The half-shocked giggle as he shoved Steve back - lightly - and his eyes opened up real nervous, for once, and that was the first time Steve realized Bucky Barnes really wasn't all bravado or smarts, he was as human as Steve was. "I can't offer much, but I do make a pretty good drawin' model, I thought."

So she said, "That's okay, as long as you can make a promise not to break my little heart, or leave me all alone -" in the summer.

Steve let himself soften for a moment at the vulnerability of Bucky's expression and scooted closer, pressing his tiny body against Bucky's side, taking his hand for no reason but to hold it, watching Steve's tiny white fingers disappear between Bucky's soft long ones. "You make a pretty good best friend, Bucky. Forever."

Bucky's eyes blinked open, slow like he wasn't seeing Steve's ceiling, like he was looking right through it at the same old memories Steve was.

He held his breath, waiting for the rejection, and then Bucky rolled his head across the pillow and the icy crystal blue locked on Steve's and they weren't angry, or pissed, or confused, just. Looking. Searching. Probably finding.

Well he was just hanging around, then he fell in love. A sharp intake of breath between Bucky's lips - Steve's chest might seize with anticipation, his heart was pounding so hard he was sure Buck could hear it.

And he didn't know how, but he couldn't get out. The crystal blues left Steve's then, squeezing shut tight, like the words had burned him, like they actually meant something, and if it weren't for the cold hand suddenly clutching his, Steve probably would've floated away.

Just hanging around, then he fell in love...

"Steve," Bucky rasped, face turned away, and the world hitched in Steve's chest, his fingers tightening around Bucky's, their whole universe pending on the edge of a golden cliff shaped the color of summer and sunshine.

It took him a few seconds to get his vocal chords functioning again, to squeeze out a quiet, pained,
"Yeah?"

_All was golden when the day met the night_

Bucky didn't reply, fingers curling hard enough to leave bruises in Steve's skin but god, he wanted them there, he wanted bruises anywhere Bucky'd give them to him, he wanted anything to prove to Bucky he was here, forever, his, forever,

_Summer, summer, summer,_

The breathing in the room was harsh and Bucky was still facing the wall, but the grip on his hand hadn't let go and he'd bet anything Buck's eyes were closed, letting the music wash over him.

_When the moon fell in love with the sun,_

And the sun fell in love with the moon, Steve wanted to say, wanted to make sure Bucky knew, but he was being pretty damn clear with this whole thing, wasn't he?

_All was golden in the sky, all was golden when the day met the night._

Bucky's balance of weight shifted and Christ, was he wiping a hand over his face? Had he made Bucky _cry_? He had no idea if he should be elated or mortified.

Either way, the next move was simple, no matter why Buck was sniffling. Wrapping Bucky up in his arms until he understood that Steve never ever wanted him to get away again.

_In the middle of summer, summer, summer, summer._

He closed the gap between them, one arm curling over Bucky's stomach, and he didn't even get the chance to tighten his grip before Bucky turned, sliding out from under Steve's arm and hopping off the bed.

"Bucky," Steve tried, sitting up and stretching for the closest shoulder, but Bucky shook his head and strode out of reach, keeping his back to Steve as he paused in the doorway. It didn't hide the way his left hand was clenched, his right fingers trembling as he ran them through his hair.

"Don't, I'm fine. I've just. I've gotta go."

Then Steve's door was closing softly behind him and Steve flopped back moodily on his bed, staring up at the ceiling and wondering how he'd managed to fuck everything up even _more_.

~~~

He hadn't been haunted by anything but the mirror in a long time. Until Steve showed him that song. It wasn't fair. What was he supposed to do with that?

Did Steve know? Was it the universe laughing at him? Some stupid coincidence? A platonic _I'm here for you_ gesture?

Or, the thought that was churning his stomach, was this another signature Rogers fight? Throwing himself down on the line - sacrificing his heart and his body to keep Bucky around. A reason to stay alive, at the cost of the truth.

Like offering himself to Bucky would save him from condemnation.

Bucky wanted to hurl.
But he'd really like to keep Rogers as far away as possible right now and puking in the bathroom was going to do the opposite.

So he ran.

He took Sam with him. For safety reasons. Wilson was surprised, but he gladly agreed. Bucky didn't let himself run ahead like Steve did, he kept it slow and focused on his breathing. It was more of a social exercise than an avoiding Steve exercise than a physical one, forcing himself to communicate and be congenial to others.

Sam Wilson was a great fucking person. He was funny, loyal, honest. Didn't push Bucky (anymore) about getting his head evaluated. Which was good, because Bucky had been taught plenty about evaluations so he could do on-the-job analyses and he knew exactly what was going on his head and it wasn't something Sam needed to see.

Steve didn't either. Sam was a great friend. Sam was the kind of friend Steve needed.

Sam didn't try to jump off buildings. Not without wings, anyways. Sam may not know how to stitch up Steve's broken skin like Bucky did, but he could probably stitch up that broken head. Steve needed help with nightmares and denied PTSD - Sam could help him.

Really, Bucky shouldn't be sticking around.

But if he disappeared, Steve would come looking for him. And there it's gone, full circle. Back to the only thing that felt like a solution. He was a burden and the very last thing Steve needed right now.

Running only worked for a few hours, then it was back to the tower. He worked out, read books, got caught up with the twenty-first century, tried to draw, and everything felt like endless scrolling, waiting for the next thing.

He found himself in Steve's art studio one day, because Steve was out and he had time and he'd always wanted to come in here but he'd never had the nerve.

He couldn't lift any of the drop cloths or walk up to the half-finished paintings on the walls; there was a possibility Steve had been painting him and Bucky wouldn't be able to handle that right now.

Instead he found the closet of empty canvases and set up an easel. Painting was different than sketching, because paint stroked on free and easy, didn't have to look like anything; there weren't any rules. Look at fucking Picasso.

He got about halfway through the covering the canvas when he realized what he was painting.

The skin and blacks and reds stared at him as he wiped a fallen piece of hair away from his forehead. Fuck. His forehead was hot as hell. Bucky put down the paintbrush carefully, placing both palms on his cheeks. His right hand supplied fever and his left hand felt like heaven, all that cold metal against his hot skin.

His shoulders hit the wall and he couldn't remember backing up but now he was sinking to the floor, shutting the haunting painting behind closed eyes and the cool touch of an unmovable solid. It was the only simple part of him anymore, as ironic as that was.

The fake, machine implant was the only thing he understood, the only thing that felt like it wasn't about to break any moment. And the funny thing was that his shoulder'd been killing him lately, acting up more and more, the nerve endings flaring in pain, the muscles cramping with the weight of his arm. Even his body was rejecting the easiest thing he had left.
One of the only things he had left.

God, he used to be so okay. He used to be balanced, powerful. What happened to kicking ass with Steve behind the secure safety of his Winter Soldier mask? What happened to the steady concentration of watching the world behind a silent sniper scope? What happened to laughing with the Howling Commandos around a campfire?

It'd gotten so difficult, so fucking complicated. And he'd, what, tried to give up?

What a fucking coward.

He'd been a lot of things in his life, but two weeks ago? That was the first time he'd been a coward. The biggest kind of performance error - machines don't turn themselves off. He was supposed to be better, supposed to be efficient and right and strong and all of the things normal people couldn't-- and he'd done the worst thing imaginable instead.

The world behind his eyes wasn't as dark as he deserved.

He sat on the floor holding his head in his hands so long that he didn't know what time it was anymore, that he couldn't find a single reason to ever move again.

So he hadn't expected it when the door swung open. Worse, he was way too fucking far out of his head to recognize it, to move before he got questions. Everything felt so distant, then there was a gentle hand on his arm and Bucky lifted his head from his drawn knees, blinking until the image swum into focus.

Steve. Of course, it was his art studio after all. Who else would come in here?

...

Bucky's brain didn't supply any commentary after that. He just looked.

"Hey," Steve said softly, his body crouched in front of Bucky's. He waited dully for the inevitable are you okay, maybe the slightly more thoughtful anything I can do? But it didn't come. Instead Steve's thumb rubbed gently along Bucky's right arm, not even looking too hopeful as he asked, "Can I look at your painting?"

That was odd. He'd never asked permission before, he'd always stolen Bucky's art and looked at it regardless of what Bucky protested. He didn't want to open his mouth, didn't feel like pressuring his vocal cords to engage. And shaking his head side to side would waste way more energy than a simple nod, which was the only reason Steve got a yes.

Blue eyes looked him over for a few moments then Steve stood, turning away from Bucky to look at the easel.

Bucky stared at Steve's shoes and curled his fingers tighter on his elbows, hoping the dull sensation might hurt enough to shake his mind into clarity. That had worked once, when Steve's hands had been bruising his collarbones, pressing hard fingers into wounds - sharpening Bucky's mind and forcing him back into his body.

He'd wanted his body, then. He'd wanted to feel pain, to own that, to become everything that his vessel was. But the sensation had dulled and his own hands, right now, weren't doing anything. For whatever reason, it wasn't enough when the metal fingers left bruises. It wasn't clear like Steve's hands were.
"Can I keep this?" The words sounded very very far away and really, if Bucky kicked out his foot he'd knock Steve over, there was no reason for it to sound like Steve was in New Jersey. He still didn't want to open his mouth though, didn't want the vulnerability of parting his lips.

"No?" Steve prompted. Bucky didn't move. "Yes?" he asked, like it was totally normal for Bucky to refuse speaking. No condescending tone, no confusion, as though Bucky had been mute their entire lives. That was why Bucky nodded.

The painting wasn't done, but if Steve liked it enough to be patient with Bucky in order to get it, he could have it.

Creaking and shuffling as Steve took it off the easel, but he didn't lift his eyes enough to see where it was placed. The sound of boots approaching, then a body pressed against his left side, metal sending a pressure reading, and Bucky let his body list sideways, his head falling on Steve's shoulder and he hadn't intended for this to happen only now his eyes were closed and he really couldn't place why he felt like crying but it didn't matter, his eyes were eternally dry.

When he blinked them opened again, the art studio was coated in streaks of sunshine, light that hadn't been there when he'd fallen asleep. He'd slept all night then. That hadn't happened since the Gun Incident.

There was a weight on top of his head, and it took a few seconds of calculation to register it as Steve. He'd fallen asleep on Steve's shoulder and Steve had fallen asleep right back, head tilted on his.

Why had Steve stayed all night? Why had Steve played that fucking song?

Why had Steve crashed that plane in the ocean on purpose?

They used to sleep tucked close together any chance they could get away with it. Especially when they were kids. That wasn't the way things were supposed to be now. It wasn't fair, the stupid psychological block that he only felt safe enough to drift asleep when Steve was there to protect him. Hold him.

The Winter fucking Soldier did not need to be held.

Rationally, the correct thing to do would be to slip away, use his training to make a perfectly silent exit. There would be no questions, no worry, no fight. But he didn't want to be fucking correct, he didn't want to be a good собака, fuck performance errors. Who was he performing for??

He shoved Steve off him, hard, and Steve went down with a shout that sounded more scared than anything and good, fucking good, Bucky shot to his feet and Steve was scrambling to wake up and process but Bucky stormed outta the room and slammed the door behind him - splintering the doorframe, look at that - before Steve had the chance to push himself off the ground.

The moon may love the sun. It was a reflection of the sun's rays, after all. But the sun didn't love the moon, the sun runs around the other side of the world the moment the moon showed its face. Or at least, the sun fucking should be.

"Do you want to talk about it?"

"There's nothing to talk about," Steve breathed, dropping his hands to his knees and avoiding all thoughts of what asthma attacks feel like.
"Dude, you just ran so hard you almost hurled." "Have before," Steve muttered under his breath, but thankfully Sam didn't hear him. "Maybe this is the psych lessons talking, but I'd say something's up."

"I'm fine."

"Is Bucky?"

Steve scowled, straightening up and starting for the tower. Sam caught up annoyingly fast, keeping pace in a light jog beside him as Steve stalked down the sidewalk.

They made it halfway back in silence before Sam finally spoke up, glancing from the corner of his eye. "You still haven't told him?"

Steve stopped in the middle of the sidewalk, making at least three businessmen scowl and walk wide strides around them. "No, Sam, I haven't told my best friend I'm in love with him when he's shoving me away - literally - anytime I get closer than three feet!"

"Okay, okay, man. Calm down." Sam's hands were up and Steve scowled. How many times had people told him to fucking calm down in his life?

But he wasn't going to get in a fight, the last time he'd gotten in a fight Bucky'd almost killed himself and Steve had to keep it under wraps, bleed on the inside, goddamnit. He grit his teeth and placed one foot in front of the other, a facade of calmly walking, even if his hands were clenched in fists at his sides.

"So what are you going to do?" Sam fell in step beside him again and goddamn, why did Steve have to pick such stubborn friends?

"I don't know." He stared straight ahead, not caring how dead his voice sounded. "I have no idea."

But he was sick of telling Sam he didn't know. At least he finally knew what made him happy...too bad he couldn't figure out what to do with that.

The words were simple. But the timing, tone, delivery, mutual agreement - that would all determine whether Bucky said them back, freaked out, or walked away forever. It should be simple, but Steve didn't know how to get the words outta his mouth.

However, he did know that it was no use trying until he and Bucky were on good terms again.

"Can we talk?" Steve propped his shoulder on the wall and the body in the armchair stiffened, then forcibly relaxed.

"Famous last words," he mused darkly, but the book in his hands dumped dramatically in his lap anyways, crystal eyes landing heavy on Steve. "Yeah, what's up?"

"About yesterday--"

"I was exhausted, haven't slept in a long time, and shouldn't have taken it out on you." Bucky stood abruptly after his interruption, tossing the book to the coffee table now. "Sorry I ended up drooling on your shoulder or whatever."

Steve fought the urge to punch something and tightened his mouth, calmed his heartrate.

"That's not what I'm upset about, Bucky." He kept the words slow without erring into piss-off territory. "I have no problem sleeping with-- uh... under-- beside you. Getting shoved first thing in the morning, though..."

Odds were that Bucky'd bristle at that, so it was pleasantly surprising when he deflated instead, looking depressingly young as he pinched the bridge of his nose and closed his eyes guiltily. "Yeah. I shouldn't've pushed you. Are you okay?"

Swallowing the lump in his throat and the tightness in his chest, Steve pushed off the wall. "Yes, Bucky, I'm fine. Are you?"

He'd taken a few steps closer while Bucky's head was down, and it paid off in the clarity of his expression as he looked at Steve now, the words written clear on his face in a language only they'd ever understood. What's it to you, Bucky replied in the skeptical expression and Steve held his breath at the loaded question.

"I care about you," he finally managed, barely above a whisper. And that pretty mouth curled up sad and lonely at the corners, melting Steve's heart in the worst of ways.

"I know, Steve," Bucky replied softly, and it was a shame Steve couldn't hear the Just not the way I want you to, added in Bucky's head.

The apologetic smile was breaking his heart but he couldn't push it - not if Bucky wasn't ready to hear it. Instead he nodded and sat down on the couch beside Bucky's armchair. In the silence Jarvis put on a movie from their catching up with the world list but Steve couldn't pay attention.

(Through some grace of god he fell asleep halfway through, head propped on the armrest and arms curled under his body. The flickering light of the TV cast rainbows over the peaceful face and Bucky watched the colors playing on that exquisite bone structure until the movie ended and the room fell dark.)

The feelings he'd dealt with for years were eating him away inside. He needed Bucky to know. It'd never felt like lying before, just protection. Now, though, Steve had almost lost Bucky again and everything was finally crystal clear. Bucky had to know. Steve was wasting away every moment he scream it aloud.

Bucky was killing him. It wasn't his fault his subconscious mind took that literally.

As a kid, he'd always wished he could step into paintings; a place he could go that wasn't as painful as his world. Except when the dream washed him under this time, the paint that choked him was only pain.

Skin and blacks and reds swirled thick around him, then his bones lit up with life and he was running, pushing aside rattling tins of rusting metal, the sound of attack dogs barking at his heels. Like all his dreams, gunfire in the distance, explosions and fire in his peripherals, fading to smoke when he turned to look directly.

The shadows of skyscrapers hiding monsters in the darkness and he could turn, spin round and stare at every corner, but there were always eyes and he could never find--

Until this dream, that painting, and when he inspected the shadows he actually saw shapes; and instantly wished he hadn't. Heaps of bodies, bleeding and distorted, piling around him, each with a bullet between the eyes and a number carved into their chest. Kill count. Some of the faces were familiar enough to know it was his - but they'd all been sniped, instead.

Every person Steve'd killed reassigned and the red on his hands was dripping, running free, washing off, because a certain sniper had gotten to them all before Steve had, to save him the guilt --
He screamed.

The black shadows and red blood swirled through his feet and he was swinging out at the darkness, fighting nothing, fists raised at monsters too deep for him to kick away.

Then the body dropped from his sky and suddenly there was a black gloved hand over his mouth. Hydra or himself or anyone, really, and Steve was scrambling at the hand because he couldn't breathe, he was suffocating with water in his lungs, but the hand didn't let him go, and he kicked his legs and squirmed as it dragged him into one of the skyscrapers, one of the masterpieces he used to draw now drawing and quartering him. And up up up the stairs in a never ending spiral and thick red black and skin was dripping from each step, kicking up muddy bloody with his feet as he fought in vain.

The stairs leveled out and the sky opened up, inky black and gray, red stars poking through like glittering death omens. A rooftop, they were on the roof of his old apartment, darkened New York stretching out in its apocalyptic wonder around them and he was getting lightheaded without oxygen in his lungs, could feel his body shrinking smaller and smaller--

He gasped in air, collapsing to the ground as the hand dropped him. Struggling to push himself up on his hands and knees, trembling, spitting blood on the ground the way his lips had learned, too many back alley fights, too many bloody nights.

Then the black glove gripped his hair and forced his head up, blood-red moon backlighting the man who'd taken him.

Half a face, that was all. The other half was twisted with black and silver metal, a muzzle over bloody lips, carved barbs gripping the damn terrifying mask to his face and Steve screamed, barely a shriek before a cold metal hand closed over his throat, destroying the sound and Steve was choking, unable to speak, fingers pressing bruises into his skin.

A glint of a knife, half a face, everything black and red and then the sharp edge of the knife slipped into his throat above the cold metal hand and the world spun and tipped sideways and he was falling, always falling, falling--

"Steve!"

The command hit him the same time the bottom of the fall did and he jolted awake, startling into his body with the impact vibrating in his muscle. The room was filled with a gasping sound, the clearer version of an asthmatic wheeze, and that was him, his throat was still being sliced open by that terrifying knife.

A cold metal hand to his cheek and Steve flinched away from the touch, making it recoil in a blur. Everything was blurry, and dark, but there was one warm, nice thing on his shoulder and he drew all his energy from that, pulling from that comfort to shut the mental haunting out, regulate his breathing.

Bucky was leaning over him, concern etched into his features, metal hand hovering self-consciously, like he wanted to have both hands on Steve but he was terrified to get an adverse reaction to the metal again.

He didn't have a right to look like that when he'd kicked Steve outta his heart so many times. But more than anything, Steve wanted him to look like that, concerned and caring and scared, vulnerable, real, but he had to mean it. Right now, he couldn't believe Bucky meant it.

"Get out," Steve rasped, shutting his eyes stubbornly.
A moment of silence. A single backwards footstep, the right hand hesitant on his shoulder now.

"Go," he reiterated. "I don't need you here."

It wasn't a game. It wasn't some stupid relationship test. Part of him honestly didn't want Bucky here. The bigger part needed to know how much Bucky remembered. How much he'd endure.

"No," came the single, quiet word.

"Go away," Steve hissed, eyes squeezing tighter shut to hide the tears gathering on his lashes.

"No." Stubborn, stronger. Quiet, but sure.

"I don't need you," he insisted, but it was a hell of a lot less convincing when his bottom lip was trembling and his squeezed-shut eyes were threatening to leak at the corner.

Bucky had come for him. Why? When he'd pushed Steve away so much, why come for him?

"I don't believe you." Simple. Quiet.

Buck had a lot of nerve saying that. It ripped something in Steve's chest.

"Fuck off," he choked out, turning his head towards the back of the couch, praying Bucky would catch a hint and listen to him for once.

"Try'n make me."

How many times had they danced this before the war? Steve shoved Bucky off when he tried to patch him up and Bucky held him down until Steve relented and let Bucky fix him.

Steve would push and scream and punch and shout, telling Bucky to leave, get out, go away, never come back.

Hoping he'd prove it by staying.

He always had.

And he could still call Steve's bluff, apparently. Try'n make me. That was when the useless hitting normally started - Steve swinging his fists wildly in frustration at the world and Bucky catching his wrists, backing Steve against the bed or a wall or the floor, any place he could keep Steve pinned while he held his wrists and predicted the abortive swings, holding Steve still until he broke and stopped fighting, deflated against Bucky.

Steve didn't feel like hitting now, especially when he knew Buck wouldn't hit back.

And if he did, Steve'd probably crumple from the weight of the nightmare.

So he turned his head to glare, right on time to see Bucky plop down on the floor beside the couch, legs crossed as he brought their faces level, propped an elbow on the cushion, and ran his right hand through Steve's hair.

It was so affectionate and simple and easy that the drying water in his eyes seeped another drop of moisture onto his bottom lashes.

"Steve?" Bucky checked in quietly, one finger slipping from Steve's hair down his forehead and the line of his nose, coming to rest at the tip.
"Mmm." All the fight had drained outta him, the panic too. Bucky knew it would. No one could keep Steve down but Steve, and for some reason if Bucky fought back hard enough Steve chose this, to quiet down and concede.

He always had. Only ever around Bucky, and that was the part he couldn't figure out. It was like a strange, less dramatic demonstration of dropping his shield, the way he had on the helicarrier.

In a world that always got Steve's I can do this all day, somehow Bucky got I'm not gonna fight you.

He'd bet he was the first and last thing Steve Rogers ever chose not to fight.

So that's why he'd stayed. That's why he was sitting here next to the couch, playing with Steve's hair and tracing memorizing, soothing fingertips across his features.

Now probably wasn't the time to bring it up, but he wasn't sure he'd have Steve passive and listening to him again anytime soon. He opened his mouth, hesitating before the words finally tumbled out.

"I get you took my death real hard..." Although he had no idea why; could it possibly be that Steve loved him as much as he loved Steve? "...and Steve, look. I know you're not doing as okay as you want everybody to think."

Understatement of the year. Steve snuffled and prodded Bucky's hand away from his cheekbone. "I'm fine."

"That's not the point. What I'm trying to say..." One blue eye peeked open, studying him hopefully in the dark. The sudden perky hopefulness carved a hole in Bucky's chest and he had to take a breath, looking away as he muttered the words. "Clearly, I agitate something in you. I'm here for you, Steve, always. But aren't all of my issues the last thing you need? Look, I'm a chip on your shoulder that you shouldn't have to be worrying about. I'm a mess--"

"But you're my mess," Steve interrupted suddenly, sitting up, and Bucky stared up at him from his spot on the floor. Once, a long time ago in the woods of Europe, he'd confessed "I'm a fucking mess, Steve. I'm a mess and I don't know what the fuck I'm supposed to do with it because we're all fucking messes out here. I don't even know what kind of mess I am anymore."

And Steve had leaned over with "Hey, c'mon. Whatever the mess you are, you're mine, okay? You're not alone. And I'll take whatever pieces you want to give me, mess or not."

Except this time, a warm hand reached for him, tentative, then Steve's rough palm was resting on his cheek, thumb smoothing over his skin, and Bucky had to tilt his head up to keep eye contact, a strange tightness settling in his stomach as Steve looked down at him. What a picture this had to make, the deadly assassin sitting on the floor at Steve Rogers' feet, those artist hands cupping his cheek like he was the precious one.

"You're a fuckin' sap, Rogers," he'd said last time. But Steve hadn't been looking at him like that in the woods of Europe.

Darkness sharpened the building coil in his stomach as Bucky shut his eyes, pushing a calming breath through his lips, calculating his heart rate and hating himself for leaning into Steve's hand. "Steve," he warned, sounding more breathless than he wanted to be.

"I mean it, Buck." Steve's other hand threaded fingers through Bucky's thick hair, folding it away from his closed eyes. "I no more want you to leave than you want me gone."

The weight of sandbags on his chest kept it from expanding as he breathed in, a reverberating shudder drilling down his spine, making him shiver colder than cryo.

He couldn't believe that. He couldn't believe that Steve wanted him as much - it wasn't possible. As caring and compassionate as Steve was, as much as he valued their friendship? That philia was never going to compare to Bucky's agápe.

This time he purposefully chose the metal fingers to wrap around Steve's wrist, because he didn't want to feel the warmth of that skin against his right hand. The last time he'd held Steve's wrists, it was because Steve'd almost broken them. Because of something Bucky had said...

How were they healthy for each other? At all?

He pried the hand from his face, unable to watch Steve's expression as he shook his head in apology and pushed himself up to stand. Only Steve stood with him, and they were way too close for this, chests brushing as Bucky clenched his jaw. His lower back was burning, a heavy hand resting there, wrapped around him loosely but asking him to stay. He kept his eyes on Steve's shoulder, wondering what it would take to shove him off.

How much of their friendship it would break.

"Stay--"

"I can't."

Steve nodded, the hand dropping away from Bucky's lower back. It didn't change anything, he still couldn't breathe. But he didn't move away either.

Checkmate, their circle dance halted with nowhere to go, no place but hell or heaven at this point--

"Do you want breakfast?" Steve asked, interrupting his thoughts and surprising him enough to tilt his chin up and finally meet Steve's gaze.

"It's 3 in the morning."

Steve shrugged. "I can make mango sorbet now."

He chewed his lip, studying Steve's expression for the catch. It didn't look like there was one. Fine. He sighed and Steve lit up, instantly recognizing the agreement and taking Bucky's arm, tugging him towards the kitchen.

"You never cease to amaze me, Rogers," he half-complained, following after the stupid punk who'd somehow switched this whole thing around on him. Steve was the one who'd woken with the nightmare, but Bucky was the one being taken care of.

A blinding smile shot over a wide shoulder and the last of his resistance melted. What was the harm in giving Steve this? Maybe it'd be good for him. For both of them.

~~~

"Til then," Steve sung softly under his breath, taking the last flight of stairs two at a time and pushing open the door. "My darling, please wait for me. Til then, no matter when it will be...one dayyyy--Oh. Hi Natasha."
"Someone's in a good mood," she commented and Steve shrugged with a sideways smile. "What's got you fluffed and bright-eyed, Rogers?"

"Nothing," he insisted, snagging one of her cheese-cracker sandwiches off the bar. "Have you seen Bucky?"

A suggestive eyebrow-raise in response. Steve rolled his eyes, both hands on his hips as he shook his head at her. "You ever gonna butt outta my love life?"

"So it is a love life, then. You told him yet?"

"How do you even know about that?"

"I know everything, Rogers," Nat replied smugly, popping a cracker in her mouth. He pointed an accusing finger at her, already starting for the stairwell again.

"You can't fool me Romanoff. I know for a fact you don't, heard it from the best source around."

"He's on the hangar floor!" she shouted over her shoulder and Steve pumped an arm in victory. Although...wait. The last time he'd seen Bucky on the hangar floor--

So maybe he took the stairs a little fast, was a little flustered by the time he rounded the corner, panting. He spun in the open space, actively avoiding that wall, but Bucky was nowhere to be seen, maybe Natasha had been wrong again after all?

A slight movement caught his eye and Steve bounded up the stairs in the middle of the room, peering out the windows. Bucky was outside, sitting in the middle of the hangar overlooking New York, wind whipping the few escaped strands from his bun around his face as he curled over his sketchpad. He paused the moment Steve stepped outside, overtuned to the environment. But he didn't look up, pencil angrily scratching at the paper, dark graphite lines in a distinctive shape, clear even with the distance between them that Steve was closing carefully.

Halfway across the hangar and there was suddenly a loud tear, then Bucky was shoving the drawing aside, paper swooped up by the wind and carried into open air. Steve leaned to the side to watch it drift towards New York sidewalks, surprised to see there were two more sheets floating slowly down too.

"Somebody's pissed," he commented nonchalantly, shoving his hands in his pockets and glancing at Bucky, who was grinding harsh lines into the next victim sheet of paper.

"You would be too if you'd almost wasted decades of courage on a single. stupid. mistake," Bucky bit between grit teeth, ripping the next page out and sending it cascading to its death too. Steve nodded, looking down at his feet, at the drawings beginning to litter the ground so far beneath them.

"I know. I was there." He kept his words as careful and sweet as he could, wondering what the hell had gone wrong between this morning and now.

But did it matter? This was still how Bucky felt, inside, no matter how much he smiled on the outside. As much as Steve's heart seized at Bucky's smile, he'd take the truth any day. If he was going to confess to anything anytime soon, Bucky should probably know that first.

"Buck," he started.

The whole sketchpad went over the side of the tower. Steve cringed, praying that the cardboard wouldn't hit some poor soul in the head, a dozen blank pages ripped out by the wind and fluttering down the side of the tower like dead butterflies.

He could do nothing but watch as Bucky stormed past him, brushing an angry hand through his hair and dislodging more of his bun, then he was swinging the glass doors open and disappearing inside and Steve sighed, looking back at the cascade of drawings to the sidewalk. Something was always falling with them, wasn't it?

The rest of the day disappeared in meetings with Maria and not-SHIELD operatives, but odds are Buck was avoiding him anyways, there was no point in hanging around the residential floors.

He woke up to the sound of breaking glass.

"Buck?" His socks slid dangerously on the floors, threatening to send him into the wall (that never ended well) as he caught his footing and turned the corner.

The mirror in the living room was destroyed, shards of glass strewn all over the floor. There was a bullet casing on the floor and no other sign of Bucky.

Eventually Steve found him on the kitchen table, sitting cross-legged and cleaning out his gun.

"What the hell happ--"

"Reflection startled me," Bucky replied boredly, shoving the clip into place and flicking on the safety. "You can go back to bed."

"Why were you...are you okay?"

"Perfectly efficient," he sneered, dismantling his next gun with his long, disheveled hair stuck up in a hundred directions. Right. He was totally balanced.

But there was nothing he could do, so Steve left him there and retreated to his art studio, staring at Buck's half-finished painting for a while before going back to bed.

The next incident was considerably more dangerous, mostly because it wasn't isolated supersoldiers involved. Clint and Bucky had taken up training together for things beyond sharp-shooting and were working on long-distance drops when Clint snuck up behind him, startled him, and ended up with a knife in the thigh.

That time Steve met him in Stark's infirmary, pale and drawn as he sat ramrod straight in a waiting chair outside Clint's operating room. Steve sat down beside him and Bucky stood up, crossing to the observation window. He stayed for a few more seconds, then he was walking away and Steve knocked his head back against the wall hard enough to dent it.

Personally, Steve was torn between two theories. Either Bucky was losing his mind, or he was testing boundaries to see how much damage he could do before Steve gave up on him.

Funny enough, those were Bucky's same two theories.

He didn't want to hurt Clint. But his body and his mind were more disconnected than ever. He'd had a glimpse of what it'd be like to own his flesh and bones - the tight grip he had on his conditioning was slippery now, because he couldn't decide whether to abandon his body again or embrace it and that left him in this terrible gray area where his training decided things before his head did and he was shooting mirrors and punching walls and throwing knives into Steve's friend's thigh.

But no matter what he did, Steve kept showing up, all understanding and soft and sweet and Bucky was choking with the cloying taste of it.

That's where the losing-his-mind part came in.

He'd given his everything for all the wrong things for a long time - a selfish war machine buried under a lifetime of guilt traced back to the first time he met Steve. The dark, terrifying side of him, the black soul and hands that itched to kill.

Moon was a compliment, he never shone that bright. But that didn't stop Steve from shoving that in his face.

It was so confusing, why did Steve bother? Why was he acting like this was more than the friendship bond they'd shared for years? Why was he looking at Bucky like that?

There was one possibility he couldn't get outta his head, another bullet to bury in his head and bring the ghosts in his dreams to life. He was haunted again, like last time.

Last time. He'd gotten that memory back when he'd gotten the others - but it wasn't until now that he started thinking about it. Dreaming about it. Dreaming about a dream, that's how fucked up his head had gotten.

"Why do I see you everywhere? Who are you?" Bucky accused, taking a step back, closer to the edge of the water. The angel's hand fell to its side, mouth turning down in disappointment.

"I was everything to you." The angel answered quietly. Bucky stared for a few moments before whipping around on his heel, looking out over the water and turning his back on the sunshine glow. He could see his reflection in the water, watched the angel's reflection step closer before he felt the warm hands circling around his waist.

Those arms had been around his waist before, his body knew them like a puzzle piece. Bucky turned his head to the side, looking stiffly over his shoulder at the angel who was resting his chin hooked over Bucky's clavicle. Blue eyes glanced to his and Bucky held their gaze.

"Were we lovers?" he asked, the words less curious and more accusing. Blue eyes blinked slowly, then the arms around Bucky's stomach squeezed a little tighter as the angel looked out over the harbor.

"Almost," he said softly.

He remembered dreaming that as the Winter Soldier. The Steve in his head had told him they were almost lovers. It was all a concoction of Bucky's subconscious, but it had to come from somewhere.

And if he held his breath and looked back at every moment between them, every lingering look and touch and clasped hand and near-kiss?

It was the assumption one might make.

If it weren't for Steve Rogers being so definitely, positively not in love with him.
"Alright, team, I think we need to make a few precautionary safety measures--"

"Stark," Bucky interrupted, tucking a piece of hair behind his ear and crossing his arms over his chest. "We all recognize I'm the problem here. You don't have to pretend it's about everyone."

He'd accidentally blown up one of Tony's lesser-used labs yesterday, but he was pretty sure the impromptu Avengers meeting was actually about the arm-shaped hole in the hallway. In his defense Jarvis had come out of nowhere, ripping the AI system out of the wall was the instinctive thing to do.

Or maybe it was all the doors he'd ripped off their hinges over the past week. Who knows.

"Well, in that case, stop fucking up my tower."

"Tony!"

"What? He's got a point. I've been distracted." This was all going to fall on Bucky anyways, might as well let them blame him. It was better than sugarcoating.

"Distracted? You're taking your personal emotions out on Stark's damn inventions, Bucky!"

"Steve, chill."

"What, calm down Stevie, like always? I won't act like this isn't a big deal, Buck."

"Oh, what, like you've got the power to decide everything I do? Or pretend to fucking care?"

"Guys, guys, fighting over this isn't going to fix anything. Cap, it's fine, this is all kinda routine. Barnes is going through a lot--"

"I'm right here."

"--and Sarge, Steve's looking out for your well-being, you know that."

"I don't need a keeper." Bucky rolled his eyes and stuck both his wrists out, shoving them together. "If you guys wanna put chains on me just do it already, I hate all this diplomatic bullshit."

"The first person that goes near him with restraints is breaking their arm," Steve pointed a very serious warning finger and Bucky laughed sharply, tipping his head back.

"I can fucking take care of myself, Steve, you don't need to threaten your team."

"Our team, and apparently you can't take care of yourself or else you wouldn't be taking your vendetta against me out on the towe--"

"Goddammit Rogers, not everything is about you! You know what, I'm fucking done with this bullshit. Count me out of your superhero drama, I'm not interested."

Bucky took the stairs mostly so he could slam the door behind him, every step jarring him on the way down - as far down as he could go, basement level - and echoing the lie in his head over and over. Of course this was about Steve. Damn him, everything was.
Because it was his little Stevie. His precious, darling, Steve.

God, he'd been a dick.

He was so confused.

On one hand, maybe Steve wanted him, maybe after everything they'd been through they deserved this.

On the other hand maybe Bucky was grasping at reasons to stay alive and he'd end up depending on Steve for his existence which was exactly what he didn't want to do. Because then he'd lose Steve and become nothing again.

What was the worst that could happen? This was Steve.

Shit. This was Steve.

A hell of a lot of terrible things could happen.

Did he mean it?

Did Bucky mean it?

Of course he fucking meant it. He remembered the first time he realized he was in love with Steve. Clear as day. It was before all of this shit. This wasn't new. If it was new, he could be worried.

He was worried. Why would Steve want him?

He didn't. He couldn't.

Wishful thinking.

Ghosts.

Memories and false hopes.

He ended up in Steve's room anyways, the internal argument too loud to handle on his own. He can't survive alone again.

Steve walked in and dropped his coat in surprise. Bucky didn't look up from where he was sitting on Steve's bed, staring at his palms. One of these was fake and sometimes he couldn't decide which one.

A warm arm wrapped around his shoulders and Bucky let Steve guide him back onto the comforter.
Let arms curl carefully around his torso, lips pressed to the back of his neck once before he curled close and held Bucky.

This was nothing like the straps they used to hold him down. This was nothing like the punk firey spark he'd fallen in love with as a kid. But this was them, and it was now, and he couldn't imagine being anywhere else in the world.

The rush of anguish settling, hot breaths on his neck healing the hurt behind his eyes. Like spun sugar, waves of sweet fire, finally safe within Steve's arms. The flood came rushing in, but for once it wasn't tears or blood. It was a hand in his hand, the mess in his head drowned with sunshine shadows.

They fell asleep tangled together and when Steve woke he wasn't holding Bucky anymore, just a single handwritten note.

You deserve better.
I'm sorry it's me you got stuck with.

-B

Bucky wasn't supposed to feel emotions beyond rage and victory, that was the whole point of the Winter Soldier program.

Any other emotions were weakness and fuck, he could agree with that motto now.

He was living in a castle of glass and yes, he was the crack threatening to destroy the entire tower.

Maybe he was going out of his fucking mind.

~~~

He left a post-it note on the fridge that he'd be gone for the day, then he caught the first bus to D.C. before anyone could ask him questions.

It'd been way too long since his last visit, but he'd been so busy and overwhelmed with everything from SHIELD going down to Bucky being back that he couldn't spare the daytrip.

The way Peggy's eyes lit up when she saw him, he felt ten times shittier for missing months of visits. But she greeted him joyfully, shushing him the moment he began to apologize.

"I certainly hope you've been too busy to visit. Have you had the...the chance to start that life?" Steve scooted his chair closer, sighing at the familiar question. Because the thing was, he thought he had. The center of his unhappiness had been focused on loneliness. On looking for a home.

But Bucky was alive and so Steve had those things, if Bucky would let Steve have him.

Peggy could read him as well as ever, the teasing lilt in her tone softening as she looked at him worriedly, "What is it?"

As much as he'd love to tell her his troubles, this might be something she didn't need to know. She'd been his girl in the forties - kind of - and dropping his bisexuality in her lap the same day as confessing a lifetime of feelings for his second in command felt an awful lot like undermining what she'd been to him.
People may be more open-minded now, but it wouldn't be easy to hear there'd always been someone else. The thing was though, he'd come here for her help because she always knew what to say. If he kept it vague enough, neutral pronouns and situations, he could confess without hurting her.

Besides, this was Peggy Carter. He could no more lie to her than he could to his mother.

"For as long as I can remember," Steve started, settling into the chair and letting his eyes drift over Peggy's retirement room. "I've always been so sure about my decisions. Until recently...I figured I finally need to do something. Say what I haven't before. Be true to every part of me...I guess it's not that easy anymore.

"I thought I could throw myself in with open arms, maybe have the courage to chase what makes me happy." Steve shook his head slightly, disbelieving he was even saying this aloud. What a place he'd come to, that he was confessing to the one person who deserved his burdens the least.

Besides Bucky. God, Bucky didn't deserve any of Steve's issues. Buck was trying to work through things, but how could he do that when Steve was having just as many nightmares? No fucking wonder he didn't want to stick around.

"They're just not interested," Steve quirked an eyebrow, tilting his head with the saddened curve of a smile.

With the same dependable, wonderful reaction Peggy huffed a weak laugh, shaking her head fondly at him as her British accent scolded. "Still so dramatic...Steve. He died for you, did you ever stop to think. Of what that means?"

He turned his hands over in his lap, the soft sad smile still on his mouth as he ran the words distantly through his mind again.

Then it clicked.

His head snapped up, looking at Peggy with alarm. "Did you...How did you...?"

She'd said he died for you. Was she talking about Bucky? Did she know he was talking about Bucky? When the hell had that happened?

"Oh dear," Peggy frowned, reaching a frail hand for him across the pastel sheets. "He still hasn't told you?"

His brain was spinning too much to accept the offered comfort of Peggy's hand, instead looking between the door and her face, processing the words again and only more confused by it.

"Told me-- what? Who?"

How could she possibly know he was talking about--

"James? The Sergeant who came back from the dead for you?" She raised an unimpressed eyebrow and Steve's mouth opened and closed, eyebrows furrowed as he shook his head, his insides rattling around in their tandem befuddlement.

"You...but how?"

He was running a hundred different scenarios through his head and drawing up blank for all of them.

There was no way Peg could have known about his feelings for Bucky, no way except that somehow she did.

Actually, she shouldn't even know Bucky was alive. At all.

He was missing so much of this conversation.

"You should know better by now, Steve. There isn't much I don't know." Peggy patted his arm in amused condolence, but her expression softened into something gentle as she took in the overwhelmed shock on his face. "I'm sorry I never told you about him. I promised him I wouldn't--"

"You two did talk then." Steve should feel bad for interrupting, only his mouth was moving faster than his brain. Everything was moving faster than his brain right now. "About what? About me? Bucky talked to you about me?"

"He shouted about you," she corrected. "And cried. My, what a day that was."

He could do nothing but stare at her. The hand on his arm slid down and slipped in his hand, rubbing a weathered thumb over his skin like he was the frail one now. Well, she wasn't wrong.

"I'd known already, of course. But I don't think he ready to admit it, not until I made him. But I knew the moment you brought him back from that Hydra camp...the way he looked at you? That boy was more in love with you than I was."

"Peggy," Steve choked out, closing his fingers around hers to stop her, half because he was terrified of what she'd say next, half because this felt like some lucid dream and there was no way any of this was true. Besides, she couldn't be the one to be saying this, not when she'd been the one who-- "But you..."

"Steve, I know what I meant to you. He kn-knows that too. It doesn't...matter now. What matters is. What you two mean to each-- each other. Now you can live your life."

Was she saying...Bucky'd talked - shouted - about him? Cried? "More in love with you than I was"...it didn't feel possible.

"It's impossible," Steve echoed aloud, staring at their hands, duly surprised he hadn't shrunk back to pre-serum size from shock alone. "Really, how could he?"

"You already know the answer t-to that. That qu-question," she turned away, coughing lightly for a moment before turning back with a small smile. "You know most all of it, if you think hard enough."

Actually, he knew shit, but he wasn't going to say that aloud.

"What did he say to you?"

"Shouted?" she corrected again, eyes twinkling with that mischief that looked so much like someone else's. God, Bucky. "I had him...so scared, talking a-about you and his feelings for you and then he j-just. blew--" a choked cough, "-blew up and..."

Her words rolled into a heavy coughing fit and Steve grabbed water off the bedside table without looking, sloshing some onto the carpet as he brought it over, helping guide it to her lips as always. If she noticed that his hands were trembling, she didn't comment on it. As soon as the water was gone Steve shoved it back on the nightstand, careful not to knock over frames as he turned back to her, feeling nine times too eager and vulnerable right now.

"A-ask him yourself," she muttered, letting her eyes slip closed tiredly. She at least had the guile to let her mouth curve up again as she patted his hand and pushed it off her bed. "Now leave an old woman be."

He sat for a few seconds, brain still working too slow, then he cracked a smile - couldn't disobey a direct order after all - and stood, bending to place a soft kiss on her wrinkled forehead. The lines next to her eyes and mouth crinkled deeper and Steve squeezed her hand one more time before he started for the door.

On instinct he turned around in the doorframe, looking at Peggy one more time. Her eyes were back open, slightly, and the smile on her face was wide and happy and god, if she had that much hope for them (he still wasn't over that she knew, let alone approved), then maybe this really could work.

"You two youngsters are both so damned blind...you deserve each other, in every sense of the word." He gave her a final smile and she waved her hand for him to hurry along. His trembling hands closed the door softly, careful, and the moment it was shut he leaned his temple on the wood, closing his eyes to still the spinning in his head.

There was something Bucky had said to Peggy, something important, that could change everything.

His best girl had thought Bucky was in love with him the moment she met him.

Maybe.

Maybe he was going as crazy as Bucky or maybe, really, there was a chance.

After all, he'd never heard of Agent Peggy Carter being wrong...

The bus ride home might as well have been a plane for all Steve was floating. He stared out the window for three hours, replaying every individual word of their conversation over and over.

There was a chance.

A legitimate, honest, strategic chance.

Bucky Barnes might love him back.

~~~

So maybe he dented a wall or two running in. It wasn't easy to slow down for corners with all that muscle mass.

All heads shot up as he came bursting into the communal kitchen, where basically everyone was bickering over food. Steve put a hand on the wall to try and catch his breath.

"Where's Bucky?"

Clint was the first to get over his surprise, putting his knife down to address Steve. "Apparently, he's been intercepting SHIELD calls for the past week, which Maria finally discovered today. We tried stopping him, but he took the mission parameters anyways, storming out with - and I quote - 'Just because Steve won't let me die for the people I've killed doesn't mean I can't atone for my sins.'"

"Maria was reluctant to let him go but I figured it was like that phone call, the whole 'guilty in the eyes of God' 1940s thing you two've got goin' on." Clint went back to chopping, barely heard Steve's confused murmur over the sound.

"Bucky's not religious..."

They all looked up again and this time Sam was the one who spoke. "...well that's a problem."

"I need a printout of the last call interception, now."

~~~

He would prove it.

Bucky Barnes would prove to the world he was still alive. No, the Winter Soldier would prove to the world that ghost stories don't die. Although, really, it was the same thing, wasn't it?

This was the best he'd felt in a long, long time.

Stealth boots on his feet, Gerbers and SOCP in their sheaths, Derringer and Intratec strapped to his thigh, Skorpion between his shoulderblades, SigSauer P226R in hand.

Winter Soldier mask strapped over his mouth and nose. Hair down and wild, his old leather one-armed jacket strapped over his chest. It was like stepping into a pair of your favorite, most comfortable shoes after being forced to wear someone else's for months.

Bucky crouched behind the lip of the roof, looking through the scope of the rifle he'd brought.

The building across the street was a Hydra intelligence base. Well, it'd been taken over by one, anyways. After the downfall of SHIELD, they were popping up everywhere. It made perfect sense they'd chosen a well-populated building in Manhattan as a base of operations. Especially if they thought their greatest threat was gone.

Inhale, and a slow exhale, stilling the crosshairs on the little black box he'd placed in one of the windows earlier. Tell them all the ghost lives on. Bottom of the breath and he pulled the trigger.

The explosion was instantaneous, anybody in the near vicinity likely eliminated, but he was more interested in the smoke now spiraling heavily through the building's vents. He'd smoke 'em out like a forest fire - and the ones that looked up as they hit the sidewalk, searching building rooftops for a sniper? Those were the agents that got to die first.

To be fair, he was half out of his mind at this point.

Steve Rogers was fucking with him and he couldn't take it. He'd tried the whole emotions thing and it was painful, it was ripping him up because Steve was so goddamned beautiful and funny and understanding and perfect and Bucky was trying too hard not to care because it all had to be some kind of joke, only he couldn't tell the difference anymore.

He'd lost control of his head and his life and he was going out of his fucking mind with the suspense and confusion, so he'd gone to the one place he had control left.

The battlefield, the mission, was the only place he still recognized the inside of his own brain. He was powerful here, behind the trigger of a Beretta, taking out black-suited bastards right and left.
On the plus side, the noises and explosion had cleared all the civilians from the street. That meant it was just him and Hydra now. He swung his rifle to the ground and vaulted over the edge of the roof.

Metal fingers skid down brick, snagging on a ledge ten feet off the ground and snapping him to a stop, then Bucky was leaping to the ground, rolling with the impact, and had bullets between the eyes of three suits before someone thought to shout "The Winter Soldier!"

The screams and panicked frenzy that accompanied that were quite flattering. That didn't stop Bucky from slaughtering the closest screamer.

This was what he was made to do. His metal arm felt lighter than it had in months, grabbing Hydra agents by their throats and throwing them into the squirming crowd. When was the last time he'd felt this good? When was the last time he'd done something good?

Taking out evil was better than just killing, it was catharsis. The blood splattered on the road was to make up for the innocent blood he'd spilled for decades.

Besides, nothing distracts you from the sunshine more than dabbling in the darkness.

~~~

The motorcycle under him roared and Steve sped down the streets, weaving haphazardly through cars, the shouts and whipping wind falling into background noise as his mind flew a hundred miles per hour. No wonder Bucky'd been so temperamental. No wonder he was losing his mind. If he really did have feelings for Steve, that had to have been hell.

Steve spent so much time making sure Bucky knew their relationship was platonic because he was terrified of being found out. Buck must've gotten a thousand mixed signals - Steve almost kissing him before he got his memories back, shutting down emotional talks, wanting simultaneously to hold him and keep a careful arms-length away.

It must've been terrible for him to fall asleep in Steve's arms and wake up thinking Steve was only doing it out of pity or friendship.

If Bucky thought this was unrequited, no wonder he'd blown up at Steve's begging to stay alive for him.

No fucking wonder.

All of Bucky's weird behavior since he got back suddenly made sense.

Actually...all of Bucky's weird behavior since Azzano was starting to make sense.

This was the missing factor, the piece in the puzzle that connected all the horror and the good times, the shared underscoring that knit everything together and finally gave Bucky the motivation, purpose, reasoning that Steve'd never seen.

This was why.

Bucky Barnes might be in love with him.
Unfortunately, a lot of Hydra was too smart to stay in the street and get slaughtered like sitting ducks by a righteous assassin.

They split off, running into buildings and up fire escapes and hey, who was he to deny a challenge?

Creative, the army used to call his sniping methods. Efficient was the better word; he thought of the simplest ways to kill. No annoying dramatics or unnecessary finesse. He needed a plane? He hopped on the roof, shot the pilot, and swung inside.

Efficient.

Things started getting fun when some of the agents ran back into the building and brought back guns. Big guns.

He backflipped outta the machine-gun fire and pulled the pin on a grenade, tossing it as he rolled to the side and brought down a stray soldier with a heavy kick to her knee, another scream as the bone snapped and then she had a knife in her throat and didn't scream anymore.

There was another agent climbing up a fire escape and it looked like the street was gonna be covered in a lot of machine guns pretty soon, so Bucky figured he might as well follow. He launched himself upwards, swinging on the metal arm and flipping high enough to crush the agent's shoulder in his metal fist, fling him off the side of the building. A sound on the roof made him look up, then a grenade was flashing, blinking towards him and he batted it aside with metal fingers just in time, blast radius close enough to send a dark splatter against the metallic shine of his arm.

Bucky glared at the mark - it needed new paint job anyways, but still - and pulled the Skorpion off his back. Whoever was on that roof was about to be very unhappy in the next twenty seconds.

Or, as it turned out, a lot of people were about to be very unhappy.

The conglomeration below had been a setup - actually, surprisingly smart for a Hydra cell. Because the guns on the street were nothing in comparison to the numbers of muzzles pointing at him when Bucky vaulted the rest of the fire escape and skid onto the roof.

But the difference between him and the twenty-five agents on the roof? He wasn't quivering with fear at the sight of the black-clad assassin with deadly eyes staring over a black mask belonging to a ghost.

Ammo ran out pretty quickly, he caught a bullet in his right thigh, and knives weren't as replenishable as you'd think, so there were still twelve people shooting at him by the time he started fighting with his hands. That number quickly became five though, then he started pushing people off the roof because it was so less time consuming.

With that rooftop cleared, he rode the fire escape back down to the ground and didn't have a chance to grab anymore guns before he started combat fighting with the group of assholes who decided to bring tasers.

His wicked killing streak and the resulting screams were suddenly interrupted by a loud roar behind him, the sound of a high-power engine. Yes, that meant even bigger guns to fight.

Bucky spun around, freshly-retrieved knife between his metal fingers and poised to throw, except that the bigger guns to fight were totally not the kind he was thinking of.

"Steve," he groaned behind the mask, throwing back his head in annoyance. "Again? Really?"
"We need to talk," Steve told him, climbing off his bike and stepping over a bloody body in the middle of the street. Bucky swung his metal arm out wide in explanation, raising his eyebrows because Steve couldn't see the annoyed set of his mouth.

"Can't you see I'm a little--" a sound to the left had him spinning on his heel, throwing the knife meant for bigger-guns into the forehead of one of the taser assholes. "--busy?" he finished, turning back to Steve.

"Bucky, c'mon. I'm serious." Steve stepped closer, and if he got into the middle of this then Bucky wouldn't be able to finish his damn fight. He wasn't about to drop everything for another one of Steve's games.

"So am I, Rogers. Get the fuck out." Bucky turned his back, scooping to snatch his knife from taser-guy's forehead and breaking into a run, picking up speed to swing over a car the stupid bastards were hiding behind. Half of them were fast enough to dodge, but the other half got sliced open or crushed by metal.

"Buck!" Steve called the moment Bucky rolled back into the street, jogging closer and making a total nuisance of himself. "Listen to me, I have to talk to you."

"Not. Now." He punctuated the words with the angry hurl of an empty gun, shattering windows across the street and eliciting more panicked Hydra shouts.

Steve was closer now, ten feet away, and Bucky spun towards him angrily, his hair whipping in his eyes as he hissed at Steve through the grates covering his nose and mouth.

"I don't have time for your shit, Rogers. Get the fuck out of here."

"Just liste--" Steve tried, reaching with pacifying hands. Bucky knocked one of the artist wrists aside, glaring over his mask - the same glare from their first fight on the bridge, his metal fingers wrapped around Steve's throat. They were standing that close too, because Steve wouldn't stop advancing and Bucky wouldn't back down from a challenge; stepping forward, practically on his toes as he glared Steve down, just inches away.

"Why can't you ever catch a hint Steve, good fucking lor--"

The words cut off in surprise as Steve's hands came up to his jaw, fingers hooking around the back of Bucky's mask and tugging it straight off his face. He stared incredulously as Steve tossed it aside like it was some useless piece of plastic instead of the emblem of his identity, then he turned back to Bucky, those blue eyes burning as they met his own, clashing like two stars colliding in the sky.

The look in Steve's eyes. Bucky couldn't breathe.

This time when Steve's hands landed Bucky's jaw, there was no mask in the way. Just Bucky's soft skin under his palms and Steve's heart pounding out loud enough that Buck could probably hear it...but he didn't care.

Not anymore.

Steve tightened his hold, long strands of hair brushing the curl of his fingers, his stomach twisting in knots as the wind whipped around them, Bucky's crystal eyes staring at him, staring into him, and it was jump now or never, a lifetime of waiting, and with fists raised and blood pumping Steve leaned forward, destroying the space that had been between them for decades too long.
He tilted Bucky's face up and pressed his lips to soft pink ones, eyes slipping closed as their mouths connected and the world stopped turning.

The exotic, plush curve he'd dreamed about a hundred times over (and drawn twice that many) was caving under the pressure of his lips - barely parted, a touch of lingering wetness against Steve's mouth and the jolt of it spiraled through his body, rippling down his spine because god, this was Bucky in his hands, Bucky's face tipped up to meet his, their - their - lips pressing together.

In the middle of this carnage, this wreckage of bloody bodies and dirty New York streets, somewhere in the goddamn twenty-first century; he never thought he'd live to see this day but fuck, wasn't it fitting.

Fit just like Bucky's mouth to his, crushed close and solid and so warm and -

Bucky wasn't kissing him back.

Steve pulled away so fast their lips made a soft popping sound, then Bucky's icy eyes were staring at him, wide and so bright Steve could see his own wild reflection in the blown pupils, those lips he'd just been kissing parted in shock.

Shit.

"Bucky," he started to say, to apologize or backpedal or something, but he only got out the first vowel before the glinting flash off metal caught his eye and Steve's heart stopped for an entirely different reason because that metal arm was reaching out for him and fuck, he was going to die because he'd kissed an assassin who quite clearly didn't want to be kissed--

Then metal fingers tangled up in the front of his shirt, fabric catching and threatening to tear as the arm that'd done nothing but crush things permitted its first mission for something good and hauled him back in, their mouths crashing together this time.

He took it all back.

Bucky arched up against his mouth, kissing back messy, hungry, and Steve couldn't breathe, he needed more than just his hands on Bucky's face, he needed Bucky so close he could never get away again. He crushed their mouths tighter, lifting his hands from the strong jaw and wrapping his arms around Buck's muscular back instead, leather creaking as he pressed their chests flush together, twin hearts skipping.

Metal and real fingers shoved into his hair, dragging Steve down further, closer, and Bucky's head tilted sideways to adjust the angle, lips interlocked and pressing, hard enough to bruise, hard enough that Steve could taste the desperation - the broken, terrified way Bucky was clinging to him like he'd disappear the moment their lips parted.

A stuttering wave of emotion rushed through him, threatening to knock him off his feet. Steve bundled Bucky close and kissed him deep, letting them both drown in the sparkling heat of their chests; all senses on fire and warding off the years of freezing ice cold. Maybe this was how they were supposed to heal, in the warmth of their hearts combined, in the comfort of each other's bodies. Real, alive, here.

Real, alive, here.

In the same shot of adrenaline that made him swing his shield into fights, Steve figured if he was already running towards the window, he may as well jump out of the proverbial burning building. It'd always been all or nothing for them anyways.
He parted his lips, opening his mouth to cautiously trace plush lips with the tip of his tongue, dragging wet heat between them. Bucky's mouth was as soft and pretty under his tongue as it looked on paper and tasted almost exactly how he smelled, that warm familiar presence he'd grown up tucked beside like a puzzle piece. Then Bucky eased open his mouth, breathing straight through Steve's parted lips - an electrical shock tingling all the way to his toes as Bucky pressed his tongue back, wetly brushing against Steve's, and he couldn't help the indecent moan dragged out of his throat as his fingers tightened and toes curled in his boots.

And all the pieces locked together, their life-long dance in circles around each other finally meeting in the middle. Every single word and broken nose and burning building had carried them here, to the passionate crook of their pressing mouths.

The heat coiling in his chest could set fires in Russia. Bucky's fingers were still knotted in his disheveled hair and his fingertips were probably embedding bruises into Bucky's shoulders and there may still be people trying to kill them but Steve couldn't imagine breaking away, not now, not ever. He was focused too intently on the lips against his, the hot, heavy, surging heat in his mouth, the wet pull of his bottom lip between Bucky's.

Jesus Christ, why hadn't they been doing this for years?

A piece of glass broke off to the right and suddenly Bucky's mouth was gone and Steve's chest hitched, trying to take in oxygen and his lips landed sloppily on leather, Bucky's shoulder, eyes still shut, trusting Bucky to take care of whatever the fuck was going on and get back to freaking kissing him as soon as physically possible. The gun tucked against the small of his back suddenly disappeared with a woosh of cold, then a loud shot fired off and something thumped in the distance. Then Bucky's hand was on his cheek and Steve lifted his head off Bucky's shoulder, moving right back in to kiss him.

Bucky laughed against his lips and it was the best thing Steve'd ever tasted, licking Bucky's laugh right out of his mouth and memorizing the feeling of that smile pressed against his lips and then he was getting shoved an inch backwards with unforgiving metal. Steve finally opened his eyes into sparkling icy crystal, Bucky's face tipped up to look at him, that wide, honest, Brooklyn smile on Bucky's pretty, swollen lips and god, why did they have to stop kissing?

He groaned in annoyance and ducked in again but Bucky's hand on his chest was solid and unbreakable so that smile just widened and those eyes danced with laughter and he was so goddamned beautiful, stunning, breathtaking, that it was a miracle Steve had enough brain power to pout, pushing out his bottom lip in petulance that his mouth wasn't on Bucky's anymore and then finally the metal gave, curling him in again one more time as Bucky reached up and kissed the pout off his mouth with sweet, moving lips.

It was total submersion and the opposite of drowning, like being so stocked full of ecstasy and warmth it overflowed, overwhelmed, and then they weren't kissing, again, much too soon and Steve was really upset about the whole stopping thing Bucky kept doing. He pressed his forehead against Bucky's and breathed him in, breathed in the air ghosting over his wet mouth and god, there weren't words in any language he knew to describe this.

"Why can't you ever catch a hint?" Steve asked breathlessly, fingers threading through Bucky's long hair to keep their foreheads dipped together.

He could feel Bucky pause, tracing back to their conversation before the kiss, the BC to their now AD and god, everything had changed, his life wasn't pre-post serum anymore it was pre-post kissing Bucky--
Then a surprised huffed laugh burst over his lips and Steve dipped his mouth down to cover Bucky's again, quick enough that he wouldn't get shoved off, just pressing mouths together and capturing that surprised joy before letting their lips drag apart from each other, slow and wet and fuck fuck fuck, he was never going to get over that.

The metal hand on his shoulder was the only thing holding him steady as Bucky took a step backwards, tilting Steve's chin up straight with a crooked finger on his right hand. Steve looked at him, could feel his insides melting, his knees practically going weak, he was so so goddamned in love with his best friend and Bucky'd kissed him back and the whole world was perfect now--

"This doesn't change anything," Bucky told him, softly. He blinked, repeated it in his head, then the meaning kicked in.

"What the hell?" Steve threw his hands up and spun away with the motion, staring up at the sky because of fucking course that was his luck. They were never going to catch a fucking break, were they?

He had to take a few breaths - probably needed them for going so long without oxygen anyways - to calm himself down before he turned back to Bucky, one hand on his hip and the other waving in the air.

"I just kissed you--"

"I noticed," Bucky interjected with a sideways smile.

"--and doesn't that change everything?" Steve continued, ignoring the sassy comment.

Bucky shrugged.

Of course, he hadn't shrugged once since he got back and he chose right then to revert to his old fucking habit of shrugging at everything Steve said.

"I mean, I'm definitely not going to hit you if you do it again." The twinkle in his eye at that made Steve's chest clench and that wasn't fair, they were trying to have a legitimate debate here, now was not the time to get distracted. Then the shine faded, the edge of his mouth turning down in disappointment. "But it's not some magical band-aid to fix me, Steve."

"I don't want some...magical band-aid." Steve stepped forward, not missing the way Bucky eyed him warily as he took the metal hand with both his own. "I just want you to talk to me. To take comfort in...this."

He squeezed Bucky's hand, knowing that the pressure signals would at least show him what Steve was implying. Them, to take comfort in them, two human beings turning to each other in crisis because they cared about each other, more-than-friends cared about each other, and they'd always be best friends first of course, but they could have this too. They could have each other.

Bucky sighed, eyes filled with that familiar tired sadness. "It's not that simple, Stevie."

"It can be," Steve tried, taking another step closer and cupping Bucky's cheek in his palm. He kept his expression as honest and genuine as he knew how while Bucky's sharp sniper gaze searched him, looking for the catch.

Eventually he tugged Steve's hand gently away from his face, weaving their fingers for a brief moment. That, that was familiar. Holding hands was nowhere near new territory, comfortable where everything else was precarious, and the fact that Buck incorporated it into the moment meant he
"We'll see," he finally permitted, thumb running over Steve's hand in an aborted comforting movement. Then he looked over Steve's shoulder, a single pause to survey the damage around them before he pulled on his hand and tugged towards his bike. "In the meantime, I don't wanna be here when the cops show up for cleanup."

"Yeah, you made a mess," Steve commented, letting Bucky pull him along while he looked around at the scene for the first time since arriving.

"I was emotional," Bucky shot back, the barest hint of a grin as he slid onto the back of Steve's bike.

"And then I came along..." Steve prompted, swinging onto the seat in front of him and leaning back, tilting his head onto Bucky's shoulder to look at him with a teasing, wide smile.

"And fucked me up more," Bucky complained, running steel fingers through Steve's blonde hair one more time before shoving him back upright. "Now drive."

~~~

The world was oversaturated. He knew plenty about mind color contrast play, sensory deprivation and cornea confusion but this wasn't anything like that.

This was like all his senses weren't just enhanced, they were...tingling. It was ridiculous, really, and he'd roll his eyes at himself in the mirror the next chance he got. But in the meantime he'd let the energy build in the tips of his fingertips, steady himself in the cool smoothness of the kitchen counter against his calves.

"Why do you sit on the counter?" Steve asked, glancing up from where he was making trail-mix cookie dough. Bucky raised his eyebrows, feeling his jaw click against the heel of his hand, elbow propped on his knee as he looked Steve over curiously. It was a question he'd know the answer to if he stopped and thought hard enough, but that was basically the theme of today so Bucky might as well tell him.

"Better vantage point. And latitude advantage."

Steve pursed his lips, setting the stirring spoon against the side of the bowl and facing Bucky, leaning back against the opposite counter. "So it's basically so you can be taller than me," he clarified and it took all his willpower not to cringe instinctually at the expression on Steve's face, that too-familiar one that spelled trouble.

"Basically," Bucky relented. The too-innocent smile widened and Steve crossed the kitchen, wide hands propping on the counter on either side of Bucky's knees. Brilliant blue eyes looked up - and wasn't that a trip, Steve looking up at him again? A wave of nostalgia for the 30s tugged in Bucky's chest and that's exactly what Steve was doing, wasn't it? Giving Bucky the upper-hand, the taller one again, to get him all riled up. Maybe get his mouth on Steve again.

The punk.

"You really think you can handle me?" Bucky asked, dropping his voice low as he straightened and brushed his metallic thumb over Steve's cheekbone. There'd been a nasty bruise here once, caused by this hand, but that actually wasn't what Bucky was talking about.

See, the thing about Steve was that he went running into things head on. Jumping out of planes and taking on Hydra bases single-handedly. Okay, they shared that trait, but they went about it so differently.

Steve hauled himself into the line of fire, all instinct and passion and no thought. No planning ahead of time, everything on the goddamn spot, grab the flag and run with it.

Bucky was the one who made sure they covered every angle of the plan. Way ahead of time. Steve was an incredible leader, but he relied on instinct and leaning on people and Bucky wasn't like that, he was a sniper for Godsakes. It was all about preparation and strategy and deadly power and control.

That wasn't just who they were in the battlefield, that was who they were. Steve had ripped off his mask and kissed him in the middle of a live battle scene, all passion and fire.

Sure, Bucky was pretty sure he meant it then. And, knowing Steve, he meant it now too - and that was without the assurance of the hungry way he was looking at Bucky. But it wasn't the same as the way Bucky wanted Steve. Needed Steve.

This wasn't about comfort for him. It wasn't about what they deserved, what he wanted, none of that.

He'd devour Steve from the inside out.

This went a hell of a lot beyond want.

"I don't think I can handle you," Steve murmured, pushing up closer, head tilted back to hold his heated gaze. "I know I can."

He wouldn't throw caution to the wind, not when Steve was on the line. Protecting Steve came above everything else is, especially his own happiness.

But that didn't mean he couldn't let his fingers shift roughly through the hair on the back of Steve's head, forcefully tilting his face higher. A soft gasp escaped his lips and Bucky held him there, head cradled in his metal palm because for some reason, Steve really liked his left hand. Maybe because it wouldn't let him forget this was Bucky, no one else. Bucky liked that idea.

He tipped his head down, long hair flipping over the top of his head as he pulled Steve all the way up, pressing a hard, frozen kiss against his pretty mouth before releasing him entirely. He almost missed the soft whine in back of Steve's throat that he tried to choke down, but enhanced hearing gave him a really pleasant advantage for once.

"It's not going to be that easy," Bucky warned, leaning back against the wooden cabinets and raising one eyebrow at Steve. He had both hands on the counter again, looking vaguely out of breath and fuck, he looked good overwhelmed.

"I don't care," Steve breathed, hand curling around Bucky's bare foot. "I'll do whatever it takes."

Bucky hummed, studying him for a moment.

"Let's start with testing your deadly cooking," he offered, shaking free of Steve's hold and hopping off the counter.

Steve glared, but it was so affectionate Bucky'd normally laugh at him for it. As it was he nudged
Steve with his hip, taking the raw-food bowl from his hands and shooting a playful glance over his shoulder.

It was adorable, watching Steve groan and fumble after him, light pink dusting his cheekbones when he used to be a full-body blusher. Bucky sat the bowl on the table and grabbed a spoon before he broke his resolve and tasted the soft blush on Steve's cheeks instead.

In all the fighting they'd done lately, in all the running he'd done since he got his memories back, all the problems he'd caused lately -- he finally got his solution. The antidote, the snapping ribbon at the end of the finish line.

Everything he'd pushed away was ready to hold him. For real.

All the angst and the pain and the longing should all be over now. According to Steve. Who apparently equilibrated kissing to ambrosia.

Steve wanted to take his hand, give him a reason to start again, but Bucky meant it when he said nothing changed. Well, not nothing...he knew Steve liked him like that now. And sure, crushes could soothe surface pain and aggravation.

But they didn't change his mind about not depending on Steve. If anything it was more risky now, to open his heart and rely his existence and his reasoning and his drive on someone else. Even if -- maybe especially if that person was Steve Rogers.

So when he woke up thrashing and screaming because of some horror, some terrible distorted body beneath his hands, the disgusting things they'd made him do? When he woke up like that and Steve burst into his room, automatically dodging a knife that wasn't there, nothing could change.

If Steve was expecting to swoop in and rescue him, thumb away his tears and kiss his face and pull him into his arms to soothe him back to sleep, then he was going to be sorely disappointed.

Bucky kicked him out on his ass.

He had it coming, really, scooting up to Bucky's side and taking his shaking hands and throwing an arm around his shoulder and whispering for Bucky to talk to him.

Right. Talk about his nightmares. He'd done that...let's see...never. And he was never going to. And so he shoved Steve off his bed and made it very clear he was being dumb as fk. Even repeated this doesn't change anything, in case he'd forgotten, featuring a wild hand between the two of them on this.

Whatever "this" was.

The next morning was the first morning he'd ever woken up, stared at the golden sunrise outside his window and had the chance to think - "I've kissed the sun."

What a way to start a morning.

He pulled his hair into a high ponytail, liking how bouncy it made him feel as he rummaged through his closet for something tight and black. The only thing he was missing was his hoodie, but he figured Steve might have it, so he was already loudly voicing the question as he wandered into the kitchen.

"Hey Steve, have you seen my--mmpf!"

His question got cut short by a mouth suddenly covering his, Steve's heavy hand on his lower back pulling forward the same time he pressed hard against Bucky's lips, effectively bending him backwards with the force of the kiss.

Bucky felt like something out of a comic book, dipped backwards like some dame with his arms out in surprise - and a failed attempt at balance - eyes wide as Steve folded him close and kissed him.

He could've shoved Steve off, playfully punched his shoulder, except then Steve opened his hot fire mouth and Bucky was a goner.

His eyes slipped shut and he pushed back into the kiss, shivering as Steve's lips slid over his, carefully wrapping his arms around Steve's neck to hold him closer.

Steve tasted faintly like tea, and maybe mint under that, and as assaulted as he felt, Bucky figured he could definitely get used to this.

When they finally straightened up, Steve's hands sliding to settle on his hips, Bucky detached his arms and fell back flat-footed, although he'd never in a million years admit he'd been on his tiptoes.

The kiss broke with a wet sound that made it really hard not to dive in for more, then Steve was beaming down at him prettier than the morning sunrise outside his window and Bucky bit his lip, head spinning as he ran both his palms over the sides of Steve's neck. Right. He'd been saying something.

"Have you seen my hoodie?" He managed, fingers rubbing circles into the top of Steve's spine. Steve shuddered and smoothed a hand over Bucky's hair, tweaking his ponytail with a grin.

"It's in the living room." Blue eyes looked down at him and the hands on his hips squeezed, thumbs digging into his hip bones and turning his head woozy.

"Mmm. O-kay," Bucky nodded slowly and rolled his lips in, trying not to think about how he tasted like Steve. Jesus. He forced his hands off Steve's warm skin - god, he really was made of fucking sunshine, wasn't he? - and tilted his head towards the living room. "I'm gonna go...um. Get my...yeah."

He ducked out of the kitchen before he could embarrass himself any further, clutching a hand over his chest the second Steve couldn't see him anymore. Holy shit. There was a chance he wasn't going to make it past today, let alone anytime in the future. He was gonna die of a heartattack first.

Fuck. There were worse things to die of.

Considering that he'd blown off his mornings with Clint since he'd stuck a knife in the guy's thigh, now was as good a time as any to mend that burnt bridge. But he couldn't resist popping in the kitchen one more time before he left, catching Steve's attention by drumming his metal fingers on the wall.

"Hey, so I'm headed out to meet up with Clint." Steve's face lit up at the news, although whether it was because of the actual event or because he was being told about it, Bucky couldn't say.
"Have fun. Except maybe don't throw more knives."

Of course, leave it to Steve to joke about Bucky nearly killing one of his friends.

"Haha," Bucky shot back, dryly sarcastic. He pushed off the wall, pausing one more time in the archway to cock his eyebrow at Steve. "Speaking of which, I'd be careful with the surprise kisses, you catch me on a bad day and you might end up with a knife in your thigh."

He only got three steps down the hallway before Steve shouted from the kitchen, "It'd be worth it!"

And maybe Bucky shook his head and smiled all the way down the elevator.

~~~

After getting heartily lectured for stealing not-SHIELD intel for his own "revenge missions," Maria reluctantly let him back on the fight squad, effective immediately. The team was called in somewhere around noon, various states of grumpiness as they all shuffled into the tower's official briefing room.

Apparently he left a few survivors in his fiasco yesterday - which made everyone look at him in confusion and Steve look down at the table with a barely-concealed smile. The leftover Hydra asshats were too shaken to cover their tracks though, so it was pretty easy to trace where they ran. Which meant another Hydra base location.

"It was a strategic move, leaving them alive," Bucky confirmed, standing up after Maria dismissed them. Tony gave him a funny look and Steve laughed out loud because he knew exactly why Bucky'd failed total elimination yesterday. Bucky shot him a glare and Steve covered his mouth with a hand to stifle his snickering.

"Suit up, the quinjet's waiting!" Maria ordered over her shoulder, letting the door slam behind her. Tony mimicked her words with a bitchy face and Steve punched him on the shoulder hard enough to make him whine and Bucky rolled his eyes a lot and they all filed out of the room to get changed.

"Buck, have you seen my shield?"

"You lost the single most important Captain America symbol?" Bucky shouted back from his room, wrestling his metal arm through the sleeve hole of his new uniform that 'didn't look like a straight-jacket.'

"Never mind, found it!" Steve passed by his room, strapping the shield onto his arm as he muttered, "Dick."

"Hey," Bucky interjected, sticking his hand in the hallway to flick Steve off. A distant laugh, then Bucky cursed, struggling to get the stupid inner layer of his jacket zipped except that the thing was way too small for his metal fingers to hold and the angle wouldn't let him zip it with his right hand. "Fuck, who the fuck designed this thing?"

"You did," Steve reminded him, suddenly at the doorway again. "Can I help?"

"No." Bucky gave Steve a weird look and wiggled the stupid metal thing, cursing again when it refused to move. Then red gloves were on his hands, prying them off so Steve could do it.

Just because they kissed now did not mean Steve got to coddle him.

Bucky swatted Steve's hand - hard - and turned away, muttering "I got it, I got it," as he curled his right hand around, trying to overcome the impossible angle. The piece finally caught, zipping up all the way, and Bucky spun back around to glare at Steve. "You done being my mother?"

Steve crossed his arms over his chest, the dimensional white star in the center making him look ridiculously pompous. "Why are you still denying help?"

"I told you, Rogers." Bucky brushed past him, grabbing Steve's shield from where he'd deposited it in the hallway. "This doesn't change anything."

Despite the squabble, the mission went off without a hitch - the Hydra base was less a base and more a safehouse, so they grabbed what intel they could and blew the place up. In and out.

And thankfully, Steve didn't try to wipe the soot smudges off Bucky's cheekbone and forehead because he literally would have punched him.

They got back to their floor sometime around five, cleaned off and changed into comfortable clothes, the remnants of post-battle victory still thrumming beneath Bucky's skin. It didn't matter that it'd been easy...Steve had still gone blazing in, uniform hugging him in all the right places as he flipped to the ground, lips parted with adrenaline and fuck, Bucky was still human and this was still Steve Rogers in a goddamned uniform.

But he wasn't about to kiss him on the battlefield - not when Tony and Clint were there. Not when anyone was there, actually.

The good thing? They weren't on the battlefield anymore. In fact, they were perfectly alone...

Bucky hummed to himself, plugging his iPod into the speakers in the living room. He could get Jarvis to play the music for him, but he liked having the control in his hands. Besides, he was pretty sure Steve had disabled Jarvis in most of their floor by now.

xx

Just as the music started up Steve wandered in, tight blue tshirt and gray sweats that he had to be wearing that low on purpose. Fucker.

"Who's this?" He asked casually, following Bucky into the dining room. Bucky grabbed his water glass off the table, listening to the words float over the apartment. It was loud, loud enough you could feel it but not so loud you couldn't talk.

"Fall Out Boy remix. They're kinda like Panic." He took a sip of water and Steve leaned against the table, head cocked as he listened. This is the road to ruin, and we're starting at the end. Say yeah, let's be alone together. We could stay young forever...

"I like it." Steve traced his fingertips over the edge of the table, sketching something into the wood. Bucky watched him for a moment and sat his glass down on the other end of the table.

"Do you?" He made his way back over to Steve, standing in front of him with his arms crossed over his chest. Steve nodded, looking up at him with a half-smile, still focused on the music, which was catchy enough that Bucky couldn't help but sing softly along. "We'll stay young, young, young..."

Blue eyes lit up, bright and amused, and Bucky raised his eyebrows, couldn't help a sudden smile spreading. Steve was still leaning on the table, eyeing Bucky with this look, so he took the last few steps forward slow enough to make Steve's pupils dilate.
The music was picking up, crescendoing, and the moment Bucky was close enough, heavy hands reached out slowly and landed on his hips, thumbs tracing over his tshirt contemplatively. Bucky stood still, right hand running over Steve's forearm, watching him and waiting, waiting, gazes still locked as Steve's fingers curled in his belt loops and tugged him closer.

The beat dropped and suddenly there were hands under his thighs, scooping him off the ground and swinging him around, dumping Bucky on the table and Steve shoved his thighs apart, pressing in between his legs and pulling his face up to meet a hot, wet mouth that was already open, kissing Bucky so hard and filthy he gasped, both hands clenching in the back of Steve's shirt as he arched closer, unable to breathe or think anything but the mesmerizing, pounding heat and the way Steve's mouth was stealing every ounce of oxygen from his lungs.

Fingers spread low on his back, one rounding over the top of his ass and suddenly dragging him closer to the edge of the table and his legs wrapped around Steve's hips, ankles locking at the back as he pressed closer, one of Steve's hands running up the side of his thigh and god, Bucky couldn't breathe at all.

He ducked his head, breaking apart from the heat of Steve's mouth with a shudder and a gasp, his eyes still closed as he tried to regain a heartbeat somewhere rational. His head rolled to the side and then Steve's sweet mouth was sucking its way down his neck and Bucky's fingers clenched tighter, thighs squeezing Steve closer as his lips parted in an obscene moan. The lips on his neck paused for a moment, pressing a quick splattering of chaste kisses over everywhere he'd just mouthed wet.

"Fuck, fuck, Steve," Bucky breathed, one hand scratching up his back to scramble at the short blonde hair. And just when Bucky thought he couldn't go out of his mind anymore, the muscle between his shoulder and his neck lit up on fire, Steve's teeth sinking into his skin and Bucky jolted, crying out and tensing all over, a shiver running down his spine and his left arm at the same time. Steve's lips closed around his skin, sucking lightly on the mark and shooting a flurry of sparks into his spine.

"I'm outside the door, invite me in, so we can go back and play pretend..."

"Christ, get your mouth up here and kiss me." Bucky grabbed Steve's jaw with both hands, pulling him up and pressing their mouths together desperately, unable to go a moment longer without Steve's lips on his own. Warm hands rubbed over his ribs, circling up to his shoulderblades and back down to his hips, tracing his thighs, like Steve had to touch everywhere and fuck, Bucky was so okay with that. He pushed up against Steve's mouth like he was dying for it, lips moving together as they held each other tight and--

There was someone in their apartment.

He didn't hear it, didn't see anything with his eyes closed, but he knew. Bucky shoved Steve off him so fast Steve stumbled over a dining chair, barely catching himself on the edge of the table before he hit the ground and Bucky swung his legs closed, eyes wide as he registered the intruder standing stock still just outside the elevator.

"Ms. Potts!" Steve greeted, voice more alarmed than welcoming, pushing himself to his feet and swaying a tad before he steadied himself on the back of the dining room table. His face was bright red, but not as red as Bucky's. "We...we weren't expecting you!"

Pepper rolled her lips in, touching her hand to her mouth once, looking away for a moment before composing herself and looking back at them both. "Clearly."

She was trying not to laugh.
"Is there...is there anything we can help you with?" Steve gestured vaguely with a hand, still propping himself up on the chair.

"Ah...ahm. Tony would like to extend an invitation to a sitdown team dinner tonight." She bit her lip, looking away for another moment, clearly having an increasingly difficult time holding her laughter in.

"Great!" Steve said way too enthusiastically, even shooting her a little thumbs up. "We'll be there."

"I'll let him know." She gave them a low nod and pressed the elevator button, stepping back inside. Just before the doors slid shut, she leaned to the side and offered, "Boys, you may want to fix your hair before you come upstairs. Have a good rest of your day!"

The doors chimed closed and they both stared at the gray metal for a few moments.

"Shit. She's so telling Tony."

"Uh. Yeah," Bucky agreed, running his hand through his hair. Wow, she was right, it was totally fucked up.

"Fuck."

On the bright side, they made it halfway through their pasta before Tony put down his fork, taking a sip of water, turned to Bucky and Steve and casually asked,

"So when were you planning on telling everyone you guys are makeout buddies now?"

Sam Wilson spit his drink all over table, an arching spray that soaked both a dangerously-frozen Natasha and shocked Bruce.

Clint fell out of his chair laughing.

Bucky rolled his eyes and stood abruptly, taking his plate with him as he walked away, shoving open the stairwell door and disappearing with a loud crash while Steve stared after him like a lost puppy.

"Rogers?" Natasha asked, and Steve stood up too, apologizing as he threw his napkin down and took off for the stairs.

"That doesn't bother you?" Bucky hissed, waving an arm in a general up-direction as he stormed into his room.

"No! I could care less." Steve followed, closing the door behind them and sitting next to him on the bed, running his palm over Bucky's bicep. "Bucky, I have you now."

He got a glare for that, but at least Bucky didn't shove him off. Instead he ran a hand through his hair, looking about ready to pull it out in exasperation and confusion. "But it's so...dangerous."

Coming from a fuming, deadly assassin, the idea of their teammates knowing they kiss seemed like about the least dangerous thing Steve could think of. But he didn't say that, he just took Bucky's hand and weaved their fingers together.
"We're indestructible. I've always gone in fighting, Buck. And you mean way more to me than any dame I've stuck up for."

"I'm no dame," Bucky scowled, trying to shake free of Steve's hand. Steve squeezed tighter, leaning forward and forcing Bucky to look at him.

"I know, and I'm glad you aren't."

"C'mon." The scowl was all skepticism now, the face he wore when he was getting Steve to fess up to something stupidly obvious. "You ain't a fairy, Rogers."

He let go of Bucky's hand then, only so he could sock him in the shoulder.

"Oh shut up, what would you know?" Those crystal eyes narrowed, open distaste with that sassy I'd know plenty, Rogers look he didn't have to voice aloud. Steve shook his head, because of course Bucky would fight him about this. He tipped Bucky's face towards him, forcing his stupid head to listen. "I've been wanting to kiss you since I knew what kissin' was."

Bucky searched him, contemplated for a moment or two. Started adding up clues, from the look of it. He looked off to the side, eyebrows furrowed. "So that one April those guys beat you up for looking at that dock worker...?"

"Which dock worker do you think it was, Bucky?" Steve sighed boredly.

"I-- what?"

"How did you never catch on?"

"Why did you never tell me?"

"Because you're Bucky fucking Barnes, that's why!" Steve threw up his hands and a disbelieving huff escaped Bucky's lips as he shook his head, running an exhausted hand over his forehead.

"Fuck. How did this...just come kiss me, Rogers, that's how you can apologize for wasting all those years." Bucky still looked chagrined by Steve's confession, but he was waving a beckoning hand impatiently at Steve, so who was he to protest?

Steve leaned over and captured Bucky's lips under his, not touching anywhere but their mouths as they tilted their lips together and slid apart again. Was there ever a day that kissing Bucky wasn't going to light up every nerve ending in his body? He seriously doubted it.

But this conversation wasn't over, because Steve may have fessed up but he still hadn't gotten a word from Bucky's side. So he (very unfortunately) pulled away, pressing one more quick kiss before straightening back up and placing a hand on Bucky's knee. "What about you?"

Bucky blinked his eyes open, glancing between Steve and the hand on his knee, before finally settling on looking at the wall. "I had a hell of a lot more reasons than you did, let's just say that."

"Like what?" Steve teased, leaning forward again to ghost his lips over Bucky's. Bucky tipped forward to close the space between them but Steve slid back, biting his lip and staying just out of reach as Bucky leaned in again. "C'mon, tell me."

He slid his fingers through Bucky's hair, tangling in the long pieces as caught Bucky's gaze and held it. "Like what?"
"Like maybe I'll tell you one day if you ever stop being a dick," Bucky shot back, suddenly shoving Steve off and jumping up from the bed, gone out the door before he could apologize. Steve collapsed back on Bucky's comforter and groaned up at the ceiling.

Why was his life so fucking hard?

"Why's my life so fucking hard?" Steve complained, plopping down heavily in one of Tony's swivel lab stools. Tony raised an eyebrow at him, minimizing one of his slidey blue screens and waving a hand in the air for Steve to elaborate.

“He's not letting me in,” he pouted, crossing his arms over his chest. Tony snorted and Steve glared crossly at him. “Not like that.”

With a grieved sigh, Stark pushed off from one table and let his rolling chair slide up to the table Steve was sitting by, tipping his chair back as he looked over with that one unreadable expression. Steve raised his eyebrows, waving his hand in a what? motion.

All he got were an axiomatic glance and a shaking head like he was the dumbest person on the planet.

“He's not going to let himself need you, Cap.” Tony reached behind him to grab a bag of something while Steve scowled and fiddled with the adjustment controls on his chair.

“Why can't I be what he needs?”

“Because he doesn't need,” Stark replied, popping a handful of mystery-bag's contents in his mouth. As much as Tony's advice normally sucked ass, he had a pretty fan-fucking-tastic point with that one.

Bucky was a lot of things, but dependent was definitely not one of them.

“Then how the hell do I keep him in my life?” Steve swiped the bag and inspected the contents, deciding that goji berries sounded very strange and smelled even stranger.

Stark paused at the question, pushing his roll-y chair again and swiveling to a stop at one of the holograph tables, flicking something blue into oblivion as he pondered. Steve could hear him muttering to himself, something along the lines of without needing...if you don't need, then...

Suddenly he straightened up, lightbulb going off as he froze, pointing a finger in the air as he finished chewing his strange berries.

“...You gotta be what he wants,” Tony suggested, popping another handful.

Steve pushed off from the floor with his feet, letting his chair glide until he bounced into one of the holographic tables, where he expanded the closest 3D model of the tower, zooming in on his floor and shifting it to look at another angle. “Meaning?”

“Meaning, if you want him to stick around, you've got to give him a...” Stark waved his hand around in the air, probably looking for a word that wouldn't offend Steve's 'delicate sensibilities.' "...different reason to stay. Meaning you have to get out of your comfort zone a little, Cap.”

Right, yeah, he knew exactly where this was going. Steve sighed, smashing the holograph tower into 2D with a flattened palm. “I hate to break it to you Tony, but things don't just get fixed with sex.”
“Yeah no, believe me, I know that.” The tone of Tony's voice didn't leave any room for imagination, but as least that meant he wasn't suggesting stupid things he'd never tried before. "But if you want him to need you, you gotta start small, with him wanting you.”

It was an interesting theory, at least. Steve scooted his wheels back from the table, curling his feet up cross-legged in the chair and pushing off with an arm to see if it spun in circles. It totally did.

When he slowed to a stop he was facing away from Tony, so he had to grab a table and swing back around again to clarify the suggestion.

“So basically I'm covering up the fact that I want to hold him through his nightmares by making out with him on the couch?”

It sounded totally irrational, especially when he said it out loud like that. But Tony shrugged, pouring more berries out of his bag. “Sure. It's worth a shot. Everything's worth a shot, right?”

He held out the bag towards Steve and he crinkled his nose, shaking no.

“I don't know. It seems kinda immature...” he trailed off, looking down at his hands. This was Bucky Barnes, his best friend in the whole world, wasn't it kind of childish to convince him to agree to something by teasing him with his body?

A goji berry hit the side of his nose and Steve popped up, making an indignant sound and covering his nose with his hand. Before he could say anything or yell at Tony another goji berry was being thrown at his face and he barely managed to dodge it in time.

“A goji berry hit the side of his nose and Steve popped up, making an indignant sound and covering his nose with his hand. Before he could say anything or yell at Tony another goji berry was being thrown at his face and he barely managed to dodge it in time.

“C'mon, lighten up, Grandpa Rogers!” Tony chided, throwing another berry. What the fuck? The look on Tony's face was pure glee, that expression he got when his robots did something particularly extraordinary. He threw another berry and Steve batted it aside with a scowl. Tony shook his head, popping the next one in his mouth. "You're acting like you're 96.”

“I am 96,” Steve informed him dryly.

“Then for once, just maybe, you should try being 27.”

Steve stared at Tony.

Stark popped another berry in his mouth and chewed, raising his eyebrows.

He had a really fucking good point.

He was 27.

Tony must have taken his silence and stare as disagreement or offense, because he sighed and shook his head, finally getting up out of his roll-y chair and standing like an adult. He pulled the 3D tower up again, zooming in on the unfinished floor and rotating it, looking for something while Steve just kept staring at him.

“You know...I think you could really get him." Tony clicked his tongue, wiping a wall out of the hologram before turning to Steve and making a wave gesture with his hand. "Just for a few days, try it, okay? Words of an ancient proverb: I can make the bad guys good for a weekend.”

That did not sound like an ancient proverb.

I think you could really get him.
Maybe, you should try being 27.

Steve put his legs down, pushing his toes along the concrete floors to slowly scoot his chair to the table with the goji berry bag.

Stark was busy assuming Steve was pouting, or leaving, or something, because he didn't look up as Steve moved across the room. With careful, slow, planned movements he tipped the bag over into his palm, arranging the little dried berries with a fingertip, looking for the biggest one.

And then he chucked it at Tony.

He was going to be 27.

Chapter End Notes

Woohoo!

So if you're looking for the links to embedded songs those are here:
- This is Gospel - Panic! at the Disco
- When the Day Met the Night - Panic! at the Disco
- Alone Together - Fall Out Boy (The Jumpsmokers Remix)

Other songs that coincide with the chapter:
- Hurt me - The Jezables
- Ghouls - We are Scientists

So to everyone who has commented "Steve get your shit together"

Steve got his shit together

(well, like, the kissing-Bucky part. We still have a lot of problems but hey)

Thank you all so much for reading - comments and sharing are the drive of my writer's heart <3

xx
"What are you doing?"

Steve looked up under his lashes and Bucky kept his hand on the stairwell doorframe, eyebrows raised as he waited for an answer. But he didn't get a reply - instead Steve stuck out his arms, presenting the flowers to Bucky.

He stared for a few seconds, studying the bouquet without reaching for it, then looked back up at Steve and repeated his question. "What are you doing?"

"Aw, c'mon, Buck. Don't be like that."

"Be like what? You brought me flowers, Rogers, what the hell am I supposed to do with that?"

"Take them?"

Bucky threw up his hands and kicked the stairwell door open, leaving Steve to come inside for himself. It was stupid enough he knocked on the damn thing in the first place. What, so he could stand there like a moron pretending they were in some suburban movie? He fell onto a couch, groaning into his hands, and suddenly a faintly-sweet smelling bouquet was dropped in his lap. Bucky lifted his head, picking the thing up like it was poisonous, and made a disapproving sound.

Steve plopped down next to him, one hand on Bucky's cheek while he nuzzled in and pressed a soft kiss to the other cheek. Bucky grumbled and turned the open petals towards them, scanning the color palette and Steve even picked out flowers like an artist.

"You're lucky you're a good kisser," he muttered, dropping the bouquet back into his lap. And tipping sideways with the force of another supersoldier kiss to his cheek. "Why'd you get me flowers, anyhow?"

Resting his forearms on his thighs he turned his head to look at Steve, who at least had the decency to blush a little at the ridiculousness of it all. Then he shrugged, twisting his hands together and looking down in that weirdly cautious way he did sometimes. "Always wanted to. Figured I finally could."

"You've always wanted to get me flowers?"

"I did, once." Bucky's eyebrows shot up and Steve leaned back against the couch, voice barely audible as he mumbled. "Just didn't give 'em to you."

"Wait...really?"

"If you're gonna be a dick about this just forget it--"

"No, no, wait. You are so telling this story. Sit your ass down, I need to hear this." Steve crossed his arms. Bucky picked up the scented plants and waved them enticingly in front of Steve's nose. "I'll keep the flowers if you tell me?"

Blue eyes narrowed suspiciously and Bucky jumped off the couch, filled a glass with water, and dumped the thing in as is. Steve rolled his eyes and took them back out, clipping the bottoms and undoing the ribbon that held the stems together as he talked.

"Eighth grade - you'd started workin' your first job, so I'd go to that park down the street to wait for you to get off. Except you always looked so exhausted comin' home and I wanted to do somethin' to make you smile." Steve fluffed the flowers in their makeshift vase, thumb stroking a tiny delicate petal. "So I picked half the flowers in the park and bundled em up with a shoelace--"

"You asshat, you said you lost that shoelace by stepping on it!"

"Interrupting. Anyways, I got you flowers and ran to see you as fast as my stupid lungs would let me. 'Cept then I was standing outside the door with flowers for my best guy and..." He stopped, running a hand through his hair and closing his eyes and Bucky could see it - little Steve standing outside the door, bouquet of freshly picked flowers in his tiny hands, wheezing from the run - pretty face falling as he reached for the doorknob and reality hit.

Steve cleared his throat, "...and I couldn't. So I gave 'em to Ms. Sherry next door."

The tone of his voice, the way he was looking at his hands...there were times Steve's body language overruled the muscles and he was the tiny punk again, sittin' on the couch next to Bucky, stuffed inside some body that took better care of him than Buck ever could.

And it was goddamn depressing, the mirror of the past slumped beside him; that irrational hope, stubborn spark, broken heart - all still tucked inside, no matter what body he had.

And so he brought Bucky flowers.

Because he couldn't before. What a touching parallel.

"You think this is sweet, don't you?" Steve looked up, glancing from Bucky to the vase and Bucky shook his head, swooping a hand as he clarified. "Not the flowers. I'm talking about the whole thing."

That got an even more confused glance so Bucky shifted, turning his torso and sitting up straighter, his body language as accusatory as his tone.

"You think this is some sorta...romantic Shakespearean play." Soft lips parted to protest but Bucky shut him up with a hand because he wasn't done. He wasn't anywhere near done. "Best friends their whole lives, one almost dies and the other can't live without him and tries to die too."

Blue eyes narrowed but Bucky ignored them, waving a hand and continuing in his mock storytime voice. "Then they both get a 'second chance' so they play it right, fall for each other. Get to be together after decades of pining and unrequited feelings..."

Steve's expression was hard, defensive and hurt and that in itself confirmed everything Bucky said. He wasn't being malicious; just realistic. That's how Steve saw this whole thing, some mushy fairytale about flowers and yearning gazes. They'd never survive this if that's the reality Steve was pretending to live in.

With hands as gentle as his words had been harsh, Bucky took Steve's face in his hands, running his thumbs over the chiseled jaw and forcing Steve to look him in the eyes, serious and close.

"Stevie," Bucky chided softly. "This ain't some sonnet."

Blue eyes searched his, wavering between confusion, offense, and fear and this was so much more complex than Steve was pretending.

"Bucky, what're you saying?" He managed, hesitant and small and it wasn't like that.

Steve was painting their picture in pastel colors - but it'd never be them without harsh blacks and reds and grays. Bucky was only trying to change his color palette. Look at this thing without rose-colored glasses.

Don't forget what this thing was really about.

"We're not a love story, Steve." Bucky smoothed his hands down Steve's neck and shoulders, gripping his arms and holding them both stock still. "We're a war story."

Surprise flitted over sharp features, a single pause as it sank in, then Steve shook Bucky off, grabbing his hands before they could retreat and holding all four in between them, high and centered and Steve looked almost relieved. Excited, even, and it was Bucky's turn to be confused.

"It's the same thing." Steve squeezed their hands together and Bucky furrowed his eyebrows, pretty sure he'd heard wrong.

"What?"

"It's the same thing." Steve repeated, scooting half a foot closer as the eager look settled into determination. He let go with one hand to gesture grandly as he elaborated. "Love, war."

Bucky stared at him. Maybe somebody should give Steve a dictionary because Bucky was pretty sure those were antonyms.

"I'm gonna show you, Buck." He put their hands down, fingers running up Bucky's forearms as he leaned forward, mouth curling into a pretty smile. "It's the same goddamn thing. You watch."

He was still wrapping his head around whatever the hell Steve was saying when warm lips pressed against his, thrumming with energy as excited palms rubbed lines into Bucky's arms and how had that turned around on him?

It wasn't like Steve said it just to say it, either. He'd brightened all over, lighting up the way he always did when he realized something important.

He actually believed it, Steve sincerely thought...

Their mouths broke apart and wet lips puckered on the side of his mouth in a chaste, happy kiss and Bucky's brain was turning gears but he still couldn't figure out how Steve was going to show him two opposites were the same thing.

Then Steve leaned back and great, Bucky knew that face, that was the unmistakable - probably patented - Steve Rogers has a mission face.

Bucky watched with a sigh as Steve vaulted off the couch, snagged a single flower from the vase and took off with a salute.

Great.

In his attempt to make Steve understand the actual theme of their lives, he'd accidentally invoked another war.

Because that's what Steve's mission face meant. He wasn't gonna let this go, he wasn't gonna back down from the fight.

The bouquet laughed at him from its vase and Bucky reached out, running his thumb over one of the delicately soft petals, the pretty colors blinking up almost cloyingly sweet.

If flowers were the first battle?

The next assault was the exact fuckin' opposite.
It came roughly 20 hours later, so Bucky'd pushed it out of his mind and really, he hadn't expected Steve to follow up flowers with something like that.

Bucky went to the gym in the mornings, Steve knew this. And he hadn't forgotten either, because when Steve left for his run with Sam and kissed goodbye him on the nose (fuckin' sap), he explicitly said "have a wonderful workout!" with a suspiciously cheery tone.

He'd jogged down the ten flights of stairs to the gym in a tanktop and gym shorts, debating what the hell Steve could've been up to with each jolting step.

The explanation came when Bucky swung open the glass doors.

Steve was in the middle of the gym floor doing one-armed push-ups. In tight black boxer-briefs.

His life was so hard.

Literally.

"You're an asshole," Bucky commented nonchalantly, leaning against one of the padded columns to watch. Steve pushed extra hard, torso lifting a few feet off the ground as he quickly switched arms, landing on his left and tucking the right behind his back. The kind'a pushups officers do in basic camp, back in the forties.

"Don't be sore," Steve managed between heavy breaths, "Just 'cause you're...jealous."

Bucky scoffed, pushing off the wall and making his way slowly across the mat. "At that rate, you're gonna be the sore one."

"Prove it," Steve breathed, not missing a beat of the obscene up-down motion, arm straining and muscles ridiculously defined, shiny with the beginnings of a sweat sheen, the perfect gorgeous soldier.

He'd seriously been hanging out with Steve too much, because that sounded like a challenge, and who would he be to deny it? And as much as he'd love to give Steve some extra weight and do sit-ups on that gorgeous back, they could save that for a time when Steve wasn't practically naked.

There were other ways to make him exhausted.

Scooping his foot under Steve's ribs, Bucky flipped him over easily, balance shot with only one arm on the mat. The rippling back smacked the mat with an loud noise then Bucky was straddling him, pinning both arms over his head, locked fingers over strong wrists.

Steve strained up against him, lifting his head and forcing his wrists apart in attempt to break Bucky's hold, only Steve was a goddamned amateur at wrestling compared to him, so he didn't get further than an inch. He flopped his head back down on the mat, sweaty hair sticking up in a thousand directions and an amazing, fucked out grin on his face.

He liked being held down. A lot.

A mischievous smile of his own curled a corner of his mouth, because he was in a great position for revenge when he was hovering over Steve. Squeezing the wrists tighter, Bucky lowered down, mouth ghosting over Steve's, then he was grinding his ass down on Steve's hips and the sudden pressure shot through Steve like a bottle rocket and he arched up hard, spine curving and head tipped back and goddamn, was he beautiful.
The pressure against his ass was making him dizzy, the heat pressed up against him through a thin layer of boxers and fuck, fuck, Steve was keening up against him all needy and flushed and every single one of his nerve endings were on fire, a ripple up his spine and through his left shoulder, plates of his arm shuddering all the way down to his fingers closing harder around those pretty wrists.

Sweat glistened on Steve's neck and Bucky circled his hips once, biting his lip at the heat tightening his chest as Steve lost it, head thrashing to the side with a gasp, shaking and panting under him, lips parted and damp with heavy rushes of air and fuck, that was enough of that.

Bucky covered that gorgeous mouth with his, kissing the trembling lips rough and dirty. He tasted salty with sweat, pressing up against Bucky all desperate and hot with tiny puffs of staccato breaths in and out of Bucky's mouth, stealing his oxygen and god, that was fucking intense, Steve filling his lungs with air directly from his own. The world threatened to tip sideways but he couldn't afford to get lightheaded now, not when he was supposed to be exacting revenge.

He broke off before he lost his mind, feeling the separation tug deep in his chest but he forced himself up, on his knees again so the only part of their bodies touching were the cuffs of his fingers over Steve's wrists. It took a few seconds to open his eyes, get his breathing under control because fuck, he could feel Steve everywhere and he needed more, really fucking badly, and he actually had to resurface mental training techniques to keep himself from dipping back down for more.

"C'mon, Buck. C'mon," Steve panted, squirming and looking so goddamn debauched Bucky almost caved. God, Steve was all sweaty, had come in here and stripped down to just boxer-briefs to put his gorgeous body on display all for him and Bucky was gonna die.

"No," he managed, voice cracking, then he shook his head and forced himself to get a grip. And seventy years of training were apparently still good for something because it took him about five seconds before the tension bled enough to calm his voice down, steady and cocky now as he spoke again. "This is payback for interrupting my morning workout."

Steve glared up at him, biting his lip annoyedly except Bucky knew it was to entice him and that's when he made the mistake of readjusting his grip on Steve's wrists. That was the only opening he needed before Steve kicked up, wrapping one leg around Bucky's hips and then suddenly Bucky was slammed into the mat, pinned down with inescapable weight and Steve's mouth was back on his, kissing the fuck out of him.

Wet, hungry twists and darting licks of his tongue and Bucky's head was spinning, his everything was spinning and fuck fuck, training, he could do this. He could fucking fight the moans Steve was trying to tug out of his chest, he could hold himself back when Steve tugged at his lips, sliding and popping and diving back in and fuck fuck fuck, he could keep his hips from bucking up like a starved whore only god he wanted it, so fucking bad, and it was every ounce he had to keep himself from crying out and shuddering when Steve pressed their mouths so hard together they'd both bruise.

Decades of training and he was barely keeping it together, ripped apart by the fire of Steve's mouth and holding on by a fraying string, so close to giving in that he was trembling with the force of it, barely managing to keep still--

Then suddenly it was all gone and a whimper did escape his throat finally, mouth and chest and everywhere hit with cold as Steve's grounding weight disappeared. Fuck, fuck, he probably looked like a total wreck, laying on this mat and half-near crying with the effort and the twist in his chest.

"Hey, hey, are you okay?" Steve asked from next to him and god, what a fucking question that was, Bucky felt like he was inches from exploding. He glared at the gated lights on the ceiling.
"No." He grit between his teeth, heart pounding out of his chest and why the fuck had Steve stopped touching him, he wanted - needed, to do something about that but if he caved now, if he grabbed that perfect body and pressed it back to his then Steve would win.

And that was the thing about being best friends for a lifetime before they started doing...this. As fucking much as he wanted to kiss Steve? He couldn't lose a competition. Goddammit, he could not let Steve win this. It was like, embedded in him not to.

"God, Bucky, I'm sorry, I didn't think." Steve's voice sounded strangely distressed, although Bucky felt pretty damn distressed too, only what the hell was Steve apologizing for? Bucky glanced over and Steve was curled up, arm curved around his knees and the other fucking up his hair as he looked down and muttered. "Of course you wouldn't want to be held down. Fucking Hydra."

He pushed up to stand and Bucky stared at him, the words finally registering.

"Wait what?" So that's why he'd stopped? Oh, shit, must've thought Bucky's reluctance meant-- He shook his head quickly, quirking an eyebrow as he looked up with an amused twist of his mouth. "No, no, I just didn't want you to win. I'm so okay with being held down." The amusement curled up in a sidesmile but Steve furrowed his eyebrows in disbelief. Okay, he had a bit of a point. Bucky thought it over and tacked on a stipulation. "Just as long as there aren't chairs or leather involved, I'm good."

The hesitant fear was still on those pretty features so Bucky reached out, curling his right hand around Steve's ankle, forcing his attention with a sharp shake of his head. "Seriously, Steve. Don't let Hydra take this too."

That got him. The idea of Hydra still fucking them up, grip tight when it was in the past, it was over? Hydra'd already taken so much from them and Bucky meant it when he said they weren't going to take this.

Whatever this was. So they kissed now, but beyond that, he had no idea what they were supposed to be. What it meant, even, really.

Steve ran a hand through his hair, ducking his head. After a moment or two and he nodded slowly, looking Bucky over carefully. "Yeah, yeah. Okay...if you're sure."

The mood shift had given him enough time to get a grip on himself so he stood easily now, closing the step between them and tipping Steve's chin up with the side of his finger. "I'm sure. I'll let you know if it ever gets to be like...that, okay?" He gave Steve a small smile, hand sliding to cup the side of his neck. "So long as you do the same."

He'd expected it, but that didn't make it sting any less as Steve's face twisted in blatant, honest confusion. A few beats of silence, then Steve's mouth opened and Bucky's heart broke. "You've been hanging out with Sam too much." A little laugh, shake of his head. "I don't have...issues. I'm fine."

Right. He'd never heard Steve say it out loud like that, but he didn't need to. He knew how that brain worked and he'd be offended, really, that Steve thought he was too good for PTSD - but smothered Bucky about his. Except he knew it wasn't about that either. As much as he'd love to shake Steve's shoulders for being a self-deprecating dumbass, he raised an unimpressed eyebrow instead.

"So if I wanted to makeout in a pool you'd be fine with that?"

Steve huffed and looked away, the internal monologue of this is stupid as clear as if he'd said it aloud. Ever patient, Bucky cupped Steve's jaw and manually turned his face, making their eyes meet again.

"How about thunderstorms?" The blue darkened a little but Steve didn't say anything.

"Nightmares?" Bucky suggested, and that one got a flare of annoyance in response. There was no way to deny the things Bucky was saying and he could tell, that was the most frustrating part for Steve. Not the truth, but that Bucky was presenting it in a way he couldn't deny it like he'd done for months.

"The way you refuse to go into the cockpit of the quinjets?" Steve's eyes widened at that one and Bucky pursed his lips, adding a thoughtful sidenote. "Or any plane, for that matter."

"How did you--" Steve started and Bucky almost laughed. Was he about to say notice? How did Bucky Barnes notice something Steve Rogers did? Gee, it's a national mystery.

He refrained from saying, "It's my fucking job, punk," and instead cut Steve off, continuing with the mile-long list Steve didn't want to hear.

"How when you visit Peggy you can't take the train, so you sit on a public bus for three hours?"

Steve scowled. "You take the train when you visit her?"

There was a lot loaded in that question, the assumed accusation of you visit her; Steve was trying to trip him up, shove Peggy and the train-fall in his lap at once but Bucky just smiled, running his thumb along the edge of Steve's ear.

"No. But I know I'm fucked up."

And there it was. Steve either had to deny being fucked up too, which would be ridiculous considering everything they'd just said, or he'd have to admit to months of denial.

Or he could take bastard-route-number-three.

"Speaking of which, Buck. Last time I saw Peggy she told me you two had a talk? During the war?"

Bucky dropped his hand from Steve's face. The subject change was blatantly obvious, depressingly desperate, but he wouldn't force Steve to talk about this in the middle of the gym floor if he didn't want to. Instead he studied Steve's expression, looking for exactly how much he knew before carefully replying, "We did."

"About me," Steve clarified.

"Yep."

"And you said?"

Bucky snorted, taking a step backwards. "That's between me and her."

"Really?" Steve crossed his arms over his chest, all stubborn and righteous again. "Cause she seemed to think it was pretty important you tell me."

"She would," Bucky conceded, more to himself than Steve. The expectant look was waiting but Bucky ignored it, taking a few backwards steps towards the door. "But I'm not going to. Now, before we ruin a morning that started out perfectly fantastic," he gave Steve a grin and turned, looking over his shoulder for the rest of the line, "...you wanna put on some clothes and join me for He paused at the door, trying not to laugh at Steve jumping into gym shorts and throwing on a - Bucky's - black hoodie, tugging it over his head as he caught up to Bucky's side.

"Real breakfast as in not juice? We're actually eating food now?" There was a joking tone in that sweet half-smile but it was a low blow, so Bucky shoved him, swinging through the door first with a growl.

"Shut up, I'm trying." He meant it to be snarky but Steve's face suddenly went all soft, bumping up against Bucky's side with a sugar smile.

"I know. And I'm so proud of you, sweetheart."

Oh Christ. Bucky rolled his eyes and threw his arm up, looping Steve's neck in the crook of his elbow and tugging him down the way he used to when they were kids. Except this time he nosed Steve's temple, eyes closed, placing a solid kiss to the side of his head and holding him there a moment too long.

When he finally let go Steve straightened up with that sunshine smile and it wasn't Bucky's fault if he ducked his head with a smile of his own.

~~~

Natasha was waiting on their couch. That was the thing about living in the tower, there were always people invading your space because technically, it was all Tony's space.

She stood up when she saw them, and thankfully they weren't doing anything embarrassing like making out in the elevator. They were both outta breath, but that was because they'd raced up ten flights of stairs - while pushing each other down whole sets. Steve had a fading bruise on his shin and Bucky had one on his forearm and he could tell Steve's hair was fucked up, so god knows what his looked like and all in all they probably looked suspicious as hell. But it'd been an innocent game of shoving people down dangerous slopes, nothing to be giving them that look for.

"James, can I borrow your--"

"Steve, yes, you can borrow him, but you have to return him without any cracks or I charge full refund." Bucky clapped his hand on Steve's shoulder and shot them both a wide smile on his way to his room. Either Steve was seeing things way more sexually or Bucky was totally swaying his hips on the way out.

He shook his head fondly and suddenly remembered he was being stared down by Natasha, turning to her with raised eyebrows. He was pretty sure she'd almost called him Bucky's boyfriend, so it was a really good thing Buck had reflexes enough to interrupt before they had to have that conversation. Not that he didn't want to have that conversation, but.

"Nat. It's been a while, how are you doing?" Steve started towards the couch and Natasha waved a hand, cocking her head towards the elevator.

"Not as great as you, it seems. Although with bruises like that, I don't see how anyone could be." Another raised eyebrow and shit, this was totally not what it looked like. Not that it hadn't been like that earlier, down in the gym, when Bucky'd...God. Not the time to think about that. "You had coffee yet? There's a great place downtown."
Steve followed her into the elevator, wondering what the hell could be pertinent enough to discuss over coffee. He didn't have to wait long to find out; the moment they sat down in the corner booth of a shop (that was surprisingly cheery for Natasha's taste), she cut straight to the chase.

"Do you have any idea what you're doing?"

"You're a very gentle person Natasha, has anyone ever told you tha--"

"Rogers, it's a ploy. I told you he's a professional, I warned you he was putting thoughts in your head. You know you're smarter than this." She uncapped her coffee and blew on it and Steve blinked at her with a little shake of his head.

"Don't you think you're being a little paranoid?"

"What do you know about Red Room?" Steve shrugged, making a wishy-wash motion with his hand. Natasha pursed her lips and held up her thumb for number one. "First step for deep cover missions: make yourself appear the victim. Misogynistic minds do that to women all on their own, but it helps to play up confusion and dependency. What's the first thing Barnes did? Show up to your apartment bloody and needy. You know what it takes to get a ghost story to bleed?"

"He was in a messed up place--"

"Do you honestly believe that? A man who's been invincible for decades suddenly leaning on you because you 'shared a moment' on a burning helicraft during one of his kill missions? He saw an opportunity in you, and he took it."

"Natasha, this is Bucky. He's not playing me, he's been my best friend as long as I can remember. He's got his memories back, he killed all his Hydra connections."

"Step two, prove you have a common enemy." She flipped her palm out with an axiomatic expression that read hello in that terribly sassy tone. "And you can say for sure it was total elimination?"

Steve narrowed his eyes and took a sip of his coffee. "I can't imagine he'd leave any alive. You should've seen what the carnage looked like."

"I've seen him fight." Nat leaned back in the booth, arms crossing over her chest. "He's an animal."

"Steve. He's not your innocent Bucky Barnes from Brooklyn anymore." She shook her head exasperatedly and Steve stared into his cup, the taste bitter on his tongue now.

"He was never innocent, Nat. He was always...dark."

"And Hydra took that darkness and twisted it, shaped it into a guard dog. Don't -" she held up a hand to stop him and he froze, forcibly unclenching his fists under the table. "I know what you're going to say. I get it's hard to hear, but they called him Собака for a reason. You don't come back from that."

"Maybe you don't," Steve leaned forward, holding Natasha's gaze seriously. "But he's not a machine anymore. He's a human-fucking-being. Not a ghost story, or a monster. When's the last time you kissed somebody because it made you happy, Nat?"

"C'mon, Steve, that's the point! You seriously think he's seeking happiness here?"
"Right, 'cause god forbid a killer be happy?"

"You're blind to this. You don't get it - you're the in. The tool to pry open the vault. You two conveniently fall in love while one of the biggest evil super-corporations in the world decides they don't care about retrieving their deadliest weapon? Oh wait - it's because he's safe now, right? The only place in the world he could to be safe from Hydra is, of course, the famous Stark Tower. There was just nowhere else to go.

"And now he has full access to one of the most technologically advanced intelligence bases in the world. The inside scoop on SHIELD's biggest pawns, the dinner invite with the Avengers. I wonder how he could've possibly set that up?"

"It's not like that." Steve glared out the window and it was Natasha's turn to lean forward, rapping her fingernails on the table insistently.

"How do you know? Hydra hasn't attempted to come after him. He's refused to do a psych exam. Or a medical exam. Or even a debriefing over why the fuck he's here."

"He's here because of me." His voice had the edge of a challenge in it, the same tone that'd gotten him into a hundred fights before.

Except Natasha had the opposite reaction, dipping her head and softening her voice, something almost like pity. "That's what he wants you to think. That's the whole point of this."

She gestured at him and Steve ran a hand down his face. When Natasha got worried, that's when you should get the fuck out of whatever the hell you're doing. But this was Bucky. There's no way he'd be a double agent.

"There's a Red Room method, a guaranteed-results path. Ensures any victim, no matter how difficult to break." Natasha looked sorry enough that he could anticipate her next words and fuck, he wasn't sure he'd be able to hear them. He didn't have a choice though, because Natasha flicked her hair over her shoulder and opened her mouth to break his heart. "You make them fall in love with you. You get that, you have everything."

Steve tilted his head and curled one side of his mouth in a smile, the way he always did when he wanted to cry.

"Do you believe in love?" he asked softly. Natasha gave him a sad smile and weary eyes holding the reflection of a thousand stories.

"Love is for children."

He nodded, looking out the window again. "We were children together. I loved him then, and I never stopped."

"But did he love you?"

Steve closed his eyes. He'd been asking himself - how long - had mentioned it to Bucky, tried to pieces together clues. But the truth was he didn't know. Bucky refused to tell him.

"When did he start feeling this way about you? As kids? Teens? After you shot up three feet? After he broke your cheekbone with his metal fist? When his agency was tracking him down and he needed a safe place to stay?"

If Bucky didn't insist on hiding everything, Steve could answer that. But he'd been shoved off every time he brought it up. So he shook his head, giving Natasha the depressed shrug.

"He didn't say."

Another smile and Nat looked him over, studying and evaluating. If she didn't think Bucky was working for Hydra and Bucky wasn't cold to basically everyone, they could be friends. They'd talked a few times (because Bucky'd known about the kiss in the mall and Steve hadn't told him), but now that Nat laid out her opinion it was pretty clear she'd only interrogated him and thrown events to judge reactions.

How do you feel about me kissing your best friend? And by the way, are you still being brainwashed by the assholes who kept you captive for seventy years?

A surprisingly sturdy hand slipped into his, holding it tight until Steve looked up at the concerned green eyes. "Look, Rogers, I don't want you hurt. If he's hiding something, you need to know what."

He didn't want Natasha to be right. But she had a terrifyingly good point.

All the signs, they all pointed to a distrustful double agent who’d found Steve's weakness and exploited it like the professional he was.

Steve could only pray it wasn't true.

~~~

He ran into Bucky in the first hallway past the lobby.

His hair was pulled in a low bun, wisps of pieces around his face and he was carrying a small thin box under one arm.

"Hey! You and Nat missed it, Tony's setting up the neatest security net for the Tower residents and he asked if I wanted to help." Bucky stopped as he reached Steve, bouncing on the balls of his feet in excitement.

What had Nat said? Insider access to the most-advanced technological base?

"That's great, Buck," Steve managed, hating how obviously he tensed up. It was a lot to take right now, so Steve meant it when he offered a small smile and stepped aside, ending his half of the conversation.

Only Bucky was too excited to recognize the uncomfortable rejection, following Steve's step with his own and pulling him into a one armed hug, other occupied with holding the box at his side. He pressed a kiss to Steve's shoulder and Steve closed his eyes, wishing he'd had like ten minutes longer to absorb everything before this.

"Remember when Howard used to let me hang out in his lab?" Bucky lifted his head, one arm still around Steve's waist as he looked up with bright eyes. Steve smiled tightly. When Bucky'd hung out with Howard he hadn't been a deadly assassin with possible ulterior motives.

"Yeah, after you got shot? And were supposed to be invalid for a week?" He'd meant it to be a joke, that always was between them, it was their coping method.

Except this time Bucky's expression dimmed, ducking his head to look at Steve's shoes as his excited energy thrummed down into quiet seriousness. "I knew I'd heal faster than that. I should've...I shouldn't'a faked it, I should've told you." A soft breath, the metal hand on his back tightening in his shirt. "Steve, I'm sorry."

"What, a legitimate apology from a Barnes?" He teased, because that's what they did, Bucky'd would say shut up and they'd go their separate ways and Steve would have time to think.

But he didn't get the shut up back. Instead crystal eyes turned up at him and fuck, were they actually wet? Bucky had his pretty bottom lip between his teeth, all masks down, sincere and honest written into every single detail of his features.

Steve had known this face his entire life. He knew exactly what Bucky's poker face looked like, what every stage of his lying faces were. This wasn't any of them - this was honest.

If Natasha was right...if Bucky was trying to hook him?

He got Steve good.

Fuck paranoia. He was goddamn sick of second-guessing every good thing that came into his life. They'd been brought back together through the centuries and they'd finally gotten something great and Bucky was blinking up at him, teary-eyed and so sorry for not telling Steve about the serum, so sorry he didn't save them from all that pain--

Steve pulled Bucky into his chest, wrapping both arms high around his shoulders and holding him close enough to feel the patter of his heartbeat. He was so far gone. If Bucky was playing him...there was no way he could back out now. He was in this thing way too deep.

When Bucky pulled back, sniffling once and wiping an embarrassed hand down his face, Steve tucked a piece of dislodged hair behind his ear and told him to have fun with Stark; Buck gave him a little wave goodbye and turned back to the labs. Steve watched him go, memorizing the familiar gait for the thousandth time, and decided that the most honest thing Natasha'd ever told him was I only act like I know everything, Rogers.

He'd defend her to the death. She was honestly his friend - and she'd also been the one to tell him not to look for Bucky in the first place. Don't pull on that thread. It was her past experience clouding her judgement and Steve could never think less of her for that. God knows the same was the case with him.

But he didn't have to take her word as gospel either. You can't kill ideas once they're planted - he'd watch closer now, make a point to learn all the things Bucky was hiding. But he wasn't going to accuse his best friend of working with the enemy, and he sure as hell wasn't leaving him anytime soon.

In fact, he was gonna do the opposite. He was going to give Bucky every reason in the world to trust him so he could know all those secrets, so they could put the entire thing behind them.

He'd tuck the paranoia as deep inside him as it'd go, smile bright over the top so no one'd ever know.

Just one more reason to give it their everything, right?

~~~

It'd become almost regular, now, waking up screaming. Or silent-crying, or sweating, or gasping and jerking upright. Or not going to sleep at all, that was pretty regular too.

That didn't make it any easier.
Especially since Bucky'd called him out on it, claiming it was PTSD or something. After everything Bucky'd been through, Steve didn't deserve to have nightmares at all, let alone full-blown issues like trauma.

The darkness of his room was the same blackness as the back of his eyelids, the same darkness as that black mask that'd been shoved over his face ten seconds ago, cutting off his air and suffocating him as he scrambled against the hard plastic--

Steve shoved upright, pressing his back against the solid headboard and drawing his knees into his chest, covering his face with both hands and forcing himself to breathe normally. Fill his lungs, empty them, inflation, deflation. Things Bucky'd coached him through a hundred times; and the words in his head were in Bucky's voice, the familiar concerned tone and gentle coaxing.

The door to his room pushed open and then it wasn't the comforting voice in his head anymore, it was the weight compressing the other side of his bed, five warm fingers encircling the top of one of his knees. Bucky refused to touch him with the metal hand post-nightmare after Steve'd flinched that one awful time.

"Hey, you here with me?" A whisper against his ear and his shoulders dropped, slippery sheets sliding him down the headboard into a tighter ball. He didn't mean to let out the whimper, only the sound came from somewhere in him he didn't have control over and then heavy arms were around him, pulling him all the way down to the bed.

Bucky was wearing a hoodie, and a glove, and Steve felt goddamned awful about that but he didn't have full control after waking up like this and fuck, he wanted to tell Bucky he was sorry but he was afraid of the noises that'd escape his mouth if he pried his lips apart.

"Shh, shh. I'm right here, babydoll," Bucky murmured into the darkness, running the leather glove over Steve's sternum soothingly. He figured when we were in bed together...all sweaty and outta breath...it was gonna be for a really different reason.

Puffs of breath tingled at the top of his spine, a steady, slow rhythm that was nothing like the way Steve was breathing and he had to focus on that and he'd be fine, he'd pull himself together.

It wasn't fair doing this to Bucky.

How could Steve take his nights away too?

It took another three minutes, but he got ahold of himself. By the time Bucky was running gloved fingers over his ribs, Steve's back leg trapped under his, the darkness had faded enough that the terror in his veins was safely threaded out. It always drained him, made him boneless and exhausted, never wanting to crawl out of bed again, and once he hit that point, that's when Bucky usually smoothed a hand through his hair and left.

"You know," Bucky pondered into the darkness, running the leather glove over Steve's sternum soothingly. "I figured when we were in bed together...all sweaty and outta breath...it was gonna be for a really different reason."

Steve couldn't help it, a laugh escaped his chest and he could feel the smile in the kiss pressed to his neck that time. It was such a Bucky thing to say, only it'd never meant anything before. Except now, now feelings had been revealed and it wasn't a joke anymore. Not in that way. It was a tease, but it wasn't...impossible. Which made it a hell of a lot less depressing than usual.
He lifted his head from the soft sheets, rolling backwards enough so Bucky could scoot out of the way and let him roll onto his back. He got a grumble of complaint, then the glove was cupping his face and Steve blinked into the darkness, barely catching the outline of Bucky's features.

The leather thumb brushed over his cheek and he couldn't have felt it through the leather and metal, but somehow he still knew... so Bucky leaned forward and kissed the tears from his cheeks.

Steve's eyes slipped closed and the soft presses against his face didn't stop, soaking warmth and safety into his skin, and then the world wasn't palpable anymore, he was drifting to some place where everything was sleep-soft and easy and smelled of Bucky.

He fell asleep while Bucky was still kissing over his forehead.

Thankfully, he woke up first. But god knows why he opened his eyes to a peaceful face smushed against one of his pillows, dark hair fanning against white, lips slightly parted and arms curled under the sturdy chest.

Why was Bucky in his bed? Why hadn't he left?

He always left.

Steve held his breath and rolled off the side of the mattress, landing silently on his feet and padding for the door as quiet as possible. Bucky must not've slept in a while, otherwise he'd have woken already. But his body was more exhausted than his mind was alert, so Steve snuck out of his bedroom without waking the snoozing assassin.

He'd rather have stayed, but that wasn't an option. God knows Bucky would either freak or bolt the moment he realized they'd fallen asleep in the same bed now that they didn't have to (Steve had no idea why - they'd shared fine in the past, what the hell was the problem with it now?) and he was sparing Bucky the trouble. Leaving first so Bucky didn't have to.

And in the process, saved his own heart from breaking the way it always did when Bucky left. Bucky wouldn't care about waking up alone, but it ripped something up in Steve he didn't have a right to keep whole with hope in the first place.

Really, Steve was desperately reaching for him with no idea of what Bucky wanted. But he was determined to find out. To prove Bucky that they could be happy - more than that. They had the right to be happy.

"You seem awful chipper this morning," Sam huffed, pumping his legs and arms while Steve jogged lightly beside him.

"Hmm? Yeah. Guess I am." A smile curled his mouth up and Sam gave him a suspicious side-glance.

"Barnes alright?"

"Yeah. Yeah, he's great. I mean...things aren't perfect. And I still don't know where we stand on. Well. Anything. But he smiles now, and he kisses me sometimes and I definitely can't," Steve sucked in a breath, picking up the pace a little to push Sam further, "-complain about that."

"No you cannot," Sam agreed with a smile and quick shake of his head, wheezing a tad as he forced his body to match Steve's pace. "You - agh - you remember that one conversation we had...in that restaurant in Germany?"

Steve furrowed his eyebrows and Sam made a cross face, apparently hoping Steve would pick up the talking at that point to save Sam's breath.

"The one-- where you said Bucky'd never. Like you like that?"

"Oh yeah. That conversation. Is this your I told you so?" Steve grinned and widened his strides, making Sam curse before switching into a sprint to keep up.

"It's a little...more effective when I can. Fuck. Breathe."

Steve laughed, taking a few jolting strides to slow back down to an easy jog. Sam nearly collapsed with relief, falling into step beside him and wiping sweat off his forehead, flicking his hand to splatter the drops on Steve.

"Eww," he complained, shoving Sam's shoulder lightly, except it still almost made him wipe out and by the time he caught his balance again Steve'd stopped jogging, hand on his stomach as he laughed at Sam trying to breathe, hands on his knees and gasping.

"You're a lot more of an asshole than that museum makes you look," Sam gasped and Steve shook his head, glancing up at the sky and smiling. It was nice out today. Maybe he'd take a walk with Bucky in Central. "Speakin'a which..."

Sam straightened up, hand on his torso as he waved a hand to get Steve's attention. "If Barnes is in a good mood, I've got somethin' I wanted to talk about with him."

Steve shook his head, both hands on his hips as he raised disapproving, amused eyebrows at Sam.

"I'm pretty sure the I'll kill you if you break my best friend's heart' speech doesn't work on deadly assassins who can backflip-dodge your machine-gun bullets and kick your ass nine ways to Sunday."

"Haha, very funny. It's actually not about you, surprise of all surprises. Somebody wants to talk about something other than Captain America..."

"And you wonder where I get my sarcasm from," Steve shot back, bumping into Sam's side as they started back towards the tower.

"No way, man. You had that way before I was in the picture."

Steve rolled his eyes, but that much was true. Honestly, though, it kinda made Steve curious. What would Sam want to talk to Bucky about that wasn't Steve? It was kinda...all they had in common.
God knows Bucky wouldn't do a psych eval, and Steve doubted Sam was dumb enough to ask again.

Which meant it was something Steve had no idea about.

So it couldn't be good, could it?

~~~

"I've actually never been in here," Bucky mused, stepping in behind Sam and glancing around the room. It was tidy, small enough to feel cozy but sparse enough to seem decently-sized. Brown crown-moulding and a wooden desk, everything else standard whites and blues.
"Well I don't live in here anymore, so feel free if you want a change of scenery." Sam waved a hand around and Bucky snorted.

"It's twelve feet from my room, the scenery can't change that much."

Sam shrugged and pulled the chair from under the desk, scooting it next to the bed. A sound at the door made them both turn their heads, where Steve was standing in the doorway pointing over his shoulder.

"Hey I'm gonna go find Clint, so follow the smell of pizza and dogs if you need me." He gave a little wave and disappeared, and that was the first clue this was definitely not going to be the good kind of talk.

Well, the first clue was Sam coming back with Steve from his run and asking if he could talk to Bucky privately, but if Steve was leaving their floor altogether? Might as well get it over with.

Bucky plopped down on the edge of Sam's former bed, rubbing his hands together and letting the serrations sliding across the palm of his right hand calm his heartrate.

"So. What did I do?" He glanced up, tucking a piece of hair behind his ear, and Sam swiveled the chair around, sitting down on it and crossing his arms over the back of it.

"Right to it?"

"Sure. Unless you wanna talk about Rogers first, I've got about a million embarrassing stories you could hold over his head."

Sam laughed, eyes lighting up and shifting to get more comfortable. "Man, that sounds great. I'd definitely love to hear those sometime. You should stop by more often - we're both friends with Steve, I'm sure we've got plenty in common."

"Actually I think we're polar opposites," Bucky admitted and Sam smiled with a contemplating sound, "But that could actually be a good thing."

"Yeah. And I'd like to see if Steve's stories are anywhere near the real thing."

"Steve talks about me?"

"Uh. Yeah, all the time. You're kinda his..." Sam waved his hand, waiting for Bucky to fill in the blank. He shrugged, looking away and pretending to study the framed picture on the wall.

"We haven't talked about it," he finally filled in, glancing back at Sam. But his expression didn't crease with worry or flatten with judgement; it was as open as ever, nonchalant but not uncaring.

"Cool. Whatever floats both your boats, you know? It's none 'a my business. That is, unless you hurt him--"

The over-exaggerated tone was obviously a joke and Bucky snorted, shaking his head because they both knew that conversation was useless. How many people had Bucky threatened or killed for hurting Steve? It was a mute point. That is...unless that's what Sam'd come to say?

"Uh. Is that what you wanted to talk about...?" He asked hesitantly, rolling his lips in and glancing up with an apologetic look.

"Oh, no. No worries, man. I know you've got him. You always have."
"Except when I was trying to kill him. Then you had his six. I never, uh. Thanked you for that, so. Seriously, it means a lot to know that if I went off the rails, he's got somebody else."

Because really, Bucky'd spent months being pissed at Steve for making him feel this way. And years with muddled memories wishing he could get rid of the ghost with the blue eyes. And now that the ghost was pressing kisses to his lips, everything was a thousand times more complicated and nothing was answered. So yeah, going off the rails didn't seem that far out. And he couldn't let Steve get hurt if that happened.

"Yeah." Sam nodded, biting the inside of his cheek and looking down. Steve'd told him about Riley - Bucky knew exactly how it was, finding out your best friend died. So it was a hard topic for everybody.

"See? This is why we should be friends." Bucky reached over to nudge Sam's arm and he lifted his head, mouth turning up in a one-sided smile as he nodded slowly.

"Yeah, yeah. We should. Which, actually, brings me to my point. I know your birthday isn't for a week--"

"Ugh how do you know that?"

"Dude, everyone who's taken sixth grade history knows that. Anyways, that's not what I came to talk about either. See, I got you something for your birthday, and this is gonna spoil it but I don't really care, so." Bucky shrugged in agreement and Sam continued, "A lot of soldiers who come back already have 'em for comfort, but I know you don't, so I figured I'd get 'em for you."

Sam leaned sideways and dug a hand into his jeans pocket. Bucky knew what is was the moment the silver chain fell between Sam's fingers, the familiar clink of metal on metal.

He didn't know what to say. Thankfully, Sam to be expecting that, holding his hand out and dropping the two metal plates out of his hand, letting them dangle by the chain in front of Bucky. He lifted his right hand slowly, wanting to feel them against a hand that'd actually held dogtags before.

The cool metal settled against his palm, an extension of the steel fused to his body, the first metal he'd ever been attached to. Sam dropped the chain and it slinked into Bucky's hand, rattling softly as he ran a finger over the raised words, the inscription he used to trace back in the war.

BARNES, JAMES B 32557038 T42 43 A P

That's who he was.

Who are you?

Rewind.

Nothing.

A soldier.

James.

Buchanan.
Barnes.

He pressed his thumb into the letters, like maybe if he could engrave the name into his skin he'd never forget it again.

"You-- thank you." Bucky closed his eyes and wrapped his fingers around the tags, reveling in the bite against his palm. He'd never thought about it, hadn't considered the absence of cold weight against his chest. Identifier. "I...I didn't even know I was missing them."

"Most people don't." Sam propped his chin on his forearms, watching Bucky as he ran the chain between his fingers, clutching his fist tight and releasing it open again, looking the necklace over. Hydra'd taken his, the same time they'd taken that drawing and his coat, burned it all to ash.

"And thanks for not...not giving them to me in front of everyone, that. I, uh. It's just really personal." Bucky glanced up and Sam nodded silently. As much as he wanted the chain around his neck again, he didn't want the emotions that'd come with it. He'd do it later, by himself. So instead he held them, turning the tags over in his palm.

"It's actually not...I mean, I wanted you to have the tags, but it's not what I wanted to talk about."

"Oh?" Bucky didn't look up, running his fingernail along the curved edge of metal instead. Nothing Sam said was going to surmount past this anyways.

"Yeah. I went to the Smithsonian exhibit a few weeks ago," Sam cleared his throat, maybe nervous? before continuing, "...and they got something wrong."

Bucky snorted, glancing up with an amused smile. "You mean like how I was simultaneously born in both 1917 and 1916? I'm sure you can imagine how confusing that was, pre-memory-restoration. No wonder I was messed up."

He was expecting a laugh, or at least a smile, but Sam just looked at him. Bucky shifted his weight uncomfortably, tightening his fingers around the individual bubbles of the chain. But he didn't get an answer, only a patient expression as Sam waited for him to cut the bullshit. Finally Bucky sighed, pushing an aggrieved hand through his hair.

"Fine, what is it?"

The brown eyes were looking at him cautiously - gaging a reaction? Why? What could possibly be that--

"Your part of the exhibit?" Sam straightened up, voice softening as he pinned Bucky with his gaze and said the four words Bucky was praying he'd never hear aloud. "It says you enlisted." The colour drained from his face.

"That's not what your serial number says." The words were low, half-asking a question that clearly, he already knew the answer to. Then his fists were curled tight enough to hurt and the metal in his right hand would get crushed, if he didn't let go.

He shoved the dogtags in his pocket, tucking the etched name and number out of sight.
The numbers Zola used to make him mumble on repeat.

The fucking number that gave him away.

Obviously Sam worked with vets, 'course he saw Bucky's serial and recognized the numbers - it wasn't the combination they gave the enlisted, it was the bastard number given to the soldiers who had to be drafted, dragged off their home turf before they agreed to suit up, to all the people like Bucky who'd never wanted it, who'd gotten a letter in the mail with their name and words to end a life.

No one was ever supposed to know.

It was the best thing that exhibit ever did for him, those words etched into the glass. Enlisted. It couldn't be any other way, not with who his best friend was.

"Steve doesn't know, does he?" Sam's voice shook the air again and Bucky parted his lips, staring at the ground and wondering if he could sink into the floor if he focused enough.

Of course he hadn't told--

"What don't I know?" Interrupted a voice from the doorway and both their heads snapped up. Steve was leaning in the doorway. He pursed his lips, looking between Sam and Bucky with his arms crossed over his chest. "I came back to get something, caught the tail-end of 'Steve doesn't know.'"

He stepped into the room, moving big and graceful and powerful and Bucky wanted to shrink away, crawl under the carpet and never face the light again. "So what don't I know?"

Steve sat down on the bed beside him, pinning sky-cut eyes and Bucky had to look away, desperately turning to Sam for help.

"He deserves to know," Sam offered quietly and hot tears welled up in Bucky's throat because yeah, he fucking knew that, he should've told Steve the moment he got the letter.

Better now than never, right?

Actually, scratch that, he'd much rather have this conversation never.

He could leave. Storm out, lock the door to his room, they'd let him go. It's what he wanted to do...escape the situation and he didn't have to deal with it.

But Steve was doing so much, trying to make this work, whatever the fuck this was and hell if Bucky was going to be the weak one.

Flailing in the dark for a maritime star. Praying it wouldn't blink out.

Blink.

"I never joined the army."

There, said it, done, he could go now--

Steve's hand landed on his arm and Bucky flinched, falling weakly back down to the bed. He didn't want to see the look on Steve's face, the hate and confusion and betrayal.

"What do you mean? Buck? I fought beside you, watched you ship out--"
"I was drafted," he interrupted flatly.

The hand on his arm fell away.

Silence.

Tick tick tick and Bucky could count the seconds from the patter of his pulse, and ten, fifteen, twenty, maybe he'd be the first person to count to infinity, and then

"What?" Quiet. Calm. Too calm. Way way way too calm, but hey, at least he hadn't walked out yet, right? He was saving that for later. Probably after he had the satisfaction of seeing Bucky cry. Wouldn't be long now, not with the way his throat was closed and his eyelashes were cold, clumped together, bottom lip wavering no matter how much he bit down.

Another ten seconds, god knows how long, and then he couldn't.

"I'm sorry," he broke, curling in against the light except the hands on his face had barely covered him, he'd barely pulled his knees into his chest before there was a heavy hand on his shoulder and one on his thigh, prying him back apart before he could become a whimpering ball and Bucky was so surprised he pulled his hands off his face and blinked at Steve, two fat tears rolling down his cheeks.

"No. We need to talk about this." Steve was looking at him with that face they'd given him the title Captain for. He was so goddamned pure, beautiful, good, noble and honorable and fuck, how was Bucky supposed to look him in the eye and admit he'd been a coward all along?

"First of all, why the hell is this the first I'm hearing of this? Are you...are you being serious? I mean, Buck. You've gotta be...this can't. Okay. Um. If you really....when the hell'd you get a letter? 'Cause I sure never saw one. And why'd you tell me you enlisted if you were...

"A sunshine patriot?" Bucky asked with a self-depricating smile, wiping a quick hand over his face.

"C'mon, you know that's not--"

"That's exactly what you were gonna say," he bit back, jumping to his feet so he could sneer right in Steve's face. Letting the red take over his veins because it hurt less to shout than to cry. "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine--"

"I know how the goddamn quote goes, Bucky." Then Steve was standing too, a few inches taller than him and like he was gonna let Steve use the fucking serum to win this fight.

He shoved Steve back on his ass with his metal fucking arm, two could play that game, and crossed his arms over his chest, leaning forward enough that Steve was forced to look up at him.

"Then you know exactly what people used to call the soldiers who got drafted. Why'd you think I never told you? So I didn't have to see the disgust on your face when you found out I wasn't the 'brave, courageous man' you always thought I was!"

"Seriously? Seriously, you're gonna pin this on me?"

"Oh, like you don't hate me right now?"

"I don't! I'm pissed," Steve bit back and Bucky threw up his hands because wasn't that the whole point, then Steve put a palm up to stop him and continued, "-that you didn't think you could tell me you got drafted into the goddamned army. That you felt like you had to lie to...to keep my respect for "What, like you respect me right now? No, don't answer that. I don't wanna fuckin' hear it out loud. If I did, I would've told you instead of burning the fucking letter."

"Oh, stop with the dramatics, would you? You seriously thought I'd feel better thinking you joined the army for me? I've lived with the guilt of that for years, Buck. I kept telling myself I pressured you to sign up, that Azzano, Zola, the fucking Winter Soldier never would've happened if I hadn't kept pushing you to fight. That it was my fault everything happened to you and you knew, you knew," and Steve was on his feet again, jabbing a finger in Bucky's chest and forcing him a step backwards, ",how guilty I felt for that because I told you and you just let me live with it? When all along it would've happened anyways? Are you fucking kidding me."

They were both staring, winded and emotional to all hell, and Bucky was so goddamned pissed, he could feel it in his bones and fuck. Fuck, he knew he was pushing that outwards on Steve, who sure as hell didn't deserve to take the brunt of Bucky's shame.

That's what it was, that's why he was pissed, at himself for refusing to sign up, for having to wait until he was dragged overseas when the sweetest, most honorable person he knew would do anything humanly possible - did do anything humanly possible - to get one minute of fighting for his country.

So yeah, he'd never told Steve. Because it was about more than what Steve thought about him.

It was what Bucky thought about himself.

He couldn't look Steve in the eyes, so he stared at the wall over his shoulder instead. "I couldn't...I couldn't tell you because. Because I don't deserve any of the- the honor and credit they all try to give me when I wasn't even." He sucked in a breath, closing his eyes so they didn't well up with tears again. "I wasn't even brave enough to go over there on my own. And. And you were so small and s-sick and you wanted to fight so badly you'd do anything and I couldn't bring myself to enlist, I couldn't bear to--"

A choked sound escaped his mouth and he ducked his head to his chest, taking a step back to sag against the wall. "I couldn't imagine..."

"What, Bucky? You couldn't imagine what?" It wasn't yelling anymore. It wasn't soft, more like...tired. Steve sounded exhausted. Done.

A week ago, he never would've been able to answer that. But. But Steve had kissed him and Steve cared about him, more than his second in command, more than even best friends, and. and.

He may not know what that meant or why Steve was doing any of this, but they'd kissed and somehow, that changed something. He didn't know what it changed or why Steve kept kissing him, but for some reason when he opened his mouth, the words didn't freeze in his throat.

"I couldn't imagine leaving you." He bit his bottom lip, shaking his head as tears prickled the corners of his eyes, trembling hands curled into weak fists. "I couldn't imagine having to live without you, Stevie, I'm. I'm so sorry, I needed you too much..."

Callused hands curled over his, tugging him off the wall.

"C'mere," Steve ordered, voice rough and gravely as he bundled Bucky into his chest, one hand pressed hard against the back of his head, the other arm barred over his shoulder as he held Bucky close and rocked them gently.
He clutched Steve's shirt in his hands, arms parallel with Steve's back and held on as tight as he knew how.

There'd been a time he hadn't felt emotions at all.

He couldn't decide if this was better or much much worse.

"You two okay?" Sam asked quietly from the side of the room and Bucky choked a sudden laugh, turning his face into Steve's shirt.

"Ohmygod, we forgot about Sam," he mumbled apologetically against the warm cotton and Steve finally seemed to catch on, hand on the back of his head leaving to probably cover his mouth in surprise.

Bucky lifted his head, resting his chin on Steve's shoulder to look behind them at Sam, who was still sitting in his chair, had seen that entire argument and Bucky was probably all puffy and red and he could still feel the glittering cold on his cheeks and nobody'd ever seen him like this except Steve, so the club of witnessing trash Bucky Barnes just expanded by one.

"I'm so sorry you had to see that," he winced, jaw clicking weirdly from keeping his chin on Steve's shoulder. Sam put a single hand in the air, mouth curling up a little on one side.

"Hey, man. It's all good. At least now I know how supersoldiers work through their problems. A lot of shoving and a lot of yelling."

Bucky snorted, tucking his face back down against Steve's collarbone and then Steve was turning them, looking over Bucky's back now as he mouthed something at Sam, except Bucky could really care less because Steve was holding him, hadn't left after he found out what a fuck-up Bucky was.

He'd ruined Steve's shining, reflective image of him, had wiped it black with truth from long before he killed people, and Steve was still here.

He had no idea why Steve hadn't left. And he was much too selfish to ask.

~~~

It was raining.

He couldn't remember the last time he'd sat and watched it rain.

The window at the far end of the art room, after stepping over the cacophony of paintings and supplies, had a window seat, a long, wide one that fit him easily with room to spare.

Steve sat on the windowsill with a mug of tea and watched it rain. He used to love this before the serum. Sometimes Bucky'd sit on the other end and Steve would watch the reflection of rain in those crystal eyes instead.

One thing that hadn't changed, over all this time, was the way the rain fell on the fading dusk of New York.

The rain hadn't lied to him about one of the most important--
Bucky'd been the one to bring up they were a war story. War stories started with letters. Drafting and enlistment letters. Red and blue. Bucky'd started the most influential chapter of their lives with the biggest lie imaginable.

Was this it? Was this the one thing he'd been hiding all these years? Was this why he refused to talk about how he felt when they were kids? Was this the big secret Natasha wanted him to find out?

All that talk of spies and trust. Steve wanted to be trusting, he did. This was Bucky. And he'd been lying for how long?

But the rain cleared his mind. Let him think. And he was going to prove that even this -- this -- was part of their story. It all was. He only had to figure out how to say it.

The door creaked open slowly, a silent foot touching hesitantly inside. The nervous features asked a single silent question. Steve nodded and turned back to the rain.

It was hard to be graceful when climbing over a mess of canvases and paint but somehow Bucky managed it. He really was an assassin after all. Steve scooted one leg up, bending at the knee so Buck would have room on his half of the bench. His other foot was on the floor beside the windowseat, propping him up and out of the way for Bucky to sit.

Steve just hadn't expected him to choose there.

Hesitantly, propped a few inches away, looking over his shoulder for permission first. Steve sat his mug down and opened his arms, waiting for Bucky to lean back against his chest before he wrapped his arms around Buck's torso, hands sliding into the hoodie pocket over his stomach. Bucky pulled up both his legs, feet flat on the windowseat as he settled back against Steve, covering Steve's hands with his own.

The rain was pattering softly against the window, wind blowing it at a rougher angle than before. But it was still beautiful, always was, from angrily pattering to a gentle drizzle.

The heavy weight on his chest was grounding, warm. Everything he hadn't had the last time he'd done this - sitting alone on a windowsill a few months after waking up, staring at the foreign outside world and wishing he had his best friend beside him.

But those dark days? That was the worst time in Steve's life. Those months after Bucky died, after Steve's existence was cut in two. And maybe Bucky lied to him, maybe he hurt Steve - a lot - but he was here. In Steve's arms, the strong muscles of his back solid against Steve's chest. How could...how could he stay pissed? In the end, it didn't matter. What mattered was they had each other now.

He tightened his arms around Bucky's torso, pulling him in closer and eliciting a soft sound as he pressed his nose to the side of that beautiful face. Crystal eyes slipped closed and Steve opened his mouth, breathing soft over Bucky's ear for a few beats before he brushed his mouth close, placing the words right onto heated skin.

"I forgive you," Steve whispered, and Bucky deflated against him, going soft and pliant with relief as he turned towards the window, reaching his head up to kiss under Steve's chin. He ran his fingers through thick, long hair, carefully untangling knots as Bucky curled closer against his chest, knees knocked over and pressed to the cold glass as he gripped one hand tight in Steve's shirt, head falling to Steve's collarbone.

The rain settled, quiet steady bullets from the sky, splashing on pavement far far below. Two boys sat on a windowsill, one cradling the other in his arms, holding each other close as water poured down outside.

It was probably twenty minutes later that Bucky fell asleep on him, exhaustion making his eyes droop and slide shut, breathing slow and deep as he let himself drop off in the safety of Steve's arms. He ran his hands carefully over Bucky's hair, the sides of his face, smoothing down his torso and his sides, securing warmth around him while he rested.

A few months ago, Bucky hadn't slept at all, not until he came stumbling into Steve's apartment with wary eyes, jumping up and clutching a knife the moment he awoke. And now Bucky was passed out on his chest, fingers loosely tangled in his clothes and body curled as tight to Steve as he could manage.

It was an hour later that Steve threatened to fall asleep too; shifting carefully, avoiding the mug of tea as he slipped off the windowsill, he lifted Bucky up bridal style, tipping him inwards and turning his face against Steve's chest. Carrying him all the way across the apartment to his bed.

A few years ago, Bucky'd been shot in the thigh and Steve had carried him out of the city exactly like this, climbing over twisting roots in the woods and soaking his Captain's uniform as he waded through a river, looking down at his pale best friend with his heart in his throat.

He didn't let himself fall asleep beside Bucky this time. He wouldn't be able to take the heartbreak of waking in the morning alone.

~~~

He woke up alone.

It was his fault; he'd never told Steve he could stay.

He shouldn't care.

But he felt empty. Hollowed out. Missing.

He couldn't hate Steve for not staying. But he could hate himself for making Steve think he couldn't.

And he hated himself the most for wanting Steve to stay so goddamn badly.

When Steve came to check on him at eleven the next morning, Bucky was staring at the ceiling, lips red from how much he'd bitten them in attempt not to call out Steve's name.

"Buck?" The door shut softly behind him and Steve sat down on the edge of his bed, stroking one hand through Bucky's hair. He couldn't help it. He turned into the touch, nosing at Steve's hand with his eyes screwed shut. "You feelin' okay?"

"Fine," he choked out, keeping his eyes shut so he didn't see Steve's stupid face. He wanted to grab that jaw and kiss him until he bled.

"You mind if I sit awhile?"

Yes, conditioned training formed on his lips.

"No," his mouth answered for him. Bad dog. Steve scooted up on his bed, laying beside him and stroking his fingers down the back of Bucky's neck. They were so warm and solid and fuck, Bucky wanted them tangled in his hair.
With his eyes shut, he could keep the vibrations down his spine minimized, he could keep Steve out of his goddamned head--

And then damp lips were on his. Bucky's lips parted in ecstasy and the chaste kiss of comfort was suddenly Steve's tongue sliding into his mouth, violent shivers running through his bones and his body pulled itself closer to Steve's without his permission and then a warm hand was pressing hard against his lower back, holding Bucky up against his hips and every nerve ending in his body was warning him, bright red flashing signs off off off

don't touch don't touch

his senses overloaded with every instinct to stop, poison seeping into his mouth from Steve's, toxic every place they touched and he needed--

The Winter Soldier did not need.

Only now he needed too much.

Consumed, buried so deeply in his veins he could devour Steve from the inside out and this, this was what he'd been worried about, this was so much more than comfort and crushes, this was addiction and pain and he wanted to bar his metal arm against Steve's throat just to hear him choke Bucky's name and--

No one'd told him the serum amplified everything. Including emotions. He'd been repressing them from the moment he'd gotten drugged up in Azzano. And now that Steve was trying to open

the floodgates?

"Hey, hey," Bucky mumbled into Steve's mouth, getting a metal hand between them and shoving Steve gently upwards. Their mouths broke apart with a twist to Bucky's gut and he managed a breathy, barely-there smile up at Steve because it was the only way not to scream or pull him back in. "Breakfast?"

Steve groaned, dropping his forehead to Bucky's chest. "Can't you eat later?"

"No. I'm hungry." He ran a controlled hand through Steve's blonde hair, watching with careful eyes to be sure it didn't shake. He was hungry, but not for breakfast. He needed air before he lost the last grip he had on these tumultuous waves inside him.

A heavy sigh shoved hot air against his chest - Bucky closed his eyes and grit his teeth, then Steve's head lifted and he smoothed out every tense muscle in his face, looking down with patient, sculpted softness. He should be on Broadway.

"Do you want grapefruit? Pepper said something about a really good--"

"Sure. Great. Cut it up for me?" So I can have three seconds to breathe without inhaling fumes?

"And he thinks just 'cause I kiss him now I'm his servant," Steve grumbled, inching forward to press another short peck to Bucky's lips, sticky and tugging then he was climbing off and Bucky was sucking freezing air into his lungs and his room was empty, door wide open.

Fuck.

"Get up. We're going out."

"What?" Bucky looked up as Steve smacked his foot, raising his eyebrows and gesturing hurriedly at Bucky.

"C'mon. Get dressed. We're going out."

"Where?" Bucky looked back down, uninterested. Steve grabbed his foot and pulled.

The squawk that came out of his mouth was not his, he'd claim that to this day. But dumped on his ass on the living room floor with Captain America standing over him with his hands on his hips and that patriotic-ass look on his face?

Bucky got off the floor and put on nicer clothes.

"Do people even do that anymore?"

"Course they do. A lot might've changed, but going out for drinks isn't one of them."

He glared out the tinted window. It wasn't that it didn't sound like fun, it was just that...everything lately? Bucky sucked in a breath and glanced back at Steve.

"Why are you doing this? Like...all of it. Flowers, the gym, taking me out drinking..."

Steve shrugged, eyes on the road. "Things have been hardcore lately. I figured we could use some fun."

That wasn't what he meant. But he wouldn't ask again.

"...it's not that easy, Steve. All the crap doesn't go away if you ignore it."

"No, it doesn't." Blue eyes glanced over from the other side of the car, all sweet and serious at the same time. "But the bad times don't have to be over for the good times to begin."

"Steve," Bucky whispered into his ear. "Steve, is this dancing? I don't think this is dancing."

"You're the dance expert, not me."

"Steve," Bucky tugged his sleeve. "Steve, I really don't think this is our scene."

Steve raised his eyebrows and knocked back the shotglass the bartender slid him. He didn't feel the burn, but he needed to do something with his hands.

The bodies on the dancefloor were basically...having sex with their clothes on.

The music was so fucking loud, he didn't care how old he sounded saying that.
"You can get a little tipsy, right?" He shouted over the bass, leaning closer to Bucky's stool. Bucky looked between him and ridiculous supply of alcoholic beverages behind the bar.

"A little." Bucky made a face and Steve lifted his hand, calling the bartender over.

"Give me ten of the strongest stuff you've got."

He got a really concerned look, then he slid Stark's card across the bar and there were no more problems after that.

Steve laughed as Bucky made a horrified face at the greenish liquid the bartender plopped down on the slick black surface. He made a worse face after tipping it back, but then he was reaching for the next one and Steve leaned on the bar, propping his head in his hand as he watched Bucky grimace his way through the drinks.

They'd had some bad experiences with drinking since Azzano, but Steve was sober and on red alert; the slight chance of an episode was worth getting Bucky to loosen up for the first time since their roadtrip. It was killing him, watching how much Bucky beat himself up over everything.

You know what he needed? Bucky Barnes needed to dance.

Ten apparently terrible drinks later and a vodka to wash it down - Russia, god - and Bucky's eyes were a little brighter, looking over the squirming bodies on the dancefloor with genuine curiosity instead of disgust. Steve slid off his barstool and scooted up to Bucky's side, leaning close to his ear so Bucky could hear him over the blaring music.

"You wanna dance?"

"C'mon, Stevie, you know we ca..." Bucky trailed off, turning in his seat slowly to look at Steve with wide eyes. "There's guys on that dancefloor. Together."

Steve stuck his tongue in his cheek, biting back his laughter at the look on Bucky's face. "Yes, Buck. There are."

"So we could...you and me..."

"Yep." Steve popped the 'p,' leaning in close enough to make Bucky go cross-eyed looking at him. "We can."

Another glance at the dancefloor, then the DJ and the rest of the room, and Bucky turned to him again. "It's dark enough in here, flashy lights and everything, no one's recognized you yet."

" Entirely anonymous," he confirmed. Bucky blinked, staring at Steve like he was something out a gold mine. Then there was a gloved hand squeezing his and Steve jolted as Bucky jumped off the stool and started towards the dancefloor.

They weaved between sweaty, scantily-clad bodies until a spot in the middle of the floor opened up, the beat of a new song started up. It didn't sound like a real instrument, but then Bucky's arms were wrapping around his neck and he was swaying his hips tentatively back and forth so Steve was definitely not complaining.

"C'mon, put your hands on my waist," Bucky breathed into his ear and that was it, there went any bit of resolve Steve had.

His hands settled on the light curve of Bucky's waist for about three seconds before he decided that one of them had to adapt to this century sometime. Might as well be here.

With a quick shove to Bucky's right side and equal tug to his left, Steve spun Bucky around and pulled their bodies flush with his fingers digging low into the jut of Bucky's hipbones. He felt the air leave Bucky's body in a shocked gasp, then his head was leaning back on Steve's shoulder with his eyes closed and lips parted in arousal and Steve sunk his teeth into the side of Bucky's neck and ground their bodies together.

"F-fuck," Bucky cursed, low and rough, bass too loud to hear it, the word slipping silent into the smoky air around them. He kissed the faded bite mark, pressing his lips too long because Bucky was irrationally, wonderfully warm.

The music was loud enough to sink into his bones, crashing beats against his insides, steady and downright dirty. The bass made the floor beneath their feet tremble and every place their bodies were touching - pressing - was throbbing, making Steve's head spin, dizzy with the heat between them.

The curve of Bucky's body against him, the solid, undeniable weight of his arousal pressed against Bucky's ass, Buck's hands pressed over his, forcing Steve to grip him tighter and fuck, Steve could get onboard with the twenty-first century. Thumping in his chest, the energy thrumming in his fingertips as he hiked up Bucky's thin black shirt, eliciting another broken sound as he painted his touch against the heated skin stretched over sharp hipbones.

He could feel the leashed moan in Bucky's chest, a dark low sound, vibrating under his skin, and he had to dig his fingers in harder to anchor himself. The room blurred around them, sweat and alcohol and artificial smoke.

And then Bucky's hands reached backwards, sliding over Steve's hips until his fingertips were brushing over the edges of Steve's ass and then they were curling hard against his jean pockets and there were only a few layers of clothes between that metal hand and his ass and Steve's knees nearly gave out with the heavy rush reverberating into his spine.

"Ahh, Buck," he groaned, voice low and rocky. Then Bucky was grinding back against him hard and Steve wasn't in his mind anymore, he was lit up like the fireworks on his birthday except this was way better than any birthday he'd had.

A hand shoved up in his hair, fucking it up royally and god, he wanted Bucky to wreck him, wanted to walk out of here stumbling with bruises and fucked up hair and a swollen mouth for a reason that was finally not a fist fight.

He couldn't resist, Bucky was devastatingly gravitational and Steve was so so gone, the secure hands on Bucky's hips started to wander, skimming up under his shirt over the tight planes of his stomach, hard muscle tensing under his chest and then Bucky rolled his hips back slow, so slow Steve's stomach coiled tight enough to shake another moan past his lips.

The music shifted, picking up faster in the background but he didn't notice, not when Bucky's pretty mouth was turning to him and whispering firmly against his neck, "Yeah, babydoll, c'mon."

Would it be entirely too forward to drag Bucky off the dance floor and bend him over the sinks in the bathroom and ruin him in every way imaginable?

Except they hadn't talked about that, hadn't gotten anywhere near that, and honestly he'd be just as fine with pushing Bucky into a wall, makeout and grind against each other. Those lips were wet and parted and the most familiar shape he knew, the most addicting thing he'd ever had against his and god, Steve wanted to kiss Bucky until the world stopped spinning around them.
"Steve," Bucky said again, voice strangely clear, and it wasn't until the hand slipped out of his hair that Steve opened his eyes, blinking and looking back down at Bucky.

"Hmm?" he hummed, an octave too high with the way his brain wasn't exactly functioning right now.

"Did you hear that?" Bucky'd stopped moving, looking up at Steve with his eyebrows furrowed. Steve blinked at him, hands still swaying Bucky's hips back and forth except they were barely touching now, and maybe that was helping clear his head a little. "Pretty sure the song just said...wait. Okay, hold on, we have to call Natasha."

"We have to-- what?" His confusion disappeared under the blaring song and the sudden jarring of being dragged across the dancefloor. "Buckyyy," he whined, tightening his fingers around the hand dragging his. He didn't want to call Nat he wanted to dance with Bucky. Or makeout with Bucky. Although it did look like they were headed towards the bathrooms.

"Wait, wait, listen." Bucky stopped, putting a hand on the center of Steve's chest and thank god that was there, he was about to fall over, only how was it that he felt like the drunk one? Although, looking closer, Bucky was totally swaying off tempo, his lips shiny and wet and why wasn't Steve kissing him?

He leaned forward, landing his mouth sloppily against Bucky's, the intoxicating wet drag that had nothing to do with the alcohol, the cling of Bucky's plush lips to his and god, that was great-- And then he heard it.

He actually laughed into Bucky's mouth before thinking to lift his head, cocking it to the side as he listened harder to the lyrics. "Black, black widow baby."

"Oh my god," Steve gaped for a moment, then the next line came in I'm gonna l-l-l-love you until it hurts. Just to get you I'm doing whatever works, and if that wasn't Natasha he didn't know what was. "You have to--" he turned back to Bucky, but he already had his phone pressed to his ear, dragging Steve towards the bathrooms.

"Natasha!" Bucky shouted into the phone, slamming the bathroom door behind them. The music was still really loud in here, but you could hear yourself think too, which was nice.

"Barnes? Is Steve alr--"

"NAT!! There's a song about you! And it's like waaaay worse than Star-Spangled Man." Steve giggled and Bucky shoved him, then he was half falling, grabbing Bucky's hip with one hand and the wall with another, and suddenly Bucky was pinned against the wall, blinking wide pretty eyes up at him and then that mouth opened....

To shout into the phone again. "Hold on, hold on, it's comin' up. Wait, listen."

Bucky held the phone up and Steve finally noticed the speaker button was on, which would probably explain why he'd heard her so well.

This is the web, web that you weave, the song sang and Bucky covered Steve's mouth with a hand, trying to keep his laughter quiet so Natasha could hear but while they were waiting they might as well be kissing. Steve pressed his mouth to Bucky's, only wait, his hand was still there. Well. They were kissing through his hand at least.

"Are you guys in a club?"
"Why are you not freaking out about this song?" Steve demanded, breaking off to stare at the phone in Bucky's hand.

"I've heard it before."

Bucky groaned, banging his head back against the wall and mouthing goddamnit and wait, his mouth was free again, only then he was being pushed back by a metal hand and how did Bucky have more resolve than him all the time?

"But you didn't answer my question. You guys went clubbing? And you haven't freaked out and left yet?"

"We're not that lame," he whined and then Bucky gave him a look and he could picture the Natasha-version of that same look probably on the other side of the phone right now.

"You know, twenty-first century dancing can be very fun if you give it a shot--"

"Oh, believe me, we know," Steve told the phone and then Bucky's hand was clapping over Steve's mouth - again - and he squeaked in annoyance.

"You guys are at a club and grinding?"

"No, Steve's drunk," Bucky tried to cover, only Natasha snorted at him and said, "Steve can't get drunk."

"You should see 'im right now, you'd be surprised. Although he's not drunk on alcohol, just m-fuck."

Steve had gotten tired of Bucky's hand over his mouth and decided to lick his way up one of Bucky's fingers before pulling it into his mouth. Now Bucky was staring at him with wide eyes and a bead of sweat rolling down his temple, his finger salty and heavy on Steve's tongue and wow, they should do this way more often.

"Are you okay?" Nat asked over the phone and Steve couldn't answer with his mouth preoccupied so that left Bucky to breathe, "Yeah, fine. We gotta go, bye."

The phone clattered to the ground and Bucky's finger popped out of Steve's mouth, replaced with his tongue and then Steve was being shoved back against the sinks and he moaned, threading thick hair through his fingers and pressing back against Bucky hungrily.

Unwielding hands shoved against his ribs, yanking his shirt up and then there was cold metal running up his bare sternum and solid teeth sunk into his bottom lip and Steve cried out, clutching Bucky's hair and pushing their mouths together harder, tasting a hint of cooper as Bucky ground his hips forward against Steve's and fuck his mind went white.

The heavy heat against his crotch was making him see stars and he let go of the long thick hair to grab Bucky's ass and drag him closer, kicking his feet out to the side to press against that hard pulse and then Bucky's hands were on his shoulders and Steve had about three milliseconds to register that before he was being shoved to his knees, denim smacking the dirty bathroom floor hard enough to throb except that really wasn't the throbbing part of him he was concerned with.

Or the part of Bucky he was concerned with. His knees were still smarting, sending a tingle up his spine that traveled right back down to tighten his pants and he tipped his head back, meeting those crystal eyes looking down at him as that metal hand shoved into his hair, gripping the short strands tight and it was predatorial, the way Bucky was staring down at him. Animal, someone'd called him.
Fuck.

He leaned his forehead on Bucky's hip, so dizzy with want the room was threatening to tip, and Bucky's hand smoothed down the back of his head, still rough, still possessive, but comforting too and god, fuck, if that didn't make Steve want to do this even more.

Running his hands up the sides of Bucky's thighs Steve lifted his head again, peeking up at Bucky one more time before breathing out heavily and inching his fingers closer to that zipper.

He didn't even get the chance to touch metal before there was a loud banging on the door and that's right, Bucky'd locked it and this was a public restroom after all, if he had to pee he'd be super annoyed about people making out or doing...other things in here and leaving a public commodity unavailable to the rest of the population, especially one that'd been drinking a lot.

With a very reluctant and still spinning head he pushed to his feet, eliciting a groan and an arm wrapping around his stomach as he tried to walk away and okay, if Bucky pulled him tight enough to press up against his ass Steve was gonna be gone, so he shoved forward and quickly yanked open the door, Bucky's arm still around his waist as he peered angrily over Steve's shoulder.

"Sorry," he winced, then the interrupter stormed past them and nearly stepped on Bucky's phone so thank god Steve thought to bend over and pick it up only Bucky was still behind him and the sound he made--

They really had to get out of here.

And sleep in different rooms.

Before somebody did something really stupid.

He hauled Bucky out of the club with an arm around his waist and Bucky kept kissing his neck when they passed through the shadowed areas and hell, maybe nights on the town weren't his brightest idea. Especially when he was drunk on Bucky and Bucky was at least tipsy for real and seriously, weren't they supposed to talk about these things before doing stupid stuff in club bathrooms?

