompassed the air again and the warmth of the sun didn't feel so distant.

~*_~*_~

It wasn't all driving, all the time. The pattern they struck up wasn't much of a pattern of all, but it tended to consist of staying at a few places for a few days with stretches of road in between. Sometimes roads that crossed state borders and sometimes roads that only went five hours further. There was a lot of parking and staying, which had its upsides and downsides.

He got to run, to stretch out his legs in the morning and take the world under his feet before the morning sun broke the horizon. He invited Bucky to run with him, but he never wanted to. Steve wouldn't make him do anything he didn't want to.

Some mornings he ran so fast that he ended up puking on the side of the road, then he'd have to run some more to get colour back in his cheeks before he made it back to whatever random motel or cabin they were staying at for the day. Bucky would study him when he got back on those mornings, but he thankfully didn't say anything. Steve didn't know if he knew, but he didn't let himself think about it (or what it might mean) enough to find out.

They played cards, they took pictures with a digital camera Stark had put in the box. Not of each other (not when the other was looking) but of cities and sunsets and long stretches of road. Steve drew and had nightmares and Bucky drove and had nightmares and Steve ran every morning that he could and Bucky drove as far as he could and they were running but they weren't going anywhere.

Steve told stories about the USO tour and Bucky told stories about memories from Brooklyn that made Steve smile.

Bucky pulled a gun on someone in all black when they were in a grocery store and it took Steve half an hour to calm him down in the parking lot.

Steve found a golden retriever tied to a fire hydrant, waiting for its owner, and Bucky laughed until he couldn't breathe because apparently Steve's hair was the exact same colour as the dog's golden fur and "even their goddamned facial expressions matched."

The further they drove and the more they saw, the more people they ran into, the more Steve realized that yeah, there were some amazing things out there, some amazing people, but there was nothing or no one that came anywhere close to comparing to Bucky.

It was like there was an entire world full of people to see and only one that mattered. And he was at his side, methodically driving with a shadow on his jaw and his hair up in a ponytail.

There was something about Bucky that he needed. And a lot of things about Bucky that worried the hell out of him.

He would've let Bucky be, because it was really just a shower, but the moment fog started rolling underneath the closed door, he had to do something.

Steve knocked first, calling Bucky's name cautiously. When he didn't get an answer he tried the handle, relieved to find it unlocked. He pushed open the door and it was like walking into a sauna, slammed with a face-full of steamy, hot wet air.

"Buck? Jesus, how do you breathe in this - Bucky?" Steve stepped up to the other side of the shower curtain, close enough to hear over the pounding of the shower water.

"Mm?" Finally came a reply, a detached hum of what do you want?

"How hot is that water? You're gonna burn yourself." Steve tapped on the shower curtain to get Bucky's attention without putting either of them in an awkward situation. "Bucky? Is anything going on? Can I help?"

A few moments of silence passed, the pattering of the shower, the silhouette of Bucky's hands moving through his hair, the metallic plinking and soft hiss of his left arm. Steve was just about to ask again, maybe switch into concerned-scolding mode, when Bucky finally sighed, arms lowering back down to his sides.

"Can't get warm..." he said softly, like it was the worst admission he'd ever made. "I keep turning it hotter but I'm still cold, my bones aren't thawing, I just can't. Get warm."

"Turn off the water," Steve ordered, grabbing a towel from the rack and unfolding it. The water hadn't shut off yet so Steve repeated himself, voice stern. Bucky finally turned the handle, the steam-coated shower room falling into silence. Steve pulled back an inch of the curtain and held out the towel for him to take.
"Steve-" Bucky started shakily, but Steve cut him off.

"I know, Buck. I know. I'll get you warm, I promise. Just dry off, I'll grab you a pair of sweats, and come join me in the bedroom, okay?"

He got a noise in return that was probably the closest to a yes he'd get, so Steve draped a pair of gray sweats over the towel rack and left the suffocating fog with his head feeling crystal clear in comparison.

By the time Bucky came out of the bathroom with his hair damp and his skin tinged pink from the shower, Steve'd already turned up the room's heater and piled all the room's blankets onto his bed. He'd taken the pillows too, making his bed twice as warm.

Before he could talk himself out, he motioned for Bucky to come sit on the bed. The mattress sunk under his weight, icy eyes confused behind the pieces of hair catching on his wet eyelashes. Taking a deep breath, Steve pushed Bucky back onto the bed, turning him to lay with his head on a pillow as Steve crawled in next to him and pulled the mountain of blankets over their shoulders.

"C'mere," Steve offered quietly, holding out his arms for Bucky to settle between. The icy eyes were still confused, maybe sad around the edges.

"Rogers, I don't need you to-"

"It's not an emotional thing, okay? I'm cold too. It's just sharing body heat, like we used to. Back in the war, back when I was always cold as a kid. Okay? It doesn't have to be anything else. I'm not coddling you, just. Please."

Bucky looked like he didn't quite believe Steve, searching with that calculating stare from the war from when he was scanning the area for the best escape route. Steve held his breath and waited, hoping that he didn't decide to escape now.

Then Bucky rolled over, muscular back to Steve, and for a moment he thought he'd just get up, walk to his bed, maybe walk out of the room, maybe never come back. And then he scooted back, shoulders bumping into Steve's chest cautiously.

The half-second it took for Steve to get his arms wrapped around Bucky's torso was embarrassingly short but he didn't care, not at all, he just tucked his forehead against the back of Bucky's neck and tried to breathe, tried not to cry.

He had his best guy in his arms again and from the moment he let Bucky fall from that train, he'd thought this would never happen again.

His fingers might be leaving bruises in Bucky's ribs but he didn't care, he could feel Bucky's lungs expanding as he breathed, the tips of his damp hair seeping wet; he could feel the skin real and warm and alive underneath his fingertips and that was all that mattered. Bucky probably thought he was crazy, squeezing them so tight together like this, but he was indulging Steve and he didn't plan to let go until he was forced to.

Exhaustion took him after about twenty minutes of quiet breathing and a few stifled gasps from tears in his throat. He hadn't intended to fall asleep or hold Bucky hostage in his arms the whole night through, but one moment he was reveling in the warmth of Bucky's back and the next he was blinking into daylight, his vision obscured by a veil of Bucky's soft hair.

Bucky had rolled over onto his back in the night, right arm pinned under Steve's body. Actually, more like entire right half pinned under Steve's body. He still had one possessive arm wrapped over Bucky's bare stomach, his face tucked in the crook of Bucky's neck.

And for some reason, Bucky hadn't shoved him off. That was even more surprising than the position itself. Why the hell had he let Steve koala him? Even when they were kids they never slept that intimately.

For lack of a better solution Steve drifted back to sleep and when he woke back up, Bucky was across the room, lacing up his boots, complaining for Steve to hurry up. Neither of them talked about the night before, falling into old habits of pretending silence.

And the next time Bucky got a room, there was only one bed in it.

Steve had choked on his tongue for a few moments before deciding that if Bucky wasn't gonna say anything, neither was he, and he definitely wasn't gonna let the single king sized bed be the death of him.

They slept on opposite sides of it anyways, occasionally back to back when it got colder, but it was basically the same as the bed at Steve's apartment. Maybe the motel clerks thought they were giving each other the time, but what did it matter? He wasn't gonna look a gift horse in the mouth, because feelings or not, it was nice to have the familiarity of Bucky's warmth beside him while he slept again.

Just like the war, just like when they were kids. It didn't mean anything.

And the next morning, there was always another morning-run or another checkout then they were back behind the wheel and pulling off and the motel room was forgotten behind them and it really wasn't a big deal anyways.

The road was congested again as soon as they crossed the next state border, weaving through bits of traffic while they chatted, Steve pointing out every piece of pretty architecture they passed. There were a lot of churches, from glass paneled sleek ones to ancient German rock facades to towering renaissance-styled steeples. He kept pointing them out, making Bucky turn and twist around in his seat to see them all.

"Jeez, Rogers, you start bible thumpin' while I was gone?" Bucky asked after Steve pointed out the second Celtic church in ten minutes.

"It's good architecture!" he said in his defense, following the buildings with his eyes. They passed a few boring strip malls and congested buildings before he sighed and glanced at the driver's seat. "I've been praying again, though."

"Really? Sarah'd be glad." Bucky sounded carefully disinterested and Steve wondered if either of them would ever call each other out on each other's bullshit. Probably not. So he studied Bucky's jaw and answered as vaguely as possible.

"I don't think so. It doesn't count if you pray for the wrong reasons." He could still remember confessing to Clint; he kept praying to switch places with Buck. (Please, lord, why couldn't you have taken me instead?) Bucky didn't need to know that, although he already knew what kind of praying Steve used to do.

"So it's the 'just in case it's real I don't want my ass kicked' kind of praying? Or the 'I aught to be respectful' kind?"

"Neither," Steve said quietly, looking out the window. "I mean, after everything that's happened? Aliens being real, the Norse gods Mom used to tell us about real too? I never mentioned to Thor that I had an Irish upbringing and used to hear stories about him. They were supposed to be myths" though, not actually gods. Mom was always saying there was just the one--"

"But since when have you listened to anyone? You've got your own opinions on everything."

"I don't know. I don't know how I feel about it anymore, what I'm supposed to believe. I don't like the idea of praying to no one, and there are things I guess I do pray about but it's not even the right way--"

"What do you pray about?" Bucky interrupted curiously.

Steve looked out the window, watching the reflection of their car roll by in shiny storefronts. So much for not opening this jar of beans. "You."

"You-- wha- why would you pray about me?"

He turned an unimpressed look on Bucky who threw up a hand, looking genuinely confused. Seriously? Like he didn't know. Like he didn't fucking have a reason to be prayed for. Even taking God out of the equation - because really, how was he supposed to be sure about those things when his best friend had been tortured for seventy years?

"Buck, what happened to you--"

"Wasn't your fault." Bucky interrupted, smooth as molasses, which was probably the craziest thing Steve had heard all week.

"Bullshit!" Steve said incredulously, turning all the way in his seat to face the driver's side. "You said it yourself, I let you fall."

What he hadn't been expecting was the instantaneous drain from Bucky's face, the suddenly pale, sickly pallor as his eyes went wide and his cheeks inebriated: the color of a empty sketchbook pages. His metal hand was whirring, unintentionally molding permanent indents in the hard steering wheel.

Which made no sense, because Bucky had said that. He'd shouted it. In Steve's face. And stormed out of the room. Why the hell did he look like he was gonna puke?

A trembling hand pushed hair off his forehead, fingers caught in the strands for a moment, the unconscious tick suddenly revealing exactly how nervous it'd always been.

"Jesus, Steve. I had to. It was the only way to get you to shut up. You know I didn't--"

He couldn't listen to that.

"No, Bucky," Steve interrupted. "Don't insult me like that. I know you. And I know you meant it."

Bucky opened his mouth and closed it again, expression wrecked, looking positively devastated. Fine. He could act as upset as he wanted. Steve crossed his arms over his chest and refused to meet Bucky's eye, looking passively at the city instead.

Buildings rushed past, faster now as the traffic began to clear, and it was only a few seconds later that he muttered something, so quiet that Steve almost didn't pick it up; Bucky probably wouldn't have if their positions were switched.

"Not in the way you think."

He didn't mean it in the way Steve thought? What in hell other way was there to mean the very clear words of blaming someone for your death? Or, actually, worse-than-death condemnation to seventy years as a prisoner of war?

Then Bucky cleared his throat, sounding desperate as his words nearly broke over his tone. "Steve...It wasn't your fault."

He couldn't do that, he couldn't blame Steve and ruin his life and then go on and sound so damn sincere saying the opposite. It wasn't fair, and Steve was entirely justified when he turned to Bucky and snapped, "Then whose was it? Yours? God's?"

"I don't know! But it's not yours, goddamit. Did you blame yourself for the first time I got tortured?" Bucky's voice got all sarcastic at the end but funny enough, he had no idea how deep the guilt ran, how much of his life had been Steve's fault, how long Steve had been living with this.

"Yes, I did, I pressured you to enlist! And then I asked you to stay when you could have gone home!" Steve snapped back and Bucky fell silent, squeezing the steering wheel in both hands now, taking very obvious, deliberate breaths that were still infuriatingly, perfectly silent.

He was so goddammed quiet all the time and so damn stiff like the entire world was a battleground and maybe Steve had always seen the world that way but this was Bucky, he wasn't supposed to. That was probably Steve's fault too.

If all those years ago, he hadn't ever become friends with Buck, none of the terrible things would have ever happened to him--

"Look," Bucky started, voice soft and serious, hands rolling frettingly over the steering wheel, probably leaving more indentations in it. "I chose to go on every mission I ever went on with you." That little kid from Brooklyn, I'm following him. Why? Why? "Including the last one, Steve. I could no more have left you than you could have left me."

He would've scoffed, if those weren't words he'd been craving to hear, if those weren't words that threatened to breathe life back into him.

I could no more have left you than you could have left me. There was a part of him that wanted to protest, to tell Bucky that no, he was wrong. That Steve loved him as more than a best friend, that Steve loved him with every inch of his soul, that he'd meant it on the helicarrier when he'd looked up at Bucky's broken eyes and said he'd rather die by his hand than live without him.

But Bucky had broken through Hydra's clutches for him.

Romantic, aching, heartbroken, consuming love aside - Bucky felt the same way about Steve. It shouldn't be possible, because Bucky didn't love him like that...only somehow, Steve knew in his soul that no matter how much he protested, Bucky was right when he said that.

I could no more have left you than you could have left me.

He'd made the mistake once, of thinking that Bucky would be fine without him. That because it was only best-friend-love Bucky felt for him, it was somehow lesser than the way Steve felt. Then the same haunted, tortured man had gripped onto a metal bar and screamed No, not without you!

Bucky'd do anything for him.

He'd been a fool to ever think otherwise. He'd known that then, but how much had he let himself change since then?

"Okay, well." Steve leaned his head on the window, the outside world passing by in a dizzying blur.
Everything felt dizzy and blurry, lightheaded, the way he kept getting lately. "I could use some sleep, wake me up if you want me to drive."

Bucky wouldn't wake him up and hadn't let him drive once, but that part didn't matter. The point was that they weren't talking about this anymore because this wasn't something they could solve and Steve was honestly way too tired to try. Not tired from lack of sleep (though he hadn't gotten enough) but from the exhaustion of this conversation, of all of the conversations they were always on the verge of having.

The conversation they'd been on the verge of having for decades.

It wasn't the answer Bucky wanted and neither of them were saying what they wanted to so really, it was only fair. Steve leaned his head against the window and closed his eyes, listening to the occasional whir of Bucky's hand as it repositioned on the wheel until he drifted off.

He slept fitfully and woke too many times but when the really bad nightmares started to tug he woke up again - this time forcefully, the loud unmistakable sound of a semi-truck horn blaring through his dream and yanking him into the present.

The car swerved and Bucky was cursing, then the semi's bright headlights were fading into the rearview and they straightened back out on the road, both of them breathing heavy with wide eyes. Steve opened his mouth to ask if Bucky was okay, then suddenly the car was signaling to pull over to the side of the road, tires rolling to a stop in the grass before the ignition cut and everything fell perfectly silent as Bucky tipped his head back against the seat and tried to breathe.

His pretty eyes were squeezed shut, and in the dark with nothing to reflect it the metal arm was undetectable, the seat obscuring his long hair, and Bucky looked exactly the way he had during the war, after one of the missions that Steve had done something particularly stupid and Bucky'd tipped his head back against the seat and forced himself to breathe the exact same way he was doing now.

"Want me to drive?" was the only thing Steve eventually said. Bucky nodded, handing Steve the keys before crawling out of the car, folding himself up small in the passenger seat while Steve started the engine, locating the emergency brake and a few key features before pulling out into the empty road again.

They were both quiet and Bucky's eyes kept threatening to slip shut but he didn't let himself fall asleep, forcing himself back awake and staring out the window like the world outside could swallow him up and take him somewhere far far away.

Steve focused on controlling his own lungs, keeping the impending panic down, driving safely and securely with Bucky in shotgun. It was more than stressful, he felt like screaming or parking the car and running or curling up in the backseat and wrapping himself around Bucky until both of their bodies decided to stop freaking out; but he kept his foot resting on the pedal and his hands planted firmly on the steering wheel.

Everything got a little easier by mid-day, sun high overhead by the time the rusty voice croaked from the passenger side. "About the car--" Bucky started.

"It's okay," Steve replied with a small smile, before Bucky could beat himself up anymore. They'd both been arguing and ridiculous and they'd both pushed themselves too hard. Bucky didn't know about Steve's morning runs that ended in him lightheaded or puking but he knew a lot about pushing too hard.

He got a silent nod in return, then they were half-heartedly listening to the local classic rock radio station for the rest of the day. Driving was...healing, almost. Easy, to keep his eyes on the road, to have Bucky as a solid presence behind him, to have the purpose of going somewhere without the pressure of needing to get anywhere. He didn't have to fight to keep his eyes off Bucky with the excuse of looking at the road. He didn't have to worry about anything, really. Keeping Bucky safe and driving, that was all that mattered.

Sometime around three in the afternoon while they were driving through a midwestern smalltown, Bucky turned away from the window and casually asked, "Where we at?"

Steve shrugged. "I dunno."

He did not expect Bucky's eyes to go wide.

"You don't know where we are?"

Confused, he glanced back over, exchanging his attention between Bucky's confounded expression and the road. "No? Why would I? Aren't we just driving?"

"Well yeah, but I still knew where we were the whole time!"

It was Steve's turn for his eyes to go wide, then Bucky leaned his head against the window and groaned - loud and exaggerated like something out of a terrible porn flick.

"C'mooooon, Rogers. I give you the wheel for fifteen hours and you get us lost. This is why no one gives you maps."

"Hey! How was I supposed to know?"

"That's exactly what you said when you landed us thirty miles into the middle of nowhere-backass-Europe."

"Okay, no, that was Falsworth's fault."

"It was not, the Commandos were fucking saints for putting up with your shit."

Steve glared but he couldn't keep the corners of his mouth from wavering, and Bucky made another hopelessly gorgeous sound and threw up his hands.

The rest of the afternoon drive was filled with stories about the Commandos, carefully skirting around ones battles or fights that might trigger memories of other ones. They didn't talk about the war much, if ever, so the mention of their team already had Steve's heart pounding.

He didn't want to be the one who set off the grenade in Bucky's head. So he skirted to only non-violence stories, stories of campfires and bad food and coffee and ridiculous bets. And, like he'd guessed, Bucky didn't bring up a single battle scene.

Better to just avoid those all for now. It was still perfect, somehow, finally getting to talk about their boys. He'd walk on eggshells for the rest of his life, he already knew that, but having a few more topics open up as at least semi-okay? It was exciting. Progress, but he'd never say that out loud.

They stopped for the sunset.

Steve turned the wheel - they'd finally figured out where they were a few hours ago - into one of the prettiest places he'd ever seen. A dirt road that broke off from the stretch of Route 66 they were on, one surrounded by nothing but golden cliffs on the horizon glinting with rainbow reflections, dust kicking up behind them as the sky got darker overhead and the dirt road rumbled to a stop at a lookout point. It was exactly what Steve had been hoping the dirt road would be.

The loud rumbling of the engine cut as he parked the car in front of an old wooden post, a few propped pieces of wood making a makeshift semicircle fence. The sign read simply Sandia Mtn. Range.

Bucky raised an eyebrow at him and Steve shot him his wide winning smile and pulled himself out of the car, closing the drivers side door with a satisfying metallic click. He pocketed the keys and cocked his head to the footpath behind the sign.

With curious eyes absorbing the colors of gold and red splashing around them, Bucky followed him down the path. It was getting rapidly darker with every step around the rock facing, and then suddenly the footpath curved around the outcropping and they were standing at the top of a cliff, a valley opening up below them.

"Wow," Bucky commented, like it was involuntary, stepping up next to Steve.

He couldn't tear his eyes away. The world was huge. Gigantic red rocks in squares and rectangles and crumbling columns layered with sparkling orange clay and patches of green mosses and bushes. At the bottom of the valley was a thin, glittering ribbon of water, cutting through the desert landscape with the glinting promise of the dying sunlight.

An entire world in the dip of a valley, exotic and stunning. Dusty and lush at the same time, vibrant like someone had turned the saturation up on the world. And then there were the clouds; purple and pink and orange streaks across the sky, layering like whisps of paint to cover the highest parts of the most incredible canvas he'd ever seen.

There was nothing like this in real life, he didn't think. He'd seen pictures of course, he'd seen movies with landscapes like this, heard songs about the open frontier of the west. That was nothing compared to seeing it laid out in front of you, an entire universe beneath your feet as you stand atop a plateau, a tiny speck in the arching circle of mountains in the distance, surreal valley below.

The last time he'd felt this small, he'd been laying on a table making a joke about a serum that would change his entire life.

And now he was tiny all over again, but somehow, through all of the time that had passed since then?

Bucky was still standing here beside him.

"I'm sorry." Steve finally turned his head, looking Bucky square in the eye. The fading sun was right behind him, casting a halo behind his silhouette, temporarily blinding Steve and wasn't that just fitting.

"I'm sorry too." The words were almost a whisper but they were the sweetest sounding words he'd ever heard out of Bucky's mouth.

They were apologizing for everything and nothing and it didn't matter, because they'd said it and they'd meant it and in this moment, everything could be at peace between them again. Although, really, when had anything ever been at peace between them?

There had always been something, even when things were good, there was always tension or conflict or craziness or laughter, never so simple as contentment. Apologies. Mutual understanding, for once.
They both had a lot to be sorry for. Things they'd said - just yesterday - things they'd done. More from Steve than Bucky, but he wouldn't ruin the moment by taking the release of Bucky's apology away from him.

Then came the brief dangerous moment where they stood in silence and looked at each other. This could go one of three ways, really. Steve could start crying, which really didn't happen that often at all (and never lately) but it was a feasible option from the past.

He could take the option he normally did, which was to joke away the moment. Like one of the more poignant times they'd come to this impasse - Bucky's hands wrapped like boxing gloves, an intimate stare in a cold tent in the middle of a war, the words I ain't leaving til the stars fall from the sky sitting heavy and real between them. Steve had leaned over in the silence full of raw emotions and wounds opened up and exposed and said, "I didn't know you were a poet, Buck."

He'd been smacked for that. They'd both laughed and the moment had passed and the world had righted itself.

But there was always option three.

Steve reached into the space between them, closing a distance that had been too far for far too long. He moved slow enough that Bucky could see him coming, but Bucky would be able to see him if he was moving at the speed of one of Clint's arrows (he'd proven that already) and really, it was more about the fear of Bucky pulling away.

He could pull away.

But how much was on the line here? A lifetime of silence versus for the fear of rejection. So he closed the gap between them and weaved his fingers in between Bucky's.

The icy blue eyes turned down in surprise as the lips parted with a sharp intake of New Mexico air, his right hand flexing around Steve's left. A moment of silence as Bucky looked down at their joined hands, as he categorized or registered (or whatever he did in that efficient brain of his) the feeling of Steve's fingers in between his.

These exact ten fingers had held hands before. Their palms had been pressed together like this before. When they were kids, when the night got too cold and dark as teens, when the threat of a bullet or fire or mission or the eminent death in general that came with the war got to them and made them reach out for each other in the darkness.

But they hadn't held hands in a long long time and no one was dying right now. The world was breathtaking and Bucky was breathtaking and Steve didn't want to waste another breath without Bucky's fingers entwined between his. Actually, he was currently holding his breath, waiting to see if Bucky would pull away or not.

Then his warm right hand fingers tightened around Steve's and the wired tension in Steve's body drained out of him and it was just the two of them standing on the top of a cliff and holding hands and looking out at the sunset as the world faded from gold to red to purple to black.

For the first time since he'd woken in the SHIELD fake hospital room, Steve finally felt like he was home.

He wished he could say they held hands all the way back to the car, but when the stars came out and they both started shivering and the world was shifting into shadows around them Bucky gave his hand one last tight squeeze and let go, gesturing Steve back to the car.
They were quiet but it was the good kind; then Bucky was back behind the wheel and they were off again, the road stretching out before them.

The warmth that had spread through his body from where their hands had been threaded together didn't leave him the whole night through. And from the resting soft curve of Bucky's mouth, he'd guess it was the same for the stunning man beside him.

~~~

With the world set right and a new destination in mind Steve decided they might as well play the other half of the 'Popsicle Boyfriends Mixtape' that Tony had made; still extremely careful not to let Bucky see the title as he popped in Side B.

"The first half wasn't so bad," Bucky mused as another soft piano intro broke out over the speakers. Steve grimaced, remembering exactly how fitting the lyrics had been, how much he was gonna strangle Tony for finding out his secret.

Like that one song that'd said something about She's got a smile and it seems to me, reminds me of childhood memories...And if I'd stare too long, I'd probably break down and cry.

He should ask Jarvis if Tony had installed spying software in his apartment.

This song was a lot slower though, sad sounding, which should have been the first clue to skip it, but they both just hummed along to the background music and listened intently to the lyrics. The first verse was something about a priest, but he didn't make the connection until the drums hit.

Twenty-two years of metal tears, cries a suicidal Vietnam vet. Fought a losing war on a foreign shore to find his country didn't want him back...In a time I don't remember, in a war he can't forget.

The only other sound in the car was the creak of leather under Bucky's tightening metal hand - Steve was just frozen, silent.

He cried, "Forgive me for what I've done there, cause I never meant the things I did."

A drum hit, pause, then the music picked up again, strong and crooning sad, hopeful in a way that neither of them were. And give me something to believe in - if there's a Lord above. And give me something to believe in. Oh, Lord arise.

Steve considered turning it off. It might offend Bucky though, the implication of how well the song fit. It was hitting Steve hard, all the emotions put into words they couldn't say out loud. He wasn't sure if he hated Tony Stark for this or if the screaming guitar was exactly what they needed to face this. He didn't want to face it, though. But it wasn't his place to do anything about it. He curled his fists in his lap and stared out the window, not seeing anything, washed over with a Poison song.

My best friend died a lonely man in some Palm Springs hotel room. I got the call last Christmas Eve and they told me the news...I tried all night not to break down and cry, as the tears rolled down my face.

Maybe Steve had the right to cut the song after all.

I felt so cold and empty, like a lost soul out of place. And the mirror, mirror on the wall... see my smile, it fades again.

"Turn it off," Bucky interrupted, sharp, and Steve had never responded faster. He jammed his finger on the next button and the song cut out, a squeaking creak as the tape looped to the next song, then You're as cold as ice. They both turned to each other, eyes wide, and lasted about three seconds before Steve was cracking up and Bucky was snorting, shaking his head and dislodging pieces of hair from his ponytail. You're willing to sacrifice our love.

"Tony Stark, man." Bucky shook his head in awe and Steve nodded his agreement, looking amusedly out the window. It was exactly like Tony to put the most heartbreaking song on the tape right before one called Cold as Ice.

And yeah, maybe the lyrics still hit a little too close to home with you're closing the door, you leave the world behind...throwing away a fortune in feelings, but someday you'll pay... but it was too hilarious for either of them to really care.

They hummed along through the rest of Cold as Ice then it was another Pink Floyd song. The first one - Comfortably Numb - had been brutal, and Wish You Were Here was no less so.

That didn't stop Steve from singing "Did they get you to trade your heroes for ghosts?" under his breath as he grabbed two iced-tea lemonades from the gas station refrigerator. And since Bucky was outside filling up the car, he sang "Did you exchange a walk on part in the war for a lead role in a cage?" as he grabbed granola bars and uncrystallized ginger.

"We're just two lost souls swimming in a fish bowl, year after year," Steve deposited his things on the counter, ignoring the amused look of the checkout girl as he kept singing softly to himself. It was a catchy song, alright? "Running over the same old ground, what have we found? The same old fears. Wish you were here.

"See?" The gas station door chimed as Steve pulled out his wallet and looked up. Bucky was propped in the doorway, straight out of a magazine with his arm on the doorframe, the aviators on, his long hair down and windswept away from his face. Steve only barely managed not to drop his credit card. "I told you we never coulda been a barbershop quartet."

"Septet," Steve corrected automatically, handing the checkout girl his card. She was staring wide-eyed at Bucky too, her mouth open and eyes glassy. Steve could relate.

"C'mon, Captain. Taking long enough, we've still got the rest of that mixtape to finish." Bucky swung the gas station door closed and sauntered back out to the car while Steve awkwardly gathered up the purchases in his arms.

"Is he your boyfriend?" The checkout girl demanded, peering around Steve's shoulder. Steve snorted, glanced at Bucky who was waving to hurry up with his gloved hand. And managed not to trip over his words for once as he looked back at the girl and deadpanned, "I wish."

The next few songs on the tape were good, ones they could hum along to and probably fit as well as the others if Steve paid closer attention. He could sing loudly along with here I go again on my own and pretend that Bucky hadn't jumped ship a thousand times, harmonize to I close my eyes, only for a moment and the moments gone and snort at the irony of having slept for seventy years instead of get all teary-eyed about it.

Dark fell back around them, headlights flicking on to light up the crystal clear night as Steve rested his arm on the open windowpane and watched the line of mountains in the distance. A soft guitar piece came on and by mutual silent agreement neither of them sang, watching the raw beauty of the wilderness open up around them as someone crooned out knock knock knocking on heaven's door...

So maybe he wouldn’t quite strangle Tony for the mixtape. He finally could see now, why it’d been called Popsicle Boyfriends. When you looked at how the lyrics lined up to their lives, how their lives lined up to some of the nation's most classic love songs...

It looked a little like they were dating. Should be dating. Something. And god, Steve would, he so would, but Bucky would never. Hell, knowing Steve's luck, Bucky probably thought of him as brother or something. Never anything more. How could they be something more?

When the next song started up Bucky instantly started humming along. There was this high-sounding piano melody arching over a lower one and it was nice. He was pretty sure it was the last song on the tape, if he’d counted correctly, so it'd be interesting to see Tony Stark's grand finale choice. Tony was all about grand finales.

I can't fight this feeling any longer, the voice started. Steve dipped his head forward and forced himself not to groan. He was not gonna give an ounce of perfectly sculpted years of denial away because of one stupid song.

And yet I’m still afraid to let it flow. He risked a glance at Bucky, who was carefully not returning the gaze, all focus on the road in front of them. What started out as friendship has grown strooonger, I only wish I had the strength to let it show.

Okay, it was not a matter of strength. He was strong enough to say it. If he thought Bucky felt the same way. Which he didn’t. If he did... I tell myself that I can't hold out forever, I say there is no reason for my fear.

When he looked at the driver's side again, Bucky's cheeks had flushed pink. Wait...what? Cause I feel so secure when we're together, you give my life direction, you make everything so clear.

It was probably just embarrassment that Tony thought this song would be about them. Right? Of course. It had to be. Steve could prove that's what it was. It was all a big joke to Bucky and he could prove it. He started listening harder, picking up on the pattern of the melody so he could predict it and jump in for the second verse.

And even as I wander, I'm keeping you in sight...and I'm getting closer than I ever thought I might...

Bucky was bright red now, from what he could tell in the dark with just headlights to illuminate. Yeah, Steve had to prove it. As much for Bucky's sake as his. The drumset picked up and the chorus broke out strong and sure. And I can't fight this feeling anymore. I've forgotten what I started fighting for...

By the time the first verse was over Bucky was fidgeting and Steve was holding back his mischievous smile. He may or may not have just gogg led and memorized the lyrics on his phone. It'd at least prove that it was all a joke, right? That was the whole point.

So when the song settled back into the chorus, Steve casually leaned against the car door and started to sing along.

"My life has been such a whirlwind since I saw you...I've been runnin' around in circles in my mind. And it always seems that I'm following yooouuu--"

"Seriously?" Bucky interrupted, looking over from the driver's seat. Steve perked up, pretending to have just noticed Buck was in the car at all. But instead of responding, he held eye contact, opening his mouth to sing the next line quietly, barely letting any sound out at all, like he was timid or
"...you take me to the places," he lifted his voice just a little louder, ",-that alone I'd never fiiind."

Finally realizing what Steve was doing, Bucky groaned and smacked his head against the headrest. Steve leaned forward in his seat, getting increasingly louder with every phrase.

"And even as I wander, I'm keepin' you in sight." Bucky made another hopeless sound, mouthing please stop at Steve with a desperate gaze.

Steve screwed his eyes shut and clenched his fist in the air, voice properly loud now. "You're a candle in the wiindooww on a cold, dark -" punch to Bucky's shoulder "-winter's night."

"Please, god, save me," Buck muttered to the sky and Steve scooted closer, stretching his seatbelt as he knocked his knees against the center console and leaned as close to Bucky as he could.

"And I'm getting closer than liii ever thought I miiiight." Two hands cupped over Bucky's ears and Steve had to grab the wheel to keep the car straight, singing as loudly and obnoxiously as he could when the chorus hit again. "AND I CAN'T FIGHT THIS FEELIN' ANYMOOORE!! I'VE FORGOTTEN WHAT I'VE STARTED FIGHTING FOOOR!!"

A hard metal hand shoved his chest, effectively pushing Steve back into his seat as Bucky took the wheel back with a scowl that was starting to slip. Steve bunched up both hands in front of him, knotting his eyebrows together as he sang as passionately as he could. "It's time to bring this ship into the shooore and throw away the oars fooreeeeever."

"What did I do to deserve this?" Bucky asked the steering wheel. "I don't think even seventy years of killing people deserves this."

Okay, that was low. Steve sang louder. "CAUSE I CANT FIGHT THIS FEELING ANYMOOOREE. I'VE FORGOTTEN WHAT I'VE STARTED--"

"I WILL GIVE YOU SOMETHING TO FIGHT FOR!" Bucky finally shouted back over the top of Steve's singing.

"That doesn't make any sense!" Steve shouted back, then kept going. "COME CRASHIN' THROUGH YOUR DOOR--"

And then, finally, Bucky gave up and jumped on board.

"BABY I CANT FIGHT THIS FEELING ANYMORE." He shout-sang right along with Steve and Steve hollered, fist-pumping the air and shoving Bucky's shoulder again.

See? It didn't have to mean anything. Just friends. The way it'd always goddamned been. That's what Bucky wanted, wasn't it?

Only now, Bucky was looking at him, and his eyes were soft, affectionate in a way that made Steve want to stay pinned under that gaze forever.

The car had fallen immaculately silent. Steve was still facing Bucky, turned in his seat, and Bucky kept turning back to Steve after glancing at the road, like he was studying him, like he was holding him with his eyes and didn't want to ever let go.

The air in the car got thicker and Steve's whole body was buzzing. It was probably a straight - well, not-straight - minute before Bucky finally shook his head a little, long hair bouncing around his jaw before he settled back in his seat and really started focusing on the long stretch of road again.

"I like that song," he said softly, and Steve could only swallow and nod his agreement.

Plan; backfired.

Steve wasn't sure whether or not he minded.

~~~

"This is the craziest thing we've ever done," Bucky told him, looking up at the terracotta entrance.

"Maybe," Steve agreed. "Are you counting the serum and Howling Commando experience with that?"

"Yes," Bucky replied instantly. Steve laughed and readjusted the duffel bag on his shoulder. "La Posada de Santa Fe... it literally just means The Inn of Saint Faith."

"Well, it's the nicest looking inn I've ever seen." Steve started up the steps to the lobby entrance and Bucky trailed behind him, still looking at everything in awe. "Besides, you're the one who said we should listen to Tony. He said treat ourselves."

"He did. I wasn't exactly picturing this though. The last time I was in a place this nice I was killing the person who owned it." The tone of voice didn't change for that, just as speculative and in awe as if he'd commented that the last time he'd been there he'd gone swimming.

Which, of course, was the first thing Bucky wanted to do. Not the killing-people thing, because Steve had dryly replied, "Well, let's refrain from that this time," and Bucky had snorted his agreement. Probably on the grounds that he figured he wouldn't be allowed to use the pool if he did.

But whatever motivation they could find, right?

Oh, and there was the small factor that La Posada de Santa Fe was home to one of the most respected art galleries in the Southwestern art world. Steve was sold the moment he saw the architecture, and that was before he found out about the art gallery.

"Hurry up, Stevie!" Bucky shouted from the living room of their suite. Although why he was impatient Steve had no idea, because their suite was literally the most lavish thing he'd seen in his entire life and there was no way in the world that Bucky could be bored.

The whole resort felt ridiculously warm, although that could be due to the fact that everything was painted red, gold, or yellow. But somehow still ridiculously classy. And they were in New Mexico which was incrementally warmer than New York anyways.

Their room - suite - had its own fireplace, billiard table, french doors opening to the path that lead to the pool Bucky was obsessing over and Steve was currently changing for. They'd only been here for twenty minutes but Bucky insisted that swimming was the most important part of "fancy-ass hotels" and Steve certainly was not opposed to seeing Bucky shirtless and wet.

It would be innocent enough, swimming together, because they'd only done it since forever, all the way back to when Sarah used to throw them in the same bathtub in order to save water and warmth.
Obviously a lot had changed since then, including the horrifying scars arching out from Bucky's shoulder and the tight abdominal muscles they were both sporting now. And how Steve would probably be staring the whole time, but what's new?

He wasn't even that concerned about keeping his eyes to himself - certainly wasn't concerned about anyone else's eyes either because the hotel clerk had said the pool was technically closed since it was cold outside; although with the mention of Tony's name and the large sum of money that came along with it, hotel management said they'd have the pool heated up for them within fifteen minutes. Privately, even, closed off to all other guests, which had made Bucky get way too excited.

And so by consequence, Steve was excited too. They got to go swimming in one of the most beautiful, architecturally mouthwatering (and romantic) pools he'd ever seen in his life.

He didn't think to think about it until he was standing on the first shallow step of the lit up pool, golden reflections of firelight dancing in the blue water circling his ankles.

And suddenly the only thing he could think about was the icy crush of an ocean in March of 1945. He had drowned. The ice may have saved his life, but not before the water had taken it.

It had only been a few months ago that he'd been surrounded, pummeled, ice filling his cells and burning his body and his brain, his life slipping between his fingers as water pushed into his lungs, crushed him, and killed him.

Water and chunks of ice flooded into his throat and Steve choked on reflex, his lungs seizing and heart pounding and throat convulsing. It burned worse than fire, worse than the cold numbing tingling of his fingers and hands and feet. His lungs filled with water and his eyes spilled over with tears of pain that the cold water took away, sucked for their own.

He couldn't do this.

Steve stepped back out of the water, forcing himself to put his feet on soft concrete with slow, careful precision. Forced himself not to jump out of the water screaming and run as far as possible. Forced himself to stay calm. He could stay calm. He couldn't let himself shake.

He closed his hands into fists to stop the trembling and tried to focus on the feeling of solid ground beneath his bare feet. He was safe, he was on land, he couldn't drown so long as he didn't touch the water.

"Rogers! The hell are you doing?" Bucky shouted at him from across the pool, water lapping at the waistband of his shorts, halfway down the steps Steve had freaked out on. Had he walked all the way over here already? When did that happen?

Steve flailed for an answer, pulse thudding, unstable and lightheaded from the memories threatening to overtake him.

"It's cold," he finally managed. It wasn't, it really wasn't, they both knew a lot colder. It was warmer than outside, warmer than roadtripping with the windows down.

Bucky rolled his eyes and waved a hand, taking a few steps further into the pool. He was up to his waist in the shallow end, slowly advancing deeper, gesturing for Steve to join him like it was the easiest thing in the world. It wasn't. But he couldn't tell Bucky that.

"C'mon! I'd say don't be a dame, except that Peggy Carter would laugh her ass off at you right now. That woman is more fearless than anybody I have ever met."
Steve managed a shaky laugh that didn't sound the least bit convincing, but Bucky was busy gliding his hands through the water in fascination, watching ripples curl around him in the glittering gold reflections of the firelight that lit each of the pretty lamps surrounding the pool from their safe distance in the rocks.

And Steve didn't notice that Bucky used present tense, that he knew Peggy was alive, that he'd talked to her. He was too busy forcing himself not to back away from the pool and finally realizing what it was like to be scared of something that wasn't losing the people he loved.

If the twenty year old version of himself was here, he'd go running at the pool full tilt and splash Bucky with a wicked cannonball, getting about three seconds of laughter in before Bucky was scolding him and holding him above the water for fear that his weak lungs would give out on him. But Steve was careful in the water, always had been. Swimming was good for him, the docs had said. Fair playing ground too - he and Bucky could hoarse around without the threat of Steve getting mortally injured for once.

But now, less than ten years older and just the sight of the pool was making him shake.

"Steeevveee," Bucky whined, treading water into the deep end and making doe eyes up at him. "It's cold," Steve protested, at least a little more convincing sounding this time.

Probably because the memories that were trying to drown him again were reminding him just how cold that ocean had been.

He got a splash of water in his direction for his troubles. The metal arm had some serious splashing power and the droplets of water managed to sprinkle as high as Steve's swimshorts, but it was a close enough sensation to shower water that he didn't freak out.

"Don't make me swim alone, that's no fun." Bucky was pouting and Steve raised an unimpressed eyebrow at him, crossing his arms over his chest. He could make this about Bucky. He could pretend this was just some act to annoy him or something, anything that wasn't the memory of drowning. Dying.

"Just jump in. It's really nice once you get used to it, and it's warming up more by the minute." Bucky sing-songed the end, sinking into his shoulders to prove his point. The tips of his hair drifted across the top of the water, a few pieces sticking to his neck, and he looked so beautiful there, flickering firelight lighting up the night with the peaceful water lapping gently around him.

"I don't know, I'm kinda tired. Not really in the mood to swim..." he trailed off lamely, looking away from the gorgeous temptation of a wet Bucky Barnes crooking a finger alluringly at him.

"There's no such thing as not being in the mood to swim." There was a soft plopping sound and when he risked a glance back at the pool, Bucky was gone. Steve's heart stopped for a moment, then Buck burst up from the water with a graceful slide like some sort of sinful, heartbreaking model, having swum underwater all the way to the edge near where Steve was standing.

His breath was still caught in his throat and his heart was pounding in his chest except it was for two reasons now. For the first time, he wished that he could let himself be distracted by Buck, that he could make Steve's heart pound fast enough to forget about the other reason his lungs weren't working.

But the pool was still right there and so were the memories. It wasn't enough.

Bucky folded his arms over the edge of the pool, looking up at Steve with forlorn eyes, hair slicked back and dark and so so pretty and wet as he batted his eyes and made a pouty face.

"Please? You're gonna love it," Bucky coaxed.

"Seriously, Buck. Swim without me," Steve suggested, sitting down at the edge of the pool, a few feet away from where Bucky was looking at him with that sad puppy expression. At Steve's stubbornness Bucky let out an exaggerated heartbroken sigh, clutching at his chest and falling back into the pool dramatically. Steve rolled his eyes and Bucky stuck his tongue out.

After a few faces made back and forth in response, Bucky started lapping the pool with a perfectly executed freestyle, gliding through the water as gracefully as everything else he did. Steve half focused on watching him while convincing himself to dip his toes back in the water.

By the time Bucky had gone through freestyle, butterfly, backstroke, and breaststroke, Steve had convinced himself to let his ankles dangle in the side of the pool with only minimal dents to the side of the pool from the terrified tight grip of his hands.

Just ankles. He was fine. He watched Bucky's repetitive motions and let the rhythm calm him. Bucky had pulled him from the water before. He was safe, it was just ankles, there was nothing to be afraid of.

The water was warm now, really warm, and that helped. It wasn't icy like the ocean. Like standing in a shower with the plug blocked, almost. He could convince himself it was that. Just ankles.

After a little while, Bucky swam back closer, looking him over for a moment. Steve met the gaze with a lift of his chin, challenging Bucky to say something. Instead he narrowed his eyes a little, thinking, and suddenly swung a leg up over the side of the pool.

The splash narrowly missed soaking him, then the other foot was up and Bucky was leaning back down, his hair floating around him in the water. He was basically sitting on the wall of the pool, shins tucked up on land and legs bent at the knee so he could hang upside down and keep stationary in his backfloat. It was a good position for situps too, or for lowering yourself underwater to practice holding your breath.

Having Bucky close - even though he was underwater now, out of sight but for his wet calves dripping eight inches away from Steve's spot - calmed down a little of the panic and Steve found he could uncurl his hands from the side of the pool. Well, not entirely let go, but relax them enough to see that he at least hadn't cracked the concrete.

With a splash Bucky's torso emerged from the water again, shaking his head and sprinkling Steve with water again from the soaking strands of flying hair. Steve made a face and only didn't splash Bucky back because insinuating a splashing war was not a good idea right now.

Then icy eyes were on his and Bucky pulled himself up in half, looking at Steve with a glimmer in his eyes that almost looked like...heat.

"Steve," Bucky murmured, running a hand through his hair to pin it back. Steve's mouth ran dry, because god, he'd give anything to have his own hands running through Bucky's hair right now.

"Mm?" he managed, forcing his brain to work at least moderately.

"C'mere." It was barely above a whisper, low and almost gravely, and it sent shivers down Steve's spine. He scooted over closer but Bucky crooked a finger, placing a hand up by his mouth like he was gonna whisper something. So Steve pulled his legs outta the water, kneeling between Bucky's feet and leaning over so Bucky could whisper whatever it was he had to say.
Steve's heart was pounding out of his chest, his hands felt clammy and his head was all lightheaded again, but this time the majority of it was the proximity. The way Bucky was looking at him.

He moved in closer and the hand beside Bucky's mouth reached out, cupping around the back of Steve's neck. He was practically leaning over Bucky now, the wet non-metal hand curling damp fingers into the place where flushed skin and soft hair met, carding through the short hairs as he pulled Steve in even closer.

Steve couldn't breathe. Bucky was reaching up for him and Steve was leaning over and god good, right before Bucky had gotten his memories back they'd almost kissed, they'd been so close and maybe Bucky wasn't as disgusted with that memory as Steve thought he'd be, maybe all of those times he'd never let himself quite refer to as "almost" really had been just that.

And it was all leading up to right now, with that intensity in icy eyes and the warmth of Bucky's wet hand on the back of his neck as he pulled Steve in closer and reached up further and both of their lips were parted and Steve's lungs weren't working again but he didn't care, he didn't care because Bucky might be about to kiss him, all he had to do was lean in a little closer--

He leaned and Bucky tugged and then he was in the air, somehow, for about three seconds, just enough time to register that he was flipping - had been thrown - then he hit the surface of the water.

A ploy, a practical joke, something so signature Bucky - he was sexual, he was devious, Steve had always known that, should never have let himself be blinded, he'd always known that, should have seen it coming - and so innocently brilliant, really, the pretense of the whisper then the unmistakable curiosity of the what's-going-to-happen that obviously hadn't meant anything, except for that it worked.

It worked and Steve had fell for it, leaned in close, and gotten flipped right over Bucky's head with that strong hand and splashed straight into the water and normally, he'd come up sputtering and righteous and Bucky would be laughing and it would be a win on Bucky's side except that this time, this time it was different.

Because Steve hadn't told him, Bucky didn't know, but the water wasn't just cold and Steve wasn't just tired. He was terrified.

And he was drowning.

His lungs protested and Steve couldn't breathe, water was rushing in everywhere. He wanted to go peacefully but this wasn't anything like serenity. He just wanted to let go, let the plane be his resting place, but it burned and his brain wouldn't leave him be, just begging and begging for Steve to swim up to the surface. The water pushed at his skin and his muscles and he squeezed his eyes shut tighter. The hurt pulled at his heart now and he could feel himself filling with water and he still wasn't dying, nothing was going black, and Steve was crying steadily, his entire world collapsing...

He gasped in a breath of air, unable to cognize that he was really breathing, that he was choking up water past his lips and that there were hands on his chest, on his cheeks, a very concerned voice calling his name, soft concrete under his back, that he'd been pulled out of the water, carried onto land, was safe now.

"--evie? Steve? Hey, hey, can you hear me?" His brain finally registered and Steve blinked open his eyes, vision feeling muddy and body heavy, waterlogged, world still spinning. He choked another spurt of water up and careful hands tipped his face to the side, insured that he didn't spit into his own mouth. And drown. Like he'd just been doing.

"B-b--" he managed, coughing before he could get the full name out. One of the hands left his cheek and covered his forehead, pushing back soaking hair.

"Hey, yeah, it's me. You're okay. I've got you." Bucky's face swam into focus above him and the coughing finally died off. He sucked in a shaky breath, closed his eyes for a moment, and opened them again to a world that was spinning a hell of a lot less.

"Thanks," he croaked, gesturing with a hand before tugging Bucky's touch away from his face. The terrified concern in Bucky's expression melted to exhaustion and worry as he plopped down next to Steve, who was stil on his back, staring up at the sky and trying to catch his breath.

Bucky pulled his knees into his chest and looked at Steve with wide eyes, like he'd been betrayed somehow.

"Are you okay?" The worry was disconcerting, even through the pounding in his head. Steve made a vague humming sound in response; but apparently that wasn't gonna fly because Buck scooted closer and studied him harder. "What the hell was that? Last time I had to pull you outta the water you were unconscious."

He'd forgotten that. Buck had pulled him out of the water before. Bucky'd saved him, even when he hadn't known him. Like his love for Steve ran deeper than just his mind. Of course Buck would save him again.

"Nothing." The word came out all crackly and Steve cleared his throat, forcing himself to speak louder. "I just don't like water."

"You don't like water my ass. You used to drag me down to the beach the second the snow cleared. Swimming was the only place you had equal fighting ground." Bucky prodded him, carefully, like Steve was still that tiny little thing that could break from a hard gust of wind.

Really, though? He'd been stronger back then.

"Things change." Steve gritted his teeth, staring up at the desert sky and wishing Bucky would leave him alone. He didn't turn on his serious voice when it was just the two of them, but this was an exception. He needed Bucky to shut up for once, to take a card from his own book and be goddamned quiet instead of bothering Steve. "I don't like water."

About three seconds of peaceful, hopeful silence. Then the arms unwrapped around Bucky's knees and he folded his legs indian style, toes brushing Steve's bare (wet) ribcage.

"Why?" Bucky leaned forward, propping his elbows on his knees and looming directly over Steve, looking down at him with his own serious expression on, the one that fit on the face of the killer, of the fighter who'd almost killed him on the bridge. It was even more terrifying with the curious, worried, soft words to accompany it. "I'm not taking 'drop it' for an answer."

Steve stared up at Bucky, at the way he was worrying his bottom lip between the teeth and knotting his eyebrows together but looking at Steve like he was the most precious thing in the world that had to protected at all costs.

It was a pretty damn familiar look.

He sighed, closing his eyes, the weight of Bucky's gaze on his face still heavy in the darkness. There'd be no point in hiding this anymore. This was Bucky. Who the hell was he kidding?
wouldn't let Steve rest if it was the last day on earth.

"I drowned once, okay?"

"You- what?" Steve opened his eyes back up to see icy ones staring down at him, wide and scared and confused. He met them back calmly, silently, and Bucky's eyes only widened more. "When the hell did you- Oh. oh. Oh my god, the plane crash."

The metal hand shot up cover to Bucky's mouth in horror, looking positively devastated as the past ten minutes sank in alongside the words plane crash and drowned once. By the time his hand lifted slowly away from his face again, it was trembling. "I'm so sorry Steve, I didn't know, I didn't think--"

"It's fine. Like you said, you didn't know." Steve shrugged, looking away from the pity party and back up at the sky. This was half the reason why he didn't tell Bucky. He didn't need the concern and the prodding and the arguing. "Since we settled that, can we go back to the room now?"

The firelight in the lamp posts around them flickered with a soft breeze, crackling in the beat of silence.

"No."

It took a few extra seconds to register, then he was slowly turning his head in case he'd heard wrong. "What did you say?"

"No," Bucky repeated. Then he hopped to his feet and held out a hand. "C'mon, We're gonna take care of this."

Steve propped himself up on his elbows, ignoring the pounding in his head and glaring at Bucky, the way he used to when he was getting mother-henned after a fight that wasn't that bad in the back of some alley.

"Bucky, no. I don't make you--"

"That's different," he dismissed with a wave of his hand, grabbing Steve by the shoulders and hauling him up impatiently. "I'm not gonna let you be afraid of swimming pools for the rest of your life, alright?"

"I'm not five." Steve glared harder and Bucky threw an arm around his bare shoulders, guiding him to the stairs of the pool.

"No, you're not. But you are human."

The water was warmer now, as Bucky kept an arm around Steve's shoulders, another looped around his waist, the way Steve had carried him out of the Hydra facility in Azzano so many years ago. It was just the first step, wet around his ankles and not an inch higher. Like standing in a shower. It was even warm.

He forced himself to breathe. He wasn't gonna make this into a big deal, he could suck it up and push through if it meant Bucky worrying about him less.

You are human. Steve had told Bucky that, something like that, and Bucky had run out on him. He'd followed it up with hero too, which is what Bucky was, but he didn't want to see that.

Funny, how Steve was Captain America, the bright shooting star across the sky, the one with the flag and the exhibit, and he couldn't handle himself in more than three inches of water. Funny how the deadliest assassin of the century was the one keeping him from falling apart, who'd pulled him out of the water and saved his life again.

Steve wasn't the hero. He'd never been the hero. He held the weight of world on his shoulders but he leaned those shoulders on Bucky. Even when he'd had nothing, there'd still been that memory.

"You don't have to do this," Steve breathed, the world spinning a little again as Bucky helped lower him down to the next step. Just halfway up calves. He was fine. The water couldn't kill him from here. Bucky's arms around him could keep the memories at bay. Right?

"Gotta make up for triggering you somehow," Bucky replied with a soft squeeze to Steve's shoulder. He huffed annoyedly in response, because it wasn't a trigger, he didn't have PTSD or anything. Not that there was anything wrong with that but--

But his best friend in the entire world had been tortured for seventy years and was holding it together better than him. He'd been in a coma, basically sleeping for decades. He'd fought in the war, but he'd had a special serum to keep him safe. He'd been nothing but privileged and Bucky had been anything but. Steve didn't have the fucking right to complain once. Who was he to be scared? Who was he to want to cry?

He'd weep on the inside because he didn't deserve to fall apart. Not when Bucky was holding it together.

So he clung a little tighter, both hands gripping metal for fear of bruising Bucky if he touched him anywhere else. He had to do this. He had to do this. If Bucky could do it, if Buck could get through, then he fucking could too.

Steve forced himself down the next step, jarring the unexpected arms around him looser as the water flushed up to his thighs. God, it was gonna take him. It was gonna take him under and take Bucky away from him again and he'd never felt so goddamned helpless--

"Bucky?" he called out, turning in the water, reaching and scared, and warm arms wrapped around his waist from behind, holding him tightly as Steve dug his fingers in the metal plates again and tried to shut down the fear pounding inside his chest.

"I'm right here, Stevie. 'M not goin' anywhere." He closed his eyes, focusing on the strength and smoothness of the metal under his fingertips. Bucky was solid, he wasn't gonna let Steve drown. The arm around his waist was strong as Steve's shield was.

He almost wished he had his shield right now, the comfort of being able to protect himself, the familiar weapon to hold that saved him from every other weapon in the world. But he didn't have it, he had Bucky. He'd protect Steve too.

"Easy, easy. Take it one step at a time." Literally, one step at a time, Bucky eased them down the next one, the warm water badgering up to the waistband of his shorts now. His grip tightened on the metal bar around his waist and Steve wondered briefly if he could dent it. Bucky didn't seem concerned, keeping his arm tight, voice soft and warm against the back of Steve's ear. "Just hold on to me."

He squeezed his eyes shut, gritting teeth and focusing on his lungs. He wasn't gonna have an asthma attack on top of a panic attack on top of a trigger or whatever. He could do this.

There was so much water.
"Don't think we should do this, Buck," Steve managed, voice sounding weak and frail even to his own ears. The warmth of Bucky's chest against his back was about the only thing keeping him from running out of the pool like a madman and curling up on the floor and never opening his eyes again.

"Let's try. Let me try." The gentle murmurs in his ear were so sweet, so caring. It wasn't right, Steve had to find his center, had to get his head on straight, something. Wasn't he supposed to be the strong one now? Wasn't he supposed to be taking care of the man who'd been prisoner of war for seven decades?

He took the last step down and the water crushed his abdomen, swirling around him and he was standing in the shallow end of the pool now but that's not what it felt like, it felt like his brain was screaming at him to swim for the surface, that his body was fighting him to live, that his cells were filling with water and there was blood arching around him from the broken glass of the plane's window and he was so cold.

The metal arm around his waist became a metal hand on his hip and the blurry world shifted into focus for a few seconds to see Bucky standing in front of him, cupping Steve's face in his hands. Something cold and wet ran down his cheek and a warm thumb wiped the tear from Steve's cheek the way it always had.

Except that day. That day Steve had cried more than the rest of his life combined and Bucky hadn't been there to wipe them away.

Bucky had been dead.

Steve had just been trying to join him.

He grabbed the metal arm again, trying to weakly tug back to the stairs, his hands slipping on the smooth surface.

"Don't think I can do this," he gasped, backing towards the entrance. A soft warm arm wrapped around his shoulderblades, stopping him gently. The water around his legs hadn't tugged him down yet, hadn't held him under and taken him away from Bucky for seventy years.

"You can," a gentle voice told him. "I believe in you."

Of course he did. He always had. Steve stared up at the sky and sucked in as many breaths as he could, chest heaving and water tumultuous around him with the movement. He had to be able to do this. He couldn't afford to have things wrong with him. What if Bucky fell in the water one day? He had to try harder. He needed to be able to do this for Bucky, heart racing or not.

Fingertips brushed the top of the water, then his whole wrist, and he could remember the snapping sensation of what he'd thought were bones when he'd been gripping the plane controller too tight, hands coming up last second to block his face from the imploding glass.

"I don't want to do this," Steve finally whimpered, hating himself for how damn broken he sounded. He'd been so good. He'd tried so hard to be everything that he was supposed to be, to not let down anyone, to not bleed on anyone. He'd spent the first twenty-six years of his life as a burden; he didn't want to be a burden anymore.

The hand on his back rubbed in small, grounding circles and that voice was talking again, calming and gentle and sweet. "Alright. If you really don't want to, we won't. I'll take you right back up to the room okay? Is that what you want?"

Throw in the towel. Give up. Give up. Let the damn bully of the water win. When did he ever want that? Yeah, cause you've got nothing to prove.

He'd always rolled his eyes, ignored Bucky when he'd said that. Except that he'd always known it was right. He'd always had everything to prove.

"I want to stop being scared," Steve whispered.

"Okay," Bucky agreed. "Let's figure that out. Tell me what you're feeling. What's going on in that fluffy dandelion head of yours?"

Steve closed his eyes, forcing himself to breathe in through his nose, out through his mouth, and tried not to let his voice crack as he told Bucky what it felt like to drown. Not all of it, not the really bad parts, but about how the water tried to drag him under, how it surrounded him from all sides and there was no escaping it (that part was a lie - he could have gotten out and he hadn't and that was the worst part) and how it filled every cell and made him choke until his body betrayed him all over again.

Patience, listening, then an arm circling around Steve's waist again. "Does this help?" Bucky asked, holding Steve tight against his side. "Physical contact? So you don't feel like you're alone?"

Steve shivered and gripped Bucky's arm again. "Yeah, yeah. It. I th-think so."

They'd drifted a little deeper in the pool and Steve hadn't even noticed that the water was up to his ribcage now, covering up Bucky's arm. He was being so perfect, so patient, it wasn't fair-

"You don't have to do this. If it makes you uncomfortable..." he trailed off, letting the silence finish for him. They were wet and cold from not moving much, half naked and pressed so close together that not even water could get between them.

"Hey, whatever you need, okay?" The words were soft, the smile quirked up at the side, and how was it that people said Steve was the strong one?

Who's strong and brave, here to save the American way...

Certainly didn't feel like it was Steve who that song should have been about. Thomas Payne had written something once, a poem, and loving a man named the Winter Soldier, he'd had it memorized to the last word-

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country...

But the Winter Soldier?

Who will redeem, head the call for America? Who'll rise or fall, give his all for America? Who'll finish what he began?

Steve was under no illusions who the real hero was.

They got as deep as rushing water around Steve's neck before he started panicking. Then Bucky had him back on dry land in seconds, covering him with towels and wrapping his arms around Steve's neck, pressing close together until Steve stopped shivering, started breathing.

It was over, he'd survived, and he half felt like crying, half like throwing a goddamned party and inviting the whole state to celebrate.
Instead he put his arms around Bucky's warm, wet back and tucked his face in the crook of his neck. Maybe his actions would speak louder than his words and he'd get, he'd really get how damn grateful Steve was for this. For Bucky's strength, his support. His unwavering loyalty. His stupid perfect everything.

So goddamned human.

Bucky squeezed him back, laughter bubbling in his chest, a smile on his lips as he pressed his cheek against Steve's and murmured happily,

"How 'bout next time we die together, yeah?"