Except once he called a cab, Bucky passed out on his lap with a soft smile on his pretty face, so maybe tonight wasn't exactly his worst idea either.

~~~

They'd just come back from a mission when Steve first did it. Bucky was exhausted and gross and stripped off his shirt before the elevator doors slid shut behind them. Steve whistled low and Bucky flicked him off, then they were both getting water glasses from the kitchen, leaning against the counter with twin groans.

"I'm gonna go take a shower," Steve whispered against his cheek, pressing a quick kiss to Bucky's sweat-sticky skin. "Mmm, have fun," he hummed back, tilting his head to the side as Steve pressed another kiss to his neck, then his shoulder. Then the red star on his arm.

Bucky pulled away, shoving Steve back lightly and holding his arm out of Steve's reach. "Don't," he warned quietly, turning to put his glass in the sink. Except Steve caught his shoulder, turned him
"Why not? You don't like the star?" The worry in that statement held even more than than the weight did. He didn't answer, then a pressure slid over the plates, Steve's thumb tracing over the mark. "I think it's patriotic."

He yanked his arm away again, starting for his room as he muttered to himself. "Yeah, for Russia."

"What?"

"Steve, it's the Soviet symbol? Hello?" He cupped his hand over the red metal, wishing he'd thought to paint over it by now. Although honestly, he wasn't sure he could.

It wasn't hard to hear Steve following him to his room, so Bucky didn't bother kicking the door shut behind him, sitting down on the edge of his bed with enough room for Steve to sit quietly beside him. On the right side.

"It shows I belong-- belonged, to them. Like a brand." He turned the metal hand over, watching the way the plates shifted and glinted in the light.

"We could get rid of it, if you wanted." Steve scooted further on the bed, coming up behind him lay his palm gently over the metal. So much for putting him on the right. Steve's fingers were running so gently over his arm he could barely detect them, tingles more than pressure. He didn't know the sensors could do that. "Or..." the trace of the star, an outline Bucky could swear he felt sometimes, "...instead of altering you why don't we alter what it means?"

Bucky turned over his shoulder to give Steve his what the hell does that mean face, then Steve was climbing off the bed, spinning around as he scanned Bucky's room and found what he was looking for by the window. Grabbing a clipboard, paper and colored pencils, he sat back down, shoulders tipping together as the mattress shifted.

He started drawing, careful thin strokes of color across the paper, outlining a shape that'd become achingly familiar. As touching as it was, he really wasn't all that interested.

"I'm not gonna wear a flag suit like you," Bucky rolled his eyes and nudged Steve with his elbow, because he was still drawing that signature Captain America suit that looked great on Steve and Bucky had absolutely no reason to wear.

"It's not for you," Steve replied, focused hard on his drawing and missing the confusion knotting Bucky's expression.

So he sat and watched for a while, the outfit sketching more dimensional, padded and smart like his blue one, closer in color to his old one with red and white stripes across the stomach. By the time he finished it looked really good, clean and sharp with heavy outlines and stark colors. Steve straightened up and held the clipboard out, showing the suit to Bucky.

He nodded, because it did look good, but he still didn't get whatever point Steve was trying to prove. Then he put the clipboard in his lap again, grabbing the red pencil and pressing hard, dark lines on the chest, outlining the silver-white star in bright red.

"There." Steve scribbled the lines darker, "Now your red star is over my heart."

He stared wide-eyed at the drawing. Steve wanted to have Bucky's star...and then he was swooping the red lines out at two of the tips, arching them across his chest and wrapping them over the top of his arms, tying it in perfectly with the rest of the uniform. "And this way, it wraps all around me..."
"You're a fuckin' sap," Bucky said incredulously, taking the clipboard from Steve. He took the blue pencil and eraser, smudging out the red on the top point of the star and the two bottom points, leaving the red outlines on the other two points that wrapped across the rest of his chest. "That looks better. And this way, it almost looks like something red is holding the star."

Steve laughed, nudging him back. "You're an even bigger sap than I am." Bucky shrugged exaggeratedly and handed Steve the clipboard as he popped off the bed with the energy of that tiny kid from Brooklyn. "I'm gonna show the sketch to Tony, get him to make it for me."

He started for the door and Bucky gave him a little wave, except then Steve stopped in the doorframe, one hand on the wood as he turned around and gave Bucky that look.

"So now your star means something...it means we match." Bucky groaned and Steve stepped closer, wide-ass smile on his face. "We're a pair, a duo, it's so ROMEO AND JULIET."

And it was worth getting off the bed if it meant shoving that smug, laughing face out of his room with some very rude expletives and a smile on his face to cancel them all out.

The next time he saw the star in the mirror, that sinking feeling in his gut of branded didn't feel so bad. It didn't stand for Russia anymore.

It stood for Steve.

Bucky let him kiss the red star when he got back from Tony's lab. He let Steve kiss all the way up his left arm.

~~~

It took some searching, but he finally found Steve on one of the communal floors, elbows propped on the counter with a pile of papers spread in front of him, talking to a holographic screen and practically bent in half at the angle. He stopped and leaned against the wall a little ways away, admiring the view until Steve finally noticed him, straightening up and saying goodbye to Bruce before shutting off the screen and scooping up the papers into a pile.

"You're back." The smile on Steve's face was tucked in at the corners, lips rolled in so he didn't end up grinning wide like an idiot. Except his eyes were dancing and bright and it wasn't like Bucky wasn't gonna notice how happy Steve was to see him.

"I'm back," he confirmed, twitch of a half-smile as he hopped up the inset three steps leading to the kitchen, then Steve's arms were sliding around his waist, under his jacket, both of them checking over each other's shoulders for company before Bucky leaned up on his tiptoes and pressed a kiss to Steve's mouth. Fingers pushed up through his hair, smoothing it away from his face and combing out the few light tangles as Bucky slipped his hands up under Steve's shirt, heat-warm metal still making Steve shiver against him.

When they pulled away Steve pressed a kiss to his forehead, hands cupping Bucky's jaw and tilting his face up to look him over. He let Steve look his fill, tracing lazy patterns across his back with fingertips while he waited.

"I missed you," he whispered, hands dropping to Bucky's shoulders. And this time it was his turn to lift a hand to Steve's face, holding the pretty jaw as his eyes crinkled in a smile.

"I always miss you, Stevie." The precious blonde head ducked, bright smile and faint blush on his cheeks. Bucky pressed his thumb against Steve's shoulder, holding him solid and steady as he leaned forward to whisper in his ear. "Even if it was only a day-mission with Clint."
"You better," Steve mumbled back, shoving Bucky's collarbone in his flushed grievance. It was adorable, so much like the way he acted when he was younger, that Bucky had to tip his head up and kiss him again.

His lips were soft and pliant, moving under Bucky's so easy, breaking apart to soon, always too soon. Then a light went off behind Steve's eyes and he straightened up, mouth curving in excitement. He didn't bother moving out of Bucky's loose embrace, reaching around his arm to dig something out of his pocket.

"We," he announced, pulling two slips of hard paper into the air. "-are going on a date."

"A date? Jeez, Rogers. You gone outta your mind?"

"Why couldn't we?"

Steve's eyes widened all innocently and Bucky narrowed his, analyzing Steve and the two suspicious pieces of paper between his fingers. They weren't...they weren't dating. Yeah, they'd kissed. A couple times. But they were still best friends, and going on a date? That wasn't something they did. Like...why would they?

“What's your game?” He asked warily, hands frozen on Steve's sides as he tilted his head up to look directly at those pieces of sky. Steve softened at the tone in Bucky's voice, fingertips running along his right arm and sending tingles up his spine.

“Don't you wanna go back?” That c'mon, Buck plea was in the curve of those pretty lips and Bucky squinted, analyzing Steve harder as fingers closed tight around his bicep. "You and me, the old days. Let's be the way we never got to be then."

There were a lot of ways they never got to be then. But. But if Steve wanted to court him, take him on dates to make up for all the times they'd gone with girls instead of each other...

"My hair's too long for that," Bucky conceded, pushing a handful backwards for emphasis. Steve's eyes lit up in a smile because he heard the yes, then Bucky's hand was covered with another, warm fingers threading through his hair with an affectionate grin.

"I like your hair." Dry lips pressed a kiss to Bucky's forehead and he closed his eyes, pushing aside the thought at least one of us does before it ate him up. Then Steve was leaning back, sunshine smile as he presented the tickets to Bucky with a flourish.

"So, we're going." Steve's fingers brushed his, waiting with his tongue in his cheek while Bucky read them over.

"These are train tickets." Bucky turned them over, not seeing what they'd have to do in that destination. Then he flipped them again, staring at the front for a moment before it clicked in and he looked back up at Steve. "These are train tickets."

Steve shrugged, one hand playing with the long hair at the base of Bucky's neck. "I figured we've gotta conquer it eventually, right? Why not together?"

The platform was noisy, full of people crowding each other and for once, when Steve reached for his hand, Bucky let him take it. It wasn't about the whole new kissing thing though - it was about the two of them finding comfort in each other's touch the way they always had.
They waited in silence, standing with shoulders pressed together as people milled around them on the tracks.

Then the train came roaring around the corner. Impossibly loud, chunking engine and piercing whistle as the wheelbars whipped in spinning circles.

Steve cringed at the sound, forcing warm air into his lungs. Bucky was here beside him, his hand in Steve's. They were fine. It was just another form of transportation.

If Bucky was doing fine and he's the one who fell, then seriously, Steve shouldn't be shaking. What gave him the right? Only then he glanced over at Bucky and maybe he wasn't doing so fine after all. If the gloved metal bruising his hand was any indication, anyways.

They both stood in silent checkmate, staring at the train and the cacophony of sounds washing over the platform. Steve was frozen again, stuck in a coma of ice and couldn't move at all--

"We tried," Bucky suddenly announced, tugging Steve's hand and pulling him off the platform. Good lord could Steve agree with that. He laughed incredulously as Bucky shoved through the crowd, pulling them back out into the lobby and holding the tickets up in front of them, letting go of Steve's hand to dramatically shred them into the closest trash can.

Steve smiled all the way to the bus.

The seats were admittedly cramped and it smelled like the underside of an extremely dirty city, but they crammed their shoulders together and sunk low in the seats, one earbud for both as they listened to Bucky's iPod and whispered made-up stories about the other patrons.

"Why can't you tell me where we're going?" Bucky whined, tipping his head against Steve's shoulder.

"The whole point of a date--"

"Oh what do you know about dates?"

"Plenty! Watched you go on 'em all the time."

"Shut up," he grumbled, poking a finger into Steve's pretty waist. "S'not like we couldda done this in the thirties."

"Would you have wanted to?"

"Are we really gonna get into this now?"

"Why not?"

"Because it's the past, there's nothing we can do about it. Plus you're interrupting, this is a great song. Now we're gonna have to start it over."

Steve had to admit, it was a good song.

They got off the bus in DC. Truth was, the whole time Steve'd lived here, he'd never once gone. He'd ran past it almost every morning, but nothing could make him turn down the path to cut between the Lincoln memorial and the Washington Monument. He couldn't do it.

But now that Bucky was here? He deserved to go.
"You taking me on a date to see a dead guy pillar?"

"C'mon, Buck. It's George Washington, it's a monument."

"He owned 123 slaves and used to be a spy, don't tell me Captain America doesn't know his American history."

"Yes, I do, why do you?"

"Because I am not as dumb as you think."

"I don't think you're dumb," Steve shoved Bucky's shoulder lightly and then a metal arm was shoving him off the sidewalk.

Bucky laughed at him way longer than necessary, finally settling down as they neared Washington Monument. "Wait, are we seriously going to the tower thing?"

"No, we aren't."

"I thought dates were supposed to be fun. Like dancing and drinking."

"We tried that. It didn't end well."

"It didn't end badly. And it wasn't a date."

"True. But still."

"...but seriously, monuments? D.C.? Can't we go to the movies like normal people?"

"We go to the Avengers movie nights all the time. Besides," Steve looped his arm through Bucky's, turning them down the split in the sidewalk he'd never taken before. "This is more important."

"What could possibly be...oh."

They stopped and Bucky stared.

Here we mark the price of freedom.

More than 4,000 gold stars reflecting the sunlight. Huge white pillars with wreaths, a fountain pool in the center. The two gazebos, Atlantic and Pacific at the ends. The National World War II Monument.

The war. The beginning of the end, the end of the beginning, the catalyst to everything and the suppression of the air in their lungs. Lies, bullets, prayers, a sniper scope and a shield, seven men in uniform in the back corner of a rundown bar.

The memorial was a circle. They stepped onto the path quietly, pausing at the Victory Medal embedded into the ground. A medal they'd never gotten to see. Victory.

No part of it had ever felt like victory.

In silence they moved along a curving wall, bas relief depictions in an arching story. Engraved: soon-to-be servicemen getting physical exams, taking the oath, being issued military gear. Bucky's eyes cut away and his arm unhooked from Steve's. Steve didn't stop him.

It was an entire study, scenes following through the war, soldiers in uniforms nicer than any the Howlies' had ever worn. Sun shadows over deep engravings, men in combat.
And Steve's turn to stop, step closer, press his fingers against the wall. Broken-hearted brothers burying their dead. Something he'd never gotten the chance to do with Bucky. Something the Commandos had never gotten to do with him.

Eventually Bucky took Steve's hand off the wall, both of them moving in perfect silence as they stepped further on, arms falling to their sides, shoulders brushing as twin gazes followed the carvings. The elation of the homecoming scene. The brilliant smiles and the cheering. A couple dancing in the street, another kissing over a mailbox, people waving flags and leaning out of windows. Neither of them had that either.

The last scene was of a handshake between the American and Russian armies when the western and eastern fronts met in Germany.

Steve put his arm around Bucky to still the shaking. "They didn't know," he whispered against his ear. Bucky covered his mouth and nodded, staring at the joined hands. The Americans, Bucky's home; the Russians, his captors; shaking hands at the end of the war he'd given his life for.

By the time they'd gravitated back to the Atlantic gazebo no one'd cried, but they'd come pretty close. As soon as Steve propped on the white stone wall, scooting over to leave room for Bucky, those crystal eyes turned to him, too shiny and dangerously pretty.

"You tryin' to make me cry on a first date? What kinda fella are you? Mixin' this with..."

"Us? I told you, Bucky. This war? Our war story? It's the same thing as our love story."

Bucky turned away, shielding his eyes from the sun as he squinted at the immense marble columns surrounding them, the glitter off the fountain pool. "How, Steve? How? I look at this...at us?" Crystal turned to him, surreally beautiful, brown hair fluttering in the wind. "And I don't see anything but those engravings, but our lives laid out bloody and sad. The only flowers we get are the ones on graves."

His chest rose and fell, a slow steady breath, eyes closed against the sun and those words. Bucky waited, watching Steve ground himself, watching his hands flatten against the white stone beneath them, blonde hair batting against his forehead and how much had changed since the last time they'd sat somewhere and talked.

How many memories were full of smoke and fire? How did Steve not see that? Did he not remember the clarity, the stark whip of death, of living on the brink of that...

"Bucky? When...when you first heard about the war, what's the first thing you did?" Steve's eyes were still closed, or maybe downcast, and Bucky squinted across the memorial, the circling pillars shining so white and clean and opposite of war's reality.

"We were in art class. I turned to you and--"

"You turned to me. And what did you do when I told you I wanted to train?"

Bucky furrowed his eyebrows, glancing over curiously again. "I took you to that gym and taught you what I could."

Steve nodded, head lifting to look out over the water, sun blinding a halo behind him, so beautifully regal against all that white stone, like the angel who'd come to visit his own grave. Their own graves.

"When I stopped in front of the first I Want You poster?"
"I put my arm around your shoulders and dragged you off. Told you they didn't need fellas like us. Why?"

"And when I asked you to enlist?"

"Said I had enough fightin' keepin' you outta trouble. Steve, what's this got to do with anything?"

Steve paused, blue eyes reflecting water and stone and everything was so bright and open and so different from those dirty gold streets, from the shadowed green woods, from the bitter years of ice. They were sitting close enough that he could see oxygen filling Steve's lungs, his chest expanding without the familiar wheeze, the strength and power, so surreal. Ethereal.

"And when you got...your drafting letter? What's the first thing you thought?"

The wind almost stole the words before he could hear them and it certainly stole Bucky's breath away with it. He hadn't thought they'd talk about this again. Especially not on a date. If this was a date.

"I. I thought about how I couldn't leave you. How I didn't want to...to die over there, because who'd take care of you? I thought about how I didn't want to fight, not when the only thing--" he stopped, clearing his throat and kicking his heel against the stone beneath them. "--when the only thing worth fighting for needed me here."

Brooklyn, dirty Brooklyn that felt like heaven after the months in trenches with the 107th, the explosions he'd see everytime he'd close his eyes, and he couldn't have Stevie in those ditches with him.

"After Azzano, they told you to go home. But I needed you there, so..."

"I followed orders. I went home, to your side, and I fought beside you because I'd rather die than have to leave you--"

"Do you see it, Bucky? Do you see the common denominator between you and the war?" They turned to face each other and Bucky had to pin his hair back with a hand to keep it from flying into his face.

"...you. It was all about you." Bucky sighed, pressing his palms against the tops of his thighs. They were so much warmer than the cold stone. "Steve, if you're tryin' to prove my life revolves around you, believe me, I already know that--"

"No, Buck. Listen. The war. For you, what was the war about?"

With his memories so vivid in his head, it could've been yesterday he burnt that letter in the alley. He remembered exactly what the war had been about for him. What the fight had always been about. "So...I did it all. Because of you."

"No," Steve said again, then there was a hand covering Bucky's, fingertips landing between his spread ones, interrupting the energy, the space he had control over, now that space was shared. The hand on his. The one that'd taken off his mask, cast it aside. Pulled Bucky into his arms. A thousand times.

Then that rich low voice was in the air between them, heavy words spilling onto white pristine and black relief. "You did it because of love."

I'm gonna prove it to you, Buck.
They're the same thing. War stories are love stories.

"It's not...it's not clean enough to be love," he whispered and the memorial ghosts shredded his words the moment they hit air. The fingers between his curled, tucking tips under in a rush of seething warmth.

"Love isn't beautiful." A melody on the air, singing voices of soldiers past as Steve leaned closer, too far for intimacy but proximal enough to float soft sounds instead of stab. "Love's human."

Human. Собака. War?

"Do you remember when we danced...it was February, 1945?"

A laugh spilled out of Bucky's lips, quiet under the roar of distant invisible gunfire. "Did you forget that dance? Everyone who saw that remembers that dance."

A little girl grabbed her mother's hand, pointing at the pond with a loud exclamation and Bucky watched, thinking of swirling snow and spinning gold. "The damn bartender, who didn't even know our names, probably thinks about it nightly," his mouth said for him and Steve's hand loosened on his.

"Do you remember what you said?"

1 2 3, ratty boots over war-worn floors.

Tears in his eyes then, dry disfracture upon him now.

"When I asked what you were fighting for?" Steve's dandelion voice prompted again. Bucky remembered. He remembered every detail.

Solid stone where there had once been caving dirt, earthy tree branches, the sharp smell of smoke from behind a sniper scope.

"I said...you already know the answer to that question."

The hand over his - the same two that'd once been clasped in a waltz.

"And I did," the angel beside him replied softly, white as his halo, white as the sloping gazebo behind them. Atlantic.

"Love," Bucky echoed, detached as he cocked his head at a scar on the side of Steve's hand. He didn't think Steve got scars anymore.

"Me," Steve corrected, and something warm flooded him from his toes and arched out through his fingertips, buzzing them warmer against Steve's, buzzing his whole body bright.

War story?

Even the wind took the caesura, everything freezing around them in the only way that wasn't cold, in the only way that didn't lock him out of his mind. He could go back.

That body, that Steve was touching, was his.

Maybe it wasn't on fire enough to feel all over. Maybe it wasn't bruised enough to feel alive. But it could still be his.
That story. That could be his.

"Bucky. That's what soldiers fight for. They all do it for love. Love for their country. Love for the people they leave behind. To protect the people who haven't gotten the chance to love. Because the horror hit and they love the world to much to see whatever they're fighting for die. The soldiers who got drafted? They didn't enlist because they were already fighting for something they loved back home. Like you. And when you left overseas, that was about love too. War stories, Bucky. They're love stories, every one of them. Every soldier."

"All those people that died..."

"I don't commend countries for initiating mass murder with a patriotic stamp on top, but it's not about the countries who do this, or the politics. It's about the soldier who fights anyways. Every uniform has a cause, Bucky."

"But Steve, war--"

"You say 'war' like it's a condemnation. Like being soldiers was the worst that ever happened to us." Fingers, palms covering his and Bucky clutched on too tight, digging metal bruises into angelic flesh. "But we're still here. We came home."

Some day, I know I'll be back again. Please wait, 'Til then.

"And I took so many. Stevie, I can't come back from that--"

"You think you're already dead from the inside out." The fingers squeezed tighter and maybe they'd bruise each other this way. "You think all that matters is the lives you've taken, but that's not it. You're not a machine, Sergeant. Your skills might not be applicable in the civilian world, but you're still part of it - you went on a journey, you left with your brothers, and you came back dead, but there's always a second chance."

Shining waterdroplets and anyone who said angels couldn't cry could write that out of their poems now. The memories under their feet and the wind and the sun so cold and warm against their skin and holding on too tight as tears slipped out of blue eyes while crystal watched on.

"You think no one will ever see you again. I see you, Bucky. Let me be your second chance."

The blinding light off white stone and glittering clear fountains disappeared, fading, and Bucky tilted his head back to look up at the sky. A swarm of mottled gray and white clouds, covering the brilliant sun. Shadows cast over the memorial and the speckled crowd began to murmur and exit.

Impending storm.

Bucky looked up at the clouds and wondered how long he'd been covering the sun.

He used to be the nightsky holding a remarkable star.

The sun was reaching for him and the one in the sky wasn't the one that mattered, not when there was another at his side. A glowing halo waiting to pull him out - but it was more complicated than that.

That halo was stained red. Just like his.

The angel didn't want to lift him from condemnation, it wanted to take his hand and army crawl into the light with him once more.

A second chance.

Bucky tore his eyes away from the sky, sweeping over to the wall now duly reflecting what bits of light the clouds had left to offer. 4048 gold stars. Each for 100 soldiers who'd died in this war. The Freedom Wall.

And before it, engraved and huge enough to see from the sky. Here we mark the price of freedom.

The price of freedom is high. It always has been.

He was the price of freedom.

He was one of those gold stars. So was Steve. So were so many soldiers. And this was only one war. War.

Love?

Bucky turned back to Steve. The wind settled enough to gently ruffle their hair now and Bucky lifted his hands away from Steve's, scooting on the white stone wall to angle his chest towards his best friend.

His comrade. His brother-in-arms.

He lifted his metal hand - the phantom's limb, the mark of his time as a soldier he would always be a soldier - and placed the cold palm against that angled, pretty jaw. Steve's eyes slipped closed and he tipped his head into Bucky's touch and Bucky held him that way for a moment, a moment of concession to the words upon this world they'd written.

"Steve?" He lifted his other hand, half dead and half alive, half human and half machine, all here. All soldier. All...

All hero.

"Will you be my war story?"

~~~

"Am I the only one who thinks surprising a scary ghost-assassin and his legendary boyfriend is a bad idea?"

"Shhh, they have super-hearing." Natasha elbowed Sam and he hissed in pain, scooting away and bumping into Clint. "Besides," Nat whipped her head towards the stairwell door, pressing closer to the wall they were all hiding against. "They're not officially dating."

"Well they're something, otherwise it wouldn't take them eight years to walk up the stai--"
"Tony! Super-hearing!" Nat hissed. Clint and Sam snickered.

"Yeah, Tony, superhea--" Sam started to mock in a high voice, only then Pepper elbowed him in the other side of his ribs and he hissed again, grabbing his side in offense as Nat reached over him to high-five Pepper while Clint and Maria snickered.

Then the stairwell door was pushing open and everyone shut up, a final quick battle glance before they jumped into sight, a cacophony of clashing voices,

"HAPPY BIRTHDAYYYY TO YOOOUUUUU!!"

It was only his immaculate training assess targets before shooting that left everyone alive, although there were two guns aimed at both Tony and Nat, who had been the loudest shouters of the group and therefore deserved bullets to the chest first.

Except then Steve was knocking both out of his hands, pushing through from behind him and taking his guns almost as fast as Bucky had drawn them, then the room fell silent as Steve stared wide-eyed at the Avengers: frozen with their arms wide and their voices echoing around the huge room. Two metallic thuds as the ejected clips hit the ground, and Bucky stared over Steve's shoulder at his crazy, colorful friends.

One of which was holding a cake, another a big blue box with a bow, another a bottle of wine, another a microphone?, another with a bunch of balloons and a sixth with a deck of cards.

The last time he'd been told happy birthday, it had been by the Howling Commandos. They'd been on a boat, there'd been singing to Dernier's harmonica, whiskey, cards. They'd woken him up by screaming the happy birthday song in his face.

He'd pulled a gun on them, too. Steve'd taken the clip out then, too. Everyone'd been dying of laughter, brimming with joy. No one'd been afraid of him. He'd been a killer then, and they'd woken him with shouts because they trusted him.

But now, he was more than a killer. He was an assassin, deadly, volatile.

A war story.

And...these people. This team. They trusted him too?

They trusted him enough to shout-surprise Happy Birthday at him and not fear for their lives. Tony wasn't even in his armor. They were all just standing, looking, presents and a cake in hand. Waiting to see what he'd do.

The last time he'd been told Happy Birthday in 71 years had been by his boys. His team.

And this time, it was his team too.

"You're all going to hell," Bucky told them flatly. And his mouth curved up in a tentative smile. A real one.

Steve glanced over his shoulder, blue eyes soft and...watery? Fucking sap. Those pretty lips rolled in and Steve shook his head once, then he handed the guns back to Bucky and turned back to his team.

Their team.

"Already there," Tony offered cautiously, shrugging his shoulder like he wasn't sure if he'd be shot or toasted with amusement.

Then Steve was laughing and Natasha stepped forward to give him a kiss on the cheek. Sam crossed the room to throw an arm around Bucky’s shoulders, Tony shook the big blue box in his face tantalizingly and Pepper held up the wine for him to see as Clint crowded the herd towards the dining table, narrating the scene into the random microphone as Bucky laughed at everyone and tried to peer over Maria's shoulder to see what Natasha's cake had in icing on the top.

Happy B-day Bucky Barnes.

The 98 was crossed out with a big purple x of icing, the 28 traced next to it all lopsided and most-likely in Clint's handwriting. Steve had this beautiful smile on his face, one arm around Nat and the other around Sam, backs of his fingers brushing Bucky's shoulder as the cake slid across the table to land in front of him.

A fancy-looking lighter that probably had 8000 extra features wielded in Tony's hand while Pepper produced candles, setting one on each point of the red star in the center of the cake, everyone cowering cautiously as Tony flicked a switch and a golden flame leapt out of the end of the lighter, then Clint was starting the Happy Birthday song way too loudly and quite off-pitch into his still-mysterious microphone and everyone else's voices joined in, loud and merry.

Steve caught his eye over the people between them, gazes meeting in the middle of the chaos and the look on Steve's face, that easy, unadulterated joy - he deserved that every day of his life. After everything they'd been through? Steve deserved that more than anything. That brilliant glow in those angel-blue eyes, surrounded by his friends while they serenaded terribly, and this was exactly where Steve belonged.

He broke his eyes away, looking down at the round cake, the flickering fire atop each of those five points. Five months ago, he'd been in a box of ice. He'd been nothing but a killer. And now here was this team, this family, pulling him into their arms and their antics and baking him a birthday cake.

How could this be where he belonged? He was that odd piece out still, wasn't he? Steve fit in here, Steve'd found a home amongst all the crazy soldiers and scientists, but that piece of sunshine was the only thing Bucky had in common with these people.

How could they want him to be part of this scene?

How could Sam be squeezing his shoulder and Clint be nudging his side and Tony be trying to poke him with the strange lighter as they all waited for him to lean down and blow out the flames.

Five candles, five months ago he'd been a burnt-out empty shell full of nothing but fire and now, he was blowing fire out.

But war stories didn't have happy endings, did they?

Except love stories did. And if they were the same thing...

Bucky closed his eyes, leaned over, and blew out his birthday candles with a single wish silent on his tongue. Cheering erupted and rough hands clapped him on the back, more loud shouts and insisting of unwrapping presents and getting knives to cut cake.

He pulled one of his nine blades out and Pepper scolded him for using weaponry on things they were going to eat and Tony thanked him exuberantly for not being the only one to understand functionality of personal armory and Sam and Steve were in some sort of argument over ice cream and Nat was trying to get Maria to lick off the icing on candles so as to not waste it while Clint pried the cork off the wine with what looked like a modified arrowhead and Bucky stood and watched; a soft, awed smile on his face.

Pepper coerced him into letting her pull his hair back into a french braid while he opened gifts and Sam set up cards. Nat smeared cake in Tony's and Maria's faces and nobody dared get her back. The loud and the crazy and the laughing didn't stop for what felt like hours. At one point Tony shouted "children, behave!" at them and Steve giggled like a schoolgirl and threw a plastic fork at Bucky's head, only it hit Clint instead and that induced a very quick wrestling match that ended with Clint cradling his elbow and whining.

Eventually, in the midst of an intense game of B.S, the chance popped up and Bucky pulled Steve to the side, halfway across the room so they could talk without being overheard, think without Sam's bellowing laughter floating between them.

"So this," Bucky waved a hand to indicate the surprise party, glancing up at Steve with an amused look as he ran his fingers through his hair to undo the french braid. "Our war story? This part of it may play out familiar, but they sure are nothin' like the Howling Commandos."

"No, they aren't." Steve shook his head, glancing over his shoulder affectionately before turning back to Bucky, running his palm down the metal arm and freeing a few pieces of remaining braid with his other hand. "But it's just part two of our war story, Buck."

He huffed a soft sound, catching Steve's fingers as they stroked down his wrist and stilling them, holding his focus tight.

"I fought a World War for you, Rogers." The liberation of saying that out loud - he never thought he'd have that. He never thought he'd have any of this. "You think we'd be done with this whole battle business by now."

That pretty blond head shook, then their clasped hands were joined by another warm one, wrapping Bucky's fingers up and squeezing tight.

"Never." A step closer and Bucky had to tilt his chin up to meet those eyes and wasn't that strange, this body he used to be able to scoop off the ground like a sack of potatoes now forcing his chin up. His little Stevie. Nothin' little about either a' them anymore.

Fingers squeezed tighter and maybe Steve was making up for lost time or somethin', how much he'd been holding Bucky's hands, only he really really wasn't gonna complain. Those pink lips parted again, whisper floating between them. "I'm on the frontlines all over again. I'm fighting the war for you this time."

Their war. Only the war hadn't ended so well last time and that was written all over his face, familiar pained sorrow that'd found them so young and taken both their lives.

"And I'm not crashing anything this time," Steve added with a little smile. Bucky blinked and Steve's whisper was louder now, desperately sincere as he leaned down, inches from Bucky's nose, and slipped a promise over his shoulders. "This time, I'm falling with you. For you. Every day."

He wasn't gonna cry, really, only he'd spent months wishing and wondering why Steve hadn't jumped after him because God knows Bucky would've. Except now Steve was. Falling right alongside Bucky, both of them jumping off the proverbial cliff into this mess of a war story, into whatever this was, into kissing each other and testing icy waters with toes that were scared to be frozen or broken again, only they'd already jumped; it was too late to do anything but hold each other tight and close their eyes until they hit the bottom.

"Aw, Stevie," he managed, eyes watery and voice choked. "Sure know how to sweet talk a fella."

Another little sad smile, only that wasn't enough, holding his little punk Stevie's hands weren't enough for this moment.

"C'mere," Bucky murmured, wiggling his hands free to spread his arms. And like always, his Stevie folded against his chest, icy nose to the side of his neck, one hand clutching his shirt and the other shoved up in the back of Bucky's hair and he closed his eyes, clutched his arms around Steve's broad back and held him tight.

Falling for you. With you. Every day.

He wasn't gonna cry.

When he pulled away he covered his eyes with his right hand, knowing the wet would shine against the metal and wanting that water gone before the day was spoiled. Bucky wiped the stupid unfallen tears and knocked his damp fist into Steve's shoulder, making that sweet mouth giggle softly and fuck, that look on Steve's face wasn't fair.

"What do you say we get outta here?" He whispered, leaning to the side to dodge the kiss aimed for his cheek. Steve made a pouting sound at the rejection, but it came with a nod and a quick squeeze of Buck's hand, then they were saying goodbye to everybody, tingling with the anticipation to be alone again.

"You guys have been wonderful," Bucky begrudgingly admitted, placing chaste kisses on the cheeks of all the women - even Maria - because that's what he would've done back in the day. "But we're gonna go try out my new present."

"If I'd known we were couple-gifting, I'd've been much more raunchily creative." Tony raised his eyebrows with that look that said way more than his words did and maybe he went red as the star on his arm but god that is not what he meant by that.

"Haha, we're not a--" he cut off, glancing at Steve for help, except he looked just as confused, so Bucky threw up a hand and gave Tony a pointed look. "We're gonna go. But thank you guys, seriously. It's great to be older than everyone and still the best looking."

Nat flicked him off and Maria snorted and Sam laughed at Clint's raised unimpressed eyebrows and Tony rolled his eyes as Pepper shooed them off. Steve wrapped a big arm over his shoulders, Bucky's gift from Stark in the other hand as they stepped into the elevator.

Bucky pressed the button for the roof instead of their floor and Steve gave him an amused look but didn't say a word of protest.

The soft beeps followed them up and Bucky repositioned his grip on the speaker handle. Jarvis told Tony how he liked having control of his own music and didn't have a decent speaker, so the big blue present had been a high-tech but simple boombox, small enough to carry around and big enough for a great sound.

It was actually the perfect gift. And they were going to test it out properly.

"Alright, c'mere." Bucky sat the radio on the ledge of the roof, waving Steve over to the center of the empty space. Steve screwed up his eyebrows, looking between the boombox and his best friend, the urgent gesturing hand, bottom lip caught between his teeth.

"What are we doing?" he asked cautiously, taking a step closer. Bucky waved faster. Giving up on interpreting anything, Steve crossed the space between them, hands on his hips and head cocked as he waited for whatever Bucky was planning.

He pressed a button on the tiny remote, shoving the thing back in his pocket, and then the music started.

It was loud, an instrument Steve'd never heard before, and strangely poppy sounding. He turned to look at the stereo in confusion, but Bucky grabbed his wrist, whipped Steve back to face him, all attention on the crystal eyes and ruffled brown hair.

"Oh don't you dare look back, just keep your eyes on me," the words started behind them, except Bucky was singing along, eyes sincere, expression serious, fingers locked tight around his wrist.

"What ar--"

"I said you're holdin' back, she said shut up and dance with me."

It was such a signature Bucky thing to say that a surprised laugh tumbled out of Steve's mouth, shaking his head in amusement, except that only made Bucky more insistent, taking Steve's other hand and squeezing them tight.

"Oh ooh oh, shut up and dance with me!" And then Bucky was tugging him in, lifting clasped hands up and wrapping metal fingers over Steve's hip, cool through the cotton of his shirt.

"Are we-" he started, then Bucky took a step backwards, pulling Steve with him, making him stumble to keep up.

"We're actually-"

Bucky stepped again and spun them around, hands secure,

"--dancing on the roof." Steve finished, raising his eyebrows because this was Bucky of Brooklyn, not the Winter Soldier, and this one didn't belong to Steve, not the debonair flirt from the past.

"We were victims of the night," Bucky's hands curled around his waist, their bodies pressing close as he guided Steve's hips, moving them together. "-the chemical, physical, kryptonite." The suggestive, classy way he used to dance with all those dames.

"Helpless to the bass and the fading light." The New York skyline reflected like stars and he was leaning up with a coy, precious smile on his face, singing straight to Steve with this incredible, twinkling mischief.

"Oh, we were bound to get together, bound to get together."

Together, Bucky'd just called them together and bound, bound to happen, if Steve was ever the sun, it was only because Bucky lit him on fire.

"She took my arm, I don't know how it happened." Bucky's expression shifted into sheer, exaggerated innocence, wide-eyed and pure trouble because he knew exactly how this happened and then he took Steve's hands again and the chorus hit, music loud and fast as Bucky tugged him into a swing-out Lindy.
"Oh, don't you dare look back. Just keep your eyes on me." The sincerity in Bucky's words made it impossible to tear his gaze away, although Steve couldn't imagine looking at anything else, locked on each other with Bucky's grace and fire to guide the way.

"I said, 'You're holding back,' she said, 'Shut up and dance with me!'"

It wasn't You're My Sunshine but Bucky was as stunningly beautiful as the last time he'd sang for Steve on his birthday, that night on the boat with the Commandos. After all this time, everything that happened to him, he still had that spark. That gravitation, the light behind his eyes and that dashing smile and the undeniable charm, that perfect way he moved his body like he owned everyone who dared look his way.

The heavy beat fell back to something lighter and Bucky pulled him in close again, hand on Steve's waist, rockstep triplestep. He'd never been a dancer like Bucky, despite the lessons in the kitchen. But now, like this? This was perfect, like old times. Better than old times, because this time it meant something.

He knew he was already beaming down at that pretty smile like a lovesick fool, but it wasn't until Bucky's eyes darted down, a hint of shyness as he sang the next line a little softer, "I felt it in my chest as she looked at me." That's when Steve melted entirely.

"I knew we were bound to be together," Bucky whispered quietly, something like awe. And Steve'd caught on enough to take the next line easily, tipping his hand under Bucky's chin to make their eyes meet.

"Bound to be together," Steve echoed with a smile and the world lit up as Bucky brightened again, the music stopping for the briefest of pauses, tension flying as it kicked up again, voice loud and beautiful again as Bucky swung them through the crisp night air.

"She took my arm, I don't know how it happened. We took the floor and she saaaaaid..." They spun and Steve was past focusing on not falling, only thinking of those crystal eyes and warm hands on him. "Oh, don't you dare look back, just keep your eyes on me--"

"I said you're holding back," Steve sang back at him and the air was the lightest in his lungs it'd ever been with the way Bucky was beaming at him.

"She said shut up and dance with me. This woman is my destiny," and Steve had to join in for the next part too, enthusiasm to match Bucky's, energy and tension between them high enough to float to the clouds and, "Oh, oh, oh, shut up and dance with mee.

The song split into an instrumental bridge and Bucky broke off, dancing backwards, gesturing at Steve, all mischief and beauty and temptation and Steve was a helpless, poor lost soul. "Oh, come on girl!" Bucky shouted with the song and Steve laughed up at the sky, hand over his chest as he tried to catch his breath.

"I ain't your dame," he finally managed, eyes on the man jazzing in happy circles around the rooftop.

"Prove it," Bucky dared back, raising an eyebrow.

He was close enough that Steve only had to bound once before he had Bucky in his arms and he may not be the kind of dancer Bucky was, but there had been a bounty of kitchen-lessons and he hadn't learned nothing.

With one hand tight on Bucky's he flicked him out, lifting his arm high and whipping in a circle to spin Bucky under it, tugging him right back into Steve's chest, finishing the swoop and dipping him low, long brunette hair falling back as Steve leaned over the backbend of that pretty body. Bucky tipped his head back even further, laughing joyously, and the sound echoed over the rooftops and engrained itself into Steve's heart.

Only a few seconds of victory before he was outmaneuvered and Bucky straightened, falling onto his chest and the world froze around them, bright eyes looking up, reflecting stars and city lights, both palms flat on Steve's collarbones, blinking up intimately like Steve was somehow everything.

"Deep in her eyes, I think I see the future," Bucky sang, captivated, and how could this emotion be for him, edging into desperation tinged in sadness and the next words tore his heart out of his chest, the heavy, final way they fell off Bucky's tongue.

"I realize...this is my last chance."

As much as Steve wanted to hold him and tell him they had all the chances in the world, all the last breaths in the world; Bucky kept singing, pushing past and the wind whipped everything else away.

"She took my arm, I don't know how it happened. We took the floor and she saaid..."

The music paused and really, he wasn't going to get sentimental, but he was going to goddamn kiss his best friend because he wanted to more than anything and for once, he finally could.

Steve tilted Bucky's face up and pressed their lips together, eyes slipping shut as Bucky's hands weaved into his hair and kissed him back, easy and sweet, his soft bottom lip sliding between Steve's, a gentle tug as their mouths moved together, stars shooting down his spine, making his toes curl in his shoes.

Their lips parted, barely, and Bucky's forehead pressed to his, his words ghosting right over Steve's mouth and this time, they meant a lot more than dancing. "Oh, don't you dare look back...."

He could never look back, not now,

"...just keep your eyes on me."

They'd never been anywhere else.

Steve's eyes were still closed as he ran his thumb over Bucky's jawline, and his whisper wasn't about dancing either. "I said you're holding back."

"She said shut up and dance with me," he replied softly, and it was an answer and a promise and maybe Steve was high on moonlight and dancing but he could swear this was important, the way Bucky was holding him so tight and close. "Oh, oh, oh..."

The moment snapped, hair flipping in the wind as he grabbed Steve's hand and opened his pretty mouth to shout at the top of his lungs,

"Shut up and dance!"

Bucky lifted him off his feet with strong hands and twirled them around, sending them both spinning across the rooftop like crazy people and no wonder all those dames fell in love, the celestial beings looking down from heaven were probably in love with Bucky Barnes right now.

But in all the times he'd seen his best friend dance, he'd never seen this pure freedom. Which he would never say aloud because there would be jokes about eagles and bleeding red-white-and-blue for the rest of his days and that was not the kind of freedom he meant.
"Ooh, oh oh, shut up and dance with me!" The roof and New York were spinning around them, the only clear thing pure crystal, if it was possible to burst, he might do it in this moment.

Bucky's hand whipped him around and Steve's feet twirled so quickly it felt like a battle reaction, then he was spinning right into Bucky's arms and they were dancing around the roof, Bucky's hair was all over the goddamned place and his smile was impossibly wide.

"Oh oh oh, shut up and dance with me!!" Bucky shouted at him and Steve shouted it back and then they both stumbled to the edge of the roof, hands overlapping as they clutched the edge and shouted over the floating rooftops of the city.

"Shut up and dance with me!"

Bucky spun under his arm and Steve spun under Bucky's and then they were laughing over the final refrain of the music, falling against each other and propping each other up because god, when was the last time they screamed something over the rooftops of New York?

The drums hit in a final warning for the end of the song and Bucky grabbed him around the waist, dipping him upside down and kissing his mouth hard enough to press the laughter right over Bucky's tongue and it felt like falling, in a million ways, only propped up with a single hand on his back, balanced over Bucky's touch and entirely trusting as that mouth moved over his, and then the music crescendoed into silence, echoing the finish into the night.

And then Bucky dropped him.

Steve hit the ground with a groan and a swinging kick for Bucky's shin. He cursed and dropped to Steve's side, then those contrasting hands were on his face again and Steve rolled them over on the concrete ground and kissed Bucky back until his lips were numb.

The moonlight spilled over them and every time they'd almost kissed, almost spoken, and passed each other by all melted away because this, this was the end game. Simple and perfect, no complications, just them under the big bright sky, holding onto each other for no other reason than that the other was here.

By the time they shoved each other off, collapsed in heavy-breathing piles next to each other, staring up at the sky, Steve's heart was pounding out of his chest and he was happier than he could remember being, ever.

"Wow," Steve told the stars and Bucky laughed, an airy, disbelieving kind that was exactly how the inside of Steve's chest felt.

"I wanted to dance." Bucky shrugged next to him and Steve made an approving noise at the sky.

"That crap at the club doesn't count."

"It doesn't," Steve agreed, smacking his hand on the concrete next to him repeatedly until he located Bucky's arm by whacking it and scooted over, still looking up at the sky as he flopped his head down on Bucky's stomach and made him huff in annoyance.

But then a metal hand was carding through his hair and Steve closed his eyes with a smile because he knew Bucky didn't really mind. How long had he been using Bucky for a pillow on rooftops and fire-escapes?

This, this was what it was all for. This was that reward, the point of living that made not-dying worth it. Moments that could belong to any goddamned year in their life and that was the most beautiful part, how many times they'd done this and how this time was unlike anything they'd ever done.

"I want to paint something," Bucky declared to the stars and Steve raised his eyebrows curiously, even though Bucky couldn't see him. He could probably picture it anyways. The fingers in his hair didn't stop playing with the blonde strands, voice kinda distant and dreamy. "Like, for real. Not some moody expressionistic creepy crap."

"Yeah your last painting was creepy," Steve pondered and the fingers in his hair flicked his temple. He supposed he had that coming, so he refrained from punching Bucky back for it.

"One rule though," he continued, like Steve'd never interrupted at all. "Nobody touches it but me. Until I give you permission, then you can, but I want it...I want it to be mine. And maybe, if you're nice, I'll let you see it one day."

"You planning something big then," he asked, although it was worded like a statement because he knew Bucky well enough to at least know that.

"Oh you know it." Steve'd bet anything Bucky quirked his eyebrows all cute and he laughed at the metal image, opening his eyes up and rolling his head on Bucky's sternum to catch a glimpse of his peaceful expression. The angle was all wacked, but then Bucky lifted his head and looked down at Steve, twisting up funnily. "Get your ass up here so I can kiss you."

Steve rolled onto his stomach and army crawled the rest of the distance, pressing a chaste kiss on Bucky's lips. "You're shivering. Inside?"

"I'm not shivering. You're shivering." Bucky shoved him off and Steve rolled his eyes, picking himself up off the ground and humming over to the quiet boombox. He tugged the iPod off the top, checking the name of the song and the artist. "Walk the Moon...no way."

"What?" Bucky paused from brushing himself off, looking up in concern. Steve waved the iPod, pointing at the artist and kinda disbelieving of the uncanny luck.

"Stark sent me a song to show you, it's by them. We're..." he slid his thumb over the screen, pulling up YouTube because he was a Proper Twenty-First Century Citizen and typing in the name of the song. "...gonna listen to it on the way down."

He shifted the boombox in his hand, throwing an arm over Bucky's shoulders as the elevator doors slid shut and they began the descent to their floor.

The elevator doors slid open with a ding and Steve tugged Bucky into the hall, thumb pressing the play button, arm hooking around Bucky's neck just in time for the song to start.

"We walk out the cinema, about to go our separate ways," Steve tipped his head up and gestured with his free hand at the sky like somebody out of the films.

"And I, I almost wave goodbye, when you let your hair fall in your face," he tucked a piece of stray hair behind Bucky's ear and the crystal eyes rolled in fond exasperation.

"And I often wonder why the things that I want are so hard to find," Steve sang, tugging Bucky towards the kitchen and setting the boombox on the table. "But I often fail to see the things that I need are right here by my side."

He pressed a kiss to Bucky's cheek and a metal arm shoved him for his efforts and Steve grabbed the steel fingers, tugging Bucky back in with a twirl, one hand pressing tight to his lower back as he lifted his eyebrows and sang with overexaggerated sincerity.

"Something in the air is giving me bad ideas,"

"Always," Bucky grumbled in agreement and Steve swayed them side to side, still on top of the world and full of energy from that smile, no matter how much Bucky was pretending to complain now.

"Something in the air is giving me dangerous thoughts, like..." Steve took the pause, gathering courage before he let the words slip out of his mouth.

"...Why don’t you stay at mine tonight?" The song echoed the question in the background and Steve rolled his lips in, refusing to get nervous and let his heart rate raise the way Bucky's eyebrows suddenly did. So he'd never explicitly asked before, but.

"Why don’t you stay with me...and be my sidekick, sidekick?" Steve twirled him out with a shove and it was a good thing he did, because as soon as Buck spun back to facing him, his mouth was open in shocked, exaggerated offense. Steve offered a don't kill me smile.

"Do you, do you, do you wanna be my sidekick, sidekick?"

"I will sidekick your ass," Bucky declared, then there was a heavy boot colliding with Steve's hip and Steve barely caught Bucky's ankle before it knocked him over, laughing and tugging Bucky down sideways with him as he did lose his footing after all.

They landed in a pile on the tile floor and Bucky wasn't trying to kick him anymore, just tickle him, which was a hell of a lot worse, so Steve grabbed his hands and rolled them over, pressing kisses to Bucky's face so he'd stop trying to attack Steve for the sidekick comment.

"We’re kissing on that kitchen floor, our friendship up against the ropes," the song sang from the boombox on the table and Steve suddenly broke off, pushing up to look down at the crazy waves of brown hair and parted lips because that opportunity was too good to pass up.

"I've got you on the ropes," he exclaimed, then he was being shoved onto the tile floor none too kindly and even if the air hadn't been knocked out of him Steve wouldn't be able to breathe anyways, he was laughing too hard at the scandalized look on Bucky's face.

They wrestled around on the ground, tumbling over the tile and shoving into cabinets and walls before somebody finally pinned somebody and they were kissing.

The best idea to shut Bucky up was definitely by kissing him. And, strangely, for once they agreed on something because Bucky was kissing him back enthusiastically, giving up his attempts to tickle Steve to run his hands in swirly lines down Steve's spine instead.

"Well it just occurred to me the one that I need could be right here by my side." The words floated over them and Bucky was smiling into his mouth and Steve adjusted the angle to kiss that smile right off his lips, taste happiness like if he could memorize the flavor they could feel this way forever.

"Something in the air is giving me bad ideas, something in the air is giving me wicked thoughts..."

"Wicked thoughts, huh?" Bucky murmured, words squished by Steve's mouth, so he reluctantly pulled back a little, blinking his eyes open while the song reverberated that question through the room, settling the meaning heavy in their gazes.

"Why don’t you stay at mine tonight?"
It could mean sleeping next to each other the way they used to. Or maybe. Maybe it could mean something more.

"Why don’t you stay with me and be my sidekick, sidekick?"

To be fair, Bucky'd been offended as hell at being portrayed as a 16-year-old in a mask and tights, and after everything that'd happened since, he'd imagine being called a mere sidekick was even more offensive.

Which was exactly why he ran his fingers through Bucky's hair, eyes wide and innocent as he cooed, "C'mon, you'd be a great sidekick, baby."

And also why Bucky kicked his shin, flipped him onto his back and shoved him sliding halfway across the kitchen tiles in a single maneuver with a very loud shout of "The Winter Soldier is not a sidekick."

Steve was out of breath again, wheezing laughs as he grabbed onto the counter and hauled himself back to his feet, leaning on the granite for support.

"Do you, do you want to be my...?"

Buck pushed up to his feet too, fluid and easy, moving like a different kind'a dancer now, a ballerina or a trapeze artist, all grace and waterfall movements as he slid back up to Steve's side just in time for Steve to mouth the words do you want to be mine? against his cheek.

He got a contemplative noise in return, a stiff hand rubbing over the top of his shoulders, and Steve closed his eyes again, tipping his head against the side of Bucky's and breathing in the heat of his skin.

"Something in the air is giving me bad ideas," Steve whispered along to the song and the ripple down Bucky's spine was unmistakable, the shiver making his metal fingers pulse and tighten, plates shifting with a whir. He slid his lips over to Bucky's ear, pressing the words tight against his skin. "Something in the air is telling me you could be my..."

Settling his grip on Bucky's hips, Steve pulled them away from the counter, gazes locked as he backed towards the archway into the hall. "...sidekick, sidekick."

There was too much loaded on this to let it happen this easy, so as soon as he backed into the hallway Steve let them settle against the wall, unmoving as he ran his thumbs over the defined bones of Bucky's hips, ignoring the fading music in the background as he leaned his mouth beside Bucky's ear again.

"C'mon, Buck, answer the question." He kissed the soft skin of his neck and Bucky shivered against him, taking a moment to get ahold of his voice again before he answered in that familiar, masked nonchalance.

"Be your sidekick? Aren't I kinda--"

"Will you stay at mine tonight?" Steve interrupted, pulling back so he could see the emotions flickering through Bucky's eyes in the dim light.

He was frozen, studying Steve with the skilled, observant debate of a sniper. Steve waited, patiently, his hands stilled on Bucky's hips because if they were going to do this, they were going to talk about it like adults instead of dancing and flirting like the crazy teenagers they'd been all night.
"Maybe," he finally relented, not sounding adverse as much as cautious. "Let me take a shower and think on it, then...then we'll see."

Steve nodded, ducking his head with a sincere smile that invoked another fond shove, then Bucky backed up a foot, eyes still on Steve as he tugged tantalizingly at the hem of his tshirt and added, "And no, you can't join me."

"I wasn't gonna offer!" He clutched a hand over his heart in offense and Bucky's eyes went wide with dancing amusement.

"Oh you totally were." Steve looked scandalized at the suggestion, a slip in the usual teasing for whatever concern Steve had about Stepping Over Lines and Bucky wanted to kiss him for that, too. Instead he kept up the innocent act, taking another step backwards as he teased. "It was in your eyes, Rogers. I can read you like a book."

And finally Steve seemed to catch on he was still playing, the worry draining entirely as he shuffled awkward on his feet, arms crossing over his chest as he pouted.

"You're a... book," he responded lamely and Bucky threw back his head and laughed, because sometimes Steve was the same ninety-pound punk he'd grown up with and that was probably the very best thing about all of this. Bucky got to have them both.

The pout was too precious, he had to bound forward and kiss that pretty mouth one more time, lips sticking and popping apart with a wet sound as they both ached to hold on too long, but Bucky really had to go off for a shower, spend a few minutes alone to get his head on straight without the poison of Steve's taste on his tongue.

So he smacked Steve's hip and darted for the bathroom door, only Steve caught him first and shoved him and Bucky had to shove him back and he barely got his hand on the doorknob, turning it quick and tumbling out of Steve's reach before it could turn into another battle that ended in kissing against walls and floors and maybe beds.

He stumbled into the bathroom, laughter echoing with the closing door, tile cold and smooth under his bare feet. A hand landing on the counter Bucky looked up, flashing crystal eyes meeting his own in the mirror, a beaming, brilliant reflection. That smile on his face, that joy in his eyes, that light and laughter tingling in the layer beneath his skin.

It almost didn't look real.

Like a doll.

Like a pretty painting.

A perfect machine.

He lifted a hand - the right one, both literally and figuratively - tentative fingers curling towards that expression in the mirror. Reaching forward, watching as the flesh grew closer and closer, until his fingertips were pressed against the shocking cold, hard, unfeeling glass. The surface of that smile. Glass.

Crystal eyes locked on his as the edges of the mouth fell, hundreds of feet down a mountain. The fire in eyes extinguished, burning flame flickering to ashes of paper drawings. The bright joy sinking through a frozen river to settle against the billowing dusty bottom of reality. He watched as the man in the mirror faded.

If he pressed hard enough, maybe his fingers could go right through the glass, delve into that shiny, gooey material to reach that face in the mirror, touch real skin, feel what a smile meant against his fingertips. Skin pushed harder, glass creaked in warning and his hand flew back like fire.

Those eyes were dead now, looking back at him. If he opened his mouth to scream, no sound would come out on this side of the mirror, not when the dead man staring at him was locked inside that shiny, silver box, behind the glass wall.

Bucky cut his gaze away, staring at shaking hands. One grabbed the faucet handle, turned the sink water on full blast to fill the bathroom with noise. He couldn't hear his own breathing. He wouldn't know he was breathing at all if it weren't for the stinging blood pumping through the veins beneath the translucent skin on his wrists.

Shoving his hands under the clear spray, waiting for water to wash the shaking away, only the water wasn't touching him at all. Full, wet, circle droplets sliding off his skin, over his hands and gone, nothing was sinking in. Nothing was staying. Like duck's feathers, waxed cars, waterproof dogs, the water slid off his skin and none of it sank in. It wasn't permeant. He was impermeable.

He'd been letting himself slip. He'd been letting himself forget. He'd been breathing, blinking, thinking automatically. A month and a half ago he'd shouted at Steve that they'd broken every bone in his body. Tackled Steve to the ground when he tried to snap his own wrist.

They'd done -- Hydra'd done so much to him. He had all those years of training and torture and hell shoved inside his head and he'd been ignoring them. Kissing Steve's mouth to forget the taste of blood on his tongue.

It still happened.

Bucky stared at his hands under the spray of the water. The water slid right off his hands and drained down into the sink. That part wasn't a war story. Seventy years that didn't fit in - that was a horror movie, no plot but pain and terror.

He could rub a towel over his hands and all of the water would be gone. Just like that. Nothing stuck. Nothing absorbed. Nothing lasted. Nothing stayed-

The water was cold, flooding his eyes as he shoved his head under the faucet. It drained down the long strands, soaking his head, but at least it proved he was real. His hair was wet, dripping into the sink, running down his forehead, but at least it would stay that way. At least it proved he could be touched. At least it didn't slide off like his skin.

The towel was rough on his head, turning dripping to damp, then he was staring at the reflection again and finally, fuck, something changed. He smoothed his hands over his head, pushing strands flat to his head, slicking it all back until the length disappeared, until the man in the mirror looked like someone he knew. He used to wear his hair like this, all slicked back. Especially for special occasions. And funerals.

The person in the silver box could almost be him. If it weren't for the hunk of ugly metal hanging off his body. Metal.

Bucky dug his fingers in his pocket, pulling out the chain with a soft clink. He hadn't had the courage to wear them. Sitting the tags on the counter, he pulled his shirt over his head, smoothing his hair down again before unbuttoning his pants, dropping them to the floor and toeing them aside, sliding down his briefs too, pushing the pile of clothes out of the way, peeled out of this century and left with nothing but his body.

He turned to the man in the mirror again. If he looked at the right half of his body, he could be back in 1944. What he'd give to be back in 1944.

They'd danced tonight, under the stars. Laughed and kissed. Steve was waiting for him in his bedroom in this lavish palace of glass. He had a team. They made him a cake, got him gifts, trusted him.

What he'd give to be back in 1944.

He lifted the dogtags off the counter, holding them up in the air and watching the bright bathroom lights reflect off the glint. If he had to choose -

- go through the hell of Hydra and be with Steve, or
- go back to the simplicity of the war and watch Steve marry Peggy

At least he was invited over for dinner on Sundays. Steve was so much...brighter, then. He was still beautiful now, but that easy, sunny joy? Nothing was easy anymore. Bucky'd give up kissing those precious lips for the rest of his life if it meant Steve could have a home.

The dogtag chain was big enough that he could slip it over his head, slicked-back hair setting the strangest illusion of youth. He almost looked 28.

Steve knew he'd been drafted. The way he'd acted, his response, the easy way he was around Bucky now. He thought that was it. He thought that being drafted was the scary, dark secret Bucky'd been hiding away since '43, he thought everything was in the open and fixed now.

He had no idea. That was nothing, not in comparison.

The metal settled on his chest. Familiar clanking, cold, his name etched and unforgettable.

James.

Buchanan.

Barnes.

"Bucky?"

A naked soldier staring at his reflection, wishing he had the courage or incentive to cut his hair off, wishing the body in that glass box could belong to him.

Crystal scanned over his reflection, looking at the expanse of bare skin, wondering if he could carve his way inside, force his mind back into that body manually. He was nothing but metal and bone now - more metal against his chest now. He'd always been metal.

Clanking.

There were fingerprints on the mirror. Fingerprints on the counter and the doorknob. Sloppy. Worse than sloppy - a death sentence. Shaking hands grabbed the towel and started to scrub. Smear. The man in the mirror looked distressed and Bucky ignored him, wiping away the evidence. He'd been here.

This body had been here.

There were fingerprints all over the apartment. Sloppy sloppy sloppy. If Hydra came, there'd be so much proof, so easy to track, he'd have to burn the place down--

His fingerprints were all over Steve. He'd touched his face and his arms and his back and his hips and his mouth and if they got their hands on Steve they'd have proof of that, they'd have proof that Steve was involved and they'd kill him, they'd torture him and he wouldn't break not like Bucky did so they'd kill him and it'd be his fault because he'd left proof, his hands, this skin, had betrayed him and he'd have to flay Steve's skin off to save him--

Metal fingers slammed on the hot water in the shower. More than hands were shaking now and he didn't wait for the temperature, ducking into the waterfall, under the spray and let the water rush over him - untouched. It burned his lips and his eyelids and the skin of his wrists and his lower back and his chest, it was burning a hole in his chest.

The dogtags heated up and they were searing hot into his skin, imprinting his name so he could never forget again only nothing stayed, nothing lasted, all the scars and burns were gone.

Except his arm.

The metal burned. It was still burning when he slammed the water back off, leaning his forehead on the cool tiles to clear the swimming vision. It didn't clear.

He dried off automatically. Wrapped in a towel. He didn't look at the man in the mirror.

He went straight to his room. Steve heard him. Came and hesitantly knocked on the door once Bucky was dressed. Bucky didn't answer.

He'd said maybe. It was never. He couldn't -- it was too deep. Everything with Steve ran too deep.

They'd used Steve to break him. Of course he was still broken. He couldn't turn to the cracks in his heart for comfort, not when Steve'd been the one that'd caused them.

Why don't you stay with me tonight?

He pulled the sheets over his head. Eventually footprints walked away from his door. Steve got the message.

Except really, he didn't. He had no idea.

The nightmare was inevitable. Waking up silent was the only blessing. He used to be perfectly silent.
Efficient. Now he was a fucking mess. A fucking mess.

Whatever the mess you are, you're mine, okay?

Shut the fuck up, Bucky told the Steve in his head, the first cognitive thing he'd processed in the past five minutes of rocking, clutching his head as he shook. Most times, Steve came barging in. It was like he had a sense of when Bucky woke up with a nightmare.

It'd been a terrible one. There'd been a hole in his chest, a smoking burning hole where his dogtags now burned against his skin. He'd pulled a knife from that hole, carved the skin off Steve's pretty face, carved him down to a skeleton while Steve looked up at him lovingly and even his skeleton was golden, made from the sun and the moment Bucky's fingers had touched it it'd burnt black, spreading like a disease, crumbling to ashes--

He shoved metal knuckles in his mouth to stifle the whimper.

His eyes were squeezed shut and the darkness did nothing to ground him. He had to stay silent. Steve couldn't come in here right now.

The taste of metal on his tongue. Bitter like blood. Only maybe there was blood in his mouth too.

Copper and steel swirled over the backs of his teeth, drowning his throat. A metal swirling poison. Topped off with salt from the tears streaming down his face.

Curling up into a ball, as tiny as he could get, holding his arms around himself as more tears and salt dripped against metal and a cotton pillow that felt like falling.

Always falling.

Every day, for you. WITH YOU.

But Steve hadn't. Bucky'd fallen alone.

His shoulders shook. He shook until he cried himself back to sleep.

But at least he'd accomplished the mission. He'd kept quiet. So quiet Steve never knew. Steve never came. Just like he'd told himself.

It was better this way, he was made - designed - to fall alone.

---

Chapter End Notes

I'd like to give a reference to Amanda H and her VA group - one of the quotes is taken directly from a comment of their group leader, an Army psychologist. Innumerous thanks to this VA group for reading TIMLB, all of your comments give me a kind of purpose I haven't had in a long time. So shout out to each and every one of you for being amazing, incredible soldiers who fought with the kind of inspiration these boys do.

And here are the songs:

Poison - Groove Coverage (this song is 300% Bucky in this chapter it's great) Shut up and Dance - Walk the Moon
Sidekick - Walk the Moon

Thank you all so much for hanging in there with me this long. God it's been crazy.

P.S. your lovely comments are my life force and you are all positive darlings
xx
Двадцать Один (Twenty-one)

Chapter Notes

Warnings: verbal discussion of nonconsenting sexual encounters, brief thoughts of self-harm and low-key suicidal ideation (really low-key), someone gets shot, discussion of war as always. Dissociative minds, vertigo, a lot of yelling.

Also there is a lot of falling over in here, people's bodies are betraying their insides and just fyi that happens a lot.

There are a couple of stabs at AOU (couldn't resist), but nothing that spoils the movie. And there is no intention of hating on Laura Barton, but the AOU storyline really doesn't fit with this one. Clint's farm is therefore empty.

The song "Til Death" by Barcelona is making yet another appearance. (It is the theme song of this fic after all.)

The Words - Christina Perri
World Without You - Hudson Taylor
Guilty Filthy Soul - Awolnation

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

This is My Last Breath

...:

A love story.

He'd seen Steve his whole life. Wanted to kiss him since the war, last night, last week, always. They were on that verge again. The cliff to something more: only they didn't cannonball off holding hands, Bucky tripped and fell, sinking through the whipping wind and snow until he splattered on the riverbottom below and wrenched off a limb.

That's what it felt like. Again. He hadn't wanted anything in so long; and the logistics behind wanting, the rationality, the lack of efficiency behind personal frivolous desires? Synopsis: useless.

Only Steve kept kissing him and Bucky didn't have the power to tell him no. Because he wanted to kiss Steve, more than anything. He just couldn't figure out why Steve was pretending to want it to.

Was it a tactical move? Forcing Bucky's emotions to form a deeper connection and gain control over the asset? But this was Steve, not Hydra. So was it outta the goodness of his heart? Finally giving Bucky something he'd wanted for the sake of making him happy?

On Steve's dime, of course. Or, well. His body.

So he'd wanted to bring Bucky flowers as a kid. Maybe even told the truth about always wanting to kiss him. But they were best friends, impossibly close. Bucky was what Steve knew, what he trusted. Mere Exposure. It was all imprinting, that fuzzy line where he wanted comfort and Bucky's attention and maybe at one point mistook it for something else.

Sailors who spent too long at sea, isolated, surrounded by water for years, underwent a phenomenon: started to see manatees as mermaids, long and lust after them, because it was what they knew, all they had. Then, of course, the moment any deep connection was made, the effect shattered and reality hit like a tidal wave.

Bucky was waiting for the tidal wave. For the day Steve woke up and realized - shit, I don't actually like him like that, I just needed to have him close.

Only for Bucky, he'd never wake up and think that. He wished to god he could. Steve had other people - Nat, Sam, Peggy, Tony, that one god-friend he talked about. All Bucky had was Steve and he'd sworn to himself he wouldn't let Steve be his only tether to the Earth and he--

He couldn't.

They may be a love story, but there wasn't a happy ending.

The sheets were technically soft, but they felt like sandpaper on his skin. Like he'd been laying here for days. He hadn't - it'd been a week since his birthday. They'd been busy with missions and the drone of everyday life and really, the past seven days were blurrrier than anything else in his memory. He'd drifted through them all. Perfectly, he was fairly sure.

His mask was incredible.

But when night fell - the darkness let paint run from his face and shadows cut his features. If only they'd leave permanent marks.

He was on his stomach, arms wrapped underneath a pillow, trying to get out of his head when it hit him like a bus. He couldn't remember if he'd been eating regularly or not, couldn't remember much at all except Steve's hands brushing his arm, his collarbone, his neck; except it didn't matter if it was lack of food or whatever, the world suddenly tipped sideways and Bucky's brain short-circuited.

One moment laying quiet and the next everything was wobbling, distant and dizzy like spinning in that coffin-machine Hydra'd shoved in the 50s, unstable and suddenly washed over with the unmistakable urge to hurl.
He couldn't hurl, couldn't bring that mess up again.

Forcing his feet into the kitchen to get water, he could do that. The world was still tipping, he felt like hell, everything was too far away; echoing. Coming in, he'd kept his hand on the wall. Those fingers now curled around the counter to keep him upright, gripping tight enough to ensure he wouldn't fall over.

Everything was pounding, shit. Head dipped, stupid fucking hair hanging in his face, breathing slow, itching fingers longing to grab a knife and saw off Hydra's destruction of his once beautiful pomade only he couldn't. Steve would freak, they all would, and he'd do anything to keep them from asking questions.

Speaking of which. Truthfully, Steve's real superpower wasn't the serum, it was goddamn perfect timing.

A single creak, then a sleepy soldier stumbling into the kitchen. Bucky didn't move, the shadows of the moonlight were keeping him in the dark and there was always a chance Steve'd go back to bed without noticing him. Neither of them used lightswitches, so with the dark on his side...

Beneath the veil of snakes in his face, he could see the black boxer shorts and loose gray army tshirt, flailing clumsy arms patting along the cabinets until he pulled open the right one, yanking a glass out and filling it with water and just a few more moments and he'd be gone, no dealing with questions -

Except then Steve turned around, glass tipped to his lips, and finally caught sight of Bucky. He nearly spit out his water in surprise and Bucky sighed. So much for that.

"Hey, Buck, you okay?" A few seconds and a big hand ran down his spine, the simple comforting kind that could've placed them back in Brooklyn. Then that sleep-warm mouth dropped a kiss to the top of his shoulder. Definitely not LittleSteve.

Why.

"Yeah. Just thirsty." His voice was even - a filter, separating him. Detached.

Tracing Steve's warmth behind him; then thick arms wrapped around his torso, spread fingers sliding over his chest, rippling sparks into his body. His eyes slipped shut, his chin dropped and the fog thinned. His chest expanded under Steve's hands. Only it really didn't, not the way it should. Steve's hands were compressing, couldn't breathe deeply.

"Mmm," Steve hummed against the cotton of his tshirt, low and rumbling as hands pressed tighter against flimsy ribs.

If he kept breathing shallow, he might pass out, slump right here on the counter while Steve caught him, slowly lowered him to the ground, worriedly calling his name and realizing how fucked up Bucky really was.

Except...he had training to breathe shallow. The Winter Soldier had to be able to stay perfectly still, learn how to breathe without expanding his chest or stomach or anything, look perfectly dead.

Because he'd been dead.

And now Steve's kisses were CPR, dragging him to reality, bringing him back to life. Except everything was easier when you were dead.

Warm lips brushed damp against the nape of his neck and Bucky pushed off the counter, head lifting and chest breaking free, spinning out of Steve's reach and molding his face into a sleepy smile. Steve was a little confused but that was okay, so long as he wasn't suspicious. Bucky rubbed his eyes for good measure, running a hand down Steve's arm before he could stop himself. It was instinctual, as real as he didn't feel. But it eased the tension a little and then he was heading back to his room and thankfully, Steve wasn't worried enough to follow.

Can ghosts have souls?

...

"Hey Barnes, you see the screwdriver around here anywhere?" Tony didn't bother glancing up from whatever he was attacking with a hammer.

"Don't you have bots designed specifically to retrieve you things?" Bucky sighed, not lifting his head from where his cheek was pillowed on his forearm, tracing useless designs into one of Stark's transparent tables.

"You're part robot," Tony shot back in his This Is Rational tone and Bucky glared at his shoulderblades, thinking how easy it'd be to kill him from here.

"But he's not yours," Steve interrupted, strolling through the sliding glass doors with a box in his hands and interrupting Bucky's six hours of peace. Again.

He held his breath, praying Steve wouldn't complete that thought with he's mine.

Thankfully, he didn't.

Tony did.

"I wouldn't mess with Property of Steve Rogers if it was the last option on our little blue marble," he announced, grabbing the screwdriver from literally two feet away and giving Steve a pointed look as he sat the boxes down.

"Don't belong to anyone," Bucky muttered under his breath, turning his face down towards the table. The surface was cold on the tip of his nose, strange in comparison to the warm arm still under his forehead.

"What's that, Buck?" Steve asked congenially, rough fingers rubbing into the back of Bucky's neck. Fuck, that felt good. But he wasn't gonna repeat himself, Steve didn't need to hear that - he'd freeze, lift Bucky's face from the table, kneel down in front of him with that hurt puppy look and press his fingertips into Bucky's thighs and promise that Steve never owned him.

Property of Steve Rogers.

He hummed uselessly instead and Steve dropped it, still rubbing the back of Bucky's neck as he chatted with Stark about something or another. Bucky stopped listening. Thankfully, he'd thought to tuck the chain of the dogtags under the lip of his shirt. He didn't need Steve to know. He'd worry.

He shouldn't worry.

...

"Cap, hold these."

Bucky flipped a page in his book, tucking his feet deeper under him and pretending he wasn't listening in to Bruce's and Steve's conversation. Doctor Banner wasn't in town for long, but he'd requested Steve for something and apparently that was adequate to do right here in the communal living room.

* A Farewell to Arms was intense, but nothing could distract him from the sudden weight of Steve's pretty blue eyes on him. With a repressed sigh he stuck a finger in his page, lifting his head to see whatever it was Banner'd given Steve and was apparently worth showing Bucky.

Thick black-rimmed glasses, eyebrows raised and waggling as he made a face. He was gorgeous, as always, looked like a proper hipster in Banner's glasses, but the smile Bucky gave him must not've been bright enough. The expression fell and before he could mend the crack in his mask, Steve was sinking down on the couch next to him, eyebrows crinkled now as he looked Bucky over with his worried CO face.

He didn't have the energy to sculpt a good reflection, but it didn't end up mattering. Steve glanced over his shoulder, ensuring Banner's back was to them, then big callused hands were cupping Bucky's face, tilting his mouth up to reach Steve's, glasses and all.

The kiss was so tender it sunk exhaustion heavy into his veins, made him want to collapse on Steve and fall asleep with their lips still overlapping, breathing into each other's mouths. Steve pulled back, tugging Bucky's lips lightly before sliding together again at a deeper angle, wetter now but still all sugar and sweet, palms framing Bucky's cheeks like he was something precious, mouths squeezing together all pretty and soft and really,

Bucky didn't deserve to be kissed like that.

He slipped out of Steve's hands, lips suddenly cold, blinking hard a few times to make the room stop wavering. Steve'll be suspicious, he was stumbling over masks that used to be airtight. Too much breathing room.

"Nat's a smart woman. Don't know who could resist kissin' you in glasses," his mouth supplied and good, that was sufficient enough, the smirk even felt familiar, had to be close to accurate. Convincing, at least?

The worry bled out of Steve's smile and one eyebrow cocked in amusement, and he looked so comfortable, one arm propped on the back of the couch and his body angled towards Bucky's. He was really settling into this. Increasingly happier.

A foot away but shrinking into the distance. Bucky couldn't keep up.

He lifted his tired legs off the couch, tensing his quads so he wouldn't fall, engaging decades of steel training. Something soft tugged inside his chest and Bucky leaned down, pressing his lips quickly to the corner of Steve's eye, beneath the black rims. If only it could stop the years of dried tears. Another smile and Hemingway in his arms as he retreated from the room.

The hallway was empty. The mask slipped so fast from his face it hurt, falling like a crash instead of the easy slide he'd perfected as a teen. The wall held him up when his body listed sideways, betraying him again but he had to be quiet, it'd all be shot to hell if Steve followed him out here.

A few moments to catch his breath, eyes closed, fucking hair in his face, lungs reset. Mask recalibrate. Pushing off the wall, taking strides down the hallway, forcing each step to get lighter. Roll shoulders back. Think murder.

But don't, not killing, he wasn't that monster anymore. A faded ghost, rusting machine; but not a "You sure like that book," Steve's voice was even lighter today. Sunshine on green grass, sparkling lakes. Summer.

Bucky lifted his head. Послушный Собака.

"It's World War One. Before even your time," Bucky teased, tipping his head back against the armchair as Steve walked behind him. No glasses now, running shirt tight on his shoulders.

He paused as he passed, one-sided mischief tucking into the corner of his lips. "You callin' me vintage?" Two hands curled around the back of Bucky's armchair, fingers inches from his shoulders. "I'll have you know I'm 27."

"Two years younger than me," Bucky provided perfectly, and Steve tipped his head back to laugh, one hand flying to his ribs.

"How many times? One year, three months, twenty-five days..."

His head was still tipped back against the edge of the armchair and Steve bent in half to press his top lip against Bucky's lower. A Spiderman-kiss, the media called it. Bucky opened his mouth to kiss back and he could swear he felt the toxicity rolling from his tongue to Steve's the moment they touched.

And he was dirty all over, covered in layers of grime and filth. During the war he'd pressed bloody, muddy hands to his face, wondered how Steve's hands could be so clean when they had the same filth coating them. But the dirt on Steve was precious earth, the blood spilt in justice. Bucky was steel, copper, swirling choking dust.

A pollutant. A parasite burrowing into Steve's veins each time his mouth sunk low enough to kiss Bucky's.

If he slid down the couch and curled up in a ball, started shaking, Steve would know. He'd come running around the edge of the couch, bundling Bucky into his arms and brushing long fingers through his hair, whispering soothing worried.

He forced himself to stay. Thankfully, Steve pulled back away with a happy, barely contained, bottom-lip-caught-in-teeth smile before he was contaminated beyond repair.

Bucky stared at the ceiling until Steve was gone on his run. He couldn't remember what he stared at after that.

"Yeah, uh, I'm actually real surprised Tony hasn't told you. He's gotta big mouth."

A laugh. "No, I guess not. I don't know what the policy on Asgard is-- oh. That's awesome, yeah, we're not quite that advanced over here. It's getting there, but honestly? I could care less if it was still illegal."
Another laugh and Bucky held his breath as there was a pause, silence as Steve paced the distance of the bar.

He hadn't meant to eavesdrop, but he'd come upstairs and Steve was on the phone, it was Hydra's instinct that had him pressed against the shadows around the corner, listening silently in curiosity. So far all he'd picked up was that Steve was talking to his teammate Thor, and whatever news he was relaying was irrationally exciting.

"Yeah, I. I can't wait for you to meet him, Thor. You'd love him."

Shit. This better not be about--

"Well, he's a warrior, like you. They call him the Winter Soldier- there's this quote that was published back in the day..."

Bucky cursed internally and forced himself not to bang his head against the wall in exasperation.

"...fought beside me everyday in the war, been keepin' me outta trouble since I was a kid. Yeah, yeah, just like that. War-brothers. He means the world to me." Laugh. "I know Earth's valuable, I'd still trade it for him in a heartbeat."

Another pause, then Steve's next words were wrapped up in a smile. "Yes, it does, but I'll bet yours beats faster around Jane...well I'm not a god...actually, he's got a version of the serum too, it's not as strong as mine but--Thor!! We haven't-- I mean. Hell."

Steve was blushing now, Bucky'd bet his best rifle on that. But he didn't dare peek around the corner to confirm it.

"Hmm? He...yeah. I couldn't imagine being with anyone else...I mean, I've been through alot, but nothing like what he's endured. Does Asgard take prisoners of war? Oh? Wow. And uh, Buck was one for seventy years...they kept him frozen a lot of the time. Yeah, I know. It's- it's not easy, but he's so strong. Tell you what, next time you hop down here, bring your hammer -- I'll bet he'd pick it up without thinking about it, probably shove it off the coffee table to put his feet up. Yes, I really do-- oh c'mon, it's more rational than an elevator..."

He didn't need to hear anymore. Bucky slid along the shadows of the wall until he reached the stairs again, taking them down one at a time because he wasn't sure his feet could go faster.

How long before Steve built him up so high he fell apart? How long before Steve took off the rose-colored glasses and the world shattered into reality?

He didn't want to be human if this is what it felt like. He'd do anything if it was what Steve needed, but he couldn't tell if this was all reversed and backwards instead.

His metal hand whirred as he turned the doorknob to their floor and Bucky barely repressed the urge to rip it from his body. He'd tried before - it wouldn't work anyways.

The door closed softly behind him and Bucky tightened his fists instead of sinking against it. Steve thought he was strong? Maybe he'd go shoot things until he felt that way too.

... He'd warned it might be a knife in the thigh. At least it wasn't a knife in the thigh.

Bucky shoved open the gym door, damp locker-room smoke rolling out behind him, and then an arm was around his waist, whipping him around fast and hard and suddenly his air-supply was cut off; he'd been tense; he hadn't been sleeping;

every muscle in his body blared threat, then his metal hand was knocking into something hard and there was a sound of pain and Bucky fell backwards on his ass, scrambling back to his feet with his stupid fucking hair in his face and fuck, why was he wearing yoga pants, there was no traction or tactical advantage--

"Steve?" He froze, gun dropping from metal fingers, hitting the ground with a loud clatter.

"Ow?" Steve replied, one hand on his purpling jaw and the other touching his lips tentatively, not looking all that shocked when his fingers pulled away warm and red.

Bucky just stared. He'd punched Steve: hard enough to make him bleed. Time passed uselessly as Steve felt his jaw tentatively and Bucky was frozen, he'd hurt little Stevie and he'd done that once, hadn't meant to, it'd been the worst memory of Brooklyn--

"Hey Stevie!" He stumbled into Steve's room, nearly tripping on the windowsill, but managed to plop down onto the thin, hard bed. Steve groaned and rolled away from him, shoving a pillow over his head.

"'ow'd you even get in here? It's like 11, Buck."

"M pretty sure 'ts 12," he slurred and Steve lifted his head, moonlight soft on his floppy hair.

"You drunk?"

"I hafta, hafta," he waved a hand around, looking for the right word before he suddenly remembered it, reaching clumsy hands to squeeze Steve's hip - missing the hiss of pain as the room tipped. ".-gotta teach y'ta fight, kid."

"Buck, not right now. I know you're still worked up over Tuesday, but I'm fine. Had it worse. Tomorrow, okay?"

"No, no, now. Can't see ya'like that 'gin Stevie, 'm not livin' through that again."

"I'm fine," Steve insisted, which was counteracted quite nicely as he sat up, wincing when stitches pulled, moonlight lighting up his broken face, swollen eye and mouth, gashed nose.

"See? Gotta a'least teach ya t'block."

"Buck, you know I ain't--"

Blocking? Yeah, he knew that. But he wouldn't be able to sleep tonight - hadn't been able to sleep, that's why he was here and wasted - if he didn't get this outta his mind. He'd never been so sure Steve was dead. Every time he closed his eyes--

"Gotta, Stevie, c'mon. Lemme." He tugged pathetically at one of Steve's impossibly thin arms, fingers wrapping all the way around and touching on the other side. Something in his expression must've made Steve realize he wasn't kidding, cause next thing he knew the little body'd clambered outta bed and was tugging him to his feet.

"Kay, you punch and I'll show you I can duck and we'll go back to bed, yeah?"
Bucky didn't answer, he just pulled back a fist and swung. Steve dodged as promised, little towhead ducking beneath him and circling behind except it was never one swing with bullies and they both knew that. He spun back around, aiming a gut punch and Steve barely skittered to the side.

Then the asshole was swinging back and Bucky'd known he would, and that was the exact-fucking-reason why Bucky couldn't sleep, because he knew one day Steve'd pick the wrong fight and he'd be finished, bleeding-out and glassy-eyed on the sidewalk by the time Bucky got there and he couldn't live through that.

He caught Steve's tiny fist, twisting it back and popping something and Steve yelped like a wounded puppy - only he didn't give up, he never gave up, he was never gonna get it, he'd give Bucky a legitimate heartattack eventually - and his pale barefoot kicked Bucky's shin hard, making him drop his grip.

The movement opened up Bucky's side and Steve used his other arm to punch directly under his ribs; only it felt like a chewed-tennisball dropped on your foot - soft and useless. He shoved tiny shoulders and Steve just bounded back, barreling forward with his fists raised and that fucker was so goddamn infuriating, how could he do this to Bucky?

He swung again and Steve dodged, faster than him when the room was spinning in drunken haze. So he shot out a foot and Steve tripped right into him, little fists flying and fuck, there was so much anger in those tiny hands as he hit Bucky over and over and the moon cast shadows over Steve's eyes like they weren't there at all, swollen and black, and Bucky swung again, connecting with Steve's jaw, hard enough to knock him down.

Up again, hair flying, spitting to the side like he was enjoying this and that was it. Bucky was too drunk to know his strength and Steve was too pissed to be properly cautious and he was already well banged up in the first place.

They collided again and it all happened so fast, then there was a loud crack and Steve was sliding down the wall and by the time Bucky rushed over Stevie was bleeding from the back of his head and cradling his elbow and blinking wetly and the stitches over his eye had split, blood dripping down the side of his face and--

--and the helicarrier was exploding around them, Steve's right eye orange and red, swollen to hell, lip busted, blonde hair sticking up in spikes, lungs stuttering, head snapping back over and over, each one hard enough to crack a normal human skull and Bucky was going out of his goddamned mind; because he didn't know who this man was and he knew him with every inch of his being, beating the fuck out of the only human that he'd ever seen in clarity - humans were nothing. Targets, blank, featureless; only this man was as clear as weapons, real as the guns in his holsters, as sharp as knives felt in skin.

Fist raised and the cold wind attacking his skin only he hadn't be able to feel it then, the only thing he could feel in that memory was the calculated rate of Steve's heart under his curled right hand.

His metal too, drawn back, hair whipping (back when he couldn't give a damn how long it was) as he stared down at the man who was willing to die to prove his loyalty to someone he thought Bucky was supposed to be.

Blind rage and fear to curiosity and wonder to recognition and horror.

One single punch away from murder. He'd hurt Steve.
"Bucky? Buck? C'mon, hey. It's okay. It's me. I'm okay." Something warm ran down his face and Bucky jolted, unfreezing as his eyes snapped up and met blue ones. Worried blue ones.

_Fuck._

He grit his teeth and turned his face away from Steve's touch, backing up a step to get un-tainted oxygen and shoving a pissed hand through the long hair, pushing it away instead of pulling it out.

"You okay?" A tentative hand on his shoulder he couldn't bear to shake off, then Steve's palm was running down his chest, words whispering soothingly. "God, you scared me. You okay? Fuck, you're tense. Buck, c'mon. It wasn't your fault, you were just in a headspace, but it's fine now. We're fine now."

Two hands running up and down his biceps and Bucky wouldn't break away, he knew better. He stared at Steve's barefeet and wondered when he'd gotten time to tan them to match the rest of the golden muscle. Maybe the serum fixed his white toes too.

His shoulders were too high, muscles tensed, metal clenched, and Steve only petted him softer, words gentler. "Just let go. Let me take care of you."

"And what, destroy the mermaid effect?" he mumbled to himself, thinking of crashing boats and sinking planes.

"The what?"

"Nothing," he muttered and Steve sighed, taking a step closer and stilling his hands atop Bucky's shoulders, thumbs pressed into his collarbones.

"Why won't you let me in, Buck?" His voice got quiet, low, so much lower than it'd been back then. "What more do I have to prove before you trust me?"

He wasn't talking about the punch, because that was to be expected some time or another. No, he was talking about the way Bucky was closing up. Funny thing was, he was looking at it all wrong. It had nothing to do with trust. Not that kind, anyways.

"That's not what this is about," his mouth said, and Bucky could punch himself for that, it'd all go away if he just kept _quiet_

"Then what is it about?"

Raised fists, all that radiating little anger in the moonlight :: Bloody and broken by Bucky's hand.

Neither of those things had gone away, but at least one was out in the open. The other...the other was tucked deep inside that body, the new one, the one that couldn't allow for rage. Didn't mean it was gone.

He had to look out for Steve. That was his _job_. And unless there was some alternative motive for the new twist in their relationship - like why the fuck had Steve kissed him in the first place, he'd understand.

Deep breath; oxygen. Optimal functionality.

He lifted his head, eyes locking on Steve's. Same colour blue. Still the same colour blue underneath all that black bruising, bright red blood;
"I can't let this happen, Steve." Just frozen, staring at him, and Bucky kept the gaze because he could do this, this was the one thing he'd never stopped being good at. Save Steve. "I've followed you around for years."

He took the thick wrists (his fingers couldn't wrap all the way around now) brought them down between their chests as his thumbs ran subconsciously over Steve's artist fingers, eyes cataloging how much had changed from the little fists he used to know. "...and I'll never stop chasing you, I don't think."

Never wasn't a long enough word because he'd always go where Steve led, "But what makes you think you can stop running?"

He lifted his chin again, meeting those eyes with the glimmer of defiance they used to share, the one Steve pretended he didn't have anymore. The one Steve pretended he could drop. Just like he could apparently drop PTSD, depression, and his addiction to the battlefield.

"What do you mean?" Eyebrows furrowed, genuinely confused, because this ran so deep he was lying to himself and Bucky couldn't do it anymore, he couldn't get deeper entangled with Steve when there was this sitting between them.

The fight. The war. Their story - Steve wanted him to let go.

Let go.

When the fuck had Steve ever let go? And he suddenly wanted to now?

He wanted, what, a steady boyfriend? Kisses over morning coffee and snuggling on the couch to movies? This war hero wanted to let go of all their protective walls and safety nets and break down the barriers around two of the most dangerous people on the planet and shove them into the same box with no secrets left?

Two catalysts, two broken shells cracking against each other and letting go, letting all of both their pain bleed into each other, he really thought that was a good idea?

Steve was notorious for bad ideas, but them giving this their all...that was the most dangerous idea he'd had in decades.

And why why why, what was the fucking point, why would he push this that far if it was just a game? Or maybe that was the whole purpose of the game? Break Bucky's walls down, get him to let go, then they could ease out of the kissing stuff and get back to being best friends only Bucky's heart would be shattered and Steve'd be happier than ever, thinking he had the dedication of his just best-friend at his side forever...

"I'm done, I'm ready, I just want to be with you now--"

"And I can't trust that," Bucky interrupted, and that pretty, earnest smile wilted like autumn leaves and Bucky hated himself for saying this, but he had to, had to drop their hands apart. "I can't let go, Steve. I can't fall into this. I've hurt too much in the past."

The dropped hands lifted to his neck and that really wasn't the point but he was glad as hell he'd put a shirt on, that Steve couldn't feel his dogtags.

"I'm so sorry, Buck. But that's all over now. It's just you and me--"
"Until it's not, until I lose you again and I lose everything."

It wasn't supposed to come out that blatant and honest. But it did and Steve's eyebrows furrowed in confusion, because he still didn't get it.

"Wha--"

"Nothing. God." He lifted his arms and shot them out, breaking Steve's grip an ounce too violently, the purpling bruise on Steve's jaw screaming at him now as Bucky glared. "Leave me the fuck alone, Steve."

Not the most subtle. But efficient.

He got about 24 hours of reprieve, anyways.

...

"Hey," a tentative voice as Steve knocked on his open bedroom door, hands shoving in his pockets nervously. "Can I come in?"

Mechanically lifted his shoulders up and let them fall, thought about how goddamned inefficient shrugging was. Waste of energy.

"Are you--"

"I'm sorry I yelled at you. I shouldn't've freaked." He scooted over in his reading chair and Steve sat down carefully on the armrest, looking down at Bucky with a soft, forgiving gaze, reaching out to tuck a strand of snakehair behind his ear.

"It's okay, Buck. We've all got bad days."

He kept his mouth shut when he smiled lightly because opening it might mean saying or bad months. But he'd been doing so good, besides the one break. Everything else, he'd been perfectly convincing. He could go back to that now.

At least until he completed his mission of finding out Steve's mission. Why why why.

A gentle kiss pressed to his forehead and Bucky closed his eyes, sucking in a breath at the warmth on his skin. Sometimes it felt like he'd never been touched before, the way his body starved for Steve's. The starvation didn't make him any less queasy, didn't make him pray any less for Steve to get away before he was ruined from Bucky's sheer proximity.

"Lunch?" Steve asked, standing and offering a hand. Bucky took it, using the ruse of sitting his book down to make sure his legs were stable - enough - before following Steve numbly into the kitchen, letting the world fade into the distant part of his brain again.

...

He couldn't place it exactly. But it was there.

See, he knew it had to be something. Steve just wasn't like...this.

The more he saw of twenty-first century Steve, the further the Steve Rogers he knew felt. This...this was Captain America, not Steve Rogers.

Like seeing that exhibit made him forget everything he stood for in Brooklyn. Or hell, even in the
This Steve - the one that wanted to kiss him? He was still sunshine, but where was the spark? The thing that made that scientist pick him up for Rebirth in the first place.

Steven Grant Rogers was a troublemaker.

This Captain America fella was all rainbows and sweet befuddlement over the new century.

Steve was hiding a lot. The Steve that kissed him wasn't Steve and that was it, he couldn't take that. It was proof that this - whatever this was - wasn't real. Because this wasn't his little troublemaker.

Hell, the most in-character thing Steve did lately was the surprise-attack kiss Bucky punched him for.

Fuck, now? The way he'd been acting lately...this was the kinda guy to shout language! in the middle of a mission, instead of slicing the throat of a Hydra agent with his shield and kicking the guy in the chest with a take that, fucker.

Which yes, Bucky had witnessed with his own two eyes. (In fairness, the Hydra agent had Monty in a headlock only moments before), but still.

The Steve that joked with the Avengers felt...fake.

His Steve in Brooklyn had always been righteous, always been inherently good. But he wasn't some naïve golden puppy. He wasn't the kinda guy to settle back and be content - always looking for something more, always trying to prove himself.

Even in the war, the constant stream of battles: they fought people back then, men with wives and families, innocent kids who got drafted only to take one of Steve's bullets to the chest. Now it was aliens and creatures and robots they fought. No moral confliction there.

People treated Steve like he was made of gold and hell yes his core was, but what happened to the hardened shell? When did he get all soft? Why was he acting? Why was he hiding? Why did he always use his commanding voice around his team?

Why did he kiss Bucky all soft and sweet?

It was all wrong. The only time it felt like Steve at all was when the shield was in his hand.

He still did stupid shit in the battlefield, which was actually a solace. His fighting style changed, but at least that felt true. On the helicarrier, he'd been tough - skilled. Smart. That was Steve. He'd seen clips of the stupid fucking elevator fight. That was definitely Steve.

All that brutality, the simmering-under-the-surface-hate. Bottled up, barely contained. It was still coming out in his fists. Thing was, those fists dropped the second the shield did. That wasn't like Steve. It was like he was...afraid to be himself off the battlefield.

Like the battlefield was the only place he was comfortable in his own skin. Maybe that was because the whole world used to be a battlefield for him - he was fighting for his size, for his country. He'd never had to live in a world without constant fighting. And he didn't know what to do with himself.

Steve hadn't had to be anyone but Captain America for nearly a year. He didn't have to be Steve Rogers, because no one even knew who that was. His closest friends saw exactly what Steve wanted them to: dude, Captain America needs my help, there's no better reason to get back in. He'd submerged himself in the role. Which was easy when it's all his friends knew. It wasn't lying, because Captain America was still a part of him, but it wasn't all the truth either.

How much?

WHY?

This wasn't Steve. What was this game?

The asset couldn't figure out the fucking mission.

...

He could pretend he was in control if he ignored Steve.

Really, Bucky couldn't breathe right when he wasn't in the room.

...

Left alone, staring up at the dark ceiling; he couldn't decide.

There was a monster deep inside him and he'd been feeding it. It was either that or starve.

Stave for Steve's touch, for his smile, for the security of his kisses.

Or let himself burn up in flames.

The hunger left pangs of hurt in his chest, in his heart.

Yards away, Steve was sleeping alone in his own bed. The darkness was sweeping Bucky out again.

He couldn't remember moving, but somehow he was standing outside Steve's door, knuckles rapping once before he wrapped hoodie arms around himself and shivered in the cold.

Losing his grip, losing his mind, then Steve's door was opening, just in time before Bucky took it all back. It'd brought him here tonight, but the horizon was still wavering, he couldn't see straight.

He stumbled inside and warm hands guided him to Steve's bed. He curled up the moment he hit the mattress and Steve climbed around him, pulling the blankets over them both and flipping over, scooting so his shoulders lined up against Bucky's.

Back to back, the way they had in the war. Brothers in a dim-glowing tent.

The world slid black and for once, he didn't scream.

...

Eyes shooting open into darkness. Calculate: body behind him, stiffling blankets, wrong room.

His muscles ached to run.

He held his breath and counted, staring at the blackened windows and convincing himself not to crash through them.

The soft earth wasn't beneath them. There was a mattress and a floor, then another floor and another and another and so much open space, they were floating in the sky so goddamned high, and-- Rolling off the bed, dropping to the carpet, catching himself on his hands to keep it silent. Holding breath; no movement.

The floor wasn't low enough.

At least he hadn't learned from Hydra how to sneak out of a room without waking Stevie.

Elevator button blinked, coming down from the top. Watching the dot move closer. He didn't have the energy for the stairs, he'd probably launch himself over the side and hope he didn't break too many bones when he hit the bottom. He couldn't keep floating up here.

The elevator was safe. Ding, slide. And occupied.

He froze, arms curling tighter around his chest, eyes wide as he stared. He wasn't gonna get in, it was so late, why was anyone else even up--

Sam's hand blocked the elevator door from closing. He'd have to get in now, or Sam'd worry. More than the brown eyes already were.

He stepped inside.

The doors slid shut. Floor dropping. Fuck, he hated that.

"Bed? Too soft?" a solid, quiet, sympathetic voice beside him. Bucky stared up at the blinking dots, watching them descend.

He wondered what Sam would say if Bucky replied, I wasn't in my bed. Not like they'd been doing anything but sleeping, but.

"Too many floors up," he replied, eyes still on the descending lights. Like him.

Sam raised an eyebrow. He hadn't heard that one before. But Barnes was kinda a unique creature.

He reached over Sarge, unlighting the button for his floor. There were other places that needed him more right now.

Bucky turned his head, studying with searching eyes. Sam shrugged, settling his stance and staring forward. Another few blinking dings passed before he cleared his throat, hands shoved in his pockets as he offered,

"Tony's lab in the basement?"

...

There was a camping pack in the lab's back cabinets that Sam pulled out with a quiet triumphant sound, unzipping it to unroll a two-man prop-up tent. There were sleeping bags in the cabinet too.

He had a feeling Jarvis and the robots might've had something to do with that.

Sam must've expected him to stand idly by while he wrestled with the tent, silent and useless. Bucky didn't understand Steve and he didn't know Steve's mission but he sure as hell knew tents. WWII gave him quite a bit of experience.

He knelt down beside Sam on the concrete floor, taking one of the long poles and snapping the ends together.
"You guys use tents in your war?" Bucky asked, wrestling one of the extended poles through the tent-loops. Sam sat back on his heels, still surprised Bucky was helping and talking, but he was on the ground (underground - even better) now and didn't have to think about Steve for a little while.

Or, not the Steve that kissed him anyways. The Steve he'd shared tents with didn't make his soul ache. He could smile fondly at the memory of that Steve.

"Yeah. I mean, not like this. There were team tents - 10 to 20 men per tent. If you're on the move, you usually dig and sleep in a grave. Rocks for pillows. That's a lot of desert." He started feeding the other pole to cross-section Bucky's and there weren't exactly dirt places to drive in the stakes -- how mad would Stark be if they hammered tent stakes into his concrete floors?

"Desert. I wonder if snow-forests or hell-deserts are worse to fight in."

"It's still all war, still all fightin' man." Sam shook his head and Bucky made a noise of agreement, picking up a stake and seriously debating whether Stark would kill him or not.

"We could duct-tape the edges down?"

He looked up, between the silver tape in Sam's hand and the wooden stake in Bucky's silver hand. That was much better than cracking the concrete.

They got to duct-taping and it was nice. All quiet, like how it used to be with Steve. Easy. How it could still be with Steve if he knew why Steve'd made them more than best friends. It wasn't the kissing he had the biggest problem with, it was that he still didn't know why why wh--

"Sarge?"

"Mm? Oh. Sorry. Uh, what were you saying?"

"Green or black snivel gear? If, you know. You sleep in that kinda thing."

"Green."

"Really?" Sam handed the green one over, folding back the tent flap to roll the black one out inside.

"I thought you liked black. Wear it all the time."

"It hides the blood of my enemies."

Sam barked a laugh and Bucky cocked an eyebrow, pinning him with a serious look. The laugh faded as Sam caught the expression, his eyebrows raising in return.

"You weren't kidding."

"No."

Another laugh, lighter this time and shorter, the kind that sounded more amazed than anything. He held back the tent flap for Bucky and he crawled inside, flattening out the sleeping bag beneath him.

"Besides," Bucky started, unzipping the side of the bag and taking note of how much smaller the world was from the inside of a tent. "Green was better camo for Egyptian PT's. Forest, remember?"

"War, man."

"War," Bucky agreed, flipping over to shove into the sleeping bag, slick material whistling around him as his feet slid to the bottom.
Sam settled in, rolling on his side to face Bucky. A few seconds convincing himself and Bucky turned his head too, hair flopping haphazardly. The concrete was super uncomfortable and the most comforting thing he'd slept on in months.

There was a lantern between them, flickering gold, and at least that hadn't changed. There were white and blue lights now, but this one was gold, the way it used to be.

He'd never shared a tent with Gabe, but the gold looked just the same over Sam's dark skin as it did over anyone else's, shining and flickering like the promise of an ending. The hope of an ending. A victory, a finale, the grand explosion in the streets that sent hats flying instead of heads.

They'd never seen that.

"You win your war?"

"Not over yet." Sam shifted his head, tucking an arm under his temple. "You win yours?"

"You read the textbooks," Bucky shrugged and the sleeping bag whispered around him again.

"Not the one I was talking about."

The tent fell silent.

Those brown eyes were steady on his, flickering with lantern light, and Bucky wondered what his own silver looked like in the flicker.

Minutes ticked by; he could hear them on Sam's watch. It was half a millisecond slow, but he'd had a lot of training on perfect timing. Sam probably wouldn't notice until it got to be a whole minute off. That was fine.

He rolled his head again, kicking his feet out further and folding both arms under his head, staring up at the ceiling. Ten minutes ago, this space had been immense, towering lights and technological toys and concrete floors and now it was just a little golden bubble, a piece out of time he was carved into. And once they took it down, it'd be like it never existed.

"I don't get him."

"Does anyone?" Sam asked, but it wasn't as rhetoric as it was meant to be.

"I used to." He shifted, thinking of fire escapes and sketchbooks and playgrounds and kitchen tables and battlefields.

"He's changed."

"Not as much as he wishes." Rage eyes.

"What do you wish?"

He wished he knew why Steve's latest dangerous idea was one that'd ruin them both.

Steve'd had a lot of ideas.

This was the worst.

"I wish I knew how to live without him."
He got silence in return.

"Not that I want to, but. I've never been able to. I wasn't alive as the Winter Soldier and I can't..."

"You can't what?"

"I don't know. Breathe."

The ceiling flickered. Sam reached over for the lantern, hand cupping behind the flame.

"Why don't we just shoot for sleep for now?"

Bucky laughed. It was the best advice he'd gotten in a long time.

Sam smiled and blew out the lantern.

...

Waking up felt raw.

More real than he'd been.

Shoved back into a body again - his body? - but not trapped, just. Bursting.

Tingly, oversensitized all over. He could feel the lights of Tony's lab burning his skin as they rolled the tent up.

He hadn't spoken this morning. Sam didn't ask questions.

Floating to the elevator would've been a blessing. Instead he felt the jarr of every step, stretching his arms out and rotating them, curling and uncurling his fingers.

This was a body he was in. Way too present in this moment.

Soft dings were now loud warning beeps - it wasn't a hangover, more like the opposite.

He stepped toe-first out of the elevator, blinking at the living room and taking in the spiderweb in the top corner, the rumple of the couch cushions. He was seeing everything, but not evaluating threats.

The sunlight was streaming in the kitchen and it reflected rainbows off the glass and Bucky blinked, spinning around in the space. There was a lot of white in this apartment.

Kitchen tiles cold cold under his feet, his toes, and he lifted the metal hand slowly, spanning his fingers out. The rainbow landed in his palm and shot a hundred new directions, casting prisms off the metal and--

"Buck."

Clenching the fist, trapping the rainbows inside, and turning to Steve. "Goodmorning."

"I've got something for you."

"Oh?" Seven steps and he was leaning on the counter beside Steve. It was smoother than he remembered, fingers jumping across the surface as he slid his right hand. Steve fumbled around with his sketchbook, flipping pages while balancing, and he wasn't looking Bucky in the eyes.

Why?
"I know your birthday was a while ago, but it wasn't done..."

"It's been," Bucky started, and the vowel felt strange on his tongue. He paused, mouthing the been again - what kinda vowel was that anyways? Steve glanced up. Right. He'd been speaking. "...a while since I got a drawing for a gift."

A curl on one edge of Steve's mouth, eyes on Bucky, then he was flipping through the book again. Bucky mouthed been again.

"Here." Steve sat the sketchpad down, bracing it with one hand as he carefully tore out the drawing. Bucky waited, tapping his barefoot and deciding that was a very strange sound on tile.

Then a paper was being held out to him and Bucky glanced up at Steve before taking it. Charcoals, it'd been a while since Steve'd--

A man standing at a window. Shirtless, hair in a low ponytail. Watching, silent, pensive.

He knew it was supposed to be him. He remembered standing there. The lines were all right for it to be him. Shape of his lips was perfect. Hairline, eye shape, it was all perfect.

It wasn't him.

It was the first time in his entire life Steve had drawn him and it hadn't been him.

"Bucky?"

"This isn't. You didn't--" he stopped, biting his lip, glancing up. Steve was looking at him expectantly, waiting. "Are you okay?"

"Am I...what?"

"You...forget it. Never mind. Um. Thanks for the drawing, I'mma go hang it up." He walked an arch around Steve, cold tiles morphing to cool wood, then fuzzy sinking carpet and he pinned the thing to his wall, studying the man's face for a few more seconds.

He didn't even know who that was. It wasn't him in the past, and it sure as hell wasn't him now. Unless that's what his mask looked like to Steve? No way to tell.

When he turned back around, Steve was in the doorway of his room. Just...standing there.

Bucky shoved his hands in his pockets.

"You wanna..." he started awkwardly.

"Sure," Steve agreed, before he knew what it was. Wouldn't matter anyways, right?

He moved a shoulder and Bucky started for the living room, plopping down on a couch and realizing he hadn't brought his book.

Steve sat down next to him. Fuck.

"Are you--"

"I'm fine. Sorry."

"It's fine."
They both shifted, staring at the blank wall that projected into a tv screen.

In 1944, he'd shouted at Peggy Carter I loved him first. He'd broken down and cried. Then he told Peggy she had to take Steve.

He didn't believe in 'if you love them let them go,' because that wasn't love. Love was scouring the earth, love was never giving up. But this love didn't have a choice. He'd never give up on Steve, not ever, but he was giving up on himself. He couldn't give Steve anything more than undying devotion and Steve deserved so much more than that.

He couldn't give Steve anything more than undying devotion.

What the hell could he give Steve now? He'd follow the kid for the rest of his life, but he couldn't give himself over. He couldn't let go. He couldn't devote himself because there'd be nothing left of him...

"Do you wanna--" Steve started, turning to Bucky the exact same moment Bucky turned to him and said,

"Why are you doing this?"

They both froze.

"What?"

"...why are you doing this?"

"Doing what?"

"I'm a killer, Steve." Poison poison.

It'd been his job to protect his darling boy.

He'd protected by ripping heads off innocent men.

But Hydra never went searching for his sunshine's body. Not when they had a soldier to train.

"I know you are, Bucky," Steve said slowly. Confused. "Why am I doing what?"

"All of this! The past few weeks." He waved an arm across the living room and Steve straightened, turning his torso as his shoulders softened in seriousness.

"I care about you. You know that." Reaching hands. Bucky withdrew his from the touch.

"That doesn't explain this. You cared about me before. You never kissed me before."

Steve leaned back, startled. Caught out? Was that genuine shock or faked annoyance from his mission being discovered? Bucky straightened too, scooting back an inch as he gave Steve a serious look, tipping his head and studying the blue eyes

"All missions have purposes."

And there startled goes to shocked. Steve's eyebrows shot up and he leaned forward, looking Bucky straight in the eye and pinning him there. The abundance of emotion in his expression was insufferably overwhelming, his voice laced with it - feelings, caring, acting? why? - laced like arsenic floating atop a shiny gold-rimmed glass.
"You're not my mission."

Fuck. He couldn't do this. He shouldn't have started it. Left it alone.

The room span and Bucky shot to his feet, wobbling a little as he stepped backwards away from the couch, into the middle of the room. Rug sharp under his toes, hand in his hair as he spun, tried to keep his balance, only everything was faded dark grey - except Steve, who was shining, wavering like a mirage as he untucked the leg from under him, standing and approaching and Bucky stilled himself, taking a solid step backwards.

You're not my mission. That road.

"You're my friend," Bucky sneered, mocking as he quoted back because that was the whole point. He remembered every bit of the past ninety years, that wasn't the problem. But there were problems, there were so. many. problems. "--yeah, okay, I got that part. Loud and clear. We're friends, Stevie, so why the fuck are you kissing me?"

Friends for their whole lives, and Steve'd never kissed him until a few weeks ago. Friends wasn't the part he was confused on - it was the part that was fucking up the friendship he'd relied on for so long.

"I thought you. I thought you wanted to--"

Of course he thought that because god did Bucky want to. That wasn't the fucking point. That was the opposite of the fucking point.

"We're not talking about me, I wanna know why you kiss me."

"Buck--" Steve tried and Bucky took a step forward, plates on his metal arm rippling as the sensors picked up the heightened pulse, shifting into battle mode.

"Give me a goddamn reason, Rogers. What's your play?"

"I'm not playing," he pleaded, standing in the middle of the room now with his palms open, forward and exposed, begging as Bucky approached. He paused a few inches from Steve's face, narrowing his eyes as he studied the blue.

Honesty. But that didn't mean he was telling the truth. Steve was brilliant at keeping things in the dark.

Look how he'd kept Bucky on a leash for so long.

He snapped his eyes away from the blue, studying Steve's posture. Bucky kept his eyes narrowed, a few inches away as he advanced to Steve's side, circling him like a predator stalking prey.

Interrogation. He was good at this part.

Steve followed him what he could, flipping his head to the side to watch Bucky evaluating him. He circled once, then again, slower this time - voice low and curious. He'd made victims scream their secrets. Steve would be no different.

"What's the advantage?" He pondered, noting the way Steve's pulse picked up when Bucky was behind him. He was scared, then. Or at least cautious. Smart boy. "Proximity?"

A shiver went down Steve's spine and Bucky smiled, running his metal fingers over the back of Steve's neck, watching his body shiver again, violent, harder this time. "Dedication?"
Another half circle and every muscle in that scientifically perfected body was tense now, on high alert. His arm whirred, fingers curling and ready to tighten. Battlemode. Behind Steve again, careful not to touch as he leaned close, air ghosting over the spot underneath Steve's ear. "To make sure I don't put a gun in my mouth again?"

"C'mon, you know this isn't about that." His voice was weak. Not breathy, but weak.

"Oh really?" Bucky sing-songed, continuing his stride circling Steve's pretty shoulders. "Because you never kissed me before I tried to kill myself."

Steve flinched.

Bingo.

Bucky stopped circling, directly in front of him as he narrowed his eyes once more, cocked his head and an eyebrow at Steve.

"So that's it?" Lay down Steve's happiness to make sure Bucky didn't pull the trigger anytime soon? Dance with him on the roof so he wouldn't jump off it?

"No. No, Bucky, it's not like that." A soldier's response, words separated and serious, heart pounding steady now. It wasn't a lie.

"Then what's it like, Steve?" he asked sweetly, taking a step closer and tilting his chin up to look right in those aching eyes. "Huh? What's it like?" A curious, overly-happy question. He knew he was scarier like this, when he was smiling instead of glaring.

"You're trying to twist this," Steve started, low and commanding, but Bucky wasn't gonna let him make this into a Captain-Sergeant moment.

He shot a step backwards, façade falling, because he couldn't let Steve get the upperhand here and all that stupid army training made him withstand interrogation and it wasn't fair.

So forget it, if the Winter Soldier wasn't getting answers outta Steve Rogers, Bucky Barnes sure as hell would.

He threw his hands up, ripping away the painted sincerity because fine, if it was gonna be about emotions, he could do that. He'd do whatever the fuck it took to get answers.

A frustrated noise, clenching fists in the air, and whipping back around on Steve.

"I'm not twisting anything! I'm just trying to find out why the fuck my childhood best friend decided kissing me was suddenly so goddamn important. What are you trying to do?" A plea, at the end, shoving his hair away from his face and for one moment, this could be in their apartment back in Brooklyn, Bucky begging Steve to stop getting in fights and Steve was suddenly shrinking his shoulders in, making himself smaller and yes, exactly, he felt it too.

Time jump and those same shifting eyes, the same way he'd always gotten when Bucky opened up for real.

"Nothing, I--" small now, hands shoved in pockets and eyes too wide, looking so little. Was that it? Bucky paused, looking Steve over from across the room, swallowing and reign in the emotions as he forced himself to ask.

"Are you trying to shape me?" A step closer again, the disbelief as the idea suddenly dawned on him making his voice cut too high. Conditioning, he knew all about conditioning, classical and operant and shaping, conditioning into the exact result you want through a simple reward, association, something. "Mold me into that pretty young thing I used to be?"

Steve's eyes went wide in shock. A lot of shock. So it wasn't conditioning, maybe it was therapy? Before Steve could jump in with buttery protests, Bucky's voice arched higher again and he leaned forward, gestured at his own chest, the alien metal.

"Are you trying to fix me??" Steve Rogers' latest adopted puppy. He'd thought he'd made it very clear Steve couldn't fix him, but how many poor girls in alleys had Steve tried to save? He wasn't some helpless dame, he was a broken man in a gutter somewhere in Russia.

"What, the serum give you magical healing make-out powers?" He shoved both hands in his hair, smoothing it roughly away from his face and not looking Steve in the eyes. "You think bombarding me with affection is gonna wipe away seventy years of blood and ice?"

"Bucky--"

"Why? What the hell do you want from me?" He was too far away to hear Steve's heart anymore as he paced across the living room, but a glance at his face said it all. Stunned into silence. Bucky jolted to a stop, shaking his head as he finally looked at blue again.

"My undying loyalty?" He spread his arms wide. "You already had that you asshole, you didn't have to uproot our entire friendship to make me jump in front of bullets for you."

He didn't have the scar in his leg anymore, they'd carved too many over it.

"Buck--"

"Was being friends just not good enough for you?" Back then, Steve used to say he was the best friend a fella could have. Made life exciting. What about now? "I'm too broken and I'm no fun anymore unless you can shove your tongue down my throat?"

"Bucky stop," Steve pleaded, tears welling up and no, that wasn't fucking fair.

He strode the distance between them, shaking his head wildly.

"Why why why why?" He closed his fingers too tight around Steve's biceps, shaking him like that could make him fucking answer. "Why??" Steve rattled, didn't fight the movement an ounce, eyes squeezed shut like he didn't want the tears staining his cheeks either.

"What do you want??" Bucky shouted, shoving him away on the last word. Steve stumbled backwards and Bucky spun away from him before he fucked everything up even more. Then there was a solid hand on his shoulder, pulling him back and no, not now, not after everything.

He whirled back on Steve, slapping his hand away hard enough to make a sound, rage in his eyes as he stared down the man who'd dared touched him, dared tried to pull him back. Into what, a hug? A kiss? A thousand promises of sunshine and summer?

He knew nothing of summer.

He was frozen, staring, then his lips parted, posture shifted, quiet and serious, voice calm and controlled as he let the words drop into the space between them.

"Do you wanna fuck me? Huh?" The words didn't sink in at first. Good. Bucky closed the space between them, slithering close and sexual to spit the next words in Steve's ear, "You wanna fuck me, use me up and toss me aside like a fu--"

Steve shoved him off so hard Bucky almost fell on his ass, barely catching his balance in time to straighten up, to stare defiantly at the shocked, horrified face. Steve was breathing heavy, shoulders up and down, lips parted as the implication settled in.

"If I let you fuck me, will you leave me the fuck alone? 'Cause I'll do it." Bucky's voice was still steady, his fingers not quite so as he fumbled with his belt, metal scraping over the clasp with this terrible sound, wrenching the leather out of its fastenings, and it was only because he was staring down at his hands that he saw Steve's fingers cover his, ripping them away.

He wasn't going to let himself shake, as much as he felt like collapsing. Didn't want to look up.

"God, Bucky, no. No." Steve squeezed their clasped hands and his voice was all watery and broken; Bucky didn't wanna see, staring at his half-undone belt and stilling the trembles in his bones.

"Bucky. Bucky, no, no I'd never--" Steve gathered Bucky into his arms, drawing him closer like he just needed to hold Bucky, to stroke his hair and feed him tea and wrap him in blankets and this would be so much easier if Steve just answered yes to that question instead of looking horrified.

Or like he might puke.

Bucky wrenched his wrists away, wriggling violently out of Steve's grasp and Steve pulled back his arms so damn fast that Bucky almost fell again, hands raising in air to signify safety, no harm. Totally unwilling to touch Bucky if he didn't want to be and why couldn't he stop being so goddamn full of justice for one moment, just bend Bucky over the back of the couch, take him and leave him there dirty because it'd be so much easier and faster. It'd at least be mercy, but from the look on Steve's face, mercy was the last thing he was getting.

Steve was crying now. Bucky curled his arms against his chest, staring at Steve from the three foot distance between them. He couldn't stand it when Steve cried. Used to thumb the tears away. If he put his thumbs on Steve's face now, he'd probably bruise him permanently.

"Bucky. Bucky, please. You know I could n-never..." Choking on his own words, tears gathering and then slipping, racing down his cheeks one at a time, building then slip, gone. Shiny, pretty, making Steve's eyes all red. He understood the tears, at least. "Bucky, you're my world, I couldn't -- I couldn't lose you."

A sob and Bucky rolled his shoulders back, dropping his arms to his sides. Actually -- he looked down again, reclasping his belt with careful, slow, steady hands. Steve was still crying softly, shoulders shaking in his peripherals as Bucky's insides scooped out; a pretty, numb void.

"You did once," he said thoughtfully, tucking the edge of the leather into its loop and looking up with a shrug. "You survived." He paused, voice going flat as the image of a plane flashed. "Well. Relatively."

Steve stepped forward again. Dancing, they were always dancing, except this kind wasn't the fun kind, this was the kind that ended with one of them over the edge of the roof instead of collapsing on each other in the middle of it.

Their eyes locked and Steve was still sniffling through tears, fists raised for once - clenched pleadingly instead of a fight.
"Bucky. James. Please, just listen to me," he reached timidly, with a shaking hand, and Bucky stared at the extended plea. He couldn't take that. He couldn't take all that concentrated heartbreak on Steve's face, in his trembling fingers.

"You don't get to do that," his voice said, hollow and echoing around in his empty mind. He wasn't talking about touching. He was talking about reaching. "You don't...you don't get to be all angelic and then..."

Lifting his head. Don't look directly at the sun, you'll burn your eyes. He'd never been too good at following directions when it came to the sun.

And he was burning on that cross.

"Y-you never--" he paused and Steve was frozen, a foot away, waiting, begging, tear-streaked and too goddamned bright.

"I can't." Bucky looked down at his hands in surprise, the quiet whirr of confirmation from his arm; the next words were to himself, not Steve, more surprised than he'd been at anything in a long life of shock. "I can't do this."

He turned on a heel and started for the door. Steve lunged for his arm, fingertips brushing, but Bucky wasn't going to let Steve grab him, wrestle him to the floor and pin his struggling arms until he gave up and cried, until they clutched each other tight and cried and cried--

Running, he'd always been good at. Bucky took off for the stairwell, sprinting and sliding, wrenching the door open and hauling down the stairs.

A bang from above as the door slammed open again and a sharp shout of his name. "Bucky!"

The railing shook as Steve pounded down the stairs after him, shouting his name, and Bucky was taking three at a time down, god knows how many Steve was taking.

The last time Bucky screamed something at Steve and went running down the stairs, he hadn't been chased.

You didn't let me down Steve. You let me fall.

He hadn't been talking about the train.

He'd been talking about this.

Steve'd let him fall into the darkest pit of devotion, of needing Steve to breathe, and Bucky could hate him for that if all his hate wasn't used up on himself for letting it happen.

But he'd been fine, he'd pushed past it, shoved it down and he'd tried to function fine and then Steve'd kissed him and--

You know what, fuck Steve. Fuck him for making Bucky so goddamn broken and dependent and--

It was amazing the glass didn't shatter as Bucky burst through the garage-lab doors. Tony did a lot of testing in here, but more importantly, all his cars were in here, this was where the tunnel to the streets were.

He skid around a table and all the robots were making concerned noises but Bucky ignored them, cursing as the doors burst open behind him again and fuck Steve was still behind him, when was he gonna get the message?

Steve'd chased him all the way down here. They used to chase each other as kids. That was cute. There was nothing cute about this. No grabbing Steve and picking him up at the end, tickling his sides as he shouted laughter and kicked, flailing to be put down.

Steve'd chased him once, after Bucky'd shot Nick Fury. He hadn't caught Bucky then and he wouldn't now.

But how fucking much had changed since he swung out his left arm, resounding \textit{pang} as it caught Steve's shield for the first time since it'd blown him out the side of a train?

He already knew which cars had keys in them, came sliding to a halt at the blue one and he knew he had a fifteen foot lead at least, so he wrenched the door open, ducking to shove himself inside--

--only then Steve's hand closed around his arm and yanked him backwards. Bucky stumbled a step before catching himself on the open car door, breathing heavy (for once - he'd raced Steve in the war, right before shouting \textit{I loved him first}, had to hold back so Steve wouldn't suspect - there was no holding back now).

"What part of \textit{I can't do this} did your thick stubborn head not understand?"

"Bucky, you can't leave, please don't leave--" Blubbering, begging, needy. If this was Steve's new version of raised fists, it wasn't a good look on him.

"You gonna stop me? Why, Steve?" It couldn't matter this damn much, it really couldn't. He'd sent Bucky off to \textit{war} with a hug and a smile. Like he couldn't do the same now?

Although, he'd been planning on following behind. Funny enough, Bucky'd been so sure he'd never see Steve again. How many times in his life had he been so sure he'd never see Steve again?

He raised his eyebrows, making a get-on-with-it gesture, because if Steve really wanted him to stay, he'd share the goddamned reason. The blue eyes were still puffy as he stepped forward, hands wrapping over the tops of Bucky's from the other side of the open car door.

"I need you." Steve's fingers tightened around him and Bucky could've laughed, if he had enough air left in his lungs. Instead he shoved Steve's hands off, throwing them back at him like the lying things they were.

"No you do \textit{not}," he snapped. "You stopped needing me the moment you stepped science's fake manufactured foot out of that stupid Vita Ray machine."

The pretty pink mouth fell open as Steve gaped at him. There. Bucky'd never said it. Ever since that first night, the trek from Azzano to base, Steve's hand on his lower back, the big bright smile looking \textit{down} at him for the first time. An entire base one-handedly destroyed. He'd thought it then - \textit{you don't need me} - he'd meant it then, and that hadn't changed.

"You know that's not true," the mouth finally managed to whisper, and the funny thing is Steve kept assuming he \textit{knew} all these axiomatic things but he was wrong, this was all wrong.

"Yes, it is," Bucky insisted, but that wasn't the conversation they needed to have right now. He waved a hand dismissively, forcing Steve back on the goddamn point. "But it doesn't matter. I need to know why the fuck you kiss me."
"Can we please talk about this in the apartment?"

"Why, Steve? Just give me the fucking reason, I can't fucking take it anym--" he started for the car again and both Steve's hands went up, reaching instinctively before snapping upwards in surrender.

"Wait. Wait. It was too much, that's okay, I'm sorry, just come back upstairs -" Steve's voice nearly broke again and Bucky had to harden his shell in order not to reach out. It was instinctual, ingrained in him deep enough to break Hydra's coding and years of brainwashing - protect Stevie. Who was currently about to start crying again. But he couldn't protect Steve from this. Not if he didn't know what was going on.

He grit his teeth, tightening his fists and maybe denting the door a little. "No. You're always asking me for answers and now it's my turn. Why? Why are you pretending to care so much?"

"I'm not pretending!!"

An exasperated sound and Bucky threw his hands up again, staring up at the sky in frustration. "Why do you even bother?"

"You're my--"

"What? Long lost best friend that's just a broken twisted piece of metal now?" He glared at Steve, because really, what was he going to say there? What the hell was Bucky to Steve? What the hell was Bucky without Steve?

Nothing nothing nothing.

The garage was swimming treacherously and his grip on the car suddenly became a lot more about being upright than leaving.

Steve's face was still clear as ever though, so much pain etched into his features that Bucky could cry too from that look alone, if he weren't the reason for it. Instead he leaned into Steve's space, tightening his fists on purpose this time to stop the shaking.

"Buck--"

"I've tried every fucking thing I can think of, WHY ARE YOU DOING THIS??"

"Bucky--"

"FUCKING WHY??"

"Please--"

"Whywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhywhy???"

"Bucky, I--"

"WHY STEVE FUCKING WHY??"

"BECAUSE I LOVE YOU!!" Steve screamed, and the garage fell so instantly silent that the words echoed.

CAUSE I LOVE YOU
I LOVE YOU
"LOVE YOU"

love you

Two bodies breathing heavy, shoulders rising and falling like they'd ran a marathon.

Once, in 1944, they'd raced each other, laughing and shoving, breathing hard as their eyes locked, magic dancing between them. The last moment before he'd been called into Peggy's tent and screamed his confession. I loved him first. Because I love you.

He had no idea how long passed before the metal hand resting on the open car door twitched and whirred. Decades, maybe. All of the space between the first time he'd shouted it to the first time Steve had.

Waiting, heart racing, world laid at Bucky's feet.

I love you.

"Well that's too bad," that hollow voice seeped through his lips, then he was swinging into the drivers seat with a slam and the tires screeched, wheels spinning, engine roar. And Steve was staring blankly at a cloud of black smoke.

He'd left Steve in a cloud of black smoke before too. Who the hell is Bucky? Because I love you.

He lowered his boot on the gas pedal, car rumbling as he burst into a world rushing by to fast too see and Bucky had no idea that he'd left Steve to sink to his knees both times.

~~~

"I think Barnes' pistanthrophobia may have just ruined everything."

"Goodmorning to you too, Stark." Nat didn't lift her head, strolling past Tony while tapping rapidly away on her phone.

"No, Natasha, I'm not kidding. Jarvis just recorded in the garage-- there's something you've gotta see."

"Now?" she sighed and Tony made a face, gesturing her to follow. "Now."

...

Natasha stared at the screen. "Rewind that."

"I've watched it like six times, yes, Steve does say that--"

"I'm not interested in Steve's shout-confession, rewind it."

Tony gave her a weird look and rolled back the tape, playing again from the part where Barnes yanked open the car door and Steve yanked him back. The angle wasn't great from the camera in the corner of the ceiling, but you could see Steve's face and hear them both really well.

"Why do you even bother?" "You're my--" "What? Long lost best friend that's just a broken twisted "piece of metal now?"

Nat made a contemplative noise and Tony looked at her funny. The rest of the video played out and Tony cringed, the way he had every time now, as Steve shouted a seventy-years-late confession and Barnes looked him dead in the eye and told him too bad.

"It's pretty cold, right? I mean I get they call him the winter soldier, but damn," Tony whistled and shook his head because, really, Steve had to be aching right now. "You gonna go check on Steve, or--"

"Stark, as upset as Steve's gotta be right now? I'm a lot more concerned about Barnes," Natasha leaned back and crossed her thin arms over her chest and Tony blinked up at her.

"...Barnes? Why the hell--"

"Do you read Vannugaut?" Natasha interrupted.

"Obviously, why have you?"

"Bluebird, there's a quote. 'Never trust a survivor,' my father used to warn me, 'until you find out what he did to stay alive.'"

Tony blinked again, looking back at the screen. The image of Steve sinking to his knees, the car speeding off for the entrance of the garage.

"You think that Barnes...you think that asshole move's a deflection method he learned from Hydra?"

"Worse. I think that's something he learned from himself."

The warning click of approaching heels was the only preparation he got before Natasha's blunt shout across the room.

"I saw the tape from the garage."

He didn't answer. He hit the punching bag again instead.

She was too smart to try stopping him, instead standing right in his line of sight and crossing her arms, talking loud enough to hear over the slamming of fists into plastic.

"What are you gonna do about it?" She shouted and Steve laid his fists a lot harder, voice as punched and torn as the crumbling bag.

"He made it...pretty damn clear," he grit his teeth, letting his fists fly faster, "...there's nothing. I can do."

"Oh c'mon, you don't believe that."

"Thought you'd be happy, Nat," he shot back, pausing for a millisecond to shoot her a glare before shifting his weight on the balls of his feet and landing a few more solid punches. "You were right. He doesn't want me."

"I'm not happy, asshole. I didn't want him to leave, I wanted you to get answers."

"Yeah, well." His hair was dripping sweat into his eyes and the burn was too grounding to wipe away. "He wanted answers too and the ones he got weren't what he wanted to hear."

"He was afraid to hear. You think it's really as simple as he doesn't want you?"

Punch punch combo, kick for good measure. "Yes."

"This doesn't add up, you know that. Why did he run? What's he so afraid of? You broke him out of decades of training by just existing and you seriously think the feelings aren't mutual? Something else's at play. You need to find out what, and you can't do that by beating the shit of out punching bags."

He didn't bother responding. If he punched hard and loud enough, maybe he'd forget the sound of well that's too bad.

"You have a love to span the decades. Don't you think that's something worth fighting for?" She almost sounded pissed, which was funny because nobody was as pissed at Steve Rogers right now as himself.

"Not if he doesn't love me back," he growled, the punching bag groaning in complaint as it threatened to snap.

"You've fought for him your entire life. And after all of this, after everything. You're giving up on him now?"

Bucky'd given up on him.

Then punching bag flew, breaking against the opposite wall and exploding sand everywhere.

Nat had to sidestep to dodge it, glaring at Steve as his chest heaved, hair still dripping in his eyes.

"Clean yourself up. Your knuckles are bleeding." Nat stalked past him in her clicking heels, red hair flipping over her shoulder. "Be upstairs in ten. Don't you dare make me come down here again."

He stared at his hands, sweat rolling down his nose as blood dripped from his ripped open hands. He hadn't wrapped them. He should've.

He should've done a lot of things. Not letting Bucky leave being the primary of those things. Right next to not shouting a lifetime of feelings in the middle of an argument.

He should've --

He should get upstairs. God knows what Nat would do if he didn't.

~~~

Two kids thrown into the flames.

Bucky'd always had this kid he had to look out for. The only real family he had - for the longest time, the only thing he'd wanted was to retain that image of himself that Steve had. But he'd ruined it, through and through. Hydra'd turned him inside out and flayed his darkest parts into the open, letting the sunshine peer at the swirling secrets of the night.

It was instinct to look out for Steve, but when was the last time he'd actually dragged him out of a fight? He'd been the one causing problems and Steve was the one patching up and Bucky couldn't do that anymore.

Bucky Barnes would go to the ends of the earth to protect Steve Rogers. And if that means saving Steve from him, too, he'd drop himself back in a pit before he let his pain ruin that sunshine.

He couldn't drive forever.

He was a Soldier, he should've stayed to fight. But he wasn't made for the art of war like Steve was.

So he ran. Eventually, he'd have to stop somewhere - and besides the Stark credit cards in the glovebox and his own weapons, he didn't have anything on him. Using the credit cards would be a giant red flag to where he was. He needed a safehouse.

All the safehouses he knew were Hydra. It wasn't like the Avengers ever had to lay low, wasn't like Stark had--

Wait. Stark didn't. Barton did.

~*~

"But where would he go? You think he'd run back to Hydra?"

Steve shrugged and kicked his feet against the floor. "Don't think I know 'im as well as I thought."

"Cap, it's not--"

"Stark, don't bother. He's gonna blame himself, fine. But we need to find Barnes before..."

"He hurts someone. Or himself," Sam added solemnly and Steve swallowed rocks down his sandpaper throat.

"Guys..." Clint finally sighed, getting up from the couch and looking vaguely guilty. "I'm pretty sure I know where he is."

"What? How?"

"It's kinda the only place he could go. He's at my safehouse."

"You have a safehouse? No, wait, it doesn't matter. Take us." Tony started shoving maps aside and Clint held up his hands to freeze.

"If everyone knows about it, how's it gonna be a safehouse?" He complained, making a gesture for them to stay put. "I'll go myself."

"Cut the crap, Barton. We're your family. There's no one safer." Stark slammed the quinjet controller against Clint's chest and raised his eyebrows, waiting for the protest.

Sam, Natasha, and Bruce all crossed their arms, flanking Tony in a V. Steve was still standing dejectedly to the side, staring out the window silently. Clint looked between all of them, hesitating a second before finally throwing up his arms.

"Fine. But you're throwing me a pizza party or something."

"I'll get you a goddamned puppy," Tony promised, clapping Clint's shoulder and starting for the elevator.
"Don't say that, he'll actually hold you to it," Nat warned, shrugging into her leather jacket and cocking her head for the boys to follow.

~~~

"Sergeant Barnes?"

He figured someone'd come eventually. Bucky sighed, starting down the stairs and pulling his ponytail out, letting his hair swing against the sides of his face.

Clint was standing tentatively in the foyer, fingers twitching like he was dying to pull out his bow. Bucky paused on the stairway landing, looking down at him with an unimpressed look, kicking a foot out to the side and crossing his arms over his chest.

"I thought I told you to call me Bucky."

The worried expression dropped and Clint shrugged, exaggerated frown as he gestured with a hand. "I think Sarge fits you. Hell of a lot more authoritative than Bucky."

Bucky sighed heavily and tapped down the rest of the stairs, swinging past Barton and strolling through the corner of the living room to the kitchen. There was a pitcher of water in the fridge, so he got to pouring them both glasses as Clint wandered into the kitchen behind him.

"I spent my life growin' up with the most authoritative person imaginable, I've got no illusions about how much authority I've got." He turned and held out the glass of water for Clint. "Which is none."

"I dunno, I think the homicidal look alone gives you plenty of authority." Clint sipped his water and made a general gesture motion in Bucky's direction, which he had every right to roll his eyes at. It wasn't like there was anything he could do about the fucking hair anyways.

They both sat down at the empty wood table, Clint's feet kicking up on the chair next to him as he leaned back and studied Bucky lightly.

"Speaking of growin' up with...how are you feeling on the whole Cap subject right now?" It was a casual enough question, all easy and curious instead of worried; he couldn't help but tense up anyways.

"Don't wanna talk about it," he muttered, dipping his pinky finger in his water glass to hear it whirr in protest. He had an understanding with Clint - they went shooting together pretty often, and most sessions were silent except for initial greetings. Sometimes not even those. Clint'd been messed up recently enough to understand a little of Bucky's headspace, and the sniper/soldier in him certainly didn't hurt.

So he expected Clint to nod, drop it and go quiet like always. Maybe they'd play cards in a while, then Clint would clap him on the shoulder, give him crap about his arm, and head off with a I'm around if you need to talk, real glad you're okay.

Except none of that happened. Instead, he shifted in his chair, lowering his feet down seriously to the ground as he leaned on the table, tracing a design into the wood grain table.

"Tasha told me this story, cause I wasn't there when it went down, but." His finger traced a little heart into the table and Bucky narrowed his eyes. "Apparently, right before SHIELD went down, there was this battle on the bridge...everybody got detained by Hydra, shoved into a truck in handcuffs. And the Commander told his team that this deadly assassin they were fighting was his best friend from the 1940s. At first, his squad was a little reluctant, cause you know, that's like impossible, but. One word from the CO and the team just accepts the Winter Soldier was this guy's pal. Cause what the hell, if Rogers was frozen for 70 years, obviously his buddy was too."

"Clint--" he started to warn, but Barton just barreled on.

"Look, Sarge, the point is, you two are \textit{like that}. That's how you are, how you've always been. Together." A simple shrug, finally looking up with that easy relaxed expression. "So maybe it's a little more complex now, doesn't mean you can't handle it."

"Actually, I can't," Bucky shot back, bitter as he pushed the glass away and stood. "You here to lecture me? I'm not interested. I made a choice, and that choice doesn't include your opinion."

Steve was a soldier. He'd make it through fine without Bucky. He always had.

"Look, I know what happened--"

"Okay? And? I'm not gonna talk about it. If you want me back in the tower you're gonna have to sedate me."

Clint stood then too, hands out in the \textit{placating a wild animal} gesture everyone always used around him.

"C'mon, Sarge. I just wanna talk. Why'd you run? I thought you would've wanted--"

"Wanted what? \textit{That}? I can't, Clint. I can't."

"Bucky,"

"I \textit{can't}. I can't I can't I can't." He'd backed into the living room now, his back to the windows and if there was anyone out there they'd have a perfect shot of his back right now and wouldn't that be mercy.

"Bucky, I get it. Emotions are scary. This, this is really scary. But Steve shouldered the blow, he still wants you--"

"He doesn't! He can't. I can't. I can't do this Clint, I can't, you can't make me."

Two hands up, getting closer, and Bucky kept backing towards the windows. It was a cute farmhouse, but he'd dive through the fucking window if it came to that.

"No one's making you do anything, Bucky. We just wanna help."

He was panicking, looking around for exits, head whipping back and forth and Clint couldn't have him fall into an episode now, not when it was just the two of them. There was no way that'd end well. But, thank god, he missed the slip of \textit{we}.

Instead he curled in on himself, hands in his hair, metal fingers curled tight enough that the entire arm was clenched and vibrating and fuck, that couldn't be good.

"Bucky? C'mon, man, you can push through this. I get it, I really do, it's okay to be scared. There's nothing in this world that's scarier than love--"

The explosion happened so fast that he only registered Barnes's shouted words on their echo in the empty house.

\textit{He can't love me, crack crack love me, crack love me.}
The two shots echoed pretty well too.

It took a few seconds before he managed to look down, pull his hand away from his side. Red, wet, and he managed to lift his head, blinking at the image of the gun's muzzle smoking in Barnes's hands.

The farmhouse tipped and Clint reached out for something to grab onto, praying that some of his rushed words were making sense.

"Bucky, it's okay, it's fine. I've had worse, just. Ah, tell me you know how'ta stitch up-p," he paused, grabbing his side again with the bloody hand and waving the other one in the direction of Barnes's horrified expression. Shell-shocked. He hadn't meant to, Clint got that, he shouldn't have pushed so hard, it was his own fault for coming in here without backup, cornering an assassin and trying to crack open his feelings.

Well. He sure had cracked something somewhere.

And that was the last thing he thought before the farmhouse swam black.

~~~

They'd have heard the shots if they didn't have equipment trained on the house. Steve's eyes went wide, Sam cursed. Bruce's hands covered his mouth and Natasha went white as a sheet. Tony blinked, whispering something to Jarvis.

Then Nat was leaping out of her seat and sprinting down the quinjet, jumping from the ramp and taking off across the grass. They were a couple hundred feet away from the house, but she ran fast enough to bust down the door in seconds.

Sam cursed again and took off after her while Tony and Bruce shared a terrified glance.

"Jarvis, fly us to the front porch, we're gonna need to carry Barton in here. Bruce, get the med kit, we'll have to stop the bleeding on the way to the hospital. Cap, you're probably gonna have to sedate Bucky...Cap? Rogers? Fuck, snap out of it, Steve, one of your teammates is down. Steve? Good, thank god. I know you're upset, but--"

"I'll handle Barnes," he muttered, pushing himself out of his seat. Except there was no assassin to handle. Nat and Sam came stumbling out with Clint lifted between them.

"He was gone by the time I got there," Nat grimaced and lifted Clint a little higher. Steve sunk back down in his seat and stared out the window.

~~~

He stayed upright the entire walk through the lobby, hallways. Stark's carkey was burning a hole in his pocket, illegally parked in front of the building but he could give a fuck, he had to be here.

He also had to disarm himself before he released himself around everyone. So he couldn't climb in the quinjet, he'd gotten the fuck out of there before he shoted anymore of his friends.

Clint was his friend. His.

He made it to the fourth floor hallway, the one that ran perpendicular to where they were holding him. Not holding, healing.
He hated hospitals.

One of the doors was open, a nurse wheeled past him with a tray of tools. Some of them were the exact same tools they'd used on him.

He stayed upright until that point.

The nurse disappeared around the corner and then Bucky was stumbling, pulse pounding too hard, vision swimming. He collided softly with the clean white wall and collapsed against it.

One of his feet slipped out from under him and he let his legs go out, tumbling to the ground, spine sliding down the supporting plaster. Everything was rushing, flashing too loud, so much white and it smelled like antiseptic but Clint was hurt, he'd been bleeding, the smell of gunpowder was still on his hands.

Bucky weaved his fingers together tightly, pressing them down on the tops of the knees he curled into his chest. Rising too fast, breathing heavy, trying to clear his head, only the world kept betraying him, spinning like that box--

He whipped his head to the side, glancing up just as Steve crouched down beside him.

The rush of air out of his lungs felt something like relief, then he was staring at the wall across from them again, gasping air into his chest again before he passed out. It was laboring, the breathing thing, the way Stevie must've felt like a kid. Steve didn't comment, silent and unmoving in his crouch.

“How's Clint?” Bucky managed, squeezing his fingers tighter to his knees.

“He's gonna be okay,” Steve promised quietly and that time the breath was real, unmistakable relief, oxygen collapsing and refilling against his lungs.

“Nat's here, Sam's here?”

“Everyone's here.”

Bucky tipped his head back against the wall, still breathing heavy, closing his eyes for a moment. Clint was okay. He was okay. Everyone had come. Clint was okay.

“How's Clint?” Steve's voice washed over him, concerned enough to preamble a talking-to, but he already knew the speech. That wasn't...so long as Clint was okay, he could work through everything else. Clint was easy.

"I know he'll forgive me. You don't have to tell me," Clint Barton was too good for all of them.

He opened his eyes again and Steve moved in his peripherals, settling down on the ground next to him, sitting properly now with his torso turned all the way to Bucky.

Those wide shoulders pressed to the wall, followed by Steve's temple as he tipped his head, blue eyes heavy on the side of Bucky's face as he stared straight ahead at the washed out white across from them.

He couldn't do hospitals. Never'd been able to, even before he got strapped down and drugged up. Never could handle seeing Stevie's thin skin under those harsh lights - he hadn't been admitted as often as he should've, only when Sarah was alive, when she could afford proper care. Bucky couldn't ever stand it, sitting at Steve's bedside as doctors shoved tubes down his throat and needles in his tiny arms.
Clint was easy. This wasn't easy.

"Hydra always told me I was defective," Bucky started, pausing as the wave of memories threatened to dizzy him. The goddamn smell, the glint of those silver tools--

A shuddering breath. Steve kept silent. He wasn't sure he'd be able to do this if he wasn't.

"And when they took me... in the moment that mattered most, I was." His metal fingers were bruising his right hand but he couldn't stop, he couldn't stop pressing and he couldn't stop talking. Steve's knee was pressed against his hip and Bucky had to bite his lip to reign in the emotions. "I couldn't take it, I couldn't handle it when they told me--"

Gray, defiant, red, screaming. Refusal.

He's. always. there. He's saved me from this same fucking table dozens of times you insignificant fucking Nazi. He promised me that as long as he's alive he's coming for me. He's always going to save me. And YOU CAN'T TOUCH ME BECAUSE HE'S ALWAYS GOING TO SAVE ME.

"That you uh. In the plane." He had to pause again, words too shaky. The water gathering on his bottom lashes was making it hard to see. He rubbed his eyes hard, but he wasn't sure anything could postpone the break. His throat was closing up with bottled tears, years of bottled tears and secrets, but he had to say this before he started sobbing.

He couldn't say this.

He had to.

Running two hands of fingers through his hair, knocking his head back against the wall once - not hard enough for Steve to worry. Two palms pressing hard on the tops of his thighs, pushing against just for the pressure, and his mouth opened again.

"I...I gave in. I a-asked them to wipe my memories. I thought it'd be easier than facing...I c-coul--." A quick shaking gasp and he rushed the next words so fast they almost blended together. "I just keep pushing myself to prove them wrong and. I'm. I'm pushing you away."

A whoosh of air out of his lungs and it felt like deflating, only he filled himself right back up with air because this was too heavy, too much.

How do you tell your best friend the entire reason you'd had temporary amnesia and tried to kill him - and everyone - was because you'd asked for it? Begged. Begged for it.

He'd planned to carry that to his goddamned grave. Hydra'd hurt him, but Bucky Barnes was the one who'd ruined himself. The Winter Soldier had stood in front of Sergeant James Barnes's exhibit in the Smithsonian and sworn to destroy who'd ever taken that laughing man away from him.

He didn't need to scour the earth to find that man. All he'd needed was a mirror.

The clock down the hallway ticked the minutehand again and Bucky finally turned his head, glancing at Steve over his shoulder. He wasn't leaning on the wall anymore, he was just sitting and looking at Bucky. There were tears in his eyes.

He'd thought Steve was dead. He'd thought Stevie was dead.

He'd held that newspaper in his only hand and cried and screamed until his throat bled.
He'd caved like an animal at Zola’s feet, begging them to take away every bit of humanity he had left.

Tears in those pretty blue eyes he'd never thought he'd see again. They were here now, Steve was alive and okay and here. Bucky took a deep breath, one single in and out, and the bright lights overhead maybe dimmed a little, the horizon centering, and Steve's lips parted softly with words to match.

“I don't think you asked them to take your mind away because you couldn't handle death. I think it was because you couldn't handle feeling.”

Feeling. The way his heart had wrenched outta his chest. He'd say his world split in two, but it didn't. Steve was more than half of him, Steve had a bigger portion than that, especially back then when Bucky'd let himself go. When he'd said the words I love him, when those could still come off his tongue.

That was total submersion. And look what it'd done?

He searched Steve's expression for detest, disgust, mortification. Anything.

A war hero's eyes looked back at him. Love.

“But you're not like that anymore. You're strong.”

The words were so sure, so Steve, that Bucky's lungs stopped working again and he had to suck in a shocked breath through his teeth, grinding his hands down to get a grip on himself.

Steve's fingers brushed his skin, then there was a warm, heavy hand on his arm, solid in the way only Steve was. The hands that punched and saved and raised and held his since they were kids. The hands that let him fall and lifted him to the earth again.

“You carry people, Buck.” Steve told him, hand tight on his arm and words cracking with emotion. "You carry me.”

Bucky's head dropped to his chest, breath hitching and lungs shot again, silent sob catching in his throat. Blinking through water and staring at the polished hospital tiles between his feet, then Steve was leaning in close, warm at Bucky's side, forehead pressing against Bucky's temple and a single drop of cold landing on his shoulder.

The space between his ear and Steve's lips disappeared and the warmth came with more than tears this time, the quietest whisper, the most precious secret. “There's a fire in you that Hydra could never take away.”

One of his hands shot upwards haphazardly, fingers threading roughly into Steve's hair and it was seconds before one of Steve's was covering it, fingers interlocking as they both held on tight.

They sat together on the hospital hall floor, clutching each other tight, Steve's head pressed to Bucky's, and let the air in their lungs catch until oxygen began working again.

How many times had he sat in a hospital with Steve, praying for those lungs not to fail him? And now they were here. The world was a real fucking terrible place, but this? Steve, here. This was all worth it.

By the time they both could breathe, tears on cheeks had dried up too. Bucky lifted his head and cocked it enough to the side to see Stevie, sliding his hand down Steve's head to run a thumb over his jaw. This part, this was beautiful. So goddamn beautiful.

“C’mon. I think it's time we finally go home,” the beautiful angel whispered. The words were the sweetest thing he'd ever heard.

Steve pushed to his feet, offering a hand. Bucky took it.

The hallway floor was a little slick with moisture, but Steve steadied them both easily before taking a step backwards, leaving open space. Bucky ran a hand down his face, settling himself. The hospital still smelled terrible, but. He was okay.

When he turned back to Steve, a gentle hand pressed to his lower spine, the way Steve'd supported him on the walk after Azzano. One more shaky breath, Steve steady as a rock beside him. Glowing like an angel in harsh hospital lights.

He threw an arm around Steve's neck, like the old days, pulling him down into Bucky's side.

“Thank you,” he whispered, closing the words with a tight kiss to the side of Steve's head. He wondered if Steve would ever know how much he meant inside those two words.

An arm wrapped around his waist and it didn't matter, not now.

...

With quiet assurance and insistence from the team, Steve and Bucky took the illegally-parked Stark car back to the tower. Nat was okay, and they were transferring Clint to the Stark tower too, as soon as he woke up. We'll be there by morning, Tony promised, clapping Steve on the shoulder. Go take care of your boy.

It was a few hours drive back to the tower, and Bucky made it about ten minutes in before he curled up, falling asleep with his head on Steve’s lap.

Steve stroked the long brown hair with one hand, the other on the steering wheel as countryroads gave way to highways.

Bucky slept and Steve stared out the windshield and cried.

Highway sets the traveler's stage all exits look the same.

~~~

He didn't mean for this to become his life. He didn't mean to make war the only thing he understood anymore. Because he sure as hell didn't get his best friend.

Or the man staring back at him in the mirror.

Steve splashed crystal in his face, looking down at the water pouring out of his hands and wondering how he’d let it get this far. He was so extremely out of his depth here.

What Bucky did---

There was so much he didn't understand, and it was like Steve was just finally getting that. Seriously, if it'd crossed Bucky's mind even once that the only reason Steve wanted him around was to fuck him?
A ripple went down his spine and Steve shuddered, turning the water off with his wrist. This was such a goddamned mess.

His hands were still dripping, scrabbling as he gripped the counter, ducked his head, steadied himself. Fumbling to grab Bucky from falling again with hands too slippery, coated in blood--

Why was it always goddamn falling?

They were dominos, setting each other off, every time they touched: falling deeper and harder and faster, flashing closer to utter blackness. Only when were they going to land so hurt they couldn't heal?

The counter cracked. Steve forced his grip to loosen. He hadn't always been like this. It was something he'd become.

There used to be clear lines: good, bad. Evil could be destroyed, bananas were sweet, never stop fighting. But where the hell was the right thing here? Where the hell was he?

He couldn't remember the last time he'd doubted...he'd doubted everything.

Part of him wanted to pack up with Bucky and leave this place, never come back in their lives. Forget the bloody fists, forget everything but some beautiful green hillside in Ireland and waking up next to Bucky's sweet face.

Part of him couldn't imagine hanging up the suit, ever. What the fuck would he do? What good were these hands if they weren't killing to save a life, what good were these legs if they weren't standing between his country and chaos? What use were two out of time soldiers if they weren't being the machines they were made to be?

But what was good for Bucky? He had no idea.

Steve was a killer and a soldier and he'd never wash all the blood off his hands and maybe Bucky was right. Maybe they were too messy to mesh. Would you kill to prove you're right?

Plane crashes and smoke and the red spray as the edge of his shield sliced through skin--

He was drowning again, but his lungs were dry, choking with no hands around his throat. The counter spiderwebbed further and he flared his fingers, letting go, stumbling backwards and hitting the wall.

The heartbeat in his chest was too fast, skin on fire with the flames of icy tears.

It'd all abandoned him, everything he knew. Where was his God now? He used to pray let me switch places him, lord please - the idea of sinking to his knees felt hollow now. A desperate cry from a despairing man who didn't want anything but for his heart to stop hurting, for the world to stop being foggy at the edges.

You always were so dramatic, Peggy teases in his head, but even that isn't enough, even her words aren't grounding like usual because this time, it's worse than just am I fighting the good fight.

Was he fighting at all?

He'd walked an entire exhibit in the Smithsonian, watched his past laid out in the world's hands like it was just another story and that's exactly what he'd become - just another story. Isolated, alone. Unrecognized as he walked beneath his own goddamned mural. The suit's what they saw, so the suit's what he became. He didn't have anything else but the star on his chest to match the shield on his back.

What you carry, so heavy on your back, soldier.

Steve Rogers fell off a train with Bucky Barnes. Bucky'd come back. Where was he? Who was he?

Faith slipping steady from his hands. If his blood ever ran red white and blue like they teased, the navy was rusting, burning out filthy, guilty black and he could see the uniform in his head, the blue paint dripping from the shield, searing black left behind--

The sky wouldn't save him, he lowered his chin and forced the man in the mirror to look him in the eye. His entire life, saving people. And the one person that mattered most, it'd been too late once, twice, almost a third--

The one person that shared the bones in his spine distinguishing the lanterns in his eyes. How many wars was he going to drag Bucky into before he gave up breathing through the sludge of Steve's poisonous love?

~~~

Paint was easy. Facing everything else was not.

Clint laughed at the pizza Bucky dumped on his sidetable with a loud "I have it on good authority hospital food sucks." He'd also taken Bucky's apology with grace - said it happened to the best of them. After all, he'd shot Bucky with an arrow the first time they met.

"But it didn't hit me," he argued. Clint shrugged. "And if I was good enough, neither would've your bullets."

A startled laugh, then they both sobered up and Clint apologized, saying he had no right to corner Bucky like that, but Bucky couldn't take that apology.

It wasn't Clint's fault, none of this was anyone's fault but his. He was the one who ran, pulled the trigger, fucked everything up.

Paint was easier.

His canvas was quite big, but he could still see the door opening over the top of his easel. He'd expected Steve would come in here, which is why he was painting with the canvas facing the window and therefore outta sight. No one got to see it yet - Steve knew that though, he wouldn't ask.

In fact, he barely gave Bucky a glance, but the few seconds their eyes met it wasn't cold. Then he was propping up on the windowseat across the room, dragging the closest sketchbook to him and grabbing a pencil stub.

They were both quiet for a long time. It'd never really been like this in Brooklyn - Steve would fit perfectly dumped back eighty years, but they'd never had the money for paints back then. And if they had, you could be sure as hell Bucky wouldn't be the one using his mediocre talents to waste them.

In fact, he'd always been reluctant to do anything that might mean taking away from materials for Steve. Or food for Steve. Anything for Steve.

He picked up a thinner brush and blew out a level breath between pursed lips, leaning closer to the canvas and carefully touching the blue tip over brown.

"You okay?" Steve asked, twenty minutes later. Bucky tucked a stray hair back into his bun and swirled his paintbrush in a cup of water.

"Uh huh," he replied, taking a dab of orange and locking the metal fingers in position around the brush to keep his grip solid as he pressed careful, small, watery dots.

Another five seconds and the sketchbook closed, sound of the discarded pencil rolling edgily across the floor.

Then Steve plopped down a few feet in front of the easel, shoving a bucket aside with his toe and looking up with his arms around his knees.

"What's goin' on?"

When he'd asked Natasha, she'd looked at him incredulously for a moment before cautiously replying, "When I first joined SHIELD, I thought I was going straight. But I guess I just traded in the KGB for Hydra."

If only Bucky trusted him so much.

"Nothin'," he hummed, not looking away from his painting.

Apparently they were going to ignore that Steve'd shouted a lifetime of feelings yesterday and Bucky'd broken down in a hospital hallway.

"You want lunch?" He offered, and Bucky paused, looking around the side of his painting.

"Let me clean up here, and I'll get something cooking--".

"I'll do it," Steve interjected, and Bucky gave him an odd look and scooped up his brushes, starting for the sink to wash them. Steve stood and walked back out, fighting the urge to slam the door behind him. It wasn't Bucky that made his fists curl. It was Bucky that forced them free.

~*~

Once, months ago, a comment about Hydra that Bucky shoved aside, straightened up, and Steve kicked into Captain Mode. Before they'd ever kissed, before any of it.

"You can't just pretend the past 70 years didn't happen," Steve'd argued, and Bucky'd kept his voice level in response.

"It's either that or have a mental breakdown, which would you prefer?" It was sarcasm obviously, but Steve just threw up his hands.

"If it'll help you move past it! You ignore this and it's going to boil over one day and that's gonna be a hell of a lot worse."

"No."

"What?"

"No, I'm not going to talk - I'm not going to think about how I got tortured for 70 years. It's not happening."
And now, months later, Bucky looked back and decided Steve'd been right. It'd built up.

He supposed this was that breakdown.

~*~

Bucky sat uncomfortably at the table, watching Steve busy himself around the kitchen. They weren't like this.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. Steve was the snarky one, full of sass and bullshit, the one getting in fights in alleys. He wasn't supposed to be the one cooking and taking care of and squeezing himself into that "settling down" box. What happened to the restlessness?

A plate slid in front of him and Bucky silently picked up his fork.

"Can we talk about it?"

He looked up as Steve sat down, hands in his lap and eyes down cautiously.

"Meaning?" Bucky said, because there were multiple things that could be about. Hallways and Garages.

"What I said..."

"Now?"

"No, it's fine," Steve mumbled, picking up his fork too, eyes still cast down. Bucky studied the top of his blonde head for a moment. A month ago all he'd wanted was for Steve to not get in fights, but that was before - this. Why was it changing everything?

Or maybe Bucky was the one changing everything.

They ate in silence.

...

He was curled up around Hemingway when Steve knocked on his door.

"Sleep in mine tonight?"

Well that was blunt. He was gonna ask why, but the nervous voice and shoved hands in pockets beat him too it.

"Didn't get an hour last night, don't wanna deal with the nightmares alone."

That was even more blunt. But he was still Bucky Barnes, he wasn't gonna be able to deny Steve that. He stood, followed into the other bedroom, refusing to let his heart beat faster as he plopped down heavily on Steve's bed and kicked his feet up, crossing them at the ankles.

Steve sat down beside him and it felt strangely like all the sleepovers they'd had as kids, falling asleep mid-ramble. Well, Steve would. Then Sarah'd come home and Bucky'd pretend to be asleep too as she draped them both with a blanket, placing kisses on their foreheads.

"Bucky, I--"

"Steve."
"No, Buck. Let me say this. I don't care if you want to hear it, let me say it for me if nothin' else."

He crossed his arms over his chest and slid down Steve's headboard, feet kicking up the comforters as he stared at the ceiling.

"Fine."

Steve still beside him like he hadn't been expecting that answer. Bucky may've kept his head as goddamned blank as possible don't think don't since...

But he wasn't gonna go kicking and screaming in protest either.

"I've known you my whole life," he started slowly and Bucky snorted because yes, that was the whole point. Mere exposure. Mermaid effect. Nothing more.

A pause and Steve slid down beside him, matching his stance as he stared at the ceiling too.

"...and so I know what you're thinking."

"You really don't," Bucky pointed out, and Steve reached over to smack his arm. Bucky made a hurt noise and covered the bruising spot with his metal hand.

"Yes, I do. And I looked up the mermaid effect. You idiot."

"Hey! How'd you even--"

"You said it once. And despite what you think, I pay attention when you talk, Buck."

He sunk further down on the bed and kicked his legs deeper under the covers. Steve never paid attention when he - I dunno, told him not to fucking jump out of buildings.

"Buck. Bucky, are you listening to me?"

"Yes," he growled, counting in Russian in his head.

Then Steve's hand was on his face, turning it sideways, thumb and fingers pressing into his cheeks and forcing him in place.

"You really think my feelings for you are only cause we've been friends for so long?"

"...it makes sense."

"Is that why you have feelings for me?"

"Whoever said I have feelings for you?"

Steve let go of his face but Bucky didn't bother turning away now. Curled towards each other.

"Do you?"

Fuck. This?

"And that's it."

"I was going in alphabetical order," Bucky clarified. "There's still 25 more letters."
"D comes before G."

"But I had to put aggravation before adoration because it's a very primary emotion."

"I told you you could feel emotions."

"I tell you to be careful all the goddamn time and what do you do? You crash planes and dive out of places without a parachute--"

"Forcing myself to know what you felt like falling."

Bucky stared. Steve blinked at him, tucking his hands further underneath his cheek.

"What the fuck you motherfucking asshole--"

Steve closed the space between their mouths and pressed his lips carefully, softly, to Bucky's.

It was short and the softest thing he'd ever felt, just a brush of their mouths, a little pressure, and then Steve was pulling back, plopping his head back down on the comforter with a little curling smile and his eyes all lit up, hair ruffled to the side and his nose just inches from Bucky's.

Huh. That light in his eyes was the same one he got in fights.

Bucky'd always thought that was rage. What the hell was it, then? Cause he sure as hell didn't look pissed now.

"What was next on the list after amazement?" Steve whispered and Bucky couldn't fight the smile because what a fucking idiot.

"Anchored. Anxious. Awestruck."

"Do you really have a whole list?"

"26 letters, Stevie."

"Buck...what about the eight I told you earlier?" He rolled his lips in, suddenly nervous again, and Bucky's heart was pounding fast enough Steve had to hear it.

He swallowed and searched between the two blue eyes. He wasn't sure he was ready for this. How was he supposed to face--

It couldn't be, Steve couldn't really...

He'd been waiting round for Steve forever. He'd always been there, waiting for Steve, he'd just never thought Steve'd ever actually...?

"I've spent my whole life afraid to let go and tell you. You've always had so much, Buck, but me, I had nothing but you--"

"No, it's not."

"Listen. Before the suit, before everything. You were the one. Do you remember what I told you the first time I almost died? I've got no regrets cause I have you. The hell did you think that meant?"

"You were always restless, wild, what happened to that--"
"Nothing! But I'm older, now, Buck. I don't have to prove anything anymore, not if I have you. This can be it, don't you get that? I know it's scary - believe me, I'm terrified - but just because you can't control it doesn't mean it's gonna be a disaster."

But he'd always had control, that was how you survive--

"Emotions are weaknesses to you, I get that. I don't know if that was Hydra or just you, but I promise you the truth can't hurt us now, Bucky. I went through hell to find you, I always have and I always will. But I wouldn't trade a minute of it, not if it got us here."

Snap and he almost sat up, shooting back so fast Steve could barely finish the declaration.

"I'd trade it. I'd trade it all, send you back home to Peggy like we planned. Come over on Sundays for dinner-but-not-dessert, I'd fucking do it Steve, you deserve that."

Steve's big hands grabbed his and Bucky was looking at him with wide eyes, caught on that helicarrier all over again, terrified of wherever the next minute would land them.

"You and Peggy planned...?"

"Shit."

Bucky rolled away and Steve bounced up, landing on top of him with his arms barring either side of Bucky's shoulders, looking down with his eyebrows raised.

"She knew? She knew before I did?"

"She knew before I did," Bucky corrected. The incredulous look on Steve's face narrowed as he searched back through his memories. Bucky waited, shifting a little to get more comfortable under Steve's weight - honestly, who the fuck had conversations like this - and finally it clicked, blue eyes going wide.

"That day you came out of the officer's tent crying. You avoided me like the plague after that. What the hell happened?"

"A lot," Bucky sighed and Steve furrowed his eyebrows in offense.

"Tell me."

"I will, eventually, just not right now, okay? I've fessed up my share of secrets over the past twenty-four hours to last me a month." Bucky gave him a look and Steve tipped his head in reluctant agreement, rolling back off Bucky to collapse on the bed beside him.

"Speaking of fessed secrets..."

"You really don't know how to drop anything, do you Rogers?"

"At least that hasn't changed?" He offered and Bucky elbowed him. An offended laugh and Steve's pretty face turned to his again. Bucky met the gaze, raised eyebrows as wavering honesty draped like a blanket over the raw wound. "I've been waiting to say that for years. And, since its me, of course I mucked it up, did it during the middle of a stupid fight, but."

"You kissed me in the middle of a fight too," Bucky pointed out, because really, could Steve even function off a battlefield? Although that thought was a lot more depressing than amusing.

"Bucky, shut your mouth for three seconds and let me say this."
"Shut it for me," he shot back and Steve smiled.

"I'm gonna say this first. Not gonna let you distract me with your pretty lips."

"You think my lips're pretty?" Bucky batted his eyelashes and pitched his best USO dancer voice, which got him an exasperated sound from Steve as he rolled his eyes up to the ceiling again.

"My god shut up, would you?"

"CO thinks he can order me around," Bucky mumbled under his breath and Steve shot him a glare, propping up on one elbow so he was fully in Bucky's line of sight, hovering over him.

"Sergeant James Buchanan Barnes--"

"Oh my god I'm too young to get married--"

"--I love you."

Bucky's mouth snapped shut. Steve looked down at him, eyes all soft and affectionate, fingers sketching tiny letters into Bucky's chest.

I love you.

"Stevie," Bucky breathed, name hovering on his lips like raindrops dripping from a flower. A lifetime of I need you's and switching a couple letters suddenly confirmed every wish he'd ever made.

"You don't have to say anything, you don't have to do anything about it if you don't want. But it's the truth. And if you want...I'm yours to choose."

Tears shouldn't've welled up at something so simple, something he knew in his soul, but they did anyways. How was this what he deserved?

When he'd asked why, this wasn't an answer he'd ever considered.

The pain ripping in his chest, the open vulnerability on Steve's face, that same simple, unrepenting promise he'd had on his face on that helicarrier, then finish it.

His chest was tight and his eyes were prickling because after all that time, the explosions of war and dirt-covered simplicity of Brooklyn and promising, hopeful smile from the passenger side of a red car as the USA rumbled beneath their tires and how far had they had to go before they made it here and it wasn't fair, he'd never planned on making it here at all.

Spending his whole life chasing rainbows and he'd ran smack dab into the gold at the bottom and it hit like a faceful of bricks.

If this was love, he didn't want it. If this pain was their hearts, then Bucky'd give anything to cut his out and restart. Take it from me please.

An angel's thumb slid over the corner of his eye, wiping an unfallen tear and Bucky closed his eyes, bottom lip trembling. How could Steve be so sure when Bucky was so terrified?

"Stevie, I can't give this my all," he whispered, and the thumb curved down, tracing his cheekbone. It wasn't just that he didn't have control, he was a ghost, they were both dead already, how were they supposed to make it--
But that wasn't the worst part. The worst part was what if they did. What if they tried and it worked, then something happened and he lost Steve?

"N-now that you know what happened last time? Don't you see why I can't let that happen again?" He blinked his eyes open and Steve was still propped on one elbow, gazing down at him with that serious, caring expression, hand shifting into Bucky's hair as he listened quietly. Now Bucky was the one pleading, running his hand up Steve's arm and back down, trying to get him to understand. "I turned into a deadly assassin because I lost you. Can you imagine if I actually had you - like that, completely - and I lost you? I can't picture anything worse than the monster I became as the Winter Soldier, but I promise, somehow, it would be."

"You won't lose me," Steve replied, easy and light like that could somehow be true.

"You don't know that." How could he be so goddamned calm?

"I do." A little mischievous smile and the fingers in his hair tugged a piece. "It's the only thing I know."

Bucky narrowed his gaze, studied Steve's tells, except the idiot wasn't lying. Steve's lies were so goddamn transparent, but he'd convinced himself completely.

He actually thought this was going to work, he was more confident they'd have each other forever than anything else and if that wasn't the most infuriating thing he'd ever heard--

"You're a fucking sap," Bucky accused, knocking Steve upside the head with his metal hand. A resounding noise of offense, then Steve was shoving him hard enough to slide half the blankets off the bed and that's right, it was like the middle of the night, he'd totally forgotten with the bedside lamps on.

Why'd Steve turned on the lights before he invited Bucky over? He'd been totally planning this conversation, hadn't he, the nightmare thing had been a total ploy.

Bucky dove back across the bed and landed a punch on one of Steve's arms, then that beautiful laugh was lighting up the room and they were rolling over, sheets tangling up in their legs.

"Only thing you know," Bucky huffed, throwing an elbow before wrapping his knee over Steve's leg to pin him. "I could've sworn you at least passed Ms. Jones's third grade class."

"Why do you still have to bring that up?" Steve flipped over and knocked Bucky back to the mattress, glaring down at him with his hair sticking up in spikes. "I passed the goddamn class."

"Barely! They almost held you back because you were always missing lessons, getting sent home with bloody noses--"

"It wasn't like they were gonna send me across the hall to Ms. Holtz so you could patch me up!"

"They should've," Bucky shot back, letting go of his grip on Steve's arms and flattening his palms on soft cheeks instead, holding Steve's face as he tipped his head curiously and looked him over.

Another little smile and Steve dropped down to his elbows, chest compressing heavy over Bucky's heart, both hands sinking into his hair. He wondered what Steve would say if Bucky asked him to cut dark length away from him forever.

"So do I get to have an answer? Am I yours?" It was such a silly question, felt like it didn't come anywhere near what they were, what they'd been since they met.
"You've always been mine." Bucky sighed, shoving a hair through the blonde and snorting at the sudden joy that lit up Steve's face. It was misplaced, though, because that wasn't a concession to the future. He wasn't retracting his belief anytime soon. He couldn't imagine willingly falling again. "But that doesn't mean we can do this, Steve. I don't know if it's even possible for me to open my heart--"

"Is that a challenge?"

"Shit, Steve, no--"

"Steve yes." He bounded up like a goddamn puppy and placed a loud peck to his cheek while Bucky groaned at the sky. "I'm gonna show you Bucky, I'll show you it's real and I'm here forever. I'll prove it to you every day if I have to."

"Why?" Bucky asked the ceiling fan, throwing up the hand that wasn't pinned by Steve for good measure. "Why is this the idiot who weaseled into my life?"

"Shut up. You love me." Another blinding smile and Bucky squinted, too bright to stare right at the sun. "I'll show you. Can I kiss you?"

"Really. You never asked before." Bucky raised an eyebrow and some of the light diminished as Steve's face clouded over, sinking down into the memories of everything'd Bucky shouted yesterday. No, no, none of that. "But...since I know you're not being a manipulative ass and you actually lo--have feelings for me, then. Yes punk, you can kiss me."

"You sure?" Steve asked slowly and Bucky rolled his eyes, grabbing the front of his tshirt.