Steve laughed shakily but he couldn't fucking agree more.

~~~

"Steve?"

The whisper in the dark was the first sound he'd heard in hours, drifting through an abyss of dark room silence. But he could at least be dignified enough to pretend he'd been asleep. He'd been dozing, at least.

"Steve?" Bucky whispered again. Steve made a groaning sound in response. It was like 2am. Probably. It was dark and the world was sleeping and they should be too.

"Steve, seriously. It's important." The whisper got more urgent and Steve sighed, blinking all the way awake and rolling over to face the ceiling. What could possibly be so important in the middle of the night?

"Wha'?" He mumbled crossly, draping a hand over his eyes. Bucky's whispers had sounded serious, enough to force him to pay attention from his half of the bed.

The room fell back into silence. Steve dragged the hand off his face after a few moments, rolling more so he could actually see Bucky, lifting his head off his pillow to meet the icy eyes in the dark.

"Buck, what is it?" he pressed, repositioning his pillow and propping up on his elbow to look down at Bucky concernedly.

Blue eyes blinked up at him then Bucky's lips parted, looking like a sweet, young innocent angel as another whisper slipped past his lips.

"Were oranges named after the color or the other way around?"

The pretty parted lips opened in a squawk as Steve's red and orange striped pillow slammed down in his face. The metal arm lifted to block the attack but Steve was faster and this hotel had an ungodly amount of pillows.

Steve hit Bucky with them all.

"Why-" smack "- the hell -" thump "- would you -" whack "- wake me up -" more pummeling "- to ask a stupid -" tiny pillow aimed at Bucky's face "- fucking question??"
Bucky was rolling and laughing, trying to dodge the blunt Steve's pillow attack, but there were a lot of pillows and the bed was big, but not that big. For once, Steve was faster too, because he was grinning instead of laughing, yelling instead of gasping to breathe.

"No fair, no fair!" Bucky shouted, ducking away from another pillow aimed for his head. Steve didn't plan to stop his pillow assault anytime soon, only they'd reached a whole new level of warfare since when they were kids.

So Bucky slid under the covers, all the way under, somehow slipping to the bottom of the bed without totally rucking up the sheets and comforter. It was January and therefore cold, but New Mexico was warm and he had to be burning up under there. Besides, hitting an immobile lump through blankets was no fun.

Steve kicked most his ammunition off the bed - just in case Bucky came back out with a surprise revenge attack in mind - and shoved himself under the covers too.

Bucky made another indignant squawking sound at his hiding place being violated, then Steve placed a finger on those pretty exotic sloping lips and Bucky fell entirely silent, darkness between their faces keeping both red flushes secret for the time being. It was perfectly black under the covers, the way it was only in the middle of winter with every blanket they owned piled on top of Steve to keep him warm.

He used to hate that, as a kid. Thought it wasn't fair that other kids got to play in the snow while he had to stay wrapped up inside underneath a pile of blankets. So Bucky'd join him. They'd camp out under the covers and Buck would end up sticky and sweaty with his good immune system but he didn't care. They'd tell stories and Bucky would make Steve laugh and he'd forget all about playing outside in the snow.

It was crazy to think that those were the same two people underneath the covers now.

Steve took his finger off Bucky's lips. It'd been there for way too long, but neither of them said anything. Neither of them had been able to breathe either, the giggling suddenly cutting short in a wave of hot, coiled tension. Tension no one did anything about, as they laid there underneath the covers and caught their breath.

It was probably five minutes before Steve finally reached out and poked Bucky's right arm.

"Pretty sure it was the fruit."

They spilled into giggles again, laughing and kicking at the blankets above them until they were curled up next to each other, sheets draped over their heads and comforter tangled around their necks and torsos, knees bumping and fingers pressed to backs of hands, and fell back asleep.

The room was warm and everything was soft and dark and they slept most of the day through.

By the time they'd both woken back up it was getting dark again outside.

"We should go out," Bucky declared, emerging from where he'd been tying his hair up in the bathroom. Steve studied the painting above the fireplace up for a few more seconds before turning around and raising an eyebrow.

"Out?" His voice was way higher than it should have been, but Bucky's hair was in a bun. Practically on top of his head. It was messy and somehow perfect, soft strands framing his face and the rest pinned up all pretty. Steve could die from a heart attack.
"Drinking! We haven't done that since the war." Bucky made an adorable face and Steve forced himself to stop staring, processed Bucky's words - he was right, they hadn't been drinking.

_For good reason_, Steve thought to himself.

But somehow the next thing he knew he was carefully making his way across the Irish pub they'd found, plopping two pints down at a table. He obviously couldn't get drunk, but it was the spirit of the thing.

Which made him wonder a lot about all the times Bucky had been "drunk" during the war.

"Wait, can you...?" Steve asked, gesturing at their glasses.

"I can get tipsy. A little drunk if I try hard enough." Bucky raised his, dark liquid sloshing. "Here's to trying hard enough!"

He knocked back half the glass in one try but Steve was studying his (and the slightly wet puff of Bucky's mouth) and trying to figure something out.

"Are you sure you can get wasted?" he asked again, just to press, just to get a reaction out of Buck that might clue him in on the truth. The skeptical look on his face would make Bucky nervous if it wasn't true, if he'd been faking the whole time - why would he fake being drunk enough to fall asleep in Steve's bed?? - but if he really could get wasted he'd roll his eyes, make fun of Steve for not being able to.

"I totally can!" he said defensively, snatching Steve's glass from him too. Okay, mixed signals. Steve studied him suspiciously, but by the time he'd knocked back quite a few, it looked like what he'd said'd been mostly true.

His knock-off version of the serum could get him a little tipsy. His personality did the rest.

"C'moon, come sing wi' me!" Bucky whined, tugging at Steve's arm. Steve laughed, barely catching his glass before it tipped and spilled all over the bar.

"Okay, last time I had to get the Commandos to _push_ you out of the seat," Steve complained, but it was fruitless because he was letting Bucky drag him towards the karaoke stage.

They'd specifically picked an Irish bar because it was Steve's heritage, but it was also a bonus that everyone would be drunk as hell - it meant no one would think to tape Captain America getting hauled on stage by his assassin best friend and a microphone shoved in his face.

"I don't know any modern songs," Steve hissed, glaring at Bucky who was already humming along to whatever song was just closing up.

"You're mem'ry's like...kickazz," Bucky slurred, shoving Steve in the arm. "F'gure it ou'."

With a heavy sigh, Steve relented and thumbed through the song choices. Bucky hovered over his shoulder, trying to peer around and see what Steve was singing, so he kicked him off the karaoke stage with a firm _no way_ and sat him down in the closest chair.

Thankfully the karaoke-song-choosing device wasn't half as complicated as half of Stark's equipment, so it didn't take long until Steve _found a song_ that he decided would be absolutely perfect. Bonus, it even sounded Irish, so by the time the first rowdy notes started up, half the patrons were shouting cheers.
Bucky tipped back his chair, eyes glassy and movements loose as he blinked up at Steve with amused eyes, nursing another vodka and waiting for the singing to start. People were already clapping along by the time the music dropped to a simple drum beat.

Steve glanced at the screen, memorizing the first few words and deciding he'd just wing the melody. And act it out, because that would make up for the rotten singing. Probably.

"When I'm fat and old, and the kids thing I'm a joke-" he clutched a hand over his (perfectly sculpted) stomach and Bucky was already smiling, which was exactly the whole point. "Cause I move a little slow..."

He spun around in a fairly terrible circle, nearly tripping over himself as he sang the next line. "...when I daaance."

Bucky was nodding way too vigorously at that, making faces at Steve.

Then he froze, pointing at Bucky in the front row with a tilt of his head and the cheesiest Captain America smile he had, "I can count on you, after all that we've been through."

Bucky put a mock hand of surprise over his heart, mouth and smile wide as he looked up at Steve and Steve looked down from the stage. "Cause I know that you'll always understaaand..."

The bass dropped and the music was pounding loud, so Steve took three steps back, lifted the microphone up high, and shouted the first line of the chorus. "I won't act my age! No, I...won't act my age, no I'll stiiill feel the saaame around yooou...hey!!"

He glanced down at Bucky, who was laughing so hard he couldn't breathe, gasping with hand on his chest and water in his eyes. He looked drunk as hell, and Steve felt drunk as hell, just from the smile on Bucky's face, the gasping laugh and shaking head, the way those watery eyes were looking up at Steve like he was the cutest thing in the world.

The rest of the bar was cheering and clapping, even though they probably had no idea how ironic the song really was. Because really, Steve was ninety-five, Bucky was even older, and how could he pass up a song called Act My Age? Even if he'd never heard of the band before. Direction something.

This time when Bucky clambered back up on stage, Steve just handed him the other microphone, clapping along with the rowdy Irish sound while Bucky shook his head, mouthed you're a dork at Steve, and quickly scanned the rest of the lyrics to memorize them. Minds like theirs gave an unfair advantage to karaoke but he didn't care at all.

"When I'm fat and old, and the kids think I'm a joke," Bucky started, his voice incrementally better than Steve's, even if the words were a little slurred. "Cause the stories that I told, I tell agaaain and agaain."

Steve clapped, because yes, Bucky told stories all the goddamned time, the Commandos used to make it into a game, who could get more stories out of Barnes before the night was over. "I can count on you-" Bucky sang, tilted his head comically at Steve, who couldn't keep his foolish smile off his face.

"...after all we got up to." That one came with a quirked eyebrow that Steve knew was exactly for all those times in back alleys, pulling Steve out of fights and getting into them himself, all the prank wars and the trouble they used to get in. It was all there written in the sideways smile and the shining eyes looking at him from the other side of the stage.
"Cause I know that you truly understaaand...I won't act my age," Bucky bent in half, singing straight into the microphone with all of his Brooklyn Beauty energy and the crowd went wild, jumping and cheering and drunkenly singing along while Steve laughed and tried not to look so in love with his best friend. "No I...won't act my age! No, I'll still feeel the saaame around you."

Steve lifted his own microphone, taking a step closer so they were facing each other as he joined in and they sang together. "I won't act my age, no I-" he scrunched up his nose and squeezed his eyes shut to hit the high part "-won't act my age, no I'll stiiill feel the saaame, and you will too...."

They looked at each other for the brief second pause, then Bucky turned out to the crowd and lifted his hands as he shouted "Hey!!"

The whole bar lit up with the excited cheering na na na na na's as Steve and Bucky jumped around stage like morons, clapping their hands and riling everyone up even more. The folk instruments in the background rapidly pattered over a fast part and Bucky did a pretty impressive foot move to match that had more people cheering and Buck tipping his head back to laugh, looking at Steve with those shining eyes.

His hair was a total mess, pieces dislodged from his messy bun and flying around his face as he danced and it was probably the most breathtaking thing Steve had seen on their entire trip.

They danced closer, meeting somewhere in the middle of the stage for the bridge, singing turned to mostly sing-shouting like the way they had in the car, loud and crazy and matching the song's energy perfectly.

"When I can hardly walk and my hair is falling out--" Before he could lose his nerve Steve reached over and tucked a piece of the unruly hair behind Bucky's ear, raising an eyebrow at him that said exactly what a mess Bucky looked like right now. Buck bit his lip to keep from smiling, shoving Steve's shoulder playfully and whistling along to the song as he shook his head, dislodging more pieces from the bun on purpose.

Steve tipped his head back and laughed so Bucky took the next line, singing straight to the audience, "We'll still stay out too long and--"

"--we'll throw the afterparty!" Steve joined in, shoving Bucky back, then they were both singing oh yeah's in each other's faces, standing way too close and leaning closer as the music crescendoed and everything got louder and louder - then fell perfectly silent as they both pointed up at the sky for the acapella break for the loud shout of, "Won't act my age, no I..."

A single piano chord and Steve took the high part again, hand splayed over his stomach to give him the air support, "...won't act my age, no I'll still--" he glanced over at Bucky, who was looking straight at him with this wide affectionate smile and they were both total morons, more high on each other than anything else, but Steve wouldn't change it for the world, "--feel the same about you."

It was a lyric slip, but the bass and drumset hit again before Steve could think about what he'd just said. Besides, Bucky was probably too drunk to realize the difference between "still feel the same around you" and "still feel the same about you." It could mean nothing. Steve was gonna pretend it meant nothing. Not that he'd been in love with his best friend since the beginning of time.

"I won't act my age, no I won't act my age," They shouted the last chorus together, Bucky's arm looped around Steve's shoulders as he pulled him down heavily against Bucky's side, the way he used to when Steve was a hell of a lot smaller, but he wasn't complaining. "--I'll still feel the same, and you will too."
The music froze and Buck turned his head to meet Steve's gaze only they were standing way too close for that, sides pressed together, and their noses almost bumped and Steve could practically taste the alcohol on Bucky's breath and good god, his heart was pounding out of his chest.

"Hey!! Na na na na na na," Bucky interjected happily, arm moving down to wrap around Steve's waist, then he was pulling him along with the metal hand looped through Steve's fingers, jump-waltzing them around the stage for the last round of na na na's. Steve laughed and the bar spun and the music was so loud and Bucky was smiling at him, dancing them so fast and wild that it was amazing they didn't fall, feet circling each other and hands squeezing hard, one of his palms splayed on Bucky's side and one of Bucky's gripping him back, tight so he wouldn't fall as they spun and spun and the lights turned into a blur then the music crescendoed one last time and cut with a final burst of music.

The bar was perfectly silent for about three seconds, then the crowd went insanely loud, cheering and shouting and Bucky was laughing more, patting Steve's shoulder and drawing them out of the crazy dance, bowing low to the crowd and nudging Steve to bow too.

He felt like he was in a daze, stumbling to set their microphones back down, while Bucky waved and blew kisses at the crowd. Steve made it back to his side just as he decided to try jumping off the stage. He lunged and caught Bucky's right arm before he faceplanted, then the crowd was laughing and Bucky blinked up at him with a surprised expression, turning between the edge of the stage and Steve and trying to cognize how the hell he'd almost fell.

The Winter Soldier, deadly assassin, had almost just nose-dived the ground because he couldn't figure out where the end of a damn karaoke stage was.

Steve couldn't breathe he was laughing so hard, then Bucky was pouting and shoving at him with that beautiful smile and Steve dragged them both down the stage stairs, arm slung haphazardly over Bucky's shoulders, tucking him close against Steve's side as they pushed through the crowd, hands clapping shoulders and random cheers still spurting through the group.

Bucky was chattering and laughing and so goddamned beautiful that Steve's lungs weren't working; they'd just danced again. It'd been short and brief and crazy but all he wanted to do was dance with Bucky for the rest of his life and Bucky's arm was around his shoulders again and the bar floor was spinning like he'd been the one to down a bottle of vodka.

Actually, on that thought - Steve reached out the free arm that wasn't curled around Bucky's waist, snagging the closest shot and tipping his head back to down it in one swing. It burned on the way down, but there was another cheer from the crowd. It wouldn't do anything, but it made it a hell of a lot easier to pretend.

Then Bucky was smiling loose and pretty at him and Steve was smiling back, laughing as he got poked in the side, and maybe he didn't need alcohol to get drunk at all. Some of the drinkers got together to shout something at them that was way too slurred to figure out so Steve waved his free hand at the crowd, tugging Bucky towards the door with a shout of thanks over his shoulder.

They stumbled into the night air and Bucky was still laughing, leaning his weight on Steve's side like he'd fall over if he didn't. Buck was wasted, (or acting like it) and Steve was high on life and karaoke and the feeling of Bucky's warmth pressed up against his side.

If Bucky was faking, Steve had every right to fake too. If he wasn't? Well, then he wouldn't remember anything in the morning anyways, right?

Arms slung over shoulders they stumbled to the hotel two doors down, crashing into the rented room still out of breath from laughter and shouting and dancing like crazy people. Bucky was more out of it than even he was - Steve was basically holding him up, propping Bucky on his side as he shouldered his way through the wood door and locked it tight behind them.

"God, their faces," Bucky slurred, giggling. "They don' ev'n know you're li'...nin'y fiiive."

He didn't remember much about being drunk, only that his Brooklyn accent got ridiculous - so for a moment, Steve decided to forget his sculpted words, the way he forced himself to talk without a trace of the slum he grew up in.

Steve laughed and tugged Bucky away from the door, shoving him unceremoniously on the bed. "You're old'a 'an me!"

"Been thr' way mor' shit too," Bucky mused, blinking lazily up at Steve from where he was sprawled out across the top of the covers. Oh yeah, yeah, that was right. Bucky had been a POW, had had some not so hot experiences with getting drunk.

Steve plopped down on the bed next to him, turning Bucky's face to him with a heavy palm on the scratchy cheek. "You don' gotta worry, Buck. Don't hafta be afraid." He leaned in closer, the icy eyes locked heavy on his. "Cos even if we've got nothin', we've got us."

Even when I had nothing, I had Bucky.

Big wet blue eyes blinked up at him, then Bucky's hand pressed to Steve's cheek too and they were so close, their mouths just inches away. If they were really drunk, they might have an excuse, except Steve still wasn't sure how much of what Bucky was doing was an act. Some of it, he was pretty sure, but what if it was a hell of a lot less than it looked like?

He considered shying away, until Bucky's fingers curled in his hair, possessively keeping Steve's face close as he whispered up at him with his slurred words. "'M so damn gl'd we made it ta this time."

Steve swallowed and Bucky's eyes cut to his mouth as his tongue darted out subconsciously. A temporary crush, then. Alcohol, singing, exhaustion - whatever it was that was making Bucky look at him like that. It had to be.

They were frozen looking at each other for a moment, gazes on mouths and eyes and searching and god, this was everything, the feeling of Bucky's fingers in his hair, Buck's scratchy jaw under his hand, long hair splayed out around him like some gorgeous model.

With a too-innocent look, icy eyes blinked up at him, wide and pretty and oh so sweet as Bucky's perfect wet lips parted. "'M s' cold, Steviee," he groaned, sounding obscene, and Steve was lightheaded again. Only this time it felt like the good kind.

So maybe he kicked off his shoes, laying down fully next to Bucky and snagging two pillows from the top of the bed, hand slipping down to Bucky's neck as the beautiful eyes didn't leave his.

"Hey, well, I'm a furnace now, so..." Steve trailed off, raising an eyebrow at Bucky, and that was all it took before Bucky was climbing half on top of him, dramatically draping himself over Steve's chest and nestling his cold nose against Steve's neck.

Steve closed his eyes and ran his hands up Bucky's back, soaking in the warmth and the weight of him pressed heavy over Steve, the muscles under his hands, and if his shirt rucked up a little in the process it couldn't have been Steve's fault.
He could hold Bucky like this every single day for the rest of his life.

Once, a long time ago, he'd made a joke about how maybe he couldn't kiss, and Bucky had looked at him with bright eyes and offered well, I'm a pretty great teacher?

He'd almost collapsed at the comment, had thankfully been sitting down, but he'd forced it out of his mind until now, with Bucky's mouth lax and wet on the collar of his shirt and god, what would he give to have that mouth on his skin instead?

"Y'know," Steve started, hands stilling from where they'd been mapping Bucky's back. On second thought he traced one down the center of Bucky's spine, all the way down to where his shirt had rucked up, leaving the small of his back bare as Steve spread his palm over it, humming at the warmth. "If you want to really warm up in the winter, skin gives off more warmth than clothes do..."

Bucky sat up so fast Steve almost took it back, almost dropped the out-of-it-act (although he really did feel like he was barely here, like he was drunk on something because good god the world was still spinning), almost darted off the bed and apologized.

Except then Bucky threw his shirt off over his head and the words sucked back into his mouth, lungs seizing in a gasp for air as he stared at Bucky, sitting up over him with his shirt hastily tossed off and thrown to some corner of the room and Steve could die.

He was just gaping, staring, at the barechested Bucky, not realizing how much time was passing or what the hell he was doing, until cool metal tugged at his shirt, a whining sound out of that pretty wet mouth, and Steve realized he was supposed to take off his shirt too.

He lifted up just enough to pull it over his head and he hadn't even tossed it off the bed yet before Bucky collapsed back on top of him, fingers curling into Steve's side as his head pillowed on Steve's bare chest. Lightning shot up Steve's spine and straight to other places, pants tightening, and fuck he was a terrible person, but Bucky was squirming around to get comfortable on his bare chest and Steve couldn't die, he'd already died and gone to heaven.

Removing clothes to get warmer when there was a perfectly functional thermostat and a heavy comforter beneath them? Sure. Why the hell not.

Less than five seconds later and his palms were running over Bucky's back again, eliciting a soft sound out of him, then those wet lips parted and Steve could feel Bucky's open mouth against the tight skin on his collarbone and the world was spinning faster than when they'd been dancing in that bar twenty minutes ago.

It was his responsibility as the most not-drunk one here to keep shenanigans at bay instead of encouraging them, but good god Bucky was shirtless in his arms, there was nothing in the world that could stop Steve from wanting this, let alone his own libido.

So he squeezed tighter and Bucky went lax against him, eyes slipped closed and silky hair brushing Steve's skin and the sheer awe and arousal pulsing through him was the most overwhelming thing Steve had ever felt.

But he was exhausted. And the most comfortable he could remember being. Besides, Bucky needed him here in case he had nightmares from the alcohol, right? This was perfectly rational, as perfectly rational as holding hands to watch the sunset or dancing around bars together or singing each other love songs that fit too well in the car...

And then he was asleep and rational didn't matter the slightest bit anymore.
Bucky woke right after two, consciousness snapping back into his body in silence that had him counting his surroundings - tactical move - before deciding to open his eyes.

All he could see was blonde. The side of Steve's head, his nose pressed to a spot right below Steve's ear. Bucky closed his eyes again, pretty damn quickly; set to evaluate and recalculate.

He'd fallen asleep draped half across Steve. In Steve's arms. They weren't wearing shirts, jesus. There was no way they were ignoring their way out of this one.

In a quick, perfectly executed movement, Bucky slid half a foot backwards, effectively landing on the pillow next to Steve without disturbing him. One of Steve's arms was still pinned under his body but at least they weren't breathing in tandem anymore, at least Bucky could see more than just a faceful of Steve's dandelion puff hair.

What the hell were they supposed to do now?

He stared at Steve for hours, memorizing lines and slopes and angles and bone structure and freckles. Just in case. He had no idea how the morning would go once Steve woke back up.

There was an unmistakable sense of warmth that curled into his consciousness first, then the weight of eyes on him, and Steve blinked his own open. It took a few moments to register the room, the sunlight pouring through the windows, the white sheets and light blue comforter stretched out below him.

And Bucky, sitting shirtless on the edge of his bed. Steve lifted his head, propped up on his elbow, realized he was shirtless too, and the night before came back to him in an instantaneous flash.

They'd fallen asleep that way. Bucky had woken up first, which meant he'd had time to think, which meant--

"We should go back to New York." Bucky's voice drifted softly over the morning sunlight, dead of emotion, like he was reporting the weather. It didn't have a right to still sound so soft when he was refusing to look at Steve.

Just the beautiful, sunlit, arch of Bucky's back, metal shoulder facing away from Steve so he could only see Bucky's profile, the parts of him that were still all human. And bare, beautiful, had been pressed against Steve's naked chest all night.

Fuck. Steve collapsed back down onto the pillows, breath flying out of his lungs as he repeated Bucky's words in his head. Back to New York.

He stared at the ceiling and wondered whether the past month had positively been the best or worst thing they could have done.
Disclaimer: there are some strange scenarios in this, but actually, most of them are based on legit things that have happened to me throughout my various trips across the country.

Like the inmates at the rest stop, that happened to me. All the exhibits and places I used are real life places you can go as well.

And here's a song for Steve: Something I Need - OneRepublic

Sorry for all the classic rock and One Direction I warned you guys it was a lot of cheesy ass music. Honestly I think we just needed a happy chapter (can I count this as a happy chapter?) before the next one of terribleness. Don't hate me.

Thank you all for reading! Your comments give me life xx

(PS IM SORRY THIS GOT SO LONG I DON'T KNOW HOW THAT HAPPENED)
Disclaimer: pay attention to the warnings!!

WARNINGS: suicide attempts, eating disorders, mentions of self harm, lots of discussion about death and worthlessness, graphic depictions of trauma and pain, a shit ton of sleep deprivation, street hecklers that are assholes

Christ everyone is a fucking mess is this chapter

After I've gotten some feedback on this, I'm going to reinforce there are very very realistic suicide thoughts / scenes, which I have placed between *'s so if you need to skip, do it there.

Glittering Clouds - Imogen Heap
Save Me - Globus

(also lots of Fall Out Boy quotes no regrets)

Also Tony is a music guru who knows everything about modern music and chooses to listen to classic rock because its better #confirmed

See the end of the chapter for more notes
"You called?" Steve crossed his arms over his chest, leaning against the closest lab table that wasn't holding explosives. Tony spun around, fingers tapping into another file, pulling up documents as he spoke.

"Yes, actually. I've got some awkward questions for you." Steve raised an unimpressed eyebrow. They'd gotten back to New York an hour ago from their silent car ride home and already Tony was up to his antics. Stark waved a hand around, making his contemplative how-do-I-say-this-in-English face. "Has Barnes been eating?"

That was definitely a weird question, but he shrugged and answered anyways. "Yeah. I mean, it took some convincing."

Tony tapped a blue screen, too fast for Steve to catch. "...and he's been leaving for the restroom after meals?"

And the questions were getting weirder. It took a bit of mental calculation to answer that one because he hadn't been counting. But, looking at it, "Um, yeah, I guess. I dunno, why?"

"I think we've got ourselves a problem."

"What kind of problem?" He kept the words slow, so it wouldn't be so obvious that his heart was pounding out of his chest. The look on Tony's face - like he was already apologetic before he even started speaking - was making his stomach coil in fear.

"Look..." Too gentle, his voice too kind, the way a soldier reported the death of a fallen comrade. "Barnes's sugar levels are record low, his stomach's unnaturally small, his energy level's down...and then there's this."

"The hell is that?" It wasn't supposed to be demanding, but that medical diagram looked terrible, all torn up and complicated, and they were talking about Bucky.

"His knees show signs of repetitive bruising without time to properly heal in between. So unless you two have finally acted on that mixtape I sent with you..." Tony raised his eyebrows as he looked up; somehow cautious, smug, and curious at the same time, and it took Steve a moment before he caught the reference.

"No! No. God, no. We – no."

The teasing that would normally accompany that didn't come. Instead Tony grimaced, flicking through another table of calculations as he took a sip from one of his infamously strange drinks.

"That's what I was afraid of. So if he hasn't been on his knees for you--" The indignant squeak out of Steve's mouth at that was entirely not his fault, "--that basically confirms the rest of this."

Stark waved a vague hand but all the numbers and charts and pictures weren't the kind of English that Steve spoke.

"Which is..." he prompted, rolling a hand. Finally, Tony looked him dead on, stilling from his fidgeting with that rare seriousness.

"I don't think Barnes's been keeping down anything he's eating."

Steve just stared.

"Excuse me?" It had to be a miscalculation. "No. The two of us just spent an entire month together. There's no way I wouldn't have noticed."

He'd crossed his arms over his chest, defending his best friend, because there was no way Buck had an eating disorder that Steve just happened to overlook. Especially if it was as obvious as bruised knees and puking in the bathroom. Although when had he seen Buck in shorts? Only at the swimming pool...but there had been a lot going on, he hadn't exactly been checking Bucky's well being. There had to have been other signs if it was true. He was supposed to be looking out for Bucky, supposed to be taking care of him now.

"No offense Cap," Tony started slowly, taking a step closer. "But you've got a lot going on too."

"It doesn't matter," he hissed, glaring so he could ignore the water starting to build up in the corners of his eyes. Tearing up wasn't going to make it any better. But everything Tony was implying? "No, if something was this wrong, there's no way I wouldn't have--"

Steve broke off, staring at all of the clear, factual evidence staring right back at him. He'd sat beside that man for a month. Shared a bed with him for half of it.

"God, Tony, how could I not have noticed?" His voice cracked and he had to take a shaky breath to keep himself from crying. But Bucky was hurting, his Bucky was broken and he'd done nothing, he hadn't even known.

Bucky'd told him once, in the beginning, that his body rejected certain foods. The mental image of Buck alone and throwing up had been devastating; Steve'd shut it out of mind. He'd figured - stupidly - that he was taking good enough care of Bucky, that doing that wasn't an issue anymore--

"Hey, he's trained to keep things secret, okay? It's not your fault."

"It is my fault." Steve threw up his hands, frustrated and teary eyed, because it didn't matter that Bucky was trained to keep secrets, it was Steve's job to see past them. "I'm supposed to be looking out for him!"

"Nobody can do that all on their own." The bluntness hadn't left Tony's voice - no one could ever accuse him of being soft - but he did wipe the files out of sight and throw some sympathy in Steve's direction. "Look. I've been meaning to offer for a while, since Barnes is so restless. Your apartment's tiny, but if you both moved in here, you'd have reign of a lot more space. So instead of running off, he could run up three floors and crash at Clint's or something."

Tony shrugged and Steve wiped a finger under his eyes, smoothing away the unfallen tears. It wasn't confirmed, there was always the chance of assumptions and mistakes. All hope wasn't lost.

"I'll run it by him, see what he thinks." He'd probably say yes, but Steve wouldn't make a decision that big without asking permission, especially since nobody'd allowed Buck to have an opinion for so long.

"And if you move in, we can keep an eye on his health. You don't have to go this alone, Cap. If he's here, we'll be able to help him...It'll at least be harder for him to keep secrets."

He forced a tight nod and tighter smile. Anything that would help Bucky, he'd do. And a little more socialization would probably be good for him. Or both of them.

"How bout I give you a rundown of those reports while we wait? He's gotta come in the lab entrance anyway. And there's another test I can do, to check stomach acid levels and everything. Just to confirm."

Tony started thumbing through the file as Steve pulled up a stool and tapped out a message to Bucky.

Idea to run by you. In Starks garage lab.

It was only a few minutes later when his pocket buzzed and Steve got his response.

D grt CapAm can txt its a modern miracle

There was something about getting a text from Bucky that made him warm inside. Maybe it was the comfort in knowing that regardless of how far apart they were, for at least a few seconds in time he'd been on Bucky's mind. And actually, he didn't know how far apart they were - Buck had taken off as soon with a few thrown ambiguous words the second they got back. But he'd taken Steve's bike which meant it wasn't permanent.

And the science geek can communicate long distance, Steve typed back. Barely a minute this time before the next vibration.

Not tht long c u soon

"You texting Barnes?" The voice from the other side of the room asked, way too casual. Steve pocketed his phone and looked back up.

"Yeah, why?"

"You've got that fool smile on your face."

Steve transformed said smile into an annoyed frown and Tony laughed. Which reminded him, wasn't he going to strangle Stark for that mixtape about Bucky?

Speaking of the devil (or the angel), Steve's thoughts got cut short by the loud roaring of an engine as his bike came racing down the tunnel to the lab garage.

The tires skid and the bike cut to the side in a diagonal slide, squealing to a stop inches from crashing into a lab table. The roar of the engine cut and one leg swung gracefully over the side, a creak of leather as two gloved hands reached for a helmet, tugging it up and off in a cascade of sweaty, tumbling dark hair and the sharp click of boots as Bucky walked over, helmet under one arm, hair a gorgeous mess around his face, smelling like leather and the pungent sharpness of the city, jaw chiseled to fuck, exotic lips soft pink, eyes clear enough to be waterfalls, and a swing in his hips like he ruled the entire world.

He ruled Steve's world, anyways.

"Wow," Stark commented from behind him, voice thankfully covered by the sound of the blow torch. "Your boyfriend is really hot."

"God, I know," Steve sighed dreamily before he froze, registering Tony's words and the smug look. "...wait what?"

By the time the opportunity opened to slug Tony, Bucky was already crossing the floor, well within earshot. Steve glared as evilly as possible. Stark smirked back.

Really, he needed to know how Stark had found out his secret. Maybe his old drawings of Bucky showed the underlying fondness? Was there a history book somewhere that speculated army tent conversations? They'd always been so careful - or at least, Steve had. Bucky didn't have a reason to. He didn't have anything to hide.

If only...

Steve turned away from glaring at Tony, nearly jumping as he realized Buck was right there, standing a foot away with his head tilted up, crystal eyes sparkling coyly at Steve like he knew exactly how beautiful he was. Or he was teasing again because god, he was always teasing and Steve was always fumbling to keep his reactions sane.

"I'm gonna go take a shower," Bucky said casually, like the words weren't sending a thousand images through Steve's head of his nose tucked in Bucky's damp hair, holding their warm bodies together under a pile of blankets, or the exquisite muscles of his naked back under Steve's hands, pressed together hot and needy and-- "Can we talk after?"

Because he didn't trust himself not to open his mouth and either say something permanently condemning or cover Bucky's lips with his own, he nodded vigorously and tried not to look like he was falling deeper in love every day.

The corner of that precious mouth curved up in response, the one-sided start to a smile that always made Steve's heart melt. Unmoving as two chess pieces, a knight and a rook frozen in places on a board they'd been dancing circles around forever, gazes locked on each other in a battle to the ground.

Maybe it was the guarded affection in Steve's eyes or the familiar silent standoff of nothing in particular, but the side grin suddenly expanded, pretty lips curving up wide and honest and stunning, every feature lighting up, a smile that belonged in the back of Brooklyn alleys; and he looked so astonishingly much like the beauty Steve grew up with that his knees went weak.

Some part of his brain was functioning enough to lean back against the lab table, propping himself up on the cold metal with gripping hands, unable to stop watching as that bright face strolled by him, then he was left to stare at the back of Bucky's jacket as he ascended the spiral staircase.

God, it wasn't fair. Buck was so perfect, why did his body have to reject nourishment? Wait, wait, Steve'd planned to check him over the next time he saw him, to look for bagginess in his clothes, sunken ribs or cheekbones or something, and he'd totally blown it off, it'd slipped his mind entirely--

So that was it. This was why he'd never noticed Bucky's eating disorder. He was too busy fawning over him to actually look at his best friend.
What the hell kind of friend was Steve?

"You know, I'm pretty sure my dad would be disappointed as hell to find out the serum actually makes you blind."

"What?" Steve asked, remembering he wasn't alone.

"Did you see the way he was looking at you?" Tony swiped a screen to the side so he could look at Steve directly, deliver his next line with his signature dead-serious genius science-y monotone. "Like he wanted to tangle those metal fingers in your hair and fuck you sideways on a lab table."

Steve raised an unimpressed eyebrow. He was pretty damn sure he'd know if Bucky looked at him like that. He'd been pining after the guy for their entire lives, he'd know the moment a thought like that - even more innocent ones than that - crossed Bucky's mind. Arguing was useless; he gave Tony the bullshit Captain America Disapproves look that the public ate up like sugar. (If only they knew.)

"I was friends with your father, you know. Buck even more so." He crossed his arms over his chest for good measure, puffing up to the righteous Red White and Blue pose that pissed Tony off. Instead of getting annoyed though, Tony looked more amused.

"You even call him Buck."

"What's that supposed to mean? It's not like the stupid boner thing is it?"

Tony laughed. A lot. Steve glared.

~~~

Hurting Bucky was the last thing he wanted, but if they could avoid the eating disorder fight, he'd take a few seconds of pain.

Buck was sitting on a stool at one of the hundred bars that graced the Avengers Tower, hair slicked back wet from his shower, wearing leggings that weren't half as tight as the shit Steve owned but gorgeous enough to be outlawed.

He looked up when Steve walked in, setting down the book he'd been reading and raising his eyebrows. Steve made his way over, pretending to be distracted by his phone so he'd have an excuse when he tripped over the stool in front of Bucky's.

A metal hand shot out to steady him, but not before Steve reached to catch himself, the heel of his hand smacking hard on Bucky's knee. Steve was heavy, landing on a "repetitive bruise" would be painful. Unless none of it was true and Bucky was fine, then he'd make some comment about Steve's clumsiness instead of jerking in pain.

"Clutz," Bucky muttered, helping Steve straighten back up without so much as a flicker across his face. Steve might as well have smacked his metal arm.

Bucky was okay. He had high pain tolerance, sure, but he'd at least flinch if Steve smacked one of his bruises, right? It was the involuntary reaction.

So a false alarm, old injuries and Jarvis confusing serum readings, nothing to worry about. He hadn't let Bucky down again. The relief that flooded him was instantaneous and intense and he plopped down on the stool beside Bucky the happiest he'd been since they'd sung in that Irish Bar a few days ago.

And Bucky was totally cool with moving into the Avengers Tower. So much so that Steve pretended to be a little offended and Bucky shoved his shoulder with a smile and said that Steve's apartment was too small for both their egos anyways.

It was so signature Bucky, still Steve's best friend through and through, the twinkle in his eyes and the way he fucked up Steve's hair with a ruffling hand as he took his book and left to lay claim to his new room.

There was no way he was keeping something as big as an eating disorder from Steve. Just so they could put this whole thing behind them, Steve pulled his phone out again, shooting off a quick text to Tony in the downstairs lab.

_Just talked to B we're moving in! You have final test results?_

It was only a few seconds before he got the text back. A report with the compilation of all of the data, evidence, and a clear resolution at the bottom.

_Undeniably positive._

Steve stared at the photo, zooming in, reading it again, checking again. It didn't make sense. How could--

No, because Bucky had been perfectly normal. Like nothing was wrong, the way he'd been for the past month. Months. Everything'd been fine. He hadn't even flinched.

Hydra...it had to be.

Fucking Hydra had made Bucky so damn used to pain that he didn't feel it anymore, that he didn't flinch when he got hurt. Steve had seen him get shot and Buck hadn't even cared, like his body didn't matter, like he didn't matter, like his entire self was worthless, meaningless, and he'd been throwing up for months and he'd never bothered to say, never reached out for help, he'd covered it with bright smiles and teasing and anything to keep from admitting that he was hurting and he hadn't even flinched, he'd taken the pain like it was something he was supposed to do, he'd hidden it from Steve like it was something to be ashamed of, like there was something wrong with him, like he wasn't allowed to be broken and he wasn't allowed to feel pain and, and--

Something shattered, loud and crashing, but it took blinking at the black mess of pieces on the ground for fifteen seconds before Steve registered it was his phone, that he'd thrown it, and he was still standing, breathing heavy, hands clenched in fists at his sides.

It took a faceful of water and a few dents in the edge of the sink before he managed to cool down enough to slink into the "quiet room" (aka attached office) of one of Tony's labs. He was sitting at a desk, writing a note of some sort, when Jarvis announced Steve's arrival and opened the door.

"I hate to ask --"

"Then don't," Tony offered, still writing with his head down. Steve ignored him and continued.

"-- but can I have a new phone?"

"You get what I sent you on your old one?" Tony glanced up for a millisecond before looking back down at whatever he was doing, too preoccupied to pay attention.

That is, until Steve dropped shattered pieces onto the table, scattering cracked glass and black plastic.

"That's why I need a new one." Steve crossed his arms over his chest and leaned back, detaching himself from the evidence of his destructive temper.

Tony finally looked up, for real this time, setting down his pen as he studied Steve like he was a malfunctioning lab experiment. He was. A few moments of silence as Tony picked up the pieces, letting them trickle through his fingers. Too-observant eyes cut back to him and Steve tried not to bristle in defense. "Cap, you okay?"

"Fine." Sharp and curt enough that Tony should drop it.

The calculating gaze broke away as Tony rummaged through one of the drawers for a new phone, tone exaggeratedly casual.

"You wouldn't happen to be getting that pre-serum temper back?"

Steve grit his teeth, response clipped and a little brutal. "I've got a handle on it Stark."

"You know me." Tony put his hands up in surrender, the paradigm of innocence when he was anything but. "Just trying to help."

"Oh, is that what you're doing? I could've sworn you were prying into my personal business. And I disabled the cameras in my room, by the way. Hope that's not too much of a problem."

Steve glared and Tony looked chagrined by the sarcasm for three seconds before returning the glare, sliding the new phone across the desk haughtily.

"You're welcome, Rogers."

"Thank you ever so kindly, O' god of technology." Steve shot back, snatching the device and storming out of the office, letting the door slam behind him.

Tony stared at the empty space for a few minutes, making a mental note to reinforce all the doorknobs and frames on Rogers' floor.

"Hey Jarvis," Tony called, waiting for the customary yes sir as he scooped the destroyed pieces of Cap's old phone into the trash. "Put a tag on Steve's emotional spikes. I think the Captain's not doing as well as he'd like everyone to think."

~~~

CFB: you're having a moving-in party?

JBB: b thr or b sqr

CFB: god you do realize no one actually texts like that in this century

JBB: idc I hav 1 hnd gfsoi

CFB: I'll be at your moving-in party just so I don't have to text you anymore

JBB: asshole
"Just to be clear," Natasha started, uncapping a beer with her ring and sliding it across the bar to Clint, who made a face. "Are we celebrating Barnes and Rogers moving in here or moving in together?"

Her mouth quirked up on one side, the smile that implied unmistakable mischief.

The other Russian assassin averted his gaze, perfectly masked nonchalance as he cracked open another pistachio and slid it to Steve, standing on the other side of the bar.

The awkwardness was palpable enough that Tony decided he'd be a good person for once and come to the rescue.

"We're celebrating 4.5 fulltime Avengers living in the Avengers Tower." He snagged the orange juice from the fridge and sat it down in front of Steve's friend. "Me, Cap, Sarge. Then Barton and Romanoff both count as a half because they live here when they're in the state. Which is never. And Steve's friend gets the other half."

He shot Wilson a smug smile, handing him a whiskey glass for his orange juice.

"So let me get this straight," Sam leaned forward on his barstool, ignoring the glass and the orange juice both. "The world's deadliest assassin gets a full membership but only .5 goes to the guy that helped take down Hydra and's been watching Steve Rogers' ass for the past six months?"

"Hate to break it to you Wilson," Bucky finally piped up, "But everyone watches Steve's ass, you don't get a medal for that."

Natasha laughed and Clint snickered but Tony was way more interested in Steve's reaction. He had a torn look on his face like he was trying desperately to figure out if that was a you-are-reckless-and-everyone-has-to-babysit-you comment or a you-have-a-smoking-hot-ass comment.

Like he said - serums apparently make Brooklyn boys blind.

But now wasn't the time to have an existential crisis over everyone's feelings; Tony saved the day again before Rogers blew up the tower with his intense blush.

"Sarge, you drink?" He offered, grabbing a few bottles of his best bourbon and wines from behind the counter.

"You invent things?" He sassed back. Apparently serums made people blind and sarcastic. He'd have done Project Rebirth differently, he mused.

Barnes rolled the bottles in his biohand, looking over the labels. "But it takes a lot of kick for me to feel it. Pretty sure I could drink Romanov under the table."

Natasha made a very offended face that was mostly skepticism.

Barnes spread his arms with a cocky grin on his face. "Serum, what can I say?"

"Stark, give him the strongest stuff you got," she ordered, tapping the bar for him to hurry up.

Well that sounded like a brilliant plan. "Finally, some people who know how to party!"

The drinking games commenced and Rogers leaned against the bar, watching with a hint of amusement and a lot of faked scorn.
Until Natasha grabbed him by one scientifically perfected bicep and dragged him off to the side where no one could overhear. Steve had no idea what for, but by the look on her face he was about to get lectured.

Behind them Buck and Tony were engaged in an intense and likely detrimental drinking game while Sam snickered and Clint ate his seventh slice of pizza. Earlier, Steve'd almost joked that Clint ate more than the serum recipients, until he'd remembered test results and bitten his tongue. Literally.

"Rogers, please tell me this crazy innocence act hasn't got you fooled too."

Steve didn't grace that with a response. He'd spent a month on the road with Bucky, had lived inside that fantasy world with him where nothing mattered. They'd come home and reality hit and it was painful and terrible, but Bucky was no less Bucky now than he had been then.

"He showed up at your door half-crazed and bloody. He's almost killed you what, four times now? At least? He shot me. Twice."

"And he's had plenty of opportunities to kill me since, but he hasn't taken one of them. He's healing, Nat. I need to be there for him. He's struggling with the idea of being dependent..."

"He's a professional. It's his job to make you feel exactly what you're feeling right now. I promise, every single thought in your head about him, all you've ever felt - he has put there with expert care and derision."

Steve glanced away, his gaze landing reflexively on the beautiful boy smirking at the bar, pushing long silky hair away from crystal eyes and gorgeous features. Well, clearly not all, he thought.

When he turned back to Natasha she had a look on her face that implied she knew exactly what Steve'd been thinking. "I just want you to be careful."

"Aren't I always?" Steve smiled and gestured Nat back to the bar because Stark was lining up vodka shots and she'd been looking for an excuse to drink Buck under the table all night.

"You have the weirdest drinking style," Tony slurred, twenty minutes and a close competition later, "You've got tastes - and down shit - like you're Irish, but a Russian poker face and strange draw to vodka."

Bucky smiled loose and pretty, the way he used to in golden-lit bars of the past. "Well, spent a lotta time in Russia over th' past couple decades. But Ma..." Bucky paused, contemplating for a moment before he corrected, or clarified. Steve was never sure. "...Steve's Ma - was Irish as hell, Catholic single mom, nurse taking care a' two kids in the dirty thirties.....only person I know tough as Sarah Rogers is Peggy Carter."

"You knew Peggy?" Tony interjected curiously, leaning forward on the bar. It was the perfect time to jump back in the conversation.

" Barely, they only met once," Steve answered, at the exact same time that Bucky started, "Really damn well, she's the one who--"

Buck froze, suddenly snapping his mouth closed as his widened eyes flicked to Steve, looking unmistakably guilty.

Steve crossed his arms over his chest and stuck his tongue in his cheek. Since when did Bucky know Peggy? Let alone "really damn well." Everyone'd always whispered how Sergeant Barnes was so cold towards Agent Carter. The only time Steve'd ever seen them interact was that first night in the bar, and Bucky had been pouty and shell-shocked. He'd even told Steve in his drunken haze that he didn't like her.

So where the hell did Bucky's answer come from?

He shifted uncomfortably in his seat, glancing between Steve and the table for a few moments before clearing his throat and finishing his sentence.

"...the one who was gonna marry my best guy, I had to make sure she wasn't some hack." The fake smile curved over his pretty face and Steve's eyes narrowed suspiciously.

"Possessive," Natasha commented with a raised eyebrow and her glass pressed to her lips.

"Damn right," Bucky shot back, settling into his cocky smirk.

Yeah, no way in hell Steve was gonna let himself analyze that comment. Buck'd always been protective, that's all he'd been implying. Right?

Apparently he wasn't the only one surprised by the comment. Clint's eyebrows shot to ceiling and Sam was glancing between them curiously. Buck ignored the looks, grabbing the closest glass and tipping it back.

And leaning back, on the precarious stool that suddenly threatened to tip. Then Bucky was flailing backwards and Clint jumped forward, catching a firm grip on Bucky's left wrist before he could topple to the ground.

It all happened in an instant, then Bucky cried out in pain, wrenching himself free. He didn't even have the time for a follow up whimper before Steve was at his side.

In one smooth movement he ducked under Bucky's right arm, wrapped his arm around Bucky's waist and straightened them both carefully, suddenly fit together like perfect puzzle pieces. Bucky melted against his side, tension draining as he let Steve support his weight and remove his mind from the pain.

They'd taken less three steps forward when Bucky's thankful expression suddenly changed, a darkening shift before he was shoving Steve off with a hasty, "I'm fine, I'm fine."

"Bucky," Steve chided, grabbing his elbow before he could pull away and freak out--

With a sharp twist Bucky yanked away from Steve's grip, wincing as he jarred his metal shoulder again. Steve bit back the exasperated huff, gritting his teeth as a soft cough reminded him that they weren't alone.

"I'm really sorry, man," Clint started, carefully keeping his hands to himself as Bucky cradled his metal elbow in his right hand. Buck gave him a tight smile and a quick shake of his head.

"Wasn't you. Performance error, not an often occurrence."

"The hell happened?" Tony inputted, finally speaking up.

"Nothing," Bucky replied defensively, narrowing his eyes. Everyone stared. After a beat or two of staredown with five concerned friends, Bucky sighed and deflated. "Fine. Ever get your shoulder yanked out of socket? Try that when your shoulder and arm aren't attached right in the first place."

Clint made a distressed noise and Tony's eyes went wide. As much as Steve would love to gasp himself, pull Bucky into his arms and hold him tight until he never hurt again, all this attention was going to be the exact opposite of what Bucky wanted. Instead he stepped in, replaying their conversation on the picnic tables about Bucky's arm - he didn't consider it a burden, and Steve wasn't going to make it one.

"I'll walk you back to our floor," he offered, taking a step closer and interrupting the pity party.

"I don't need your assistance, Rogers." Bucky grit his teeth, looking more annoyed than pissed.

"No, you don't, but I still haven't gotten a tour of the place and there's no reason to pull Sam away too." Steve lifted his shoulders innocently and Bucky rolled his eyes, grumbling quietly, but he took a step in Steve's direction, cocking his head towards the door.

Steve waved at everyone without taking his eyes off Bucky, carefully tossed an arm over his shoulders and guided him out of the room. Buck didn't even shrug out of Steve's hold until they parted ways on their floor.

But when the bedroom door closed in Steve's face, it was impossible to pretend he didn't hear the pained whimper from the other side as Buckycollapsed against the wall. Steve lay awake all night listening for more whimpering sounds. Buck was too good at keeping quiet. He didn't hear a peep.

~~~

Everything was fan-fucking-tastic when the sun rose over breakfast, table set in the perfect place to be lit up gold but not blinding. Which Bucky noticed and rambled on about, like the whole world was as perfectly bright as the glass breakfast nook of their tower floor.

Which meant that he was pretending last night didn't happen. Or the silent night in the car before that. Or any night since - and definitely including - the bar.

And it wasn't like Steve could say anything; calling Bucky out on his chipper smile was the last thing he wanted to do. So he ate his eggs in mostly-silence, pretending he wasn't watching close as Buck ate. He cut everything up into tiny pieces, but otherwise it seemed perfectly normal. Just like his smile and his attitude and everything was perfectly normal and Steve was fucking sick of it.

He hated lying. He'd only intentionally lied to Buck twice. But he couldn't stand the tension of the suspense anymore.

Steve cleared the breakfast dishes and casually told Bucky that he was going running with Sam, shouldering on his jacket and shoes and waving goodbye from the stairwell door. In some ironic twist, the anticipation was eating his stomach; but at least it was only a white lie? He did leave. He just only went as fall as the stairwell.

His training was sharpening up lately, but he wasn't at Bucky's observational level yet. He'd have to depend on Buck being too distracted to notice Steve stealth-sneaking back onto their floor.

He made it to the bathroom in perfect silence, right on time to hear the first heart-breaking lurch. The door wasn't closed - would've kicked it down if he needed to, so he slipped inside and forced himself not to freak at the sight of Buck on his knees, forehead resting heavy on the arms crossed over the toilet seat, long hair a veil to hide his face.
His back arched suddenly, another choking sound, and Steve bit his tongue and stooped down, smoothing his palms over flushed temples to pull Bucky's hair back as he coughed weakly. His forehead was warm against Steve's skin, holding back silky strands from his face with one hand, long pieces wrapped in a loose finger-ponytail with the other. He wondered distantly if this was why Bucky wore ponytails.

A few pained wretches later and suddenly Bucky rocked back onto his heels, nearly knocking into Steve. He hadn't reacted to the intrusion, like he didn't know or care that Steve was here, and for some reason that felt a hell of a lot worse. Because if he honestly didn't mind, he'd have told Steve about it. So that meant he was purposely ignoring him.

God, Steve just wanted to help. He was so far out of his depth.

Seconds later and Bucky pushed to his feet, breaking free from Steve's touch and washing his mouth out at the sink. Steve straightened up slowly, watching in cautious silence as Bucky toweled his face, threw the cloth down, and strolled out of the bathroom without a glance his way.

Great. This was going just great.

But the swift exit didn't keep him from following, on Bucky's heels all the way to the open living space. And he was still being ignored. Fine. If Bucky wasn't going to say anything, Steve would. There was no point in pretending he didn't know anymore.

"You ever plan on telling me?"

"You were supposed to be out," Bucky pointed out nonchalantly, pausing by the couch to worry the edge of a pillow between his fingers. Steve shifted his weight, one hand on his hip as he waited for Bucky to meet his eyes. He didn't so much as lift his head. Holding back an exasperated sigh, Steve took a single step closer, blocking the path to the doorway in case Buck tried to bolt.

"I'll take that as a no."

The combination of the movement and the words had Bucky's head snapping up, glaring cold Winter Soldier daggers but finally meeting his gaze.

"What did you want me to do? Oh Steve, I can't keep down most the food you shove at me because the only thing I've had in my mouth for the past seventy years is a rubber bite guard or a rubber something else, would you please hold back my hair for me as I keel over after every meal? Yeah. Really wondering myself why I didn't tell you that."

Steve crossed his arms over his chest and raised an unimpressed eyebrow.

"What?" Bucky demanded, throwing up a hand and glaring harder.

He was trying to get a rouse out of Steve, anything to distract from the truth, from what was going on. But Steve wasn't having any of it. He stayed perfectly silent, waiting and calm, eyes locked on Bucky's.

"What?" Bucky demanded again, voice pitching a little higher in hysteria. "It's not like I need your help! I've been handling this for months!"

When the shout died, the only sound in the room was the metallic whir of Bucky's arm as his fingers subconsciously crushed the edge of the pillow in his frustration. Silence was the best way to fight him sometimes.
"You're shaking," Steve finally said, voice quiet and calm.

Bucky looked down at the tremble of his right hand, his legs, like he hadn't noticed. When he looked back up, his jaw wasn't clenched in anger anymore, just stubbornness. "Yeah, it does that. It'll pass. Performance error..."

And that was the last straw.

"Stop." The word broke through the soft bubble of peace, too harsh and rough for the moment. Bucky stared at him. Steve took a step closer, barely refraining from shouting. "Just, stop. It's not a performance error, because you're not a machine."

Avalanches start with a single tremble, then momentum picks up and rolls and rolls and builds and builds and builds.

"No, I'm not anymore." He'd been right, then. Bucky actually used to think of himself as a machine. Steve grit his teeth and dug his heels into the carpet so he wouldn't fly at the closest punchable thing. Bucky just kept talking. "I used to be perfect and you ripped that away from me. And you want me to thank you for it?"

Right, of course. Who was he kidding? Buck had every right to be a total dick when Steve had done nothing but try to help him.

"Is that what this is about? Because I'm trying to make you human?" He'd promised himself he wouldn't yell and he wasn't, not really, it was more of an incredulous half-shout.

"I don't want to be human!" Bucky shot back, crossing his arms defensively over his chest. "Being human is really, really shitty, in case you haven't noticed."

You let me fall.

Human meant emotions. Pain. Facing things that'd happened. Steve knew that, because half the time he didn't want to be human either.

But the funny part? As much as they should have this conversation and talk about how they had way more in common mentally than Bucky thought, he'd actually managed to distract Steve. He'd pulled them off the tracks - no pun intended - and entirely washed aside the conversation they were supposed to be having.

So Steve shifted his weight, relaxing his half of the western-gundown-at-high-noon, trading in the revolver for the rope. He wasn't letting this go now, not after Bucky'd admitted he'd been dealing with this for months.

"...was it an IV, then? Maybe shots? You don't have the scars from needles, but the only scars your body holds onto are the fusion marks at your shoulder."

Steve crossed his arms over his chest and Bucky's lips parted in surprise, staring at Steve incredulously. Like the topic change back to the eating disorder was the worst in Steve's long and offensive career.

"Yeah," Bucky said slowly, dragging the word long enough to make it axiomatic. "Shots. Nutrient needles. Directly into my bloodstream." He was studying Steve now, a strange expression that could either be disgust or something else entirely. "And they kept my mouth occupied so my teeth didn't weaken."
"Occupied?" He echoed, dread dropping his stomach like the Coney Island Cyclone.

"Bite guards. Belts. Other things." Steve couldn't breathe. It'd been years in captivity, but he'd prayed it'd never been like that.

"We don't have to--" He started, trying to backpedal before he triggered Buck, or maybe he couldn't have this conversation right now, but Bucky just barked a laugh, spinning away from Steve to stalk to one of the glass walls.

"No, really," Bucky glanced over his shoulder at Steve, right hand resting on the glass as his mouth curved up in an innocent, pretty smile. "It's not like I haven't been interrogated before."

Steve cringed, something dark twisting inside him at the look on Buck's face. Fuck, this was not how this conversation was supposed to go. Then the sadistic, terrifying grin turned away from him, a distorted reflection in the window as Bucky stared at the streets below.

"You shoved my belt between my teeth once too, remember that?" Five flesh fingertips pressed against the glass like if he pushed hard enough he could push through, disappear out the window into another world.

"You got shot, we were in enemy territory..." He reasoned, calm and slow as he could be, because they were treading treacherous waters now. Any moment Bucky could break, blow up, and Steve'd been avoiding exactly that, he was only trying to help--

"They broke every bone in my body, Steve." Bucky spun around, the air thick like smoke. "Is that what you wanted to hear? It's the truth."

Soldiers didn't get squeamish. They'd all seen men blown apart, ripped apart, faces torn off and eyeless, legless men dragging themselves across bloodstained ground.

But none of that came close to the punch in the gut at Bucky's words.

Every bone in his body. There was something intimate, violating, disgusting about that and Steve couldn't imagine, his head couldn't fathom something that terrible happening to Buck. If it weren't for the crazed fucking look in his eye.

A madman, stalking closer with the dangerous walk of the world's deadliest ghost story, right up to Steve, eyes on fire and hands clenched in fists and Steve couldn't move, couldn't think, this was Bucky and he was going out of his fucking mind and Steve was already out of his fucking body, floating, trying to process everything.

And reality slammed like an ice bucket to the face, except instead of water there were freezing metal fingers wrapping tight around Steve's wrist, yanking his hand into the air and Steve didn't have time to think or move, his wrist was thudding and Bucky was leaning in close and the last time he'd been anywhere near this panicked was when that same metal hand had been around his throat on a bridge a few months ago.

"I know exactly how much pressure I need to break each--" Metal fingers tightened with a whir, bruises purpling on his skin, heart racing, his eyes unable to leave the crystal cold ones locked to his, so close that the bitter, terrifying words were practically assaulting his skin, "--and every bone in your Pretty. Little. Artist. Wrists."

Steve's brain was short-circuiting. This was Bucky, his protection, his savior, his night sky, with no excuse of amnesia behind the brutality and the pain, and he was positively terrifying. Steve had never been scared of Bucky before. The moment he'd found out the Winter Soldier was his best friend, the only thing that'd mattered was getting him back. He'd never been afraid of anything but losing Buck.

Until right now. Logic said he'd never hurt Steve. The throbbing in his wrist begged to differ. The look in his eyes begged to differ. The pounding of Steve's heart begged to differ.

Your pretty little artist wrists.

Maybe it was the danger. Maybe it was the words pretty little artist. Maybe it was the proximity or that this was Bucky, but for some reason his terror was ridden right up next to anticipation. Fascination, like the way one reaches out to pet the coat of a beautiful wolf before it rips you to shreds. Steve was so fked up.

Bucky threw his hand back at him like it was on fire, then the metal fingers grabbed his shoulder instead, thumb digging into his clavicle bone, pulling him forward an inch to counteract the sudden heavy weight of Bucky's knee pressing hard against the top of Steve's femur. He leaned in closer, practically whispering the words in Steve's ear as his knee dug in harder to Steve's thigh. "I can break this one too. This one hurts like hell. It broke through my skin the third time they did it."

Breathing still wasn't an option, but it wasn't the sharp pain that was closing his lungs. If Bucky wanted to, if he firmed the position and actually snapped Steve's femur, there was nothing Steve was going to do to stop him. It was revolting, the whole affair was, but it was also the first time Bucky had opened up about his time as the Winter Soldier and maybe it was fucking freaky, but he'd sacrifice whatever he had to if it meant healing Bucky.

The metal hand uncurled and shoved away, rocking Steve backwards as Bucky stepped away. His eyes were still on fire and so was Steve's shoulder and his thigh and his wrist and his heart.

"You're never gonna get it, Stevie," Bucky sneered, mocking sing-song on the old sweet nickname. Steve's blood curdled, but his vocal chords were still dysfunctional, he could nothing but stare in shock as the one-sided grin curled up, Brooklyn twisted dirty with Russia. "We're not on the schoolyard anymore. And this battlefield is so much bigger than you could ever imagine, babydoll."

Best friends since childhood, Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield...

Bucky gave him one last look that stung worse than bullets to the gut, then he was brushing past Steve, knocking his bruised shoulder and jolting his body sideways as he passed, stalking all the way to the door of his new room and slamming it shut behind him while Steve stared after him.

Huh. He'd called Steve babydoll.

He'd almost broken Steve's wrist.

Steve drifted to the couch somehow, couldn't remember deciding to move his feet but then he was sinking onto the edge of the cushion, eyes unfocused and too dry, like he hadn't blinked in days. The throb in his wrist had already subsided. The room was colder than he remembered it being earlier.

Every bone in his body.

Somehow, that was an easier conversation for Bucky than his eating disorder. Or maybe it was the worst thing he could think of, shocking Steve into numb terror so they didn't have to talk about anything else. Maybe he was giving away the darkest parts of him so they didn't meant anything. Steve knew all about that.
He tilted his head, lifting his hands up in front of his face and turning them over. His stomach churned and his throat was scratchy with unshed tears and there was a heavy weight crushing his ribs and he was not alright, not at all. And his hands looked perfectly fine. The hands that'd let Buck fall. The hands that'd betrayed them both.

His pretty little artist wrists.

He healed fast anyways.

Steve positioned them, one palm facing away in resistance, other hand wrapped tight around his own wrist. All he'd have to do was snap and pull back at the same time and the bones would break - shatter, if he pressed hard. He could feel them, smooth white skeleton beneath layers of skin and muscle scientifically gifted to him.

It might take a while to heal. He wouldn't be able to draw for a bit, but that was the whole point, right?

He grit his teeth, bracing himself and counting down to the snap. Five, four--

A whooshing swing of a door he'd missed in his concentration, then Bucky came flying into the room, already talking, hands thrown exaggeratedly in the air.

"And one more thing--" he started, then froze like bathwater in winter. Only problem was Steve hadn't been expecting him, had frozen too, in the same position and shit shit shit, Bucky's face was twisted up in an expression he'd never seen before and he'd walked right in on-- "What the hell are you doing."

It wasn't worded like a question. It was a statement and a terrifying one and Steve had to get out of here, not because he was scared of that tone of voice but because his heart was thudding and his lungs were tight, verging on a panic attack because through the flashing disorientation in his mind, he was scared of himself now, of what he'd almost done, shying away from the look on Bucky's face and making to leave.

Escaping was pointless. Bucky got there faster. Then there was an unstable, half-crazy assassin pinning him down to the couch and Steve was spinning with lightheadedness from the sudden knock into the cushions. Both of his wrists were trapped in Bucky's hands, back pressed against the length of the too-soft seat, Bucky looming over him with his knees on either side of Steve's thighs, feet hooked over Steve's calves to keep him pinned down as his eyes searched Steve's, looking more hurt and terrified and pissed than any other part of their conversation today.

"What. The hell. Are you doing." He repeated. Steve struggled, trying to break free from the impossible grip, whipping his head to the side so he didn't have to look at the rage and the betrayal on Bucky's face. But the position was too tight, Bucky was holding him down with all his weight and the leverage wasn't there, not if he didn't want to majorly injure Bucky in the process of escaping.

His wrists were transferred to Bucky's left hand, metal fingers trapping both and shoving them hard against Steve's sternum so his right hand was free to grab Steve's face, digging indentions in his cheeks as their eyes were forced to meet again.

"Have you gone out of your fucking mind?" Bucky demanded, leaning down closer. Steve tried to pry his hands free from the metal fingers, but there was no give. He struggled a little more, trying to wiggle away as he glared and finally opened his mouth, shooting off his own fiery, pissed response.
"No, but you have! You hid an eating disorder from me for months, you bastard!"

Bucky leaned even closer, hissing directly in Steve's face. "It's not an eating disorder."

The extra few inches he'd moved to make his point shifted his balance and Steve may not be a superassassin but he was still a good fucking soldier and he knew an opportunity when it hit.

So he pushed off the armrest of the couch, sliding up and kicking his knee hard into Bucky's (empty) stomach, knocking the breath out of him but Steve wasn't going to stop there, he was getting the fuck out of this situation before something worse happened and yes, there were a hell of a lot worse things that could happen right now.

Using Buck's temporary surprise and lack of oxygen he finally wrenched one of his wrists free - though not without significant bruises and a sudden long, bloody gash from slicing his skin on the edge of a metal plate - smacking the heel of his hand into Bucky's shoulder and knocking him off the couch in an ungraceful tumble.

Only the metal hand still had one wrist and Bucky was still faster than him. One foot hooked around Steve's leg, the metal hand tugging, and then Steve was flipping and dragged right off the couch with him.

Thankfully the coffee table was a few feet away, so there was enough room for them both to land on the floor. (Not that the thing didn't end up breaking anyways.)

They'd wrestled as kids, whenever they were swimming. That way if Steve went down too hard the water would break his fall. And they'd fought a few times in this century - except in the helicarrier it had been about weapons and damage control, during Bucky's night terror it was about holding him down so he didn't hurt anyone.

Now they were both out to hurt each other. Kind of.

Steve slammed his elbow into Bucky's ribcage and thought it's complicated.

Metal fingers closed around his bicep and flung him at the coffee table, only they were still both on the ground and Steve's leg was hooked around Bucky's, so when his back slammed into the wood and broke it, Buck was dragged close enough to have to shield his face from the spray of splinters.

Because being thrown at the nice furniture was super rude, Steve bit back the groan and tackled Bucky instead, aiming for the metal arm. Only Buck was expecting it and absorbed Steve's momentum when he rammed into him, using the speed and force to flip them over so Steve was on his back except no, he wasn't going to let Bucky win that easy; the metal was heavy, so all he needed was a tug and they were toppling over again, neither able to hold a solid lead.

That's because they were equals, or they were supposed to be, only how could they ever reach that if Bucky never told him anything?

Then they were rolling across the floor, shoving each other, slamming into the couch and scooting it a foot, then Bucky somehow got Steve's arm behind his back, twisting up painfully, and he had to do a forward roll and smack Buck into the ground to get out of it, then a heavy boot knocked into his hip and the ceiling tipped and then Bucky was in sight again and Steve grabbed him blindly, throwing him into the couch again.

Long hair draped in his face as he tried to catch his breath, stunningly beautiful, his skin glowing with adrenaline and his eyes on fire and his hair sticking to his neck, his temples, muscles straining beneath his black tshirt. But Steve couldn't take it easy on him cause he was pretty. Besides, maybe if he ached a little he'd understand that Steve was trying to help him and he didn't have to be such a bitch about everything.

And suddenly those immovable metal fingers closed around his ankle and yanked, tugging Steve's shirt up and threatening carpet burn if it weren't for the fucking ridiculous softness of Stark Tower rugs. The rug practically slid with him anyways, and he barely managed to kick Bucky's thigh and break out of the hold before Buck's right hand grabbed Steve's fist out of the air, stopping the punch to Bucky's arm before it connected.

If their first dance on the bridge had been ballet, this fight was those interpretive dancers who broke out in beautiful, unbelievable movements on some abandoned basketball court, the kind of dance that was haunting to watch, none of the class or beauty or efficiency of ballet, all popping and kicking and individuality showing through each punch. Or, well, blocked punch.

He used the brief moment of distraction to swing his other arm up and grab Bucky's shoulder, flipping up and kicking his feet out from under him at the same time to shove his back into the ground, metal wrist pinned under one knee, fist struggling to break from Bucky's hold.

The hips he was trying to balance on suddenly twisted, tumbling Steve to the side and he cursed as his back hit the ground again, air going out of him and everything pinned, forearms under Bucky's calves, feet digging into his hipbones, and two hands wrapped around his throat, metal cool against the warmth of his skin.

He couldn't breathe. His heart had never beat so fast.

Bucky stared down at Steve under him, defenseless and still defiant, spark in his eyes as he looked up from his position of defeat on the ground, blonde hair spiked up around him like a halo of thorns. The brilliant blue color nearly vanquished, his pupils were dilated so much. What was that? Terror? Disgust? Hate?