"Shut up and kiss me, Rogers."

~~~

"Uh oh, Rogers is smiling, barr the doors!" Sam shouted and Steve flicked him off on his way to the fridge. "No, seriously man, what's going on? He say it back?"

"No," Steve opened the door and grabbed Sam's orange juice. Sam opened his mouth to protest, but the dreamy look on Cap's face made him shut it again. It wouldn't kill him to let Steve have the goddamned orange juice for once. "But we're working on it. We're working on a lot, and it's good, Sam, it's really good."

A glass sat down on the counter because he was a civilized human being unlike Natasha and Sam watched as Steve poured his precious orange juice with hands steadier than he'd seen in a few weeks.

They'd all gotten to that point where paranoia set in - no one was gonna tell Rogers about Jarvis's footage or the tabs they were keeping on both him and Barnes, but it'd been a necessary precautionary to take. Barnes was pretty fucked up still, and Steve was oblivious to the whole thing - even the way his own hands trembled, it seemed - but now that Clint had a couple holes, it seemed shit was starting to straighten out.

Which was good, because everyone in the tower'd agreed they were damn near intervention-time.

"I'm glad for you, man," Sam said cautiously, shifting on his barstool. Steve hummed and put the orange juice back in the fridge. "I'm always here if you need to talk, you know that, right?"

"I know." Steve shot him a quick smile and grabbed the glass, starting back across the room without as much as a goodbye.
"Jarvis? Are Stark's warnings still on alert?"

"Yes, Mr. Wilson," the walls (or whatever) replied.

"Good." Sam studied the empty elevator Steve'd disappeared into. "Let's keep it that way for awhile."

~~~

He shouldn't have told Steve he could use his boombox whenever he wanted.

Because stumbling into the bathroom at 6am and getting assaulted by a sudden blast of music was not his idea of fun.

Bastard set it to auto-motion-play (it was from Stark after all), so at least the only receivers of his knives were the walls. Which was probably the point, but still.

Teelllll me you believe in love, it's not an illusion illusion illusion

"STEVE!!!"

"Hmm?" was all he got in response, stalking into the kitchen and dumping the still-playing boombox onto the kitchen table. Steve was flipping pancakes on the stove and he was wearing a goddamned apron and it was way too early for this.

"What the fuck is this?"

"It's a cute song," he defended, tilting onto one tiptoe to grab cinnamon from the cabinet. "They're that band who sing 'Act My Age.' Remember, that Irish song we danced to?"

Bucky cocked his head, listening to the lyrics. But believe me, I'm not trying to deceive you. I promise falling for me won't be a mistake.

"Má tá tú t-ádh go leor chun a bheith Éireannach, tá tú t-ádh go leor," Bucky muttered, drumming his fingers along the counter.

Steve whipped his head to the side, disbelieving grin creeping onto his features.

"You remember that?"

"Your ma literally said that weekly, Steve. Pretty sure even the Winter Soldier would've recognized that one. Why didn't you shoot for that instead of the awed 'Bucky'?"

"Wait. You remember that?"

"The bridge fight? Yeah, sure. I remembered it after too. Kept saying but I knew him when Hydra was telling me to kill you. They had to wipe me again."

Steve lowered back flat-footed, setting down the cinnamon and wiping his hands off on his apron. Were his eyes watery? His eyes were definitely watery.

He stuck his thumb over his shoulder, indicating the peppy song still drifting from the stereo. "The song isn't actually that bad. I mean, it's cheesy as hell..."

"Bucky," Steve's voice broke over his name and Bucky sighed, hurrying across the kitchen to undo Steve's apron and turn down the heat on the pancakes, whirling Steve around and wiping both hands over his cheeks.

"C'mon babydoll, don't cry. Of course I knew you, you idiot." He reached up on his tiptoes and pressed a solid kiss on Steve's nose, ruffling his hair for effect as he pulled him away from the stovetop. "C'mon, don't get all soft on me now."

"Sorry," Steve wobbled and Bucky rolled his eyes, cupping his hands on both sides of Steve's neck, catching that shiny gaze on his.

"It's okay. Now talk to me about the song, yeah?"

A soft laugh and Steve's hands covered Bucky's, squishing his cheeks a little. "It's pretty self-explanatory."

Can't you see it? I'm not trying to mislead you. If Steve was good at anything, it was finding goddamn fitting songs. No baby, this is not an illusion. I've really got my heart out on my sleeve.

"I ever tell you your a--"

"Sap? Yes." The smile was hurting, Stevie was hurting, and Bucky couldn't take that, gripping warm skin tighter.

"Kiss me," he murmured, and warm hands squeezed his hips, his ass hitting the counter as Steve caged him in with his body, tilting Bucky's chin up and capturing his mouth with catching lips. It was salty with tears, dizzying with everything else. Fingers slipped beneath his tshirt, branching over skin and it almost burned, summer sun pulling nerve endings to the surface, trapping him here in this body in the most incredible of ways. Hot air cascading over his tingling mouth as they broke apart for a millisecond, then Steve's lips were slipping between his again, tugging plush and slanting together again.

You're the truth I can't explain, you're the only one I see. It's not an illusion to me.

Steve's head tipped to the side, pressing harder against Bucky's mouth, prying his lips open with his tongue, suddenly nine kinds of filthy and wet and Bucky couldn't help the surprised sound escaping his mouth because he was the one with all the kissing practice, what did Steve think he was doing?

Except then those long fingers were digging into his skull and a heavy knee eased between Bucky's legs, forcing a gasp out of parted lips and Steve's tongue curled in his mouth, an electric shock shuddering down his spine and yet, wow, Bucky was really not complaining. The thumbs hooked under his tshirt guided his hips down to grind on Steve's thigh and that's when his veins took fire, devastatingly hard as he choked on another sound and Steve hummed soothingly into his mouth. The leg shoved between his was solid, warm, and... comforting. Strangely. To have Steve this close, this comfortable with Bucky's body, wanting him--

Had he just called this body his without thinking about it?

So tell me you believe in love...

Their mouths pulled apart on twin gasps, not enough oxygen in the inch between them for both their lungs, then Steve was leaning back and running his hands down the sides of Bucky's face, overwhelming adoration in that gaze as he stroked Bucky's cheeks and Bucky just tried to catch his breath, still shaking from the power of the way they were touching and those pretty lips came closer, mouthed the last words over Bucky's mouth, lips catching and moving with Steve's, sticky with wet kisses instead of tears, so tell me you believe in love, cause its not an illusion to me.
And Bucky was shivering, wanting Steve to take him here and now but it was raw, he was raw all over and he wasn't sure he could take anything more than this.

If he looked in a mirror right now, closed Steve on the other side of the door, would it feel real?

He almost wanted to go try.

"You okay?" A gentle voice as Steve kissed his cheek, pressing hard like he could sink right back into Bucky's mouth that way.

He tried responding and the whimper that escaped his throat first was ridiculously embarrassing. Fuck, he was drunk on the feeling of Steve hot and firm against him, could bleed himself dry and fill his organs with this instead--

Except he wasn't supposed to think like that, wasn't supposed to wind tendrils so tightly 'round the rose it shattered in fragility.

"Stevie, hell. The things you do to me, the things you make me want..."

"Like what, Bucky?" Closed eyes and Steve's repetitively-broken nose nuzzled his temple, words barely reaching the air. "Tell me what you want, sweetheart."

The world was split, tingling heat swooping in his stomach and that, Steve's pressure on his crotch, he wanted that. But everything else was so sweet right now, wouldn't it shatter the bubble of comfort and warmth they'd made, how was he supposed to decide between swooning or moaning--

"Do you smell that?" Bucky's eyes shot open but Steve was still lazily draped over him, placing sticky, lingering kisses on his cheekbone. He shut down the brain functions screaming to respond, rerouting his attentions to stave off impending mental crisis. And apparently kitchen crises as well. "Shit, the pancakes are burning--"

He shoved off the counter, ducking free from Steve's arms and darting across the kitchen. Only he'd grabbed Steve's hand on impulse, dragged him over to keep him near.

Addict.

"You're never touching pancakes again my god this is a disaster, the hell'd you use for butter? Hand me that bowl." Bucky gestured impatiently with his free hand and Steve reached, fingers locked together between them, tether and reminder and when Steve squeezed his hand, Bucky squeezed back.

But he still bitched when Bucky told him to back the fuck up and let him cook, so he gave Steve the silver bowl and a spoon and told him to stir, even let him sit on the counter and swing his legs and sing to the boombox while Bucky artfully made shield-and-heart pancakes with minimal glances in Steve's direction.

Steve started blowing kisses when their eyes met and Bucky blushed, tingled all the way to his toes.

"Kiss me where I lay down, my hands pressed to your cheeks," Steve sang loudly, leaning sideways into Bucky's space for the next line, "a looong way from the playgrooound."

"Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield," Bucky mock-recited and Steve's smile reached his eyes.

"You understood the reference!"
The last time he'd referenced that, Steve's hand had been poised to break his own wrist.

A long way from the playground.

A long way from the battlefield too.

The song kept playing in the background and Bucky hummed along a few counts. It was his favorite - he was sold on the first four lines alone.

"They called you Steven," Bucky giggled and Steve whacked his red star with a wooden spoon.

The morning sun was finally in the sky, lighting up the kitchen in streaks, shooting highlights into fluffy blonde spikes, catching a glow on his left arm in some angles, serene and beautiful.

"I have loved you since we were eighteen," Steve sang, legs swinging to the sides, his hands curled round the counter as he tipped sideways to the beat. "Long before we both thought the same thing."

He still couldn't believe that Steve was singing I have loved you like it was the easiest thing in the world. Like they hadn't spent decades dying for each other with their lips zipped shut.

"Were you really eighteen?" Bucky asked, scooping another round of perfect pancakes onto the serving plate and picturing every moment he could remember of eighteen-year-old-Steve.

"...these arms were made for holding you," Steve finished singing, hopping down off the counter and yanking open the silverware drawer. "More like eight."

"Really?"

"Yep," Steve popped the p, grabbing a handful of silver and sliding the drawer shut with his hip. "Told my mom I wanted to marry you."

Bucky almost dropped a pancake in surprise, thankfully scooping it into a flip before it hit the ground. "Holy shit, what'd she say?"

Steve shrugged, grabbing extra plates and starting on the table setup, hands and eyes focused on the mundane task.

"That I was confused. Not that kinda love." He straightened the forks and made a contemplative face at them. "I knew she was wrong."

Bucky watched him, careful with his words as he toed around the wicked temper and defensive walls. "Your ma wasn't wrong about much from what I remember."

Which was true, she'd raised them both with all the answers and an inescapable kiss to the forehead.

"She was wrong about this," Steve said firmly, taking the plate of finished pancakes and setting it on the table. All the stubbornness Sarah had, Steve had double.

So was he certain Sarah was wrong about what kinda love Steve felt. Unless...he'd been talking about the marrying thing? Was that something Steve wanted? To get married?

To him?

Whatever it was Steve was talking about, he'd known all the way back then.
And well, Sarah was wrong about one thing for sure. Steve wasn't gonna die in the back of some alley. He was gonna right here in the middle of some fucking Houston street throwing himself into a throng of electrically-enhanced-experiment-zombies.

"What the fuck are you doing," Bucky complained, shoving his next clip in and taking out the creature lopping towards Steve's deaf side.

Wait Steve didn't have deaf side--

Whatever. He'd take out all the bastards around Steve. Especially since Steve thought it was a good idea to abandon his relatively safe post in order to fight amidst the deepest of these peoplecreaturethings.

At least he had a great post from the overhanging highway, perched with a perfect view of the city. And the perfect spot to gun down every creaturething before it got a chance to come within five feet of his idiot Steve.

It was about three minutes of swinging around in circles at already-falling zombies before Steve threw up his hands in exasperation, shouting upwards in Bucky's general direction-ish.

"Let me hit someone, Buck!!"

He peered through his sniper scope, picked out the smallest, sickliest looking zombie and shot down everyone else except that one. There. Steve couldn't say Bucky never gave him anything.

"Asshole," Steve muttered into the comms, uppercutting the tiny zombie with his shield.

"Woah, woah, let's not share explicit relationship details over the intercoms--"

"Do you ever shut up Stark?" Bucky complained, re-aiming to send a bullet into the foot of the red and gold metal blasting past. Stark made an indignant sound and Bucky lowered his sights again with a smile.

By the time they took out the threat to downtown, storm clouds were gathering overhead and growling in recompensation. Someone made a joke about Steve's friend being annoyed he couldn't join in the fight and Bucky just had to shake his head, because they were fighting creature-experiments and joking about Gods of Thunder and how was this the future they'd both made it to?

Everyone was heading back to the quinjet after helping with a cleanup when said rainclouds opened up. Stark and Sam flew back the rest of the way for fear of their equipment, taking Bruce and Nat with them. Clint was actually on coms in the Stark Tower, making a lot of jokes from his hospital bed. He'd be back in commission tomorrow, and Bucky was pretty sure he'd only stayed behind because everyone'd lined his recovery room with pizza boxes.

But for now Bucky and Steve were stuck in the rain and walking on foot for the last block. The second the water started pinging off his metal arm, there was suddenly a dry spot. Or a metal disk floating overtop of his head. Bucky looked up, into the underside of Steve's shield.

"Well now you don't have an umbrella," Bucky pointed out, squinting through the increasing wall of rain at the water running in rivets down Steve's uniform. He shrugged, a little smile at one corner of his mouth.

"I don't rust," he commented, reaching over to flick Bucky's arm.

"Neither do I! You know I take showers all the time."
"Well I don't know that, first-hand." The blue eyes widened innocently and Bucky laughed, reaching from under his shield-umbrella to shove Steve sideways, even if it meant the cover tilting and pouring a rivet of rain between them.

"You two are still on comms," Clint offered and Steve cursed, leaving Bucky to laugh harder.

~*~

"I'm just glad Bruce didn't break the Houston aquarium - no one wants to deal with albino alligators running around the city too," Tony raised his eyebrows at Bruce, who narrowed his a little and turned his music up louder. Sam leaned an elbow on the cockpit with a curious look out the quinjet's windshield at the city disappearing below.

"They have albino alligators?"

Natasha rolled her eyes at the boys, steadying her balance as she peeled off her leather jacket, hanging it carefully in its place before spinning back around, aimed towards Steve's chair and mouth half-opened with a question before she realized it was empty.

He was in the middle of scooping Bucky's hair into a ponytail when Natasha shouted from the cockpit. He finished the tie, kissed the exposed back of Bucky's neck, and jumped up to see what Nat needed.

Rounding the corner from the shadowed tail-end benches revealed a very worried, arms-crossed redhead. Everyone else were in their regular seats, joking quietly and relaying plays of the fight, discussing something or another.

"Nat, what's u--"

"What's going on?" She interrupted, grabbing his arm and leading him off to the side, no room for answering before she waved a hand behind them and furrowed her eyebrows, shaking her head in confusion. "You always sit with the team."

"What?" Steve cocked his head in surprise, amused smile on his face as he reminded her. "I've been hiding in the back of the bar with Buck for long as I can--"

Remember, the Howling Commandos and a dozen other soldiers in a swirling, golden room, clunking piano keys and drunken singing, shouted laughter as Steve wove through the crowds, tension draining from his shoulders the moment he crossed the threshold into the back room, Buck waiting for him on a barstool. Just the two of them, the way it always was, sneaking off to the comfort of each other.

Nat blinked at him, waiting for him to finish the pause. The Avengers, piling into the quinjet after a mission. Tony plopping down in cockpit, Sam beside him and Bruce too, if he were there. Nat leaning against the wall with a snarky comment, Clint beside her. Steve on the opposite wall, arms crossed and plastered smile as he ran over battle suggestions with the team until Tony complained for a lighter mood and they all shared stories instead, one of the echoing laughs his.

He'd sat with the Commandos, sometimes, when they went out for drinks. But the moment missions were over it was instinct to close the flap behind him on the tent he shared with Bucky. Fall behind in the squad marching back, the two of them keeping up tail and talking about nothing at all as they marched over thick treeroots in forests. Even right after Azzano, when everything had been off, it'd been his instinct to separate himself from the team, to go running to the man waiting in the back.
instead of keeping his Captain Stance on, his Captain Voice, never stepping back from the star on his chest, never taking off the red white and blue--

Bucky'd asked him if he'd keep the suit. Not become it.

"...remember," he finally finished, trailing off in echoing wonder.

Natasha gave him a strange look and crossed her arms over her chest again, leaning closer with red hair bouncing.

"This is your team, Rogers. Is one member more important than--"

"Than sitting with the Avengers?" He interrupted, and suddenly the suit compressing his chest felt betrayingly tight, irrationally bright. It wasn't the brown, medallioned Captain's uniform he'd worn off the battlefield in the forties, he hadn't stepped in a real soldier's clothes since.... Steve swallowed, shaking his head once and curling his fists. "It's a plane ride, Natasha. I'm sitting with Barnes."

He brushed past her, aware of how the cockpit had fallen silent, ignoring the questioning gazes as their Precious Good Captain America marched to the back of the plane.

She was right - he always sat with them. Hanging on the edges, quiet. Gazing off, detached, isolated at his own celebration parties. Looking out over a crowd like an outsider.

He didn't used to be an observer of his own life. He used to have two feet on the ground. Natasha wasn't to blame for not understanding - she'd never seen him human, none of them had, he'd never let himself take off the suit because it was his only protection, the only way he even had friends.

None of them wanted to befriend Steve Rogers. No one ever had but Buck. Nat knew Captain America and that was fine, that's who he'd become, that superhuman with the morals and the golden-boy blood.

Did he have any human left?

It hit him harder than a swing to the face, saturating the world and dumping him on his proverbial ass. His hand darted to grab an outlay of the jet's wall, head dipped as the floor tipped and threatened to deposit him on the ground. Upright, all he had to stay was upright and he'd be fine--

"Stevie?"

That name shouldn't belong to him anymore.

A flash of dark hair, then a soft sound as Bucky hit the wall, tipping the plane sideways with the weight of supersoldier+metal and Sam shouted for them to settle down the post-mission celebration because Tony was threatening to come back there and film, words drifting uselessly over the air as Steve stared at his hands.

Bucky's fingers were curled, eyes wide, muscles tensed from the harsh shove.

"I'm so sorry," Steve rushed, reaching before he realized these were the hands that'd hurt, they couldn't heal too and then he didn't know where to put them, spinning around in a circle and forcibly unclenching the fists they kept making without his permission.

"Hey, hey, it's okay. Is it the plane?" Bucky hovered nervously at his elbow, and at least he looked okay, he wasn't bleeding, just surprised, asking Steve if he was what - freaking out because of PTSD? He wasn't fucking stressed or whatever the fuck Bucky thought was wrong with him, he was fine, he could handle fucking planes. Crystal eyes worried over his features and Steve's chest was pumping air too fast, raising up and down, making metal fingers twitch as Bucky worried his bottom lip between his teeth. "Can I touch you?"

"I'm sorry," Steve tried again, letting Bucky lead him carefully back to the benches in the shadows. Suddenly the wings were tipping and they were sliding over slick floors and fuck, fuck, maybe the plane was crashing, how was he supposed to deal with that right now too?

"I'm here, angel, you're okay," Bucky soothed. Steve blinked against leather, jolting in shock as the sudden sharp smell pressed to his nose; and tried to remember falling onto Bucky's chest, how the metal hand stroking his hair had gotten there. How long he'd been clinging to Bucky like the lifeboat he'd never had.

"I'm sorry," he mumbled against Bucky's collarbone and the hands in his hair stilled, hooking under his jaw to tip his face up.

"You have nothing to apologize for." Crystal searched his for a moment, then Bucky pushed his shoulders down, sitting him on the bench before swooping down beside him, hand cradling the back of Steve's head like he couldn't hold it up on his own.

The glass had been so loud when it shattered. He hadn't expected it to happen all at once, the moment the nose hit water, but it'd been an instantaneous explosion, the sinking-stomach feeling from the altitude drop turned to irrational, spiking fear.

"It sucks, huh?" Bucky whispered, pressing a kiss to his jaw. The strands of hair that'd escaped his ponytail were brushing Steve's neck, the sides of his face, too soft for the way he'd just shoved Bucky and practically barreled into him afterwards. And Buck was acting like this was all okay, like the whole world wasn't all wrong.

"Why can't I take back what it took?" He whispered back and he could be talking about flying, planes, instead of a man who died in the ice seventy years ago and never unfroze.

"Take me," Bucky whispered, then hot air was ghosting Steve's mouth and parted lips to follow, the sudden weight of two hands on his thighs as Bucky leaned over to kiss him, soft and pliant. A distraction. With his eyes closed he could feel every press of Bucky's lips, how easy they caved, like he was waiting for Steve to push forward and grab him, pull Bucky over into his lap--

_Do you wanna fuck me? Huh? If I let you fuck me, will you leave me the fuck alone? 'Cause I'll do it._

At least he had the sense to throw Bucky off him before the bile threatened to resurface, shoving him blindly aside as a hand jumped up to cover his mouth, eyes squeezed shut to keep from hurling, replaying the look on Bucky's face as his fingers fumbled with his belt and he couldn't handle this, how was he supposed to ever...

"Steve?"

"God, I'm gonna be sick," his hand muffled most of the whisper, didn't stop the sudden palm pressed to his forehead, checking his temperature like _that_ could be a problem. Bucky's skin was warm, grounding, worriedly holding his head in place and it wasn't right, he'd been trying to help and Steve even managed to fuck _that_ up. The fingers over his mouth curled roughly, digging into his own jaw to bring back any sensation that wouldn't leave him shoving Bucky again. "I'm sorry," he grit between teeth still holding back the urge to vomit.
How many things had he fucked up? The one thing he'd always taken for granted thought Steve just wanted to take him. That he only kept Bucky around for...

"Hey, no, it's fine, you're dizzy, it happens." Sweet fingers curving down his face, over his hunched spine. If only it was vertigo, if only he could be sick from just the goddamn plane instead of that and the suit squeezing his chest and the goddamned boy stroking his back, the one who'd laid down his body like an offering Steve could crush.

Bucky'd thought--

He shoved both hands into his hair, clutching to stop spinning that had nothing to do with altitude.

"Fuck, I'm losing my..."

"--center of balance?" Bucky finished for him with a little smile of comfort in his words. Like it was all okay.

Steve pried his head upright. Mirrored the pained smile with a similar nod and turned towards the window, shoving down the slow-dripping word mind he'd planned to finish that sentence with. He had to be okay.

Especially now, when everything was so fresh and new. He should be focusing on Bucky right now, on the confession of I love you resting between them. On building something. That was what mattered.

Bucky was what mattered. He had to get a grip and figure out how to breathe in the tight clothes SHIELD and the Avengers and the World wanted him to wear. It didn't matter that he missed the ragged suits that hung off his frame.

He had Bucky now, nothing else mattered.

A soft kiss to his cheek, hand slipping in his, and Steve had to close his eyes before Buck saw the way they were shining.

And for once, it wasn't to hide his love. It was to hide something else entirely.

Chapter End Notes

Yeah, I know, more 1D but those songs had to make an appearance somewhere because seriously, stucky.

So the rain idea was inspired by this adorable art:
and here is the source!

I know people are looking for solace between these two and really, it had to get worse before it got better but hey, it got pretty bad so there's definitely some good to look forward to.

As always, thank you all so much for reading, you're wonderful people and your comments make my entire existence. If you wanna come yell with (or at) me, I'm here!

xx

"Bucky. Wake uppp."

A soft groan and Bucky rolled onto his stomach, metal fingers untucking from under him to raise the middle one at Steve.

"So classy, Barnes. Get the fuck outta bed."

Long hair disheveled distractedly as Buck lifted his head and glared through the messy veil at Steve. "You're no better than me, asshole."
"Never said I was. Now get up."

A swinging kick that Steve barely managed to dodge, then Bucky was grumbling, sitting up and shoving hands into his hair. He was so precious in the mornings, especially the mornings where he wasn't throwing knives. A moment's hesitation, then Steve decided fuck it and bent over to press a rough kiss to Bucky's forehead, holding his head in place with a possessive hand.

Bucky made another noise and waved Steve off, grumbling something about little or not so little blonde punks ruining his sleep and Steve smiled the whole time he was searching for his running shoes.

"Hey Cap!" Sam called, waving him closer. "You see that sign? Memorial Day concert in Central Park. You goin'?"

"If Bucky wants to," Steve shrugged, glancing over the sidewalk to where Barnes was keeping pace with them easily, hair dislodging from his ponytail the faster they ran, framing his face all soft and disheveled. Long hair was a goddamn blessing.

"You gotta," Sam insisted, less outta breath than usual with the slower place they were (hallelujah) taking. "Probably playing your theme song."

"Theme song?" That signature befuddled-with-newfangled-twenty-first-century look and Sam grinned, tipping his head with the most axiomatic look he could muster.

"My Country 'Tis of Thee? America the Beautiful? Y'know, all the songs about you."

"About America," Barnes corrected, falling in closer stride and Sam gave him a funny look.

"Yeah, man...Captain America, remember?"

"He remembers just fine," Steve suddenly snapped and Sam's feet jolted in surprise. Not like it would've mattered, because Steve's smile shut down and he just...took off.

Left them both in the dust, a quick glance at his shoes then eating pavement fast enough to rewrite records.

"Wow. Uh. What was that about?" He started jogging again, pushing faster in case there was any chance of catching up.

He glanced over at Barnes, but the long-sleeved-shoulders only shrugged.

By the time they reached the edge of Central Park, Steve's body had to be aching with how fast he'd ran on an empty stomach. The sidewalks were crowded, but the towhead wasn't hard to keep a (very distant) eye on as Steve pushed through the crowds.

Then suddenly he stopped, one hand on the wall and head dipped, chest heaving and a dark inverted triangle of sweat soaking his back. They were too far away to see his face so Sam pushed through the crowds faster, Bucky keeping obediently by his side.

Steve's body suddenly jolted, visibly shaking even from the distance, and he was gonna fall, his legs looked about ready to give out on him--

A pedestrian knocked Sam's shoulder and he cursed, glancing back up in time to see Steve darting into the closest coffeeshop, disappearing with a hand over his mouth.
That couldn't be good. He quickened the pace, arm out to push through the coffeeshop door, when Bucky grabbed his bicep and pulled him gently aside.

"Let him go." The look on Barnes' face was passive, too passive.

"Shouldn't we follow him?" Sam glanced between the door and Bucky, but all he got was a nonchalant glance.

"His hair's too short to hold back. He'll be fine. You have mint gum?" Barnes checked pockets and Sam furrowed his eyebrows with a "no," trying to peer through the windows to catch a glimpse of blonde. He was probably in the bathroom then, if Sarge was right about him overexerting himself to the point of hurling.

"He do this often?"

"Running himself ragged? Yeah." Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, leaning on the brick and for just a moment the mask of indifference cracked, worry slipping temporarily before he cut it down, staring at the ground. "I can't decide if coming home weak-limbed or broken-limbed's worse."

Sam'd vowed to support the two outta-timers, they had enough on their plates without being nagged, but this was one'a those times someone had to step in before either got seriously damaged. He crossed his arms over his chest too, pursing his lips to the side before shifting his weight, glancing at Barnes carefully.

"You know that's really not healthy-"

"Yes, I know that," Bucky snapped, crystal eyes flashing as he narrowed them at Sam and then the door. The metal arm whirred and anger faded a smidgen, resigned sorrow filling the frown. "He won't listen to me."

It was a long shot at the least, but there wasn't much else he could offer, so Sam tilted his head and kept his voice as levelly helpful as possible. "You think he'd listen to me?"

Finding their target was easy when Steve was the only huge blonde with slightly shaking hands and a pale, pained face. He was at the front of the coffee queue, ordering some drink or another, too focused to notice them entering. Bucky sighed beside him, pausing at the edge of the counter to pull the disheveled ponytail out, both hands reaching up to redo it in a bun.

It all happened in slow motion, black glove twirling his long hair atop his head, and the long sleeves on his arms slipped, succumbing to gravity, sliding down to flash jarring metal in overhead lights. Bucky didn't notice, too preoccupied with studying Steve to realize he'd exposed a futuristic robot arm on a man who already held himself like a killer, a spark in his eyes and shit, knives lining his belt, glinting right along with the arm.

The scream was so loud Steve nearly spat out his coffee, spinning with wide eyes to the scene. The little boy wailing, tiny finger pointing as tears bubbled at his eyes, words blubbering high-pitched and terrified. "Monster! Mommy, monstermonster! Killer robot's gonna get me, killer robotkillerrobotkillerrobot!"

Bucky was frozen, staring at the kid like he was Hydra, fingers still tangled wrapping a tie around his bun. The kid screamed louder and the mom grabbed his hand and took off for the door, looking near as terrified as her son, muttering something about not invoking dangerous people and Bucky was still frozen, staring at the same spot, metal arm flashing and whirring in warning.

A cop two tables over fidgeting, setting down his coffee to stand, looking nervously between the door and Bucky, hand going to his belt, and Steve's brain finally kicked into gear.

He abandoned the drink and crossed the room fast enough that his head was pounding again but he couldn't give a damn, reaching for Bucky's left arm to slide the sleeve back down. Only the moment he touched metal Bucky flinched away from him, turning his entire left side out of Steve's reach. He threw an arm over Bucky's shoulders and Bucky elbows him off, refusing to let Steve anywhere near his left side and fine, they weren't gonna mess with it right now, they could talk once they got the hell outta here and back to the tower.

With the compromise of an arm around Bucky's waist he led the silent, stunned man over sidewalks, all the way back to the tower with Sam faithfully trailing beside.

"You take him up, I'll make him something to eat?" Sam offered as they stepped into the elevator and Steve nodded gratefully, letting go of Bucky's waist to press the button for their floor. Bucky backed into the corner, tucking his left shoulder out of sight and a wave of dizziness had Steve reaching for his hand, needing to know they were both alright, only Bucky's right hand wasn't there, fingers squeezed tight over his left bicep.

He looked about ready to rip off his arm.

Not safe; he'd blown his cover. Order: relocate. Civilian witnesses and coffeeshop cameras, a confirmed sighting. Running, they should already be running--

The look on his face was horrifying and Steve could picture it, Bucky curled in a bathtub, right arm clawing bloody at his arm like he could scrape away all the pain it'd caused and that image was too much, he couldn't handle this.

Then the elevator dinged open and Bucky darted past him, leaving Steve to follow weakly behind. His shield was propped on the wall, the silver marks from Peggy's hotfire gun flashing in the morning sun and he had to be strong, for Bucky, had to be that man again.

Captain Rogers, he forced himself to pretend that's what they meant when they called him Cap. That's what the Howling Commandos had meant, they'd called him Captain in reference to the man in the brown medaled uniform who'd held up that shield to Peggy Carter and asked what do you think?

And then cowered in awe as she stalked away on heels, beautiful hair swishing with the sound of her gunfire echoing around the base. Captain Rogers: a real soldier.

If he focused hard enough, he could pretend the Avengers saw him that way too. But what of that was left to see? He was Captain America to them. It was his own fault. He didn't know how to strip the red white and blue from their image of him, didn't know how to push aside the icon and show the face behind the mask.

Was the face even there anymore?

A quiet crash and Steve jumped, startling back into the present. Bucky.

He was sitting on the floor in his room, one arm wrapped around his knees and the other limp at his side, framed Howling Commandos montage scattered in pieces at his feet. The past, their old faces, their old smiles and laughter from that film in the museum--
Were those the ghosts? Or was it them now that weren't real anymore?

"They couldn't have known--" Steve started, crouching down beside Bucky on the floor. He got a glare through a veil of messy hair, but at least he wasn't frozen anymore. Crashing glass and pictures tended to bring you back to reality pretty damn fast.

"That I kill people with a terrifying hunk of metal?" He shot back and Steve plopped down beside him, grabbed the right hand from around his knees and kissed the skin on his fingers.

"It's done good too, Buck," he reminded softly, stroking a thumb over the only hand Bucky was letting him touch. "You pulled me in and kissed me with that arm the first time--"

It was the wrong thing to say. The hand disappeared and Bucky skid away, thankfully backing towards his bed instead of the spewed glass, a mean sneer twisting his mouth.

"What, you gonna be my redemption?"

Steve pushed to his feet, walking right up to Bucky and sitting down on the edge of his bed, only then the confidence flickered, hands trembling again. He squeezed them together, gaze flicking over the pictures on the ground. One of them was flipped up, a simple one from a film reel of battle, Bucky at his side and Steve's finger pointing at something in the distance.

"Is that what you want? Am I what you want?"

Bucky eased down next to him, tense all over. "Don't be ridiculous," he said crossly, like Steve's question was legitimately offensive. "You know the answer to that."

"Do I?" Steve muttered, shutting his eyes and running a hand through his hair, only the pictures weren't disappearing in the darkness.

"Steve, I want you." Less axiomatic this time, more the way you reminded a child not to play with fire. They were too late for that. He opened his eyes again, staring at his upturned palms instead of looking at the man beside him.

At least he'd said that much, Steve shouldn't push him, except in all those photographs he'd been drowning in love for his best friend, deep enough that he'd dragged Bucky with him through a war, selfish enough he'd let him die, let seventy years of hell take him away.

He had to know.

"How long?" Steve asked the sepia smile on Bucky's face in 1944.

"Too long," he replied easily and Steve couldn't take it anymore, he had to know, to be sure he'd fucked up their entire lives with an unrequited love story of one-sided dedication.

"Give me a date."

A shift and silence, then the sassy smirk in his words that Steve didn't need to look up to see. "What, you didn't like our trip to the World War 2 monument?"

There was a lot in that question, too much to take right now and Steve shoved it down, deeper where it couldn't hurt Bucky, where he was the only one being eaten by parasites.

"Bucky," he pushed, because this wasn't something he could dance around anymore.

And apparently neither could Bucky.
"Why does it matter?" He stood, snatching up a photograph and crumpling it in the metal hand. "Does it make it easier to believe if you think I loved you before I was a monster?"

The ground was slipping under his feet, impending avalanche and god, how could he be so selfish when Bucky was still hurting? Forget what Steve needed, "C'mon. You know that's not what I meant."

"Do I?" Bucky mocked back. "Because I hate to break it to you, I've always been a monster, Steve."

The little kid had shouted monster and Bucky'd frozen, broken, the words he'd had aimed his way for seventy years still trailing at his feet like a demon's shadow.

Always been. On their roadtrip, Bucky'd mentioned something about being deadly and broken long before Hydra. But that didn't make him a monster. Not Bucky.

"A killer, maybe." Steve lifted his head, stood all the way. Raising fists to take Bucky's hand in his, snatching the left too before Bucky could pull back, even though he tried, even though metal fought and whirred against him. Steve squeezed his fingers tighter. "But that doesn't make your left arm any less beautiful."

He said it like a challenge and Bucky twisted in confusion. "It's not--"

"It is, Bucky," Steve interrupted, letting go of his tight grip to brush his fingers up the cold plates. "You are."

The anger twisted, fingers curling too tight; a pause, precipce; and releasing, draining away as Bucky melted against him, emotions leaving him soft and pliable against Steve's chest, mellowing out of the Winter Soldier and into his best friend, both their knees a little weak.

He tugged them to the bed, sitting on the edge so no one's legs gave out, tracing his fingers higher over Bucky's shoulder, ducking underneath his sleeve and stroking back down.

"Beautiful, you hear me?" Steve whispered, tucking his hand under the metal one, lifting them both into the air, holding his palm out towards Bucky.

Crystal eyes were wet on the edges but his face was smoothed and calm now, curiosity and hesitance as metal fingers spread, his palm extending forward slowly. Sitting on the bed and facing each other, fingers lined up between them, the heels of their palms, cold hard metal against the cave of Steve's callused hand. Like reaching to touch your reflection, hand against thin glass, mirroring each other as two humans with two real hands.

"One day," Steve started, voice crackling enough to clear his throat and try again, wrapping his thumb over the back of Buck's left hand. "I'm gonna prove to you this is beautiful too."

Soft eyes flicked to his and Steve leaned across the space between them, tipping his mouth against Bucky's ear as he dropped to a whisper. The words hesitated on the edge of his tongue, barely convincing himself to say them when just the thought alone was so goddamned overwhelming, but.

He sucked in a breath and blew it back out slowly, ghosting hot air as the words pressed against Bucky's skin. "One day... I want this inside of me."

The whisper sent shivers down both their spines. It sunk more sensual than sexual but Bucky's body tightened all over anyways, collapsing forward weakly. Forehead pressed to Steve's shoulder, a soft groan as he closed his eyes, metal hand tightening around Steve's.
"I love you," Steve whispered and he could feel Bucky's heartbeat in his neck, the way it skipped and pounded. Entwining their fingers and squeezing tight enough for sensor pressures to shift plates. "Every part of you."

Running fingertips delicately over metal knuckles, Steve could still remember rolling out of the way as this same brutal fist shattered the concrete where his head'd just been, the way his heart had pounded in terror, realizing he may have finally met the man to end him.

How right had he been? And now his heart was pounding with the same thoughts and a very different kind of ending.

Rogers: the building that stands after a hurricane destroys every living thing.

Barnes: unraveling bricks and shattered glass, melting silver dripping weak to a black pit below.

He stroked Steve's cheek with his open metal palm, staring straight into the sun, and wrapped an arm over his shoulders, tipping forward and pulling his best friend into a hug.

Steve clung to him tight and somehow, no one cried.

~~~

"Oh, did I just take over your entire country? Is that right? With this modern game I supposedly won't understand?"

"Jeez, Barnes," Stark muttered, repositioning what Risk pieces he had left. "What'd you do with Cap and who is this sassy asshole?"

Bucky glanced over his shoulder, studying the innocent look on Steve's expression versus the chagrined one on Tony's. It almost could've been the Stevie he knew. With a shrug Bucky turned back to the chessboard, making a face at Pepper's destruction of his bishop.

Clint was playing solitaire on the coffee table next to the chessboard and it was raining outside, there wasn't much else to do.

"Hey! That's not a legal move, Stark."

"This is literally the first time you've played this game, you have no idea what's legal or not, Rogers." The sound of a card slapping onto the board. "Just because you're all righteousness about the country doesn't mean you know anything about Eurasia."

Bucky knocked out one of Pepper's pawns and waited for the pending explosion behind them.

"And what would you know about anything other than your luscious glass tower, Tony? Some of us fought over there, some of us saw the world and got our hands dirty, laid down on the wire--"

Not the wire.

"Cool down Papa, don't you blow your top," Bucky sing-songed, scooting his rook outta the way.
A spray sounded, pieces rattling and an offended noise, and everybody's heads lifted to look at Tony and Steve. Stark was wiping his mouth, setting his water aside and wiping the splattered table down distractedly with his sleeve while his widened eyes turned on Bucky in offense.

"My god, Barnes. TMI."

"Tee-em....what?" Bucky sat up, turning around on the couch and furrowing his eyebrows, because how was Stark spitting out his drink his fault? Tony made a really? face and took another sip of his water before tipping his head with an axiomatic,

"No one needed to know you have a daddy kink."

It was Steve's turn to almost spit out his drink and Tony snickered, fixing a plastic piece on their gameboard. Bucky ran back over everything he'd just said, because where the hell had that come from...oh.

"No, no, it's from that song. Straighten Up and Fly Right?" He made a nondescript handgesture and the awkward silence broke as Pepper moved another piece and Clint shuffled his discard pile, dealt himself another round.

"That makes way more sense," Clint glanced up at the rest of them before turning back to solitaire with a tutting sound. "Steve is not the daddy type."

My god. Bucky shook his head and turned back to chess, only the door was open and it was Steve, he had to, it was in his blood. He moved his knight and said just loud enough to be heard but quiet enough to be offhand, "Well, you've never seen the beard."

"Cap had a beard?" Tony whipped his head to Steve and the pained look on that pretty face was exactly what Bucky'd been aiming for.

"Oh god, Bucky, no," Steve pleaded and Bucky smiled, because there wasn't anything better than embarrassing stories about Steve.

"Oh, do tell," Pepper encouraged, ponytail flipping as she gave Steve a look. Bucky leaned back on the couch, winking at Stevie's frown before he started dramatically.

"It started when Dugan found out he'd never been able to grow one as a kid, that young pretty skin and all." Pepper made an awe sound and Steve put a hand over his face. Bucky smiled wider and continued. "So there was a month in '44... we were gonna be isolated from the cameras - and Peggy - and the Commandos dared Steve to grow it out. And let me tell you."

Bucky didn't get another word in before a plastic Risk piece smacked him dead-center forehead. Steve had a triumphant grin and Clint was laughing at him, then Pepper knocked his king over in checkmate.

He sighed heavily and pushed off the couch, nodding a good game at Potts before he plopped down on the stool between Stark and Steve, directly in front of the Risk board, and put Steve's little arrow back in his country, except probably in a better place because if they were good at anything, it was war strategy.

Tony's water was still on the counter and at least half-full, so Bucky snagged that too, watching as Tony fumbled his way through adding more troops.

They only got three minutes of content silence before Tony had to open his mouth again.
"...seriously though, if you guys sang that song in the forties, who was the top then?"

And it was Bucky's turn to spit out his drink.

Clint perked up from his spot on the floor, leaning around Pepper's novel to add an intrusive comment of his own.

"Actually, who's the top now?"

"My question first," Stark shot back, then all three heads turned to Steve and Bucky.

They turned to each other with wide eyes.

Tony watched the supersoldiers watch each other, everyone in the room frozen as two of the deadliest people on the planet stared wide-eyed like six inches away from him, matching unreadable expressions and weird stillness.

To be fair, they'd just been asked who topped in their relatively-new relationship and it was 99.99% likely they hadn't slept together yet and it was Captain fucking America after all, he was the paradigm of purity and goodness.

They still didn't move and maybe Tony'd broke the poor virgin vintage boys who probably never even talked about sex, let alone had it, and he may have just ruined Captain America?

Or not.

What he didn't expect, what he was pretty sure no one expected, was the perfect mirror, two twins jumping forward at the exact same time.

"It'd've been me!" They both shouted, and Tony's stool slid half a foot as they shoved each other off their stools and my god, he was way to close to this, and he was pretty sure Rogers just growled something that sounded like "oh yeah?"

And then they were wrestling on the floor and jesus, not holding back the slightest, it looked more like dancing except actually really violent, and kinda sexual, and he just threw his hands in the air, jumping off his own stool before they knocked it over with their rolling around and fuck, he was pretty sure Barnes just made that sound--

"Oh god, Pepper, I don't get paid enough," he complained, covering his face exaggeratedly as he fell down on the couch beside her. She put her book down and he could hear the amusement in her voice as she looked over his shoulder at the two idiots wrestling and probably wrecking his goddamn stools.

"We don't get paid at all, taking care of those two kids." Yes, kids, that was the perfect word. He'd told Rogers to lighten up, but he was pretty sure the only person who actually made him young was Barnes. And as much as he complained, a Cap that was smiling was...kinda nice, actually.

Although it was still weird, Cap was acting weird, and why were neither of them shocked and horrified at the idea of who topped in the forties, he'd really thought he'd had something there. Maybe if you've been best friends with someone forever, shit like that doesn't phase anymore. Still, though, it was a serious topic and they were wrestling over it--

"Pretty sure they take care of each other," Clint offered, laying down his last card and making a victorious noise at winning solitaire. Against himself. Again.
"Barnes! Eight o'clock!"

Bucky ducked and swung out his arm, knife flying from his fingertips and dropping the assailant with a stunned look and bleeding forehead.

"Rogers, head up!"

Steve swung around, efficiently bouncing his shield off the attacker who'd dropped unnoticed behind him.

"C'mere, you're better behind me," Bucky commanded, waving Steve over in between backflip-kicking the next victim's face.

"You two planning date night or fighting?" Tony commented sarcastically from above and everyone ignored him.

Steve did fight better behind him, when Bucky could have his six. And it didn't hurt to keep an eye on the gorgeous ass in that suit too.

The suit that Steve'd picked at uncomfortably on the ride over, finally fessing up after a lot of poking and pestering that it "felt tight, is all." Right.

Bucky didn't know what that was all about.

Steve loved the suit. Walked like he was always wearing it, puffed twice as big when he actually was.

Even if he wanted to be more than the flag, the attachment ran too deep. He needed that, the shield in his hand, the star on his chest.

The place he was most comfortable: the way Bucky used to only feel safe behind his mask. He actually wasn't wearing it today. Figured he'd give tying his hair up and looking relatively-normal a shot.

And from the heated glances Steve was giving him between punches to bad guys, Bucky was pretty sure the messy bun was worth it.

He was sniping from a rooftop when the access door blasted open - actually, blasted off its hinges, falling to the ground as Steve came rolling into view and Bucky straightened worriedly, turning to ask Steve what could possibly be bad enough to warrant him following Bucky up here-- then Steve reached out and turned off the comm on Bucky's uniform, still breathing hard as he leaned in against Bucky's ear and whispered, "I'd've topped you in the forties."

That, that's what--

Alright, he was high enough on adrenaline to play that game.

He ran his gaze obviously down Steve's body, taking in the pleasant curves of the uniform before raising a curious eyebrow and leaning in closer. Blinked innocently up at Steve's blue eyes, thumb brushing over an arm of the raised white star on his chest and casually challenged, "Stick me with that little prick a' yours? You think so?"

"I think I've had you begging for it," Steve replied, low and husky, and Bucky groaned low in his throat, dragging his bottom lip through his teeth and slowly popping it out, wet and puffy.

Steve yanked him close with one arm, mouths nearly brushing and tingling everywhere--

A sound behind them and Steve slid his palm over leather, grabbing the gun from Bucky's thigh and aiming it high to shoot cleanly over Bucky's shoulder.

"You used to shove me behind you, now you don't even bother," Bucky teased, running a hand down red and white stripes over abs, remembering the dozen times he'd been shoved behind Steve's back - the last of which ended with Steve down and the shield in Bucky's hand, then the train's walls'd peeled back and that'd been the end of that.

Except then a red glove was shoving him again, pushing Bucky roughly, slamming his back hard against the brick wall; Steve's body following and pressing tight, the bright blue shoulders pinning Bucky behind him.

"Like that?"

"Fuck, Steve," Bucky moaned, rolling his hips forward against Steve's perfect ass, making him grind back against his crotch roughly.

A red glove reached behind and gripped Bucky's hair tight for a single moment, fucking up his bun but a perfect picture stretched out over Bucky's chest; before Steve was suddenly rolling away, using the momentum as he straightened to vault over the edge of the roof, flipping out of sight and Bucky ran to the precipice, leaning over with fallen strands from his bun dangling in his face as he watched Steve plummet for the ground, reaching up to blow a kiss on the way down, cheeky smile on his face before he smoothly landed in a roll and dipped into it, throwing the shield on the impact, already back in the fight.

Bucky was left with his chest heaving, staring after the idiot who'd come up here just to say that and do that with huge, dark eyes.

He didn't turn on his comm in time to hear the comment as Stark blasted past him, took one look at Bucky's widened eyes following Steve's path through the black-suited enemy and murmured a soft, "Ah, those two. Fighting, they're lethal. Around each other, they melt."

Steve heard it, but he was too busy thinking about the look on Bucky's face, the way he'd hardened so quickly against Steve's ass--

The whole quinjet ride home had them on opposite sides of the same bench, forcing Sam to sit between them with no explanation as to why, shooting fuck me eyes over the barrier between them anyways.

They made it as far as Bucky's bedroom (it was closer) before he slammed Bucky into a wall. The gasp he made sent shivers down Steve's spine, sun-hot leather under his gloves as he palmed Bucky's thighs, sliding under to hoist him higher on the wall with two handfuls of his ass and Bucky was moaning wantonly, heavy boots crossed behind Steve's back, probably getting mud all over his uniform but he really couldn't give a damn.
Metal fingers were clutched tightly in the straps on the front of Steve's uniform, holding onto him like he'd fall the minute he loosened his grip but he wouldn't, Steve'd never let him fall again.

He scraped his teeth over the only part of Bucky's neck he could reach in uniform, tightening his grip and eliciting a soft cry from those gorgeous lips.

"Fuck, I'm glad Nat was wrong," Steve murmured, kissing over the fading bite mark, tasting like sweat and salt and mission grime and he was so okay with that. He pressed another kiss and another, trailing up to the soft skin behind Bucky's ear. "She warned me about you."

"She say I'm trouble?" Bucky managed, words breathy and voice shot to hell. And really, when he sounded like that, how was Steve supposed to do anything but pick him up all the way, mouths crashing together as he held Bucky's spread legs to his stomach and stumbled across the room to tumble haphazardly on the bed. They were tangled to hell now but Bucky didn't seem to mind, kissing Steve's mouth and jaw and clawing hands down his shoulders, swooping fingers down the curve of his spine.

"Cause you of all people know I'm trouble," he whispered, then hard metallic fingers were pinching his ass and Steve jumped, making a shocked sound and untangling his arms enough to pin Bucky's hair out of his eyes.

"Hey!" Steve kissed the smile on his face and wrapped a leg over his hip, rolling them closer together. Another sticky kiss and Steve murmured the rest against Bucky's mouth. "No, she thought you were a double agent for Hydra."

"What?" The pretty lips disappeared and Steve lethargically blinked his eyes open, meeting Bucky's wide ones and trying not to think about how hard he was, pressed up against the sharp bone of Bucky's hip. Instead he spread his fingers and thread them through long hair, careful not to catch on his gloves, twisting a piece away from Bucky's face and smoothing it down as patiently as possible.

"She thought you were playing me." Maybe it wasn't the best idea to tell him, on the off chance she'd been right, but with everything lately, how could she be? So what the hell, he may as well say it. "-- pretending to be in love so you could have access to Stark security."

"That bitch!" Bucky exclaimed and while that wasn't exactly the word he'd use, he understood Bucky's grievance as much as he understood Natasha's caution. Although, right now, really, tossing it all aside and kissing Bucky sounded like the best plan of all.

He ducked back in, catching ahold of Bucky's mouth and tugging his lips apart, then they were rolling, a haphazard tangle of uniforms and straps (and weapons, not the best idea) that somehow made sense to one of them, because then Bucky took control again, used his hands to grab Steve's gloves, pull back from kissing, cradling his face and forcing his gaze.

"You know that's not true." The sincerity in his voice made Steve's heart skip.

"I'm real glad it isn't," he breathed, glancing down involuntarily to Bucky's lips. He could feel his heartbeat in his throat, in between his legs, in his chest. And the hands on his face pulled him back in, lips already parted and wet as they pressed to Steve's and hell, he wasn't gonna live through the intensity of kissing Bucky Barnes.

Then metal fingers were undoing the buckle between Steve's shoulders and he lifted up, panting as their eyes met. Dark and sparkling, nine kinds of heat as they pressed closer, as Bucky unthreaded loops with a daring side-smile.
And really, it was only fair, because if he'd be wearing fewer clothes Bucky really aughta too. He hovered higher, starting down the dozen straps across Bucky's chest. It was a hundred times more heart-pounding than buttons, slowly undoing pieces of battle-armor.

The zipper slid down his spine, warmth trickling down his sides as the suit split open, Bucky's solid palms sliding down the curve and further, over his lower back and all the way down. He bit his lip to keep in the sound, then fingers were sinking into his ass and squeezed, rough and hard enough to make Steve cry out, rolling his hips forward instinctively to escape the grip - only that made him grind up against Bucky's pants and fuck, the predatory look on his face, Steve was gonna pass out. A shiver wracked down his spine and Bucky hummed, tightening his hands and pushing Steve's hips forward again.

"Fuck, Buckybuckybucky," he groaned, tipping his head back and curling his fingers over Buck's chest.

The grip suddenly released, wide palms spreading to the sides and tracing down the outsides of his hips. "So goddamned beautiful, Stevie."

Steve grabbed the collar of Bucky's undershirt, dragging him upright and pushing his tongue into Bucky's stupid mouth before he could say anything else to make Steve swoon. Uniforms shoved over shoulders, discarding haphazardly. His gloves were sweaty and he really needed Bucky's skin under his touch so those got tugged off with his teeth, tossed aside to hike up the black undershirt, get his hands on Bucky's hips.

Their mouths had to break in order to yank shirts over their heads, then Bucky was squeezing him tight around the middle, head tipped up as Steve grinded down on his lap. He wrapped his arms around Bucky's neck, panting into his mouth as their bodies rubbed together. They were still wearing way too many clothes, but if they took off more that'd be a line they hadn't crossed yet and he didn't want--

"You sure about this?" Steve asked, mouthing Bucky's jawline, chests expanding against each other with all the heavy breathing. Buck tipped his head, pretty hair swooshing outta the way so Steve could suck down the taut line of his neck.

"Yes, Steve," Bucky groaned and tightened his arms, pushing his hips up hard and making Steve's lips part in a gasp. "So sure."

"Ah, ah, but." He sucked in air, eyes squeezed shut as he leaned his temple on Bucky's, hands smoothing down the muscular back as his heart pounded in his veins. "B-but what about...?"

It was a good thing Buck knew him well enough to know what he was talking about, because his mouth couldn't form another word, not when it was too busy reigning in the wrecked sounds he wanted to scream. The hands around his waist loosened, trailing over his back in misplaced awe as crystal eyes leaned back into sight, irises contracted dark.

"I'm messed up, I know. You're messed up too. It's okay. I want this." Cold metal against his cheek and another shiver down Steve's spine, the rest of his skin burning hotter. Bucky looked so sincere, so sinfully gorgeous, stroking fingers over his cheekbones. "And I promise we'll talk about it all you want afterwards. If you want this too..."

It trailed off into a question and fucking hell, did Steve know the answer.

"God, Bucky. Yes." Leaning back further, he ran his palms down Bucky's bare chest, picturing it sweat-sheened and shuddering and hell, he wanted this as much as he'd ever wanted anything.
That pretty face was quirked in amusement now, watching Steve absorb hungrily, metal and short nails brushing gently along the back of his neck. Sweet voice innocent, laced with a dare beneath. "Then shut up and kiss me, Rogers."

The mattress compressed and they both bounced as Steve shoved Bucky onto his back, pinning him hard and taking his mouth. Bucky kept gasping against his lips and he'd never get enough of that, Steve could listen to him make those sounds all day long.

Except right now, Bucky wanted more and fuck, Steve could definitely give him more. The heels of his hands raked down Bucky's sides, fingers slipping beneath the hem of his pants to dig bruises into bone. Bucky scraped his teeth over Steve's bottom lip before pulling it into his mouth and sucking hard and Steve had to press their hips harder, throbbing enough to make him dizzy.

Metal scraped along the clasps of his pants, then everything got a fraction colder as Bucky shoved them down his hips, making a frustrated noise when he couldn't reach all the way. Steve licked the sound out of his mouth and sat up, wiggling the material past his knees and over his feet, turning to flip Bucky's button free next. The black pants were even tighter than Steve's blue, but he managed to get them all the way down, forcing himself to only think about this and this alone, removing Bucky from his clothes, because if he let himself actually think of what comes next--

Buck kicked his pants to the ground after Steve wrestled both their boots off and now it was just boxers, Bucky laying out on the bed and looking up at Steve beneath his pretty eyelashes and jesus, Steve'd never thought this could be his.

He swooped down to kiss Bucky's knee and a hand shoved his shoulder in retaliation but Steve didn't care, someday he was gonna kiss every inch of Bucky's body, memorize every bit of skin to call his.

From the drawings over the years, he had Bucky's face memorized. His shoulders, his hands and arm. His feet, ankles, but there was one part of him Steve'd never drawn, he'd never known like everything else.

His fingers skirted lines up strong thighs and hell, Bucky'd probably killed people with these and now Steve was feeling them up with yearning hands.

The breath in Bucky's throat caught and Steve bit his lip, gazes locked as he pressed the heel of his hand against the tented fabric of black boxers.

Bucky's hips rocked up and a moan choked past his lips, then Steve wrapped his fingers experimentally around the fabric, pressing his palm firm against the hardened heat through the layer of cotton.

With the same wild impulse that normally had Bucky yelling at him, Steve ducked down and pressed an open-mouthed kiss to the bulge under his hand. The sound Bucky made was nothing like yelling, all breathy and broken and beautiful and Steve wanted to make those sounds spill from Bucky's lips for the rest of his life.

He parted his lips wider, mouthed along the outline of Bucky's erection, eyes flicking up in fascination as strong hips stuttered. A soft hand gripped the back of his head and Steve tongued over cotton, wetting the material to stick to Bucky's skin.

"Baby, baby," Bucky murmured, fingers threading through Steve's short hair, scratching at his scalp. "You're gonna kill me."
"Wouldn't be the first time," Steve smiled, pressing a hard kiss to the wet mark he'd left. Bucky groaned something like I don't even care just keep your mouth on me.

As much as he could probably do this for the rest of his life, there were all these other unexplored parts of Bucky too and Steve wanted them all, everything.

The curve of Bucky's lower back allowed just enough room to slide fingers beneath the elastic hem, tracing over and down, dipping shallowly between round cheeks and his skin was so much smoother than Steve'd imagined, so soft and easy to touch, begging his hands lower.

"How're we doing this?" Steve glanced up at the fluttering eyelashes, mouthing over Bucky again and slipping his fingers further down, elastic band pinning his wrists.

"I'm - ah - still teaching you the ropes, huh kid?" Bucky managed, hand covering the thudding pulse in Steve's neck and really, he had the audacity to call Steve kid when he was on his back arching against Steve's tongue?

He lifted off and glared, except the crystal eyes were squeezed shut; so he closed his teeth over the skin on Bucky's hip in retaliation, biting hard enough to make a mark. Dark hair fanned on the pillow as Bucky whipped his head and moaned low in his throat, hips stuttering and toes curling.

"W-want you in me, Stevie," he gasped and Steve had never been faster to agree in his life. He chastely kissed the bitemark and pressed a bruising thumb against the red, pushing himself back up Bucky's body, another quick kiss on Buck's open mouth.

"Yes, yes," he mumbled, kissing again, tilting into it as Bucky's squeezed his shoulders, arching up to brush his damp boxers over Steve's equally disastrous state and at this rate it'd be amazing if they even got that far, the way Bucky's tongue was sliding into his mouth, tightening every muscle in his stomach, the cotton catching between them making his head spin.

Because he wasn't sure he'd have the mental capacity to remember later, Steve reached out his free arm, patting the edge of the bed until he hit the nightstand, mouth popping free as he turned his head, biting his bottom lip as he rummaged through the drawer because Bucky had to keep--

There, thank god. He grabbed one and slid the drawer closed, fingers curling around the crinkling packet and head dropping as Bucky's pretty mouth suddenly slid over his neck, teeth worrying his skin, sucking a mark into him that Steve only wished would stay.

"Overeager, huh?" Bucky pulled back and smiled, tipping his head towards the wrapper in Steve's hand and the teasing was so far from putting him off because honestly yes, he was really goddamn eager to touch Bucky like that.

"You have no idea," Steve huffed a disbelieving laugh and Bucky curled him closer again, a delicate kiss to his ear to follow the whisper.

"I have an idea, I think."

Wasn't it kinda crazy, how it felt normal to hold Bucky this close while they bantered? That their friendship fit in just as well right here with nothing between their mouths, hearts beating against each other wildly. A hand on Bucky's waist, legs tangled together and everything burning all over, warmer than summer on the beach, brighter than the sun off the east river.

He bit the edge of the foil and tore, shoving aside the wrapper to flutter off the bed and hell, they were really doing this, Bucky was waiting and warm beneath him, crystal eyes dark and watching--
Except. Except they weren't looking at him anymore, hardened and glazing over. Steve froze, hovering as he blinked down at the eyes that'd been so bright just seconds ago.

"Buck?"

A quiet metal ripple, then Bucky's shoulders drew up and Steve furrowed his eyebrows. The chest beneath his was rising and falling too quickly, lips parted, and Bucky wasn't even blinking.

"Hey, Bucky? You with me?" He discarded the condom and placed both hands on Bucky's cheeks, looking right into his eyes.

Nothing.

Then his entire body started shaking. Steve placed both hands on Bucky's chest, stilling and comforting as he tried to get Bucky to look at him.

"Bucky? Are you okay? Talk to me, what's going on? Buck?"

He waved a hand in front of Bucky's eyes. Nothing, again. His bottom lip was trembling now, hands clenched fearfully at his sides. Steve's heart was pounding for a hell of a lot worse reason.

"We don't have to do this," he reminded carefully, thumb over Bucky's jaw. He clenched his teeth in response; Steve bit his lip and hovered higher. Maybe his weight was too much, maybe they really weren't ready for this, maybe a lot of things.

"Bucky," Steve tried again, hand curving over scars from metal, and he hit the ground so quickly and so hard he'd have no idea what happened if the quiet whirr wasn't still adjusting plates. His chest was pounding, sternum already bruising from the swing.

"Please, please," Bucky whimpered from the bed and Steve got up so fast his head was spinning, one hand over Bucky's pulse and the other on his cheek, turning his head and searching for answers in the deadened eyes.

"Can you hear me? You're safe, Buck, I've got you and no one's gonna hurt you--"

"NO! Nonononononono," Bucky thrashed and Steve cursed, looking around the room for whatever must've triggered the panic, because he'd been fine just seconds ago, the only thing Steve'd done was open...

Maybe the sound? Or the smell?

He had to let go of Bucky to run around the other side of the bed, clear away the wrapper, dumping the whole thing in the trash. He'd barely turned back around when Bucky was blinking owlishly, rubbing his eyes with a tentative, "St-Steve?"

The panic in his veins dropped and the weight of fear lifted so quickly he felt a little light-headed. He leaned a hand on the wall, the other over his forehead as he watched Bucky cautiously from across the room and forced himself to breathe again. "Thank god, are you okay?"

"Fuck," Bucky groaned, struggling upright and waving Steve over distractedly, resituating himself on the sheets. "That wasn't fun."

"What happened?" Steve sat down on the bed beside him, clasping his hands together in his lap to keep from reaching. He had no idea what Bucky needed and he'd already fucked everything up once today.
Metal fingers ran through fuckedup hair, an aggrieved sigh as Bucky looked at his hands, voice falling quiet in explanation. "I used to have a rubber mouthguard...for when they wiped me. So the smell of rubber just--"

He made a crashing sound and spread his fingers in an explosion motion, staring at the sheets instead of Steve, but at least he was breathing regular, at least he could talk about it. Which was better than Steve could say, air trapped in his lungs and head flashing with seventy years he'd missed, slept through while his best friend was getting his head wiped.

And then Steve went and triggered him right back to living that.

"I'm so sorry, Buck," he started, but before he could beg for forgiveness or promise something unkeepable, soft fingers landed on his thigh, crystal eyes waiting when he finally found the courage to turn his head.

"It wasn't your fault." Bucky shook his head solidly once, and Steve had no choice but to concede, attempt to believe him. The sheets whispered as Bucky scooted closer, leaning on Steve's shoulder and settling in against his side. The fingers on his leg traced lazy circles, easy comfort to melt into, forget everything else.

He closed his eyes, didn't count how long they sat there before quiet words slipped into the room again.

"But Stevie, how're we supposed to...if I can't...?"

"We'll get tested." Steve dragged his eyes open, watching window curtains flutter and threading fingers through long brown hair. "Then we won't have to use one."

"Jeez, Steve. You honestly think that's a good idea?" The hand on his thigh stilled and Steve swallowed the ice coating his throat.

"Look, Bucky. If you don't want to, we don't have to. We don't ever have to do any of it." He tugged on a strand of hair and Bucky made a sound, his palm flattening on Steve's skin, fingers curling against sensitive inner thighs. Tingles straight to his brain, the kind that made him wanna wrap himself around Bucky's body and never let go.

He blew air steadily between pursed lips, slowing his pounding heart that'd be impossible for Bucky not to feel. "If we never kissed again, I wouldn't love you any less."

The head on his shoulder adjusted, chin resting on his collarbone as big eyes gazed up at him. Steve turned to meet the searching look, the wonder that made Bucky ten years younger.

"But you...love me enough to risk that?" To get a simple test and never use something triggering? Steve leaned back on the headboard, smoothing over soft strands and fluffing them away from Bucky's face.

"We've got the serum on our side too," he reminded, because the risks for them weren't the same as everyone else, and it wasn't like Steve was planning to ever have this with anyone but Bucky. How could he even question-- Steve cupped the pretty jawline in his hand, tone dead-serious as he laid the stars at Bucky's feet. "And I love you enough to risk anything."

"That's not a good thing, Steve," Bucky whispered, fingers tightening bruises into his skin, a warning instead of a comfort and Steve turned his head away, letting the blank wall empty him from his mind.
The hand released its painful grip, throbbing a pulse heavy in its place, and Bucky's head slipped from his shoulder, tips of hair tickling bare skin at the bottom edge of his boxers as he curled up in Steve's lap, resting heavy on his thighs like a solid weight to drag him down from the sky.

He didn't know how to get Bucky to accept the light he stole and offered, didn't know how to hang the stars to make Bucky smile instead of sink with quiet worry. What was there to worry?

"Later," Steve said, lifting Bucky off his lap so he could lay down proper, toss sheets over lethargic hearts.

Buck curled up on him like he was a sleeping bag, collarbone for a pillow, stomach pillowing his side, an arm tucked under Bucky's like a blanket, all bare skin and smooth sheets. The dark night ran away from them. Sleeping shallow. Then the sun rose, casting a golden glow over a scene Bucky'd seen once before.

A green vial, weeks after a plane crash in '45. A dream.

It wasn't the warmth that hit him first this time. It wasn't the glow of sunlight on his closed eyelids. It wasn't the soft breaths unsettling and resettling the loose strands of hair across his forehead.

The first thing he absorbed was the feeling in his chest. More than warm, more than comfortable, more than happy. Safe. Loved. Filling him, every ounce of his soul - in his toes, shins, hips, torso, tingling out the tips of his fingers, behind closed eyelids. Everywhere.

Flashes of lightning pulsing through his veins, screams gurgling bloody--

A soft smile and fingers pressing his spine harder, serenity washing over him so sweet he could drown in it.

The splash, icy water, choking up on black-booted feet that dragged him by his hair over metal catwalks--

In response strong arms wrapped him closer, spread wide and possessive over his shoulderblade, lower back.

Bloody dripping onto white brilliant snow.

"Mmm," Bucky hummed, mouth muffled. A hand dragged upwards, callused artist fingers rubbing over the bare skin on the back of his neck before slipping into his hair, nails scratching against his scalp. His lips parted in a blissful breath, fingers digging in to find outlines of newly-padded ribs that didn't stick out (thankfully) like they used to.

A green vial, needle sticking into his arm, slumping to filthy floors as his eyelids betrayed him, mind slipping into the golden sunshine of Steve's arms.

When he slowly blinked his eyes open, Steve was already looking at him, eyes so dazed they looked mesmerized. The image grew sharper and Bucky's soft smile returned, the edges of his mouth curling as he lost himself in an abyss of beautiful beautiful blue like the sky over Brooklyn.

Bloody stump, sutures torn, tipping sideways, wracking screams - cold, lying sunshine.

Steve's hand slid from Bucky's neck to his cheek, cupping his jaw as he searched Bucky's face, only a few inches of white pillow between them. Everything was so perfect and beautiful that Bucky's heart couldn't help but ache. He couldn't lose this, he couldn't.
Concrete floors, dogbones and crinkled newspaper in the corner.

"Let me wake up next to you every day, Steve," Bucky breathed, his fingertips curling a bit frightenedly over Steve's heart. The peaceful look on Steve's face sharpened with worry, creases forming between his eyes as he registered the tremors down Bucky's spine.

He knew this dream.

Rolling up to hover over Bucky, Steve's gorgeous halo of blonde over his head and their legs all tangled up. Elbows pinned on either side of Bucky's head and Bucky's breath cut off from his lungs.

How many times had they forced him to dream this?

Steve was looking at him with this burning expression, his eyes flicking down to Bucky's lips and the oxygen would cut off now, he knew that. He knew the next words--

He couldn't hear them again.

He couldn't hear them again.

Solid gold and he was drowning in it, choking on artificial sunshine and molten aureate in his veins--

"Nononono," Bucky pleaded, still as a board, afraid to lift his arms in case the left was gone; "Not this time."

A violent shake of his head and his hair was too long, whose body was he in--

"What?" The angel-imposter asked, and at least he hadn't said it yet.

"I know this dream. I know how this goes," he whimpered, heels digging into the bed because he couldn't move his arms, didn't wanna know.

"I never wanna see you again," Steve whispered, so soft, a promise. Hot, heavy hands ran down Bucky's sides, roaming over his hips, but the sentence wasn't matching the touch, the sweet sugar expression.

"Please," Bucky begged, thrashing his torso, shoulders pinned in place.

"--cky! Bucky, baby, listen, it's just me. You're here, in my arms, safe--"

Steve had a knife. The knife would carve a star into his chest. And a deeper, bloody red x over it.

"Don't!" He knew this and he couldn't take it, not again, too painful to survive. The film of water in his eyes blinded, cold slipping down cheeks as he pleaded the way he'd learned so well. "Don't cut me up this time," a choked gasp.

Cold, spitting metal voices. Were you in love with Captain Rogers?

"--real, this is real, I'm so sorry Buck. I need you to talk to me--"

"You already have my heart," Bucky tossed his head, dislodging the path of tears on his cheeks, voice a hoarse whisper, "-don't carve it out."

The blade of his favorite knife sinking into his chest.

Bucky screamed.
Hands stroking his face, chest, but he wasn't dripping blood, where was the pain, the angel of murder carving stars into skin?

"--aby, it's me, I'd never hurt you--"

"You killed me," he gasped through tears and the hands on his chest fluttered worriedly.

"Buck, it's Steve." Then warm hands were reaching for his and Bucky blubered protest, he didn't want Steve to see the missing arm--

And then four hands were between their chests. Except one of them was metal.

They'd--

"Get it off!" Bucky shrieked, clawing at the elbow, only it didn't end there, it went all the way up his shoulder--

"Shhh, shh, Buck this is your arm, it's okay--"

"NO! I have one!"

"...y--you think you're in-- before. Before you forgot me?"

"Forget you? Are you fucking kidding me?" A hysterical choked laugh. "Nothing Hydra's gonna do can make me forget you, you bastard." He struggled against the hands holding his, trying to punch upwards with the metal one, to wiggle free, salt dripping over his lips as he voice caught. "I-If only. It'd be better than waking up next to you...a-and. and then waking up again, faceful of snow. That stupid fucking newspaper..."

His shoulders caved, wracking his chest painfully, "I don' wanna wake up, Stevie. Why aren't you cutting me up? You always carve me up--"

"Bucky, this isn't a dream."

"I've had this dream before!"

"I'm real now--"

"Including the part where you carve a star into my chest and rip out my heart??"

Steve's soul shattered in his chest.

What had Hydra done?

Bucky struggled against him but Steve held him down, barring his chest solid as he reached for the nightstand. He didn't know how to deal with this.

His chest was soaked with terrified tears, the wrecked look of confusion on Bucky's face, the shaking and disgust, begging Steve not to-- "Goodmorning," the other end of the phone answered cheerfully and Bucky whined into Steve's collarbone, thrashing beneath him, pinned.

"Nat, Buck's having an episode and I can't break him out," Steve rushed, eyes shutting against another pained sound beneath him. "I need you in his room as soon as you possibl--"
"On my way, don't let him break anything."

The phone clicked silent and Steve tossed it aside, gathering Bucky properly in his arms and holding him unforgivingly tight to his chest.

"Please," Buck gasped and Steve shh'ed him, comforting hand stroking his hair, tears gathering on his own lashes as another shout of pain ripped through the shaking body.

The door burst open and Bucky screamed, roughly fighting Steve's arms. A kick to the thigh that was definitely gonna bruise, elbow catching under his chin and hell, it was a good thing Bucky's body was exhausted from crying, otherwise he'd never be able to pin him back down.

By the time Steve managed to settle him in an armlock and look up, Nat was putting her phone away again and Clint stepped through the open door too.

"Explain," Nat demanded, stooping down beside the bed and reaching for one of Bucky's hands. He curled closer to Steve and shook his head madly but she grabbed it anyways, started to wrap rope around his wrist.

"H-he triggered last night but it wasn't bad, he snapped out the moment the rubber smell disappeared--"

Clint made a sound and Steve flushed red, but there were things more important than embarrassment right now, than his friends seeing him and Buck tangled together in bed, wearing just boxers. They hadn't even--

He took a deep breath, stilling the shake in his voice, and stroked a worried hand over Bucky's fucked-up hair. "But this morning he woke up blabbering about vials and dreams and...and knives, me carving him up, and--"

"We've gotta debrief him. All the way." Natasha gave Steve an unarguable look and it wasn't fair, Bucky'd never consented to being debriefed but he was outta his goddamned mind and Steve couldn't lose him for good. She stood, gesturing for Steve to lift Bucky up, grabbing his other wrist and winding more rope, locking his arms together as Steve murmured promises against Buck's throbbing temple.

The three of them somehow lifted him into the hallway and Clint was thoughtful enough to throw a robe over Steve's shoulders as they started for the elevator.

But the moment Steve and Clint tried dragging him across the floor, Bucky's shaking flipped instantly and he was kicking and screaming, fighting back hard even with his arms tied and pinned to his chest with rope.

"Nonono," Bucky twisted away and Natasha yanked on the rope, tugging him towards the elevator and Steve's stomach seized, threatened last night's dinner to resurface because he couldn't watch this, he couldn't see Bucky struggling and fighting against them but--

It was impossible any other way. He'd tried everything to pull Buck out of it but nothing. If they didn't tie up his arms Bucky'd probably kill them all, if they didn't drag him for one of the labs he could end up offing himself.

This was dangerous, Bucky was dangerous and they didn't have options that didn't include dragging him bodily down the hallway.

Clint caught a kick to the shin and cursed. Steve tried to wave him off, he was still healing from gunshot wounds after all. But he just grabbed both of Bucky's ankles, scooping him all the way off the ground so he couldn't kick anymore. Steve braced Bucky's shoulders and head but he didn't stop thrashing.

"He's gonna come for me," Bucky insisted, eyes glazed and vocal chords destroyed. "Stevie's saved me from this table a dozen times y-you insignificant Nazi!"

Steve almost dropped him. Nat wrapped the rope around her elbow and took Bucky's shoulders on the other side, apparently not trusting Steve either.

Bucky's face was streaked with tears, more bubbling over as he choked defiant protests. "He won't leave me here. He'll know I'm alive, he'll feel it in his soul."

The weight tipped sideways and there was cursing, but Steve didn't hear it, palm covering his mouth. He'd known. He'd sat in the jeep next to the Commandos and stared out the window and he'd felt it in his soul that Bucky was alive.

Even convinced Dugan to go searching after the last mission.

Bucky'd been waiting for him, counting on Steve coming--

"Rogers!"

"Rogers, the hell were you thinking? Schmidt's supposed to be the crazy one, remember? I swear to god, the next tank you backflip off--"

A smack to his cheek and Steve startled, hand still covering his mouth.

"We need your strength, get your head together," Nat snapped and Bucky twisted sharply, one leg breaking free of Clint's hold.

"He's gonna kill you all," Bucky promised madly, eyes flashing through the tears, blood dripping onto the floor beneath him and Steve lifted his side again, fingers sliding over wet, biting ropes on a flesh arm. "He's gonna save me. He wouldn't leave me. He wouldn't, he loves me." A broken sob, curling at the hips. "He loves me."

Steve froze, staring down at the crystal eyes that were in 1945, screaming at Hydra captors that Steve'd come for him because Steve loved him--

Wind whipping open the side of the train, staring down at the empty snow, watching the world drain of color, watching his life fall down to the ground. On the metal floor, Gabe or someone trying to calm him,

"Where's Barnes?"

Screaming for Steve as he fell and Steve should've jumped.

"MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN! MAN DOWN, God, dammit, I need backup I don't even know what I'm supposed to - man down, I-I--"

"He's not coming for you," Natasha's voice replied and Steve's eyes flashed open so fast the room span. Bucky was crumpled on the ground and Steve's hands were empty and Clint was wincing, holding himself on the wall, and Natasha was standing over Bucky with the lead of the rope in her hands, looking down at him with cold eyes.
"What the fuck are you doing?" Steve lunged for the rope and she held it easily out of his reach, a hand up to stop him, and when her green eyes met his they weren't cold, not at all, they were heartbroken and full of more emotion than he'd ever seen in her.

"You want answers? You wanna help him? This is how." She dropped her gaze to Bucky again, all waver cleared from her voice as he curled away from her, dripping tears onto the hard floors. "Who are you?"

"Sergeant James Barnes," he choked and that was it, that was good enough, right? He knew who--

"That's not the answer they'd've wanted," she told Steve quietly and he covered his mouth with his hand again, backing up until his spine hit the wall.

"Who are you?" she demanded again and Bucky shook, answering her without the slightest hesitance, like he knew exactly what would happen if he didn't.

"A soldier."

"Who are you?"

"Fuck you." Bucky's eyes squeezed shut and his lip was bleeding, bitten bloody. "Waitin' to ask the bad one?"

"You say it," Natasha ordered, yanking the rope to roll him on his back, like she was in control, like she wasn't fishing for information and it was good, she was too good at this and what was left of Steve's heart sunk even lower.

Bucky blinked at the ceiling, deflated entirely, ropes going loose where they'd sliced into him moments before. The crystal eyes weren't crystal at all. Flat gray, no light to be spoken of, nothing to shine.

He looked dead.

"Who are you without him?" Bucky mumbled. Steve's throat closed. "Nothing," he supplied softly to himself, then his pretty face was twisting and Bucky shot up faster than anyone could've anticipated, scrambling away on solid heels, voice cracked and broken but getting louder with every word until he was shouting, until his lips were spotted red with blood.

"Nothing nothing NOTHING NOTHINGNOTHINGNOTHINGNOTHING--"

"Sputnik!" Natasha shouted sharply and Bucky didn't deflate, he shut off. Eyes rolled back in his head and he collapsed to the ground, and if the feeling in his soul wasn't still there--

Bucky's alive

--Steve would've thought he'd got shot, died on the spot.

And he was, dead, lying broken and small, tied up and bloody, and Steve couldn't move right now if a freight train came rushing through the living room and if a train couldn't move him now--

"They used you to break him," Natasha said softly, her tone filling in the rest, that explains alot. She watched him passively and Clint put an arm around her soldiers and Steve lifted a foot forward, stumbling from the single step, and somehow lopped his way across the room, legs giving out the moment he was close enough to reach out and touch the unmoving back.

His bare feet were sticky with blood and Bucky was still off, frozen, and Steve couldn't feel him breathing when he pressed his forehead to Bucky's ribcage.

Phones dialed in the background. He weaved his fingers in warm, lifeless ones and held Bucky's hand and the obligatory you holdin' my hand, Rogers? didn't part from those pretty lips and the noose around their necks might never let them both breathe.

They'd--

Bucky'd told him in the hospital about asking to be wiped.

And if they'd used that, Steve's not entirely sure he'd've made a different choice.

But the choice now--

Bucky said he couldn't let go, give everything to Steve.

He couldn't give anyone that power over him again.

This power.

The right thing to do would be to let him go. That was the just thing. But who was gonna wipe Steve's tears after his nightmares? Who was gonna hold him in rushing water? Who was gonna see past the suit who was gonna remember he still existed?

A touching glimpse at himself again, at being alive, real, instead of a 3D RedWhiteandBlue drawing, icon, and giving up Bucky meant giving up that again, giving up his life.

His love.

Selfish. Selfish.

A hand rested on his spine and Steve's mouth spoke. just. like. it. should.

No, Cap's mouth opened and spoke, Steve still couldn't breathe.

"I'm too goddamned selfish," the speech-voice said for him and the hand on him waited, silent for Steve Cap to say something more.

"I can't do this without him."

A nod he couldn't see. Natasha's voice, steady now, understanding.

"You're different around him, Rogers. Rougher around the edges. But softer in the middle." The end sounded confused, like Nat couldn't quite figure out how or why Steve was different but he wasn't different, he just wasn't Captain America.

Rougher around the edges and softer in the middle because he wasn't flattened with an iron, because he wasn't broken down and destroyed, because he wasn't pretending. A real human being.

"Is he coming back?" His mouth was dry cotton and his voice was nearly unrecognizable now.

"He'll wake up. Although he's gonna be pretty pissed. I'd be."
At least the walls weren't steel. Off-white, sculpted crown-molding bordering the ceiling. Not white enough to think he was dead.

Except he'd died already, with a newspaper. He'd forgotten and he'd been dead for seventy years.

Shot back to life with just one look. Thirteen words.

Then finish it.

He might as well've finished it, the pain etched into Steve's features when Bucky turned his head.

Steve was sleeping, chin on his chest, bags under his eyes and tight hurt around his mouth. If Bucky closed his eyes again, forced himself back unconscious, would someone eventually drag Steve away? Or would they let him rot at Bucky's side forever?

They were stones that stopped rolling, gathering moss and mold as their wheels spun and they went nowhere.

Because I love you.

You carry people, you carry me.

Codependency. If nothing else, the past twenty hours - that he remembered perfectly fantastically - served as an eloquent reminder: how much this would hurt if it went wrong. And that, what he'd reverted to, the screaming and the crying and the pain?

That was before Steve'd said I love you. What would happen now?

And if Bucky said he loved him back?

It wasn't just dangerous.

This was potentially deadly. For how many thousands next time?

In the war, Steve'd vowed to always save him. He didn't save him that time. Or on the helicarrier, or now. Bucky'd saved himself. And he had to keep doing that. Steve'd understand.

The hospital bed under his back was hard, unforgiving. That made two of them.

Bucky lifted his hands, turned them over, spread his fingers. Efficiency, that's how episodes were avoided. It was catching up to them, it was all catching up to them.

He felt Steve's eyes open before he rolled to see.

"You okay?" Rubbing eyes, then a hand reached for his and Bucky burned in the heat off Steve's skin inches before they touched.

Fingers weaving between his and cutting off the energy between and Bucky closed his hand in a fist, nearly crushing Steve's bones.

"I need out."

Steve paled.
"Not like that," Bucky clarified, "Out of the tower."

"What're you thinking?" Steve's thumb managed to fight Bucky's deathgrip enough to rub soothingly, contrasting soft over metal.

What was he thinking. Alottathings. Things he couldn't say.

This, he'd been thinking for a long time and hadn't said. His skin'd been itching to run for weeks. It wasn't enough, the openness of the tower. It was better than any other place, the security was comforting. But it'd been a cage since the last near-breakdown episode and the sudden adaptations in their relationship hadn't erased that.

"Road trip?" he offered, because it was easier to imagine handling this shit in some sketchy motel room halfway across the globe where Hydra and robots weren't tracking his every move.

"You think that's a good idea?" Steve worried his thumb over metal and Bucky wondered if he'd wear it down, rubbing hard for long enough.

If they were halfway across the country, the next time Bucky slipped into an episode and started clawing the walls, who'd be there to help Steve hold him down?

The ropeburns on his arms and wrists weren't bleeding anymore, just bruised. How many bruises would Steve have if Bucky got violent and there was no one there to help?

But he couldn't stay here either, he needed out.

"I just need...if I hadn't seen my roadtrip to Clint's farm through a wall of tears that might've counted, but." He shrugged, lifting his head off the hospital pillow and swinging his legs to the side, fingers still squeezed unforgivingly tight.

"You cried?" Steve was staring disbelievingly and Bucky looked down at their entwined hands.

"Yeah," he muttered awkwardly. He didn't wanna worry Steve, not with that and not with his need to run, but it was either have this conversation or leave out the window in the middle of the night. Steve'd given so much for them lately, this was the least Bucky owed. "But I need to do this."

When he looked up again it was Steve's turn to look away, discomfort and hesitancy written all over his features.

"If crisis arises, we'll be a phone call away," Bucky tried.

"I wasn't worried about that." Blue darted to his before looking away again. "They've got other soldiers."

Bucky knew the worry wasn't a fight without Steve. Just Steve without a fight.

"You don't have to come," he reminded quietly, touching down off the bed and padding for the door. Steve's hand tightened again so they wouldn't break too late, dragged behind for a moment before he caught up properly.

It didn't feel romantic, holding hands like this, not when both of them were holding tight enough to bruise. Sinking ships in a rocky sea, maybe.

"Of course I'll come." Steve held open the door with his free hand and Bucky brushed his hair back as he stepped through. "How bout we try a day thing. See how that goes."
It wasn't worded like a question so Bucky didn't question it.

"Beach?" he offered instead and Steve nodded, held onto his hand the whole time they bustled around the apartment, gathered supplies. Everyone came individually to check on them and Bucky let Steve do the talking, wandering off to stare out the window.

Steve'd told him they did tests while he was out. So, if that came back clear, they'd be in the green, no condoms necessary. Somehow, Bucky'd even managed to fuck that up. Disaster.

The moment the elevator slid shut behind Sam, Bucky turned back to look at Steve, busily folding a beach towel into a bag.

"I haven't had a conditioned trigger in ages and then I had two within ten hours?" He kept his hand on the window, glass cold on skin, and Steve looked up, meeting his gaze steady and level.

"We're digging into deep emotions Bucky, everything's gonna get a lot more intense before it gets easier."

"There's nothing easy about this," he whispered to the curtains. Steve pursed his lips and kept packing their bag.

Maybe if Steve held him down, pinned him with those beautiful arms. Crippled Bucky, broke his legs, he wouldn't keep running. Maybe if he held on too tight, the way Bucky wanted to hold onto him, the pain of that would be the only pain in his heart.

"I'm not leaving you."

It came out of nowhere and Bucky couldn't gasp, forced a breath through circle lips.

The tiles were cold under his moving feet, each rib expanding as he breathed, blood running through his veins that wasn't drugged, not with green vials anyways.

The kitchen crossed behind him and he took Steve's face in his hands, turning sorrowful eyes on him. Leaning in and hovering over lips, Bucky shut his eyes and exhaled an easy whisper,

"When you kiss me, do you taste the blood I've taken?"

Steve crushed their mouths together and Bucky opened instantly, letting Steve lick into his mouth, catching the wet tongue between his teeth, jolting a gasp in the back of Steve's unbruised throat. Heat burned in his pallet, the top of his throat. Then the hands on his jaw dug in sharp enough to hurt and Steve pulled Bucky off him hard enough to make his head spin.

"Can you taste mine?" Steve ordered and a chill drizzled down Bucky's spine, the intensity of the question and the look and that tone - his Captain. The Captain that'd killed, blew up, beheaded, shot, destroyed so many - from the clean-handed shadows. Bucky'd always been the one to do the dirty work, to take the rap: that troublemaker Bucky Barnes and his sweet friend Steve Rogers.

Oh, how the world was fooled. The reputation Bucky'd take on so Steve didn't have to, so everyone thought his beautiful angel was just that.

The blood Steve's taken, he wanted to know. Thrown the question right back at Bucky. But there wasn't copper in his kisses. Not steel or gold, just wet and human.

Love, not blood.
Love,
not blood.

"I don't know how to do this," Bucky choked and Steve pulled him in tight, arms crossing over his shoulderblades and cheeks smushing together. They rocked back and forth and the summer shining smile used to be so bright it burned Bucky alive only now the harsh depths of winter reflected that smile brighter, brilliant sunshine off snow.

"I've got you. I've got you," Steve promised quietly and Bucky let him rock them back and forth in the middle of the kitchen floor.

~~~

"Normal people go to the beach for sand," Steve complained, climbing over the brush Bucky just stepped around.

He hoisted their bag higher on his shoulder, hopping around another grassy patch. "We've never been normal people."

Steve followed with a sigh, probably glancing back to the pretty sand they'd left a hundred feet behind. "I dunno, you were pretty normal as a kid."

"I was best friends with you, that's bout as far from normal as you can get."

Lifting a hand to shield his eyes from the sun, Bucky peered over the shoreline ahead of them and determined it entirely empty, which was perfect. To be fair, Fort Tilden wasn't the most popular beach in New York, and definitely not this far from the tourist trails at this time of year. It was an old military base, and according to the signs swimming was not recommended - which made it perfect for them.

No people, just the two of them, and if they went swimming they'd be breaking rules, which would make Steve happy.

Speaking of Steve, he'd fallen quiet after Bucky's last comment, so he paused and turned around, letting his hand fall back down. Steve was squinting at him, skin and hair lit up golden.

"Why were you?"

"What?"

"Best friends with me?"

Oh.

Bucky extended his hand and Steve climbed over the tall grass, reaching to lace their fingers together and finally landing on open, sparkling sand beside Bucky. The wooden trails were arching atop the hill on the left, but the cliff face separating them made the whole area perfectly secluded, which was exactly what Bucky'd been hoping for.

"James Buchanan, don't forget that sunshine needs the rain to make it bright. Don't forget the rain needs the sun to set it right," Bucky recited, shielding from the sun again to look at Steve outta the corner of his eye.

A tug and Steve started them off across the sand, gritty grains slipping between toes.

"That's real beautiful," he said softly and Bucky turned to look at him proper, wind blowing salty in his hair as the sunshine held his hand and walked him down the shoreline.

"Sarah used to tell me that all the time."

"Really?" Another pause, looking out over the sparkling water, maybe thinking how beautiful it was, while Bucky could only look at Steve and think how beautiful he was. Sap. "She might've known more than she was letting on," Steve mused, easing the bag off Bucky's shoulder.

"About you and me? Hmm." He took the other corners of the blanket, straightening it out and guiding it to the sand, tossing Steve a book and a waterbottle to hold the edges. "Kinda funny how it's the women who figure it out before we do."

"I can't believe Peggy never said." Steve plopped down moodily in the middle of their blanket and Bucky held out his hand again, gesturing him back up.

"When the hell would she've said?" Buck tugged the callused fingers, pulling Steve towards the water with him. He came easy, like he'd actually forgotten. And constantly denying his PTSD, he probably did.

"I dunno, maybe when I was crying my eyes out over your death and she told me - I quote - 'he believed in you?' She couldda worded that a little better, maybe told me what you said that day."

Bucky ignored the prodding because he wasn't gonna tell Steve about that conversation, not now, not yet. Instead he turned around, still tugging Steve as he faced him, backing towards the water.

"You cried in front'a Peg? I figured the Commandos had to deal, but--"

"Deal? I was a mess, Buck." Steve stopped at the water's edge, but Bucky had a feeling it wasn't intentional, he was just pausing to make a point. Really, Steve'd probably let Bucky drag him under before he admitted to himself he had a problem.

"My mess," Bucky quoted smiling and Steve shook his head, taking two steps forward.

The water grabbed his ankles and the color drained from his face and by the time Bucky herded him back onto sand Steve was shaking, hands in fists, one pressed to his mouth, trying to stop the trembling. Like there was any way Bucky wouldn't've noticed.

"S-sorr--"

"What did I just say? My mess?" He ran a hand through Steve's hair and the pretty blue eyes closed.

"But--"

"You can do this. I get the current makes it harder, but you can do this."

"B-bucky, just yesterday y-you. I need to take care of you."

"No, you don't, let me watch out for my punk the way I always have, yeah?"

"I don't wanna..."
"Try? For me? I mean, if you think it's impossible--"

"Is that a challenge?" Steve interrupted, eyes popping open. He got him. Bucky's mouth spread into a smile, gesturing towards the water.

This was how Steve faced things. Everyone had different ways of handling trauma, and Bucky'd bet anything Steve's was tackling it with fists raised. But Steve knew his body and his issues better than anyone - including Bucky - so if he was wrong about this, they'd figure it out some other way. And Bucky'd have to live with the guilt of hurting Steve again.

It was worth it though. He could handle that responsibility if it let Steve overcome this fear, the fear of drowning. If he could get a smile on that face, get them splashing in the waves the way they had as kids.

Steve eyed him, and maybe he'd caught on to Bucky's brilliant idea of making it a challenge, forcing him in there through his own stubbornness, but whatever.

"I'm not getting my shirt wet," he said slowly, hesitantly, and Bucky smiled wider.

"Even better." He grabbed his own collar, whipping his shirt off and tossing it aside, gesturing Steve to do the same.

Except Steve was staring at the center of his chest. Bucky looked down in confusion, and the sun glinted off the dogtags hanging over his heart. Oh.

He'd taken them off before the last mission, didn't like wearing them under his uniform yet. Two things that didn't quite go together. So when they'd stripped down, it hadn't been a problem, but Bucky'd entirely forgotten about slipping them back on later.

It'd be easier to explain before he got a bundle of confused, overwhelmed questions.

"Sam got them for me," he said quietly, running his real fingers over the edge and looking back up at Steve. There was a whole whirlpool of emotions on his face and the wind whistled by them, the splashing rumble of the ocean filling silence.

It meant alot, he knew that. More than was probably good to share in this moment, but.

It was his name. Identity. He'd been wearing ones just like these when Steve'd rescued him in Azzano, all the way 'til when he'd fallen from the train, and now that reminder what he'd forgotten was sitting between them in plain light, glinting reflections and undeniable.

For a moment, Bucky was fairly sure someone was gonna break down crying, and he wasn't really sure who.

Except Steve didn't, he didn't say a single thing. He just held out his hand.

Bucky weaved his fingers between Steve's, and they both stepped into the water.

An hour later they were standing chest to chest, arms around each other and waves lapping at their waists. Steve pinned Bucky's hair back with two palms, saving him from the salty wind, hands not shaking anymore. They couldn't go deeper than this, and Bucky's arms couldn't leave from being wrapped all the way around Steve's waist, but it was a start.
"You alright?" Bucky puckered his lips to kiss Steve's cheek gently. The ocean reflected, then eyelids closed and another deep, controlled breath.

"Thanks to you," Steve murmured, lifting his arms to rest on Bucky's shoulders, caging their faces in close and personal. A soft press of lips, a breathy sound, and they were both pressing in deeper, tilting heads and suddenly making out right there in the water, twenty feet from the coast. It was a pretty goddamn decent distraction in Bucky's opinion.

Rough hands slid over his collarbones, down his chest, circling around to dip under the waistband of his swimshorts and slide wet fingers between Bucky's cheeks and _fuck_, as much as he'd love to climb Steve right now, there were more important things at hand. Like making sure Steve's hands didn't start shaking again - although from the way they were kneading into his flesh, he'd say Steve was doing very well, but.

"A-ah, c'mon, Stevie, not now," Bucky managed between biting kisses.

The hands instantly slid back out, mouths breaking away as Steve leaned back to look at him, concern etched into his features, like something was wrong with _Bucky_ instead. Only the movement caused a ripple in the water and the sand beneath their toes shifted and balance shot to hell. Bucky didn't have enough solid ground to stop them before they both tipped, but he shot a metal hand to catch Steve's head before it could break the surface.

His eyes were wide, breathing too fast, and Bucky slid across the sand, digging his heels in to pull them upright. "You're okay, I'm here, you've got this Rogers."

Fluttering eyelashes, arms tight around Bucky's back now as they finally balanced again, waves rocking around their ribs now.

"See? Not thanks to me at all, thanks to you. You're the one who's pushing through this Steve, who's kicking this thing's ass." He ran his hands up and down strong, heaving back muscles, Steve's forehead on his shoulder, sounding half-exhausted as he clung.

"Bout time I kicked _something_ 's ass," he muttered and Bucky smiled, kissing his collarbone and starting to walk them slowly back to shore.

"You kicked plenty of Nazi ass as I remember." Arms looped over shoulders and Steve leaned on him, still clutching tight as the waterlevel lowered down their bodies.

"Mmm. They kicked ours too." Waves crashed over their ankles, then they were on dry sand and he could feel the relief seeping through Steve's bones. "You got shot," he pointed out, voice already less shaky.

"I did," Bucky agreed distractedly, watching Steve's face for any signs of lingering stress, anything to show the whole thing'd been a mistake. But he just got a brief, pretty smile and an arm snug around his bare waist. Steve better not be bottling shit up, burying it down, because they'd just made progress and going backwards on that wasn't something Bucky was looking forward to.

The beach towel caught them easily, sand soft as a pillow compared to the ground they'd slept on for a mock-eternity. A moment to catch their breath, then Steve was shivering a little and Bucky gathered him close. The last time they'd been tangled together like this, they'd been on Bucky's bed, about to-- "Penny for your thoughts," Steve breathed, head flopping down on the sand beside Bucky's, still curled against his side.

"You'n'me, that night," he replied simply and Steve's smile vanished, long fingers tracing the scarred flesh near Bucky's heart.

"We're taking this too fast." It was more of a statement than a question, slow and pensive.

"Since when do you abide to caution?" Bucky snorted, rolling his head to stare at the clouds, which were thankfully covering the brightness now.

"I'm not kidding."

It was his Captain's voice and Bucky sighed, because honestly what would Steve even know about it?

"It's just sex," he argued lightly and the hand over his heart froze, thankfully not pressing into sensitive scar tissue.

"But sex is powerful, Bucky. This is a big deal."

The clouds shifted in the sky, sunlight pouring over them in a wave and Bucky just looked at him because people don't treat him like this. After the number of times Bucky'd almost killed him, how could Steve treat him like he was fragile? Without making him feel like glass?

"Bigger deal than getting shot?" The joke was flimsy, shallow, and Steve saw it for exactly what it was. That didn't stop him from running a hand down Bucky's body, dragging down the outside of his thigh, branding him with seeping summer.

A shock snaked up Bucky's spine as the palm traced to the inside, tucking in the crevice between his thighs and sliding up, nice and slow, creeping higher, until a final pause, a few inches before the crotch of his shorts.

Then Steve's thumb was pressing hard to swimshort material and it took a moment, but he caught. Hard pressure over an invisible mark, a scar that hadn't been a scar in years - the first real one that healed too fast, the first confirmation of the half-serum pumping through his veins.

Falsworth'd gotten the bullet out of his leg while Steve'd cupped a hand over his mouth and now that hand was holding onto his leg, pressing a reminder in a place he'd never had the chance to be...touched like that before.

"I thought you were gonna die," lips whispered into his mouth and Bucky parted them further, let Steve kiss him gentle, eyes closed and sun beating on bare skin. Red white and blue, an American summer beating into their skin.

Weren't they always gonna die?

"I don't remember what it's like," Bucky's eyes were still closed, words forming the moment Steve's mouth released him. "--to not feel afraid. To not feel broken."

Fluttering open, eyelids heavy as he sunk deeper into the warmth of sun and sand, voice shifting to a whisper. "Was there a time you weren't angry? Or numb?"

Their foreheads pressed together, senses heightened without sight; the beach blanket fluttering around them, Bucky's hair whipping against both their temples.

"When I first met Sam...he asked what made me happy." Hands found his, a thin pinky wrapping around Bucky's. "I said I didn't know."
"Do you know now?"

"I know you make me happy."

Bucky's breath caught and Steve shifted, free hand tracing up his sternum, two fingers resting on the hollow of his throat.

"What else?" he whispered. "We have to have something else. And I think you know what yours is."

Steve shrugged and somewhere a seagull called, clouds drifting in front of the sun again.

"You don't have to bury it." He peeked a glance at his best friend, thought about how much had changed since they'd laid on a beach together like this. "I know I've given you shit your whole life, but. You're a fighter. A soldier. You don't have to be sorry for that and you don't have to have some...happy ending that doesn't include that. If you're home fighting, then fight."

"That's not a life."

Before he could reach to stop him, Steve rolled away, staring moodily at the clouds.

"Said who?"

"C'mon, Buck," Steve huffed and it was an awful sound, then his soft hair fluffed up messier with an annoyed hand and he sat up, further than ever as he stared over the crashing waves. "Don't be ridiculous. It can't go on forever."

"But we can?" He asked incredulously, sitting up to give the same seriously look at the idiot on the blanket next to him.

"Yes," Steve replied instantly, picking up a handful of sand and watching it trickle through his fingers.

He wasn't sure he'd ever be able to believe in the possibility of forever, of them never being apart again, but he wasn't gonna be the one who gave up on Steve either. He'd never been able to and--

And fuck how much he hurt, he wasn't gonna let Steve feel that same pain.

"Then so can your fight." Bucky scooted over, ghosting his touch down Steve's arm, running it heavy back up over gathered muscle, wishing he could keep the tremor out of his heart the way he kept it out of his voice. "I'd rather have the real you than some watered-down version. I'll fight at your side. We'd be amazing."

The point was, neither of them knew how Steve was gonna live without a war, and if fighting was the only piece of him left that connected this Steve to the little one he'd fallen in love with the first time, Bucky'd do anything he could to keep him on the battlefield, however long it took to remind Steve who he used to be off it.

"We?" Bucky rested his hand on the back of Steve's neck and he turned, catching Bucky's gaze and pinning him, ocean glinting off blue. "Does that mean you're...you're accepting this? You and me?"

If they didn't have to fight for each other, if they just had each other...how long before Steve didn't want that either?

Was there an end goal? An ending at all?

Was you'n'me all Steve wanted? What did that mean to him anyways? It'd always been "What exactly are you asking?" He narrowed his eyes in comic-suspicion, waiting for an answer while his stupid hair flipped sideways on his head from the wind.

A brightened spark, then Steve was leaning over with that mischievous look Bucky knew all too well, that sweet cherishable trouble he'd missed like water.

Then the mouth that'd gotten punched a dozen times more than kissed (which said a lot about how much they'd kissed and even more about how much Steve'd been punched in his life) opened and a phrase Bucky hadn't heard in decades flowed off the cheeky tongue.

"Hey sugar, you rationed?"

Bucky couldn't help it, couldn't stop the laugh that bubbled up in his chest, had him shaking his head and closing his eyes against it, chest shaking a little and this was it.

Somehow, he'd become the man in that video in the Smithsonian and he had no idea how they'd gotten this far without him noticing but they were here, Steve was giving him that same laughing smile, crinkling eyes, and Bucky was looking down with an unbreakable, unmeltable smile that no mirror could take from him right now.

He had an idiot for a best friend, and funny enough that's exactly what he'd been thinking when the photographers had caught that video in the 40s too.

"You wanna go steady with me?" He finally managed, half-incredulous, still smiling like an idiot.

Steve softened a little, lips closing and smile turning more sweet than amused, gazing at Bucky like he was thinking the exact same thing, living that exact same movie reel, except this time Steve's next words were quite different.

"I want you to be my boyfriend."

Something in Bucky's chest twisted and he breathed in hard, forcing oxygen to his brain in hopes it might spin a little faster.

"Yeah?" It came out breathier than he meant and Bucky tipped his head again, giving Steve the side-eye as he studied him. "Not words I thought I'd ever hear, Rogers."

A fond smile and Steve leaned even closer, words dropping lower as he teased, "That's not an answer, Barnes."

He tipped his head and kissed Steve's pretty mouth for his answer. Which was that he didn't have one, because part of him felt like they'd already been so much more than dating their whole lives and at the same time, how was he supposed to commit to a relationship for Steve when neither of them could go five minutes without someone panicking over something?

Then Steve adjusted the angle, pressing closer and deepening the kiss and Bucky let the ocean waves be the only thing crashing for a moment, let himself drag the smile from Steve's mouth and save the taste in his own. There was something immeasurably fitting about sitting here in the sunshine, hot all over from the heat while he kissed his own little sun and streamed a whole different kind of heat.
down the back of his throat, down his spine, wildfire spreading through his veins.

This way, he didn't wanna get this way, only how Stevie clutched his arms on the shiny side of desperate, maybe he was getting this way too and wouldn't that be a disaster, both of them diving so deep there was nowhere to go but down, nowhere to go but death.

Their mouths dragged apart with tugging bottom lips and twin low sounds, then another chaste kiss to Bucky's mouth like Steve was starving without it, satiated heavy gaze.

"Lay down with me." Steve dragged him down before Bucky could disagree, only he really didn't wanna do anything but let Steve hold him here in the perpetual warmth, where night could never touch them.

The beach towel was crumpled on the edges, sand kicking up around their feet, scraping grainy skin as ankles hooked over each other. Bucky's back on the towel, metal shoulder opposite from Steve so he wouldn't burn; and Stevie on his side, broad body tucked smaller against him, one hand splayed possessive over Bucky's bare stomach.

A bicep for Steve's pillow, fingers playing with blonde hair, a soft kiss to the top of his head as Bucky let the sun bake his chest, let Steve's warmth bake his soul.

And it was so nice like this, his boy propped on him like the old days, back when Bucky'd crush him with his weight. Steve didn't need Bucky anymore, not like this, but the idea that he still wanted to rest his head on Bucky's arm - or sometimes his stomach, shoulder - that felt important. At the least, he got to support the pretty head that'd been worried over waves and sinking planes moments before, give him some comfort after that bracing display.

But as sweet and lovely as Stevie was being, as comfortable as the sand was, the soothing heat of sunny skin, heavy eyelids begging to flutter shut - he fought it hard, because it wasn't safe here, not for that.

"You're makin' me drowsy," Bucky grumbled, carding fingers through blonde slower and slower.

"You can sleep." The jaw on his arm moved as he spoke and Bucky could feel it layered in his muscles. "I've got you."

Except he really couldn't. They were in public; he didn't sleep in front of all the Avengers, let alone out in the open. Anyone could. Could come along...

A yawn threatened his chest and Bucky blinked hard, focusing on the floating clouds above, designing shapes to keep himself occupied.

He hadn't slept proper since the breakdown, the drug-induced coma. (Or shutdown word, he hadn't asked and he didn't wanna know because really, he didn't even know what the word was and he sure as hell hoped Steve didn't. Not that Bucky didn't trust him with that, he trusted him with his life, but that was one horror Steve didn't ever need to see.)

So he'd convinced himself someone'd shot him up, drugged him and dragged him free from whatever horror he was inflicting on his Stevie. Either way, drugs or...that, there was nothing restful about those, nothing but sluggish hell, invoking more exhaustion.

Still wrung out from the night with Steve, the breakdown, the drugs, the nightmares, the aftermath. Helping Steve through this thing, watching shining golden hair without reaching, forcing himself to be what Steve needs, fumbling to find a balance, give him the love he deserved without ruining their souls in the process.
His body wanted to sleep and his mind refused; he slipped into darkness within minutes.

Steve watched the battle, watched Bucky's body jolt as he forced himself back awake, watched his mind drag him back under. Then, finally, he was gone for good. And Steve didn't move a centimeter, laid still and quiet on Bucky's arm, palm flat over soft abs, watching the chest rise and fall of the man he loved, the man he'd thought was lost to him forever.

Nothing on the beach moved for a long time, nothing but Bucky's beautiful hair in the wind as Steve laid sentry and Bucky slept soundly beside him, safe. Forever safe.

Crystal cracked open and Steve didn't move until Bucky did, until he lifted up - abs clenching wonderfully under Steve's hand - and peered over squintingly, slightly peeved but definitely rested.

Steve lifted on an elbow, little knowing smile, and he couldn't resist running his eyes down Bucky's stretched out body one more time.

He froze as his eyes lit on Bucky's stomach.

"What?" Bucky croaked, looking down before the question was even finished, then his mouth popped open in indignance. "You ass."

"I didn't even think--"

"Your handprint is tanned into my stomach--"

"I didn't know you tanned so damn fast!"

"There is a white handprint on my abs."

"...it's cute?"

"I'm way too metal for this shit," Bucky whined, then he was shoving Steve onto his back.

And they both found out very quickly that wrestling in the sand wasn't fun for anyone, especially tracking the grains all the way through the taxi, Stark tower, and into their shared bathroom.

They didn't share a shower, but Bucky winked and teased him before shoving the curtain closed and tossing his swimsuit over the top while Steve shaved in the mirror so really, it wasn't all that bad either.

~~~

Bucky was humming when Steve cracked open the door, shoving the folded paper in his back pocket. Although, lately, it wasn't safe there either--

He smiled to himself at that thought, but changed pockets anyways, stuffing it in the front (Bucky really couldn't see yet) as he picked his way over paint buckets.

There was a blue streak across Bucky's forehead, angled like he'd rubbed a hand over his temple to catch sweat, and combined with the peek of his tongue as he concentrated, holding the paintbrush close and steady - painting something very tiny and detailed, and the only colors Steve'd picked up so far were orange, brown, and blue - he looked as adorable as he'd ever been.

"Hi honey, I'm home," Steve teased, crossing his arms over the top of Bucky's easel, sure not to get within sight of peeking over.

"Hey sugar," Bucky flirted back, pinning his hair behind his ear and giving Steve a charming smile.

Because he just had to, Steve licked his thumb and reached over the painting between them, rubbing at the mark on Bucky's forehead the way Sarah always used to. An offended noise, then Bucky was dipping bristles into his pallet and there was a paintbrush dotting red to the tip of Steve's nose.

"Oh you rascal," Steve exclaimed, trying to wipe it off with the back of his hand, then Bucky came swinging around his easel, no more barrier between them as his eyes widened innocently, licking his thumb and reaching for Steve's face too.

He dodged the hand in time, grabbing Buck's wrist and pulling him in close, then they were stumbling over each other and a lot of paint cans that were not as empty as Steve thought.

So really, it wasn't his fault the art floor was now splashed in red, green, and blue, but it probably was his fault there was a multi-colored handprint on Bucky's ass and another smear across his cheek. And it was definitely Bucky's fault Steve ended up laughing so hard he clutched his chest and fell over in the mess, splattering it over everything.

Actually, the whole thing was basically Bucky's fault for being so damn cute while he was painting and if there was anything that Steve loved about this century, it was that they had enough money for Bucky to paint too, for him to be proud of something, for his eyes to light up the way they did every time Steve so much as mentioned the mystery painting.

And it was also Bucky's fault for all the paint in Steve's hair, because it was Bucky's stupid idea to kiss him silly in the middle of the mess, until Steve felt dizzy with it and could do nothing but lie in paint and giggle and really, who cared whose fault it was?

~~~

"Are we betting money on this?"

"Hell yes."

"Easy for you to say, Stark," Sam pointed out and Tony waved him off, taking a sip of his bourbon.

"Fine, you can bet your fancy wings?" Stark offered and Sam scoffed in offense, just as Clint jumped onto a stool and slammed an arrow down on the counter.

"I am so in."

"Barton, how many times--"

"I don't get why we can't match, birds of a feather and all that?"
"Boys, boys, are we making bets or not?" Pepper placed a fancy key in the middle of the betting-counter and everyone looked at it suspiciously, including Tony.

"Alright, Wilson, if you don't wanna bet wings, how about you remove your blanket claim to all orange juice??"

"Buy your own goddamned orange juice! It's one thing, literally one thing that I own in this tower and every morning--"

"Is this arrow even worth anything?" Tony asked skeptically, picking it up and studying the tip.

"You're all idiots," Natasha offered, and everyone shot her a glare, except Pepper gave her a nice smile and turned back to the betting table.

"Alright, I'm calling Miss Missing You," Clint declared, pointing an accusing finger at everyone that clearly stated there were to be no takebacks. Everyone gave respectful nods and Natasha pulled the lyrics up on her phone, snorting at the chorus and reaching over Sam to give Clint a high-five.

"Fair choice, Barton, but I've gotta go Jet Pack Blues," Sam inputted, scratching out a reluctant freed orange juice on a napkin and tossing it in.

"Really?"

"Man, you didn't see how blue Steve was before we found him, trust me on this one. It's pretty goddamned fitting."

"Are you all betting on Fall Out Boy songs? For what?" Maria grabbed a glass as she passed Tony, one eyebrow cocked curiously.

"For Steve and Bucky's theme song," Tony clarified, getting a snort in response. "Everyone quotes FOB to them all the time anyway, may as well make an official thing of it."

"And no one's brought up Alone Together?" Maria offered, tipping her head to where the two were curled up on the couch all the way across the room, murmuring quietly to each other some romantic poetry shit from the 40s, probably.

Pepper made a choked sound at Maria's suggestion and everyone looked at her funny, so she quickly nudged the key and placed her bet. "I'm on Young Volcanoes."

Nat fist-bumped her across the table too and Tony narrowed his eyes, looking around everyone in the group.

"Good, fair choices, all of you. But I'm still taking the cake on this."

"Oh really, you gonna go American Beauty American Psycho? Cause it's good, but the title's the best part--"

"Nope," Tony interrupted, popping the P and dropping a thousand dollar watch into the pile. "The Kids Aren't Alright."

Nat and Sam groaned in tandem while Pepper and Maria made agreeing sounds and Barton's fingers hovered, debating whether or not it was worth snatching his arrow back.

"I dunno, I'm still for Miss Missing You though..." he mused, and everyone decided they'd keep their bets in regardless of how surprisingly well-fit Stark's song choice was.
"ROGERS! Get over here." Tony beckoned with a hand and Steve got up, hand carding through Bucky's hair before he started for the table, leaving Bucky on the couch. Stark muttered something under his breath and clarified loudly, "Both Rogers's."

Bucky lifted his head, turning over the back of the couch in confusion, but at the insistent wave sighed and got off the couch too.

"So, we made a bet--"

"No, no, you can't do it like that," Natasha interrupted, waving a hand to shut him up and facing the boys with a one-sided smirk and tapping nails. "We made a playlist for you two, so listen to the whole thing and tell us your favorite song, okay?"

"Okay...?" Bucky agreed confusedly, then they were being lead to opposite sides of the room, both facing the same direction so they could give each other weirded-out sideglances.

"There's a lot of money on the table, choose wisely," Tony advised, and Sam flicked him on the arm.

Bucky recognized the first song as Fall Out Boy instantly, caught onto the bet by the second song, and spent the rest of the playlist crossing his arms over his chest and trying not to cry.

Steve was stunned, to say the least, and neither of them really had much to say after, but their friends prodded them for a decision and saying no to an Avenger wasn't exactly easy--

So Steve weaved their hands together, too many fresh memories to not touch Bucky right now, and decided he'd pick the one that was the most present, the one that didn't rip out his heart (although really, what were friends if they weren't a little painful), even if it meant Tony cheering and crowing the rest of the evening.

Bucky stayed quiet, pulled Steve aside for just a moment, because he'd been told who'd chosen what song and if Sam had chosen Jet Pack Blues, "Was that really how it was in the beginning, looking for me?"

He had to ask, and by the water in Steve's eyes, he already had his answer.

"I'm so sorry--" he started, fumbling with how to make an apology for the Winter Soldier's stupidity, only Steve grabbed his hands, interrupted him with tears stuck to bottom lashes.

"But you came home." Steve smiled wobbly and Bucky pulled him down to press a solid kiss to his forehead, closing his eyes and holding too tight for just a moment, then he waved Steve back off to his friends.

In the absence he chatted with Pepper, congratulating her on song choice and asking under his breath who the fuck had this kinda idea and she laughed for a good minute straight, waving one hand in the air as she grabbed a martini for him and whispered who do you think?

He kept humming Americana, exotica to himself until Tony came to prod him with his newly-won arrow. Although, really, if it came from Barton god knows what kinda tip it had and Bucky would really prefer not to be unexpectedly electrocuted or something.

"So, Barnes, you agree with my song too? I know I won the technicalities, but I like the confirmation of full agreement--"

"Your song was the closest to making me cry," Bucky interrupted and Tony stopped talking. For a moment.
"Steve said the exact opposite, said it was the only one that didn't, that's why he chose--"

"It wasn't from his point of view. He wouldn't know." He crossed his arms over his chest, looking past Tony to the wall of windows, the midnight lights of New York opened up beneath them.

"I didn't-- I told Steve, after...after he told me he loved me, he. He said he wouldn't change a single thing if we ended up here and." Bucky stopped, sucking in a breath and glancing at Stark. He was standing silently, listening quietly, no rude remarks in sight, and for some reason that made it a little easier to keep talking.

He didn't have to, he didn't have to explain a single thing to Tony, but. But if that was Tony's song, he already knew it all anyways. Besides, it was Howard's kid, and god knows Howard got an earful of Bucky's complaints about Steve back in the war.

"And I told him I wouldn't, that I'd go back and make him marry Peggy and have some normal life but--"

And in the end, I'd do it all again. I think you're my best friend. Don't you know that the kids aren't alright?

"But Tony, I don't. I don't think I'd do that anymore. Not after...I just want the best for him." He scrubbed a hand down his face, checking the other side of the room just in case, but everyone was busy laughing and chatting about something or another.

"Do you think...you think there's a chance that I'm the best thing for him?"

"You heard the song," Tony replied quietly, swirling his glass around in his drink and right, Bucky wasn't the only emotionally destroyed person around here, he forgot that sometimes.

"Well," he said, a touch brighter, clapping a hand on Tony's shoulder. "Every word of it, Stark. You outdid yourself. Things you couldn't've known, even, and. Just...yeah. Congrats on the win, it's deserved."

Even if it was a some stupid game, but. But maybe Bucky meant more than that and thankfully, Tony was smart enough to get everything Bucky wasn't saying.

Y'know, if they ever got the chance, Bucky was pretty sure he'd be really good friends with Stark. They were both science geeks, Bucky just wasn't as smart. Or maybe hadn't had the opportunity to be as smart, who knows what he could learn now, especially if he was hanging out on Tony's lab tables the way he had with Howard's.

A clap to Bucky's shoulder this time and Tony gave him a half-sorrowful smile, the other half genuine victory and Bucky huffed, waving him off and feeling a little bad for suddenly dampening the parade, but if anyone could handle it, it'd be Stark.

He slid back into the crowd laughing and joking with the rest of them, easy and light, and Bucky watched from afar, small smile as he propped on the armrest of the couch and let his eyes drift over the skyline.

Even the whistles at the beginning were perfect, the swinging hands of little Stevie as he skipped up the driveway to Bucky's, perfect image from whatever time in the 20s that'd been.

Fall to your knees, bring on the rapture. Blessed be the boys time can't capture.

You gonna be my redemption? Falling to his knees at Steve's feet, that's how it'd always been, letting time slide right past them both.

On film or between the sheets. I always fall from your window to the pitch-black streets.

How many times had he gone through Steve's window, how far had he fallen to dark bloody streets since?

Former heroes who quit too late. Who just wanna fill up the trophy case again.

If the trophy case was Steve's heart, that is. He was never gonna quit, and Bucky knew that in his soul and it ached that Steve'd never be free, he'd never get the dream and promised freedom he'd won for everyone else.

Then the next line came and Bucky couldn't stop repeating it in his head.

And in the end
I'd do it all again.

Would he?

Would he go through seventy years of torture to know what I love you sounded like falling from Steve's lips?

Forgetting it all to remember again?

Bucky's gaze cut to the other side of the room, searching and finding heartbreakingly quickly. And he looked at Steve Rogers, just watched him across the distance between them that really, really wasn't that far at all. Time frozen in this moment, sound shifting to hollow echoes, light from the overhead bulbs reflecting highlights off blonde, illuminating brown roots darker.

I think you're my best friend.

One look, dark room. His moving-mountains mouth opened in a happy laugh, blues flicking between Sam and Maria and Bucky couldn't turn his eyes away if the world lit on fire around them.

Steve looked up, lifting his head and meeting Bucky's eyes. A smile grew, genuine and slow until he was shyly beaming and Bucky's heart tore slowly in his chest.

And I'll be yours.

Just when he thought he'd burst with it, with too much of everything, that bright blue of Bucky's sky and ocean and stars - they flashed once and Steve crossed his eyes at Bucky, making a face like this was just another day in their apartment in Brooklyn and a choked huff escaped Bucky's mouth, tearing out half his soul with it.

Then just as quick Steve's head turned again, raising his eyebrows curiously at a question from Pepper, then he was waving his hand around as he answered and Bucky looked away, tears gathering on his lashes.

He was so. so. in love with that boy.

~~~
"Should I be worried, or...?"

"Why would you be worried?" Steve teased, pressing the button on the elevator and making sure his hand covered Bucky's eyes entirely.

It was amazing, that months ago Bucky was throwing knives at everything and now he was letting Steve lead him around blind.

"I dunno, maybe because I was told to dress nice and I haven't even seen you since you got home? It was hand over the eyes since before I could even kiss you hello."

"There'll be plenty of time for that. Besides, what I'm wearing is half the surprise."

"...you do realize the places that makes my mind go," Bucky started and Steve pinched him.

"Shut up, we're almost there."

The elevator dinged open and Steve guided him into the room, floors suddenly echoing at the sound of his boots, emptier sounding than any of the floors Bucky could remember.

"Where are--"

Then Steve's hands were lifting away from his eyes and Bucky just stared.

"I thought..." he started, and Steve wrapped arms around his waist from behind, resting his chin on Bucky's shoulder.

"It was under construction? It was. But Tony said I could take over, do what I wanted with it. Said it was only fair, since we're the only two who've really been here anyways."

The floor Bucky'd made into a knife range back in the first few weeks, the floor he'd been on when that terrible thunderstorm hit and Steve'd had to drag him out using Soviet commands. Then, it'd just been an empty floor of concrete and windows, white plastic sheets over some walls.

Now? It was transformed. The floors were still concrete, but everything else'd been shaped into something beautiful -

Dark brown walls, a swooping wooden bar on the far wall that looked straight outta the war, wood seats and everything. Every light in the place was golden, the old kind, only most of them weren't on - instead, the angle where the walls met the ceiling was strung in tiny, white-gold lights like something out of Great Gatsby, the modern twist that tied in the wall decor and the floor-length windows on the sides with the old-timey look, leaving everything beautiful and vaguely nostalgic instead of a cloying imitation ignoring the progress and life they had now.

"Steve..."

Just when Bucky couldn't imagine it getting any better, Steve stepped out from behind him, holding his arms out a little shyly as he turned to show off the whole thing.

He was wearing clothes straight out of the 1940s, right down to the suspenders and the slightly-big white shirt and the pants settled around his waist. His hair wasn't slicked down, but it wasn't spiked up either, kind of just. Swooping to the side in that same incredible mix between past and present, the Stevie of then and the Captain of now.

"Dance with me?" Steve offered a hand, stooping low, and Bucky placed his fingers gingerly in Steve's grip, still hardly believing this was all real, then Steve straightened and pulled him close in one motion, touch settling easily on Bucky's waist, other hands clasped loosely in the waltz they hadn't done since that night in the bar, a week before Bucky'd fallen from the train and everything’d changed.

Music started from the boombox on the bar, motion sensor picking them up the moment Steve pulled them into the first one two three.

Only it sounded like it came straight outta a record player, fuzzy with that muted quality and that, that's what they used to dance too.

The song sounded familiar as hell, could swear he knew it, only nothing really mattered right now but the way Steve was looking at him, not as much soft as melting, like the confident step towards him wasn't about dancing at all.

One two three, one two three, and the last time they'd done this it'd taken a bit to get into but now Steve just took his hand and...jumped. Finally, jumped.

"Took you long enough," Bucky whispered and Steve cocked his head a bit, tightening the fingers on Bucky's waist and pulling him into the sidestep. One step closer.

Smooth gliding, solid touch, beat not too fast, and Steve had a much better handle on this than Bucky remembered, swinging them into the three step spin.

The triplet pattern of their feet was natural as breathing, always had been for Bucky, and he had half a mind to ask Steve if he'd been taking lessons, only who the hell taught jazz-waltzing anymore? The piano in the background was naggingly familiar, the overlaying trumpets shaking the sound a little too high the way it always did on records, just enough edge to set your toes a little faster.

A sax hummed in the background and Steve moved the hand on Bucky's waist to wrap around his lower back, pulling their chests closer and heartbeats flush against each other; a perfect reflection, looking through a mirror to the past, two other boys on the floor with them, young things with easy smiles and bashful glances, dancing hand in hand the way they always had.

Who were the ghosts now?

Young. For Steve, it'd been fifteen months ago. Fifteen. He was still a kid, they both were, only why did Bucky's soul feel so worn?

They circled around again, then again, floating to the beat like immortals and really, Bucky thought, tightening his grip on Steve's shoulder, it wasn't that far of a stretch.

The way you wear your hat, a muffled voice came in and Bucky suddenly snapped his fingers, finally placing where he'd heard the damn song.

"Shall We Dance, 1937, that's what this is from." He made a victorious noise and Steve crinkled his nose in a smile, hand a little looser on Bucky's back as he squinted and cocked his head. "It missed the intro."

"Our romance won't end on a sorrowful note?" Steve offered and Bucky closed his eyes with a quiet "Yes, that's it. It was killing me."

"Noo, they can't take that away from me," he sung softly, then Steve was sweeping him into another spin and Bucky nearly missed the timing of the footing, landing a touch too close to Steve's chest, only that was perfectly fine.
The hand on his back spread angel wings over his shoulderblade and Bucky held on tighter, eyelids slipping closed as their feet straightened into a perfect triplet again.

Are you out here for me? Steve'd asked him.

Of course, Bucky'd thought, squeezing Steve's unbloodied hand. You know the answer to that question.

Though they take you from me, I'll still possess...the memory of all that, no, no, they can't take that away from me.

Bucky turned his head, just inches between their noses.

"Fifteen months isn't long at all," he said quietly, wrapping a forearm tighter behind Steve's shoulder and pulling him into the next step of the waltz a little harder.

"Bucky?"

"Yes, Steve."

"Can you...how well do you remember last time?"

He pressed his lips against Steve's solid jawline, closing his eyes into the warmth. "Perfectly."

"That...when you told me you were fighting for me, you had this look on your face. A...resignation I'd never been a part of, some internal agreement you had with yourself that I wasn't anywhere near understanding, and. I remember thinking Not now, not tonight. That you'd tell me one day and I'd wait until then. And I. I think I've waited some time now..."

Bucky huffed a laugh, slowing the pace of their dancing a little as the next song echoed into the room. He pondered a moment, each step of feet a little lighter as they spun around each other's boots. This was a thing for them, apparently. Talking and dancing.

"It was about that talk with Peggy," he said slowly, hopefully level enough to translate to Steve that his wait wasn't over, that this wasn't something Bucky could talk about.

Violins arched over them and Steve cocked his head, leaning it against the side of Bucky's for a moment, touching their temples together. For once it wasn't curiosity, muted frustration. Just simple affection, showing he understood, he was still here.

Last time, Bucky's eyes fluttered closed, lips parting in overwhelmed emotion as he fought the urge to cry. Such a simple gesture and Bucky could only think what if we could be this way forever.

He'd told himself forever with Steve wasn't his.

One two three, spinning over each other's feet. So tightly close and promisingly safe, they were kids again and real adults for once, forever and never because was this something Bucky could actually keep?

Any change in time, we are young again.

"If you can ever tell me one day--" Steve started, his voice soft and quiet against Bucky's ear. Steve was almost sure he felt Bucky shiver in his arms, then Bucky's voice interrupted him, slipping languidly over Steve's as a trailing palm ran down his spine.

"This song, is it Panic?"
"Yes."

A modern song for their lives now and it wasn't fair, forced to live two realities at once, the pain of a double love story to break hearts twice.

Lay us down, we're in love.

"Steve," Bucky's voice cracked over the word and Steve broke the dance, letting go of extended waltzing hands, wrapping both arms solid around Bucky's back, held close as the room spun around them.

"Is this the end of all things?" he asked into Steve's collarbone, hands curling comfortably around the familiar suspenders splitting across sheathed muscles.

"Is this what you want at the end?" The soft, low words bled into his skin and Bucky wasn't going to cry.

He clung a little tighter and this wasn't a war-worn floor, their boys weren't waiting at the table, the war outside wasn't the promise they'd never spoken aloud because that was all gone, it was gone forever.

Were they gone forever?

In these coming years, many things will change. But the way I feel will remain the same.

The end. Dancing with Steve, holding each other close - it was this that'd haunted him before, it was this that'd haunt him now.

It didn't matter what he wanted at the end, this was what would be there waiting for him. The first step inside the pearly gates would be into Steve's waiting arms.

If he ever got so far as heaven.

He couldn't fool himself.

So this was it, then. If they both died tonight, this would be the last time he'd hold Steve close--

Lay us down, we're in love.

"I can't lose you," Bucky breathed, and Steve's fingers dug into skin, bruising like that would be enough to ensure Bucky he'd never be alone again.

"I need an answer, Buck. I can't...keep wondering." Heartbeat loud enough for Bucky to feel against his throat. "Will you be mine?"

Mine.

Property of Steve Rogers.

He lifted his head, took ahold of Steve's hand, and swept them to the side. Fast, rough movements and then they were spinning across the floor in a dizzying waltz, Steve tripping over himself for the first time that night as he switched into the way Bucky'd taught him, standing on his toes as they waltzed over easy, uncomplicated kitchen floors and then--

If Steve'd asked then, he'd've said yes. He'd've fallen to Steve's feet in prayer, begged Steve to take his heart.
Mine. Owned.

Wide blue eyes, off-guard from the sudden mood shift, from the sudden burn in Bucky's eyes but he'd always been like this, he'd dipped Steve that night in '45 and he'd spun him every dance before that and there's a fire in you that Hydra could never burn out. Only why was Steve surprised he still had it?

"I used to be a legend. A ghost story. I had power, control, a name for myself. And now you're asking me to become Captain America's boy toy?" He spoke the words private and serious against Steve's ear, but the moment he said boytoy the waltz stopped abruptly as Steve planted his feet, forced the dancing halt, fast enough to make Bucky stumble, only he wasn't done, Steve didn't get it.

He considering wrenching his wrists from Steve's hands but he didn't want that, he wanted to hold Steve, wanted Steve to hold him, but he wasn't sure how to say this with so much intimacy still hovering between them. So instead he clamped his fingers down on Steve's arms, holding him solid and still, making sure he was listening.

"I don't want the world to remember me as Captain America's scandal," Bucky emphasized seriously and Steve gripped him back, hard, fightin' words on the tip of his tongue but he thankfully, somehow, kept his mouth shut long enough for Bucky to finish. "I don't want to be the plus one for Mr. Steve Rogers. I'm the Winter fucking Soldier, and I don't wanna lose that."

Can't lose that, because it's all that kept me alive when you couldn't.

Hands framing his face, room spinning again, only they weren't moving, Steve's gaze was just that dizzying, Bucky was hopeless in his arms.

"I don't want you to. I want you exactly as you are." The palms slid down Bucky's arms, holding him tight and serious and sweet as Steve crinkled his brow, lifting his eyebrows in the center and shooting a wave of shocking honesty through veins. "I want you strong and terrifying and I want you to remind everyone that I do have a dark side. You're my dark side." I am the mask you wear. Metal plates shifting under the intensity of Steve's grip as Bucky blinked dizzily and Steve tipped their foreheads together, strong hand rough on the back of Bucky's head, voice dropping low. "I won't let us forget each other again."

"Fuck you, Rogers," Bucky shot back weakly, searching the two blue eyes a little wildly, shifting his feet to scoot closer, then he tipped his chin up and Steve leaned down to meet him halfway.

The kiss was something out of movies, the kind where the camera spins all the way around and the watcher is dizzy as fuck - which was only fair, because Bucky's brain was pounding, his heart was thudding, his body was thrumming with every tipped angle of Steve's mouth, lips professing together and away, tongue dipping emphatic and this was how people fall apart.

Was this the apostatized promise? Downward spiral to the end? Their mouths broke apart, Steve's biceps on his shoulders and forearms tucked up behind Bucky's head, hands gripping hair tight as he boxed Bucky closer, breathing fast and heavy as Bucky held onto Steve's back just as terrified.

"I love you," Stevie breathed, ducking his head and swaying Bucky close against him. "I love you, I love you."

The words were a confession, a cry, and Bucky swallowed the lump in his throat, praying to a god he'd never quite believed in that he didn't lose this.

Singing baby come home.
There was one more fight left for them, one more battle that they hadn't been ready for, not when Bucky was still ready to give this all up for the past, when he still regretted all those years--

But he couldn't, he could not physically imagine losing this. Losing Steve after this.

The way Steve looked at him, the way Steve held him, the rushing relief and lingering fear in his voice every time I love you escaped his lungs, there wasn't anything Bucky'd trade for that.

Maybe this was the victory swoop at the end of their war.

Bucky withdrew from Steve's arms, leaning all the way back to arm's length, both hands on Steve's collarbones as he held him in place and watched the devotion flit over beautiful features. A tone of voice to match Steve's I love you perfectly, low and quiet, their final words to condemnation.

"Make me never forget you again."

Two hearts pounding through the drowning flood and Steve snatched Bucky's hand, pressing a kiss to metal knuckles, and lead him across the open dancefloor.

Bucky was just about to make a joke about how romantic concrete was, until they turned the corner around the edge of the bar and there was suddenly a door embedded in a lone wall.

It looked old, almost old enough to be the one to their apartment in Brooklyn, and Bucky squeezed Steve's hand helplessly. The final steps forward and Steve reached out, turning the doorknob and stepping behind Bucky as it swung the reveal.

The door creaked open and Bucky paused at the threshold, staring inside. He didn't know what to expect, but it wasn't this.

A single bed, a nightstand, a single curtained window.

There was nothing else in the room.

"You..." he trailed off, mind racing with thoughts of he planned this, he wanted this, Steve went to all the trouble to make this beautiful.

"We don't have to," quick and quiet, "We can go back upstairs if you want, I just. I thought maybe we..."

deserved something like this?

Steve's voice was quivering, nervous as hell and Bucky looked over his shoulder, eyebrows raised and lips rolling in.

"It's perfect," he promised quietly and a rush of air escaped Steve's lips, untensing in relief as he beckoned Bucky inside, followed him in. Closed the door carefully.

This was happening.

Bucky's heart was in his throat and this was happening.

In all his memories, he'd never had anything like this.

In all his years, his heart'd never been so full and close to seizing.
The bedroom was dark, black and sharp at the edges. Shadows like the altar of his sins, then Steve drew back the curtains, spilling white moonlight through glass and he'd always pictured this moment in gold, but the black and white felt about a thousand times more real.

Steve was still in color. Everything else was gone, but the moon reflected palladium on his hair, soft angel-wing glow on his skin. Blue eyes bright like the sky, the only heaven Bucky'd ever reach.

They were so far apart, Steve standing at the window, looking at Bucky with those beautiful eyes and how was this real? He'd never been more sure something was, but after everything that'd happened, every twist and plummet of their universe, they'd ended up here and there was nothing in the world that could take this away from him. Nothing.

And it's peaceful, in the deep. Cathedral where you cannot breathe.

He stood silent and still, watching each beautiful stride Steve took to his side, the easy way he moved, all grace and power underneath those rippling muscles and he'd shouted about fake manufactured science a month ago, but here, like this? If this was the perfect body, the optimum potential and efficiency, it belonged to Steve before it ever did to science. Because this was the only one that could match his insides, the man behind the wind-whipped flag.

A callused palm ran over his cheek, cupping his face into the moonlight and Bucky shut his eyes, leaning into Steve's hand the way he always had inside.

"Are you sure about this?" Steve's voice was low and soft, gentle the way no one else'd ever been with him, wrecking Bucky's future with anyone else in a single moment because that, you don't come back from that.

Bucky just managed not to say let me give you my life - he'd done that once, he'd died for Steve a hundred times over, and this was about more than that, about more than living for him too. This was about coexistence, about tying their lives together in every way they could be tied, stepping over the final threshold hand in hand.

"If we could go back," Bucky whispered instead, opening his eyes again to make sure Steve was listening, absorbing every word outta his mouth. "If we had time for that, would you change anything?"

The sweetest smile, crinkling next to his eyes as the familiar dance resurfaced. And for once, neither of them were dying. Or maybe they both were.

"If it meant getting to have this, with you? No, I wouldn't change a single thing."

The raw honesty in Steve's voice hurt, deep inside where the memories of every beating he'd endured were stored, every memory wiped away from him and shoved back inside.

The threatening rainstorm that started everything could knock down their window tonight and Bucky'd let it take them both this time, so long as they were together.

"If this was my last breath," Bucky vowed quietly, taking Steve's hands in both of his, holding them between their chests with the quiet whirr of metal and the tight press of skin. "If the last words I ever said were against your lips... I'll leave with no regrets."

I'd do it all again.

There were tears in his eyes. He meant it.
Steve leaned down and kissed him.

The bed hit the back of his knees and Steve's strong arms lifted him onto it, one cradling his back and the other his legs, placing Bucky down like he was made of something beautiful. If he could pick any moment to know inside Steve's head it'd be now. How did he look at Bucky and see this?

A tender mouth pressed to his again and Bucky parted his lips, inhaling the oxygen from Steve's lungs and taking it for his own, sunburnt on the insides as Steve closed his mouth around Bucky's bottom lip, pulling off with a slide and the shivers down his spine were subdued by the reaching fingers rubbing down his ribs, his waist, his hips.

Fingertips grazed the bottom of his shirt and Bucky lifted his arms, breaking away to breathe cold air as Steve tugged his buttonup over his head, tossed it aside, sitting up to pull off his own too, white and black landing in a pile to the side, suspenders hanging off Steve's hips, and Bucky forced himself to push air through his body, rolling his head on the pillow to look up at his best friend.

Lover, he was going to be Bucky's lover.

No war could've prepared him for this.

Steve's fingers branched over his bare chest, tracing lines and patterns like Bucky was his blank canvas, the same contained joy that lit up his face the first time Bucky'd handed him a sketchbook. A huff of laughter escaped Bucky's throat and he shook his head, reaching up to palm the curve of Steve's shoulder.

"What?" Steve asked, settling down closer, his knees pressed to Bucky's hips as he bent, mushing a kiss over the scarred skin over his heart.

"You're looking at me like I'm something to paint on," Bucky replied, a little disbelief mixed in the awe, hand swooping over the curve of Steve's spine. He lifted up at that, eyebrows furrowed in confusion and hesitance.

"It's a good thing," Bucky assured him, because he'd always thought there wasn't a better look on Steve's face than when he had a pencil in his hand. _Bucky liked watching Steve draw almost more than he liked the drawings themselves. It was just the only time he got to see Steve peaceful. _At home.

A tiny smile and Steve pressed closer still, chest hard and heavy over Bucky's, lips teasing at his softly.

Something clanked a quiet metallic sound and Bucky turned his head, breaking off and closing his eyes as Steve kissed a trail down his neck, tilting outta the way as his lips caught on the metal chain, followed it past Bucky's collarbone, another quiet rattle as he pressed a kiss to the name etched over Bucky's chest.

_and it's breaking over me, a thousand miles down to the sea._

The earth held still for a heartbeat, then Bucky lifted his head, tugging the chain carefully off of his neck, over his hair. Steve propped on his elbows, worried again, but he hadn't done anything wrong. Not when it came to this, he never had.

Bucky looped the chain over dark blonde, holding his breath as the heated metal settled over Steve's skin, plates dangling down in the space between them.

"You ever get your tags back?" Bucky asked softly, running his thumb over his name around Steve's neck. It may as well be his anyways; it wasn't like it'd matter, if one of their bodies were found, whoever's tag was around whom's neck. If one was gone, the other would be too. He was starting to get that now, maybe finally. He didn't just follow Steve, Steve'd been chasing him around their whole lives too.

"No." He ran his fingers over the chain, the strange way the individual metal beads threaded together, lifting them in front of him, reading the engraved letters, numbers. Barnes, James B.

Blue staring at the name, the serial Bucky'd been tortured into mumbling on repeat. He closed metal fingers over Steve's, easing the tags out of his hand and into the metal palm, tugging gently, pulling Steve down by his own necklace, then their mouths were pressed together once more and the emotions were bitter on Steve's tongue.

Broad hands spanned down his ribs again, past his hips, fingertips dipping beneath his waistband. Bucky lifted up, encouraging Steve silently, kissing his pretty mouth over and over while careful fingers unbuttoned his jeans, lifting and tugging down the zipper. Steve's hands were steady, sure as he pulled back, tucked his hands in the pockets and slid Bucky's pants down his thighs. The air hit cold enough to make him shiver, tugging off the rest of the way and wrestling them over his feet, Steve pressed a quick kiss to his ankle as he tossed them aside.

Steve'd helped him outta coats a hundred times, carefully removing Bucky's boots from his drunken feet, helping unstrap the guns and knives from his back. So as foreign as this should've felt, it didn't. It was different, but it was Stevie and everything about that was comfortable.

His right hand was trembling as he popped the button on Steve's slacks, left hand whirring softly as metal fingers slipped on the zipper. It eventually caught, then he was pushing the material over Steve's ass, palms following with a gentle stroke that had Steve's eyes closing, a deep breath through his nose. The slacks and suspenders were tossed aside too and Bucky's palms kept running up Steve's sides, pressing fingertips into his skin, leaving white rivets in his wake as he traced the body he'd spent so much of his life protecting.

"You know what you're doing?" He asked quietly, tilting his head at the sound of a container dropped on the bed beside them.

"Don't I always?" Steve replied, making a face and sitting up to unscrew the top.

"Never," Bucky sighed, staring up at the ceiling in feigned disaster.

Steve smacked his lower thigh and Bucky made a chagrined sound because that was bare skin, it stung like hell.

Then his boxer-briefs were sliding down over the stinging mark and suddenly there were a lot of other things to focus on. Tugged over his feet, dropping to the floor, and Bucky was laying here naked, with Steve, moonlight casting black shadows, white highlights, except how naked could he be when he wasn't all skin, when there was metal attached to his shoulder?

He wanted to get rid of it, give himself, nothing but his skin and bones and beating heart. But then Steve's boxers were dropping to the floor too and the pretty face was leaning over him again, dogtags swinging from his neck. And Stevie had metal too.

Reflections still look the same to me, as before I went under.

"Bucky," Steve whispered, and without the low gravel in his voice he could've been eighteen, tiny and reaching and maybe it was crazy but he didn't care, this was still his best friend. He reached up and pulled Steve into his arms, wrapping tight over broad shoulders and a tiny waist and fuck, lord their hips were pressed together like this too but just for a second he needed to hold the punk who'd made it through the century with him.

Nose against his neck, lips parted on his collarbone, elbows slid under his spine, warm and solid in his arms, alive and real, the pounding heart against his chest and heavy breaths, for once: nothing in the world standing between him and Stevie.

No need to pray, no need to speak. Now I am under.

Then, because he'd chosen an asshole of a best friend, Steve mumbled something into his skin and rolled his hips down on Bucky's. The air punched out of his lungs, hard abdominal muscles catching on his skin, consuming spike of arousal as their erections rubbed against each other.

Hands tipped his face up and Bucky breathed into Steve's mouth, metal plates shifting as he ran two fingers down Steve's lower back to flatten over his ass, drag him down to brush together again.

Words were gone, but that didn't stop the shaky sound escaping his mouth as their hard lengths pressed together, as Steve rocked his hips and Bucky's hands curled to fists against golden muscle.
He'd always been attuned to the world, moreso as an assassin, but it'd never been like this, so electrifyingly aware of each touch, brush of skin. Tingling instead of shocking, building instead of breaking.

"C'mon angel," Bucky coaxed, but it was more of a breathy plea, meeting the circle of Steve's hips with a reminding squeeze to plush flesh.

A bit lip, nervous trembling hands as Steve held his breath and nodded, scooted backwards, lifted one of Bucky's legs at the knee and let blue eyes cut down to unfamiliar skin. A bottle screwing open, hesitant heartbeats as eyes shot to his again.

"I can--" he started to offer, but Steve crinkled his brow in offense and lifted Bucky's other knee, tipping the bottle slowly to coat two fingers in slick.

A hiss as sensitive skin lit up cold and Steve murmured something low, Bucky's lips parting at pressure tentative and warm over tight muscle, then the tip of a finger was folding inside his body and he didn't know how to breathe.

"A-ah," Bucky's throat caught and Steve stroked a worried hand over his stomach, hand stilled inside him.

"You okay?"

It burned a little, stretching more than he'd pictured, but that was nothing compared to the feeling of something inside him. Intrusive, a different angle than he'd thought, feeling bigger than Steve's fingers were.

He bit his lip and nodded, not trusting his voice or words right now, staring at the shadows dancing on the ceiling while Steve planted the hand on his stomach and slowly withdrew, pushing in again while the burn dulled.

"God, you're beautiful." Steve's eyes grazed over his body in something like awe and Bucky glanced down at him with an amused little smile.

"Mmm. Think so?" The finger inside him was slipping in and out more easily now and Bucky's chest was rising and falling deeply with it, rerouting the highs under his control, letting his body trust Steve's immeasurably.

"Know so," he murmured, placing a kiss to Bucky's inner knee and guiding his finger all the way in to the knuckle, shooting a stutter into Bucky's breathing because god, that was deep.

"Th-thank you, Captain Rogers," Bucky managed and a little laugh escaped Steve's throat, suddenly lifting up to drop over Bucky's body and kiss him on the mouth, a gentle tug on his bottom lip as he kept working his finger in Bucky's ass. It was a little overwhelming, having two fires lit up in his veins at once, but Steve was keeping everything easy and slow and captured every gasp with a soothing flick of his tongue.

Steve's hand sped up inside him and Bucky had to break off to keep breathing, a touch too fast as he squirmed on the penetration.

"You're welcome, Sergeant Barnes," he finally replied with that knowing smile and Bucky snorted because god, Steve was a little shit even in bed, he wasn't the slightest surprised. "You ready for another, sweetheart?"

"Fuck, Steve, don't say shit like that," Buck cursed and couldn't help but reach down and run his hand up his cock, moaning softly as he stroked down, way too fucking hard to not have some kind of friction before he exploded.

Steve's eyes were glued to Bucky's hand, breathing shallow and cheeks pink, his finger buried deep and unmoving in Bucky's ass.

"C'mon, Stevie, yes, put another damn finger in me." Bucky tipped his head back as Steve drew out, pressed two fingertips against the rim of his hole. It took a hell of an effort not to beg Steve for it, to grit his teeth as wider warmth barely squeezed inside. It burned again, but Bucky was getting to really be alright with that, kinda goin' mad at the thought of Steve inside him at all.

More slow, slick easing in and out until Steve had two fingers half-buried in him and started kissing the inside of his knee with each shove deeper.

By the time Steve was spreading his fingers apart in his ass Bucky was shaking, hard tremble rucking down his neck, spine, ribs, hips, legs. One of Steve's big arms wrapped around his thigh, kisses a bit rougher as he sped up the flick of his wrist into Bucky's body.

His mouth was dropped open in an overwhelmed O and the looser he felt around Steve's fingers the less he remembered how breathing and talking worked, then a third finger was pressing into him and Steve licked Bucky's weak cries out of his mouth, muscles in his arms rippling as he made a space for himself in Bucky's body.

It was like being drugged with sugar instead of bitter, lips fumbling wet over Steve's without the slightest finesse, feeling ruined and wrecked and never more solid in his life.

Eventually Bucky couldn't take it anymore, panting helplessly into Steve's mouth and forcing his brain to focus enough to mumble something coherent.

"Please, please," he whimpered into Steve's mouth and the pretty face leaned back, blue sparkling as he hovered and looked down adoringly.

"Okay," Steve whispered, and Bucky let his eyes close, sensations washing over him like ocean waves. The fingers dragged out of his body and it was terribly cold and empty without Steve completing him--
No.

No, he'd promised himself he wouldn't let Steve complete him.

Crystal eyes shot open, finding Steve instantly, wiping his fingers on the sheets and grabbing the bottle of lube again, eyes down and the lightest pink flush blushing down his chest, neck, cheeks. His hands were shaking.

Bucky reached out, placed a palm over the unsteady hands, stopping Steve and forcing blue eyes to look up at him.

"Hey," he soothed, running a thumb over callused skin. "It's me, Stevie. It's your Bucky. I won't let anything happen to you."

"I'm not...I don't wanna hurt you." Steve looked so innocent and sweet, sitting there on the white sheets with the moonlight striking white lightning strands in his hair, lighting up the rare nervous expression.

"You won't," Bucky promised, wishing they both could believe every swear unconditionally, that the world hadn't made them break promises to each other so many times.

Like the promise that he wouldn't let himself wind the tendrils so tight around the rose that it choked them both. But what could he do now?

A quick nod and Steve popped the cap, tiny sound escaping parted lips as he slicked himself up, rubbing a hand tightly down his erection. Bucky kinda longed to reach over, take Steve's cock in hand for himself, twist his wrist and see what kind of sounds he could pull outta those sweet lips, but there'd be time for that later, there'd be time for all of it.

He held his breath as Steve settled between his legs again, hand smoothing under Bucky's lower back to tip his hips forward and up, making the angle easier. It wasn't a question, the position the first time, he needed to look Steve in the eye as they fell through rushing wind and snow together.

What would that've been like, if Steve'd reached far enough for Bucky's hand that he had to let go of the train instead? Their hands clasped tightly as Bucky screamed, realizing in that moment that Steve was going to die, never assuming they'd both survive the fall. And Steve would hold his hand tighter, pull them closer through the falling wind, arms around each other as hair whipped, two blue uniforms tumbling for the ground as they clutched each other and Bucky'd probably cry, squeeze his Steve tight and shout I love you over the wind before they both hit the bottom.

Their eyes locked and Bucky cupped Steve's cheek in his hand, poised and ready to fall all the way this time. Except he'd never drag Steve down with him, not if Steve wasn't positive, not if they weren't both ready.

"You want this?" Bucky questioned quietly, curling fingers in blonde hair and scratching Steve's scalp, letting all of the masks slip from his face for one of the few times in his natural life. Steve looked ready to cry, hands clutching the sheets on either side of Bucky's head desperately.

Bucky met that gaze and asked the most honest question he could think of. "You want to damn yourself to me?"

A flit of confusion and Steve's eyebrows furrowed, taking a few seconds before the words managed past his lips. "You think this is wrong?"

He shook his head with a soft smile, stroking his hand down to Steve's neck, running fingers delicately over the thudding pulse.

"That's not what I mean. But there's no going back after this," He stilled, made sure Steve was paying attention, because every word counted, this was all dark truth. "You let me in your halo...you're coming out the other end bloody or black."

A shaking breath and Steve dropped his head, staring at Bucky's chest, the metal dogtags swinging between them for a moment. Bucky ran his hand up through brunnête roots, waiting patiently as Steve gathered his thoughts, whatever fighting words he was raising fists to this time.

"I walked through hell for you," he started, metal clinking together on the chain around his neck, then Steve looked back up at him, a hundred stories in his eyes of army fields and bloody battles. Peggy'd told him, on that day, something Steve's said when he found out Bucky was a prisoner of war. I'll walk there if I have to. Steve'd walked through hell for him and maybe Peggy was right, maybe that was all that really counted in the end.

Artist fingers found his, taking both Bucky's hands and entwining them onto the sheets. How many times had they entwined fingers? How many times?

"...It'd be an honor to burn hand in hand."

Bucky blinked up at him and Steve lowered his arms in a pushup to kiss him one more time. Bucky closed his eyes and his lips slid against Steve's, then oxygen filtered through parted wet lips and the air without Steve was cold as it'd been that day, wind and snow.

Fingers laced together, letting go of Bucky's metal hand to reach down between them, lining up the wet head of his cock against Bucky's entrance. Gazes meeting one more time, a look across a dark room, the silent words they'd never had to say aloud for them both to know in their souls.

A careful tilt of hips and then Steve was pushing inside him, slick and stretching and Bucky's throat seized like he was choking, fumbling metal plates until he was gripping Steve's bicep hard enough to leave a star-shaped imprint on him too.

"Mo dhia," Steve cursed, pressing further until the head slipped past the outer rim of muscle, shooting spikes of burning fire up Bucky's tailbone, into his lower spine and straight up to his brain. He still couldn't make a sound, head tipped back with his lungs entirely void of oxygen, body void of anything that wasn't Steve.

The burning wasn't fading, not like it had with his fingers, and as Steve's hand clutched tight enough to tear the sheets, tipping his hips to drive deeper into Bucky's body, he wasn't sure he'd ever breathe again.

"Bu-ucky," the heavy voice broke above him and Bucky's eyes were frozen open, felt like real crystals, sparkling and faceted with a thousand indescribable feelings.

Then Steve's hips were flush against his, buried deep in Bucky as he could go, as connected as they could ever possibly be. The built pressure in his body was so much higher than he'd imagined, could feel Steve all the way in his stomach, the warmth spreading up over his heart and into a gasping breath, lungs finally expanding over oxygen and Bucky's lips parted with the only worded that mattered slipping off his tongue.

Loose lips touched down to his, brushing mouths as they both fought to breathe, fought with lungs caught like little Steve's asthmatic ones, then Steve was drawing out of his body and the burn forced a whimper out of him, shot to pain but not stopping, he didn't ever wanna stop, he knew Steve'd take care of him.

"You alright?" Steve breathed against his cheek, eyes squeezed shut and dogtags brushing Bucky's neck. He sounded as wrecked as Bucky felt, hips tipping forward again to sink back deep.

_I love you_, Bucky thought vehemently, easing up his grip on Steve's bicep a little, not missing the wince as Steve realized the bruise.

"Ah-- I. Mmm...yes," he managed, his pulse pounding so loud it felt like plenty of an answer anyways.

It was all still slow and careful as Steve pulled back, pushed into Bucky's bloodstream again, smoother that time, like gaining his footing in a waltz.

"Does it hurt?" He asked, still panting breaths over Bucky's skin, rocking his hips up a bit faster.

"A little." A gasp flooded his chest, making metal ring softly in the background, his abs trembling and clenching against the sliding flesh under his skin. He wasn't lying about the slight pain because it'd eased, it wasn't nearly so bad, sharp hurt faded into a dull stretch of light sparks.

"Ah-h, Bucky, I'm sorry." Steve slowed his hips a little, like he couldn't stand any slower and Bucky felt that in his bones, couldn't imagine Steve ever _stopping_ now. Not when every slide was adjusting him more, fluttering muscle accepting Steve into his body the way his heart had years ago.

"Don't be," Bucky breathed, back arching as Steve drove his cock in again and the burn finally settled. He could think again, almost, enough to feel nothing but the maddening dance of their bodies together.

Having Steve inside him, filled to the brim, threatening to overflow; a sparkling river, clear enough to see the shining rocks at the bottom, pattering raindrops marking ripples and circles, rising the waterlevel, dancing and flowing closer up the shores, dragging the tips of leaves and roots down before engulfing them entirely - and the river overflows the banks, hugs the shore the way his body held Steve's, snug inside him.

The way his body'd held Steve's when he'd pulled him out of the river then, saved his life. Set him on shore and believed to save his life a third time that day, by walking away.

He understood, now. Saving Steve's life could never include walking away.

What had they gotten themselves into?

"Stevie," Bucky moaned in reverence, eyes shutting as he lifted his hips, shifted against Steve's thrust, driving back against his beautiful hips. There wasn't enough leverage and he wasn't sure he could control his legs or move his lower body without shaking all over.

He wet his lips, a soft groan punching out of him as Steve pressed deep into his body again. It took a few tries to find words, to make a sound out of his mouth that wasn't a shaky, hurt, pleasure sound. "Feet...waist," Bucky managed, pressing his knees against Steve's hips to hopefully portray the request, eyes still shut as his body rocked an inch higher on the bed.

Steve fumbled for a moment, unstable rhythm derailing entirely as he straightened up, lifted Bucky's legs at the knees and wrapped them around his waist, crossing them at the ankles behind his back.
before sinking back into him again, leaning over Bucky's chest with his own heaving, bottom lip puffy and wet from worrying teeth.

"That okay?" he asked and Bucky nodded, rolling his lips in and lifting his hands to the sides of Steve's neck, holding onto him as Steve ducked his head again, dogtags swinging between their bodies as he planted his hands and started picking up his pace, evened out the push with the pull, sweat starting to bead along the edges of his pretty blonde hair.

When Steve was all tumultuous and fucked up inside he'd end up in the gym for hours, beating the fuck outta punching bags until his hair curled of its own accord, arching pretty in little slopes over his forehead, dripping wet into his eyes.

And the arms of the ocean are carrying me, all this devotion was rushing over me.

Stuttering hips a hard crash together and a little cry escaped Bucky's mouth, the flinging pieces of blonde threatening to sting blue eyes and Bucky bit his lip, body rocking faster and harder under Steve's as he tried to find some sort of balance, lifting fingers to Steve's forehead to brush sweaty hair out of his eyes, sweep it to the side like a pomade and blue flicked up to his for it, gazes locking with Bucky's hand still pinned to the side of Steve's face.

And they looked at each other, world spinning, swirling around them like the flashing golden snow of dances and Steve pulled his hips back fast, drove into Bucky hard and deep, settling flushed and rolling his hips in a tantalizing circle, grinding up against Bucky like he could get at every angle and pore of him from just this.

The sound he made wasn't describable and Bucky lifted his head the same time Steve ducked his, mouths slotting together somewhere in the middle, then Steve's mouth was pressing Bucky into the pillow and his hips rolled, deeper and encompassing again, everything starlight and gold.

When the hips started pumping into him again Bucky's jaw dropped open and Steve's tongue followed the movement, fucking into Bucky's mouth like they could have this forever, like there wasn't a part of Bucky that wasn't worth filling and loving and it was dizzying, crushing his mind with the weight of it.

The sky held stars, jet-black made to show off bright light, galaxies trailing behind stardust and the two of them were everything, oceans and heavens and fires and sunshine and rain, his beating pulse against Steve's skin, the tight skin of Steve's abs rippling over his leaking cock.

Shifting his mouth softer, lighter, Steve withdrew his tongue and peppered affection over Bucky's jaw, matching innumerable kisses with each thrust rocking them together. Steve Rogers was in his body, Steve Rogers was as close to him as it was possible for two humans to be. He'd always known Steve better than the back of his hand and now he knew this too. There was nothing he didn't have and nothing else mattered.

All the questions I have, for a sinner like me.

A wet tongue slide down his neck, licking the salt off his skin, and Bucky's hands clawed mismatched patterns of white down Steve's spine, heels digging deeper into the dimpled hollows of his back.

The steadiest hands on Bucky's hips, holding him in place so Steve could bring them closer to each other, closer to oblivion, closer to the whiteout that'd leave them waking into snow or finally letting go of ghosts. Sharp white teeth sunk into the hollow of his neck and Bucky'd fought a world war for Steve, for love, and Steve was sucking marks into his neck that sang mine in the only way Bucky could hear it.

But the arms of the ocean deliver me.

The never-ending fight; everything was a battle or a dance, there was no in between. This was the latter, this was round and round in a bubble of crystallized glass with stars hanging from red string above the shrine of a sinner, above the beating hearts of soldiers; immortals doomed for death.

An uncontrollable whimper as teeth scraped over bruised skin, dark marks he couldn't see but felt in his bone marrow, then Steve lifted a centimeter from the bite, lips brushing over raw sensitivity as he shaped his gasps into a whisper.

"Forever," he breathed and they were too close anymore to tell where Bucky's body ended and hadn't he always had such perfect control, known exactly where he was, could find the energy waiting in his fingertips, only now he was more than he knew with no idea to how much belonged to him, where he ended and Steve began.

Forever.

He didn't have control, where did that go? Where did he go? His body was empty every time Steve drew back, even emptier than he'd always known he'd be without Steve, and he'd promised himself he wouldn't let Steve complete him.

Nothing left, if there was nothing left for him but this boy, they really were both damned.

Artist hands tightened on his hips and Steve rocked into him harder, faster, and Bucky's feet were slipping out from under him. His fingers were frozen to metal, slipping for a moment before he held on tighter, fought the wind, couldn't fall now, not when red gloves were reaching for him to take a hand.

Take my hand.

The shadows on the ceiling behind Steve's blonde halo shifted, moon slipping behind clouds, and the wind clutched him even tighter than Steve was, held down with leather but lifted so high, like Steve could push him right over the edge into the sky where they belonged and it was too much, it was all too much.

"Steve, Steve," Bucky begged, whipping his head to the side, the world sinking under the surface, submerged in panic instead of purge. The same way he'd whimpered that name, laying on a table while Steve hovered over him, turtleshell hat on his head and breathing fast huffs of relief, the amazed Bucky as he tried to lift him from leather bonds that'd started everything.

"It's me," Steve breathed, hovering right over him the way he had that day. Except everything had changed. That'd been eternal darkness dragged into bright green; this was darkness holding hands with light and stepping into the unknown. Blue eyes held his, held him tight enough to etch it into the deepest, most untouchable of memories, voice washing over him like holy water over sinned scars. "I'm here. I'm here, I'm never gonna leave."

He shook and Steve took his right hand, the two existing parts of them that'd never changed, the two hands that'd held each other through decades, curling fingers as his body never stopped rocking, never stopped lifting, melting them higher, closer.

"I love you, Bucky, I love you." Steve's forehead rested on his, solid and present, touching him hard enough to shoot the reminder that'd drawn him off the cliff a spike of pain - that was his body, his, this was his body, the one Steve was inside, his, him and kept thrusting, tangling them eternally.
He lifted off long enough to kiss Bucky's eyelids, then foreheads were touching again, rough grips and pressing close, going outta their damn minds.

Bucky ran his palms over Steve's shoulders, eased the weight off them, if only for a moment, only for these next few minutes, where Steve didn't belong to the world, where Steve's heart only belonged to him. Steve's mouth covered his, just covered open and beautiful and he squeezed Bucky's hand tighter, let him breathe smoke into Steve's precious lungs.

Found the place to rest my head.

He couldn't tell who was healing who anymore and he wasn't sure it mattered. Maybe both. Hand in hand, together, the way it should've gone every other time, they were finally getting it right.

And it was better than anything he'd ever dared to dream.

The trembles were violent now, throat wrecked with little sounds that wouldn't stop, a litany of low ah ah ah ah's that bled into Steve's lips and matched each pant punch for punch. The hunger burned so hot inside him he wasn't sure he didn't turn to flames under Steve's skin, stomach coiled into the tightest of knots, shaking all over as Steve held him close and rocked again and again and Bucky only had the chance to open his eyes into Steve's, grasp his hand in a lock nothing could break again before he slipped under, before he crashed so high the heavens were looking up to find him--

His muscles clenched, seizing, waves breaking over him, drifting him out to sea and the arms holding him tight and close were crushing him into a thousand pieces, broken glass shattering and raining into streets as the ice thawed completely from his bones for the first time since Russia. Body jerking and heated ivory painting between their sticky bodies together, sheets sliding whispers under his scarred back.

Steve's hips pistoned and shook them both, then the space between his heart and Steve flushed warm as he stilled inside Bucky, shaking the way he had as a child, as a kid, as the small coughing thing with pneumonia laying numb in Bucky's arms. He was anything but numb now, larger than life, larger than Bucky's life.

A mouth slipped over his and Bucky clung to the only thing that'd made it through ice and fire with him to reach the other side, a brighter reflection than they'd ever know. Honest devotion of the sweetest heaven, spilling a river of promises into his body and maybe, when they hit the bottom, the jump'll have taken them someplace untouchable, where they never had to give up, where they only gave in to each other.

I love you, Bucky thought to the blonde hair under the soothing stroke of his palm. Steve's face tucked against his neck, nose cold the way it'd always been.

The world could crumple around them and Bucky wasn't sure he'd have the strength to save Steve from it, wasn't sure he'd do anything but let them both get crushed here together.

Every nerve ending open, flayed, shattered. Drained of all of it, lost to all of it, wiped clean - wiped clean of everything but Steve.

Insides raw on oceans and sunlight; Steve'd loved him into ruins.

He blinked at the moonlight splitting over the ceiling, the silver reflection over their entwined bodies.
A flutter of his eyelashes and Steve was up again, pulling their bodies apart with a hiss, and Bucky wasn't sure this was the time to beg Steve to never leave his body again.

Careful hands unbent Bucky's knees, laying him flat out across the wrecked sheets. He didn't try breathing until Steve was hovering over him again, on his elbows, dogtags clanking between their chests, maybe spotted white.

A moment's pause, a moment and twenty, eyes studying each other the way they'd spent so long perfecting.

The smile broke Steve's face first and Bucky followed in his footsteps as always, one-sided corner of his mouth curving up with every bit of honesty.

"Is it cheesy to say I saw stars?" Bucky asked innocently, throat scratchy and voice wrecked, then Steve was rolling off him and plopping down at his side, making the shared pillow bounce as their shoulders squished together.

"Yes," Steve laughed, airy and light, smiling up at the ceiling, black and white still dancing with the clouds drifting by outside. It was cold, wet inside him, like a bottle of tears buried so deep inside they'd never be shed. Bucky stared at black shadows chased away by brilliant silver moonlight and the smile melted off his lips, he melted down like weak caving steel, his breath catching just once.

Steve rolled his head, looked over at him, and Bucky was shaking. A hand landed on his arm, the way Steve'd soothed him during the war, then tears were gathering in the corners of his eyes and he didn't want to cry, didn't want to ruin this, but water was streaking down his cheekbones before he could do a single thing about it.

The first instinct was to lift a hand, wipe them hurriedly away, only Steve got there first, propped up on an arm, other hand gripping Bucky's shoulder tight as he pressed puckered lips over the salty streaks on Bucky's skin, kissing each dripping tearstain away.

No one'd ever kissed his tears away before.

Steve was rocking him before Bucky realized he was sobbing, before Bucky realized he'd broken right in half, curled into Steve's chest and let his heart shatter over his lit soul. Steve clutched him tight, both arms around his back, silent but for the occasional murmured promise, rocking them both back and forth and it was everything and nothing like the way they'd rocked together minutes before.

How could you love a sinner like me? Bucky mouthed into Steve's collarbone, wet with tears and the heat of trembling lips, eyes squeezing shut against the pain as his chest tore, half a heart pounding, and could only think one thing, over and over, pressing the words silently into wet skin and muscle like they could somehow save him, like if he mouthed them enough they could somehow, ever come true. One thing.

Never let me go.

Exhaustion took him before anything else could and Bucky slipped under for the second time tonight, into the dark wide ocean of sleep instead of the crashing white river of ecstasy, but the arms wrapped around him didn't change, would never change.

It'd been awhile since Steve'd been deaf in one ear.

He wondered if Bucky remembered he used to be able to read lips.

He cupped a hand over the back of Bucky's head and held him over his heart and prayed that he'd feel how strongly it beat, only for him, even in his dreams. That he'd hear how it was pounding and he'd know, he'd know. Steve'd never let him go.

"Say you'll remember me," he whispered begged pleaded vowed into silky brown hair, tangling his legs around Bucky's, tracing the scars on his back with the softest touch he could.

Steve pulled the sheets from the bottom of the bed, lifting them with his toes first and pulling them up to settle gently, drifting down light over their bare torsos.

If Bucky forgot him now--

He closed his eyes against the thought, swallowing hard.

Only the darkness behind his eyes was terrifying, because Bucky wasn't there and what if he left, what if he disappeared? Heavy eyelids were easier to lift again when you feared what you'd lose the moment you closed them.

Steve blinked hard, forced himself to settle in and trace his touch down the vulnerable curve of Bucky's spine, moonlight reflecting off closed eyelashes, making them shine with the weight of tears. Sleep might take him before Steve could stop it, before he could fight the fear of losing this, of losing everything. At least if death took them now, he was ready. This was it.

He'd never let Bucky go. He promised.

✩

If only they could keep that promise.

Chapter End Notes

✩

As always, feel free to come talk to me here!

Songs:

- Kids Aren't Alright - Fall Out Boy
- You Are In Love - Taylor Swift (listen to it while Bucky's looking across the room at Steve and rip your heart out)
- They Can't Take That Away From Me - Fred Astaire
- End of All Things - Panic at the Disco

Thank you to everyone who leaves me these beautiful comments and kudos - you've kept this story alive, I'll never thank you enough.

xx
It'd be nice to say he had a beautiful, peaceful awakening full of filtering sunshine and Bucky snuggling warm against him, their first morning together something out'a fairytale; only the chirping birds didn't wake Steve up, a very rude metal finger stabbing his side did.

He drowsily blinked awake, curling hands tighter under the pillow as he adjusted to the brightness of the room and Bucky's face swam into focus.

"You're alive," he declared and Steve groaned, because really, he'd be a lot more alive if Bucky let him sleep.

"Were you expecting otherwise?" It was half-serious through the sarcasm because Bucky'd cried himself to sleep after all, who knows what kind'a dreams he'd fought all night?

A little shrug and Steve squinted, studying the pretty face. His eyes weren't red-rimmed anymore, hair splayed crazy in his eyes but he didn't move to fix it, so Steve reached out to do it for him.

With a chagrined sound the disheveled head ducked away, slipping beneath the covers and stilling suddenly. Steve prodded the draping sheet, poking his revenge right back, only Bucky squirmed away and went still again, white sheet conforming to the outline of his forehead, nose, like a ghost - beauty in a veil. One that didn't appear to be moving anytime soon.

He still didn't understand the complexities of Bucky's responses, the way he sometimes looked at the world with eyes so different than Steve'd ever seen it; but he knew him well enough to know fluffing the sheets over his head was about more than protest, he was hiding under the covers and it was obligatory best friend protocol to lift the corner of the sheet and slide underneath too.

"I can't believe we had sex last night." Bucky's lips slid over fabric, voice slightly muffled from staring up at their thin ceiling in floating awe.

"Can't believe good or can't believe bad?" Steve prompted, rolling closer and careful not to dislodge the safety of their miniature fort. Bucky glanced over at him, twinkle in those eyes as they met Steve's and goodness, they'd had sex last night. That suddenly sounded like the best thing he'd ever heard outta Buck's mouth.

"Just that it feels like a dream." He shrugged, unsettling the sheet over their heads and Steve slid right up next to him, miles of bare skin inches from his fingertips. And he couldn't not touch, not when Bucky was right here and talking about how unreal it was. Steve's fingertips ran down the center of Bucky's chest all on their own, eyes tracing the movement and wrapping around to his hip - there was a faint bruise here, still, and the sight made Steve suddenly feel a little light-headed.

The back of Bucky's hip was such soft skin, caving so pretty he helplessly slipped a palm between Bucky's ass and the sheets, quickly scooping low before Buck could stop him. Rough grip and he yanked Bucky up on his side, pulling him close as he skirted fingertips over the sensitive skin around his entrance.

Buck let out a little yelp, cringing and wrapping a deathgrip around Steve's arm, pupils blown as their eyes locked, heartbeats pounding palpably between them.

"That feel like a dream?" Steve murmured, squeezing the plump flesh and Bucky hissed, the sound breaking into a shattered ah-ahh that shot straight to his stomach. A sweet whimper between parted lips and Steve surged forward, prying Bucky's mouth open with his tongue.

The kiss tasted stronger than usual, still like Bucky, still hot and wet against his lips and it was overwhelmingly tempting to roll his hips forward, sinking new bruises into Buck's perfect ass as he grinded them closer, the groan from his own throat nearly covering a second pained hiss from Bucky's.

It was only through long-ingrained stubborn willpower that Steve managed to pull away, blinking himself back into reality as he studied the panting chest, the squeezed-shut eyes. He didn't want to hurt, not actually, but Bucky wasn't made of glass and he could take some pain. Steve would be happy to remind him just how strong he was.

But maybe not this morning.

"You want a massage?" Steve offered instead, already rolling Bucky onto his stomach and pressing slow, soft kisses down each notch of his spine. "It might loosen you up."

"I thought you liked me tight," Bucky mumbled and Steve barked a laugh of surprise, shaking his head affectionately and dipping to kiss further, digging his thumbs into shoulders and ribs as he rippled down. Bucky's scarred shoulderblade didn't release as quickly as the other did - another thing to add to the list of things to work on.

They were lovers now, Steve could do things like massage his shoulders. And other places.

He sat up, flinging the sheet back and exposing bare bodies to the cold air of the room, eliciting a shiver down Bucky's spine that Steve's gaze followed, all the way down to the incredible curve upwards and he just had touch where he'd been inside last night--

The muscles of Bucky's ass were tight, bruised, and gorgeous. As much as Steve wanted to take it easy this morning, kneading both hands over round cheeks was making his pulse race, heart pound outta his chest. Steve bit his lip to rein in the arousal tightening his stomach, calling stubborn willpower to shove thoughts into the corner of his mind.

It wasn't much easier when he worked down to Bucky's thighs; legs strong enough to kill, all golden lines of muscles rippling beneath smooth skin--

"I need to wake up like this every day," Bucky groaned contentedly, eyes shut and temple resting on folded arms.

Steve's breath caught and he stilled the grinding heels of his palms, touching delicately now as he smoothed fingers hesitantly up Bucky's lower back.

"You can," he trailed quietly, gaze flicking to the crystal one peering over Bucky's shoulder. "I mean. I'll understand if you want your own space, but. We don't have to sleep apart anymore..."

A soft huff concaved beautiful, sloping shoulders, an amused eyebrow cocked up. "Jeez, Rogers. Screw a guy once and you're asking him to move in?"

"You asked me to move in when my mom died, that's a hell of a lot less romantic," Steve pointed out, sliding spread fingers up Bucky's ribs. He made another precious deflated sound and Steve bit his grin, running thumbs over each individual bone. Buck was stunningly peaceful like this, easily trusting and stretched out for Steve, eyes drifted shut and lips parted around weak banter.

"You know what's romantic?" Bucky grumbled, back expanding and contracting under Steve's hands like he was the most comfortable he'd ever been. "Food."

Hmm. Steve dropped a kiss to Bucky's thigh and rolled off the bed, because he'd kinda made the floor with certain things in mind and breakfast was definitely one of them. "I'll be right back," he promised at the little groan of displeasure. Buck grumbled annoyedly and Steve hurried out the door before he lost the resolve to leave at all.

When he came back ten minutes later, Buck was sitting up with his back against the headboard, sheets draped over his lap and fingers combing the knots outta his hair.
"Hey Rogers, you--" Bucky's question cut short, a wide grin spreading on his face as he took in the glass bowl Steve was carrying, rolling his lips in to hide the beaming smile, but his eyes were sparkling with it anyways. "You're kidding me."

"Yep, this is all for me," Steve teased, plopping on the bed beside him and leaning over to coax that pretty smile open with his lips. Bucky angled their mouths, metal hand curling around the dogtags on Steve's chest, tugging closer. It was an effort not to tip raspberry sorbet over the sheets with Buck kissing him like that, but when their lips slowly eased apart the bowl was somehow still upright.

He handed it over and Bucky gave him this look, leaning back against the headboard as he popped the spoon in his mouth. Lots of happy moaning sounds followed and Steve twitched at the teasing because he'd been trying to behave, but Bucky and his disheveled hair and his stupid sounds were agitating every nerve under his skin.

Halfway through the bowl Buck offered him a bite, holding the spoon in front of Steve's mouth and swatting his hand when he reached to take it. Obediently Steve parted his lips and Bucky fed him the soft pink sorbet, bright eyes and crooked smile.

"This part's stranger than the screwing was," Bucky crinkled his nose and Steve smiled, spoon slipping from his mouth as he nudged Bucky's shoulder and nearly spilled the sorbet again.

"Doesn't have to be like this all the time."

"Good. I'd probably suffocate." He scooped another bite of sorbet towards his mouth, giving Steve that secretly-affectionate smile that'd be the death of him one day. "But I can take it for a morning."

Pink lips closed over the spoon and Steve drifted his hand over Bucky's thigh, rustling sheets as he looked up under lashes, tone pure innocence.

"Anything else you can take?" He wrapped his fingertips around the inside of Bucky's thigh and crystal eyes widened, a quiet slipping sound as Bucky curved the spoon out of his mouth, lips tugging it clean.

"God, you're insatiable." Bucky tapped the spoon on his mouth and cocked his head knowingly.

"That's the third time in ten minutes you've tried to get into my pants."

"You're not wearing pants," Steve pointed out and Bucky raised an eyebrow with that mischievous half-smile. The spoon clanked back in the bowl with a chime, then Bucky was leaning over him to sit it down on the nightstand. Only that left him draped over Steve's lap, and the next thing he knew the sheets were whispering around them and Bucky'd slid over to straddle his thighs, metal tipping Steve's chin up.

He groaned and Bucky licked it from his mouth, cold, sweet like raspberries. As much as he teased, the filthy sounds he made when Steve sucked on his tongue gave him away; not to mention grinding his perfect ass down on Steve's lap, pained whimpers only making him that much harder against Steve's stomach.

Smoothing one hand over Bucky's lower back, Steve kept his lips pliant against that sweet tongue, bringing his other hand between them to circle around Bucky's erection and tug upwards. That sweet mouth broke off with a gasp, nose tucking against Steve's neck as he slid his palm over the slick head and pulled down. Buck's hips stuttered, a dozen little sounds as Steve ground up against his ass and jacked hard flesh easy between them.

A twist of his wrist and Bucky's teeth sank into his collarbone, making Steve tip back his head and moan faintly, unable to focus on much but the sweet plush of Bucky's ass pushing down against his dick, spinngly beautiful pressure building between them under the gentle gold of morning sun filtering through the window.

Steve could definitely wake up like this every day. All of Bucky's bare, precious skin his to touch, kissing away bruises from the night before, pulling a sleep-warm body into his arms and just looking at those sweet eyes - that's all he'd ever need.

"Ah-ah I'm. I'm gonna--" Bucky started shakily and Steve pumped his cock faster, pulling Bucky closer to the edge as he tipped his mouth to Buck's ear, voice lowering husky and deep.

"C'mon, come for me, Buck," he murmured, pressing a kiss to the silky hair behind Bucky's ear. The body in his arms jolted and Steve tipped Bucky's face into sight, free hand on his jaw and stroking over rough skin, unable to tear his gaze away from the shut eyes and parted lips. His stomach and hand painted filthy again and Bucky let him have this, his body at its most vulnerable and Christ was he beautiful.

He slotted his mouth against Bucky's open lips, tipping his hips up and grinding in tight circles until he was seeing stars too, half-conscious of the hands stroking over his body, everywhere they could reach. It felt like an oath, the way Bucky was touching him, like maybe this really could be promise they finally kept, hauling over the final threshold with arms around each other.

The drift down from the high left him breathless, Bucky's metal hand shoved in his hair and wrecking blonde spikes disastrously, sheets spoiled again and both their bodies sticky and fervid, collapsed against each other. Buck was lazily mouthing along his neck, up to his ear where he paused to mumble something about never having morning sex before.

Steve closed his eyes, liking the idea of being Bucky's first something, although last night had been all new experiences too, having someone inside him like that, Steve had no idea how that had to feel...

"You okay?" he checked, Bucky's neck feeling small and delicate under his big hands. A quiet hum and Steve wrapped his arms all the way 'round the broad back, swinging Bucky off his lap to lay him out carefully on the bed. He got a fake warning growl for his troubles, jumping off the bed to grab a clean shirt to clean off, wiping down both their stomachs and leaving a kiss over Bucky's bellybutton.

"Speaking of pants," Bucky murmured, rolling his head over the sheets to furrow his eyebrows at Steve, "-did you bring down extra clothes?"

Steve stared at the shirt he'd just dropped to the floor beside the ones they'd cleaned with last night, before blinking back at Bucky. They stared for a moment wide-eyed, picturing the number of people they could run into between this floor and their own--

"Jarvis!" They shouted in tandem, twin voices loud enough to hopefully be heard in the elevator (he hadn't had the speakers installed yet on the rest of the floor) and the word barely had time to echo before they were both laughing, falling to the mattress beside Bucky with one hand clutching his chest, giggles amped from the post-coital haze-

-and god, they were still talking in sync, calling on robots to bring them extra clothes after having sex in a floor all to themselves in one of the biggest, most beautiful towers in New York and there was nothing about this that wasn't ridiculous - except for the fact that through it all, no matter what, Bucky was the one still here with him.
Bucky Barnes could handle a lot of things: the idea of carrying on like normal, sitting around the tower with thin clothes covering a body that'd just been exposed and turned inside out like the entire world wasn't fucking upside down...was not one of them.

Steve was surprised when Bucky suggested it. But he'd always caught on quick, and the argument caved with a few well-placed kisses, then Bucky was packing a bag, pausing to shake his wrists and listen to the silence, the absent rattle from chains because he wasn't held down anymore, there were no unturned cards or worries to hold back, this was it and this was his all--

He'd warned himself about this, but if he didn't focus too hard and didn't think about everything he'd given to Steve last night, the strange glowing feeling inside him could be a good thing, instead of an unanchored, fumbling loss of control. Yes, he'd lost control, but who better to give it to than his best friend who'd left him to rot once who wanted to take care of him, Bucky could let them have this--

But just in case - cage either closing for good or finally opening into sunlight - he couldn't spend that wavering line, walking cliff here, not in the tower going about as usual he needed out and maybe Steve got that part because next thing he knew there was an overnight bag dropping on the floor next to Bucky's.

Grab your bag and grab your coat. We are headed north.

Bucky tipped his head up and Steve's arms circled his waist and he rocked them side to side as they kissed and it was adorable, childish like he just couldn't believe Bucky was in his arms and Bucky smiled into the kiss and really, he could prove to himself, his past.

He could prove it, climb to the highest mountain and spread his arms to the sky and shout that he was free, that he could be free and still love Steve Rogers.

He wanted this.

"Woah, woah, the hell are you--"
"Is this suitcase big enough for overnight? Do you have anything besides band tshirts?" Bucky tossed a Zeppelin one into the case and Steve dumped one'a the drawers onto the ground, toeing through the mess for anything bright colored.

"Does Tony Stark even own a swimsuit?"

"There," Bucky pointed and Steve made a triumphant sound, tossing it over his shoulder into the bag too. Bucky reached over him to grab another tshirt and Tony just stared.

"What--"

"Grab whatever else you need, meet in the basement lab in ten, don't be late." Steve pointed a serious finger, looking remarkably like the 1940s propaganda posters except Tony couldn't believe what the fuck he was wearing, then Barnes tapped the glowing center of his chest with a metal finger, echoing with a clank and they both swept outta the room, tornado in their wake as Tony stared blinking at the door and finally registered Pepper's laughter from the wallscreen.
"Are you wearing shorts? I've never seen you in shorts." Natasha glanced up from her phone, still sitting cross-legged in her fancy armchair and seemingly unfazed that they were (carefully) packing a suitcase for her. Actually, more like uninterested, so Bucky pinned her with a look and snapped one of the clasps shut.

"You're coming with us," he informed her, tossing a bandana in her direction and she snorted, scooping it outta the air easily.

"With your hairy legs? No thank you."

"Oh, like yours are any better," Bucky shot back and she narrowed her eyes to study him distrustfully, but she was rolling up the bandana to wind around her head so he was pretty sure he won this one.

"You adapted to the times scarily fast." She tied the rolled bandana around her red hair and Bucky smiled, tossing Steve the suitcase and grabbing a pair of flipflops off the top shelf to hold out.

"Lots'a things are scary about me. Now, you coming?"

Barton and Wilson were already waiting in the lab, legs swinging off a glass table with Bruce propped beside them, cleaning his glasses a little worriedly.

They all looked up as Steve and Bucky bounded down the stairs, and Clint snorted at the sunglasses propped on Bucky's head, holding back long swoops of hair, matched perfectly to the bright tshirts and boardshorts they were both donning. So much for homicidal looks.

Then everyone was turning around as Natasha burst through glass doors on the other side of the lab, extra black bag thrown over her shoulder that Bucky definitely didn't remember packing. Everyone gave each other quizzical looks as she dropped the bag on a table and it clanked. Loudly.

"I know how to have a bit of fun," she defended, one side of her mouth curled in devilish mischief and Steve threw up his hands when Bucky looked at him accusingly, then Tony was grumbling his way down the stairs too and everyone was looking to Steve, who gave them all his signature troublemaker smile and held up a dangling key.

"Don't tell me," Tony started, low and threatening, and Jarvis chose that moment to light up the garage behind them and reveal the hippie van they'd rented, straight out of the 1960s, round headlights and pealing white paint, backseats that folded into side couches.

"I can't be seen in that," Tony pointed accusingly and Bucky very solemnly handed him a pair of aviators.

"Example C of Rogers&Barnes exemplary disguises." Natasha clapped Stark on the shoulder and gave him a sweet smile. "I'll bet you don't even get shotgun."

"I call--" Clint started and Bucky clamped a metal hand over his mouth.

"It's already sorted," he assured, patting Barton's hair once before lightly shoving him in the direction of the van. Clint grabbed Nat's arm and they both ducked inside, calling cool kids sit in the back.

Bruce actually looked quite excited, coaxing Tony inside with something about a personal test of suspension rates while Sam laughed at everyone and loaded the overnight bags.
Then they were pulling into New York traffic and Natasha clambered over the boys in the middle to insist that she was only coming along if Bucky let her do his hair.

"You're already in the car," he debated, but she gave him a look and he turned sideways in shotgun, grabbed Steve's arm for support and made him tighten his grip on the steering wheel with a bit-back smile.

"Where are we going?" Bruce asked, leaning over Sam, the same time Clint tapped on the window and asked in an annoyingly high voice-

"Are we there yet?"

"I think that's paparazzi," Tony peered over Clint's head and Natasha hip-checked his shoulder outta her way so she could have enough room to braid the underside of Bucky's hair. To which Tony immediately prodded Steve's shoulder and whined, "Teacher, she's being mean."

"Ponytail," Nat demanded and Steve slid one off his wrist, holding it up while Sam and Bruce started taking bets on who was cracking first.

"Can we make it outta downtown before everyone kills each other?" Steve suggested, and Clint leaned around the other side of Bucky's seat to ask if he'd packed food.

"Yeah, don't forget the rage monster," Stark helpfully added and Bruce put both hands up, looking increasingly amused.

"You think the metal arm could do any damage against the Hulk?" Nat pondered and Sam instantly argued no way, which Tony backed up but then Clint was asking which metal would hold up stronger between Iron Man and the Winter Soldier and everyone got in a very loud, heated debate about the densities of certain metals and their epicness properties, which Tony claimed was definitely a considerable factor.

"Whose idea was this?" Bucky grumbled and the corner of Steve's mouth curled because they both knew exactly whose idea it was.

Natasha finished Bucky's hair by the time they got outta the city, two-lane blacktop headed north, industrial fading to residential to rural to the breathtaking open road - with three little braids swooping up into a high, messy bun atop his head, pieces hanging around his clean-shaven face, aviators shading crystal and quite frequent glances from the driver's seat because Bucky was absolutely gorgeous and it was only because he was driving that Steve managed to keep turning back to the road.

"Do we get to know where we're going?" Sam asked, forearm on the side of Bucky's chair with the first polite time anybody'd asked that question.

"Sure," Bucky shrugged, unzipping the backpack at his feet as a chorus of complaints piped from the back with I asked that half an hour ago and that's not fair, playing favorites but the whines hushed pretty quickly when Bucky leaned over the center console with a handful of brochures.

"We're going camping."

"In tents??"

"In a log cabin," Bucky corrected, and the mortified faces morphed into cheers. "There's five to chose from, so pass these around."

Sam took the brochures and handed one to everyone, the van falling into temporary silence interrupted only by the quiet scuffle of switching brochures.

"I want--"

"No deciding yet, we decide after we swim."

"We're going swimming?"

"The hell did y'all think we were taking you?"

"Hydra base," Nat supplied, to which Clint modified, "Taking out a Hydra base," and Tony inputted, "Some nostalgic-ass 1940s dump," and Sam half-agreed with, "A place from your past," and Bruce just said he'd had no idea and didn't really mind all that much.

"These assholes you call friends," Bucky shook his head and Steve threw an affectionate, amused glance over his shoulder before everyone fussed at him to keep his eyes on the road.

Natasha tightened her bandana and asked Sam why he didn't have one, then Bruce mentioned maybe they should all get matching bandanas or t-shirts which got Clint and Natasha in an argument over clashing color-palettes of everyone's skin tones and Tony shooed them to the back so he could unfold the side bench and maneuver an actual seat in place behind Steve's, so he could lean over and flick Bucky on the shoulder.

"You know Barnes, you're actually pretty cool now that you're not homicidal."

"I might be soon if y'all don't calm the fuck down," he pointed out, but Tony rolled his eyes at the threat, fixing his sunglasses and tapping on the window view of roadside speeding past.

"It's a roadtrip Sarge, it's supposed to be loud."

"As a Howling Commando, I'd have thought you'd be used to loud," Sam piped up and Steve snorted, adjusting his grip on the wheel. Bucky turned around in his seat again, elbow on the console and cocked eyebrow antithesised to the graceful messy bun and softening swoops.

"Oh those boys were loud, but they were also respectable soldiers." He fixed them all with a look everyone could decipher through the aviators. "Y'all are children in colorful suits running around the clouds."

"I take the stairs," Steve interjected innocently and Bucky whipped around to point a very serious accusing-finger at him.

"No, you jump outta fucking buildings."

Steve shrunk away and scooted against the door, eyes cast down guiltily in the face of Bucky's wrath and Tony turned to Nat with a shake of his head.

"See, this is why I can't decide who tops."

Clint snorted, waiting for the explosion, and Bruce lifted his head to peer around Sam's shoulder at the two boys in front, who'd both straightened up and were side-eyeing each other with this knowing look and half-smiles and everybody else in the van fell silent. There was no arguing or surprise or bashfulness this time, just glowy drifting--
"Wait, did you two..." Bruce trailed off and Bucky blinked spellbound at Steve, eyes glazed and smile soft and trusting and sweet and Sam was pretty sure Bucky'd never had that look on his face before and it took at least ten seconds before he'd registered the question enough to tear his eyes away and glance at the matching stares from the back of the van.

"Hmm?" Bucky hummed, still in some trance and Natasha studied Steve in the rearview, cataloging the blissful far-off look and wondering when the hell she'd missed one of her best friends falling irrevocably in love - not just the kind he'd told her about, or the kind he'd shouted in the garage, but the simple, soft, easy kind of love that had blue eyes burning brighter than she'd known Steve's could--

Like a corpse come to life, almost.

"They totally did," Tony suggested, leaning back against the window and Bucky's eyebrows furrowed as he scanned over various expressions.

"Did what?"

"You guys had sex!" Clint declared, loudly, making Bruce and Sam almost spit out the drinks they'd just found and Natasha bark a laugh while Tony reached forward for a high-five--

--and landed in Clint's lap with a scream, both of them toppling sideways and getting squashed by Natasha and then Sam while Bucky laughed his ass off in the front and Steve straightened the steering wheel back into their lane from the heavy, intentional swerve into oncoming traffic.

"See, told you I could shut them up, Buck," Steve said innocently and Tony cursed while Bruce held onto the ceiling handle by the door, bench seatbelt snug across his chest and a shrug about not turning green.

The bruises were minimal and Clint spent ten minutes complaining about being the smallest and how it wasn't right he got stuck on the bottom and Natasha complained how his arms were way too ripped for him to be the smallest, that was definitely Tony, and Bruce piped up if they were talking human or hero forms and Bucky glanced over at Steve with a smile before looking out the passenger-side window at the landscape swooshing past and thinking there was no place he'd rather be.