It'd be so easy to end it all here and now. Except that this was Steve, and Bucky no more wanted him dead than he did in 1930.

But here they were, so much later, and this time it wasn't pneumonia or some bully that had Steve on the ropes, it was Bucky. And from his angle, there wasn't much of a difference between the little punk kid he used to loop under his arm and the one pinned and choking under his hands.

He looked goddamned gorgeous this way, Bucky's hands around his throat; contradictorily, the sight was also threatening to puke up his guts again. The way Steve was looking at him? It was dangerous. A moment of adrenaline and blood pumping and hearts racing and those dark dark eyes did not mean the heat they were staring Bucky down with.

It was a fight. Steve was a fighter. Bucky'd always said he thought Steve liked getting hit.

From the look on his face, the way he was choking out breaths around Bucky's hands, his parted lips and huffing chest, all of the body language he'd been trained to read --

Maybe Steve really did like getting hit.

And how far had they come since the last fight he'd pulled Steve out of? The war didn't count, those were battles with the team, that wasn't the hot-headed temper brat that he'd grown up with, Steve had dropped the temper when he got the serum - it was dangerous as hell to throw fists at every disrespectful person when you could kill them with a punch.

So the last fight had been in an alley outside the movies. Not bad at all, Steve'd brushed himself off and stood up fine. Bucky'd walked him back to the apartment, straightening out his tie and fussing over his hair until Steve shoved him off with a grumble and kept trying to tilt Bucky's hat straight.

I like it crooked, dammit, Bucky laughed, dodging yet another swipe at his head. C'mon Stevie, it ain't disrespectful to have it tipped a few inches.

Steve glared, but it held no heat. If I was goin' with you I'd wear my damn hat on straight, he huffed and Bucky held up the corners of his mouth with every ounce of strength he had because he couldn't let his smile falter, not tonight, not when Steve wouldn't be around tomorrow. No, he wouldn't be around. Steve would be home, safe.

Safe from everything, the way Bucky had always wanted him.

Funny, how safe was he now, windpipe half crushed beneath an alien hand of metal?

This time the bully was Bucky. But he'd save Steve - even if it meant from himself. The pariah and the messiah. He'd never fail to come around the damn corner, fists flying. Even if it meant he was the one who ended up on the ground.

He unwrapped his fingers from Steve's throat, revealing white and purple marks underneath. They'd heal. Steve would heal. The pretty pink lips parted, gasped in a few breaths, and Bucky curled his hands into fists, landing them heavy on either side of Steve's head.

Darkened eyes blinked up at him, breathing slightly heavy, marks already fading as Bucky loomed over him. He should never have fought, but how could he fucking not.

Steve had lied, manipulated him, asked too many questions, stood there with a broken look on his face when he finally got answers, and then had the audacity to nearly break his fucking wrist and then accuse Bucky of being the one out of his fucking mind and then he'd kneed his stomach and wrestled him and looked up at him with eyes of heated want and it was all such a huge fuckin twisted mess.

"You happy now?" Bucky glared accusingly down at the blue eyes and they lit up with darker, hotter fire at the words.

"I could be," Steve dared back, lips parted and words strong through the breathy tone.

Bucky stared at him. The blatant challenge in those eyes was unmistakable. Steve was daring him, that was his fight-me face. Only, it looked exactly like a fuck-me face too. Which was fucking with Bucky's psyche.

Steve was looking at him like it was an invitation.

"You've never learned when to stay down, have you?" Bucky grit his teeth, narrowing his eyes into the Winter Soldier glare that made lesser men cower in fear. Not Steve. Steve licked his lips and tilted his chin up, the equivalent of raising his fists when his arms were still pinned at his sides.

"You used to love that about me."

The tone was so sure, cocky, the strangest mix between the confidence he had now and the defiance he had then. Bucky could only stare down at him incredulously, the loose hair hanging on the sides of his face framing Steve to be the only thing he saw.

"You worry the fuck out of me," Bucky told him.
"Right back at you," Steve spat.

Blue eyes narrowed and the world zoomed into this moment alone, three seconds of a challenge, another battle in a war they'd been fighting their whole lives, another step along the precipice they'd always been walking.

He could lean down and kiss Steve right now. It'd be all heat and anger and decades of pent up frustration, biting teeth and wet tongues and Steve's pinned body squirming underneath him. From the way Steve was acting, it looked like that was exactly what he wanted.

He could do it.

Bucky pushed himself off the ground, shattering the moment and anything that could've happened, and left Steve there in the middle of the wrecked living room floor, breathing heavy and hot, surrounded by broken wood and a spray of couch pillows and knocked over, rearranged furniture and strolled his ass out the door, walked right out of the Stark Tower.

He didn't come back that night.

Not through the front door, anyways. He snuck into his room, actually, but Steve didn't know that. As much as Bucky would like to make a point, he'd also like to sleep on his bed, so sneaking back into his room it was.

Then maybe he could figure out what the fuck he was going to say to Steve tomorrow. Preferably, nothing at all.

It's not like he got sleep anyways. He laid in his bed and stared up at the ceiling for hours. The whole room felt so goddamned empty. Which was funny, considering how it was way more cluttered than any cell or chamber he'd been in for the past seventy years. But he could remember a time when he'd lived in apartments papered with Steve's drawings, so the blank walls felt hollow.

He'd removed the propaganda poster from the wall for various reasons, but he'd at least kept the framed Howling Commandos one up. Sometime around four in the morning he got off the bed and wiggled the center photo of the boys out of its place, taking it to the window and using the dim light of the outside streets to look it over, committing every detail to memory.

He knew exactly what they'd been talking about, he could remember that night perfectly. The bellow of Dugan's laugh, Morita's eyerolling, Falsworth's pestering about French lessons. It was a few months before the train fall.

Then there was Steve - looking directly at Bucky with that peculiar soft smile on his face. The one he couldn't remember ever seeing in person.

And in the center, hand raised in story-telling, hair a quarter of the length it was now, was Bucky. The photo didn't have color, but memory filled in the cherry wood table, the rich blue of his peacoat. He'd loved that goddamned peacoat. It meant he and Steve were still in arms, still matching in their unique way. Two blue soldiers.

Sergeant James Barnes of the 107th. Howling Commando.

There was a replica of that coat in the closet. It was probably a crazy impulse, but Bucky sat the photo down and swung open the closet doors, rifling hangers until he could pick out the reflection of buttons in the dim moonlight. It wasn't the exact same as the one he'd had during the war, the one he'd fallen in.

The one he'd opened his eyes to see was missing half an arm. He slipped it free from the hanger, carrying it to the window and holding it up for inspection.

So damn much had changed since the last time he'd worn this, since the smiling face in that photograph on the windowsill. But the scarier part? How much he hadn't changed. He'd told Steve "it's still me" and goddamn, was it. Sergeant James Barnes, torture victim - here in the twenty first century, the longest prisoner of war.

He was an assassin now, yeah, but hadn't he always kind of been? The same pent up rage, the same protective streak. The same waiting, black piece inside of him, filled with gravity to Steve, the only place in his soul he had left.

The biggest difference was the stupid mistakes he used to make in the past; Hydra had weeded those out. They'd given him perfection and this was what he's chosen to do with it?

They'd given him perfection. God, who the fuck was he? Perfection was safe. Perfection wasn't human. Steve took that all away. He wasn't safe around Steve, he was far too human, and it hurt.

He didn't want to hurt anymore.

Metal fingers dug into the material of the blue coat, clutching it tightly against his chest.

Back then, he'd have followed Steve anywhere. Right over the edge of a cliff it that's where it took him. He'd been in so far over his head, he'd been so ignorant, so foolish. Such a child.

Back when he'd still had a chance. It'd been illegal, it'd been risky, but it would've been worth it. He could've had Steve back then - and he knew that now. If Steve had been looking at him the way he had today, the way he had in that photograph? If Bucky'd just asked, Steve would've been his.

Back when he could've had everything, he'd blown it. He'd been scared, terrified, of losing Steve. Putting a lifetime of friendship on the line for the slight chance of real love. But goddammit, he should've taken it. Right before he'd fallen off the train, he'd finally found the courage. He'd finally been ready, brave enough.

Only then it'd been too late. And it was too late now.

It wasn't just friendship on the line anymore. It was their entire lives, the safety of Manhattan, the safety of the world. Because if Bucky was wrong, if he'd been reading it all wrong and Steve didn't want him and he lost Steve again?

He'd go out of his fucking mind.

And they all knew what happened then.

Steve was the brave one. Steve was the unshakable one. Bucky caved like a flimsy mattress under the weight of the sun.

Carefully uncurling metal fingers from the indentions they'd made, Bucky shook the coat out and shrugged it over his shoulders, sleeves hugging his arms like he'd never left. He hadn't. He was still right here. The buttons clacked quietly against his left hand as he fastened them, slipping navy blue through stitched holes, tightening the material across his chest.

He still belonged here, if nowhere else.
They'd taken this from him, ripped it from his body and shredded the contents before his eyes. It was his turn to take it back.

He'd been dozing in the armchair when the handle to his bedroom door turned. He didn't think, just moved, instinct and decades of defense training stepping in before his cognitive processes did.

Then there was a quiet, surprised "Fuck!" and the dull thud of his knife embedding itself in the hallway wall. Steve jerked his body sideways just in time to avoid getting knifed in the chest; although by the hand clutching his bicep with shiny red seeping between the cracks in his fingers, it looked like he hadn't moved fast enough to avoid getting nicked on the flyby.

"Would it kill you to knock?" Bucky sighed, letting his second knife clatter lazily to the floor beside the armchair.

"No, but apparently it'll kill me to not to," Steve offered, visibly shaken a little, but the surprised humor in his words was enough to prove he was okay. After checking the cut on his arm and determining it not dangerous, he brushed off and looked back up, a tiny curve of an apologetic smile on his lips. "Sorry, I didn't know you were in here..."

He trailed off, eyes drifting down to Bucky's chest. Oh, right. Shit, he was still wearing the peacoat. Playing oblivious, he crinkled his eyebrows at Steve's stare then followed his gaze, looking down himself and even popping his mouth in a surprised "o" and jumping a little.

"Oh, wow. That would explain why I was as damn uncomfortable as always." He smoothed his hands over the fabric like he was seeing it for the first time, not meeting Steve's eyes and pretending to be just as distracted. "Got in so late wasn't even lookin', just grabbed the first warm thing in my closet and passed out."

He glanced back up and Steve nodded, looking disturbed, even moreso than having a knife thrown at him as a goodmorning. Bucky looked away and Steve shifted his weight, leaning on the doorframe and biting his lip worriedly.

"About yesterday..."

"I'm meeting Clint for a shoot this morning," Bucky interrupted, before Steve could start talking and digging deeper holes and ruining everything all over again. He stood up for good measure, taking the few steps to the closet and grabbing his gun duffel. Steve was still leaning in the doorway, looking at him expectantly with his arms crossed over the too-tight white shirt. Fine, if he wanted an answer, he could have an answer.

"But don't worry about it." Bucky smiled bright, words chipper as the look on his face. Odds are Steve saw straight through it- so the sooner he got out of Steve's sight the sooner he'd be off the hook. So he tossed the duffel over his shoulder, tilted his head in goodbye and brushed past Steve, careful not to knock into him on his way out.

Then he was gone, again, and Steve stared at the empty bedroom. He took the knife out of the wall behind him and sat it carefully on Bucky’s nightstand and decided not to leave the apartment today. He'd call in with a headache if he had to.

He couldn't go out and pretend everything was okay right now, he didn't have it in him.

The only thing he did do was about two hours later, when he forced himself to get up and find his cellphone to call Clint.

"Did you and Bucky have fun this morning?" He'd never get his head back on straight if he didn't checkup, make sure Bucky was doing all right. He needed to know, was all.

"You mean at the range? He never showed up."

"He never-- oh. Okay."

"Yeah, sorry Cap. Haven't seen him all day. You want to come down instead?"

"No, I'm good. Thanks. I'll uh. See you later."

Steve hung up and stared at his phone. It was the new one. That was the only thing that kept him from throwing it at another wall. He sat it carefully on the nightstand and retreated back to bed.

And here he was, on the wrong side of the bridge but otherwise back in 1940, waiting at home for Bucky and feeling utterly, entirely useless.

~~~

In 1926, the first playground was put up in Central Park. They didn't get the chance to go play on it for nearly a year, but by the time they did Steve had been so excited that he'd nearly bruised Bucky's arm dragging him through the sunny grass while Sarah clapped her hands in amusement behind them.

Now, it was basically a city in itself. Everything from Shakespeare Garden to the Bethesda Terrace in Mid-Park. That was where Bucky ended up, sitting on a bench at Bethesda, overlooking the water and feeling like a dramatic teenage Upper-East sider in a soap opera.

Normally at this time of year the Canada Geese were gone, but today there was a gaggle of five or six down by the water, undeterred by the cold with the depressingly small amount of snow on the ground.

From his spot on the bench, he could have killed them all within seconds. It'd be more than easy. Hell, he could peg a rock and knock out three from this angle.

And it was the same for the group of scarf-and-sweater-bound teens gossiping by the trees. Seconds, and they could all be dead, put out of their misery with a knife to the throat. And they'd never have to be in pain again.

Everything died so easy. He could save these lives by taking them, gift death to the living, put the geese and the kids and the whole world out of the terrible misery of waking every morning. A flick of his wrist and the impossible weight of living gone.

Bucky clasped his hands in his lap, dipping his head down and sucking in the crisp winter air.

"But I can't die that easy," he whispered to the wind, letting the sound whip away into nothing. "You can't kill me. They can't kill me."

He lifted his head, smoothing his hair back from his face with a tired hand and stared out at the water, the dull reflection of the sun against the water.

The wood beneath his right hand was soft, like it might cave and shatter if he pushed hard enough. How long before he pushed hard enough?
Bucky traced the grain with his finger, wind rustling his hair as it swirled around his mouth, stole his words right out of the air in their quiet whisper.

"So that leaves me as the only one to take mercy on myself."

When he got back to the Stark tower that afternoon, Steve paused in the kitchen, glass of water in hand, and looked at Bucky for a moment. Then he kept walking without a word, closing his bedroom door behind him quietly. Bucky stared at the blank door and the empty kitchen for a few minutes before slipping off his peacoat and tossing it on the new coffee table - that was fast - and plopping down in the couch to settle in for a movie without any beautiful blonde boys or people who smiled like the sunshine.

~~~

He got one more night of silence.

Then everything was loud and busy and constant and Steve was suddenly around all the time. Thin healthy smoothies placed in front of Bucky at the breakfast table. Knocking on his door in the afternoon, running shoes in hand. Cocked eyebrows and nudges over mission plans. A sketch pad full of drawings slid across Tony's bar, design ideas for Bucky's new outfit.

And Bucky was trying, he really was, anything that wouldn't have them throwing each other around the living room and breaking all the furniture. Circling with pens, silent nods, grabbing his running shoes too, taking the smoothie and drinking more every day without chucking it back up.

But no matter what he did, Steve wouldn't leave him alone. Bucky was busy, trying to re-train his body to fit his current living situation. Or ideally, change his current living situation - only he couldn't strand Steve.

As nice as the tower was, it wasn't enough. It didn't change the fact that Bucky felt utterly, crushingly alone.

Walls of glass and metal, clean cut wood and swirling paintings, a constant availability of company. A gym and a library and a room with Steve's art supplies; a shooting range, multiple kitchens, labs and labs full of technological genius. He had access to the world, anything he could want. He had people invested in his well-being, an enemy to destroy, and freedom he hadn't been allowed in a long time.

But it wasn't enough. He didn't have Steve.

Steve was always there - dragging Bucky to events, rushing to his side the moment nightmares woke him up. But he wasn't his. And so Bucky was constantly shoving Steve off. He didn't want to fucking cuddle when he'd spent twenty minutes reliving Hell. He didn't want Steve to look at him with those big beautiful eyes and give him that soft smile and wrap his strong arms around Bucky because he didn't mean it. It was like forcing a recovering alcoholic to swim in pools filled with whiskey and vodka. It wasn't fair.

And then, of course, there were the questions. Feelings aside, he couldn't do the goddamned questions. Steve would not leave him alone. Every day, questions.

“Hey Buck, how are you?”

“Jimdandy Steve, leave me the fuck alone.”

Except he didn’t say that, even if he was thinking it, he only said, “Great, you?” and gave Steve his best bright-white smile.

It was getting harder to wear that goddamn smile.

If he had it his way, he’d live behind his mask. Too bad Steve’s face wilted like it broke his heart every time he saw the damned thing. It was Bucky’s salvation. His only protection in a world of prying eyes and stone cold expressions. He’d always been good at putting up walls and masks to hide behind anyways, but it was exhausting. The Winter Soldier facemask let him breathe, through a filter like how he deserved. Air was better with a buffer. He was better with a buffer.

His body was betraying him too. He was either so sick that his insides felt like they were trying to devour each other or he was a cavity, an empty scraped out shell with bones rattling around under his skin. He looked fine, for the most part. The mirror did plenty of lying. But he ached with fatigue inside. It was too bad that the most dangerous place he knew was behind his own closed eyes.

Alcohol didn’t do anything. He even tried a few different drugs, but nothing stuck. What was the fucking point, anyways? If he could only function with the help of some pill or needle, he’d become his own Hydra and everything he’d fought to escape would’ve been for nothing.

It was February. He’d fallen off the train in February. He’d danced with Steve in that bar in February. He never let himself think about that memory, but it happened 69 years ago as of next week and how was he supposed to not think about it? His left hand was acting up, but not because something was wrong with the machine; it was all ghost pains, the terrible kind that made him want to shoot something until either it stopped breathing or he did.

Worst though - worse than the ghost pains or the physical pains or eating food when his stomach didn’t know what to do with it or even Steve’s constant bombardment – was his head. Some days the world was crushing him. Not as much dragging him down by his ankles but making him sink with the weight of his head. He didn’t want to talk to anyone, basically all of the time, but he sucked it up 9 days out of 10 and gave sharp short proficient answers on the tenth day until everyone eventually left him alone.

The only good thing about it was that when he wasn't asking questions, Steve didn’t really feel like talking either. He’d overheard a conversation between Stark and his AI assistant about chronic depression and anhedonia and realized that fuck, he had no idea whether Stark was talking about him or Steve.

That was also when he realized that if it was Steve – and it could be – he knew why. He’d found out on their little roadtrip that Steve was a hell of a lot less okay than he pretended to be. He’d always been a shit when it came to admitting pain or owning up to injury, but Bucky’d had no idea how fucked up Steve was inside until the exhaustion and the nightmares and the running and the panic attack in more than an inch of water.

Steve was fuckin’ mess: it was all Bucky’s fault.

And there was absolutely nothing he could do about it.

The only thing that kept him hanging on was that beneath all the crap and the not talking and the pain and the loneliness and the guilt and the general feeling of not wanting to deal with existing anymore, his best friend was still his best friend.

Stark was holographically designing their route through Brooklyn to the abandoned storehouse some alien-enthusiasts were rumored to be meeting and he was royally mucking it up, ignoring side streets and shortcuts that would get them through the city in half the time with a quarter of the traffic.
Another turn down some generic road added and Bucky caught Steve's eye over the holograph table, raising his eyebrows and fighting a grin as he tipped his head at Stark's 3D drawing. Steve caught on instantly, widening his eyes and nodding in agreement.

Turning left there? Bucky mouthed, making the most exaggerated skeptical face he had. Steve mirrored his expression, mouthing I know right! back at him.

Twisting his mouth sideways and signaling with his eyes, Bucky made his say something face and Steve pursed his lips, tipping his head to the side, no, you. Bucky rolled his eyes, but leaned forward.

"Stark?" he finally interrupted, swiveling the holograph closer. "Steve and I are both pretty sure it'll cut three minutes off the route if we turn right there."

"When did you decide that?" Clint asked, confused as always.

"We just talked it over," Steve replied, crossing his arms over his chest.

"I didn't hear anything," Clint complained, looking between him and Steve.

"You wouldn't," Bucky muttered, adding another turn to the hologram. When he glanced back up, Steve's eyes were on him, and they both smiled a little deviously.

Vague fighting and eggshell walking aside, there was still an unbreakable camaraderie between them. They were sticking up for each other, finishing each other sentences, United We Stand on the battlefield.

And on the Avengers game nights.

Which he hadn't been to a lot of, but everyone hadn't been super annoying lately so when Steve tugged him off the couch Friday night he relented and let himself be dragged upstairs.

The game of the night was Scrabble and they were playing in teams, which was a good recipe for a quiet night. Team games always went smoother because the one on one shit got people at each other's throats faster than you could imagine.

As usual, he and Steve were axiomatically on a team and kicking ass. Maria (who didn't show up often and still threw distrustful glances when she thought Bucky wasn't looking) and Clint were the only real competition though, because Tony and Sam were arguing the whole time and unable to decide on a single word to play.

It was about halfway through the game that the perfect opportunity laid out on the board - a triple word score on the q in quaint with the n turning or into nor and rash into trash at the same time.

Steve hadn't been paying much attention, too busy watching Bucky out of the corner of his eye and avoiding all of the pointed looks and head tilts and obscene gestures Tony was making in his direction. About Bucky. Like usual.

Then Clint whistled low and impressed, the same time Sam groaned in agony, and Steve focused back in on the board. Bucky was placing the Q down, finishing the word that was going to guarantee their win. Again.

His annoyance with Tony and his constant underlying worrying dissipated for a moment, the rush of a victory and the chance of seeing Bucky smile overshadowing everything else in the lighthearted joy of a simple win.
"Hell yes!" Steve spun towards Buck with a huge smile on his face, lit up at their teemed (aka mostly Bucky's) genius, and leaned forward, shooting his hand up for a victorious high five.

And Bucky cowered.

He recoiled from Steve's raised hand like a rattlesnake poked with a stick; so quickly it had to be instinctual.

The second that he registered the flash of fear across Bucky's face, the way he shrunk back in terror, Steve's hand fell to his lap fast enough that it smacked his leg but he didn't, couldn't feel it because Bucky was cowering away from him like Steve had been about to hit him.

"I'm sorry," Bucky rushed out, straightening up and scooting away from Steve, eyes wide and hands shaking. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to--"

"Buck, Buck, it's okay, you don't have to apologi--" Steve tried, reaching for him before he flipped and darted, only Bucky'd already shot to his feet, backing away from the table with his hands up while they all stared.

"I should go, I don't-- I'm sorry. I didn't mean to ruin the game, I'll just. Sorry. I'll go. I'm so sorry."

One of the surrender hands threaded through his hair in a panicked craze, then he spun on his heel and clenched fists at his sides, all but running for the stairwell, door slamming loudly open and louder closed.

And just like that Bucky was gone and Steve was left staring at their knocked over tray of Scrabble letters.

"Is he--" Maria started.

Okay, she might say. No, nothing was okay, not at all.

Crazy, she might finish. Probably. Steve sure fucking felt like he was.

But he couldn't sit here and listen to them talk about Bucky, couldn't sit at all, he needed out out out, Bucky had thought Steve was going to hit him.

He stood before she could finish her sentence, bumping the table and making the pieces scatter loudly to interrupt. It'd been instinctual. Bucky's ingrained response was that he was going to be smacked, his body reacted to violence like it was expected.

Maybe he should've followed Bucky out. But there wasn't anything he could say to change what just happened, and if judging from the look on Bucky's face, he could use a little time alone. To breathe, get his head back on straight. Stop feeling mortified.

Steve might never stop feeling mortified. He could feel it tingling in his bones, the rage, the pure unadulterated hate towards Zola, towards Hydra. And if he looked deep enough, towards himself, for letting Bucky fall, for not being there when Bucky needed him, for leaving his best friend for seventy years.

So he didn't follow Bucky out, there was too much shit going on in his head, too much guilt and horror and rage to be able to handle Buck's needs properly right now. He'd probably end up yelling at some point, hitting walls, and that wasn't going to help anything.

There was one place he could hit things though. He excused himself from the room less than ten seconds after the door had closed behind Bucky, then he was taking the stairs down to the gym, two at a time with his head down, watching black boards soar behind him faster and faster. The glass gym doors only didn't shatter when he shouldered through them because they'd been reinforced for occasions like this one. An angry supersoldier storming down to the gym to beat the fuck out of some reinforced punching bags in order to keep himself from beating the fuck out of other things.

He almost didn't wrap his hands, wanted to feel his knuckles split, feel the blood soaking through his fingers hot and pounding, but Bucky would only be more distressed if Steve showed up on their floor like that. So he wrapped them - too tight, but still meticulous enough to save his skin - and dragged one of the reinforced punching bags out of their closet. Then he got to work.

A lot of people had things that let their mind drift, mindless activities that let their body focus on something else so their mind could open up deep. Things like playing the piano, painting, riding bikes, running. For Steve, it actually wasn't drawing that gave him release. Drawing was peaceful, blissfully unplagued, everything simplified down to the shading of a monkey's bike or a skyscraper's window.

The thing that really let him think though, was punching things.

Hitting the bag over and over, sweat dripping down his temple, the world was in vivid hypercolor, saturating his mind with emotions and his veins with adrenaline and he was punching and punching over and over and waiting waiting waiting for the pain to stop. Or take him over completely.

The look on Bucky's face. He couldn't decide which was worse. The look on his face as he cowered away from Steve's hand, or the look on his face when he straightened up and realized what he'd done? Terror and horror. Two sides of a coin that Steve wanted to smash under his foot until it split into crumpled pieces and could never hurt his Bucky again.

There was sweat flying now, his hair curled over his forehead and hanging in his eyes. The reinforced bags were a hell of a lot more of a challenge, they met every angry red punch and let Steve pummel away, his thoughts exploding around in his head and his fists flying faster faster faster. Someone was watching him. He'd felt it a little while ago, but he hadn't stop hitting the punching bag because Bucky's stammered apology was on repeat, his hands didn't hurt enough, his brain wasn't shutting up, the bag wasn't enough. A drop of sweat rolled in his eyes and he'd have to pause anyways to wipe the hair out of his face, so he might as well see who'd joined him.

He threw one more brutal punch at the red plastic before stopping and catching the bag, the smack against his palm reverberating loud around the empty gym. (Well, empty except whoever was standing behind him.) His bet was on Sam, maybe Clint. But when Steve turned around, he was wrong for once.

"Bruce," Steve greeted in surprise. "I didn't know you were here." Here as in the country, or the state, let alone the tower. He hadn't seen Bruce in person since they'd put Loki away.

If it were any other situation, he'd go hug the good doctor, except Steve was still red and soaked with sweat and breathing heavy and way too full of rage to do something like hug right now. Instead he kept his hand on the punching bag, making it clear that he wasn't finished and wasn't in the mood to talk.

"Just got in." Bruce gave that half-smile that wasn't as much a smile as it was a I'm not about to turn into a rage monster confirmation. Which was nice and all, except that Steve was still in his own rage-monster mode. And Bruce didn't look like he was planning on leaving anytime soon. "Thought I'd come down and say hi."
He almost replied with well you've said it, you can go now, except that as pissed as Steve was, Bruce didn't deserve the wrath. Instead he huffed and nodded, curling his fists again and tapping the punching bag with one. Then the other. And it felt good, the shock running up his "pretty little artist" wrists, the way it reverberated all the way into his shoulder.

So he hit harder. And harder and harder except then the super hearing picked up a soft sigh and it was rude to stand here and punch away his troubles when someone clearly wanted to talk. Steve had never let his own pain get in the way of others before, he wasn't going to now. Bleed on the inside, right?

The rage wasn't stopping, not anytime soon, so he bottled it up and shoved it deep down and he was hot all over, skin tingling with it, but he reached out and stilled the bag again, hand on the material to prop him up as he deflated a little, head dipped as he tried to catch his breath.

It wasn't fucking fair.

He blinked and watched as sweat dripped from his hair and his nose, landing in splattering drops on the floor. There was a possibility Tony'd turned up the heater for Pepper and Natasha's bikram yoga and never turned it back down, but it was more likely that Steve'd been in here a hell of a lot longer and punching a hell of a lot harder than he should've.

"How are you holding up?" Bruce offered behind him, not particularly soft, more like he was simply curious.

"You want to know how I'm holding up," Steve asked, voice tinged with disbelief as he spun around and pinned Bruce with his gaze.

Bruce contemplated Steve's question for a moment, the way he did to show he was actually thinking instead of giving automatic answers. He came to a conclusion pretty quickly, pushing his glasses up on nose and nodding. "Yeah. Yeah, I think so. How are you holding up, Steve?"

Clearly, Bruce had to have heard. He wouldn't be down here checking on Steve - with wary movements, like he was handling something explosive - if he hadn't. Except he was asking the wrong questions.

Steve stared incredulously for a moment, because that couldn't seriously be the concern right now. Steve and his crazed punching bag meltdown should be the least of anyone's worries. But Bruce wasn't budging, leveling him with that solid gaze and Steve took a single step forward, aware of how threatening it looked and doing nothing to stop it.

"I just tried to high five my best friend for the simplest of things and he cowered like a beaten dog and you want to know how I'm holding up??"

Hands curled in fists at his sides, boxing wraps biting into his skin, nowhere near hard enough to bring any sort of clarity, but at least the shaking was less obvious. Bruce probably noticed anyways, but in the guarded eyes it was impossible to tell.

Banner looked him over for a few beats before crossing an arm over his chest and throwing the other up nonchalantly, "...humor me."

Why the fuck did it matter how Steve felt? But he shook sweaty hair out of his eyes and grit his teeth, answer clipped and nowhere near strong enough. "I'm pissed."

That wasn't even the right word for it. He squeezed his eyes shut and focused on his breathing and trembling and rage, trying to get a grip on himself before he did something stupid. "Really pissed," he clarified, opening his eyes to glare at his hands.

The ones that'd let Bucky fall, then scared him into cowering away.

"I know the feeling," Bruce offered quietly. Steve glanced up and Bruce gave him a little sympathetic shrug. How sweet. He looked back down and started unwrapping the gauze from his hands, heading for the closest bench.

"Sorry if I’m not in the most therapeutic of moods, Doc." He tossed the white strip of cloth down violently, unwrapping his other hand fast enough to make his wrist ache. Then that one got thrown down too and Steve landed heavy on the bench, tipping his head back against the wall and rolling his head to look at Banner, who still hadn't left.

"I'll be on my floor if you want to talk," Bruce finally offered, then he was blessedly thankfully leaving Steve alone to sit on the gym bench and stare up at the ceiling and cool the fuck down and figure out how the hell he was supposed to help somebody who wouldn't let him in.

He wasn't the only one who'd needed to cool off steam. Beyond out, Bucky hadn't decided where to go until he was already there, standing outside the track entrance on the second floor of the gym. It was something Steve would do, beat things up to calm down, but it wasn't a bad idea.

He'd always felt the most powerful in control when he was fighting. He just hadn't thought Steve had steam to cool off too.

Bucky came in on the second floor, where the circular track was - complete with a balcony to overlook the main floor, where someone was currently pummeling away at a punching bag. He heard the squeaking material and muffled hits right before he stepped up to the balcony, where he'd be in sight.

The sound made him freeze in the shadows. Steve was here. Shit. He didn't want to talk right now. At all. He wanted to forget.

So Bucky plopped down behind the balcony, hidden by shadows as he looked between slats and listened. He saw Bruce come in before Steve did. The doctor was a lot shorter than Bucky'd pictured. He stayed perfectly silent, watching the scene unfold from his perch in the shadows - Steve's frustrated and shaking hand pushing sweaty hair out of his eyes while Bruce watched calmly.

Their voices carried and echoed in the gym's vastness and Bucky almost smiled at how goddamned stubborn Steve was being. Right up until he blew up.

"I just tried to high five my best friend for the simplest of things and he cowered like a beaten dog and you want to know how I'm holding up??"

Cowered like a beaten dog. Bruce's response, the rest of the conversation, the loud noises as Steve slammed the punching bag again, none of them stuck. Sounds drifted over him, but his head wasn't there to hear them.

A beaten dog. That's what he was, wasn't he?

Собака. They used to call him that. It was his first name. He knew enough Russian now to know exactly what it meant.

Hydra's pretty attack dog. Beaten dog. Just look at him, hunched over in the shadows with glassy eyes. He'd cowered. Like he was supposed to.