~~~

Thirty minutes down the road the Avengers were chatting light-heartedly in the back when Bucky decided they were rural enough to roll down the windows. An instant chant for roadtrip tunes followed that was more coordinated than some of their fight scenes, so Bucky plugged in his phone with rolling eyes.

There was a lot of screaming Rock'n'Roll out windows before Bucky suddenly gasped, diving over the seat to snatch Tony's phone outta his hands and waving at everyone to get theirs out.

"Wait wait, there's this song we're all gonna sing, I'mma bluetooth connect everyone's screens for the lyrics..." he started rapidly tapping with his right hand and everyone shared shrugs and got out their phones.

"You can do that?" Sam asked, right as his screen lit up with a page of lyrics.

"Yeah sure, it's not complicated, you just..." everyone but Banner and Stark droned out as Bucky explained, shifting metal flashing sunlight.
"Hmm," Tony apprehensively agreed, taking his phone back from Bucky. "That's really simple. I like the way you think, Barnes. You should come hang out in the lab for real sometime."

"Speaking of which, Tony," Bucky spun around in his seat again, pinning his sunglasses on top of his head so he could give Stark the proper Winter-Soldier-Death-Glare. "Where the fuck are the flying cars?"

"What?"

"I saw, first hand, your dad working on a prototype that was really damn close to flying and that was seventy years ago, so where the hell are they?" He crossed his arms over his chest and Tony sat up, looking confusedly between Rogers's expectant sass-face in the rearview and Barnes's glare.

"I don't....know?"

"Hopeless," Bucky sighed, unfolding his arms to gesture at them and reach for the radio. "Okay. Everyone, here we go."

If Sam knew anything about the stories he'd been told of the great Bucky Barnes, it was that if he was singing, it should be recorded. And he'd brought a camcorder, because superheroes didn't understand how important these things were to put on YouTube for the rest of the population.

The chords came in and before the first words could even start, Stark was already scoffing, crossing his arms over his chest.

"This song is way too peppy for you to like, Barnes."

"Hey, the most metal thing is liking non-metal music too," he defended and Natasha snorted. Bucky rolled his eyes and canted his head towards the stereo. "Besides, it's a song we could all listen to."

"Not all of us," Clint argued and Bucky pointed a metal finger at him, glinting threateningly with sunlight.

"Yes, all of us. Just wait for the chorus, you'll get into it."

Sam trained the camera on Bucky, the charming smile, the man behind the mask & metal arm that even the Avengers hadn't seen yet, not really. Capture the impact, see how true the stories were - Bucky cranked it up louder, tilting his head as he came in halfway through the first verse,

"And I've trained myself to give up on the past, 'cause I've frozen time between hearses and caskets," Bucky sang and Steve shook his head in the driver's seat while Tony made a contemplative sound of amusement.

Bucky rallied them up, crystal eyes lit up and voice gliding along easy with the song, beckoning with his right hand, '"my friends were gettin' high and chasin' girls down parkway lines," silky strands of hair framing his excitement and whipping around in the wind.

He swung his head back and forth, singing up at the sky, "the love the love that I gave, wasted on a nice face," reaching over to gently knock Steve's jaw, smile and mischievous fire that made him look so much younger-

Stepping back into the past, a man straight outta Brooklyn, the snarky war sniper with two human arms and a tendency to follow around boys in blue.

"--and got carried awaaay--" Bucky leaned an arm on the windowsill, wind stealing the shout roadside, a van mesmerized frozen until Bucky suddenly spun to gesture at them all, "Hey! I wanna get better!"

Steve lit up, shot back seventy years younger too - one hand on the wheel as he tipped towards Bucky and sang, "I didn't know I was lonely 'til I saw your face."

I wanna get better the song paraded in the background, and Clint started drumming along on the side of the van, making Tony arch unimpressed eyebrows and Natasha tip her head in contemplation. Better, better, better, I wanna get--.

"I didn't know I was broken, 'til I wanted to change," Bucky sang back, sincerity in his voice and knitted eyebrows matching the wide smile on his lips.

*I wanna get better, better..."

"C'mon!" Bucky insisted, waving for them to join and Tony finally sighed, scanning the lyrics and shaking his head, but Bucky cranked the song up another notch, singing even louder, and Stark lifted his voice,

"...chased that feeling, of an eighteen year old who didn't know what loss was," Tony broke into a reluctant smile, rolling his eyes as he took the next line and Barnes whooped. "--now I'm a stranger."

"And I miss the days of a life still permanent," Bucky carried again and Sam steadied the camcorder, scanning to Clint who leaned over to shout the next line with him,

"Mourn the years before I got carried away!"

Metal and human arms out the window, leaning back to shout at the wind, "So now I'm staring at the interstate screaming at myself--"

"Hey! I wanna get better!" Nat and Clint jumped in and Steve took the next line again, pinning Sam in the rearview with a pointing finger, "I didn't know I was lonely 'til I saw your face."

Bucky laughed and clapped, Natasha called out meet-cute and Sam took a humble bow that almost had him toppling into Bruce as the van sped around a curve in the road, saving the camera in time to train it back on wild, bright eyes.

Natasha jumped in all the way, tugging the bandana off her head to ball up and throw at Clint while she came in too, "I didn't know I was broken 'til I wanted to change."

The song blasted around them and Bruce picking up the drumming as Clint crossed his eyes at Nat and leaned into the middle of the van,

"Beeetter! 'Cause I'm sleeping in the back of a taxi," Barton's falsetto was surprisingly accurate and everyone laughed as he screwed up his nose to hit the high notes, eyes closed and head tipped sideways, "I'm screaming from my bedroom window--"

"Even if it's gonna kill me!" Bucky and Sam sang along and Bruce clapped his hands, then Tony was breaking out the air guitar and Clint's drumming started up again, building faster and louder and Bucky leaned out the window again, right hand in the air as he shook his hair in the wind and hollered and Natasha rolled on the floor, clutching her side in laughter, running smack into Sam's foot, who shook his head at her and angled the camera on messy red hair before panning up to Tony's air guitar and the brilliance of Steve's beaming smile in the rearview.
The song dropped down into quiet chords and everybody froze, Nat tipping her head up from the carpet as they all looked to Bucky, propped on the dashboard and facing the back, smile shifting down into something a little shy as he flicked his eyes between each of the Avengers in the back and came in with the bridge, voice floating and pretty now.

"Woke up this morning, early before my family..."

"We love you too, man!" Sam shouted from behind his camera and Clint made kissy sounds and Tony covered his eyes with his hands, but Bucky just shook his head affectionately and turned his soft gaze on Steve.

"...from this dream where she was trying to show me," he sang and Steve bit his lip, waiting, then Bucky's voice drifted again, "-how a life can move from the darkness. She said to get better."

Steve made a tiny noise in his throat and Bucky leaned closer, eyes widening comically as he shook his head, lifted a mock-gun to his temple,

"So I put a bullet where I shoulda put a helmet--"

A very audible shocked sound and Bucky tittered, "-and I crashed my car--"

Metal hand grabbed the wheel, rocking the van and shaking the back passengers to topple over, shattering the emotional moment as Bucky screwed his eyes shut and yelled at the roof, "-cause I wanna get carried awaaaay!"

Steve righted the car and grabbed Bucky's hand off the wheel, tangling their fingers together as Bucky paid him no mind, waving over his shoulder for the laughing Avengers to join him, "That's why I'm standing on the overpass screaming at myself--"

"Hey! I wanna get better!" Everyone shouted and Steve whooped, then Bruce was shoving Tony's shoulder, jumping on board with his own heartfelt, "I didn't knooow I was lonely 'til I saw your faaace."

Tony smiled, squinching his nose up, then everyone was singing better better better out the windows and the road whipped past them while Bucky clamored the loudest, "I didn't know I was broken 'til I wanted to change!"

Sam panned the camera over everyone's smiling cheers, lyrics Tasha kept caroling towards the sky as Clint drummed, the way Tony and Bruce were leaning on each other's shoulders and singing with their eyes shut, panning over to the two in the front seat,

"I wanna get better, better, better, better, better, better, better, I wanna get better!"

The red button kept blinking and Sam studied the screen, Steve and Bucky holding hands as the song crashed its final chords behind them; the way they were looking at each other, fingers laced and heads turned, twin gazes stuck together, shining bright, melting smiles and so in love and beautiful and - Sam panned down the camera slowly, the final note echoing as the video ended on two entwined hands - metal and human.

He pressed the record button again, video saved, and swallowed the lump in his throat.

He just never thought he'd see Rogers like that.

He didn't know there was a Rogers like that.
Or any of them, for that matter.

My family, Bucky'd sang.

Sam sat his camcorder down and wondered if maybe that's exactly what they were.

~~~

"So, I've got a surprise for everyone," Bucky broke the silence, drumming his fingers on the windowsill and Steve glanced at him curiously.

"Really? What?"

"I tell you and it's not a fucking surprise." Bucky gave him a crazy look and Natasha started laughing in the back. "Just turn at the next exit."

"Buck we've still got another fifteen til the beach--"

"Yes, I know, we've got something to pick up first." He pointed out the window at the exit and Steve started turning the wheel, sliding everyone to one side of the van.

There was a lot of apprehension and grumbling as the backseat passengers attempted to peer out windows to see what the Winter Soldier was surprising them with, especially if it was something the responsible Captain didn't know about. Personally, Bucky couldn't believe how backwards they all had it. Steve was the troublemaker, he just had everyone convinced he was an angel. (Well, he was, but he was a troublemaking angel.)

Who, based on the look on his face, was half-in-love with a god.

The van screeched to a halt so fast that everybody in the back fell over before they could see what Steve was gaping over, the driver's side door slamming shut before even Natasha picked herself up off the floor.

Bucky pried open his door too, hopping down to the ground just in time to see the Adonis-man scoop Steve up in a bone-crushing hug. He kept his hand on the frame, wind whipping hair around his face as he tentatively watched, rolling his lips in to hide the smile as the god squeezed Steve and proclaimed loudly,

"My brother!"

Steve kicked his feet the way he used to when Bucky picked him up like that, then he was sat back down and Steve clapped the huge arm, beaming back. "Thor! I didn't know you were visiting!"

A quick glance over his shoulder and Bucky shrugged, then Steve was waving him over for introductions, right as the rest of the Avengers found the latch on the back of the van and came tumbling out.

"My man," Sam greeted, going in for the same arm pat, and Thor reached over to squeeze Clint's shoulder and nod respectfully at Tony, beaming at Natasha and frowning exaggeratedly as he looked over everyone's heads and counted.

"Where is Miss Potts?" Thor nodded at Banner too, peering around Tony like he might be hiding her. It was kinda cute, in a way, the exaggerated movements and way he furrowed his eyebrows at them.

"Having the weekend of her life running a multinational corporation without 12 year olds hanging around," Tony crossed his arms over his chest and Thor's frown turned into an amused smile, tipping his head in agreement. Then the bright grin was turning to Bucky, a huge hand stuck out to shake.

He took it and Thor's grip was warm and more gentle than he'd've imagined, shaking Bucky's hand once and respectfully not holding on too long, voice not so boom-y now that they were all close.

"It's a pleasure to meet you in person, Snow Warrior." The words were solemn and it took everything in him not to snort, but the guy was from another planet after all.

"Something like that," Bucky agreed, running Thor's name through his head before suddenly ɡlancing at Steve. "Wait, Thor as in Sarah's Thor?"

Sarah? Thor mouthed confusedly at Tony and he shrugged back just as befuddled. Then Steve jumped in, still smiling like he'd won the lottery, one hand on Bucky's shoulder as he talked with the other and explained.

"My ma's Irish, knew a lot about Norse mythology. And she was a storyteller too, full of anecdotes from her home country, legends and myths for bedtime stories. So, Tony grew up with stories of me, while Buck and I grew up with stories of Thor."

"All the more reason to get along," Thor declared, while Tony narrowed his eyes suspiciously and Clint pattered something about growing up with normal stories while Natasha nudged him and whispered the stories she got told at bedtime would make Thor lock himself in a closet in fear. Bruce frowned and she smiled congenially, patting his arm with an assurance she wouldn't whisper them in anyone's ear while they slept.

Glancing between the rest of the faces, Thor's gaze settled back on him again, smile softening a bit as he leaned over Steve and lowered his voice a tad.

"Although I already welcome anyone who can have such a hold on Captain Rogers' heart."

Bucky raised an eyebrow, popping his lips and looking over at Steve, who'd retracted his hand and was blushing like a fool, mumbling abashedly for everyone to get back in the van already, they had places to be.

Piling back in the van proved a little more difficult with an extra two hundred plus pounds to fit in and they'd barely pulled back onto the road before the complaining really started.

"Okay, this is ridiculous, let's make Cap and Sarge sit in the back," Clint complained, scooting closer to the window while Thor tried to make his shoulders smaller.

"But they're both huge," Tony and Natasha said in tandem, glaring at the plethora of muscle surrounding them.

"Stevie can sit in my lap," Bucky offered innocently and half the van made surprised noises while the other half broke into laughter, although Bucky wasn't sure which half Steve's expression fit into.

"Man, am I the only one who still can't get on board with the Stevie thing?" Sam asked, leaning over the center council to raise his eyebrows at the two of them. "You are way too big to fit a name like that."
"Well, he wasn't always. Actually fit in my lap back then."

"Okay, that was one time," Steve complained.

"That sounds like a fantastic story," Clint encouraged from the back and Sam prodded Bucky's metal arm, making it whirr and adjust in offense, but he sighed and turned halfway in his seat anyways.

"Alright, so, back in the day when Steve could still get drunk--"

"You know, there's an Asgardian drink, aged for a thousand years, in barrels built from the wreck of Glunhill's fleet. It's not meant for mortal men. But I do think it'd get the great Captain drunk again."

Thor tipped his head and patted his pocket knowingly, making Steve's eyes widen in the rearview until Bucky grabbed his chin and moved his gaze back to the road.

"It sounds fantastic, bring that stuff out when it gets dark, maybe we'll get a repeat performance." A groan from the driver's side and Bucky covered Steve's mouth with his hand, leaning further in the back, eyes sparkling as he continued his story. "Anyways, little Stevie was a goddamned lightweight, knocked out with stuff that barely made me tipsy. So one year, for his birthday I took him to this bar..."

~~~

"We're all just gonna...jump off this cliff into the water." Sam crossed his arms over his chest and Bucky shoved his bare shoulder with a smile.

"It's only twenty feet up, I've pushed you off higher." He got a mild glare for that and Bucky patted his back, turning around to see what all the commotion was about behind them.

Natasha'd climbed outta the van in her bikini and was fussing about scars or something? She pointed accusingly at Bucky before indicating a distorted mark on her hip with a loud, "Look, see, ruined!"

"Yeah, Natasha, you look terrible now," Steve drawled boredly, pushing past her in his american-flag-striped swimshorts. Bucky raised an eyebrow and pointed at the shorts, then Steve was pointing at Tony in explanation and Bruce interrupted that it was rude to point.

"Battle wounds make a woman more beautiful," Thor declared, while Natasha only glared harder, both hands on her hips. Steve rolled his eyes at her and Bucky lifted a hand helpfully, tone just flat of teasing.

"Matches the fresher one on your shoulder just fine," he offered, gesturing at the other bulletwound he'd left on smooth white skin. Natasha's mouth popped open like she couldn't believe he just said that and Bucky cackled, hand over his stomach.

Then there was a little spider trying to push him off the cliff and Bucky grabbed the fragile wrist, whipping her around so Nat would fall instead, except she used that momentum to vault onto his shoulders and-- hadn't they been here before? She undid his bun with one hand, disheveled hair ruining his vision, tugging him towards the edge of the cliff to tip him off balance and Bucky supposed it'd be rude to flip her onto the hard ground with his arm, so he was stuck trying to lift her off carefully. Only Natasha was showing no mercy at all.

His foot slipped at the edge of the cliff and Bucky shouted, then Natasha's heel whipped into his chest and shoved him backwards over the edge, using the pushoff to flip off his shoulders, and she was gonna land right back on safe ground. Bucky swung out his metal arm and closed immovable fingers around her ankle, then they were both tumbling downwards and landing in the water with a splash.

It was colder than he'd pictured, but compared to the ice tanks Hydra used to dunk him in the temperature was lovely. And the depth was perfect too, letting him spring off the soft ground to break the surface dramatically, shaking water outta his eyes and flinging long hair as he caught his footing and flexed his arms to test the shifting metal plates.

It was working beautifully. And apparently so were Steve's eyes.

He stood gawking at the ledge, gold hair and barechest stunning like everyone's most angelic fantasy - only he was looking at Bucky like he was something outta dreams.

Bucky slid both hands back through his hair and Steve blinked cutely, sliding outta his trance - only it was too late, Thor'd snuck up behind him, hair braided and feet ungodly quiet for someone of that size. The only size that easily scooped Steve Rogers off his feet, bridestyle.

The sudden shout of protest was generic enough to be anyone's reaction, no way indicative of I can't handle water without triggering, then it was too late anyways and Thor was tossing Steve high into the air, already laughing good-naturedly at the arms and legs flailing in panic as Steve dropped for the surface.

Bucky didn't need to see the flash of fear in Steve's eyes as he hit the waves to close the distance between them in a rapid freestyle, already pulling Steve towards him before he broke the surface sputtering.

Steve shot outta the water with a harsh, choking gasp that could've belonged to younger asthmatic days - except for the tensed, trembling muscles veining arms and shoulders, squeezed shut eyes, all-but-flailing panic. Bucky was gathering Steve into his arms before his lips could part in another terrified wheeze, dragging close and shoving their bare chests together, pounding heart over Bucky's steady one as he forcefully wrapped Steve's legs around his waist and tucked the watering eyelashes against his neck, metal hand solid on the back of Steve's head. Holding him immovable, safe.

The others were all watching cliffside, Steve's tensed spine to them as Bucky scanned options over Steve's shoulder, calculating Thor and Tony's laughs, Nat's curiosity - it probably looked like Bucky'd swum over and possessively hauled Steve into his arms, under the ruse of staking his claim after Thor's manhandling of his Stevie.

So that's exactly where Bucky took it, keeping his tight grip on Steve and rocking them slightly in the waves while he fake-glared over the trembling shoulder.

"Hey, hey, paws off," he warned playfully, petting Steve's hair once for effect as the Avengers laughed or shook their heads, then all his attention was back on the terrified boy in his arms.

"You're okay, I got you," Bucky soothed, whispering into wet blonde hair. "I've got you."

His right hand ran up and down Steve's spine, stroking warmth over tight muscle like he could coax the strain right outta Steve's body. If only. It was hard to tell in the water, but maybe splashes of salty tears were blinking down his collarbone, matching a muffled, broken little sound and Bucky shushed his shaking boy, holding him tight in the waves.

"Geronimo!" Someone shouted, twin splashes and Bucky didn't look up to see who.

The water thankfully wasn't too rocky, wasn't too deep, and by the time they'd all jumped from cliffside, Steve'd simmered down to clinging hands and soft whimpers, the strained shifting muscles of his torso deflated against Bucky now.

"You alright?" Bucky murmured, metal fingers shifting through wet-blonde, right arm propped under Steve's ass to keep him upright. A weak sound against his skin and metal slid around to tip Steve's chin up, let him look at the shiny blue eyes and see for himself. Woozy, a little shaken, but otherwise Steve just looked cold, like the water was icy instead - for the plane crash, it had been. He stroked over Steve's cheekbone, adjusting his other arm and jostling Steve closer to his chest. "Can you breathe sweetheart?"

"...I think so," Steve mumbled, eyes cutting down, loosening his grip on Bucky's shoulders.

"Alrighty, you want down?" He palmed Steve's outer thighs, moving to lift him off, only Steve's eyes went wide and he squeezed his legs tighter.

"Uhuhplease -" Arms wrapping around his neck and Bucky glanced over Steve's shoulder again. The others were shooting them occasional amused glances, but nobody looked all that concerned. Good.

"Piggyback?" Bucky offered, going near crosseyed how close their faces were. Before he could think of another option Steve was already swinging around to his back, abs pressed to Bucky's lower spine and chin tucked over his shoulder. "Okay then," Bucky glanced back, amused at Steve's spidermonkey grip that hadn't showed since he was ten and begging Bucky to carry him over hot beach-sand this way.

Now, carrying him through waist-deep water to their team, Bucky hummed to himself about another thing that hadn't changed, another trait buried deep enough in Steve to stick around after everything else'd been shoved in the redwhiteandblue box.

They got a few raised eyebrows, but then Nat suggested a game of Chicken and Steve and Bucky opted to be lifeguards, chatting softly from chest-deep sidelines as Clint climbed on Nat's shoulders, attempted to shove Tony off Sam's while Bruce and Thor actually made an impressive team and knocked everyone into the water scarily fast.

The indignant losers of the game started splashing around, finding creative ways to slice into the water to send legitimately threatening sprays at each other, and no one was spared in that fight.

There was a hold-your-breath-underwater contest that Steve might've won if he were brave enough to play; not that Bucky'd ever say that out loud, because Steve would shove himself underwater - trigger or not - to prove the challenge.

The thing about triggers though, was that unless all parties present were aware, hovering on the edge of an episode eventually meant a crash. What Bucky hadn't realized was the tenseness of his own shoulders, the ever-shifting metal plates actually in fight mode, every hitch in Steve's breath sinking deep-embedded worry down Bucky's spine (where he was still pressed).

Steve hurting meant Bucky at-arms; so when Tony swam up behind them and jumped outta the water with a splash and a shout intended to scare--

--startled wasn't quite the right word. The water and sky tinged red and his vision narrowed - black eating his peripherals and the swinging metal arm wasn't controlled, not like it would've been if he'd been practicing efficiency the Winter Soldier relied on, it was a mix between that brutality and the younger-panicked-version of backalley fights--

His fist would've shattered Stark's skull, if it'd connected.
Steve's callused hands nearly ripped open grabbing the metal elbow mid-swing, yanking backwards and tearing the snarl on Bucky's lips in half, water-surface tipping as they knocked off balance and Bucky's feet slipped, Steve's head went under and the commotion drew Avengers like moths to flame.

The only thing that mattered was pulling Steve above water, wiping hands over his dripping face and tipping Steve's chin up to clear his airways only he wasn't breathing and Bucky moved on instinct, whipping him around to get his hands under Steve's sternum, press the coughing, wracking spine to his chest and shove his right hand over Steve's forehead, pinning up soaked blonde bangs outta closed blue eyes.

"Nonono, please, no c'mon, you're okay," Bucky begged, then Steve choked up a stream of water and gasped in oxygen and Bucky could've passed out with relief, cradling Steve close and finally looking up at the concerned faces.

"I'm sososorry," he scrambled at Stark, because he'd almost just killed him but Tony waved him off quickly, cockiness shattered to leave him looking raw, but not scared, more...worried.

"Can Cap swim?" Bruce whispered cautiously. To someone who didn't know what happened, it probably looked like Steve fell, swallowed water, and Bucky overreacted like hell.

"He can," Bucky answered before anyone else could, stroking the heated forehead as Steve melted in his arms, boneless and shuddering breaths. "He's fine."

"Look, Barnes, I never meant to--" Stark started and Bucky waved him off in return, running a hand through Steve's hair as blue eyes blinked lethargically open.

"No, we're the messed up ones," he assured Tony, because there was no way he could've known. Except then Steve was shoving hands over his face and struggling outta Bucky's arms, stubbornly wading water as he sucked in shakily, kept his eyes averted and fussed, "Speak for yourself."

Sam was probably the only one who got Bucky's noise of frustration, but if Steve didn't wanna talk about it, Bucky'd drop it. In front'a his teammates wasn't the best place to argue over PTSD.

"You looked like you swallowed the whole goddamn lake," Clint commented, and if Steve was still breathing heavy no one was gonna say anything. Nat was eyeing Bucky distrustfully and Thor's eyebrows were knitted in concern, but Steve was being stubborn as hell and--

"Wouldn't be the first time," Bucky joked, and that at least got a huff outta Steve's pretty mouth, then a metal finger prodded his side and the blue eyes rolled; but he let Bucky gather him up in his arms again without swinging fists, a loose circle around Steve's waist as both their heartbeats slowed, the tension in the air snapping as frozen statues of Avengers began moving again, a backhand splash from Thor sending a stream of water over Tony's head.

Worry shifted to laughter and Steve laid hands over the ones on his stomach, hummed softly as they watched the scene. Nat scampered ashore to take a volleyball from her mystery bag - which made it even more mysterious, because what-the-hell-else was in there - and Steve got his footing enough to join in as a setter on the back corner of their makeshift court, so long as Bucky was always within five feet. Which he didn't say aloud and didn't need to, Bucky read his face just fine.

Thor spiked the ball and Bucky dove through the water, metal fingertips shifting plates, tapping it just in time to save the point. Bringing his arm back down caught a ray of sun, shining reflective light in Sam's eyes and making Clint snicker.

"The metal arm's an unfair advantage," Tony insisted and Steve scoffed, flicking water his way, making a face that implied he quite liked Bucky's metal arm. "You would protest that," Tony grumbled, bumping the ball outta bounds and spinning moodily towards Clint, the brunt listener of his complaints.

Probably because he was half-deaf and didn't hear most of them, but.

"You know, how is it that the pinnacle of purity, the paradigm of the American Dream, America's Original Sweetheart, golden boy Stevie Rogers is – out of all of us, the crazy assassins and mad scientists and alien gods – the one that gets metal fingers shoved up his ass on a regular basis?"

The barked laugh outta Clint's mouth almost rivaled Nat's sudden cackling and Bruce's hand over his mouth, Thor's shocked cough and Sam's snort, even Bucky's mouth popped open in surprise.

Steve raised an eyebrow without comment, not quite CaptainAmericaDisapproves; it was only the enhanced hearing that let him hear Steve's mutter under his breath as he lined up to serve.

"Golden boy paradigm of nothing," Ball tossed into the air, words just as vehement as he tacked on a quiet, "-motherfucker." and smacked the hell outta the volleyball, deflating it the second it slapped the surface of the water and Bucky chewed the inside of his cheek but didn't say a word.

It almost sounded like Steve was bucking the stars'n'stripes suffocating him for so long.

~~~

"You're drooling," Natasha commented, crinkling a towel around her hair to squeeze it dry. It took alotta effort to tear his eyes away from Steve's method of hair-drying, which was scrubbing a towel over his head until it stuck up in a million directions like the disheveled spikes of early-morning, a mix between adorable and just-been-fucked and Jesus Christ that was a fantastic mental image.

Natasha was still giving him that look and Bucky raised a single eyebrow at her.

"Messy-haired Steve Rogers is the most beautiful thing in the universe, fight me."

The corner of her mouth twitched up in an amused smile, tilting her head in Steve's direction again. "Prove it."

"Don't gotta, I know."

"Aw, c'mon man," Sam inputted, clapping a hand on Bucky's scarred shoulder. "You say you like him, but so far there's nothing to show for it."

"They were only in each other's laps for the past hour," Clint pointed out as he passed by and Bucky stuck a finger at him, both eyebrows up in a hello expression at Sam and Nat.

"Yeah, sure, and you held hands. All platonic-best-friend stuff if you ask me," Nat nonchalantly studied her nails, undeniable challenge in her stance.

"Platonic?" Bucky sputtered, throwing down his towel and leaning forward to sass them both, "-how's this for platonic?"
He stalked across the rocky ground, not even bothering to tune into Thor and Steve's conversation before whipping him around by the shoulder, blue eyes wide with surprise, but they were about to get alot wider.

In swift fighter's coordination, Bucky lifted with firm hands on a tiny waist, releasing to quickly scoop up Steve's legs, pull muscular thighs around his hips and plant possessive palms on Steve's spine as he dipped Steve upside down in one fluid motion, bending in half to smother the open mouth with his.

The little sound muffled by Bucky's lips sounded straight outta the punk kid he used to throw over his shoulder, and thank god for the weight-training he'd done for the past seventy years because Steve was a hell of a lot heavier now.

Not that he'd ever had the chance to scoop Stevie into an upside down kiss with skinny legs sticking up in the air as a kid, but he'd probably been wanting to since sixteen, looking back deep enough under the bullshit he'd told himself for decades.

Steve tasted sweet and a bit like saltwater, hands shoved in Bucky's hair and entirely complacent otherwise, lips moving plush and pretty under Bucky's, then he was straightening back up, Stevie still snug against his hips, held steady with the metal arm tucked under his ass.

Their lips dragged apart slowly enough to tug at his gut, then pretty blue eyes were blinking owlishly at him, dead silence around them. Steve was flushed all over, from his cheekbones down his barechest; it was just about the cutest thing Bucky'd ever seen and he couldn't keep the helpless smile off his face.

Bright eyes and slightly swollen lips dipped forward to brush against Bucky's one more time, little smiles on both their faces as Steve dug his heels into Bucky's spine and eyes sparkled, locked.

"I dunno, I could still go with platonic--" Natasha finally broke the silence, amusement coloring her tone pretty and Bucky laughed, adjusting Steve on his hips and nudging their noses together.

"Oh fuck you, Romanoff," he shot back, but there was too much smile and no bite in it. Steve's pearly teeth expanded under his lips, sweet as spun sugar, fingers tightening on Bucky's arms and eyebrow lifting invitingly.

"You'll be too busy fucking me," Steve teased, and a loud cheer shot up to the left, juxtaposed to a defeated groan.

"I told you Barnes tops," Tony crowed and Steve lit up in a precious, shockingly amused laugh, tipping his head back before swatting Bucky's hands, hopping down to stand and threading his fingers happily through Bucky's hair.

"Not necessarily," Clint argued back, swinging open the side of the van and helping Bruce in with a hand. "If Tasha were to say she's too busy fucking somebody, doesn't imply pegging."

Tony threw up his hands and grumbled something about getting to the bottom of this eventually, pun intended.

There were a lot of underhand comments about how cute they were that Steve kept blushing at, ducking his head and looking up under long lashes at Bucky. It was a good thing they'd gotten kicked outta the front seat, otherwise it'd be too distracting to drive, shoulders brushing every time Sam curved the van around a corner.
Thor was in shotgun because he was the biggest, so the back actually had a bit of room, enough for Tony to sit in the middle of the floor and announce they were picking a cabin now, he'd be reading off choices and tallying votes himself.

It was actually quite easy to agree on one - for once - and then it was sleeping assignments, which Tony pulled out a pen to jot down on the brochure so no one could argue over it later.

"Alright, we've got three couches, two bedrooms, at least two oversized chairs, and probably plenty of rugs--"

"I'll take the floor," Steve offered instantly, good samaritan he was, but Bucky soccer-mommed his chest with a glare, holding him back from pointing at Tony's list and quickly corrected him.

"No, we will be taking a bedroom."

Steve's mouth popped open in delighted surprise and Bucky's eyes crinkled joyfully, bumping the side of his hand against Steve's, their pinky fingers wrapping together as Steve ducked his head and blushed, biting his lip to keep the smile from bursting.

Tony blinked, tipping sideways to mutter to Bruce, "I think I just threw up in my mouth."

"Not sure I've seen two people wanting to screw each other more," Clint agreed under his breath, tying Nat's bandana around his head and making his hair stick up in spikes.

"Dunno. I'd say that runs a lot deeper than screwing," Sam offered and everyone made sounds of captious agreement.

As if the blushing pinky-holding wasn't enough, the moment the van rolled to a stop in the rock driveway, Steve and Bucky were practically tumbling out the back, racing each other up to the cabin without even grabbing bags, twinkling laughter and shoves to shoulders, fingers tangling as they darted up wooden stairs.

They probably would've disappeared for the rest of the night if Natasha hadn't suddenly leaned out the window, calling after them.

"Rascals, wait! Before you go rendez-vous, there's a hottub." She raised her eyebrows invitingly and they both stopped on the porch, glancing between each other and the van.

"We just got dry," Steve whined, and Nat clicked her tongue disapprovingly.

"Not entirely. We have to go hottubbing."

Bucky heaved a devastated sigh, but there was a smile on his face as he took Steve's hand and led him back down the stairs.

The hottub was around back, a stone path circling down the side of the mountain the cabin was built into, Colorado-style pointed windows, glass and wood and rock, a porch that wrapped all the way around, on stilts in the back with zig-zagged stairs leading up to dark-green doors.

The air was crisp, making the bubbling warmth of the hottub jets a hundred times better. It was a giant circle, big enough for everyone to spread out their arms and slip into the safety of family and the joy of friends that let them relax for the first time since aliens came pouring outta the sky in Manhattan.

Eyes all closed against the twilight sky, sun already set, hovering light enough to decipher faces and Bucky tipped his temple against Steve's chin, leaning back against the sculpted chest from his spot in Steve's lap - which they both claimed was to open up more room for everyone else, but really neither wanted to stop touching quite yet.

Ten minutes in and Steve's fingers started tracing lines over his skin - specifically a watery circle around his wrist, repetitive motion with a perpendicular dash on top before sloping into a circle again.

"What are you drawing?" Bucky whispered, not bothering to open his eyes from his cozy drift.

"A never-ending line," Steve replied softly, voice sounding deeper and echo-y with Bucky's head on his chest. It took a second, but Bucky caught the reference, breath of laughter escaping his mouth as he nosed the underside of Steve's chin.

"You cheesy sap," he chided, the ripple of the jets keeping their hushed tones just murmurs to everyone else. Bucky slid his fingers around Steve's wrist, making the same motion on him and pausing at the dash, tapping it once. "What's that part for?"

"Well, that's where the line begins, and see how it connects on both sides? That's where the line ends too." The rumble was soft, patient, flooded with emotions, enough to make Bucky's lips tug into a smile, turning to humor the way they always did when things got serious.

"Let's see, we met while I was pulling you outta some fight," he pondered, pressing a kiss to Steve's neck as he began tracing Bucky's wrists again. "You think that's where we'll have the eternal breakup too?"

"No," Steve corrected patiently, "The line began when I felt alive for the first time and it ends when we die together."

"Jesus Christ you have the most twisted version of romance in the world," Bucky huffed faintly, shaking his head at Stevie's maudlin tone that belonged in a tinier body. Steve hummed in response, circling line and dash again, and again, before tipping his head against Bucky's and dropping his voice into a whisper.

"Kiss me."

"Here?"

"Here."

He shifted in Steve's lap, tipping his head up and curling on his side so their mouths could press together, colder than the water lapping at their chests. Lips dragged together and apart, heads tilting as Steve tightened his arm over Bucky's chest and licked along his tongue.

"Okay," Natasha announced loudly, water rippling as she sat up, "To cover up the sound of Rogers&Barnes tongue war, we're gonna gossip now. Tony, is Maria dating Kristin from Statistics or not?"

A giggle that Bucky kissed off Steve's lips, hot tub silence breaking into easy chatter. They didn't kiss for much longer, then Bucky was straightening to sit properly in Steve's lap while they listened into the conversation, inputted opinions here and there.

It was innocent, easy for at least another five minutes, then Steve's hands started to trail over his body and Bucky was a little more focused on that than whoever was dating who in SHIELD.

Underneath the surface of the bubbling, tumultuous water, a finger slid over the curve of Bucky's hip, caressing from the tie of his swimshorts upwards, wrapping around and sliding down again, skirting the hem in the back. Bucky forced himself not to tense, he'd agreed to sit in Steve's lap and he could handle keeping light touches on the downlow.

The tip of Steve's finger curved a v-shape along the top of his ass, dipping a bit into the crease and sending tingles down after it, so, okay, maybe caresses were gonna be closer to teasingly petting. He could handle that too.

Which was apparently what Steve was thinking, because the arm across his chest suddenly dragged him backwards, interrupting the water with a wave as Steve pressed his mouth to Bucky's ear and whispered low and rough,

"How good's your mission face?"

It was quiet enough that only Bucky could hear, but Steve didn't bother giving him time to answer before the teasing finger dipped down, all the way down, running a line of heat from Bucky's tailbone to his entrance.

Despite whatever the hell warning of keep a straight face that'd been, Steve's fingertip was rubbing tiny circles over his hole and Bucky's eyes went wide, quickly snapping his head to the side to hiss back, "What do you think you're doing?"

"Seeing how much you can take," Steve replied innocently, voice floating airily over his ear and sinking deep into his stomach. Bucky only just managed to lockdown the shiver of his spine, stilling himself entirely in Steve's lap while one hand stayed barred against his chest and the other massaged unrelentlessly against tight muscle.

Yeah there was nothing innocent about this. Nothing innocent about smiling easily at the other chatting Avengers while he pressed heavy circles into Bucky's rim. No, that was all Steve Rogers is a little shit.

And it wasn't like Bucky could back down from the challenge, not when Steve was betting against his battleskills. Not to mention that caving and letting Steve win was about the last thing he wanted to do right now.

Then the tip of Steve's finger was pushing inside him and Bucky had to clamp his thighs around Steve's knee to keep from jerking at the penetration.

It burned, but the water made the intrusion easier than he imagined. Then Steve's finger slid in to the knuckle, curving upwards with the angle and Bucky's mouth popped open of its own accord.

"Were you gonna say something, Sarge?" Sam asked from across the hottub and Bucky blinked, snapping his mouth back shut.

"Lost it on the tip'a your tongue?" Steve offered sympathetically and Bucky would turn around to glare at him if it weren't for the finger in his ass.

Instead he was stuck picturing all the things he was gonna do with said tongue to get back at Steve for this, only maybe not the best time to be picturing bedroom scenes, considering.

A second finger pressed against him and Bucky sucked in a breath. If Steve was gonna finger him right here - first of all, holy fucking shit - and secondly, he really did have to keep this under wraps.
Decades of torture training and control had to be used for something eventually, right?

His whole body was being stretched, remolded, as two callused fingers pushed inside him, just the tips; if they were alone he'd be gasping, crying out. Instead he grit his teeth, cocked his head under the guise of listening to whatever Bruce was ranting about.

Steve carefully eased his fingers deeper, placing a chaste kiss under Bucky's ear where he'd pushed damp strands aside. Concentration and control, he had to slip the fuck outta his head before he whimpered or moaned or something equally incriminating. Thankfully the angle wouldn't let Steve get very deep--

The fingers in his ass lifted to the side, tugging Bucky diagonal across Steve's lap like a puppet moved by the hand inside and fuck, Bucky's vision whited out for a second at that thought, Steve moving him anyway he wanted by the fingers dragging against walls of muscle. And this way, his ass hung off Steve's thighs enough to shift his wrist into a better angle and Bucky's muscles all clenched at once, biting down on his tongue hard enough to swirl copper in his mouth as Steve's fingers sunk all the way in.

It wasn't just deep, it was consuming and the burn was light enough to be a sweet bite of pain and Bucky registered mist smoking off the heated water into cool air before he slipped under entirely.

Silhouetted shapes, safely tucked into his own mind where nothing mattered but the drag of Steve's cautiously scissoring fingers inside him. Two minutes and thirty-seven seconds, then Steve was leaning forward to study Bucky's face; glassy eyes, but bright, like a lightbulb behind a mottled window.

"You okay? Still with me?" Steve murmured against his ear, fingers twisting and drizzling sparks to Bucky's toes. Bucky leaned back slowly, the changing angle making lips part in blissed silence, pausing his mouth beside Steve's ear and taking a moment to gather himself enough to whisper without breaking in half.

"...I'm gonna murder you in your sleep," he exhaled and a little laugh bubbled affectionately in Steve's chest, too quiet to hear but enough to feel.

"Well I'm glad you're okay," Steve informed him, all serious and cute, dipping his head to kiss Bucky's neck.

Bucky's eyes slipped closed in ecstasy, tipping his head and risking the slightest roll of his hips down on Steve's hand. Both fingers slipped out instantly, abandoning him gaping wetly in the current of the hottub and fuck fuck, the jets were close enough he could feel their ripple against the space Steve'd left and nonzero, he needed Steve back inside him right the fuck now.

Just as he was about to spin around and demand Steve stop tormenting him, there were suddenly three fingers shoving inside his ass and Bucky choked like they'd shoved down his throat instead, the sound making a few people glance at him in concern, so he covered his mouth with a hand and feigned coughing, which made his muscles tighten around Steve's hand and then Steve was groaning quietly, pressing his mouth into Bucky's shoulder to shut himself up.

"Fu-uck," he managed under his breath, squeezing Steve's thigh in his left hand as some sort'a anchor. God, Bucky was gonna die, squirming on Steve's fingers and wishing it was his cock, filling Bucky up and stuffing him full, making his head spin, drop to his chest--

Steve crooked his fingers, dragging out and brushing...Bucky's mind went with his body this time, sparking up to a high, floating plateau that felt like being dragged through the stars. Everything shot away, sounds going distant and faces and sky and pine trees blurring, Steve's fingers pressed against his prostate and entirely owning Bucky's body, dangling him over a kindling fire.

The last rational thought to cross his mind was that his face was probably fucked to hell. He turned away on the guise of whispering something in Steve's ear, leaning back against him and shuddering a ripple up his spine, down his left arm, plates on his fingers whirring. He couldn't actually whisper, he'd choke again, or cry, or scream, so instead he squeezed his eyes shut, mouthed and tugged desperately at Steve's earlobe to keep himself silent.

He shouldn't be surprised Steve Rogers had the audacity to prop Bucky in his lap and put three fingers inside him while the rest of the Avengers were there - but taking it this far?

Calluses fingerpads rubbed against sparking nerve-endings and Bucky broke off, words tumbling outta his mouth through the detached training-headspace.

"Fuck, fuck, Steve," he moaned brokenly in warning, voice low and metal bruising fingerprints into Steve's thigh, "You gotta stop, I'm gonna come."

"Don't," Steve ordered instantly, low and commanding and Jesus fuck, that wasn't helping. "Don't, Bucky, our friends are here. Stark and Nat would kill us for real. C'mon, sugar, you can do it."

"N-no, no, Steve, I can't, baby please," Bucky begged, rocking his hips shallowly back on Steve's hand, mouth tipped up and breathing shattered over damp skin.

"The hell are you two gossiping about?" A loud voice - Clint's - interrupted and Bucky could cry, he could cry with how much he needed Steve right now.

Big blue eyes looked up over Bucky's shoulders, wide and innocent as he draped his free arm higher over Bucky's chest.

"Nothing," Steve insisted like a goody-twos school-boy, shoving three fingers to the hilt, and Bucky growled into his neck.

"It's strange, Rogers being with someone," Tony uttered under his breath, too quiet for the whispering supersoldiers to hear. "He's always been so...isolated. Solo. I never pictured him, you know, dating."

"It's strange to see him smiling so much, man." Sam glanced over at Steve's closed eyes, lips curled as he pressed his nose to Bucky's temple and whispered something low. "Like a different smile, y'know? Kinda makes the other one look fake."

"Maybe it is," Natasha offered, flicking her toes out of the water and tilting her head at the two across the hottub.

"Maybe."

It was through some grace of god that Steve only got in four more stomach-jerking pumps, crooked fingers making Bucky see stars, before Sam finally stood up, waves rocking the waterlevel.

"I'm wrinkling, we're getting out," he announced and somebody commented on girly sensibilities, a splash in retaliation then water was flying everywhere and Bucky lifted his head drunkenly, dazed like he'd been yanked outta REM.

The others leapt to dry-land in the ruckus and Steve's fingers eased out with a throaty desperate moan, eyes slipped shut as he fluttered empty. Steve kissed his forehead and set him down on the rockseat to go get towels. The hot tub was still warm and Bucky was so hard his vision was swimming, then Steve was pulling him outta the water, wrapping him up in a towel and Bucky could kill him, he really could.

Natasha was saying something and Steve was answering but Bucky's ass was throbbing and he really didn't care until Steve grabbed his hand and started for the cabin.

Bucky cursed Steve all the way there, but they were both running and he was outta breath already, so he was pretty sure only half the I fucking hate you so fucking much's were audible at all.

"We'll be right back," Nat mocked Steve's sincere tone and Tony snorted, everyone watching the cabin door slam behind the two hurried boys.

"You think they're..." Thor waved his hand in a rolling motion that everyone definitely caught the gist of.

"I doubt it," Clint scoffed, grabbing a pack of matches from Nat's mystery bag. "I don't think they'd have sex with us all so close. They're probably giving each other back massages, maybe having some serious, deep, poetic talk or something."

"Fuck, fuck, baby fuckme--" Bucky's desperate plea cut off as Steve's tongue slid into his mouth, the same time Bucky's back slammed into the wooden door, gripping handfuls of ass as long legs wrapped around Steve's waist.

They'd barely made it to the bedroom, Steve'd already untied Bucky's swimshorts on the way and now it was a simple tug to get them off, setting Bucky on wobbly feet for just as long as it took to strip and slick himself up with pocket-lube then Steve scooped him back up against the door again, everything smelling like rich cedar and warm water as he traced strong hands down Bucky's sides, uninterrupted bare skin under his palms now.

"Steve Steve," Bucky whimpered, throwing his damp head against the door, cacophony of despairing, needy sounds tumbling from gasping lips. He crowded their bodies closer, ankles hooked and heels digging into the top of his ass, nothing but smooth wood and Bucky as he pressed his mouth to Buck's collarbone.

"You were so good for me," Steve murmured into his skin and Bucky honest-to-god whined, tipping his hips forward to grind against Steve's abs. He was hard and leaking on both their stomachs and fuck, Bucky wanted this so bad, didn't he?

"Fuck me, Stevie please, n-need you inside me." That pretty head tossed, trembling already, lit up sensitive and feeling everything so intensely, outta his damn mind like he'd die without it and Steve'd teased him plenty, Bucky deserved anything he wanted--

Steve straightened up and took ahold of Bucky's hips hard, shocking more pitiful noises from him as he lined up, the fooling around in the hot tub'd opened Bucky up quite nicely and the moment the head of his cock breached muscle he slid in easy and slick, hips stuttering as he sucked oxygen into his lungs.

It was still tight and hot as hell, enough he should probably be careful, but the choked sound and the look on Bucky's face as crystal eyes rolled back in his head - Steve gave them about three seconds before he was pounding Bucky's ass against the door.

"Ah ah ah St-Steve, Stevie, fuck," Bucky shouted and Steve held on tighter, nerve endings on fire as he rocked in and out of Bucky's body fast enough to make his limbs tremble, wood behind Bucky's back smacking repetitively as Bucky staccato-breathed, fingers biting, digging sharp into Steve's skin.

"Babybabybaby," Buck murmured nonsensically, scrambling his heels tighter against Steve's ass like he could pull him closer that way. Steve was just trying to breathe and stay upright, holding Bucky up with one hand and the slam of his hips while the other braced on the cedar door, trying to find some purchase and stability when his body was ripping apart at the seams. Bucky was moaning so desperately and pretty, begging Steve for more between rough breaths and yanked screams and he was so goddamn hot and tight inside, surrounded on all sides by slick muscle until it felt like the very air he breathed belonged to Bucky, everything did.

The door creaked and Steve dropped his forehead to Bucky's shoulder, panting as he kept thrusting hard and fast enough to pull another groan from the wood behind them. He really didn't want to explain to the rest of the Avengers how he broke the door, so through some act of god he managed to gather enough strength to haul Bucky into his arms properly, pulling him down snug on his cock and swinging them around to the closest available surface, then he was fucking Bucky against the perpendicular wall and the litany of moans were only louder this time ah-ah-ahh as he pumped in again and again.

"Fu-fucking hell, Steve," Bucky keened shakily, right hand gripping hard enough in Steve's short hair to hurt, the thighs caging his sides tightening as he found his grip again. If he tilted his chin up and pressed close enough, he could rock in and out of Bucky's body and still press their lips together. It was a tight, closed mouth kiss at first and Bucky held his head close enough to keep it that way until they both gasped for air, right into each other's mouths and he felt the shiver that sent down Bucky's spine, all the way down to vibrate his tailbone and Steve groaned, fucking up into him harder.

At some point there were a few soft thuds to the right, then a crash as a painting fell off the wall but whatthefuckever, Bucky was marking up his jaw and there wasn't much to focus on but Bucky's velvet insides and the sting of his teeth along Steve's skin. It was unreal that Bucky let Steve have him like this, let alone broke off to whimper brokenly for it.

"So sweet for me," Steve murmured against his ear and Bucky's hand slid between them, a rivened cry falling from his lips as the pretty hair tipped back against the wooden wall and the metal hand starting jacking in time with Steve's hips, cold plates grating along Steve's stomach from how close they were pressed.

The air'd shifted to something frantic, heat building and coiling as more filthy sounds spilled from Bucky's mouth with each punched breath and shove deeper. Bucky'd already been close in the pool, right on that edge, so it was harder, brighter, faster when he stiffened up, tightening around Steve and gasping shakily, crumbling and crushed, free hand scrambling over the back of Steve's neck in warning. He just pressed closer, drilled his hips harder, faster, dirtier as he pinned Bucky to the wall with his chest and sunk his teeth into the junction between Bucky's neck and shoulder.

The resounding scream was breathtaking, then Bucky was coming all over Steve's chest and the shiver down his spine clenched every muscle so tightly he could barely move, the prettiest little whimpering cries layering over the pounding in his ears and he was spilling into Bucky's body, clinging tight as they rocked together through the addictive waves.
The world spun electric and they were both squeezing tight enough for bruises that might stick, and if this was the kind of drowning he got to do now, Steve'd jump in headfirst every day for the rest of his existence, hold the shaking body to his and trip over the ledge with him the way he'd dragged Bucky everywhere else in their long lives.

Bucky melted like butter in his arms and Steve was pretty sure the serum was the only thing that enabled him stumbling backwards, holding Bucky's weight to his chest until his legs hit the bed and collapsed backwards, tumbling them both onto the mattress. He slipped out of Bucky with a wet sound and a groan, then a metal hand was dragging him higher on the sheets and Steve stared up at the ceiling, heaving breaths making his chest rise and fall like he'd fought a dozen rounds.

Well, something like that.

"Fuck," Bucky cursed beside him and Steve drew in another breath, glancing over from his side of the blanket.

"You alright?"

"You gonna ask me that after every time we have sex?" Bucky groaned, digging the heels of his palms into his eyes and Steve sighed, running a hand through wrecked blonde hair. At least Bucky was alright enough for sarcasm. In Steve's defense, Bucky'd broken down bawling the first time and he had a right to be concerned.

They'd never talked about that, but Steve knew Buck well enough to know the whole thing'd been overwhelming, something he'd never felt before and the connection, the gravity of that--

He understood why Bucky'd cried. Didn't make it any easier, but at least he knew what was going on in that mind for once.

A metal finger prodded his ribs and Steve rolled his head, blue eyes searching Bucky's face. But there was only a hint of exhaustion underneath the amusement, and even that was fading. The benefits of the serum apparently went further than Steve'd thought.

"I think we broke things." Bucky gestured at the wall and Steve lifted his head, taking in the two paintings on the ground - two? - and knocked over demi-moon table. He hadn't even seen that.

"Hmm. We've had worse damage for less noble causes," he pointed out and Bucky giggled, turning his nose into Steve's shoulder and hiding his face against bare skin.

"Having sex isn't noble you asshat."

"But the room's not even that broken!"

"I am," Bucky groaned, nuzzling against the bruises on Steve's arm and reaching to curl a hand around the side of his ribs. "Feels like you split me right in half."

"At least we don't hafta explain breakin' a door," Steve offered, eliciting a snicker that felt really funny with Bucky's lips against his bare skin and Steve couldn't help the huffed response, then they were both giggling, floating with post-orgasmic haze as the giggling bubbled into full-on laughter and Bucky was dragging him sideways to smooch their mouths together and it was the most fantastic taste in the world, laughter on Bucky's lips.

They probably would've kissed back into another round if a sudden rapping on the door didn't break them apart in surprise.
"We're doing s'mores in five, get your clothes on!" Clint shouted from the hallway and they both turned to each other, breaking into another fit of laughter because apparently they wouldn't have to explain anything if the Avengers knew what they were up to without the broken door to show for it.

"While you two were busy," Natasha started with a knowing twitch of her eyebrow, waving them over to the rock pit. "-we started a fire to warm up."

"Are there marshmallows?" Clint asked, to which Thor chucked a bag across the fire and Tony snorted, stealing Sam's camera away from him to capture the offended look on Clint's face as he caught the bag against his chest.

"Stark, you bring fancy mechanical roasting forks?"

"Hell no." Tony reached behind him for a pile of whittled sticks, balancing the camera in one hand as he tossed them around the fire, short pieces of sharpened pine. "We're goin' old school."

"Does that mean scary ghost stories too?" Natasha asked, plucking the uncooked marshmallow off the end of Sam's stick and popping it decisively in her mouth.

"I've got ghost stories," Bucky offered, lifting the metal hand to catch the stick Stark tossed his direction.

"Not-real ghost stories, preferably," Bruce corrected, holding out his stick for Clint to put a marshmallow on the end.

"Now where's the fun in that?" Steve plopped down on the log beside Thor, making a grabby-hand motion at Tony for a roasting stick of his own. Bucky gingerly, slowly sat down in the space between Tony and Steve, passed the stick along before holding his out for a marshmallow from Clint too. "I've got plenty of good horror stories from Brooklyn, too."

"I'm sure they all end with me pulling you outta some alley and holding my sleeve to your bloody nose," Bucky sighed, lifting his stick over the flames and maybe-on-purpose knocking Tony's marshmallow off into the fire. He got an elbow to the ribs and Bucky shot a glare, which Tony returned just as easily, then Nat was coughing some comment about testosterone and Thor laughed, echoing over the crackle of the fire.

"Was Cap really that bad?" Bruce asked, carefully keeping his roasting marshmallow out of swordfight's reach.

"I was always holdin' him back from some fight. Only time he settled down was when he had a sketchpad in his hands."

"You're an artist?" Thor adjured curiously and Bucky's eyebrows shot up, jaw dropping. Steve shifted and looked down at his hands, pretending to busy himself with breaking bark off the handle of his stick.

"He sketches," Nat shrugged and Bucky swiveled to her, same incredulous look on his face.

"Steve," Bucky said slowly, reaching out to tap his thigh that was still mottled purple from Bucky's death grip in the hottub. "Why do these fine people not have your paintings coloring their walls?"

"Cap's that good?" Clint objected incredulously, tossing the bag of marshmallows at Tony.
"That good? Christ, he could be a professional. Probably wouldda been if the army hadn't scooped him up."

"I dunno, Buck," Steve mumbled shyly and Bruce leaned over Sam to whisper to Natasha, "Is Cap actually blushing about something?"

Bucky stuck his tongue in his cheek, debating reactions before rotating his stick, casually offering over the fire,

"You guys know he can speak Irish?"

"Really?" Thor raised an eyebrow, leaning over. "Rud eile atá agaínn i bpáirt, mo chara."

Steve's mouth twitched up at the corner, eyes cast down. "Táimid a lán I gcoitianta, nach bhfuilimid?"

Bucky studied them both while everyone else just gaped.

"...why would Captain America speak Irish?"

"Because that's his heritage?" Bucky furrowed his eyebrows up in the center, axiomatic calling crazy. "Stevie was always about freedom and righteousness, but the 'redwhite'n'blue' thing came way later. What's that quote you told me, Steve, when Erskine asked if you wanted to kill Nazis?"

Steve sighed, wiggling a marshmallow onto the end of his stick and still not looking at anyone. "That I don't wanna kill anyone. I don't like bullies, no matter where they're from."

A few beats of silence filled with crackling fire and the crinkle of the marshmallow bag as Tony popped another in his mouth, chewing thoughtfully as everyone looked at Steve.

"The Smithsonian doesn't have that part," Stark finally said and Bucky's mouth skewed, pulling his golden-brown marshmallow out of the fire and waving it under Steve's nose.

" Doesn't have a lotta things." Bucky waved it again and Steve finally lifted his head enough to glare, sliding the marshmallow off the end and popping it in his mouth. Bucky made a pleased sound and gestured for another from Stark. "Like how Stevie went against orders for that first mission."

"The greatest soldier of our time broke orders," Sam deadpanned, half-disbelieving. "The hell for?"

"Buck," Steve finally inputted, around a mouthful of marshmallow. "He was in trouble."

Sam and Natasha exchanged a glance and Thor mouthing something at Tony nobody caught, then Bruce finally leaned over to see Steve around the flames, more trepidation than confusion in his voice.

"So you're normally considerate and in-line, but when it comes to Sergeant Barnes, you just..."

"Fuck shit up?" Clint finished for him and Bruce shrugged a shoulder with a waving hand of agreement. Bucky pursed his lips and studied the flames because that's not where he was going with that.

"When you put it that way, it's almost romantic," Natasha teased, and Steve flicked the wrist holding his roasting stick, flinging a marshmallow in her direction. She dodged easily, giving him a you-can-do-better-than-that look and that's how the great marshmallow war of '15 began.

Thankfully it also ended quickly, after Clint flung a flaming one and nearly caught Thor's hair on fire, although there were already pelted white lumps covering the ground by that point.

Steve was laughing though, after Tony’d smashed one uselessly on his head (it popped right back up), and the odd tension dissipated entirely, teammates falling back into patterns of banter and smiles the trip’d galvanized so far.

Thor went for a broom and Sam and Bucky went for drinks from the van, dark sky lighting the way with the sliver of moon and stars sprinkled overhead.

Bucky lifted the cooler outta the back, scooting it to the edge of the van so he could dive metal into ice and hand Sam individual drinks. He’d barely pulled out three before there was a dark hand on his shoulder, making him pause and straighten, meeting the serious brown eyes with a questioning gaze.

"Why are you doing all this?" Sam asked gently, gesturing to the van and sweeping his arm around to the fire, where the Avengers were laughing at Steve animatedly describing the Howling Commando version of s'mores, waving arm motions and all. Bucky watched for a moment, firelight flickering over Steve's stunning jawline, the shape of his shoulders and chest that housed the most beautiful, bright heart Bucky'd ever known.

"I’m introducing you all to my best friend."

He could feel Sam's eyes studying his profile, the slight hesitance before the next careful remark. "We may not know the details, but I think we all know Steve."

Bucky turned his head, meeting dark eyes and pausing at the genuine care in that expression. That was why Bucky'd chosen to do this, because he and Steve were diving into this all the way and hell if Bucky wasn't dragging their family through the light too. Especially one that wanted to be there, to understand for real.

"No. You don’t. You know Captain America. But not a single one of you know who he is when he’s not being a soldier." Bucky looked back out at Steve, smiling at Natasha as he gestured for a chocolate bar. How many nights in Europe, firelight under the sky, soldiers around a fire? Nights before that, Central-Park stars? How long ago, how much hadn't changed? Bucky let out a breath, handing Sam another drink without tearing his eyes away from the sweet boy in the firelight. "I’m showing you all."

A slow nod, curious flickering eyes, but Sam gathered the drinks into his chest and started to the fire anyways, calling over his shoulder for Bucky to carry the last few. And Bucky watched the scene for another moment, the grateful smiles and teasing jabs as Sam passed out drinks, alone, quiet as he studied Steve with his friends.

It was time, now, do to this. Because for the first time since getting his memories back, he was 100% sure Steve was still in there somewhere, the same beautiful golden sunshine kid he'd always known.

There was no Captain America in the way Steve laid him down. No Captain America holding him in bed, screwing him into walls. They crossed the final threshold and it'd done nothing but open more doors, let him see how much of his best friend was dying to peel off the suit.

Steven Grant Rogers, back from the dead.

Just the stars as witness, Bucky sucked in a breath, whispered tenderly to the stars for no one else to hear but one day, for everyone to see.

"I’m showing him too.”
"Truth or Dare? You mean 'who do you like' or 'sexual act of choice'?

"Whatever, we're playing, get over it."

"Okay, Natasha switches bathing suits with Thor." Nat took in Thor's baggy tshirt and bright red swimtrunks before looking down at her own.

"Yeah, no way he's fitting into these bottoms."

"Rogers, then," Clint suggested.

"I can confirm Steve won't fit in those," Bucky pointed a reflective finger and Steve smacked him on the arm, shaking out his hand with an ow while Tony doubled over in laughter.

Thor ended up switching tops with Natasha, who looked like she was wearing a dress in his swimshirt while everyone else got blackmail photos of Thor in a bikini top.

Clint had to jump off the roof, Bucky held his hand in icewater and Tony got dared to lick it, which did make his tongue stick and Sam tear up from laughing so hard, but the thaw was disappointingly quick then Steve had to go streaking (after choosing Truth and refusing to answer what he'd been whispering to Bucky in the hottub) and Bruce had to drink Asgardian liquor and Natasha had to jump over the fire without using her feet and there was dog-barking and whipped cream at some point and by the time the fire'd kindled down to ashes everyone was exhausted from laughter with resting smiles on their faces and murmured goodnights as they each leant on somebody on the way back up to the house, collapsing on couches and beds with groans like they'd spend the day taking down an alien army instead of marshmallows and sleepover games.

~~~

It was somewhere around 3am, moonlight cutting through glass to figures on couches and beds, casting long dark shadows, the silent stillness of sleeping soldiers and scientists. Somewhere around 3am when that glass shattered, snoring exhaustion splitting in the half-second it took for the first blood-curdling scream.

The scientists shot awake and stumbled to their feet, the soldiers shot to their feet and stumbled awake, battle glances exchanged as they all started for the stairs in rushing worry, weapons drawn.
Thor shot up the stairs first, two at a time and silent as the widow behind him. Tony kept pace in between them, curiosity overruling the battle sense for weapons, but when you were peering out behind the shoulder of a god, you have room to be weaponless.

Sam started at the back of the line with his couch the furthest, but he carefully shouldered past Bruce,
Clint, Nat, Tony - he'd never heard that kind of scream before, but soldiers of that caliber had to be in serious pain or danger to make a shrill, terrifying sound like that.

Weapons drawn and wary feet - the nature of the danger could be anything from a spider to Bucky trying to kill Steve to a Hydra unit attacking the loft bedroom - Thor reached the door, eased open the heavy wood, and flattened to the side so all the Avengers could peer around him into the room.

The curtains were drawn, night sky bright enough to light the scene, but the unobstructed sounds revealed it all anyways.

Soft, broken crying, gasping breaths and shaky whimpers, a metal hand cupping a blonde head silver-white in the moonlight and tucked against a bare chest, broad shoulders wracking with tears, heavy artist hands gripping Bucky's ribs tight, bones mottled purple. Steve was curled up tiny enough on Bucky to look like the version from museums, slight and helpless and broken and nothing like the impenetrable Cap they all knew.

And the Winter Soldier didn't look anything like himself either, propped on pillows to wrap an arm all the way 'round Steve's back, expression gentle and sweet and caring as the normally-snarky mouth comforted promises of safety and protection.

Bucky's gaze shot up the moment the door opened, pulling Steve tighter to his chest – and relaxing the moment he realized who was standing in the doorway. The metal hand glinted as it slid down Steve's head and rubbed methodically into the back of his neck, small sad smile on Bucky's face as he scanned over their visitors and glanced at the still-distraught soldier in his lap.

Another terrible, broken sobbing sound and Bucky's face just melted, all concern and fierce love in his eyes as he leant to press a kiss to Steve's crown, pulling him up higher and wrapping his arms tighter to start rocking them, Steve's head still tucked against his chest.

"Nightmare," Bucky mouthed in explanation over the top of Steve's head, cradling him solidly as they rocked, back and forth, heart-wrenching sounds starting fade.

The Avengers all stared, solemnly frozen in their hallway lineup, various stages of disbelief and awe as the unshakable Captain America let himself get rocked back to sleep a crying, crumbling mess.

It wasn't a side of Steve Rogers any of them had seen before. Sam knew Steve had trouble sleeping sometimes, but he'd imagined restless pacing and staring moodily at the ceiling, not waking up with terrified screams and clinging to Bucky Barnes like both their lives depended on it.

Early on, Jarvis reported to Tony that there were occasional shouts at night, but he'd figured that was all Barnes and long-since passed.

None of them knew what quite to do with the knowledge that Steve Rogers cried, let alone sobbed and clung and shook, had nightmares that worried Barnes - but from the look on his face - didn't exactly surprise him either.

Thor'd been fully prepared to interfere and help, but from the quiet snuffling and tiny, increasingly rare whimpers, Rogers was mostly calmed, shaking turning to trembling and finally just collapsing in exhaustion over Barnes. Clearly their assistance wasn't needed - which, for once, was a comfort. Disconcerting to see how hurt a teammate was, but relieved there was someone in a position who already knew how to help.

Nat mostly just stared silently.

Eventually Bruce started waving the Avengers away from the door, mouthing things about privacy and Cap's fine now. Everyone blinked owlishly, moving like molasses as they snapped outta their consecutive trances, bustling around each other to glance in the room one more time before starting back down the stairs. Clint caught Natasha's eye and signed "did not see that coming", which she could only nod at, the last to linger in the hallway, reaching to close their door with a final scan over the scene.

Rogers was weightless and pliant, reduced to the occasional sniff, ugly finger-shaped bruises arching
Barnes's ribs he didn't seem to give a damn about. That uncharacteristically caring expression was looking at Steve like he was the most precious angel in the world and she had to close the door at that, leave that private thing between them while she stood in the hallway and wondered when life was going to stop throwing her curveballs.

The morning broke easy and misty over the wooden porch, where Sam and Thor were sitting on the cushioned swing, sipping coffee and silently watching the sunrise on the horizon over the view of glittering water and swaying conifers. Stark came out with his mug half an hour later, then Bucky slid open the screendoor and stepped barefoot onto the cedar porch too.

The log cabin was built into the side of a mountain, the stilted porch overlooking the lake, wind blowing the fallen pieces from Bucky's bun as he propped nimbly on the wooden railing, both hands curled around hot chocolate instead of coffee.

A wind chime in the corner of the porch jangled distantly and Tony sat his mug down on the ledge, bracing both hands on the rail as he looked out over the silent stillness of the dewy morning.

"Rogers have nightmares often?" Stark eventually asked, quiet enough to slip through the wind and be ignored if Bucky hadn't been listening for it. He stirred his pinky in the swirling hot chocolate, taking a moment's pause as he squinted over the peaceful view and considered the hidden concern in Tony's voice.

"Yeah," Bucky finally answered, looking down and tucking a piece of hair behind his ear. "Bout as much as I do."

Tony nodded, still looking out over morning mist, soft creak of the swing behind him as Thor pushed his bare toes against the wooden slats to rock the cushion gently.

The silence settled in again, everyone lost in their own worlds until heads all turned at the slide of the door again and Steve and Natasha stepped onto the porch, soft smiles for everyone and mugs in both their hands too. Banner came out yawning, then Clint followed with macaroons he passed out graciously, spun sugar dipped in chocolate until the morning faded from peacefulness to easy chatter and plans for the rest of the day were made.

The first stipulation of which was that Steve and Bucky weren't allowed to drive again. So they called the bench against the back doors, insisting it was the only space for two sets of wide shoulders.

Which turned quite quickly into more than just sitting.

Bucky'd been explaining enthusiastically to Thor, something or another about science fiction novels and alien hovercraft, when Steve suddenly leaned over and kissed him right on the mouth.

It was mid-word, so his lips were parted, confusion furrowing his eyebrows and eyes still wide open as Steve pulled back and turned to Natasha like nothing'd happened.

Bucky took a few seconds to recalibrate, fingers briefly touching his mouth in questioning wonder, then he shook his head and started in on the conversation again, talking with his hands and eyes lighting back up with excitement.

And less than a minute later Steve was leaning over again, hand cupping Bucky's jaw this time as he pressed their lips together briefly and pulled away, searching Bucky's face for a second with a little smile before releasing him and turning to Sam this time.

Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, looking confusedly at Steve. Steve paid him no mind and kept right on talking to Sam.

Eventually he sighed, turning back to Thor and lifting his hand, but before he could get a word out this time Steve turned around and kissed him again.

This time Bucky made a noise of frustration when Steve pulled away, turning yet again like it'd been nothing. Sam heard him apologize briefly to Thor with an if you'll excuse me, then he was turning sideways in his seat and whipping Steve's shoulder around, taking his face in both hands and kissing him hard.

Steve's eyes opened wide like he hadn't expected that in the least, then he was melting into Bucky's touch, slipping his arms around Bucky's shoulders and pulling him close, eyes shut blissfully now as they kissed and jesus, there were other people in this car, like two feet away, and Tony was trying to drive.

He glared in the rearview for a moment, but Barnes&Rogers were still kissing and didn't look to be stopping anytime soon, so he cleared his throat loudly and jerked the car wheel to get their attention.

"Please don't act out Partition when we don't have one I can roll up." Tony gave them a pointed look over his shoulder before turning to the road with an aggrieved sigh because seriously, these lovesick kids.

At least the rearview was angled perfectly to see the confused looks they gave each other at the reference, mouths separated now as hands fell to knees instead of shoulders.

"You guys know the song, right?" Clint held up his phone, shaking it in example and they both shrugged. Thor leaned over to ask Bruce what the song was and Bruce simply replied "something no one's surprised Clint has on his phone," as though that explained everything.

Barton'd called shotgun, so that left him access to the aux chord, which was his excuse for educating the lovebirds on Beyoncé.

The moment the bassline started Barnes was giving Rogers the side-eye and Tony was already second-guessing his life choices by the time the lyrics hit because the sexual tension was palpable from all the way up here. He was just about to reach over and turn it off when that tension finally snapped, metal hand darting out to grab something silver around Rogers' neck and haul him in for a filthy kiss even Natasha made a sound at.

Bruce covered his eyes and Thor looked amusedly at Nat, who was signing rude expletives at Clint while Sam turned his head away and threatened under his breath that he was learning sign-language one of these days.

"I didn't know Steve had dogtags," Clint leaned over the back of his seat to nudge Sam, who furrowed his eyebrows, glancing back at Steve and Bucky once before shrugging and turning back to Clint.

"I don't think he does. I gave Bucky a pair?"

"...that's kinda annoyingly romantic."

"They're disastrously cute," Natasha agreed, signing I'm just glad he's happy to Clint, softened smiles on both their faces, juxtaposed oddly to the heavily suggestive song in the background.

Which apparently was getting a little too suggestive, because as soon as the words handprints and good grips all on my ass hit Bucky suddenly broke off with a gasp, shoving Steve off and shouting at the front without taking his eyes off blue ones,

"Turn it off, turn it off, unless everybody wants to see me ride my boyfriend in the back of this van."

Clint shut the song off fast enough to cut mid-word, stagnant silence filled with the sound of Steve breathing too heavy, staring at Bucky with wide eyes and a pounding heart that Bucky was pretty sure everyone could hear.

He curled his metal hand in the front of Steve's shirt, eyes still locked on each other, mostly to not see the looks on the rest of the Avengers' faces, which were pretty damn likely a shit-ton of teasing. The silence stretched forever until somebody finally broke it with a curious,

"Boyfriend? That's new."

"Yeah..." Steve trailed, a handle on his pulse now and curiosity in his eyes because technically, Bucky'd never exactly answered that question.

Bucky shrugged and leaned forward to press a much softer kiss to Steve's parted lips. At least the Avengers all had a fantastic sense of humor.

What would the Commandos have said, if it'd been like this back then? If the homophobia thing hadn't been a problem, they probably would've just had alotta canteens thrown at them. There'd be bets placed. Jargon and code and acronyms about their relationship, pranks and nicknames too.

At least the Avengers weren't immature enough to throw things--

Thor's flipflop bounced off the red star on his bicep and smacked Sam right on the temple, to which Natasha suddenly broke into a flurry of apologies, then Sam was throwing Nat's flipflop and Steve and Bucky spent the next ten minutes of the trip dodging various shoes and apologizing loudly for "scarring" everyone with their "stupid cuteness," as Clint eloquently put it.

Everyone'd settled down into mild glares they didn't mean when the van finally rolled to its last stop, but after a very serious, heartfelt apology from Steve that had Bruce and Thor both tearing up, Natasha just shoved them out the back of the van and told them to makeout all they damn wanted, so long as Steve didn't make anybody cry with his righteousness speeches about how happy he was and how he'd never want to make anyone uncomfortable and really, nobody cared that much that you makeout with your boyfriend in the back of the van.

The line was drawn at Partition though, and Tony smacked Clint upside the head for playing the song, but then Thor was pointing out how beautiful the cloud formation was and everyone was too busy discussing the best plan hiking up the mountain to notice the look Steve threw Bucky and the kiss on his cheek he got in return.

The only plan everyone agreed on was that everyone wanted to climb the mountain a different way, so Tony finally just waved his hand and said, "Whatever, let the kids decide."

"Young and in charge," Bucky said proudly, arms around Steve from behind as he lifted his chin off Steve's shoulder to peck him affectionately on the cheek.
"Alright, Buck and I'll take lead, use our stamina--"

"Really, Rogers?"

"Okay, first off, not what I meant, and secondly, just because your Captain is giving orders with a smile on his face doesn't mean he means them any less, a'ight?" Steve mock-glared at Clint and he put both hands in the air, then he turned his glare on the rest of them before starting his orders over again.

"Sarge and I'll take point, hike to the top, Thor will take rear to protect everyone from potential bears. Romanoff and Wilson mentally track the route so we can get back down easy, Stark's in charge of scenery photos, Barton's in charge of granola bars, and Banner - just don't scare at a rabbit and Hulk out on the mountain, okay? Great."

Natasha pointed through the treeline at the hawk flying overhead, nudging Clint with a sharp elbow and shooting him a smile.

Clint opened his mouth for whatever sassy reply he had planned when he was suddenly interrupted by a declarative yell up ahead.

"I LOVE BUCKY BARNES!!"

The shout echoed and bounced off the canyon below them and Tony snickered, canting his head towards the path broken through the trees and raising an amused eyebrow.

"Sounds like they found the top of the mountain." He kicked aside a pinecone, lips pursed as he gathered his debate, suddenly turning to Clint with a pondering, "If Barnes said he'd ride Steve in the van earlier, does that mean cowgirl or as in ride his ass, because really it still doesn't prove either way--"

"Give it up, mate," Thor clapped a hand on Tony's shoulder, passing him on the trail while Tony adjusted his backpack and made a face.

"You...give it up."

"It's beautiful, isn't it? Shouldda brought a sketchpad." Steve gave Bucky a little smile and he ducked his head, tucking a fallen piece of hair behind his ear.

"You should start drawing again. For real. There's no reason not to." Crystal eyes pinned him with a gaze and Steve scanned back over the view, taking in mountains and valleys and dotted lines of billowing trees. Bucky's fingertips brushed the back of his hand, voice quiet and almost unsure as he dropped the question between their feet. "Don't you wanna get better too?"

The wind whistled past and Steve shoved his hands in his pockets, kicking the dirt. In order to get better, he had to admit he wasn't okay.

"Is there..." How a life can move from the darkness, she said to get better. But there wasn't...he didn't have anything wrong with him. So he couldn't do planes or water, so his friends didn't see him. But Bucky was looking at him so hopefully, like this was something Bucky really wanted, like being brushed off about this would break his heart this time. Steve's voice dropped, barely mumbling, but he got the words out. "...whaddu you mean by better?"
"You, Steve. Stepping out of Captain America. Easing back into Captain Rogers. Steve Rogers. Anybody that isn't this redwhite'n'blue patriot that doesn't have a home."

"Home?" Steve squinted over the edge of the cliff, tipping a rock off to tumble below. "Buck, our home was 70 years ago."

"You wanna find a place in Brooklyn?" A thin smile, eyes averted from the searching crystal gaze.

"Leave the comforts of the tower?" Steve chided and Bucky didn't even allow him that, brushing the comment aside and to tug Steve's hand outta his pocket and squeeze.

"I'll move out with you. If you want." A few mornings ago Bucky'd scoffed at sleeping in the same bed but now he was holding Steve's hand and offering to move into a place of their own. The tops of mountains tended to put things in perspective. Monumental, but Steve still couldn't look him in the eye. Warm fingers rubbed over his skin. "Let Steve Rogers come back to the living."

He fell silent. Bucky didn't need to put it like that.

Better. What was there to get better?

Was there anything left to get better?

Footsteps were on the path, almost at the top, must've heard the I love you echo Steve threw down the canyon.

"I'll think about it," he inhaled and Bucky's fingers clamped over his wrist, forming a circle he traced, closing with a dash at the top.

Steve eyed him in his peripherals and couldn't help but smile.

"Sergeant," Thor greeted, boots tramping soft ground as he reached the peak, hand extended towards Bucky. "For you."

Bucky's nose twisted, confusion and admonishment, delicate fingertips closing around the stiff stem as he took the flower from Thor's hand.

"I thought it might be nice in your hair," Thor explained and Bucky made a sound, quiet and incredulous as he handed it to Steve with a gesture to weave it in. Steve braided a piece on the side, pulling it back and pinning the flower through, bright pink against dark waves.

"Thank you." He squeezed his hands together abashedly, ripple down metal and Thor nodded sincerely. Even Tony had the guile to keep his mouth shut.

A rumble overhead was the sole warning they got before clouds blocked out the sun and sparse droplets started pattering nearby trees.

I wanna get better, his head mocked and Steve shook it aside, shoving down the urge to scream, to curl away from the thunder and from Bucky's hopeful face.

I didn't know I was broken til I wanted to change.

"The pavilion by the van," Steve shouted and everyone took off, sliding through mountain muddy paths. If Rogers kicked mud at people's shoes on the way down, he was a twenty-something kid, it was to be expected.

Change into what? Could he reach that far back?
The two troublemakers got there first, with Thor and Sam following close behind, other four bringing up the complaining rear and significantly more damp than the first quartet.

Bucky made a face at Nat and she flung her wet bandana at him, then everyone was collapsing on picnic-tables with tired legs, safe under the overhang and watching the rain patter down, plinking off the van's roof twenty feet away.

_Betterbetterbetter_

Rogers was playing with Barnes's hair, careful not to dislodge the flower as he fingerbrushed tangles and squinch-dried the damp tips. Barnes paid him no mind, leaning his metal arm on the table to say something to Sam.

Bright, easy smiles, damp hair curling over Rogers' forehead. Just kids. Both of them were younger than Natasha.

Tony couldn't remember when he'd stopped called Steve grandpa and started calling him kid. Maybe he'd listened to the lighten-up advice after all. Or maybe there really was that deeper side of Rogers that nobody born past 1920 saw.

"You know what I can't figure out?" Tony propped an elbow on his knee, foot on picnic bench, chin in hand as he studied Cap. "How did you turn from _I don't wanna kill anybody_ to the paradigm of goodness and sacrifice?"

_How a life could move from the darkness -_

Steve didn't look up from rebraiding, sighing once. "That part's Bucky's fault too."

"What? No it isn't." Barnes gave him a funny look and Steve dropped his hands, folding tiredly over the table, temple landing on crossed forearms as rainwater dripped off blonde onto wood.

_She said to get better._

"Everyone's got a catalyst, right? Stark, yours was getting kidnapped, Romanoff when Barton made the call not to shoot her, stuff like that. Mine was when Buck fell." Everyone's conversations pattered quiet and muscled shoulders shrugged. "I mean, in the beginning I didn't wanna kill anyone. I'd never been to war. I hadn't...once I became Captain Rogers, the soldier, the military officer? Things changed. I killed who I had to."

A weary smile and long fingers traced something into the wood, head propped on an elbow now. Tony watched Steve's touch and wondered why he'd never noticed how much Rogers did that. That it wasn't boredom, that he was _drawing._

"That's it?" Tony prodded and Steve's shoulders tensed, damp tshirt sticking even tighter. Bucky was silent beside him, pink flower between metal fingers as he twirled it absently and didn't look at anyone. "You just dropped the Batman-no-kill policy and started taking heads?"

"I thought that's what I was meant for." Rogers's voice dropped six levels quieter and Clint shuffled closer to lip-read. "They'd designed me -- the serum. To fight the good fight. I never thought being Captain America would take everythin--"

He stopped abruptly, sucking in a breath.

"You guys don't wanna hear this," Steve huffed dismissively, self-deprecating, and a gentle brown hand landed on his arm, made him lift to look at Sam, eyes searching and guarded, hesitant.
"Steve. We do."

How could he say out loud...he couldn't talk about himself, not like that.

...but he could talk about Bucky.

Blue eyes cast away again and Tony hopped over to sit on the bench across from Barnes, still motionless at Steve's side. It took a few moments - rain pattering overhead, debate etched into strong features - then another breath and Steve's started again, hollow.

"...when I lost Bucky, everything changed. There wasn't a "right thing" anymore, it was about good men dying on my watch." Rough hands rubbed blue eyes and Bucky finally unfroze, tipping his shoulder into Steve's.

The touch startled, instantly visibly draining comfort, widening blue eyes, and a goddamned flip switched. Cautiousness to the wind as the breeze carried distant warscreams closer--

"I was s'posed to be makin' a difference, for once, finally, an'I got...caught up. Lost th'only thing that'd stood by my side long before I had strength at'oll.'

Cap stopped, staring straight at Bucky, crystal locked on blue like he couldn't believe Barnes was real and here and--

Bucky, screaming, falling away from him. Watching as Steve fell too. Then a few nights ago, fingers entwined - it'd be an honor to burn hand in hand - and Buck had given up everything, sacrificed his body to Steve like the holy at an altar and this, Steve could give up this, burn hand in hand. Open the floodgates and

I didn't realize I was broken.

--the rest of them didn't dare breathe, not when Cap's bottom lip was trembling, hands creaking picnic-table surface. Not when it meant Steve might snap his mouth shut the way he always did. He didn't see them anyways, didn't see much of anything behind blurring eyes.

"I remember, after, s'in this bar tryin' t'get wasted, drinkin' glass after glass that did nothing, cryin' m'eyes out ev'ry ten minutes, bawlin' th'ole night through when Peggy came in...t'interfere, told me Bucky's dea-- Death wasn't m'fault. S'where the catalyst comes in I guess." A forceful half-manic laugh and Barnes cringed, Rogers' voice biting higher and higher. "Y'know what I said? Said, m'not gonna stop 'til all Hydra's killed. And so they didn't lock m'up, tacked on or captured."

A gust of wind-blown rain assaulted the side of the picnic table but the Avengers statues stayed perfectly still, couldn't spook, only movement a metal hand gently covering Steve's shaking one.

Don't you wanna get better too? PTS--PTSD, that wasn't him. Speak for yourself. But this - identity. Home. Captain fucking America--

Steve shoved Bucky off with a snap of his wrist, eyes squeezed shut and fingers gripping blonde hair tight, a sudden, shattered gasp through wet, wrecked lungs.

Tony had a brief second to wonder distantly if Steve'd told anyone about the asthma attack he had after Barnes' night terror, then the broken voice came back, riled and wound so tight with emotion it'd snap if one'a them wasn't crushing, aching, heartbreaking defeat.

"The only person who ev'r made me...c-calm was Bucky. Grew up so angry at everything and...always there to talk me down but then I lost him. I lost'im n'I didn't care 'bout justice, didn' matter anymore 'cause th'arrow...spinnin' line. In my compass was gone. Gone, I crashed the plane into the ocean an'I woke up with nothing and no one."

Bruce took off his glasses to wipe his eyes and even Tony's heart lurched - a little, maybe - as Steve buried his face in his hands. He looked so small and tired, deep breaths expanding out-of-place back muscles, then a metal hand was resting on his spine at a second attempt to soothe.

Stevie, Buck still called him Stevie, but hadn't he died in the crash? Or on the train?

Cap shrugged him off, face turned away as he peeled his hands free and rolled them in the air, voice rocking the precipice of breaking, haunted.

"They showed me pictures, and warbooks, n'files n'films n'fliers n'told me this symbol I'd....the Captain America that went on ice wasn't the one I woke up to; Became so much bigger'n me but there was nothin' I c'do, the shield was the last thread left'a what I knew." Desperate, tumbling, waterfall words, wringing hands - "So I put on their uniform an' fought. Molded into the personality, persona they'd built 'cause I had nothin' else. I have...no other purpose."

Not a perfect soldier, but a good man.

Steve shrugged despairingly, mouth twisted up and face downcast, maybe to hide tears or maybe just to hide.

"My heart didn't matter; that...fell off a train with Bucky Barnes." His voice broke over the last part and Steve bit his trembling lip, wiping haphazardly at his face before shattering an exhale and tipping his head up to stare at the sky, raw, high-pitched tears in barely-audible words, "I didn't think...I'd ever b...b-breathe again."

The edge of falling apart -

Thunder rolled in the distance, three Avengers statutes flinched.

Then Bucky was pulling Steve into his chest, hand cupping his blonde head as Steve gasped wet, blinking rapidly to halt oncoming tears, then Sam's arms were wrapping around both of them.

Barnes squeezed tighter and Thor placed huge hands on Sam and Bucky's backs, head bowed in respect -

Which Clint spoiled instantly, circling Sam and Thor in his arms and closing his eyes as he tipped his head on top of Steve's. Bruce joined carefully, added his comfort beside Thor, and Natasha looked to Tony.

He figured he'd cave first, but then she was pulling a tiny arm around Bucky and wedging the other between bodies to grip Steve's arm tight.

Tony felt like the kid hugging a tree ten times his size, no way arms could reach all the way around, and the internal monologue was running alot about hippie sappy types who shouldn't be relied on to save the world, but he tipped his head against Bruce's and hugged the goddamn pile anyways.

Cap - Steve surrounded on all sides and at least no one was crying, he could do silent reverie and console a teammate.

But here of all places, in a lone pavilion somewhere in the mountains of upstate New York, raining and otherwise unremarkable, why here that he broke?
Tony supposed it didn't matter. This was the easy part anyway. So he told a story at least Barnes probably already knew, one Steve certainly did too.

Didn't change anything.

He'd admitted present tense - I have no other purpose - and it wasn't like hugging it out on a mountainside was gonna fix that.

That was a hellolot to fix. How does one go about reclaiming yourself when you've been the living dead in an entirely different world than your own?

So Cap was lost, and they'd all finally been told, but. How exactly was he gonna get found?

Not to be the devils advocate here, but honestly? Tony wasn't sure it was possible. Wasn't sure there was though left of...whoever Cap used to be, in order to save the man he was now.

Clearly wasn't gonna say that when Rogers was on the verge of crying already, but. The skies weren't exactly shining ahead.

"God, you guys are as bad as the Commandos," Steve muffled, started squirming, made everyone drop their arms and back up a foot. Bucky let go last, placing a chaste kiss to Steve's forehead and no one but Steve heard the vehement, whispered swear, you're not alone. A broken sound and Steve wiped his face haphazardly, squeezing Bucky's shoulder hard and waving his free hand to shoo.

"Everybody in the van. We're going home."

Doors slid open and people piled inside, engine rumbling to a start and Tony looked out the window, caught a flash of crumbled, flattened pink torn on the concrete floor under the picnic table, flower fading to a speck of nothing as the van rolled away.

Steve was curled against Bucky's chest, fist tucked against his squished cheek, eyelashes draped beautifully over his cheeks as he breathed, slow, in and out. The metal arm was hooked around Steve's shoulders and Sam's head was upside-down asleep on Bucky's other bicep, curled away from them with his legs tucked against Thor's. Thor had one arm thrown out like Bucky's, and Nat's ankles were curled over it, her head resting on Clint's stomach.

Clint snored, but Tony had soft Poison drifting over the speakers as he drove, so he didn't mind. Bruce was knocked out against the shotgun window, glasses crooked and curls squished on one side of his face, mouth parted as he breathed slowly, fogging and unfogging a spot on the window.

Tony knew Bucky was awake, staring up at the metal ceiling, but neither of them said a word to each other as the night slipped by the van in a blur of overhead lights and sleepy sounds.

They didn't need to.

~~~

They'd barely stepped into the Tower lobby, bags thrown over shoulders and sleepy-eyed and messy-haired, when a team of smartly-dressed agents lit on them, herding everybody into the elevator with tutting noises.

Commotion and raised voices, bustled into this room with bags on hangers on the walls and mirrors and vanities and Steve was so goddamned confused--

"What's going on?" Bucky finally shouted over the noise, aimed in the direction of Pepper Potts, who'd just swept into the room in a beautiful blue gown. She held up a finger in Bucky's direction, making worried noises as she slid a comb through Tony's hair, threw a tie at his chest and started distributing the bags from the walls.

"I've got two hundred people here and most of them have their checkbooks with them so please do behave all of you." She thanked Thor for coming and Steve blinked a few times, forgetting Thor was even with them before taking the bag shoved at him, unzipping it to reveal a suit.

"This party's gonna be a mess," Natasha commented, slipping a second earring into her ear - somehow already in an evening gown to match Pepper's?

"The hell are you having a party for?" Bucky demanded, hopping on one foot to wrestle off his boots in exchange for dress shoes.

Everyone listened to Pepper, the one standing house-rule.

"It was Tony's birthday yesterday," Pepper supplied quickly, straightening Bruce's bowtie and tsking at Clint's shoe-choice.

"It was--" Bruce started confusedly, and Steve interrupted him, looking up from buttoning his shirt to stare at Tony in the mirror.

"Why didn't you tell us?"

"We were all having a good time." Tony shrugged, meeting Steve's eyes in the reflection and clipping on his cufflinks.

"You're a lot better person than you let on, Stark," Bucky accused, pulling his hair on top of his head in a quick, sleek ponytail.

"And so are you Barnes," Tony shot back, waving a vague-disapproving hand at Thor's hair and making him frown, duck his head to look back in the mirror. Then he was started for the door, straightening his bowtie, immaculate like he hadn't just driven the state of New York after running through pouring rain. "You two coming? I believe this is your debut Stark party, right? Pepper, find some of Thor's Asgardian mead. They're gonna need it."

Nat shot a wicked smile and stalked out after Tony in clicking heels. Clint clapped them both on the shoulder as he passed, then Thor was discussing drinks very seriously with Pepper and Bruce gave them a good-luck nod.

Bucky and Steve stared at each other wide-eyed for a moment, then Pepper was pushing them out the door too and it was all he could do not to take the metal hand in his.

The tie wasn't suffocating, the suit wasn't itchy, it just felt...normal. Almost more comfortable than his uniform, because these were clothes he was used to, didn't fit so tight he could barely breathe sometimes, just sleek line edges and sharp clicking heels--
Not to mention that Bucky looked so gorgeous it'd be entirely worth it if he had to come to this thing naked.

They skirted the edges of the party, mulling and avoiding while hopefully not revealing they were doing just that. At one point Bucky skipped out to get drinks and Sam tugged Steve away for a game of billiards.

When Buck came back, Sam and Steve teemed up and he still wiped the felt with 'em, game unprecedented as it'd been back in the day.

Sam tipped his head back with a groan as Bucky sank the eight-ball for the third time that night, then sticks were being tossed down and everyone started for the stairs. Or more accurately, the bar upstairs.

It was weird, everyone was walking fragile around Steve now, had this whole party. Part of him was relieved, even if the past five hours felt...chimerical.

As the world's leading authority on hiding feelings, he'd known he was lying to himself about Captain America since the day they'd shoved him out on stage in a colorful suit. But saying that to them, his team?

He didn't think he'd have the guts, ever. But Bucky'd just looked at him, beautiful and supportive and alive. He was alive and Steve owed him this, in the least. Steve owed him everything.

"So, Steve," Sam started, climbing the stairs between Steve and Bucky, "Heard something about you considering a place in Brooklyn?"

Steve shot Bucky a look and he just shrugged. A sigh, slowing to a stop at the railing up top, looking out over the party as Sam settled next to him.

"I'm not sure I can afford a place in Brooklyn."

Sam looked about as convinced with his avoidance tactic as Bucky'd been. He didn't call him on it, neither of them had, but he did shrug, looking wistfully out at the party below.

"Well home is home, you know?"

"That's what I said," Bucky interjected, leaning an elbow on the rail and tipping outwards to catch Steve's eye. Steve considered them both before shrugging, watching the people mulling below. The people who all looked up and thought there's Captain America.

Brooklyn. Right.

"If Bucky wants to," Steve finally offered, to which Sam's eyebrows went up and so did Bucky's gloves.

"Woah-ho-ho, hey now, this is a two way street." Bucky lowered his gaze with that reasonable-rational look and Steve forced himself not to glare, because Bucky's logic had never been logic he appreciated at all.

"I'm allowed to let my boyfriend chose some things," Steve gave Bucky a defiant look and Sam took three steps backwards, excusing himself to go get drinks and spinning around with something about fighting supersoldiers.

"Shhh, keep your voice down," Bucky hissed, ignoring Sam's comment and very poignantly not closing the space between them.

So Steve did, sliding closer with a curious tilt of his head, pushing Brooklyn to the back of his mind in favor of running a hand up Bucky's arm, swatted before he could so much as make it to his elbow.

"What, you ashamed to be my boyfriend? I think we make quite the power couple," he teased and Bucky bit back some remark, hesitating a second before leaning closer, dropping his voice and softening his eyes as he gave Steve a little regretful smile.

"We've got too much to risk right now. People aren't gonna take us seriously if we're boyfriends."

"You're worried about the public?"

"It's part of your image. And it's not because it's me, but name one couple you've ever taken seriously when they're boyfriend status."

Steve chewed his lip, thinking it over before finally relenting, half-smile and a little shrug of agreement. Bucky cocked his head pointedly, placing both forearms on the banister beside Steve, nudging shoulders comfortably when Steve'd kill to touch Bucky for real right now.

Boyfriends. Saying it out loud had a rush the first couple'a times, but. It just didn't carry the weight of their relationship.

He glanced at Bucky in his peripherals, sketching the beautiful profile and thinking the word over. Maybe they should change it, was all.

The party didn't last much longer, everyone was too exhausted from the trip. Tony shooed the public out pretty quick, but at least he kept up the reputation of the annual Stark-birthday-party, even if nothing exploded at this one.

Although cleaning up after, it sure felt like something did.

By the time the tower was presentable and they all retreated to their rooms with a birthday-kiss on each of Tony's cheeks - he'd protested loudly that troublemaker kids shouldn't tag-team kiss people or they'd be dishing heartattacks - Steve was about ready to curl up on the floor.

"Mm, I'm exhausted," Bucky murmured, crashing stomach-first onto Steve's bed dramatically, jacket draped over the chair and loosened tie on the floor. He toed off his shoes and Steve sunk in the mattress beside him, carding a hand down Bucky's spine and pressing a soft kiss to his bicep.

"Too exhausted for a night of it?" Steve teased, pushing Bucky's long hair aside to lift up and feather kisses on the exposed back of his neck. A tiny noise, shiver, and Bucky's toes curled in his socks.

"The way you rock those hips? Hell yes." A fond smile over his shoulder then Steve was rolling him over, palms tracing reverent lines down sides as plush lips eased together. Bucky's eyes slipped closed and he rolled his spine, arching up into the kiss with a sleepy stretch and Steve hummed into his mouth, thumbs rubbing little circles into Bucky's hips.

He could fall asleep like this, Steve half-draped over him and tugging their mouths together contentedly. It was warm and safe and comfy, then Steve slowly undid the buttons on his collared shirt, pushing it off Bucky's shoulders and starting in on the belt next.

Steve kept kissing him softly, sweetly, stripping them all the way down to their boxers, then he was really quite comfortable and in complete risk of falling asleep making-out. A kiss to his throat and Bucky keened, rolling his hips up against Steve's, stimulating sparks up his stomach and spinning his head.

"I love you," Steve whispered, eyes locked on Bucky's, nothing but Steve's face hovering above them and the ceiling spun out, the flicker of a tent, a cracked one from Brooklyn, Central Park's starlit sky, swinging back around to their room in the tower and Bucky ran his hands up Steve's chest, palms smoothing over tensed muscles.

"I'll never forget you," he promised, gravel in his voice as he tipped his chin up, bottom lip catching in his teeth as he beckoned Steve back down. He kept hovering though, eyebrows furrowed and little frown on his pretty lips.

"That's not the same thing," Steve started and Bucky hummed, lifting his head and pulling Steve's down at the same time, mashing their mouths together and pressing his body harder to Steve's. Shoving hands between them to drag rough thumbs over Steve's nipples, a gasping pant as the gorgeous mouth broke away, outline of his erection rubbing up against Bucky and oh, s-see, that was so much better than talking.

But, as always, Steve found some loophole, sliding their crotches together as he pressed his mouth to Bucky's ear, words less breathy than they'd should've been, considering circumstances.

"Buck, you still haven't said--" he started again and Bucky knew exactly where that was going. So he took the easy way out, slid his hands down the back of Steve's boxers and cupped that beautiful, smooth ass in his hands, breathing against Steve's neck, "Screw exhaustion. I want you." A moment's consideration and Steve hovered again, dropping the iloveyou conversation as he somehow stilled his hips.

"You sure?" he asked, all the right kinds of breathless now, and Bucky squeezed, kneading Steve's pretty ass in his hands and making him whimper in his throat.

"Real sure," he assured, wiggling down the hem of Steve's boxers and pressing his open mouth to the sensitive skin under his ear, "Make love to me, my angel."

"Don't just feel obligated?" Steve pressed one more time, but his hips were rolling again so Bucky was pretty sure he had him convinced.

"Me? Feel obligated to do something for you? Have we met?"

Steve was smiling as he tugged Bucky's boxers down with his teeth, then Bucky was laughing all the way through Steve's fingers and the pattering of kisses on his inner thighs, let Steve lick it out of his mouth as he rocked into his body.

And really, it wasn't so hard, pushing it all to the back of his mind when Steve took him like this. In fact, it was the easiest thing in the world.

~~~

Since the time he was a kid, there were moments - everything from quick flashes of smiles to entire nights - that the second they happened, he knew he'd remember them for the rest of his life.

Waking up this morning was one.

Apparently they had longer to go before he woke to a sleepy, cross Bucky on the other side of his pillow because Buck wasn't even in bed when Steve woke up sometime in late afternoon. To be fair, they'd been up until nine o'clock this morning, because not-exhausted turned into do-me-one-more-time to jesus-christ-you're-beautiful-fucked-out-let-me-ride-you-for-an-hour to kiss-me-again- i'll-fuck-you-into-the-floor to I-bet-you-don't-have-it-in-you-for-another to...Steve kinda lost track after that.

Blinking groggily into the filter of late afternoon sun, the first thing he registered was miles of rucked up sheets, then the work of art propped in the windowsill.

The sun was shining behind his hair, making dark-brown look dark-gold, shadows over a muscled, bare chest. The way Bucky was sitting the metal arm was to the window; it simply looked like his best friend from the war, a sketchbook propped against lifted knees, bare toes flexed against the opposite end of the windowsill.

He was in nothing but Steve's underwear, a black pair with a red-white-and-blue band across the top, hair rucked up and unbrushed from a whole night of it, crystal eyes dark blue in the shadows, lips still puffy from how much Steve'd bitten them. And there were the bitemarks too, dark red crevices on the muscle between his shoulder and neck, a glimpse of the ones on the inside of his thighs, marks from Steve and Steve alone.

His right hand moved swiftly, easily over paper, glancing out the window every so often, pencil held careful like something precious, nothing like the bruising way he'd clung to Steve last night.

If Steve painted every day for the rest of his life, he'd never capture how beautiful Bucky Barnes was, never in another seventy years.

"I love you," Steve whispered, reverent, and Bucky's head lifted, pencil eraser tapping his sketchbook as his hand went lax, head turned an inch.

"Goodmorning to you too." Bucky's mouth curved up in a little one-sided smile and Steve bit his lip to keep from crying or something equally stupid. It was just...a lot of emotions.

"Come back to bed," he whispered instead, reaching a hand across the space between them. Bucky's smile didn't falter, but his eyes flickered, once, and gone.

"I'm good." Bucky picked up his pencil again and Steve's fingers curled into the sheets.

"Aw, Buck, m'cold." Steve scooted a fraction closer, sheets whispering and tugging around his bare skin.

"You've had colder," Bucky offered, off-hand and neutral, glancing out the window and sketching a swoop over his page.

(He used to stare out windows and long to jump. Before that he used to stare out windows and see the endless infatuating outside world to explore. Even staring out the windowpane wishing he were dead made him feel alive. Now staring out the window he didn't feel much of anything at all.

What was he now. Content or docile?)

Some part of Steve had always seen this coming. Bucky was ethereal, something surreally beautiful and perfect and human - moreso than Steve, even after the Winter Soldier, because he'd died by his own choice, brought himself back to life by his own choice, and Steve'd always been shoved into things like the pawn he was.

Bucky Barnes was beautiful, and Steve knew he had pulchritude too, but nothing that ran that deep.
Nothing like that work of art, the complexity and loyalty and darkness he'd thrown himself in and pulled himself out of.

Bucky was never really his to keep, was he?

Some part of him'd always seen this coming. Bucky, giving him nights and not mornings, days and not nights, giving him pieces and allowing him glimpses but never really his, never Steve's for the taking, always something he got to borrow, fall deeper in love with, and have to watch walk away from him.

You can't hold the ocean waves in your hands, they're always going back out to sea.

"You alright?" Steve murmured, soft, careful. He could try. His hands were slippery and he felt like he could never hold onto Bucky tight enough to keep him from disappearing, but he could try.

Expanding chest, pause, a heavy rush of air in something like a sigh.

"What brought this on?" Steve pushed up on an elbow, running a hand through his fucked-up hair and Bucky sat down his pencil, putting both it and his sketchbook on the windowsill, bare skin and strong legs as he crawled back into bed.

"No, Bucky, I need you to talk to me."

No frustrated noise, no searching eyes; just collapsed onto the pillow beside Steve, one hand on his sternum and head turned, hair splayed out around him while Steve hovered on an elbow. Until Bucky dragged him down with a metal hand on familiar bruises.

"What would you think if I got a tattoo?" Bucky kissed into the side of his neck and Steve rubbed his thumbs over Bucky's ribs.

"A tattoo, hm?" Steve lifted up, pressing a kiss to Bucky's dimpled chin, making him cross his eyes, then two graphite-smudged fingers were tapping his chest.

"Your name over my heart."

It meant something, Bucky saying that, but Steve didn't know enough to decipher it. So he dipped down, kissed the spot, lifted back up and entangled their hands together on the pillow, fingers locked.

"Why, you planning on forgetting it again?"

Clearly teasing, it was a joke, but Bucky's eyes darkened, not in the good way.

"No." He shook his head, squeezing Steve's hands and rippling his entire arm in a loud whir, "No, never. Don't joke about that."

Steve searched the gaze, fumbling one step closer to wherever Bucky's headspace was right now, wishing he could talk straight like a normal person, wishing either of them could talk in anything but poems and silence and grasping hands.

He let go of Bucky's grip, having to shake the left to get free, sheets unsettling around them as he sat up, crossed his legs Indian style and gestured at the art supplies on the bookshelf.
"Get me a Sharpie." Bucky looked at him confusedly and Steve shoved his hip, gesturing again. "Go on."

When he sat back down, cross-legged too, Steve took his wrist and braced it on his knee, sunlight filtering veins stark blue against the black ink. He traced a careful, steady line all the way around Bucky's wrist, completing the circle with a dash, an ink bracelet to match the one he'd traced in water a few days ago.

Bucky was staring at the mark - an endless line, the beginning marks the end - and Steve pressed a kiss into his palm, holding warm, human fingers to his lips until Bucky's eyes lifted to his.

"That's the only thing you ever need to remember," Steve swore, quiet, and Bucky's eyes were watering. Steve kissed his fingers, every one of them, waiting for the ink to dry before he pressed his lips to the line around Buck's wrist too, mouth against skin as he promised, again, "I love you."

Bucky swallowed, eyes cutting away for a moment before he leaned forward, mouth brushing Steve's, waiting for him to press harder, more, something. Steve didn't, he kissed a tender line to Bucky's scarred shoulder and murmured against metal,

"What were you upset about?" Silence, stiffening that almost snagged Steve's lips between shifting plates. He lifted, kissing Bucky's cheekbone, the corner of his eye, gathering the metal hand too and squeezing them both between their bare chests. "C'mon."

Bucky's face turned away and Steve caught his jaw, brought him back and forced the crystal eyes on his, steady breaths through his nose to block the sound of his heart breaking.

"Talk to me," Steve pleaded, pretending it wasn't destroying him every moment Bucky stayed quiet.

Один-два-три-четыре-пять-шесть-семь--

"I sleep with you, I take care of you." Broken ice-gems, soft dove mouth twisted down in confusion and hurt as Bucky pleaded right back, "What more do you want from me?"

The question took him by surprise. It wasn't something Steve'd ever considered, that he was looking for more from Bucky. But the retracted shoulders, burdened gaze, the way he kept turning away. He did want more.

Steve furrowed his eyebrows, looking down at their hands, body shrunk half its size, background flickering. Sketchpad in shaking, small fingers, looking across a dirty apartment at the beautiful boy draped sleeping on their ratty couch. Hiding a cough in the corner of his elbow and wishing that were the reason his eyes were watering.

The one thing he'd always wanted. Wanted too much, that he'd never imagined asking for, the susurrate on repeat in his head, deepest tug from his soul - voice dropping quiet now, words he'd held inside him when there was nothing else, when he had nothing else.

Words he'd never imagined saying aloud.

"I want you to love me." His shoulders shrugged up by his ears, watching Bucky's stomach expand and contract as he breathed. Was that really so bad to want?

There were other things to drown in, besides water and ice. He'd drowned in this boy, he'd drowned in the weight of the past and the weight of a uniform.

And now he was drowning in silence, waiting.
"You know, Steve..." started so quiet, cautious, careful. “In the movies...books, stories. They always forget. Forgive, overcome, succeed. Someone doesn't believe in love until they find it and boom unexplainable magic.” Buck’s fingers slipped free, stroked up the tops of Steve's thighs, rucking the sheet covering his lap, warm and cold against his skin, the way Bucky was inside too. "Is that real? Do any of those stories feel real to you?"

"It can be real," Steve whispered, watching Bucky's hands stroke down to his knees, back up to his hips again. "It's about trust. Letting go."

"It's too dangerous." Gently, the way you remind a child, no, that's tomorrow. Or Never, maybe it was Never.

He caught Bucky's hands on an upstroke, finally lifting his eyes to meet the crystal ones trying to search his face. A veil of beautiful hair curving over his forehead, framing his jaw, the fallen angel sitting on his bed who kept shying from Steve's reaching touch but dragging him down with warm arms of his own.

"We can't get much deeper into this, Buck. Remember?" Steve pleaded, the only thing he'd ever wanted, remember, don't forget me, not again, “...burning hand in hand? I'm right. here. with you."

"I can't-- I don't see it, Steve, how all those stories switch from caution and logic to suddenly letting go in this overwhelming emotion-- it's not safe. It makes no sense. That sudden spark that turns the coin...it doesn't exist."

Steve just looked at him. Bucky looked away and muttered to himself again, "It doesn't exist."

There was one thing about Bucky that'd taken Steve a very long time to figure out, but it changed the whole game when he did. If he was cornered, Bucky said all sorts of things he didn't believe. He'd convince himself of something, ignore his own head, and outright lie to himself, lie to Steve--

He'd prove Bucky wrong. This was real, and it was something they could have. Deep down, Steve'd bet anything Bucky wanted to believe in love desperately with every ounce of his being. But Bucky wouldn't say he wanted to spend eternity with Steve. Scared.

Steve could protect him from the dangers. It was his turn; and Steve had his six.

A sigh, deflating. Steve looked up under his lashes at the silent, still, skeleton boy, offering Bucky a little smile and a quiet, "Can I make you breakfast?"

"You can make love to me," Bucky whispered, then two hands were pressing him back down into the mattress and Steve went easy, let the weight crush them both, and saved Bucky the only way Bucky'd allow.

Held on tight enough to keep him from disappearing, fading ghost.

Clung and dug fingers into flesh, holding tighter tighter, taking back every time hands'd slipped, forcing those memories away with a castle of new ones.

Drowning in the boy in his arms, gasping for air to keep afloat--

And Steve couldn't tell anymore, who was holding who.
It was pitch-black outside when he woke. There was a strand of hair in his face he highly considered sheering off with the knife on the nightstand, but he was supposed to be getting better.

Bucky rolled over, wincing, stared up at the ceiling and distantly noticing the bed was empty. He was getting better, he supposed. He honestly didn't feel like jumping out the window. He didn't even feel like running. Or fighting, or killing, or doing anything but kissing Steve.

That was progress, in some way, twisted or not.

Rogers was a drug, a very beautiful addictive drug that made him so present in his head. Spun time into some abstract concept, let him look up from the sheets at that beautiful face and picture himself in 1944 and everything was okay, they were both okay.

Not that they weren't okay here. Steve was okay, asking for impossible things but Steve was getting better too.

So then why the hell was he outta bed?

Bucky rolled off the side, planting careful, silent feet on the ground and padding for the door. Immediate hallway, empty. He didn't have to try to be quiet, it came like breathing, hugging the shadows and easing around their floor of the Stark tower, searching.

He finally found in the study, which neither of them spent much time in at all, a computer lit up devastatingly bright, Steve's mouth twisted contemplatively as he looked at the screen.

It was like 3am, what the hell did Wikipedia have to say that was so important?

"Hey," Bucky ventured, biting down the smug smile as Steve jumped a foot in the air. He recovered impressively quick, waving Bucky closer to look at the screen over his worn-tshirt shoulder.

"What do you think of this one? I know we don't need three bedrooms, but I figured we could turn one into a guest, the other an art studio. The windows look over the harbor...but, I mean, if you didn't want a studio, that's fine."

"A studio's great," Bucky peered a little closer, one hand on the back of Steve's chair and the other on the desk. "But you're sure you wanna--"

"We need to do this," Steve interrupted, glancing up to meet Bucky's eyes in the foreign blue light of the computer screen.

They studied each other for a moment, Brooklyn apartment pulled up on the screen beside lit faces. If this was what Steve wanted. Or needed. In Bucky's opinion, it was exactly the step forward at this point, the catalyst to healing, to better.

"Alright," he finally agreed, looking back at the screen. "Let's make an offer on it."

Steve leaned over, pecking Bucky's cheek. He swatted him off, making a motion to scoot because honestly, Steve was shit with finances and Bucky'd gotten all their apartments before, it only seemed rational he do the transaction for this one too.

"Jesus Christ, Steve, you weren't kidding about not being able to afford this."
Steve laughed brightly, wrapping his arms around Bucky's torso and running affectionate fingers over the lines of his bare stomach.

"Sure we can. Seventy years is a lot of pension."

"You're...a lot of pension," Bucky muttered lamely, pressing a hard kiss to Steve's bicep and turning back to the computer, humming something under his breath as he navigated the page.

Steve smiled into his sleep-warm skin because he knew exactly what Bucky was humming and yes, finally. Til Then.

When I will hold you again...

But he got to hold Buck now. That was the present, he had that life, and he couldn't imagine it being any better.

Bucky was all he'd ever need.

It kinda hit him like a lightbulb going off, 3am with Bucky squeezed into his chair and elbow bumping Steve's arm as he slid over the keypad and--

Bucky was all he'd ever need.

Of course.

~~~

"Fancy seeing you here Cap-- Steve."

Tony lifted the red soldering goggles from his face and Steve mumbled hello on his way to the closest holographic lab table, tapping the center with his palm and lifting up.

The schematics for some fancy metallic gear system popped up and Tony stood from his rolling chair, making his way to the other side of the table and swiping the holograph aside, pulling up the main frame database with a curious look at Steve.

"What're you looking for?"

"I need the dimensions of Bucky's arm."

Both eyebrows raised and Tony stroked a hand over his beard-goatee. "There a particular reason why..."

It wasn't hard to see the gutter-thoughts Tony was implying and Steve shot him a mild glare to hide the way his hands were clasped, cold and clammy.

Stark pulled up the holograph, plates separating automatically to reveal the complex interior wiring and Steve signaled his hands to slide the pieces back, compress the arm into the visual he was used to.

He'd like to be able to do this on his own, get the numbers he needed without Tony's help, but the holographic metal hand was being difficult.

A noise of frustration and Steve finally caved, spinning the arm towards Tony and crossing his over his chest.
"I need the diameter," he sighed and Stark gave him this unreadable look.
"Of which part?"
"Fingers."
"You knitting gloves?" Mostly sarcasm as Tony twisted something, pulled up an array of floating white numbers. "All of 'em?"
"Just the fourth," Steve replied, voice carefully cautiously neutral. Tony nodded distractedly, swiping aside all the numbers but one, expanding bigger.
"Measurement for left hand ring finger," Tony announced, and the air of the lab actually went stale as Tony froze, staring at nothing for a few seconds before his eyes lifted slowly to Steve's.
"Are you..." he trailed off, throat dry, and Steve spun the hologram back towards him, tracing a circle around the fourth metal extension.

Stark was smart, it'd be useless to pretend Steve didn't know that he knew. So he met Tony's eyes instead, tapping the white dimensions to the side, little hopeful smile on his face that he almost didn't dare, but. This was Tony. Steve knew by now he could be trusted.

Besides, there wasn't much else he could be doing with that dimension, and the more personal he could make this, the better chance Bucky'd say yes.

So he sucked in a breath, steeled himself, and asked the question he'd never imagined he'd have the chance.

"What do you know about making rings?"

Chapter End Notes

✩

I Wanna Get Better - The Bleachers (the car-singing song) (sing it in your car, do it, you'll be on top of the world promise)

This kinda just fits the whole first half, Geronimo by Sheppard

And Tony's Poison songs for the car-ride home, in case you feel like being melancholy.

Thank you so much to everyone who's left me beautiful comments and kudos - this chapter was purely self-indulgent in the name of oncoming onslaught (jeez so few chapters left) and it's an odd stand-alone but you'll thank me for it one day, maybe.

Also I'm so sorry this took almost a month; I got ridiculously sick and was bedridden in the not-fun way (then ao3 ate 16k of this last night) but hopefully the next won't take as long? But there is a shit-ton of stuff going down in the next chapter like lord almighty

Love to each and every one of you xx
He woke to a scream.
For the first time since war 1945, it wasn't his own.

Steve half-expected Bucky to shove him outta bed. The other half expected an impenetrable curled ball, barking words to leave Bucky the fuck alone.

Knives to the heart if they weren't to the head.

But no matter, no matter how many weapons Bucky'd thrown, no matter how many times he'd snapped to leave--

That part of Steve was hoping, begging, waiting - the day Bucky decided fuck it and burrowed into Steve's chest. Let Steve hold him.

One day, someday. Steve was waiting.

That day wasn't today.

Bucky screamed and shot up, puppet yanked so hard a string frayed, wood splintered. Steve snapped up, already reaching pleading hands for his sweet boy to calm--

Then there was cold metal pressed dead-center to Steve's forehead. Metal, registering human-equivalent. Metal, he usually knew.

It wasn't Bucky's hand. It was the muzzle of a gun.

A hitch of oxygen--

"Hey, hey, baby, it's me," Steve soothed instantly, holding his breath against the exploding heart in his chest, armystrength to keep his hands complacent and raised at his sides instead of yanking the cocked and loaded firearm away from his brains. Every instinct in his body was screaming, muscles trembling, pulse thudding, eyelashes watering, danger.

Bucky's eyes were wild. Flashing in the darkness of Steve's room, where they'd both been tangled up in boxers seconds ago.

The gun wasn't moving. Bucky wasn't moving. But he wasn't pulling the trigger either.

"Buck? It's Stevie," he tried, quiet, stripping gravel from his voice and throat-shredding against a thousand rocks. The little kid you used to know.

Recognition.

Horror.

“Bu--” he started again, but it was too late, the gun was shattering in a metal fist, pieces snapping and crumbling and hurled, denting the wall. Steve reached, still too late, Bucky slid backwards off the bed with a hand over his mouth, then scrambling feet were skidding over carpet, rounding the corner of the bed, nearly pulling the door off its hinges and Steve was barely three feet behind him, socks slipping on wooden hallways, shouting something stopwaititisokay, another yanked-open door.

He made it into the bathroom as Bucky's knees hit tile, dropping behind him to smooth hands over beautiful long hair and fold it into a ponytail, force his hands not to shake. Bucky's spine went rigid, eyes squeezed shut, coughing up last night's dinner and Steve kept his hair pinned back, from crouch to sitting as Bucky hurled again.
Pressed his forehead against the heated skin on Bucky's back, stroking his free hand up and down trembling, taut muscle.

"It's okay," Steve promised, and maybe this was why Buck hesitated to share beds. Steve didn't wake from nightmares with a gun in his hands. He wasn't sure he could handle that. "You're alright, Buck."

"Nightmares happen. You didn't hurt me." He circled a hand to Bucky's forehead, checked for a fever and he was warm, but no more so than everywhere else. Stroked down, temple to the corner of Bucky's shut eyes, pulling away with salty tears on his fingertips. Steve closed his eyes too, willed himself to make sure only one of them cried. Kept lamenting they were fine, they were completely fine and they always would be. "You're alright. Everything’s alright."

"D-don't."

"Hey, no, we knew--"

"What, we knew what?" Bucky spun on a heel, tripped over Steve's ankle, and promptly landed on his ass, wiping the back of his hand over his mouth with a bitter groan.

"Are you--"

"If you ask me if I'm okay, I'm gonna shove you outta that door and you will be sleeping alone for a week."

It was weak. A hollow threat and it shouldn't mean anything, but...nightmares. Maybe those were getting worse or maybe he was so wrapped up in post-screaming comfort Bucky offered him and he couldn't return that the idea of crying himself to sleep alone was more horrifying than it should've been.

"You don't have to be a dick, Bucky, I'm not going anywhere--"

"Why? And don't say it's because you love me," he spat, like an offense, and Steve's lungs closed stubbornly inside his chest. "--because this goes beyond that, this is just dangerous. Why the fuck didn't you tackle me? Break my fucking arm? Something! Anything, Steve, I can't have you sitting there when you've got a fucking muzzle to your forehead! Do you have any idea what that's like to gain consciousness to??"

Steve crossed his arms over his chest, wishing that'd inflate his asthmatic respiratory system but he refused to freak over the lack of oxygen now, couldn't let Bucky turn this on him by sinking into an asthma attack, glaring from his own spot on the floor and what a pair they made--

The angry-born kid who let the light in and pumped himself into a hero;
The angel-born devil who shattered his halo and swallowed the darkness to protect his boy.

But Steve didn't need protection. Not from himself and not from Bucky. He trusted Bucky not to hurt him, he trusted Bucky to remember, to always snap out of it. He was giving this his all and that's the part Bucky didn't get. Steve wasn't bailing, ever.

"I'm not letting you run from me," Steve shot back, lifting his chin stubbornly. "You've got my everythi--"

"You can't throw yourself into this," Bucky rasped, struggling to his feet, flushing with one hand and turning on the sink with the other. A violent splash that sent as much water onto the counter as it did onto Bucky's face and his legs were shaking.
Beautiful killer thighs broken down, muscles convulsing--

Steve stood slowly, picked his way over to the trembling, angry, scared, precious--

"You'll lose everything." Bucky spat, slamming off the water, head hanging between his shoulders, fists tight, muscles tensing under Steve's wide palms.

"I'll lose it to you." Smoothing his touch around to Bucky's chest, over pounding wild beating, soft as fallen snow, "I want you to have my heart."

There were ghosts inside the crystal eyes that shot to his in the mirror. Locked gazes and Steve swallowed, a flicker of fear at the haunted figures.

"Don't put that in my hands." Seething. Blood dripping between fingers, souls staring into twin abyss.

"I'll shatter it one morning at 3am and what'll be left of you then, huh?" Angry-beautiful spun around and like this, flat-footed against the counter, Bucky was his height, same wide shoulders and same packed muscle, two fighters head to head at a match. Like this, darkness around them and lingering adrenaline and haunted, cutting gazes - like this, early morning, they were a mess, everything was darker and scarier and it was war all over again, back in the trenches and fires and explosions, inside demon's minds and they'd never come back from that--

"You're going into this with fists raised but this isn't a fight you can win, Rogers."

The only thing missing was red candlelight, the flicker of fire in Bucky's eyes, but if he looked deep enough there were flames anyways.

For most his life, it'd been fights he couldn't win. Wake up. Never stopped him before. Pull me out. Swallow.

"Then you'll pick me up when I fall down." Steve painted Bucky's cheekbone with his fingertips and the burning crystal cut away, face turning, jaw clicking, eyes falling shut like it hurt to look, always falling.

"Not this time." Drained. Not sleepless, but void. "Not this fight. I can't come in swinging to save you anymore. Not when I'm blinded, not when it may be you I'm. H-hitting instead." A hitch, betrayal of emotion and a hand shot over his mouth again, like he wanted to hurl again at the thought and the remnant pieces of Steve's heart shattered deeper.

"Baby. I'm okay."

"Please, just." A single headshake, fists tight at sides and Steve shifted, sliding his hands over Bucky's bare skin, wishing he could force him to understand from touch. If it took bruises, blood, bones, to make him see, Steve'd carve the star out his chest and lace it to Bucky's feet.

"Just what?"

"Promise me--"

"Not that." Steve flatlined and Bucky's sneer sharpened dangerously.

"You don't even know--"

"I do, and I won't promise you that. Come back to bed."
Bucky's eyes were still closed when Steve lead him away from the counter, swallowing tightly as he guided warm shoulders carefully through the doorway. Bucky didn't open his eyes once, not when Steve laid him back down, kissed his eyelids. Rolled him over and kissed his spine.

Neither of them slept again, but Bucky pushed Steve off halfway through kissing every-inch of scarred shoulderblades, metal arm tucked behind his back and right palm flat on Steve's skin in the darkness - arm's length, humanfingers curled over his pumping heart - and Steve pretended not to taste cold salt dripping down the pillow.

~~~

"You talk to Steve about it?"

Bucky snorted, flicking the robot buzzing around his elbow and wondering who the hell Stark thought they were talking about. Because Steve, talk? The robot tapped his star with its claw-thing and Bucky sighed, relenting the attention and turning back to Tony. "No."

"Have you guys even stopped and talked about everything? I mean. From what I've gathered, you refused to talk forever and Steve rolled with it. Until that fight where you ran to Sam's--" Bucky remembered that fight, remembered shouting you let me fall because it was the only thing to shut Steve up. And it'd been true in a way. Funny Tony remembered it though.

"--then you went roadtripping to cover up everything, then it piled up too much and you almost offed yourself."

Yeah, he remembered that too.

Bucky shrugged, poking the robot back so he didn't have to look at Tony's expectant gaze over the safety glasses.

"We talked a little after that. Well, Steve shouted and I listened." That, that'd been alotta information. That'd changed the whole game. Finding out Steve'd crashed the plane on purpose--

"Okay." Tony tightened a wrench and something shot sparks that didn't seem to bother him. "And then you guys kissed and the lack-of-talking meant you didn't even know why for like a month, then Steve blew up and said he loved you."

Either Stark had a really good memory or Jarvis was recording things, Bucky wasn't sure which was more unsettling.

"We talked a little after that too."

"And then you slept together, so. All conflicts resolved?" Stark looked up just in time to see the amused, incredulous look over Bucky's face.

"Yeah, no."

"Are there things you guys haven't talked about?"

"...yeah."

"Then maybe you should sit down and have a catharsis." Tony tapped his temple with a wrench, eyebrows lifted in that you-know-i'm-right look he got way too often and Bucky impatiently shoved the robot off his arm again.
"You make it sound easy, Stark." Bucky hopped down off his designated lab table (well, it wasn't his, just his perching spot) and made his way over to Tony's. "But anyways, enough relationship drama--" of all people, why would Tony be an expert on Steve's motives as of late? "--what did you actually call me in here for?"

"Jarvis, pull up the specs - I'll go drag that prototype outta the closet. Although, really, maybe we should make the one with the metal arm do all the heavy lifting?"

"Steve! Stevie, look what Stark got me! Do you recognize it?"

Steve rolled his lips in, hiding the grin as Bucky practically dragged him over, gesturing with the same expression he'd worn the first time they'd been standing in front'a that same invention.

"Do I recognize it? Course I do. From the last time I--" Steve snapped shut on the words saw you. The beginning of the end. Never bring up. "--the day you shipped out," he corrected.

"Mnhmm," Bucky agreed distractedly, metal fingers tapping shiny-red. "Apparently Tony took my ridicule to heart, because he dug up Howard's old blueprints and found a half-functioning prototype. It's about as well off as the one we saw that night, but I'm gonna fix it." Bucky's eyes were sparkling near as bright as the hover-car, glancing back up in disbelief. "I'm gonna fix it. Can you believe it?"

Something in his chest tightened - that night, standing at Bucky's side at the Queen's ScienceExpo, the joy smile the moment Stark walked on stage, bouncing on his toes in excitement. And this was where they'd come, this was where they stood so many years later, Bucky's hands fixing the broken pieces of their past, finally becoming that something-more.

"Course I can." Steve scuffed his boot on the lab floor, despairing smile taking a corner of his mouth. "You always had it in you."

Bucky averted his eyes, arm rippling unsettlingly. "See, look, I've already figured out how to reroute the electrical overload that caused the explosion hindrance in '43. Tony said I can use whatever tools I need, he's been in here working next to me on some project of his own and it's been--" his voice faltered and Steve shoved his hands in his pockets, forcing himself to look at the hover-car instead of twitching metal fingers. "It's just been nice, y'know? Besides my painting, I've never really had anything like this."

He'd never had the chance. They'd never had this life. But it was theirs, now. The world could be theirs if Bucky just--

"Mine," he shrugged and Steve's smile was hollow that time. If only Bucky didn't fight so hard, he could have more than a painting and a science-experiment to call his. He could have a whole damned person.

A beat of silence and Steve'd spill blood to know what Bucky was thinking, the flickering truths behind that expression.

A step in his direction and Steve rolled his shoulders, forcing himself upright. Reminding himself to stand tall, because it didn't hurt anymore, he didn't have scoliosis; even if his spine thought otherwise sometimes, the way Bucky shifted the bones under his skin.

"...thank you," Bucky offered quietly and Steve extended an arm, taking Bucky's hand in his to pull him closer. Always closer.
He couldn't have any of this without Steve. Not just because it was his friends and influence, but. He'd never have wanted this if Steve hadn't been there when he pulled himself outta the fire. If he hadn't had something to latch onto. To bring himself back to this. This.

What Bucky could be thanking him for, Steve couldn't imagine. So he pulled him in and kissed him instead.

He wondered if Bucky could taste it on him.

Bucky breathed in Steve's hurt, lingering like bullets on his tongue and he'd so long since slipped past Bucky's defences, what was the point anymore? When they pulled away he was wrapped too tight in strong arms and Bucky knew he had a grease mark on his temple but Steve didn't rub it off like he'd expected, Steve just stared at him, squeezing close and desperate as Bucky blinked up at lost blues.

Furrowed eyebrows over the strong nose, the impenetrable concern masked with hope - goddamn Steve Rogers, that's what.

It took everything not to wiggle outta the grip. It wasn't leather clamps on his arms but it might as well've been, what Steve was asking--

Bucky tipped up and took his mouth again, parting Steve's lips with his tongue, tugging him down without protest. Kissing him sideways and harder and softer, anything it took until the tight grip around him started to loosen and Bucky smiled against Stevie's soft mouth until he was smiling back.

When they broke apart that time Steve's forehead touched his and Bucky ran his right hand over the back of Steve's neck, dragging him kicking outta his shadows and there, all that tension and worry drained and it was daylight for godssakes, no crying or scraping hearts allowed.

"I came down with news for you too," Steve finally said, breaking the silence and pulling back with a tiny - real - curve on his lips. Bucky slipped outta the embrace, keeping his fingers tangled in Steve's while he tugged a folded paper from his back pocket. Bucky recognized the paperwork before he unfolded it, bit his lip and watched as Steve shook it open, turning to him with a flash of that smile that made it all worth it.

"You ready to kiss community luxury away?"

"Ready to go anywhere with you," Bucky squeezed their hands, tilting his head teasingly, "...so long as it means kissing."

Steve's nose squinched and their lips met and then there were boxes--

So many boxes, more than they'd need, especially since they weren't taking it all yet, but Stark "wanted this done right."

They decided to move the studio last, leave the paint and supplies here for now. It was only a twenty-minute taxi-ride from the Avengers Tower to the new Brooklyn apartment, half that on Steve's bike.

It should've been scary, maybe, but carefully lowering the recently-repaired montage of his Howling Commandos into a box with bright yellow caution-tape (Stark's idea of a joke, but Steve'd smiled so he wasn't complaining) Bucky didn't feel anything but a distant sense of Finally.
The first time they'd moved in together, Bucky'd done all the heavy lifting while Steve fretted and attempted lifting boxes he really shouldn't. There'd only been four anyways: carefully-packed sketches and art supplies, clothes, dishes, Sarah's things.

Now, Tony was shouting at Sam to make sure to get the wallclock in the box with the over-couch mirror and Steve was protesting that really, they shouldn't be taking Tony's things then Stark was arguing that he'd designed the place for them, they could take whatever they wanted, it'd leave more room for updating the floor.

"C'mon, it'll give me something to do. I'll still keep it vintage, because you two will always have a home here, but I've--I mean, Pepper, has been dying for another floor project and these could use a fresh coat of paint anyways..."

Steve finally conceded and Thor helped Barton carry the couch down the hallway while Maria directed traffic and Bucky stood in the middle of their empty living room, single box in his hands while Avengers circled and shouted and carried around him, and asked himself when he was going to stop being so surprised. He had a family.

Natasha socked his shoulder on her way past with kitchen utensils and he shook his head, breaking from the trance and following her down to the quinjet - yeah, Tony didn't know when to stop - they were packing their boxes into.

Pepper kissed them both on the temple and waved them off with a hand, then Steve was waving out the jet window and Natasha was leaning over Thor to ask Bruce if he'd remembered the lamps from the den, up front Tony was asking Sam his opinion on letting the Rogers's take some of the gym equipment for their new place, and all Clint wanted to know was if Bucky was throwing a housewarming party and if there'd be pizza?

"This is way more windows than I thought you would've wanted," Clint commented offhandedly, plopping a box down in the living room and dusting off his hands.

"What can I say, we got used to the Tower's view." Bucky shrugged and Tony fist-pumped on his way past, saying something to Jarvis about a perimeter scan and getting blueprints of dimensions just in case--

"Except now you've got the Brooklyn Bridge instead of Manhattan," Bruce pointed out, straightening the mirror Thor'd just hung and Bucky glanced over at Steve, talking (with his hands) over kitchen-organization with Natasha.

"Well. Brooklyn's always been where we belonged. Ain't that right, Stevie?"

"Hmm? Buck, did you see the different bedrooms? Which one do you think for the studio? Since we've got two resident artists now--"

"Oh shh, I don't count. Put it wherever you want, I'd be fine painting in a closet."

"Closets! Nat, do you know where..."

Three hours, too many boxes, and an arm-wrestling competition over who got claims on the guest-bedroom later, everyone was surveying the open living room one last time before gathering at the front door, starting noisily down the hallway together.

"Avengers Movie Night is still Friday and if you two aren't there, I know where you sleep. Actually,
I setup where you sleep, I'd be careful if I were you--"

"We'll be there, Tony," Steve assured, knocking his shoulder against Stark's. Bruce shook his head while Thor laughed and Sam threw an arm over Bucky's shoulders, tugging him in with a beaming smile as Clint reached over to tweak the loose bun atop Bucky's head.

They were all at the curb too soon and the bustling cheer settled into soft smiles and a few teary eyes and really, they weren't far--

But it was an end of an era, and none of them'd gotten alotta happy endings before, so Bucky wasn't gonna say anything as Clint sniffled and curled his fingers too tight in the back of Bucky's shirt.

Steve shooed everyone back towards the jet parked at the water and five waving hands disappeared around the corner. There'd been five Commandos too, five of those boys like the five boys leaving now--

And Natasha, still standing on the curb beside them. She'd moved Steve into his DC apartment, Bucky'd found out an hour ago. She'd been there when he couldn't--

"I'll be upstairs," Bucky started, because Steve and Nat probably wanted a moment alone but she reached for his wrist before he could go, turning him back towards the sidewalk and beautiful green eyes.

Steve seemed just as confused as Nat tugged him a foot further from Steve's side, leaning in close with that signature curved mouth, dead-serious and somehow disastrously-soft as she looked up at him, held him still and swore vehemently under her breath, "You take care of him."

Bucky blinked down at the little spider who'd been through so much, whose life'd been a reverse of his. She'd started in torture and come to life so much later - he'd had a life and lost it to torture. But no matter what they were, they both loved Steve and-- "I will," he promised, quiet, and by the look in those searching green eyes? She believed him.

Natasha popped up on tiptoes, placing her lips to his cheek and Steve let out the same sound of surprise Bucky did, then she was releasing Bucky and shoving Steve playfully. He pulled her into a tight hug and she kissed his cheek too, then she was turning without the words goodbye - Bucky understood - and Steve called after her, lifting his voice with hands shoved in pockets--

"Aren't you glad I pulled on that thread?"

She stopped in the middle of the sidewalk, turned around with a flash of a slow, real smile on her face.

"I think maybe I am, Rogers."

"Hey Nat?"

"Yes, Barnes?"

"...maybe I'm a little sorry for shooting you."

"Which time?"

"Okay, now you're pushin' your luck."

Her lips pursed and her eyes rolled but she was fooling no one.
For once, everyone heard the I love you too's.

The view out the living-room windows was an upclose underneath the Manhattan bridge and an angled, more distant Brooklyn bridge. Bucky had no doubt there'd be plenty of study-sketches on both soon.

It was quiet, white and fancy now that the Avengers weren't bustling around and shouting over the newness of it all. There were tall white columns separating the window-view every ten feet and Steve stood beside one now, hand on the column as he watched the world outside and Bucky watched him.

Brooklyn'd never been this fancy for them. But nothing in Brooklyn was the same now as it'd been in the 40's - nothing but the bridge. So even with the tall glass and granite counters, the view from this apartment made it the closest available to the backalley-dirty-dripping apartments they used to share.

It was an atmosphere anyways, the mindset of across-the-bridge that still carried on the sidewalks, the smell from the docks that still lingered beneath the rush of newcenturytraffic if you got close enough to the water. And John Street was about as close to the water as one could be.

"Y'know," Steve started, staring quiet and pensive at the outside world. "The morning of that last mission in '45, the Commandos asked if I was going home to Brooklyn after the war."

Bucky peaked his hands together, palms flat against each other as metal fingers rippled quietly. He'd never gotten to thank them for being there for Steve after the fall. He'd never gotten to speak to any of them again, actually.

That mountaintop'd been the end of his brotherhood.

"I told them I wasn't."

Bucky looked up. He'd been surprised to hell that he hadn't found Steve in Brooklyn either of the times he'd ran into him, but he'd assumed that was the new-century thing. Of course Steve would've come back here if he'd survived the war. Why the fuck wouldn't he?

Steve's left hand - unmarred, human - reached up, tapping the glass like he could take them right back to the first time they'd stood on that bridge, before everything got so damned messy, when Bucky'd had two gentle hands too.

"Why?" He finally pressed, looking away from the flesh covering Steve's left arm.

It didn't matter anyways, Steve spun around and broke the spell, small smile on his face as he made his way to where Bucky was propped, leaning against the wall between the living-room and kitchen.

"Brooklyn was never about Bed-Stuy, brick buildings, dirt and the bridge." A shrug and Steve finally stopped in front of him, a foot away as their eyes met and Bucky forced his expression neutral, schooling into the mask that'd saved him in a hundred conversations like this, too deep to dig out.

Steve's hand extended and Bucky shifted so he could place the human, right one in Steve's. "For me, Brooklyn was a cocky smile...bright accent. Crystal eyes and warm hands pulling outta dark alleys."

Bucky tilted his head, running his thumb over Steve's pistol-calluses and wondering why Steve thought his eyes were crystal. Bucky'd always thought they were blue, gray. Ice.

"Now, I getta have both." Steve tugged him closer and Bucky let him, tipping his head up as their chests brushed, Steve's smile inches away.

What was Steve saying?

Brooklyn was a burrough. A home, right? So why wouldn't he go? Because he associated it with Bucky too much?

He blinked confusedly but like everything else, it stopped mattering a moment later because their lips touched and that, that's what mattered.

It was dizzying, still, kissing Steve. A possessive hand on his lower back pinning him close, the hard angles and curves of Steve's chest to contrast the smooth glide of their mouths slipping together, apart, angled and again.

The tension slipped from his shoulders somewhere between his tongue and Steve's and Bucky wrapped his arms around Steve's neck, the same time Steve reached his other arm down to gather Bucky closer. Except then they needed closer, and closer, never close enough.

Warm hands slid up the back of his shirt and Bucky circled his hips forward slowly, smile quirking at the sound in Steve's throat. Fingertips traced up and down his back, sliding over slender ribs and rubbing heat into his skin like they were still frozen in winter. Bucky melted, an icicle dripping into a puddle and Steve's strong arms were probably the only thing holding him up, weak-kneed and clinging to Steve's neck, almost unafraid to fall.

Their mouths broke apart and Bucky's eyes stayed closed, tipping his head against Steve's as the wet mouth ghosted hot air over his ear.

"Whaddu you say we christian these new rooms?" A damp kissed dropped right under his ear and Bucky squinched his nose, lifting his shoulders against Steve's ticklish nosing down. Steve squeezed his arms tighter around Bucky's back, strong and demanding and yes, Bucky'd love to christian something, to collapse to his knees and worship Steve right here and now, pray at his feet and take him into his mouth like the holy thing he was. Only Steve was holding him too tight to fall to his knees, mouthing back up to Bucky's ear to drop his voice low and dirty, "All of them."

"There's seven," Bucky managed - more breathless than scolding - and that was if they counted the living and dining rooms separately.

"Eleven, counting bathrooms and the laundry room," Steve pointed out helpfully, hand sliding down spine to squeeze his ass and Bucky laughed, threading his fingers through Steve's hair as he leaned back and bit his lip, affectionately scanning the pretty face.

Steve's eyes were bright like Bucky was the cutest thing he'd ever seen and yes, Bucky wanted to giggle his way through riding Steve on the couch, let Steve bend him over the bathtub, fuck him on the washer and yes yes, that sounded fantastic.

"Where do we start?" Bucky teased, and he was entirely unprepared for hard muscle suddenly sweeping him off his feet, tackling him to the ground with a careful hand catching his head before it hit white-maple floors.

If it'd been a few months ago, the move would've been anticipated, reacted, revenged. But he'd been outta training for so long, been way too tangled in Steve's bed to worry about optimum-functionality or proper efficiency or any of the things that used to keep him lethal - when was the last time he'd controlled his breathing, blinking?

- but the effort of focusing on expanding-decompressing-lungs when he could be focusing on the heavy weight pressing his hips into the floor or the look in Steve's eyes as he hovered playfully over Bucky's body, arms splayed to the side and wrists pinned under Steve's long wrapping fingers. That machine had been long disconnected and Bucky couldn't place when the hell that'd happened.

So he got tackled to the ground with nothing to show for protest and Bucky's heart was so so full.

"We start right here."

Eager hands yanked his shirt upwards, tugged off quick over his head and probably wrecking his bun but Bucky didn't care, not when Steve was kissing down his throat, his chest, making him roll his head lazily on the hardwood.

The soft lips kept kissing down and Bucky was all set to cup the back of Steve's head, let him wrap those pretty lips around Bucky's cock--

Only he stopped at Bucky's bellybutton, nosing against his abs and peppering little kisses over his stomach, lighter and lighter til it just tickled to hell and Bucky swatted at him, crinkling his nose against the laughter as his toes curled, thighs tightening.

Steve fluttered his eyelashes and kissed again, again-- Bucky caved, giddy giggle as he pushed at Steve's shoulder, tried to gruff at him to knock it off.

Peckpeckpeck and Steve paused, lifting his head only a touch so their eyes could meet, mouth still hovering over Bucky's stomach. The blue was so beautiful, looking up at Bucky like that with his shiny blond hair a halo over his unfairly handsome features and Bucky was so far gone, could look down his body to see Steve there for the rest of his life.

Their eyes held contact as the lips pressed again, promise, just above his bellybutton. "I love you," Steve declared quietly, just as soft and playful as the kisses were. Bucky sucked in a breath, stomach expanding under Steve's touch and Steve pressed another kiss, breaking off to say it again, "I love you."

Kiss. "I love you," kiss, "I love you," kiss, "I love you," kiss Iloveyou, kissiloveyoukissiloveyou--

The words froze on another pause and Steve hovered, eyes meeting Bucky's again with a flurry of warmth spreading through Bucky's stomach chest head fingertips. All the energy he used to trap there spinning under the surface of every place Steve declared his love and sealed it with his mouth and really, Bucky's lungs weren't working right.

Pink lips were parted, mouth open to say it again but he was waiting, waiting on something. Maybe waiting for Bucky to say it back. Bucky wet his lips, ran his hand over the curve of Steve's head, rucking up his hair while he waited, patiently, more patience than Steve'd ever had for anything else.

"Say it again," Bucky whispered, and the corner of Steve's mouth turned up just barely, so small it was hardly a smile, reflexive and stunning and then he was breathing the damnation over Bucky's skin again.

"I love you," serious, a kiss to his stomach. "I love you," reverent, a kiss to his sternum. "I love you," whispered, awed, a kiss to his mouth and Bucky kissed him back.

He kissed him back for a long long time.
"It's alarming how charming you can be--"

"Why thank you."

"--while still being a complete ass."

"I thought you liked my ass," Bucky teased and Steve leaned over the stair railing to swat said-ass, only Bucky dashed up a step further before he could and the rail barred Steve's bare chest from reaching.

"C'mere." Steve made grabby hands and Bucky's reddened lips were curled up at one corner, leaning over the side of the stair-balcony, a strand of stray hair escaping his workout bun.

"You come up here."

"I've been on the bar for an hour, I'm not doing that weird flip-workout with you."

"Aww. Callin' it early?"

"Shut up, you're hard to workout with."

"What was that about hard?" Bucky teased again, sliding down a step to hover over Steve's upturned face. Popping up on his tiptoes let their lips barely brush and Steve just wanted to lick the sweat off Bucky's neck, he should really come down here.

It was unfair as hell, straining up to have his lips just dance across Bucky's, faint taste of salt and plush give much too far away. "Closer, do me deeper," Steve murmured and Bucky groaned, at least three-quarters annoyance.

A metal hand thwacked him upside the head for the comment, but he did lean over the balcony further and Steve sucked that pretty bottom lip into his mouth, stomach tightening with sparks as Bucky shuddered, pressing closer. He reached up to pull the sweaty body down further and suddenly Bucky popped upright, entirely outta reach as Steve landed flat-footed with an offended sound.

"Uhuh, I've fallen for you enough times," Bucky shook his head and Steve strained up on his tiptoes again, trying to snag Buck's arm or something except he was halfway up the goddamned stairs and the serum didn't make him Elastigirl.

"I only remember one train," he huffed, fingertips grazing metal before Bucky took a step backwards, impossible to reach now as his pretty mouth twitched up in that beautiful smile again.

"Who said I was talking about trains?"

The words were hardly outta his mouth before Bucky was dashing up the second-half of the stairs and Steve rushed to swing around the railing and race after him, panting from the workout they'd just finished.

"Did Bucky Barnes just admit he's fallen in love with me?" The pounding in his chest nearly matched the thudding in his head, both outnumbered by the stupid smile stretched across his face.

"I didn't say that," Bucky pointed out, starting into a jog around the upper-floor track and Steve broke into a quick run, grabbing Bucky's shoulders and yanking him backwards into his chest, wrapping his pulsing arms around Bucky's stomach, eyes drifting shut to avoid the sweat running down his temple as he tipped his breathing-heavy mouth against Bucky's ear.

"Yeah, okay, you fell in like with me." The sarcasm invoked rolled-eyes Steve didn't need to spin Bucky around to see. He nosed along the scruffed jaw, nipping the side of Bucky's chin, smiling too much to sell the teasing. "It's just my irresistible body isn't it?"

"Irresistible?" Bucky scoffed, tipping his head back against Steve's shoulder, hips rolling backwards against Steve's gym shorts as his voice dropped an octave, "Prove it."

See, this was why coming to workout at Stark's gym was a good idea. Tony'd been elated to see them, offering for Jarvis to send down Gatorade or something and they'd both waved him off, insisted they'd barely moved out a day ago.

"It's been three, two of which I'm sure no one wore clothes for--"

"Tony!"

"What? It's like an early honeym-- Nevermind. Go enjoy your workout."

At least Stark's mouth had snapped shut at Steve's warning glare because Bucky was right there and not exactly the time to be talking about honeymoons when the ring was getting its final touches engraved in Tony's most-private lab.

Steve still couldn't believe it.

But he was gonna prove to Bucky, one way or another, he was permanent, forever. This, they could have for eternity.

And speaking of proving things...

"How would you like me to do that?" Steve whispered in response, making Bucky's eyelashes flutter as he tightened the curl of his fingers in hard muscle.

"Hmm." Bucky tipped his ass back against tented gym shorts and Steve's vision swam with want. "Ooo, I have an idea. I dare you...to bench me."

Not exactly what he'd been thinking, but. It was a dare. Steve ran his hand up Bucky's side, peering down his body as he made a contemplative noise. "You weigh what, 190?"

"Think you can't?"

He was 90% sure Bucky said that just for the face Steve gave him in return. But either way, he was on the ground with Bucky balancing on his palms ten seconds later.

"Jesus fucking Christ you're heavy." He groaned, folding his arms in half and pushing a very smug looking Bucky a foot upwards.

"I had a big breakfast."

"Nrgh."

There was a lot of huffing and puffing, but he got in twenty reps before the teasing started, about the same time the sweating started and this was nowhere-fucking-near 190lbs.

To be fair he was already exhausted, he had every right to unceremoniously dump Bucky on the ground after fifty and whine. "How much does that goddamn arm weigh?"
"A lot." Bucky shook his head, freed strands of hair sticking to the side of his face as he looked up at Steve from the ground, eyebrows raised. "You wouldn't believe how long it took me to handle the weight."

He didn't mean to shut down.

Bucky saw the moment his expression turned from light-hearted to maudlin, bright eyes fading as the gravity sunk down, heavier than the arm for either of them.

"I'm sorry, Bucky," Steve whispered and Bucky was tired, so tired of tossing aside Steve's thousand apologies and pretending nothing mattered - being blue is better than being over it.

"Y'know." He stuck up his right hand and Steve pulled him to his feet, sweat making the grip precarious as fingers clung too tight and blue eyes searched his. Bucky nodded, looked off into the distance, the empty side of Stark's gym. "I'm sorry about it too."

"You miss it?"

"My arm? Sometimes. Do you?"

"Sometimes. Sometimes I think about how it use to be, both your arms around me. I never appreciated enough, I don't think. Not that the metal isn't beautiful..."

"I know."

His right palm on Steve's cheek and pretty blue eyes closed, head tipping into Bucky's hand, sorrow etched into his mouth and heart laying at his feet. Bucky'd trip over it if Steve didn't get it together. If they both didn't get it together.

"Showers?"

"Race you," Steve whispered, eyes opening, and they were gone.

Bucky won. Not because he was faster, but because Steve wasn't even trying. Steve was too busy staring at him with big broken doe eyes and Bucky dashed over the threshold to sag against the wall, wiping sweat off his forehead and regretting it a moment later because salt in his eyes would be an excuse for the tears welling up in his chest.

Steve stood in the threshold, eyes flickering between centuries. They'd raced here once before, but he had a feeling Steve was thinking a race to different showers. The last conversation they'd had before Bucky ripped his heart of his chest and buried it in European soil.

Steve knew that now. Knew the conversation with Peggy wasn't about Zola, it'd been Peg discovering his feelings and just so long as he kept his mouth shut--

"What did you tell her?" Steve whispered and the first time, Bucky'd been exhausted and happy and laughing and wanting Steve to kiss him more than anything else in the world only right now Bucky knew pushing his lips against Steve's wouldn't be the kind he'd meant in '45.

"Will you wash my hair?" Bucky said instead and Steve nodded like Bucky hadn't blown off his question, like he'd been expecting that answer all along, closing the door and bolting the lock because this was still official Avengers property.

The water was scalding, the kind he liked and Steve scolded him for but Steve didn't say anything today, tipping Bucky's head back in the spray a little forcefully and Bucky closed his eyes against the urge to scream because he couldn't handle manhandling his head into a sharp spray of water but he wasn't gonna flip and trigger right here right now, the last time he'd drowned in years of torture he'd woken with a gun pressed to Steve's forehead.

And if he freaked, Steve'd know he'd only asked as a distraction, so Steve wouldn't press about that. Thudding heart was better than that confession.

Hands scrubbed him down, sliding suds over Bucky's bare body shamelessly, like Steve already had every inch of him memorized.

There was a hiss as Steve accidentally brushed the left arm Bucky was keeping tucked aside because it heat up like a motherfucker, but by the time Bucky blinked open to apologize Steve already masked the pain and moved on. A kiss dropped to the top of his head as he tipped it back again and Bucky forced his fists to unclench.

Then Steve's wet, naked body was sliding up behind his and Bucky's breath caught in humid lungs.

Rough fingers squeezed the back of his neck, rubbing thumbs deep into muscle and yeah, okay.

The world around them heated steam, a poor excuse for fire. Making bodies sticky and puffs of breath wet as Steve slid hard flesh through Bucky's crease and Jesus Christ it felt surreal, water pounding from above and eyes closed, head tipped and both their lips parted in damaged ecstasy.

Steve propped Bucky's naked body on the bench, spread his legs with demanding hands, exposure sending shivers down his spine and Steve opened him up with quick fingers coated in conditioner, water dripping down the blonde hair hanging over his forehead like the bangs he used to wear and Bucky tipped his head back against the wall and inhaled thick smoke.

The last time he'd been in this shower room with Steve, his world had been upside-down and they'd laughed their way through washing Bucky's hair and everything had been safe and beautiful and Bucky wanted to laugh again, wanted to suck the smile off Steve's lips instead of stare into cloudy, teary eyes.

"C'mere," Bucky croaked, hoarse from disuse and the fingers twisting in his ass - Steve bent over to kiss Bucky's mouth, but that's not what he meant.

He pulled Steve down with their mouths still attached, right arm wrapping over Steve's shoulders and dragging him to the bench. Steve plopped down with a wet sound and Bucky swung a leg over his lap, grabbing the conditioner and wrapping his palm around Steve's cock to slick him up.

Steve's hips stuttered and his mouth opened wider and Bucky licked inside, running his tongue over Steve's teeth like he'd bite Bucky properly hard if he just begged enough.

Heat pulsed in his hand and Bucky broke off, placing the metal hand on the shower wall beside Steve's head, watching steam curl off it as he registered shower water hitting his calves, Steve's knees.

"In French," Bucky started, clearing his throat as he lifted up, hovering over Steve's lap with his hand steadying for the drive down to come. "--the word for orgasm is la petite mort. It means little death."

"Little death," Steve echoed, then Bucky was sinking down on him and the blonde head tipped back against the wet shower wall, eyes closed and lips parted in bliss, voice echoing and hollow over the pounding water, "Alors...on va voir."
On va voir it was.

Bucky lifted himself up and lowered again, filling up so quick with Steve his head was spinning and the pretty throat groaned, Steve's head still back like he couldn't lift it himself, bruises squeezing into Bucky's hips as he let Bucky ride him slow, closed blues allowed Bucky's stares over every flickering change on Steve's face.

God he was beautiful. Bucky could sink his teeth into Steve's neck and swallow him whole.

Not--

He shouldn't be thinking like that he shouldn't want to devour--

"C'mon, baby, show me what you got," Bucky whispered because he couldn't be in control of this right now and Steve sucked in a breath, fingers pulsating on Bucky's skin, then blue eyes were opening and Bucky handed over reigns that weren't a leash, weren't.

An arm tightened around Bucky's back, a slow roll grind up into his body and his abs clenched against the burn in his stomach. He squirmed on Steve's lap and the gaze flashed heated, both arms wrapping around as Steve rocked harder inside and Bucky's vision swam.

He arched against Steve's chest, oxygen spilling through his head and saturating the world bright and pink lips made a hungry sound that ate the heart right outta him. A scalding mouth enveloped the skin beneath his ear, mouthing wide and sucking a touch as lips slid off, eyes fluttering closed as Steve kissed his neck open-mouthed, down and down like the shivers in his spine, teeth scraping over his collarbone possessively.

"Always a goddamned challenge," Steve growled against Bucky's skin and he couldn't help it, it was just so petulant and young and seriously, Jesus Christ, Steve was the one who didn't know how to back down from a single thing, so what if Bucky used it to his advantage sometimes?

It couldn't be helped. He laughed.

He was having lap-shower-room-sex with his best friend and Steve had to be so Steve, he couldn't stop the burst of sound and his torso wracked with it, muscles tensing from the force of the unexpected joy in his chest and the arms around his back curled closer. Steve was smiling against his collarbone now, Bucky could feel it, and holy hell that felt incredible, Steve's cock filling him to the brim and tracing little circles inside him as hips rolled lazy while Bucky laughed in his lap and Steve hid his smile against his skin and he was lightheaded with it all, shower room zooming outta focus and it was only Steve's embrace holding him upright.

And solid enough for Steve to draw out, slide back in deep, rubbing muscles shifting to part for Steve inside him and Bucky crumbled, deflating against Steve's chest with a fervid groan and he could have a fever from how riled up Steve's touch got him and jeez if that wasn't ironic and his mouth was laughing again, high and light and so turned on, curled against Steve's chest with their bodies connected like this and-- "I love your laugh," Steve murmured and Bucky's smile cut on a glass edge, fading a touch as the sound of laughter stilted on his lips but it wasn't sinking, it was just silence. Steve pulled back anyways, two big palms lifting Bucky's head from his chest.

Hips tipped up against him again, again, and Bucky trembled, sinking up and down but Steve didn't let go of his face, staring right in Bucky's eyes through every shuddering breath and trembling muscle.
"I love your soul," he whispered and Bucky started to shake his head, break free but Steve held on closer, their foreheads nearly touching and Bucky couldn't get away--

"I love your everything." Steve's words were the challenge now, fingers reinforcing as he refused to let Bucky turn away, hide his face and how much was Steve seeing in his eyes that Bucky'd spent so long hiding?

There weren't a lot of defenses at this point - fuck, they were fighting even while they screwed - but to tighten his body up and take back enough control to get Steve choking on his tongue instead of digging his own grave.

He shouldn't be saying that shit, Bucky'd kick his ass for it if his hair were shorter and his eyes were brighter but he'd hurt Steve too much by now, the only thing he could do was try to drag Steve away from the six-foot-pit he was rushing towards. Like this, if he kept this up - pushing into Bucky's body over and over, holding him by his face in worship and spilling those condemnations--

They weren't going to survive that. If Steve planted his roots inside Bucky's chest, when Bucky shattered Steve would wilt and die and the scars they had from each other were already too deep, he couldn't be fool enough to let Steve close artist hands around his heart and squeeze squeeze

The years he had on Steve meant nothing. Steve would die and leave him behind because the sun exploded if it kept chasing the night. His long legs could only keep running forever and Steve wasn't made to run, Bucky was, he couldn't let Steve trip and fall following him.

No more falling allowed.

Prying the hands off his face, Steve opened his mouth to protest but Bucky didn't give him the chance, pressing his mouth over Steve's open one and shoving their entwined hands against the wall.
Didn't think of how scalding his left hand had to be, pinning Steve there and bracing his knees, riding him hard and proper now and Steve whimpered and gasped beneath him and Bucky's head was pounding more than his heart and he had to close his eyes, duck his head, focus on anything that wasn't impending cemetery.

Over and over, so full of Steve he couldn't breathe and the drag out didn't register, only deep thrusts again and again, sliding so fast into Bucky's ass there was no room for anything in between but a broken cry of Steve's name.

With the slick rapture of bodies, sounds spilling from his throat, encircled in steam and heat, he could shove it all aside. For as long as it took for their bodies to heat each other up, turbulence rocking them in crescendo and the mouth on his was so wet, wet as the shower-pearls tapping his ankles, feet. It was hardly kissing, mouths slotting together sloppily as Steve's cock slotted firm and precise.
Muscle made of marble and Bucky latched tight enough onto the statue to fear his own grip, fear shattering walltiles or bones; shoving them into the abyss together and it did feel like going up in flames, burning hand in hand, then the edge rushed and they tipped over and Hollow chest gasping, stuffed sunshine moaning over his tongue and hands broke from the wall to wrap around him again and if Bucky wasn't spinning like the Cyclone he'd have the sense to shove Steve off him instead of collapsing against his chest but here he was, breathing open-mouthed against wet skin and one hand was in Bucky's hair and the other was rubbing his lower back, massaging the outside shell where Steve was sheathed inside and Bucky couldn't do anything but cling and wish his mouth could open in more than begging, broken sounds but that was all he had left anymore, wasn't it?

Strong arms lifted him off the bench and Bucky's legs were rubber. Weak. Staggering weight held him steady as the shower water washed over their heads. Careful, loving fingers slid over his ass, dipped inside enough to clean him out and Bucky coughed into Steve's chest and tried not to collapse on the wet floor.

Footing caught in time for him to grab the shampoo from Steve's grip, turn broad shoulders and reach up on his tiptoes with a hand cupping the edge of Steve's forehead. Bucky'd allowed him twice, the least he could do was let Bucky wash the blonde hair the way he used to when the fights were bad, when Steve was bleeding too much, too many bruises. They were both dotted in bruises now, but the blood was all internal--

Bucky'd asked Steve if he could taste the blood on his lips of the people he'd slaughtered and Steve'd demanded, can you taste mine?

He still didn't know how to do this.

"Do you remember..." Bucky started, fluffy towel around his waist, dropping the hair-drying one to the floor as he ran fingers through dreadful long strands, watching the movement in the mirror. The same mirror he'd stood in front of when Steve looked at him with that look and Bucky'd lied about his hair because he saw the question and he couldn't face himself - not then, not that day when everything was so fresh - and admit boiling hatred.

The shower was dripping in the background and that wasn't like Stark, to have some non-perfect piece of equipment but Bucky wasn't sure anyone but he and Steve used these showers anyways.

The beautiful familiar face slid up behind him, peering over Bucky's shoulder into the mirror, arms wrapping over Bucky's stomach as blue searched in foggy-edged glass. Bucky dropped his gaze, stared at the sink,

"...after our first kiss, what we talked about?"

He should just keep his mouth shut, really, but his body was aching and his soul was aching and Steve was looking over his shoulder and the words were already out anyways.

"What, you catching a hint?" Steve teased and Bucky was always the one shutting that down, wasn't he?

"No," he exhaled and Steve's heartbeat flashed before the words dropped between them and this'd be easier if they didn't know each other's worlds better than their own. His fingertips worried over Steve's wrist and his hand was goddamned warm, had he burned Steve's fingers-- "That it wasn't gonna change anything."

It wasn't as bad as the sinking deflation he got the first time he said it. Steve swallowed, quiet enough for the echo not to snatch his words and run away.

"It kinda changed everything."

Bucky lifted his head and eyes locked through clearing fog, if only their minds could clear that fast too, if only his lungs could clear from the ice he'd drowned in.

"Did it? Or are we using the excuse of this--" a gesture between their naked bodies, as if Steve didn't know exactly what he was talking about, "--to pretend we've improved?" Steve's head cocked and Bucky's mouth wouldn't seal closed. "I mean. We talk even less now that we can kiss to shut the other up."
"Or do we have less to fight about? We've shared a connection Bucky. A deep, deep connection. I've been inside you, inside your body, that's..." Steve whistled low without the sound, overwhelmed rush of air. His hands on Bucky's hips, sliding up and down bone, "--combining the emotional and physical together like that? Maybe we're closer than ever. Maybe we're just living behind the same mask now, we don't need to ramble our emotions when I can see them, feel them on you."

Fingertips traced up his sternum and Bucky watched so he didn't have to meet ice - crystal - in the mirror.

"Maybe," he relented. Or maybe Bucky was pretending all along. How could he know? Real? Unreal. Real?

Ice finally caught up to him and he stared at their reflections in the mirror and had no idea what was staring back at them.

~~~

The new apartment meant an array of new sounds, but the shuffle of someone in another room was unmistakable. Not to mention that sharing a bed meant Steve couldn't sneak off so easy now, not when Bucky woke up freezing in the middle of the night.

Unless he was looking to buy more apartments, Bucky couldn't imagine a reason Steve might wanna be up at 2am, so he stuck to the shadows and slipped outta their bedroom, moved carefully over newly-familiarizing terrain.

He found Steve at the kitchen table, sitting in the darkness and barely illuminated gold and white, lights off the Brooklyn bridge playing diffused golden dots around the room, over his skin. There was a glass in his hands, some unidentified liquid swirling slightly as Steve stared at the lights dancing off the glass's facets, perfectly silent.

It wasn't a nightmare, because Bucky always woke to those, even when they were in different rooms. But it was something.

He watched from the shadows, hair framing the edges of his eyes, arms crossed over his chest.

Steve took a sip from his glass, setting it down quiet enough he had to be aware of it, he was purposefully trying not to wake Bucky. Too late.

Shifting in his seat at the table, profile glowing as blue eyes looked out distant windows, bridges glittering in the distance, fading sounds to match. At first glance, it could be peaceful.

Only Steve's hands were shaking.

Bucky's chest tightened protectively but he couldn't step outta the shadows now, Steve didn't need generic comfort. Bucky needed to know what was wrong.

Long fingers raked through blonde hair, rucking it spiked the way it's been when they'd first met again. Bucky couldn't decide which was brighter. Before Bucky or After Everything, which was better? Whichever was true, right now it didn't matter whether Bucky was here or not, Steve was falling apart.

He could feel the itch from here, the restless tapping of Steve's foot and the twitching fingertips and the tense shoulders--
Thirty seconds, that's how long Steve lasted with his fingers buried in his hair before he was up, outta the chair with hands falling to his sides, attempting to shove in pockets that weren't there. He was only in boxer shorts and one of Bucky's t-shirts, no pockets to be had and Steve shifted uncomfortably on his bare feet, lifting his hands in the diffused light and staring at his palms like they'd betrayed him for not disappearing into pockets the way he wanted.

Did he see they were trembling or was he blind to that too?

The unease was palpable but the hands fell back to his sides, then barefeet were worrying shine into the wooden floors. Restless pacing, back and forth back and forth, edge of the couch to the table and back again and Bucky watched unmoving in the shadows, eyes dancing horizontally as he traced Steve's movements, back forth back forth.

It ended as abruptly as it started. One moment Steve was pacing and the next he was stalking into the living room. Grabbed a sketchpad off the coffeetable, searched the kitchen for a pencil, and plopped back down in his first seat, scooting the half-empty glass aside as graphite touched clean paper.

Bucky almost snuck back to the bedroom. Maybe Steve simply needed to draw, maybe he'd been pacing because he was looking for inspiration. Bucky'd told him he should get back into it, maybe it was as simple as that.

For selfish reasons, he decided to stay a moment or two longer. Bucky liked watching Steve draw almost more than he liked the drawings themselves. It was just the only time he got to see Steve peaceful.

Except there was no peace to be found this time.

He was too far to see the subject - not too far to see the stressed grip on the pencil - but Steve couldn't've gotten more than a basic outline done before he suddenly snapped, ripping the page outta the notebook fast and hard. It was louder than everything else he'd done and if he was regular-frustrated, he would've looked up as he realized, checked to see if he woke Bucky.

If it was about drawing, that's what he'd do, but apparently drawing was a symptom and not a cause because he didn't even hear the sound. He just ripped the paper in half again. Then crumpled, fists curling it into a ball and tossing it aside like the paper burned and Bucky had to roll in his lips to keep the pitying, hurt sound inside his mouth.

Steve needed him, but he still didn't know enough--

Drawing destroyed, Steve shoved up from the table again, chair screeching and eyes wild as his hair in the flickering light. He paced to the wall Bucky'd leaned on, listening to Steve talk about the Commandos and Brooklyn. Only he didn't collapse against it, he turned and stared at it like it'd personally flattened him and then strong arms were extending, fingers splayed like the volleyball game they'd played.

Setting-position and fingertips pressed against the white paint, the hard surface holding Steve up as he leaned forward, pushing against the wall like he could break right through. He could, if he tried hard enough. Or maybe he wasn't trying to get through, maybe he was trying to move the wall.

Bucky watched him, metal fingers digging into his own flesh, unable to tear his eyes away from Steve's distress.

The wall didn't cave. It wasn't like Old Brooklyn - muddled by too much give, pushing against rotted apartment walls that were supposed to be sturdy and solid but bowed under touch like a flimsy mattress. New Brooklyn was frozen, like them.

Steve broke off, taking a single step backwards, then another. Spinning around and at least Bucky could see his face now, but for once maybe that wasn't a good thing.

It hurt. It hurt something inside Bucky's chest and he didn't know how to patch up this one, didn't know what stitches Stevie needed now.

A tired hand wiped down Steve's face and his expression wilted, pained but...defeated, almost.

Blue eyes were caught on his hands now, staring at them again but maybe really seeing them this time. No, definitely. Steve stared down at his hands and Bucky could see the moment he realized they were shaking.

He couldn't decide if that realization hurt Steve or him more.

A shocked, ragged suck of oxygen and Steve clenched his shaking hands into curled fists and that was it - that was it.

Those fists.

Bucky slipped back through the shadows, treading silently to their bedroom as Steve collapsed tiredly back into his chair, glass spilling atop rainbow facets cutting the room as his hands uncurled from fists to hold crystal and never stopped shaking.

~~~

"Bye babe," Steve leaned over the back of the couch and kissed his cheek, barely pausing his momentum for the door. "Gonna go see Thor and Clint."

"Again? What could you three possibly get up to?" Bucky teased, standing with a stretch that had Steve pausing, eyes lewdly grazing up and down Bucky's body while Bucky rolled his eyes.

"Avenger stuff," Steve shrugged, mischief-smile tucked in the corner of his mouth as he leaned a shoulder against the wall he'd been trying to break three nights ago. Bucky didn't think about that, Bucky raised his eyebrows and bit his lip to hide his smile too.

"Steven Grant Rogers, you think me - me - of all people is gonna fall for your bullshit after all this time--"

His mini-rant was interrupted by Steve tipping his face upward and pushing their mouths together, lips tugging on Bucky's with the drawback and Bucky shook his head affectionately, tapping his palm against Steve's chest and prying his eyes open to see the smile on Steve's face from inches away.

"Go," Bucky allowed, pushing Steve backwards a step. Their lips locked again and he managed enough motor control to keep them moving for the door, butterflies tickling his stomach on the slide apart, taking a second longer to blink his eyes open this time. "Get on, then."

The next kiss was a touch shorter and Bucky was about to drag Steve back to the couch if he didn't leave soon. "Tell Thunderbird...." Another soft collide of their mouths and this would be the last one, really, they were basically up against the door now all he had to do was shove Steve through it, "...I said hi."

He really would've let go and put Steve out the door at that point, but warm hands were sliding under the hem of Bucky's sweats and Steve tugged him impossibly close, a whole different kind'a rush this time as he squeezed Bucky's ass and kissed him ardent. Hard-pressed from all sides and Steve's mouth was intoxicating, heat shivering up Bucky's spine at the touch kneading bare flesh, deep enough to make him dizzy as he crowded as close to Steve's chest as he could, let Steve's lips play over his.

"Hi? You say hi?" Steve murmured against his mouth, rocking them from side to side while his hands smoothed affectionately over skin, petting Bucky's ass like it was his favorite thing. "No witty remark?"

A peck to his mouth and Bucky leaned up for more, only Steve ducked his head back, just outta reach, teasing shine over blue. "No bitchy comment this time?"

Steve may be cute but Bucky was strung-up and determined, pressing up on his tiptoes to tug Steve's bottom lip into his mouth and hook him back into kissing proper again, which Steve seemed more than willing to do, stave the few interruptions. "You honestly give your greetings?" He teased again, which definitely invoked a nip or two before their lips broke apart again.

"You're so annoying," Bucky complained, pressing the side of his nose to Steve's. "Why do I put up with you?"

Mouths tipped forward to meet again and there was that smile on Steve's face, that disastrous one that always spelled trouble; quite rarely in a good way. Bucky could taste it, right before they broke again and Steve said it, smug against Bucky's lips.

"You looveee me," he sing-songed and Bucky pulled back enough to properly roll his eyes, then Steve was only pressing forward more determined, kissing solid hard serious before they broke and, "You love me," he declared again.

Bucky leaned up and pressed his mouth to Steve's again so he'd shut up - see - and Steve was having none of it, kissing Bucky back for a moment before his hands slipped outta Bucky's pants and wrapped around his back instead, holding him tight and close as he lifted off long enough to say it again, "You love me."

Their mouths met again and Steve kissed him like he meant it, like he was painting the words onto Bucky's lips so he could parrot them back, "You love me, you love me."

Youlovemeyouloveme

He was getting squirmy, trying to wiggle free from Steve's grip surreptitiously, afraid to stop kissing Steve lest he say something really stupid and it was kinda impossible to get-away-but-keep-kissing and Steve just kept saying it with that teasing tone from when they were kids and Bucky just couldn't take it anymore.

"Okay okay, enough, enough," Bucky broke off, reaching behind Steve to grab the doorhandle and yank it open, stumbling them awkwardly into the open space and Steve's grip loosened enough for Bucky to plant a hand on his chest, a quick peck on his lips, and shove him into the hallway. "Get outta here, punk."

He smacked a playful hand over Steve's pretty ass and stepped out to peck his cheek as fast as humanly possible, closing the door between them with a wilting rush of relief, totally oblivious to Steve standing in the hallway on the other side, staring at the closed door while the smile on his face faded away.
The explosion was bigger than he'd predicted, so Steve was cursing and revving his bike to safety before he got either fried or lectured, popping a wheelie to slam over a stray robot and crush it under tires. Tony was complaining a litany over the mics about people trying to copy his tech and Sam'd probably begged him to shutup twenty times already, but half the robot-things were smashed at this point and it didn't look like any of the dead ones were getting up, so it'd all be over soon enough anyways.

"Shit, where the fu--" Static cut out over the line and Steve slammed his bike to a halt, searching over his shoulder frantically because that was Bucky's voice that'd just disappeared.

"Buck!" Steve called out, twisting the ignition again and whipping in a circle to start back for the exploded patch of trees. "Barnes, do you copy?"

The mic in his helmet went quiet as Tony finally shut his mouth long enough to see if Buck replied. Only he didn't. Sam cursed softly, the sound of whooshing wings soaring by overhead.

"I'll see if I can spot him, Cap-- Steve."

"You guys got search-and-rescue, right, because I'm still holding off the other half of these asshat-sorry-excuses-for-a-robots."

"S'fine, Stark, he can't be far-- BUCKY!"

"Jesus Christ you can't shout into a microphone, take off the goddamned helmet if you're gonna blast out everyone's hearing."

Steve ignored Tony and whipped around the closest tree, back tire skidding out before it caught with a jolt and whistling wind soared past, smoke curling in the distance and fire dancing at the edges of leaves and fuck if that wasn't a familiar sight.

European soil flashed behind his eyes and Steve blinked, shaking his head to dislodge the memory. The smell of burning sap and twisting metal --

Blink

A blast exploded two feet to his left and Steve cursed, sliding the bike on its side to avoid the fire and rolled off in a flash of shield and blue, ducking to avoid another soaring grenade, diving around the closest tree and dropping to the ground with another curse.

Laughter echoed behind him and Steve zapped his shield to the metallic grips on his arm, spinning around with his mouth already open to scold, "Watch where the fuck you're throwing those things, Jacques."

Except

Except Dernier wasn't there, the air was too warm and the trees were wrong and a little metal head poked up from behind a log, eyes blinking purple. Fuck fuck, 2015, he was fighting with the Avengers, not the Commandos and where the hell was Bucky?

Jumping the log to smash a stray robot with his shield, Steve held his breath and listened, if Bucky wasn't on comms he might be shouting at least?

Except the Winter Soldier apparently only screamed at him, because the world was dead-silent. except the occasional explosion and curse from Stark or update from Sam and nonono, he wasn't gonna lose Bucky in some silly-ass low-grade fight--

A smashing metallic whirr sounded to the right and Steve took off, slamming his shield into a tree to ricochet off and soar down into a wooded valley, where a small herd of robots were pouring in one side and a very pissed off soldier was punching and throwing and ripping apart metal pieces which should've been a terrifying sight but Steve could've collapsed with relief.

"Bucky, you're okay," he breathed, running forward to smash a row of metal-toothed things and Bucky glanced over his shoulder at Steve, mouth curling into a little amused smile that Steve could actually see because Buck wasn't in the mask - he was in a uniform he'd drawn and designed himself, mostly black and blue but as stunning and efficient as he was.

"Yeah, one fucked up my comms but they're so goddamned small it's annoying as fuck-- ow!" Two robots jumped on Bucky's back, claws sinking into the exposed skin on his neck and Steve threw his shield into the remaining herd, dominoing nearly all of them as he ripped the two clawing off, throwing them at the nearest tree with a tiny explosion, pieces of metal raining down on them like confetti as he wrapped an arm around Bucky's waist and pulled him in.

Bucky's mouth crashed into his and Steve curled his hand in the blue straps across Bucky's back, kissing him with every ounce of the fear from the moment he'd been gone and everything that could've happened, teeth scraping a plush bottom lip and it was a little violent and rough but his heart was pounding and there'd been so many times in this war, in the last one, he'd been so sure Bucky might die and he'd never gotten to kiss him after so he had a lot to make up for.

A metal hand between their chests finally shoved him off, just in time to backhand a robot Steve'd missed, then soft blue eyes were looking up at him like both their mouths weren't bruised to hell.

"I'm okay, Stevie," Bucky promised, metal thumb dragging over Steve's bottom lip with a sweet smile, "I had 'em on the ropes." His pounding heart stopped entirely.

The last time Bucky'd said that, he'd put a gun to his temple. The time before that, he'd fallen off a train.

"Steve? Why are you looking at me like that? Are you alright? Oh my god, please don't cry, I swear, I'm right here--"

"Buck," he managed, and warm fingers were wiping under his eye, Bucky's calluses rough against thin skin but Steve didn't care, he'd lost Bucky so many times--

"Not goin' anywhere. Promise, Stevie, you and me," Bucky swore under his breath, lifting Steve's wrist to trace a line around his wrist, the perpendicular ending dash and Steve breathed out through his nose, forcing himself to calm because Buck was strong now, so strong and he promised he wasn't leaving and so what if they'd broken promises, they were fucking keeping that one.

Metal fingers curled over his heart and Steve threaded his fingers through Bucky's hair, tickling soft on the back of his hand, his wrist, bright eyes looking up at him expectantly, waiting. The air between them was still filled with shuddering sounds, breaking metal robots underfoot but it might as well've been lightning, the electricity swooping through his stomach.

Their lips met soft and slow this time, gentle as the summer air around them and it didn't feel like Europe anymore, this didn't feel much like Europe at all.
Stark didn't complain half as much as Steve'd expected when they got back to the battle, a few exchanged kisses later. And maybe when he kickflipped a stack of leering purple-eyes and landed next to Bucky, he swept him in for another quick one but to be fair, it wasn't like they were in public. Or really grave danger, this was definitely in the mild-danger category.

Stark complained a lot more then. Sam told him to shut up and that solved that (for once) and so what if he stole one more peck before breaking off to catch Tony's six again?

"Hey Buck," Steve parroted over the comms (after Stark'd turned Buck's back on), slicing the head off a robot and sending sparks and wires in every direction. "Does it bother you that in all the documentaries about us there's no mention of us?"

"What?" Sam whispered.

"Hell if I know," Tony muttered.

"Not once," Steve continued, ignoring his asshole friends. "Maybe no one will ever know I loved you way back then..."

"We know," Tony offered and Bucky flipped him off with a shiny finger. Tony flipped him off with a shiny finger in return and Steve kept ignoring them, not a break in his speech.

"--that you died for me and I died for you. That we finally won when we found each other."

"A sap. I'm dating a total sap." Bucky sighed and tossed a robot at Tony, who shot it outta the air with a little more zealous than necessary.

About to be engaged to Steve muttered under his breath and by the lack of shocked responses from any parties present, it was quiet enough. So he lifted his voice, a little, directed straight at Bucky this time. "What if we were...y'know. More than that."

It wasn't like he was popping the question, he was running an idea by his best friend because that's what he did. If he planned on furthering a relationship to any point, Bucky'd kinda be the person he'd consult, so.

"More than the mess we're at now? Like you're ready for that?" Buck snorted and crushed a robot-skull in his bare hand. "I don't think so."

Steve frowned, running a finger over the outline in his pocket. He wasn't planning on it right now or anything, but Stark'd just given it to him on the jetride over - surprisingly secretively - and he couldn't help but think that really, Bucky was wrong. Steve was more than ready for that. Steve was ready for fucking anything.

The jet stopped downtown for the four of them to grab dinner. It was an older place, one of the golden-lighted bars that were dark enough inside you couldn't pick apart clothing colors or certain dishes or centuries.

It wasn't the 40s. He wasn't with the Commandos. Steve knew that, and looking around at all that golden glow was making him more and more pissed he'd lost his grip in the woods. How long had he been in this fucking century? It wasn't like the battles he was fighting now were anything like the ones he'd fought back then. The people weren't the same. Hell, even Buck had a metal arm and a whole different fighting style.
"-eve?"

"Sorry, what?" He blinked and turned to Sam, who was looking at him concernedly. Actually, on second thought, all three were looking at him concernedly. "Spaced out," he dismissed, reaching for his fork to take a bite of whatever Bucky'd ordered for him. So everyone else was halfway through theirs, he was a fast eater anyways.

He was fast at a lot of things now, jumping from one thing to the next to the next and his body did more than keep up. Hell, it was encouraging him faster. See, he could do so much now, he had a responsibility--

"Steve, you alright with that?"

"Hmm? Yeah, sure," he agreed, making Bucky look at him funny, tucking long brown hair behind his ear and tipping his feet forward to catch Steve's under the table. He was fine, he was just thinking was all.

Why would Bucky think he wasn't ready for a more committed relationship? This was their lives, and if today was anything like a reminder, they weren't guaranteed long ones and he'd really like to make the most of it while they were still some semblance of young.

A hand pulling him outta his seat made his head snap up in surprise, then Bucky was weaving their arms together and waving goodbye for the both of them, door ringing shut behind them as the faux-lit sidewalk opened up under their feet.

"Wa- where are we going?"

"Home," Bucky furrowed his eyebrows in that funny look again and Steve paused, looking behind them at the door where they'd left Sam and Tony.

"We don't have a car."

"You said you were fine with taking the subway?" Bucky was looking at him even more oddly and Steve blinked, forcing himself to start walking again, bustling shoulders with a man in a black coat before he caught up to Bucky's side again. Steve pursed his lips and nodded like he'd just forgotten or something, staring straight ahead at the dusk skyline.

"Hey, you alright?"

"What, me? Yeah, fine. Why?"

"You had like. Three bites to eat."

Had he? "Not that hungry," he shrugged and Bucky peered at him suspiciously in his peripherals.

"And you're all...distant, I'dunno."

"Just tired. Ready to sleep." He gave Bucky his best tired-smile and there was a 50% chance he bought it based on the return expression.

The subway was crowded. It was New York, it was to be expected. It was just a lot of people which really, normally didn't bother him at all.

Only with this many people condensed in one space, how easy would an enemy attack destroy them all right now? Steve reached up and grabbed onto the overhead bar, swaying as flashing blue tunnel lights passed and the subway rocked on its tracks.

It wasn't a train. He kept that on repeat in his head. It wasn't.

The next bustle had a woman stumbling into his back and Steve didn't mean to bristle, only he'd spent so many years being pushed down, the crowds hiding the scuffing of boots to his ribs--

Bucky's hand found his and Steve squeezed it once. But he was fine. He didn't need to be taken care of.

He dropped Bucky's touch, feigning the excuse'a diggin' the iPod outta his pocket. It was a long ride and the man down the way kept clearing his throat and it was just that he needed to slow his heartbeat for a second. Nothing outta the ordinary.

The headphones were all tangled up and he bit his lip to hide the frustration as he straightened them out and Bucky just would not stop looking at him. Why did he have to do that? Steve was trying.

He finally got the earbuds in, thumbing through playlists and artists and there was nothing he wanted to listen to--

Fall Out Boy. That was a safe bet. That one song, his favorite by them, the one he hadn't shown Bucky but it was a good song and it was personal and maybe it'd take his head outta this space and put him in that one.

Last year's wishes are this year's apologies, every last time I come home...

Bucky tapped his wrist and Steve glanced over, raising an eyebrow and silently communicating a more patient what than he felt. He didn't take out his headphones.

"Are you okay," Bucky mouthed and Steve furrowed his eyebrows like Bucky'd asked the weirdest question in the world, giving him an axiomatic nod.

We're the new face of failure, prettier and younger but not any better off.

Why wouldn't he be okay?

Bulletproof loneliness, at best.

They were going home. Home, the Brooklyn apartment, that was his home, right? Right? Bucky'd called it home.

He'd just called it home.

Steve could be a good boyfriend, he could play house. It was home, right, if he said it enough it was bound to come true and this should be what they were doing right now anyways.

Marriage and settling down and the endgoal, weren't they supposed to be at the endgoal?

If I woke up next to you.

That didn't include the blood on his knuckles.

Didn't include any blood at all.

How much blood--
"You see that guy over there?" One girl whispered to her friend, subtly pointing in Steve's direction. Except he could read lips. "I think that's Captain America."

"No way. You think so?"

A tree I used to lay beneath, kissed teeth stained red.

He lifted a hand in a sarcastic wave and both girls quickly averted their eyes. Right. Captain America dare be an ass to people staring at him. No, he'd sign autographs with that plastic smile and some quip about the healthcare reform, pass out voter-registration forms and carry the American flag up to Washington's steps to roll it in a knot and fucking hang himself from the Capital building's pillars--

Bucky's hand squeezed the back of his neck and Steve jolted, shoulders stiffening as he ducked his head and shy-ed away and shit, if Bucky was looking at him like he was broken before?

Metal fingers plucked out his earbuds and Steve was greeted with the sound of harsh, ragged breathing except fuck fuck he couldn't have an attack right now, not with all these people around, the moment he landed on the ground he'd be vulnerable to steel-toed-boots and he was supposed to protect civilians, not place them in danger of his fucking hyped-up body because he couldn't get a goddamned grip.

"Steve, Steve, I need you to talk to me, you can't-- are you okay, c'mon, Stevie, talk to me--"

"Fine. I'm fine. I'm fine."

He forced his spine straight. People were staring. They'd always stared. Stared when he was too small, sickly. Stared when he was too big, perfect. Stared when he sold bonds, when he was a war hero, when he was the freak science-experiment that survived 70 years. Stared at the man out of time and it made no difference now as they stared at the loser choking on his own oxygen in the subway.

Soldier. A-ten-tion!

Who was he supposed to be? The angry kid who got in fights? The eager showgirl who was dying to join Bucky on the front lines? The stumbling sarcastic army captain? Were any of them good enough?

Was he good enough to do anything right?

"Ste--"

"I'm fine," he insisted and Bucky scrubbed a hand over his forehead, distressed to hell.

"Look, whatever's going on--"

"Nothing," he insisted, sharper, and Bucky reached for him. Steve let the hands come, let Bucky wrap an arm over his shoulders and tug him close. Sideways. Weren't they all.

"Just hold on til we get home, okay?"

Steve flinched at the word.

It took Bucky a second. Then his eyes went wide and Steve stared at his feet and didn't see anything else for the rest of the trip back.

Back home.
The door shut loud and he flinched again. He left his shield in the jet. He'd like it back, solid metal in his hands to ground him except he couldn't and his hands worried long stripes down his thighs, wiping sweat off palms as he kept his eyes down and followed Bucky into the living room. Stupid shield.

His crackled knuckles from the fight were already healing. There wasn't even blood under his nails.

The couch greeted him with hard cushions and annoyingly comfortable pillows and it just wasn't--

Steve forced himself to calm. Forearms on the tops of his knees, feet flat on floors and hands clasped loosely together as he looked at the ground, other couch, Bucky's shoulder, one eyebrow lifted and lips parted in apology. Except the silence filled before he could.

"I don't know what made me think this would be good for you."

His mouth closed.

Bucky was leaning on a window, watching the Bridge, and it took a second for the icy words to sink in. Sometimes Steve hated that intuition. How many times had Buck weasled into his head and found out more than he should've, how long'd Buck had him figured out--

After Bucky'd fallen. Right after, the day he spent bawling his eyes out at every thought that crossed his mind-- he was never gonna hear Bucky's laugh again. Oh god. --heard Buck's voice in his head, telling him to pick himself together, felt Bucky's comforting touch that hadn't been there, his favorite voice telling him to be strong. But sitting there on the floor in his tent, clutching the black sketchbook Bucky'd given him before he shipped out, there'd been one thing he couldn't shake. One thing he couldn't stop thinking about.

All those nights in Brooklyn, looking out over the bridge with Bucky at his side. For the first time since the war started, Steve understood what all the soldiers felt when they wrote about how homesick they were.

"I just wanna go home," Steve whispered, dissipating to nothing with no-one to listen anymore. They should've jumped the tracks together. They should've fallen together. They did everything together in life, that's the way it should've been in death too.

His hands were shaking; head was spinning. Bucky'd found so much in life, he was the most alive person Steve'd ever known. Even after he'd been a prisoner of war, he'd come back alive in a different sort of way - a darker, more serious kind. He'd met death and came back even more determined to live.

And now he wasn't alive at all.

He wanted to go home. He wanted to stand in the middle of the Brooklyn Bridge, Bucky at his side. Looking over the water, eyes following the tension lines, the sweeping architecture of the dark brick. The familiar embrace of the cobblestone streets. The dim streetlights that flickered, the dark alleys with their hidden secrets, the smell of salt and sweat at the docks Bucky used to work.

If he could somehow go back now, to their old apartment, looking out over the view he'd drawn more than anything (besides Bucky)...would Bucky's ghost find him there? Would Brooklyn take Steve back in, give him back the warmth he'd lost from his core?
The only thing that'd mattered was coming back to Brooklyn with Bucky. He'd ached for this city, for the burrough's warm arms.

But this wasn't Brooklyn. Not really.

And as much as Bucky hadn't changed...Steve almost wished he had. Almost wished he'd changed enough to love Steve the way Steve loved him. Then maybe this strange city would take him in.

"Brooklyn isn't home to you at all anymore, is it?" Bucky lifted his head off the window, meeting Steve's eyes across the distance between them and he used to feel everything so strong, saturated and painful enough to make him gasp and cry except now he just fell into a complacent curl of his mouth and stared at nothing and Bucky was right, Brooklyn wasn't home. Bucky was.

Steve wanted to hold Bucky's hand, one more time, take the rough skin in his palm and lace their fingers together the way he used to as a kid, comfort he'd been addicted to and lost so quickly and he hadn't had something that simple since the war.

"You're too far gone," Bucky muttered and Steve squeezed his hands together, staring at nothing with his mouth pursed tight and sideways like he wasn't dying inside.

"I like it here, Buck." It wasn't a lie. He did like the apartment.

"But it doesn't feel like home," Bucky filled in and Steve made a point not to flinch this time. "This isn't the life you're cut out for."

His hands were shaking, a little, and Steve clenched them to each other harder. His head was spinning. Nothing he could do about that.

"Bucky, we've talked about this." The words were careful, void of emotion juxtaposed to drowning-emotion the day after Bucky fell. Clutching that sketchpad. God, he'd thought he'd never stop crying. Maybe he hadn't.

"You're better on a battlefield than at a kitchen table." Crystal flashed and Steve broke away, head hanging as he stared at the rug covering wood floors. One of the Commandos said they'd curl up on a rug in front of a fire for weeks after they got home. Had they? What'd Steve done? Had Steve ever come home?

Scuffed kitchen table, swinging little legs while he drew. He'd tried. He couldn't do it anymore, not like he used to. What was wrong with him?

Metal flashed reflections across the room and Steve didn't have to look up to know Bucky was spreading his arms, gesturing at the apartment and Brooklyn and domesticity. "This isn't you, Steve. Not anymore."

This was supposed to be their fresh start. How had he fucked it up already? He fucked up everyth--

"It has to be," Steve said, firmly, clenching his fists together to keep himself from striding over and taking Bucky's hand. He'd take it wrong anyways. "I can't live in a state of perpetual war, Buck."

"You want to settle down, for what? Chasing the American dream?"
The mocking tone cut deep. Steve sucked in a breath and pretended Buck hadn't just driven a knife into his stomach. Voice: level.

"I can't keep fighting. Before...I wanted a life like this, easy, with you. Aren't I supposed to be going back to that?"

So he wasn't adjusting so well. He was trying goddamnit. It wasn't like they had any other options. They couldn't fight forever. Fighting was never the life Bucky wanted. He was a lover, not a fighter. Back then. God knows what Buck was now. But he'd fought a war for Steve and Steve still didn't understand why--

"Not like this. There's not enough Brooklyn left in you to live this way." Metal tapped glass like the bridge outside was personally inputting to the conversation and tough shit, Steve couldn't hear whatever melody it sang anymore. "You'll never be happy."

Happy?

Happy?

"I just want you to be happy," Steve told him. It was the wrong thing to say. Icy eyes widened a fraction, then a bomb went off somewhere and Bucky exploded.

"Happy?? Ты счастлив? Are you happy, Steve? Tell me all about what it's supposed to feel like to be so goddamned happy!"

Steve'd crossed his arms over his chest, glared back. "I'll be happy once you're better." It was the truth; Steve may not be in a great place right now, but once Bucky was okay, then there'd be nothing to keep Steve from being okay too.

Right. Nothing to keep Steve from being okay, nothing at all.

"Better? Better? There's nothing wrong with me!" Bucky shouted, metal arm whirring as his hands tightened into curled fists...

Happy.

You'll never be happy.

The hell did Bucky know about happy?

"I can't--" Steve scrubbed a hand over his mouth, forcing the fight off his tongue. When was Buck gonna get it? For all that he knew about Steve, how hard was this to grasp? He steeled; hardened instead of crumbled like he wanted to. Lifted his head, straightened up. Stared right at Bucky's expectant expression and opened the door on his soul. "I cannot keep fighting, Buck. Can't you see? That's how I lost you. I got you killed by fighting, Bucky, that was my fault and I can't lose you again because I'm the idiot who likes getting punched."

He spat the words bitter at the end and the transformation over Bucky's expression was remarkable. Frustration morphed to shock, then a dark, dry laugh tumbled past Bucky's beautiful lips and Steve had to grit his teeth to keep from turning away.

Thankfully Buck flicked his gaze through glass again and Steve could inhale properly without sucking in the poisonous danger of Bucky's eyes.

"What a place that leaves us. You keep fighting and you're always scared of losing me. You don't fight and you're already lost." The metal shoulder shrugged and Steve couldn't see the scars rippling beneath Bucky's clothes but he could swear, in that moment, he could feel them. He could feel the flint in Bucky's throat, the shards cutting slivers against his voice.

Patience faded for sharpness and it hurt, enough to make Steve swallow dryly and hold his breath against choking. "You can't make decisions based only on my well-being, Steve. You can't... codepend on me like that."

Codepend. He'd proven, he wasn't alive without Bucky, he was more of a cyborg than the Winter Soldier and the ship to be whole without his best friend had sailed a long time ago.

Even when I had nothing, I had Bucky.

He had Bucky by his side and that - that connection, that tie to his past, that's what made him breathe real oxygen for the first time. Smile. Laugh. Realize he was just a step away from home, from taking Bucky's hand and meaning that, meaning what it'd meant back when Bucky'd let him cling however tight he needed.

Without that, before that? He'd drifted. He'd been nothing. He'd gone to Peggy and told her he didn't know right from wrong but the truth was that he didn't know himself from that exhibit and it hurt, it ached. He'd even been a stranger there. He'd stood in front of murals of his own face and people brushed by him like he was no-one because he was, Steve Rogers had died seventy years ago and someone else'd come outta the ice.

But Bucky'd brought him back. Barely keeping it together in a rainy pavilion as he spilled his soul to his friends and they hugged him and made a point to call him Steve instead of just Cap. He liked Cap fine, so long as it meant Captain Rogers, but the effort was too touching to correct.

Without Buck...

"You're all I have that ties me to who I am, Bucky." Steve stared at the other end of the room and exhaled heavy, sinking. Bucky Barnes, that's what tugged him back from the edge and breathed vitality into lungs that went from broken to perfect to useless to full and alive.

It was silent. The apartment was silent and Steve couldn't turn his head, could picture the broken look of pity on Bucky's face just fine--

"For how long?" Bucky interrupted. Except that softness wasn't there. It was hard and cold and Steve snapped over to look at the passive expression.

"What?"

"For how long have you made me the only way to be you?" Bucky took a single step forward and Steve sat dumbly. Bucky's voice was too careful, words articulate and bordering on efficient and Steve could only blink. "You can't do that to yourself, Steve."

(During the war, Bucky'd come back from torture and stitched himself up with sunshine thread, tying himself to Steve so tightly-- every inch of his fucked-up brain clung to Steve. Steve was the glue that held pieces together so Bucky was a real person. And long before any of that shit, Bucky'd needed Steve like people needed oxygen. Held on with both hands and spent his spare time sewing himself up so one day, he could let Steve go.

Except he'd never figured how to keep himself from unraveling without Steve holding him together like thread through a vital wound. And look what that'd done. Look what happened. The Winter Soldier, that was Bucky unraveled at the seams and it'd been his own fault because the stitches had been Steve's love and when he didn't have that anymore he fucking lost everything.

Now Steve was doing the same goddamned thing.

Steve was laying that responsibility on Bucky. He couldn't do that to himself.

"--and you definitely can't do that to me." Bucky pointed an accusing finger and Steve looked shocked, appalled. Like he somehow didn't know. "I'm not stable enough to carry us both."

"You're doing better. The nightmares are still bad but--"

"It seeps through in the night, but it's always there. Those horrors. The risk of falling apart? That's always there. I'm too broken for you to need me like that." He couldn't be sunshine stitches when he woke with a gun to Steve's forehead, when Steve was dragging himself through mud to make something work that shouldn't, Bucky wasn't strong enough to support when he was a goddamned hurricane. The only way they were surviving this time around was if they did it different. If they had themselves first, if they could be real people without each other. "You have to make it on your own, Steve."

They were both standing now, a foot away and if they couldn't even control this gravity, how were they ever supposed to be safe--

Steve's puffed-up chest caved.

Blue eyes were watering.

Bucky cocked his head, running back through the lines in his head as Steve looked up at the ceiling, tried to collect himself, looked back at Bucky like he was the one who'd kicked him in the stomach all those years.

"You promised me I'd never have to."

Oh shit. When Sarah'd died.

If only she were here now. Which one would she scold for being foolish? Which one would she pull into her arms and cradle and let cry? It didn't matter. She wasn't here.

She hadn't been since that first night. Standing outside Steve's apartment, his housekey cool in Bucky's hand.

I can make it by on my own, Buck.

He'd known that. He still knew that, only problem was that Steve didn't anymore and Bucky needed him to keep thinking that, needed Steve to be strong enough on his own. Because Steve'd always been so strong, even back then, and Bucky'd always known and that's why he'd shaken his head, glancing up at Steve under dark lashes and offering,

The thing is...you don't have to.

That used to be their relationship.

That used to work.

This?

This didn't work.
Bucky breathed out slow through a circle-o, steadying himself. Steve was leaning too hard. There was no confidence and alright-with-loneliness now. Steve clung to him and Bucky was choking.

Where had he gone wrong?

"We weren't lovers then. We weren't each other's everything then." Bucky tried to keep his voice steady but it was hard when the words sounded like lies. They may not've been lovers, but Steve'd always been his world. In the war he'd realized just how much of that world. But this wasn't then. Too much'd changed and Steve used to be fine without him, hadn't needed anything but company and care and the occasional stitch-job.

Now? What Steve was asking of him now?

"You didn't say you loved me then and you didn't expect me to say it back! We took this too far, we're in this too deep, and if one thing happens that's it, don't you get that?" How many times had he told Steve, we can't give this everything. What happens next time? He was already a killer, monster, nothing without Steve. It couldn't be that way for both of them. "Don't you get how burning hand-in-hand only works when we're two people? When we're equals?" He tapped a metal finger to the center of Steve's chest and it didn't clunk hollowly like Tony's, there was nothing hollow about Steve's heart and if Bucky ever broke that beautiful thing...

He sucked in a breath, thinking of bullets and battle-scars and the danger pumping through his veins that everyone so easily tossed aside now. He'd almost killed Tony the other day, nearly cracked his skull with a punch that Steve'd just barely managed to stop. He almost killed Steve the other day, waking from a nightmare. He was unraveling. He'd never had proper stitches this time around anyways.

It was simple. "The only way I can protect you is to make sure you'll be okay on your own when I finally break down."

"Protect me? When are you gonna stop protecting me? This is why we're not equals, because you've never seen me that way. I'm always your responsibility. Even now, you don't want more with me because you think I'm not ready. When do I get to make my own damn decisions in this relationship?"

"When you start being honest with yourself," Bucky snapped, then he was striding past Steve and the apartment settled into silence and Bucky slammed the bedroom door loud enough he was surprised it didn't come off the hinges.

More with me.

What the hell did that mean.

Bucky saying I love you back? Getting matching shirts? Going steady? He kinda thought they already were.

They'd moved in together. They slept together, they were dating, what the hell did Steve need that was more. Again.

I want you to love me back, he'd said. Was that what he was talking about? Or maybe...no.

No, it couldn't be that.
He didn't have to deal with this shit.

It was two hours later when he opened the bedroom door again. Night had already fallen and Steve was stretched out on the couch, arm folded behind his head as he stared up at the ceiling, apparently thinking he was supposed to sleep there. Right, sleep. That'd become a regular thing for them, a nightly thing. Bucky used to sleep four hours once a week and now he slept for seven most nights and was that a good thing or a bad one? Was he losing time or healing?

It didn't matter. He wasn't sleeping tonight.

Bucky cleared his throat and Steve's head snapped up, sitting up slowly as he looked at Bucky over the back of the couch. He was already standing by the door and he could see Steve register that, the confusion and hurt on his beautiful face and Bucky was getting outta here, couldn't handle this right now.

"I'm going to Tony's." They'd all have so many questions, showing up alone in the middle of the night, but he didn't care. Bucky grabbed his shoes, hand on the doorknob, and leveled his gaze seriously on the blue eyes. "Don't do anything stupid until I get back."

Steve froze. Eyes blown wide, lips tight and trembling at the corners, then he looked away, nodding silently. No quip back. It'd've been trying too hard if he had. That wasn't Steve anymore.

Bucky shut the door behind him and didn't hear the broken sound as Steve put a hand over his mouth and stared at the betraying door.

To their credit, the Avengers did try talking to him. He stepped off the elevator onto their old floor to a hoard of heroes on the couch.

"Sarge," Clint greeted and Bucky's jaw clicked.

"You wanna come and ta--" Natasha started and the look on her face suggested maybe no one'd ever snap-interrupted her before.

"Not interested." Bucky started across the room, having to pass everyone to get to the other half of the apartment and the offended silence Natasha was sitting in may've just destroyed everything they'd so tentatively built as friends in the past few weeks.

"James Buchanan," Pepper called after him and fuck he did not need this right now.

"Don't," he snapped, spinning on a heel to glare at them all. "You may be Steve's friends, but you need to back the fuck out."

There were at least two slack jaws and Sam looked so wounded Bucky was probably gonna be haunted by that expression for months. So he'd disowned them all by calling them Steve's friends, not his.

It wasn't like they weren't all thinking it anyways.

Like any of them genuinely liked him? Right. No, if he wasn't Steve's "significant other" then he wouldn't've had a single fucking hand extended. He remembered how much they all hated him at first. He remembered.

No one said another word and Bucky turned back around, leaving them all in the dust as he slammed the artroom door behind him. The frame splintered again and Bucky didn't give a fuck.

The paintbrush in his hand was stiff, an old one spun tight with glue to make the tip even smaller. Etching the tiniest of details, smallest color changes and sharpest pointed tips on white stars - if he focused enough on the tiny tiny pieces of his painting then he wouldn't have to look at the big picture and maybe he wouldn't start crying.

Focus on just one star, tiny golden light in the window. Nothing else, don't look at the watery outlined rainbow hues...

Painting let him think, at least. About Steve, of course.

The thing is...you don't have to. Yeah, Steve was right, he'd always been protective. But he'd never seen Steve as some fragile flower. He knew damn well Steve could do things on his own. Never made decisions for him. The only decision Bucky ever made for Steve was when he picked up his shield to protect him from the blue blast that shot Bucky off the train.

He knew Steve was a fighter. Better than Steve did, sometimes. Knew that he'd been through so much and he knew that Steve could pull through anything. He didn't need Bucky, he didn't.

When he'd told Steve he'd stand by his side no matter what happened, offered his company in the worst moment of Steve’s life, it'd been because he didn’t plan on ever leaving Steve. But he knew now, it didn't work like that. Some things were bigger than they were. They couldn't hold tight and be blind to the fact that Bucky'd turned into a monster without Steve and Steve'd turned plastic without Bucky.

If Steve couldn't see that...couldn't see the difference between protection-love-safety and underestimation-no-respect...how was this supposed to work?

Let alone something more. What the hell did that even mean?

More.

He was still thinking about it when the door creaked open. His head snapped up, ready to bark at whoever the fuck it was, whichever "friend" thought they were so damn superior they could just march in and get an exception, only it wasn't one of Steve's friends at all.

It was Steve.

He closed the door softly behind him and Bucky sat down his paintbrush.

"I wanna be honest, Bucky." Steve shoved his hands in his pockets and stared at the paintbuckets on the floor that they'd laughingly splashed each other with and Bucky stepped around his painting, waiting.

"It's ripping me apart -" Dropped into a whisper, Steve's voice so quiet and broken it belonged in that moment Bucky'd witnessed a week ago, pacing around the apartment and ripping up drawings in the watery lights of the bridge. "--this dual life."

Bucky shrugged, crossing his arms over his chest and laying it out, translating the inside of that messy head. "You're a soldier the minute we walk out that door and you're trying to shed the shield when you cross the threshold again. The back and forth is shredding you at the seams."
The seams that weren't allowed to be made of moonlight and starshine.

"You do it," Steve whispered, shoulders up by his ears. Small, almost like Little Stevie again. "How do you do it?"

"I don't," Bucky replied, tucking a piece of hair behind his ear and stepping forward. Steve's eyes lifted and Bucky held them because he wasn't sure it was a good idea to hold any other part of Steve right now. "I'm never a soldier. I fight, but it's for you. The monster I am out there -" A point and Steve started to shake his head, protesting that Bucky wasn't but he didn't wanna hear it, " - is the same monster I am in here. You're the one who can't pick an identity. I've always had the same one."

Maybe...maybe he'd always known he'd become something like this. Maybe that was why he'd always been so afraid to love Steve. Because becoming the legendary ghost-story was a hellofalot less surprising than it should've been.

"Always been the Winter Soldier," he echoed quietly, always been too far in love with you, he didn't say, even though he should've. Even though that's what counted.

Even though that's what Steve needed to hear.

Blue studied him like Bucky was something sweet. Good. The sweetest outsides had the rotten cores, didn't they?

No one said anything else because there was nothing to say.

Their shoulders brushed as they got back into the elevator and Bucky saw the depleted cushions, the empty space Steve's friends had left and turned his eyes away.

~~~

Black.

Foxholes in black forests; the screams of terrified soldiers, the smell of blood and tears.

He'd told Bucky that much about his nightmares before.

But the Commandos were never the screaming ones. They were never the terrified ones. It was hard, it wasn't like their side had it easy. But they were the ones doing the shredding - cats eating the canaries. That was the part they didn't let themselves think about.

It was the good fight;

Steve'd cut the heads off people who'd been dragged into the same war they'd been shoved into.

Doors bust open and it was too dark to see anything but Steve was firing anyways, bursts of red and white that soared into shadowed corners. Screams lit up the night and there was machine gun fire beside him, except this time it wasn't comforting. The warehouse started to drip blood and Steve's vision swam, checking over his shoulder.

There was Falsworth, beret riddled with bullet holes, Dugan's mustache flecked red. So were Sam's eyes, Natasha's hair catching fire and everything was black and white that wasn't red and Steve opened his mouth to scream.

Except he couldn't, there was something choking his lips, holding his chin in place. He released his grip on the gun in his hands...except it wasn't letting go, it was stuck to his bloody-red gloves and Steve shook his hands, trying to free himself only the gun melted, molded to his fingers with curling black snakes and Steve still couldn't scream.

Black-red fingers tentatively touched his lips and his mouth wasn't there. Hard plastic instead and the dripping blood had pooled on the floor, raced to his feet and looking down he could see his reflection, flickering in shiny red and there was a mask over his mouth, nose, cheeks. A very familiar mask.

Steve clawed at the choking thing and it wouldn't budge, squeezing tighter and tighter as he screamed wordlessly and fumbled gun-coated fingers on the edges he'd once taken from Bucky's face. The reflection stared back at him with hollow eyes and Steve kicked the pool of blood, spiking red shards across the black-edged room and there was a voice, echoing quietly in the distance, young and innocent and Steve stumbled through black-red into a wall of tar, words steadily louder and louder at the edges of metal.

Not all of us can storm a beach. Or drive a tank. But there's still a way all of us can fight.

You've heard a lot about me over the past few days. Some of you were even ordered to hunt me down.

Series E defense bonds. Each one you buy is a bullet in the barrel--

I think it's time you know the truth.

I know it's a war, you don't have to tell me it's a war.

Each one you buy is a bullet--

I don't know how many more. But I know they're in the building. They could be standing right next to you.

"Bucky!" Steve's throat choked but it didn't matter, the mask was muffling his words and his voice hadn't even changed--

-in the barrel of your best guy's gun.

They almost have what they want. Absolute control.

The wall caved and finally finally, only Steve wasn't breaking free he was falling, falling. Bucky was watching from above and falling below him faster and the screams, everything steadying for a single second long enough for Steve to break the neck of a Hydra scientist. Warm blood spilling over his hands with his last shout still echoing in the factory--

Where is he?

They hadn't told him. He'd found Bucky in Germany, how many facilities had they ripped apart before that-- Good becomes great. Bad becomes worse.

If you launch those helicarriers today, Hydra will be able to kill anyone in their way.

I'm not stopping until all of Hydra's dead or captured.
I know I'm asking a lot. But the price of freedom is high. It always has been.

Bucky, Bucky, c'mon, there are men laying down their lives. I got no right to do any less than them.

Laying down their lives, ribs cracked and lungs punctured with the force of a shield to their chest.

No right to do any less.

He hit the ground with a jolt and the quickest flash of black and white, a man laying crumpled on the ground beside him with red oozing out of his shoulder and eyes and Steve woke.

His hands went to his mouth first, holding his breath, afraid he'd find the mask fitted over his skull again. Except those were his lips, he was fine, and he pulled air into his lungs as slow and quiet as possible.

He was fine.

Bucky shifted on the pillow beside Steve's, rolling on the arm Steve had tucked under his neck.

Bucky.

His palm found Bucky's heartbeat and it was steady but it wasn't enough, Steve had to know he was real, this was real.

Wild hands ran over bare skin and Bucky made a sleepy sound but Steve couldn't stop devouring every inch in reach; hard muscle that refused to cave, flesh of Bucky's stomach that condescended under pressed fingertips, gasp punched outta him and Steve was pressing too hard, leaving bruises but he couldn't make himself stop, he needed to crawl inside Bucky's skin where it was safe and he wasn't covered in Hydra's spilt blood--

Strong arms wrapped around his head and Steve choked against Bucky's chest, squeezing his ribs tight enough to break, clinging to him desperately and burrowing closer, breathing straight off soft skin and ridged scars because oxygen'd never liked his lungs.

The mattress compressed as Bucky rolled Steve onto his back, covering him in darkness and heavy weight, living blanket to pull him down from red-stained skies and Steve hid inside Bucky's body and slid his trigger-hand over Bucky's neck. Cold, ice shuddering minutes around them.

"I need you," Steve rasped and his throat sounded as blood-filled as it felt and Bucky just held him tighter. "M'suffocating without you please please, drowning, promise we'll outlive the blind this time just let me--"

"Steve."

"Bucky p-please--"

"Shhh. Shhh, angel, it's okay. I've got you."

"P-p--"

"Shhh. Stevie, shh."
Catatonic melted in his arms and Bucky hid his tears in Steve's blonde crown.

For so many nights beside Steve in bed, how many times had the pretty mouth exhaled nonsense in his ear, late night promises of bleeding himself dry to keep Bucky alive and it hurt, so much, every time. He'd spent a lifetime scared of broken promises, he didn't need to be scared of Steve keeping his.

But he was. This life wasn't made for Steve, this life of latenights in bed and morning kisses over coffee and how...why did Steve want this anyways? Why was he convincing himself he wanted this-

Bucky didn't have the right to hold him back from his shield. He already knew fire and scars and at least that was better. They'd both known death for so long but the real kind, the one that ripped your body to shreds, was kinder than the death that just ripped out your heart.

This was all Bucky'd wanted for so long. Steve was all he wanted and all he'd have to give up--

How much longer could he fake the fragments, how much longer could they both keep playing alive? He was losing his grip in the wake of holding on too tight and two comets weren't colliding with one left in the sky anymore, the stars were battling the sky they lived in and the sky was fighting back even harder and if they couldn't--

They'd lose everything they'd built, Steve's friends. Demons were nipping heels, water poisoned between them, a bridge to fall off one more time--

"Do I deserve to call myself Steve Rogers anymore?" Steve whispered into the darkness and Bucky closed his eyes.

He'd never wanted to have this conversation. They just had to hold each other down and no one was allowed to run or else everyone would explode--

"I never wouldda killed like this back then."

I know, Bucky said silently, hands running down the trembling muscles of Steve's shoulders, arms, hands. Rolling to the side so Steve could breathe but maybe that's not what either of them wanted anymore. Blue eyes were red with tears and exhaustion and stress and Bucky kissed Steve's eyelids and Steve's mouth crumbled down, words rushing like deflating lungs.

"If I'd seen then, what I'd become now..." Bucky kissed his mouth to beg him to stop talking and the moment they broke back off Steve kept right on digging graves. "I'd've been disgusted with myself."

"War," Bucky started, ready to preach back that same speech Steve'd given him. The price of freedom was high. So maybe he wasn't as good as Stevie Rogers from Brooklyn but that didn't mean--

"I've. I've become the bullies that I've fought my entire life." Steve's face twisted and Bucky found his hands, squeezed them and kissed his knuckles and Steve closed his eyes in defeat, voice breaking over a soundless sob, "I-I'm the monster."

And that was it.

Bucky couldn't fight the thing he'd always been and Steve became the thing he always fought.

There was nothing left to go back to and Bucky couldn't fix this one.
He pressed metal to Steve's cheek and Steve pressed flesh over the top, squeezing Bucky tighter to his skin and there'd be an imprint on his jaw, the edge of his mouth, lines like the mask Bucky used to wear on his face and who were they kidding?

"We're both too far gone," Bucky told him and Steve turned his mouth into Bucky's palm and cried himself to sleep.

~~~

The light of dawn faded out the stomp of the drum and Steve was already at the kitchen table when Bucky started breakfast. They were both quiet and the white walls of their apartment, big glass windows, made the shadows of night irrationally far away.

Steve's uniform was laying by the door. Bucky still had paint on his wrists, the backs of his hands. He hadn't properly cleaned off between Steve's visit to the tower and crashing beside him in their new bed.

"This is what I used to want," Steve finally offered, both hands warming his mug of tea. Bucky raised an eyebrow and sat a plate of apples in front of him. Steve took a slice with a tiny smile, popping it in his mouth before shrugging, looking down at his mug. Over at the living room. Back at Bucky. "This home, a family with you. The guy who wanted this, that's who I'm supposed to be."

Bucky pursed his lips and nodded. That's what he'd figured this was about.

Steve was trying to come back from a battle he'd never left and all he had to cling to was distant dreams he remembered from a life they never could've had, not then and not now.

He picked up the knife he'd used to cut the apples, swiped it clean with a cloth, slid it back in its engraved wooden block. When was the last time he'd killed someone with a knife?

"Being happy isn't becoming who you used to be, Steve." Bucky turned around, leaning against the counter as he picked up his own tea, metal creaking from the heat. "It's becoming who you want to be."

It took him a long time to figure that out.

Longer to brush it aside.

Steve gave him a look that Bucky read easily, pot calling the kettle black and Bucky ignored it, taking a sip and scalding his tongue. Steve took another apple slice, popping it in his mouth and glancing between the plate and Bucky again.

"I want to be with you."

"Mm." Bucky raised both eyebrows and pursed his lips, sitting his mug on the counter because he'd figured Steve'd say that, really hoped he'd be wrong.

Only he wasn't and Steve was pinning him with another look, defensive like his fists were raised instead of wrapped innocently around tea.

"Do you want to be with me too?"

"You know I do," Bucky reminded him lightly, crossing the kitchen to Steve's table and the blue was still looking at him with that defiant challenge.

"Do I?"

Bucky knew what he was talking about. There was no use anymore pretending that he didn't, so he sighed and braced a hand on the back of Steve's chair, leaning over to speak low and close.

"You don't need those words to know." He tipped forward into a kiss and Steve kissed him back, didn't say aloud what he was thinking and Bucky could go the rest of eternity without the damnation of the confirmation he knew was resting on the tongue he sucked into his mouth,

Yeah, yeah, maybe I do.

Steve blew out a breath and adjusted the height of his stool.

He was gonna get better.

"Is Sarge alright?" Clint asked.

Steve furrowed his eyebrows. "We're fine."

"He seemed...distressed, the other night," Thor offered and Steve shrugged.

"We're working on it. Speaking of which..."

They both huffed, got to work, didn't mention it again.

Steve thought about it though, all the way through when he waved them goodbye again.

There was that book: Wuthering Heights. Bucky'd liked it more than he had, but there was a quote he couldn't stop thinking about. Catherine and Heathcliff, best friends since childhood, mortally in love and fatally obsessed. Anguished, haunted by each other's ghosts, and Catherine had said, He's more myself than I am. Whatever our souls are made of, whatever's in our blood. His and mine are the same.

That, he understood.

Bucky, he didn't.

Why--

See, the thing was, as angry as he could get with Bucky about shutting him out, pinning him down, accusing him of lying to himself, refusing to say he loved Steve and breaking more promises thing is, you don't have to - as angry as he was about that?

It was still all Steve's fault.

He let Bucky fall.

He let Bucky fall and didn’t go looking for him afterwards, let Hydra find him and torture him and turn him into the Winter Soldier.
He'd said it before but he'd say it again because as many times as it'd been shoved in the dirt, it wasn't something that went away. Ever.

He never saw the darkness Bucky'd hid in all along.

When he was the one falling, Bucky jumped. Bucky saved him when Steve was nothing to him and Steve failed him when Bucky was everything.

He'd carry that with him forever.

He was selfish enough to be grateful he never saved Bucky back then, because Bucky was here now and he wouldn't trade that for anything.

Steve was sick and twisted, and it was all his own fault.

He'd threatened to destroy thousands of people to get Bucky back, to avenge his fall, to get him back once more.

Steve couldn't sleep at night and Bucky couldn't sleep at night and they were poisoning each other and drowning in too many emotions and everything was all off and wrong and if they were ever really gonna move forward, get better? Save each other and heal and start breathing the air of the living again?

They couldn't go on like this. Something had to change.

And Steve was gonna change it.

~*~

War. He'd never come home from the war.

~*~

Right, cause you've got nothing to prove.

Steve could prove to Bucky they could do this. It wasn't enough to say he and his boyfriend were working on it. If they were ever gonna get there, he had to know.

Bucky had to be his. Tied to him in some way more than "dating," bestfriends. Just in case things went to shit like always, he needed to know Buck was never gonna leave him.

If "home" couldn't feel permanent, their relationship had to.

It was time.

"...Natasha? Would you...I need some advice."

"And you're sure this'll work?"
"Yes, Steve. I made it to fit, just twist it this direction and it locks in place. I am the best mechanical engineer you know. You doin' it soon? I can break out the heavy champagne."

"Uh. Yeah, actually. I'm doing it tomorrow."

"Wow. Anything special about the 22nd of June?"

"Yeah...that's the day I got the serum. Changed my life around. Figured next big change I'm doing could be that day too."

A few decades ago, Peggy Carter stood on the Brooklyn bridge, skirt blowing in the wind and traffic rushing behind her. Younger than she was now, old enough to have the start of crinkles by her eyes.

She stood on the place that, for her, always stood for Steve. Brooklyn was New York's heart, her heart, the core of the people and the truth behind the struggle.

It'd been Steve's home, and standing on a bridge she knew first-hand meant the world to him - it was about as close as she could get to Steve these days. The museum exhibit they'd opened was as cold as the ice he and Bucky'd crashed into. Glass and walls and distant flickering movie screens.

Black-and-white photographs that didn't capture the skin. The light in his eyes.

The bridge was closer to him. That, and the vial she held in her hands.

There's only one person in the world who knows what to do with this.

She'd kept it for so many years, entrusted with this one last piece of Steve. There's only one person in the world who knows what to do with this.

She'd wondered, for most her life, what that was. Research for the future? Saving more lives?

But he'd already saved so many. It was time he rest.

But time they both rest.

Peggy Carter stepped up to the edge of the bridge and tipped over the vial in her hand.

"Goodbye, my darling," she whispered into the wind and the last piece of Steve fell, fell, splashed into the water below, not a drop to stain the bridge beneath her feet.

Where she'd stood, it was the same place Steve stood now. He didn't know that, but Bucky did. Peggy'd told him.

Steve asked Bucky to come on a walk, Bucky was surprised they'd gravitated here.

But the bridge was the start of it all. For Peggy, the end of it all too. Whatever Steve wanted to talk about had to be important, then, and Bucky leaned on the railing overlooking the water, thinking to himself that maybe the two of them should go up and visit Peggy soon. She hadn't gotten to see the both of them at once before. And Bucky hadn't seen her since...since this.

He glanced over at Steve, wind rustling blonde hair and river below reflecting into peaceful blue eyes and he was so goddamned beautiful, a work of art. If Bucky had to say goodbye to him here too, lost him off the bridge, at least he knew Steve loved him this time. At least he knew Steve was the world.

"Buck," Steve started and Bucky straightened up, tucking a piece of stray hair behind his ear. "I...I wanted to ask you something."

Bucky raised an eyebrow and waved for Steve to continue. He hesitated, opening his mouth and closing it again, looking out over the water, up at the railings of the bridge. Back at Bucky, more decisive this time.

"Lemme see your hand."

Steve started digging for something in his pocket before Bucky even extended it, offering his flesh palm to Steve confusedly. The hell did this have to do with anything?

Then Steve found whatever he was looking for, pulling it outta his pocket with a triumphant noise while Bucky's eyebrows furrowed deeper in confusion.

"What is that for?"

"Just, gimme a second, jeez," Steve muttered goodnaturedly, taking Bucky's extended hand and separating his fingers. Then he put the Sharpie in his mouth, popped the cap off with his teeth and held it there while he hovered the tip of the marker over Bucky's skin.

"You drawing something?" Bucky asked curiously, trying to peer around Steve's fingers to see what the Sharpie was marking onto his hand this time.

"No, m'writin'theconstitution n'yourhand," Steve sassed, Sharpie in his mouth slurring all the words and kinda losing the teasing effectiveness.

Bucky rolled his eyes with a crooked smile. Steve drawin' on him always tweaked this string in his chest.

Right up until Steve gave his hand back, popping the cap on the Sharpie and shoving it back in his pocket. Because then Bucky gotta see what he drew.

And his lungs closed.

"Steve," he breathed, lifting his hand to sunlight to see it better, making sure he wasn't losing his mind, that Steve'd actually drawn that on him. He had.

His gaze cut to Steve's face next, eyebrows still knit in confusion and eyes broken over hope and mouth twisted because that couldn't mean what he thought it did.

Except Steve's eyes were twinkling, challenge mixed with mischief as he looked at Bucky with that same fire in his eyes, Nothin. I'm just a kid from Brooklyn.

Bucky looked back at his hand. At the mark Steve'd drawn on him.

Of all things Steve'd drawn, this was the one rendering him speechless.

Which was ridiculous, really, considering it was just a line, wrapping around his fourth finger. A line with a perpendicular dash to mark the end. He knew what that meant. And it was on his fourth finger this time. It couldn't help but look like a ring.

Bucky opened his mouth to ask Steve if he'd just goddamned proposed by drawing on Bucky with a Sharpie, except when he looked back up Steve wasn't standing there.

He was kneeling at Bucky's feet.
"Oh my god." Bucky's metal hand shot up to cover his mouth and Steve's expression crinkled in a smile, one knee up at a ninety and the other on the ground and Jesus Christ, this couldn't be happening to him right now.

There was a box in Steve's hand.

There was a box in Steve's hand.

It was open. There was a silver-white ring inside.

"Oh my god," Bucky said again, muffled by his hand, and Steve's smile lit up bigger. The little shit, he was enjoying this. Bucky honestly picked the worst best friend on the planet. His mouth wasn't working now, nothing but his sight as he stared down at Steve. Blue eyes waited patiently as Bucky tried to get a grip and failed miserably.

"Steve," Bucky broke over his name, almost a distant call, and Steve reached up and took his right hand again. The smile faded a little, or the mischief in it did anyways, expression sinking pure and genuine and Bucky was gonna fucking cry. "Y-you want to--"

"Yes. Bucky. I want this. I want you."

It was his most sincere scolding voice - Bucky Bucky, c'mon, there are men laying down their lives...

Only they weren't arguing about joining a war anymore.

Steve was offering to end one.

He couldn't believe-- after all the hell they'd both been through, this was where they'd ended up? It wasn't even surreal, it wasn't. It felt really goddamned real and that was the worst part, because looking back at everything, back from that first backalley, Bucky Barnes and Steve Rogers were always meant for each other. They were bound to get together.

Bound to get together.

"Stevie, are you..." Bucky started, lingering over the word sure because that rush in his veins couldn't help but fear if maybe he second-guessed it then Steve would too and after all the shit between them lately and all the issues they'd just exposed raw to the open, how was this some kind of solution and Bucky couldn't survive another heartbreak.

Only Steve squeezed his hand, wrapping their fingers together the way they used to.

A flickering army-tent. Bucky's hands in bandages like a mummy and Steve'd even held his hands then, Steve'd even held him tight then and Bucky'd joked - you holdin' my hand, Rogers? and Steve'd shot back wouldn't be the first time and god, god it'd been nowhere near the last time either and Bucky was seriously gonna cry.

Steve's chest expanded beneath his tshirt as he sucked in a breath, then the words, barely more than a whisper, were sinking straight into Bucky's heart.

"I finally figured out how to come home." A little shrug and Steve's thumb ran over the back of his hand, over knuckles that'd broken, and swore his life down on the wire. "You're my Brooklyn, Bucky. I wanna come home from that godforsaken war. Let me come home – to you."

Come home. To you.
When Steve said all that about telling the Commandos he wasn't going back to Brooklyn, that's what he meant. When he said Brooklyn was a cocky smile, bright accent, crystal eyes, warm hands pulling outta dark alleys? He wasn't saying Brooklyn wasn't enough he was saying Bucky was his home.

Oh.

And now he wanted to prove it. To make it solid. Bucky was his home.

No wonder Steve'd been lost. His home wasn't a time - it's not 1945 anymore, Cap - or a place - I can't afford a place in Brooklyn. It was a person. His home was Bucky.

Oh.

Funny, of everything he knew about Steve Rogers, how had Bucky never known that?

"Bucky," Steve italicized and his sight unblurred long enough to see the desperate promise on Steve's lifted face as he looked up at Bucky-- what a trip, Steve looking up at him again, maybe he'd planned it that way to rip out Bucky's heartstrings because that was his boy, that punk kid who looked up at him with that bright face and messy bangs and little bloody fists. This was his boy too, the strong and healthy Captain he'd followed into battle and yeah, there wasn't any question about the answer he was giving Rogers.

--and laid their hearts on that wire again, 1941 outside Steve's apartment and 2014 in a helicarrier and they looked at each other with that promise in their eyes and hot fire cradled in hands.

"This can be our last breath. This is it," Steve swore, quiet, and Bucky was hanging on the thread of losing it, suspended above the crash, hand stilled over his mouth and chest frozen colder than cryo, then those words came outta Steve's mouth and there came the slip into the familiar fall, down down down. Bucky welcomed the rushing wind this time, hand in hand, heart to heart, crystal on sky as blue eyes looked up at him and promised;

"I'm with you to the end of the line."

Although there are oceans we must cross, and mountains that we must climb. I know every gain must have a loss, so pray that our loss is nothing but time.

Til then.

The tears came with the same crash the rain had, that first thunderstorm that'd given Steve pneumonia and drew them to each other in the first promise, I had you.

Bucky's biggest regret was that he couldn't see right now, the tears slipping over his eyelashes and down the line of his nose and pooling wetly against the hand over his mouth, they blurred his vision and he couldn't see the look on Steve's face, but he was shaking too hard anyways.

"Are you crying?" Steve asked and Bucky's hand whirred as he brought it away from his mouth, tried uselessly to glare down at his asshole of a best friend.

"My b-best guy just asked me to marry him, of course I'm c...crying."

A bright laugh and that was nice, at least Steve was enjoying himself, then there was a tug on his hand as Steve hoisted himself to his feet and wrapped his arms around Bucky.
All the cold fought off and the wind off the water whistled around them and the lights over the bridge were just blinking on, glittering over them like stars and they hugged each other on the Brooklyn bridge tight enough to promise to never let go.

Bucky buried his face in Steve's neck and Steve held him closer, warm hands flattening Bucky's spine, strong muscle holding them both up, one sharp edge of the box in Steve's right hand digging into his ribs but he could give a damn, he could stay right here for the rest of his life.

The relief that'd rushed through him after Azzano, when Steve'd dragged him off that table and through a burning building and waved a hand at Bucky Just go and Bucky'd lost his fucking mind, grabbed onto the rail and shouted back No. Not without you, then Steve'd jumped over that goddamned gap and landed in Bucky's arms, stumbling into each other and breathing too hard and smelling like smoke and squeezing each other tight because they'd almost lost each other so many times--

It wasn't all that different from the relief he felt now, crushing his bones inside Steve's embrace and holding on tight for every jump they'd almost not made across and funny, how much Bucky still meant that, every word.

No, not without you.

Bucky had fallen and Steve had crashed and they'd both made it back to each other and everything hit him in that moment, in Steve's shuddering breaths against his ear and his watering eyes getting Steve's hair wet and they couldn't hold onto each other tight enough.

"God, you bastard," Bucky finally breathed against his ear, hands splayed across his shoulderblades. Steve lifted his head a little outta Bucky's hair, eyes still closed and nose tucked against his temple. Bucky's body expanded dirty sadness fill me up just like a balloon as he sucked in a breath, attempting to level his voice and failing. "Of course I'll marry you."

Steve barked a shaky laugh, because of course. Of course. Fuck, he'd missed this. Steve bundled him up tighter in his arms, until he couldn't breathe at all, but Bucky was never gonna want anything less.

It was probably another minute before he sighed into Steve's neck, arms releasing tension as he started to pull back. Steve wasn't letting go yet, but there was a box digging into Bucky's back they still had to attend to. He prodded ribs with a metal finger and Steve relented, put a few inches between their chests, palms secure on Bucky's ribcage, his on Steve's biceps as their eyes met, both teary and smiling.

A single brief pause, and Bucky could swear their souls were entwined, always had been, then Steve was letting go all the way and lifting the box between them again. Bucky held out his right hand, heartbeat in his throat because Steve was about to put a goddamned ring on him, then Steve's fingers were wrapping around metal and the excitement sunk a beat.

"Steve, you know I can't," Bucky murmured sorrowfully, moving to drawback his left only Steve suddenly closed his grip tight, glancing up at Bucky under ridiculously long eyelashes with this nervous look, then the pretty mouth was moving, rushed like he was actually unsure for once.

"It's magnetic. I made it for the specs of the metal, it twists and compresses so it should even stay on in battle but. But, um. I mean, you don't have to. If you want it on your right, you can, I--"

Bucky kissed him. Steve made a surprised sound, then they were melting together again and Bucky smiled, salty tears on tongues as their lips pressed together, still and real and human but more, more, them.
"I can't believe you'd do that for me," Bucky finally mumbled as their lips broke apart, Steve's forehead brushing his as they both looked down at entwined hands, the little black box in Steve's.

He got a snort for his sentiment, blue flicking cross-eyed to his for a second before the blonde head was shaking in amusement.

"I stormed an enemy base solo, dropped my shield off a burning aircraft, and you can't believe I'd get you a ring that fits?"

"Shut up," Bucky smiled, then Steve was slipping the ring over his finger and Bucky fell silent, staring at the shifting plates of his fingers as the lighter, beautiful metal settled over the metal he'd used to kill, then Steve twisted the circle and it snapped into place, magnetizing to his hand and Bucky sucked in a breath. That was some fancy tech, he'd bet anything it came from Tony.

What a fucking sap.

He kissed Steve again as their fingers entwined, then Steve was scooping him off the goddamned ground and Bucky brok off with an offended shout. The last time he'd been carried like this he had a goddamned bullet in his leg, Rogers couldn't just pick him up bridestyle whenever he goddamned wanted--

Except Steve was kissing him again and okay, fine, he'd let it go this once. He should've known anyways, Steve was always a hopeless romantic, course he'd scoop Bucky up in a bridal carry in the middle of the Brooklyn bridge after fucking proposing to him.

The only thing cold left in him were his cheeks, drying tear stains and that was alright, Steve kissed those away too.

It had to be another fifteen minutes before they managed to let go of each other long enough to walk back, shoulders bumping as always, but hands entwined this time as the bridge crossed under marching boots, the place where one love concluded and another began.

Bucky smiled to himself, glancing over the water, and thanked the lord above for Peggy fucking Carter.

The wind whistled back.

"We've been dating for a month," he pondered aloud, glancing over at Steve with a shake of his head. "A month, and you propose."

"Did the word 'boyfriend' not feel extremely inadequate?" Steve defended and Bucky rolled his eyes, rubbing his thumb over Steve's hand.

"Well, sure, didn't mean I was gonna propose."

"Not all of us can have great ideas," Steve teased and Bucky stopped in his tracks, right at the edge of the bridge as their hands yanked and forced Steve to stop too.

"Great ideas? Great ideas?"

"Oh here we go," Steve sighed, and Bucky tugged him in, wrapping an arm around his neck and rucking up his little blond halo with a playful hand. Steve squirmed and pushed at him and tried not to laugh, same way he always had as a kid, still failing miserably.

"Disastrous ideas," Bucky corrected, rubbing Steve's hair one more time before shoving him back to his feet. "You have the worst ideas."

Steve rolled his eyes, taking Bucky's hand again and pulling him along to keep walking. Bucky stumbled a foot before he caught up, making Steve drag him as he squinched up his face and mocked his voice an octave higher, "Oh, let's just storm this really-well-stocked-base from the front, that way they see us coming but at least the explosions will be bigger and cooler looking!"

"I literally never said that," Steve pointed out and Bucky scowled.

"Maybe not, but that's what I heard. S'what the rest of the Commandos heard too, pretty sure, but they liked you too much to say anything."

Steve ducked his head with a soft smile and Bucky let go of the teasing for a moment, falling into step properly alongside Rogers, bumping his shoulder with a shy smile of his own.

"I liked you the most though."

"You think so?" Steve teased and Bucky lifted an eyebrow.

"Unless you wanted to marry Morita?"

"Shut up," Steve groaned, giving Bucky a very serious face. "I know he kicks in his sleep."

Bucky had to stop again, bending in half with laughter in the middle of the sidewalk and Steve looked around, taking in the city for the quickest of moments, let himself breathe in the air of home, and lifted Bucky back up by the shoulder to kiss him again.

And again.

And again.

~~~

Nothing was fixed. They were still messes. But Bucky supposed that if they were fucked up already, having a ring on his finger wasn't something he'd turn down.

And okay, maybe it changed a few things. The home thing - that was helpful. There was a dedication now, that rushing thrill that went through him when he looked down and saw the proof of Steve - Steve loved him and Steve wanted him, eternally, forever, and the comfort he got from that? It was changing a few things.

But what about all the things it didn't change?

"Are you fucking kidding me?"

"I know, man. When I first heard Steve was getting married, I was like. To America or to Bucky?"

"Haha," Steve said dryly, rounding the corner into the kitchen where Clint and Sam were gossiping. They both shot up like rockets, wide eyes at the intruder on their breakfast.

"How is it my luck he overhead that?" Sam complained to his orange juice and Clint made an equally chagrined face.
"You don't even live here anymore man, what are you doing here at 7 in the goddamned morning?"

"Getting breakfast," Steve answered from the pantry, rooting through kinds of cereal.

"...I'd've thought you guys would be like, honeymooning, that we wouldn't see either of you for weeks."

"The honeymoon usually comes after the wedding." Steve commented loudly outta sight and Clint rolled his eyes, nudging Sam and mouthing seriously, why is he here though, just in time for Steve to come outta the pantry with HoneyNut Cheerios, popping one in his mouth and chewing contemplatively. "Besides, the gym equipment here is way better to have sex on."

Sam spit out his orange juice and Clint choked on his cornflakes and Steve threw back his head and cackled all the way back to the elevator.

"Where do you wanna get married?" Steve tapped a pencil to his mouth and Bucky made a contemplative sound, dipping his paintbrush in water and changing to a lighter blue, bending back close to his painting as he thought over an answer.

"We could always do it at the World War 2 memorial, that might make the papers."

Steve snorted and shook his head, going back to sketching the shadows on Bucky's face from his signature spot on the windowsill. He was glad they hadn't moved the studio yet, it was nice to be back in the Tower on the occasion. Their studio back home - no flinch! - had a couple of easels in it and Bucky hung out in there sometimes when Steve went on his morning runs with Sam, but he'd refused to move his painting over; no one can see it and I'm not risking it getting damaged until it's done, okay? so they were back here in their old studio, windowsill and sketchpad for Steve, painting for Bucky.

"We could do Hawaii. It's like the only place I didn't go on the USO tour."

"That sounds more like a honeymoon destination than a spot for a wedding. Plus isn't Hawaii hot as hell? I'm not gonna sweat through my tux, no thank you."

"Oooo, I getta see you in a tux. How exciting."

"Shh, you've seen me in a tux everytime I've worn one, dunno why you're excited."

"Because you're hot as fuck?"

"Steven Rogers, watch your language," Bucky teased and Steve threw an eraser across the room at him.

A knock at the door had them both lifting their heads before it escalated into an art-supplies-war.

"Come in?" Steve raised an eyebrow and gave Bucky a trepidatious look, getting a shrug and the same look in return.

"Please say everybody has their clothes on," Tony winced as he opened the door, eyes squeezed shut before he cracked one, then opened them both in surprise. "Oh. You're not even in each other's laps or anything. Like...on opposite sides of the room."

He waved his hands around in explanation and Steve shot Bucky a look, pencil-tip on his mouth
"How can we help you?" Bucky sat his paintbrush down and Tony made another nondescript hand-gesture.

"Just figured I'd come ask if you were sticking around for movie night. What're you guys doing?"

"Right now? Art," Steve replied, tapping his pencil knowingly against his temple. Tony made a face and Bucky picked his paintbrush back up again.

"Sure, we'll stay for movie night. And we were talking about wedding destinations." He glanced at Steve in his peripherals and there was that mischief twinkle, the same look they'd give each other during gradeschool pranks. Bucky cleared his throat, dabbing a touch of lightblue on his canvas and speaking as off-hand nonchalant as possible. "We're considering Canada."

Canada?? Steve mouthed with a smile and Bucky gave him that look that said better than Jersey and rolled his lips in to hide a smile too as Tony looked at him wide-eyed.

"You know it's legal in New York, right? You don't want to go to Canada. Goddamned Captain America wants to get married in Canada?"

"Why not?" Steve challenged and Tony turned the wide-eyes on him.

"There is a consistent layer of snow at all times."

"I like snow," Steve shrugged.

"Yeah," Bucky defended, cocking his head with a grin playing at one side of his mouth. "It's insulating."

Steve's eyes shot to him across the room and neither of them could hold it in any longer, bursting out in laughter. Bucky dropped his brush on the floor and bent in half and Steve threw his head back, one arm over his stomach as twin sounds echoed around the room and Tony backed out very slowly, shaking his head as he stared at the white paint and wondered if he ever would've known what Steve Rogers' laugh sounded like if Bucky hadn't come around.

He smiled one-sided, background full of echoing giggles as he took a step away from the door, and another. Those were two different people than the ones who'd sat barefooted on his lab floor months ago, dancing around each other with wary looks and careful words. Now?

Now, they were dancing together.

"Fiancé," Steve whispered into his skin and Bucky tipped his head back, holding his legs higher as Steve slid deeper inside him and peppered his neck with kisses, bedroom dark but for the light of the moon come round again.

"Punk," Bucky retorted and Steve threaded fingers through Bucky's hair with a smile, ducking his head as he rocked their bodies together and Bucky's throat wrapped around a groan that Steve clutched him tighter for, hips meeting again and again.

Bucky kissed the matching ring on Steve's hand when he finally stiffened and came inside him, and didn't comment on the tears in Steve's eyes.
It made sense that Steve saw Bucky as his home. It made sense and Bucky understood better now, why he’d paced the rooms of the apartment and cringed at the word and looked at the bridge with all that sorrow.

But it was a problem.

Bucky'd literally just told Steve he needed to make it on his own. And now they were engaged. They were engaged, and Bucky could whisper that word to himself with the giddiest, most terrified smile he owned but it didn't change a thing. Steve had to be okay when Bucky finally snapped and Bucky had to ensure that. He had to make sure Steve would be okay without him.

And he had to be okay without Steve.

The timing was terrible, was all.

How could they work on being individuals, independent, when Steve'd just tied them together closer than ever? Could they ever be independent?

It was just that Steve didn't understand how important it was to keep that distance. The moment Bucky gave it his all, the moment they both did?

There was no coming back from that. Hell, there was probably no coming back from this.

But Bucky was still holding out and Steve knew that but so long as they could keep distance between them they might make it out the otherside un-charred.

Steve still looked at him like his heart was broken whenever he thought Bucky couldn't see but he hadn't tried to make Bucky say I love you since the proposal so he was gonna hold his breath and count that as a win.

He just...couldn't give up this time.

"Do you want something to eat?"

"It's three-am."

"I know. I'm hungry."

"Okay, midnight snack it is." Steve swung his legs off the side of the bed, stretching to reveal that piece of beautiful skin between the hem of his boxers and the white tshirt he slept in.

"It's three am," Bucky pointed out, because that would be an after-midnight snack, and Steve socked him on the shoulder but cut him up apples anyways.

"Are either of you wearing a white tux for the wedding?" Natasha asked and Bucky cocked an eyebrow.

"I wasn't planning on it."
"Rogers?"

"Hmm? Whatever Bucky wants."

"Hey, don't put this on me. It's your wedding too."

"But you're the one marrying me, shouldn't you pick what I look like?"

"No? You don't get to pick how I'm styling my hair," Bucky replied incredulously and Steve sighed, turning back to his book.

"Can we do white flowers in braids?" Nat pressed and Bucky narrowed his eyes suspiciously. Zoned out as Natasha rattled off ideas, side-eyeing Steve from across the room with his jaw clicking. Whatever Bucky wants.

He hated that.

"How about the top of the Tower?"

Bucky blinked, glancing at Steve a moment before looking back out the window. "That's fine."

"I figured Tony'd be pretty stoked, plus it's the first place we danced after 1945."

"Mmm," Bucky agreed, watching the sailor down the harbor climb back aboard his boat. How many times did he drag Steve off running before Steve was too tired to chase him anymore?

"Bucky?"

"Yeah?"

"...nothing."

He didn't want Steve to save him.

That was all he wanted.

fading.

What was he now. Content or docile?

~~~

"Okay, this explains so much, and I've got more questions than ever." Bucky crossed his arms over his chest and Steve crossed his eyes at him in return.
"Just sit down, everybody, we can't do this with you standing."

"That's not what I heard," Sam muttered and Natasha snorted and Bucky gave them both a mild glare.

"Please tell me you guys call yourself Blondie 2.0," Stark interrupted and Steve raised an eyebrow, glancing between Thor and Clint.

"We don't have a name?"

"Although we should," Clint agreed, tapping the hollow of his guitar. Thor tipped his head in agreement, repositioning the Cajon boxdrum between his legs. Steve rolled his eyes from his stool between them, adjusting the microphone stand a little higher.

"I still like Stevie Thunderbird," Bucky pointed out and Pepper and Maria both laughed. It wasn't the Howling Commandos Septet, but apparently this was the mysterious Avengers stuff Steve Thor and Clint had been working on for the past few weeks. They'd formed a band and honestly Bucky wasn't sure that wasn't exactly the kind'a mischief he'd expected outta them.

As for Blondie 2.0, it was a pretty fair name too, especially considering they were made up of all the blonde Avengers, but Bucky had better name suggestions, that was that.

"Shh, shh. You can criticize after we play." Steve waved a hand at them to settle down, adjusting in his chair and pulling the mic closer. A glance to his left - encouraging nod from Thor, big hands hovering over his drum - to the right, Clint's thumbs up and poised fingers. "Alright. Here goes."

The speakers crackled, adjusting as Clint strummed the first chord, then an easy melody drifted over the room and an involuntary smile curled on Bucky's face.

Barton hummed a few pitches, half ooo's and Thor's hands were drumming steadily, a nice rhythm between them.

Then Steve started singing.

"Yellow boxes in my car," Caution-tape popped into mind and Bucky lifted an eyebrow.

"Pack 'em high til' I can't see far," Steve tipped his head, mouth curving up in a bit of a smile as his tentative voice drifted over the next line, "Yeah, I'm moving on to better."

I wanna get better.

Bucky bit his lip, shifting in his chair as Clint nodded along with the beat, fingers shifting to another chord.

"Try not to care what others think," Steve sang, the boy with raised fists fighting hard to keep his nose outta trouble, harder once he found it. "If I fail again, try to swim and...sink."

Blue flashed to his, hours of swim-and-sink between them, "They'll say I could do 'Better'."

One side of Steve's mouth curled, leaning in close to his microphone and the music peaked.

"So I blame it on...my optimistic heart," The world's just not that good of a place, Stevie. You expect too much. "At least I'll ha-ave stories for my scars."

Artist fingers wrapping around the mic, eyes squeezing shut and lifting for the high note and everyone's breath stilled in their throats, "American dream my life away, when all of my dreams cry
A plastic shield painted red-white-and-blue.

"I may lose my heart," A hand lifted, palm placed over the center of his chest and Bucky's heart stopped too, "...but one day I'll be a star."

Steve looked up, hand still over his chest, the place where the Captain America uniform's star shone; the symbol, his symbol. You be my star, I'll be your sky and Bucky's hand covered his mouth.

"They promised me a bigger house. I'll make the money playing out loud, don't you hear," Steve cocked his head, that sad smile that hid beneath the plastic point, I want you and The Avengers Initiative, "That sounds much 'better'."

A beautiful pawn dragged into someone else's game because of his golden - optimistic - heart and Steve'd thought he was living better. Doing more. Making up for the hell he'd gone through for the first twenty years of his life.

"And if I make this dreaming last, is it worth the painful past? I hope... I hope this will get 'Better'."

The guitar and drum crashed strong and Steve's eyebrows knit as the passion hit again, "So I'll blaame it on my optimistic heart," a little shake of his head, "--at least I'll have...stories for my scars."

Scars and bruises and broken-noses and stories, causes, battles-worth-fighting,

"American dream my life away--" all twisted and stuffed into vivid uniform and Steve'd zipped it up anyways, "--when all of my dreams cry mayday, mayday."

Chasing frontlines in the distance, compromising and unclenching his fists and lifting his chin, "I may lose my heart, but one day I'll be a star."

Peggy told him he could do better, but Steve jumped out a plane for more than that. Catalyst--

The war took more from Steve than his spirit, it took his heart and strapped it to a torture table and Steve'd been drifting when he heard and If I read the posters right, you've got somewhere to be in half an hour.

Yessir, he did. And Steve dropped it all.

"I'll tell you all about the things I left for," Steve's eyes were on his and Bucky's were watering. "Hanging onto dreams thought I was meant for, never did I think it'd take the heart from me,"

A new century and a tighter suit "--it'd take the heart from me--" and Steve'd dropped it all--

Dropped his shield I'm not gonna fight you - for the same reason he'd dropped the fame and picked it up, I'm gonna fight for him.

"I'll tell you all about the things I left for, hanging onto dreams thought I was meant for--"

Dreams of change and the power to make a difference and it never should've gone so sideways, it never should've scooped Steve outta his own suit and shield and

"Never did I think it'd take the heart from me, it'd take the heart from me."

Clint's strums paused, a single beat from Thor's palms and Steve's gaze floated over the audience, microphone in both hands now as he lifted his voice, sang from so deep inside him Bucky could see every version of his boy right there before him;

"Blame it on my optimistic heart." Tiny, indignant, too caring, _so much to prove_

"At least I'll have...stories for my scars." Fumbling showgirl and reckless best friend, _just go, get outta here!

"American dream my life away," Beautiful soldier, _red white and blue._

"When all my dreams cry _mayday mayday,_" and the empty Man out of Time.

A hand over his chest again and it couldn't be more fitting, that they'd sewn the star right over his chest, bright white beautiful to hide the hole they'd carved in the center of him.

"I may lose my hea-art...oh the day I'll be a star."

Bucky wiped a thumb under his eyelashes and Steve's lifted to lock on his again.

It was so loud, the _I love you_ in his eyes. In his words.

How had Bucky never known? How had he never seen?

Everything he was to Steve...

"I'll tell you all about the things I left for," the voice of an angel sang and Bucky'd never dreamed it come to this.

"Hanging onto dreams thought I was meant for." They'd put the serum in his veins and Steve'd taken it as a responsibility and he was _meant_ to save people and so he held on and he crashed, he crashed and they stole his home from him and there'd been nothing left to thaw to.

"But never did I think it'd take the heart from me," His hands uncurled from the microphone, words drifting over them all again as Clint hummed in the background, layers spilling out so beautifully, "-- it'd take the heart...from me."

The guitar strummed and Steve scooted the microphone back a foot, nodding lightly along to the beat and the smile on his face was so distant it was surreal; watching Steve on his stool, singing to his friends about how he lost his optimistic heart, so goddamned beautiful Bucky could've cried from that alone, _I'll tell you all about the things I left for._

He'd looked right at Bucky, and this time Bucky hadn't turned away.

Steve's reason. Catalyst.

You're all I have that ties me to who _I am_, Bucky.

Say I could do _better._

Clint's fingers floated the final chord over the air and Bucky couldn't remember standing, or walking, but then he was pulling Steve into his arms and not much mattered anyways.

Steve's arms hooked over his back, nose buried in Bucky's neck and they were holding each other so tight he could feel the imprint of Steve's ring under his shoulder and that, that's how far they'd come from stolen hearts replaced with stars?
He didn't know how long they held each other, only that Clint eventually started playing some finger-picked melody on his guitar that made the Avengers laugh and Bucky reset, pulling back to force a smile on his mouth and Steve's hands framed his face, thumbs wiping over Bucky's cheeks and Bucky closed his eyes against the burn behind them.

Gentle fingers tipped him forward and Steve's mouth touched his, so soft and light, and Bucky was gonna cry a lot more if Steve didn't cut it out. He pressed closer and Steve let him, kissed Bucky back just as hard, just as many promises on his lips and Bucky ached, all my dreams cry mayday because it hurt, his chest hurt like they'd carved him up instead.

They had. Just not the way they'd carved Steve. They'd dug a star over his heart too and maybe, maybe that's why it ached because Bucky couldn't sing this song and have anyone understand, not when he wasn't the angel Steve was. For Steve, it was about losing himself and for Bucky he'd dream'd his life away to escape the knives sinking into his skin and that wasn't romantic, that wasn't beautiful like this was.

He wasn't beautiful like Steve was.

Stevie Thunderbird got a standing ovation that Bucky'd missed, but everyone was still standing and clapping when he and Steve pulled away from each other. The right thing to do was laugh, to shake his head at them or maybe flip the bird but Bucky saw all those people celebrating and cheering over the song and their kiss and he turned back around, tucking his face in Steve's neck and clutching him too tight and Steve laughed for him, sweet and light, one hand playing with the hair on the back of Bucky's head like it was made of silk instead of snakes, making a joke over Bucky's shoulder and reaching around him to clap Clint and Thor on their arms, blushing at the oo'ing compliments and it'd been beautiful, the whole thing just hit too hard and Bucky wasn't ready.

His left arm whirred as Steve barred happily over his back, rocked them to the side to lower his microphone, appeasing Bucky's clinging to him and just functioning around him and it was domestic and sweet, probably, to someone, likely him if he wasn't half outta his mind. But with the melody still drifting through Bucky's head it just felt stupidly symbolic, rain and blue curtains when you didn't need them.

Steve was functioning just fine with Bucky latched onto him, and how long had that been the case? How long had he held so tight Steve just learned to live around him? To mold his life around Bucky's needs and it didn't feel good, it didn't feel good at all.

He let go and Steve tipped his chin up, thumb pressed in the dimple in it as he kissed Bucky's mouth again and Steve's eyes were open books, what were Bucky's?

Hopefully? Lying.

~~~

"Do you remember, in 44, we stayed at that place in France?"

"Mmm, yeah. Why?" Steve glanced up and Bucky glanced down.

"No reason. Just curious if you remembered it."

Steve eyed him, running Bucky's posture over in his head for any anomalies before slowly turning back to strapping on his uniform.
"What song are you dancing to at your wedding?"

"Whatever Bucky wants."

Bucky didn't want.

The pan hissed, oil jumping to scald his hand and Bucky stopped himself milliseconds before shouting, mouth poised open as he froze.

Did that hurt?

Really?

A spot of hot oil and he was going to complain. He used to get knives shoved all the way through his legs and not scream.

What was pain anyways?

Had he fallen so far into convincing himself to be normal that he was lying automatically now? Or was this just a consequence of calling this body his?

Bucky sat his spatula down and took a step back from the counter.

"That smells good," Steve commented offhandedly, reading something in the paper.

Buck turned and stared at him.

What the fuck had he become. What had they become.

What had he allowed--

"I'm not just the most convenient apple-pie picket-fence candidate am I?"

He hadn't meant to say it out loud. But Steve's head shot up, deep line creasing between his eyebrows as he studied Bucky's face, whirring fingers trapped between real ones, trying to keep still and realized how much he meant that.

"Bucky, c'mon," Steve chided and Bucky turned around, back to the pan, staring down at the sizzling bubbles popping in oil.

"Why do you of all people wanna get married." He said it too quiet but Steve heard him anyways, scrape of a chair and feet on tile.

Arms wrapping around his stomach and Bucky wished his insides didn't feel so goddamned hollow.

"I wanna spend the rest of my life with you," Steve whispered in his ear and Bucky closed his eyes.

"That was always the plan, since the beginning. Marriage or sleeping-together aside." It was a plan they'd made as kids and Bucky'd spent half his life believing they'd never be able to keep. But they had a shot now, was it really a good idea to risk it on something like marriage? What if he lost Steve?
"What if-- "So why this?"

"I know what you're thinking." Steve's hands took his shoulder, spinning Bucky to face him and that wasn't what he wanted either. It was just he needed, he needed too much--

Warm hands lifted his face, tipping his chin up to force Bucky's eyes on pieces of stolen sky and Steve held him firm and promised firmer, "It's not just another American Dream."

"Not screaming mayday?" Bucky inhaled, not sure if he was being endearing or morbid.

"No. My heart's right here," Steve placed Bucky's palm on his chest, steady thumpthump under his fingers and Steve's heartbeat, that was Steve's heart and he was alive, as alive as Bucky was and he promised he wasn't leaving again. Steve's heart, sans stars. "It's all yours."

"I hope you don't mean that," Bucky splintered over sorrow and Steve didn't give him time to weep, lips interlocking fierce and Bucky clung to him like a dying man in the desert, no companion left but the burning sun, the very thing that would kill him.

If he tried, maybe they could make it out alive.

Just try.

Too much to give up, he couldn't, he could not.

It wasn't working.

~~~

The door slammed shut like a gunshot and Steve flinched, shoving it back open, cracking as it slammed into the wall.

Why did Bucky have to be like this?

Why did it always turn out this way?

What was Steve doing wrong?

"Is this a test?" Steve demanded, storming into their old kitchen after Bucky. The mission hadn't gone well and Bucky'd been so out of it he'd almost gotten killed and then Steve'd been a hair too close to an explosion and Bucky'd blown up and freaked out on him and then given him the silent treatment for the rest of the time and that wasn't fucking fair.

He'd shot off the quinjet the moment it landed, taking down nine-fucking-hundred flights of stairs to get away from Steve, go to their old floor so he didn't have to face Brooklyn only Steve wasn't gonna let him run, not without chasing.

Bucky was running from \textit{everything}.

Since the goddamned day on the bridge, since the moment his mask flipped off and Steve stared at him incredulously and asked, \textit{Bucky}?

Steve was still chasing.

"Bucky, c'mon," Steve snapped, halting a step before he ran into Bucky's back, which was turned to him. Like always.

Steve reached for his shoulder to whip him around only then Bucky was halfway across the kitchen and Steve had to blink a few times, recalibrate. Bucky hadn't moved like that in months. Not since he got over the obsession with efficiency.

"You don't get it," Bucky hissed and Steve threw up both his hands, leaning forward in the distance between them that suddenly felt way more poignant than it should've.

"Because you keep hiding from me!! What don't I get? You've been distant since I proposed - before, probably, but you won't even tell me why!"

Bucky turned his back to Steve again. Opened a cabinet, grabbed a glass with his metal hand and all-but-shattered it on the counter, slamming the cabinet back shut and yanking the faucet on, edge of the glass clanking against metal and that wasn't even \textit{like} Bucky, slamming things around and ducking away from Steve's touch and giving him the fucking silent treatment and weren't things supposed to be getting \textit{better}?

"What's \textit{WRONG} with you?"

The glass dropped in slowmotion, top inch already shattering in a robotic hand as the rest slipped free, crashing to the floor and splashing water up the cabinets, shards skidding across tile and Steve's mouth opened wordless, only Bucky was facing him now and there was nothing in his eyes but hurt. Nothing in his mouth but snapping, sharp words deeper than knife wounds.

"I'm a killer living on borrowed time that's held together at the seams with sunshine that burns so hot it blinds itself."

Water was trickling on the floor. Steve stared at Bucky. \textit{When it rains it pours, stay thirsty like before.}

Bucky stared back.

"Do you love me?"

"...what? Why do you keep asking that!" Bucky growled high-pitched in frustration, leaping over the sharpest of the shattered glass, a step away from Steve and a piece slipped into his foot, instant red joining the water, glass, crystal, and Bucky made an even more pent-up frustrated noise.

Steve stepped towards him, carefully to avoid shards and Bucky cursed under his breath, sidestepping to a safe spot and lifting his foot to pry the piece of glass out, wiggling with metal fingers and not looking at Steve. "How many times do I have to say – you know the answer."

He tossed the glass aside, stained red and Steve couldn't believe he'd never noticed how far Bucky'd go to avoid talking about this.

"How are we ever supposed to share the kind of commitment - like a marriage - if you can’t even commit to saying you love me?"

"You wanna hear that so bad, but you don’t even know what you’re talking about. You honestly think that's what the problem is? Some stupid, cliché three-little-words?"

"Yes! Because if you can’t even say it, how could you mean it?"

"Don’t give me that," Bucky snapped, arms crossed over his chest, plates on one shifting tighter. "Like you mean it."

Steve's mouth popped open. They were standing in the same building Steve'd declared his love in, reinforced it a thousand times over and was that actually still a problem? Bucky didn't believe him? How could Bucky be so fucking stubborn? Still? After all this goddamned time, you'd think he'd've outgrown that.

He had to take a few breaths to keep himself from shouting, calming himself enough to take a step closer with a semi-patient, "I've been chasing you—"

All over the goddamned planet

"Saving me," Bucky interrupted, sneer on his pouty mouth as he leaned forward and threw invisible knives into Steve's chest. "It's always been about proving yourself, about showing the world how fucking capable you are and I'm just the next project you can fucking use to distract yourself from how much you're hurting, the poor adopted-fucking-puppy that lets you live in your goddamned hero bubble."

"Me? Me? What about you!? You still see me as some little kid that needs to be protected from everything that jumps! You think I don't know horror? You think I should fucking be afraid of you? How many times do I have to say it, you already have me, you always fucking have. And I keep proving it over and over, I dropped my shield on that helicarrier and laid myself out to die to prove to you—"

"This isn’t love," Bucky severed, hands in fists shoved in the corners of his elbows and he looked tight as strung wire, as close to splitting in half as the Winter Soldier had staring at him on that bridge months ago. Steve's mouth was parted in the same shock anyways, words not-quite-registering. "It’s some kind of skewed, delusional devotion."

Devotion. noun; commitment, loyalty.

Allegiance; worship, passion.

There was nothing delusional about it. It was devotion, and it was love, the highest kind. Unconditional. Eternal.

Bucky could say what he wanted to throw Steve off, but it wasn't working this time. Steve'd chased him too long. They had to stop. Face the reflection for once in their goddamned lives. He was so done with the lies.

"I don’t think you believe that," Steve retorted flatly. Bucky's eyebrows shot up and Steve crossed his arms over his chest too. "I think you just won't say you love me. You've never said it once, not when we were kids on the brink of death, in the war surrounded by death, not now when we're all we have left and you know what I'm starting to get? You've never said it once and...maybe you never will."

The counters were dripping splashed water onto the floor, plinking off glass shards and red was still swirled in with melted ice and they should've known it'd happen that way.

His best friend since childhood, the same man who stood before him and begged him not to sign up again. Worse, they'll actually take you.

The same look was on his face now, exasperation sans fondness, cold disbelief of the recklessness that'd just come out of Steve's mouth, deep-seated fear that he'd never voice aloud and Steve stood his ground, the same stubbornness he'd faced Bucky with that day and the only thing he could pray was that Bucky didn't walk away from him this time.

"For once, Steve," Bucky said, slow and bitter metal reaching into his chest and closing a fist around his heart, shattering it like the melted ice coating broken crystal. "You might be right."

Bucky turned.

He turned and he didn't salute this time.

He turned and he started to walk away and the feeling in Steve's chest the first time he'd done that, Steve'd thought he'd never feel anything that painful. This time?

This time crippled him.

The hallway between the elevator and their bedrooms, the hallway Nat and Clint had dragged Bucky down, rope cutting into his wrist as he screamed that Steve was coming for him before he collapsed, Sputnik, they were in that hallway when Steve caught up, grabbed Bucky's arm hard enough to bruise, maybe break, a thread short of shouting that word again, anything to get Bucky to stop.

"No. No, you don't get to walk away from me like that," Steve's voice sounded like he was crying but he wasn't letting go of Bucky's arm to wipe his eyes and find out. Bucky was staring at him incredulously, and maybe in some other circumstance Steve might be delighted he still managed to surprise Buck but not now, not when his chest was aching. Not when his bottom lip was trembling and his words were shot through with bullets. "You don't get to break my heart and make me come ask for forgiveness. You fucking asshole."

"You don't understand!" Bucky yanked free, arm purpling and Steve's hand smarting, and there were tears in Bucky's eyes now too, empty walls staring down at them, empty rooms that used to be theirs. Empty bodies that used to have souls. It wasn't defensive, this was begging. "How can you expect me to say that? After e-everything that's happened to me--"

"Is this about the torture?" Steve furrowed his eyebrows, hand freezing moments from circling Bucky's wrist, just a foot apart so he saw every flicker on Bucky's face perfectly.

"Is this about the torture," Bucky scoffed incredulously, turning away and rubbing a hand over his forehead. He was taking that then. He was making that his out.

Steve couldn't do it anymore.

"You can't blame everything on Zola."
Bucky froze. Even his left arm fell silent, perfectly still without the slightest buzz. Nothing moved but his eyes, suddenly on Steve through the disheveled strands across his forehead.

"What did you just say."

He wasn't undermining Bucky's trauma. He wasn't.

"You knew," Steve accused, pointing a finger at Bucky's chest. "Back then, didn't you? Before any of that shit went down. You didn't tell me then, and you didn't have the reasons I did. It's always been about something else."

Bucky just stared at him. Steve crumpled his hands in frustration, making a noise at the ceiling before leveling his heaviest challenge gaze on Bucky, leaning forward just enough make Bucky look like the small one and pinning his slippery heart with bitten words,

"This has nothing to do with the torture, admit it."

It was a corner Bucky couldn't squeeze out of and the last time someone'd backed him into a corner they'd been shot twice in the stomach.

Steve leaned back just in time to see the flash of white and silver, knife handle wobbling on the wall and a gash in the sheetrock, but that knife wasn't half as concerning as the one still in Bucky's hand, metal fingers flexing around it as he breathed too heavy and the throw hadn't even been aimed at Steve, Bucky'd just hurled it in rage and even then, he'd been careful about it.

Even in his wild rage he was protecting Steve from himself.

Blood boiling, red-tinted vision and the sudden rush of anger that whipped up through his sternum came straight out his mouth, spitting pissed at the lying, heartbreaking asshole who'd fucking ruined Steve's life then claimed he didn't belong it.

Bucky threw knives when he lost control and Steve was the one who belonged on a battlefield?

Steve shoved the invisible star branded on Bucky's chest too, fucking pushed him hard because Bucky couldn't do that to him, couldn't pretend like Steve was fucked up just to hide how messed up he was.

"Oh, what, right, like you're not a fighter too?" Maybe if Steve pushed him far enough Bucky'd break, maybe he'd fucking break down and tell the truth for once in his goddamned life--

"YOU RUINED ME!"

Steve's flinch had nothing to do with the second knife burying itself in the wall.

His heart was pounding and their old apartment was on fire, smoke curling up between them and Steve couldn't move. The sun was going down and the darkness would destroy them in the wake of mourning light.

Fingernails dug into palms. If it were anyone but Bucky, Steve'd throw a punch, anything to get Bucky to take it back. But there was no taking that back.

So he reached for him instead.

Bucky yanked away stumbling, knocking into the closest wall and near collapsing against it, creaking steel as Bucky's metal hand crumpled the last knife, bent and staggered dropping to the hardwood with a hollow clank.

"Holy fuck, you're driving me fucking crazy," Bucky breathed, curling in on himself with his hands gripped together against his forehead, knuckles fucking up his hair as he closed his eyes and trembled and with his face hidden, it was like Steve could see him clear all over again.

Masks, overlayed on walls covering more masks and he'd thought he'd torn them all off but he hadn't, because Bucky was shivering against the wall and losing his goddamned mind.

Steve could see his hands clench tighter like he could hold onto reality that way, like he'd stop slipping off whatever cliff he was dangling on in his head and if Steve could pry open their skulls to get to Bucky's and free him from wherever he'd caged himself inside, he'd do it in a heartbeat. He'd do it in a heartbeat if it were the last heartbeat he had.

Bucky's hands didn't stop squeezing. Steve started forward, worry sinking a pit in his stomach - dropping through the floors below them as he shifted in front of Bucky and saw the other side of his hand, metal holding so tight blood was seeping through his fingers and Steve was prying Bucky off himself so fast he smeared red all over his fingers too but he couldn't see it, couldn't see anything but the tears in Bucky's eyes as his head shot up with a gasp, right hand shaking and imprinted with the outline of metal, blood dripping from the plates' cuts and Steve pulled Bucky's hand to his mouth to kiss the marks, make him see--

Only Bucky was trying to spin away again, eyes flashing and mouth twisting like he'd rather bleed out than have Steve's lips coated in his blood and that was the fucking problem if only he'd hold still--

He should've remembered November 1943, grabbing onto Bucky's upper arms and holding him so tight and solid Bucky thought he was strapped in leather again, but he didn't remember that and he grabbed onto Bucky's arms anyways.

Red smeared on skin and Bucky struggled to get away, uselessly since he wasn't letting Steve anywhere near his metal hand. Like just touching it would kill him but Steve wasn't letting him ruin months of progress in one fight, Steve was keeping him right here until they figured this the fuck out and Bucky stopped hurting himself.

Mentally, more than physically. Seeing Bucky bleed like that was terrifying, but it was nothing compared to the way he had to be ripping himself apart on the inside and that, that was worse because Steve couldn't kiss those wounds, couldn't stitch up those scars.

"Stop," Bucky rasped, shaking his shoulders to make Steve let go and Steve crowded closer, backing Bucky into the wall and holding him firmer, chasing Bucky's gaze to force crystal to fucking look at him and Bucky kept turning his head, fighting, weak sounds in the back of his throat as his feet kicked and Steve shoved him harder against the wall. "Leave me the fuck alone," he spat and Steve leaned in close, gripping tight enough to wreck already purple-red skin.

"No," he bit back through grit teeth and some distant part of his mind recognized that he'd held Natasha like this once, slammed her into a wall and demanded, do better. She'd looked at him with her unshakable eyes and averted too-quick, averted in fear. Of which legend?

Those that do call him the Winter Soldier.

He'd called him a ghost. Had no idea how much it'd mean. How much he'd been right, how faded the boy in his tight grip was now.
And like this, head turned away and disheveled hair falling in his face, shoulders drawn and toes barely touching the ground, he did look like a boy. He looked like Steve's boy, his best guy, the one who socked him on the shoulder and stayed up for nightwatch with him so they could watch the sunset.

The sun wasn't going down that fucking easy.

"No," Steve repeated, because he wasn't ever leaving Bucky alone, there was no day without night. "Never. I lo--"

"STOP, let go," Bucky squirmed, starting to tremble as he yanked his shoulder to the side but Steve just shoved him harder against the wall again. "Let me go!" Hysteric that time, head still turned away, bloody hand knocking at Steve's arm. Steve tightened his grip and Bucky made a pained sound, tipping off into rambling, shaking his head.

"I'll hurt you," A plea, terrified, not a threat and Steve stepped closer, feet between Bucky's and chests almost brushing I dare you. "I'll hurt you, I won't be able to live with myself, I'll hurt you!!"

Bucky thrashed in his grip and he had nowhere to go but up, a flash of his eyes and Steve could see that same fear, the horror as he crashed into reality with a gun to Steve's forehead but he hadn't hurt Steve then, he wouldn't now. Bucky wouldn't hurt him. Sometimes it felt like Bucky wouldn't come near him and Steve was so goddamned sick of it.

"No, you won't," Steve grit through his teeth, struggling to keep Bucky's arms pinned and only making him fight back harder.

"Let me go. Let me go!!" His voice shot shrill, heart pounding so fast Steve could feel it in the rotting air between them and crystal was rimmed red and wet, like the kitchen floor, hovering tears on eyelashes as Bucky twisted, voice cracking over a sob, "Why can't you ever let me go??"

Steve stopped.

There was too much loaded in that sentence, too much and he wasn't talking about Steve gripping him against the wall. He wasn't talking about that at all.

The surprise rived a crack in red anger and Steve's hands loosened a millimeter, just enough for Bucky to tear free, duck under Steve's arm with stumbling legs and backpedal dangerously down the hallway, practically falling over himself as he darted for the nearest door and fuck - fuck,

His feet slipped over hardwood, peripherals blackened with ancient blinders and Steve was no more steady chasing Bucky than he was running and when did it ever s t o p--

Bucky crossed the threshold and Steve practically dove to reach him before solid wood slammed between them - he'd break it down anyways, he'd fucking go through the wall if he had too.

He had, chasing Bucky before. Broken down doors and dented walls and jumped out glass windows to throw his shield, the unforgettable echoing clank as a metal hand reached out and snapped it from the air.

Bucky's eyes over the mask painted, dripping black and Steve'd been so entranced he hadn't followed up the throw with a run, punch, anything, he'd just stood in awe as Bucky threw the shield back to him and if he had to Steve'd do it all over again, he'd chase Bucky across the rooftops and break crystal glass and dive over darkness just to get Bucky to hold his shield one more time--

But the door didn't slam in his face.
Bucky didn't move to close the door at all.

Bucky wasn't moving.

Steve slid into the studio behind him and an empty paintcan rolled and Bucky was glued to the easel on the other end of the room. The painting was still facing the window, so Steve couldn't see it but Bucky, Bucky was standing there like he could, knowing exactly what was on the other side and whatever it was he'd made so important, dedicated all that time and beauty too?

Whatever it was, it destroyed him.

The last, invisible knife dropped, clattering silently to the ground and Steve stepped forward, just as Bucky collapsed. Falling to his knees, crumpling broken skeleton with a whirling metal arm and Steve followed him down seconds after, as always.

His face was in his hands and the agony in his fingers, neck, shoulders, the damaged sound in that beautiful mouth, it'd all risen like a tsunami wave, crashing ashore with the painting's push and black fishes in the sea were beached, unbreathing, gasping in the air that didn't belong to them anymore.

Steve fell beside him. Took Bucky in his arms, pulled him sideways into his lap and they were both too big for this but Steve didn't care, wrapping his arms around lethal muscle, rocking back and forth as the waves white-capped, crashed, settled. Drew back, repeat, and Bucky wasn't crying, just fading. Steve wished he'd cry; there'd be something he could kiss away.

He pressed his forehead over scars, breathing in the life he'd spent so long loving, touched his nose to the fabric of Bucky's shirt like it was his skin instead.

They could heal.

We're too far gone.

Whirring metal shoved long hair back, buried in brunette as Steve played his fingertips over Bucky's bicep, swaying back and forth, the way Sarah used to when it hurt too bad to sleep, the way Bucky did when Steve was the one disappearing into bloody screams.

Bucky scrubbed the back of a bloody hand over his face to wipe invisible tears. Mortal fingers closed over Steve's knee, five-pointed brand in his skin that Steve'd never shake.

"Touch me," Bucky whispered, hushed and rough in prayer. He'd wanted nothing but to escape Steve minutes ago and now he was begging for him and it ached deep in his stomach because Steve knew why. Could feel it, the nights that Bucky climbed into his lap for more than his love. He laid himself in Steve's arms to forget.

Neither of them were breathing right but Steve depressed his thumb against the back of Bucky's neck, digging into years-built tension too deep to massage out and dropped his palm between spade shoulderblades, smoothing ripples down the bow of spine - a shudder, not the good kind and Bucky was curling in tighter on himself reflexively, shying from the touch like it hurt, like Steve might as well be Hydra.

He lifted off and Bucky made a distressed sound, squeezing Steve's knee tighter and forcing a controlled breath through his lips. He couldn't tell which was worse - touching Bucky or separated from him.

The only thing clear was that Bucky was hurt and Bucky needed him but it was all too raw, torture and pain and the painting and the bruises and the knives in their walls and the empty paintcans he'd kicked on the way in - Bucky was asking him to touch and Steve knew what that meant but Bucky was too messed up right now for Steve to penetrate his body like that. Bucky was too weak for that.

They needed to be close, they had to drag back together or they'd keep falling further apart but Bucky couldn't take it, not right now, Steve knew that much. So how--

Oh.

"No," Steve withdrew quietly and that time the distress was quiet and high-pitched, a child's cry and Buck looked ready to crack in half but it was better than the way he'd cringed at Steve's hand. So they had to make it Bucky's hand. He pressed the five-pointed brand deeper against his skin, fingers lacing between Bucky's as he leaned forward and whispered mollified against his ear, "You touch me."

*

A single pause as the implication sunk in and Bucky lifted his head, staring at the back of the painting across the room. Then for the first time in what felt like an eternity, Bucky turned and looked him straight in the eye, searching. Realizing exactly how serious Steve was. They needed each other and Bucky'd split open for real if he was under Steve. It was simple.

"I c-can't be gentle with you right now." Bucky's mouth twisted, eyebrows lifted disbelieving like Steve was a maniac to suggest it.

"I can take it," Steve promised, because he hadn't been expecting Buck to make sweet, slow love to him. Whatever damage Bucky thought he'd do - Steve'd heal.

Wary eyes studied his face and Steve waited, let Bucky look him over with that serious contemplation he'd perfected in European woods. They might as well be there now, the way Buck was looking at him, protective-streak mixed with that "mystery look" Steve'd finally recognized as desperation, seventy years late.

His right-hand sniper sat here with him on the floor, blue shirt and all, hair windblown from the battle they'd been at an hour ago, curved back away from his face like how he used to wear it and Bucky looked a century younger, blinking his icy-blues at Steve. His best friend, that's who was staring at him now, the exact same man that'd sat beside him at the flickering fire, that'd leaned against him while the whipping wind of the boat echoed the final notes of their songs around their heads and it was Buck, it was always Buck, and Steve'd never felt this close to the truth of then as he did right now.

Soldiers, two young soldiers dragged through the bumpiest road of all and Bucky's dogtags were still sitting cool against Steve's chest, under his clothes and -- the spell finally broke, bright eyes turning away as Bucky took back his hands and for the first time in months Steve had to blink and remind himself that one of them was metal.

"No, Steve." His voice was almost the same. He'd never stopped saying Steve's name the same, heavy New York accent or not and when he spoke again either Steve was fucking losing it or he hadn't noticed Buck's accent starting to creep back into his words. "I can't be what you need."

"I need you." Steve whispered and Bucky closed his eyes, curling up shaking hands into little balls that didn't feel like fists at all. Carefully, gently so it couldn't feel anything like leather or lightning, Steve placed his palm on Bucky's neck, the same place he'd held moments after pulling Bucky off a table the first time, I thought you were dead. "Real, raw, I want you to give it to me like you'd break me if I were younger."

"But you've never...we haven't." Bucky sucked in a breath, almost a hint of a smile (despairing one, but still) as his gaze flicked back up to Steve's. "It's harder than it looks."

"That's the best you got?" Steve murmured and Bucky's face fell, turning to hide again but Steve caught his dimpled chin before he could go, run away again. "C'mon, Buck. I...I need to know how it feels. I. Bucky, I need you inside me."

"Stop," he croaked weakly, fists curling in the front of Steve's shirt, eyes downcast and bottom lip trembling. "You don't want that. I could-- I could seriously hurt you."

"Make me feel," Steve overrode, rubbing his thumbs over Bucky's wrists. "Show me. Show me, Bucky, give me everything. Everything you've felt since the first day you realized..."

Bucky was shivering, eyes wide as he stared at the ground, overwhelmed and broken at the edges and Steve just needed him. In everything. But like this, right now.

He tipped forward, reaching for Bucky's body and his lifeline and Buck scrambled, shot to his feet, pushing Steve off but Steve grabbed for his wrist before he could go, latching onto metal and steadying himself on his knees, pressing his lips to the back of Buck's hand and the sound outta Bucky's throat was absolutely horrible.

Steve glanced up under his lashes and Bucky was staring down at him, lost and tearstained and Steve reached up to grab his other hand, pressing both of them to his mouth, kisses to fingers, wrists, the fading mark on Bucky's right, line with its ending dash. The feet in front his knees tried to take a step back and Steve only just managed not to drop and kiss those too.

Worship, Steve was kneeling at an altar and Bucky was crumbling marble, withstanding the most treacherous of storms but melting in soft sunlight.

"You forgot about me," Steve accused, blinking away blurred vision and sinking his teeth into the metal plate above Bucky's wedding band, pulling back to kiss the ring, voice dropping in a whisper. "You forgot me and I was so empty without you. Was it easier to be nothing?"

Mechanics whirred and Steve's head snapped up forcefully, Bucky's hand immovable under his chin.

"You can't imagine," Bucky began and Steve tipped back further, muscles trembling and he just wanted to grab Buck by the hips, drag him down to the floor and fuck him senseless among the paint cans but that wouldn't--he had to give this to Bucky.

Prove his trust. Let himself go.

He closed his eyes and his back muscles wouldn't relax, hands jittery and legs twitching from kneeling this long but Bucky needed him. He needed Bucky, every bit. No holding back.

Bucky had to stop...stop holding back or it was gonna break Steve's heart outta his chest.

"Why are you doing this?" Bucky whispered and Steve bit his tongue to keep his eyes from watering over. His windpipe was half-crushed from just Bucky's pinky pressed up against it and it was simple, really.

"Til death," Steve rasped and Bucky shoved his chest, tipped him backwards onto the floor and his head hit hard enough to make him groan, then warm fingers were pressing skin against his stomach.
Bucky's hands rucked up his shirt, the tight white one he wore under his uniform and it was spandex anyways, it wasn't like the material was that strong. But he still gasped as a runner ripped up the side, fabric tearing at the seams and Bucky didn't even bother to lift it over his head, just ripped it up to the neck and tore it from Steve's body and that, Steve hadn't been expecting that--

His workout pants didn't have a button or it'd've clattered to the ground, but Steve did slide a foot as Bucky yanked those off his hips, down over his thighs, calves, feet, tossed them aside too. Boxers next and Steve was laying out naked on the artroom floor. He'd been naked in front of Bucky more times than he could count but there was something about this time that was sending shivers up his spine, making him breathe heavy as he watched Bucky strip himself down too. Efficiently.

Before he could think over the perfect way he folded his clothes Bucky was back over him and Steve inhaled weighted air, forcing himself to ease and let Bucky take, whatever he needed. It was just that he'd hated being taken care of as a kid, made him feel even smaller and sicker than he was, but he'd made the exception for Buck then, he could make a hundred exceptions for him now.

Heated lips pressed to his neck and Steve closed his eyes, tipping his head but Bucky was already one step ahead of him, sucking down his collarbone and over shining dogtags, wet trail down his chest and curving to the side, a sudden gasp as Bucky's tongue pressed flat over his nipple. Teeth scraped sensitive perked skin and there was no buildup, no pause, just shooting fire straight from Bucky's mouth to his stomach, building further down between his legs--

It was exactly how Bucky fought, Steve realized distantly as his chest was abandoned for sucking marks down his abdomen, the lack of preamble. No preemptive speech, just aim and fire and Steve'd almost been killed, he'd been almost destroyed by that then and he'd be destroyed by it now.

Buck was in that sniper mindset, looked so much like his younger self that Steve'd forgotten about the arm again. He'd kissed it so many times he'd forgotten how strong it was, then somehow Steve's lower back lifted and the room spun, then he was flipped over and propped up on his knees and Steve's head was reeling, the move had been so easy and now he was on his hands and knees in front of Bucky and he'd never felt so goddamned exposed in his life.

Not up on the stage, not practically falling outta the vita ray machine, not stripping in front of all those generals and Peggy to fit his tiny body inside that machine.

His lungs were tightening up on him and Steve inhaled as much air as he could take--

Right up until Bucky's hands spread open his cheeks and all that air punched outta him faster than the bully in seventh grade. Thumbs lightning on sensitive skin and Steve's lips were parted in overwhelmed shock, then Bucky's mouth closed over him and the sound ripped outta his throat couldn't belong to him. He'd never-- Steve hadn't even considered--

Thoughts weren't forming all the way but Steve's spine was arching, frozen and wound so tight he'd either explode or collapse but there was a flood of sparks riveting up his body and everything was narrowed down to the wet, ragged shock of Bucky's mouth on his ass.

Slick wet rubbed over clenched muscle and Steve whimpered, arms shaking to hold himself upright and he was in way over his head. Bucky's tongue prodded his entrance, licked rough stripes that made him want to cry, dragging sparks over the fluttering, loosening ring of muscle and Steve fingernails scraped the floor then Buck was prying inside and Steve's arms gave out on him.

Sucking tight round muscle hard, tongue shoved in his opening and it wasn't a describable feeling, the shockwaves riding up Steve's lower back, the room fading around them and every amped-cell in his body narrowing down to the twitching muscle clinging to Bucky's tongue. He was dwaling in his own head and Bucky didn't stop, stroking inside him with the mouth Steve could hardly believe he was allowed to kiss now, let alone--

Some part of his brain registered the slight burn on the edges, the light scratch of Bucky's not-quite-smooth-shaven jaw around sensitive skin and Steve couldn't stop gasping. His chest was heaving and his forehead was sticking to his forearms with sweat and Bucky was sucking on his hole like Steve was the most beautiful thing he'd ever seen and it was disarming, the desperation in the way Bucky kept twisting for more like Steve could never give him enough.

Steve'd give him everything. He already had.

Short fingernails scratched red lines down Steve's back, over the sides of his ass and down his thighs and everything was burning high and bright and the whimpers on his lips didn't feel like they belonged to him.

A particularly hard suck as wet-hard swirled a circle inside him and Steve arched again, words finally shocked back into him as he broke over a despairing, "Bu-ucky--"

Just like that, his face was gone and Steve's ass was instantly, terribly cold and wet and gaping and god, fuck. Then a heavy hand was pressing down between his shoulderblades and Steve rolled his head to the side, fluttering eyelids as he gasped for breath and Bucky pinned him harder to the ground.

"Did you mean it?" Bucky asked, low, and Steve sucked in enough oxygen to manage a destroyed, hoarse, "Yes."

"You don't know what I'm asking about." Bucky's fingers curled, scratching his shoulderblades and Steve's vision blurred. "D-doesn't matter. Mean...everything I've." A soft moan behind closed lips and Steve was gonna finish with ever said to you but he couldn't open his mouth again and Bucky seemed to get the message clear enough anyways.

The only warning he got that time was a strange metallic sound, which he'd find out later was the plates on Bucky's fingers compressing and locking, smoothing out water-and-air-proof, tighter and thinner but unsnagable. There'd been lube in one of their pockets but Steve was too far gone to think about things like that.

Cold metal pressed wet against his opening and Steve had a flash to remember--

One day, I want this inside me. I'll prove to you it's beautiful too.

--then Bucky's fingers were sinking inside him and Steve didn't have flashes of anything but lightning anymore.

Eyes rolling back in his head and he wasn't aware of the whimpers, the tears on his eyelashes, writhing on the floor beneath Bucky's hand. Chanting Bucky's name like a mantra, begging again and again. The only thing he was aware of was the slide inside his body - inside - that was peeling him open like a grenade destroying its shell.

Bucky was right.

There was nothing gentle about this.

Teeth sunk into the flesh of his ass and Steve jerked, but the two fingers in his ass didn't stop their relentless dance in out in out in twist out in out and Steve kept curling away and towards and couldn't decide but he wasn't the one deciding anyways, Bucky's right hand held his hips in place
He had to hold hard, tight, to keep the serum strength at bay and Steve was paying for it, he couldn't count the fingershaped bruises if he had the coherency to think.

He didn't know Buck lifted up until the angle in his ass changed and there were teeth sinking into the back of his neck. Steve cried out and Bucky nipped the top of his spine, fingers withdrawing in a rush of cold, then just one was sinking in, the fourth, lighter-metal ring jammed up against his rim. Everything was too bright and the ring felt so different than Bucky's fingers and Steve couldn't breathe.

Buck's hand swirled agonizingly slow inside him and the teeth on the back of his neck scraped further down, sinking around the next ridge of his spine and Steve's bones were shifting under Bucky's touch, rearranging in Steve's body with the brand remember and the way Bucky was touching him?

A bite to the next knob of Steve's spine, the next. Each and every bone, thoracic to lumbar and down down - like he could thread Steve's spine outta his body with his teeth, rip his skeleton apart through his skin.

Closing over his tailbone last, sucking hard enough to shine stars on the back of Steve's eyelids, then the world spun into a vortex and he was spinning, flipping, three fingers inside him now but they were warm and flesh and Steve shook, he shook and Bucky's metal hand closed around his throat.

Pulled him upright and close and Steve's eyelashes unstuck enough for him to blink salty open, recognize Bucky's face in front of his, inches away in the same grip when they'd met but a thousand times less tight, a thousand times closer to letting go and running away and Steve'd rather Bucky choke him to death than hold him close and intimate in that same stare, desperate and heated for all opposite reasons, and not mean it.

Steve's lips parted and he would've spoken but Bucky's right hand was still fucking him on three fingers and he couldn't, so he opened his mouth and waited for Bucky to close the distance, take him. The metal released even looser, slid around to the back of his throat as their mouths collided and Steve inhaled Brooklyn smoke from a hollow chest and the way Buck kissed him now was exactly how Steve'd pictured he'd kiss back then, back when they were ducking from wartime explosions and sharing a tent and yelling at each other in battle.

If Bucky'd shoved him up against a tree, let Steve thread his fingers through short, sweaty hair and kissed him with every ounce of the passion he had when he screamed at Steve for whatever stupid reckless thing--

It'd be like this, this was that kiss and it was the dawn of time and the end of days and the taste of copper slid over Steve's tongue as Bucky's teeth drew blood from his bottom lip, tongue darting over the split seconds later and Steve didn't know anymore if Bucky was patching him up or drinking his blood but it didn't matter, the war was raging on behind them and the boys were waiting back at the camp, he'd stay here in Bucky's arms and drown in his veins for every second he had the chance to.

His unthreaded aching bitten spine arched and their lips broke and Bucky pushed him by the shoulder, further into the arch on the edge of snapping bones and Steve's head tipped back, midnight racing around them and a second away from winning.

Shaking, he started begging again, barely-whispers over the sound of gunfire and the blood in his mouth. "P-please--"

He'd begged Bucky after his nightmare, days ago, begged him for something, anything, and he hadn't known this was what he'd been asking for.
"Buck, please, need--" The hand on his shoulder slid to his chest, pushing backwards further; fingers in his ass withdrew, wet hand grabbing bruised, bitten cheeks instead, grinding his cock against Bucky's thigh and he hadn't even realized how much it throbbed, too much ache everywhere at once. His throat closed, breathing cut out again.

But. It wasn't coming back.

Steve's eyes shot open, gasping for air desperately in a way that had nothing to do with Bucky's hands ripping him apart.

Sliding touch and Bucky was everywhere, a hand on the back of his head pulling Steve in reverse, curling him in with his forehead against Bucky's chest. The fingers in his hair were holding tight, protective and terrifying and in the safe weight of Bucky's embrace Steve shook air into his body and he'd been fooled, it wasn't an asthma attack, but Buck was holding him and Steve selfishly didn't wanna move, didn't want anything but to stay collapsed here in Bucky's arms.

But Buck was smart, caught on. Lifted Steve's chin with metal and Steve's mouth wobbled, looking up at his entire universe as Bucky stared down at him like he was starved.

Their lips met. Bucky kissed him and there were no scraping teeth, no sucking desire. Bucky kissed him and it was soft and more-than-gentle and so dark dark deep-down into despair Steve's chest shattered, heartbeat pounding fast in the million broken pieces scattered through his body and he was melting, he was melting instead of thawing and all he'd wished for the first time he'd drowned was to see Bucky again and now that he was, eyes closed and mouths pressed tight together, seeing Bucky for the first time...

Steve'd rather drown.

The tears bubbled up in his throat, fire and water ready to boil over the edge. Bucky's tongue darted over a single streak down Steve's cheek but before the dam could burst into sobbing his back slammed into the ground again and the hand behind his head didn't do much to stave the impact. Steve groaned and Bucky placed a fierce, open-mouthed kiss to his adams apple, sternum, stomach hips thighs, spreading Steve's legs wide and sending a dizzying rush to his brain. The next hard press of Bucky's mouth was to his perineum, making leg muscles tighten and twitch, toes curl as the wet suction lifted higher, mouthing his balls, the base of his cock up to the head dripping onto Steve's abdomen.

Rough kiss to the center of Steve's stomach and lift, glancing up at him--

Bucky froze.

Steve palmed the back of his head and searched haunted eyes, sticky lips parting as he finally caught on. When he'd littered kisses all over Bucky's stomach, peppered between reverent I love you's...they were in that same position now - reversed but no less reverent and Bucky's mouth was open but he wasn't gonna say it, they both knew that.

They were sliding over precarious ice threatening to crack and it'd either sprawl them over the frozen waterfall or they'd sink right here and freeze to death in struggling water. His vision blurred and Steve blinked rapidly, sending another river down the sides of his face and Bucky still didn't move, hovering and watching Steve cry, still and silent and Steve was so relieved and so terrified that it might be over.

A pause, a lapse in time.
What you were then, I am today.

Temptation snapped before heads did and Bucky flipped Steve over on his stomach with one arm again, fast enough to make his knees bang on the floor, smarting up his thighs in sparks that Bucky traced from the outside with possessive, shaking hands. Deep-chested moans were tingling Steve's lips, wet spread over his loosened hole again and his hips tipped backwards, just as the head of Bucky's cock bumped up against him.

Slick and smooth and bigger than Steve could take but he hung his head between his arms, closed his eyes and arched his back purposefully this time, offering Bucky to take him, always, to fucking keep him for once. How could he not, how could he toss Steve aside when Steve could feel the aching need in Bucky's soul, desire and codependency and damnation bruised into his skin, solid proof of how much Bucky was dying to consume him so why wouldn't he just let go--

Metal-human steadied his hips and Bucky pushed inside, head breaching the rim and shoving further, deeper and it wasn't gentle, it was exactly like Bucky'd warned and it burned, stretched him so wide Steve was sure his body'd just break, scorching all the way into his stomach, his throat and Steve was choking, on Bucky and oxygen and too much too much.

The choking gag slipped into coughing, the way everything had when he was a kid, body wracking roughly and shifting the heat at the base of his spine. Steve coughed weakly, head spinning and Bucky rolled deeper inside, the hands on his hips running up his sides to stroke his ribcage and Steve closed his eyes, the burn of their joined bodies sharper with his other senses gone, but with Bucky's warm hands on his ribs his lungs began to cooperate again and Steve's chest eased into shaky, overwhelmed gasps.

There was no reprieve, only clinging drag backwards before Bucky drove into him hard and Steve's eyes shot open to see the ground rock, or their bodies were the ones rocking, forceful thrust into his body again and Bucky's dogtags whipped underneath his chin, colliding metal to bruise.

Then fingers were weaving between his gripping the floor, both hands covered by Bucky’s as his forehead dropped to the back of Steve's neck and their bodies fit together again. Steve was dizzy, hands and knees already aching and Bucky just squeezed him tight and fucked him harder. Steve's vision went spotty, red dancing in front of his eyes as he stared at Bucky's bloody right hand over his, and how many places on his body had been smeared red before the serum had stitched wounds closed?

It wasn't burning anymore, not in the way it had at first. Now it was just fire, fire pounding into his spine and blistering his skin and slicing him raw like all those nightmares of knives and Steve stared at their overlapped hands and bit his bloody lip and had to focus all the brainpower he had left to tuck his thumb up over Bucky's, hold him a little closer, the tiniest gesture he could give back.

A terrible noise broke between Steve's shoulders and Steve wanted to kiss him, wanted to kiss Bucky for the rest of his life, offer himself in a million pieces until Bucky didn't feel so goddamned lost, so fucking desperate for Steve--

The pain channeled into squeezing hands and normally that was fine but everything was too amped and neither of them were paying enough attention to how strong-- The snap echoed off studio walls and empty paintcans but Steve's stifled scream echoed louder.

Once, after Bucky'd told him Hydra broke every bone in his body, Steve'd sat in perfect silence on the couch, hand bent backwards and seconds away from snapping, gritting his teeth against oncoming pain but then, he'd had no idea how much hands hurt to break.
Now he did.

The room spun and Steve wasn't tipping over, Bucky was flipping him again, panting like crazy as he sank back inside Steve's body, hips dirty and sweaty hair sticking to his face but a fraction slower, burning Steve up from the inside as he gratefully pulled his fractured left hand into his chest, lifted his legs higher and bit back the tears prickling at him again.

His back hurt, bitten knobs of his spine rucking against the ground, but it was better than supporting his weight on a broken hand and Steve forced himself to breathe, quick and shaky between circle-lips, then one of the hands carrying him let go, metal wrapping over Steve's clenched. He hesitated, drawing his hand a bit further from the thing that'd broken it, then Bucky's hips circled and he was stuffed full of the closest thing Bucky'd allow to love and he let Bucky take his broken hand. It wasn't like he could protest much impaled and held in place like this. As much as instincts were screaming at him (in Bucky's voice, as always) this was still Buck and Steve trusted him more than he trusted himself.

Bucky didn't snap bones again, Bucky lifted Steve's hand to his mouth and kissed it, kissed it all over, peppering to the rhythm of his hips driving into Steve's body and there were tears on Bucky's cheeks that Steve couldn't do anything about, but he let him kiss his hand over and over like that'd make it heal faster.

Part of Steve didn't want it to heal at all. He'd keep broken bones for the rest of his life if it meant Bucky'd give him this, if it meant Bucky needed him enough to slip outta control, if only for a moment.

He rolled his head against the floor, forcing himself quiet but for the rough litany of sounds in his throat straight from the heart aching in his chest, the body pushing inside his over and over.

Bucky curled Steve's fingers with the press of his mouth, making him gasp at the pain, but then his hand was in a fist and the tension wasn't so bad, it'd be easier to keep that way. It always had been.

Steve dropped it to the side and Bucky leaned over him, nearly folding Steve in half as he turned worship from hand to lips. Steve closed his eyes and tipped up against Bucky's mouth, sliding together and it wasn't fair, Bucky was tugging his heart out right through his throat, another deep drive inside that had him stilling in Steve's body a moment, pressing circle of hips together and the draw out was so slow Steve couldn't handle it, too much on an entirely different scale but he didn't have a choice.

He didn't have a choice in anything about Bucky. None of that beauty, none of that rage belonged to him.

Bucky sucked on his tongue as the rhythm picked back up again, fast rocking, in and out of Steve's ass and Bucky sucked on his tongue until he couldn't feel it anymore, numb like ice when everything else burned like fire.

There was no hiding now. Every inch of violence revealed how much fear was mixed in with that need and if the bleeding and broken and bruised was any indication?

He'd never seen someone this scared of anything in his life.

Maybe he could've drawn over that thought, maybe he could've whispered it against Bucky's swollen lips, but that was the exact moment Bucky drew back, shoved a hand under Steve's lower back and forced him to tip up, changing the angle so Bucky could fuck him harder deeper and Steve's thoughts shortcircuited on twisting traintracks.
Mechanical strobing skies outside windows and midnight wasn't racing them anymore, the sky'd draped down on them like a blanket meant to suffocate instead of sleep.

But Steve'd surrendered long ago, so far gone for this boy he'd do anything. Like laying under Buck on that helicarrier, waiting to see if Bucky'd kill him or save him and in a twisted way Steve was waiting for that now, hovering on the edge with the full knowledge that Bucky'd never want to cause permanent damage, that'd Bucky sooner die than kill him for real and that meant all this, all the hurt and pain and bleeding--

That was underneath, that was the part Bucky couldn't control, the physical representation of everything he'd been feeling for so long and if this was letting go, no wonder it hadn't happened 'til now. No wonder Bucky was so unsteady.

Nothing, Hydra'd made him believe he was nothing, and Steve'd slaughter them all, he'd slaughter every person who touched a hair on Bucky's head, he'd slaughter the innocent ones too if it meant he could go back in time and change it.

If he could make it him instead.

Bucky pried open his jaw with human fingers, peeled back Steve's bottom lip to cut his thumb on bottom teeth, fucking him straight into the floor and jerking with every movement, Steve’s blood-splattered right hand clenching in a fist around the closest crumpled paintcan to keep from shoving Bucky off him like instinct was begging him too.

The way Bucky was touching him, the passion behind that, it wasn't different than the passion behind the delicate way Steve kissed Bucky. It just resonated different and on that very first day after their first kiss, Bucky'd asked if Steve thought he could handle him and now, Steve knew the answer to that.

Tipped hips to just a slightly different angle and outta nowhere Bucky grazed something inside him and a full bolt of lightning raced up Steve's spine, neck snapping back as his lips opened around a scream and his arm shot out to brace himself only there was nothing but metal around him and another paintcan tipped over, splashing black acrylic onto the floor. A sky for the stars blinking in his eyes, the drag of Bucky's cock over bundled nerves again and again and his head wasn't just spinning now;

Everything was so saturated and so contrasted, shadows blacker and white so bright Steve was blinded-

...held together at the seams by sunshine so hot it burns itself

- and it was crazy, because he hadn't pictured having someone inside his body to be so consuming but this was the point of delirium, this was the point of nothing-in-the-sky but the moon and it seemed irrational now, that there was ever anything for him but Bucky.

There was only so high he could build before Steve gave in from winding tighter tighter and collapsed boneless, so hard he was crying again but the thrum settling into jerking and twitching with eyes squeezed shut and Bucky rocking into him.

Pure surrender and Bucky leaned down and gathered Steve as close as possible, knees nearly touching the ground by his shoulders as Bucky fucked him so fast and hard Steve couldn't see or hear anything, shaking through black until Bucky's voice sunk into his skull and his senses shot back on like switches,
"Steve, Steve, please please." Frantic and so scared and Bucky was touching him over and over, pressing bruises and untouched skin until there wasn't a place on Steve's body that wasn't Bucky's and Steve just cried and clutched Bucky's back, head tucked in his shoulder through ragged breaths, broken hand fisted and half-clutched to Bucky's neck anyways, hanging off him and suspended from the fall.

"Yours," Steve breathed salt&copper and Bucky choked. That's what it was all about, wasn't it? He closed his eyes, nose pressing bone and swore into the carnal space between them. "Yours yours yours yours forever--"

Bucky grinded up into him and cold droplets splashed his chest and Steve held onto him and he may be the one wrecked but Bucky was destroyed.

"T-til our last breath," Steve choked and Bucky's hips stuttered, dragging Steve through Heaven and dropping him back to earth, splintered sob of his name as Bucky came inside him and painted Steve's body his. Metal wrapped around his cock and muscles convulsed, tossing him so high in the sky the stars were below them now, pearled poison coating their slick skin like he'd been detoxed, giving up a part of him to make room for Bucky inside his body, oxygen long gone and thighs pressed tight to his chest.

Bucky'd called orgasm little death; Steve died here in Bucky's embrace tonight. But it wasn't the kind'a death that came through disconnect and bliss, not the blackout pleasure and pain and overwhelming emotions kind'a death. But the kind they'd always lived in - never on the edge. They'd lived and loved in death since they were children on the streets and now they were of the gods, in a glass sky, and death still tread beneath their feet, under their backs, in Bucky's eyes and Steve's hands and the fusion of their souls.

A quiet whirr over patterned breathing as Bucky's hands laid him back out on the ground, soft, and Steve blinked open his eyes, stillness settling as he peered open his eyes to look at that beautiful face.

Only Bucky wouldn't meet his eyes.

Steve pressed his hand to Bucky's cheek, thumb tracing teartracks and staring at Bucky like he was holy, only Bucky's face was turned away like he was damned alone.

He parted his lips to tell Bucky he wasn't, only a hand got between them in time, metal covering Bucky's face like a mask and Steve'd seen him do that before, seen him do that right after Azzano.

He'd have to be a fool not to recognize the shame in Bucky's shoulders as he hid his face, terrified. Undeserving of being looked at like that and Steve was exhausted but there wasn't anything but relief in the way he reached for Bucky's wrist, pulled his hand free.

Crystal shot away again and Steve opened his mouth to plead, no, stop that, I love you--

I forgive you, for every life you've taken, especially mine.

But Bucky felt it coming, lifted up and pulled Steve's shoulder, leg tucked up high so Bucky could flip Steve onto his side without pulling out and the rotation of his body on Bucky's softening cock--

It shut him up.

Steve needed to keep Buck inside him as much as Bucky did, but without the teartracks on Bucky's face to focus on, his felt ahellaofalot colder.

A strong, sweaty arm slid around his waist and Steve deflated against the floor, blinking heavy and watching black paint drip drip drip from the edge of the can he'd knocked over.

*

There was blood and crystal shattered on the kitchen floor, black and tears dripping on the studio floor.

Funny how well that fit his insides.

Bucky held his battered body tight like leaving was impossible, worse than everything they'd just done and Steve's mouth was bleeding and his hips ached and his ass ached and his spine was crusted in bloody bites and his voice was hoarse and his eyes were spilling over again. Bucky's mouth pressed to his neck, the chain of his dogtags, kissed him and kissed him and it felt shallow because Steve saw him. Steve knew. He knew now. He knew.

And that was why he was crying, not because he was hurt. But because he finally knew Bucky was, deeper than Steve could ever touch.