Собака. He remembered perfectly well. He used to like that name. It was an escape of sorts. They could spit dog at him like he was a filthy worthless animal but he didn't mind, liked being called Собака. And he remembered exactly why.

He'd told himself one thing, over and over again. Something to hold onto, a reason to respond to his new name. It was disgusting and it made him feel worthless, less than nothing. But. But he still liked it - because at least he had no idea what it sounded in the voice of the man he loved. Because at least he'd never heard it spat with distaste from Steve's soft pink lips.

Well.

Now he had.

He didn't know how long it took him before he could move his fingers again, before he came back to his head enough to realize he was sitting in an empty, dark gym. Broken, beaten dog.

Bad dog, staying out this late, not letting your master know where you are.

Bucky laughed out loud, the sadistic sound echoing around the gym like it was coming back to slap him across the face.

He stood, dusted off his hands, and debated punching a hole in the wall. That was more Steve's gig than his. Instead he'd keep silent, walk methodically back to his room. Pretend to sleep while he stared at the walls and forced himself not to carve out his own heart with his metal hand.

They used to disable it when he got bad. Bucky was pretty sure he understood why now.

~~~

"Hey, it looks like it might storm today." Steve piped up from the kitchen, looking out the window as he swirled his paintbrush around in a fresh cup of water. The words were way too casual, like he was trying to get a rouse out of Bucky. Or maybe warn him.

Like he figured that some thunder might send Bucky spiralling into madness. He'd had a hell of a lot bigger reasons to lose his fuckin' mind and he hadn't yet.

"Well, I've always loved storms," Bucky deflected, pretending to be distracted, keeping up appearances as he thumbed through his book to find some random chapter to fake-read.

Steve hummed in response, nodding to himself as he stepped away from the window. In his peripherals, Bucky could pinpoint the moment that the words registered - Steve paused, eyebrows furrowing, looking at Bucky's profile confusedly.

"You hate storms," Steve said slowly.

"What?" Bucky asked distractedly, pretending not to pay attention.

"You've always hated storms." Steve corrected, the words loud, a challenge, on edge.

Oh shit. The nonchalance had backfired on him. It wasn't often that he slipped up that big - normally when he was faking being okay, he was smart enough to remember times in the past that used to not be okay. But he'd overdone it because, yeah, he'd always hated storms, and now Steve had caught him red-handed in a lie and there was no way it wasn't written all over Bucky's face.

He shut his expression down as quickly as he could, but it was too late. Steve had already seen the slip.

"Remember?" he goaded, taking a step closer to Bucky's couch and making his shoulder tense. "We were out in a storm once and I got pneumonia and almost died? You've despised them ever since. Always freaked out."

"I remember." Bucky mumbled, words short as he turned pointedly away.

"Then why did you say you liked them?"

"Let's drop it," he replied too brightly, and shot to his feet, slamming his book shut and dropping it on the reinforced coffee table.

He almost wished he didn't have enhanced hearing, because the defeated sigh and collapse onto the sofa was so loud behind him. He was opening the door to the stairwell and he still heard Steve's murmured rhetorical question from the living room.

"How much have you been lying to me, Buck?"

And there was no way in hell he was answering that.

Turned out it did storm.

And, like Bucky predicted, the thunder rolled off his shoulders, no problems. Bombs had never bothered him anyways.

But, like he hadn't thought of, lightning was open electricity, something he was too familiar with. There had been a chair, a machine to be strapped into. Another mask that covered all of his face but a single eye, both wide open as he screamed through a rubber bit and open lightning danced around his face, pulses of shocking electricity to take his memories away.

Wipe him.

He didn't respond so well to the lightning.

Maybe he was going out of his fucking mind, but Steve could swear he felt the scream before he heard it.

It pierced like something from hell, a demon screech, echoing through the vents and shaking the tower and Steve pulled out his headphones and scrambled up so fast he knocked over the red paint, the can hitting the floor with a clank and a sudden spray like blood over the floor and the walls. He skid out of the room with his latest work in progress dripping bloody red behind him.

It took him way longer to find Bucky than he would've liked, but Steve didn't even know there was a floor still under construction, let alone that Bucky'd set up a knife throwing range in the empty space. Jarvis wasn't active on that floor, but he managed to give Steve enough to go from that he was bursting into the huge, dimly-lit room a few minutes after the scream.

Like most of the other floors, the walls were shiny with windows, the black storm outside making everything that much darker, casting shadows longer. "Bucky?" Steve called, spinning blindly to try to locate a shape in the darkness. Thunder rolled distantly outside, dark and low and threatening, twisting a shiver down Steve's spine.

He shouldn't have let Bucky go off on his own, not when he knew it was going to storm. Especially not after he finally saw through the bullshit front Buck'd been putting up for weeks.

A hitched breath in the darkness tipped him off. On the far side of the immense room, a crouched figure, curled into the shadows of the wall. He flew across the slick concrete floor, nearly wiping out as he fell to Bucky's side, worn leather under his palms as he stroked his hands over Bucky's back.

"I'm here, I'm here. Bucky, c'mon, talk to me," He pressed his forehead against Bucky's shoulders, rubbing soothing circles down the curved spine. Buck was curled in a ball, head tucked out of sight, and didn't look to be budging anytime soon - thank god he wasn't screaming anymore.

"You're okay, you're safe, I've got you," Steve promised, pressing his knuckles against the back of Bucky's neck, wrapping one arm over his ribs to tug him closer, then a loud crack of thunder sounded and Steve jolted, a shot of panic through his veins as a bomb went off behind his eyelids, smoke and bloody red of the war shaking into his core.

He clung tighter to the unmoving body, grounding himself in the solid muscle beneath his arm. Bucky was here, they weren't in the war, he was fine. But Bucky wasn't, and he hadn't jumped at the thunder, so what the hell could have sca--

Lightning flashed, arches of crackling electricity outside the window, turning the room of shadows into a white and blue painting for a pause. The scream was muffled in his curled ball, and what a pair they made, one who couldn't handle thunder and the other who freaked at lightning.

He tried everything he could think of short of kissing him to pull Bucky out of it, but nothing was working, he kept trembling in Steve's arms and he wouldn't lift his head or move an inch and the thunder was making Steve's heart pound faster and it was so dark and the storm was so loud.

Because his life was bad luck followed by more bad luck, Natasha's number was out of service. Tony was the next on his list.

"Rogers? Why are you calling me when there is a perfectly good AI system?"

"I'm on the construction zone floor, Jarvis isn't around. Can you get Natasha on the line?" Keeping his voice calm, not panicking, he was okay, Bucky would be okay, no one was hurt and the thunder wasn't bombs, it was just a goddamned storm.

"Why the hell are you on that floor? And yeah, she changed her number again, let me see if I can find it...okay, I just added her to the call, it's dialing."

"Hello?"

"Nat? It's Steve, Bucky's having some sort of panic attack and I can't get him out of it." Steve sucked in a breath and dug his fingers harder into Bucky's ribs. "I don't know why it's different this time, but he can't hear me. The only thing he's responding to is lightning, which is making him scream. Please tell me you've got some idea what that means."

"They must've used electricity in his conditioning...Okay, Steve, he's not going to be able to respond to anything that isn't part of his training. You're gonna hate me for this, but you have to be his handler for a moment. Ask him for...ask him for a mission report."

"What?"

"Just do it."

Steve shook his shoulder, forcing his voice steady. "Bucky. Mission report."

"C'mon, Rogers. Do you wanna help him? Not like that. And don't use his name, it's contradictory. You fought in wars. I'm very aware, the thunder has no problem reminding me, Steve added in his head over Natasha's commentary, "I know you have that commander voice in you somewhere."

"Soldier!" He snapped, shoving Bucky sideways. "Mission report."

He really hadn't been expecting it to work. So when Bucky shot up instantly, robotic voice stating "Ready to comply," Steve freaked out, dropped the phone, and scrambled backwards, hands scraping on the concrete.

"Wow, you didn't even need to use Russian. I wonder how many languages he's trained to respond in," Natasha's tinny voice crackled through the line.

"Fourteen," the robot voice responded, dead as hell, eyes glassy and body straight and stiff like a talking doll.

Steve put his head in his hands.

"Steve?" the tinny female voice asked again, about as worried as Nat let herself sound. Steve lifted his head slowly, staring at the blank concrete walls and draped plastic dropcloths.

"Holy shit, Natasha. I'm going to kill them. I'm going to kill every fucking one of them, I'm going to tear apart the rest of Hydra until no one even remembers their name--"

"Rogers, calm the fuck down. Barnes needs you, okay? Just...tell him to report to his resting quarters or something. Get him in a neutral environment so he can be comfortable until he comes around."

Steve stared at the phone on the ground, appreciative for the serum enhanced hearing so he didn't have to pick the damn thing back up. His hands would crush it right now. "How long is that going to take?"

"No idea. He may not break out of it at all."

"That is super comforting, thank you," he replied dryly, snatching the phone and standing up, brushing the dust off his pants and making a gesture at Bucky.

"Asset report to resting quarters."

Bucky blinked at him.

"Bedroom?" Steve tried. Still nothing. He took a breath and stared at the dusty, raw ceiling, gathering his wits before he started breaking things. "Report to cryofreeze," he relented, closing his eyes in pain.

When he opened them again Bucky was already pushing open the door on the stairwell. Fucking hell.
Steve followed him up to their floor, where Bucky stood patiently, waiting to be shoved into some ice chamber. Now that they were in a place that Steve could lock the doors while Jarvis monitored from above, breaking Bucky out of the conditioning was worth a try.

"You know me," he started, keeping his words and movements slow as he approached Bucky. Buck turned his head, blinked twice, his eyes still foggy as he opened his mouth.

"The man from the bridge," Bucky replied, looking down. Steve froze, absorbing the words. The man on the bridge. Their first fight had been on a bridge. Had Bucky asked his handlers about him? But he'd acted like he'd never seen Steve before when they met again.

"What about the man on the bridge?" He asked carefully, taking a step closer.

"I knew him," Bucky whispered, head down as he grimaced. He was referring to Steve in the third person, like he wasn't right here in front of him. Was he stuck in a loop then? Repeating whatever he'd told his handlers that day? If Bucky had known him, why did he fight so hard against him?

The sky choose that moment to explode in thunder again and Steve jolted at the sound, cursing and covering his ears with his palms, forcing the flashbacks and the bubbling rage and fear aside. The sound must have triggered something in Bucky too this time, because when Steve looked up Bucky's eyes were watering, his teeth clenched as he looked at Steve with terrified eyes.

"But I knew him."

Lightning crackled, followed by a sharp burst of thunder and Bucky was covering his face with his hands, pleading as he sank to his knees. "Please please don't wipe me I don't want to forget him again, please please don't wipe me--"

His stomach churned and pulse was racing as he slowly reached for Bucky again, hands low and palms up, as unthreatening as possible as he pressed his fingertips into the tops of Bucky's thighs.

"No one's wiping you, Bucky. It's me. It's Steve. I'm here. I've got you." He gathered Bucky into his arms, threading fingers through his long hair and burying his nose in the top of Bucky's head. Strong arms wrapped around Steve's ribs, clinging to him desperately as the storm rolled around them.

They both winced and cringed at the sounds, the shocks of light, but neither of their grips let up. An anchor in a storm, two lost drifting ships tethered together. Until about three minutes later, when Bucky suddenly shook himself free of Steve's hold, blinking at him confusedly from beneath his fucked up hair. "Steve?"

A choked laugh escaped his throat and Steve folded in half, head landing in his hands. "Thank god," he murmured to the ground, pressing his palms against his eyes to stop the tears that were threatening to spill from relief. Or trauma. Whatever.

"What the fuck happened?" Bucky poked his shoulder and Steve lifted his head again, sniffling a little and wiping off his face as he scanned Buck over again. All of the fear and glassiness was gone, his sarcastic asshole of a best friend looking at him with one eyebrow raised worriedly.

He supposed he'd be concerned too if he woke up sitting in the middle of the foyer floor wrapped up in Bucky's arms. Steve gestured with a wide arm, resting the other elbow on his knee. "Apparently you don't like lightning."

Bucky cocked his head, looking around the dark room and taking in the fading storm outside. "Huh. Who'd've guessed."
"Natasha," Steve answered with a strained smile. Bucky gave him another puzzled look and stood up, brushing himself off and holding out a hand to help Steve up. Steve took it gratefully, keeping Bucky's fingers entwined with his a little longer than necessary. "If it makes you feel any better, I don't like thunder?"

"It doesn't," Bucky replied flatly. The smile he got for his troubles was more of a grimace, then Bucky withdrew his hand, clapped him congenially on the shoulder, and strolled towards the kitchen, shooting a final word over his shoulder. "Thanks, by the way."

Steve stared at his hands and the tear stains on his shirt before running tired fingers through his hair.

"Sure, Buck. Anytime."

~~~

"Sergeant Barnes," he was greeted the moment he stepped out of the locker room showers.

Bucky raised his eyebrows, squinching the rest of his hair dry. "Doctor Banner. What can I do for you?"

"I was wondering if you'd be up for a chat." The easy smile was simple and the words were simpler, the quick adjustment of his glasses making him look like the least harmless thing in existence.

It took more than Bruce Banner to get one over Bucky's head. He returned the bright smile, tossing his towel in the hamper and opening his arms wide and sarcastic.

"Steve put you up to this?"

Bruce put his hands up in surrender, carefully schooled expression of calm. "I just want to talk, Sergeant."

Bucky nodded slowly, rolling his lips in and popping them back out, and started for the doors.

"I'll tell you the same thing I told Sam last week. I'm not interested in a psychological evaluation." Bucky glanced over his shoulder at the surprised and slightly guilty expression on Bruce's face. He turned all the way around, walking backwards as he pushed open the glass gym doors behind him. "And the next person that mentions it is walking away without an eye. Thanks for asking!"

He gave the scandalized doctor a sarcastic salute and spun on his heel, stalking down the hall with his metal hand curled into a fist so he didn't start breaking things.

Personally, he thought the threat was pretty damn clear. But he'd barely turned the first corner when a hand landed on his shoulder, spinning him around. Seconds later and Bruce's hands were up again, Bucky's favorite pistol aimed at the center of his chest and a feral look in his eyes.

"Stay the fuck away from me," Bucky warned, metal finger twitching on the trigger, forcing himself to back off before he killed Bruce. Or, knowing his reputation, kill them both. Because meeting the Hulk out was not number one on his list of activities to do, Bucky lowered the gun a few seconds later, flipping the safety on and flipping his middle finger up as he walked away.

Barely twenty minutes from their conversation at lunch, Bruce showed back up on the communal floor, concerned creases by his eyes, curly hair rumpled.
"Hey, Steve. I, uh. I don't think Barnes is okay at all."

~~~

It was 1944 and the rumbling clouds in front of the moon cast shadows over the soggy trench they were crouched in, the dirt under his back caving every time he shifted. The sound of enemy gunfire was getting closer, but they should be able to contain it. They were helping the escaped 109th back into allied territory, only no one had anticipated the ambush.

They'd dealt with worse and Bucky wasn't all that concerned with anybody's safety. Except Steve, because he was always doing something fucking stupid.

"Hey Sergeant," a warm voice whispered against his ear. Bucky glanced to the side, not risking turning his head in their proximity.

"Whaddu you want punk?" He couldn't help it if he was soaking up how close Steve was, how warm his body was pressed against Bucky's side. But he could shoot his arm out to blockade Steve's chest the moment he saw that familiar glimmer in his eyes. "Don't you fuckin' dare. Leaping out of this trench will do nothing but endanger everyone."

"I didn't even say it," Steve complained under his breath, glaring and trying to wiggle out from under Bucky's arm. Bucky pressed down harder and didn't say your eyes said it, because he was trying not to think too hard about the fluttering in his chest he'd felt ever since that first night in the bar. "C'mon, Buck, you know if we don't start taking out these bastards they're gonna pin us like animals."

Bucky stuck his tongue in his cheek and knocked his head back against the dirt wall. Steve was right, of course, but there was always plan B when plan Sacrifice Steve got shot down by Sergeant Barnes. And plan B tended to consist of Sacrifice Bucky.

He shot a crooked grin at his best friend, nudging him once with his shoulder before flicking the safety off on his sniper rifle. "Well...let's give 'em a taste of this animal then, huh?"

Before Steve could drag him down Bucky shot upright, training the gun over the top of the trench and opening fire on the approaching enemies, aiming for the grenades strapped to their chests and belts, setting off explosions left and right.

There was nothing but him and his scope, the cross-hairs settling steady on grenade pins. Then on helmed heads, shooting between eyes. The background behind the target was shifting, trenchside battle turning to a river, then a little German town, a snow-covered mountain, barren Russian lands. A city, a rooftop, decades suddenly cycling through the crosshairs, Winter Soldier's targets in flashes, shots and shots fired, blood exploding, bodies dropping.

Carefully tracking his Captain through the scope, catching the strays and getting a salute in return. Then they were morphing and Steve kept showing up behind the scope just as Bucky was firing and then all of the head shots and the bodies crumpling were all wearing blue with soft blonde hair and the blood was spreading and there was screaming and screaming--

A sharp sting on his cheek, then Bucky was sitting up and the screams stopped and someone was breathing heavy on the floor beside his bed and there were two knives wobbling in his wall.

"Fucking hell," Bucky groaned, dropping his head in his hands. Long strands of hair swam into his vision and he pushed them away angrily, hating the sudden reminder of how much older, sadder he looked now. On second thought he snatched a hairband from his bedside table and whipped his hair into a high bun. He wanted to shear it all off but that'd be caving, that'd be cheating. Like he could go back to being okay if he looked okay.

"You with me?" a breathy voice asked from out of sight. Right, Steve had probably come barging in at the screaming. And apparently Bucky'd responded by throwing knives. He wondered if Steve would've agreed to living with him if he'd known that came with knives.

"Thanks for waking me." Bucky sighed and tipped his head against the headboard, remembering when it'd been dirt just a moment ago, in his dream. Well, it had started out with a memory.

The thing was, memories were comforts for normal people; but they are gorgeous and vibrant and unfairly detailed for Bucky – they are the most stunning, real thing he'd ever seen, clear in a way nothing was anymore, and he'd live inside those memories forever if he could.

He remembered so much. Including every second of the lightning trigger. And the nightmares. And everything else he pretended to blank out for. His body might freak, but his mind could remember every excruciating moment afterwards. Steve didn't need to know that.

"Of course, Bucky. Anytime, you know that." Steve pushed off the floor and sank onto the edge of Bucky's bed, looking at him too softly, even with the darkness shadowing his eyes.

The room was coated in fractured moonlight, streaming between his black curtains. If Steve weren't here he'd rip the curtains back to look out the window, make sure the world outside wasn't on fire anymore. But he didn't need Steve thinking he was any crazier than he was, so he turned away from the prying gaze and pulled the third knife from under his pillow, setting it carefully on the nightstand.

"Bu--"

"I said thanks, can I go back to sleep now?" he interrupted, not looking at Steve, his right hand tracing designs into the sheets.

"You can go back to sleep after that?" The words were incredulous, so it must have been a really bad one. Steve'd had to slap him to wake him up, clearly it'd been pretty awful. He shoved at the guilt in his stomach before it ate him alive and slid back under the sheets, rolling his back to Steve.

"I can try. If you leave."

Steve left without a word.

Bucky didn't get a second more of sleep.

~~~

In order for people to leave you alone, you have to be okay.

So he forced himself to join in on the Avengers lunch date in the movie room, where there was a very loud and very vigorous, game battle of Guitar Hero commencing. He made it about halfway through a song before the amount of noise started to drive him crazy.

It was only noise, he could block it out. Bucky focused on spreading his fingers, feeling the energy between them. Controlling every inch, focusing on his breathing. He could erase the noise. He could still do it. He could still--

Three songs later he excused himself to the bathroom and he'd been in the closest dark space he could find ever since. Which was some sort of janitor's closet. He wrapped his arms around his knees and buried his head and forced himself to count his breaths.
He hit three hundred seventeen when the handle turned. His gun was in his hand at the sound but he shoved it back in its holster when the door opened to flood light in and he recognized the quiet breathing.

"Shut the door," Bucky growled, not bothering to lift his head. If Steve knew what was good for him, he'd close the door again.

And surprise of all surprises, he actually did shut it. But not surprising at all, he stepped inside first. Which was not the fucking point. Bucky'd said shut the door as in go away, not come squeeze your perfect ass into the closet with me and then shut us both in here together.

He lifted his head, glaring at Steve's innocent perch on the ground across from him, wishing it wasn't pitch black so Steve could actually see the anger in his glare.

"Do you just not care that I'm deadly or are you that stupid?" With all the knives he'd had thrown at him lately, you'd think he'd catch the hint.

"Probably both," Steve replied simply.

Well, how fucking true was that. They sat in silence for while, until Bucky's breathing had settled back out and Steve seemed pretty comfortable himself, leaning against the opposite wall with his legs stretched out in Bucky's space. Bucky was counting breaths again, making bets about when Steve would speak again.

He'd actually undershot, guessing 150, but it wasn't until 419 that the pretty mouth opened again.

"You may be deadly--" a quiet admission that Bucky'd been waiting to hear from that mouth for a long time, even if he could already hear the condition Steve was going to tack on to it, "--but you're still human. You're allowed to feel. Be scared, overwhelmed, whatever. You're allowed to be human. You don't have to be powerful and efficient and in control all the time, Bucky."

He closed his eyes because Steve couldn't see him anyways, hating his stomach for untwisting its knots at Steve's words. He didn't want Steve to be a comfort. He didn't want to soften at those blue eyes. But most the time it wasn't up to him, and that was the very source of the problem.

"Look, Rogers – Hydra put a leash on me." Literally, he added in his head, but he didn't need to clarify the mental image for Steve. "They tortured me and made me believe it was for my own good. I get that. I get that I'm fucked up or whatever."

Steve made a noise of protest and Bucky threw up a hand to stop him, even though they couldn't see details in the dark he should be able to detect the movement and shut up. Which he did.

"But when I wasn't leashed and caged up, when I wasn't strapped down in a chair and tortured? I was powerful. I was invincible. It was the only thing I had for decades. And you're asking me to throw that away. You're asking me to give up the last bit of control and power I have in my life."

Bucky reached up for the door handle, twisting it and shoving the door open without getting off the ground. Light flooded them both, so he got to see every ounce of heartbreak and despair as it crossed Steve's face at his next words.

"I won't do that."

When he gestured out the door with his hand, Steve didn't move. Bucky sighed and got up himself, strolling away before Steve could catch up.
"What am I supposed to do?" He threw up his hands and nearly knocked over the closest robot, who made a funny noise and wheeled away from him. Tony picked up a wrench and started twisting something, making an annoyed sound before glancing back up at Steve.

"I'd wait it out, Rogers. Sometimes before it gets better, the darkness gets bigger." He went back to tightening bolts and Sam reached over the lab table to nudge Steve, furrowing his eyebrows and tilting his head towards Tony.

"Did he just quote Fall Out Boy?" Steve shrugged and Sam turned to Tony this time, leaning over his latest project to get his attention. "Did you just quote Fall Out Boy?"

Tony glared at Sam and chose not to answer, tossing a bolt in his direction instead. Steve sighed and glared at the robot who'd decided to venture over again, thinking it was safe from Steve's wrath. He definitely didn't knock it over on his way out.

~~~

SGR: Hey B, easy mission at 13:00, meet me @ the lobby

JBB: so I'm ur собака now too? I go on missions when I want to.

Steve frowned at his phone, copy-pasting the unfamiliar word and shooting it in a text to Natasha. Is this Russian?

NAR: wow, Cyrillic letters and everything, I'm impressed Rogers

SGR: but what does it mean?

...

NAR: dog

Suddenly, Steve didn't feel well enough to go on a mission. He called in with a headache and Tony shot a knowing glance at Clint, who sighed and pinched the bridge of his nose to ward off the pending headache.

But Sam didn't know there was even a mission going on, so when Steve popped into his new floor (aka Thor's floor) he didn't bat an eye.

"I'm going out for a run, you want anything?"

Sam looked up from the spread files and books, taking in Steve's appearance - he'd chosen carefully, clean sweats, a tight gray shirt, his running shoes already laced - and settled for approval of sound mind.

"Sure, you planning to pass that coffee shop on Broadway?"

"Kinda hard to miss."

"So Captain America wouldn't mind picking me up a cherry donut?"

Steve put his hands on his hips and shook his head, perfect smile stretched across his poster-boy face.

"No sir, Captain America would not mind."
"Awesome. Thanks, buddy." Sam gave him a little wave that Steve returned cheerily before heading back out into the elevator.

If his smile fell the moment Sam couldn't see, no one was the wiser. Well, maybe Jarvis, but he didn't have a reason to care.

He really did plan to go running. The burning soles of his shoes eating up pavement, the world rushing by him fast enough that he didn't have to focus on anything but keep going.

Only nothing was ever that easy anymore.

The route he had planned was an hour long, but he was only halfway through when it got interrupted. He'd stopped for a moment to grab water because hydration meant he wouldn't end up puking, and that was when he heard them.

A pack - like hyenas - of total assholes, big, buff, and jostling each other around. There were eight of them, huddled in the mouth of an alley, out of sight if it weren't for the leader suddenly wolf-whistling some girl walking down the street.

Steve may not know much about the twenty-first century, but he was entirely sure that was not okay, no matter what time period you were in.

"Hey! You wanna show a little respect?" Steve called, straightening up from tightening his shoe. The pack of jerks ignored him, a few catching on to the one asshole's move and making obscene gestures at the poor passing girl.

"Why don't you come say hi, pretty lady?" One of the asshats shouted and his buddies all laughed, shoving each other's shoulders and pointing at the girl with beckoning fingers. That was enough of that.

"Hey, you wanna shut up?" Steve crossed the street, puffing up his chest because he could do that now, making sure the group wouldn't miss him this time.

A few pointed in his direction, whispering amongst themselves, but they didn't budge. And then one had the audacity to whistle at the next girl passing by, shooting an amused look at Steve seconds after.

"What're you gonna do, big guy?" He jeered and Steve had to clench his fists at his sides, grit his teeth to keep from lashing out.

"I'm gonna ask you one more time to stop whistling at the girls like they're dogs."

The hyena pack laughed, turning their backs to Steve like he was the least threatening thing on the planet. He'd spent a lot of his life getting that exact same cold shoulder from bullies. But he wasn't prepared for an asshole leaning over, snapping his fingers at the next passerby with a smug sneer.

"Hey, a bitch is a bitch."

So maybe it was a soft spot. Steve Rogers would stand up for anyone getting heckled, regardless of gender or situation.

But calling someone a dog?

After the text he'd just gotten?

He used to have a wicked temper. It had been too dangerous to keep - he'd mellowed out with the serum, putting his pent up energy into helping people, fighting the war. But this was the war he was fighting, the dehumanization, the haunted looks and nightmare screams and sharp accusations of so I'm your собака now too?

Which meant he'd been somebody else's dog before, and it wasn't hard to put two and two together with the Russian and the words Hydra had me on a leash.

So it was a soft spot. The dog thing.

Steve reeled back his fist and punched.

~~~

"Spill." Tony swung his leg over the chair, facing backwards and straddling it as he blocked Bucky into the corner of the communal floor he'd escaped to.

"What, blood? I'm pretty good at that." Bucky raised a cocky, triumphant eyebrow and Tony could swear it was like looking straight in a mirror.

He stroked his beard thoughtfully, giving Barnes an unimpressed eyebrow-raise of his own.

"You and Steve. It's a fucking rollercoaster. He wants to help you and you want..." Tony trailed off, waving his hand in the air to indicate Barnes to fill in the rest.

Instead he scowled, leaning back in his chair and crossing his arms over his chest. "I don't need anyone. Or anything. I'm perfectly fucking functional on my own."

"Did you even listen to the boyfriends playlist I made you? Everybody needs somebody."

"Everybody wants somebody. And even if I did want Steve..." Bucky trailed off, staring down at his metal hand and twitching his fingers, sending a whirring ripple down his arm. Tony knew that look. Again, mirror.

"Let me guess. He's an American beauty and you're an American psycho?"

Bucky's head snapped up, staring at Tony with wide eyes, looking like the young, kid army brat for the first time Tony'd ever seen.

"Yes exactly," Bucky breathed, eyes glittering with relief that someone had finally said it out loud.

Making a mental note to deck out an iPod for Barnes ASAP, Tony poked the metal arm, catching Bucky's attention again from wherever he'd drifted off to.

"Hey, well, that American beauty is fixated on you."

The temporary brightness dulled, then sharpened darker, and that's it, there it was, the American Psycho, the ghost with a kill count high enough to be an Avenger.

"He shouldn't be," the assassin snarled, and Tony's fingers twitched irrationally for the protection of his suit. As terrifying as Steve's boyfriend was, he couldn't back down when Rogers had been dying lately and if somebody didn't intervene it would be on Tony that they lost the greatest soldier of all time.
Again.

And as much as he'd like to pass on his dad's legacy, the trauma of losing Captain America was not a burden he wanted passed down through the generations.

"You know Rogers. There's a reason he's fighting for you, he's got a reason for everything."

Plastic snapped and shards were already flying, Bucky was already standing, by the time Tony's brain registered he'd moved - broken the chair in his metal hand then moved - and the violence was too sudden for him to calculate a single solution before Barnes was shouting, towering over Tony, all angry red deadly rage.

"Guilt! That's why! He fucking adopted me because he feels guilty about what happened. He's always had something to prove and now it's me, I'm his fuckin' project, and he's got fists raised at shadows he's never gonna be able to fucking fight and I don't need to be saved, I don't need the goddamned blessing of his love or whatever the fuck he's trying to give me I don't fucking need any of this just because Steve fucking Rogers has to take on the fucking world!!"

Because apparently Barnes really was adjusting, really was thoughtful, the knife he threw for emphasis wasn't aimed at Tony, just at Tony's wall.

Then he stormed out of the floor and Tony slumped in his chair.