Deeper than Steve could ever save.

~~~

Sam looked up in surprise at the visitor knocking on his door. But the expression on his face wasn't half as surprising as the words outta Bucky's mouth.

"I need help."

Sam scooted back a chair. Bucky sat down, stiff, staring straight ahead for a second or two before he snapped out of it, looked over at Sam's chair.

"What can I do? Is it nightmares? Commitment?" He offered quietly and Bucky's eyebrows furrowed in confusion.

"What? No. Uh. Not about me. I'm fine," he lied and Sam kept his face neutral, decided not to point out that Bucky looked stiffer than he'd been the first time they'd met on that bridge. "I need to talk about Steve."

He was here for all of it, and honestly still shocked Bucky'd come to him, so Sam settled into his chair and waved a hand to continue.

Bucky cocked his head. Maybe his lying was better than he thought, or maybe no one believed a word outta his mouth anymore.

"You ever saved somebody's life?" Bucky asked and Sam raised an eyebrow. Bucky lifted the metal hand like he was about to wave it around, the way he talked with his hands sometimes, but it fell back to his lap with a dull thud almost instantly. "I'm not talking about shooting someone as a preemptive strike, I mean like really saved 'em, made a difference. Stood in front to take a bullet to the chest, said the right thing to make 'em step away from the edge of a cliff."

Sam pursed his lips to the side, thinking over the question. He didn't know. Maybe. There was that one time with Riley, a couple months before That Mission. So probably. He nodded, and Bucky nodded too, teeth tugging his bottom lip as he looked off in the distance, voice drifting hollow.

"It's the best feeling in the world, knowing you're that one who made a difference. You've had purpose because you gave another human being a chance at life. It's a beautiful feeling." Bucky cleared his throat, glancing at Sam outta the corner of his eye before looking down at his hands, metal rippling quietly. "And Steve's addicted to it like a cocaine whore."

Sam opened his mouth to offer that might be a bit of an exaggeration, but Bucky just kept talking.

"It's not enough for him anymore to save a person's life, step in front of one civilian. He has to save groups, cities, worlds. He's personally halted grand-schemes-of-chaos at least three times now, but nothing satisfies the bite. It's never enough. He needs it like people need water. That's not something that's ever gonna change. He wasn't just a spitfire as a kid. He's a revolutionary. He's a soldier. It's who he is. And he clings to that so hard he can't see anything else."

A despairing shrug and Sam didn't have anything to say to that. Bucky shrunk a little in his chair, quiet edging with sadness.

"He says he sees me, but he never will. He can't. He's not ever gonna be done with this life." Bucky ran his right thumb along a ridge in his left, watching the movement and a million miles away.

"He said his home was me. Which I don't think is a lie. But as much as it's me - maybe even more - his home's the battlefield too. And like this, he can't have both. He's always gonna be missing something. He won't admit it, but he's trying to squeeze himself into this new life, into this marriage thing, and he thinks that's what we need but it's not. Even if...even if I wanted it, it's not right for him. God's righteous man, pretending he can live without a war. But he thinks it's me who doesn't want this because he can't...see inside himself."

Wobbling, his voice was shaky now and Barnes wiped a hand over his eyes, drying desert skin that probably hadn't seen rain in years.

"He thinks he owes me this," Bucky breathed and it sounded so heartbroken Sam's chest tightened with sympathy. "He doesn't get it. He owes me nothing."

"But you two are in love," Sam offered quietly, because maybe that's what it was about.

Bucky shrugged.

"It wouldn't matter either way. I'm not gonna let him sacrifice everything, because that's not love."

Sam nodded, accepting that much but gently leaning forward to press,

"What is love, then?"

Bucky stared out the window, overcast clouds covering the sunlight and told him, "I don't know."

And that was the problem.

"That he doesn't know what love is?" Natasha asked. Steve looked up from his hands, left still bandaged up but at least Nat hadn't asked about it. Or any of the other various marks he'd be stupid to think she didn't see.

"Well that sucks, yeah. But no, that's not--"
Steve had to stop, suck in a breath. She was patient, letting him barge in here and tear up over his best friend.

He was losing him.

He'd seen so much--

Steve squeezed his hands together, stared back down at them because that, the proof of Bucky's pain, was easier than looking her in the eyes as he said it.

He didn't wanna see her face, because he knew how it'd register. He knew how true it'd sound coming from his lips and Steve didn't want--

"You know what the most painful thing is?" Steve asked, barely above a whisper, watching the world slip through his fingers as his mouth opened around words he'd never wanted to say. "I've been through a lot. A hell of a lot."

"But there is nothing worse than loving someone you can't save."

☆

Chapter End Notes

I've got a whole compendium of things to say so

1) Stevie Thunderbird (Blondie 2.0) - I don't know why I latched onto this idea but I dig the idea of their band SO MUCH. I put together a whole playlist of songs they sing and two hands in the air for our blonde boyband of heros

2) Actually on that note, the song Better - this is an original by Tyler Ward, one of my fav people on the planet. The song itself is incredible, but the music video is super cute too. If you wanna go check it out, there's a link for that here. (He could totally headcannon modern-singer!Steve go check out this video too if you don't believe me)

3) The Fall Out Boy song Steve listens to on the subway is I'm like a lawyer with the way i'm always trying to get you off (thanks to the lovely E who suggested it for Steve of this story)

4) Sourcing a fantastic quote from this post

5) If you want more songs to jam too, Gun by Chvrches for this chapter.

6) Okay, so, happy things over. We're in rocky waters I know, but I promise it's all headed in a direction - you'll see. And it's taking me like a month to update each chapter but to be fair there is a lot happening in said chapters (also 42k holy shit) and my life is super busy jeez but hey. I promise, no matter how long it's been, I will be seeing this story through to the very end. I've actually got the rest of it all sketched out, I just have to actually write it. Which takes a lot of time and inspiration and a lot of attention to detail. There's like so many things all compiling here at the end and it's crazy!

6) So long story short sorry this is taking forever but I promise, I'm trying.

Thank you so much to each and every person who has commented on this fic - your words have been the inspiration to keep writing, but more importantly, to keep getting better. (haha wow ouch referenced my own chapter there)

Seriously though, I feel like my style has improved so much even just throughout recent chapters. It's been a long journey, but we're all headed to the grand finale soon, so.

Thank you.

Immeasurably.

xx
Двадцать Пять (Twenty-five)

Chapter Notes

I'm so sorry

For this entire chapter

Warnings: graphic violence, mentions of rape and previous rape encounters, dubious consent by means of disassociation, eating disorders, vomiting, intentional infliction of pain on self and others, general uselessness and loss, depression, mentions of past suicide attempts, panic attacks, PTSD, adult content.

 The scene discussing rape - which is also the dubious consent scene - is bracketed between double stars, feel free to skip. **

I swear it sounds like a total shit show and I mean it is but it's not like. Just. I mean, be careful okay. There's still plot though I swear.

There are a lot of songs quoted in the chapter, but they've all been sourced previously or directly in the chapter. Definitely recommend clicking the song links as usual.

One song I must direct your attention to: I've been listening to it on repeat for the past month. It was actually inspired in part by TIMLB and written by my dear friend and it's beautiful, go give her some love here.

Other song super relevant once you finish the chapter: No Place Like Home - Mariana’s Trench

(it's so fitting I literally sat there in shock when I found it. Also, in the middle there's this huge shift in tempo and style - leading us right into the next chapter of TIMLB hint hint)

Additional reference to this text post.

- one more note, the painting is in this chapter and if the image doesn't load i put a link underneath it with a little "xx" so you should be able to click on that -

Painting cred goes to me. It took me fucking six months to paint that shit. It's huge. And beautiful and actually hanging in my house. I made it for this story, and if you want it that's super cool but hey please don't sell it I promise I'm more broke than you.

Anyways.

I wish you all luck. Much love.

xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
There’s a lightning in your eyes I can’t deny. Then there’s me inside a sinking boat, running outta time. Without you, I’ll never make it out ali-i-ive.

“But I know, yes I know we’ll be alright,” Steve sang softly under his breath and Bucky glanced over at him from the driver’s seat, one eyebrow raised.

There’s a devil in your smile that’s chasing me, and everytime I turn around it’s only gaining speed.

He couldn’t help it. It was just too fitting. Steve reached over, nudging Bucky’s shoulder and beautiful crystal eyes rolled, that one-sided smile tugging at his mouth now.

“How is it you always find these songs, Rogers?”

“Oh just wait,” Steve smiled, resting one elbow on the open window, wind whipping his hair as the American landscape flew by, legs stretched out on top the dash, cherry red hood stretched out beyond the windshield and an endless black top road stretched out ahead of that, yellow lines disappearing beneath them as the complicated world in the rearview faded to nothing at all.

The chords of the chorus hit and Steve tipped his head across the seat, eyes on Bucky as he open his mouth just in time,

“This time I’m ready to run,” he sang and Bucky’s half-smile broke out into a real one, affectionate shake of his head as he glanced back over, eyes glittering under the highway sun and the crashing stereo.

“Cause I wanna be yours, don’t you wanna be mine?”

“We’re getting married, doesn’t that count as yours?” Bucky sassed and Steve smiled and ignored him, rolling his head on the headrest to sing up at the sky, “Wherever you are is the place I be-long! Cause I wanna be free, and I wanna be yours, I’ll never look back now, I’m reeeeeddy to run,” Soft hum along to the background music, the echoing I’m ready to run and a funny sound from Bucky’s side of the car.

Steve looked over, smile widening as he caught Bucky’s thumbs drumming along on the steering wheel.

“Isn’t that kinda impossible? Being free and someone’s at the same time?”

“No,” Steve told him, reaching over to turn it up a bit louder. “—a future in my life I can’t foresee. Unless of course I stay on course and keep you next to meee. C’mon, Buck, sing with me!”

“I don’t know the words!”

“You will at the chorus. C’mon. Don’t tell me the great Bucky Barnes is too afraid to sing—”

“God, that trick, will you ever stop being twelve?”

“If it’s not broke—”

“This time I’m reeeeady to run,” Bucky interrupted loudly, smiling at all the edges as his singing voice filled the car and Steve was smiling so wide he might break. “Escape from the city and fol-low the sun.”

Buck’s right hand reached over and shoved him on the word sun and Steve laughed, tipping sideways with it, lit up with the entire world bright and beautiful and Bucky right here beside him there wasn’t a single thing else he could ever need—

“Can you turn that off?”

Steve’s head snapped up, pencil falling out of his fingers in surprise as the daydream flashed to nothing in front of his eyes.

Bucky shot him an irritable look, gliding past the kitchen table with a bundle of files in his arms.

Steve blinked, glancing between the tenseness of Bucky’s shoulder blades, and the lines he’d been drawing in his sketchbook, how far from reality the drawing of Bucky’s whipping wind and mouth tilted open in song was.

Right.

He forced himself to reach over and turn off the knob on the speaker. He liked the song. Combined with a pencil in his hand it made it easy to pretend--

Bucky stalked back out of the bedroom and Steve curled his hand tentatively around his pencil again. It was better to draw now if he had music going. What was the point in drawing them happy though, when he lifted his head to that scowl on Bucky’s face?

Bucky’d heard the song too, clearly. Steve’d been hoping--

But he’d asked to turn it off.

Steve's heart sunk.

“I’m headed to the tower today,” Bucky said, grabbing a pistol from one of the kitchen drawers. Steve looked down at his paper.
“Okay.”

“I’ll probably do some shopping, too.” Buck tightened his ponytail and Steve bit the inside of his cheek.

“Okay.”

A step in his direction and Steve’s heart fluttered ridiculously, hopeful when he knew better. Bucky stooped to press a nonchalant kiss to his cheek, straightened back up to go. It was stupid, Steve knew, but he couldn’t---

Bucky started for the door and Steve’s hand darted out, grabbing Bucky’s. Warm, skin, it felt like they hadn’t touched in years and Steve wanted to cry from the familiar rough of Bucky’s pistol calluses. Only he couldn’t even look up to meet Bucky’s eyes.

A pause, waiting to see if Steve said anything, only what could he say?

“Don’t wait up,” Bucky finally managed, then he was tugging his hand free, boot-falls across the tile, door opened. Closed.

Steve stared down at gray lines on paper. Beautiful twinkle in eyes that cut away from his in real life. It wasn’t Steve who started looking away first. He just didn’t bother meeting Bucky’s eyes this morning because he didn’t feel like getting his heart ripped out through his throat when Bucky turned away like it hurt to look at him.

If it were anyone else Steve’d make a point to lock gazes, defiantly lift his chin but this was Bucky and Steve was weak, always was for James Barnes.

The drawing was crumpling before he realized he’d torn it out. High arc into the trash and Steve was headed for the door too. Fuck this apartment. Fuck it all.

His running shoes were by the door. The next thing he knew, Brooklyn sidewalks were disappearing under his feet.

Files.

Only one had ever really mattered to him.

The Hydra file had been so thin. Certainly wasn’t seventy years worth.

There was always something else, one more thing Steve didn’t know. One more horror Bucky was running from. It was a wonder he was functioning, let alone that they were living together.

How could Steve ask for more?

Only he’d seen--

He sucked in a breath, jolting his legs to pump faster. Rounded a corner, less populated streets. Graffiti littering back alleys and in another life, this had been a place he’d known.

Why had they moved to Brooklyn?

How much about Bucky did Steve still not know? It should’ve been enough, seeing him freak once, to know that Bucky was better off without him. It was just that...Hydra’d used Steve. They’d used him to make Bucky think he was nothing. Maybe Bucky still thought that.
Steve pushed harder.

He still remembered pulling Bucky from that facility in Azzano. It’d only been a few years ago. The bile churning in his gut, the overwhelming urge to puke or cry, just seeing Buck strapped down like that.

That’d been Bucky’s life for years.

He still remembered how Buck broke down in that schoolhouse, 1944. Scrambling into a corner, dripping wet, begging Steve not to touch him. Snapping that he knew where he was, but he couldn’t deal.

Buck didn’t show shit like that anymore. It was all internal.

Bucky’d been so hurt, Steve’d been used as a weapon against him. And still, Bucky touched and grabbed and fucked him like Steve was the only thing left in this earth, like Bucky’d die without him--

...he had, because Steve’d failed him.

Who the fuck was Steve to stay around, when he was the very thing that’d tortured Bucky for that long? It was clear, in the way Buck clung to him too tight, nothing about the way they needed each other was...good, anymore. It was fucked up. They’d made Bucky believe he was nothing without Steve and now he was afraid of making it true again but Steve could feel it, in the bruises he still had on his spine, in the sharp shifting of the broken bones in his hand as they healed.

Bucky’d tried to devour him. There was so much desperation in the way he’d consumed Steve--

God, the things they must’ve done to him.

Steve crashed to his knees, but at least he’d been smart enough to dart inside some cafe bathroom first.

The bile he hadn’t gotten to hurl after Azzano - and every time he’d thought about what happened to Bucky since - had to resurface eventually. Or maybe he’d over-ran again. Maybe both. Steve didn’t know anymore.

Sweat dripped into his eyes and Steve ran a hand through blonde hair, spiking it crazy again, and he wasn’t exactly feeling that rebellious, puking his guts out in some nasty public toilet, but it wasn’t like he had a lot of other options.

He’d been surprised to hell the serum let him puke at all. But perfect cell structure didn’t mean his head wasn’t fucked. Didn’t mean he couldn’t overwork his body. Besides, try hard enough at anything...not that he was intentionally running too hard. Or, well. It wasn’t all intentional. Only partly. On good days.

The reflection staring back at him was shaking and pale but Steve ignored that, splashing his face with cold water. It didn’t clear shit.

The walk back to the apartment started with trembling leg muscles and clenched abs, a searing stitch in his side from the heaving. So he ran back instead, fought tears as the pain spiked to consuming but at least that was better than crumpling in the middle of the sidewalk.
There were too many floors up to the apartment. Steve took them anyways, heaving as he hauled himself up by the stair-railing.

Fuck.

The door was the only thing supporting him as he shoved a key in the lock, then Steve was basically falling inside, kicking off his shoes violently enough to dent the wall.

A tiny sound, far enough off that it was only the enhanced hearing that picked it up, and it was such a terrible sound, Steve could only stop and stare and pray it wasn’t in his apartment.

The bathroom door was open. Steve always kept it closed.

Shaky legs brought him to the edge of the doorframe, one hand on the wall as he carefully approached.

“Bucky?” he finally called.

Quiet tightening whirr. Steve peered around the corner, both hands on the wall to hold himself up. Upright was important.

And better off than Bucky was right now.

Curling in a ball in the tub and Steve couldn’t handle this. He wanted to collapse, needed to curl up himself and how was he supposed to be strong?

“Buck,” he said anyways, pulling himself into the bathroom and carefully, quietly closing the door behind him. Box.

Box.

“You’re okay,” Steve started and Bucky made a weak sound that could’ve stood for yeah, easy for you to say, or a not-at-all-teasing fuck you. Maybe both.

“Can I --” Steve started, reaching closer but paused before he said the word touch you because that wasn’t always a good idea.

Only Bucky spoke before he could.

“You smell like puke,” Bucky muffled, head tucked in his hands and Steve pinched the bridge of his nose, taking a step backwards.

“Were you running?” Bucky asked again, voice shaky and gravelly, shot to hell like he’d spent the night screaming. He hadn’t, Steve knew because he’d been there. At least Buck hadn’t kicked him out of bed. Just curled up as far away from Steve as possible instead. He’d almost rather have been banished to the couch.

“I was running,” Steve managed. “Just pushed a little hard, empty stomach--”

“Please don’t lie to me,” Bucky mumbled and Steve shut his mouth, blinking and turning away.

“Anything I can do?”

“Get it outta my fucking head?” Bucky offered sarcastically, curling in a little tighter and Steve knocked his head back against the wall.

“You know I wish I could.”

A weak, dire sound and Bucky's knees were shaking; almost glad he couldn't see his face.

“Temporary?” He muffled quietly and Steve looked over the hunched shoulders for a moment.

“...yeah, maybe I've got something.” Pushing off from the wall made the room spin but Bucky couldn't see him stumble so they could pretend. Steve caught his breath, managed, "Wait here.”

“Not like I'm fucking going anywhere.”

It was that scary Winter Soldier voice but Steve wasn't gonna think about that. Only focus was staying upright long enough to find a pen.

The sketchbook smacked the bottom of the tub loud enough to make Bucky jump, curl tighter in on himself. Frightened groan like he was pissed at himself for freaking at the noise and Steve needed to puke again.

He sat the pen down quietly, one hand over his mouth because Buck still hadn't lifted his head and he couldn't call Steve on it.

Managed to make it back to the wall beside the bathtub, flickering thoughts over why a bathtub of all places. Safe? Cold? Easier to clean up if he offed himself?

Morbid, both their heads morbid.

"Blank page,” Steve explained, hoping Buck couldn't tell how weak his voice was. "Best you can get. Draw about it.”

“How do you draw trenches?”

“...it's the war?”

“The fuck did you think I was curled in the bathtub for?”

“I dunno, seventy years of torture?”

“Fuck you.” Bucky squeezed tighter in on himself and Steve forced himself to breathe. He didn't know what he was doing. He wasn't any good at this. How was he supposed to help--

Bucky didn't need him. How many times had he said that? Steve steeled himself. Tried to cut the emotion outta short words.

“Great.” Push off the wall again, "I'll leave you to it then.”

He wasn't trying to be an ass. But his mouth tasted awful and he couldn't shower and his legs were still shaky and Bucky wasn't even supposed to be here, let alone broken down in the tub and biting everything Steve tried to help.

Two steps towards the door before the panicked scramble against porcelain.

“Wait! Don’t.” Steve turned around and Bucky's eyes were up, just barely. Red-rimmed and puffier than Steve'd pictured. How long had he been in here? How long had Steve been running? "Pleas--Ca. Can you stay?”
Eyes icy as the water Steve froze in. Eyes the very ice he froze in.

His spine, bruised and aching, softened like rotted mattresses and Steve's feet took him back to the tub before his head could say not to.

“Yeah. 'Course,” he whispered, sliding down the wall to sit beside the edge of the white white basin. The dark figure inside watched him, studied him, body ridged, hair shining black, bottom lip trembling. Steve curled his legs up, wrapped his arms around them in hopes Bucky wouldn't notice the way the muscles kept convulsing. Distraction. The tiny sane part left of his head inserted best-friend-hurting and Steve's mouth opened around words more light-hearted, lips more curled and soft than they meant. "Thought the smell was bothering you.”

He didn't get a smile back, but Bucky's shoulders rippled and dropped from his ears, harshness dropping from his throat too. “Better than you gone. I'd offer you a shower, but.”

“Not leaving the tub,” Steve filled in, tipping his head back against the wall tiredly. “It's fine.”

The day passed in a series of dozes against the bathroom wall, flashing in and out to consciousness where Bucky was scratching away at pages only to tear them out. He wondered if he ever figured out how to draw trenches.

Steve fell hard-asleep slumped against the bathtub somewhere around four in the afternoon. The world tipped and he woke again to strong hands carefully picking him up. His throat grumbled, but Buck was outta the bathtub now so he couldn't actually complain.

(Even if it was only because he was taking care of Steve. He could let himself be needy if it made Buck feel needed.)

“I'mma wash you down,” Bucky whispered and Steve nodded weakly, bathroom hazy behind sleep-stuck eyes. Propped on his feet and he didn't sag against Bucky but he wasn't all that stable. Didn't matter. Metal was holding him secure.

Cold hands stripped him carefully, running-shirt peeled from skin stiff with sweat, carefully tugged over his head. Easing down sweats while Steve braced himself on the counter and he couldn't help but think about the last time Bucky'd taken his clothes off. Ripping apart his shirt at the seams, shredding them from his body and placing bruises instead of careful support.

Bucky was being gentle, so gentle, like Steve was 20 and fragile again.

It was cold and he hadn't been naked in fronta Buck since he'd been bleeding and broken two nights ago. The handprints bruised into his skin were almost healed - it wasn't just internal bleeding, metal had ruptured blood vessels under his skin from squeezing so hard and it wasn't normal for him to take this long to heal but Bucky was strong.

So strong.

His hands barely touched Steve now, fluttering over skin like he couldn't decide where to touch, finally settling for lightly over Steve's ribs because those weren't purple and blue like his hips were.

Careful lifting into the shower and stepping over the edge of the basin was harder than it should've been. As soon as he had two feet on slippery ground, Steve closed his eyes and tipped his head and shoulder against the wall, propping upright so Bucky could turn on the water.

The spray splashed onto not-quite-healed skin and it stung, enough to make him hiss and tense, fingers curling automatically and fuck, bad idea. Steve cradled his left hand to his chest, breathing fast and already exhausted, lips parting to tell Bucky it was fine, he didn't have to--

(He just wanted it to stop)

But Buck was already smoothing a soapy washcloth over his skin, hands a little shaky and face all twisted up, teeth sinking into his bottom lip every time he slid over a bruise. Pausing at the raw scrapes and bite marks, all that proof still there - Bucky's lip was bitten bloody before he finished Steve's torso.

The water hurt. He didn't want--

Breathe.

He let Bucky wash him down.

He hadn't, after. Steve'd woken up the morning after still curled on his side in the middle of the art room floor. Only Bucky hadn't been behind him. Bucky'd been gone.

Steve'd cried again, but he should've seen it coming. The surprise hurt more than the loneliness.

He thought they were better than this this. Better.

Bucky's touch looped around the back of his neck and Steve sucked in a breath, holding as much air in his lungs as he could as the careful cloth started down his spine. There were still crescent-moon-bruiises, heart pounding beneath each, riddled white-hot pulses down his spine and Bucky wasn't breathing, hands so soft Steve could barely feel the cloth.

These hands had cleaned, fixed him so many times. Never from bruises that came from the same hands--

The sound of knees hitting tile behind him met Bucky's touch smoothed over his ass, the backs of his thighs. Steve's balance threatened precariously as he tried to spread his legs, hand shooting out to grab the opposite wall but Buck was one step ahead of him, catching him with hard hands on his hips and that was where he was bruised the most but of course Bucky didn't think about that when he was reaching to keep Steve from falling and if he could he would've kept the shout inside his chest but it felt like his skin was nothing but muddled pain-sensors and broken bone and the sound that ripped from his throat was just as horrible as it felt.

"Oh Steve, Steve m' sosorry--"

"S'fine," he managed lightly, shower tipping, blurring, light-headed to fuck and half that was probably from puking his guts out earlier when he hadn't had enough food in the past two days to puke at all, let alone knelt for twenty minutes over a public toilet.

"M' sosorry," Bucky rushed under his breath again and Steve palmed his forehead, forcing his lungs to expand with oxygen. He kinda wanted to hurl again.

"S'fine," Steve repeated, closing his eyes against the spin. "M'okay."

"Your body begs to differ," Bucky muttered, running soap over Steve's inner thighs. It was a nice
"Always has." Weak whisper, chin dropped to his chest and fingers curling on the wet wall. Metal whirred as Bucky paused at his words, fingertips skirting the edges of bruised knees.

"Not like this," Bucky whispered back and Steve would've laughed, if he had the extra air. So he had bruised knees from being fucked into the floor instead of falling on it, so his spine ached from bites instead of scoliosis. Didn't mean he forgot what it was like to be broken on the outside too.

"Like this."

Hell, maybe it was comforting, in a way. Familiar, at least.

Maybe it was the most this body had felt like his. Maybe he really fucking shouldn't say that out loud.

Bucky’s cloth started again. Steve’s knees stopped shaking somewhere around Buck’s hands on the back of his neck, guiding him into warm water to wash off soap and this, this was easy. Close his eyes and let Buck carry him through every step, smoothing suds from his skin, rinsing cuts and bruises clean before wrapping him in a towel and Steve didn’t open his eyes, not once.

Arm slung over his shoulders, other curved to hold up his torso and Buck led him all the way back to the bedroom and this, he could do. He could give Bucky purpose, let him take care. Not like he'd been craving since before his hand snapped in half.

Nowhere left to go.

Careful hands laid him out on the mattress then Bucky was straightening and leaving and Steve couldn't do that again. He couldn't.

"Bucky," broken, needy, and he turned on a dime, worried crystal searching and Steve fist the front of his shirt, dragged him closer and Bucky's worry shut down into blank nothingness but Steve cupped the back of his head anyways.

"Don't run," he begged and Bucky tried to duck outta his grip.

Steve pushed up on a shaking elbow and touched parted lips with his.

Bucky's mouth was rough, lips dry and scraping across Steve's still-healing ones but the physicality was so far from the harsh feel, the world spun dizzy--

A soft destroyed noise and Bucky pressed closer, lips tugging Steve's desperately but so so gentle like he was terrified of what more he'd break but he needed to kiss Steve so badly a starving man in the desert looked fulfilled.

His chest seized and everything was fire, like the burning buildings they'd ran coughing out of. Only Steve was running straight into the smoke now.

Mangled bones bit sharp in complaint but Steve ignored them, closing both hands around Bucky's waist and dragging him gracelessly onto the bed. He'd forgotten he was naked from the shower until Bucky's thigh jammed between his legs, denim scraping sensitive skin and Steve hissed, rolling them in a tangle of wet, messy desperate kisses.

Cool metal hitched along his stomach, Bucky's mouth opening wider to the sound of jeans snapping open, lifting his hips to slide them off and Steve took over, vision spinning as he leaned back to strip Bucky hurriedly out of his clothes, both of them wiggling, tossing, then Steve was surging over him again, mouths slotting together faster and sloppy, rest of their bodies lining up and a groan rumbled in Steve's throat, resounding whimper from Bucky's mouth as he rolled bruised hips down against Bucky's, cocks rucking against each other.

Steve broke off panting, blinking a few times before the bed stopped spinning enough to see Bucky's face, gorgeous hair splayed out crazy and tangled on the pillow below him and it felt like they hadn't touched in forever, like it'd been years instead of days and Steve was still sore and broken and bruised but he'd never wanted that crystal mouth on him more.

"You sure?" Steve managed, biting back the woozy lightheadedness to press his forehead to Bucky's, eyes slipping closed, hands gripping tighter.

"Shouldn't I be asking that?" Bucky shot, weak, barely breathing. Steve pushed his hips forward, skin catching and tugging and the twin sounds past swollen lips matched everything else they'd ever done in sync.

"Please," Bucky whispered, floating his fingers over Steve's sides, still afraid to grab, ruin more, but he needed and Steve knew that now, heard the plea for all it was and there was nothing left but to believe him.

Dropped head, delicate kiss to shoulder scars and Bucky fidgeted under him, breathing picking up as he palmed the back of Steve's head, rocked their hips together again.

He could feel it, the energy trapped under Bucky's skin, the buzzing desire for more, faster, harder. As if Steve wasn't getting it, Bucky knocked their cocks together again, lifting up his knees to tip them open, spread his legs wide beneath Steve and moan prettily for him.

Softer, lighter, sweeter touches, barely grazing his fingertips over Bucky's skin, carefully curving the shape of his hip, caressing down to the inside of his thighs, kissing his neck through gentle, tender touches and Bucky just whined, tipping his head to expose his throat, arching his back to force Steve to touch him harder but Steve just--

Soft and sweet, the way you were supposed to touch. The opposite of how Bucky'd touched him.

"C'mon," Bucky choked and Steve paused in a kiss, lips pressed unmoving and sugary to Bucky's jawline.

Soothing hum in his throat, hands stroking up and down tense muscle and Buck was only stringing up tighter beneath him.

Please. He wanted this. Then why was he shaking?

Steve pressed another kiss to concave skin of heated cheeks, eyes closed, tender and soft as he knew how - Bucky was porcelain and Steve could handle fragile crystal in his hands without shattering either of them.

Even softer, more careful, lips dragging and catching to press by Bucky's eye and--

The tense body was frozen, always ice, except something somewhere was melting inside because Bucky was leaking out his eyes and there was salt on Steve's tongue.

Tears. The moment the taste registered Steve shot up, hovering over Bucky with his eyes wide and mouth open to ask because crying wasn't supposed to be part--
"I'm..." Bucky inhaled, eyes squeezed shut and oxygen caught in Steve's throat as he thumbed a tear away but Buck turned his head, slid and maneuvered and carefully rolled out from under him and Steve was reaching after like a child but Bucky didn't turn to see, padding barefeet to the bathroom.

The door closed quietly behind him, steady stream of sink water flipping on and it'd been fine one moment and fell apart through Steve's cold hands the next.

Steve touched him soft and Bucky cried. How was that any better than Bucky's rough touches that made Steve cry?

Weak. Useless. The mattress swallowed as he fell on his side, curled tiny ball with tears pricking and hands shaking again. Hadn't been this naked and small and sick since he'd had pneumonia.

Empty, rotted from the inside out and he hadn't even fallen to face the bathroom door, couldn't face everything he'd done now.

It opened so quiet he didn't hear. But he felt. The gravitational hurricane sweeping into their room on silent feet. Waiting, deciding, and Steve couldn't keep his wet, trembling mouth shut.

"I-If you got drafted...y'never chose this fight. At'all. Why'd'u keep following me into battle?"

Mismatched shoulders lifted. Fell. Steve wasn’t there to see but he felt the shrug anyways.

The mattress compressed and Bucky’s weight was so heavy. Used to carry, now they were both drowning.

Spines to each other, curled on opposite sides of the bed but they might as well’ve been face-to-face. Spent enough colorblind days and awed wartime nights to memorize every bit of that face.

“I’m sorry,” Bucky whispered into the dark and Steve was naked and cold and small and it was his fault, he couldn’t listen to that apology.

“God, Bucky. Don’t be,” Steve breathed and a tiny sound broke between them, sucked-in sob cracking over Bucky’s throat, bottom-lip trembling but he was nodding, curling tighter, further and further away.

Part of him wanted to beg. Another part never wanted to speak again.

Seven minutes. He lasted seven minutes before he couldn't do it anymore.

The bed was a marshmallow all over again and he'd gotten over that, when Bucky dragged him between the sheets because it was something to cling to through too soft but Bucky wasn't wrapped around him and he couldn't ignore it, falling through rough clouds without anyone to catch his hand.

The mattress unsettled as he slid off the edge, feet catching floor and knees giving out but his arms had the strength to lower himself weakly to the ground, spine propped up against the side of the bed and he was exhausted and he hated sleeping upright but at least he wasn't falling anymore.

Cold morning light and Steve blinked groggily, unable to remember passing out but it was light and he was so goddamned stiff every muscle he had ached--

Bucky.

Steve rubbed his eyes in case he was seeing things but no, the tiny light form was curled, fetal, on the floor beside him.

He'd pulled on a white tshirt - rucked up in the night to reveal the patch of skin at his lower back, over the hem of white boxer-briefs. Long dark hair splayed on the floor, near-tickling Steve's foot and contrasting sharply to the white clothing and expanse of smooth skin, arms tucked into his chest and metal underneath so it looked like Bucky back then and that hurt.

It ached, scooting along the floor quietly, holding himself up with his elbows as he ducked down and kissed Bucky in his sleep.

Dry lips dragged slightly with his and the curled shoulders shifted a little, knees curling up tighter and Steve was dizzy again, drawing back to watch silent flickers of closed eyes, parted mouth as perfect as ever and he had to dip in, just once more.

Lips pressed to the smart, slack mouth and Steve wished he could pull Buck's curled body into his arms, carry him like a child over the threshold of the flames and heal the scars and love this beautiful soul and press a thousand promises into ruined skin that he could finally mean, promises he could stop breaking, cobwebs he could clear away and pull cold metal from fading--

Shock rippled up bruises as he fell backwards on his ass, gasping stale air with his mouth broken free in surprise. Startled awake, wide ice staring at him as thick chest muscles heaved beneath soft white cotton.

"Fuck, what were you thinking?" Bucky croaked, hoarse from sleep and Steve wanted to kiss him again but his mouth flapped uselessly instead.

"You...slept on the floor for me. You looked so beautiful I had--"

"Beautiful doesn't mean not deadly, Steve," Bucky snapped, smoothing his long hair angrily out of his face and Steve knew that.

When he'd first met Buck again, fighting the Winter Soldier under that bridge, before he knew it was Buck, cold metal wrapped around his throat and faces close, burning fire in his veins Steve could remember thinking that rush, dance, the fight; ghost, the paradigm and enforcer of the dead--

Could remember thinking "if this is courting death, no wonder he jumped outta buildings."

He’d thought fighting Buck was courting death, but really...in a twisted sort of way. Being with Bucky at all was courting death.

And Steve was still jumping outta buildings.

“I know that,” he said quietly and Bucky made this frustrated sound, pushing himself to his feet and pacing towards the dresser, yanking open a drawer hard enough to dislodge the things atop.

Shoulders tense with anger and annoyance and Steve pushed to his feet too, ignoring how shaky he felt because it was better than yesterday and there was too much else to worry about for his bruises and empty stomach to take precedence now.

Bucky’s hands gripped the edge of the dresser tight, a thousand things running through his head that Steve’d never been let in on and would never be told. A choppy inhale, fingers running pissily through his hair again.
“I can’t protect yo—”

“It’s always about protecting me,” Steve interrupted, stepping up behind the heaving cotton shoulders. Metal tightened, creaking, and how many bruises had Bucky hid by barging in alleys to fight off Steve’s? Torn-out throat and he sucked in a breath, staring at redstarcorner peeking out under white. “How far does it go?”

How far would Bucky go to protect--

That far. He almost had. He’d tried. That--

There were tears in his eyes and Steve blinked them away because he’d gotten there in time and this was not the time he had to be strong. Strong. Couldn’t let Bucky see how hurt because that’s what this was about, he was trying to keep Steve from hurting but lately all that did was hurt him more.

“You tried to kill yourself,” the slowest, quietest whisper, “—to protect me.”

That’s how far it went.

Steve couldn’t watch--

Dark hair flashed, spun around and crystal caught on his, defiant, angry. Boiling up over all the hurt shame guilt just under the surface but Steve knew now, Steve’d seen him, Steve could see right through it now because he’d been there breaking under Bucky’s hands as he fell apart, desperate and ruined and “I said that was about me, not you.” An accusatory tip up of his chin and he looked scary, almost, all pissed red-hot like this but it was even scarier, the watery truth underneath, the part Steve was finally starting to see with open eyes that the tiniest part of him really wished he never knew. Too much now, he was starting to realize too much.

“Did you mean it?” The words were steady, sure, because Steve was. He remembered every word Bucky’d said to him crumpled against that wall, all the let me do it for me’s, but he knew better.

Even knew better then.

Bucky just glared.

And glared.

Steve melted.

Fire made ice drip into weak water and he couldn’t do it, couldn’t watch Bucky so tight-strung and hurt and guilty, that pretty face twisted up with hate?

“I’m okay,” Steve swore, same seriousness as all their childhood cross-your-hearts, and every instinct wanted to cradle Bucky’s face but that wasn’t what this was about.

He took Bucky’s hand, uncurled hard calluses of clenched fists and lifted the palm to his own jaw over bruises he knew they’d both been thinking about. Tipped his head against the brutal weapon with a softness to contrast the sense memory of pain and barely managed not to cry.

“You didn’t hurt me.” Another promise. “I’m okay.”

“I broke your bones,” Bucky whispered, horrified, staring at Steve’s cheek against his fingers like one of the two would burst into flames if he flinched.
“Not the first time,” he tried to smile and Bucky shook his head, tearing touch and eyes away but Steve saw the shine on his eyelashes anyways. The same shine that’d been there the first time, the first real time, on that helicarrier above him with metal glinting and eyes watering and he’d fucked Steve’s face up, shot him multiple times, stabbed him with a knife - did he really think a broken hand and some bruises were something Steve couldn’t get past?

“You really think that’s helping?” Failed dry-sarcasm just sounded desperate and sad and Steve’s chest ached with more than bruises. It was so cold and empty from this side of the room and the room wasn’t tipping dizzy but his world was when Bucky was so far away, inches turned miles and Steve couldn’t stop himself from reaching, pulling.

Bucky couldn’t stop himself from hiding against Steve’s chest.

He had to lift to put his chin on Bucky’s head but it was worth the solid weight against his throat and Steve’s eyes slipped closed as fingers curled tight and frightened against his bruised spine.

Desperate.

He’d been so--

The way he clung, like Steve was fading from his fingertips, like they were going to lose each other all over again and god, Bucky clung like Steve was the only thing anchoring him to Earth and that had to be Hydra, had to be the way they’d told him he wasn’t worth anything without Steve and and

“Do you really think you’re nothing without me?” Quiet words came out jolted with his chin on Bucky’s head, vibrations sliding down just like them. “Bucky, you’ve always been so alive, so much better than, than--”

Frozen pause. Swallow.

“Fading stars,” he managed and Bucky’s fingers released from bruises just as Steve’s throat betrayed him again. “You don’t need me.”

“Stop.” A heavy hand landed on his heart and it was the only place he wasn’t bruised at all and Steve hated that because the insides felt the exact-fucking-opposite. Beautiful shining hair was hanging in Bucky’s eyes at he stared at their shoes and if only he’d just fucking look at Steve.

Fingers curled, digging in for just a moment then Bucky pushed off his chest and the room shrunk in size as he left but then he was gone and Steve stared at their rumpled bed with desolate eyes and a distant everything else.

~~~

When he was younger, Bucky’d told himself Steve was the liquid that ran through his veins - just wanted to have as much of Steve inside him as possible, wanted to consume every bit.

If only he’d known.

~~~

The fallen ones locked away in permanent slumber.

He found him staring out the window, hands shoved in sweats pockets, radio crooning heartbeats in the moonlit background.
Truth be told, I never was yours.

“Come back to bed,” Bucky whispered, reaching over to turn off the words himself this time.

The fear, the fear of falling apart....

Steve crawled in beside him and the radio clicked off with an echo, cutting a word in half but better than the knife under Bucky’s pillow.

Ten minutes of ticking silence, bedside clock splitting skin with every shifting second, counting slower slower decades backwards and infinity further under ice and “What do you remember that rhyme,” Bucky asked the shadows behind Steve’s shoulder blades, “Just before it ends, people start to fly?”

Steve’s form shifted in the sheets, whispering around him and Bucky blinked against the hell-bound silhouettes, voice dropping quiet, echoing hollow off an numbed-empty room. “I thought that’d never hit us. We all had wings back then. On your helmet. On my arm. Right here. They took away my wings.”

Steve sucked in a breath and Bucky closed his eyes. “But that’s alright. Everyone I know’s got wings now. Tony in his hands. On Sam’s back. Your helmet.”

Silence in the dark and Bucky curled real fingers over the metal star, one that used to have something else and it didn’t matter now, it was three am and it’d all be bright enough in the morning not to remember anyways.

“I miss my wings,” he whispered and Steve’s pillow was wet when dawn hit.

~~~

When he was younger, Bucky’d told himself alotta things.

From the very first moment it dawned on him, Bucky’d told himself--

As nice as Steve’d be about it, he’d be disgusted, disoriented and he’d hate Bucky for taking away the one thing he’d always counted on: Bucky’s friendship. He couldn’t do that to Steve.

He’d already taken more than his share, didn’t deserve to thwart all the sunshine outta Steve’s life. He could never know.

Well. It was late for that.

The world outside the window was edging early-dusk and the day should’ve passed brighter than it did but the cheery smiles he used to get were weary-wary glances now. Bucky spent the morning making Steve’s favorite breakfast, the one Sarah used to.

Steve ate seven bites and gave Bucky a weak smile, collapsing on the couch with a sketchpad pinned to propped knees, flinching visibly across the apartment as the cabinet in the kitchen snapped shut too loud.

The last time it’d been this day, it hadn’t been easy either. But it hadn’t been anything like this. There’d only been once - before they’d met again on the bridge - Steve’d had this day to himself and Bucky had no idea if it’d been miserable or celebratory.

He couldn’t imagine it being more miserable than this though.
Last time, it’d been expected. And he knew, today, what was coming only he hadn’t in so long and he didn’t know if it’d ruin him disastrously or mean nothing and he couldn’t decide which was worse.

Steve was on the couch in the next room carving five points into paper and Bucky was curled against the edge of their bed, distant light fading from the walls and the quiet sounds of New York outside and in a few hours there’d be nothing quiet, everything shouting at once just like Bucky’s bones had that night--

There’d been so many times. So many times he’d almost said it.

When they were kids, it would’ve meant something different probably. Or he would’ve thought so. But the first time he almost said it, for real, pure honesty without any filter or barriers, it’d’ve...it’d’ve changed everything. How many things could’ve that one moment prevented--

The first time.

Steve, huge and new but Steve and Bucky was burning and the world was spinning and he wasn’t sure it wasn’t all a hallucination but there he was, gripping a metal rail so tight his hands hurt more than his cut-up feet and he couldn’t feel it, was numb to everything but Steve on the other side of that metal gap, freshly bent-back-rail and that stupid stubborn look on his face and Bucky was terrified and his throat hurt from shouting back at Steve so loudly but the bastard had told him to leave without him and Bucky’d barely been off the table ten minutes, he wasn’t about to leave Steve Rogers.

Then Steve jumped.

Bucky’s heart dropped to his feet and Steve’s feet were flailing in the air, soaring over the exploding fiery gap and clearing the landing and he was going so fast he pummeled straight into Bucky but Bucky didn’t care, just absorbed the impact - always - and clung so tight to Steve his eyes were watering with it.

Relief, disbelief, real alive and Steve’s warm skin under his cold nose and Bucky’s lips parted against that beautiful skin and right then, in that moment.

He was gonna say it.

He’d opened his mouth and the first hoarse start of an I-- was in his throat and the love you was coming right after but Steve’d stopped him, Steve’d interrupted him and said we gotta go and Bucky’d let Steve drag him through hallways then there’d been a flash of blue and the temporary sanity he’d had, the clarity of truth had dissipated and Hydra’d taken his head and it wasn’t until that evening when Peggy swept into the bar that the words from earlier sunk in, subconsciously, and funny Bucky hadn’t remembered he’d almost said it until he’d gotten them all restored and even then, he’d never let himself think about it until now.

Now, staring out the window with a heavy blanket wrapped around his shoulders, toes freezing, ears attuned to Steve’s movements and heart pounding in anticipation for when the first colored bomb dropped from the sky and wondering how they were passing yet another of Steve’s birthdays without Bucky ever having said I love you out loud.

“Sweetheart?”

Bucky wrapped the blanket tighter, not turning around to the voice because he couldn’t stop rocking and he had no idea when he’d started hiding behind the heels of his hands, pressed hard enough to his eyes to make them throb and and

“Bu-cky? Are you...”

Steve crouched beside the rocking bundle and carefully pried violent hands from pretty features, chest seizing at the look on Bucky’s face because that was beyond drunk, the parted lips pulling a memory and he was too surprised that the next murmur wasn’t a serial number to register what the mumbling was.

“No--stars. We'renotstars. Notstarsnotstarsnotstarsn--”

“Shhh, shh. Bucky, baby. It’s okay. Can you look at me?”

“We’re. We’re not stars, Stevie, we’re notstars.”

“I know,” Steve promised, wrapping ticking fingers around thick blanket and Bucky tipped sideways into him like gravity meant nothing. “I know.”

"Too many," the broken voice gasped and Steve pressed the unbandaged hand to his forehead but of course Buck didn’t have a fever, he was burning on the inside, to the end of days.

“I've k-killed too many.”

Sinking stones and Steve squeezed him tighter, tugging a hurt sound and Bucky struggled against him, bumping fading bruises and shaking shaking and the weak protest was too much for Steve to take, not today.

Water welled up and he buried his nose in Bucky's hair, praying he wouldn't feel the cold tears edging between them.

Taut and braced, wavering on the moment when Buck shoved him off and away because he did, he always did.

“I got you,” Steve whispered anyways, harsh floating and muscles tensing cringe for the metal hand to his chest, the cold reminder that no, he didn’t deserve to comfort Bucky like this, not anymore.

The heavy body would never crumple against him, puppet with the strings cut, because the branded wooden x’s hadn’t stopped tugging above.

He used to touch Bucky to ground him and save him and Bucky hadn’t let him do that, didn’t let that work this time around. Maybe it could’ve, from the first days back as the Winter Soldier. How many episodes would’ve been avoided if Bucky’d reached for Steve instead of ran from him?

During the war it’d been different. He’d done it because he had to be okay. The torture was in the past and Bucky had a responsibility to move on. If he was psychologically damaged, he was useless to Steve. Mental injuries were just as dangerous as broken legs on the battlefield. They were a unit and there was no room for a weak link. So Bucky buried it all down and didn't let himself be weak.

There was no room to be weak. And now, a lot more than a team was a stake.

The doorbell rang.

They both jumped and Steve cursed loudly and Bucky was rolling outta his grip within seconds, shedding the blanket and straightening scarily fast, a single stumbling step before the spine snapped tight and tall and Bucky was stalking the murder walk past a stunned Steve on the floor and seconds ago he'd been a mess but now he was striding confidently and scarily for the door and Steve couldn't breathe because he hadn't seen the Winter Soldier like that in months.

But then the door was opening and there was nothing left but to pull himself to his feet too, and wonder how the hell they were getting outta this one.

“HAPPY BIR--”

“Wait, wait, false alarm, s’not Steve.”

“You letting us in Barnes, or you gonna block the doorw--”

“Look, there he is! Haappy Biirr--”

Bucky finally stepped aside and a swarm crowded into their apartment, kitchen filling with miscellaneous shouts, bright packages, clapping hands, and flickering candles.

It wasn’t until Steve saw his reflection in a window he realized he still had tears gathering at the edges of widened eyes. Wiping his face haphazardly wouldn’t do much now because everyone was already here and there was no use hiding and Bucky was standing across the room, arms crossed over his chest and ice studying Steve critically and he was fine, it was Bucky’d he’d been tearing up over in the first place.

All that pain that’d just snapped off like a switch, it was terrifying and honestly Steve felt like crying a lot more instead of plastering on a smile but they had to do better.

He let the Avengers crowd him into the dining room, shoving into the chair at the head of the table and he’d sat at the head of tables in the war, that was where they strategized, Sergeant Barnes on his left and Dugan and Stark on the right, Peg right alongside the boys. Except once, the last time, Bucky's chair hadn't been at the table because Bucky wasn't there and really, really, Steve wasn't sure he was here now.

Crystal was still watching him from so far away but Steve's arms were too-long now so it didn't take much before he curled his fingers over a sharp wrist and pulled. Everything was still loud as Bucky stumbled to Steve's side and it was just so much.

Blonde spikes crushed as he leaned his temple against Bucky's ribs, holding where he hadn't been allowed to for centuries but Bucky wouldn't push him away in front of their family and Steve knew it was sick but he needed the weight of Bucky's body against his, bruised bloody or not.

"You wanna cut the cake, Barnes?"

"Hmm?" Bucky looked up, blinking confusedly with one hand tentatively resting atop Steve's head.

"Buck gets first piece," Steve insisted and the dark head shook, fingers sinking into Steve's scalp.

"S'your birthday."

"Want you to have it."

"Not hungry."

"You haven't eaten."

"Steve."
"Buck," he replied stubbornly and they were arguing about way more than cake and everyone else had gone pretty damn quiet by now.

"I can cut?" Tony offered and Clint smacked him but Pepper started slicing the cake anyway as Natasha got plates and Steve stubbornly stared up at Bucky until the rough hand in his hair tightened sans metallic whir.

"We did not come at a good time," Sam muttered to Barton under his breath but Steve and Bucky both heard anyways.

Apparently Buck had no problem shoving him off in front of family after all.

Steve's head was spinning with it as Nat slid a slice of cake in front of him, mini fire lit up over cloying blood-red frosting.

Bucky stalked all the way to the other end of the table and he was staring at the candle just like Steve was and neither of them were seeing days-past birthday-cakes.

Leaping flames, crying out in the darkness and blood staining snow and electric sparks licking up Steve's boots as Bucky fried his hands prying them free, knuckles split pulpy from the mangled corpse beside them and le fonce est approche.

After, boxer gloves and Bucky'd asked Steve when he was going to kiss him and Steve was so relieved because he knew it was a rhetorical cry for help and he'd forgotten about it since but what if What if it'd been exactly what they were now, what if it went all the way back then—

It did, didn't it?
It did, didn't it.

Steve looked up from the candle.

Bucky was staring at him.

You gonna kiss me anytime, Rogers?

The chair screeched loudly enough to make Nat's hand dart to her gun and Tony to jump but Steve didn't hear it, just strode around the edge of the table until he reached crystal and took Bucky's cheeks in his palms, tilted that beautiful face up and moved too quick for Buck to stop him but just slow enough to see the flash in his eyes before their lips pressed together and Steve kissed him like the taste was the only way he could breathe anymore.

A tiny distant crackle outside, kids on streets starting firecrackers as dusk set in and they never got to be kids with firecrackers, they were destined holding timebombs.

Polished bone sunken into plush lips, scraped drag tugging a choked tear and Steve pulled away with a gasp, soldier calluses swiping over brother-in-arms cheeks and sliding wet.

He stared at melting ice and Bucky ducked his head, wiping both palms over his cheeks, rubbing his eyes and Steve just held on as tight as he could to Bucky's biceps and sucked in greedy gasps of proximity.

"I'm putting on a movie," Pepper clapped her hands together and started for the living room, shuttling awkwardly downcast Clint and Bruce in tow. Steve pressed his forehead to the top of Bucky's scalp, too hard and aching but his lungs still weren't working right and with his eyes closed he could at least pretend they weren't insideoutexposed to the very people who never needed to see either of them like this.

"M'sorry," Steve breathed because he didn't know what he did or why Bucky was crying or why he'd been freaking earlier but whatever it was had to be Steve's fault anyhow.

Bucky opened his mouth to answer and Steve was hanging onto the silence like gospel; perfect time for Sam to lean over to Tony and mutter just quiet and worried and bitter enough,

"They care about each other so much it's gonna swallow them whole." Brown arms crossed over his chest and Tony pursed his lips, stabbing a bite of cake and studying the distraught pair around the fork in his mouth.

"I thought you said Bucky came to you for help," Tony pointed out and Sam shifted his weight, leaning closer to drop his voice lower but neither willing to follow Nat outta the room without the soldiers.

"The more I think about it, it's like he only reached out to say he did. To talk aloud about his problems but what's the point if he's not interested in healing, y'know? I have no idea what happened between them, but I know it was something."

"Or. Maybe everything." Tony shrugged and Sam lifted an eyebrow, tipping his head in the direction of the watery-eyed pair, who were finally on their way for the living room too.

"You think this is built up? Over days, weeks?"

"Hell, it could be years. Decades, centuries, lifetimes. Built up, one brick atop another and now the wall’s so high they can’t see over it."

Sam studied Tony out the corner of his eye, watching him tighten his mouth, staring straight ahead at the retreating backs, the bruises on the back of Steve’s neck.

“Well,” the silence finally broke as Sam gestured them to follow into the next room. “At least we came over, can’t imagine what’d’ve been like if they were alone when the fireworks started.”

“Hell, we still may have an explosion. Turn the movie up loud enough, might drown some of it out.”

“For how long?”

Tony scoffed, watching as Steve sat down next to Bucky on the floor and Barnes scooted half a foot away. “Not long enough.”

Because the speakers came courtesy of Stark Industries, they were loud enough to at least muffle the fireworks. Nearly everyone flinched at least once, but with the curtains pulled and the aliens of Independence Day crashing over the screen, no one had a panic attack and it could almost be summed up to a success.

Except Bucky kept glancing at Steve every twenty seconds. And wiping at watery-eyes every forty.

Rogers kept dozing off and shooting back awake and every time he startled into consciousness he looked terrified and Bucky looked so miserable that Natasha took to “accidentally” kicking Steve’s side to keep him awake.
They were a little over an hour into the movie - an entirely calm scene, so clearly he hadn’t been watching - when Barnes finally broke. Angrily wiping a tear that’d slipped past his metallic defenses, he pushed off the edge of the couch and stood, excused himself with a weak voice.

“M’sorry guys, but I’m off to bed. Thanks for coming over.” His mouth twisted up into a smile that looked nothing like the Sergeant Barnes of textbooks and everything like a man who’d been tortured for a lifetime.

Everyone gave various soft replies of course and Bucky nodded, bottom lip drawn into his mouth and a hand raking shakily through his hair. Steve was looking up at him like a kicked puppy and Bucky exhaled heavily, dropping to one knee and cupping one side of Steve’s face to press his lips gently to the other cheek, lingering just a moment with his eyes closed painfully tight, then he was letting go, straightening again and gone with fallen footsteps across the apartment, a carefully quietly closed bedroom door.

The movie was still playing and no one looked. Six pairs of eyes watched Steve instead as he deflated further against the side of the couch, drawing his knees into his chest and resting his chin on top, eyes straight forward at the screen and prickling water at the edges.

He didn’t speak, so eventually they all turned back to the movie too, one by one with worried glances back at soft blonde hair and dull-blue eyes.

Twenty minutes and a lot of explosions and sniffles later, he finally broke.

Sucked in breath and they were all perking up, then it was finally spilling from the tightened mouth in a rushed, weak version of the Captain’s voice they all knew.

“It’s grinding me into the ground, the way-- the way he won’t let me hold him.”

Steve’s arms tightened around his knees and Nat reached down, massaging the tense shoulder muscles with small hands. Clint plopped down on the floor beside him, tipping into Steve’s shoulder and even Bruce reached over, tucking his ankle comfortingly over Steve’s foot. Tony sighed and scooted over too, taking the shaking wrist and make a small sound of surprise as Steve suddenly grabbed his fingers and gripped tight.

Pepper raked her fingers through his hair and Sam got off the couch to sit directly in front of Steve, expression sympathetic as Steve rubbed wet eyes with his free hand.

They all sat in silence again, giving what little physical support they had, just making sure Steve knew he wasn’t alone but he wasn’t looking any less distraught, and Tony’s hand was turning white and really, they’d all be able to help a lot more if they knew what was going on.

Steve was staring at nothing, but he still didn’t notice as the circle exchanged glances, mouthing to each other who should ask and eventually all heads tipped towards Sam so he scooted a touch closer, keeping his voice as soft as he could.

“...what happened, Steve?”

The pouty mouth trembled and he turned his face away, found there wasn’t anywhere he could look that someone wasn’t looking back and finally just stared at his knees.

“Steve?” Natasha pressed quietly and he shook his head once, like it somehow didn’t matter. No amount of pain was irrelevant, regardless of how small, and this was nothing like small. Sam reached over, curled a hand atop Steve’s knee and forced him to look up, meet his eyes, spoke as slow and clear as he could.
“It had to be something. You two were...giddy fiancés a week ago.”

Steve’s shoulders lifted to his ears and Nat made a little noise of frustration. Rogers just looked so...small. Struck silent as yet again, the LegendBiggerThanLife was nothing but a tiny kid who spent his childhood with black eyes and split lips.

“Steve…” Sam tried again and Tony let out a breath of relief as Steve let go of his hand, shook Bruce and Clint off too.

“Nothing,” Steve said flatly, wiping his face again before shoving upright and standing, knocking off Pepper and Nat too. Natasha popped to her feet but Steve was already halfway’round the couch before she could grab his arm, not like she had much chance stopping him anyways.

“Thanks for coming, guys.” Steve’s voice was all off, kinda scary in a way and he didn’t even stop to look at anyone, headed straight for the bedroom with those bruises on his arms and his broken fingers still wrapped up. “We’re good from here.”

“Happy Birthday!” Natasha raised her voice suddenly and Steve paused, hand on the counter as he froze, broad shoulders hunched and barefeet midstep. It was nearly impossible to hear the tiny self-deprecating huff followed by a much louder, dry and frankly terrible,

“Thanks.”

Then the door was opened, closed, and he was gone.

After some quiet debate, it was decided that Tony should spend the night.

Just in case.

(Sam wanted to - he had work in the morning. Clint wanted to, everyone wanted to, but Tony didn't have anything to do but fix things and that's kinda what this was anyways. Pepper kissed him on the cheek and he tucked in for a hopefully uneventful night on a couch that looked just as sad and quiet as the rest of the Brooklyn apartment. Hell, probably the rest of Brooklyn too.)

They were on the tenth floor. Odds are, both of them’d survive the jump.

Didn’t stop Steve’s heart from seizing when he opened the door to see Bucky standing there.

It took him a second to find air again, then the words were tumbling out his mouth as dark and quiet as the room was.

“Don’t worry precious, I’m here,” Steve swore lowly, shutting the door carefully behind him, no loud noises to spook the animal. Except he didn’t move, didn’t budge and Steve took another careful step inwards, kept his voice slow. “Bucky, step away from the window.”

He didn’t listen. Didn’t jump either, white curtains whipping into their room, distant sprinkle of colored explosions and they both flinched and Steve’s heart stopped because he’d just have to tip forward--

Two more seconds and he got there in time, wrapped a solid arm over Bucky’s chest from behind, dragged him backwards with too-heavy breaths and Buck just slumped against him, staring dejectedly out the window.
“Wasn’t gonna do anything,” he mumbled, disoriented and Steve closed his eyes, tipping his temple against Bucky’s and tried to just breathe.

“I know, baby,” he soothed, rubbing warmth into Bucky’s stomach, over his heart. “Let’s just get you to bed okay?”

They were young and crazy and drunk in one of those years and Steve didn’t feel anything but the fireworks exploding outside the window ricocheting up his spine when Bucky slammed him into the wall.

Snapping, back and forth mood to mood like a toy soldier and Steve’s eyes were blown and he could finally see right through it.

“I need you,” Bucky whispered against his mouth and Steve would give him everything, had to give him everyth--

He dropped to his knees before he could stop himself; here in worship, to pray to the young god and fill his mouth until his throat pounded and Bucky’s hand was in his hair and the fading bruises on Steve’s knees were smarting and he wanted to close his eyes and tip his head back and let Bucky fuck him until his lungs gave up on him but

But Bucky’s hand was shaking in his hair.

Steve leaned forward enough to press his forehead to Bucky’s belt buckle, his nose to heat and place a kiss on the tented bulge but Bucky’s legs weren’t steady and Steve’d seen him, he knew better now.

Bucky made a weak sound when Steve took his hand, weaker still when he rose and shoved finger pads to Bucky’s neck, over his pulse point and it was fucking crazy, they were fucking crazy.

It didn’t take any strength at all to drag him to the bathroom, but it took all the strength Steve had to pin back the long hair as Bucky threw up in the sink and no, he didn’t know how they were ever gonna make this work.

~~~

Broken.

~~~

They used to not be so different.

Golden Steve, navy-blue Buck.

Now they weren’t gold, navy-blue.

How far apart had they grown--

The contrast between them now?

Pure white.

Jet black.
There was no blue or gold left anymore. The spectrum pushed them far apart and it didn’t get, it didn’t get any more fucked than this.

~~~

“He’s gonna leave me. He’s gonna leave and I don’t know what I’m gonna do--”

A slamming door made them both jump, but it wasn’t until the shadow stalked around the corner that Tony’s bed-rustled (couch-rustled) head lifted with concern. On guard, because that wasn’t Bucky Barnes, that was the fucking Winter Soldier murder-walking into the living room.

Steve’s mouth’d snapped shut but clearly, someone’d heard him anyways.

A metal finger pointed accusingly at wide blue eyes and if Tony didn’t know better he’d say Rogers was scared. Should be scared, at least, but he wasn’t, he was sitting there in awe like Bucky was something ascended from the heavens instead of clawed up from hell.

“Nothing,” Barnes snapped, rounding the corner to stand right in front of them and Steve blinked owlishly. “If I wanted to go, I’d’ve gone by now. But I need you.”

Blue cut away, staring at Tony’s shoes and no less wide. Pouty lips tightened to hold in a sob but Barnes’ voice wavered on the next words anyways. “M’not going anywhere Stevie.”

Steve wouldn’t look at him.

Tony was frozen, because he had no idea what the fuck was going on, let alone what he was supposed to do.

Bucky stalked over and Tony tensed but he wasn’t here for him, he dropped to his knees between Steve’s thighs, reached flashing hands to carefully gently lift his face. Force Rogers to look at him and they used to not kiss in front of anyone else, now they were losing their goddamned minds and didn’t care who fucking saw.

“You’re the only thing in this world--” Bucky exhaled, quiet and close and private and Tony would move but every instinct was screaming predator and frozen seemed much safer. Even with Barnes three feet away and gripping Steve’s face with searching eyes and the most desperate tone in his voice Tony’d heard on anyone.

“--I would destroy without.”

Steve’s hands shot up to lock over Bucky’s, and that had to hurt his jaw or something but they were just staring at each other and Tony honestly wasn’t quite registering what Bucky’d said.

Destroy. He’d said destroy and once, Barnes had asked him if he could be the best thing for Steve and Tony’d told him he was, but looking at it now he’d like to retract that fucking statement.

You broke our spirit, says the note we pass.

This wasn’t unhealthy, this was so beyond unhealthy and shocked wasn’t the word for his dropped jaw. Appalled, maybe.

Destroy. To be destroyed or to destroy others? Either way, it wasn’t the kind’a love note anyone wanted to hear.
Except, apparently, Steve.

Those big legendary hands were holding onto Barnes so tight it was pretty shocking nothing’d snapped yet.

They...those two were not okay At All.

Don’t you know the kids aren’t al-- kids aren’t al--

(Right?)

~*~

Bruce didn’t think it was a good idea, but Bruce didn’t quite believe how bad it’d gotten and if Tony hadn’t seen it for himself he wouldn’t either. But he knew love - he loved Pepper, he cherished her and he felt lost without her but there wasn’t a dangerous _destruction_ there and they weren’t talking about master assassins and supersoldiers with the ability to level a city so really, if he wanted to take some precautions when everything was so fragile, he was pretty sure he had the right.

Jarvis helped make the pills, Nat slipped them into the building’s water source. Everyone else was delivered a note about not drinking local water for awhile, and Stark Industries provided Brita filters for the rest of the residents and Steve and Bucky were none the wiser.

~*~

Bucky knew the first time he took a sip from Steve’s water bottle. He’d been drugged for a long time, he was pretty sure he knew how to recognize anything slipped his way now.

Initially, he thought it was Steve. But he’d been drinking the water too so that couldn’t be right. Stark, then.

Bucky didn’t care. He’d fucking drink whatever they wanted to put into his body. Not like it fucking mattered anymore.

Funny, he’d come all this way and he recognized this body as his without second thought, but. But now he’d finally come full circle and yeah, it was his, but who fucking cared.

Y’know, he used to be perfect. Once, forever ago. Really, though, it’d just been months.

Months of flaws. Of wrong. Of hurt and pain and ache--

It could’ve all been prevented, really.

He’d lost so much, and for what? He used to have complexity, understanding of the world, power. And then they’d gone stumbling along the path for happiness and he’d dulled all his edges to fit into the box of a tower, the small box of an apartment and he’d calmed his hands so they could touch Steve’s skin without bruising anyways and he’d stopped killing so Steve would smile at him and he was so simple and pliable and easy now, just an extension of Steve Rogers, the docile best friend, boyfriend, fiancé and all that freewill he’d fought so fucking hard for he gave up in the face of what Steve needed and the individual fire that used to rule in his eyes was diminished for the soft lovey-way he looked at blue ones and he used to be Invincible but now he was edging on Invisible and this, wasn’t this exactly what he’d warned Steve would happen?

Worse, though, than everything he’d lost was everything he’d taken from Steve ruined and _torn down_ and it was all him, his fault, because he couldn’t handle himself and he leaned too heavy on Steve and Steve crumbled and crushed and tried to tell Bucky he didn’t mind and the part of Bucky that thought he was lying hated him for it and the part of him that believed it wished he’d gone through with shooting himself in the mouth that one day because Steve, he couldn’t do that to Steve he couldn’t.

But here he was.

“I’d still trade places with you if I could,” Steve whispered into the dark one morning at three am and Bucky rolled over in his sleep and stared at the wall and thought about the chains that used to latch him to Hydra’s walls and tried to picture them around Steve’s wrists and decided it wasn’t all that far from how he looked now.

Running, Steve spent the morning running and puking and Bucky’d always been running and he wasn’t letting himself eat enough to puke because just One More Thing Steve didn’t need to worry about.

One door swinging open and one door swinging closed.

~~~

He’d told Peggy, once, the reason why he was so jealous of her. Not because she could be with Steve when he wasn’t. She’d asked him why, then and he’d told her.

“Because he looks at you the only way he’s never looked at me. Like he wants to marry you.”

If the way Steve was looking at him now was anywhere near that simple, maybe they really could get married one day.

Hell, Steve’d even told Sarah he wanted Buck to be the one he married.

Bucky stared up at the ring on his hand and wondered if Sarah’d known that day would never come. If she’d known that it’d look like it did, it’d stand there and taunt them and the closer they got to the day Steve and Nat picked the further away it felt and really, Bucky couldn’t quite believe he’d live that long.

The day he’d realized he felt more for Steve, he’d realized for the first time that he was jealous and maybe he didn’t like the idea of Steve marrying somebody else and funny, because that thought had freaked him out but maybe this was what Bucky’d always wanted and would never ever get.

Metal plates adjusted, breaking underneath the ring and his entire hand could detach but the ring would still stay, stuck to him with the very technology that’d failed him in the first place.

The Stark technology that’d taken his bitty Steve away from him, the technology that hadn’t been good enough to distract Steve from signing up that last-fatal-time, technology that altered perfect cells into efficient ones and built the shield he hid behind and wrapped him up redwhite’n’blue and made the zipline that took them to the train that separated them for a lifetime and perfected the engines of the machine that’d held that Saratoga fight and built the band that tied Bucky’s finger to Steve’s with a red string he couldn’t snip without bleeding out.

Steve was listening to Fall Out Boy in the kitchen. Bucky stared at the ceiling and stopped ignoring distant melodies.

He could feel Stark’s drug weighing down his limbs, but Bucky hadn’t slept in three days and it’d take a little more than the snuck pills to get him down. He had to be awake.
There were trumpets in Steve’s song and those always reminded him of war anyways.

Passive-aggressive song-wars were kinda Rogers’ thing lately.

...ought to keep me concealed just like I was a weapon drifted in from the kitchen and Bucky lifted his head.

Didn’t come for a fight but I will fight till the end. And this one might be a battle, might not turn out okay.

He sat up all the way. He knew Steve was drawing, just like with the stupid Ready to Run thing but what the fuck was he listening to?

Then the chorus hit.

Bucky’s jaw dropped.

He couldn’t believe Steve Rogers had the audacity to play that song.

Actually, worse, he could entirely believe it.

They’d talked about this. Briefly, Bucky’s cried out and Steve’d soothed and he’d finally scrubbed down all the cuts and bruises he’d made and Steve’s body was healed now, no more fading bruises or marks and even his hand wasn’t wrapped, just hurt sometimes. At random times he’d cringe and pull it into his chest, the same way he had when Bucky’d first broken it, kept fucking him--

--get you to burst just like you were a bubble, frame me up on your wall just to keep me outta trouble.

Trapped in the light by fixation, dying by flying too close to the sun and Bucky was worse than a moth, Icarus, Bucky was the fading moon who chased the sun everyday and night of existence and would never get close enough.

Too many war wounds and not enough wars, too few rounds in the ring and not enough settled scores.

How much had they never solved.

It wasn’t just a four-letter-name they were in anymore, not just blood in the snow but boiled blood under skin and a thousand words they couldn’t speak.

He was on his feet at the second chorus, so fucking pissed he had to take a moment to grab the edge of the easel, keep himself from knocking over all the just-started paintings.

His wasn’t in here and it was a good thing too because he might just go break months of work over Steve Rogers’ fucking head.

He didn’t--

He didn’t get to blare the lyrics of that chorus like they weren’t a fucking lie like they weren’t the opposite of how everything should be like Bucky’d done something good instead of repulsive and unforgivable and everything Steve should hate him for what the fuck was fucking wrong with him to make him blast the fucking lyrics

I love the way you hurt me?
Bucky was fucking done with Steve Rogers thinking his own life was a joke.

Bucky could've killed him. Bucky'd come so close to killing him so many times and he could feel that tick, the darkness settling in his veins right alongside with the way he was walking taller speaking less more efficient energy movements not eating drinking pills breaking bones and they were Steve's, just like Bucky'd always known they'd be--

You're secondhand smoke, I breathe you in but honey I don't know - what you're doing to me, mon chérie.

My darling.

Bucky could still kill him.

French, like all those days back in the war, back before Steve would've ever let Bucky fuck him up, let alone fuck him broken--

Truth catches up with us eventually.

The door to the studio whined in protest as Bucky threw it open and if it weren't for Stark's tinkering it would've come off the hinges. What the fuck did Steve think he was doing.

Always somethin' to prove, huh? Even now, even still? This, he’d never fucking convince Bucky of this and honestly what the fuck was wrong with him to even try.

I'm coming for you and I'm making war, the song sang and Bucky stalked through the hallway so fast he almost lost the power in his step.

Steve looked up the moment Bucky swung into sight, flash of something across his face - what, triumph for making Bucky listen to his fucking blasted song?

The timing was perfect, words slamming into his gut the second their eyes met, I still love the way you huuurt me-e-e and it was literally visible the moment it sunk into Steve’s stupid fucking head how pissed Bucky was, that twist of apologetic underneath the burning defiance, like if Bucky said a single word about the song Steve’d repeat the goddamned words right to his face and fine, that was fine Steve could be a stubbornfuckingass, Bucky wouldn’t say a single thing.

He knew the speaker was a gift from Stark, it was for Bucky’s own goddamned birthday and they’d danced on the roof to it and that was all wonderful and nonsense but Bucky had a fucking point to make and that was more important than some sentimental-- tear apart what’s beautiful to prove that nothing lasts

"It's irresisti--" crash.

The screech as metal crumbled electronic pieces was horrifying, but the satisfaction of smashing Steve’s fucking radio and shattering pieces over his lap came second only to uncurling the metal fist to throw the remaining mangled mess into the closest wall.

Crash, clatter, and pure echoing silence.

Bucky was breathing heavy and his metal arm was twitching but Fall Out Boy wasn’t singing anymore.

Steve wasn’t drawing anymore either. He was staring.
And staring.

Then exploding just like the fucking stereo.

“What the fuck is wrong with you??”

That was about a lot more than a stereo.

“With me?? You’re the one who’s fucking everything up!” Bucky shouted back, bent forward eagle arms - wasn’t that ironic - like it might get through Steve’s fucking head if he screamed loud enough.

Nothing got through Steve’s head.

... and Bucky’s head was so fucked, everything was so fucked the room was already spinning because Steve was yelling at him and there’d been a few skipped meals and he really shouldn’t’ve stormed in here using all that saved energy in the first place-- “I don’t even have my fucking efficiency--”

“Efficiency? That fucking-- Hydra, again, you’re resorting to Hydra ‘cause you can’t handle--”

“It has nothing to do with handling shit, it has to do with what you keep, keep---” A frustrated noise and that was nowhere near describing everything Steve kept doing because it was everything;

“What, ask you to love me?” Steve scoffed, big artist hand scuffing up carefully-tamed-blondie into rebel-spikes, head tipping with that awful, terrifying smile he got sometimes - always a way out; you may not be a threat, but you better stop pretending to be a hero. Except Bucky was a threat, and Steve had no clue how deep the pretending went. Just that curved pretty mouth, the distaste as he narrowed his eyes at Bucky and sneered in the fucking worse sarcastic tone he owned,

“Can you even love anymore? Or did Hydra burn that right outta you?”

Whirring as fingers curled, filling the silence as he stared blankly at Steve.

Honestly, he couldn’t quite believe his best friend had just said that.

Except Steve was nowhere near done.

“Am I wasting everything I’ve done for you? Tell me it’s all meant something.” Those big hands once entwined, held back hair and traced lovingly over sharp features-- up and accusing now, pleading but not asking, burnt and curled at the edges.

Cages, and bars, and he’d shook his free wrists once and now everything inside him was nothing but screaming.

He was honestly surprised how quiet and soft his voice came out, how scarily calm.

“You’re giving up now? After an entire life of not knowing how to stay down and this is it, this is terminal?” The end of a rail-line, ironically, and the angry flash in blue eyes proved he got the reference. Oh did he. But Bucky kept going, quiet and slowly slipping down that hill-- “You can stand thousands of hits but you’re done fighting for me?”

“I have fought for you for as long as I can remember,” Steve snapped and Bucky flinched. A single step forward and he didn’t mean to cower but maybe he did just a little and Steve didn’t even notice he was so mad. Little, and bigger than he’d ever been, righteous and indignant and everything Bucky couldn’t face. “You always asked if I had something to prove? You’re right. I did. I fucking did. But it was never about my size, Bucky, it was about being good enough for you!”

"Don’t make this about me, Bucky begged in his head, wringing his hands together and forcing himself not to shrink. Why? Why? Don’t say things you don’t mean because it’ll dig deeper, Stevie, please."

Didn’t say that.

Rolled back his shoulders and leveled his gaze on fiery blues, “I must not’ve been good enough for you, if you’re lowering your fists after a century.”

“Don’t you get it? They never should’ve been raised! Maybe once, a long time ago, but I shouldn't have to fight for you anymore. Aren't we past that? Don't I deserve more than a fucking struggle every step of the way??”

Deserve more.

Didn’t they deserve more.

Bucky lifted his chin, glaring at Steve like he was the smaller one again and opening his mouth with the kind of bitter he never could’ve shoved on that tiny body. The real one.

“I’m sorry I’m not the perfect doll you want me to be, Steve. Not all of us came out of a goddamn bottle.”

Big blues stared at him and Bucky glared back because yeah, he fucking said it.

Yeah, he fucking said it.

Blonde dislodged as the pretty head shook, once, disgusted smile curving one side of his mouth again and Bucky’d never hated himself more.

“Huh. So much for following that tiny kid from Brooklyn, huh?” He just sounded tired now. Tired and….and defeated. Broken-hearted, disappointed.

Destroyed.

Cleared his throat, blue flitting away from Bucky as his fingers twitched and this was nothing like the bar, nothing like that promise Bucky’d made to him. Jaws of death.

“You ever even mean that?” Steve asked quietly and Bucky ran his fingers through his hair and stared at the ceiling so he’d at least know the moment it collapsed in on them.

“Would it matter?” He asked pure-white and pure-white didn’t need the stain, why were they fighting this so hard? Follow Stevie, that tiny kid from Brooklyn? Not this war. Bucky couldn’t do this war anymore.

Closed eyelids didn’t help anything but the darkness was at least a comfort, something that understood for once, even if it made his ears too acutely aware of how raspy his voice sounded, how shattered. “What's the point in following you if you insist to go places I can't follow?”

“You can follow.” Preached, exasperated, I want you and the pointing finger was only pressing bruises now. “You can come with me! It doesn't have to be so fucking complicated.”

“Well, it is fucking complicated,” Bucky pointed out and that bottle rocket was a millisecond away from going off.
“Love isn’t supposed to be,” Steve fired and the flames were so close to just rolling off shoulders now. “Love is supposed to be--”

Honestly, Bucky couldn’t listen to that right now, not if he wasn’t gonna break more than Steve’s radio.

The flash of the metal coming up into a stop position might’ve been the only thing that made Steve pause. And flinch, he flinched, because Bucky’s eyes opened just in time to see that shitty reaction and he was so beyond horrified now with himself and his hands and Steve that he could do nothing but blink. And open his mouth. And lie.

“I don’t care what you think.”

It didn’t even ripple the slightest waters.

Steve scoffed at him and not even a second of triumph, instantly shoved aside irrelevant with that familiar scorn,

And, damn him, once that’d been true. When he still had Steve Rogers.

But Steve wasn’t Steve anymore and he didn't have the goddamn right to use that name as leverage when he barely fight the fucking bill and he was so SICK and TIRED of fighting about everything when Steve was never gonna understand him because it wasn’t even his Stevie anymore! Had it ever been, or did the beautiful boy he thought he loved die in the plane crash, freeze in the ice that day the same way he had?

And he had the audacity--

“Steve Rogers? Steve Rogers? Really? There's none of you left in there, Steve! Or, wait. Should I call you Cap.” That flinch was worse than when Bucky’d lifted his hand and funny, which strikes still hurt Steve more.

This was his best friend.

His best friend since childhood and they were doing nothing but swinging words instead of fists and it wasn’t like that was any better and Bucky didn’t want to hurt anymore, didn’t want to pretend they were something that they weren’t, just wanted to go back to that day that Steve’d looked at him with love in his eyes and a glowing smile and Bucky’d been saved and nothing’d been complicated because he had Steve and he was Healthy and Safe and Bucky was Saved and there were no feelings, no complications, he’d only had hours, just hours before the red-dress marched in and ruined his entire life and somehow lifted him saved higher than the Azzano fires but before that, those brief moments, Bucky’d honestly, truly believed that for once they might be okay and it was the first and last time he’d ever believed it and he couldn’t fucking believe how far they’d come from that, how far Steve Rogers was from the man that’d stood before him with that shy smile on that day, given Bucky that look while he shouted over the crowd and pulled the first audience for the hero that’d turn into the same villain he did.

He’d said it himself, Steve’d said it himself not a month ago, do I deserve to call myself that anymore? after a nightmare and Bucky’d just shushed him then but he was done, he was done with keeping his mouth shut.

“You know, when I said let’s hear it for Captain America?” The ground was unsteady, softer than war-mud and more dangerous because now, if Bucky tipped over, no one was there to catch him.
Especially not dead-blues that used to shine like the skies.

“...I didn't think he'd be the one to kill my best friend.”

Steve stared at him, blank look on his features that Bucky used to see every time he looked in the mirror. He didn’t look in mirrors much anymore.

But there was an accusation, a disbelief and horror in the way he was looking, like Bucky was the twisted one and it wasn’t fair, Steve was the one who fucked them both to hell. Although, really, who was the one with bruises and who’d done the fucking last—

“You're not him,” Bucky’s voice broke and it wasn’t fair, he’d never asked for this. Wiping freezing metal underneath cold damp eyes and biting his lip didn’t make it tremble any less. “You're n-not.”

“Bucky,” watery-depressed and Bucky wiped metal on his pants to smear away the evidence but Steve was closer now, barely a few feet away and Bucky couldn’t remember when he’d started reaching. The softness didn’t feel gentle, just looked weak. “I can’t fight anymore. Is this a test? I can’t take anymore tests. Just. Please.”

Warm hands closed around his wrists and Bucky stared at golden chains.

“Please, Buck-- I can’t. I can’t take it anymore. Can’t watch you leave me again, I. Please, just. Buck, I can’t...get by on my own.”

Young-rotted-lungs and Bucky couldn’t just grab a little shoulder anymore and make everything alright. Couldn’t tell Steve what he needed to here. The thing is, you don’t have to.

“I can’t get by on my own,” Steve repeated stronger, and weaker than he ever was then.

“Bucky. Don’t make me-- please. Just.” Beautiful lips parted, hopeless inhale sucking air far from Bucky’s lungs, then Artist Hands wrapped around Winter-trained biceps, thunder rolling proximity as desperation of years exhaled,

“--say you love me.”

Bucky stared at Steve’s shoes. He used to keep newspapers in the end, when they couldn’t find pairs small enough.

“I can say it,” Bucky echoed and it was his voice from way back then, accent and all, but the words were anything but his. “If that's what you want. It's three words and I can say them the way you want me too but what then? There's no magic switch, Steve. The world won’t burn brighter. The world didn't burn brighter when you said it. It took me a long time to realize, Steve. Love isn't magic.”

“I'm not expecting it to fix everything,” stubborn persisted and Bucky’s stare snapped, blinking as his eyes flicked up to Steve’s stomach, forced himself to match the expansion, forcing himself to breathe in, let the words tumble as his lungs deflated once more.

“...but you want it to fix this. You want the final emotional, psychological, physiological bond of mutual love to tie us eternally, deeper than two other people have ever felt.”

“We can have that,” Steve whispered.

Bucky stared flately at Steve’s thick arms. “It's not possible.”
“I love you, Bucky. And I think you love me, I don't get why it’s not--”

“Love doesn't exist,” he interrupted, tugging his wrists free from bright-white. “Love doesn't exist, Stevie.”

“I know you're wrong.” Fighting voice. “I feel it.”

Bucky took a single step backwards.

“You feel affection, attraction, devotion, pain, a thousand different things and you jam them all into one pretty three-word phrase to make it simpler, bigger. More magical than the world has. Humans have been doing it forever, Steve, but there's no such thing as love. Everyone wants to – needs to believe it. You need that Steve, the idea of something bigger, bigger than you and everyone, this amazing, beautiful, powerful force that brings people together. Takes two lives – two eggs afraid to crack, and breaks them against each other, makes one big mess and combines everything until two people who used to be people on their own are just one mutated form of a thing until both end up miserable--”

“We won't end up miserable Buck--”

“I know we won't, because at least one of us is smart enough to realize that love isn’t real, it’s some delusion that society’s desperate to fall under and how many songs, stories, entities are created about this concept of human beings relying on each other when we all could be perfectly efficient and happy on our own?”

Steve cringed at the word efficient and Bucky took one more step backwards.

It was quiet, too quiet with the solid windows and all that space between them and the flattening ground outside, no rush of New York traffic, no creak of Brooklyn pipes because all that slipped away, perfected and fixed, just like them.

Silent.

“You feel just as complete without me?” Steve asked and Bucky dared flick his gaze upwards for one moment, long enough to see water and hurt before he huffed, looked away again because that was Easier.

“That's not the point.”

“That is the point.”

“No. No, I'm not gonna let you drag emotions into this--”

“That's what it's about.”

“No, I'm talking about logic, and love doesn't exist--”

“Yes, it fucking does.”

“Steve, no.”

“Steve yes,” he shot back and it actually wasn’t funny this time, neither was the self-deprecating huff that came after because this was how it always was, even in the beginning. Always been nothing but fights for the two of them.

“Fine, you wanna be blind, you wanna be the idiot who never stops jumping outta buildings, you wanna fall into the same traps as everyone else in this world, I'm sure as hell not gonna stop you.”

Not like he’d ever stopped Steve from doing anything anyways.

“Would you ever have?” The sunshine asked the rain and Bucky took a final step backwards then Steve was just fading in the distance to the murmur of Bucky’s last cognate words,

“I don’t know.” I don’t know.

~~~

If there was one thing he knew, it was pain.

Back then, in Brooklyn, that wasn’t supposed to be who he was. Just some pretty kid who felt too much for his best friend and now he was a demon, leashed and snarling at the edge of a chain, a dog who knew too much about what happened when guns misfired, a bullet in the gut and a saw in the brain.

~~~

His memory wasn’t as good as Bucky’s, but with his shield in his hand and the dull drill of training practice thudding his pulse in his ears, he could hear more than drowning thoughts for once.

Bugs still ate at his insides, tormenting him that the only time he could think was here, fists curled and rubber pounding, shield ricocheting off practice dome walls, but if he could only think clear when he was fighting, then he’d fight until the glass shattered between them both.

During the war, there’d been changes in Buck. Ones that’d made Steve uneasy, watch him closer from the corner of his eyes, worrying the nights away.

Sometimes he’d look at Steve and quickly look away, pained. He’d told himself Bucky’d always considered Steve as someone he had to protect - they were family - and the hurt came from what Steve’d done. He’d taken that away from Bucky.

He didn’t think let himself think about it much, the fear that Bucky might hate him was-- But he could admit to himself that sometimes, it felt like Bucky just wanted the old Steve back. That had to be why he kept looking at Steve with a funny expression, one Steve’d never seen before. The idea was worse than Steve could handle, but he kept it to himself. Bucky had every right to feel that way. Steve just wished he didn’t.

See, looking back on it, Steve knew that much was partially true. Just the other day, ten floors below his sweaty feet now, Bucky’d shouted in his face that Steve didn’t need him anymore, not since he stepped science’s perfectly manufactured foot outta that fucking machine.

The dull thud of his shield off the wall didn’t feel half as good as the ache in his arm from throwing too hard for too long but this was the only place left for him anymore.

The last time they’d talked, Bucky’d said it again. He wouldn’t’ve said it twice if it wasn’t important; efficient-Bucky didn’t repeat things.

Not all of us came out of a goddamned bottle.

So maybe that’s what the dreaded-painful look during the war was all about.

Or maybe.
Maybe Bucky was bullshitting his way through everything like he always fucking did. Maybe Bucky was in pain, about Steve, and had been all the way back then.

The shield ricocheted and he caught it on a jump, swinging around it launch it at the closest wall again and Maybe Bucky was slipping from his fingers or maybe Steve was so close to the edge of his core that he could finally taste the possibility on his lips.

Maybe Bucky’d just always been in love with him.

The shield didn’t bounce off a wall that time and if he wasn’t too busy staring wide-eyed at nothing he’d’ve seen it coming, but the bruise to the back of his head from not paying attention was worth the moment’s pause, the pounding made it easier to think anyways.

Maybe Bucky’d just always been in love with him.

~*~

When the pressure’s building, do you give up the things you love?

The sunset was on fire, edges of clouds lined in brilliant reds, reflective orange fading in the background and Bucky sat cross-legged on wood before floor-length windows, Brooklyn bridge stretched out over glittering-fire waters; watching the sky burn, watching the river sink.

It was all going to crumble around him.

The weight from above was shoving him down and he was choking, scrambling for the surface but on the outside, he sat quiet and still and passive, hair tucked behind his ear and blue-gray trained dully out crystal glass, always towards the sun sinking into the city.

Used to be he’d never go back on his word.

Numbed by time and age, were there any words to count on anymore?

The tiniest shift and the metal on his hand caught, flashing red against the plating and his gaze flicked down, watching the ring on his finger. Might as well be round his neck.

“Hey, I’m off to bed,” Steve called from behind him and Bucky lifted his head, stray strands of hair falling in his eyes, fire filtering between the dark spots blocking vision.

“I’ll be right in,” he echoed back, arm whirring as he pushed himself to his feet. The world spun black, rushing dizzy but Bucky only stumbled once, caught on the window and straightened again. He’d be fine.

Lack of sleep, most likely.

It’d been....six days now?

He used to be quite good at this. Used to go weeks. It was just--

Laying next to Steve in bed? How was he supposed to shut his eyes? How was he supposed to turn away from the beautiful sleeping boy who kept slipping from his arms in daylight?

Only when Steve was sleeping did he feel….okay, anymore. Because his boy was there, safe and stunning and at Bucky’s side where he belonged - but dark eyes closed instead of beckoning Buck closer, where he’d do nothing but damage. Steve didn’t fight for more when he slept. Steve didn’t fight at all.

All exits look the same.

Hazy-edged vision as silent feet took careful steps past the threshold, closed the door softly beside him. Steve was already curled up under the sheets, pillow shoved aside and shoulders taut. A marshmallow night, then. There were a lot more of those lately.

Lifted the corner of the sheets with flesh, soft slide as he slipped beneath, opposite side of the mattress from bare golden skin. The bedside lamp lit up Steve’s chest, shoulders, all the naked beautiful that Bucky used to kiss, touch - left pining once more.

What he’d give to reach over the space between them and pull Steve’s sweet body into his arms, to be close and warm and together again.

But even in the soft glow, even after the weeks that’d passed - all he saw were the bruises. They’d healed, entirely. The surface of Steve’s skin was deceptively clear and beautiful, like it’d never happened but Bucky looked at him and all he saw was broken bleeding skin and his hands halted before they reached so much as a centimeter for the boy who used to be unpullable from his arms. The one who’d rocked their bodies together in overwhelmed bliss, the irresistible offering just a few feet away. The one Bucky’d broken. The light he’d nearly extinguished with harsh metal desperation, soft sunshine Stevie.

His precious Stevie.

Bucky reached behind him, clicked off the lamp. Darkness fell, and so did they.

Steve to sleep and Bucky deeper deeper in love and it only burned darker every step of the way.

~~~

“...hostages in the center guard room, but the prisoners are basically stuck there, since there’s nothing but water surrounding the site for a hundred miles. Not the most well-thought out escape plan, guess they thought they’d take the ships of whoever came to rescue the prison guards. But obviously, if we go in, that’s not exactly an option for them.”

“Buck and I’ll go.” Steve swept aside the island prison plans, collapsing the diagram at the edge of the wallscreen while Tony frowned.

“We can all go.”

“Barnes and I can handle it.” Bucky flicked a piece of hair out of his eyes, glancing boredly over at Steve, contrasted weirdly with his spine still board-stiff. Although, to be fair, he’d stood perfectly still the entire briefing, kinda scarily so.

Natasha looked between them both and raised an eyebrow at Tony.

“We can all go.”

“Barnes and I can handle it.” Bucky flicked a piece of hair out of his eyes, glancing boredly over at Steve, contrasted weirdly with his spine still board-stiff. Although, to be fair, he’d stood perfectly still the entire briefing, kinda scarily so.

Natasha looked between them both and raised an eyebrow at Tony.

“We’ll hover over with an extraction tea--”

“I said we could handle it,” Steve interrupted, already fitting his earpiece for the mic.

“And we’re saying there's no reason you can't have backup.” Natasha crossed her arms over her chest, one hip popping out to the side but Steve just glanced up, grabbed his helmet off the bench with an eyebrow cocked and his voice eerily steady.

“Who’s the captain of this team? I give the orders, and you listen to them.” The dark blue gloves pointed a finger that swept from Nat’s stony expression to Tony’s offended-passive one and Bucky didn’t even look up, disinterestedly adjusting the straps across his thighs.

Firm, crystal clear and just this side of too calm, “Barnes and I’ll execute the mission, and you’ll wait until I call the quinjet for a ride home. Understood?”

“Steve--” Tony started.

“Be ready for the drop in five, Barnes.” The helmet slipped over blonde halo and Steve was off, leaving Nat to blink rapidly, look away with a swish of shining red hair. Tony to suck in an exasperated breath and type something onto the wall.

Bucky sighed, smoothing two hands over his hair. “Sorry guys. All the fight he’s got left in him..” A loud snap as metal fingers closed the button on his collar, “—bleeds out in this stuff.”

Natasha tapped her foot, lips pursed and Tony didn’t turn from messing with the screen.

Bucky grabbed another pistol off the table, checking the clip and raising his voice a touch to talk over the snap of metal, “Hover the backup team at ready, Stark.”

Two pairs of eyes flashed to him in various degrees of curiosity and confusion.

“But Rogers said--”

“I know what Rogers said.” Bucky slipped the pistol in a strap against his ribs, straightening his jacket back out with a darker version of the familiar forties commanding voice. “Have the backup team ready.”

“You ready?” The shout over the blasting cold air made Steve glance over, take quick note of what he could see of Bucky’s arsenal. Definitely enough. Although Buck could go in with a stick and probably still take down the whole site one-handed.

He was already poised to jump, graceful fluidity to perfectly toned muscles, muscles that’d seen more time in the gym than their bed lately. Muscles carved back towards that efficiency they’d had months ago and every ounce of hard training Steve’d thought he’d been doing lately? Buck spent double.

But they were doing this mission together, because Steve’d show Bucky that they were still better as a team, starting with this goddamned quinjet hatch.

Only a couple more seconds until the drop, and Steve wasn’t opposed to the idea of holding hands for it. Especially considering that Bucky’d died once from a fall like this. And he had the audacity to ask if Steve was ready?

“Shouldn’t I be the one asking that?” Steve shot back, tightening the strap under his chin. Bucky tipped his head with an amused snort, then he was disappearing in a flash of black and Steve cursed, launching over the edge of the jet after him.

“Do I bother asking?” Tony sighed and Natasha pressed the button to close the hatch, shaking her head once.
“Y’know, I did see Steve use a parachute once, back on that mission we met Thor?”

“What the hell happened? And when did he get Barnes to join the stupid suicidal plane jumps?”

“Isn’t that the question,” Natasha replied dryly.

Jumping outta tall glass structures was admittedly a bad idea and even Steve knew that, but that didn’t stop him from crashing out the window of the tallest guard tower with three bulky inmates in tow.

Slamming into the ground made him groan, and it took a second and a half to get up and the first thing he did was look around for Buck.

Only Bucky was already landed, gracefully artfully beside him in a crouch for a half-second then he was off, firing two shots into the shadows only to have...four? bodies fall off the outer wall and. That didn’t even make sense.

Steve was watching Bucky with the curious tilt of his head a second too long, like always, and the pistol whip to the back of the head didn’t feel fucking good at all. He whipped around to retaliate, just in time to see a pile of glinting knives and ammoleless pistols jump him at once.

Fucking great.

Bucky took out another twenty Steve hadn’t even seen by the time it took him to roll out from under the mob, then Bucky was taking out his crowd with a couple of really well placed shots and Steve was forcing himself not to growl in frustration.

Not exactly what he’d pictured when he’d said work together.

Fine. He’d go find another mob, take that one out on his own.

It it was gonna be like that.

Steve rolled underneath the swinging arm of the closest jumpsuit, whipping around to drive his shield between orange shoulder blades and there was another fallen one and Bucky didn’t make a sound, slipping past with disinterested eyes and Steve huffed beneath his helmet, gritting his teeth as he started for the next one.

Never good enough, he was never good enough. Everything he did.

He was small, then he was sick, then he was both and Buck never looked at him as an equal, just someone to pull outta alleys, to help. On the better days, a good person to look up to, somehow, and even that was never level with Steve’s eyes.

He wanted Steve outta the fight, always had. Asked him to stay behind, collect scrap metal, anything to keep Buck from worrying but Steve never wanted Buck to keep him safe, he wanted to prove himself stronger, strong like Buck was.

“What the fuck is wrong with you?” Pink mouth snapped, frustrated growl following as Bucky shoved long hair aside, stalking over to snatch his knife back from the fallen body, glare in Steve’s direction and he was off again, hurling over broken concrete to land atop another snarling prisoner and Steve sucked in a breath, uniform cutting into his neck.

Another snarl to the left and Steve flung his shield, ricocheting off in the opposite direction as the man fell and he lifted an arm to retrieve it, a hollow clank as metal snatched it from the air and it wasn’t fair, Bucky was training so fucking much these days Steve could barely keep up.

An exasperated sound as Buck tossed the shield back, mouth twisting into a sneer as he called out, like Steve didn’t fucking see it coming,

“Heads up, Captain!”

The shield slammed his wrists as he practically dove to catch it and Steve just managed not to throw it back pissily.

“Thanks, Sarge,” he bit back instead and Bucky snorted, turning to sprint away again and it wasn’t fucking fair.

Four fallen prisoners later and Steve was just more pissed, snapping heads right and left only there were a lot and he’d already been knifed twice. A huffed, how are there more of you into the mic and of course, who came to aid, fucking Barnes.

He hopped down into the pit beside Steve, taking out three in one swing, discontented scorn replacing long-past worry,

“You even fucking trying?”

“Sorry we’re not all trained-fucking-assassins,” Steve shot back and Bucky threw his head back to laugh at that one, smile still on his lips as he shook his head, ripped the arm off a baddie to swing at another’s head.

“Sure tried though, huh?” Buck huffed, sparing a look to sweep his gaze up and down Steve’s body and after everything they’d fought over for the past fucking month this was the one thing Steve couldn’t fucking let go.

Knocking out everything in proximity with a circle-toss and a series of angered punches he finally fought his way to Buck’s side again, shoved the closest jumpsuit with a boot to the sternum and just managed not to shove Bucky’s next.

Didn’t grab his arm, just stalked up close enough to bump their chests, glare down at defiant eyes, because this was fucking uncalled for, let alone on the battlefield.

“I jumped into that fucking science experiment, volunteered my body to science because it was the only way to get in the fight,” Steve hissed and Bucky’s eyes rolled. Steve bumped into him again, whipping off his helmet so Bucky could see him properly glare. Crystal eyes were paying attention now.

“--to prove that I was good enough. And maybe if I could do something good with it, save the world, I’d see myself differently in the mirror. Come to terms that I didn't need to shoot up with a serum to prove myself to anyone. Or maybe, hell, even somethin’ as simple as you wouldn't look at me that way.”
“Steve, this really the time?” Bucky sighed, cocky-asshole-ness barely dropped. Steve reached up, yanking Bucky’s comm outta his ear, and plowed right on.

“But it didn’t, even that was a mistake, apparently the most perfect body on earth wasn’t good enough for you. And when I realized that I finally saw it wasn’t my bony elbows or ragged lungs, it was me you’d never want. I’d thought you never would, never let myself get past hoping.”

“Steve.”

He remembered. Remembered the dull hope that maybe, just maybe, Bucky might...might see him as worthy. Might see him as more than some sickly kid. Might respect him enough to see his insides, see how much he loved Bucky. How he’d sacrifice the damn world for him.

The look on Bucky’s face now was nothing like the way he’d looked, that day Steve’d pulled him outta the fire, saved him from Zola’s torture table -

Steve was the sun and Bucky’d lived in nothing but Night for centuries

- and maybe he hadn’t saved him later but he had that time and it’d still meant nothing.

It meant nothing because Bucky’d fallen, Bucky’d left him anyways.

“Steve?” A hand pressed to his chest, bitter edging into fear and Steve’s vision was swimming but he didn’t know if that was tears or dizziness. He’d started only eating when Bucky did. It wasn’t faring so well for either of them. Turned out Buck was eating a lot less than even Steve’d thought.

“And then I lost you,” he breathed and the fingers against his heart curled. “...and I couldn't help but wonder if I owed it to you to tell you I’d been in love with you my entire life.”

His throat choked on cotton and Steve shut his eyes before they spilled over, voice scratchy and haunted now. “Do you think I owed it to you?”

Something was removed from his hands and Steve leaned forward, let Buck hold him up as he fought for his breath back.

“Stark? Look, Steve’s not okay, send the quinje--”

Bucky made a startled sound as Steve ripped the comm back, tossed it at the ground but fuck that, he needed to talk to Bucky right now.

He had to battle his tongue a few times before he managed to choke out the next words, to Bucky’s wide eyes and hurt, twisted mouth.

“The next time I see you, seventy years later? You didn't even know who I was. Nothing could've hurt worse than that. I didn't matter enough to look at twice and I sunk so fucking hard that day, that's when it all hit me. Not just you, but my entire life, how fucking bad that day, I'm still not enough.”

“Steve, hey, we can talk about it at the apartm--”

“But I didn't have to face it, any of it, because all I had to do was find you and for months, a year, you were the only thing that mattered and I gave you everything I could and it still wasn't enough. I'm still not enough.”

“St--”
Bucky’s protest cut off as his eyes suddenly flicked over Steve’s shoulder, then the world tipped sideways as he was shoved aside, hard enough to land in the dust and come up coughing, just in time to see Bucky behead another enemy with one of those bloody knives.

And spin back to him with that stunning grace, eyebrows knit in pissiness and worry again and Steve spit out the dust in his mouth, huffing because of-fucking-course Bucky was still trying to save him.

He started slower this time, a single step forward because he didn’t trust himself to walk all the way to Bucky without falling to his knees; words haunted, dark as the circles under both their eyes.

“I train too rough, I run too hard, I mess myself up trying to be good enough for this legend, this thing I could never measure up to,” Steve started and Bucky’s gaze flickered, leveling with a tilt of his head like he couldn’t figure out if Steve meant himself or the Winter Soldier as the legend and honestly, the hell if he knew the answer anymore.

The mouth that’d spit and curse words in and against Steve’s name for his whole life, the mouth that’d kissed his heart and bit his words in half and snarled when Steve tried reaching once more.

Just pursed now, studying Steve from the distance between them and Steve lifted his hands, gesturing shallowly at his chest and trying not to let his voice choke up.

“Well, I realized that superhero, that suit, wasn’t someone you wanted me to be.” Didn’t think Captain America would be the one to kill my best friend. But they were supposed to be Better. Fixed. Working past it. All the past progress? And what’d it done?

“So I changed, I tried, I fucking quit for you and it still wasn’t enough.” Bucky flinched as Steve pointed a finger at him and once, months ago when Steve’d reached for a high-five Bucky’d flinched then too because he’d thought Steve was gonna hit him and even that, they hadn’t even come past that and it was so far down on the radar now Steve didn’t stop to correct, let alone beat the shit outta punching bags in anger. There was too much and Bucky wouldn’t meet his eyes.

“I’m still not enough,” Steve whispered and the clamor in the background was loud but Bucky’s shoulders curled in and Steve knew he heard him anyways. “You still can’t tell me you love me, let alone since when. Or why. Anything about it, you can’t speak a single word when I’ve given you everything.”

“Stevie,” Bucky whispered softly and Steve shook his head. Not anymore.

“This is a long and fucking lonely one-way street, Buck.”

The quinjet landed loudly behind them. Bucky’s hair blew back with the wind of it, crystal eyes studying Steve now and Steve’d seen so much in them. Seen how much Bucky needed him. Felt it, in hands so desperate and terrified they broke his bones.

Bucky offered a hand to pull him aboard. Steve walked past him and only had to catch himself against the wall a few times.

Natasha and Stark rounded up the hostages, they were all but saved anyways. Romanoff rounded up a dozen knives from foreheads too, brought em back in a little pile that Bucky waved aside for the armory.

The jet started up its engines.

Bucky stood with his arms crossed, crystal trained unapologetically on Steve.
Steve leaned back against the wall and tipped his head down, eyes shutting in pain. He couldn’t even manage a simple mission.

There was nothing left to do.

~~~

They were supposed to be planning a wedding. No one’d bothered asking, mentioning it at all in the past few weeks. What was the point, when they did nothing but fight?

They were supposed to be married. Steve wanted to marry him. And all they did was break each other deeper.

It just hurt so bad. He couldn’t turn and look over at Steve without this terrible, sinking pain and. And he couldn’t take that anymore.

He’d been in pain this bad before. And if he’d learned nothing else from those godawful demons, Hydra’d taught him one useful thing.

Bucky knew how to make the pain go away.

There were only two ways, really. Either he could turn heel and grovel, please his captors enough to make it stop--

Or he could detach himself entirely. Remove his mind from his body and leave Steve and--

He couldn’t leave Steve. He’d go through hell and back and flames and fire and ashes but nothing in this godforsaken world could make him leave Steve Rogers of his own will.

Even when he should.

So that left option A, and it’d been so long between them anyways, maybe he could just fix it for a night--

The look of surprise Steve gave him as Bucky sat down on the couch beside him hurt, but it’d all go away soon. A hand to that pretty cheek and Steve clicked off the TV, scooted to look at Bucky properly.

Just in time for Bucky to sink to his knees in front of the couch.

Kneeling, between Steve’s legs but it wasn’t even about that yet, just once more kneeling at his only altar.

**

“I’m so sorry,” Bucky whispered and Steve melted, warm touch to the edges of Bucky’s face, smoothing fingers sorrowfully back through his hair and Bucky didn’t want to think about that, about any of it. He just wanted to stop hurting.

“Let me make it up to you.” A little less soft, running both hands up Steve’s thighs, surprised muscles twitching beneath his palms. Steve’s breath caught and Bucky scooted forward on his knees, tugging closer with hard hands on hips.

He let go of Steve’s hips the moment they were closer - skin was too soft, too much give, Bucky’d sink right through and it was irrational to think but he could feel the black’n’blue he’d left there--
“Buck,” Steve breathed, and Bucky shook his head, clearing his stupid fucking brain because he had to do this, had to make the pain go away because if he just made Steve happy for a moment--

“Baby,” sweet murmur as Bucky leaned up, pressed his mouth to Steve’s sternum, cotton against his lips that didn’t feel anything like a kiss, fingers swiftly untying sweats to pull down muscular thighs.

“Bucky, you sure?” Steve pressed, but his voice was already breathy and Bucky was Being Good, stroking up thighs again to dip fingertips under the edge of blue boxers. Steve’s breathing picked up but so did his hands, fingers wrapping around Bucky’s wrists to halt his movements, burning gaze telling him to look up.

Bucky didn’t look up. Steve had his hands, sure, but Bucky could still move, dropping to mouth the bulge under fabric and the sound Steve made was like being choked.

He knew exactly what Steve being choked sounded like.

Bucky closed his eyes, nosing up to Steve’s waistband because he’d strip Steve with his goddamned teeth if he had to.

“B-b…” One of Steve’s wrists let go to grab a handful of Bucky’s hair and yes, good, that meant he was doing it right. “Buck, gotta...g-gotta tell me you want this,” sweet words gasped and Bucky sucked in a breath, deflating to press his forehead into Steve’s stomach.

“Пожалуйста,” he mumbled, twisting his other wrist free and finally getting a grip on boxers, tugging those down carefully but too quick for Steve to make him stop again. A soft gasp at the cold air and Bucky pressed his mouth to the inside of Steve’s knee, sinking careful, gentle fingers into white inner thighs.

“Buck, still haven’t said…” the shaky voice insisted and Bucky had to take his hands off Steve to keep from grabbing him harder, kissing up his bare leg instead.

"Пожалуйста любимая.” More desperate that time, and his head was spinning a little but Steve’s hand held him steady and he knew better, knew this was Better, he’d asked nicely and they should just let him-- “Wh-what are you saying?” Confused and demanding, the hand in Bucky’s hair tangling and tugging upwards to force Bucky’s eyes up and that, that part he knew fucking well.

The snap of his head made him blink, thoughts clear and....his instructions weren’t matching his tongue. Respond in that spoken to. No, no, he’d messed up. He could fix it, maybe, the rough hand in his hair didn’t feel very mean.

“Please,” he corrected, Steve’s face coming into focus before wavering out again. “Please.”

The hands in his hair smoothed to the back of his neck and Bucky’s eyes sunk again, prickling at the edges as he opened his mouth and he was just goddamned grateful Steve was letting him fix this.

The sound Steve made as Bucky took him into his mouth was too much like the ones he’d made That Night but Bucky hollowed out his cheeks and sucked anyways.

He couldn’t breathe and his eyes were watering by the time Steve was gasping, stroking through snakehair like he’d never get Bucky close enough. Last time Bucky’d been weak enough to start something Steve’d seen through him but it’d just been so long.

Steve was weak too. Can we fast forward to when you go down on me?
Bucky was just so sorry.

“B-buck, ooh, Jesus I missed you. God, fuck, missed you baby,” the soft voice murmured and Bucky just curled his fingers and tried not to choke. “You’re so good at this, fuck.”

He could laugh, if he could breathe, but Steve’s hand was tight in his hair and Bucky’s head was swimming and he shouldn’t’ve pulled off for a brief moment, because the senseless words wouldn’t’ve mumbled rough and sarcastic past his lips, “Y’not’xactly m’first.”

Banter, that was regular even in heated times like this and usually he could lick back down Steve and that pretty mouth would pop open and the subjects would fade but he wasn’t fast enough this time, wasn’t pushing Steve high enough yet for the words to slip and suddenly the hand in his hair was stilling.

It took a second for Steve to catch his breath and even then, he sounded nothing but shaky and confused. “What? You’ve...you’ve done this before?”

Bucky had to slide off again to speak, jaw aching and eyes still prickling but if he kept them closed and didn’t look at Steve it’d be fine. Darted out his tongue, swirled another keening noise before answer muffled, mouthing back down, “A’ready talked bout this.”

Another broken sound and Steve’s voice was all distracted, his hands on the back of Bucky’s neck even more so. “Uhm. Mm, no, haven’t.” Pretty blonde tipped against the back of the couch, eyes closed as his hips stuttered and Bucky did his best to shut Steve up but that stupid mouth never knew when to close.

“W-when? In Brooklyn?” Fingers curling against cervical spine and Bucky slid his mouth back up, popping off with a wet sound he forced himself not to cringe at.

“What? No. Them,” he replied distractedly, focusing back on fitting Steve between his lips only rough hands jolted him back, tipping his chin up and forcing him to look at blue eyes that were suddenly a lot less concerned with Bucky’s mouth.

“Them?....Hydra?”

Bucky would roll his eyes but this was supposed to be about getting Better, why was Steve interrupting everything?

Why was Steve looking at him like that?

“...what?” Low and dark now and Bucky didn’t like that tone, didn’t like the way Steve kept forcing his chin up, didn’t want to fucking talk about this. Especially not Right Now, couldn’t they just forget about it, let Bucky’s wet mouth make it all go away--

“Did they….oh my god, Bucky did they--”

Steve was freaking out. Bucky could see it, hear it, feel it. Choking on his own words, eyes watering, cock going soft and no, there were things that had to be done, why did Steve always have to be like this, care too much?

Bucky snapped his head back, free from Steve’s shaking hands, waved one of his own in nonchalance, had to end that conversation right fucking now before it became a Discussion, “Just a couple guards who took advantage of the obedience training. No big deal.”

He dropped back towards Steve’s lap, blinking away the thoughts because he had to finish this, make them both forget for a little while, just needed the pain to stop--

“Stop that.” Steve all but shoved him off, heavy hands on his shoulders hauling him upwards but Bucky made his limbs dead weight, crumbled back to his knees between Steve’s thighs but if he didn’t want Bucky like that then he’d stop, he should’ve known Steve wouldn’t want anyways--

“Why didn’t you tell me?” That rough voice demanded and Bucky kept his eyes down, averted. He didn’t wanna talk about it.

“I did,” Bucky sighed, because he at least had to pretend to be bored. And it wasn’t a lie.

Not the only thing they taught him to do with his mouth.

“I told you they found ways to keep my mouth preoccupied.” The words came out all bitter, but did Steve not remember that conversation? The one where he’d almost broken his own hand after? Wait, that’s right, Bucky’d eventually broken it for him.

Steve was just staring, burning gaze into the top of his head as Bucky traced the pattern of the skin on the inside of Steve’s knee. “I couldn’t handle the goddamned condom, what did you think that meant?”

“Your rubber mouth guard…” confused, hurt trailed and Bucky snorted. That too.

“Yeah. That was part of it.”

“What else? Did they, Did they--” Steve’s voice was all choked, hands frozen and curled fists and Bucky sighed again, he knew what Steve was asking, but no. Thankfully, no.

“Too valuable to risk permanent damage,” he quoted, the first time it’d been brought up and it’d been after he stopped feeling emotions so there’d been no rush of gratitude or relief but now, looking back, it was maybe the one lucky thing about the Winter Soldier.

Only Steve was still staring at him, all hurt and such and Bucky just wanted it to stop hurting.

“You were still my first like that,” Bucky swore, and it was the truth and good news, so maybe Steve’d let him take away the pain now? Shifting forward again, eyes flicking up for a brief second as his fingers slid up white thighs, “Now c’mon, lemme--”

“Stop, Bucky stop.” Serious, scared, shaking head and that wasn’t fair, Steve couldn’t drag him around like that, couldn’t force him to talk but not let him fix anything--

“It’s not that hard to wrap your head around,” Bucky bit because it wasn’t fair, Steve wasn’t-- “You really thought I was in captivity--” sharp cringe at the word, which Bucky would laugh at if it weren’t so goddamned true “--for seventy years without somebody putting their hands on me at some point?”

“Stop, just. Stop.” Steve was shaking his head and he looked like he was gonna be sick and Bucky could do nothing but sneer.

“You don’t want me now?”

“What?”

Bucky scoffed. Just like Steve to play all innocent, huh? That was fine. Bucky could say it nice and plain and clear. No fucking denying it then, right Steve?
“Too damaged, even for you. Shouldda known. I’m contaminated, right?” Tarnished, and Steve was made of gold, who would he be to want-- Bucky shook his head, curled smile on one side of his mouth that had nothing to do with joy. “Not good enough anymore now that you--”

He hadn’t expected the hands on his arms, leather straps grabbing him and hauling him up with a rough shake that had Bucky’s brain rattling and his arm whirring in warning but Steve didn’t pay the slightest mind to Danger, like always, shoving Bucky in place with forceful hands and an even sharper tongue.

“Don’t you dare. I don’t love you any less.” Steve’s grip loosened an inch and Bucky’s shoulders knocked sideways, then scrambling hands were straightening metal again. “I’m pissed you didn’t tell me--”

“Because then it’d’ve been easy right?” A jerk away but Steve wasn’t letting go, tugging closer and he couldn’t take that, turning leering eyes up at Steve from under the veil of snakes that’d fallen in his face, like some rat under interrogation. “Excuse not to start anything. Cause I’m too damaged, used. At least I’ve got stories for my scars, huh?”

“Fucking stop, Bucky, you’re perfect you know that--”

“How do you know that’s not what they said when they put their filthy cocks in my mouth? Huh?” Curled in a snarl instead of broken tears and he spit the words angry, like Steve wasn’t staring at him mortified, like the hands on his body weren’t shocked still, just biting and biting deeper and harder and, “You’re never gonna be able to stop thinking about it. Every time I go down on you you’re picturing me scared and dirty on my knees with no light in my eyes and a burning taste in my throat. It’s ruined it for you. I’m ruined for you. I’m a broken toy, how could anybody ever want--”

The words caught up to him before the anger could.

Frozen, for a millisecond, choking on the next string in his throat and neither of them were moving but Bucky couldn’t breathe, couldn’t see, paused before the edge of the drop and Steve didn’t want him anymore and that was all he had left, that was it, there was absolutely nothing left in his life but Steve’s want for him and that was gone and Bucky was nothing because Steve didn’t want him, no one wanted him and and

Struggling, flash of terror behind crystal and the room was spinning light-headed from closed lungs and his body won, overtook the wild mind and forced his lips to part, gasp in air and then it was all tumbling out like gushing blood from a knife wound,

“Steve. Steve. Stevie Stevie don’t leave me, please don’t leave me don’t leave--”

Blubbering through salty tears and he barely got half a sob out before strong hands were hauling him into Steve’s lap, wrapping around his back safe and protective and Bucky couldn’t survive if Steve left, he couldn’t, not again.

Steve’s neck was slick and warm against his nose, twisting to press a hard, possessive kiss to his temple and Bucky couldn’t do anything but cling, beg, let Steve push long hair out of his face, another warm kiss on the soft spot behind his ear, rough hand clutching the back of his head and just rocking, rocking them back and forth and it was a long time before the broken sounds quieted enough to hear the murmurs Steve kept whispering into the salty air,

_I love you, I love you, I still love you._
Weakness, that’s what ruined him the first time.
That’s what’d ruin him this time.
Bucky was giving away pieces of himself, chopping up to serve on a sunshine platter and he couldn’t do it. He couldn’t keep performing open heart surgery on himself and hope to survive.
Steve was the one who was messed up. Not him.
Steve.
He was exhausted. All the time, this constant wave of nausea. Couldn’t stand up without the world tipping, had to be careful from how dizzy he was getting.
Hadn’t slept yet. Couldn’t afford it.
Couldn’t afford a lot of things, not with the way Steve was looking at him.

But he wasn’t gone, and that was all that mattered, and Bucky could stare out as many windows as he wanted but so long as Steve’s reflection was in the room behind him he wasn’t ever giving up, he couldn’t, this was Steve, this was his everything.

There was so much Steve didn’t know about.
There was always gonna be something else. Bucky could tell him every day he remembered, every moment of the past seventy years and there’d still always be another, something else that’d broken Bucky that Steve didn’t know about.

How was he ever supposed to help Bucky heal when he didn’t have the slightest clue where he’d been hit?

“How was he ever supposed to help Bucky heal when he didn’t have the slightest clue where he’d been hit?

“Can’t you just...comfort him? A good hug can do wonders towards--”

“Look,” Steve interrupted and the other end of the phone line fell silent. “It’s not like he’ll let me wrap him up in blankets, make him a cup of hot chocolate and kiss his forehead. He doesn’t let me anywhere near him when he’s hurting. Honestly, knowing Buck, he never has. He never would.
He’s not the kind of guy you can soothe with a good movie and chocolate. Hell, that’d probably make it worse. He’s the kind that’ll go take a walk barefoot in the snow, chill himself to the bone to make himself numb, he’s not...he’d never let me take care of him like that and I know that, I know it’s not what he wants but goddamn why won’t he let me make footprints next to his in the bitter cold? Let me walk in front and shield the wind? I’m not asking too much, how does he think I’m asking too much?”

“Steve,” Sam started and it took everything in him not to snap back at the tone. “I know you’re trying. But you don’t have to do this alone. You’ve got an entire team--”

“I know. But we’re okay. We are, really, sorry I just. Needed to rant. Nothing to worry about Wilson.”

“You’re both hurting--”

Steve sighed, loudly, watching the shadows shift as the ever-silent ghost slipped into the living room behind him. It didn’t matter that he was on the fire escape, a wall of glass and a door between them, Buck could hear him now and that meant Steve had a whole different road to rant about.

“It’s okay,” he insisted, keeping his back to the windows and pretending not to notice Buck’s presence. “I’m okay. I mean, he can’t say he loves me, but.”

He could feel Buck freeze from here. Steve tapped in, quiet and inattentive as Sam started monologuing again, too busy waiting for the door to slide open.

And then there was a crude paper airplane hitting the back of his neck.

Steve bit his lip to hide the smile because that was just such a Bucky thing to do, scooping the fallen plane from the fire escape floor and unfolding it carefully.

You can’t admit you have PTSD! Scrawled in angry handwriting, perfect to match the furrowed expression as he finally lifted his head to see Bucky standing in the doorway, arms crossed over his chest and so beautiful Steve could choke.

Instead he lifted an eyebrow, holding the phone a centimeter away to mouth very clearly, “I don’t.”

“Why, because you're too scared to say you do?” Bucky hissed, watching Steve’s eyes narrow stubbornly, then the phone was being tossed aside and so much for whatever Sam was saying, apparently bristling at Bucky was too important.

“Really? We’re gonna fight again?” Exasperated, like Bucky was the one acting like a child when Steve was--

Y’know what, he didn’t have to deal with this. Turned on a heel and he’d just walk the fuck away. Got three steps inside the apartment with the security door to the fire escape still wide open and “...fine.” Steve grit behind him and Bucky stopped, chest expanding on an inhale, deflating exhale and he wasn’t walking but he wasn’t gonna turn around either.

“Fine,” he repeated, voice dulled and heart lying at his feet again. “I’ve got PTSD.”

That….was not what he’d expected.

“I’ve got PTSD,” Steve repeated, louder now, like a fight. Like a challenge. To who?

Bucky counted Russian numbers between erratic heartbeats, then this sound came from behind him and it broke, it all broke.
“I have PTSD.” A crumpled whisper and Bucky spun around, staring at Steve standing there alone in the middle of the fire escape while Steve stared at his hands, dead still, wide-eyed, lips barely parted in another whisper, “I have PTSD.”

If it were Bucky, this would be the point he’d fall to the ground, curl up and shake or something, anything because when he broke he broke hard, just proved that yesterday, curled up in Steve’s lap like a child until he was so exhausted from crying he almost fell asleep and he’d been forced to end it then, because he couldn’t sleep, couldn’t miss, and he’d crawled off Steve’s lap and squeezed his hand and ran away, taken a shower for an hour or so and scrubbed himself down until he was pink and when he broke he broke hard but Steve was just standing there staring at his hands like he couldn’t believe the words outta his own mouth and that was the problem in the first place.

He wasn’t gonna crumple up, break down. Steve didn’t do that. Steve wasn’t weak like that. Internalized every ounce of the pain so he didn’t bleed on anyone when newsflash, Bucky was the one who’d made him bleed in the first place.

Haunted eyes flicked up to his and Bucky didn’t move, couldn’t spook Steve, had to wait until watery blue said something first. And when he did, that time, it was exactly what Bucky’d expected.

“God, Bucky, I don't deserve to, I don't deserve--”

The powerstride everyone joked about wasn’t joking or deadly this time, neither were the hands suddenly framing Steve’s face, forcing him to keep his eyes on Bucky, his head up because that’s where it’d always belonged, especially with this.

“You deserve the world,” Bucky corrected. For once, scolding his best friend instead of the Winter Soldier arguing with Captain America because for once, they were just two broken soldiers standing under a Brooklyn sky again. “You fought, same as the rest of us. You died. Your brothers died. You had a family and you woke up to a folder of Howling Commandos deceased reports instead of the support you needed.”

A shaky breath and Bucky slid his thumbs over beautiful cheekbones, just this side of too hard but Steve kept hanging from his every word and Bucky gave him the only thing he could, voice strong as he’d had to make it back in Brooklyn too.

“You have PTSD. It's okay.”

Steve’s eyes closed in worship and Bucky couldn’t, he wasn’t the one made to do any saving.

Gripped the back of Steve’s head tight and pressed their foreheads together, eyes squeezing shut in return, pressure hard enough to make his brain pound but by God, Steve was here and he was okay. He had every right to being fucked up. Every right.

He could say he didn’t see it coming, but the energy between them didn’t fade with the added friction, it only grew hotter and the fire on the horizon was never as far as he wished it.

Steve tipped forward and Bucky tipped up and the distance was too small for it not to have happened and he couldn’t fight it at this point, couldn’t fight Steve when his hands were bunched up in Bucky’s shirt like he was tiny again, not when the cliff ended right there.

Their mouths met like it hadn’t been days, weeks, centuries, fit together so easy Bucky’s knees threatened to give and Steve squeezed him tight and kissed him hard, lips interlocked rough enough to hurt, more desperate than his fisted shirt, than Bucky’s grip on the back of Steve’s neck and he couldn’t think, couldn’t make a single good decision right now because the world was slipping out from under his feet but this wasn’t supposed to shake him, to the core and it was and neither of them dared deepen it because moving meant the other might pull away and he couldn’t breathe but it didn’t matter, reality was long since slipping, just like Bucky into Steve’s arms again.

Somewhere in the back of his head, the briefest thought of how many of their kisses had been tear-stained, salty wet between cracked bloody lips and it wasn’t fair, why was it always them who had to end up miserable?

We won’t end up miserable, Buck.

Buck.

It was only ever Steve who called him that.

His lips were probably bruised, caught between Steve’s and crushed up against pearly teeth but at least his hands weren’t in Bucky’s hair. At least for a moment, he could pretend the seizing in his chest wasn’t from time apart, for a moment he could pretend it was a passionate post-battle kiss, maybe sometime in 44, fire flashing around them and that spinning camera angle from the movies, zooming out from around them and their desperate hands and mangled mouths to the carnage of some European forest, Commandos in the distance and the shell of some building, ashes dancing over their heads and flickering down to land in Steve’s soft white hair, Bucky’s short army cut curling at the edges of his forehead.

Except. Except that was steel under his toes, too-clean smell in the background and his head was heavy, too heavy with Hydra’s reaching red arms. This war was all internalized, shaken battlegrounds and raging fires housed inside two bodies meeting again for the first time in ages but they had to break apart sometime.

Teeth caught just as Bucky began to pull back, like Steve could feel it on him and the tug on his bottom lip as they dragged apart made every nerve ending he had light up but really, oxygen--

They both gasped and Bucky could swear he felt his heart leave his chest through his mouth, somewhere between Steve’s gulp for air and his deflated lungs.

Soft panting, collecting oxygen and their minds again and Bucky was still holding Steve’s neck and the balcony was so quiet now and he could hear the harbor beneath them but it was centuries past and Steve wasn’t saying anything, wasn’t even looking at him, blue eyes on the ground while Bucky searched his expression and was left with absolutely nothing to go from.

He was pretty sure now was the wrong time to say I love you.

Even if he’d ever been planning to.

Which he hadn’t.

Bucky let go of Steve’s neck. Another tiny gasp between beautiful lips and Steve didn’t have asthma but Bucky still knew all the signs of an oncoming attack and fuck if he couldn’t at least save Steve mentally from that since physical didn’t need him anymore and--

He wasn’t gonna think about that. Wasn’t gonna think about any of it because Steve was under his skin. So far away and still in his bloodstream, the very lifeblood--

“C’mon.” His voice was too gruff and Steve was too big to throw under his arm but Bucky tugged him in anyways and. Changed his mind.
Dragged Stevie right down to the floor, pushed with careful hands until long legs folded and that legendary ass was sitting somewhere stable that wouldn’t have them both toppling over the railing.

They hadn’t sat out here yet, which was funny considering how much time they’d spent on fire escapes as kids.

Steve was still staring at the floor, dejected and detrimental to all the fences Bucky’d been putting up and this wasn’t fair, wasn’t fair to either of them really but god knows what was running through Steve’s head right now and maybe Bucky shouldn’t’ve forced the PTSD thing on Steve but he was just so sick of all the lying and hiding and pretending and fuck.

“Stevie.” Bucky reached over, hand cupping Steve’s soft cheek and Steve flinched like Bucky’s fingers were fire. It wasn’t even his metal hand.

“C’nere,” he soothed again, hooking around that strong neck once more, but they were sitting too far away to tip foreheads and that wasn’t the intention anyways, Rogers wasn’t breathing right and that’s what Bucky was here for.

Tipped Steve sideways, right into his lap and how many times had he laid Steve down, normally coughing up a lung or bleeding half-to-death, but there were only a handful of times it’d been like this.

Well, not quite like this. Steve went down easy, staring up blankly at the sky, skull pillowed on Bucky’s thigh, body stretched out and mouth twisted up in that awful dead shape.

There was no pretty swoop to mess with, but Bucky carded his fingers through Steve’s hair anyways. A lot’d changed. Propped against the metal rail instead of a tree this time.

He stroked soft blonde hair and watched flashing blue eyes and waited. And waited.

And eventually it came. The slightest teary eyes before blue closed painfully and Steve finally caved.

Bucky lifted his hand, shifting as Steve rolled over on his side, nose tucked against Bucky’s stomach, fingers coming up to clutch his leg and that, that was what he’d been waiting for. He waited a moment longer, sure Steve was comfortable, then his hand came slowly back down, over the blonde head one more time before palming down Steve’s spine, neck to shoulder blades and down.

He stroked Steve’s back and Steve held on tight enough to bruise but it wasn’t the same way he bruised Steve. Wasn’t the same desperation. Couldn’t be.

Last time, the last time in the woods when it’d all been easy and simple, it was just like. Like a dream now, like it could hardly be the same two people from all the way back in the beginning.

A higher place.

Some sort of heaven, now. They’d been safe and together and that, that dream.

"What’re you thinkin’ about?"

"What?"

"You had this awful look on your face. What were you thinking about?" Bucky asked again, bouncing his leg. Steve sighed, putting the clipboard down and giving Bucky this look.

“You,” Steve responded simply. Like he hadn’t just squashed Bucky’s heart.
“Wow, thanks, so sweet.”

“Well, what happened to you,” he amended and. Bucky looked away. Cleared his throat. What happened to him...Steve was thinking about Zola and the torture and finding Bucky like that and how he hadn’t been able to eat for days and “...oh.” Hoarse. Steve was right there. Too physically close to deny anything.

(It didn’t work like that anymore. They’d already proven that Steve could be inside his body and Bucky’d still deny being in love with him until the day he died.)

“Why won’t you talk about it?” Steve asked him.

Why didn’t they talk about anything?

Bucky wondered, distantly, if Steve was running the same flashback through his head.

He’d taken a long time to answer Steve’s question. Dug his fingers into Steve’s hair, same way he was now, and tried to find the words to tell his best friend that his world was destroyed without making Steve wanna abandon his sorry ass forever.

“There’s nothing to talk about,” he’d finally lied and Steve’d absorbed the blow, better than he did now, better than they both did.

“Why don’t you tell me anything anymore,” Steve’d whined playfully and they’d gotten to flirting, or something, whatever that was back then.

It didn’t go like that anymore.

But funny enough? Turned out Bucky didn’t tell Steve anything anymore in the future either.

”Wish we could just live out here,” Bucky said softly, trees whispering around them and Steve’s warmth radiating at his side.

"I’d miss being able to do my part," Steve told him. And so.

Here they were. Steve still trying to do his part. Bucky wishing. Wishing they could just find some bubble of peace and live in it.

They’d lost so much. Woods like that didn’t even exist anymore, not for them. Maybe not at all.

“Bucky?” Steve whispered.

"This is weird.” Bucky mumbled, running his thumb over the back of Steve’s hand. "I’m supposed to be the one holding you.”

"Grow a foot and then we’ll talk,” Steve muffled back, lips scraping over the back of Bucky’s neck.

“Yeah?” He finally croaked, Brooklyn air feeling dirtier with all the twenty-first century pollution grabbing at his lungs.

"Or you could just stop growing,” Bucky offered and Steve shifted his arms tighter around Bucky’s stomach.

"I thought I did,” he murmured back nonsensically, already drifting off to sleep. Bucky didn’t know the serum all that well yet, but he did know Steve and anything he said in the next ten seconds would be swept under the rug and tied up in confusion of that tired brain and he’d been taking advantage of those ten seconds for his entire life.

“It’s gotta be this way, you and me forever, yeah? Promise me?” Bucky asked and it sounded way too breathy and desperate and it wasn’t something you could say when you were falling asleep alone in a forest with your best friend-newly-realized-crush’s arms around you but Bucky said it anyways because he meant it, goddamn it, and he always had this theory that some subconscious part of Steve’s brain caught all his ten second confessions and stored them somewhere safe that added up to this general feeling of warmth and that was all that mattered anyways.

“G’night Buck,” Steve mumbled back softly, and yet another day safe, words lingering in the air between them and Bucky finally let go, let himself relax into Steve’s arms. He could pretend they could stay here forever anyways.

“G’night Stevie,” he replied and then it’d been dreams, dreams about Steve’s warmth and the stars and the great open sky above them.

“What happened to us?” Steve muffled into his shirt and Bucky scraped sharp fingers over the back of Steve’s neck.

“I dunno pal,” Bucky whispered back. The wind whipped snakes in Bucky’s face and he just closed his eyes. Easier to pretend his hair wasn’t long that way, his arm wasn’t metal. Steve wasn’t fighting tears that’d never come and the docks didn’t smell all wrong.

Tiny shifts in the plates of his fingers, wrist, adjusting to the expansion of Steve’s back when he breathed and the metal sound was the only thing in the silence but the wind. When was the last time he’d been in perfect silence? His arm was loud, every increment at least a whirr and it’d been so long since pure quiet.

Steve always hated the quiet, felt like he was missing things due to his shoddy hearing. That he didn’t have anymore. Maybe it was better this way.

“Tell me a story.”

The words weren’t as muffled and Bucky looked down, hair whipping across his eyes again but he could still see Steve, half rolled against his stomach and half looking up at Bucky, eyes dry as the ground they bled on.

“A story?” Rubbing his thumb from Steve’s temple to his cheekbone, down the side of his nose. Ghosting over his bottom lip and Steve sucked in a breath, eyes widening as he blinked up at Bucky with those beautiful blues--

“How bout I show you one instead?” He drew his hand back and Steve rolled over proper on his back, fingers releasing Bucky’s leg and the slight bruises they’d made beneath layers.

“That sounds ominous,” Steve offered, and Bucky huffed.

“You...sound ominous.”

He’d been meaning to show it to Steve for awhile now. It’d been done for a month or so, but. It just hadn’t been the right time. Honestly, he wasn’t sure if there’d ever be a right time and this still might not be it but it was the closest to okay they’d been in a long time and it had to be now, or maybe never and he. He wanted to give it to Steve.
It was easier than words, anyways. Words used to be his greatest weapon and now they were his greatest enemy.

Because Steve was just waiting, waiting on those three-- Bucky didn’t have any good stories left to tell but this one.

They took Steve’s motorcycle to the tower, and it’d felt like ages since they’d ridden on it together. His arms around Steve’s waist, rumble beneath them and bodies slotted together as the bike whipped down streets. One corner too sharp that Bucky balanced with metal fingers tracing over concrete, then they were upright again and Steve had a smile on his face and the sharp wind gave an excuse for the tears in Bucky’s eyes.

He just. It was a big step. He didn’t even know what Steve would say.

He just needed Steve to know.

This whole mess was his fault anyways, the least he could do was give Steve some little piece of explanation.

The motorcycle cut to a stop, Stark’s downstairs garage, the one where Steve’d confessed and Bucky’d ran away. That wasn’t...that wasn’t the point of this and Bucky didn’t want to think about that because. Maybe it was the point of this and fuck, fuck it--

Steve propped the kickstand down and Bucky grabbed his shoulders before he could move another inch, spun them both halfway and kissed Steve before his head exploded with the screaming.

No noise of surprise, just slight stiffness before Steve melted into it, lips softening and pressing back against Bucky’s, hands sliding up the back of his leather jacket to tangle in his hair.

He could do this forever. God he could kiss Steve for the rest of his life.

It didn’t last long - couldn’t last long, Bucky’s heart was already pounding out of his chest - and as if he wasn’t nervous enough Steve was just looking at him, all soft and hesitant and sweet and Bucky had to look down, tuck a piece of hair behind his ear and breathe slow, force himself not to reach over Steve and start the damn bike right back up again.

“What was that for?” Playful but too careful, Steve was confused of course because kissing hadn’t exactly been a regular thing lately but.

“Just in case.” Bucky threw his leg over the side of the bike, got solid ground under him again that didn’t feel all that solid after all. Steve didn’t move for a moment, looking at him under the strange garage lights with his hair half swooped to the side and the grips of his motorcycle perfect under his palms. And one eyebrow up, like he’d caught exactly what Bucky’s words meant.

“Is this that life changing? That I wouldn’t kiss you again?”

Except Steve wasn’t the one who’d kissed him in the first place, because the last time he’d tried that Bucky’d bitten his head off about it because--

Life changing, was this that life changing? ....maybe.

“Dunno,” lifted shoulders by his ears and it just felt weird, shrugging, extraneous and a waste of energy but Steve’d vitiated everything and. “Just...c’mon. Before I freak and change my mind.”
Bucky tilted his head for the door and Steve practically leapt off his bike, shrugging off his jacket and jogging a step to hold open the door for them both,

“Yeah, yeah let’s definitely go then.”

There were a lot of memories in the elevator, and in the stairwell, but at least in the elevator he could close his eyes and not think about them. All the times they’d raced each other up the stairs, caught up to the other halfway and wrapped arms around waists to laugh and push and kiss and--

Their old apartment at least looked different. Not much, though. Tony was still renovating, walls half painted and nothing in the living room but the one old couch they’d left behind.

Bucky made Steve wait in the hallway, because there was no way in the world he was handing Steve the goddamned painting in the same room where he’d fucked their relationship to hell. Literally.

Breathe in, out. Careful metal compressing around the edge of the canvas, recalibrating to hold it gently and he couldn’t believe it was done, let alone that Steve was about to see months of work, but. Controlled breaths. He could do this.

Steve was practically bouncing on his toes by the time Bucky made it into the hallway, impatient as always.

Kinda froze when he saw what Bucky was holding. Which was funny, because what the hell else was Bucky gonna get from the studio? The note he’d left Steve wasn’t on the floor, which meant Steve had it, or threw it away or something. Hopefully he lit it on fire, the way Hydra’d lit that drawing of Bucky under the tree into flames. It was better that way.

“Okay, you don’t have to like it and I. I don’t know if it’s any good…” Bucky looked back down at the painting in his arms, up at Steve who could only see the blank back of the canvas. Although from the shock on his face, it might as well’ve been the front. “What?”

“Your painting?” Steve breathed, blue all wide and beautiful and chest heaving a little, “You’re done? It….You....”

“It’s for you,” Bucky offered, extending his arms a little in Steve’s direction. Steve took a single step closer, eyes flicking down to the back of the canvas, back to Bucky’s face.

“It’s for me,” he repeated, like he couldn’t believe it. Honestly, Bucky couldn’t quite either.

“Yes.”

“Bucky--”

“Don’t, just. You don’t even know what it is yet! Just. Look at it and then you can decide what you think but. God…I--”

It was a big step. Maybe it was too much. Not even for just right now but ever, in general, maybe Steve wouldn’t like it or wouldn’t get it or maybe he’d be freaked or or

“You know what, I’m not sure I can give this to you.”
“Bucky!”

“I know, I’m sorry, I just.” He looked up and Steve had this look on his face but seriously, he hadn’t seen the painting yet, he’d understand if he had. “It’s too much.”

“Bucky.”

“Steve,” he replied. “It’s….look, I’ll paint you another, something else just. Let me go put this back-”

And then there were two supersoldier hands holding the edges of the canvas, staring right at Bucky’s eyes with that kicked puppy look, that I’m sorry to do this, we had nowhere else to go look that had know-better-than-civilians opening doors to the golden retriever on their doorstep and it may’ve worked on Sam Wilson but Bucky Barnes had spent his entire life combating that look.

“Bucky. Please.”

“Steve, I…” One more glance down and Bucky made up his mind. It was too vulnerable, too honest, they couldn’t handle that on top of everything right now, Steve’d break under the weight of it and everything would blow up and--

“…no. No, I can’t.” Three step backwards and Bucky spun around to go dart back inside the studio--

Only.

Only the painting wasn’t in his hands anymore.

“What the fu--”

Bucky whipped back around, ready to snatch it back because Steve couldn’t just take it, the way he had with all of Bucky’s sketchbooks way back when. Back when Bucky’d chase him around the kitchen for them back, scooping Steve up and making him this indignant ball of gasping giggling rage and that was a unique combination but that was basically little Steve.

Steve used to take his shit all the time, he should’ve seen it coming. But Steve wasn’t little anymore and that certainly wasn’t a fucking sketch. That was a four foot wide painting.

Steve was staring.

Too late now.

Steve was holding the canvas in outstretched arms, just looking at it and he hadn’t looked at Bucky once, didn’t look like he was gonna look anywhere but that canvas again.

They both stood frozen. He sure as hell wasn’t gonna say anything until Steve did.

It could’ve been years that they stood there, Bucky really didn’t know. He was good at standing in place forever. Toy Soldier didn’t need to count time, just stand still so the straps on his chest head arms feet didn’t electrocute.

Steve moved first. An increment, shift of a shoulder muscle, then he was drifting into the living room and Bucky was following silently, swinging out to the side so he could keep watching Steve’s face but it didn’t change a bit, didn’t leave the painting for a single moment.

Kept holding the canvas, carried it all the way to the couch and sunk down slow and careful, still not saying anything, just looking at it. He might as well sit down too, especially if Steve wasn’t planning on talking.

Stevie looked a little overwhelmed. Maybe he was shellshocked out of words. Whatever it was, Bucky was gonna sit right here beside him. Clasp his hands and wait.

And okay, maybe straighten up to peer over Steve’s shoulder, make sure it was the right painting and all.

It was.

xx

Part of him wanted to talk about it, wanted to tell Steve how there was the shape of an eagle in the translucent wings, wanted to complain about how long it took to do the tiny individual faded lights on the Brooklyn bridge, wanted to tell Steve that his body type was fucking hard to paint, wanted to point out Peggy and Nat and the Commandos in the drawings in the background, wanted to tell Steve why he’d drawn himself without the muscle mass he had now, wanted to explain every thought and detail that went into the damn thing and the other part of him kinda wanted to light it on fire and blindfold Steve for ever looking at it, so.

He kept his mouth shut.

So did Steve.

His eyes, though.

It was a long time before he did, but time passed and Bucky’s hands squeezed each other tighter and finally, finally, another tiny shift and Steve was setting the painting carefully down on the coffee table.

It was so empty in here.

Steve’s hands were shaking a little when he brought them back to his lap and it was time to finally dare a glance at his face again, see what it said now.

Another moment and half and Steve’s gaze finally left the painting, flicked up to Bucky’s.
There were tears in his eyes.

“Oh no, shhh, don’t cry Stevie—” It was an automatic response because really, it made plenty of sense that there were tears in his eye but the knee-gut reaction for Steve Crying was Bucky reaching to soothe and that was just what he did, even though he was the reason Steve was crying again.

He managed to stop his reaching hands seconds before they cupped Steve’s cheeks but it didn’t matter, Steve was leaning forward before he could touch anyways.

Bucky blinked and Steve wrapped both arms around his torso, burying his nose against Bucky’s shoulder. Oh.

Fucking sap.

For once, Bucky didn’t have to think about it at all. Didn’t have to think about anything. He just closed his eyes, tipped his head, wrapped his arms around his Steve’s shoulders, and hugged his best friend back.

_How can I? You’re taking all the stupid with you._

_You’re a punk._

And Steve in his arms, hugging his best friend tight because he never wanted to let go and he had no idea how long it’d be before he saw Steve again and it could be never and Bucky knew that, knew this could be the end and the dates behind them were the furthest thing from his mind, the only thing that counted was that Steve was being an idiot and Bucky might never get to hug that idiot again, he was damn well gonna hug him now.

_Jerk._

It wasn’t the way they hugged now, not quite. This was closer, deeper. Closed eyes and slight rock.

That and Bucky was pretty sure neither of them’d had teary eyes when they pulled back that night in Queens.

“Bu-cky,” Steve broke and Bucky shook his head, nine kinds of fond and exasperation because Steve was acting like he didn’t know but. Of course. Of course he meant it every time he called Steve angel.

He didn’t wanna talk, not about this, not right now. He just wanted Steve’s arms wrapped around him. Wanted to forget for a moment how broken they were, how anything Steve was thinking would have to be shattered the moment the reality outside that door hit them again and Bucky just wanted to live in this pretend moment of okay a little longer.

It didn’t take much to push Steve down on the couch, lay him out on his back and that blonde head tipped up to look at him so easy, let Bucky do whatever he wanted with this stupid, terrible trust that Bucky’d abused and damaged and hurt in the room just down that hallway but for a moment, they could pretend it’d never happened.

They could pretend Bucky hadn’t shattered Steve’s bones and opened his own chest, carved himself deep enough for Steve to see how desperate and hurting he was.

They could pretend.

Couch cushions against his back instead of under their heads, pulling Steve up on one side so they could face each other, metal arm curling around Steve’s back to tug him close, warm air ghosting over Bucky’s nose and strong bicep fitting around his back too, over scars that Steve’d never shied from, not once.

So here they were, legs tangled up and eyes searching eyes through shadows, couch cushions the only other thing to see or feel. Clutching tight, both too afraid to ever let go.

“Bucky,” Steve breathed again and now would be another time to say it, wouldn’t it? I love you.

“Just hold me,” Bucky whispered, and Steve, for once in his godforsaken life, listened.

Precious blue eyes watching him, memorizing every inch of his face but stuck on coming back to Bucky’s gaze, their eyes meeting again over and over and lingering, forever lingering. Bucky was counting the dark blue streaks through light blue for the seventieth time in his life when long eyelashes interrupted, fluttering eyelids shut and Steve was out just like that, asleep in his arms.

He couldn’t quite believe that Steve still, after everything, felt safe enough to fall asleep in Bucky’s arms.

But here they were.

Two little kids tangled up on the couch, Stevie already asleep when the rattling lock in the door creaked open.

Bucky quickly squeezed his eyes shut, holding his breath and pretending he hadn’t been staying awake just to watch Steve sleep. He had a feeling Sarah always knew anyways.

Quiet high-heeled tiptoes over to the couch, that one wooden board creaking as always, the soft intake of breath at the sight of them. Bucky understood.

Then came the blanket, the worn one from the closet even when it wasn’t that cold, draped over their tangled bodies with loving, strong hands that did nothing but care for people day and night and Bucky always felt a little guilty when Sarah had her workload doubled like this, two rowdy boys to look after.

He’d left her dinner on the windowsill though, hopefully that’d make up for some of it.

The next part was his favorite, even if he’d never told Steve.

The two soft kisses, one atop Steve’s head, a slight pause and the huff of amusement - she definitely knew he was awake - then there was the kiss on his head too.

Bucky snuggled Steve closer, flush against his chest and the tiny fist bunched by Steve’s cheek made him look so soft and cute and.

He opened his eyes again. Steve’s hands weren’t up by his face, they were on Bucky’s back. There was no blanket from Sarah, but. That spot on Bucky’s head was warm and he could pretend for a moment - might as well, this was all pretending anyways - that she was here, left them both with a kiss upon the head like always.

A creak at the door and this time, now, Bucky’s reaction wasn’t to shut his eyes in fear of being caught out, it was an entire body of taut muscle as his free hand flew to the edge of his belt, knife handle in grip.

It wasn’t Sarah. It was Tony and Sam.
They all made eye contact and Tony’s mouth was already open to speak when Bucky’s hand slowly, silently slid across his throat in the most clearly, terrifyingly intense gesture to the intruders that if they so much as scuffed a shoe--

They may not be able to read him like Steve, but a blind man could read the glare to match, wake Steve up and they will never find your body.

Both of Sam’s hands went up in surrender, already backing out of the room. Then grabbing the back of Tony’s shirt and tugging him with because Stark was still gaping.

To be fair, the last time anyone’d seen them they’d been fighting like pack dogs and now they were wrapped around each other on their old couch with Bucky’s painting a foot away.

It wasn’t gonna fit on the motorcycle to ride home, he should’ve thought of that.

Steve blinked groggily awake a few hours later and that time, Bucky pretended he’d been sleeping too. He didn’t, of course, not for a single moment.

That familiar annoyed groan as Steve wiggled around in his arms until Bucky loosened his grip, muscles shifting under skin as Steve rolled onto his back and stretched out his arms, blinking back awake and just about knocking the painting off the coffee table.

It would’ve survived the fall, but Steve freaked and basically fell off the couch trying to catch it anyways.

The quiet moment shattered somewhere between all that, slipped from fingers before he could kiss it goodbye and it was just was well.

“We’ll have to leave your bike here, take a cab back if we wanna fit that.”

Steve looked up, following Bucky’s gaze to the painting in his hands and back up to the couch, nine kinds of solemn again.

“Bucky, I--”

“We don’t have to talk about it. It’s okay.” The couch creaked as he stood and Bucky offered Steve a slight smile, enough to get him up on his feet, moving for the door. He didn’t want to be on this godforsaken floor any longer than they had to.

It was kinda shocking Stark didn’t come barreling down to the lobby to insist they take one of his cars and a trusted chauffeur, but Bucky’s slice throat motion from earlier must’ve stuck, and they piled both sets of broad shoulders and the painting in the back of a taxi, then Bucky gave the driver the address and they both fell back into amiable silence, painting propped against the door and Steve’s leg pressed against his own.

Dawn was breaking on the horizon, which meant maybe they’d taken longer than Bucky’d thought but he wouldn’t’ve changed that moment for anything.

Their shoulders bumped at every turn and it kept sending sparks of warmth up Bucky’s scars, down his spine. The world whipped by outside, colors streaks flurry of noise. They didn’t belong here.

The taxicab driver had the radio on, playing low in background. Of all the twenty-first century songs out there, the man was bobbing his head along to one that Bucky actually knew.

A long way from the playground--
I have loved you since we were eighteen, long before we both thought the same thing.

Steve glanced over at him, signaled toward the radio. Bucky rolled his lips in and nodded. He heard it too.

Blue lit up a little, tiny curl of a smile as their shoulders bumped.

And the painting stared at them both, singing right along with the song because that, just like the night in the studio, was proof.

Bucky’d been lying.

And there was a chance Steve saw it now.

Or. Well. More than a chance.

“Does that look centered to you?”

“You’re the one with all the artistic talent.”

“Bucky, we are hanging your painting right now.”

“Okay. Fine. Little to the left.”

Steve’s tongue stuck out the corner of his mouth as he marked the spot on the wall with his drafting pencil and Bucky sighed, crossing his arms loosely over his chest, tapping his foot once.

“You’re so impatient get up here and do it yourself.”

“Uh-uh. I still don’t know why you wanna hang it centered over the bed--”

“Most visibility, which is something you should appreciate.”

“I’d appreciate it hanging in, like, a closet.”

Steve shook his head, tucking the pencil back behind his ear to situate the wire they’d mounted to the back, lining it up against the hook he tapped into the wall with the heel of his hand.

Then it was finally done and they could move on, never have to talk about it again because Steve knew now and that was all that mattered. It’d be hard to forget though, with the proof of everything hanging right there in the middle of the wall. Over his head when he slept.

“It’s not straight,” Bucky pointed out and Steve huffed, tipping one corner higher.

“You’re not straight,” he mumbled back and Bucky rolled his eyes, taking a half-step backwards for the door.

“I’ll go make breakfa--”

“Wait, wait, hold on.” Steve gestured wildly at him to stop, stumbling over the mattress to hop down hurriedly. Bucky crossed his arms over his chest, inching another step or two towards the door - he’d avoided conversation so far, he’d like to keep it that way.

“Buck.”

“Steve,” he replied stubbornly, lifting his chin. Steve just shook his head affectionately, striding up to stop right in front of him and this, why did they have to do this.

“Bucky,” started again, in That Voice, glancing between the painting and Bucky’s face and it just. Another step backwards. Steve caught on that time, eyes widening in surprise. One last glance at the painting, and a step forward to close the distance Bucky kept making.

“I….you do.” It was more to himself than Bucky, like he was realizing something aloud for the first time.

Shit.

Two steps backwards and Bucky’s back hit the door and Steve followed him right there, two slow menacing steps that probably weren’t supposed to be terrifying but they were.

“You do,” Steve said again and this time there was confidence in it and Bucky was fucked. He opened his mouth to say something, anything, but Steve’s hand shot up before he could make a sound and there was suddenly a warm palm over his mouth, the mask he’d always been asking for and never gotten, a shot of warmth down his spine then Steve opened his mouth and the warm shutdown to cold so fast--

“You do. You love me.” And Steve was smiling, the tiniest curve of awe and serenity and excitement all wrapped into one. “You always have.”

Bucky blinked.

Steve shook his head once, sucked in a deep breath, steeling himself, then he was even closer, pinning Bucky to the door with those broad shoulders blocking the world and words raining down like thunderstorm hail, hand still over Bucky’s mouth to keep him from interrupting words that’d been so long in coming and always silenced just before they could be spoken,

“I'm done being insecure about it, not when it's been there my whole life. I asked you why you were fighting, you said I knew. It was that kind of love - you were in love with me - all the way back then.” The fingers over his mouth fluttered and the smile on Steve’s face was only growing, more hopeful and sure and Bucky would sink to the floor if Steve’s hand wasn’t pressing his head into solid wood. “In Brooklyn, in the war….that's what you told Peggy, isn't it?”

His heart was gonna pound right outta his chest, explode in this bloody mess.

“That you're in love with me. That you always have been.”

Steve’s hand was still over his mouth. Lifted cybernetic removed it slowly, peeling Steve’s fingers away to drop back by his side.

His shallow grave unearthed.

Here he stood, strange look on his face. A pause, and the iced jaw unhinged,

”How's something warm for breakfast?” Steady. So much steadier than his hands or his chest. Steady and dead as his eyes.

Steve gaped at him.

you’re my best friend.

Toy soldiers bury their hearts from the Rays of Sunshine that threaten burning alive.
The silence was crushing Steve's shoulders, made them weak and Bucky took advantage of that, slipping silently underneath Steve's arm and he didn't know if he was escaping to the kitchen or if his feet would take him all the way to Russia in their fear of eternal warmth.

He was faster than Steve, always had been. Light on his feet, made himself look big in front of all those bullies when he could slip unnoticed and brutally fast during the war, use slightness to his advantage in a way Steve'd never understood.

But Steve understood him now.

From that night in the studio when Bucky finally let him see how deep this thing went to the look on his face now --

Steve caught him.

Literally, too, rough hand grabbing his shoulder before he could slip into the shadows. Slamming him back into the door, hard this time, realization splashing a second tidal wave that even Bucky swept under,

"Fucking talk to me," Steve demanded and Bucky almost laughed. Cap'n's orders. He'd taken bullets against those orders before and he'd do it again. Anything to keep Stevie safe.

Now all that stubborn and righteousness was furrowed in that angry-orders face, Even if you had, would you have told me? Or would you've compartmentalized that too? Steve's arms were tight, all but trembling as he pinned one on the wall beside Bucky's head, let the other hand curl over Bucky's chest, about to tear the heart out himself if Buck didn't offer it up.

"I know, what's the point in hiding it anymore?"

Because it was the last piece of secret he had. Last piece of him. The last thing to hold onto so he knew he wasn't done and gone. The last thing he'd said that meant the world, the last time he'd been painfully, simply honest. And it'd lose every bit of the bite it held in his heart if Steve knew too. If he said it out loud then it wouldn't wind him in its tendrils anymore. If he threw it away it proved what it meant and how much it wasn’t the way it was now.

What Peggy’d told him. And now you get to love him last.

If he said it aloud, it'd be. That’d be it, that’d be the darkest, deepest part of him exposed.

“Buck.” Steve was looking at him with that deep blue blue, rising light from the window catching flecks and reflecting long lashes across his cheeks in stripes like blinds in a motel room, nickname sparking off his tongue like it was still the easiest thing to say in the world.

If he said it, it’d be powerless, slip to nothing. Thrown away just like he was, just like Steve did, leaving him down there in the cold snow when Bucky was so sure Steve’d come for him, so sure his best friend would never leave him there and he’d been wrong. Steve left him there, staring at the sky with the snow bloody and his arm somewhere in his peripherals and snow floating down on his face while all he thought about was the way ice crystals clung to Steve’s long pretty eyelashes.

One single blink dislodging white flakes, crystal fogged and he looked up at blue, glassy-eyed.

“I loved him first,” Bucky told him, echoing hollow in the drifting snow.

The first time he’d said it it’d been a grenade.
Now the shrapnel carved out. He wouldn’t be able to count the places he was bleeding if he knew all the Russian numbers in the world.

It didn’t take much to shove Steve backwards, just metal on that pounding chest, fast as he could so the vibrations didn’t pick up how fast Steve’s heart was beating but they did anyways and Bucky was gonna be sick.

Steve reached for him, knee-jerk reaction to tug him back in with those hands but Bucky shoved free and then he was gone, hair flying behind him and feet barely touching the ground, disappearing before he could be nailed to the damn door with bloody holes in his hands.

A dull note of surprise that he skidded to a stop before he hit Russia, but he didn’t have shoes or weapons or a functioning mind so the slamming bathroom door was as good as it was gonna get.

It wasn’t just surprise that hit him as he lifted his head, looked up from where he was gripping the porcelain counter, breathing heavy enough to call it panting, hair hanging in his face as his eyes finally met their own in the reflecting glass.

He didn’t recognize himself for a half-second, the instantaneous fear of how did someone get in here -- or more accurately, the heart stopping fear of there’s a terrifying murderer in the bathroom -- before he realized it was just a mirror and wasn’t that ironic, that he managed to terrify himself, heart pounding even faster now as he quickly looked away, hand clutching his chest as he tried to breathe and found that wasn’t a feasible option.

Panic attack, some rational part of his brain warned but the rest of his brain was too busy flashing the image of that terrifying man in the mirror behind his eyes again and again and it’d looked like a demon, a monster, something straight from hell and nothing like the fading ghost he’d been convincing himself he was.

That wasn’t translucent and floating, that was the undead, dark circles and muscle mass thick and black strings of hair and a snarl on a mouth that never could’ve curled in that sweet Brooklyn Boy smile, not that mouth, not that man.

And it was the strangest thing, for just a moment, to feel like himself again, to feel like the man back in the war, detached from this Winter Soldier he’d become but the man in the mirror he’d just seen, that monster wasn’t just the Winter Soldier, it was everything before and after, it was the conglomeration of his past and the future with that creature they’d made of him, the compilation of the truth when you took a weapon and a ghost and a zombie and stuffed it full of memories and laid it out to bake in the burning sunlight for too long.

For the briefest of moments, he could simply be Sergeant Bucky Barnes in a tent in Europe, having woken from a nightmare with that terrifying monster flashing in his head, the image of that awful thing that couldn’t possibly be him, that cyborg killer, part robot and steel and ice and part twisted mutilated human and that’s what was left of him, having given that up.

Having given up the only human piece left that was only his, just his and the only other person in the world who’d known was Peg and now it wasn’t his anymore, he didn’t get to hold that phrase to his heart. The only time he’d ever admitted that he loved Steve out loud. Everything Steve wanted to hear, now he knew that Bucky’d been able to say it once, that he’d shouted it once, that he’d screamed it from his core and now he couldn’t even whisper it, couldn’t even part his lips around the words, that’d been the one time and it wasn’t his anymore.

He was ripped open. Split at the seams. No wonder he’d been able to detach himself, be the simple burdened Sergeant instead of the conglomerative mess. He’d shattered into pieces, cracks in the past and his armor dragging the Sergeant screaming away from the thing he’d become, Steve’s righthand ripped from the clutches of his fiancé, Winter Soldier torn from the schoolboy who feigned sleep while Sarah kissed his forehead, Avenger broken away from training sniper, all these pieces he’d worked so hard to mesh into one, combine into a real person, laying like broken glass before him and Bucky had no idea who was real, which was left for him, which he had to chose to be to survive now.

He’s painted a dream for an angel and now the devil was claiming back the hold he had on that soul.

Steve knew a piece of him now that he’d worked so hard to keep locked away and none of that pain mattered anymore because it’d all been for nothing, Steve found out anyways.

Nothing.

Bucky’d fought and bled and cried and it’d been for nothing and wasn’t that just fitting. So they’d been right, then.

Hydra’d been right. It’d been for nothing, his pain. His pain was nothing. He was nothing.

It took a moment to convince himself, but he turned to the mirror again. If he got to chose, Bucky knew who he had to be. Only one way to survive.

Crystal flashed, dark circles and a twisted mouth that’d spilled too many words but that was fine, he knew exactly how to silence those treacherous words.

Ironically, he’d shoved it in the medicine cabinet. Mainly because it was the one place in the apartment guaranteed Steve-proof.

A moment’s resistance before the cabinet door slipped open, then tiptoes to reach up, back left of the top shelf, and the edge of the black material tipped into grasp.

Closed cabinet once more, and the ease it slipped back on, the security that set in the moment the black fitted over his nose, lips, cheek, neck--

Air cut off, filtered through foramen. Sound muffled, long hair settling to either side, and throat finally finally silenced,

Shoulders rolling once, neck tipping side to side, straightening back every knob of spine into the perfect position and Bucky stood before the mirror once more, planted his feet, and slowly spread his fingers out, energy dancing up through--

Then he opened his eyes.

Two dark silver moons over the top of a black mask, shadows cast over skin, familiar monster again.

Familiar monster again.

Only one way to survive.

~*~

“Yeah, I miss him. Don’t you?”

Natasha cocked her head, typing in the building code while Sam held open the door.

“I get that Steve never meant to abandon everyone for Barnes. Both of em’ve been through a lot. I just kept asking myself, who would I be to intrude? I mean, if Riley came back from the dead, I’d wanna spend time with the guy - and that’s without the 70 year gap and twisted childhood devotion thrown in.”

One red eyebrow lifted in agreement, circling round the next set of stairs.

“Feels like we're losing him. When he needs a friend more than ever. Don’t get me wrong, I’m glad Barnes's in his life, but those guys…it’s gettin’ scary.”

"Interesting choice of words." Nat gave Sam a quick look and reached out, rapped her knuckles on the door that’d been sealed closed the past month and a half.

“Rogers! Barnes! Open up.”

A moment’s pause of silence, then something crashed within and Sam was kicking open the door, both their weapons drawn.

Steve was standing in the middle of the kitchen, staring at broken pieces of a pan strewn across the floor, eyes glazed over and hands clenched in fists. Sam dropped his gun back to his side, gesturing Natasha further into the apartment.

“Where’s Barnes?”

“Dunno,” Steve said quietly, gaze flicking to the counter. “I’m fine.”

“Romanoff--”

“I got it.”

The bathroom door was the only place in the apartment closed, so that’s where Natasha banged first.

“Barnes!”

“He’s not gonna open that door,” Steve mumbled, kicking a piece of glass aside. Sam looped an arm around Steve’s waist, guiding him away from the wrecked kitchen floor.

“James, it’s Natasha. Открывать.”

It was only because she had her ear pressed to the door that Natasha heard the muttered, barely audible, “...укуси меня.”

Fine. She could play that game.

“You two do anything fun Friday night?” Natasha called dryly over her shoulder, aimed in Steve’s general direction as she staked out windowsill stability, glanced over what pieces of exterior building she could see from inside.

“Considering Bucky hasn't talked to me for seventeen hours no, not really.”

She hadn’t been expecting the same shaking head, cocked eyebrow as the last time she’d asked that - only all the life, amusement that’d voice once had? Gone. Dead. Perfect-puppet-mimic.

Natasha paused, turning to look Steve over properly and he just leaned tiredly against Sam, brilliant unbreakable fire under blue extinguished. Haze. Glazed over.

Sam gave her a crazy look as she slid open the fire escape door, but she’d probably get a crazier look for scaling the side of the building and kicking in the bathroom window.

Or...not.

No dramatic throwdown, busting in on Barnes decked in Winter Soldier gear and hanging from the ceiling, aiming guns, nothing.

Bucky glanced up casually from the sink, where he was coming wet fingers through his hair, plain black tshirt and jeans, the paradigm of normal if it weren’t for his left arm shining reflections in the mirror.

“Well Miss Romanoff, what if I’d been in the nude? You can’t just break into places with closed doors.” Bucky’s voice was light, teasing, mouth curled up at one end like Steve wasn’t having some psychotic break in the kitchen. “Although, I do suppose that’s your job…”

He trailed off, smile widening a bit more and it was seamless, really, every inch of it. Even the touch of a faded Brooklyn accent, bright twinkle in dusty-blue eyes.

Nat raised an unimpressed eyebrow, touching down to the cold tile floor with her arms crossed over her chest. “We need to talk.”

Bucky’s smile grew, tipping his head as he turned his gaze back to the mirror, smoothed down a stray piece of hair and fluffed the top for a little more volume, speaking right to his reflection like Natasha’d just walked in on a primping session.

“Now, if we’re gonna have a heart to heart - I’m surprised at you, немного паук - then let us do it somewhere a bit more...comfy, yes?” Barnes turned off the sink, drying his hands before turning to her with that same brilliant smile, holding out his arm in a crook like they were in the forties, debonair lacing a perfect net over the terrifying cold, “Let me escort you to the living room?”

If she were to follow her training, now would be the point where she’d kill him. Or, since it was the Winter Soldier, this was when she’d run.

The casual mix of Russian – especially the fucking little spider he’d just slipped in - with the perfect Brooklyn, the blinding smile--

It was perfect. He was too good. No touch of soldier - cold killing machine with the best mask he’d ever worn, the face that used to belong to the man he was pretending to be. It was too good, he was better than all of them, maybe even better than her because the identity he was stealing, slipping into? Those shoes fit so well because they were his, in memory, and the lie he was fabricating?

Natasha slipped her arm through his. She had a tingling feeling it was either that, or the offered arm would wrap around her throat and the last thing she’d see was this tile floor pattern. Her skin crawled the moment bare touched cold metal and the Winter Soldier didn’t say a thing about the goosebumps, angled that cute cocked head and led her back into the apartment with a flourish.

Sam and Steve were nowhere to be seen and Bucky didn’t so much as glance twice at the mess in the kitchen, swept past like they were gliding to golden box seats at a ballet, posture perfect and each step graceful, a spotlight dancer on the very stage he led them to.

It was strange to sit down in an armchair when Barnes decorated the movement ostentatious, stranger still to watch him slip straight from ballerina-ostenair to lazy dock boy, draped out on the couch and stretched lazily like a fat cat basking in the sun.

Slow, deliberate movements, which was the only reason she caught the slightest most temporary of
The back of his head touched the armrest and the corners of his mouth and eyes tightened, body jerking in the tiniest wince that he quickly schooled into a shift of position but she’d spent a lifetime in training for moments like those, and she had him now.

There was always an in, no matter how complicated the enemy was, there was always some weakness and Natasha always found it.

“What happened to your head?” She leaned back in her chair, arms on both rests and legs crossing at the knee. Blunt, that’s how questions with Barnes had to be, because he’d weave and twist around them regardless, at least she could call him out if everything was dead straightforward. Besides, he’d had more than enough experience with her interrogation techniques, she had to pretend this wasn’t one.

“Nothing,” he shook off, settling his head back further against the couch as if to prove it. Then that mischievous smile came back, lift in his voice to imply exactly the direction he wanted her, “Things got a little heated. Got slammed into a door, but I’m fine.”

She’d have to be more than stupid to believe they were having sex. But the easiest lies were the truth, so he probably did get slammed into a door. Likely, it had nothing to do with the sly smile he was trying to pass off.

Why would Steve slam him into a door?

Well. Actually, she knew the answer to that firsthand.

The sunlight filtering through the window made Bucky’s hair highlight gold, splayed over the edge of the cream-colored couch like a painting of an angel, dimpled chin and sharp cheekbones casting dramatic shadows over his face as eyes blinked lazily up at the ceiling, catching golden at the end of his eyelashes too, lit up in sunlight and shadow so juxtaposed he looked surreal.

The perfect side smile and lazily twirling fingers only reflected the image more ethereal and Natasha’s words froze in her throat for a moment. She’d always thought of the non-human Winter Soldier to be something twisted and horrifying but he was worse than that: like Lucifer, in a way, the morning son and light-bringer and he may burn bitter bitter cold but she knew first hand nothing in the world reflected more blindingly than sun on sharp winter snow.

Clear, pure crystal, winter, sunshine on snow, that’s what Bucky was, blinding and terrifying and deceptively beautiful in the bitter, deadly cold.

“Barnes...look.” Natasha filtered a careful breath through her lungs, steadying herself. It was times like these she wished she hadn’t ever left Russia, because then maybe she wouldn’t be so scared of the man who’d spent seventy years training to beat people exactly like her.

He was a sleeper cell, even if he didn’t know it, he was more deadly than all of them. He’d shot her. Natasha Romanoff, he’d managed to shoot her twice and she’d barely nicked him once, barely escaped death every time they’d fought. He could’ve killed her, that day on the bridge, if Steve hadn’t shown up. He would’ve. She’d just been sitting there, terrified, wide-eyed and staring at the terrifying ghost who only needed to pull a trigger and she’d be dead--

That mask, she saw that mask in her nightmares sometimes and Steve’d come running out of nowhere, tugged away the Winter Soldier’s attention but Steve wasn’t here to distract, to leap in with his shield and save her life again. If Bucky wanted to kill her right now, wanted to leap off that couch, outta his spot of golden-white sunshine, he could kill her.

There weren’t many people in the world that she could sit across from and think that truthfully and the idea’d already drained the color from her face.

When she’d thought he was getting better, she’d stopped being scared of him for a while, even if she’d never stopped being cautious. But now that things were tumultuous with him and Steve --

Would it always be like that? Every time Bucky wasn’t smiling at Steve’s side, he was a bomb waiting to destroy them all? Did her life hang in the balance of whether or not the Barnes-Rogers were fighting?

“Yes?” Bucky drawled and Natasha shook her head once, wiping out the fear and curling her fingers to stop her hands from shaking, inching them closer to her gun.

Barnes, and his head injury. Slammed into a door, that was important. And she was pretty sure she knew why. This was her interrogation, not his.

She rolled her lips in, softening her gaze in case crystal dared turn her direction. Friend, she was here as a friend - Steve’s friend - and she had to make that clear.

Rogers’d hurt Barnes for some reason, maybe during an argument? Maybe just being stubborn?

Frankly, Barnes wasn’t the only supersoldier in this apartment that’d terrified her before.

“James,” she started again, forcing all thoughts of blinding snow and deadly hands from mind, “I know that Steve can be cold.”

“You know, once, you told me you couldn’t ask me to get back in the game because I got out for a good reason. You’ve got that same good reason, and you can be out, Steve. If that’s what you want.” Sam lifted his shoulders, keeping a careful tally of the blank flickers across Steve’s face. “Man, it’s what you wanted then.”

“I never said that.” Steve scrubbed his hands through his hair, nearly tripping over the crack in the sidewalk.

They weren’t walking fast enough to keep heart rates up, but he had a feeling Steve’s was too high regardless.

“You said you didn’t know,” he reminded gently. “But you know now.”

“Can we run?” Steve pressed again and Sam sighed, kicking up the walking pace just a notch.

“End of the sidewalk. But Steve, listen man, you gonna let your good reason slip away? You have a second chance. I never got that, I never will. But you do.”

Blue eyes didn’t look at him. Steve stared straight ahead, chin lifted and mouth tight. Stiff, the way he was that first day in the VA, unsure of where to put his hands. Or anything, at this point.

“Look, man, I’m here--”

“End of the sidewalk,” Steve announced, then he was taking off before Sam could suck in another breath, cursing as he leapt to follow, maybe keep up if he fought hard enough, but when were they just gonna stop fighting?
The sun was in his eyes and Natalia was droning and Bucky knew what she was doing, could read nearly every twitch of her facial muscles but he didn’t care.

He wanted her gone, so he stayed quiet, staring up at the ceiling with a filter of bloody cellophane between his ears and the spinning record words.

“--as a temper,” she started slowly and look on her face at his axiomatic snort gave him everything she knew about how he’d “hurt his head.”

Must’a hurt hers the same way once.

“--don’t scare easy...but he doesn’t know his strength, and his anger can get ahead of him--”

Flashing images in green eyes - cracked glass screen, Zola, stepping up behind and popped a bubble gum, smiling cockily because she’d expected some exasperated joke or maybe the no-fair glare he gave--

She certainly hadn’t been expected to be slammed into a wall.

“--first found the file on Zola,” Where is it? Safe. Do better, he’d hissed and she’d recoiled. “...slammed me in a wall, shook me, bruised my arm and bit don’t make me ask you again and--”

The sun was still in his eyes.

“--far he’d go. In that moment I realized he's...too much for himself....”

Bucky wondered if the tremor in her hand was discomfort or fear.

“--old him I knew about you and.....mission...easily now that he had someone to target, to kill, let’s see what the ghost wants and that's. He's messed up. I don't think he realized--”

Natalia paused, cleared her throat. Maybe realized he wasn’t exactly listening. “Point is. I know how he can be.”

She tapped her fingers on the chair’s hard armrest and Bucky lifted an eyebrow, a glance her direction before he turned a placated smile back at the ceiling.

“That’s cute. You guys talked about me?” That blinding, horror-movie smile turned on her and she barely repressed the shiver that threatened down her spine. “I’m honored. Ironic, isn’t it, calling me a ghost?”

Tongue in his cheek, amused twinkling crystal, “Not sure it fits.”

He had her.

He could see it.

She was scared of him.

This was her interrogation, not his. She was better at this, what was she doing? It was just that...she’d started to trust him. To consider him family. And maybe that was even more terrifying than he was, the idea that she’d let her guard down for a moment--

“What do you think does?” she asked carefully, calculated into a casual, amused question. One of Bucky’s eyebrows shot up, that same passively-amused expression Steve had.

“I think...zombie. Undead.” He cocked his head, neck elongated at this strange angle all shadowed from the sunlight and дерьмо, she could see the sunken cheeks and green rotting flesh from here. “I’m back from the dead, y’know, ghosts hafta die in the first place and I...never really did.”

A pleasant shrug like they weren’t talking about murder and torture and falling off trains and years under the suffocating grip of red octopus feet.

“You don’t consider Hydra’s reshaping of your existence dying?”

It was blunt, but Clint had been fucked up for a couple days and he still had issues and Bucky’s entire existence had been erased, replaced, destroyed. She’d never had one, but Bucky, he’d had a life and love and happiness and he knew joy and the salt of the ocean on his skin and sun on his face, he’d lost all that to reach the only thing she’d ever really known and at least she didn’t have memories of Before to haunt, it was only After and that was at least improving, she’d broken free and there was no past her to mourn, just a new one to create but he didn’t have Bucky Barnes, she’d thought he’d be more than pissed, she’d’ve thought he’d be righteous and haunted and vengeful and--

“Nope,” Bucky popped the p, smile curving wider than ever as he flicked his hair off his forehead and smiled up at the ceiling. Sun. Sky, casket, snow, whatever he was seeing up there, she had no idea. “Cause I’m still here, aren’t I?”

~~~

After years, war, hell, heaven and back--

Still here.

He was still here. Right here, in this same spot. The beams lining the rocks on the water’s edge, the docks just under the bridge. The spot he used to take his lunch breaks in the 1930s when it rained.

It always rained now.

And he could see himself, blurry and edged through the downpour, but unmistakable nonetheless--

There, just there twenty feet to the left, hauling a shipping crate up onto one shoulder, short hair caught and rustling with a burst of salty wind.

The real ghost, himself up on the docks, young and tan and beautiful and strong, wiping his brow with the back of his hand, eyes lighting up as his bare back straightened, perked to a noise he’d caught on the wind.

Bucky sat perfectly still, watching the movie-memory play out like a single twitch would make the image fly off like the gulls.

Young twenties, maybe late teens, quick hand rubbing his hair back like that would flatten it when the wind just tousled it once more but he didn’t mind, didn’t even notice, cursed mouth widening as he broke into a smile to rival Stevie’s.

And speak of the devil, a flash of blonde up by the road, a shout lost to the wind and eighty years past then the ghost was raising his hand and waving, beaming foolishly wide and overly joyful, the slightest pause, glance around then barefeet jumped a skip and took off, running for the road and his best friend, bright laughter bouncing off rocks, spotlight fading and fading with every step into the wind and Bucky squinted, trying to peer through the downpour but

But he was gone, the ghost boy was gone and there was no way to know if he’d reached the blonde boy waiting for him by the road. No way to know if he ever would.

Bucky tore his gaze away from the empty docks, turning back towards the water, over the bridge and the sky, anything that wasn’t the reflection below him or the reverberation behind him.

There were boats, in the distance. Bucky watched them prepare their sails, drifting background thoughts of what the ship would hold, how far it would go. He used to do that, calculate voyages and how hard it’d be to sneak aboard. Thinking one day when Steve's cough got really bad again they'd just grab a boat and sail south, somewhere warm. Somewhere the cold would never let Steve's lungs give up on him again.

But Steve set sail west without him. That first night in the bar, that last night in the bar, they were more important than Steve'd ever know. Because that was the day Bucky watched Steve's sails disappear over the horizon. Steve abandoned Bucky long before the train and they'd never sorted through that and Bucky'd never really gotten over Steve leaving him for Peggy.

That last night in the bar, the night they'd waltzed across war worn floors with broken hearts - that was the night Bucky realized no matter how far Steve sailed away from him, he'd never be able to stop chasing the horizon where those white sails last disappeared.

How were they to deal with the storm swirling around them now when they'd never gotten over the storm clouds from the past? Gray and red building on black and there was no way to tell anymore where one stopped and the other began.

Bucky stared down at his hands, laced together loosely, skin overlapped with metal and truthfully, he couldn't tell anymore. He'd wound himself so tight to Steve there was no way to know.

Where one stopped and the other began.

All he knew - every time their fingers slipped apart it was like getting shipped off again, no white sails to follow on the horizon and a lying North Star that'd hold him hostage but never let him go home.

There was no place like home and Bucky had no illusions about where his was.

He'd never come home from war.

There were storm clouds hovering on the horizon, exceptionally chilly morning and the wind was blowing colder than it should’ve, whipping snakes in his face and he couldn’t even bring himself to care. Nothing he could do.

It wasn’t hard to find him. He didn’t even really look. It was just...he had this feeling. The same feeling he got when Buck walked in a room on silent feet.

The wind was rustling his carefully gelled swoop, that last touch of forties he’d been reaching for lately but it didn’t matter whether he wore his damned Captain’s uniform or a snapback, it wasn’t changing anything. Made it easier to pretend though, shoving hands in dark brown pockets as he jogged down the same concrete stairs by the storage crates, smell of wind off the bay crisper than anything he’d been breathing lately.

Each step closer to the water was getting heavier and heavier, trudging through mud and sludge as the pressure on his shoulders threatened to crumple him down. Steve paused to run a hand over his hair, roll his shoulders. A deep breath as his thumb spun the ring on his hand back straight again, that matching metal they’d done nothing about and maybe never would.

It’d felt so much like their answer, the solution to all the fucked up sorrow. Bucky’d cried when Steve asked him to marry him and now they both felt like crying every time they so much as looked at left hands. Bucky still wore his and Steve wouldn’t dream of taking his off but that didn’t mean he didn’t feel like pegging it at Buck’s stupid head half the time.

The way it should be, they shouldn’t still be losing their minds. But Bucky was running, every moment he spent staring off into space he was still running further and further away and it was time Steve let him know.

Let him know he knew why.

More than just what Bucky’d told Peg, more than just the years since Zola, this was about Bucky Barnes’s impossible masks he’d built from the time they were battling on the playgrounds instead.

They were young when sorrow found Buck and they were too young when it won and if this was his last chance to pull Bucky from the fire, he was throwing it all in.

The wind whistled his arrival but Buck didn’t look up til the rocks crunched underfoot, then crystal eyes darted to his once, under the whipping dark hair then they were cutting away again, shoulder muscles shifting under the blue peacoat.

“Hey Buck,” Steve whispered as he lowered, sat down on the jut beside Bucky and settled his feet against the same stones they used to.

“Steve,” the quiet voice replied. His fingers twitched to take Bucky’s hand in his but. They’d never held hands in this spot as many times as they must’ve wanted to back then and for some reason he just couldn’t bring himself to do it now either.

Clasped together between knees instead, middle finger tracing aimless drawings against skin. He’d thought about bringing paper, drawing here beside Buck the way he used to but he didn’t want this to be about anything but what he had to say.

“Bu--”

“Steve, I can’t.” Bucky’s eyes shot over to his again, desperate and terrified, lost beneath all that hair that made him look so much older than he used to be. It fit him though, and Steve’d never mention cutting it. He could always see Buck beneath those masks anyways.

He almost asked -- you can’t what?

But he didn’t want to know the answer. Not with the way Bucky was looking at him, crystal searching like Steve was the sky and all the constellations spelled out the answers of the universe.
Steve didn’t say anything at all. He let Bucky look, let him search and watched as the metal plates in his arms shifted, recalibrating tighter and his real fingers twitched like they were aching to grab Steve’s too, as his lips tightened, pupils flicked back and forth.

He remembered Buck looking at him like that during the war. Behind blurry eyes when he was coughing out a lung. From the other side of Sarah’s sickbed. That look, the one under dark flickering nights when he thought Steve was asleep, that look that stripped away all the masks and shone that core, that single truth beneath it all, the one thing that’d Zola’d never been able to change. Hell, maybe the Winter Soldier was built around that, the way city walls were built around the heart.

The truth behind every unspoken word, behind every twisted lie. In that look, that single vulnerability Steve’d never been able to really understand. Not until now.

“You’re scared,” Steve told him simply.

Bucky’s eyebrows furrowed and his pretty mouth opened and Steve almost put his hand over Bucky’s face, like that mask, covering up from the dimple in his chin to the slope of his nose but he was done letting Bucky hide behind that. Hide behind any of it.

“It’s you who--”

Words could be masks too.

“You blame this all on me, point at the bright white star in the middle of my shield but you know what? It's not me. It's not.” Vaguely, somewhere in the back of his head he could remember Sam backing him into the kitchen and telling him it’s not your fault and the things Steve’d shattered in response to that.

But now, underneath their Brooklyn sky, he could look Bucky straight in the eyes and tell him what’d taken years to understand.

“I finally realized, it’s not me. Not anymore. It wasn't my fault you got drafted and it wasn't my fault you didn't tell me about the serum and it wasn't my fault you fell and it's not my fault you don’t want this.”

Voice escalating to mountaintops he’d never come down fully from and Bucky was looking at him wide-eyed with his lips parted, open around the same scream that echoed in Steve’s dreams, that terrible scream as he fell away from Steve’s outstretched hand, the scream he’d never voice aloud again and Steve got it. He got why.

He did reach over then. Not for Bucky’s hand, because their hands had broken apart too many times. Just to bump his knuckles against Bucky’s hip, to be touching him in some way that wouldn’t break hearts but Bucky might fall again from Steve’s reverent words anyways.

“It's you. You're scared. You're scared shitless and you've been scared your entire life. Scared of losing me and even more scared of losing you. And finding out that those are correlating things.” The silence swirled down on them, blinding snowstorm, and it took him a second to place where the eerie quiet was coming from. Buck’s arm had fallen perfectly still. Steve’d never heard it go silent, didn’t know it even had that shut down mode.

Then again, he’d never seen Bucky so still and silent either. He wasn’t even breathing.

Oxygen, Buck was his home and Steve was Bucky’s oxygen.

“That you need me,” Steve swore low, watching Buck carefully for any sign of air, life, but there was still absolutely nothing, pure silence. It’d been that way for decades too long. “That you love me. You’re terrified of it. You’re always saying you can’t let go all the way, and that’s why. You’re terrified of the way you feel about me.”

A single, cold gasped inhale and Steve drew his fingers back, let Buck be nothing but himself adrift in that crystal timeline as he said the words to carve on the mountainside above their twin graves.

“You're so scared to say you love me you'd rather rip us apart at the seams.”

The bridge lights fizzed and twinkled on above them, casting stars in the water and Steve pushed off crumbling stones, stood in the cold wind and looked out over the river, chest pulsing with the gravitational weight beside him.

Then he took one last glance down, filled his lungs once more.

And turned back to the road.

One, three, five, seven steps away and Bucky hadn’t hopped up to follow so Steve stopped counting.