And cursed his father for ever creating Project Rebirth, because as usual, Tony was left to clean up the mess.

~~~

The slam of the stairwell door matched perfectly to a folder file in Bucky's memories, the one that held scenes of an extremely pissed, terribly beaten, and fragile, small Steve Rogers.

The sound could've come straight out of 1941. Bucky'd assume he'd time-traveled if it weren't for the heavy weight of tired boots coming down the hallway. Tiny Steve had never walked like that.

"What the hell happened?" The incredulous words shot out of his mouth the moment Steve stumbled into the living room.

Steve just looked at him, one eye slightly puffy, his lip split, blood caked in his hairline, an arm draped protectively over his ribs.

"Did you get in a fight?" How many times had he said that in his life? He'd never imagined he'd say it again. The blue eyes were downcast, shamed and pained.

"There were these assholes goin' after a girl, I got a duty to do mor'n watch." Steve shuffled a few steps towards the kitchen, wincing and tightening the arm over his ribs.

Bucky threw up his hands and crossed the room, each step walking back a decade until the Winter Soldier and Captain America were standing in the same positions as Tiny Steve Rogers and Pretender Bucky Barnes. And as always, he gathered his fucking punk of a best friend in his arms, the familiar game of avoiding Steve's injuries while supporting his weight and keeping from getting shoved off.

They limped to the kitchen together, where Bucky snagged a stool with his foot, pulling it over and plopping Steve down so he could search for washcloths and alcohol.
"It's already healing, Buck," Steve said tiredly, leaning his non-bloody temple on the counter. Bucky ignored him, finally opening a useful cabinet and dumping everything he needed next to the sink.

"You show up bloody, you deal with getting cleaned up. And you get to tell me the goddamn story, because last I checked Captain America doesn't get into back alley fights anymore."

"I wasn't being Captain America," he huffed, eyeing the wet washcloth gingerly. "Clearly," Bucky muttered, tilting Steve's chin up with his left hand so he could use the nerve endings in his right to assess damage properly. The lighting wasn't great in here, but it was better than their shitty apartment in the forties, so he could see all the blood dried to Steve's forehead. He dabbed carefully, wiping away red with the washcloth and keeping a careful eye on the skin underneath.

Blue eyes searched his face, the penetrating gaze of confusion and calculation, like he was trying to figure out why Bucky was doing this. Personally, he thought it was pretty axiomatic. He was Bucky Barnes and Steve Rogers had gotten in a fight.

The only person here who thought this part would change was Steve. That's how everything was - Steve really did act like he was two separate people half the time. Bucky wanted to scream from the rooftops that he'd always been the fucking Winter Soldier, always, it'd only been easier to hide in that world. It was still him, he was still here to clean Steve up from his endless fights.

Except they'd been ended once; because punching civilians when you could kill them with a single swing was not a good idea.

The washcloth brushed over the open cut and Steve winced, biting his lip as Bucky held blonde hair back with one hand so he could see better. It was already healing, mostly stitched up, a slightly raised red line where there must've once been a deep gash.

"How many guys? Cause I know first hand you don't go down easy."

Or, well, in Bucky's case, he went down too easy.

He was still really fucking pissed about that helicarrier fight. Honestly Steve, what the fuck.

Steve grimaced, letting Bucky tilt his chin up again to get a look at his split lip. "Eight, I think."

"You kill any of 'em?"

"What?"

"Hate to break it to you, but you're not a scrap anymore. Punches from supersoldiers aren't the same as punk kids from Brooklyn."

Those blue eyes cast guiltily down. Bucky swiped his thumb over Steve's bottom lip, wiping away the wet from the washcloth and refusing to let himself think about how close their faces were.

"I stopped fighting halfway through. I thought I had a handle on my temper... but it's been getting worse lately and I guess. I guess I snapped." Bright blue found his again and Bucky held the gaze, running his right hand fingers over the slight bruising on Steve's cheekbone. It was already fading too.

"Bullies were that bad, huh?" Bucky framed Steve's face in his palms, turning it back and forth in the light to check for any more damage. The pretty face was pliant in his hands, eyes drifting closed, innately trusting Bucky to take care of him.

Sucking in a breath at the weight of that request and feeling a little dizzy, he dropped his forehead against Steve's and dug his fingers into the back of his neck, taking a moment to get his head back on straight. The warmth of Steve's puffing breath over his mouth was more disorienting than helpful, so Bucky only gave them a moment of proximity before pulling back, sliding his fingers through Steve's blonde hair once as Steve didn't bother to open his eyes, tipping his head in Bucky's hand like a cat.

Okay. Enough of that. Steve'd been clutching his ribs when he came in, so Bucky rucked up his shirt, tugging it off over Steve's head, careful around his wounds. Then he knelt in front of the chair, tracing his fingers over the yellow and greenish healing bruises on Steve's ridiculously built torso.

The last time Steve had been shirtless in front of him, he'd been wrapped up in Steve's arms, tangled together half-naked and fuck, why was this always happening to him?

"They called her a dog," Steve blurted out, and Bucky stilled, his fingers frozen on Steve's skin, not looking up.

So he must have translated Bucky's text. He had no idea what he was supposed to do about that. But it didn't matter anyways, because the silence was suddenly cut again, jolting words falling to the floor like death sentences.

"They whistled at the girls and snapped their fingers and when I told them to stop, one said 'a bitch is a bitch,' and I couldn't take it, I couldn't watch those monsters dehumanize people to dogs, not after...not after..."

Steve had actually gotten into some backalley fight. Bucky had every right to be pissed - only, for the first time, he didn't blame Steve. This was all on Bucky.

It was his fault.

It was Bucky's fault Steve had broken the pact of more than two years without a fight.

So I'm your Собака now too?

Because he'd dumped his problems in Steve's lap and Steve couldn't handle it - shouldn't have been made to handle it.

He'd known he was hurting Steve, but this wasn't just hurt. This was ruin.

It'd been building up, all the warnings of Steve losing his temper more and more. Breaking his phone and punching walls and the freak out session in the gym and the way he'd been biting and sharp around everyone lately, it was all Bucky's fault.

The first time he'd realized, overheard Stark talking about depression - he'd told himself there was nothing he could do about it.

At the time, he'd believed it. There were no solutions besides leaving, and if he left then Steve would come looking for him.
There was really only one way to leave for good, to stop being the burden that was eating Steve alive. To save Steve from depression and PTSD and temper swings and all the hell he'd been going through.

To save Steve. For good.

Only one way out to ensure Steve wouldn't follow.

He didn't want to hurt Steve, not ever, and he knew this would. But the bullet was too deep on this one.

It was February again. Perfect timing.

Bucky stood up, eyes on the floor, and dropped the washcloth in the sink.

"Get some rest," he said softly, pausing at the kitchen entrance. And, because it was the last time he'd get to, Bucky let his gaze land on Steve, let himself memorize the beautiful blue color again. He barely managed to keep himself from saying I'll miss you, because that wasn't something Steve needed to hear.

Instead he gave Steve a small smile, wishing he had something better to give Steve to remember him by. They'd never been ones for closure, but if anyone deserved an ounce of it, it was Steve. So Bucky sucked in a breath and gave Steve the last thing he could. "I'm sure you had 'em on the ropes, you punk."

He left before he could hear the whispered jerk in reply.

The next place he went was his room; there were some things he had to take care of first. He wasn't stupid or mean enough to write a note - letters broke hearts, it'd be easier and faster if he didn't bother. But he did grab his blue peacoat out of the closet, carefully slotting the picture of the Howling Commandos in the inside pocket.

His fingers brushed a piece of paper and he tugged it out, unfolding the drawing of his arm with the apple instead of a star. He'd never gotten rid of the damn star. Not that he wanted an apple, but there was a red Soviet star branded onto his bicep and he hadn't bothered to get rid of it. It didn't matter now anyways.

It was the only drawing of Steve's he had anymore, and maybe it was selfish but Bucky transferred it to the pocket of his leather jacket, hanging the peacoat back up in the closet. It was already nearing the end of February, he didn't need anymore parallels.

On the way out of his room something under the bed caught his eye. He tugged it out, unrolling the propaganda poster that'd once been hanging on his wall. He'd taken it down before he'd gotten his memories back, and it was a damn good thing he did--

It was the exact same picture that they'd printed in the newspaper. The newspaper that'd broken him. The newspaper that'd driven him to try to take his life the first time. When he'd realized Steve was dead.

It'd been his ruin. Steve had been his ruin. Steve had always been his ruin.

Steve broke him. With the newspaper. By dying. But he'd broken him long before that. Steve broke his heart every time he pulled away from an almost kiss. Everytime he laughed lightly at something Bucky said, didn't realize that Bucky was pouring out his soul. Steve broke his heart when he didn't even ask before getting the serum. Steve broke his heart every time he jumped out of a burning building, even when Bucky begged him not to.

Steve broke his heart every time he kicked Bucky out of his bed during the war. It's not cold, he'd say. You shouldn't need me, he didn't say. Bucky heard anyways.

He shouldn't need Steve. He shouldn't, not back then. Especially not now. He was strong and perfect, a killing machine, the scariest ghost story to tell children at night. The only thing that'd ever broken him was Steve.

Through his torture as the Winter Soldier, as a young child, as anything he ever was, Steve was the only thing that'd broken him.

And he needed him. More than anything.

It was disgusting.

Bucky couldn't live with it. Not anymore.

*

He took the elevator up because he didn't feel like climbing stairs all the way to the top floor. Well, not the roof, the floor that had that platform on it - the one that jutted over New York City with all open space and no ledges.

"Sergeant Barnes," Jarvis greeted as Bucky stepped out of the elevator. "I congratulate you on your calm heartrate, sir."

Bucky laughed lightly, scaling the few steps in the middle of the room. "It's been a while since I've been balanced, hasn't it?"

"Yes sir, I'm pleased to hear you're doing better."

"Much," Bucky replied, stepping outside. He had a mission. Of course his body was finally alright.

The sun was setting on the horizon, golden and blinding, the bright shimmer before the burn. How many times had he been burned by the sun? Except that his own sun never burned angel wings into his back, only chains onto his wrists.

Gold was the inside of a bank vault. Gold was the sunshine boy he'd craved for so long. Gold was the memories of dances to haunt. Gold was the crushing weight of a smile that never gave up.

Gold was everything that'd hurt him. And he wasn't as strong as that golden smile.

All that's golden is never real, right?

Bucky stepped to the middle of the platform, stretching his arms in front of him, rolling his fingers, watching metal plates shift and human muscle ripple. He could feel it, the constant rumble beneath his skin, the itching, swallowing, consuming dark rage that blossomed from that deep, black desire and pain.

He'd almost killed bully schoolboys with it when Steve was just a kid. Protecting the piece of gold he'd stolen from the world, like an angry dragon protecting a prize it didn't deserve.

He'd killed curly hair schoolboys with it during the war, when Steve had asked Bucky to come along. Protecting the bright star that arched across his sky, swallowing up the brilliant light with his blanket of darkness.

He'd killed so much more than schoolboys with it as the Winter Soldier, when he'd lost that bright golden star. Lost only hope he'd had to cling to. The stitches that held him together.

Now Bucky was fraying those stitches and ruining Steve and it wasn't fair, that the consuming dark rage had to drag Steve down too. He'd tried to stop it once back when he'd had one arm. He'd felt the rage coming and he'd sharpened his nails and tried to slit his wrist before the rage consumed him.

He'd failed. But he'd be damned if he let himself fail this time.

It started in a dark room a long time ago, mournful thoughts in his head and blood on his hands and wanting nothing more than to be dead. It would end that way too.

For so long, he'd forced himself to hold on for Steve's sake. The last time he'd died, falling from the train, he'd had a few brief moments of shocking clarity. In the face of death and the end, he'd decided that the moment he got pulled up from the train, he'd knock Steve to the floor and kiss him senseless. Because why the hell had he refrained in the first place? Petty, foolish, childish reasons. So now, knowing all that, he should've kissed Steve already, right?

But he'd fallen that day, moments after thinking it. Maybe it was a sign: he was never supposed to kiss Steve. The universe had yanked them apart to prove to Bucky that Steve didn't feel that way about him, then shoved them back together so Bucky could actually be a good friend to Steve without his stupid feelings getting in the way.

But he couldn't do it. He couldn't be a 'good friend' because after everything that'd happened to him? The takeaway wasn't that he didn't love Steve. It was that his love for Steve had sustained decades - haunted him when he couldn't remember Steve's name, taunted him with nightmares and performance errors, and saved him, from himself, on that helicarrier.

The takeaway was that his love for Steve was everything.

It was too much. He couldn't do it. Because what if he lost Steve again? He hadn't survived that last time and he sure as hell wouldn't survive it now. So he had to leave before it got that bad - because no death could be as painful as losing Steve Rogers.

And the thing was, it was probably the only thing Steve could never forgive. Maybe there had been a chance of them being together, but how could they when Bucky was suicidal? When he'd rather die than face the pain of losing Steve?

He'd just seen Steve bloody and beat up and it'd tugged at something so deep inside of him, the memory of faces under his own fists, the bodies piled around him. He'd end himself before he saw that happen to Steve.

Steve would never forgive him for this. He'd never understand. How could Steve understand that Bucky loved him too much, that death was easier? It was Steve, he'd never get that. He'd never stoop so low.

And so they couldn't be together.

He stepped forward, toes brushing the edge of the platform. New York was wide and busy below him, opening up with wide arms as his final resting place. All it would take was one more step forward. Then he'd be falling again.
Poetic justice, right? He fell from a train the first time, it was only fitting he fall again. He sucked in a breath and curled his right hand over his heart, taking count of his heartbeat. It was racing now, in the face of death again. He could see it, stepping over the edge, his body flying down with that unforgettable feeling of falling and reaching and falling and then he'd hit the pavement and that would be the end of him.

Tony would probably get all kinds of shit from the media. And if there were pedestrians down there, they'd probably be scared for life. The cleanup would be awful. And the look on Steve's face...

The last time he'd fallen, Steve's face and outstretched hand had been the last thing he'd seen. In a sudden selfish whim, Bucky glanced back at the tower, wishing that Steve was behind him. All he wanted was for Steve to be the last thing he saw again.

Last month, after Steve's pool panic attack, he'd pulled his best friend into a hug and said how 'bout next time we die together? He'd meant every word. And Steve'd laughed lightly in response, never agreeing, and forgotten about it. If only.

But as selfish as Bucky was, he wasn't selfish enough to wish the horror of his suicide upon Steve's eyes. He didn't want Steve to see this. It wasn't fair.

Bucky held his breath, looking down at the streets of New York.

He'd finally be coming home.

He lifted a foot, suspending it in the open air, and paused. The last time he'd fallen he'd survived. If he survived this, they'd put him on suicide watch lockdown for the rest of his life.

He'd survived falling from a train in the mountains. There was no way to be sure he wouldn't survive this too.

Cursing, Bucky stepped away from the ledge. So much for poetic justice.

Trudging back inside, he'd never felt so heavy in his life. The one out he thought he had and it probably wouldn't work. Bucky looked dejectedly around the floor, from the wall stocked with Tony's alcohol to the sweeping glass windows, the crushingly empty space.

Grand, beautiful, and unmistakably alone.

He'd told the geese in Central Park that he was the only one who could take mercy on himself. There were other ways besides jumping.

Bucky pulled his pistol out of its holster and checked the chamber for rounds mechanically, flipping the safety off and cocking it with the familiar click of a trained hand.

He jogged down the mini steps to the middle of the room and crossed over to the nearest wall, leaving a few inches behind him. It'd stop the ricochet and cause minimal damage that way. With scarily steady hands he switched the gun to his left grip, curling his metal hand to aim at himself.

On the day Steve had fallen from the helicarrier, Bucky had saved him twice. Once by pulling him out of the water and once by walking away. He'd save him for a third time today by leaving for good.

Bucky shifted his metal hand around the grip, leaning back against the wall and staring at the matte black metal. The last thing he'd ever see. Not half as pretty as Steve. Beautiful in the way Bucky was instead - dark and terrifying, stunning into shocked silence. Deadly.

And here goes. The most lethal machine to becomes it's own fatality; he got his poetic justice after all. The one who had created a century of death bestows the gift upon himself.

Bucky closed his eyes. What was one more squeeze of a trigger?

The door burst open.

The loud sound almost had his finger squeezing on reflex and wouldn't that be ironic, the sound that was supposed to save him instead sealing his death certificate. Except his reflexes were too perfect for that. Even now, even after all those mistakes and error, he still managed to keep the metal finger from twitching and ending his life.

Because he had a feeling he knew what that sound was. And it was the sole thing he'd been trying to avoid.

Bucky opened his eyes. And swore.

He knocked his head back against the wall behind him, muttering a string of violent curses as he slid all the way down, sinking to the floor and leaning so hard against the wall he was surprised it didn't bow.

"Get the fuck out, Rogers," he rasped, rolling his head to look at the intruder.

Steve's hand was covering his mouth in shock, frozen and staring and absolutely terrified. It wasn't fair. The look on Steve's face was going to fucking haunt him. He'd be fine if Steve just walked back out, so he could pull the trigger and it'd all be over and he wouldn't have to see Steve fucking Rogers look like he'd just gotten his world ripped in half.

He slammed his head back against the wall, under the chance that it could take him out just like that with no mess or worry for either of them, except of course it didn't, it just made his head throb as he glared daggers at Steve.

Steve who chose now to refuse to leave him the fuck alone.

This was the last secret he'd had and it'd been ripped out of his hands. He'd never told Steve about all the times he'd tried to kill himself while they molded him into a killer. But now Steve knew and how was Bucky supposed to live with that? Only yeah, right, the plan had been to not live, before it got trampled all over by nosy star spangled asses.

The shocked hand over Steve's mouth lowered, and it didn't take his enhanced sight to see that Steve was trembling like a leaf. Bucky kept glaring, watching as Steve rebooted, reset himself and shoved the shock aside, taking a few steps, then walking slowly all the way to his wall. Bucky bristled as Steve got closer but he didn't stop, not until he was a foot away, crouching down in front of Bucky.

He forced himself not to growl, feeling extremely patronized at the position, like he was a petulant child. He knew exactly what he was doing. But there was no point when Steve was here, so when soft artist hands reached for the gun in his hands, carefully prying his fingers from the grip, Bucky didn't stop him. He refused to meet Steve's eyes, watching his hands instead as Steve dismantled the entire gun, as many pieces as it would break into, and threw them all haphazardly across the room.

Then the gentle hands were patting him down, slipping the knife from his ankle and the two from his hip, tossing those to the side too. It was a smart idea, but Bucky still had at least 3 knives on him by the time Steve finished. Not that he was going to off himself when Steve was here.

As soon as he decided Bucky was unarmed, Steve collapsed against the wall beside him, energy drained as he threw his head back and stared at the ceiling, his shoulder pressed warm against Bucky's right side. There was no pretending he was alone now, not when Steve was solid beside him, an unmistakable reminder of everything he'd almost just saved left behind.

"Why?" Steve finally asked the ceiling, and he didn't need to elaborate, it was pretty clear what he was talking about.

"You know why," Bucky replied, glancing at Steve from the corner of his eye. Although really, Steve barely knew the half of it. Now was not the time to lay a lifetime of hidden feelings on the table.

He lifted his hands from his lap, turning over the fake one, watching the metal glint in the dying sunlight. He hated the ghost pains, like his old left hand was there under the metal, trying to break out of the encasing, reverberating in aches and sharp tingling like the blood circulation had been cut, not his entire limb.

"I've been abused too long," he said quietly, letting the metal fall back to his lap. Machine. "I can't do it anymore. I won't do it anymore. I'm done. I'm sick of hurting."

Steve swallowed thickly next to him and Bucky closed his eyes, the familiar ache in his chest nothing to do with almost dying and everything to do with the beautiful man beside him that he simply couldn't have. The American Beauty. "It hasn't stopped hurting--" Bucky paused, clarifying 'it' as loving you in his head, "--not once, and this is it for me."

"If you'd just let me help," Steve tried, voice small and scared.

Half the reason he was doing this was because he needed Steve, couldn't breathe right without him, couldn't handle the idea of being left alone. Which would happen eventually. It was more than want, he physically needed Steve, and Steve didn't feel that way. He couldn't drag Steve down that road of clinging, crippling codependency.

"It's not fair to you. All that I am? This mess?" Bucky waved a vague hand and Steve caught his wrist, fingers closing solid and promising over his pulse.

"I can take it, Bucky."

"The thing is..." he paused, finally turning his head to meet the gaze of those precious blues. "You shouldn't have to."

Maybe it was low, quoting the past like that. Steve was staring at him in horror but Bucky was just so tired, he didn't want to have this fight. He didn't want to do this at all anymore. He'd finally been so close to the end.

It took a few recalibration blinks and licked lips before Steve managed to find his words again. "You promised me it was always the two of us--"

Yeah, until Bucky had become a burden instead of a best friend.

"That doesn't change anything, Steve. I can't depend on you. When they took you away, look what I turned into. The only thing I have left is the art of murder."

"Okay," Steve shot back, like that was a perfectly alright skill to have, like it didn't matter that it was the only skill Bucky had. "Okay, we'll take that and we'll build on it. Just, don't do this. Okay?"

Metal plates caught on his long hair, tugging as he ran his fingers through his hair in exasperation. Steve wasn't going to get it, Bucky'd predicted this. He'd known this would happen, that's why he'd planned to go out alone.

"I have no reason to stay alive."

"What about me?" Steve pleaded desperately. "Can't I be--"

Your reason?

"No," Bucky snapped, stopping him too harshly, but he was going out of his fucking mind because-- because-- "No no no no, you can't, because what the hell does that make me? If you're the only thing I'm living for? I am no one, Steve, without you. Nothing without you."

Who are you?

James Buchanan Barnes.

Who are you without him?

Nothing.

Who are you?

Nothing.

There was a choked sound next to him and Bucky bit his lip hard enough to draw blood.

"You've been my everything for my entire life and then I lost you, Steve. I lost you once and I can't. do. that. again. I cannot depend my existence on you when you don't even--"

He froze, tongue between his teeth, words love me pressed against the tip of his mouth only he couldn't say that, not out loud and definitely not right now.

"When I don't what?"

Steve's wide eyes were begging and watery but Bucky shook his head, looking away before he had to see Steve cry. He couldn't handle Steve crying.

"Please," he whispered. "It's too hard, Steve. I can't do it anymore."

Silence. A few sniffles and the peripheral movement of Steve rubbing his face. Bucky blinked and wished his body would go numb already. He was so ready to give in.

But because his dumb ass decided to claim Steve Rogers as his best friend, giving in wasn't an option

"You can't do this to me, either." Steve's voice was steadier now, pissed and firey. What an unsurprising turn of events.

The whole empty room cringed as Bucky laughed, sadistic and terrifying even to his own ears, tipping his head against the wall again.

"First time I tried this - once Hydra found me in the snow - I kept thinking how ashamed you'd be of me. I didn't think about my own life, not about what God or my parents or, fucking hell, what I thought about dying. Just that you'd never understand. You'd never forgive that."

Bucky ground the heels of his hands against his eyes, wishing his insides would stop screeching. "They didn't let me, they stopped me every time I tried to off myself. And then here you are, doing the exact same goddamned thing."

"I'm not Hydra." Steve's voice had turned from pissed to desperate now, a whole range of emotions. A heavy hand shaking his shoulder. "Bucky, you know I'm not Hydra. I'm nothing like them. I care about you."

So sincere, as always, and Bucky snorted, lifting his head to give Steve an unimpressed look. "You care about every goddamned person on this planet, Steve."

The frustration that crossed Steve's face at that was at the maximum level he'd ever seen it, which was saying a lot considering how frustrated Steve used to be with the whole goddamned world.

"Not like I care about you!"

Right. Bucky just looked away, turning his face before Steve could see the tear slipping down his cheek. Weak weak weak.

Then soft hands cupped his jaw, turning him back before he could force himself away, then Steve's fingertips were digging into his hair and he couldn't turn away if he tried, Steve was holding onto him too tightly. Careful thumbs wiped over the wet streaks on his cheeks and Bucky hated himself for how that made his eyes leak even more.

How long had it been since someone had wiped his tears away? And he had no idea that really, Steve was forcing himself not to kiss the tears away, let the salt seep between his lips, take Bucky's pain for his own.

Then a warm palm pressed against his forehead, grounding and sweet and Bucky's eyes slipped closed, he was so goddamn exhausted, as tired as Steve looked. The hand on his forehead slid into his hair and the warmth was replaced with Steve's forehead against his own.

Except this time, there was no quick pull away, just Steve's raggedy gasping breaths and the inescapable heat of his hands holding Bucky in place, close and forever and perfect. If Bucky could die right now without ruining Steve's life, he would.

Steve must have run out of rational arguments, his lips parted in gasping pain and blowing hot air over Bucky's chapped lips, his earlier logic morphed to desperate begging. "Please, please, don't leave me."

Squeezing his eyes shut tighter, Bucky drew in a shaky breath of his own. "It's not up to you anymore."

Why can't you let me do this?

Why did Steve care so goddamned much? He'd get over losing his best friend. He'd gotten over it once. He could fucking do it again. He'd be so much better off.

"B-buck--" Steve choked, and Bucky's hands itched to take Steve's jaw in his hands too, hold Steve so tight and close he could never get away, but instead they clenched into fists in his lap, fingernails of his right hand threatening to draw blood.

"My entire life," Bucky's voice cracked and he had to pause, breathe in and out, force himself calm.
"My entire life, I've been so afraid of the way...the way I've always been so ready die for you." He swallowed, metal hand prying one of Steve's hands away from his jaw, eyes still closed as he squeezed Steve's fingers too tightly, tried show Steve how much this meant. "But it's my turn now, Stevie. Can't you let me die for me?"

See, Stevie, look, finally doing something for me. The way you always said you wanted me too. Shouldn't Steve be proud of him? Finally choosing himself? Even if it was to save Steve.

What he hadn't expected was for Steve to start crying.

Bucky took Steve's hands off his face and leaned away, taken aback with the sudden curl of Steve's shoulders, the fisted hands that Bucky was holding by the wrists, the broken cries and flood of tears.

He let go of Steve's wrists, still kind of staring in shock, and the second Steve's hands were free they clutched onto Bucky, one fisting the front of his shirt and the other curling around his shoulder, thumb pressed hard into his collarbone as the pretty face tucked against Bucky's neck, fat wet tears cold against his skin as Steve clung to him like a child.

He was holding on hard enough to hurt, fingers inflicting real, dark bruises onto Bucky's skin. Wet, terrified noises tumbling out of his lips, no regard for his supersoldier strength or how he might be hurting Bucky.

Suddenly unsure for the first time today, Bucky lifted his left hand to stroke down Steve's back, head, something, to comfort him.

Only the metal glinted in the last light of the sunrise and the thought made him sick, a spiraling twist in his stomach at the idea of comforting Steve with that.

The metal impersonator fell back to his side and Bucky leaned his head against the wall, closing his eyes and centering himself in Steve's touch. In the pain. Focusing on the press of violence into already purpling bruises, settling into the feeling of reality.

That pain. He could feel it. He'd always been able to feel it, but for so long, he'd detached himself.

It doesn't have to be yours, the doctors had told him. Detach yourself from your body and you don't have to own that pain.

It was how he'd survived.

But the more he focused on the sharp sensations, the more his mind was sharpening. Like someone was clearing cobwebs. Shining sparkling clarity into dull metal pieces.

That was his collarbone that Steve was bruising. His. His neck that was wet with Steve's tears, his ears that were picking up the sounds of Steve's crying.

He could own that pain again if he wanted to. He could center himself in it and he could attach his body to his mind.

He could choose himself again. He could sink back into this skin.

He'd have to feel pain again - was it worth
it?

Steve needed comfort right now, but Bucky didn't know how to give it to him. And Bucky needed words, but Steve didn't know what to say.

It was just as well when the elevator opened and the recon squad came rushing in.

*

Bucky stared ahead numbly as they approached, didn't move or blink as Sam's strong hands tugged at Steve's arm to detach him from Bucky.

Steve wasn't having any of it.

His hands dug in deeper and Bucky's lips parted in a sharp inhale - that had hurt. That had hurt.

Sam tugged Steve again. Clint grabbed his other arm to help. Steve was weak with exhaustion, everyone could tell the moment his body began to cave. That's when he started screaming.

"No! No!" He struggled, clinging to Bucky tighter. "No! I won't leave him! You don't understand, you d-don't--"

Steve tried to shrug them off but then his hands slipped, everything wet with tears, and Clint and Sam had him upright, one arm each, as Steve struggled, trying to sink back to the ground.

"You don't understand, I can't--" He turned his attention away from the interferers, eyes wild as they met Bucky's again, as he tried to lunge forward. "I can't lose you. Bucky, I can't lose you."

Struggling, trying to shove Sam and Clint away as they started to drag him backwards. "I CAN'T LOSE YOU!!"

Bucky was still staring ahead blankly, but some distant part of him recognized that his cheeks were wet again, that there were tears streaking down the passive, numb expression on his face.

"I've got him," Natasha promised, cupping a hand on Steve's tear-streaked cheek as he tried to break away from the three of them. "Steve, I've got him. I'm gonna talk him down, okay? I promise. You can trust me."

Wide blue eyes blinked at her, more water welling up in them and Natasha grabbed his hand, squeezing tight, deadly serious. "I need you to trust me, Steve. I won't let you lose him."

He struggled for a few more seconds, then the fight just flew out of him, too physically worn down to do anything but slump over, entirely deflated. Clint and Sam both cursed, readjusting their grips and propping him back up, holding him as upright as possible as they started to pull him away.

Natasha walked with them a few steps, and Bucky could hear the quiet whispers still tumbling out of Steve's mouth. Don't leave me don't leave me don't leave me.

"Are you sure you can handle him?" Clint asked, voice hushed. The distant part of his brain that was still working registered the words but he didn't care, couldn't care about anything except that his shoulder was throbbing and Steve was crying, being dragged away.

"I'll knock him unconscious before I let him kill himself, okay? He's emotional, which means I'm faster.” Natasha’s voice was sure, steady, and he got to see Natalia Romanovna for the first time.
Today was a lot of firsts.

Bucky closed his eyes and waited for the tranquilizer shot to come.

~~~

Once they’d wrestled Steve into the bathroom on Sam/Thor’s floor - it was closest - Clint left with a salute, saying he’d go help Natasha with Barnes. Which left Sam with the crazed, oversized lunatic that was barely recognizable.

When he’d been passed up on his morning runs by Captain America, this was not exactly what he’d had in mind for the future.

The clear, cold water that Sam splashed in his face was the best thing Steve'd felt in days. After spluttering and blinking, he stood up from the bathtub edge - carefully, because his legs were wobbly
- and splashed more water on his own.

Behind the cupped safety of his hands, he was okay. Then, after enough cold had washed the salty tear stains from his cheeks, he felt at least alive enough to breathe.

Sam kept a steadying hand on his shoulder as they made their way to the kitchen counter. Steve propped himself on one of the tall bar stools, both elbows on the counter in front of him, focusing on his breathing as Sam sat down beside him.

His lungs were too small in his chest, maybe all the crying had made them shrink, or maybe the moment he’d punched that asshole in the alley his body had reverted back to pre-serum on the inside, making him weak all over again.

Except he’d never felt this useless back then.

Steve buried his face in his hands, hair probably poking in a thousand directions, the epitome of a walking disaster as Sam ran a hand over his shoulders.

"You gotta pull it together man. You can't help him if you're a mess." Sam's words were gentle, kind, and Steve slumped over, fingers threading through his hair. He was so goddamned tired.

“Sam, I don't know how to help him through this." His voice sounded distant, exhausted. Shell-shocked. The hand on his back stilled, holding onto his shoulder with a solid grip.

"I know it's a lot. It's scary, watching someone you love so close to the edge. You're afraid you'll say the wrong thing, tip them off the cliff, and then it's on your hands. There's not a lot worse than that fear. But look, man, he trusts you. More than everyone else. He needs you for this one.”

That same calm, dedicated voice had once told him that Bucky was beyond saving. Now Sam was telling him the exact opposite and Steve should be elated that someone else had hope, only he was crushed, he couldn't blink without the image of Bucky with a gun aimed at himself engraved in his eyelids.

"I can't do it, Sam. I wish to God I could, I want to save him more than anything, but I can't. Of all people, I can't. Where could I even start?” He lifted his head, dropping his arms back on the table and counting as he breathed in and out, backing out of the panic attack before it could start.

“Okay, well...” Sam's hand left his shoulder, leaning on the counter next to him to catch Steve's gaze. "Look, think back to times when you had it bad. Rumor has it you didn't take Bucky's death too well back in '45, right? Half outta your mind with grief. So focus on that.”

Steve looked at him incredulously, sitting up straighter on his stool. “How the hell would that help??”

“Well, it was the darkest time of your life, but you found a way out.” The color drained from Steve's face but Sam didn't notice, kept barreling on. "You have to show him how; there was something that made you pull through-“

“Dammit, no!” Steve shoved off his barstool, turning to the shocked look on Sam's face and throwing a hand up in the air. "That's the whole point, Sam! I didn't make it out!! Didn't you read about the damn plane crash?“

He stopped to catch his breath, grabbing the counter with one hand while Sam's eyebrows furrowed, looking confusedly between Steve and the curled hand threatening to break his countertop.

"But...that was an accident. You can't blame yourself. The plane going down, there was nothing you could do--“

And that was the final straw. Steve pushed off the counter, fists clenched at his sides, kicking the barstool out of the way and ignoring it as it clattered to the floor.

"Nothing I could do?" He laughed, the sound echoing around the room, waiting until the echoes returned in silence, empty, quiet and peaceful. "Nothing I could do," Steve repeated. Then he took a step closer to Sam, one hand in the air ticking off fingers as he counted.

"You mean like use a fucking parachute? Drop the bombs into the ocean? Let Peggy reroute the aircraft? Get Stark on the radio to dismantle the missiles?" Four fingers up, another step closer as he started shaking, sticking his thumb up for number five. "Or even just jump out of the damn thing?“

His voice broke on the word jump.

When Steve had fallen from the helicarrier, Bucky had jumped in after him. When Bucky had fallen the train, Steve hadn't bothered.

He could've jumped out of the plane. He could've jumped off the goddamned train.

Maybe Bucky wouldn't feel the need to shoot himself if he thought Steve actually cared about him.

The tears started overflowing and Steve would be surprised he had tears left, if he weren't too busy breaking down crying.

“W-when the plane hit, swim to the surface? Or maybe climb out once it settled in the ice and I was st-still awake? When the ice started to wrap--" he gasped a breath, clutching his counting hand over his chest now to keep from collapsing, "--wrap around my bones, do something besides curl up in a ball? When my body tried to float to the surface, don't t-tuck my shoulder under the pilot's chair so I would stay under?"