~~~

Шесть, пять, четыре, три--

This time he didn’t come in panting, holding onto porcelain to keep balanced. Slipped calmly inside, carefully closed the door with a click. A moment’s hesitation at the light switch, then a flick upwards and the bathroom illuminated gold.

Neither of them turned on lights much. Bucky angled his jaw in the mirror, watched the shadow under his cheekbone shift and decided it probably had to do with more than just the difference in the decades.

Carefully tucking the hair behind his ear, Bucky leaned closer to his reflection, studied the shards of gray-blue for a moment.

Leaned back again, rolled his shoulders back. Squared them to that man in the mirror, sucked in a breath. Stared straight at the blue, all that clarity, and opened the mouth he’d sewn shut seventy-one years ago.

“I love you,” he breathed. The mirror blinked back at him, head cocking a touch and he cleared his throat, lifted a hand to his neck, smoothed over skin - not black plastic, the mask stored behind that mirror kept flickering from view but just for a moment just one moment he was clawing it off again, just to look, to watch the words that’d been muzzled too long - and opened his mouth once more.

“I love you,” he tried again, and it sounded just as much like a lie as the first one did.

Bucky shook his head, like he could physically knock that tone free but he’d been trained for years in detecting lies, and he knew his own tones and masks better than anyone and that’s what he sounded like when he was lying.

The tears started up in his throat and he’d choke them down like he’d choked down so much in his life but he didn’t fucking have to go through this, fuck Steve and his stupid fucking expectations--

Sharp turned heel and his hand was already on the doorknob, ready to whip it open and stalk the fuck back outta there when the stupidest, most awful realization knocked into his head like a goddamned .207 and he froze, sucking in another shaky breath as he turned slowly, ever so slowly on his heel to look at that fucking reflection, wasted lips parting one more time, the quietest of audible whispers falling free,

“I love him.”

The words reverberated in the tiny space, just a ghosted whisper echoing back and Bucky lifted his head, crystal staring at him like a dare now as he parted his lips to say it one more time,

“I love him.”

He didn’t need to analyze the tone. Rip free black plastic. Didn’t need to analyze a single thing.

The droplet of water slipping from the corner of one eyes, sliding down his cheek said more than enough.

Slow, metal thumb wiping away the vulnerable wet betrayal and Bucky turned the knob, stepped out into the hallway and closed the door behind him.

~*~

Heart racing.

He wasn’t used to being nervous.

Steady marching beat, straight spine, chin lifted like that might save him but the hand gripping the scissors behind his back was shaking.

Steve was in the kitchen, folding laundry on the counter the way they used to in Brooklyn, propped up on a barstool with his strong hands making careful creases, back in the basket for sorting. Left, left, make it there whole.

Heart racing.

Steve looked up before Bucky crossed the threshold into the kitchen. He actually did a doubletake, straightening up and carefully setting down some folded shirt. (Bucky had no idea which clothes belonged to him anymore. Couldn’t really tell back then either, everything was too big for Stevie anyways.)

He opened his mouth. No sound came out and the toysoldier broke form, ducking his head to tuck a piece of hair behind his ear, gripping the scissors behind his back a little tighter.

Screeching chair, then Steve’s barefeet strode into view, big strong comfortable, bare because the cold floors didn’t make him sick anymore. Just the cold rope dragging him down to earth.

A callused finger under his chin and Bucky let his head be tipped up, hair falling outta sight for hopefully the last time.

The scissors were cutting into his palm enough to make his fingers white but he wasn’t sure how to ask this, just knew he had to, it was finally time and he wanted Steve to do it. Maybe needed Steve to do it. Not that he couldn’t, he just wanted to trust Steve with this, give up this one thing when all he’d done was take.

Steve didn’t even know how much he hated the snakes, how much they reminded him of Hydra’s tentacles everytime he saw his damned reflection.

He had to try.
Their eyes met and Steve’s were so soft, soft as the thumb brushing his cheekbone. Bucky’s jaw unhinged, lips parting to breathe the stale words that’d been lingering behind the veil of undeserving reminders but he didn’t want this scar anymore, he wanted something to be fixed for once, just a simple sound from a closed throat.

Long callused fingers slipped along their path, zygomatic to temporal and slipping straight into his hair, sliding between dark snakes and weaving in against his skull, parting the damn red sea with those beautiful artist hands and “You are so beautiful,” Steve murmured, awed and reverent with his hands in Bucky’s long long hair and the words of freedom’s wings shriveled in his throat, crumbled to ash. The scratch of knives as he closed his mouth once more, swallowed.

Blinked up at beautiful blue, you are my sweetest downfall, and loosened his grip on the scissors behind his back. Wouldn’t need ’em now.

The edges of Steve’s palms pressed into his jaw, lifting his face just a touch more and Bucky closed his eyes, waited for Steve to decide his fate because with every ounce of the power flowing through his veins he was just so exhausted he couldn’t be the one to decide anymore.

It wouldn’t matter what Stevie tried anyways, Bucky was under no illusions about the black plastic covering his mouth, the muzzle that’d silenced him once more the moment he’d slipped it back in place, he’d been a fool to think he could muffle words like free me from those long red tentacles through the filter when he was damned here to silence for the rest of existence--

The nerve endings of his body were already lit up on hyperdrive ever since that damn day in the mirror and he felt it, felt it moments before and he didn’t do a single thing to stop it because he was still,

still

still had never stopped falling.

Steve’s lips pressed into his and Bucky’s mouth fell open in shock they’d burned through the plastic he could’ve sworn was still between them but Steve’d cast it aside once, god knows he was the only one who ever could. Burned up and clawed up and fought his way back from the dead to drag Bucky up from hell and dive back into icy waters with him all over again.

It ached, his chest was physically aching and Steve was kissing him with all this pained vigilance, beautiful blue eyes squeezed shut tight, wet lips locked between his, the slightest tug and the most heartbreaking pressure as his fingers curled in Bucky’s eternallydamned hair and pulled him ever closer.

Bucky kissed him back. Bucky would always kiss him back.

Just the tipped iceberg of desperation, desolation and he gasped against Steve’s teeth, right hand sweating as he carefully placed the knuckles of his curled fist against Steve’s lower back, trying to keep himself from just grabbing because he wasn’t sure he could let go this time.

Black was dripping somewhere from the sunshine that’d burned away smoke and painted angel wings, then Steve’s hands were wrapping around the back of his neck like a guillotine and Bucky’s right hand pressed Steve’s spine and it wasn’t supposed to go this way but now warm hands were sliding down his back, scooping him closer and Bucky just kept dragging himself closer with every degree of heat between their mouths and Steve’s fingers found the metal he still had tucked behind his back.

Steve’s fingers found metal behind his back that wasn’t supposed to be there.

It took a millisecond to register and Bucky was faster, snatched his hand away before Steve could close around the scissors but it didn’t matter, their mouths broke and it wasn’t fair because all that heat was still there, Steve’s cheeks were flushed when Bucky’s eyes sprang open to look up at him, lips parted and wet and panting but the blue eyes weren’t soft like they were before and Bucky couldn’t run away and hide with Steve’s fingers digging into the back of his neck.

The other hand was gripping his left wrist tight and the only reason Bucky wasn’t wrestling out of the grip was that the plates on his arm weren’t sealed shut and he’d slice open Steve’s hand if he tried and he couldn’t stomach Steve’s blood spilling out over the metal again.

“Give it to me,” Steve demanded, low and breathy but serious, washing warm and close like they were still kissing instead of back-to-war battling.

“Let go of my wrist,” he answered just as low, void-voice of a soldier who should be following orders but Steve wasn’t his CO anymore, hadn’t been for a long time.

Steve’s fingers loosened and Bucky’s arm whirred shut, shifting as he brought his hand out from behind his back, staring straight at the challenge in those blues.

Until Steve’s eyes dropped down to the scissors in his hand and eyelids fell with this horrific ache.

“What are these for?” Fingers pried back and the scissors were gone, sharp clattering to the left and a violent cringe, shoulders lifting as dark eyes squeezed shut tighter. He’d bet there was a dent in the wall now, and scissors pieces scattered on the floor.

“Nothing.” The hand on the back of his neck tightened and Bucky pinched the corners of his mouth, head dropping to the pounding chest so Steve couldn’t stare at his face. “Nothing.”

“Bucky.”

“I wasn’t going to!” Too loud, and he cringed at that too then the hand on the back of his neck let go and Bucky almost collapsed forward, knees threatening to give--

“Bucky you weren’t going to do what?”

I loved him first.

"I don’t know," the whisper bled and the pressure on his neck doubled, made him sway and he was so exhausted he just. "I don’t know."

Cold gathering at the corners of his eyes and Bucky's lips split over another gasp, choked instead of ached. The briefest of pauses and Steve's mouth was on him again.

Soft, so soft and gentle and sweet, pressed right to the corner of his eye, hand shifting up into longhair to hold his lips there unmoving and permanent.

Permanent. Til then.
A single drop of water slipped past his other eye and he nearly knocked Steve in the jaw because he was gonna wipe it away only soft lips were already kissing down the wet mark on his cheek.

Skin tingling with the memory of being flayed open, exposed. Bucky knew how that felt and the way Steve was peeling him open now - vulnerable and soft and gentle and in control and he wanted to shove Steve off, cover his face with his hands and he wanted to burn back the skin himself to let Steve forever inside--

Did the ice stop his heart?

Steve’s soft lips skirted up to his eye again, kiss in the corner, down the swoop of his eyelashes and Bucky’s hands were clenched in fists at his sides, held up by the hands spanning his ribs. Kiss kiss to the dark around his eyes, where he used to smear black black-- “When’s the last time you slept?” Steve whispered against blue and purple skin. A hand on Steve’s hip to steady himself, room on the edge of tipping.

He opened his mouth to spin webs and Steve’s lips ghosted down the side of his nose, stopped the words with a millimeter between their tongues,

“Don’t lie.”

He was looking out for Steve. He was always just trying to look out for Steve.

One hand raked warm fingers down the back of his head and Bucky’s eyes fluttered open, staring at the pulse under the thin skin on Steve’s neck.

Used to throw his arm around in camaraderie but now it just begged a fist around it. Used to be his best friend.

No, more than that. Before they were “more than that” they used to be more than best friends.

They--

Soldiers in arms. Brothers in arms.

Brotherhood came first, that bond that could never be broken and that love that could never be lost. Family, Steve was more than the love of his life or his best friend. Steve was his family. Steve was his only family left on this planet. Steve was all he had.

Again.

“...I don’t know,” Bucky breathed, running one hand shakily over his hair, trying to smooth it back so he could breathe again, voice echoing from the kid who used to wear it slicked back, that other one buried so deep, “Rogers, I...I don’t know.”

“It’s okay.” Strong arms circled round him properly and Bucky somehow lifted his head, chin falling on Steve’s shoulder as he wrapped them in hug, misery squashing to burn between their chests as his head tipped weakly against Steve’s temple, metal and human running up Steve’s spine. ”You're okay.”

The broken scissors were scattered in pieces on the floor, he could see over Steve’s shoulder.

The wall had another dent.

They were just standing here in the middle of the floor holding each other but Bucky was still looking over Steve’s shoulder, over his back. Maybe that’s why it never worked. This was where Bucky knew, where his heart told him he had to be. Watching Steve’s back instead of holding his face. Behind instead of side by side.

Safety instead of sidebyside.

“Supposed to go through hell together, remember?” Steve’s voice rumbled deeper with their chests pressed together and Bucky forced himself to inhale, exhale. They weren’t crushing each other this time but breathing was hard anyways.

“I remember.”

He almost smiled at the words because god, did he. He remembered it all, everything, and maybe that’s why it never worked.

“Thank my lucky stars.” There was a smile in the voice against his ear and fingertips curling ever so slightly into his back, rocking side to side. It cost Bucky control but didn’t Steve always. “God, Buck. I can’t have you forgetting me again.”

There it was, the desperation that’d ruined them both bubbling under the surface.

Bucky’d promised Peggy he’d let Steve go during the war. He should’ve. By god, he should’ve.

Steve said Bucky was scared. Bucky was death and darkness, Steve was the one who should be scared and wasn’t.

That edge in Steve’s voice, sharper than all his knives, maybe that’s why it never worked. Steve was never supposed to be that way and Bucky’d dragged him out from his halo to the other side.

Used to be what made Steve calm? Now he was the catalyst.

Couldn’t keep hurting, he couldn’t. He should’ve let Steve go so long ago.

Wasn’t strong enough. Might never be strong enough and maybe that was why it never worked.

But maybe, he could soothe Steve back from that edge of hurt one more time. Soothe him from the stab of when Bucky forgot him, soothe him from the aches and bruises he left last time. He could be in control enough to do that.

No letting go, just carrying Steve through the fire, making the tremble in that voice never forget me steady out once more.

His mouth was curved now, one corner up and it didn’t meet his eyes but it didn’t matter. He had one job, and that was to pull Steve back into the light.

“The first time...” Bucky started, pausing a moment because he wanted to word it perfectly. It felt like a lifetime ago, the gold lights lining that unfinished floor, soft dancing music in the background and the door that lead to That Bedroom on one wall, blue eyes staring down at him with the words I love you floating in the air between them.

“Give me a way to never forget you again,” he whispered. Same way he had then.

A second, two, sliding hands as Steve pulled back, looked down at him with those analytical eyes. Bucky let their eyes meet, shined his own up a bit, much as he could risk.

They hadn’t had sex since he’d broken Steve’s hand but. Bucky’d been training, he’d layered back in those protective walls and plastic masks and there was no chance on earth it could go that way again. He was in control, enough.

“Are you sure?”

Of course Steve was asking. It was the same answer it’d always been though, underneath the fe--

“Yes. Are you?”

And there it was, the tiniest hint of that watered-down smile Steve had in this century, the one that broke Bucky’s heart but it was the best he could get.

“Oh Buck.” And ostensibly, all he did was take. “I’ve never been more sure of anything.”

Steve took his hand. It didn’t make up for every time the wind had pushed cold between their fingers and forced them apart but he could pretend. Maybe that was why it never worked.

It could’ve been 1938 the way Steve led him into the bedroom, all debonair and distanced and whatnot. Well, if their roles had been switched, Bucky was the only one holding hands with girls to lead them anywhere back then.

More watered-down as Bucky raised an eyebrow, nothing close to the playful scorn that look used to be. But being frozen so long meant a lot of watered-down when they thawed so really, what else had he ever expected?

The sun had just sunk below the horizon, out of sight with just the final touches of light lingering sourceless on the world, gold flecks suspended in the air like dust as the shadows crept down from the corners of the room, decontrasted in this hovering gray nothing like the black and white shadows from that first time; but the scene was no less beautiful, softening Steve’s skin like a Renaissance painting.

Speaking of which.

The corner of Steve’s mouth tipped up, tug on Bucky’s hand that sent him straight into that broad chest but all he could see was the painting over Steve’s shoulder.

Curious eyes caught Bucky’s gaze and Steve twisted, glancing over his shoulder to follow Bucky’s gaze. There.

Unswivel and blue eyes were on him again, intense enough that Bucky dared glance over, meeting with the same sparks that’d burned his hands, the same pulse that’d driven every wild brushstroke, the same crescendo pent up in the barrel of the rifle against his shoulder, all there in the wisps of blonde around Steve’s face, the long shadows cast by eyelashes down his cheeks like morbid circusmakeup tears.

He dropped Steve’s hand, grabbing the bottom hem of black and tugging his shirt over his head in one fluid motion, tossing it behind and already starting in on the snaps of dark cargo pants.

Steve’s hand smoothed over the bare, mottled skin on his shoulder and Bucky glanced up through the stray strands fallen over his eyes, zipper cutting loud through silence as Steve’s fingers traced down, pausing at the red star on his arm, artist fingers wrapping over it and moving with him as he shoved his pants and boxers down his legs, lifted a foot to wrestle them over and off, other foot and kicked aside.

A quick glance to check for Steve’s permission, sure nod and shaky swallow, meeting Bucky’s eyes for just a moment before they were traveling down, tracing over his body and Bucky could feel the gaze on his bare skin like a physical touch.

The briefest moment to slip his fingers over the smooth skin on Steve’s hips, then he was tugging a too-tight shirt over Steve’s head, eliciting that dandelion baby-soft poof as blonde popped free and the tiny smile on his face was real that time.

Which kinda made it a hellobalot worse.

The smile wilted and Steve smoothed the snakes away from his face, tendrils strangling those sweet hands but he didn’t notice, just pulled Bucky’s face to his own and this time Bucky managed not to collapse, pressing every word he didn’t say against that beautiful mouth.

He’d wondered one night, if it was kissing the sun for him than what in the world was it for Steve?

For Steve, it was the kiss of death, wasn’t it?

They’d always lived in it, never on the edge. Deep in the throes, the constant ever-wakeful presence of the feared shadowy darkness that Steve kept chasing passionate as sin and Bucky was still caught in freefall through black.

Twin mouths dragged apart, clamped together again with teeth grazing lips and nails digging into shoulderblades, pulling them stumbling towards the bed, phantom room sliding by in a blur and before Bucky could sort out the dizziness they were tangled on the bedsheets.

It was instinct that had Bucky rolling to pin Steve to the mattress and likely the same instinct that had Steve’s leg wrapped around his back in seconds and flipping him into the pillows. He landed with a thump, blonde halo looking down at him triumphantly, framed by the bottom edge of the canvas on the wall over their heads.

A split second decision before he had his metal arm barring Steve’s chest, wrestling to flip him once more and that time when Steve went down he brought Bucky with him, their noses suddenly brushing from proximity, two pairs of hands poised to push and shove once more, hearts thudding and --

This was usually the part they both started laughing, eyes and bodies all caught up. The childhood joy and innocence from their playfights of then to the wrestling of twin soldiers and now, the grappling of twin skeletons that fought without the play, all tossed in with bright eyes turned hungry, lust and love twinkling, only.

Only Bucky wasn’t laughing. There was that twinkle in Steve’s eyes when they crashed together like this, the threat of a curve on his lips but the moment it caught up, this time, neither of them burst into laughter.

The faded hint of a smile, for the first time in ages and that’s exactly why it trailed off. Died in seconds, both staring at each other with wide eyes and thudding hearts.

Who knew broken hearts could beat so fast?

The moment broke as Bucky's chest did, surging forward in perfect time with Steve, clash of teeth and mouths and grabbing hands. The only clothes left between them were Steve’s blue pants and Bucky slipped those off him easy, thrown behind and forgotten, replaced with his mouth on sharp hips, hands smoothing up Steve's stomach, soft huffs of heavy breathing as Steve's hands weaved through snakes, pulled Bucky right back up to press their mouths together again.
Sporadic gasps and flushed cheeks, necks, pink creeping down muscled chests as Bucky swung a leg properly over Steve's lap, sliding into place over the heat between strong legs. Both Steve's hands on his jaw now as Bucky sucked on that pretty lower lip and ground down against Steve's cock, licking up every shocked sound.

Stevie was breathing heavy, way he did when he got in a fight. Chest heaving, sans wheeze and Bucky’s heart seized because what would he give to go back to the simplicity of that. Always fearing Steve’s next breath was his last, taken away from Bucky by some disastrous illness.

It was better than always fearing Steve’s next breath was his last, taken away from Bucky by his own bloody hands.

Steve’s clean, strong ones smoothed down the curves of his ass, lifted Bucky higher in his lap with those long fingers slipping lower, brushing over sensitive where he hadn’t been touched in an eternity. Pop of a cap, cold wet and Steve’s fingers were inside him again, heavy palm on the small of his back to keep him still. Bucky mouthed along the soft pretty skin on Steve’s neck, more heated-breaths than kisses, eyes closed to keep from rolling back.

It’d been so long and it felt like they’d done this just this morning, fitting right back together like puzzle pieces because this, Bucky knew. Steve’s body so close to his it didn’t matter where skin stopped and bone began, what oxygen stole between them or heat pressed them together.

Baby-soft duckling blonde hair, all white at the edges by Steve’s face but darker and thicker at the base of his neck and Bucky nuzzled against the dark, shadows hiding his face as he nosed all that brunette underneath the sunshine.

The fingers inside him twisted, pulling a distorted sound from his burning throat, grip tightening on hard biceps. A warm, dry kiss to the side of his neck, deeper twist and opening spread, too much to focus on and it all started coming in waves, crashing him into the dark.

This was where control started to slip and he just had to make sure Steve was the one in charge because he couldn’t trust much but he could trust that, he could trust the instinct ingrained from that previous century that if he let go, Steve’d catch--

No, actually, wait--

The nerve endings lit up like misfiring chambers, sporadic shocks up his shoulder into his spine as pearly teeth sunk into the scars arching from his arm and Bucky’s eyes did roll back in his head, hips rolling forward to jerkily ride Steve’s abs through the rippling shockwaves.

The fingers inside withdrew in gaping cold, heavy arms wrapping around his back, gathering even closer as Bucky tried to catch his breath, punched right back outta his lungs as Steve rolled them, whipped Bucky down to fall heavy on the mattress, disorientation rushing behind his eyes only making him gasp louder, ankles locking behind Steve’s back.

Blue penetrating his soul, suddenly still, halting all that heat and Bucky groaned, fingers digging, pulse racing, trying to drag Steve back with him.

“C’mon, c’mon baby,” Head tipped back, voice already shot and ankles digging, pulling closer because he couldn’t wait any longer, he needed Steve inside him right now and what the hell was the holdup--

It took some effort to blink open his eyes, room swimming with heat waves he barely managed to wrangle into a mild glare up at the beautiful blue blinking down at him. Steve was just looking at him, knees pinning his hips and hands cupping his neck, cradling with this sincere affection.

They were too far apart to roll up against those ridiculous abs again, but he still had hands and he wasn’t gonna make it through this if Steve was gonna keep looking at him like that.

Bucky reached up, mismatched hands cupping Steve’s cheeks, half-pulling himself up and half dragging Steve down, lips meeting somewhere in the middle, burn of that stare dissipating the moment wet dragged together again.

But then their lips weren’t interlocked anymore and Steve still wasn’t moving. Waiting, he was just waiting and Bucky didn’t wanna know what the hell for.

“Steve.” The c’mon was perfectly clear in the tone, fingerprint marks. He just couldn’t handle the pause, it had to be gogogo or else he’d start thinking and Steve’d start staring and then the questions and the doubt and the desperation.

“Hasn’t it been long enough?” Bucky breathed, avoiding blue gaze and rubbing his palms down tense shoulders, arched scapula, hollow ribs, lungs expanding wildly like they’d open up and swallow them both if he didn’t just Tilted hips, guided hand and finally, fuck. He threw his head back, rolled into it before Steve dare stop, stutter in his throat as his body surrendered once more, all pressure and sunlit prayer driving up into his stomach, shocking muscles tensed and his fingertips into roughened skin.

This used to be his favorite part, their bodies sliding back together after the hours apart, or simple minutes, whether it be the easy relock after the fourth round that night or the awakening revival after a day from each other’s sides.

In this moment, it didn’t matter that it’d been weeks, a month, more, they still knew how to do this and they still slid back together like they’d never been apart.

Steve’s hips pressed against his ass, skin on skin and already panting with it, eyes closed so he didn’t have to face but Steve wasn’t letting him go that easily, not this time.

The word was so quiet he almost missed it, if his hands weren’t wrapped around ribs, vibration sensitivity through the roof he wouldn’t’ve felt it.

“Alllllujah,” the stolen whisper, tucked away from sight with Steve’s forehead heavy on Bucky’s scars, hands frozen on his waist, quiet and devout like the soft strumming chord of a favorite acoustic, sending the same chills right down Bucky’s spine, to the base of where they were connected, bound in flesh and spilt blood.

Allelujah.

He. He didn’t know what to say.

Steve wasn’t moving, curled around and inside him with his hands gripping tight and still fearfully distant like Bucky might shove him off any moment, whispering a faith he hadn’t practiced in years. Spilled over a prayer that wasn’t sarcastic or celebratory, just cold and broken and the most lost of cries, ugly duckling in the woods and Bucky didn’t understand, why would he say that when he didn’t mean it?

It took a moment longer than it should’ve, because it wasn’t instinctive. He didn’t have instincts of what the fuck to do around Steve anymore. Just careful thought, cautious as the hand he slowly, hesitantly placed on the back of Steve’s head. Reciprocating hold, cradling him close, human fingers gliding over the soft blonde to scratch in the short darker hair at the base of his neck, eyes stark open now as he stared wide-eyed over Steve’s bare shoulder.

Up at the ceiling, the bottom corner of his painting. The light from the hallway flickered, something akin to lantern light, the arched roof of a tent during the war. If Steve’d held him this way then…

It was dark green, hair pushed back from his eyes. Steve holding him tight like those crashing hugs every time a tank bit an explosion too close and the Commandos’ backs were turned, hands pulling each other from the earth and crushing together, a fleeting moment before sniper rifle and shield raised once more, a scene of French forests and European mountaintops and wood and fire and snow,

If Steve’d held him like this, moved with him like this back then, what would that've done? What would that’ve changed? There’s no way they could’ve still ended up here, through hell, if they’d held each other this way back then, when it was innocent and sweet and young, untainted unstained.

It felt like floating again, he was floating through clouds that’d never existed and every time Bucky floated he fell. Maybe that was why it never worked.

Steve’s hips drew back, sliding a thousand nerve endings into his spine, lifting up off Bucky’s shoulder to look down at him properly, pushing back in again fluid and sure, not so slow to drive him crazy, just perfect rock and draw back, pull out and push in, slide together again, apart, and Bucky was still floating, he was floating and he was gonna fall.

“Hold me down,” he whispered.

Steve’s eyebrows knit, hips stuttering in a pause of confusion and Bucky squeezed his eyes shut, head rolling to the side, all that blackness filled with sensation but the ground was nowhere near his feet and the higher he got the worse the damage when Steve dropped him again and “Hold me down,” he begged, rubbing his fingers against skin like that would change the sensors that told him he wasn’t touching anything, nothing at all atoms could never touch, it was all a goddamned illusion.

For a moment he really believed Steve was going to. One of the strong patented arms lifted, barring across his chest, the other gripping his unmarred shoulder tight to keep him from sliding and it was all there, all he had to do was take away the pain and instead, instead.

The hand on his shoulder released, smoothing out to stroke over his collarbone, arm across his chest lifting to tip his chin up, force Bucky’s eyes back on him and he’d known it’d be a losing battle but that didn’t keep his eyes from tearing up as they blinked open on torn blue.

Dance began again, hips slow sweet rocking in and outta his body like a dream and it wasn’t fair, he couldn’t. Bucky arched his neck, swiveled his hips against Steve’s faster, harder and Steve let him, met him in the middle but it was still sweet, insistent, sure, the furthest thing from rough, from the harsh punishment--

It wasn’t like he thought he didn’t deserve

just just that he couldn’t and Steve was being stubborn which meant there was no way out of this but to stop and Bucky could do anything but that.

“Steve, God, please.” Bucky rolled deeper on Steve’s cock again, wracking his hands up Steve’s hips, ribs, chest, two fingers tapping his heart in a weak plea, pressing hard against the skin and he could feel the beating, pounding strong and solid like everything else about his blonde angel.

The angel with aching hands that pulled him through clouds until there was no weight left, higher higher through the snowing mountains, higher higher each step up on the fire-escape.

The whole world still around the sweet rocking that was making him groan, less in the pleasure than frustration at it.

“Steve,” he tried one last time, dragging his thumbs across that beautiful throat, tightening himself around all that heat, heels digging into white spine.

The shaking exhale from wet lips wasn’t the one Bucky wanted, that soft precious look he kept dodging still staring down at him like honesty wouldn’t wreck this one moment of escape.

“Fuck, Steve, c’mon. Give m-me. Something.”

Deeper, more sure push inside, bodies curling together and the slightest curve on one side of Steve’s pretty mouth, blonde hair flopping down over his forehead all mischief and young.

“Oh Buck,” a patient exhale, stilling muscles and shifting hands, tangling pulses. Who they used to be, slowing down with this toxic, gentle sweetness--

I’m so sorry he opened his mouth to exhale. Steve’s lips blocked the way, overlapping his own to close their mouths together, tug apart with a scattering of sparks through his stuffed twisted brain, not making it half far enough to trickle down his spine.

Warm, sticky skin pressed to his forehead, the heat and those layers between their brains, pia mater to that sheen of sweat as Steve lapped at his mouth again, cradled his skull with their foreheads touching so sincere, gentle rocking in and out of his body and.

There used to be days that everyone loved him, now there was just one and it was too much.

He begged.

He begged again, hold me down, speed up, harder, more, something, anything, supposed to listen when he begged

Faithfully, Steve’s hands lightened their touch, hips rolling more and more intimately, treating him sweeter and more and more beautiful and Bucky couldn’t do it like this.

Tears prickled at the corner of his eyes and shutting them wasn’t doing anything to help, Steve’s lips were on his face, breath on his ear, caress down his thighs, rumbling sobs held at the brink of his throat, more than being lifted he was being shoved into the clouds and Steve loved him. Love and love and “Stop,” Bucky gasped and Steve froze so quickly tensed muscles pushed deeper bruises against skin, popping blood vessels beneath the surface that Bucky could feel with every inch of the functioning parts of his brain, hypersensitivity shooting his eyes open against the cold, Steve’d stopped. Steve was staring at him, lifted up with eyebrows knit and that flop of sweaty blonde the way the pieces unfurled when he took those fists to punching bags instead and if only it were so simple that Bucky could be his punching bag, maybe that was why it never worked.

The sob that broke from his throat wasn’t his fault.

It was Steve’s fault, dammit.

“Bucky? Buck, hey--” The voice from every dream broke through, trickling down between black skies and blinding stars, blinking enough to recognize the room just in time to catch Steve climbing off him.

“Stop,” Bucky managed again, reflexively slamming his ankles into Steve’s spine, keeping him inside. They couldn’t break apart now, this pit in his stomach--

It might be the last time they got to be like this, Bucky would shrivel and fall if Steve left him now.

Powder-white dust, caught by the wind and dragged down down down.

“What’s wrong? What do you need? Bucky?”

There was so much concern, hurt in that distant voice.

“Stop, fuck, Steve. I don’t fucking need anything, I don’t need--”

“Buck. Buck, it’s okay. What do you want? You want me to go?”

“St-steve, fuck. I. Just...stop, I don’t. I don’t deserve--”

His wrists slammed into the mattress, pinned so hard they didn’t even bounce. His eyes shot open, visions of tents and winters swimming, fading, gray light from the window on eyes so shadowed they looked brown, none of the piercing blue nonsense from behind closed ones.

“James Buchanan Barnes--”

“My g-god if you’re gonna propose again I swear,” he managed, half cursing under his breath and he couldn’t breathe right but Steve was holding his wrists down and there was a mattress beneath him, a young god above him and there may still be clouds outside their window but he wasn’t falling yet and it was too late to climb back now.

“There’s my boy,” Steve breathed, rubbing his thumbs into Bucky’s wrists, dipping down to kiss the neck stretched gracefully over white sheets. Bucky squirmed under his attention and Steve kissed him more, thighs trembling with the effort to keep still when Buck was still all heat and pressure around him.

“C’mon,” Buck mumbled again and Steve lifted up one last time, double-checking consent because he’d sobbed to stop after all. There were tear tracks down his temples that Steve wasn’t sure he even knew were there.

“You sure?”

“Rogers.” The attempted scold was despairingly weak, completely defenseless with that dark halo and his watering eyes, miles of naked beautiful skin, raw scars on his shoulder and warmth squeezing them tight together.

This was for his eyes only. The only person who ever got to see Buck like this, ever, and Steve could barely believe it, the wings Bucky’d painted onto his back. The trust he laid in Steve’s palms every time he let him open Buck up and join their bodies in this dance he never wanted to end.

“I love you,” Steve surrendered again and those crystal blues shut against his words like they were knives.

Was it that Buck still didn’t believe him by now or that he didn’t want it to be true? Or maybe those eyes were closed so Steve wouldn’t expect the promise back.

Buck had to love him back. Of course he did. He’d told Peggy he did then hid it to his heart so close he was just scared to say it now. He didn’t want to hurt Steve with it.

It was still about protecting him, right? Buck was shutting his eyes against Steve’s words to protect him. Too scared of hurting them both to say it aloud and maybe that was all he needed to do - show Buck he was safe, loved, tonight and then come dawn Buck could finally peel back the black and whisper those words under the golden morning sun.

Buck’s pretty lips parted in another call to make him move and Steve didn’t wait for the scolding, driving into slick, tight--

A broken sound from Bucky’s throat, back arching and fingers scrambling at Steve’s spine like he was falling. Steve scooped under tight shoulders, holding Buck secure as their bodies rocked together again.

There were lines next to Bucky’s eyes from how tight he was squeezing his eyes shut and Steve dipped down, pressed his lips to the crinkled skin, sweeping the kiss to both Bucky’s eyelids, saying with his lips what Buck wouldn’t hear aloud.

It was somewhere around the fourth soft kiss that his lips met with wet, a single pause to register the salt on his tongue, tears from whatever battle was ripping Buck apart on the inside leaking war wounds to the surface.

Kissing properly normally took too much focus when they were entwined like this but Steve didn’t care, slipping his nose down the side of Buck’s and tipping their mouths together, sliding his tongue alongside Bucky’s, tangling the taste of tears between them.

And it was like pulling the pin on a grenade, the way Buck started shaking, tightened all over and strung up on the highest of tightropes, swinging higher higher with each push of their bodies together. Hips speeding up, friction dragging aggrandized and pieces of broken souls, glass scattering away from slick skin.

Mouths just mashed together now, quick pistons in in in, deep enough to make Bucky cry out against Steve’s lips.

Rocking faster, harder, indentions in the mattress and sounds torn from them both, balance barely held by a deep blue string, oxygen cutting short.

His lungs strained for air in that distantly too-familiar and similarly strange loss of breath and Steve broke off, chest heaving as he gasped against the hard line of Bucky’s collarbone, forehead tucked against the thudding neck, pulse ricocheting through every long line of two hearts.
I’m yours.

(When it rains it pours.)

Steady hands sliding down to Bucky’s hips, holding him in place, closer to each other, oblivion, whiteout that’d leave them above clouds, watching the snow from afar for once, finally. More salt under his tongue as Steve sunk his teeth into Bucky’s neck, sucked dark into untouched skin, marks of everything Bucky was giving him because when dawn came Steve couldn’t have him forget, never again, both of them needed that proof.

The room was dark and time was moving so fast, swept up in a whirlwind of sweat and sounds and skin and the brush of metal down his spine, the clamp of ankles at the base of his back, Bucky’s head tipped back against the pillow in clinging bliss.

The trembles were violent now, throat wrecked with little sounds that wouldn’t stop, a litany of low ah ah ah ah’s that bled into Steve’s lips and matched each pant punch for punch. It burned so hot inside him he wasn’t sure he didn’t turn to flames over Bucky’s skin, stomach coiled into the tightest of knots, shaking all over as he held his only hope close and dashed together and Steve barely had the strength to lift up, eyes flickering over Bucky’s face as his back arched, right hand fumbling for a grip on Steve’s arm, chest flushed and skin glittering in gray moonlight, muscles seizing as he crashed.

Compressed and spinning on that tightrope, warm white painting their stomachs and mouth tipped open in a silent scream, taut and so stunningly beautiful Steve couldn’t believe this was his, Bucky was his, this moment, couldn’t possibly be real.

Steve’s hips pistoned and shook them both, then the space between his heart and Buck flushed warm as he still, spilling into Bucky’s body, mouths slipping together in delirious heat, swirling waves, clinging to the only thing that’d made it through ice and fire with him to reach the other side, devotion of the sweetest heartbreak, spilling a river of promises into his body and maybe, when they hit the bottom, the jump’d taken them someplace untouchable where they only lost everything to each other.

Bucky’s palm stroked the back of his head, barely, lightly smoothing down down and Steve didn’t bother staving his weight, collapsed in full on Bucky’s bare chest, throbbing heartbeat beneath his ear and hesitant fingers stroking the back of his neck.

“I love you,” Steve whispered, tightening his grip at the catch between Bucky’s ribcage, the sharp intake of breath like they were still blades. What was floating around inside that beautiful mind to make bones cave and cringe from his own? Why? Why?

He couldn’t live without Buck, how could Bucky not get that, how could he still pull away when he knew fair well the pieces of Steve he was shredding every time?

Planting a hand on Buck’s sternum, Steve pushed up, blinking through the gray light buzzing cortex, taking in the deepened dip in his chin, twisted mouth, tightened-shut eyes glittering at the corners again.

“Bucky?”

A single snifflle and Bucky blinked open his eyes, little shake of his head as he lifted up a touch to look back at Steve. “Mm?”

“Are you—”
The sudden rise of Bucky’s chest shut him up before the aggrandized sigh did, snapping his mouth shut as he watched crystal turn back to the ceiling, dull light from the window reflecting off the shining corners.

It was still settling in, everything was too sensitive right now but Bucky wasn’t shoving Steve off or rolling out of bed or bawling his eyes out so maybe they just needed to sleep a moment and everything would be so soft and sweet in the morning that they could just work it all out then, over more raspberry sherbet breakfast in bed.

Everything would be alright once they slept. After all, hadn’t the conversation started with that? How Bucky hadn’t slept in ages? Weeks, if Steve were to guess. The exhaustion straining his face was visible even through the soft endorphins glow.

“Sleep?” Steve offered, running his fingers through the smooth hair by tear-stained temples. Bucky’s gaze flickered to his for a half-millisecond, turning away again before Steve could show him all the promises he held in his soul.

The tiniest of nods and Bucky’s eyes slipped back closed before Steve could say another word, check anything else. But maybe it was for the best for once, so long as Bucky actually slept. Knowing him, he’d pretend until Steve nodded off and then he’d lay awake staring at the ceiling all maudlin and

It was Steve’s turn to see Buck asleep first. He just had to stay awake long enough--

The darkness falling was only making it harder to breathe.

Steve was passed out, carefully rolled onto the mattress with his spine to Bucky, ten minutes of internal battle before he finally placed his fingers alongside the bare ridge.

Eyes wide open.

Full of tears and wide open.

His chest ached, the raw open kind from crying too much. Stuttering oxygen, hitched between shut-down sobs.

At one point the edges of his vision started blurring not tears and Bucky shook his head, dislodging the long strands he’d forgotten about, tangling down into his eyelashes.

He’d been so sure he’d be rid of it.

All of it.

It was never gonna go away, was it?

He didn’t have the strength to shove the snakes from his face. Bucky simply closed his eyes, willed himself to stay awake this way. Couldn’t miss a single thing.

It was funny, that urge, the one that he couldn’t spend a single moment at Steve’s side not awake and aware because he’d be losing so much - that feeling was stronger tonight than it’d been for weeks past.

That pit in his stomach, the one from when Steve was coughing out a lung with pneumonia on his deathbed, that pit that kept him awake for days on end-- this time, weeks on end

-- it clenched harder, twisted his stomach even more tonight. He couldn’t miss anything. Not one breath, all this time he’d spent making sure, just had to protect Steve one more night, had to keep him safe and save them both, better, save them both…

He fell asleep fifteen minutes after Steve did. For the first time in weeks, months, however long it’d been, Bucky wasn’t just missing something, he was missing all of it.

And funny enough?

It was the first night he’d broken the vow to watch over Steve in his sleep and it was last night he’d ever get the chance to.

~~~

The morning light came filtering in through the windows like a Kinkade, glowing and full instead of pale streaks and the corner of Steve's mouth twitched up as he shoved the pillow under his head a little puffier.

Just his and Buck's bedroom, all that sunrise. Warm bare feet tangled up between his own, skin-warmed metal resting against his spine. Those arms didn't need to be wrapped around him, it was more than enough just to know Buck was here, with him, sleeping and safe and warm and beautiful naked beneath their sheets--

Sleeping. Did Bucky Barnes actually get sleep for once in his goddamned life?

The curiosity overruled the peacefulness and Steve picked up his head, swiveling just enough to peer over his shoulder.

There he was, dark hair fanned out on the pillow, pouty lips slack and fingers curled protectively against Steve's spine, beautiful haunting eyes closed. Bucky was sleeping.

Steve turned back to the window, head plopping down on the pillow and now, there was a real smile on his face.

Steve’d dozed back into drifting gold at some point, because he was sleeping when Bucky woke.

Woke.

His eyes shot open, coronas instantly burning enough to make him flinch and squint.

The sunlight filtering through Steve’s hair, golden reflections bouncing over too-white sheets--

Lights blinding, he’d had no idea how bright they’d be. He was supposed to keep his eyes wide open, or else his arms wide open, anything open everything open, up in the clouds not letting go because below him was blackness, everything closed, and the moment his fingers loosened that bar peeled away and back down through the snow and cold he goes--

The muscles in Steve’s shoulders shifted and Bucky startled, hand retracting like fire, crystal shot wide and taut frozen, hovering, he’d forgotten he wasn’t alone because he was always alone and the moment Steve turned around and saw him he’d know, he already knew too much and if Steve rolled over and whispered I love you one more time then Bucky’d jump out the goddamned window, the fall from that height would be less painful than the one he’d have to face by opening his mouth and he couldn’t couldn’t Steve just had to go back to sleep and Bucky’d carefully slowly roll off the other side of the bed and throw on clothes and sneak out the bedroom and slink down the hallways and slip into the shadows and out the door and down the stairs and onto the streets into the crowd through the morning bustle and out of Steve’s life forever if he’d just shift and fall back asleep, keep those damning blue eyes closed then it could all be over right now, this morning, so long as he didn’t turn around then they could avoid falling of any sort Bucky could just leave and not keep holding his breath waiting waiting waiting

“Mmm, morning,” Steve mumbled, weight shifting and mattress creaking and then he was looking at Bucky and it was

All

Over.

There must’ve been more water in his veins than blood, for his arms and legs to stiffen like this, cryofrozen lingering as he stared wide-eyed and unblinking at the sharp angles of Steve’s face and the soft smile underneath blue blue summer sky and suddenly wrinkling brow.

“Bucky?” Are you alright?

Steve’s left hand reached for him and Bucky’s left hand coiled, plates shifting loudly and rippling up his hand wrist arm elbow shoulder down his spine and into his brain and waking him right the fuck up.

The carpet weaved peskily between the indentations of his toes, short and thankfully not as slick as the sheets, barely enough traction to get him across the room to his dresser, wood shrieking as a drawer snapped open, clothes found and unraveling, perfect balance as he slipped one foot into boxers, then pants, hands already grabbing a tshirt by the time Steve’s fingers closed around his wrists.

He’d had the sense to throw on sweats on his way over but Bucky wished he’d taken the time to get dressed entirely in uniform, red gloves and all so he couldn’t feel that damned morning-warm skin against his wrists.

“--c-cky,” drifted in hollow, echoing distantly in a faded background. Bucky’d stopped moving when Steve’s fingers closed around his wrists, head cocked as he contemplated the right twist.

The first forty escapes he ran through his head meant broken fingers for Steve and he couldn’t do that again, but forty-one was a simple enough twist and slide that’d save those artist hands from damage and the moment he located it, Bucky was back outta Steve’s grip, ten steps backwards as he threw the tshirt over his head, nearly at the door by the time it popped over the messy brown snakes around his face and the temporary lapse in sight cost him the escape, because Steve was already slamming the door - his out - shut.

Bucky stopped, staring at Steve. Spun on his heel and started for the window.

Steve’s arms caught him around the waist, dragging him backwards from behind and Bucky twisted, spinning with a shove and every other time, that’d freed him from Steve’s arms.

Apparently enough times that he expected it now, because suddenly he was back in Steve’s arms only they were face to face and Bucky’s heart was beating so fast the corners of the room at the ceiling were starting to become despairingly sharp.

“It’s gonna hurt,” Bucky swore, low and grating and it wasn’t a threat, not at all, because he could never hurt Steve and Steve knew that. He was talking about him.

Steve knew that.

“I’m not gonna let anything hurt you Buck,” he tried, circling his arms tighter as Bucky tried to wiggle free again. The glaze in his eyes was fading though, clarity cutting through in pieces and he could see it, how much the battle was costing them both.

Another struggle and Steve let Bucky gain a bit of distance, secure at arms length so he could see that beautiful, torn face, make Bucky look him in the eye, hear every touch of sincerity and seriousness as he demanded, “Can’t you trust me to protect you?

“Not from this,” Bucky grit, yanking free. Steve didn’t bother grabbing him again, the crazed fog in his eyes was gone, he wasn’t jumping out the window anytime soon. Instead he stumbled three feet backwards and hardened the vulnerability behind crystal, glaring at Steve and lifting his chin to keep it from wobbling with tears that Steve wasn’t fool enough to miss anymore.

Bucky was the only one fool enough to pretend anymore. Not from this, he spat. This.

“And that's the problem. The one thing that you should trust me with you can’t.” Steve squared his shoulders, jaw, aware of how he had to look, the same face he’d given Fury in that cave in the ground I didn’t know about Barnes. None of them ever would. Maybe even Steve.

“You've never let me take care of you. You've never seen me as an equal.” Bucky’s arms crossed over his chest, jaw clicking as his eyes flickered away, something akin to guilt or murder or whatever the fuck Bucky even was anymore. It wasn’t fair, why wouldn’t he just say it? Instead, instead he got this.

“It's always ‘look out for Stevie.’” Bucky flinched as Steve threw up an arm and Steve was so beyond freaking out about that right now, not when for all he knew it was intentional, anything to get them off the subject Bucky’d been running away from since 1938.

Or 1943. That night in the bar, when he should’ve told Steve the goddamned truth.

Steve narrowed his eyes, spitting the accusation before he could soften again to hands that’d done nothing but shove him away. “You may have followed that little kid from Brooklyn, but you never let me lead you to safety.”

Defiant lifted chin, split with that dimple Steve used to tease him for before everything went to hell.

“I have no one but myself, you're never gonna get that.”

Bucky’s eyes were on his now, as stubborn and defiant as Steve used to be, as they both used to be before they’d crumbled and it was all facades now, the righteousness. There was nothing left but echoing hollow masks of what they used to be and that anger wasn’t anger.

Fire became ash.

They were dead already, entwined fingers in mortal graves so why was Bucky still hanging from the tips of the stars, burning his hands before he dare drop to the jaws of death, like this was still about saving Steve from himself?
“I’m here, Bucky. Never going anywhere. But you’re--” accusing point that just hardened crystal, “--still hung up on protecting me. Seeing me as less. Still. The Captain thing was always a joke to you.”

“I respect your title,” Bucky shot back and Steve could’ve laughed, if there was a bone left in his body that didn’t ache.

The fucking way Bucky looked at him. Sergeant James Barnes and his charge, Captain Rogers.

Right, yeah, respect. Bucky’d given him a lot, but never that. If he did, if he respected Steve a single ounce, he’d fucking say he loved him. Or at least respect him enough to admit he never could say it, that it was too hard or painful or whatever. Anything but hanging him from fraying black thread like this.

“I may’ve been your CO, but you never saw me as one. I was the little kid to protect, not someone you respect. Cap always sounded like a joke from your mouth.”

“Really? Does it matter to you that much?”

“You matter to me! How you feel about me! I’m not some toy soldier for you to tuck away in a drawer, I’m still a fucking person underneath the uniform, Buck.”

“You wanna talk about soldiers? I dragged you out from underneath that uniform! You were entirely lost without me, in case you forgot.”

“I’m not the one who fucking forgot.”

“Fuck you,” Bucky snapped back, bitter and sharp as the expression on Steve's face. "All I’ve done is pull your ass outta the fire.”

“You think I don’t know that? That’s what it’s fucking about! Always protecting, saving, rescuing me and you won’t let me return the favor for a moment. You never fucking have.”

“There’s --” A calculated, frustratingly controlled inhale as Bucky leaned back on his heels, stared up at the ceiling with his dark hair dangling, adams apple bobbing as the sparks in his words squandered for impatient, slow elucidance. “...nothing wrong with me.”

Like Steve was the crazy one. Right. Like Steve was the one asking too much like Steve was the one fucking everything up like it was all just Steve Steve Steve who couldn’t even say a simple thing like I love you like he was asking the fucking stars from Bucky’s sky instead of a single reassurance that it wasn’t all for fucking nothing, like this was somehow Steve’s fault, he’d spent his entire life blaming himself and he was done, he was fucking done hating himself for every time Bucky’d turned away because it wasn’t Steve’s fault.

“Right, yeah.” Steve scoffed, shaking his head in disbelief because Bucky’d always been good at evading, but this was an entirely different level, pinning this all on Steve. Making Steve think he was asking too much so he’d stop asking, anything he had to tell himself to keep Steve safe because in some twisted part of Bucky’s brain that made sense.

“Except that you can't say you love me. If I thought you honestly didn't, or didn't want to, I'd never push this on you, Bucky. But I'm not gonna let you ruin us both because you see me as some sickly kid you have to take care of.”

Buck’s eyes turned down from the ceiling to glare at him again and Steve met the challenge, a single step closer but Buck was stubborn, didn’t move an inch, not even to breathe, just glared at Steve because he couldn’t handle the truth and Steve was done letting them Not Talk About It.
He’d say it over and over and over until Bucky got it.

He finally had the words for it now, the reason why they’d fought the wars and lost each other and never said, never spoken. The reason Bucky’d broken under Hydra’s reign with a single whisper of Steve’s name but couldn’t say to Steve’s face why.

“Because you’re so scared of losing me you’re pushing me away.”

One foot in front of the other, two steps closer and they were as close now as they were that first night in the bar, except the golden sun was so much harsher now than all those soft bar lights.

“Because you’re so scared to let go and hurt me that you’re destroying yourself instead.”

All he wanted, all he wanted was for Buck to keep him and all he got was tossed aside through cobwebs of years and past heartbreak to stave the possibility of distinguishing the only flame that could light the yellow brick road of the future.

“I can’t watch you shred your heart to save mine—”

“I don’t see you as breakable anymore, Steve.” Bucky straightened, took a half-step forward of his own, lips pinched in the corners, the first sign he was getting pissed. Good. Good, better to be fucking pissed than that dead emotionless thing he’d been forcing for the past century.

It was still lies though. Bucky didn’t see him as breakable? Steve’d never forget the look of horror that’d crossed those features every time Bucky’d glanced upon the bandage wrapping his hand, snapped bones that’d proven what could happen if that control dropped for a moment, that’d proven Bucky could destroy Steve inside a single lapsed second and now he held tighter to that control than ever because

“That’s exactly how you see me.”

One cocked, pissed eyebrow, face painted into a clear yeah, you wouldn’t fuckin’ know. Why? Oh, that’s right, Bucky didn’t tell him shit.

Steve huffed, shaking his head once because right, of course Bucky was pulling that expression, that flippant nonchalance, straight-faced lies right to his face, like Steve hadn’t spent his entire life growing up beside.

“I’m not terrified of hurting you.”

It was the least convincing lie Bucky’d ever spoken aloud and that was saying a lot.

“I don’t believe that.”

“So fucking what?”

“So what? Bucky, this is our lives—”

“Second, third, fifth lives, and we haven’t gotten it right before, what makes you think this is what’s missing?”

“It’s the only thing that makes sense!”

“None of this makes sense, Steve!”

“Because you won’t let it!”
“I’m not the one shoving us into boxes with labels--”

“Labels, really? Really? All I want is for you to say you love me--”

“Why? Why is that so goddamned important? Oh, wait, don’t tell me, because apparently I’ve been in love with you my entire life and I’m just too fucking scared to say it, right?”

“You’re fucking terrified. Why else would you lie to my face about how you’ve felt for the past century? I was there, the day that you almost said it, everytime you’ve almost said it and it’s always almost with us, years of silence that ended up being more important than every word--”

“According to you.”

“According to me, who’s known you my entire life.”

“Can’t know me that well, or maybe we wouldn’t still be fighting!”

“We’re fighting because you’re terri--”

“I’m not terrified of saying it!”

“Yes you are!”

“No, I’m not!”

“James Buchanan B--”

“Steven Grant Rogers, I’m not terrified of hurting you and I’m not terrified of the idea of loving you!”

The shout echoed around the room and Steve let it, both their chests expanding, heavy breathing as the words fell down down into silence, further and further until the speeding train whipped them out of sight entirely and Steve clung to the side of the train, whipping cold, hands gripping metal so tight he could feel the ice through his leather gloves, face twisted up, eyes squeezed shut in pain and a sob caught in his throat. The only thing caught, because he’d just reached for Bucky’s hand and he’d missed.

He’d missed.

“Prove it.” Voice dropped to The Challenge, I can do this all day.

Bucky’s eyebrow went up and Steve squared his jaw, glaring across the distance at his best friend. “Hit me.”

The other eyebrow went up too.

“What?”

“Prove it. Hit me.”

If Bucky was gonna be all self-assured and stubborn, rubbing that lie in Steve’s face and grinding him to the ground under his heel, Steve was going to call his fucking bluff.

Because Bucky wasn’t gonna do it.
Bucky’d never hit him, because Bucky’d never hurt him, because Bucky loved him. And standing here, sliding down the thick black cable towards a speeding train, Steve knew he wasn’t gonna do it.

They avoided the train wreck the first time, dropping down to land atop Bucky’s shallow grave, the instrument of both their deaths rushing through the ice beneath their feet and the slow motion train wreck of the past months wasn’t derailing now.

Bucky wouldn’t.

The corner of Steve’s mouth turned up, lips parting to say something smartass that he’d gotten his ass kicked for a thousand times in alleys, some smart remark that Bucky’d shake his head at and pull Steve into a hug for with that affectionate punk or some other exasperated declaration of love that was anything but I love you.

He didn’t see it coming.

Bucky didn’t wait to hear Steve’s smartass remark. Didn’t haul him in for a hug.

The metal arm hauled back.

And Bucky swung.

See, Steve knew he wouldn’t. Steve knew Bucky’d never hit him, because that’s what this was all about.

It had to be about protecting Steve. About Bucky being so scared of the strength of their love and how it could crush them both if he finally let go, surrendered.

Had to be that Bucky knew loving Steve could hurt him. That Bucky’d rather go through the hell of not being together than hurt him again.

It had to be about saving Steve. That had to be the reason.

Because then at least Bucky loved him.

But.

But the imprint of metal knuckles were smarting on his jaw. Copper, blooming inside his mouth. That wasn’t.

Bucky’d hit him. Bucky’d hurt him. Bucky’d chosen to hurt him. To prove it.

To prove.

It wasn’t about--

Steve’s jaw was on fire and Bucky was just standing there and it wasn’t about protecting Steve.

It wasn’t about anything. It was simple.

Bucky didn’t.

Bucky didn’t love him.
Bucky didn’t love him.

Bucky. Didn’t love him.

Bucky didn’t love him.

Bucky didn’t--

Steve stared at his hand. It was shaking, like the peeled-back tin of the train’s side, shaking and trembling in the cold.

Steve blinked down at his hand, watched as a single drop of blood dripped onto the back of his knuckles. Blood from his mouth.

Bucky’d just hit him.

Steve stared at the blood on his knuckles and watched his hand curl into a fist.

Always.

Every moment, every backalley bruise, every wartime worrying grasp…

Building.

Pressure, building and building over all those years,

More and more and more and.

Suspended. The edge, the lingering second at the very top of the Coney Island Cyclone. The single pause at the peak of the mountain, shoulder to shoulder and looking down at the gap - mind the gap - at the end of the world, the final glance before the jump - maintenant! - down the sliding rope to the train Bucky died on. The moment before the drop, the final peak that built for centuries and the cart was tipping, ready to fall down in the abyss and Steve’s stomach would drop and he knew he’d throw up again, like last time. Payback, right?

Now why would I do that.

Didn’t matter.

It was finally, breathtakingly clear, up here among the sun and the moon and the stars and the black night sky, hands curled into fists and gold shattered in his chest.

Bucky.

Bucky Barnes.

Bucky Barnes didn’t love him.

The world didn’t flicker sepia for a soldier, or red for we did what we had to and sometimes we didn’t sleep so well killer. The world didn’t flicker black because he didn’t get the chance to forget a moment of this, not like Bucky did.

The world went white at the edges.

The tremor shot up his knuckles like the sparks of electric fence all those decades ago, the slightest scratch across thinly skinned bones from the scruff on Bucky’s jaw. The snap, the sound, the flash in crystal before it all shattered and Steve’s fist followed through fast enough to nearly throw his shoulder and the Winter Soldier was on the ground.

Landed on his hands and knees, cat he always was, blood dripping onto the floor beneath all that beautiful long hair and Steve swayed on his feet for two white-world moments before the metal hand curled against the hard ground and that sound, the whirr--

Snap, shook the earth beneath his feet and Steve was the one on his knees now.

With Bucky’s collar in one fist and the other swinging back again, spinning swirling enough to nearly miss but his hands were big, always had been and if there was one thing he’d always known it was exactly where Barnes was. Didn’t matter if the world was white black red or something in between, his hands always found Buck, always had.

And now it was purple, blue and mottled, blue like Bucky’s eyes flashed sometimes--

What kind of sentence was this?

The Winter Soldier wasn’t hitting him back. The metal arm was whirring, fingers wrapped around his stationary wrist but they weren’t crushing the bones, weren’t even trying to pull him off.

He wasn’t sure if it was the pullback he wasn’t feeling or the follow through, but one of them didn’t exist because it was just collide and collide and collide and he could feel every single reverberation up through his knuckles into his shoulder, neck, brainstem, behind his eyes.

It was blurry, everything was blurry behind his eyes but he could see enough, feel enough to know the hand closed around his wrist wasn’t doing the slightest thing to stop him, let alone hit back, that pretty sweet-talking mouth wasn’t even rambling off some nonsense to talk him outta whatever mess Steve’d landed them in.

So what, Bucky was better than fighting him now?

Made him believe a lie his entire life and turned it all on Steve as the mastermind in the end? Broke Steve’s heart and let him take the sword through the stomach too?

He’d had no problem breaking everything in Steve’s life from his safety to his job to his face to heart to his bones to his soul but now he was above fucking fighting back?

Steve’d been sick, for so long, and Bucky’d taken care of him. Steve didn’t get sick anymore. Bucky’d been trained to take care of him, wipe him off the board. But neither of those bruises were sinking in deep enough to stop a single thing.

Bucky hit him. He proved it, proved everything Steve’d spent a lifetime convincing himself was just. Wrong.

He’d been wrong. And now Bucky was being the saint again, thrown the single punch and withdrawn like a good soldier, turned Steve into the monster with his surrendering hands and snapping head, the blossoming blue and purple around crystal piercing eyes that kept on finding his, after every punch, each lock of their gazes together that ripped a hundred times deeper than every time their eyes had turned away, broken like shattering glass as fists slammed into sharp cheekbone, defined jawbone.

And in the end they did it all again.

So he lost it.
He. He needed this to be the reason why, that Bucky couldn't handle the idea of hurting him so he'd hid his love all those years - but if Buck could hit him, that wasn't it.

There was...nothing stopping Bucky from loving him. Just, simply. Bucky didn't.

Run til the end of his life and he'd finally caught up to Buck's footprints in the snow but they were fake, leading him to the edge of a cliff and shoving him right over to tumble down screaming this time.

Bucky didn't love him.

After all this time and all those years and every tear he'd shed and every scream from Bucky's lips tortured on Steve's behalf, in place of the super soldier Hydra couldn't find so they made their own their own that was sent to kill him and couldn't, hovered there with his metal fist glinting in the air and the wildest most terrified pain in his watering eyes, hair whipping across his face in this beautiful, stark realization of everything the bruised battered face below Bucky's hand was promising, the promise of unconditional eternal love that had Steve following him right into the dark, skipping the trip wire with fake smiles and the fear of falling apart --

Truth finally be told, Bucky never was his.

"You bastard," Steve choked, curled hand on Bucky's chest pushing him harder against the ground, fist reeling back to land in emphasis on the next half-sob,

"You promised." Bucky's jaw snapped to the side, water mixing with the bloody split on his cheekbone. His head just rolled on the carpet, straightened back right in time for the next wail to his skull.

"Promised it'd b-be us, you and me to the end--" another choked sound and salt rolled over his lips, salt instead of copper so he was crying but Steve'd swear it was blood leaking the way his insides scraped.

It was lucky he was right-handed, his wedding ring would wreak serious - more serious, anyways - damage.

Wedding ring. They were...he'd honestly believed he'd get to marry the love of his life.

He'd honestly believed that.

"You never meant it," Steve gasped, head spinning and vision blurring at the edges, hand in Bucky's collar tightening enough to bring him an inch off the ground and Bucky just let him, let him the same way he'd let Steve believed he'd loved him when he never had.

Never. All the way back, no matter how far, none of it meant that. Bucky Barnes had never--

"You never loved me." The words felt like bullets to the chest, knives to his hands, electrical fence around his boots with no one to save him from the storm this time because there they were. Aloud.

Bucky's head snapped back with that punch and Steve just reeled back again, snapping harsh and violent with every single word,

"You." Punch.

"Never." Punch.
"Loved." Punch.

"Me." Punch.

Bucky was on the ground, pinned beneath Steve's weight, beneath the wild blonde halo, disheveled enough to have a few strands strayed over his forehead, fringing on the edge of his watery, spilling pure blue eyes, twisted mouth in horror at everything Bucky'd done.

Fist raised, paused and hovering in the air as his beautiful bare chest heaved, all that strong golden muscle up to his bloody knuckles that were kinda blurry with how swollen Bucky's left eye was.

Steve'd seen this picture once. It wasn't lost on Bucky, the reverse image he'd seen in a hundred nightmares, the flashes of Steve's orange-mottled broken face beneath his hand as the helicarrier exploded around them and Bucky made the single most important decision of his life.

Because Steve'd opened his stupid stubborn mouth and that's exactly what Bucky owed him now.

What he should say:

I do.

I do love you. God, Stevie, I love you more than everything in my entire life.

I always have.

I always will.

To the end of the line.

That's what he should say. That's what his parted lips should croak out in this single moment, the second chance he had at the single most important choice in his life.

If only he had an enemy bigger than himself, he could have won.

Bucky was on the ground for once and Steve'd finally lost it, the way Bucky'd always been so scared of. Scared for Steve, not himself.

He'd die here by Steve's hand without second thought. He'd do anything. All the torture he'd known had never felt like this but Bucky'd.

Bucky'd take this. For Steve. For his boy.

"I'm not gonna stop you," Bucky said, voice shot and raspy, parted lips splitting more bits of copper over his tongue with every movement but Stevie was hovering there over him and Bucky'd kept his mouth shut since he'd learned how to speak, it was his turn to pull out the fighting words now.

"This is who you are," Bucky managed, choking a bit on the blood dripping to his throat, scratching vocal chords around it, no way to silent his soul now. "Since the first time I D-dragged you outta that alley, giving you everything's been...my life, Steve."

Steve'd looked up at him and said then finish it. Bucky'd had no idea in hell what to do with that. But he'd make it clear for Steve, as fucking clear as the ice he'd shattered through at the bottom of his first fall in frozen alabaster.
Bucky swallowed, scuffed throat and fall apart, opening his split lips to make one last reverent rasped promise.

"You've...always been my mission."

Один Два Три I can't let you go. Answer's easy and we finally got it right.

Steve stared at him, wide-eyed and shaking, shaking, small as he'd been back then and larger than life, dark blue angel dripping red, his red, and Bucky could still remember the exact rip inside his chest as Steve looked up at him and croaked, cause I'm with you--

"I'll never finish it," Bucky told him, shredded in broken glass, forties fire behind blinding stars and maybe now, he'd finally get Steve to understand. Broken and more twisted cry than etched declaration but Bucky was goddamned saying it anyways.

"To the en--"

"Get out."

The voice that interrupted him was more hoarse than his was, gravel buried in skinned knees bloody noses black eyes.

Bucky blinked up at him and Steve's grip on his tshirt vanished, dropping him the last inch to the ground, head slamming but he couldn't stop staring at Steve.

Steve, who was choking on tears and muted sobs, bloody knuckles pressed to his mouth, head turned and eyes averted and throat burnt.

"Just go," he rasped again, repeat flooded with so much emotion Bucky couldn't even blink. "Get outta here."

And that was it.

Back to the start, Steve's arm waving across the fiery gap between them, barely together for a moment before the world lifted a barrier of flames and broken metal, determination between knit eyebrows, strong despairing serious shout,

"Just go! Get outta here!"

Prove it.

He had, from the glinting chain around his neck to the death grip on the banister as he shouted back the one thing that mattered most, above all of it, above what he'd shouted to Peggy, above what he'd whispered to the mirror yesterday to make him cry, above the broken promises and the falling because.

Because that was his best friend.

No, not without you.

Bucky choked on a mutilated cough and Steve deflated, falling off to one side still folded on his knees, hand properly covering his mouth now as the tears puddled along his thumb, seeped between his fingers the same way the broken sobbing noises did.

Bucky blinked at the ceiling and noted distantly that he was dizzy enough to make the ground feel like it was tipping, everything was tipping and he'd never held tight enough not to slide right off.
He'd always known one day Steve would leap into the abyss, drag them both to the edge when Bucky was so goddamned terrified of heights--

He'd promised the jump but they'd never landed. Broken ankles and a hundred feet further apart because cold really couldn't break a landing, just ask his bloody detached arm.

Sweetness turned to sorrow and then came the bitterness, blessed sadness tangling, dumped on the floor at newspapers shoes gone bare feet, dirty soles from pitch black streets and fading crooked smiles as he cleaned out each of Steve's petulant wounds, two kids weren't alright and sometime between cleaning the cuts on Steve's white cheekbones and making them,

Bucky'd realized there were battles he did not get to fight for him.

The sunrise had been a ruse. It was nearing storm season in Brooklyn and sometime between the blinding lights when he'd first opened his eyes to the crash of the door as it swung open on its hinges and emptied him onto the sidewalk, the sun had disappeared.

Looming storm clouds in its place and the pavement was already slick, tinted green by the industrial lights flickering by the docks behind their apartment building, reflecting in the puddles stretched across the ground, shadowing purple and black clouds that'd gathered above.

The streets looked like a goddamned ghost town. The Brooklyn Bridge Park and John Street bridge were both eerily empty - sudden storms and dropping temperatures did that to the tourists. They were just fading outta tourist season, august skies dropping for oncoming september chill.

A particularly cold burst of wind whipped at his face and Bucky ducked his head down, cursing the weather and the world in general. He didn't have a collar to hide his face in, or a black plastic mask for that matter.

He’d left the apartment barren, not a single thing to hold.

But his hands weren’t the emptiest.

Bucky’s heart was.

The sky thundered again, world already dark from the black clouds overhead. As the crashing grumble faded, a distant thudding overtook the silence. Instinctive curiosity made him pause at the edge of the apartment building, scanning the alley distractedly and straining to hear the sound under the wind.

A muffled thump, too familiar scuffling boots and the door he’d fallen out of burst open behind him. That was the point Bucky stopped listening. He didn't need to hear anymore, although he doubted he'd be able to over the pounding of his heart in his ears. Steve.

He didn't have time to register the flash of lightning in the sky or the anger that should be consuming him because Steve was such a fucking idiot for chasing him down like this. The only thing running through Bucky was fear, pure unadulterated fear for Steve and why in the world would he do this to himself after everything Bucky’d done to try to prevent it and god, oh god, he couldn't take another beating when his chest was still fucked up and he wouldn't be able to shield himself again he was done, destroyed, didn’t have the strength for one more ounce of a lie and Steve.
Feet pounding the slick pavement and Bucky couldn’t bring himself to move, to duck into the shadows of the alley because Steve’d always find him anyways.

Cautiousness and protection from the cold be damned. He was bleeding and already dead, it couldn’t get any worse but he should be running, because it could get worse for Steve. He’d wrecked everything to save Stevie and honestly?

He didn’t have it in him to pick himself up and walk away again. That last act, shoving himself up and stumbling around Steve’s lifeless soul to fall down to the streets outside their windows, that was the last reserve of energy he had to call on.

If Steve told him to go again, Bucky couldn’t. He was too weak. Viciously selfish. He’d damn them both and stay before he managed to rip himself from Steve’s arms again.

If only Steve would just turn around, go back inside, save himself from this storm maybe they’d come out the other end without coughing bloody to their deathbeds in a week.

Flash of too-familiar panicked anger, hands coiled into tight, warped fists, grabbing Bucky’s shoulder and spinning him around so fast they both skid on the slick ground. Steve. The long clotted eyelashes and soft fucked-up hair and strong, trembling jaw didn’t spare the energy to yell, he was too pissed. Scared. They were kinda the same thing lately, weren't they?

On the inside Bucky was struggling to stand, wishing Steve would crowd him, haul up the frail body with hands that were shaking too.

“Steve. Steve, god, fuck, what were you doing out here, you knew it was gonna storm you fucking dimwit, are you okay? Steve? Stevie, look at me. Are you okay?”

His eye was swollen and there was blood dripping down his cheek and the bruises on his jaw probably made him look like hell but Steve was staring at him like Bucky was still the most beautiful thing he’d ever seen.

“Stevie,” Bucky cracked, and he couldn’t think of a single other thing to say but it didn’t matter, his best friend took the final step between them, hands framing Bucky’s face - hard and solid on the right side, soft and so so careful on the left side bruises - and pulled him in.

A sting of pain shot through his face as their lips pressed together, split reopening under Steve’s touch and seeping copper into both their mouths but it didn’t stop Steve from kissing him, tongue darting out to carefully slide over the raw bloody mark, apologetic but not soothing, nothing could soothe the superficial wounds when they’d split his soul a lot deeper than his lip.

And the damage to his soul couldn’t be any worse at this point.

So Bucky kept his eyes shut, wrapped his arms around Steve’s waist, and let Steve kiss him here underneath the storm clouds on a dark Brooklyn street.

Steve’s hands found their way down to his shoulders, gathered Bucky closer. The quiet pained sound at the pressed bruise on Bucky’s chest was lost between their sweeping lips and it was only the familiar smell, taste, sense of Steve that held the wave of nausea at bay.

He should break off. Push Steve away. Stop kissing him back so desperately, stop the chills down his spine every time his bottom lip tugged and they broke to crash together again. They shouldn’t do this. Not if Steve wanted him gone.

As much as he didn’t wanna hurt Steve, they had to go. It’d be a hell of a lot worse if they didn’t get
But Steve held all that was left of Bucky’s dead heart in his hands, letting Bucky kiss him harder, deeper, leaning his weight on Bucky’s supporting hands and. That scared him more than the frightened curl of Steve's fingers in the back of Bucky's hair.

He’d been trained in detecting every environmental change possible. When the air suddenly got heavy around them, a thousand alarm bells sounded in some distant part of his mind he’d never been able to untrain. He could practically hear it, the impending storm in the air. The quivering tension around them, the wind whipping at their bodies as they kissed so desperately like this could fix a single thing.

They still had too far, there was too much space between them and the river home, let alone the white gates Steve deserved to live behind.

The storm was coming for them. It was coming to take them both. Artist hands slid back to Bucky’s jaw, pulling him ever closer and Bucky made a pained sound, breaking off with a gasp.

"Sorry, sorry." Steve muttered helplessly, fingers flitting over the bruises with that awful look in his eyes, too close to look at and not drown.

"'S fine," he managed, eyes dropping from that heavy heavy sorrow. It hurt, but. It was the right thing, putting it all in the rearview. The words outta his mouth weren’t--

Just weren’t.

When he glanced back up, Steve was still looking at him, blinking against the wind with watering eyes and Bucky wanted to tell him to stop, to cover his eyes or something because there was that one year the wind had gotten so bitter that Steve's eyes had watered over and it'd been so cold the tears froze and Bucky'd been terrified Steve was going to get frostbite and permanently lose his eyes like the kid three blocks over. He'd breathed warm air over the pretty blue, lighting up one of their precious rare matches and holding it close to Steve's face, apologizing profusely and holding Steve's head still so he didn't get burnt while Bucky warmed up his skin.

At the time, Steve’s vision was too blurred and fucked up to see the burns Bucky got on his fingers from that match and that was always the way it’d been, Bucky burning his hands from matches and electric fences and holding brilliant blinding stars that couldn’t stay in black skies forever.

The exact temperature was iffy, but he’d bet it was somewhere in the high fifties or low sixties. Cold for the end of August, but the rain’d be colder. Nowhere near cold or bitter enough to be snow or ice but the crossfire would only drag the hardest part out broken worse in the fear.

If they could just get inside fast enough --

The rain poured down right as their eyes met again. One moment it was all crescendo, leading up to the big explosion and then the electricity in the air lit off and buckets opened above their heads. Buckets and buckets, once the coldest thing he’d ever felt a mere joke by comparison.

Once, a long time ago, another mouth of an alley on another Brooklyn street, another thunderstorm and the first time Steve’d said I love you without those words.

I had you. Til death.

So that made this death, then. That made this the end. Is that what this was? The end?
How could it be this? This fight, out of all their fights. Those three words out of everything they’d ever said.

Bucky curled his hand in the back of Steve’s shirt, blinking through the wet droplets battering the top of his head, stinging his cuts, drenching his hair heavy and dripping off Steve’s beautiful long long eyelashes and opened his mouth.

“You know outta everything,” Bucky started quietly, swallowing blood spit salt rain, trying to cut down on tears, shakiness in his voice. Steve’s thumb slid along his jaw and Bucky looked down the hand dangling by Steve’s side, the reflection catching in the dull light. Diamonds were waterproof but they weren’t. The sharpie around his finger wasn’t. “All the...horror, and heartbreak we’ve been though? I never pictured it’d be...this that broke us.”

Steve’s other thumb spun at the ring subconsciously and Bucky tore his eyes away. Glanced back up at blue because he didn’t know how many more times he’d get to see them and that color was the only thing that’d never changed in his long long life.

There was the saddest of smiles on Steve’s face, this soft quiet knowing curve that wasn’t really a smile at all, just curved up lips that Bucky knew too well, it was his smile first. The way he looked at his precious sweet broken Steve as he picked him off the dirty ground in the back of alleys knowing that tomorrow, he’d be on his way for England and he wouldn’t be there to brush off scraped knees.

They’d survived everything. Why this?

“This is the most important part, Bucky. What else was it all for? After all that, out of everything - to imagine it amounted to nothing, it was all for nothing--” Steve sucked in a breath and Bucky tipped his chin up, studied that human, beautiful, broken face. The slope of his mouth, lips parting around the words he’d never never wanted to make Steve say. “That the one person that was always there, even when I had nothing, even when he thought he was nothing without me - that one person doesn’t love me back.”

Steve’s shoulders lifted, head tipping in a teary shrug and Bucky couldn’t stop searching his face, memorizing every single line and curve and tiny imperfection because it just might all be dead and gone and past and of course he loved Steve, more than he could ever imagine, more than Steve could ever ever understand.

But come next morning light, he’d be safe and sound.

The war outside their window was always raging on and this was the only way he had left.

That awful learned smile curved a little higher, callused palm warm on Bucky’s cheek like the summer sun and all he wanted to do was close his eyes and lean into Steve’s hand and out of the freezing rain but the droplets were still pattering their noses, shoulders, weighing down further further

Even when I had nothing I had Bucky and that one person doesn’t love me back.

“That’s the only thing that could’ve broken us.”

Bucky bit his lip, eyes cutting away again as he nodded. He supposed it was. Nothing else could come between them but each other, right? They fought the entire world and won but when it came to each other.

“I understand,” Bucky forced himself to say, knowing the words were supposed to go with a step backwards. But he couldn’t pull off that part. Couldn’t manage being the one to do that.
Steve’s palm fell from his cheek, collarbone to shoulder, sliding down down metal, lighting up an epiphany of sensors from the edge of his star to his elbow to his wrist to his fingers, hands entwining automatically.

One last time.

The rain pattered down, wetting Steve’s hair into his old bangs again, running in rivets down their wrists and trying to seep between their fingers. But nothing could get between their hands. Nothing but them.

Steve was waiting for Bucky to drop his hand. He was waiting, waiting to hear the metal shift and whirr as the plates retracted and Bucky pulled back.

Bucky couldn’t.

As much as Steve wanted him to be the one walking away, to stare numbly at Bucky’s retreating back the same way he had the night Bucky shipped out, hands shoved in pockets as he waiting for Bucky to turn around and salute --

He would, too, he would turn around and salute Steve. If it were physically possible for him to let go Steve’s hand. But he couldn’t do it. He couldn’t.

He couldn’t carry this love anymore, but he’d never had it in him to end it. He’d end himself before he’d walk away from Steve. Everytime he’d ever walked away from Steve it was for Steve, to save him or protect him, or because Steve’d told him to. Just go. Get outta here.

He’d never had the power to end this and that wasn’t changing today. And he could pinpoint the exact moment Steve realized that.

Not all of it, but blue eyes went wide, lips parting a touch in surprise as he realized Bucky wasn’t gonna be the one to walk away. He couldn’t. He didn’t know how. If he did, he’d’ve done it a long time ago and spared them a lifetime of this hell.

But it was fine.

Steve knew how.

So it’d have to be Steve who walked away. And Bucky knew he could.

He was always the stronger one.

His best friend squeezed his hand, looking down at him with this searching, desperate look and Bucky could do nothing but look back. Black banners raised, their hands should just drift apart at the fingertips, the reverse of how it all began as they slipped out of each others lives in the same crash that’d brought them together.

It’d been so long. So long.

Bucky could feel it, could already feel it ripping open his chest, the absence, that gutted hole that made his stomach drop, that vacant pit of what it meant for Steve to be gone, the empty terrifying bleakness of the suddenly very real possibility of never seeing Steve again.

The idea that this could be the very end, the one they’d always promised they’d stick around till, it was suddenly making it very hard to breathe.
That void, the black void of a cold cold future he couldn’t even imagine living on the same world as Steve Rogers and not being right here, in his life, to never hear his laugh again--

Oh god. God, no, he’d already missed Steve’s last laugh and Bucky couldn’t even remember when it was. He didn’t know. Steve couldn’t go he couldn’t go, just one last laugh, lord please--

Steve’s grip on his hand loosened. It all flashed before his eyes, something unfathomable suddenly ripped out of his chest as he felt it, for real, the deep and honest future of Steve Rogers fading away from him.

Steve’s grip on his hand loosened and Bucky suddenly tightened his fingers so fast there was a chance he snapped bone and broke Steve’s hand again but right now he didn’t care, he honestly didn’t care, it seemed so small in the face of what was breaking inside him and Stevie couldn’t leave, he couldn’t leave no no.

“Please don’t make me do this,” Steve breathed.

Bucky bit back a sob.

(And stopped breathing.)

Those clinically-perfect lungs sucked in, stole the oxygen right out of Bucky’s lungs. Never to be returned.

That strong optimistic heart steeled itself, shoulders straightening. A captain’s stance. Hell, now they might as well be shaking hands across a battlefield.

A battle nobody won in the worst war he’d fought in his lifetime.

Steve sucked in a breath, steeled himself, and dropped Bucky’s hand.

Bucky’s hand fell to his side and the distance it took to get there was a whole lifetime too.

They said goodbye in the pouring rain. And I remember.

Everything Bucky’d never said, the most important thing he’d never said.

All he wanted to do was scream for Steve to stay. But Steve turned around, and Steve walked away. Bucky stood there in the pouring rain wondering distantly if some higher power was cruel enough to make him come down with pneumonia for this.

But no, they both had perfect immune systems. Perfect everything.

Steve was fading into the Brooklyn streets and this was his last chance, to lift his voice and shout something other than let’s hear it for Captain America.

His whole life waiting for the right time to tell Steve how he felt and it never came. Here he was, without Steve, lips parted around the scream don’t let me go.

The silent scream. He couldn’t. His throat knew better, it wouldn’t let him. So close to giving it up but instead, Bucky broke down in silence and watched Steve walk away. A sparking catalyst and burning fire, there was no way they wouldn’t get burnt.

Burned to ashes, just like that photograph. Like all their photographs.

The rain pattered on his skin and at some point, Bucky stopped feeling it.
They’d sung ‘till then, whispered ‘till death.

Promised to the end of the line.

Steve was right, the line ended the same way it began, in some alley in Brooklyn.

And once, after that first time they’d almost kissed, Bucky’s sworn he’d stay until the stars fell from the sky.

Well. They were falling now.

The one thing that mattered most he couldn't fight for hard enough.

One last moment, before the black, his heart looked back. Overlayed on rainy streets, dark alleys, an image, the golden flashback of scene from another life.

The last look Steve’d just given him, as his fingers uncurled from the fist they’d knotted with Bucky’s.

The last look Bucky’d given him back.

It was the same way they’d always looked at each other. The same look he’d given Steve that night on the barstools, under all the layers of youth and innocence.

"How bout you? You ready to follow Captain America into the jaws of death?" Bucky snorted. The emphasis he put on Captain America, it was the same way Bucky’d shouted it earlier. What he’d meant when their eyes had locked after. Yeah, "Captain America". You're an idiot but I still love you.

But it was easier not to look at Steve now than he thought it'd be. Because as much as they were joking as always, the weight in Steve's voice wasn't messing around. This was the moment Bucky’d been waiting for. Cringing, preparing for. Steve was asking him to fight, asking Bucky to stay with him and try to win this bloody hell of a war.

He stared at his glass for a moment. He could tell Steve no. He could. If he was an entirely different person, maybe. If he'd been born with immunity to pretty blue eyes and soft blonde hair and quick shy smiles instead of a propensity to melt at a flash of any of those things. Let alone all of them at once, aimed in Bucky's direction. He couldn't actually tell Steve no.

Captain America, though...

"Hell no," Bucky said, a ghost of a smile. He had to lay this whole Steve vs Captain America shit to rest right now. If Bucky was doing this, if he was falling back into the fight, Stevie had to know where Bucky stood. Aka he wasn't blinded by the sequins of Steve's new tights. Probably the only person left on earth who didn't see Captain America when they looked at the tall handsome man with the shield. He never would. Bucky'd always see behind the shield. The only one.

Steve's eyes were on him, maybe concerned. Maybe waiting for Bucky to tell him that he couldn't do this, that he had to go back home to Brooklyn because they'd poisoned the blood in his veins and destroyed the very core of him. Bucky wasn't going to say any of that out loud, but he did kinda appreciate Steve's patient silence. That was something Steve was always better at than him.

Was there anything Steve wasn't better at than him? Killing people, so far. If only Bucky could keep it that way.

"That little guy from Brooklyn who was too dumb not to run away from a fight..." Bucky turned his head, gaze catching on Steve's waiting one. It was probably obvious as hell, but for just a second Bucky decided he didn't care how it looked. Some heart-eyed fool, sitting here fawning over Steve. Well, he wasn't really fawning. Just...affectionately gazing.

"I'm following him."

Steve smiled, the abashed-holdingback one. Head ducked, emotions tumultuous at the edges of his mouth. Probably relief, knowing there was somebody out there who saw more than the brave soldier, this dramatic symbol. Which Steve was, but he was a hellofalot more than that too. And they both knew it.

And if they could go back, if they had time for that.

Would it change anything?

If they were placed in that moment, those bodies, those some disbelieving desperate glances and broken shallow smiles--

It hadn't changed one bit. Because there, was Steve. Looking at Bucky like he couldn't believe he was real. That this couldn't possibly be real.

Wasn't that the same way Steve looked at him now?

And running through his head in that moment, as Steve looked down abashedly at the polished bar, was that same thought, the same one from all along. Steve sat there thinking how Bucky didn't - couldn't - possibly love him that much.

How Bucky couldn't love him.

And then Bucky, looking at Steve under those dim golden lights after being strapped down with leather and put through hell and suddenly given everything he'd ever dreamed of. Bucky looked at Steve and waited for him to fade to nothing. Nothing.

And running through his head in that moment, eyes flitting over Steve’s features as he looked down with that tiny smile, unbelievable and beautiful, the same man he’d been fighting this war for, was that same thought, the same one from all along. Bucky sat there thinking how goddamn terrified he was to love that boy.

How goddamned terrified he was,

of how much he did.
haha fuck.

that took forever to write and hopefully, you’ll understand why.

This isn’t the ending, we’ve got….quite a few more chapters. And a lot happens in each of them, so. Hang in there with me guys, college makes me more busy than I ever thought possible to be.

But I’ll finish this.

And the ending man - it’s big. This whole thing has gotten so broad and deep and it’s nowhere near done yet.

I mean. I could end it there…no, no, I’m just kidding. I would never do that. I’ve got plans man. Sorry for the mini heart attack. And the general pain of that whole…thing.

I love you all.

Leave me comments come yell and cry at me. Fuck.

xx

(Ready to Run - One Direction)
(Irresistible - Fall Out Boy)
(Eavesdrop - Civil Wars  {for the post-painting scene})
(Unfinished Business - Mumford and Sons  {this fits scarly well I found it after I wrote this and I was like AHHH})
(Samson - Regina Spektor)
(No Place Like Home - Marianas Trench)
Hello again everyone welcome to the Spiral of Pain

Warnings: death (by homicide), near-death, extreme bloody gruesome torture-esque scene, explosions, overexhaustion resulting in delirium, fuckedup dreams, accidental almost-suicide, not-super-intentional self-harm (by punching things mostly), identity crisis, flashback to homicide of adolescents, and nightmares of drowning

It's all rather fucked-up I'm sorry but there's still! Lots of plot!! And the next chapter won't have anything bloody or death-related, I promise. Maybe, like, a papercut. At most.

Although this chapter is not a papercut, this is like. bullets, guys. Proceed with caution.

(There's a quote in here, inspiration from this post.)

On the bright side!!! There's a shitton of music in this chapter. Like, a lot, the whole thing is basically one long playlist OH and there's also another mixtape playlist from Tony too. I recommend clicking links, and enjoy!!

Much Love to you all and I am Sorry in advance.

xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes
“You are so brave and quiet I forget you are suffering.”
— Ernest Hemingway, A Farewell to Arms

The soft creeeak of wood.

Steady wood, softened from use, strong-flat against spinal bones.

Warmed from the burning pulse of the sun.

Drifting, brilliant blue arching from every corner of sight.

Gentle rocking, rustling wind, breaking waves.

Murmur of invisible voices, the distant sting of salt in the air.

The only warm thing he’d felt in months.

Lying there.

Staring up at the treacherous sky

maybe I am worth the fight

tears gathering in his throat instead of his eyes.

It was a feeling, more than anything, this overwhelming feeling of being unable to swallow for the wall in his chest, neck.

But if he held his breath and stared at the sky and let the waves rock the boat, it was fine.

Yet all along, I knew we’d be fine.

If you’ll be my boat, I’ll be your sea.

I live to make you free.

I live,

to make you free.

I live.

Steve stared up at the sky and knew that somehow, that wasn’t quite right.

But there wasn’t right. Not right now, just hadta stop thinking. For one moment, stop thinking. Close his eyes, let the sunlight heat up crackled bones of too many long winters. Especially this last one, all those European snowy forests.

It was the tenth of March, he was allowed to be warm.

It wasn’t the weather though, not the sun on his skin. Instead, the body beside him, the one he could feel without quite touching. So close, all he needed to do was reach out his fingers and they’d be entwining with--
It was his birthday, y’know.

The warm lilt of that familiar voice, the full-shaped words in beautiful Brooklyn twang. Some story, the boys had pushed for some story and Steve’d started out but Bucky’d snatched it right from him with a laugh,

“I’m a better story teller anyways. See, how it actually went is that early that day, Steve had gone out to the docks I was working...”

And of course, he was right. Bucky was the stuff of stories, not Steve. So Steve closed his eyes, let Bucky’s words wash over him like the waves washed against the sides of their boat. The story didn’t matter, syllables consonants sounds. Just Bucky’s voice, the gentle tune of whatever he was saying, it was enough.

Steve closed his eyes against the blue blue sky but he could still see it, somehow, like maybe his eyes were closed all along.

>You can set sail for the west if you want to, over the horizon. Til I can’t even see you.

Til--

He was turning twenty-six. Twenty-six, that felt so…so old. So much longer than the boy laying beside him now, face surely all lit up as he told the blue sky and the lying boys the story of that one birthday, back at the docks.

Bucky was so young, so warm and beautiful. Twenty-six felt false. That part of Steve’d wondered if he’d live to see the day Bucky was closer to thirty than twenty. And here he still was, twenty-four in the middle of a war but they were both still here.

For some reason he couldn’t turn his head, couldn’t see if Bucky was actually there behind him, but that warmth radiating on the back of his hand, it had to be Bucky’s. Earlier, Steve’d glanced over at him, seen that profile staring at the sky and had the most ridiculous urge to reach out, Bump his hand against the back of Buck’s. It’d only be another few inches, but he’d refrained.

Buck was in the middle of driftin’a story, Steve could get away with it. He really shouldn’t, not when it wasn’t just the two of’em anymore.

Wasn’t it?

He couldn’t hear anyone else’s breathing. They were...he remembered, it was all of them, they were all on this boat, right?

And all of a sudden Bucky’s voice sounded very far away.

No. No no, that wasn’t right.

Steve’s throat closed up, drying out before he could part his lips in a call.

He couldn’t hear Bucky’s voice anymore.

He couldn’t hear Bucky.

Suddenly the only thing that mattered was reaching out, grabbing that hand beside his before it fell away from him forever.
His hand was rock, stone, vibranium and it wouldn’t move, he couldn’t lift--

Steve wrenched his arm away from the deck of the boat, lunging for the hand that was right there, right there, only there was nothing and suddenly it wasn’t just blue sky, there was the peeling-white paint on the planks of the boat and the waves on the sides were splashing up so high, jolting the boat sideways with a gust of wind and a desperate shove.

“Bucky!” Steve shouted, whipping his head around for Buck, Dugan, anyone, but there was no one on the boat but him and

And there were red leather boots on his feet. Why was he in his costume boots? Engaged quad, only his boot wasn’t lifting and it was nailed to the boat, his boots were nailed to the boat and the waves were rocking it harder, rougher, faster now, splashing freezing droplets of ice over the side to patter his back, his arm, and where was Bucky?

The water started leaking through the cracks the same time Steve started thrashing. Or maybe one was because of the other, he never knew how to know.

Waves flooded in, ice cold waves and the boat was going down, he was going under. Trickling cold between fingers breaking into a splash, water rushing his wrists, legs, waist, chest, freezing every muscle and bone on the way and Steve took one last gasp of blue sky, a final choked shout

"Buh--"

Icy cold rushed into his mouth, eyes, muffling the word into nothing beneath the waves and he was getting dragged down, down, more cold cold pressure shoving over his head, sinking through the pieces of wood and ice, freezing soaked clothes stuck blinding-tight to his skin, seeping in through his pores and battering against his choking throat, dragging down down down.

Watery vision, splotchy and tumultuous, white bubbles and salt stronger than tears, so much salt flooding his mouth, nose, choking on the wet trying to force into weak lungs.

A flash, broken glass and flickering plane parts, the crushing rush tsunami vibrating sparks and blood from the cuts on his arms, face, stinging to hell in the freezing cold and the bitter salt and he couldn’t breathe.

Water and chunks of ice flooded into his throat and Steve choked on reflex, his lungs seizing heart pounding throat convulsing. It burned worse than fire, worse than the cold numbing tingling of his fingers and hands and feet. His lungs filled with water and his eyes spilled over with tears of pain that the cold water took away, sucked for their own. No one can see you cry under ocean waves.

His lungs protested and his cells fought and Steve didn't wanna be a coward, didn't wanna make this his way out, but he couldn't keep trying to survive without Bucky. He wasn't Steve Rogers without Bucky and he didn't wanna see the man he would turn into in that absence.

Maybe it was selfish. Maybe it was the most selfish thing Steve had ever done but he couldn't find the willpower to pull himself outta the plane.

Bucky, he mouthed into the water, vocal cords too flooded to sound.

The water pulled and tugged at him and the plane creaked around him as it settled a few feet deeper in the ice and Steve couldn't stop crying because he'd never been so cold and so alone.

If Bucky loved him, why'd he leave? Why did he have to die? Why wasn't Steve allowed to join him?
Last time--

Last time, the last thought he’d had before it all went black,

_I’m sorry I never told you I love you, Bucky._

Steve thrashed in the water, darkness edging at the corners of his eyes, and that wasn’t the last thing in his head this time.

He’d pass out any moment, could feel it, everything from the nails in his boots that weren’t boots anymore, dark red tentacles dragging him deeper and he couldn’t fight it anymore he just wanted it all to be over because drowning was the worst nightmare that’d ever haunted him besides those crystal eyes, glittering like the surface of the water and salvation so far away--

Once more, just enough time for one last thought and it wasn’t the one he had last time.

It’d been a long time since the last time he’d drowned and that long long time had ruined everything.

Steve’s chest was being torn in half with the pressure but it was empty anyways, because Bucky was gone and Bucky was gone and the last thing he had time to think wasn’t the apology he made last time at all.

This time.

_I’m so goddamned sorry I told you I love you, Bucky._

Nothing but water for as far as he could see, empty blue.

The flashing sun distant on the surface of the Potomac as he sank sank sank, falling down down down, pieces of helicarrier diving into the water beside him, a trail of bubbles behind them, bubbles of oxygen that couldn’t save him now, nothing could save him now--

A glint of metal.

A glint of metal, out of the blue, then fingers were reaching for him, a metal hand uncurling and Bucky. Bucky came back for him.

Steve surged against the waves, reaching desperately for the outstretched hand because if he couldn’t grab it this time there would never be another there would never be another and it was so so far but--

_Bucky! Hold on!_

Their fingers locked.

The metal plates shifted, compressing, squeezing his fingers tight, interlocked the way they were supposed to be, metal cold and the most comforting thing he’d touched in decades, silver pieces shifting under his touch and over his skin--

On his skin. Folding from the hand he was holding to his own, plates locking into place over his skin and that didn’t make any sense at all, why was the metal coating _his_ hands--
Hand, wrist, arm, it was all the way on his arm and Steve’s left shoulder was suddenly aching, burning like someone was rubbing salt in all the cuts from that shattered plane, boat, train...

a strand of black hair drifting in his peripherals, long and dark and too close to be attached to Bucky’s skull, what the fu Chest damn near exploding with the need to breathe, but it wasn’t water anymore. He wasn’t in water anymore. Gag, choke, oxygen.

He must’ve been shoved above surface somehow, Bucky must’ve dragged him out only it’d skipped that part.

All he knew was that he was looking down at the ocean where he’d just been drowning and he wasn’t reaching up helplessly for the glittering sky, sinking down down down.

Bucky was.

Steve screamed but nothing was getting him any closer to the surface of the water, he could run swim dive but he couldn’t move and Bucky was sinking, drowning, the place he’d just been, replaced Steve’s dying body for his own and Steve was saved but Steve was emptied out, everything gold drained the moment their fingers weren’t locked anymore and.

His hand wasn’t metal anymore, Bucky’d transferred all of that pain and death and taken it right off of Steve’s shoulders and he could scream all he wanted but the world had rolled over and flipped their places and Steve didn’t get to be Atlas when Bucky was drowning for him.

“Rogers!”

“BUCKY!!” Steve screamed again, shooting awake and upright, arms flailing and it was only Sam’s reflexes that had him ducking in time to avoid getting smacked across the room.

Heaving chest, blurry room coming shakily into focus as Steve clutched empty sheets in his fists and blinked at the stark walls.

White. A sense of encompassing, piercingly-bright white. Just like the beginning, all over again. Could only process the too-clean color above, around him.

Purged, only it wasn’t rebirth because this death, he couldn’t come back from. The loneliness, the foreignness of a world he had to learn all over again, the awful unfamiliarness.

There was no baseball game playing from a quiet radio now.

Didn’t stop the flashing memory of Bucky’s smile suddenly on the edge of everything.

Steve swung his legs off the side of the bed, narrowly avoiding running into Sam but Steve wasn’t ready yet, he’d woken screaming and his heart was beating too fast and his face was cold and this wasn’t how it was going to be, he needed a moment to let it all sink in again.

Hands on the sink, closed door between him and the world and nothing was better. Every glance in the mirror flickered with ghosts, with his arms wrapping around Bucky’s stomach from behind, shower-heat fogging the corners of the mirror as Bucky leaned back against his bare chest, beautiful eyes drifting closed as he tipped his pretty face against Steve’s chin--

Splash of warm water, calculated breaths and if he could just flush it all away, the pain, then he would but that’d be cutting out his own chest and the only thing he could really do was shove it down, down down down until there was nothing but an empty stare looking back at him in the glass now, water sliding down his temple like blood, white towel scratching layers off skin like peeling corpses.

“Sorry for the noise.” Steve pulled open the bathroom door, drying his hands a final time on the towel, stepping into Sam’s apartment with the same careful expression and white tank top he’d worn the first time he’d been at Sam’s place. Although this was technically Tony’s place, and Sam’s floor, but.

Steve couldn’t even pretend he could live in the Brooklyn apartment. He’d asked Sam to move in there, in case Bucky came back in the middle of the night.

“You know what, I think it’s a good idea if I stay here at the tower with you. Could we send Clint?”
A clap to the shoulder. “He and Bucky do get along better.”

Steve had nodded. Clint had dropped everything and moved into the Brooklyn apartment. Steve’d gone with him, the first day, to show him where everything was and grab a few of his things.

Really, though, he had to see if there was a trace, any trace that Bucky’d come back--

Clint had dropped his bags on the couch, looked around with that approving glint and made the simplest of comments, glancing at the pillows on the floor and joked if there were any safe places to sit?

Steve wilted. The pillows weren’t there for that reason, there were pillows knocked off the couch because Steve spent so much time on the fucking couch when they were fighting he figured he might as well be comfortable. Especially after Bucky smashed his radio. The kitchen table was a hell of a lot less enticing than losing himself in couch cushions. Only not actual cushions, because even those reminded him of Bucky.

So it was pillows. Not like it’d helped.

But Clint moved in. Steve moved into Sam’s floor of the tower and Sam was at his side nearly 24/7 and he knew Tony was monitoring his vitals through Jarvis and he couldn’t bring himself to tell either of them to stop.

 Couldn’t bring himself to say much at all.

Sam looked up sharply at Steve’s words.

“Sorry for the noise,” towel tossed back onto the counter, easy saunter back into the room. “You know you don’t have to come in here every morning.”

“It’s either that or you wake the tower,” Sam came back with that touch of a smile, but neither of them meant it and Steve didn’t bother faking back.

“You making breakfast?” He asked instead, pulling open a drawer to find a shirt appropriate to run in.

“If you’ll eat that sort’a thing.”

Steve pulled a light-blue size-small shirt outta the drawer and ignored the way his stomach dropped at the thought of wearing clothes this tight again.

“I’ll eat,” He replied shortly, and Sam was smart enough to know by now that there wasn’t anything else coming outta that conversation.

He left, pausing in the door as always, but then the bedroom was back to alone and quiet and Steve rather preferred it that way. Dark would be nice too. Sam always turned on the lights when he came in, but he was gone now.

Six steps to the door, carefully quietly closed, and a single loud click as he flicked off the lights.

Better this way.

~~107th. Sergeant James Barnes, shipping out for England tomorrow.~~

“Is he just sitting there in the dark?”

“Looks like it.”

“What else am I supposed to do, Natasha?”

A shake of red hair, arms crossed tightly over her chest, pretty face shut down, staring at the closed door she’d just checked behind. Steve hadn’t even graced her with a greeting, hadn’t so much as turned around.

He was quieter, worse than those first few months with Shield. More closed off than when they first met. More distant than when they’d found Bucky with Hydra.

“How are things going on your end?”

Green eyes snapped over to Sam, his patient, hurting face and arms crossed tiredly on the surface of the table.

“I haven’t found him. Does Steve know we’re looking?”

“I’m sure he suspects it.” A dark shrug and Natasha looked back at Steve’s closed door.

“I don’t get why he’s not the one leading the investigation.”

“I don’t get why Bucky’s gone,” Sam replied tiredly and Natasha rolled her lips in. She had a pretty good idea why Bucky was gone.

She’d warned Steve. She’d warned him it would never work and she’d never been more sorry about being right.

The two boys who fell in love in Brooklyn weren’t the same ones who fell outta love in Brooklyn.

~~I just need one name. Sergeant James Barnes, from the 107th.~~

“Hey man, listen. Don’t you think we should at least try findi--”

“I don’t wanna talk about it.”
“Steve, nobody wants to see you miserable like this.”

“I said,” A simple pause, tipped head and eyebrows lifted, “I don’t wanna talk about it.”

“Okay. Okay, but when you do--”

Steve shook his head, soft curve on his mouth as he leaned back casually in his chair, smiled up at the ceiling.

Sam didn’t bother finishing his sentence.

~~The world is changed. And none of us can go back.~~

“Who’s gonna say it first?”

“Tony.”

“What, everyone’s thinking it!”

Four pairs of glares in return and Tony sunk down in his seat, crossing his arms over his chest and petulantly staring at the monitor in the center of the table.

No one said anything, glares melted for the various stages of stony worry as they all watched the live feed of Steve disassembling and reassembling every gun in his collection.

The magazine shoved into place, hammer clicking back.

Tony shoved his rolling seat back and stood, shutting down the feed with one hand, so everyone had to look at him because he was done with all this refusing to look at each other.

“Frankly, Rogers is a danger to himself and others. If we sit idle on this and something happens to either of them, that blood is on our hands.”

“Tony,” Pepper stood too and Tony shook his head, hand up to stop her.

“Don’t say it’s not our responsibility, because it is. We took those kids in.”

“This is bigger than you and your savior complex, Stark.” Natasha flicked her hair over her shoulder and Tony’s jaw clicked, eyes lit up as he turned, messy hair making him more mad than scientist as he pointed,

“At least I’m trying to help them--”

“I’m the one out there looking for Barnes!”

“Exactly! I don’t believe for one minute that you can’t find him. I don’t think you want him back!” Pepper pressed her fingers to her temples and Tony ignored her, leaning across the table to snap as close as he dare, “I don’t think you’re even trying.”

Natasha’s chair screeched as she stood abruptly, green eyes flashing, stalked around the table and tore open the door. Clint shoved upright, lunging to reach her before the door slammed but the sound echoed with his hands empty.
Tony forced himself to breathe through his nose, heavy and flared and Pepper’s fingers were curled against her mouth now, looking away from the door and the visibly pissed Stark.

“Barton, before you defend her,” Sam started slowly and Clint spun back to the meeting room table, mouth open before Sam could finish.

“Stark’s right. If Nat knows something, she’s not saying. She hasn’t even told me.” He sunk in the closest chair and Sam stared at his weaved hands on the table.

“Fine.” Tony straightened his shirt, signaling something to Jarvis’s camera in the corner of the room. “We’ll find him without her.”

“None of us have Red Room experience like Tash,” Clint pointed out, raking tired fingers through blond spikes. “We need a new expert on Barnes.”

Tony swiped a hand over the table again, pulling the live feed back up, a M1911A1 slowly being pulled apart this time.

“We’ve got the best around.” Everyone watched silently as the holographic Steve emptied bullets onto the table with hollow clanks, face just as empty as the gun he was shredding.

“You say Red Room and I’ll raise you Commanding Officer.”

≈≈Best friends since childhood. Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were inseparable on both schoolyard and≈≈

“What part of he’s gone don’t you understand?”

“Steve, why did he leave? You gotta give me somethin’, man.”

“We broke up! It’s over! What the fuck do you want me to say?!”

“He’s your best friend. Even if you guys aren’t romantically together--”

“He’s gone.”

“And I think we owe it to him to find him!”

Steve swiveled in his chair, leaning back and looking over with cold eyes, studying Sam like he was the crazy one.

“What’s this about?”

“Man, c’mon, don’t be like that. We have to find Bu--”

“Why? If this were anybody else I’d broken up with, you wouldn’t be pushing this right now. So why, what’s the real reason?”

Sam groaned, tipping his head back to stare at the ceiling. Steve didn’t relent on his stare.

“What? Are you afraid he’s gonna end up jumping out another window?”
“Look, I doubt he’d do anything to endanger himself.”

“...so that’s why-- Fuck, Sam, are you honestly gonna play that card?”

“What card? Rogers, what the hell’re yo--”

“You think he’s dangerous. You think that without me as his handler, he’s gonna go on some psycho killing spree. You guys don’t give a fuck about him - Jesus Christ, Bucky was right - you just wanna bring him in. Take another villain off the streets.”

“Steve--”

“Fuck that! Fuck all of you. Bucky Barnes is not a villain. And I’m not gonna help you go on some manhunt and treat him like one!”

“Rogers, just listen--”

“You had the audacity to come in here to try and recruit me, trick me into finding my own best friend--”

“Cap, fuck, would you shut the fuck up for a minute? That’s exactly the point! He’s your best friend and he’s alone in this world and he knows no one besides you and whatever goddamned Hydra agents are still out there and even if you guys broke up, don’t you at least want to make sure he doesn’t fall back in their hands?”

Steve just stared at him.

“Get out.”

“Steve--”

“I said get out.”

“You can’t stay locked up in here forever,” Sam started and Steve stomped him right to the door, all but shoving him through, the closest thing to light in his eyes - even if it was fire - as he spat,

“Watch me.”

Slam.

~~Hey, you wanna show a little respect? I said shut up.~~

“He’s not gonna help us find Barnes.”

“He really kicked you out?”

“Yeah, man, it was...this whole thing’s fucked up.”

“Yeah, I noticed. Jarvis, is Steve still in his room?”

“Yes sir.”

“Alright. Looks like I’m trying next.”
“Tony--”

“Somebody has to convince him. There’s no way Rogers doesn’t know where Barnes is.”

~~C’mom man. Gotta get you cleaned up.~~

There was no way. He knew Steve would find him here. That’s exactly why he was here.

Even if neither DUMBO nor Brooklyn Heights were the same shabby working class districts they’d been in the thirties, they were both close enough to walk to in the rain with a broken heart bleeding face and slashed soles.

Not that a New York taxi wouldn't take him somewhere further. Just that he couldn't afford leaving the blood trail. And he was broke.

In more ways than his cheekbone and empty chest.

So it was memory lane instead. No yellow brick road to save them from this disaster.

Their last apartment in 1942 was only fifteen minutes from the apartment on John Street he just got thrown out of. (That part wasn’t sinking in yet.) Neither were the streets disappearing under bare feet. This was an entirely different world now, with the wealthy imposters and towering glass but it was the closest thing he had and Bucky was too fucking exhausted to find anywhere else.

The apartment complex across from their old building - all wrong, all wrong of course - had a vacant room on the seventh floor with a view over the same street they used to.

Waking up to that view would either fuck his head more or spare him one brief second of reality and time lapse and truthfully it was worth sleeping slumped against the window if there was the slightest chance he didn't wake up tomorrow feeling like this.

Like he'd be better not waking at all. Ever.

~Captain? ~~ You're up~*~

“Rogers.”

“Stark,” Steve replied dully, knife thudding against the wooden cutting board. The scuffle of unsure steps behind him and Steve almost smiled. For once in his goddamned life Tony was being cautious around Steve with a knife and all he was doing was cutting a goddamned apple.

“You still all...raging and whatnot?”

Thud thud thud. Apple pieces falling apart, white and crisp inside that the knife slid right through. He wasn’t gonna fucking make it about Bucky. The tension in the room was sliceable already. Wasn’t the only sliceable thing.

“I’m not pissed enough to stab you, Tony.”
The moment his name was spoken he snapped right outta the caution, striding around to snatch one of his apple pieces. Bastard.

Steve glanced up at him with a mild glare and Tony shrugged one shoulder, popping the piece of apple in his mouth. So he was testing to see if Steve would cut one of his meddling fingers off. He may be mad, but he was still Steve Rogers.

“What do you want,” he clipped, chopping the last piece of apple in half. Tony didn’t say anything. Okay, fine. If he was gonna wait.

Steve stabbed an apple piece with the tip of his knife, popping it in his mouth and looking up again, meeting the always-analyzing eyes that were looking at him with the same ooo experiment his dad used to.

Only there was something else there, some sort of emotion he really didn’t give a fuck about finding out. Tony Stark’s feelings were basically the lowest thing on his list of priorities right now.

“Listen, Cap-- Rogers, whatever. You can’t mope around the tower for the rest of your strange sad-raging existence.”

“Hmm.” Stab of another slice, tipping it into his mouth with the knife and chewing slowly as he looked Stark over, speaking around the apple in his mouth. “You kickin’ me out?”

“You know, you are a lot more dramatic than people give you credit for. No I’m not kicking you out, you dimwit. But you should, y’know, take up a hobby. Racquetball, pilates...I always thought that’d be a good look on you.” One explaining hand waving around in the air the way he always did and Steve just arched an eyebrow, picking up his tray of apples.

“Since when do you care what looks good on me?” He threw over his shoulder, starting for the couch.

“I am the one who designs your suits,” Tony pointed out, tip of his head before he spun around and followed Steve down the steps into the adjacent room. “But that’s not the point, you’ve gotta get out there, do something.”

“Is this another one of those ‘go get Bucky speeches?” The couch sunk ridiculously around him and Steve pretended not to notice, leaning forward to set the board on the coffee table. Pause, eyes flicking up to Stark standing right in front of him, arms crossed over his glowing-triangle chest. “Because I told Sam. Find somebody else.”

“Yeah, because there’s a bounty of experts on the ninety-something year old assassin roaming New York.”

“Get Natasha to do it,”

“Tried that,” Tony huffed under his breath and Steve ignored him because whatever the hell that meant.

“--I’m not interested.”

“Spangled, listen.”

“Tony, I said I’m not interes--”

“Rogers, I said listen.”
Steve looked up sharply from the apple piece he’d been peeling the skin off. Tony was not brave enough to snap at him like that. Tony gave him the lead, only interrupted to bicker, certainly never with that serious tone.

Now that all Steve’s attention was on him, Stark took a shallow breath, headed slowly around the corner of the coffee table. It took everything in him not to drop his jaw when Tony sat carefully on the edge of the couch behind him.

He had never once in his life seen Tony Stark sit on a couch beside somebody if there wasn’t some tech-explanation or movie to watch.

He wasn’t the sit-and-talking about feelings person. He was the furthest person from feelings-sharing in this entire goddamned city. Steve would demand who put him up to this, only no one put Tony up to anything but Pepper and this surprisingly didn’t have her influence written all over it.

There were no begrudging sighs, no grumbling, just quiet soft, careful, perched here beside him and Steve didn’t know what to do with that. But apparently stare in silence. Which was probably the intended effect.

“Steve, you can’t shut everybody out.” Still matter-of-fact the way he always was, but there was something gentle about it, something almost like...Howard. Almost like Howard after Bucky died.

He couldn’t do anything but blink.

“Nobody can live like that, believe me, I know.” Tony’s hand waved out, gesturing at the room around them, this vast space that was just one floor of so many and the last time he’d been sat down and lectured on a couch had probably been by Buck or his mom, a different lifetime a different life.

“But you don’t have to.”

The thing is, Bucky paused, eyebrows knitting, that promise that’d stitched Steve up from his worse beaten-down, you don’t have to.

“You have us. The Avengers.” Stark’s eyebrows were the ones knit together now, all seriousness as he held Steve’s gaze with the most steady tone he had in his body. “You may not remember, but. Before Barnes showed up, you had a team here, Rogers.”

A team.

Before Bucky, he’d had a team.

“I may not be the love of your life, but I had your six.” Brown eyes all shiny and deep, corners of his mouth waverung the way it did when he was all emotional and didn’t know what to do with it. Steve didn’t know what to do with that either. Or the desperation turning up a notch, head tipping as he tried, pulled out every stop, “Can’t you trust--”

“He’s my family,” Steve interrupted, fast and short because he hadn’t had to face this yet and he wasn’t ready to think about the team he’d left behind when he left the tower.

They’d promised they wouldn’t drift but they’d ended up so far away Steve had no idea what to do with any of it, especially not in the face of Tony, who was letting down that impenetrable blue-glass guard and it wasn’t right, it wasn’t fair, he couldn’t talk about this.

Bucky was his only family left and maybe that’d shut Tony up because this was different, Buck was his family--
Tony straightened, slight cock of his head as the brown eyes didn’t have a single screen to reflect and shone too bright anyways.

“So was I.”

Steve blinked.

Birthday cake and road trips and log cabins and overwriting each other’s plans during mission parameters and movie nights and making fun of each other’s suits and games of Risk and teasing and competitions and orange juice and shwarma and flipping his shield up to ricochet Stark’s hand blasters and together--

"Avengers Movie Night is still Friday and if you two aren't there, I know where you sleep. Actually, I setup where you sleep, I'd be careful if I were you--"

"We'll be there, Tony," Steve assured, knocking his shoulder against Stark's. Bruce shook his head while Thor laughed and Sam threw an arm over Bucky's shoulders, tugging him in with a beaming smile as Clint reached over to tweak the loose bun atop Bucky's head.

Steve shooed everyone back towards the jet parked at the water and five waving hands disappeared around the corner. There'd been five Commandos too, five of those boys like the five boys leaving now--

How many teams had he abandoned?

How many families had he lost?

He.

He couldn’t.

“We...were never a team, Tony.” His voice sounded detached even to him, like it was someone else’s mouth speaking but he wasn’t going to do anything to shut up that voice. “Even now, everytime it’s ‘remember that time I sent a nuke through an alien portal?’ That’s how you say it, that’s how you remember it. Just because we moved in doesn’t mean everything stopped being about you, Stark.”

The bitter bite at the end was making him cringe inside and Tony’s jaw was unhinged, looking raw and positively ripped open.

They’d fought like this once, at the beginning, but reverting back to stoop that low?

He wasn’t sure if he hated himself more for lying or for why he had to.

“We’ve fought together, random battle-combinations of everyone's strengths, but there were no sixes covered.” It was all too easy to sneer his mouth up in disgust, stomach churning in disgust ten times worse. “You never stopped finding a way to cut the goddamned wire.”

He’d never seen Tony stand so quickly in his life. Pace half a yard away, fists curled and shoulders trembling. Sharp turn to face him again, eyes watering and finger pointing accusingly, all anger fighting through the crumbling, heartbreaking pain.

“We are still a team. I don’t care if it hurts, we're your family, Rogers.”
Stark may not care if it fucking hurts. Because he had no idea how much it did.

His fucking team. Family.

Stark knew fucking nothing.

Steve couldn’t remember standing, but he was suddenly taller than Tony again, suddenly towering and powerful again, not the boy who’d dropped his shield because he was so goddamned lost in the world, not the boy who’d stared at two sets of blackwhite files in the dark --

Tony’s had been in there. He hadn’t even known, the start of his new family and the end of his old family jam-packed into one manilla folder and stamped ink, deceased, deceased, deceased, he’d left them all alone and now he was so goddamned alone, there was no such thing as home without family and he’d been lucky enough to have two, entire full, loving families and he’d abandoned them both.

Deceased,
deceased,
deceased.

"Just in case things go sideways...it's been good fightin' with you, Cap."

“I hate you all," Bucky informed them with that deadpanned tone of his, pushing halfheartedly at Steve's chest but giving up after a single shove.

"What's new?" Morita grinned.

"Have fun, kids." Dugan added with a wink.

"Yeah, get him to lighten up," Jones pointed, the direction of his finger kind of vague from the alcohol in his system.

"Which one of us?" Steve asked, already starting to pull Bucky towards the dance floor.

"Both!" Falsworth shouted.

"Sergeant Barnes woulda been proud a' you."

Proud.

He hadn’t even given Peg his coordinates.

Morita had been in that room. He’d been there, he’d been the first one to answer Steve’s call from the plane.

He’d’ve been the one to tell the rest of the boys that Steve didn’t even try.

Steve didn’t even try.

Tony was standing there, chest heaving, trembling and angry and so hurt and Steve hadn’t even tried.

This wasn’t his family. He didn’t deserve this family.

He hadn’t been able to save any of them. He hadn’t been able to save any of them, every last member of his family died before his eyes, his mom and Bucky and Howard and that file of all the Commandos and if Steve kept dragging them in all these battles the Avengers would too, slowly, stray bullets and bombs and one more scrap they couldn’t squeeze out of and Steve didn’t have a single fucking use.

He hadn’t even given Peg his coordinates.

God, he’d even lost Peggy. He’d come back too late. Couldn’t save her. She didn’t even remember him.

Just like Buck hadn’t. The two people he loved the most were the only people in this new world that didn’t remember Captain America.

“My team is DEAD. My brothers. Are dead.” Steve was shaking more than Tony was but he couldn’t feel it, couldn’t see the anger melt for pain, the tears threatening to brim over brown eyes because his vision was fogged, everything was fogged and the tapes were all black and white but he’d give anything to paint the war back in color, live in the fucking black and white now.

Anything to save them, only he couldn’t, he couldn’t save any of them. When was the last time he’d saved Tony Stark from anything? Tony’d talked him through an asthma attack a couple months ago and in return he’d pushed them all out of his life. He’d kicked out Sam. He didn’t even know what color red Natasha’s hair was right now.

“My family is dead,” Steve told him, heart pounding in his chest loud enough to remind him how torn it was, how torn he’d made fucking everything.

The room was threatening to spin, everything was spinning and his voice was getting louder and louder and it wasn’t drowning out the pound pound pound because his family was dead.

“--save the one member that I couldn't save. I couldn't save him and I tried so fucking hard I did everything I fucking could and it wasn’t enough, I wasn’t enough I was too late, too late for all of them cause I waited too long, fucking leading authority on waiting too long and it took me realizing he doesn't love me to ever admit it, but fucking there, there!! I’m too late. I can't save Bucky Barnes. I can’t.”

Tony wiped a hand across his eyes. Steve sucked in a breath that was two parts shaky tears and no parts oxygen and it wasn’t fair.

Stark was going to say something. Something about family, and Steve couldn’t listen to his family talk about home and love and saving right now.

He’d failed. He’d failed them all.

“I can’t,” Steve whispered, then he was practically running for the stairwell door and Tony didn’t even try to stop him.

Tony didn’t even try to stop him.

~~You get your orders?~~

Once upon a time.
The last time he’d been Bucky Barnes without Steve Rogers, he’d been with the 107th.

See, when he was the Winter Soldier, he wasn’t Bucky Barnes, he wasn’t anybody. Nothing.

But the world wasn’t merciful enough for Zola’s men to sweep in now and knock out all the memories of sunshine and the man he’d grown up beside, grown around like a vine tightening around a tree and carving beautiful arcs into bark, choking the life outta raw nature until neither could survive without the other and the whole thing was some twisted terrifying phenomenon.

So the last time he’d been Bucky Barnes with a gaping hole in his chest not big enough to kill him just big enough to suck the life from him, he’d been with the 107th.

Dirt under his fingernails, soot smeared across his forehead. Nose. Stubble on his jaw, blood in his hair.

The first time he saw blood in Steve’s beautiful blonde hair, Bucky’d puked.

It was him that’d splattered it there in the first place.

It was him that Steve followed into that stupid war. It was him that Steve clapped on the shoulder before taking off through the woods, scouting ahead with that big shiny shield and his life on the line.

Bucky’s too, because if any of those bullets had zipped past the giant white star, taken down their beloved Captain Rogers? He would’ve gone down right there in the woods with him.

During the war he used to love that shield. Practically saved Steve’s life more times than he had. So he was a little jealous of it too. Crazy, that’s how crazy he’d been back then, he was jealous of a hunk of shiny metal painted Red White and Blue.

It wasn’t shiny all the time though, none of them were.

The rougher nights, shield propped carelessly against a log, caked with the same mud dirt streaked blood. Flickering black instead of blue by the light of the fire Falsworth was poking with a stick.

Bucky spun the knife between his fingers, held up the little piece of wood to see better in the dim ass lighting. Details were better to do during the day but he was impatient and Steve hadn’t come outta their tent yet--

“What’s Rogers up to? He’s been in there for a good fifteen now.”

Bucky shrugged, not looking up. “Y’know how long it takes to peel off tights?”

“Very funny,” a dry, flat voice spoke up behind and Bucky had to force his mouth not to twitch up in a smile.

“Funny but true,” he drawled in response, flicking a piece of freed wood from his carving, angling the knife to cut that soft curve. The air around him shifted as his Stevie plopped down at his side. He could tell without looking up that Steve was side-eyeing him, trying to figure out what this one was gonna be without asking outright or looking like he was snooping.

Bucky didn’t give a damn if Steve looked. The fire excused the heat in his cheeks, so having blue eyes on him didn’t have a single damned consequence on nights like these.

Crackling ambers filled the comfortable silence as they all settled in around the warmth, various hands stuck closer against the cold. His blue coat was warm enough to keep him from shivering, but he’d left it in the tent and this dirty shirt was practically threadbare by now. If Steve only sat a little closer, he radiated heat like a goddamned furnace nowadays.

“Well I’ll be damned.”

Bucky hummed in question, focusing on his knife so he didn’t split open a finger when his entire body wanted to tip sideways into Steve’s like some kind of fucked up gravitational pull, Mars around the Sun.

“...they even breathe in sync.”

Dernier snorted at Jones and Dugan’s slurping paused long enough to make Bucky realize all five pairs of eyes were aimed in his direction.

Bucky finally lifted his head, mess of broken pomade brushing his forehead as he glanced over the Commandos, followed their gazes to the blonde boy next to him.

“Me and Steve?” he asked dumbly and the tiny smile that quirked one half of Steve’s mouth, that tiny tip of his eyebrow - it was just so Steve, just so regular like the other half of his twisted vine-tree he’d never really thought about the odd similarities the Doe’s might’ve noticed.

“Guess so,” Steve echoed, eyes flicking down to Bucky’s neck to watch his pulse, which was suddenly jumping about a thousand times faster than it’d been a second ago. That terrible heat was consuming his chest again, that tightness that made it hard to swallow, especially with Steve’s eyes on his skin and fuck, the fire wouldn’t excuse cheekbones that red.

“Steve, uhh.” His hands were fidgeting around the knife now, flipping it self-consciously as he forced his eyes away, stared down at the glint of metal instead. Carve, he could carve and then he didn’t have to think about his stupid blush or how unfazed Steve seemed, chin propped on his big hands as he kept looking at Buck like he couldn’t fucking feel it in his soul.

“Stevie had asthma, back in the day? Used to get all worked up in a huff over every goddamned thing--”

“Hey,” Steve interjected too soft and Bucky’s heartbeat was somewhat closer to normal and he could almost use his lungs right again, if only Steve would stop goddamned looking at him.

“--got t’where I had to calm him down, make him match his breathin’ to mine cause otherwise he’d end up chokin’ on no oxygen and goin’ damn right blue in the face.” The next curve of the knife was too harsh, split a crack right down the middle of Lady Liberty’s stomach and that was fine, it was probably for the better anyways.

“You’re...blue in the face,” Steve muttered lamely.
“I’m gonna be blue in the face if you don’t get that fire hotter, Monty. What, they don’t teach you boy scouts 101 in London?”

“Oh right, Dum-Dum, because you were a bloody boy scout back in New York.”

“Hey, maybe he was, sure as hell has the look for it.”

“You watch your mouth Jones—”

“It’s still fucking freezing,” Morita interjected and Bucky had to agree, his fingers were starting to tremble against the blade of his knife.

Better cold metal in his hands than Steve’s though. Steve’s hands were much too warm to hold metal so tight like this. He’d give just about anything to have one’a Steve’s warm hands in his own right now.

He’d give just about anything to not be so freezing right now.

He’d give just about anything to breathe in sync with lungs that worked because his own certainly didn’t and Steve wasn’t fucking beside him anymore.

Steve wasn’t anywhere at all and neither was Bucky.

Neither was Bucky.

~~ Nothin’. I’m just a kid from Brooklyn.~~

“What... the fuck? Why are there... JARVIS!”

“Yes sir?”

“What the fuck is all this in the hallway?”

“Those are Captain Rogers’ belongings, sir.”

“Is he gone?”

“No, sir. He threw everything out of the room and into the hallway.”

“This is a wall clock! This isn’t even his to throw! None of it is, it’s Sam’s room!”

“There is footage, sir, if you are in need of evidence.”

“I’m not spending my day watching more of Rogers’ temper tantrums. Anything I haven’t heard? And anything not broken?” Clank.

“There was a mild explosion and some choice words along the lines of ‘beep you, you ruined everything and it all still reminds me of you, you bastard.’ Presumably referring to Sergeant Barnes.”

“Yeah, presumably.”
“That’s when he began throwing things sir. Although that did not appear to have enough of an impact, so he threw them into the hallway. Out of sight.”

“Jesus Christ, even the pillows. Is that a bedframe? Glass mirror, painting frames...is there anything left in that room?”

“No sir. I believe the quote was ‘see? my tomb can be empty too.’ Shouted at the ceiling, likely in reference to Sergeant Barnes again.”

“Yeah, yeah. Thanks, Jarvis.”

“What the fuck Steve.”

~~ Might not want to pull on that thread.~~

Steve was supposed to find him here.

Steve was supposed to come storming through that door all in a huff with bloodshot blues and wild hands, supposed to go weak in the knees the moment he saw Bucky here, curled up in the window with one eye swollen orange and his legs tucked against his empty chest.

Why hadn’t he found Bucky yet?

It didn’t make any sense.

He should’ve been here by now. It’d be the first place to go.

Why hadn’t he found--

Steve promised.

He promised he’d always find Bucky, always save him from that table--

Shit. Shit, that table, he couldn’t think about that not when he was alone and Steve really might not be coming this time, again, and how could he have ever let himself be on that table again waiting for the hero that would never save him, he’d left Bucky to die once of course he’d leave him to die again especially now, especially since he was even more fucked up now than the last time Steve left him to die and if it weren’t for that goddamned table--

It wasn’t leather. This was metal wrapped around curled legs. Not leather.

Not leather, there were no leather gloves to weave between his metal fingers and no anything, not anymore, not left and suddenly Bucky needed to see Steve’s face more than he needed oxygen.

He was real. He was real, Steve’d saved him or he’d saved himself or something, something, it wasn’t all some dream and he wasn’t back on that table and Brooklyn hadn’t changed this much or maybe wait, it had, which part was real and he wasn’t still the Winter Soldier, was he? He wasn’t, no, no, it wasn’t all a dream a really fucking vivid dream he just needed proof and where the fuck was that goddamned newspaper?
It was real, that newspaper proved it only Bucky could whip his head back and forth as many times as he wanted, all he got was snakehair in his eyes and no newspaper this entire apartment was empty and the window was so cold and there wasn’t dirt under his fingernails and none of this was right, how the fuck was he supposed to find proof--

The museum. The museum, god, if it was all real then the museum would still be there and Steve would be there and the Welcome Back, Cap would be real and Steve was alive, Bucky was alive, he knew that he just needed to be sure because they’d just played with his mind so many times he knew better than to trust himself but wait, that was so long ago, unless they’d been keeping him under in this dream for years. It could be years.

He needed to see that museum.

Three hour bus ride to DC be damned.

The glass splintered as he scrambled outta his perch but that wasn’t the glass he cared about.

The white pixelated glass of his face, that was --

Penn Station, woosh, flashing colors and lights and so many people he just stayed curled against the glass of the window and waited waited he’d waited for so many years, three hours was nothing then clean streets bustling crowds, tourist season just coming to a close, big pillars, stone steps, sneaking through security, drifting through hallways with a silver hat pulled over his long hair, one two steps freeze:

--real.

It was all real.

Steve’d left him.

They’d both survived the war and Bucky’d gotten away from Zola again and he hadn’t killed anyone in months and they’d really both survived and they’d come home and they’d ended up together and they’d fallen into each other’s beds and Steve had been inside him and they’d kissed and kissed and kissed and he’d actually gotten to hold that beautiful face, the one laughing there in that goddamn black and white video as Bucky shook his head and they’d had that, again, he’d made Steve laugh and they’d danced on the roof and Steve’d taken him to Brooklyn Bridge and proposed and holy Jesus fucking Christ there was the ring on his finger and they’d actually truly honestly built a life together with friends and family and laughter and smiling and paint and blood, still so much blood and he’d broken Steve’s hands and slipped his muzzling mask back onto his face and they’d broken up and the storm had come for them again and the rain had slid down his swollen eye as Steve told him it was the end of the line and

It was over.

It wasn’t all that surprising the next place he found himself was a barstool.

He wasn’t drinking anything. Why wasn’t he drinking anything? He was just sitting here, waiting for something. Both arms on the wooden bar, staring down at his hands, waiting for something.

For Steve to come back, from inviting the Howling Commandos to their team. Except they didn’t have a name yet. And Steve wasn’t coming back.
The empty seat next to his was going to always be empty.

Steve wasn’t coming back.

Steve wasn’t coming back.

~~ Which means um…I can’t get drunk. Did you know that? ~~

His fingers were fumbling like they’d never thawed but he dug his phone outta his pocket anyway, soft quick gasps as he tried to breathe and open the damn lock screen over and over until he realized right, metal, he was an actual real life Android not Human and he couldn’t open his phone with that hand and okay, unlocked, where the fuck was contacts, why the fuck didn't he have his number memorized.

There. There. Slide down to S, don't look further down the page just press the first one and lift the goddamned phone to his ear, try to fucking breathe long enough for him to understand when he picked up--

A click.

“Sam? Sam listen I need help, I don't fucking know what I've don--”

“Barnes. Give me a location, I’ll send help.”

“Natasha? Why do you have Sam’s phone? You know what, it doesn’t matter, is Steve--”

“Location, Barnes.”

“I’m….a bar, two blocks from the DC Smithsonian--”

Click.

Slowly lowered the phone and Bucky just stared at it. What the hell was that about? Why did…Why was any of this happening? Why couldn’t Steve just let them be happy? Why did Bucky have to fuck everything up all over again?

Why
Why
Why

The door chimed with a bell like the old days only the lady in red wasn’t gonna steal Steve away from him this time.

At least, that’s what he thought.

“Natasha,” he breathed, because an exhibit was one thing and one of Steve’s best friends in the flesh was an entirely different thing. Stark’s jet’s were fast, but not that fast. How long had he been staring at this wooden countertop? How was Natasha so close? Was she already in DC? Where was everyone else? “Where’s Sam? Is Steve--”

“Is that what you called for?”
She swept into that empty seat behind him and Bucky blinked under his stupid veil of hair because she was really nothing like Peggy. All sharp where Peg was soft, cold instead of warm. Precise where Carter had been all tough shell and beauty with the most sincere of cores -

They were polar opposites and really, he was more like Peg than Nat was. Which could be why he was the one who ended up with Steve. Not that he thought Nat ever wanted too. He was pretty sure Nat didn’t want many things. She just took. Like all the air in this room apparently, and Sam’s phone, because he wasn’t here and really he was a lot better at this sorta thing than she was so why was she here?

He’d’ve called Stark before Natasha.

Hell, he probably would’ve called Stark before Sam if Tony was first in the contact book. Tony, in some odd way, understood him in a way that Wilson didn’t but at least Wilson was in Steve’s corner. God knows where Natasha stood in any of it.

But it didn’t matter because she was here and Steve wasn’t and Bucky really needed to know the state of Steve, not Natasha.

The state of this whole fucking mess he’d made.

Is that all he called for.

“How bad is it?” It was barely more than a whisper and Natasha didn't answer at first, studying sharp green with the little cock of her head.

Fifteen seconds ticked by, fifteen more. Then green finally cut away, lithe little body leaning over the counter to wave down the bartender, ask him for two vodkas with that pretty smile.

Bucky didn't actually like vodka at fucking all.

But it was Romanoff’s turn to speak and he had to wait, black glove curled tight enough against the bar to scuff the leather. Leather.

The bartender brought two glasses, slid one in front of them both but Bucky didn't look down, watching Romanoff as she picked up hers, swished it around like it was wine instead.

Watching the liquid tumble in her glass, finally finally she opened her mouth.

“It's not pretty.” Swish and Bucky’s stomach dropped to his feet. Green eyes cut to him like daggers, chin lifted and so cold he could feel it in his bones. “I always warned Steve, not to trust you.”

Bucky couldn't take that. He looked away sharply enough to strain his neck, teeth sinking into his bottom lip like the pain could stop the tears in his throat.

She'd warned Steve not to trust him. So had Bucky.

And Steve loved him so much he trusted him anyways, with all his heart. All his heart that Bucky bruised and bruised until it wasn't anything but blue blue stained black and then crushed it in his fucking robotic metal fist.

“With your past,” Natasha shook her head, short fingernails clicking on the bar like mini machine gun fire, machine gun fire he hadn't been able to block enough, he always could save Steve from everything but himself--
“all the awful, nightmarish things…” she continued and the metal plates rippled up from his fingertips like they were remembering just how many skulls they’d blasted apart, resequencing all the way up to his shoulder, shoving the shiver into scarred skin that Jesus fucking Christ, Steve had kissed, like they didn’t attach the most dangerous singular weapon any of them had--

All the awful, nightmarish things. The things that’d given Steve nightmares. The horror on his face as he flinched away from Bucky’s touch, the fleeting terror--

“You forget who-- what. You are.”

The tone was more bitter than he’d given her credit for. He knew they’d clash again once things got bad, but the amount of hatred in that voice threatened another shiver down his spine.

“I d-don’t know-- I don't know who I'm. Who I'm supposed to be,” he stumbled, who can protect Steve better, the unfeeling monster or the broken soldier but he didn't get a chance to say it because it wasn't who, it was what and the sudden click of a glass on the table made him look up with the words still on his tongue, just as another bit instead.

“You're a legendary killer.”

Bucky's mouth snapped shut.

Unfeeling monster or broken soldier. Apparently it didn't matter either way.

Both were legendary killers. One with medals and one with metal but it didn't matter, both were. Still a legendary killer.

A killer. A murderer, slitting throats and bashing faces in and sniping bullets between eyes--

But these hands, these hands hadn't broken anything but Steve, hadn't squeezed anything but the back of Steve’s neck as they kissed, soft and chaste and.

There was a ring on his finger, not a trigger.

A ring.

Not a trigger.

“I don't do that anymore,” Bucky broke, so pitiful his eyes were tearing up again.

Natasha flipped her hair over her shoulder, mouth pursed at the corners and Bucky couldn’t take that look, everything she was implying--

I don’t. He didn’t want to kill people anymore he didn’t want to be the Soldier he didn’t want to be a legendary killer or a killer at all he didn’t want to know more ways to kill somebody than he knew how to save somebody he didn’t want to speak eight different languages and case every room he walked into for vantage points and exits and he didn’t want--

He didn’t.

He didn’t do that anymore. Any of that.

It was less than a whisper this time, distant salt on his tongue as Bucky dug the heels of his hands into his eyes, “I don’t do that anymore,”

“It doesn’t matter. You will. It'll get worse, you'll get darker.” Bucky shook his head, pressing his hands harder til his vision sparked white at the edges but Romanoff kept going. “And you will.”

“It can’t p-possibly—” Gasp, fingers clawing up through his hair, head down and shoulders shaking and it wasn’t right, she wasn’t right he wouldn’t, he didn’t, only Steve was Gone and the last time Steve was gone he’d lost everything and he couldn’t let that happen again, he’d die before--

“B-be worse than this.”

Steve was gone. Steve was gone and he was hanging on the edge of the universe about to fall into the darkness and Nat was just telling him there was no way he could come back. But. But he and Steve weren’t over forever. They-- it wasn’t possible. It couldn’t. There was no way that, just a few days ago in the street, that wasn’t. No, just a fight. They just needed help and everything could go back and they’d be okay, right? Steve wanted him back. Of course Steve did, this was Steve. He was hurt but he’d come back from it, he always did, strongest person Bucky’d ever known and it couldn’t be that bad, it couldn’t be…

“How is -- how is Steve? Is he. Is he alright?”

“He will be, eventually...” Tip of a red fingernail swirling around in vodka and Bucky sniffled, brushing long damp hair back from his face. He had to get himself together, shit. Those green eyes weren’t budging a bit from their cold protectiveness that he got, man he got that more than anybody, if she’d been the one to fuckup Steve this conversation wouldn’t’ve gone half as civil.

At least she was being understan--

“--if you never come back.”

Bucky froze.

“What?” He couldn’t remember the last time he’d been genuinely stunned, so unprepared a dunk of freezing water would’ve been kinder.

Natasha pursed her lips again, shaking her head as she swished around around around that red fingernail inside crystal.

“You hurt him more than you help him, and you know that.” Bucky swallowed only the lump in his throat wasn’t going away and neither were the stabbing bloody wounds. “If you love him, you won't dare go crawling back and dragging him down with you.”

Natasha Romanoff straightened in her chair, looking at him with those intense green eyes under the falling red waves framing her porcelain face and every moment, every emotion towards Steve hovering between them and it was deep, he had no idea it ran that deep but if there was one thing he understood, it was how fucked up Steve Rogers’ redemption could take you, how lifted and terrifying and how dire the urge was to protect something that beautiful but whatever she knew, he had it worse, he had it so much worse and she knew that and she was still asking this of him.

“If you love him the way all the storybooks say Bucky Barnes loves Steven Grant Rogers, if that's really still you - you'll protect him and you'll stay away. For good.”

“I can't,” Bucky shook his head and Natasha’s eyes narrowed and Bucky opened his palms like that could reveal his pain, voice edging on more and more desperate, pain dragging him further further, “I can't, I can’t, I've tried and I can't, the only time I've ever escaped was when I was brainwashed into amnesia--”

“You have to.” White fingers closed around his black black jacket and Bucky stared down at her hand, the squeezing pressure on real skin, his right side but the wrong side, a girl like her should be held at a distance with metal but she already knew where he was soft and vulnerable and broken, it didn’t matter.

“You have to protect him,” her voice was closer this time and Bucky looked up. She was standing now, closer than anybody but Steve’d been for a long time, asking worse than anybody’d asked of him for a long long time. “No matter the cost.”

Human skin giving under her rough touch, holding him still, holding his gaze impossible and serious and Bucky wasn’t even breathing.

“I can’t save him from you, or I would.” The hand released, blood flushing back through his arm fast enough to make him woozy, woozier than he already was, last flash of focus narrowing in on Natasha’s white features and pinning gaze, the bitter truth spilt past her lips like all the blood they both spilled, red biting fangs seizing his chest. “Only you can.”

A whoosh of red, sweeping dress and click click click of heels bells over doors and Bucky was so lightheaded he’d be begging Steve-shaped Angels to take him to heaven if he didn’t get a fucking grip.

“I’m invisible,” Bucky managed, whisper fading the moment it split from his lips. Steve had made him invisible and that was only the beginning, shot-down and falling into the nothing they’d made him without the sun but then he’d been pulled back into the light of summer and

"I'm - I'm turning into you." Nothing but an extension of Steve Rogers, the boyfriend, sidekick, sucking blonde light from the dark breathing holes in his mask, absorbing what didn’t belong to him and he’d taken too much and pushed Steve too far, trying so hard to turn into the hero when he wasn’t, Steve wanted him to be but Bucky wasn’t Good, couldn’t ever turn into Steve--

The stutter would give him away, god the stutter would give him away. He let out a panicked rush of air, eyes forcibly away. Bucky stared at the and held his breath and waited for Steve to call him out. A year ago, Steve’d know instantly.

But Bucky wasn't Bucky anymore and Steve wasn't Steve anymore and he just smiled lightly, turning back towards the bar.

The bar that wasn’t this one. Steve wasn’t here, Bucky was talking to an empty barstool and twin ghosts and the tear that slipped down his cheek was cold as the ice they’d dunked him in.

Steve was gone. Bucky was here at a bar, finally realizing - again - that he’d lost Steve. He’d lost Steve, Steve was gone and no

"Th-This is some horrible dream,” Bucky broke over the softest, deepest part of his chest and he could see the young, foolish, reckless ghost flickering beside him, the soft gold on his face as he stammered his way through realizing he’d been in love with his best friend his entire life.

The same words - a century apart - echoed over his own, two desperate turns of fate, two Saratogas in the same goddamned battle that Bucky should’ve known, should’ve always known he’d never win.

"Don't take it so hard,” Steve teased, big hand clapping down on Bucky’s shoulder. It was supposed to be playful, sure, but none of the other guys touched each other this damn often and for once? Bucky wished maybe it could be what it looked like.

Steve's hand lingered too long and Bucky was a ragdoll. He stared forward, lips parted, the touch warming him all over, calming away the anger in his belly. Here he was with a hand on Bucky's shoulder like he was the most familiar thing in the world.

"Maybe she's got a friend." Steve smiled. Like the old days. God, if they could go back to the old days. Then his hand was gone and gone and gone.

~~The living legend - who kinda lives up to the legend.~~

The wind was blowing, the edge of that New York chill, fucking his hair up, strong enough it'd’ve been hard to walk if he was younger.

He wasn’t.

Steve stood at the edge of the roof on the Stark Tower and couldn’t stop thinking about how far from young he was.

Like Sitwell said, in one of the last conversations of Steve’s free life before Bucky’s Alive consumed his existence, throwing people off roofs wasn’t really his style. Neither was jumping off them.

Then again, he’d also told Natasha in that conversation that he wasn’t ready for that girl with the lip piercing and ten minutes later there was Bucky and his metal arm and everything vanilla got thrown out the window right along with Sitwell.

Although, really, if Bucky hadn’t lied about loving--

Not loving.

He hadn’t--

If Bucky’d loved him back then, odds are Steve woulda been down to get dirty in more than one way in those trenches. But, see, it wasn’t like it mattered. So they eventually did end up screwing. What was the point? Bucky didn’t love him.

Back then, it’d been so much easier. Back then, Steve wasn’t foolish enough to believe they could ever be together. He’d been alright with just being Buck’s friend.

“And now look at us,” Steve bit into the wind, lifting the photograph to the dull light from the cloudy sky. He’d snuck onto their old floor, grit his jaw the entire time it took to run to Buck’s old room, wrestle the photograph out of the frame and run back for the elevator.

Too many memories, way too many memories. He couldn’t breathe in there anyways, and now he was up here because at least there was air up here.

They’d danced in each other’s arms up here. Sang and shouted and laughed and pushed and collided with smiling kisses and-- Fuck. Back then. It was so much easier back then.

Buck in the photograph could be somebody entirely different, only that spark in his eyes, that excited curl of his mouth as he explained something to the Howling Commandos while Steve looked on fondly--

That was the same mouth that’d pressed to Steve’s. The same eyes that held his and promised never to leave. Never to forget him again.

Well. At least he’d kept half the promise. Steve highly fucking doubted Buck was forgetting any of this anytime soon. Hell, maybe he was glowering in victory. He’d fucking destroyed everything.

Look what he’d done, look what he’d made Steve do. He didn’t have the right to blow up at Tony like that. But this family, the one in the photo - they were his real family, right? The ones who knew the real him?

Or was that all just glorified memories? Idealized stories vamped up by Buck like everything else?

But, see, at least the Howling Commandos knew Steve before he died. Before he died when Bucky fell off the train. Before he died and became this raging monster that’d kill anything that looked at his best friend wrong--

Here, spread out below him was all of Manhattan, one of the most populated places in the world. Millions, down there. Millions of individual lives, worlds, with families and friends and coworkers and plans. How many of those worlds would he let burn to save Buck?

Please don’t make me do this, only he’d wound up doing it anyways.

Because he loved Bucky. And Bucky stomped on his fucking soul, didn’t give a damn that Steve loved him more than taking his next breath.

Buck never felt that way. He’d never said I love you.

“How’re you holdin’ up?” Sam asked quietly.

Steve looked up, blinking quickly to slide the tears back down his throat instead of his cheeks.

Sam looked steadily back at him, sure and quiet and strong. Family. Palms flat on the edge of the roof beside his. Dark and real and human and smaller than Bucky’s, no metal, no leather gloves either.

Steve looked back at the city lights, squinting into the overcast glare so he didn’t have to watch that patient face. Fuck Tony Stark. He didn’t need more fucking guilt.

Sam took a deep breath, stirring up the air with the smallest of hurricanes.

“Look, Steve. I know your entire life, people have dragged you into fights. You’ve been through so much to save so many and I get it, you’re tired man. You’re done. But there’s one last mission, one more person who needs you to save them one last time.”

“I told Stark--” In so many words, anyways. Steve wondered distantly if that was the final straw on a fight they’d had their entire friendship. Probably ex-friendship. “I can’t save Bucky.”

Sam kept watching him and Steve kept looking down. He didn’t need this softness. Why couldn’t they all stop caring?

They’d had a conversation exactly not-this once. He’s gonna be there y’know. That same steady, rational, careful. Family.

“But after everything he’s been through for you...I think you owe it to him to try.”

Last time, it’d been the goddamned opposite. Last time, he was the kind you stop, right? When did Bucky stop being the kind you stop? When did Steve stop being the kind who saves?

When did Steve start being the freezing cold soldier who fought for blood instead of folks-back-home? When did he throw away all his folks-back-home?

“Steve, this is what it’s all about. Since the beginning, since Stark’s dad fired up that machine. I know it gets muddy, all lost along the way, but saving people, that’s what--”

“What I was built for,” Steve finished quietly. Getting Bucky back - he doesn’t know you. He will, Steve’d said last time. He’d been so sure. Because it was Buck. Of course he’d remember. They always came back to each other. That’s what they did, they came back to each other.

“The only thing I’m good for.” Except clearly he wasn’t any good at it, because he’d lost the war the last....every single time he’d fought, right? Lost something in all of them. Destroyed his family, every single time. Was there any war out there where he didn’t lose?

Then it wouldn’t be war, would it? And what did Buck say - Steve couldn’t live without a war anyways?

Sam was holding his breath, tentatively waiting beside Steve, all worried and knotted up and whatnot and Steve just wanted to curl in a ball and stop being awake. Stop all this. Couldn’t take seeing that beautiful face and knowing Buck never loved--

He couldn’t keep--

It. Just...Sam was right. Steve knew that, he knew Sam was right and maybe Sam was right all along, because he’d been right about not being able to save Bucky. Steve hadn’t saved Bucky since the war. Only Buck had the privilege to do that anymore, and Steve wasn’t good enough to fit in that picture. Or the one in his hand, the outsider even in his own band of brothers. The off-look, the small smile while the rest were hollering in laughter, dazed as he watched Bucky, so in love he’d never fit in anywhere in his goddamned life because he could never fucking get over the seizing in his chest when that beautiful smile lit up and that soft accent lured him in, the beautiful Bucky Barnes ripped up his entire fucking world and.

The only glint of metal he had left was on his own left hand now. Steve spun the engagement ring slowly, letting the circle slide over the calluses on his thumb, hard and smooth and the only goddamned piece he had left, he couldn’t...that couldn’t be it.

If only to give him his fucking bloody ring back.

End it once and for all.

Cut all the ties, right? Because that part, he was good at. Disappearing, he was good at. Leaving broken hearts in his wake, he was good at.

Or maybe he was just so weak it was still about Saving Bucky. Saving. Captain’s voice, more America than Rogers but it didn’t matter, it’d get the job done. Whatever job this ended up being.

Saving Bucky. Ironic. S’why he took up arms the first time and if this was the death of him the way it felt, it’d be the last reason he took up arms too.
How was that for family?

“What are the mission parameters?”

~~Then stop blaming yourself. Allow Barnes the dignity of his choice. He damn well must have thought you were worth it.~~

He stood on the bus platform for an entire hour.

He had a roundtrip ticket. It’d be a waste of money not to go back, and money wasn’t something he had a lot of.

But if he was gonna keep running, it was a waste of miles going back to the city where Steve was.

Who the fuck was he kidding.

The last few seats were taken, so he ended up in a window seat above the G in Greyhound. The first few hours were entirely uneventful. He’d picked up an iPod because listening to music was about the only thing to save his sanity on these rides, curled up against the glass with headphones jammed in his ears.

The bus came rolling to a stop at the edge of New York City, the last pitstop before his station. The hat pulled down over his hair had a low brim, but he could still see the bus platform outside the window pretty clearly.

There were only a few passengers getting aboard, couple of businessmen, a few older couples, and one young blonde girl who couldn’t’ve been older than 18. He wouldn’t’ve noticed her if he hadn’t been watching the homeless man first.

It was pretty clear the homeless man had slept on the bus bench, old and scruffy, threadbare jacket, not a single possession, not even a scrawled-cardboard sign to be seen.

The bus pulled up and the blonde girl jumped off her end of the bus bench, practically running in the other direction and skidding to a stop in front of the homeless man. He looked up under his thin cap, silver whiskers and sad eyes, even from here on the bus.

The girl dug around in her ratty blue bag, pulling out a banana, and an orange. She handed them both to the man, bright smile on her face, leaning close to give some sort of warm sentiment. Bucky couldn’t decide if he or the man were more surprised.

Then she was off in a whirlwind again, sweeping aboard the bus with her torn blue bag hanging off one shoulder. It was easier to see her now, taking in the quick confident, peppy steps as she strode down the aisle. There were lingering purple streaks underneath the blonde, pulled up in a bun over five-dollar aviators. Her gray-knit shoes were falling apart, but the rest of her clothes were in good shape - black running shorts and a white tshirt with the sleeves cut off, printed american flag and eagle design down the front, wings arching into red roses with a big black banner that read FREE SPIRIT across it.

Traveling alone, looking around like the whole place belonged in some romantic book. The vague piss smell didn't even seem to be bothering her all that much and Bucky couldn't help the little smile that curled on his face.
So this would’ve been Steve. If they’d been born into this world instead of shoved into it. If they’d grown up in the twenty-first century where they could be free spirits without dying on the frontlines for it. So this is what Steve’d been fighting for without knowing it, all those years ago.

For one irrational, stupid moment Bucky wished this could’ve been their century. Their life. Maybe if they’d grown up without the Great Depression and the second world war, he and Steve would’ve ended up together.

Maybe Bucky wouldn’t be poison.

His thoughts were interrupted as the young blonde girl swung into the empty seat across from him, brief smile in his direction before the blue bag was deposited and she curled up against the window, temple on the glass as bright eyes shut.

The bus rolled to a start. Bucky blinked as the girl...fell asleep. She was sleeping on a public bus, while a strange dangerous man - a serial killer, assassin actually - was sitting across from her. The same stupid, foolish trust. Trust not to steal her ratty blue bag, not to slit her throat while she drifted, unaware.

Trust placed in him that Steve’d given him, until Bucky’d broken it the same way he’d broken every other part of Steve’s life.

That girl was sitting there sleeping like Bucky wasn’t a lethal assassin --

Only.

Only he was.

He wasn’t deserving of that trust. Not with anyone.

“Stop the bus!”

She woke with a start, as did the rest of the snoozing passengers, but Bucky didn’t give a single fuck, standing in his seat now with the gloved arm waving down the driver.

“Stop the bus, I have to get off. I have to get off.”

~*~ You’re worth more than this, you know.~*~

“The last place he’d hidden out after Hydra was here, three or four miles west of the High Line.”

“Did Rogers make a map? Did you make a map?”

“It’s just a quick look.” Steve straightened, sliding the highlighted map of New York towards the center of the table.

“Well, nobody’s perfect,” a soft voice chimed in his head, quirked red smile. Steve paused, staring down at the city, circled regions, red X’s, black lines tracing. She couldn’t help now. She couldn’t even remember him for longer than a half-hour.

Steve set down Stark’s pens, edges of his fingers smudged red and black. The last time he’d poured over a map with the Commandos, it’d been the same colors under his fingernails. Dirt and blood traded for artificial ink and that was just the century, wasn’t it.

“And you think he’ll be in one of these places?”

Steve grabbed his jacket off the back of a chair, swinging one arm through on the way to the door, words echoing off the walls as he kept right on walking,

“I know he will.”

~~You told me you thought I was meant for more than this. Did you mean that?~~

Steve was right.

By June, 1937 all the hot water surrounding the new Wallabout Terminal had settled down and Bucky Barnes found one of his new favorite hideaways. That was back before the trains made him cringe, when he and Steve used to come down to the shiny new railroad, sneak through the shrieking, sparking railway cars, ducking through still carriages to climb over the rubble on the far end of the terminal and settle on the edge of the waterline, watch the new steam-powered tugboats come into Palmer’s dock.

It was a park now. East River State Park, ran only from North 7th to 9th, bout half what it used to. Some of the old railroad lines were still embedded in the concrete, although there definitely weren’t tugboats coming in the harbor anymore.

There were informational signs, dedicating the park as a historical site. Even some old grainy photos of the arching entrance, all grays instead of the sharp browns and copper, light light blue as Steve glanced over at him with that smile, flop of blonde and dark sketchpad clutched to his chest.

Bucky tapped the photo with his glove, as if that could somehow pull it big enough to be real life again. Real life didn’t have Steve in it.

He turned away from the sign, taking careful steps along the path that hadn’t been here all those years ago. Hands shoved in his pockets, eyes turned down from the glittering water and a lot of things hadn’t been here years ago.

The bench had the perfect view of Midtown and the Manhattan Bridge. Same way those crates did all those years ago.

Bucky closed his eyes.

It didn’t matter where he did it. He was going to, and it was better sooner than later.

But fingering the ring in his pocket, here, this place, this river wasn’t right.

Nothing was, anymore, he should be able to just ditch the damn thing. Throw the last piece of Stark technology that’d fucked over his life into the water, grind it under his heel in the dirt, flick it into some public trashcan.

But every time he had the chance, his hand shoved deeper in his pocket.

He was starting to look like Steve.
“Rogers.”

“Stark.”

Sam glanced between them both, patient expression straining. “...look, are one of you gonna apologize or...?”

“Or this is gonna be a very awkward quinjet ride,” Clint added on, tightening the strap around his wrist.

“Excuse me, did you say one of us? I’m sorry, did I miss who yelled at and accused who of what? Or did my one attempt at actually caring go so entirely south this is somehow my fault?”

“Tony, I don’t think that’s helping--”

“I will leave - right now, midflight, I don’t give a fuck - if this is going to be a fight, or a fucking intervention or whatever the fuck you’re planning. I’m going with you, but believe me, it will not take fucking much to sway that decision. It’s not me who wanted to find him in the fucking first place, remember?”

“Steve, he’s your friend,” Clint pointed out softly.

“Family,” Tony bit snarkily and Steve threw up his hands, snatching his helmet up and stalking to the cabin. He didn’t have to fucking listen to any of that. Fuck them.

“Fuck you all,” Steve cursed under his breath, both hands braced on an outcropping, head hanging down between his arms. He didn’t have the fucking energy.

There’d always been the fucking world between him and Buck and apparently that wasn’t changing anytime soon.

~~ How was it? It was okay. She’s next to Dad.~~

It wasn’t just the 1940s homophobia stopping them back then. Bucky didn't think he deserved Steve. Or real love at all. Steve couldn't understand why Bucky would waste his time on someone so delicate and useless.

The war came between them and the war brought them together and the world yanked them apart and never gave them enough time together but even if it had, it didn't matter. Bucky thought he'd changed too much to be anything but a burden to Steve. Steve thought he'd changed too much for Buck to feel like he needed to stick around anymore.

Then the trains and planes ripped them apart and when they got shoved back together again, there were only more problems to layer on. Bucky didn't need. Steve needed too much.

Bucky couldn't give up the past and Steve wanted to live in it but neither of them could handle the face of the truth and the present. Both were too hurt and too traumatized and they stumbled fast into each other's arms and didn't understand how much had built up over the years in each other's minds.

It never should've worked out anyways. It was too much, too much past and history, too high of pedestals to put each other on. Feathers weighing like rocks, sunshine and stars and moons and clouds and nothing real, nothing human like it should've been.

They weren't what they should've been. They were a war story and a love story and they broke and it was no one's fault but their own.

Or, well. Personally, Bucky'd say it was a hell of a lot more his fault than Steve's. And he didn't let himself think that Steve was probably saying the exact same thing.

Steve may've been the one kicking Bucky out on the surface but under it all, this was Bucky leaving him. Doing the same thing he always had.

Saving Steve - only now that meant what it had before. Walking away, staying away, that was how he saved Steve Rogers today.

The same way he had the day he shipped out.

The same way he had when he'd picked up that shield to be blown out the side of the train.

The same way he had leaving Steve on the shore of the Potomac.

The shore of the Potomac.

He should throw this goddamned ring into that river.

When Zola had him, that final clinging part of him that wouldn't let go - that part of him that was still so attached to Steve - it held on for years and years before he finally crushed it.

And it was here, that he’d crushed it. In a dream, a dream about a dock by a river and in the dream there hadn’t been trains or benches, not parks of the present of pulls of the past, but the view across the river was the same.

Somehow, it was here and it was nowhere, that dream on the docks where Steve had held him close and Bucky told him to leave forever.

It’d been a river that’d taken his arm from him too. Falling down into that cold blackness, surface of the water rocky and freezing and fast, whipping his body in double directions the moment he hit, severing tendons and depositing him on snowy shore, arm torn off somewhere along the way.

Hanging from a metal beam, explosions and sparks around him as he watched Steve’s broken body falling falling falling for the river below. The tearing sensation in his chest, the awful clutching pain screaming at him to save himself and the deep, searing ache telling him to let go, dive after that body.

Fingers releasing, dropping so fast his head threatened to explode, air rushing around him like a cocoon, like a memory at the edge of his peripherals - streamlining his body, dive position he’d perfected that summer at the pier and when he hit the water he didn’t think about the cold or losing his arm or the sun reflecting off Steve’s bare white shoulders that summer at the lake.

Just saving the body sinking so fast below him.

A river, like this one, all that water between them - the best of times, the worst of times.
He should throw the damned ring in.

Although there are oceans we must cross
And mountains that we must climb
I know every gain must have a loss
So pray that our loss is nothing but time

Till then, my darling, please wait for me.

And now that ocean between them, the river that’d shaken them so, there was no bridge over it anymore. Steve’d burnt that bridge right to the grou--

The bridge.

It was fitting, Steve’d given it to him on the bridge.

The bridge.

It wasn’t fair. This wasn’t fair, how could Steve do this to him, after everything Bucky’d sacrificed it still wasn’t enough and he’d been following Steve Rogers around his entire life how could they be apart--

It hurt. It hurt so much he couldn’t think about it, he couldn’t think about the fact that he’d wake up tomorrow and Steve was still going to be gone. Gone, forever, Bucky had no one he had no one but that wasn’t as bad as that he didn’t have Steve and he couldn’t breathe.

He couldn’t breathe, he couldn’t breathe, he’d lost Stevie he’d lost Stevie-- Bucky choked, glove shooting up to cover his mouth, holding his mouth so tight a sound couldn’t possibly escape but he could still feel it in his throat, chest, heart. Soul.

If he didn’t start for the bridge now, he’d collapse in a ball before he ever got rid of the damned ring.

The strength it took to drag himself off that bench, all his weight shoved upright, supported by the curving metal because his chest was so heavy and his legs were jello, strong thighs abandoning him, rendered more useless than when he’d been shot.

Steve’d carried him. Steve’d lifted him in those strong arms and carried Bucky over enemy territory, through exploding walls, across freezing rivers, through twisted gnarls of roots in that forest, carried Bucky even though his arms must’ve ached, carried him with that careful, sincere, desperate protection, soot-smudged face and rushed breaths.

It was Bucky’s fault they came so far from that. It was Bucky’s fault they couldn’t be that anymore. It was Bucky who’d reached too much, asked for more, pushed Steve further, destroyed his best friend by making him his lover and it was too late now.

The bullets riddled in his skin were too deep to dig out, bite his belt sew up with floss. Bucky’d been strong then, bit his way through the pain with tears in his eyes that Steve’d thumbed away with those hushed, whispered apologies.

Strong.

“Just hold on, Buck, c’mon.”

Staring at the ground like this, long black snakes framed his vision and he’d never gotten Steve to cut his hair, he’d never gotten out.

The silver ring in a pocket was going to burn right through his skin if he didn’t get out.

He just had to make it one more time. Come home from the war a final time, land at that bridge once more, that was the only place left and then he could stop being strong, he could stop fighting so damn hard.

Stumble out the park.

Catch himself on a lamppost, force himself to breathe right.

There was a time that he swung on lampposts, singing silly songs at Steve over the glittering gold cobblestone while Steve laughed and shook his head but

No. The bridge, he just had to catch a bus. Subway. Taxi, anything.

The taxi driver asked him if he was feeling well and Bucky waved the man off, stared out the window.

It’d cost more to catch the highway and end up stuck on the Brooklyn Bridge, so the man asked if it was alright to drop Bucky at Jane’s Carousel.

Bucky nodded. But standing on shaky feet at the restored ride from 1922, he found himself regretting that agreement.

Sarah took them once a year. Normally for Bucky’s birthday instead of Steve’s, it was so crowded on the Fourth of July they’d never be able to hop aboard.

Once, near the end, Bucky and Steve’d taken Sarah for her birthday. She’d teared up, managed to fight a smile through helping her on the beautiful golden horse.

And around and around and around

Steve’d jumped on one too, smile matching his mother’s as their eyes caught through the mirrors and glitter. Bucky’d stayed outside, watched on with a wistful smile, the two soft blonde-haired angels he was too blessed to have spinning round and round.

Bucky’d never been a catcher in the rye but he could swear he saw his entire life spinning around on that carousel that day. Immortal, those two, going on forever in their youth, beauty, for a single moment everything was alright and they were both healthy and laughing and.

The moment Bucky took Sarah’s hand to help her back off the ride, she started coughing again.

She didn’t stop.

Bucky stared at the empty carousel, the big glass cage around it now. Big glass cage around all of them now.

The carousel wasn’t moving, no spinning gold lights, no immortality, no life. Just that shining glass cage.

It was only a few feet from the base of the bridge. It took him longer than it should’ve to walk to the pedestrian stairs. These were the same stairs they’d come down the day Steve proposed to him. On this bridge, feet away from that carousel where the last bit of life was spinning around before Steve lost his angel and Bucky got a little closer to his.
“You don’t have to,” Bucky whispered, leg straightening to pull him to the top stair. And there it was, the length of the bridge stretched before him, black wires and rushing cars, huge brick archways they’d all but carved their initials into when they were kids.

Peggy’d dropped her last piece of Steve off this bridge. Today, Bucky’d do the same.

Only….only he’d carry Steve’s heart to the grave.

Sucking in dirty air, wind whipping his hair back, two hands closed around the rail, the same spot Steve’d dropped to one knee.

The cold circle of the ring in his pocket. The circle Steve’d drawn around his finger - the dashed line. The end, where it all ended, where it began only it didn’t feel like forever, it felt like they’d been together days instead of months and really, in the face of the lifetimes they’d lived, it was only a blink.

But it’d started so long before this proposal, so long before, back to the first time they’d walked across this bridge as kids, throwing pebbles off into the water, watching the splash ripple out below, blue blue blue.

Shambles, shattered, how could this possibly be the end of their story?

How could this be all they were meant to be?

Apart, forever?

No. No, they were never even supposed to get this far. It should’ve died then, they both should’ve died long before they ever reached this far but they didn’t, they survived and for the first time, Bucky found himself wondering if maybe they really would’ve been better off if Steve’d croaked the first time he got pneumonia.

Fuck this stupid ring. Fuck all of the stupid promises neither of them could keep, fuck it all he didn’t fucking need this anymore, the pain was going to crush him and he honestly had no idea how he was supposed to survive it, it was too much fuck Steven Grant Rogers.

Metal whirring as his arm surged backwards, one final pause because this was it, the moment he followed through and threw the ring it was all over, that was his last piece of Steve and he’d be absolutely nothing, tethered to nothing with no proof it’d even ever existed and it hadn’t, he hadn’t, it didn’t, he might as well fucking throw--

Bucky stopped.

Arm reeled back and hair whipping in his face and eyes flooded with tears and he stopped, because he couldn’t. He couldn’t throw it, he couldn’t throw Steve’s ring into the river below because he’d never been strong enough to, he was strong enough to do anything but leave Steve, he just couldn’t he always always came crawling back, through trenches and apartment windows he couldn’t, Steve was so much stronger than him he couldn’t, James Bucky Barnes was not physically strong enough to do this--

No. No.

He wasn’t.
But.

But it hurt so bad.

James Buchanan Barnes wasn’t strong enough.

But The Winter Soldier was.

Metal creaking, arm slowly lowering. Ripple from gloved fingers up through his spine, straightening out with a shiver. Tall. Steady. Legs locking into place, weak muscles hardening, whipping hair no longer stinging. Bridge below his feet zeroing in, out. Water splashing below suddenly loud enough to hear, each speeding car behind zipping by popping up numbers on speeds and types and.

He reached over slowly, skin fingers pinching the tip of a black glove, tugging it off slowly, careful not to drop the silver ring from his palm. And then it was metal on metal, glove deposited to the ground, discarded.

This ring.

Fingers closed around the edge of the twisting metal, closed around every promise Steve’d ever made him.

I had you. Til’ death.

The metal arm reached out, hovering over the water crashing below. It was more fitting to let it fall, the way they’d both dropped before. Fall slowly slowly to its death.

Except Bucky wasn’t pulling anybody out this time.

Not Steve and not himself.

Goodbye, my darling.

Whirr.

Metal fingers open.

A single flash of sunlight off silver and the ring dropped, tumbling down down down.

Black waves to meet it below.

Black to meet them all.

~*~ Barnes is the only Howling Commando to give his life in service of his country.~*~

Red, red he hadn’t seen in months.

The last time he squeezed these old gloves over his hands, Bucky’d backed him up against a brick wall on a rooftop and kissed him mid-mission, he could still remember the contrast of dark brunette tumbling over the red leather as Steve ran his fingers through the long hair, mesmerized at the bright twinkle in teasing eyes, heated lips--
Fucking fuck. Fuck Buck for making him do this. Steve rolled his neck, barely able to move with the tight collar against his throat, stealing what breath Bucky hadn’t beaten outta him with that brutal punch, the one that’d destroyed every false promise of the I love you he could never say.

Another tightening zipper. He hated Bucky for making him do this. One last time, had to save the world one last time. had to put himself through hell one last time. Had to shove himself into the gaudy redwhiteandblue one last time, compromise everything he’d fought for because he knew, it wasn’t Captain America anymore. Steve’d already come to terms with being the bully - monster - he’d always fought and now he had to go through suiting up into that lie all over again.

One last mission, for the good of it all, because what the fuck else did they keep Steve around for but for this. What the fuck else did Steve ever get back into fighting for? When the fuck was the last time this was about Steve?

He tightened the strap across his thigh, all but cutting into flesh, sliding the gun into one more holster. Fuck Bucky for making it about him again.

Fuck Bucky for making Steve run around the earth for him only to be stabbed in the chest - literally, once, but Steve apparently couldn’t take a fucking hint.

Or any of the fucking hints Bucky’d been dropping since the beginning of their lives together.

He was nothing more than a responsibility.

Bucky felt responsible for the sick kid he'd saved once in an alley and it wasn't love that kept him there.

It was duty.

The same duty that had Steve lacing up these stupid fucking boots in the back of a quinjet.

Funny, how during the war he could've sworn it was the other way around.

Funny, how Steve was supposed to be the loyal one who'd sacrifice anything for his country, his duty. He'd sacrifice anything but Buck, anyways.

And Bucky'd sacrifice anything for him because he was Bucky’s responsibility. His duty.

And his fucking loyalty was so precious, so strong - it made Steve think he loved him. And Bucky’d let that happen. Let it happen because he wanted what was best for Steve and that was in his arms but not his heart because Steve was SAFE there but Bucky didn't LOVE him.

Steve still needed to be protected apparently. And that only meant one thing.

Steve wasn't good enough.

Still wasn’t fucking good enough.

He nearly broke his nose shoving the helmet on his head and good, wouldn’t that be just ironic, this stupid uniform giving him more bruises than protection. Back in the days of broken noses, he didn’t make himself believe Bucky was in love with him and all that physical pain? He’d take that back a thousand times over this.

Give him the rattle and breaks in his chest over the hole any day.

Snap of the shield on his arm and Steve was fucking ready. One last time.
That’s a tough way to live. It’s a good way not to die, though.

Like he’d told Natasha. Bucky could never rid himself of Steve.

So it was simple. Forget Bucky. Be the Winter Soldier.

ends where it begins.

"Let’s see, we met while I was pulling you out of a fight," he pondered, pressing a kiss to Steve’s neck as he began tracing Bucky’s wrists again. "You think that’s where we’ll have the eternal breakup too?"

"No," Steve corrected patiently, "The line began when I felt alive for the first time and it ends when we die together."

"Jesus Christ you have the most twisted version of romance in the world," Bucky huffed faintly, shaking his head at Stevie’s maudlin tone that belonged in a tinier body. Steve hummed in response, circling line and dash again, and again, before tipping his head against Bucky’s and dropping his voice into a whisper.

"Kiss me."

"Here?"

"Here."

He shifted in Steve’s lap, tipping his head up and curling on his side so their mouths could press together, colder than the water lapping at their chests. Lips dragged together and apart, heads tilting as Steve tightened his arm over Bucky’s chest and licked along his tong--

Covering his face with cold metal was about the quickest thing to snap the hottub memory to dust, reality smacking in sharp and freezing like the chill settling on his skin, the bite from the window he curled beside.

It wasn’t really a bed. A mattress, tucked up against a wall. It was better than the floor, at least made him feel somewhat civilized. Not the soldier.

There was a thin blanket too, something he’d snagged downtown when he got the hat, the concealer for the worst of the bruises on his cheekbone.

But lying here on an empty mattress staring out the window at Brooklyn streets, curled up in a ball and just waiting?

He didn’t want to be a runaway.

He didn’t want to be left alone. He didn’t want to be alone anymore. Please, just.

Weight, the heaviness of his fingers crushed against each other. He could do this.

Bucky slowly lifted his hand, shadows falling over his face in the darkness. This hand used to grab Steve’s when they were kids, drag him running across Central Park. This hand was real. Fingers sticking to each other like some kind of human security.
It was simple, wasn’t it?

Suck in a careful breath, chest expanding with oxygen, release slow through pursed lips and spread fingers away from each other, room for power to come dancing up between.

It was a little better. The weight in his chest didn’t lift entirely.

Didn’t feel like home like he’d hoped. Or powerful. But there was something freeing about it.

Ebbing, waning away the crushed, sticky weight. Almost enough for him to lift his head off the pillow. But the sinking, the falling down towards the earth, pulled to the ground and away from St--

That wasn’t gone. Wouldn’t ever be gone, would it?

He could swear the fingers in front of his face were see-through. Fading, dissipating in the air like the skin of a ghost--

No.

The hand flopped back carelessly to the sheets only that felt all kinds of ugly again and he couldn’t hold his fingers apart forever but he couldn’t let them touch and…

Folds of thin blanket, tucked between his fingers to keep them from collapsing into each other.

His chest was still caving in.

Head pounding, throat dry.

Physically ill and the room kept shifting gravitational pull, balance all off like he’d never get comfortable in the oxygen bubble again in his life.

He just had to get back in. Get back in, turn it back on.

If he could only slip back into the ease of being that, he wouldn’t have to be this anymore.

He could be clean again. Saved. He could stop hurting, couldn’t he?

No. No, no.

He’d fucking fight that until the day he died.

It would get rid of the pain but so what?

When Steve came for him, he didn’t want to be the Winter Soldier, he wanted to be Bucky Barnes.

He didn’t go down that easy, just because he was hurt, just because he was alone-- forever, the voice in his head reminded him and Bucky moaned, whipping onto his other side, shifting his weight, sinking further but not far enough, never far enough and his neck couldn’t stay like that, turn again, roll and kick and fuck fuck fuck it wasn’t fair, he didn’t want to be alone he just had to wait, it wouldn’t be like this for long, Ste--

Steve. Steve wasn't coming for him.

The end of the line, he’d said it was over and

He had to. So long as he was alive. Steve wouldn’t leave him so long as they were both breathing.
He’d promised.

Only, it felt like Bucky wasn't anymore.

Lungs couldn’t take in oxygen with that crushing--

Sleep. Needed sleep and tomorrow, it’d all reset and be so much brighter tomorrow. Maybe he’d have the strength to crawl out of bed tomorrow.

And he was just going to fall asleep, just like that? Miserable and aching with his head fucking spinning--

What about his goddamned safety? There used to be a time - he remembered when he only felt safe sleeping under Steve’s roof. There’d been something there he’d trusted with every fiber of his being, even with all his training in full activation because it was Steve and he’d saved Bucky so many times-

Except the last time

And he’d come for him again, wouldn’t he?

Why wasn’t he here yet? Why wasn’t he here?

Vision was going outta focus, spotty at the edges. The random objects strewn across the empty apartment were dappling and shifting. Painted black, swallowed shapes threatening to swallow him right back if he stared too long.

Dry throat.

He had to stay away from Steve. He couldn’t let Steve save him, not now, not when it was his turn to save Steve. That’s why he’d walked away, that’s why he was here, and he couldn’t let himself be so weak he forgot that.

He had to be strong. Like Steve. To save Steve.

He didn’t want to fucking stay away.

Romanoff was wrong.

Was she?

He’d never fucking find peace, he’d never fucking move on from Steve fucking Rogers and he sure as hell couldn’t live without him and there was no right answer here.

The empty space on his left hand where a wedding ring had been just this morning didn’t feel any different because his left hand didn’t feel and he hated that more than everything else in the entire goddamned world.

The warmth of the sheets wasn’t the same as the sunshine but summer was fading and Steve’s skin couldn't loll him to sleep anymore.

If you love me, let me go-o-o-o-o.

By god, if there was one thing in this world that was true, it was that Bucky Barnes fucking loved Steve Rogers.
“I love you,” Bucky whispered to the dark, jaw clicking and sending a fucking blast of pain up through his skull, behind his eyes and fuck fuck.

Gooooooood

He couldn’t do colors, couldn’t do the bright in the morning, he’d fucking die.

Bucky fumbled for his phone, unlocking it and squinting in the bright light, cursing under his breath as he navigated as quickly as possible to the Accessibility section. Grayscale.

There, black and white, like them, like the only happy footage of Bucky Barnes in fucking existence, he could fucking take that without wanting to hurl.

It was late enough that the world was quiet, everything black and white in the darkness with the surrendered cones in his eyes so this, this was what he needed.

No.

No, the Winter Soldier didn’t need--

He was not the Winter So

He was not the Winter Soldier and he did not need.

He did not need.

Ghosts, did not need.

Welcome to...

...the end of eras.

~~It’s my last night. Gotta get you cleaned up.~~

“Why the fuck wasn’t he there either?”

“Rogers, there’s at least twenty other places on this map--”

“He should’ve been in that park. It used to be a train station, we used to go and. And. It doesn’t fucking matter, I don’t get why he wasn’t there.”

Slam, flinch. Shuffle of quiet feet.

“What about your old apartments?”

“No, that’s one of the last places he’d go. It’s too obvious. Bucky doesn’t do fucking obvious.”

“Could you possibly just...call him?”
“...you’re actually being serious right now.”

“C’mon, man, it’s not like--”

“Not like what?? Not like we fucking broke up?!? WE DID. WE FUCKING BROKE UP.”

“Steve--”

“I’m not fucking calling him Sam. Fucking hell, how many times to I have to fucking spell it out? BUCKY AND I BROKE UP. We broke up! It’s over!! We’re over!! Even if I did fucking call him you think he’d pick up?? I LEFT HIM BLEEDING IN THE RAIN, SAM. IT’S OVER.”

“Steve, pl--”

“IT’S OVER. And this search is about to be too, if you keep fucking pushing.”

“....okay. Okay. I’ll see you for breakfast, then?”

“I’m not gonna jump out the fucking window if that’s what you’re asking.”

“Jesus, Rogers. Not what I-- Okay. Whatever, man. I’ll be next door if you need me.”

“I don’t!” Steve shouted after him, right before the door slammed in his face.

He probably deserved that. Worse, even.

Sam didn’t deserve any of this.

Wouldn’t life’ve been so much easier for Sam Wilson if he’d been a dick the first time they’d met? If he hadn’t let Steve show up at his door like a sad puppy? If he hadn’t followed Steve around the earth to get shot at, mocked, and brushed aside at the end of it all?

He couldn’t fucking stand this. He couldn’t stand the hurt on Sam’s face and knowing he put it there, he couldn’t take the flash of fear in Tony’s eyes, the way his fingers twitched like he was about to call on his suit as a barrier between the raging supersoldier and the Innocents.

Fuck. Fucking hell.

_Fuck Bucky Barnes._

The wall exploded more inward than he’d expected, shattering plaster within itself and barely getting any white powder on his boot. Fucking odd, probably some fancy Stark technology or something. Fucking Stark technology.

Fucking Captain America boots.

See, the difference between now and this same temper tantrum in 1937 was that kicking the wall didn’t do a fucking thing back then. Neither did shouting _I don’t need your charity_ at Bucky as he slammed out of the door for the thousandth time after buying Steve fucking _art supplies._

Jesus Christ was it always about fucking Bucky Barnes?

Even in 1937 there’d been some part of his raging tiny self that wondered why the fuck Buck went to such extremes for him. He’d never been sure, but there was some _tiny_ part of him that almost suspected.
Always at least hoped.

Then 80 years later Bucky gave him the painting, that beautiful work of art he spent months on--

And he saw Steve like that?

And he wanted Steve to know that’s how he saw them and it was more than that, even more than that because it was in every stroke, clear as day. Bucky fucking loved him. Steve could see it, in the careful dabs of every color--

Then he’d fallen asleep in Steve’s arms and he’d been sure, for the first time he’d been so sure.

And Bucky told him. Finally, after years of keeping that secret, the secret that’d torn everything apart the first time, the secret that Steve knew was so goddamned important because it was the only thing Bucky held to his chest like those four words could save his life.

Finally, he’d parted those beautiful lips and told Steve the deepest piece of him he’d never shared.

I loved him first.

He told Peggy that. He shouted that at her. He’d told Peg - Steve’s girl that Bucky’d loved him first.

Or did he?

Was even that a fucking lie?

Honestly, Steve couldn’t even picture it.

Even if he did, didn’t mean he meant it. Certainly didn’t mean it now.

It didn’t fucking count, because he’d never told Steve he loved him. Never. Not once.

So it was more lies, possessive lies. He didn’t love Steve, and Bucky’d done everything in his power to prove that. He couldn’t say it out loud. If he meant it, he’d say it.

Fuck him. He didn’t get to rip Steve apart like this.

Splash of cold water, careful not to shatter the porcelain sink. He’d taken everything.

Who the fuck was he without Bucky? Before Bucky?

Was there a single part of him that wasn’t entwined so deeply with that lying, manipulative--

There had to be. He’d been a whole person before he’d met Buck. Bucky. Hadn’t he? Of course he had. He’d been sick and he’d been angry - not as fucking angry as he was right fucking now - and what the fuck had he done with all that spare time if it wasn’t-- That’s. That’s what.

That was his. Before Bucky was ever around.

He used to have free time every day back in Brooklyn. The hell did he do with it all?

Oh. Of course. There were some supplies he needed to borrow from the correspondents' tent.

Or Sam’s desk, really. And he wasn’t skipping down to a goddamned shared tent to invite Barnes along this time. No confessions under trees, this was Steve’s before Buck gave him sketchbooks and made faces while Steve smiled and sketched pouty lips from the couch--

He wore black and I wore white--

The scratch of the pencil was about to drive him mad but the lines weren’t dark enough, gray smearing shiny instead of inking black, harsh shadows laughing at him behind the dark reflective goggles, the etched holes in Bucky’s mask, sharp flicks up from the pavement, the sparks as that metal hand clawed him to a stop, hair whipping in the wind.

A halo of eraser pieces, which wasn’t right. His angel was afraid of the light, his angel only saved, didn’t love, didn’t hold sunlight in his arms without burning them both to hell and fuck those eraser shreds. His pinky was already chalked dark with graphite and the flick to clear away the assassin’s halo just smeared this black shade over the flowing dark hair and fine, what the fuck ever, shadows followed Buck around anyways.

“This is your fault, you bastard,” Steve grit behind his teeth, smudging his hand further across the page because why the fuck not, might as well paint with his blood and tears in there too, right? God knows Bucky sucked the goddamned light outta him anyways.

“This is your goddamned fault.” Scratch scratch, snap of the tip of the pencil lead.

No one to sigh and snatch the pencil from him this time, deft hands quickly whipping out a pocket knife to sharpen it for him again, tossing it back on his drawing with a ruffling hand in Steve’s hair---

“Your goddamned fault, you c-coward.” Bottom lip quivering and Steve bit it to make it stop, he wasn’t gonna let his fucking hands shake.

God, he was so fucking angry. How could Buck do this to him? How could he be that cruel, to spend months - a lifetime, really - letting Steve believed he loved him when he didn’t because he couldn’t face telling Steve he fucking didn’t and it was fucking unbelievable--

A single droplet splat, on the page, another fucking halo amongst the dark smudges, only the paper was thin enough that it started crinkling from the salty water before he could brush off again and how was he still ruining everything??

He wasn’t gonna waste the goddamned energy shredding it.

Blink, blink, one more droplet threatening to fall only he wasn’t gonna fucking cry, wasn’t gonna give Buck that power he didn’t deserve.

Fuck.

Sweep of his arm and it all went clattering to the floor, paper and journals and files and his cup of pens and it didn’t fucking matter Buck deserved the world and he fucking lied.

Steve dug the heels of his palms into his eyesockets, anything to make the pounding behind his eyes go away, to keep the corners from fucking watering because he wasn’t gonna cry, he couldn’t cry, he’d never fucking stop crying if he did and he couldn’t keep living like this, he couldn’t keep fucking living like this.

So what the fuck happened if they found Bucky? Steve threw his fucking ring back at him and Sam embedded a tracker in his fucking arm so they could make sure he didn’t go on murderous rampages?

See, that would require Buck actually caring about him that deeply. A fight wasn’t worth--
A breakup, a breakup wasn’t worth all the trouble.

“Probably too fucking late to find you anyways,” Steve muttered, shoving away from the desk, raking fingers through his already fucked up hair, spinning around to freeze - Sam was leaning in the doorway, arms crossed over his chest.

“I don’t think it’s too late to find him,” Sam offered quietly. Steve just stared. The clatter from the desk probably brought him back over. He’d have to throw his tantrums quietly apparently. That quiet, hopeful, cautious tone, brown eyes soft and all promise and friendship again and. “I think he still wants to be found.”

“I haven’t known what Bucky wants in a long time.” At least he wasn’t fucking crying. At least he hadn’t broken that far. He wasn’t breaking any further.

“None of it’s your fault, Steve.”

Yeah. He wasn’t playing that fucking game.

“Yeah, thanks, I know. Goodnight, Sam.”

Steve turned his back to the door and Sam would either get the memo and go or stand there and watch him longer but he didn’t care either way, he was going to get some fucking sleep.

Because it wasn’t his fault.

Because. That one thing his head kept trying to say, about how it was, he wasn’t going to let himself think it. Not even once.

It wasn’t. It wasn’t.

Or maybe, if you hadn’t ab--

No. No, fuck Bucky Barnes, that’s what. Goddamn him to hell. On his goddamned own.

Let him fucking be alone.

Steve was done chasing.

~*~

Most of the intelligence community doesn’t believe he exists. The ones that do call him the Obsidian, painted fingertips, dragging in streaks over closed eyes.

Couldn’t do it in front of a mirror yet, but the only glass around was the broken shards at his feet.

The alley sharpened into focus with the opening blink, dark shadows long enough to drape over the stars like the cold black sky he was.

The old steel beams had been easy enough to bend down, wedge between window ledges on opposite buildings. It wasn’t like he had access to Stark’s gym anymore.

He kept sweating off the eyemask, but it was easy enough to smear darker, slab another layer over dirty skin. Didn't have Stark's fancy gym showers either.
The black made his fingertips threaten to slip as he threw himself at the bar again, catching the momentum with metal before he slid right off, plummeted the twenty feet to the ground.

He hadn't been down there in the past three hours, wasn't gonna break the streak of windowledge training now.

Fingers spread on the bar, cold metal between each. Energy rippling between each.

He'd found the magnetized feature in his arm panel. It threw him off every now and then, having to focus on keeping his left hand from curling in the way the magnets were begging.

But it kept him in check. Which he needed.

Sweat dripping down his jaw. Heart pounding in his exposed throat, legs curling to whip, swing. Blur of brick, Brooklyn noise, toes catching on a clip in the wall.

Strands of hair plastered across his face, sticking in the heat. It was the second week of September and New York hadn't been this hot in September for as long as he could remember.

And he could remember a fucking lot. Too much.

Way too fucking much.

Like the way Steve's eyes crinkled, leaning into Bucky's space as he laughed--

Fuck. Brick crumbled precariously beneath his fingertips, crushed by metal and raw skin, calluses spotted with blood from getting treated so roughly for hours but really, if he’d kept up his goddamned training, the calluses wouldn’t’ve faded what they did.

Just seventeen more rounds, seventeen more angles to make sure he could land perfectly, seventeen more ledges big enough to jump to from his bending makeshift gymnast pole.

Breath, dust and broken promises lodging in his throat, coating his tongue against the roof of his mouth, energy focused on that focal point, on the controlled, shallow air switching through his nose, seeping his head with oxygen, lighting up neurons as he coiled his muscles, timed the push off perfectly.

Caught bar, swing, pull up to perch the tips of his boots treacherously on the thin bar, crouched and calculating.

God, he was exhausted.

Fingers black and red from the facepaint and flecks of blood, but fuck his heart was pumping in his chest and he was fucking alive--

No. No, that wasn’t right either.

He’d entirely forgotten how to do this, hadn’t he? Been way too goddamned busy fading to nothing between Steve’s sheets to scrape his skin up scaling buildings for parkour practice. But he wasn’t supposed to feel this energized, that wasn’t the point.

It wasn’t a celebration. It was a funeral.

The death of the bad habits he’d allowed back, the death of the pain he’d been penting up, the pain that was going to consume him if he didn’t find an outlet.

This outlet had worked before. So all he had to do was work, fight, beat himself into the mold of what he used to be and it’d all go away. But the endorphins, the high he was feeling, that exhilaration making his heart race -- the moment he touched the ground it’d slip from him like all those smiles had slipped from behind masks.

Exhilaration didn’t last. Especially when the workout was over and he didn’t have his sparring partner to race to the showers, ruffle his fingers through wet blonde hair--

Exhaustion. That lasted. He had to work himself harder. Harder until he didn’t have the energy for his blood to pump any longer. Harder until he could barely stand, that’s when it’d be enough for him to collapse in bed without the nightmares.

Maybe.

It was the best shot he had.

Harder. Until he didn’t notice the red flecking his fingertips was red smearing his hands.

Until the black was running down his eyes in terrifying lines, sweat or tears, messy and dirty and.

Exhaustion.

Stumbling into the cheap hotel room took more than it should’ve because he hadn’t thought through the conservation, saving energy by not moving when he didn’t have to, eating just enough, drinking just enough--

Shower. Cold, quick, wet hair down on pillows.

They gave him two and he put them in a V, head perfectly centered between. Silence, falling down like the perfectly pulled sheet. Stretched, elongate with fingers splayed against the headboard, feet en pointe towards the opposite wall.

Flat, on his back like this, coffin of pillows from his shoulders like broken wings, eyes closed, focus focus, time to go through and manually relax every muscle in his body.

Down. Down, down, the mattress was shit but he wasn’t falling, fingers were anchored against the shitty headboard and he could focus on that--

Focus on everything, toes to the cut on his ankle to the scrapes on hand and the slight stretch of the scars on his shoulder, under his left armpit, tugging at the skin metal junction with his arms above his head like this.

Proper anatomical position they should be at his sides, palms up, ready for the blades to sink in.

So he wasn’t doing that. Because he wasn’t doing this for Hydra, for the sick bastards who wanted to use him.

This was about being so fucking exhausted his body didn’t give his head the choice to talk about St--

This was about controlling himself again so he could control the pain, make it go away enough to get a fucking grip before he cried himself to sleep again.
Sleep. He just had to sink his body into the blackness, roll back behind the darkness of his eyes where everything was peaceful, just один, дба--

The dizziness hit like a semi, not a wave.

Immense, rushing spin, the disorientation from sitting up too fast in bed, bile coating esophagus cells and pounding so loud his chest could burst.

Only he couldn’t sit up, the world was spinning too much, locked flat on his back in a black velvet coffin to suffocate only it was being shoved sideways off its table, spinning spinning round and round tipping in that awful rolling machine they’d shoved him in--

Had to fight it, just fight and steady himself, he wasn’t moving it was just his head, had to center, центр, fuck.

Couldn’t get an equilibrium.

Bucky gasped, popping his eyes open in surrender, rolling his head to one side and curling his arms into his chest, breaking the perfect but god, fuck, his brain wasn’t trying to end him anymore. He was here, on Earth, face tucked in a pillow and he couldn’t even fucking lie still, lie in that dead sleeping position without wanting to hurl.

That was fucking awful.

A couple breaths, if he just found his center again he could straighten back out. He wasn’t so fucking weak he had to sleep on his side. He could pull off sleeping on his back, he could. He just had to get his head fucking in it.

Or, really, out of it.

Okay. Roll onto his back. Eyes closing, careful this time not to relax too fast into the darkness. Just sink, slowly. Minutes ticking, muscles ticking, and finally his hamstrings released, right on the edge of relaxing and crash.

Limbs convulsed, spiraling through the ceiling to collide with the mattress, jolting hard from the shove off a dream building to shock awake at the icy bottom only he hadn’t even fucking fallen asleep yet and he couldn’t stop breathing so hard, throat pounding and chest heaving over propped elbows.

Motherfucker.

His body was fighting it. Fighting him. Everyone ounce of his subconscious was fighting what he used to be. Maybe it remembered all the torture that came with.

And maybe it was forgetting the torture it’d be to never see Steve again.

He had to fucking do this.

Bucky sucked in a breath, forcing himself to lay back down. Sympathetic and parasympathetic nervous systems be damned. He’d find a way to control the damn individual synapses in ganglion if he had to.

The only thing more stubborn than his goddamned subconscious was his conscious and if that was going to be his battle over the next few weeks, fine.
Better that than the way it really was.

Him versus Steve.

How did us against the world turn into me against you?

~~ For as long as I can remember, I only wanted to do what was right. Guess I’m not quite sure what that is anymore.~~ _write our names in the stars_, were the last words on his lips but Bucky didn’t want the red white and blue, didn’t want the freedom fights and the statues.

“I just want you,” Bucky murmured, lips plush against the heated skin on Steve’s neck.

_I just want you._

“We can be free,” Steve whispered back and Buck curled his fingers into Steve’s bare hip, pressing a little closer beneath the wisping sheets.

“Thought that’s what the world war was for.” The design he was tracing over Steve’s muscle and bone - five points, like them, like both of them even lying here bare in the sheets, their shadows were still painted with stripes and stars.

“Man is born free, and everywhere he is in chains,” he told the ceiling in his Captain America voice and Bucky’s head popped up, long hair hanging in crystal eyes as he squinted them curiously. Steve palmed the silken pieces away, fingers brushing down the side of Bucky’s face.

“Rousseau? The only chain we got left is this one.” Metal fingers tugged at the dogtags around Steve’s neck, tweaking the warmed beads to rub against sensitive skin and Steve couldn’t help but smile up at the mischievous glint in those crystal--

Only maybe, in that conversation. Maybe their words had been reversed. Maybe it was Bucky who quoted Rousseau - maybe it was Steve who’d said I just want you.

I just want you.

He didn’t want to know who said it. Any of it. All their conversations were some jumble now, they’d both said so much and the silence had been so loud he remembered those parts better than any of the words.

Why couldn’t he find Bucky?

Why couldn’t he find out how Bucky really felt until Steve was in way too fucking deep?

Really, he’d always been in too deep for it not to hurt, but they’d _slept together_, kissed, dreamed, started to build a future together--

And _that_ was when Bucky finally decided to admit he didn’t love Steve? Or worse, refuse to admit that he loved him. Which meant, obviously, he didn’t.
That was honestly so so much worse. Because if Bucky just flat out said it - I don’t love you, I never have and I never will --

Then maybe Steve’s chest would stop fucking blossoming with that tiny, minute, miniscule hope that maybe there was just the smallest percent of a chance that Bucky still did--

No, no, he didn’t, he’d made that so fucking clear Steve had to get the fuck outta his way-too-optimistic mindset. Just...had to get out of his head. Fuck, he didn’t care if he lost his mind, so long as he didn’t have to fucking take this.

Was he supposed to look for Bucky or not?

What the fuck would he do if he found him? If he didn’t want Bucky back then why was he so fucking pissed everytime another spot on the map showed up empty?

How did us against the world become me against you?

~I can do this all day.~

Knuckles split under gloves only he couldn’t stand the red leather anymore, couldn’t stand the Howling Commando wings on his helmet or the raised star on his chest but he couldn’t wear a leather jacket into battle and he certainly couldn’t wear his army greens.

So he punched hard enough that the red seeping through split knuckles didn’t match the red of the leather but that didn’t really matter anymore either.

~Please. Don’t make me do this.~

He woke himself to his own screams the third night in a row and that meant skipping to another hotel again because he didn’t do questions. Didn’t do human interaction at all, really.

People didn’t try talking to the man stalking down hallways and slipping through shadows. And it was good they didn’t, he’d had enough chatter from Steve’s goddamned friends in the past few months to last him a lifetime.

The rooftops had all the sounds of the city without the people, so it wasn’t all that surprising he found himself on one again.

Found himself a lot of places, doing a lot of things he couldn’t remember ever deciding to go, or do.

It’d been like that once, when his feet took him on autopilot to Steve’s door.

Feet had always taken him on autopilot to Steve’s door. Knock knock, crash, guess who’s climbing in your window to fucking destroy your life--

I always fall from your window to the pitch black streets.

Hadn’t been able to wean himself off music yet. It stopped sounding like noise a long time ago and honestly, Bucky didn’t wanna lose one of the only familiar things he had left. The idea of throwing out all his music too just.

If his playlists were records, he would’ve worn ‘em thin by now.
Besides, up here standing on the edge of a roof with the wind whipping his hair in his face, earbuds might be the only thing keeping his workouts fucking sane.

Only problem was, when he was working on evasions with his hands tied behind his back, he couldn’t change the song. Which meant shuffle kept landing him in some pretty shitty ass situations.

The current though, might take the cake.

He was hanging upside down from the edge of the roof, hands pinned to work on his abdominals under the adrenaline rush and colder wind with the distraction of staying out of sight of civilians when his wonderful iPod chose to shuffle onto Fall Out Boy.

Specifically, the one that started with fucking whistling.

Bucky cursed.

Wiggled, trying to pry one hand free to change the goddamned song only he’d tied the goddamned knots, they weren’t coming out in this position. All he managed to do was spill fucking brick powder in his face from the roof ledge.

Great, just gr--

Stuck in the jetwash, bad trip, I couldn’t get off.

“I didn’t bite off more than I could chew, you bastard,” Bucky cursed again, wiggling some more.

So what if he’d known he could never tell Steve he loved him? He just hadn’t expected Steve to be so fucking adamant about it. It wasn’t his goddamned fault.

Fall to your fucking knees. There was not a single blessed thing about them.

It was useless trying to get out like this. The whole point was that he put himself somewhere he couldn’t shimmy outta easy and he wasn’t fucking ending his workout, not because’a some goddamned song.

Black banners raised as the crooked smiles fade…

It. Wasn’t. His. Fault.

It wasn’t fucking fair, Steve was the one who dragged Bucky down a road he couldn’t take, Steve who dropped the shield, Steve who Bucky’d given his goddamned life for, Steve who Bucky’d loved too fucking m--

Inhale.

And in the end, I’d do. it. all. again.

Bucky’s lungs shut down.

I think you’re my best friend. Don’t you know that the kids aren’t all, kids aren’t alright?

“No,” he breathed aloud, praying his voice would cover the next lyrics only they didn’t, they didn’t at all.

And I’m yours.
That was enough of that.

“Can’t fucking do this,” he submitted to the wind, gritting his teeth and snapping his body upright, using the momentum to tumble back onto the safety of the roof, rolling awkwardly to a stop on his side.

The headphones weren’t even loosened.

He’d ran them up through his shirt, so he couldn’t even yank them out or anything. Just had to get the fucking tie off his wrists and he could stop being pummeled by the Whistling Song from Hell.

I’m not passive but aggressive, take note it’s not impressive.

WASN’T his fucking fault. Not like he’d known picking up the tiny kid with the bloody nose black eye would eventually make him a master assassin, hindsight was fucking twenty-twenty and all he’d tried to do was help the kid who couldn’t stop fucking punching things.

...we put your curse in reverse

Those tiny fists, always raised, then that giant shield, red gloves, everything wrong shined up and stamped true--

And it's our time now if you want it to be, maul the world like a carnival bear--

Flash of spinning lights, Steve’s high-pitched laughter, spun sugar bright music, towering Cyclone up ahead, Steve’s thin ribs against his elbow as Bucky pointed -- set free

Couldn’t seem to get his damn wrists free, held behind his back, sweaty fingers wrapped around his skin, Steve’s knee in the middle of his back.

“You surrender?” Breathless and exhilarated, voice so much lower now,

And I still feel that rush in my veins,

The blue going dark as he backed Bucky into the counter, strong hands possessive on his hips, dipping close enough to breathe heat over Bucky’s neck, head tipped to the side, fingers tightening, eyes shut as his throat ch-choked--

Dead.

Bucky shook his head, snapping out of the memories behind the veil of sweaty hair in his face, wrists aching and ears still blasting, words echoing and overlapping each other as his vision spun in and out of focus.

All those people-- s’aren’t alrigh-- in those old photogra-- best frien-- I've see-- it pours, stay thirsty-- are dead.

All it took was one moment of pure concentration, zeroing in on the flexing metal plates, ripping as quickly and rough as possible. Snap. His right-hand wrist felt damn near broken from the force, but the tie was gone, hands free but his heart was still seizing, head still shorting out out.

...sometimes I just wanna sit around and gaze at my shoes...

Shoes, fucking Christ these weren’t even his shoes, a size too small but he’d grabbed them for the museum and hadn’t fucking done a thing about them since, hadn’t fucking done a thing since he’d stepped off the goddamned bridge where he left behind the thing that beat between his ribs--
The same one that pounded between beaten ribs he’d patched together with careful fingers, careful loving fingers while he bit his lip practically as bloody as Steve’s with worry because it was his, it was his same heart that beat in Steve’s chest and now that they were apart Steve’d left with the most of it and Bucky didn’t have enough left to breathe.

I think you’re my best friend.

Don’t you know that the kids aren’t al-, kids aren’t alright?

Crash crash and the metal covering half his face was so cold, but the other half was dirty, scraped up raw, wasn’t any fucking better and for the third distinctly memorable time in his life Bucky gasped into his hands and wished so hard they were Steve’s hands instead he could feel it radiating from his fingertips--

“M’yours,” he crumbled. “M’yours, m’yours, m’yours.”

When it rains it pours. The water sliding down Steve’s bloody knuckles as his fingers slipped out of Bucky’s.

Stay thirsty like before. He’d wanted, he’d wanted so badly he ached since so so long ago and it was never going to stop aching. He was…..never going to stop being in pain.

How was he supposed to live like that?
How was he supposed to live like that??

Don’t you know that the kids aren’t al-, kids aren’t alright?

Whistleeeeee

“Hey sugar, you rationed?” The laugh, high and bright and barely believing, nowhere near matching the fondness in Steve’s eyes, mouth curled up in a smile, skin glowing in the sunshine, sea-wind rustling through blonde hair.

"You wanna go steady with me?" He finally managed, half-incredulous, still smiling like an idiot.

Steve softened a little, smile turning more sweet than amused, gazing at Bucky like he was thinking the exact same thing, living that exact same movie reel, except this time Steve's next words were quite different.

"I want you to be my boyfriend."

Crash.

"You're looking at me like I'm something to paint on," Bucky replied, a little disbelief mixed in the awe, hand swooping over the curve of Steve's bare spine. He lifted up at that, eyebrows furrowed in confusion and hesitance.

"It's a good thing," Bucky assured him.

Crash.

"Are you crying?" Steve asked and Bucky's hand whirred as he brought it away from his mouth, tried uselessly to glare down at his asshole of a best friend.

"My b-best guy just asked me to marry him, of course I'm c...crying."
A bright laugh and that was nice, at least Steve was enjoying himself, then there was a tug on his hand as Steve hoisted himself to his feet and wrapped his arms around Bucky.

Wrapped his arms around, and promised to never let go.

He promised to never let go.

Why?

~~Did you read the report? Yes. Then you know that's not true.~~

“He’s hiding. He’s hiding from me, I know it, and I don’t fucking get it. He couldn’t walk away, never had it in him to leave but now that I pushed him out he keeps running? We were supposed to be done running.”

Slam.

“Aren't you the one who keeps insisting it's over cause you broke up?”

Grit teeth, another cabinet violently shut.

“Not helping, Clint.”

“Rogers, it's simple.”

Exasperated huff, sink jammed on to blast water.

“It's a lot of things, but I don’t think fucking simple is one of them.”

Flick, fire jumping to life, snapped pasta in one hand, lid and back to the cabinets for a - violent, again - glass of water.

Clint watched the angry whirlwind slamming around the kitchen and sighed.

“It is simple. Bucky’s your blind spot.”

Steve froze, glass of water still pressed to his lips.

“Not to be dramatic or anything. But he is.”

“He’s a lot of things,” Steve muttered, all muffled by the glass he finally unfroze to tip back. “Look, I made you dinner, so I get the couch, right?”

“You can have the be--”

“The last time I slept in that bed he was beside me Clint, I'm not sleeping in the goddamned bed.”

“Okay man, whatever floats your boat.”

“Actually my boat keeps sinking and drowning us both, but thanks for asking,” Steve said dryly, shouldering past Clint on his way to the living room.

He still had no idea why Steve was even here, of all places. Yeah he’d heard about his fight with Tony, the tension between the rest of the Avengers. Tash’s frequent absences sure as hell weren’t helping anything.

But Steve was here and it was his apartment after all, wasn’t like Clint could complain. Besides, it’d gotten pretty boring waiting on a ghost that never showed for two weeks.

Personally, Clint wasn’t sure he’d ever show.

Steve was sure.

Steve knew Bucky’d come back here, he knew it the same way he’d known Buck was alive all those years and done nothing about it. Cause I’m you.

Eventually Clint retreated behind a closed door, left the rest of the empty apartment to Steve, the same mocking glittering lights of the Brooklyn Bridge beyond the windows.

He’d spent a lifetime waiting around empty apartments for Buck. Swinging his legs at the dinner table, tapping the most recent scrap of dirty drawing paper, pretending he was doing anything but praying for him to come around.

Then the apartment they shared, waiting at the dinner table with the meal he’d managed to scrounge together, patiently re-stirring watery soup while he stayed waiting for him to come swinging through that door.

Sipping tea, apple slices on the plate in front of him as he stared at the open window in his old Manhattan apartment and waited for the black mask to come slipping through that blank hole in his walls, that place he’d always kept empty, open, waiting.

How many times had they sat at this dinner table--

Steve raked fingers through his hair, ducking his head against the silver reflections of the moonlight bathing his skin. The moon was full of hurt and he couldn’t just. Pray for Buck to come ‘round.

It didn’t go that way, Buck wasn’t gonna come in those windows, he’d sneak in through the fire escape only it wouldn’t be the city slider Steve’d called baby, he’d hurt the moon and it didn’t shine anymore, it sliced.

He could hear it, the dark side he’d shot back into their lives the moment he’d shoved Buck out that door.

He’d had a dream once, that Bucky’d dragged him to a rooftop and slide knives between skin and bone and that was nothing to the dreams Bucky’d had where Steve carved his heart outta his chest in a bloody star and if they could only put down their knives maybe they’d stop bleeding each other dry.

Fuck Bucky Barnes, he’d come with more knives than Steve had stitches for.

A lifetime of dinner tables instead of operating tables and it might as well be now. Might as fucking well be, Steve didn’t have a bone left in his body that Bucky hadn’t broke in some way.

How was this supposed to go then? Did he climb on the table, lay out and wait for Buck to come carve him up, serve him round to all the empty chairs in the empty life of broken promises they’d never even fought to keep?
Buck’d never even fought for it. Never even tried. Fought armies, wars, a lifetime of handlers and brainwashing and he couldn’t fight to love Steve, he couldn’t fight enough to come back, he couldn’t fight enough to do anything but make Steve bleed and bleed and bleed while he waited for the final blow that would never come because the tables were turning and Bucky wouldn’t just abandon him like this, Bucky’d ripped out his fucking heart with those metal fingers and his best friend since childhood, his lover, his protector was leaving him here to bleed out on this table and die--

“C’MON!!” Scream echoing off empty walls, hands shaking to keep from flipping the table, wrecking everything they’d ever fucking touched because he couldn’t keep fucking waiting--

“COME FOR ME YOU BASTARD!!”

Echo echo echo and Steve wasn’t gonna let the sob in his throat free because he was too fucking pissed to cry, too fucking pissed to do anything but scream and he was just so exhausted, he wanted to lay out on this table and never wake up again, sleep for another seventy fucking years until he woke up with Bucky ba--

The fucking bastard had broken his heart and he was still the only thing Steve wanted to see.

Eyes fell shut, throat choking up with all the tears he still hadn’t shed but he couldn’t, he couldn’t.

Steve swayed on his feet, all but collapsing into the chair again, arms folding on the stupid fucking table and he’d stay here, he’d stay here and wait because he knew Buck would come, he always did, he could feel it in his bones…

Clint found him half-asleep, folded over the table, head buried in his arms and spine shuddering every few breaths like it just couldn’t keep him upright anymore.

It took all the strength he had to pull Rogers up, throw one of those big arms over his shoulders and help him stumbling to the couch. Steve barely blinked his eyes open, groggy and heavy but eventually Clint dumped him on the cushions, tugged a blanket over him as Steve curled up on his side, breath hitching and eyes tight and shiny at the corners.

It was fucking heartbreaking. He’d kick Bucky’s ass if he didn’t think they were both hurting this bad.

Clint took a step backwards, pausing and tilting his head as the moonlight caught on something else shiny, around Steve’s neck.

Cap was out anyways, might as well untangle them for him. He was a little surprised they hadn’t been thrown out a window yet, but maybe Steve was holding on a lot more than he wanted to admit.

The dogtags clanked softly as Clint pulled them carefully outta Steve’s shirt collar, untangling the toe tag from the other, thumb running over the name. James B. Barnes. They were way too noisy for Steve to wear subconsciously. That only made the whole thing goddamned sadder.

“We all want him back too, Steve,” Clint whispered. Steve didn’t budge an inch. Not even to the clank of the dogtags settling against his shirt. Freight train couldn’t wake him now.

And apparently, neither could boys who fell from them.

The fire escape was just as fucking creaky as Steve’s’d been in the thirties, but he’d conquered them then and with all the training he’d been doing it certainly wasn’t hard to sneak up now either. At least Steve wouldn’t be here, and Clint’s hearing was good but not that good.
Bucky wouldn’t be here either, except he needed a few things and this apartment still had all his stuff, so. A night mission to sneak inside was really the only option. It wasn’t like he could get a new mask made on the corner shop.

It was dark inside, so he wasn’t all that worried as he jimmyed open the window lock with his knife. Use the fire escape to sneak into the bathroom window the way Natalia had, grab his stuff from the cabinet and sneak right back out.

The tile absorbed his bootfalls easily and the cabinet behind the mirror didn’t even creak as he carefully popped it open. His mask was still on the top shelf, good.

None of his weapons were in here though, and he could probably use some of those. No, the less time he spent in the apartment, the better.

Well. It wouldn’t hurt. It was just Clint, it wasn’t like Bucky’d wake him.

The rest of the apartment was dark too, looked like Clint hadn’t moved anything around. And the bedroom door was closed, good. Just had to get to the kitchen--

He almost tripped on a chair, barely holding in a curse as he glared at the kitchen table. Why the fuck was this chair scooted out so far anyways?

It was weird to think about, that Clint could be sitting there in Steve’s chair, that’d he leave it pushed out. Weird to think that there were other people living here now instead of them. Weird to think that just in the next room, Steve’d destroyed Bucky’s cheekbone with his fists and screamed at him to leave just a few weeks ago.

It could’ve been another lifetime. And it still kinda felt like it’d been this morning.

Didn't matter. He was here to pick up weapons, ammo, money. Shoes if there was a pair around.

Half his knives were in a kitchen drawer and thank god these cabinets didn't creak like the ones in their old apartment. He didn't have all the holsters he should but at least the knives had sheaths, he could line them up in his waistline if he had to.

There, that should be the las--

His fingers brushed the corner of something, paper nearly slicing through callused skin.

He didn't mean to wiggle it free and he certainly didn't mean to pick it up but it was in his hands now and there was really nothing he could do about it.

One of Steve’s sketchbooks.

Course it was.

Too dark in here to see which one but it didn't matter, he should leave it in the damn drawer regardless. The whole point was to get Steve out of his head.

Carrying around his goddamned sketches wasn’t gonna fucking help. He was stronger than this, better than this.

He was the fucking Winter Soldier.

Bucky tucked it under his arm and silently slid the drawer shut. He was a lotta things, but Steve was still, always, forever, Steve.
A quiet sound behind him and Bucky spun around so fast his boots made skid marks on the tile.

No one was there.

Jesus Christ he was paranoid. He’d’ve seen if Clint came out the bedroom, he’d’ve been gone before the doorknob finished turning.

He should get outta here though. Shame on the shoes, but he’d pocketed some bills so he’d figure it out.

All he had to do was slip back onto the fire escape, the living room and one glass door between him and never seeing this place again.

Hair tucked away from his face and Bucky grabbed his mask off the counter, starting for the shine of the window when another glint caught his eye.

On the couch.

Steve was on the couch.

Steve Rogers. Ten feet away from him. Curled up on his side, sleeping based off the way his chest was moving, it was too dark to see much else from here.

So of course rectus femoris contracted and the next thing he knew he was sinking to his knees beside the head of disheveled hair, staring wide-eyed at all the familiar lines. It was one thing to dream, think about, know everything about Steve Rogers but this, kneeling beside his sleeping form, it was all real, Stevie was right here, close enough to reach out and touch.

Those beautiful eyes were closed, just as well for all he’d seen.

Steve was the only one who knew. The only one who knew his soul and all the oxygen in his throat halted to a stop.

The moonlight lit up shining skin translucent - reflective, wet streaks tracing from the corners of shut eyes to dark spots on the couch cushions and he had to bite his lip to keep the pitiful sound from escaping his chest.

It was too tempting. Steve was lying there, still, no idea Bucky was here. Like standing on the edge of a tall building, the psychological wonder to step over the side so deep it was ingrained beyond anything else you know.

He had to, try, once.

“Stevie,” Bucky whispered, crouching down further to see if the long clumped eyelashes fluttered.

Perfectly still.

A rush of breath, collapsing back on his heels with his eyes prickling and heart pounding outta his chest.

God, what was he doing? Steve’d kicked him out. Told him it was over. Broken his heart and walked away in the pouring rain, the fuck was he gonna do if Steve’d woken up?

It was just so surreal, Steve’s sleeping body stretched out on the couch before him. Couch cushions on the floor, like when we were kids--
The last time he's fallen to his knees before this couch it'd been to suck Steve off, only that'd ended with Bucky crying and Steve squeezing him tight in his lap, rocking them with one hand in Bucky’s hair while he whispered, I love you, I still love you. I'll always love you.

If only Bucky could whisper the same thing to him now.

Words and fingertips couldn't, so eyes traced along the silhouette under the half-assed blanket, from Steve’s ankles up to his hips, chest--

The moonlight caught a glint, again, and Bucky nearly startled. That was the whole reason he’d seen Steve in the first place, the catch of silver on metal flashing.

Now that Bucky couldn't touch, what other silver could have its fingers around Stevie’s neck?

He leaned a touch closer, human fingers reaching out carefully to tip up the metal against Steve’s chest, darkness shifting to catch shadows on letters stamped clear, chained around Steve’s neck and fully capable of choking him in his sleep.

JAMES B. BARNES
32557038

Quiet clank clank, dogtags jingling against their chain because Bucky’s hand couldn't stop shaking.

It took every ounce of control to carefully settle dogtags back on Steve’s expanding, releasing tight chest, warmth shocking up Bucky’s skin as they brushed cotton, then trembling fingers were clapping over his mouth and Steve’s sleeping form swam sideways in watery vision.

Help.

God, help, he couldn't do this. He had knife hilts digging into his spine and the Winter Soldier’s mask tipped against his boot and he'd give it all up for Stevie to open those shocking blues, call him Buck and ask him to stay.

Steve didn't want him to stay.

Bucky’d thrown his goddamned engagement ring off the Brooklyn bridge, it was supposed to be over.

Fuck. He couldn't tell where the matching band was, Steve's left hand was tucked under his head and what if he was still fucking wearing it--

Still wore the dogtags. But God, fuck, Bucky was losing his mind, he wasn't what Steve needed, he had to protect his boy and he had to leave, he was a killer and.

He. He didn't belong here. Steve didn't want him, Bucky needed too much, asked for too much and it wasn't fair, none of it was goddamned fair because he loved Steve more than everything in the world and he'd told him so many times in so many ways only--

Only it hadn't been enough and it was Over.

Fuck.

It was dark out and it was time for Bucky to go.

His bones physically ached as he pushed to his feet, limbs heavy and feet magnetized to the familiar ground. Lost track of his long time target and if he was going to see the night through a sniper scope, Steve couldn't be anywhere near his crosshairs.

He was leaving to protect, again, and Bucky’d never made a goddamned selfish decision when it counted but he couldn't, all he wanted was too much, he'd broken Steve’s pretty hands and he couldn't ask those broken bones to catch him when he fell.

Mask clutched in one hand but the other couldn't help but reach over, Gravity. Circling back to the only sun that ever mattered.

The blonde strands were so soft against the tips of his fingers that Bucky could cry.

It wouldn't make a difference, brushing the blonde strands carefully outta Steve’s eyes. How many times had he done the same for floppy blonde bangs only for them to fall right back in Steve’s eyes the moment he folded over his sketchbook?

(Tucked safely against Bucky’s chest.)

If only he could protect Steve with the pound of his pressed heartbeat. But Steve was too bright, wild, lived too fast and loved too hard with his brilliant sunlit smile to be tucked safe anywhere and really, being without Bucky would be the best thing that ever happened to Steve.

He could finally be free.

It was with that promise Bucky swooped down, eyes shut tight and fingers lingering at the tips of blonde as he pressed his lips to warm, sweet skin.

Lingering, a single moment, the softest kiss he'd ever placed to Steve’s forehead.

The last kiss he'd ever place to Steve’s forehead.

The saltwater gathering on his eyelashes was the only thing that managed to pull him back. Wouldn't let his tears stain Steve’s skin any longer.

Straightened up slowly, soaking in, memorizing every angle of Steve’s face one more time.

_I would chose to be with you_, Bucky managed not to whisper, fingers hovering over un-bruised cheekbones, jaw.

As if the choice were his to make.

The choice had never been his to make.

Glass slid open easy, fire escape creaking as it took Bucky’s weight one more time. Jump from your window to the pitch black streets below and Bucky Barnes climbed down Steve Rogers’ fire escape only this time, he didn't stop going down down down.

_THIS is my last breath_,

If only he could leave with no regrets.

~~This hunger brought me here tonight~~
Steve was still rubbing his eyes as he stumbled into the kitchen at dawn’s break, feeling wildly around the counter for a mug for tea or something when he saw it.

Mid-reach, fingers extended and hair fucked in a hundred directions, crink in his neck from the couch cushions and his eyes wide as saucers as he froze and stared at the mark on the floor.

A scuff mark, just a black circle sweep across the tile only that wasn't there yesterday.

He didn't have to think about it, didn't wonder for a single moment. Steve knew exactly who made that mark.

He stared at it for another couple seconds before his brain started working.

Then he was yanking open That Drawer and a dozen knives didn't clatter around, empty dark wood staring back at him.

Bucky'd been here. He'd come last night. He'd come last night.

It wasn't just another dream then, was it?

He'd thought nothing of it last night, pushed it aside this morning the way he always did.

Because he'd been having that dream for weeks.

Bucky coming in the middle of the night, finding him wherever he was and combing his fingers through Steve’s hair, kissing his cheek. Nose. Forehead. Tender, whispering some profession of love under the rumble of the runaway train.

Only last night, it wasn't a goddamned dream.

Dear fucking god, Bucky had been here.

He'd taken his knives and left Steve sleeping on the couch.

He hadn't even woken, just felt Bucky in his sleep and. Assumed it was his head fucking with him again and how could he be so fucking stupid--

Steve staggered across scuffed tile floor, nearly cracking the glass on his phone screen as he punched in the memorized number.

“Sam, we have to find him,” Steve rushed, running a hand through his hair and spinning in the empty kitchen. “We have to find him, I can't keep living like this.”

“Steve, hey, slow down. Are you okay? I'm already on my way, gettin’ in Nat’s car right now. What's going on?”

“He was here, Sam, he came in here last night for his knives, God knows what else and how could he come for those and not me?!!”

“Are you okay? Did you talk to him? Is he okay?”

“I fucking slept through it, Sam.”

He was pacing in circles around the kitchen now, wearing down black to shiny white with his barefeet.
“Okay, that's okay. But you're sure he was there?”

“I wouldn't joke about this. Besides, there's a mark on his floor, the entire knife drawer is fucking cleared out. The fuck else did he take? What else did he decide was more important to come back for than the love of his life?” Steve slammed a cabinet shut, pausing in the middle of the kitchen as he thought that over, tipped his head with an exaggerated frown.

“Wait, scratch that, he was the love of my life and he never even loved me back. That's what this is all about anyways, right? Fucking bastard.”

Sam started off on another gentle speech about how Bucky was hurting and said all sorts of things he didn't mean and they'd work it all out and what not and Steve kinda ignored him.

It was never about what Bucky said, it was what he didn't.

But he kept Sam on the line for charity as he started scouting out the rest of the apartment.

After the first scan, it looked like nothing else was taken. But, y'know, his soul and whatnot.

Until the dreaded awful wonder hit his stomach and Steve just had to check, because it wouldn't come to that but he'd never be able to get the idea outta his head unless he checked. Bucky didn't know Steve knew it was there but he wouldn't take it either way, there was no way.

He knew Bucky. He'd never.

Steve opened the bathroom cabinet anyways.

The punch to his gut?

Worse than the one he'd taken from every alien blast folding him in half and depositing him in the dirt.

The mask was gone. The Winter Soldier mask was gone and he'd never hated himself for fighting a war more.

He couldn't take this.

It wasn't possible, Buck just wouldn't.

He didn't do that anymore.

Or.

Or Steve was wrong about everything.

….he didn't know him at all, did he?

“Rogers, you gotta calm down if we’re ever gonna figure this out.” Sam temporarily uncrossed his arms to wave at Steve’s pacing, indicating probably everything from the disheveled to his mildly panicked words. “You're gonna burn a hole in the floor and then we’ll have a lot bigger problems on our hands.”
He was fine. He was totally fine, balanced as fuck. They just needed to find Bucky. The jackass. Had left. Steve. Here in the dark.

“What if it's already a bigger problem than we thought? He came back for the mask, which I never thought he'd fucking do. Maybe I don’t know him that well. Clearly, I don’t know him that well.” His soles were aching from how much he’d been pacing barefoot but he couldn't sit down, couldn't stand there and not get something done--

How could the serum let his feet hurt anyway?

How could Bucky do this anyway?

Steve sure had no fuckin idea.

“We can’t find him,” he pointed out helpfully, again, for probably the nine hundredth time and Sam patiently kept his mouth shut. “He’s not any of the places I knew he’d go. The worst fuckin part is that I never imagined a time where I couldn’t find Buck.”

He'd promised Bucky he'd always come for him so long as he was alive and he meant that promise because he knew he could keep it, was more sure of that at the time than he'd been of anything else in that bloody war only now this was so much worse than the forties.

“I just don't get how we’re still in the dark. We found him when he was a goddamned different person!! A ghost. assassin. How can we not find my best friend?”

“Steve,” Sam said softly, taking a step forward. Steve took a step backwards.

He wasn't done being pissed. He was fucking pissed that Bucky pulled this bullshit on him. So what his voice lost that edge, almost cracked on the words ‘best friend.’ He was still mad, even if he felt like his insides were scooped out with an ice scream scoop. He was still mad, even if the words came out hollow and deflated.

“What happened to ‘I know what you're gonna say, Buck’? My mom died and Buck followed me up to her place, just said the single word Steve and I didn't give him a single moment more, just said I know what you're gonna say, Buck because I did. I always used to. We knew each other so well I could predict an entire conversation before we ever had it. That's who we used to be. That's the man I lo...loved.”

He has to pause, place a hand on his chest to make sure his heart was still beating, lungs still expanding because it kinda felt like they weren't. Kinda felt like they weren't even there.

“But that's not-- not anymore. Not this Bucky, not me. See, I was convinced we never stopped loving each other. Just got twisted up and that love got twisted up and...I can't even remember the last time I knew what Buck was gonna say.”

Sam’s hand landed on his shoulder and Steve stared desert dry eyes at the blank wall.

“All this time,” he echoed quietly, bouncing off all the walls and Sam kept his hand there, silent and strong but Steve could barely see him, replaying a thousand scenes that didn't look the way he'd told himself to remember them, torn apart and shattered like everything else inside him and the worst part about that was that he couldn't hide from it anymore. He couldn’t run from it anymore.

“All this time. It's...it's been my fault.” Head turning slowly, blues last to flick over, landing on sad brown and coming round full circle in one more apartment, one more realization worth smashing counters for only his hands were too numb to curl into fists now. “Sam. It's all my fault.”
And I thought I could throw myself back in, follow orders. Serve. It's just not the same.

Run, бежать, run.

Hadn't worked out this hard in months. Hadn't built muscle like this in months. Maybe ever, really.

The Winter Soldier stayed lean, they put him away in his box once he'd trained just enough to not waste their time.

But see, he had a fuckton of time he needed to waste.

Almost didn’t recognize himself, passing glass windows. Shirts were starting to look the same way on him they did on Steve. No.

Research, train. Sleep, research, train. Eat, sleep, research, train, break something, shower off blood, research, train.

Used to be him who got held up against walls but now, even without the arm he could probably prop up all 200something lbs of beautiful muscle, could just imagine the look on Steve—No.

No, he’d fucking Pavlov condition himself out of it if he had to. Couldn’t fucking research and train if that was all he kept thinking about.

Research. Amygdaloid body, part of the human brain.

See, started with memory because that's how they fucked him up the first time.

Interesting development: the amygdaloid body was one of the processes used for encoding.

Storing and coding short term memories and encoding, shifting, consolidating them into long term memories.

But the amygdaloid body was most commonly known for its associations with fear. Fear, that's what it magnetized to and stuck with like planets around the sun.

So if long term memory was going to be fucked to hell, tying the fear-processing amygdaloid body in was crucial. Which meant that the easiest way to fuck over all his long term memories was to manipulate the fear in his life.

Fear.

Bucky trailed metal fingers over the rough concrete of the ledge, watching pebbles scatter and fall to their deaths below.

What are you without him? Nothing.

The best manipulations took pieces already there - fear, what are you without him, do you love Captain Rogers, he's not coming for you.

And then used those pieces to twist everything else, control that for their own - fear, he doesn't love you, you are nothing without him, your love for him is going to destroy you.
Then all it took was making that permanent. Long-term. Amygdaloid body did most that.

Seventy years sure could do the rest.

Was it Hydra? How much blame was actually theirs?

St--

Once. He'd said, You can't blame everything on Zola.

That was probably true.

Maybe none of it was Hydra.

Just him.

Maybe it was just him.

Maybe it was worse than that.

Maybe his brain was perfectly fine, hippocampus intact and new long term emotional memories and feelings totally create-able.

Maybe he was choosing this.

Maybe he was so scared he was choosing this.

Fear.

The subway jolted and Bucky caught himself on the closest pole, metal clanking metal too loud even through the new glove.

A few people glanced his way and he grit his teeth against the urge to snap at them.

Or snap them.

He didn't know a single thing anymore.

No. He was fine.

The pulse in his neck was keeping him alive and the throb in his shoulder hurt enough to make his vision spin and he could still feel Steve’s hands soothing tight muscle but he could get rid of that. He was going to win this.

He just had to carve open his chest until the empty hole left by Steve was filled with blood and couldn’t hurt him anymore.

Until the screams that left his lips parted by the devil’s tongue instead of Steve’s.

Until the memories flashing behind his eyes weren’t kissing on the paint-splattered art room floor, until it was nothing but deep black paint oozing between the cracks behind his eyes.

Until he was free of golden chains, even if that meant jumping into the darkness.

Even if that meant trading in angels for monsters.

Ready.
Right?

It was the uncharacteristically warm weather that had Jane’s Carousel open for one last weekend. Half price admission, and still quadruple what Sarah used to pay for all of them combined.

He wasn't here to ride though. Just sit, on the bench where all the parents sat.

He'd never be a parent.

But that wasn't why he was here either.

Walking the streets of Brooklyn landed him here -- he was probably headed for the bridge only he really didn't want to get on the bridge. So he'd drawn to the familiar music, flashing spinning lights, children’s laughter, shrieks.

He honestly couldn't even imagine that life. Having a kid, taking them to the Carousel, lifting a little boy on his shoulders to tell him all the stories about how Daddy had to get boosted up onto the very smallest horse, “even when he was twice your age, Montgomery!”

A playful shove from Steve with his free hand, other holding their little girl’s, blonde curls bouncing as she giggled, looked up at Steve with Bucky’s ice-crystal eyes and asked if her other Daddy had a tiny metal arm when he was tiny too.

A smile as Steve swung their hands, leaned down to answer her question in a loud whisper, “Well, Maggie, your Daddy was so strong he sure thought he did.”

Maggie and Montgomery.

Steve’d never even mentioned wanting kids.

Bucky wondered if he ever would. If he'd ended up with Peg, if they would've ever had kids. Steve Rogers would be one hell of a father.

The carousel slowed to a stop, the new wave of riders piling with excitement onto horses, lions, bears, mirrors flashing in the September sun.

A little blonde boy climbed onto the biggest horse, black with a red mane, clutching the glittery gold pole tight with the biggest smile on his face.

What kind of father would he be? The only kid he’d really taken care of was Steve, and he'd only been a kid himself.

When was the last time he'd been around children?

The carousel started up, creaking as the music sped up, lights started spinning faster and faster.

Shot.

A loud crack in the music - smell of gunpowder seeping through his skin, mirror flashing dripping red, the blur of children’s faces riding by, a snapshot of a smiling young face, bullet-hole between the eyes, black and smoldering and dripping red down the side of a tiny upturned nose.

The scream, such a higher pitch than he'd ever heard, echoing through his ears and why didn't his mask cover that high, he really couldn't breathe and that body was so small, tiny fragile arms twisted at awful angles as it crumpled to the ground, the last of the family’s blood spilling the plush carpet.
They’d told him kill them all. They hadn’t told him what order to kill them in and he couldn’t decide if it were more cruel to make the kids watch the parents die first or the other way around but he ended up taking out the toddler last.

He hadn’t debated at the time though, which was more cruel. He hadn’t cared.

That toddler had been blonde too. Right up until the blood of his sister splattered it red. Right up until Bucky splattered it red.

Another crash in the music and Bucky flinched, ducking his head. How many kids had he killed? He’d never taken the time to count.

Certainly didn’t wanna fucking know now.

What about the monster? Wasn’t he supposed to become that again?

Wasn’t that what he was molding himself into? That same devil that shot children between their innocent brown eyes?

Fuck.

Could he kill again?

Natalia said he could. He didn’t do that anymore.

But he fucking could, couldn’t he. If he’d been able to do it once, he could do it again.

So that just left one question.

Would he?

Red blue pumped from the same heart but he’d never wanted to inherit Steve’s war.

~~Hey, you wanna shut up?~~

Bad becomes worse.

So he’d been a good man. What happened when he wasn’t anymore?

Bad becomes worse.

“Oh stop acting like you’re all superior,” Bucky scoffed and Steve put both hands over his ears. Not like it’d fucking help, not when Bucky’s voice was coming from inside his stupid head.

Sam looked at him worriedly and Steve smoothed his hair, reaching for his helmet before any of them said anything.

It was surprising enough they’d invited him on the mission, he didn’t need to get kicked out before the action started. Although maybe that’s why they’d invited him. So he could get back in the action and Act Normal again.
It was true, he was the most himself on a battlefield. He’d met, kissed, and confessed his love for Bucky in the middle of a fight, why the fuck not put him back in one? Only time his head really worked.

After everything, everything he’d broken and run from and he couldn’t get rid of that gene. He couldn’t get rid of the fight.

“You ever think you fuckin’ could, Rogers?” The voice in his head chimed again and he glared at nothing, slamming his helmet back on again.

“Shut up, no one fucking asked you,” Steve grit, adjusting the straps.

“You alright there, Steve?” Another voice asked, only that one was coming from his helmet. Shit, the comms.

“Doin’ just fine,” he replied, smooth as possible. Whoever it was seemed satisfied with the sound they made, then the quinjet was landing and it was up to him to take point and give orders again.

This, he was good at. This, they trusted him with. Probably the only thing they trusted him with. But there they all were, standing and looking at him, probably some sorta test. But awaiting his orders. Even if just to see how mad he really was. But they were here, they had to have some sort of faith in him, right?

“If any of them had met the real you, I’d be your only friend all over again,” Bucky’s Brooklyn accent chided and Steve could scream.

“You think I don't know that?” He whispered roughly, then he was clearing his throat and lifting his head. Sometimes, he thought he understood why Buck liked the mask. It wasn’t like it had any protection the way his helmet did, but there was an anonymity to the blue sloping around his eyes that just might be the only thing keeping him calm right now.

“Allright, listen up. Romanoff and Barton, take left flank, draw out the attackers on the ground and make sure the civilians really are cleared. Stark, you take main air support and Wilson, back him up on the right. I’ll run center with Bu-- I’ll run center, Wilson can check in on me from above. Everyone good? Now move out.”

The shield in his hand.

How did he get his shield back after dropping it from the helicarrier? He really couldn’t remember. Blast from the left he barely blocked, and Steve had to get his head back on his fucking shoulders. He wasn’t going down in some useless fight in the streets of The Bronx.

It was barely five minutes into the fight before Nat and Clint attempted to start up a banter. Light-hearted, like that could possibly fix anything.

The Commandos used to banter. The fuck did his Avengers think they were doing?

“You cuttin into my body count?”

“Body count? You don’t have a body count. You’re a goddamned ex-SHIELD agent.”

“Oh whatever, Miss Russian Assassin, you’re just jealous of how much--oof! Better at this I am than you.”
“In your dreams, Barton.”

“Maybe, yes, in my dreams too. I dream about a lotta-- Tash! On your left!”

“Hey, that’s my thing,” Sam interjected and Steve bit back his comment, jogging down the empty flight of stairs and keeping an eye out for movement. Didn’t have a backup sniper with him the way he was so used to by now.

“...up for interpretation,” Clint was saying, rambling the way he always did, which is probably why he didn’t think to filter out the next part. “You weren’t the first to have Steve’s left, y’know.”

The comms fell dead silent.

Which was ironic in itself. Especially, y’know, the dead part, because Bucky wasn’t but he might as fucking well be. Steve sure felt like he was.

Especially with no one on his fucking six, Christ where did that grenade come from?

“Is Steve still there?” Clint whispered, just as Steve’s head cleared from the triple roll off the banister. At least he’d landed on his feet, even if his ankles were smarting.

It was pure silence, no one there to yell at him for being a fucking moron. Of course not. Bucky wasn’t here.

“Steve?” Clint whisper-checked again and he was really sick of the Steve-this Steve-that thing everyone kept doing. More people called him Steve now than the rest of his years alive combined.

“Get back to work,” he finally ordered over the line, annoyance clipping his tone barely half of what he felt.

It was like they all knew him so goddamned well. They didn’t know a thing about him, remember?

Ste-e-eve

A soft sigh of relief, a couple distant explosion sounds. Steve took care of the grenade-thrower, didn’t think about sniper-rifle shots between eyes or black masks or any of it.

The banter started up again, slowly but surely, then everyone was pitching in and he was getting a goddamned headache at this rate.

“C’mon, you can move faster than that, birdboy!”

“Which bird, me or Wilson?”

“You aren’t even a bird, Barton. I mean, I get the whole Eagle Vision Assassin’s Creed nonsense but--”

“Did you just compare me to a video game Stark?”

“It’s just an odd nickname!! Couldn’t they call you Sharp Vision or something? Or maybe Sharp Shooter? Something to do with Arrows, maybe?”

“Oh, like Iron Man is so great? Your suit’s not even Iron!”

“Everyone’s got weird nicknames, you can deal with it. Besides, you call Romanoff Tash.”
“It’s an endearing thing,” Natasha piped up, voice breathless over the comms. “Isn’t that right, Stevie?”

And just like that, bullet straight through the chest. Didn’t matter that he had his shield gripped tightly in his hand or not, nothing was stopping that.

Stevie. The hundred-thousand ways and times Bucky’d called him that, in shouts and coos and teasing jest and soft promises, the familiarity of everything missing from this fight and the silence had never been so fucking loud, the reminder of every single thing he’d lost had never shot faster, harder, and he stopped literally in his tracks, feet skidding to a stop on rough asphalt so suddenly he almost tripped.

Stevie.

He didn’t get to be Stevie. Or pal, buddy, Steve anymore.

His lungs were more than functioning, whole body screaming and he could feel the serum in his veins, each perfected cell he’d done nothing but destroy and abandon - wow, what a pattern, everything good he’d ever been given apparently got wasted and for the first time in a long fucking time, the skyline was clear.

Everything was fucking clear, because the clouds and the sun and the rain and the moon didn’t fucking matter, the ground under his boots could be crushed if he slammed his foot hard enough and Bucky’d come to the apartment to get the mask not him and he didn’t get to be Stevie and the silence on the comms certainly didn’t get to crush him either.

“Would it kill you to address me as your Captain, Agent Romanoff?” Steve snapped, and if he’d thought it was silent before, everyone must’ve stopped breathing at that point. Good, fucking good, hopefully none of the unit’s assets would fall outta the fucking sky.

Natasha was quietest of all and Steve straightened his shoulders, stood tall, full height and full Captain America voice, because he was a goddamned fucking Army Captain and he was sick and tired -

No, not tired, not anymore, just fucking pissed. He was pissed his team didn’t have enough fucking respect to act like he was anything but broken fucking glass.

“If you can’t handle a professional work environment, I suggest you leave the battlefield.” Clear, sure, the voice that belonged to a soldier of such a long time ago, but.

But it was a voice people listened to. A voice that could change something.

And it did.

Because Natasha left.

It was luck that had him walking up on her and Clint’s corner of the street, but he got there just as he finished his last words. Not close enough for her or Clint to see him, but he definitely saw them.

And the barely-calm, vibrantly-pissed assassin picking her radio communication out of her ear.
And throwing it on the ground.

And grinding it under her heel.

And turning, and fucking walking away.

Clint’s jaw was on the ground and Steve’s insides probably were too, but how much easier was it to make her walk away tall and hurt than to watch her trip trying to save him?

There goes one more Russian Assassin walking out of his life and Steve strode into sight, making Clint startle. Calmly bent down, picked up Natasha’s earpiece, and pocketed it.

“Now, where were we?”

~~This isn’t freedom, this is fear.~~

If he shook his metal wrists, the clank of steel chains didn’t reverberate. He should be happy. Relieved. Something.

He was free.

So why was he still so terrified?

It was over. He wasn’t going back. It had to go this way. If Bucky wanted to be free, it had to go this way. The price of freedom was high. It always had been.

After that first night together, that night on the floor Steve’d made just for them, dancing and soft lights and that bed they’d fallen into with a dozen promises --

After that first night and the surreal morning after, reality hit the moment clothes were put back on.

And the glowing feeling in his chest, he’d spent an hour convincing himself that it could be a good thing, instead of an unanchored, fumbling loss of control. Yes, he’d lost control, but who better to give it to than his best friend who’d left him to rot once who wanted to take care of him, Bucky could let them have this--

He’d been convinced he could prove it, climb to the highest mountain and spread his arms to the sky and shout that he was free, that he could be free and still love Steve Rogers.

Cause I wanna be free, and I wanna be yours--

Only he’d been wrong.

It was simple as that.

You couldn’t be free and belong to somebody. You couldn’t be free and tether your heart to someone’s soul.

So this was living outta chains, then. Living on his own, that was the only way he’d get his freedom.

Wasn’t that what they fought for anyways? If you stripped away all that convoluted dedicated nonsense of being out there for each other--
It was always about freedom. It was just time for Bucky to take his.