"Maybe hold my breath while my body still could, instead of inhaling arctic slush into my lungs? Choose to fucking live to honor B-Bucky's memory instead of...“
Steve covered his eyes with a hand, ragged wet breaths gasping between his words now. "Instead of dying with him like some...some unrequited Shakespearean story? Pull myself out of the goddamn plane..."

His hands clenched into fists and he pressed them to his temples, folding in half as he squeezed his eyes shut and the words of his soul got ripped out of his chest. "P-pull myself out of the goddamn plane so I could go find my best friend before he's t-tortured for seventy years??"

The weight of the words dropped from above like an anvil and he crumpled to the ground, unable to stand on two feet any longer.

He'd hated himself for letting Bucky fall. So much.

But that wasn't the worst part.

No, the worst of the guilt was buried deeper.

Because, rationally, he knew that Bucky falling from the train wasn't preventable. Steve had reached. He'd tried.

But you know what he hadn't tried?

To find his best friend.

He'd known.

He'd sat in their tent with his sketchpad in his hands and he'd known in his soul that Bucky was still alive out there somewhere.

And he'd chosen to listen to physics instead of his heart.

He'd chosen rationality over his own soul.

He'd done worse than let Bucky die, he let Bucky get captured by Hydra, he let Bucky get tortured, he let Bucky become the Winter Soldier.

Why?

"I couldn't live without him," Steve whimpered, rocking in his ball, the guilt eating his inside like a parasite.

Because he'd been so goddamned selfish.

"It's not your fault," Bucky'd told him on their road trip. Like it was a blessing. Like it was a goddamned hail mary.

Bucky was the one who fell but Steve's soul was the one that went down and Steve was the one who died.

"I COULDN'T DO IT!!"

In a red blur Steve shot out off the ground, stumbling to his feet, wrapping his arms around himself, screams wrenched out of his throat like a monster was caving its way free from between his lips, shattering his soul and spilling it on the ground like the broken glass of a sinking plane.

"MY OWN SELFISH, STUPID FUCKING FEELINGS GOT IN THE WAY AND I KILLED MYSELF WHEN I SHOULD HAVE BEEN SAVING, HIM."

With a sob, Steve's shoulders shook and he started to fall to his knees, crushed under the weight of it all again, except that strong arms wrapped around his waist from behind and caught him.

Always catching him.

Steve dug his fingers into the metal arm over his stomach and dipped his head forward, crying openly now as another hand pushed through his hair, gentle lips murmuring and whispering against his ear.

"Shhh, shh. I've got you. I'm not ever letting go. I'm never letting go, Stevie. I promise."

Chapped lips pressed a kiss to his ear and Steve let his body go slack in Bucky's arms, collapsing against his weight as Bucky lowered them carefully to the floor. He curled up between Bucky's legs, turning his face into the solid warm chest and clinging to his back and shoulders.

Bucky tucked his chin on top of Steve's head and smoothed his strong hands down Steve's back, tears in his eyes as he mouthed thank you over Steve's crown at Sam.

Sam blinked, wiping tears off his cheeks and nodding weakly. He was still stunned, as exhausted as the shaking body in Bucky's arms felt. At least it wasn't the shocked, betrayed look Sam'd had on his face earlier when Steve had first start spurting off about the plane crash.

Bucky'd been watching from the shadows of the doorway.

He ran his fingers through soft blonde hair, relishing the warm brushes against his right and the gentle tingle against his left. Steve was still crying and Bucky closed his eyes, tightening his grip around Steve's ribs now, cradling him tight against his body.

"I know. I know. I know," he murmured in Steve's ear, heels of his hands rubbing comforting circles over Steve's spine. "I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry, babydoll. I've got you now."

He ducked his head to press a kiss to Steve's temple, the heavy feeling washing over him making him close his eyes, nestle his nose in Steve's hair and just breathe.

Steve was here.

They were both here.

"It's okay," Bucky promised breathlessly, pressing another kiss to the corner of Steve's forehead. Fuck.

This was his Stevie. His stupid, reckless, Stevie. As shocked and mortified as he was, there was some part of him that took it and rolled. Some part of him that wasn't surprised, that'd always suspected. Even before the plane, he used to joke around, 'I think you like getting punched,' but he was always afraid it was something more.

Something deeper.

So, no, now that he knew, he wasn't that surprised.

He was just so so sorry that he wasn't there to save Steve from that.
"B-buck..." Steve choked, lifting his pretty tear-stained face from Bucky's chest. Bucky cupped Steve's perfect jaw, holding his gaze as a few tears streaked down his own cheeks too.

"Listen to me. I need you to listen, okay, Captain Rogers?" Steve nodded weakly and Bucky breathed out shakily, pressing another quick kiss to Steve's forehead before leaning backwards again and catching his gaze, holding it with every ounce of seriousness in his bones. "I was afraid, but I'd known Zola'd done something. I knew about the serum. It was my fault I never had the guts to tell you. It's not on you."

A pained whimper escaped Steve's mouth and Bucky could swear that might turn into a protest, so he pressed his index finger on Steve's lips, forcing him quiet.

"It's not on you. Okay? Steve? I need you to know that."

A weak nod. Bucky raised an unimpressed eyebrow, tilting his head. Steve huffed a breathy laugh, and nodded again, this time stronger.

It'd have to do for now. Bucky gathered Steve into his arms again, crushing him as tight as he wanted because he knew now that Steve wasn't going to break.

Neither of them were going to.

A few minutes later and Bucky pulled Steve to his feet, clapping a hand to his jaw the way Steve had when he'd rescued Bucky from Azzano all those years ago.

"Don't you forget it," Bucky told him, then he nodded over Steve's shoulder at Sam, immeasurably grateful, and taken a few steps backwards. He backed all the way out of the room, eyes on Steve the whole time, pausing at the doorway to give Steve another concerned look, before pointing at Sam and making his fix it face.

Steve gave him a little wave and choked on a weak laugh before turning away, straightening his barstool on its feet and scooting it back in place guiltily.

Sam was watching him wearily and at least Steve hadn't hit anything, hadn't totally broken Sam's trust. In a shaky move of hopefulness, Steve opened his arms up and looked at Sam sheepishly, because honestly Sam may want to move out now, not hug Steve, but then there were two more strong arms wrapping around his back and Steve ducked his face on Sam's shoulder.

"I'm so sorry, Sam," he managed, then Sam pulled back, his hand clapping on Steve's bicep and holding tight.

"Don't apologize. Seriously, what else am I here for but to listen to my childhood hero vent?" Steve laughed, wiping the tears on his cheeks. "Although I have to admit I'm pretty glad Barnes showed up, because I was at a loss of words there."

"Yeah, well. I'm pretty glad he showed up too." Good thing he was already flushed red from crying, or else Sam would see the way his cheeks blushed dark at that.

Although, honestly? He'd just seen them crying it out on the floor. Blushing about his feelings for Bucky seemed...frivolous, now.

Bucky'd almost died.

They sat back down on the barstools, considerably calmer now - or more likely, finally crashing after the exhaustion of all of that - and Steve toyed with the edge of the counter, thinking out loud while Sam listened patiently.

“You know - after all this time, I never really considered how much we have in common. I mean, the two of us, all we've been through? I was so guilty for so long...and of course he understands. It's Bucky. Even when I had nothing..." Steve trailed off and Sam huffed a silent laugh, filling in the words for him.

"...you had Bucky. Yeah." Sam nodded, looking pensively off in the distance. "He's a good friend."

Steve almost laughed. Instead he looked up sharply, Sam's words playing again in his head. A good friend. How freaking inadequate.

Friends. That's what they were supposed to be, right? Best friends?

They'd never dated. Technically, Bucky wasn't an ex-boyfriend.

But he was an ex-something. An ex maybe.

All of those almost-kisses? Almost-confessions? The conversations they were always on the verge of having?

An ex almost.

Who the fuck had Steve been kidding for the past century?

He looked across the kitchen out one of the wall-length windows, where the sun had disappeared under the horizon and New York was beginning to light up in all of its shining glory. Stars, in an endless sky. This star wanted its endless sky.

And there was nothing stopping him now. The very worst thing about himself, the darkest deepest part of him - killing himself. Bucky knew. Bucky knew and Bucky understood and Bucky had held him for it.

They'd been made for each other.

Who the fuck had Steve been kidding?

Steve looked down at his hands, the ones that'd let Bucky fall, made him cower in fear. The ones that wanted to be laced between Bucky's fingers for eternity.

"We always looked each other too long to be just friends," Steve told Sam, lifting his eyes from his hands to meet Sam's wide-eyed gaze.

Silence, the ticking of a clock in the hallway.

Tick

tick

tick

"It's about damn time you admitted that!" Sam shoved Steve's shoulder and Steve laughed, throwing his head back to the sky, exalting sound echoing through the floor.

He'd never felt so free.

Sam laughed too, then they were both gasping breaths and giggling and Steve nearly fell off his barstool and they were both laughing harder. He'd been such an idiot for such a long time, that had to be a record.

"Sam, Sam, hold on," Steve gasped, holding out his hand, signaling for them to fall into silence. The quiet settled and Steve looked out the window at the New York skyline again, the bridge he knew was in the distance.

“Sam. I have to tell him.”

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to each and every one of you who have stuck in here for this long what a crazy journey right

I promise things are looking up from here, like way way way up, so. Stick around?

I'm so sorry for all of that ^^^^^ hell but it was in my head and it needed to happen I think especially considering the way their story has been in the past and...

Anyways. Thank you again everyone. So much. Much love xx

(P.S. If anyone wants to talk to me on my tumblr, I finally figured what the hell, can't stay anonymous forever.)
When you finally come to the realization you need to tell your best friend you've been in love with them your entire life, unfortunately the world doesn't just present the perfect opportunity for you to do so.
The ex-SHIELD communications line picked up a fleet of Hydra-controlled fighter jets at an airport in North Carolina. Natasha said it'd be good for everyone if Steve came along while Bucky took a few days at the tower. And surprisingly, Bucky agreed. So Steve was back in full uniform, sneaking around an aircraft hanger with Natasha and Sam while Bucky was doing god knows what alone in the tower.

Sam was still raving about what a badass he was, how that last plane he'd blown up had sent pieces everywhere and Natasha was rolling her eyes and offering side comments about how true badasses didn't have to say it and Steve was laughing at everyone's antics, swinging himself into the belly of their plane home and popping his helmet off, putting it back on its shelf. Natasha ruffled his fucked up hair as she passed and Steve threw his bundled jacket at her, which Sam snatched out of the air and tossed back at his chest.

The post-victory high was suddenly interrupted by the loud thrumming of Steve's phone, the familiar drumroll that started Star-Spangled Man because it was a Stark phone and Steve had no idea how to change his ringtone. He'd left his phone on the center console of the plane so Natasha grabbed it first, reading the screen and tipping her mouth up in that mischievous smile.

"Your boyfriend's calling." She quirked an eyebrow, holding the phone out to Steve. His cheeks flushed red, which made Natasha look even more amused, but he couldn't fight the growing smile at the teasing words. It wasn't true, not yet, but it might be soon and the idea of Bucky being his...

"Isn't it a little late to be calling? It's like...2am in New York." Sam unlaced and wrestled his boot off with a worried crease between his eyebrows while Natasha held the phone playfully out of Steve's reach.

"It's not late if it's a booty call," Natasha suggested with a wink and Steve went bright red at that, lunging forward to snatch the phone before it stopped ringing. Or Natasha could say more to make him blush.

"Alright, that's enough of that. Everybody quiet." Steve slid the green answer button and waved Natasha and Sam off with a hand, pressing the phone to his ear and taking a few steps towards the back of the plane. "Hey, Bucky."

"Steve?"

The word was enough to stop Steve's heart; breathy and destroyed, and he doubted it was due to Natasha's suggestion.

"Buck, hey, what's wrong? Are you okay?" The plane had fallen silent behind him but he still paced all the way to the back, as far from everyone as he could get, cursing himself for coming along when Bucky had been in such a volatile place.

"I-I...I can't stop sh-shaking, Stevie," Bucky choked over the line and Steve screwed his eyes shut, pinching the bridge of his nose and forcing himself to breathe.

"Hey, hey. Just talk to me sweetheart, tell me what's going on." He didn't have time to get mad at himself for the slip of the petname because a quiet sob broke over the phone and clenched his chest in pain.

"It-it's...so. So bad tonight, please. I t-ried to sleep, but. But they came after me and I c-can't breathe and nobody could hear me scream--"

"Fuck. Fuck, I'm so sorry. I'm right here, Bucky. Listen to my voice, I'm right there beside you,
"Alright?"

"St-steve..."

"I came barging in your room like I always do when you have nightmares and you threw a knife at me like always but I'm getting good, I'm getting used to the way you train me so I ducked and came rushing to your side. And I grabbed both your shaking hands and held them in mine, forced you to breathe with me, alright? C'mon, in, two three. And out, two three. One more time. In...out. There we go. Are we doing any better?"

"...I'm still shaking a little. But I can...I can breathe okay." His voice was barely above a whisper but the plane was dead silent now and Steve could hear every word.

"Alright. Then, if you'd let me, I'd wrap you up in blankets, the way you used to when I was all sick and coughy?" He got a tiny huff of a laugh at that, but it was accompanied by the shifting sound of fabric on the other side, so maybe Bucky really was wrapping himself up in blankets for once. "And I'd sit on the edge of your bed and tell you dumb stories until you passed out or kicked me out."

"T-tell me one now?"

"Course, Buck. In fact, I'll tell you all about this mission we just completed. I didn't do anything stupid, you'll be happy to hear. But Sam's promoted himself to badass level now, even if Natasha is reluctant to allow another one of those around..."

~~~

"Morning," Steve sat a mug of coffee on the table in front of Bucky, sure to steer clear of the sketchpad in case of a spill. "Whatcha up to?"

All he got was a disgruntled noise in reply and Steve bit back his smile, peering over Bucky's shoulder and definitely not missing how this would be the perfect moment to kiss Buck's cheek, or the top of his head, a simple, chaste goodmorning kiss. What kind of life would that be, greeting Buck each morning with a kiss over coffee...

"How can you see what you're drawing with all this hair hanging in your eyes?" Steve pinned back the dark hair on one side, thumb brushing soft against Bucky's temple. Those sharp crystal eyes never left the paper. But he wasn't giving up that easy, he was gonna prove to Buck how sorry he was for being gone the other night, how he was right here, not planning on leaving anytime soon.

Another few breaths of silence and Steve hummed contemplatively, stepping behind Bucky's chair and tugging a hairband off his wrist. He'd been carrying them with him for a while, ever since that day in the gym Bucky'd had to steal Pepper's. He'd told himself it was for convenience, but now that he was no longer bullshitting himself - he liked running his fingers through brunette, liked the tight band around his wrist reminding him of his best friend everytime he looked down.

With a few fingerbrushed strokes, Steve gathered Bucky's hair into a quick ponytail, catching the extras and pulling them tight enough to wrap the elastic around long silky strands, pinning them outta the way.

"And now you can see," Steve declared with a flourish. Bucky sighed, leaning back in his chair and tapping his pencil agitatedly against the table.

"Not like it makes a difference, can't draw for shit."

As an artist he felt like socking anyone who looked at his sketchpad while he was still drawing, but Buck'd never allowed himself enough pride to be uptight about his work. So Steve propped his chin on Bucky's head and made clicking sounds, looking over the half-shaded sketch. It was a crude drawing of the Chrysler building, only the lines were all dull and thick.

"What kinda pencil are you usi-- no wonder you're frustrated, this thing has no point left, idiot." Steve snatched Bucky's pencil away from him, holding it up exaggeratedly in the light and clutching a hand over his heart.

But Bucky didn't smile, just sighed and ran four fingers over his forehead, thumb on his temple. "The pencil sharpener's really fuckin' loud."

"Oh." Steve sat the pencil down and Bucky scowled at it.

"Yeah."

Well that killed the mood. Steve shifted his weight, leaning against the breakfast table to study Buck for a moment.

"...I'm surprised you didn't sharpen it with one of your three thousand knives," he tried, voice casual enough to make it a joke.

"Was gonna, but it's your pencil, didn't know how you'd feel." Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, glaring moodily at his drawing, so Steve scooped the pencil up again and sat it on the sketchpad.

"It's your pencil now."

"You don't have to--"

"It's a pencil, Buck. Take it."

"You playin' sweet on me now, Rogers?" The corner of his mouth curled up in a ghost of his old smile and Steve wished that was the only reason his heart stopped. Just one'a Buck's teasing rhetorical questions, only he had no idea how true Steve wanted that to be.

But he could handle it. He'd handled it for years. So he lifted an eyebrow, shooting a sly glance over his shoulder as he headed back into the kitchen. "Don't you wish, Barnes."

It's not what he should've said. The vaguely amused look on Buck's face was eating him up because god, he should've leaned over the table and whispered if you'd let me, Buck, I'd be honored. But it wasn't the right time, his pulse was thudding but. It was just. Well.

A lifetime of pining should be confessed over something more than a pencil, right?

Or.

Or maybe Steve was terrified outta his fucking mind of getting rejected.

That too.

He needed to tell Bucky, yes, but...but he'd like to know if those feelings were anywhere near mutual before he poured out his soul. And staring at Bucky's ducked head as he started carving the tip of the pencil with a knife, his hair swept up by Steve's hands without so much as a thank you, Steve couldn't help but wonder if Bucky took him for granted, or if he was as terrified of this thing as Steve was.
Bright sunlight when you haven't slept in four days is not a fun experience for anyone, but with enhanced sight it's basically torture. And Bucky knew a lot about torture.

But Steve had done that cute eyebrows-furrowed hopeful-puppy look and there was no argument, Bucky was defenseless. So he trudged along beside Steve, fending off interested glances with his favorite "so outta your league" glance he'd been giving girls on Steve's behalf since the operation.

And it felt even more like the old days than usual because Steve had actually done something with the dandelion poof of his hair - not that Bucky minded the disheveled, fucked out look, lord knows he did not mind that at all - slicking it down the way he used to in the war, curving and proper, and with the bright Central Park sky beating down on the golden strands, Bucky was getting burnt from more than one sun.

The ground was gross from melting snow so they found an empty park bench atop a cheerful hill and Bucky had sat down for all of three seconds before Steve's head was in his lap. He threw up his hands in feigned exasperation but Steve ignored him, shoving a sketchpad upwards and Bucky remembered this perfectly. The last time he'd held Steve's sketchbook was in the war, under a canopy of shady forest and fuck, that day had been amazing.

But he dutifully took the sketchbook in hand now, holding it up so Steve could draw whatever the hell he was looking at this time. And the same stabbing pencil told his thumb to move, the same escaped strands of blonde hair rustled against Steve's forehead in the wind.

"Hey Buck," Steve's voice drew him outta his thoughts and his gaze snapped down, raising his eyebrows as he realized the sketchpad was resting on Steve's chest and Steve was holding something out to him with his free hand. His right hand was still trapped under the sketchpad so he reached out with gloved fingers, gingerly taking the green stem.

"What's this?"

"A dandelion."

"Like you?"

"I'm not a dandelion, weirdo. You make a wish and blow the seeds out." Steve pointed at the white puff perching above the black gloves and Bucky faux-glared down at him.

"I know what a dandelion is, I'm ninety-six Steve, I'm not dead."

Steve's mouth gaped open for a moment before he narrowed his eyes, hissing an accusatory "Natasha," then Bucky was laughing and Steve crossed his arms over his chest in an adorable pout. "What did she tell you?"

"That you had to go to Jersey."

"That all?"

"Yeah, she totally failed to mention how you guys madeout in public to escape surveillance."

"Okay, first of all, we did not makeout, and secondly, it was her idea. Besides, you know how it is in the field, Buck. You do what you gotta do." Steve shrugged lightheartedly and Bucky pursed his lips, inspecting the dandelion fluff a little closer.
"We never madeout to escape surveillance," Bucky pondered casually, squinting at the dandelion like it held the answers to the universe. He didn't miss the sudden hitch in Steve's breath though, the way those blue eyes got a fraction wider before he schooled his face into a mask like the ones Bucky wore.

"No, we didn't." Quiet, the same playful tone Bucky'd carried. "It's a shame, really."

"Bleedin' shame," Bucky agreed, holding the dandelion up higher and refusing to look down at Steve. It was all a joke, it was always a joke with them, but he didn't want that confirmation right now. And he knew that's exactly what he'd see if he looked down - he was too good at reading people now, he'd see the easy laughter in Steve's eyes while his own insides were being ripped apart.

"That what you're wishin' for?" Steve pushed, nudging Bucky's stomach with his shoulder. That's right, he had to make a wish.

He'd always loved shit like this when he was a kid, wishing on shooting stars, four-leaf clovers, whatever excuse he had to wish another day of health on that punk kid who made his chest feel too tight.

Now, though, Steve was healthy. They both had anything they could imagine. So what of wishes? Last week, his only wish was to be dead.

"Got bigger things to wish for than making time with a fella like you," Bucky murmured, spinning the thin stem between his fingers, words distant and muddled, underwater.

"I'm the best kind of fella you could get," Steve argued, prodding Bucky's arm. Only Bucky wasn't listening, he was puckering his lips and thinking about death.

The white fluff exploded, a dozen little seeds caught on the wind of Bucky's breath and fluttering through the air, drifting out of sight.

"Maybe," he replied, staring at the empty dandelion stem and wondering which wish his mind had been on when it counted.

The wish to stay alive?

Or the wish for Steve to let him die?

~~~

As amazing as Steve in workout attire was, there was nothing like an empty gym to clear your mind. So Steve got kicked out of Bucky's training sessions - although Bucky was 99% sure he stole away to the second floor to watch from the shadows anyways. But if he put headphones in and turned up as loud as possible, he could pretend he didn't notice and focus on his work.

Tony'd gotten him an iPod and it was hands-down the best gift he'd ever received. Because music didn't care what mood you were in or if you didn't reply, music didn't judge or worry or hate. Behind the veil of someone else's words he didn't have to hide anything, he could listen to bands shout all his thoughts for him.

It was therapeutic really, even if it was disconcerting how well some of the songs fit his psyche. But when he was practicing his standing backflips or building-fall routine, it was kinda great to have his internal dialogue played over a loud bass.
He was probably at it for a couple hours before his muscles felt exhausted enough to warrant a hot shower. Bucky dropped from the rafters where he'd been doing pullups, landed in a careful roll, and yanked the headphones outta his ears, tossing the iPod down in the middle of the mat so he could sprint into the shower room without worrying about getting it wet.

Bucky'd been gone for no more than twenty seconds when Steve ventured into the gym, glancing around cautiously before making his way to the center of the room, plopping down cross-legged on the thick blue mat and scooping up Bucky's music thing, untangling the headphones and lighting up the screen. He was curious, is all. Bucky looked pretty damn into the music, working out strenuously to the beat in his ears, losing himself in the sound.

You can tell a lot about a person through their music choices, and honestly Steve could use some workout music that wasn't suggested by Jarvis.

He stretched out on the mat, pressing the headphones into his ears and holding the iPod above him as he thumbed to the playlist labeled Top 25 Most Played. See, Stark, he wasn't a total imbecile with technology.

Steve picked the top song and closed his eyes to listen.

It started with a heartbeat.

It all went downhill from there.

This is gospel for the fallen ones, locked away in permanent slumber. Cryochambers and the fallen ones? Assembling their philosophies from pieces of broken memories.

Well. Buck sure knew how to pick songs that fit him well. It didn't sound too dark, which was promising. He focused hard on the lyrics, wondering if this was 'the beat of my heart' to Bucky, like the song said.

For someone who'd considered themselves a machine for so long, admitting to a beating heart might be really good news. Steve hummed to himself, just on the bright side of hopeful.

But they haven't seen the best of us yet...

In his defense, he wasn't familiar with this kind of music, let alone the lyrics. And he'd had certain concerns on his mind lately, so maybe that was why he heard the next line all wrong.

If you love me, let me die, the music poured over Steve's ears and his eyes shot right open. If you love me, let me die... 'cause these words are knives enough to leave scars; the fear of falling apart. And truth be told, I never was yours. The fear, the fear of falling apart.

He couldn't breathe. This song, this song was Bucky's favorite? Fuck. No, no, no.

Already regretting his stupid music-bonding decision, Steve covered his eyes with a hand and turned the volume louder. If he was gonna do this, he might as well brace himself and take it.

This is gospel for the vagabonds, ne'er-do-wells and insufferable bastards. Confessing their apostasies, led away by imperfect impostors.

Who the hell wrote songs like this? Apostasies? But that wasn't the line that made his breath hitch, his heart fill with guilt.

Don’t try to sleep through the end of the world... seventy years, the end of their world, and Steve had been weak, chosen a coma over the pain of looking for his best friend.

...and bury me alive - in a tomb of snow at the bottom of a ravine and Steve'd known in his heart, he'd known all along and Bucky knew too, he had to.

Why was this so fitting?

He wasn't taking as much comfort as he could in 'Cause I won't give up without a fight, because how could he when the rhyming line that came next was if you love me let me die?

The fear of falling apart.

But knives? Really? Were Steve's words the knives that left scars? If you love me, let me die. He'd basically said that exact same thing to Steve when Steve'd found him with a gun in his hand. That if Steve cared about him, he'd let him do this.

But for some reason, when the song looped into the repetitive bridge, it wasn't that line that hurt the most. The whole song was making Steve ache inside, the idea of if you love me let me die was enough to make him want to curl up in a ball and cry.

And the fear of falling apart - Bucky was afraid of losing himself, the control he'd built, the way he'd put down the gun? He was afraid of what would happen if he fell apart and lost it, and if Bucky was scared? Steve was terrified.

The stinger, though? The words that were digging under Steve's skin and flaying him from the inside out?

And truth be told, I never was yours.

He wasn't.

He never had been.

Bucky had never been Steve's and he was pretty sure that until this moment, Steve had never realized how much Bucky wasn't his. And clearly, if this was the most played song? Bucky felt that exact same way.

As scary as the rest of Bucky's thoughts were, the idea that through all of this, through everything they'd ever had even when I had nothing I had Bucky, Steve'd been wrong. Buck was his best friend sure, but that didn't mean he was Steve's. He was only Steve's if he thought of himself that way - each other's other half, even if only as best friends. Steve'd always thought-- Everything he'd sacrificed, everything he'd given -

Truth be told?

Bucky had never been his.

The song ended and Steve tugged out the headphones, staring up at the gym ceiling. What the hell was he supposed to do? He'd treaded into territory too deep to fess up to, but he couldn't pretend he'd never heard either.

God, Buck was hurting so bad.

This was nowhere near over, was it? He'd thought because he'd talked Bucky down once they'd be fine now? What had changed between now and when Bucky'd been aiming the muzzle of a gun at himself?

Just that he knew Steve had done the same thing. Which had changed things - clearly, Bucky was still alive - but it wasn't enough.

He had to do something. What the hell could he do? Bucky was surrounding himself in these dark clouds and it was like he didn't want to see the sun on the other side. Then...what if Steve showed him? Maybe he didn't want to see the sun on his own, but what if Steve carried him into the light?

Rhetorically, because Bucky would probably kill him before he let Steve pick him up like a dame again. After he'd been shot in the war and Steve'd carried him bridestyle, he'd never stopped complaining.

Besides, this could actually be a really good opportunity...he could show Bucky how he felt instead of tell him. Show Bucky how much he loved him so he didn't have to go through the hell of saying it out loud without knowing how Buck felt first.

By extending his hand, he could show Buck he was extending his heart.

It was a brilliant idea, really. So Steve unlocked the iPod one more time, memorizing the name of the artist (why was the exclamation point in the middle of a sentence?) in case it proved useful.

He abandoned the iPod to its original position and got to researching. Three hours later and Bucky'd showered, helped Tony with one of his projects, and cut up a tray of apple slices, sitting down on the counter to his snack when Steve ventured into the kitchen, snagging an apple piece for himself and leaning next to Bucky's knee casually, letting him strike up mundane conversation for a few minutes while he sorted the perfect timing for his plan in his head.

It came, unsurprisingly, at the help of Tony again. Bucky was rambling something about one of Tony's projects and Steve pretended to suddenly remember something, lighting up and reaching over to tap Bucky distractedly.

"Speaking of Stark, he's been trying to accumulate me to modern music and he showed me this band I really like...Panic, uh. Panic at the Disco?"

And, like Steve predicted, Bucky lit up like a firecracker.

"You like Panic? Are you kidding me? That's awesome. Do you know Fall Out Boy too?"

"Um, no. I don't think so. But there's this one Panic song I'd love to show you, if you wanna hear?"

Bucky hopped off the counter, apples forgotten as he clapped his hands together, left whirring quietly as he looked at Steve with little-kid-eyes. God, Steve hadn't seen him that excited about something (that wasn't a lethal weapon) since the goddamned Science Expo in Queens.

Steve corralled him into his room and Buck took a second to look around. He'd been in here a few times after Steve's nightmares, but it'd always been dark and he had a feeling Buck hadn't exactly been paying attention to the decor.

Not that there was a lot of it, but he had started papering some of his drawings on the walls again. It made the place feel a little less immense and lonely.

"I like this one," Bucky commented, tapping his right index finger against the sketch of the Howling Commandos, laughing as they laid on the floor of a boat, staring at the sky and telling stories for Bucky's birthday. "That was a good day."
"It was," Steve agreed, plopping down on his bed and grabbing a pillow to stuff under his head, watching Bucky scan over the drawings for a few more moments before he remembered Steve was there and quickly turned around, shy smile on his face as he perched carefully on the edge of Steve's bed.

"C'mon, I don't bite." He patted the empty space next to him and Bucky rolled his eyes, but he kicked his feet up on the bed and stretched out next to Steve, reaching his arms over his head and arching his back like a cat before settling into the comforter and stealing Steve's other pillow. "You ready?"

"Mmhmm." Bucky closed his eyes and Steve selected the song on his iPod, letting Jarvis play it through the loudspeakers for full effect. It started with the sweet, high pitched slide of a violin and Bucky's mouth quirked up in a half-smile. "This is Panic?"

"Yep." Steve propped up on his elbow, free hand toying absentmindedly with the edge of Bucky's sleeve as he watched the flickers of his expression, memorized the sweeping wave of his dark hair as it fanned onto Steve's white pillow. They were laying so close, all peaceful and easy, and it was times like these that Steve was suddenly hit with how much he'd missed his best friend in the months that Bucky'd been gone.

But he was here now - and maybe, if Steve didn't panic (no pun intended) and stop the song before the lyrics hit, they might have a shot at being more than best friends.

He was really glad Bucky'd closed his eyes, and not just so he could stare and judge reactions to the song that would pour out his soul. This way, he was sure to listen, to really hear the music and what it was saying.

What Steve was saying.

When the moon fell in love with the sun, all was golden in the sky, all was golden when the day met the night. The beautiful pink lips parted, like he was about to say something already, then Bucky thought better of it, keeping silent as Steve's heart beat outta his goddamned chest.

He wasn't sure if Bucky remembered, but a long time ago he'd said that Steve was his own personal sun - that he lit up the whole damn world with that annoyingly bright light of his. The comment had made Steve's heart soar, but he had no idea if Buck would catch the reference after all that'd happened since.

When the moon found the sun, he looked like he was barely hanging on.

When Bucky'd first found him, pushed down by kids not much bigger than him; but Steve'd been so young and small and sick he'd started coughing the minute they shoved him to the ground.

But her eyes saved his life, in the middle of summer.

And Bucky'd swooped in, offered his hand, and Steve'd stared up in wonder.

All was golden in the sky, all was golden when the day met the night.

He'd asked Bucky, in his tiny little-kid voice, not even a proper three feet tall, why he'd bothered.

Summer (summer)

"I don't like bullies," Bucky'd replied.
All was golden...

Steve'd been toting that line ever since.

...when the day met the night.

Bucky shifted, and maybe it was Steve's imagination but it felt like it was closer. Then his hand was brushing the back of Steve's and that, that couldn't be Steve's imagination.

Hot summers and cold winters and plenty scraped knees, years later. A fire escape in Brooklyn, outside Steve's bedroom at his ma's place.

So he said, "Would it be alright, if we just sat and talked for a little while?"

A beautiful boy who'd been his childhood playmate, asking if maybe they could keep on bein' best friends, now that they were older. Steve couldn't imagine losing Bucky's friendship, but that didn't keep him from shoving Bucky's shoulder, "Yeah, jerk, what's in it for me?"

"If in exchange for your time, I give you this smile?"