~~~

He wasn't eavesdropping, just passing by in the hallway but he heard his name and the next thing he knew he was pressed against a wall, signaling Jarvis to be quiet as he listened in on the conversation drifting from the lab.

“We could make him a mixtape. That’s how they cheer people up in the old days, right?”

“Y’know, man, your patience is even surprisin’ me. Not that I thought you'd quit out on Steve or anything, but the great Tony Stark isn't exactly known for kindness.”

“Just cause I chose not to spend my days slaving away at the VA doesn't mean I don't have a heart. Ask Pepper, she got something framed once. Now, do I put The Captain on this in all caps or do I risk my head by writing Stevie?”

“And there goes my compliment.”

“Anyways, birdboy, I'm thinking mixtape 2.0 and you're helping. Although, considering the existent circumstances, maybe I shouldn’t call this one Popsicle Boyfriends. How does Melting-Ice-Cream Exes sound?”

“Fantastic, Tony. Just so sensitive. You do realize the goal is to get him to not break the rest of the tower and piss off more assassins, right?”

“I think it's a great name. So now we just need music. That pop band he likes came out with a new song a bit ago, right?”

“Which band? One-D? The song’s called Drag Me Down. You really think that’s the sorta thing to cheer him up?”

“It's a great idea. And it fits them pretty well. But fine, we’ll keep it off. For now. How about…”

Steve goggled the song.

It wasn't a good idea.

Like Bucky said, Steve didn't have good ideas. Bucky'd been right. About how much?

He pressed his closed fists to his mouth, staring at the too-bright computer screen.

If I didn't have you, I'd never see the sun

He shouldn’t.

All my life, you stood by me

What was he doing? He was mad, remember?

That didn’t stop his fingers from typing. He just…
Okay, he wasn’t gonna explain or justify anything. Scroll, find Sam’s channel, click. It couldn’t be any worse than he felt already, right?

Steve full-screened the video and instantly regretted ever owning technology the moment the camera came into focus.

"This song is way too peppy for you to like, Barnes."

"Hey, the most metal thing is liking non-metal music too," Bucky interjected from off-screen and Steve’s breath caught in his throat. He just hadn’t heard Buck’s voice in a long time. It wasn’t the same as watching all that museum footage. This wasn’t clipped up by some curator, wasn’t black and white and silent, distant, all different than he remembered.

Full color, clear sound, and his heart was pounding outta his chest because now the camera was trained on Bucky and that was Buck, his Buck, with that beautiful hairstyle Nat had swept up for him, braids into a loose bun on top of his head, aviators on his head and this beaming smile on his face, reflecting as much light as the metal arm under his tight red shirt.

"And I’ve trained myself to give up on the past, ‘cause I’ve frozen time between hearses and caskets," Bucky sang and in the video Steve shook his head in the driver's seat, affectionate smile tugging his lips but sitting here in his desk chair Steve’s hand was clapped over his mouth.

This was a really, really monumentally awful idea.

“...the love the love that I gave, wasted on a nice face," Happy Bucky reached over to gently knock Happy Steve's jaw, smile and mischievous fire, rolled eyes on his part and that smile still pulling his lips like he just couldn’t contain it.

They’d filmed this the day after they’d slept together for the first time. God, he’d forgotten how goddamned bright Bucky’s eyes could get, he was so fucking beautiful like that, head tipped in song and arm waving for the rest of the team to join.

And then there was him. Singing right back at Bucky, lit up with this soft glow and he couldn’t remember ever seeing himself look like that in the mirror. He….

what the hell’d happened to them?

In the video Bucky convinced a reluctant Tony to join, even making him smile and the stab in his chest knocked the air outta him. Steve’d grinded his teams under his heel and said Bucky was his family and Tony’d said so was I and dear. fucking. god.

He was. He was, they all were, Nat’s flirty smile at Clint and Sam laughing behind the camera, Bruce’s amused glances and Tony’s rolling eyes and Bucky’s hair whipping in the wind as he stuck his head out the window and hollered.

What’d Steve done?

The song dropped down into quiet chords and everybody froze, Nat tipping her head up from the carpet as they all looked to full-color-shining-video Bucky, propped on the dashboard and facing the back, smile shifting down into something a little shy as he flicked his eyes between each of the Avengers in the back and came in with the bridge, voice floating, as pretty as it’d been singing You Are My Sunshine on that boat with the Commandos.

"Woke up this morning, early before my family..."
"We love you too, man!" Sam shouted from behind the camera and someone made kissy sounds and Tony covered his eyes with his hands, but Bucky just shook his head affectionately and turned his soft gaze on Steve.

Steve remembered this. Remembered it from his point of view, hands tightening on the wheel as he looked over and all of that pent up Brooklyn energy was focused on him, Bucky’s lips parting in melody the way they did every time he sang Steve to sleep when they were kids,

"...from this dream where she was trying to show me, how a life can move from the darkness. She said to get better."

How a life can move from the darkness.

In the video Steve looked positively wrecked and funny, because he’d felt that way at the time and it was nothing compared to the way he felt now.

Bucky had honestly believed Steve could show him the light. He’d trusted Steve to show him how to get better and Steve’d run them into the ground, it was his fault, it was all his fucking fault and all of this, Bucky’s smile as he tipped his head, shouted, broke the sweet moment and shook the van’s wheel --

All of that was gone, and Steve was the one who’d erased it and he was drowning in the leftover pink shards, trying to unravel into the sketch they used to be only it was too late, the paper was torn up and he didn’t have anything left to tape together.

It was an honest-to-god shot to his heart as the Steve in the video grabbed Bucky’s hand off the wheel. Their fingers tangled together and Steve’s hands had never been colder, not even on ice. Curled fists wouldn’t warm them now, not when all they’d done was break, break this

"Hey! I wanna get better!" Everyone shouted and Steve whooped in the video, gaze flicking between the road and his best friend caroling beside him.

He couldn’t breathe. His lungs were closing and it’d be an asthma attack if he were younger only he wasn’t young, not anymore, he was a full 97 years and his bones were so heavy, his eyes were so tired, the kid in the video holding Bucky’s hand couldn’t be him.

Only it was, it was, he remembered looking into those crystal eyes as the final chords of the song crashed, remembered drowning in the light there, in the tight hold of Bucky’s fingers in his, in the settling wave over his body that they’d done it, they’d reached everything they’d ever dreamed of, they’d slept together and they were closer than ever, best friends instead of Fall Out and it was all he ever wanted and--

and. And it was all right there in the video.

The two of them, holding hands as the song crashed its final chords behind them; road whipping by in the window behind, lightdark blues locked on each other.

The way they were looking at each other, fingers laced and heads turned, twin gazes stuck together, shining bright, melting smiles and so in love and beautiful and - the camera slowly, the final note echoing as the full screen of his computer settled on the zoom of two hands - metal and human.

Entwined.

Cut to black. Silence.
Steve blinked, didn’t register anything for a few moments.

Then youtube kicked in, a big play button popping up and a mirage of next-video suggestions and there, just like that, ready to move on to the next thing? Ready to put that all in the fucking past like it was just one of millions of videos, press play on whatever entertainment we have to suggest? How about nine other videos you might like?

Like that hadn’t been his entire happiness summed up inside of 3:32 minutes filmed on a camcorder.

Oh my god. He’d been Happy and he didn’t even know it.

"What makes you happy?" Sam asked and Steve looked away for a moment, hands shoved in his pockets and the wood of the VA’s wall hard against his shoulder. What made him happy.

“I don’t know,” Steve said.

I don’t know.

Well.

Now he fucking did.

Flash of red, wasn’t as simple as that. The same snap when Zola’s electronic face had told him he and Bucky’d died for nothing, the snap that had his fist inside a computer screen before he could get a handle on the rage bubbling in his veins.

Except his laptop was too small to punch like that, and even if it were one of those giant old computers he’d probably have slammed it into the wall anyway.

The smash and shattering screen and harddrive pieces, falling keyboard keys, clank of metal against the ground, he didn’t hear any of it because he was breathing too loud, chest heaving and Bucky’s metal hand smashing his radio into the wall Irresititi-- crash flashing behind his eyes and Steve couldn’t breathe because look, they were one in the same again.

Twin skeletons, just like that video, only they didn’t share the sunlight and laced fingers, just hands that smashed crumpled destroyed and bones that only knew how to break and he couldn’t keep doing this by himself, he was losing his mind and he couldn’t feel his skin and the heart in his chest ached so bad he couldn’t take it anymore.

It wasn’t fair, it wasn’t fair, how could Bucky do this to him, how could he do this, was it all his fault was it all his fault Bucky didn’t love him, his fault he made himself believe Bucky did and it wasn’t fair it wasn’t fair he couldn’t keep waking up to this world where the only time he smiled was in videos of the past and the only hands that kept his fists from curling in a fight were raised in battle against him and he just.

Could’t do it anymore.

Couldn’t.

One hand clutched to his chest, heart pounding and ribs shaking like he was tiny and small and too worked up all over again, terrified of arrhythmia only it wasn’t the heartbeat under his palm that terrified him anymore, it was the broken pieces shattered around it. It hurt, he hurt, and he’d never been so lost.

He’d never been so small.
Steve hung his head, shoulders curling in, mouth breaking over a single dry sob only he wasn’t gonna cry, he didn’t cry when he was awake and the wetness around his eyes when he woke didn’t count, he wasn’t gonna cry he was so a-angry--

Small, and beaten. That’s all that was left.

He’d never been so small and beaten.

~~~

“The world breaks everyone down. And afterward, many are strong at the broken places.”

That was a quote, in Farewell to Arms. Ernest Hemingway. He’d read that book around the tower, couple months back. Funnily enough, right after he almost jumped out the roof, And almost blew his brains out. And right before Steve’d shout-confessed that he loved him.

And to retaliate Bucky’d shot one of his best friends.

_Bang._

He re-cocked the rifle pressed to his shoulder, one eye shut as he lined up through the sights again. Target practice was tough in New York, but the city was loud enough that his silencer didn’t draw any unwanted attention.

Except maybe the pigeons falling from the sky, but he didn’t give a damn about dead birds.

Didn’t give a damn about much, really.

Aim, ready, then all his finger had to do was squeeze and the world was at his feet again.

The bruise on his shoulder from firing right-handed was fading every day, blood vessels more resilient to the constant pressure. He had a lot more muscle on his upper body than he was used to, that was helping impact the shot too.

Bigger, stronger than he’d ever been. No more lean mean fighting machine, he had the bulk he’d never gotten. The strength he’d never had under Hydra because they’d never allow him to get _that_ powerful.

If only he could get the control.

Bucky grit his teeth, sweeping long strands outta his eyes again and lining up on another stray bird. A crow, or raven, this time, black and sleek, holding something shiny in its beak. It was the reflection off the soda-can tab that’d caught his eye in the first place.

It was fine, the bird would learn that midnight things shouldn’t carry shiny, not if it wanted to keep the bullets outta its heart.

The squawk it made as it went down was a little morbid and Bucky watched passively as the tiny black thing two blocks away fell down ten stories to the ground below, a wave of black feathers dusting up behind it.

They all had to learn sometime.
Bucky’d told him teary-eyed in a hospital hallway that he’d asked Hydra to wipe his memories because it was easier than dealing with all the pain Steve’d caused him.

“It’s not your fault,” Sam’d said.

“None of that’s your fault, Steve.” - Natasha.

“You can’t blame yourself, Star-Spangled.”

Tony was in his lab putting a list of songs together and Steve was sitting in the lab adjacent, staring at a shiny red hover car that Bucky’d spent hours on and would never get to finish.

That day, that was the last day he’d seen Buck before Zola’d gotten him the first time. The last day before he’d gone from hinderance to sinking-anchor.

He had to give Stark credit, at least. If he was making a mixtape, he was nailing this one just as much as the last.

My bones are shifting in my skin, and you my love are gone.

It’d be amusing, if it didn’t feel so goddamned true. Slipping heels on cold cement, knees tucked to his chest and head against the wall, glittering shiny red reflecting him squished, small and shadowed, a dark speck on the smooth wax Bucky’d worked so hard on.

...and promise not to promise anymore. And if you come around again, then I will take, then I will take the chain from off the door.

It wasn’t that he was blaming himself because he wanted Buck to love him. That wasn’t unfair. No, it was his fault for a lot deeper reasons than that.

The concrete wall was too hard against his head but Steve didn’t move, barely breathing, soaking in the cold if it could make him numb.

I'll never say that I'll never love, but I don't say a lot of things, the song echoed from the next room over and Steve closed his eyes.

He had no idea what he was supposed to do now. What was the point of each next breath? Finding Bucky? For what? He’d already broken them. Bucky made it very clear. He’d never say it. Never say he loved Steve.

So he didn’t. It was too late. Too late.

The song next door drifted to a stop and the silence was deafening, filled only with the quiet, sporadic drip...drip.

Knuckles bleeding again. Couldn’t even remember what he’d punched this time.

The next song started, another soft thing, words drifting to fill the spaces between drops of blood.
Cause it was, all you wanted and all I needed
But all I gave up, nooow

He really did hate Tony sometimes.

Could you hold me tighter when worlds collide
Just hold me down right nooow

“Hold me down,” Bucky begged, sweat-sheened and beautiful beneath him, slipping off the edge of control but Steve didn’t give him that, Steve loved him too much. Needed to much.

Fuck, Bucky’d let Steve inside his body when he didn’t even love him back--

I'm losing my friends, in the wave of all these fragments I can't fake Friends, family. Didn’t matter.

Drip, drip, click click click. That was all the warning he heard before a door slammed open, eyes popping open at the same time. Only it wasn’t this door, must be the one to Tony’s main lab.

Pepper’s heels? Sounded pretty quick and angry to be Pepper, though. Not to mention an entire parade of shoes were following the clicks.

“Woah, what’s this about?”

“How about you explain why the hell you’ve been blaming me for this shitshow?”

“Woah, Romanoff, nobody’s blaming you--”

“Oh, really? That’s not what Bruce said.”

“Bruce says a lotta things!”

“Hey, Tony, don’t pin this on me. We all thought Natasha was withholding information.”

“Withholding information?! I’m the one who’s been out there looking for him!”

“No, actually, we all went without you.”

Steve grit his jaw and squeezed his eyes shut, digging the heels of his hands against his browbone only the voices weren’t getting any less sharp and everyone he loved was fighting and that was all his fault too.

“When the fuck was this? We’re a team, and you went scouting without telling anyone?”

“We told exactly who needed to know, which wasn’t either of you.”

“All that matters is finding him--”

“With what, the fucking expertise of Stark?”

“Steve Rogers, actually.”

Pull me in, drown my fear

“Are you fucking--”
“So nobody cares about Steve’s mental break until it’s about finding some villain, right?”

“Hey, watch who you’re calling villain.”

_Could you wait another day, knowing that I’ll come back_

“Don’t kid yourself Clint, Barnes never fucking cared about any of us, or he wouldn’t’ve split.”

“Oh really? You stick around after you break up with somebody because you like their _family_?”

“Rogers made it very fucking clear we aren’t family.”

“I don’t give a fuck what Rogers says. He’s not in his right mind and we’re the ones who’ve gotta protect him.”

_I’ll come back... no fear_

“Protect him from what? Bucky’s not gonna hurt him.”

“Oh maybe you’re just scared Bucky’s coming for you.”

“It’s not my fucking fault they broke up!!”

“Oh, like you haven’t wanted them to since the beginning.”

“You’ve got a lotta fuckin nerve--”

“Are we seriously fighting about this right now? We’re never gonna find Barnes if we don’t work together.”

“Only Rogers gets to pull the ‘together’ speech apparently.”

“You guys just don’t get it. We’re never gonna find Barnes, period.”

“Because your girlfriend isn’t fucking looking.”

“I am nobody’s girlfriend.”

“You’re also getting nothing done. None of us think you just ‘can’t find him.’”

“He doesn’t wanna be found! _Ever!!_”

Crash, slam, crumble.

The silence that followed was the first time Steve felt relieved in the last month.

Then _his_ door got shoved open and that relief slipped just as fast as it’d came.

There were more people than he’d counted voices although he hadn’t exactly counted and why were they all _crowding_ him and _staring_--

“How long have you been in here?” Tony demanded and Steve wondered distantly if he was pissed about Steve sneaking into his back lab or upset that Steve’d been listening to his stupid mixtape or just wondering if he’d overheard the shout-fest conversation but his mouth was raven’s feathers and answering was pointless anyways.

Sam crouched down beside him and the dark face swam into focus, back out again. Into focus, brown brown eyes and blur, somebody in the room was wearing red and somebody else was wearing blue and that was about all he had.

“--ou okay?” Sam was asking and Steve blinked at him. How long since he’d eaten something?

“He’s bleeding,” Natasha pointed out and the room was focusing slightly, his hand’d stopped shaking enough that he could roll his eyes without passing out.

“All the boys fall for that wit?” Steve attempted to jab only she wasn’t smiling the way she always did when he teased, no one was smiling and suddenly he definitely wasn’t either. Not even the fake one.

“Steve,” Clint said softly, crouching down beside him. No, he was used to Tony’s ridicule and Sam’s softness and Natasha’s blatant comments but Clint wasn’t the consoling type, he was more Buck’s friend than his and Bucky’d thrown that away because of him too and Steve couldn’t take dragging more team members down Hell Road.

His hand was bleeding more and the concrete next to his head was broken and these hands were supposed to be in Bucky’s, walking through their bloody Hell together, right?

“It is my fault,” Steve told the splits in his knuckles. Deeper, though. Not that Bucky left. It was his fault Bucky couldn’t love him.

“St--”

“I think he did love me, once. He told Peggy he did.” Steve lifted his head, blinking. Looked between all of their faces. They all knew who Peggy was, Tony the most, or maybe Maria, but really he wished it was her young, fighting face here. She always knew what to say. She’d even known what to say to Bucky when he didn’t.

“And I think...really, he did.” He stared back down at his hands, smeared red now, just like those damn gloves that’d dropped Bucky the first time. “Just. Not since the fall.”

It was simple. It was too simple, really, and maybe that’s why it’d taken him so long to see it but after everything Bucky’d cried and confessed to him, after every piece he’d ever sewn together, Steve finally got it.

His voice was all echoy and hollow but it was the only speech he’d ever given he was sure of in his bones.

“He never died in that fall. He just…stopped loving me. When I never came for him. When I left him, for dead. Maybe that tore his heart out and he stopped loving me the moment he stopped believing I’d save him. Because I didn’t. I didn’t save him, and there’s nothing I can do to fix that. Ever.”

There were vague protests as he struggled to his feet but Steve ignored them, one bloody hand holding him up on the wall and the other waving around because really,

“Maybe he just. Hasn’t loved me since. Maybe he only stuck around, gave it a shot because he wanted to see if he could get it back but he can’t because he doesn’t believe in me anymore. He can’t. I left him for dead. I left him for dead, and maybe Bucky used to love me and now he doesn’t because I abandoned him.” Steve pushed off from the wall, bloody hands hanging at his sides. An army of hands reached for him but Steve was done with armies and hands.

“I abandoned him. So, you see, it is my fault. My fault a long time ago, but nothing I can fuckin’ do about it now so. If you would be so kind,” he shoved past Natasha’s tiny shoulders, and Bruce’s big ones but nobody was big enough to stop him and frankly, nobody was stupid enough to try.

The door took a second to figure out with his hands so goddamned slippery. But eventually it opened, and he let them all stare at his retreating back as he left.

Might as well, it was his fucking fault.

“Well that went fucking well,” Natasha added dryly as the door finally clicked shut.

“No thanks to any of you,” Sam huffed, then he was off in Steve’s direction.

Clint shook his head and took the other exit, followed by nearly everyone. Pepper lingered a moment to pat his shoulder, then even she was going. Slam slam slam and Tony stared at the empty room.

Well, not empty.

The red shiny flying car Bucky was working on before he left was in here. Probably why Steve’d been.

Wait, the hell was that on the wheels?

Tony shoved aside the past ten minutes and crouched down beside the car, peering underneath at the unfamiliar wiring.

Why had he connected those two circuits--

Huh.

It was just. Pure curiosity reasons, for posterity and such. Tony straightened, patting the hood once before waving at hand at Jarvis in the corner.

“Can you remote start the engine? Just...in case it, y’know. Flies now.”

“Certainly, sir. Would you like me to give the report--”

“No, go ahead and start it. Just a hunch.”

The engine grumbled to life and Tony crossed his arms over his chest, chin propped on one hand as he waited, rumble turning into a click and then. The car was shuddering, and. Lifting up.

Okay, basic levitation his dad had gotten at some point, so it should short out any second now--

Only. It didn’t. It...kept hovering.

“By god.” He reached forward carefully, setting a hand on the red paint. The car vibrated warm under his palm, actually floating. Flying. “He figured it out.”

The only thing it’d need now was a rerun to the cooling system it looked like, really just one more part to install to reroute the extra force required and it’d be perfect, a totally functional flying car. See, if he just clipped a secondary pump--

You know what? It was Bucky’s project.
He shook his head, signaling Jarvis to cut the engine. The car lowered slowly, settling back on the ground. Just barely unfinished. But it wasn’t his to fix.

Bit of a shame though. The man’d discovered how to make cars fly efficiently and. It was one part short of being one of the greatest accomplishments of a lifetime.

Well. It’d be here when Barnes came back.

If, he ever came back.

Tony paused in the doorway, turning to look at the shiny red one last time. Then he flipped off the light and the invention faded into black. Just like the rest of them.

When he turned back around he nearly jumped outta his skin. Steve was standing there in the doorway to his lab, hands clean and dark circles under blue eyes, looking something like a ghost as Tony froze, one hand still on the door to close the flying car into secrecy behind him.

Only Steve didn’t have a single damn thing to say about the car. Just pushed off the doorframe from where he’d been watching, and left a single damn sentence echoing in the empty lab.

“If you thought this was gonna have a happy ending, you weren't paying attention.”

~~~

He hadn’t been able to make the switch last time.

Last time, he’d been so close, bordering on the verge of perfection and Hydra kept telling him, there’s something holding you back.

So they’d let him dream, so he could fucking rid of it.

It being Steve.

They’d met at the Brooklyn bridge docks, night sky, water lapping reflections of stars. I may lose my heart, but one day I'll be a star.

See, in that dream, he’d just told Steve he had to go. Told his subconscious he had to fucking let it go. Let him go.

"I spent a lot of time trying not to think about you."

"I know," the angel replied, wind whistling like a hurricane, storm to separate them once more. "Do I have to go?"

"Yes."

"I'm never going to forget you," the angel whispered.

"I have to forget you," Bucky whispered back.

Only, it wasn’t that fucking easy this time. Not like it’d been easy last time, it’d been like ripping his other fucking arm off, and he knew what that felt like.
Last time, they’d wiped him after. Last time, they’d erased fucking everything. And that’s how he’d finally done it, how he’d finally stopped hurting.

It was the same fuckin thing keeping him in pain this time.

He remembered everything, all of it, every inch, and he couldn’t be the fucking Winter Soldier when every time he closed his eyes he wanted to curl up and never wake the fuck back up.

Couldn’t just drown himself in efficiency and workouts and sniping and perfection.

It wasn’t enough.

He still woke with his eyes tight at the corners from dried tears. He still felt the hole in his chest that was trying to swallow him fucking whole.

And. Well. He was starting to lose it.

This is a black, black ski mask song
So put all of your anger on

Bucky jumped over the banister, executing a perfect and entirely unnecessary flip, invisible gunfire whizzing by as he slid across empty concrete and spun out the closest invisible gunman.

Metal hand catching on a cooling pipe just in time, creaking under his weight as he hauled himself upwards with the momentum, forearm smacking the next ledge and fingers digging in, swinging his legs to the side and rolling onto the catwalk, knife slicing the invisible second sniper’s thigh and metal hand grasping air to crush invisible esophagus number twelve,

Blood splattering in ninety directions.

In the truly gruesome do we trust

He rolled off the side of the catwalk, catching a metal beam to right himself in the air, go flying into a crouch he sprang outta with finger on a trigger, aimed at the next invisible target.

Only the pretend muscle he was beating up wasn't a challenge in the least.

He was practically bored.

There was only one opponent really, one opponent he'd never quite beaten.

One he happened to have intimately memorized their fighting style.

So Bucky lowered the gun in the face of the invisible target - the target that'd changed everything - because frankly, bullets bounced off that shield faster than he could shoot them.

I will always land on you like a sucker punch
Singing I am your worst,
I am your worst nightmare

The ring echoed, metal colliding with metal and Bucky knew better now than to aim for the shield, but Steve was fast and his sucker punch landed there anyways. Backfired off the side and Bucky used the momentum to throw his shoulder back, spin and swing his other fist down towards Steve’s cheekbone--

That pretty face snapped to the side, blue eyes fiery underneath the helmet as they locked on his, flashing as a red fist swung for his head. He ducked, shoving Steve’s shield to the side and aiming for a gut punch, only Steve twisted and he hit bone, miscalculation costing him the balance enough to let one of those pretty red boots connect violently with his knee.

Bucky hissed and blocked a swing from vibranium, metal fingers curling around the edge and popping it violently off Steve’s magnetic sensors, one swing dodged and another fired off, punctuated with the whirring metallic ever-adjusting, the grit of Steve’s stubborn mouth.

Blocking each other’s punches and swings, forearms smacking and bruising, blue turning black too easy, threat of red to drip between the glint of his fingers and now, finally, Steve was barely holding his own, throwing up enough blocks that he wasn’t beat and he also wasn’t getting anywhere.

Because they took our love and they filled it up
Filled it up with Novocaine and now I’m just numb

Quick punch to the star in Steve’s chest that didn’t have him flying backwards, not when red leather fingers closed around the straps of Bucky’s shoulders, shoved him off balance instead. The slash of a knife, arm lifted to block a vicious stab, but the Winter Soldier dropped the knife over the side of that uniform, catching it with the other hand and blue followed the flash of the knife, letting him land a solid punch on perfect cheekbones.

Steve went stumbling backwards, reeling, still blocked the next kick and managed a solid swing of his own, catching Bucky’s jaw hard. Something snapped and he shot out a sidekick in retaliation, making Steve gasp at the force of it.

Don’t stop, don’t stop until your heart goes numb
Now I’m just

“You bastard,” he cursed, heel jabbing into the back of Steve’s knee. A stumble but Rogers caught himself, spun around on a jump and slammed his knee into Bucky’s stomach, folding him in half.

“I don’t feel a thing for you”

He didn’t. Fuck Steve Rogers, he didn’t.

Straightened up, vision blurring for a moment as he tightened the fist around his knife, lashed sideways and feigned right. Metal screeched as it split uniform, then skin, slitting open red across Steve’s bicep, eliciting an angry hiss and a shoving elbow knocking the back Bucky’s shoulder, shooting a firework of pain up stretched scars.

He should fucking give in, change his damn opponent, something, only Bucky was too dizzy to do anything but finish this and he wasn’t going down that fucking easy.

The tiny knife in his boot wasn’t good for much but throwing, so that’s exact what he did with it, curling in on himself from the sting of his shoulder and springing into a roll, metal slipping under his heel and flicking outta his fingers, glinting in the dim light before it lodged in Steve’s thigh, shocked pained sound--

_I’m just a problem that doesn’t wanna be solved_

“Why do you fucking bother?” A voice jeered from behind and Bucky spun around, eyes wide. There was Tony, arms crossed over his chest, head tipped towards Steve as he gestured boredly at Bucky.

“We all recognize he’s the problem here,” another pointed out and Bucky spun again, blinking at the redhead stalking the pace of concrete behind him. “I warned you about him, Steve.”

Bucky whipped his head towards Rogers, chest heaving from breathing too heavy, only Steve didn’t say a single thing to Natalia. Or Stark.

“You gonna fight me, Buck? Or you gonna stand there acting like I’m still too small to handle it?”

A flash, the back of Steve’s head sticky red as he accidentally pushed him down too hard when he was just trying to teach and fuck--

Red connected with his jaw again and you’d think after how many times he’d let Steve hit him in their breakup fight he’d be used to the fucking feeling but it still cut him to the core.

“C’mon Barnes, you’re doing an injustice to the Russian name,” Nat called and Bucky ground his teeth.

“M’not fucking Russian.” The metal arm swung, connected with red-white stripes, then Steve’s elbow was coming down on his shoulder again and Bucky cried out, nearly falling to his knees.

A sharp wolf-whistle to the left and Bucky used the sound as distraction to roll away from Steve, wincing as he had to roll wrong on the throbbing scapula.

“Hey Sarge, you’re better’n that!” A cheery voice called and Bucky froze, absolutely terrified to turn around.

He hadn't heard that voice in seventy five years.

“C’mon, ol’boy, bugger up!” Monty added, high British echo settling in along Dugan’s heavy accented tones.

They couldn't see this. Why were they--

Steve’s boot found his ribcage, snapping pain up his side and Bucky latched onto that burn, fingers closing around Steve’s ankle to drag him off balance.

A quick sideflip with his legs and he kicked out Steve’s other ankle, two hundred pounds of super soldier thudding to the ground beside him, a hearty cheer rising up to the left, more jeers from the right, Barton’s dry teasing meddling in with Romanoff and Stark--

_So could you please hold your applause_

Two hands on the ground, attempting to shove upright, except he only staggered a couple inches before twin kicks dragged him down again.

Bucky grit his teeth and threw an elbow, only leather caught it, pulled backwards and flipped it behind his back, that dirty wrestling move Steve used when they were kids--
“Take this sideshow and all its freaks”

“Boys! Not in the kitchen!”

Sarah’s voice cut clear over the litany of jeers and Bucky had to lift his head, blink through the sweat and dangling hair in his eyes, see for himself--

And there, hair wrapped up and donning those scrubs, same stubborn eyebrow raise that Steve did, hands on her hips, tap tap tapping heel to match the click click click of Natasha’s restless pacing,

Bright red hair bright red lips as she sneered at him, spewing her distaste in Russian now while Tony sighed, complaining to Steve with that bright glowing chest cutting through shadows to illuminate a million floating dust particles,

Barton’s lazy sprawl on a windowsill, thumping the tip of some arrow and making offhand comments about how not even Sam could help this one.

Steve shoved Bucky’s bent arm further up his back and he cried out, curling to the side and there were the Commandos, propped on various logs like they were watching a fire crackle, only it was Bucky’s bones and their smiles were so goddamned bright--

And turn it into the silver screen dream dream

The lights flashed on with that same awful, blinding loud pop they did every time the war propagandists filmed something, same spotlights and big square filter lights, shining down from the corners like some kind of arena and Bucky couldn't take that.

One foot planted on the arm behind him and Bucky shoved off, spun, and snapped something hard in the same second, a cry of pain from Steve but he was free, free enough to roll onto his back and throw a spare knife at the closest light.

It shattered, raining down glass and sparks on the heads of the Commandos, damn near lighting them on fire and Bucky’s stomach churned as Falsworth smiled wider, spread his arms and exclaimed to the rest of the boys,

“Snow! We’ll all be insulated tonight!”

“Or incarcerated,” Clint added thoughtfully, throwing a wood chip down from the rafter, throwing shadows as it floated to the ground.

The lighting was totally fucked now, too bright from three sides and casting the craziest shadows from the fourth, cutting every angle on his face deeper as he finally got his bearings, sprung back to his feet.

Steve was already waiting, brushing the dust and glass off his uniform, helmet knocked off to one side and dandelion puff looking more like a halo and horns than anything else.

“A quick feet readjustment as Steve lifted both fists and Bucky snarled, wishing he'd worn his mask - crouched low, stalked the distance between them with perfectly chosen footsteps.

“Hurry up, Cap! Put down the dog already!”

Singing I am your worst, I am your worst nightmare

They wanted собака? He could give them an animal.
Steve raised an eyebrow, then a knife was slicing into his left abdomen and he looked down, mouth opening in pain only he never had the chance to make the sound because Bucky pounced, fist connecting with that pretty jaw and snapping the perfect head to the side.

They made him into a weapon and told him to find peace.

The look on Steve's face as he lifted his head, the blood dripping from the corner of his mouth, that was the only peace he'd ever get.

Leather caught the next punch but Bucky’s brain was working now, he'd prepared a backup plan for that and his other fist landed right over the knife wound in Steve’s uniform.

A shocked sound and Steve twisted Bucky’s wrist, nearly breaking the bones and he had to get the metal fingers up to pry Steve off his damn hand, blue glaring heated and pissed over the top of their grappling hands.

they took our love and they filled it up, filled it up with Novocaine and now I’m just numb

Yank free and Steve’s next punch was an uppercut, snapping his head back and sending hair flying, but the momentum only made his kick stronger and then they were both rolling around on the ground, kicking up more dust and drowning in the shouts and jesters of the onwatching crowd.

Steve pinned him to the ground and Bucky slammed his ankle into Steve’s lower back, making him groan and shove a forearm against Bucky’s neck, only that made Steve off balance and it was too easy to flip them, knocking Steve’s skull to the side again with a wild punch, leg hooking up over his side and they were rolling, again, fighting and shoving and pushing til he couldn't tell if the red spotting his vision was stress or delusion or blood dripping into his eyes but nothing was tinting that devilbedamned color of blue, even beating bruises til they were black and matched the insides those leather gloves kept trying to pulverize and he finally got two hands on Steve’s shoulders, on the warm shoulders he used to carry, slammed that precious spine into the ground and screamed.

"YOU SAID I WOULD NEVER BE ALONE AGAIN YOU PROMISED ME FOREVER AND HERE YOU ARE LEAVING ME TO DIE ALONE FOR THE GODDAMNED SECOND TIME!!"

The break was all Steve needed, the rip in Bucky’s soul meant a tear in his heart -- literally.

It all happened so fast, the flash of the knife in his own hand, then Steve was jabbing Bucky’s hand into his chest, slicing through all that black armor, cutting straight into the deepest part of him and lodging there, choking, as his pierced aorta sputtered and Bucky coughed on the blood in his throat.

don’t stop, don’t stop until your heart goes numb

One hand grasped at his chest, gasping for oxygen and Steve slid out easy from under him, staggering on his hands and knees and by God, everything was quiet.

Bucky sucked in another haggard breath, risked looking up under the black tangled veil of hair.

They were all gone. The crowds, the Avengers, Sarah, the Commandos, the lights, broken glass.

It was just Steve, standing there, blocking the dim light from a distant window, disapproval and disinterest etched into that beautiful face.

Bucky shredded, here on his knees before Steve again only there was a knife in his heart and Steve really was gonna let him die alone.
He gasped another broken breath, looking down at his chest, lifting his hand free from where he'd been clutching the bleeding--

It wasn't bleeding. There was no knife. There was no wound.

Now I'm just numb

Not even a pierce in his shirt. His hands weren't red either, there was no blood splatters arching the floor.

“Stevie?” Bucky breathed, looking up for an explanation.

Only Steve wasn't there.

Just thin air.

Very very thin air; the kind best to choke on.

Steve was gone. Steve’d never been here.

The warehouse was empty.

So was Falsworth’s tent.

I don't feel a thing for you

I don't wanna feel a thing for you.

He was shaking, he knew distantly. Bruised in a couple places, which made sense with all the throwing himself around.

Bleeding. The worst on the inside.

I don't feel a thing for you but he could never stop feeling until Steve was gone. For good, erased, entirely. Hydra’d proven it. He’d proven it.

He was losing his mind. Losing his goddamned mind and at this rate, he really would lose his goddamned heart too. Almost did today. What if he’d actually had a knife in his hands--

Had to protect himself.

Had to get a fucking grip and protect himself and to do that he had to sever ties. Cut all the strings he was tangling himself up in before they wrapped around his neck and choked him to death in his sleep.

‘Specially that thick gold string he kept tripping on. ‘Specially Steve.

But how?

He'd never been able to drop the kid before. Steve loved him too much.

Shove off the ground, straighten to his feet. Boots felt too heavy on the cold ground now, October chill settling into bones and Bucky’d broken Steve’s but he still stuck around.
Stuck around until Bucky melted into golden nothing and stained both their souls ugly black.

It'd have to be something worse, worse than all the pain of that night. Worse than all the physical and mental torture he'd put them through, because Steve was still sticking around, sticking too hard like sunlight to tanned skin and he couldn't handle gold in the black and white painfree world.

Had to be bad enough to make Steve stop. Leave him be, forever. The only way Steve would stop chasing?

Bucky had to make Steve Rogers hate him.

~~ Sometimes I think you like getting punched.~~

Copying the files from the hard drive. It's a good habit to get into.

Natasha taught him once and it was stupid, wanting to put himself in more pain like that, but he'd never been good at avoiding pain anyways.

It was either use Tony's mixtape or trudge through his song library till something made him cry anyways.

Exes. They were exes now. As in past-tense, broken up, and it wasn't even ex-boyfriend it was ex-fiancé and in the span of lifetimes they'd lived they'd only been together for the tiniest fraction, broken-hearted over each other for all the rest.

Sorrow found me when I was young Sorrow waited, sorrow won.

“Captain Rogers? Mr. Stark has requested your presence at dinner this week. There is a general concern for your health and well-being. May I RSVP for you?”

The glass was cold under his palm, city lit up below his feet. Every one of those lights was a person, or a family, and one of them could be Bucky, he could be right there, in that distant golden window, and Steve would never know.

“Sure, Jarvis. I got no plans tomorrow night.”

Or the next night. Or the next.

Or ever.

He dropped his hand from the window, turned a dull gaze over the rest of the floor. Oddly empty, because Stark’d never gotten around to redecorating after he and Bucky’d taken most of the furniture to their Brooklyn apartment.

Still familiar though, same old kitchen table they'd eaten at so many times, same kitchen he'd sat on the counter swinging his legs and singing to Bucky that'd he'd loved him since they were eighteen and Buck almost dropped that pancake at the confession that he'd told Mom he wanted to marry
Bucky.

For awhile there, Steve really thought he would.

Don't leave my half a heart alone.
On the water, cover me in rag and bone.

There wasn't a fire escape he could crawl out on, sit in the cold with the wind in his hair and his eyes too frozen to leak.

But the dining room tile was freezing and if he tipped his head back against the wall-length windows it was close as he could get.

Sympathy - cause I don't wanna get over you.

Spine against cold rigid, heart beating too slow in his chest, lagging behind his breaths.

Let go.

Dipping Bucky in half for a kiss, over there, the shock and absolute joy on his face as Steve pulled away, crystal eyes crinkling and mouth curling up with that one-sided smile.

I don't wanna get over you.

That fight, wrestling on the living room floor after Steve'd almost broken his own wrist. Bucky’d pinned him down, hands around his throat, heated fire in his eyes. And God, Steve’d been hot all over, so young and turned on, eyes begging Buck to kiss him and really, he almost had.

“You worry the fuck outta me.”

“Right back at you.”

Steve knocked his head back against the window, eyes shut and mouth twisted up to keep from crying. He wasn't gonna cry.

“You promised,” Steve whispered, wrenched and quiet and more broken than he'd even wanted to say aloud. “Promised I would n-never be alone again.”

The thing is, you don't have to. Cause I'm with you to the end of the line, pal.

“Last breaths drawn together, but here you are leaving me to d-die alone again--”

Voice broke over the last part and Steve covered his face with his hands, gasping shakily behind softening calluses, knees drawing closer to his chest.

A muffled sound echoing through empty, empty, and that ghost might never fill the vacant spot on their old shared tower floor again.

Bucky’s laugh was done echoing off these walls. Forever. The quiet it was now, that was permanent. About the only thing that was permanent.

“He's gone,” Steve mumbled, peeling damp hands off his face, shuddering breath as he slid up the wall, teetered to his feet. Hand on the window again, five splayed star like he could break through if he pressed hard enough--

“He's gone he's gone he's gone Bucky's Go-o-o-one.”
His head hung with the sob, shoulders shaking with it and he'd never wanted to cry because he knew he'd never stop.

Cold, wet rolling down his cheek and it was too late now, the wall had a considerably sized dent, shield shaped only he hadn't just bounced off, hadn't kept running for the assassin in black because he was too late. It was too late.

Didn't have it in him to yell anymore.

Didn't have it in him to be angry.

Didn't have a thing left in him at all.

don't leave my half a heart alone. on the water, cover me in rag and bone. sympathy, cause I don't wanna get over you.

He was lying on his old bed, staring at nothing in misery when the elevator dinged.

Steve lifted his head, which was how he saw the note on his bedside table. And the sketchbook.

Dragged himself upright enough to grab both, sheets shifting beneath him. How many times had their bodies been entwined in those shee--

He flipped open the sketchbook before his head could finish that thought.

A carnival’s carousel, grays arching beautifully, white clouds saturating the sky. He didn't remember drawing that.

Another page, indiscernible sketches.

Another, another, and the book flipped open to a sketch he definitely remembered making.

Bucky, flopped out on the couch, hair splayed a hundred directions and bright eyes focusing seriously on the book he held up with his metal hand. Farewell to Arms.

The shadow of a love bite, lingering kiss, something, dark on his neck and Steve rolled his lips in, wiping a hand down his face before he made all the papers crinkle.

A sound outside the door and he wiped his face one more time, tucking the mystery note into that page and flipping the sketchbook closed. He'd read it later. Wasn't for the eyes of whoever’d found him now.

“Rogers?” Sam called out, carefully tipping the door open.

Steve glanced up a moment, saw he was alone and stared back down at the sketchbook in his hands.

He looked positively awful.

Dark circles under his eyes, loose shirt tugged off balance to one side, legs thin and bare from under a pair of worn shorts, hands trembling a little as they clutched a sketchbook too tight.

Sam closes the door softly behind him, stepping up to the bed and that's when he saw the tear tracks.
He'd never been so relieved to see someone crying in his entire life.

Steve'd been doing anything but crying for the past five weeks and now that he finally was, they were finally getting somewhere.

“Hey,” Steve croaked and see, already, progress. It was always one of them speaking first, but here was Cap taking the initiative. Maybe finally goddamn healing.

“Hey, man.” A very careful hand placed on Steve’s shoulder, one he didn’t shrug away.

But he didn’t look up either, staring down dejectedly at that sketchbook the same way he'd stared down at metal handcuffs that day on the bridge, some other world, some other time period in his hands and he didn't blink once, stared right through the bottom of the van, voice drifting, He looked right at me. And he didn't even know me.

Except it wasn't anywhere near as simple as that anymore.

Sam tugged the sketchbook carefully away from those shackled hands. Steve let him take it, head turning to stare at the wall.

“He’s been gone a lot longer than five weeks.” Voice scratchy, precariously torn, but he was speaking and Sam was here to listen. “And I didn't even notice.”

“You went for help. You noticed,” Sam reasoned softly. Steve shook his head once, words clipped like he didn't ever give his mouth permission to say them.

"I pushed him too hard to get better. To be right, for me. And he snapped.”

A simple defeated shrug and it was almost as disturbing to see Cap defeated as it was to see him broken this deep. None of them had ever wanted this, not for these two. Not for anyone.

“Look man. I know it’s hard. You two never had it easy. But you can't blame yourself for everything.”

“He's always looked out for me, even when he was rotting away inside.” A pause, so quiet, eerily calm but at least he wasn’t throwing things and screaming anymore. “And I can't return the favor once?”

“You did everything you could to help him, Steve. I know, first hand, man. But we can't save everyone.” A soft shake to those broad shoulders and Steve sighed.

More like deflated, a noise of pure exhaustion. Rubbed a hand over his mouth, head tipped tiredly to the side.

“How, Sam? It's been building up for so long and I did nothing.”

“It was never your responsibility to know everything, Steve.”

For a legend, an army captain and a best friend with a severe savior complex, that wasn't something he could hear and understand. Frustration knotted between eyebrows, voice lifting just a little.

“I'm the one who's supposed to take care of him.”

“That's not your job.”

“It's my only job! All I've ever done in my long and twisted career is try to save him and when it comes to the thing that matters most - thinking I'd leave him again - I had no idea how bad--"

“Steve, how could you? He's amazing at hiding this stuff. He's a professional --""

“I am sick and tired of people saying that. What the hell am I supposed to be, then? When is everyone going to get it in their heads that I've killed probably just as many people as he has? In wars, battles. I'm the one who gets in fights, and I'm the professional soldier. We're equals, goddammit. And he doesn't get that. No one gets that!”

“Nobody doubts you, Steve.”

“He does! He always has. Sam, he thinks I'm in it for the justice, red white and blue flags, thinks I don't love him enough not to abandon him again--”

“Steve, this is Bucky Barnes we're talking about. He knows you.”

“Yeah, maybe, but clearly not well enough to trust me! Or- or. Or love me.”

Sam let go of Steve’s shoulder, taking a step back and rubbing a hand over his head. Steve still didn't get it. After all this time, the best vision a human could possibly have and Steve was still blind as a bat without echolocation.

“You seriously think you're the only problem here?”

Blue eyes lifted, muddled confusion over glistening eyelashes. “What?”

“God, Barnes was right. You see the world in shades of martyrs and devils and angels. It's not that black and white, man. His rejection wasn’t just about you. It's him, it's because he doesn't feel safe. Because he's broken and he knows it and he thinks there's no fixing a broken machine.

“Because he's scared. He's terrified you'll jump ship and what he'll become without you, terrified to tether himself to a soul that's always threatened to leave him, either in some ball of fire or finally just walking out. That fear is what kept him from you, all these years.”

“He's always been scared I'll die, that's no fucking excuse,” Steve muttered and Sam would smack him upside the head right now if he thought it'd do any good.

“If that's not a valid reason, the hell is? Man, it's simple. He's got it in his head he's nothin’ without you, then all of a sudden he is without you and he can't handle it.”

“He could handle anything. He's...he pushed through his own brainwashing, saved himself from Hydra both times. He overcame his near-suicide, he pushed through watching people die by his own hands. Overcame seventy years of torture and came out the other side functional, happy, wanting to change, still a goddamned genius with the brain to save the world. He handled all of my shit, easy, slipped right in along the Avengers, sniper rifle in hand. He's courageous, strong--”

The waving arms and increasing pitch weren’t getting them anywhere and Sam had to put up both hands to get Steve to shut up for a second.

“Listen, listen. That's not something he can process, Steve. To him it's just fights, one after another, and he doesn't go down easy. But he's still helpless around you, and he hates that.”

The second lasted exactly that, then Steve was popping off the bed, shoving past Sam and spinning back around, visually pent up with all that frustration, but his top wasn’t blowing, limbs too heavy to be swinging and for once, Sam didn’t have to stand with his guard up, just stand and listen to his friend pour his heart out without any fists to follow.

Dear god, the affect Barnes had on that boy.

“Helpless? He’s the only reason my dumbass hasn't blown up about ninety times. He's got my six. Still, always has. He lifts me up, Sam, like you wouldn't believe. He's always put me on the tops of mountains and I don't know if I'd’ve ever been able to touch the sun like I did if he didn’t have so much faith in me.”

The tall and proud were held up with metal beams behind the green screen but without his Steve was deflating, crumpling, more and more with every word, quieter and quieter like he could disappear into nothing, become small all over again, let the coffin he was in now reverse the Vita Rays.

“It's always been Bucky, always. I hold him in my arms, Sam, but I know.” Single shake of his head, blue eyes staring out at nothing, mouth tipped sideways. “I know no matter how much he cries on my shoulder...or curls against my chest…”

Two shoulders lifted, dropped, eyes down and fists down, ground too close to do much falling but he was managing it anyways, somehow.

“...he's still the one who's holding me.”

Sam swallowed. If only he could be a miracle worker like Steve, if only he had the power to raise a nation to arms with words alone, maybe he could’ve found Steve’s best friend for him. Because he’d do just about anything to deliver Bucky to that heartbroken golden retriever right now.

“C’mere, man,” was all he had to offer, stepping up into that sad little bubble, wrapping the only two arms he could give around those broad, impossible shoulders.

It took a second, or ten, but slowly, slowly, Steve’s arms lifted too, wrapping around Sam’s back.

Sam squeezed a little tighter and Steve kept his touch light, another few moments of stiffness before he finally gave in, eyes closing and head tipping to the side, blonde resting exhausted against the side of Sam’s neck.

“You’re gonna be okay,” Sam promised, because he couldn’t give Steve a lot but he could give him that. “We’re all gonna be okay, man.”

A tiny, quiet muffled whimper and Sam swayed them side to side, holding Steve close and trying not to think about how long it must’ve been since Rogers let anybody just hug him.

He would’ve stood there as long as it took, as long as Steve let himself be comforted. If the radio on his belt hadn’t chirped, he would’ve stood there for fucking days.

But it did chirp, and he should’ve thought to silence it but he really had not seen that conversation going this direction so the words over the talkie came through loud and clear.

“Wilson? Did you ever find Rogers? It's important, come in.”

“I don’t have to get that,” Sam started and Steve huffed a weak laugh, clapping Sam once on the shoulder and pulling back, hand wiping over his eyes but he wasn’t standing quite so small anymore, which was at least one good thing.

He kept a watchful eye on Rogers as he unclipped his radio from his belt, lifted it to his mouth and pressed the button.
“Tony, hey, what's--”

Static cut through and his voice was cut off, Tony’s radio overriding his, “Code red, and not as in fire or burn victim or whatever. Not to be dramatic or anything, but get your asses up here now.”

“Well shit.” Sam stared at the little black box for a moment before glancing back at Steve, whose temporary peace was shattered with that same confusion and tension back between his eyebrows. They’d have time to fix that later, right now they had places to be.

He tucked his radio back on his belt, gesturing for the door with his head. “C’mon, we gotta go.”

“What's code red?” Steve demanded, closing the bedroom door back behind them. Sam didn’t bother waiting for the elevator, shoving open the stairwell doors and motioning Steve up first.

“As in red star.” A break, blue eyes wide like a child and he almost couldn't say it, couldn't handle the look on Steve's face. "...Bucky’s contacted somebody.”

~*_~I wanna throw my hands in the air and scream~*_~

The message had said to come alone.

Clint supposed as he dropped from the loading deck of the quinjet and left an army of Avengers inside, this was about as alone someone like them got.

Steve was fidgeting like hell inside the cabin, kept readjusting his seat to get a better view staring out the window. He could just steal Natasha’s seat, but he still couldn’t believe they’d let him come in the first place, he wasn’t gonna blow it because he was impatient.

Couldn't believe Bucky'd sent the tower that note either.

And that he wanted to meet Clint instead of Steve. Why Clint? Or better, why not Steve?

Why here, some abandoned top floor of an old factory building in Queens?

Had Bucky really stayed in New York this whole time?

What did he want?

Was he in there, with Clint, right now?

Waiting for them? This was the closest he'd come to Bucky's location since that night he'd snuck into their apartment and left skid marks on the kitchen floor.

Clint would tell them the moment he saw Bucky, right?

They were all on comms so he’d hear the moment any of the rest of them did, headset over his blonde spikes because he really couldn’t wear his helmet right now. He’d thrown on a leather jacket because it was freezing, but the cold wasn’t why he was shivering. Or tapping his foot impatiently.

It was just. He’d never pictured it going this way. Not that he was complaining, he wanted Bucky back in any way he could fucking get him.
Fuck.

Did he actually just think that out loud? Was that how it was, then? He’d come full circle and now he was admitting it, full out, to himself, in the clearest plainest of words.

He wanted Bucky back.

Jesus Christ, he wanted Bucky back.

The comms crackled and Steve nearly jumped outta his seat, adjusting the big earphones and holding as still as possible while he listened--

“This is Barton, checking in. I’ve reached the main hallway for this floor now. Lots of doors, pretty dark in here. Okay, the door at the end is cracked open, so I’m betting that's the one. Approaching now.”

“Do you see him yet?” Steve leaned sideways in his seat, like that could possibly enlighten him to the inside of the building they were hovering beside.

“No, not yet.” Clint answered patiently, silence filling with distant crackling that was making Steve’s heart race even more.

“Alright, pushing open the door now...It's a big room, steel beams up top. There's a window open, so it's a little breezy. Otherwise pretty empty. No sign of Barnes anywh-- Oh, wait. There's something in the middle of the floor.”

The comm went silent for another couple of seconds and Steve was really damn close to about bouncing out of this seat and running down that hallway himself.

“Huh. Looks like a note. Definitely Sarge’s weirdly nice handwriting. Here, it reads, ‘I said...to come alone...’”

The hell did that mean?

“Shit,” Clint cursed over the line and Steve’d never been more on edge in his life.

“Clint, what? What is it?”

Crackle, crackle--

“Fuck, bomb, bomb, there's a--”

The explosion was louder outside the headphones than over the comms, a single crack before the line went dead and Steve’s heart stopped in his chest the same time the quinjet tipped sideways from where it’d been hovering outside, heat wave rolling and the flash of fire, red orange white outside the window, black smoke curling.

And a single black shape, diving from an open window that was now glass shattering in slow motion above--

Steve couldn’t think, couldn’t breathe, just stared out the window but thankfully everyone else wasn’t shell-shocked into ice and Sam Wilson dove out the back of the quinjet, wings snapping out to catch air and dodge between burning flecks of metal.

It could be Barton or Barnes, the black figure falling, they were too far away to see but Steve couldn’t breathe either way, hand pressed to the glass as Falcon swooped further down down only he wasn’t gonna make it in time, the ground below was too close, the figure in black was moving too fast--

A gloved hand closed around a flailing arm and that should’ve been his first clue to who was falling, but Steve couldn’t process anything but the distant shout of pain, an arm yanked out of socket seconds before the body smashed on the pavement and Sam’d caught him.

Him being a half-exploded, even more deaf Clint, lifted into the quinjet with soot covering half his face, a couple bleeding cuts and an arm cradled to his chest. An extremely worried Natasha, a fretting Tony, silent frozen Steve in his chair, staring at the scene and unable to move, speak, anything.

“Damn your boyfriend ain't messin’ around,” Clint breathed, half a smile on his face as Natasha pressed a worried cloth to his forehead and Sam inspected his arm, but those kind eyes were on Steve and he didn’t even know how, what to say to Clint right now.

But thankfully he didn’t have to, because that never-dying humor turned to Tony next, tired and still light as he offered, “How about everyone listens to Barnes’s requests next time, yeah?”

“There won’t be a next time if you fucking die,” Natasha bit and Steve blinked, trying to figure out how long ago Natasha had stopped being one of his best friends.

“His arm’s gonna be fine but Stark, set a path for the hospital anyways, just in case.”

“How’s the Stark medical team sound?”

“Great, man, whoever can get me doped up on pain meds first-- ow, Nat, chill with the alcohol wipes, would you?”

The white hallways of this ward hadn’t changed the slightest and every time he’d been here it’d been because of Bucky, in one way or another. The last time, Clint had been shot, and now he’d almost been blown to bits and Barton was Bucky’s favorite Avenger.

What was he supposed to do? What was he supposed to do?

A small hand clapped on his shoulder and Steve looked up, half surprised to see Stark still here. It was getting pretty late, just fluorescent lights bathing everything now while Clint slept off the drugs and arm-relocation in the same hospital bed Steve’d stitched Bucky’s bulletwound before he was Bucky again.

“Look, Rogers. Maybe it's a good idea if you stay in the tower for a little while. We’ll set you up in some cozy room, maybe Bruce's floor--”

Bruce’s floor?

“You're gonna quarantine me?” Steve sat up all the way and Tony’s hand froze on shoulder, head shaking too quickly.

“No no, nothing like that. It's for your own safety--”

They were worried about him? Clint Barton was in a hospital bed because Bucky’d almost blown him into a thousand pieces and they were worried about him?

“I'll handle my own safety, thanks.” He knocked Tony’s hand off, glaring with what little residual anger he had left, then he was started for the stairs.
And didn’t quit walking until he found some nondescript hotel that he had enough cash for.

Bought himself a room and trudged up what felt like a thousand more rickety steps. A room in a hotel in New York City and Steve didn’t have it left in him to pity a damn thing.

Just turn out the desk light and lay in the dark until one of the two swallowed him whole.

When he leaned over to flip the killswitch, there was something scrawled on the hotel-issue notepad beside his bed. Numbers, of some kind.

Probably something from the maids, the guy before. How many lives’d passed through this hotel room and how many more after his?

The light clicked off and the pillows collapsed under his head and he could pity them, because he knew just how heavy his head was to carry. Just didn’t wanna carry any of it anymore.

All he wanted to do was stare at the pitch black ceiling, numbers floating through his brain instead of blood and for once, he just wanted sleep.

Wanted it to be tomorrow already. Next year.

Any day but today.

~~Hey! Pick on someone your own size.~~

It wasn’t enough, scrawling numbers on notes to slip on bedside tables. This was still his best friend and Bucky wasn’t done falling yet, apparently, because he was still writing more notes. How many of Steve’s friends would have to die before Steve got the goddamned message?

If Steve ever got the goddamned message.

*I don’t want to remember it all
The promises I made if you just hold on--

Stupid, to close his eyes, let himself drift into wishful sleep now. But nothing else could quiet his goddamned head and he couldn’t damn well catch himself, not if he couldn’t see anything straight anymore. Like his thoracic cavity was constantly being shredded, like the world kept changing goddamned lighting on him all the time.

Blinded by the sun and he couldn’t see out of charred coronas, not without stumbling over his own feet and that’s right, almost stabbing himself in the heart in a fake fight with invisible enemies.

Lovers. God, all he needed was just one glance--

And I just need enough of you to dull the pain

And Steve would come, because he’d been hurting too. That’s what he told himself and that’s why Bucky blinked his eyes open in the dimly lit night, hotel room with three walls, a bed, a door.

A door someone was knocking at. Because see, Steve was just like him, crazy and in love and hurting and knowing he was stupid but showing up anyways.

Just to get me through the night ’til we’re twins again
If it was possible to stop breathing in a dream, he did. Or maybe he stopped breathing in his sleep but either way he’d forgotten he was dreaming by now and really, all that mattered was that Steve Was Here.

It was million miles to the door and he was there in milliseconds, heart pounding as the metal hand reached out, turned the knob. Swung open the door.

Bucky’s lips parted but he didn’t, couldn’t make a sound. Just stared.

Steve, Steve was standing there beautiful and glowing, staring at Bucky with the same wide eyes, shock making his chest breathe too heavy and not at all, blonde so light over the dark roots, the same boy he’d left crying in his sleep on a couch, the same boy who’d left him crying in the rain.

“Is that you?” Steve whispered and Bucky couldn’t take it any longer, Steve was too far away and he was freezing, head to toe over here in the icy cold.

“Steve,” he breathed and Bucky stood there in the doorway, shoulders broader than Steve remembered, unfamiliar muscle bulking his body and his arms that made him want to cry out and beg Buck to tell him what the hell he’d been doing that was so much more important than being found but there was no point, Steve couldn’t control it, it was just a dream.

But god, was he beautiful.

That was the last thing he had the chance to think before Bucky reached across the wooden frame between them, warm fingers curling around Steve’s wrist. He nearly gasped at that touch alone, then Bucky was pulling him forward, stumbling over the threshold and they were kissing, at least one of them was crying--

“God, Bucky, I’m so sorry,” Steve mumbled against his mouth and a rough nip against his lip shut him up, door kicking shut behind them somehow, two hands framing his face, hard curl of fingers against his jaw.

Something was off. Too rough - not that harsh passion from the night he’d broken Steve’s hand, but...darker. Lost.

Couldn’t they at least be goddamned happy in his dreams?

“Bucky--”

“You wanna shut up?” It was practically a growl, teeth scraping as their mouths collided again and he couldn’t remember how he got here, or why he was melting into Bucky’s arms when he should be apologizing more, or screaming at him or something, but--

Suddenly Bucky was scooping him up - fucking literally, metal hand curling under one thigh, strong human on the other and nothing else mattered, not when he swept Steve up off his feet, easy, stronger than Steve ever remembered, so why was he dreaming that way but then those same hands were carrying him across the room, sharp tugging his bottom lip and they were finally the same size, Steve gasped so hard he sucked all the oxygen outta Buck’s lungs too only Bucky didn’t smile or joke about gettin’ dizzy, just squeezed Steve tighter, hands groping up to knead his ass greedily and the air knocked outta him had no fucking chance of returning, ever.

“Buck, Buck, jesus.” He clutched desperately at the strong arms holding him, fingers slipping along the curves of over-defined muscle, grinding his crotch against the hard stomach, thighs squeezing Bucky’s sides that weren’t the soft skin he knew - but the pouty mouth tasted the same, sliding tongue made the same shivers echo down his spine.

The mattress hit his back hard but nothing could stop the sparks running through his spinal cord, arching up against the mouth that followed him down here, hands pressing hard and sliding up over knotted shoulders, slipping into the familiar silky long hair. Even that was longer than he remembered, still soft as it brushed his temples. The scruff on Bucky’s jaw though, he wasn’t used to that, like he hadn’t shaved in weeks, scratching his face raw but Steve could care less.

Reaching, peeling off layers because god, he wanted to kiss every inch of Bucky he could reach,

_Till we're stripped down to our skeletons again_ the shiver that rippled down Steve’s naked spine echoed up through the plates of his metal hand, fingers to his shoulder, making him shudder as he dragged his mouth down Steve’s shiny lips to that sharp jawline.

Rough hands gripped his hair tight, then Steve was tipping Bucky’s head to the side, wet mouthing his neck, sucking on skin and making his head spin, hotel room blinking dizzy and threatening to land him on the mattress beside that blonde head.

Steve held him still and steady, between the heated panting against his ear, fingers digging into his neck, one hand wrapping around his bare waist like it was all he wanted but somehow unfamiliar, like Steve hadn’t taken this body and ripped it in half dozens of times.

_Till we're saints just swimming in our sins again_

Something like a fever, heat of skin on skin as the room spun, colors shot more contrasted, Steve’s hands on his body swam in and outta focus, disorientation as that wet mouth slid over his collarbone, down his chest, peppered over bruised ribs.

The ceiling rolled into sight and Steve pressed him hard into the mattress, tracing muscle with rough fingers, slick tongue, squeezing Bucky’s arms, hips, thighs.

“I love you, I love you,” Steve was murmuring and Bucky would do about anything to turn off Steve’s stupid mouth but he’d never known how, never once known how.

Soft hands turned into cat claws, digging hard into the flesh of his thighs, a deep anguished sound and Bucky’s human hand found the back of Steve’s head, metal grabbing the hotelbed’s headrest just in time for that wet mouth to close around the erection dampening his stomach.

Another gasp, lifting his head and blue eyes flicked up, hair disheveled and jaw bruised, although Bucky couldn't remember why Steve’s jaw would be bruised.

Just the right bluepurple to match his eyes, too goddamned beautiful to look at Bucky collapsed back down to the mattress, eyes shut tight and lips parted around a moan.

_And there's a jet black crow droning on and on and on_

He raced his fingers up Bucky’s sides, eyes closing to focus on the heated, salty taste on his tongue, the pulse and texture as he lowered further, waves of Bucky’s taste, smell, warmth crashing over him and making him shudder, dig his fingers in hard across the lines of padded ribs.
“C’mon, c’mon,” Bucky moaned again, fingers tightening on his neck, hauling him up and the next thing he knew they were kissing again, Bucky’s tongue in his mouth and a metal hand around his cock.

Everything was warm, sparkling and swirling and it all started coming in flashes, golden skin and dark hair and the press of lips bitten raw, soft calls of his name, slick slide and encompassing heat--

Up above our heads droning on and on and on “Ah, ah, ah,” Bucky chanted, rocking beneath him and Steve kissed the hollow of his throat, making Buck bare his teeth, fingers tightening on Steve’s ribs, matching bruises for them both this time.

Flash and Bucky was in his lap, shuddering and sliding against his chest, clawing Steve’s shoulderblades with sharp metal, head tipped back and blue eyes blown wide and dark, sweat racing down the center of Steve’s chest, skin so slick it could be blood, black at the edges of his eyes instead of red. A hard hand between all that defined muscle, shoving Steve onto his back, blonde tipping back with that sound that sent shivers down Bucky’s spine, thighs tightening around Steve’s hips as he lifted up and rocked back down, strands of wet hair flying in his face and Jesus Christ, that’s why he usually tied his hair up to ride Steve.

Only there was no usual anymore, only dreams and Steve’s hands digging bruises into his flexed thighs were a welcome distraction, slipping back into the rough drag of their bodies together, the quiet deep sounds rumbling outta Steve’s chest, painted gold instead of silver in the glittery moonlight because the moon only knew how to reflect off the sun.

“Fuck, I miss you,” his throat choked and dear god, he did not mean to say that out loud only Steve’s eyes were locked on him now, watering up like rainy skies.

Keep making trouble 'till you find what you love

“I can’t keep crr-- crying over you,” Steve swore, low, and it felt a hell of a lot more like it was directed to him instead of Bucky. “Broke both’a hearts.”

“Ahh-ah mmm, yes. Yes you did,” Bucky panted, sliding both hands up Steve’s chest, planting one right in the center, five fingers out in a star. “W-we did.”

I need a new partner in crime and you shrug

Bucky’s mouth was bitter on his that time, wetter than it should’ve been and it was no use seeing which one of them broke, the salt was unmistakable and it belonged to them both anyways.

Strong artist hands rolled their bodies together faster and faster and Bucky shuddered, crying out into Steve’s mouth, body locking up and muscles crashing down, twin skeletons shuddering and falling apart at the same time in a tangled pile of breaking bones.

Bones laced in sweaty sticky muscle, pulsing heartbeats and hands in fists, Steve’s ankles around Bucky’s shins, thighs pressed together, foreheads touching, skulls tipped together in eternity.

He could feel the expansion, contraction of Bucky’s throat as he swallowed, chests knocking from twin lungs, filled with fire instead of ice and it didn’t burn any less.

The words painted right on his lips, crystal and red, metal star burning imprints into his own,

“I didn’t win the war til you got there,” Bucky breathed, swallowing again and Steve squeezed black hair tighter, sweat and silk impossible to grip and Buck was already slipping away from him, mouth dry as deserts they never fought in. “Didn’t win the war at all.”

Steve’s eyes were closed and he could still feel the tracks down Bucky’s face, tear tracks and train tracks and mixtape tracks and it all broke at the same moment, he could physically feel the moment Bucky’s muscles retracted from his own, began to pull away.

“Don't leave me,” Steve gasped, shrunk two sizes in Bucky’s arms, on his deathbed and his boy was just marching for the rickety train-shaped door, army hat on sideways and an entire lifetime left behind in the snow.

He knew it. He fucking knew it had to be a nightmare.

“You're the one who told me to leave,” Bucky reminded him, you shipping out?, scooping his clothes off the floor. Steve was suddenly terribly awful cold, shivering and small as he wrapped himself up in Bucky’s sheet, stumbling as barefeet fell to the ground below.

“I take it back,” he insisted, tripping on white sheets again as he tried to follow Bucky around the room, black tshirt thrown over messy hair, black combat pants zipped. A single half-amused glance thrown over his shoulder, almost looking young again with his hair slicked back, a single short strand curling over his forehead.

“No, you don't. You don't take back anything, Rogers.” Bucky straightened up, turning his way and lifting his metal hand up in a stupid fucking salute.

“Buck,” Steve tried, only he was frozen in place, plane cockpit flashing around him and every choice he’d ever made wrong, he’d never deserved a second chance in the first place.

Bucky just marched to the window, glass shining like the windshield that’d exploded inward on the crash, like the glass shards on their kitchen floor after some fight, like the glass of those crystal eyes glancing at his from the next barstool over.

Window pried open and the muted city crashed inside, car horn blaring and night lights of the Brooklyn skyline twinkling in the distance.

Black boots stepping up on the ledge and Steve stood there in the middle of the room, disarrayed soft blonde over pale-gold skin, wide watery blue eyes and that long white sheet blowing in the wind like angel wings and Bucky paused, one final promise to break on his lips before he slipped away.

“I loved you first,” he whispered into the wind, then he dropped.

He dropped and Bucky was falling,

falling,

jolt

and he woke, woke falling with his eyes snapping open and the cold air hitting him like a faceful of snow, only he wasn’t in his fucking bed, he was falling.

Metal darted out on instinct, caught the window ledge as fast as it took for his mouth to open and scream.

Only he didn’t, he couldn’t scream, not when the only thing terrifying left was him-fucking-self and it was super difficult to scream when you couldn’t breathe.
Jesus christ, he couldn’t breathe. His heart was pounding outta his goddamn chest, so loud he couldn’t hear anything but that, couldn’t see anything but the forty foot drop below him, couldn’t feel anything but the cold wind and the pressure of the window ledge bending slightly under his curled metal fingers.

He’d...dear god, he’d jumped out the window in his fucking sleep.

Was it a night terror? Or did the nightmare just make him--

Bucky choked on his next inhale, but at least he was inhaling now. He could’ve died. He could’ve fucking died, what if he’d woken a single second later--

A door slammed.

Bucky’s head snapped up, staring at the open window he’d just fallen from.

That was the door to his hotel room, that’d just slammed.

Was someone in his fucking room?

He took a moment to compose himself a little more, finally sucking in a functional breath, chest expanding. Fuck, he ached. Everywhere, all over, his entire body felt like it’d been turned inside out. He hadn’t been keeping track of his bruises or injuries and dear god, it was all catching up to him now, hanging from this fucking ledge. He really ought to climb back up into his room, deal with that intruder.

Only. Only when he pulled himself up on the ledge, his room was empty.

The bed was destroyed, pillows and sheets dislodged, thrown haphazardly across the room. Great, he must’ve been lashing in his sleep again.

And he was losing his mind. That couldn’t’ve been the door, no one was in here.

Carefully lowered the window behind him, locked the latch secure. Not like that’d stop him apparently.

Fuck. Fuck, it’d been bad enough he’d jumped out a fucking window--

His heart was still pounding, life flashing before his eyes. The life he’d almost lost. Fuck, Steve was gonna follow him around forever and Bucky was gonna off himself one’a these days and he couldn’t do that to either of them.

A simple message wasn’t gonna do anything, was it?

It’d have to be a lot worse than words if he was gonna make Steve hate him.

And even if he did?

That wasn’t gonna be enough, was it? It was never gonna be enough to have Steve stop looking for him.

Bucky’d have to stop looking too.

He’d have to stop looking for good.
He startled awake to the shrill sound of a phone ringing.

It took him a couple seconds to figure out where he was, shivering cold, soaking wet curled naked in the bottom of a hotel shower but he didn’t have time to think about that, or the reason he was there aka that fucking nightmare--

Just had to dive across slippery tile, grabbed his phone outta his bag just in time to catch Sam’s number.

“Hello?” Breathless and goddamn, he sounded more wrecked than he felt.

Actually, check that. Holy fuck, he was sore. Muscles aching, chest kinda felt like it’d been ripped into ribbons in the night. And there were bruises, on his ribs, what the fuck--

“Hey, man, Barnes got in contact again. You wanna meet us at the tower? It's Tony he wants to talk to this time.”

Bucky?

Again? Tony? What the fuck?

“Yeah, okay, I'm on my way.” He dug around in his bag, looking for something decent to wear that wasn’t tight enough to squeeze all his goddamned bruises. “What time?”

“They’re supposed to meet half an hour from now.”

“Shit. Yeah, I'll be there soon.”

He tossed down the phone, tossed a shirt over his head and cursed his wet hair, hopping into a pair of pants before grabbing his bag and bolting out the door, never stopping to check the note on the bedside table.

Pepper didn’t like it, Natasha didn’t like it, Maria didn’t like it. Clint and Sam were for it and he’d never been great at listening to the right people anyways, so Tony went alone.

Entirely alone.

Drove the same red convertible he’d taken to pick up Barnes the first time, could still remember being thrown across Steve’s tinyass old kitchen and nearly breaking his arm. But what a friendship had formed.

Okay, maybe not friendship, but goddammit they’d gotten along once. Him and Barnes, they’d had a thing, some sort of mutual understanding that ran a lot deeper than genius flying cars.

Still regretted telling Barnes he was the right thing for Steve though. That damn Fall Out Boy song.
In the end I’d do it all again. Just so long as this meeting didn’t end the way Barton’s had, they’d be fine.

Although stepping into the building that looked eerily similar to the one that’d blown up, all metal rafters and graffitied walls, he wouldn’t exactly say confident was the right word for what he was feeling.

Probably not even the right word for the way he was acting, for once.

He’d just prefer not to get blown up, was all.

He’d make some joke about the things he did for Steve Rogers, but this wasn’t for Steve. This wasn’t even for the memories his dad told of Sergeant James Barnes.

This was for Bucky.

“Hello?” Tony called, a bit trepidatiously, taking a cautious step on a leather-shoed heel into the creepy echoing room. Another step, echoing slightly, and this room looked as empty as Clint’s, except there thankfully didn’t appear to be a note with a bomb under it.

Didn’t appear to be anything, though, especially not missing ex-fiancés--

“Put on your warpaint,” a low voice drewled and Tony jumped, spinning around only nothing was there, the room was empty but it’d definitely come from in here. Words kinda muffled but entirely sans accent, the purest version of each syllable locked behind that strange filter sound.

“Barnes?” Tony called again, taking a second glance at the walls. None of them appeared to be secret doors from here, but without Jarvis - he wasn’t taking any chances on the “come alone” scheme - there really was no way to tell.

That voice had to come from somewhere--

“Bring home the boys and scrap scrap metal the tanks...I tried to convince Steve to pick up scrap metal once, instead of joining a goddamned war.” A pitched hum, vibrating in the air with its echo, voice lilting almost…amused. “It didn’t go so well.”

He’d never had a clearer picture from just a tone of voice before, but it was so animated. Like curling smoke, the flickering tongue of a smiling snake. The underground villain’s final speech from the shadows before he burst out in that terrible disney green, shadow elongated and manic laughter ech-ech-echoing.

And for once, he really didn’t have anything to say to that. The great Tony Stark was silenced.

But the paranoid genius, he finally got his head on straight enough to figure out where the voice was coming from.

Bucky Barnes was sprawled in the rafters, propped up on one in the shadows, leaning back against another in the darkness. One knee up, the other leg stretched long, the way it always used to be, in Steve's space. Braced against a metal pipe like it was some luscious tree in the dappled sun of a European forest.

Only he didn’t look rugged and comfortable like that prized sketch Hydra burned.

He looked like the Devil.
“You remember that Fall Out Boy competition? Back in the...good old days.” The dark head rolled, eyes flashing at his only the sharp reflection wasn’t human and those weren’t eyes, they were pitch black goggles.

Over a pitch black mask, long hair ragged and hanging in strands over the void of a face.

Like he said, the devil.

“I gotta say, how come no one brought up The Phhoenix?” A black finger lifted in the air, gloves disappearing underneath tight black sleeves, midnight armor coating every inch of skin but the strip on his forehead, tipping towards Tony at the same time as the finger, lazy sideways point, “Let me guess. No one wanted to admit the Vintage. Misery.”

Tony cleared his throat, reminding himself to breathe in the face of the demon up in the rafters. He was just sprawled, talking, so lazy like they were such good friends, all those sing-song words drifting in the air and setting every inch of his skin on tingling edge.

“It did look better on me, by the way,” he pointed out, black finger aimed at the strapped-up black chest, lunatic with fangs and reign of the shadows.

He didn’t need Jarvis here to blare warning alarms, his head and pounding heart were doing that fine for himself.

“You gotta say it fits,” the devil in the rafters cajoled, head tipping back to look at the ceiling, black glove spreading fingers to up like an artist painting death into graffitied sheet metal. “Jack’o’lanterns in July, setting fire to the sky?”

A nursery rhyme and chills went down his spine at fire, the rough dirt rubbed into it, the first grit of an accent, Russian tainting the word a drop dirtier, a gallon more threatening then it was right back to pure syllables, clear cutting constants.

“Or maybe it was the line I’m gonna change you. Because that’s what you all secretly were dying for, right?” The bright smile was audible, wolf teeth bared and beaming on dying and Tony would give about anything to go back in time and take it back, refuse the fucking meet because he wasn’t making it outta this alive, was he?

“To change me...I'll bet anything,” midnight devil paused, tipping his head knowingly as the black finger lifted again, only it was pointed at him this time and Tony’d been praying to the God he hadn’t prayed to in decades Bucky’d forgotten he was here or something only now that black leather was aimed at him and it was worse than staring into any muzzle he’d had pointed at his face.

“--you thought of that song first, didn't you. Didn't you!” Amused again and it took everything he had to swallow, to recognize that he had anything left in his body that wasn’t the screaming instinct of run.

Just paint on the confidence, the same way Bucky was dripping with black paint, he could put up a mask too. Might not have redgold to protect him but he could pretend, if it kept him alive. Survival, he was good at. Even if the Winter Soldier was better at the anti-survival thing.

He took a single step forward, hands crossed behind his back and a nonchalant tip of his head, voice a bit too scratched up to sell it but there was a chance Barnes wouldn’t pick up on it from up there in the dark.

“It might’ve crossed my mind.”
He couldn’t see under the sharp angled glass but he knew a single eyebrow arched anyway, made it even worse, knowing exactly what he looked like under the mask but being unable to picture anything but that terrifying black void of a stare, hearing every expression in the sharp exaggerations of Bucky’s carefully stabbing words.

“So, really...the whole world will write down The Kids Aren’t Alright as the theme song of this lovely tragedy but all along, it was The Phoenix, wasn’t it? And you, you knew that.” A tut-tutting sound, finger shaking at him once and Tony didn’t mean to flinch but he also didn’t mean to walk into a goddamned death trap.

“Yeah. I did.” Tony lifted his chin, everything he had not to let his voice shake. “But I didn't bring it up because I'm not a dick.”

A short burst of laughter, grating like birds dying, almost perfectly timed enough to’ve been instinctual but he wasn’t stupid, creatures like that didn’t have instincts that didn’t include knives.

Speaking of which.

The laughter died as instantly as it began, all the air in the room chilling and sucking into shadows as Bucky’s focus shifted back from Tony to himself, heavy poisonous silence filling the space the laughter’d cut into the walls, black seeping around his feet and he was shivering again but it was just the cold, he had to tell himself it was just the cold.

Strands of dark brown fell over the black face as it tipped curiously to the side, watching broken shards of shield as they lifted from out of sight, glinting by the thousands as they shifted, metal plates rippling in the dim light like a thousand knives only, well, deadlier.

“I'm disappearing, for good,” Bucky told him, blades of fingers curling and uncurling slowly. “Don't let him look for me.”

Personally, he’d take Barton’s bomb over this. Yeah, he’d definitely take jumping out a window and getting his arm dislocated over this talk, with this demon. He had enough of his goddamned own, he couldn’t handle Steve’s.

And frankly, Steve’s were a hell of a lot scarier and came with alot more knives than his did.

“I can't stop him.” He was already cringing at the idea of telling Bucky no right now, but it was true. He was no closer to stopping Steve than he was to stopping the goddamned devil himself, believe me, he was frozen in fucking place.

“You haven't been doing much have you?” Bucky mused darkly, metal plates compressing with this horrific whirr, curling into a tight fist and Tony couldn’t believe he’d once worked on that thing, tinkering with the very weapon that looked near as ready to kill him as its master. “Where was Steve last night?”

Now that it was questions instead of that freaky-as-fuck monologue, the dry cotton in his mouth was letting him speak, because it kinda felt like it was that or….some really terrible fate he didn’t wanna think about.

“I have no idea. We can't keep track of him, he's... losing his mind chasing you all over.” Bucky didn’t make a sound and that couldn’t be a good sign but none of this was good, none of it. How long’d Barnes been this way, all hyped up and terrifying again? When had he turned dark? The moment they broke up? Was this what Steve would always chase, no matter what Bucky did? “You know him. You know that.”
“He’ll give up. He will. You’re all quite good at making him complacent.” Popped the T, little shake of the dark head, ragged hair cascading around his face like snakes. Metal fingers tracing along a pole overhead, horrifying screech bouncing off decaying walls. “Lit-tle soldier boy…”

Tony’d flinched hard at the sound, shoulders curled. The scraping fingers turned into tapping ones, little bullet sounds in intervals of four, k-k-k-k, k-k-k-k, impatient and drilling right into his skull.

Forced himself to take a deep breath, running through every anxiety-attack saver that stupid psychiatrist pestered him with. It was all intimidation tactics, right? Bucky wouldn’t actually hurt him. He’d left that window open for Clint to dive outta, he was never planning to hurt his team, right?

This was about Steve, they weren’t targets. Even. If he’d said you’re all quite good at making him complacent.

He swallowed tightly, blinking too fast, one finger loosening his collar. Shit, he was wearing a tshirt, there was no collar to loosen.

“You blame this. On us?” He finally managed, barely resisting the urge to put a hand over the glowing triangle in his chest. Just needed to make some adjustments in the wiring, keep himself from suffocating--

The rafter creaked, loud, and he almost jumped outta his skin, eyes darting upward again, catching on the black movement of shadows absorbing, silent muscle shifting as the temperature of the room dropped another ten degrees.

“Wouldn’t that be nice,” Bucky hissed, all the teasing lightness gone, words dark and dead-serious in every sense of the word, nonchalant lean sliding smoothly into a crouch, one knee still up and the other long. It wasn’t spiderlike, although he’d seen Nat crouch like that before.

On Barnes, the Winter Soldier, it almost reminded him of...Halloween. The last room of the haunted house, lights all going red with a bang, room shut black except the ledge, up high, whatever creepy soul donned themself in face paint and curling red horns, eyes glowing and smoke curling up, forked tail and all.

Now picture it faceless. In all black. And actually deadly enough to drag down half the world to hell.

“I ripped through twelve innocent men yesterday--” hissing mixed with violent constants, violent hands and violent hearts and apparently he’d been wrong. Barnes had no trouble killing. Barnes had...no trouble killing. “--before I almost blew up your Precious Agent Barton. Easy as slicing. butter.”

Glinting fingers grated along the rafter beneath poised feet, carving shiny metal steaks in the old beams, demon claws releasing with a latched pop, wrist twisting, metal plates across fingers compressing, turning over and suddenly something else was glinting in that hand, hellofalot sharper blade flipping through those fingers, knife twirling and twirling, black face cocking to the side, watching the knife in his hand curiously.

Flip glint flip spin flash, lilted voice lifting in that sweet, pretty sing-song voice, more pitched and honey’d than every other echoing word, “I warned hi-im. I warned you aaa-aall.”

He had. He had and they'd all told Bucky it'd be okay, he just had to trust, open his heart.

If this was what the inside of the century old rotting heart looked like, they really should've locked it in a Bruce-securitied box and thrown the key away.
But they didn't. Because they'd all been so sure Barnes’ core was gold as Rogers’.

Or maybe…

Maybe it was all smoke and mirrors. Maybe this was some elaborate plan with good intentions at the end. Maybe Bucky was doing, saying anything to scare him.

After all, if there'd been some sorta slaughter yesterday, wouldn't he’ve heard about it?

What if this was all just part of the painted mask?

“Bucky--” Tony started and that was as far as he got before the idea of underlying good got shot to the ground, so quick he could see it still bleeding out.

“You're the last person to ever call me that,” Barnes pondered thoughtfully, metal hand latching onto the rafter tight enough to make it groan, creak and compress. Voice lifting light again, some mix between contemplative and the Cheshire smile draining all the convicted confidence from Tony’s spine. “Congratulations. I aught to cut out your tongue.”

The movement came so fast he almost missed it, metal grip tight as strong black legs lept backwards, rafter shaking and all but collapsing as the black devil swung gracefully, invisible black wings gliding black armor silently to the ground, boots touching down like drifting raven feathers.

Crouched a single moment to absorb the impact then the Winter Soldier unfolded, straightening up tall and he took it all back, the massacre Bucky boasted definitely happened and he never heard about it because when the Winter Soldier wanted something dead, no one found the bodies unless it wanted them to.

He could see that much alone in the eyes that weren't eyes, sharp-angled goggles staring so much worse from down here and Tony'd swear even the shadows were shrinking back in fear.

Then the monster was stalking towards him and there was no way the arc reactor would keep his heart from stopping this time.

He stumbled back a few steps but he'd never move fast enough, could never outrun those legs that could squeeze the life outta him in seconds.

The gloved hand lifted and he’d swear his life flashed before his eyes only Bucky wasn't throwing knives - fingers closing around pointed black plastic and he ripped the goggles off his face in one swift motion, tossed to the ground and crushed instantly under boot soles, plastic snapping, mangled amongst glass shards and Tony stared at the broken goggles a moment too long because the next thing he knew there was a metal hand around his throat, lifting him an inch off the ground.

Garbled sound caught behind the crushing metal and Tony’s eyes bugged outta his head, feet kicking uselessly and both hands squabbling at the unpryable wrist. He took it back, he took it all back, he should’ve never fucking come in here without the suit and a goddamned army.

Just when the choking was starting to turn him from red to blue, metal fingers clicked and dropped him, feet barely catching his weight as he gasped, ragged and broken all over on the inside, vision swimming and chest pounding dangerously--

Only dangerous wasn't done with him yet, black glove grabbing a handful of hair, yanking his head back so suddenly Tony thought for a moment his neck must’ve cracked.

Then there was a knife jammed against his throat and he was very much not dead.
Neither were the eyes he finally blinked up to see.

Sharp furrowed lines between eyebrows and he’d never seen Barnes look so pissed, lines crinkling over the top of that black face mask, long hair blown back from the Power Walk of Death over here, clearing the perfect view to those familiar eyes.

Except there was nothing familiar in the cold crystals, the color of glaciers slicing holes in mountains, intensity cutting right down into his soul.

He was pretty sure he could be Steve Rogers and stare this close at those crazy eyes and not recognize Bucky Barnes right now. Because it wasn’t. Not anymore.

The blade against his throat pressed a little closer, rough hold on his head giving him absolutely no room to move. Bucky moved easy though, adjusting his footing, shoulders rolling and head tipping, something like a winding snake, sliding bloody through ice shards instead of soft grass. To imagine those same eyes once glittered fondly at them all from the shotgun seat of a hippie van--

It was machine guns now, ice drilling deep enough into his soul to make his fingers start to go numb.

“Cut out your tongue…” Bucky repeated distantly, gloved thumb digging into the back of his neck, immobilizing any sound he could possibly make. From this close, the filter over his mouth sounded even creepier, the clicking jaw right here without any of the movement, just the flashing stelliferous eyes.

“Or I could slice your throat,” he offered, eyebrow raising amusedly as he tipped even closer, near enough to whisper, still animated nine ways to hell. “Do the world a real favor.”

Focus narrowing down to the dagger edging his skin and he could feel the exact moment steel split the first layer of stratified epithelium cells, pain lacing up his senses as blood welled up on the silver of the knife, pooling and starting to drip red down his throat.

A fascinated sound behind the grated void, crystal flicking from Tony’s wide, terrified eyes to the slit in his throat and Bucky pressed the blade in deeper.

It was more fear than pain now, fear that Barnes would get bored and just press another inch, be done with it. Or worse, he’d get interested, start trailing that knife over more skin, carving him open one careful vein at a time--

Another splay of blood and Tony started choking, coughing on the blood in his esophagus, painting the backs of his teeth red as his vision spotted out black and stop.

The knife was suddenly gone, hand on the back of his head gone. A silent step backwards, drawing the blade away from his throat with this bored look, voice dropping flat,

“But I still need you to deliver the message.”

A desperate hand grabbed his neck, blood squenching through his fingers and brain rushing light-headed. He was gonna die, he was honestly going to die here, bleed out at the feet of this fucking lunatic--

His free hand fumbled for a wall, holding himself upright as his legs drained weaker, palm barely holding in the red pooling, the choking opening, coated copper over his tongue. His eyes kept jumping in and outta focus but he could at least see midnight demon every few seconds,

Standing a few feet off, twirling his knife between metal fingers. Tony’s blood splattering red drops between straps on that black vest, over the floor. The walls.

“Chain him up if you have to.” The dark voice sounded so far away, floating over him like rolling poison gas, smoke over burning fires. “Well, you won't have to. He's gone.”

A flick of red landed at his feet, drawing his eyes down a moment and there was a puddle, a puddle he was still dripping blood into--

“But make sure he knows.”

The little puddle splashed, a black boot smushing it to splatter and Tony couldn’t quite breathe but his lungs tried pumping faster anyways, heart racing so fast in his chest he might not be able to hear the next words because Bucky was right there, standing close and in his space again and if he wanted to live he had to look up, stare at those harsh, dead eyes again or Bucky’d let him bleed out before he ever finished talking.

The knife was dangling from the tips of two black fingers, the way people held dead mice like it was some disgusting thing he couldn’t be bothered with anymore, cutting Crystal of Terror close enough to count the shards inside.

A whisper curling out from behind those little black holes like smoke through a vent and he could just picture the sharp smile under the void and he thought nightmares of sending a nuke to space were gonna keep him up for the rest of his life, he was very very wrong.

“I'm nothing--” A pause, crushing silence filled with quiet choking sounds and there was something under the icy blues, black dripping in with red, shambles ripped somewhere deep enough he could barely see anything else.

“...but a ghost story,” Bucky finished and Tony gagged, blood splattering over his lips, Bucky’s collarbone. The Winter Soldier barely noticed, glancing at him once more, words twisting with this dead-final kind of sorrow and he wasn’t talking to Tony anymore, he was talking straight through him, message to the other blue eyed boy who wasn’t here. Would never be here.

Dropped, clipped, whisper. “End of the line.”

Something black slipped from gloved fingers, smacking the ground and instantly spewing smoke.

The clatter of the knife dropping to concrete and Tony flinched away from the sound, from the smoke. Blinked his eyes back open to make sure that was all of it, that Bucky could let him fucking go now.

Only the warehouse was empty. Smoke snaking around his feet, then his knees as he collapsed to the ground, and the warehouse was devastatingly, echoing empty.

~~~

He couldn’t be the winter soldier with the hope of Steve coming back and forgiving him, he couldn’t.

Couldn’t just make Steve hate him.

Bucky had to make him hate himself.
The last time he’d been in a real hospital, he’d found Bucky collapsed against a wall, huddled on the ground like the world was spinning and he’d never find his balance again.

Only now it was Steve holding himself up against the too-white walls, every panicked nurse rushing by in scrubs some ghost of his mom but no real ghosts to save him.

No one here to crouch beside him, whisper all the right things he needed to hear, the way he’d whispered them for Bucky.

Buck couldn’t be here to save him from this because one of Steve’s best friends was dying and Bucky’d been the one who put the knife in his throat.

What he’d give to go back to the simple pain of that day, the day Bucky told him he'd asked Hydra to wipe him. To spare the pain.

To turn it off. For good.

Only the pain for Steve was getting worse and worse and Buck'd almost killed Tony and seeing Stark hooked up to all those machines, glowing arc reactor in his chest flickering every few moments, it was two generations of Stark's he'd failed, two generations of families he'd let get ripped apart.

Everything was ripping apart.

“How’d the Doc say it’s looking?” Barton whispered, turning to Natasha with a wince. She was staring blankly at the window into Stark’s room, frozen. Hadn’t heard a word he said. Which was at least better than Pepper and her tear-streaked face, squeezing Tony’s pale hand so tight he was wincing from this side of the window.

He tapped Tasha gently with the hand that wasn’t pinned in a sling, red hair swinging as she whipped her head to look at him, softened just a touch when she realized who it was.

“He should live. Unless anything goes horribly wrong, he’ll live.” The sharp gaze turned back to the hospital window, blinking machines reflecting off soft white skin. Pale lips parted, shock and guilt coloring her usually bright voice. “This never should’ve happened.”

“It’s not your fault,” another soft voice interjected and they both turned their heads to see Sam, straightening up from where he’d been trying to talk to a silent Steve.

“How’s Rogers?” Clint asked quietly, glancing over Natasha’s shoulder at the Captain curled against the wall, shaking hands wrapped around his knees.

“Not doing so hot.” Sam leaned one shoulder on the wall, mouth sideways in a grimace as he opened his mouth to elaborate.

Clint’s pocket vibrated and he excused himself, taking a couple steps further down the hallway, pulling out his phone to see Maria Hill’s caller ID. The hell did Maria need right now?

“I don’t think I’ve ever seen him this bad,” Sam was saying, both him and Nat looking over at the totally oblivious Rogers. Clint walked numbly closer, phone still to his ear.

“What would Steve do if Bucky actually killed someone he cares about?” Natasha’s arms crossed tighter over her chest and Clint blinked, twice, tried to figure out how to speak.

Slowly closed his phone, staring at the little device in his hands, voice finally cracking over a whisper.

“We’re about to find out.” Two heads turned sharply towards him and Clint just kept staring at his phone. As if he could ever ever unhear the news he just got. The worst news he’d probably ever deliver in his entire life. Swallow, fingers curling over the little black device, sounding about as hollow as his insides felt. “Peggy Carter is dead.”

~~~

_A birth and a death on the same day--_

He considered doing it the old fashioned way. Checking in at the front desk, letting the nice lady in scrubs lead him up to the right floor. Open up the door, cheery voice announcing him, probably the last person alive to talk about him in that tone.

“Ms. Carter, you have a visitor!”

Only. He couldn’t handle the horror that nurse would go through, knowing she lead him up the stairs, into that room. Besides, civilian clothes would be a hassle. It was easier to stay in the mask, slip through the growing shadows of dusk, sneak up to the window he knew was hers.

The last time he’d visited Peg, she’d told him he should tell Steve everything. That she wanted them to be together.

"I couldn't be happier it was you though, James. No one in this world deserves to be with him as much as you do."

Would she be shocked at how very wrong she was? Because she was. He didn’t deserve to be with Steve. Not this monster he’d become.

They’d been planning a trip up here. Him and Steve, to come visit Peg. The two of them, when they were happy. Announce their engagement, get twin hugs from the only one who’d known all along. Fucking thank her.

What kind of thank you was this?

Bucky straightened his mask, springing off the ground and latching onto the first jutting brick. It was dark enough, on this side of the building and Peg had a corner room, he just had to swing around to her windowsill once he got high enough.

The last time he’d been here.

She’s been so sure in him. But she never knew him that well, did she?
Well enough to call him out on his feelings before he could.

Bucky shook his head, hair flopping in his vision, tossed back outta it. He wasn’t that scared young man anymore. He wasn’t that foolish army boy despairingly in love with his best friend.

He was the ghost story who slit the throats of billionaires to deliver a message.

Deliver a message. This one, this one’d be loud and clear. One more floor up--

“You told me you loved him first,” Peggy’s voice croaked in his head, the only message that’d mattered for the longest time. The words he’d given away, let stab him in the heart. The words that started and ended it all.

Ended, because it was over, there was no going back.

“...and now you get to love him last.”

The metal hand froze on the windowsill.

Dear god, Peggy’d given him everything. She’d given him everything, kept all of his secrets for an entire lifetime, and this was how he repaid her?

He could leave. He didn’t have to do this. It wasn’t too late, he could just drop from here, leave DC, go onto the next stage without--

No. It had to come full circle. It had to be bad enough that he wouldn’t chicken out last second in that chair. He couldn’t change his mind, and this was the only way to make sure he wouldn’t. It had to be this. It had to.

Bucky hauled himself through the window.

The room was taupe, decorated just the same as the last time he’d been, giant curtains framing the windowpane, a collection of photographs, books, letters, reading glasses one wooden bedside table. Pill bottles, decorated lamp, box of tissues, a painting on the other. The white pillows, so many of them, propping the frail frail body up in the sheets, thin old arms over the top of soft light brown sheets.

But this time, there was an IV hooked up to one of those arms, needle and tape stuck in at the elbow, contrasting so sharp and harsh on the weathered, once so beautiful and strong.

Peg still was beautiful, ‘specially for an old gal, gray hair fanned out on the pillow around her, just as many laughter lines as stress ones creasing her face, even with those fiery brown eyes shut.

The water cart, with the pitcher and glasses, was right by his foot, he could tap it and send it crashing into a wall. But he didn’t, he just sat in the window, waited for those Agent instincts to kick in, brown eyes to blink open.

He didn’t have to wait long.

The heart monitor beside her bed, beeping softly, increased just a touch, fingers twitching. Stirring, then those long eyelashes were fluttering and Peggy Carter opened her eyes to the all black figure sitting in her window.

He’d taken off the mask already, sat it on the ground by his foot. Didn’t have the heart to do this in Didn’t have the heart to do this at all.

Confusion furrowed first, and for a moment it looked like she might not recognize him at all. Dear lord, that would make this easy.

So would killing her in her sleep, but he couldn’t do that. A woman like Peggy Carter didn’t get murdered without knowing exactly who killed her and why.

But then the confusion lifted, eyes widening and bright, happy to see him, then furrowing again as looked around the room, realized he was alone. That something was wrong.

She always was too bright for her own good.

A single shaky hand lifted, moving like it was made of sandbags instead of frail bones and skin, pulled all the way up to her face, thumb and pinky extended, fingers curled against her chin.

Oh. That was sign language. What’s wrong.

Fuck. What a question.

Bucky smiled softly, gazing off across her room. It was cozy in here. Not too bad of a place to die.

Better than his, he was sure.

“We had everything,” Bucky told her softly, wishing that was enough to describe the laughter, the light in Steve’s eyes, the warmth of their family in the day and hot kisses pressed down his spine at night, the world conquered and every fight won, for however brief it was, for however tiny and brief it really was.

He lifted one shoulder, wishing he knew how to do this without shrugging but he wasn’t there, wasn’t full under, not yet. Needed this, needed to cut this final tie. The thing that’d make him Not Bucky Barnes anymore.

Because he couldn’t be Bucky Barnes, not when that meant being ripped in half, hole in his chest, a life without sunlight or warmth because the summer’d cast him aside. The shrug wasn’t loud enough to say that either, words could never be loud enough.

“I wasn’t good enough.”

The sound behind those pale lips was the closest thing he’d ever heard to audible heartbreak.

He’d never seen those big brown eyes look so miserably wretched before, watering up all awful and Bucky couldn’t stand that, couldn’t stand to perch there in the window while Peggy cried over the disaster the two’ve them made of each other’s hearts.

Bucky swooped down from the window, falling to his knees beside her bed, taking that shaky hand in his and hating himself more every breath he kept breathing but he had to explain, she had to understand, she’d always known him, known him in the way Steve never understood, the only person in his entire life who’d seen through every mask he’d ever put up she was so fucking clever and how fucked up was it that it was his best guy’s best girl he owed his entire existence to?

“I told you,” Bucky rushed, before she opened her mouth to croak something calming, to ruin him all over again. “I told you he deserved better. He finally figured that out. Steve Rogers finally saw his value, everything he’d ever tried to prove and I just can’t fit in that picture and god, P-Peggy, I can’t b-breathe with. without him.”
Mouth snapped shut before he could start blubbering, eyes watering just as much as hers, heart pounding twice as fast if that beep beep beeping monitor was telling the goddamned truth. He had to suck in a few breaths, look up at the sky and blink, world spinning so fast he’d crush the bones in that fragile hand if he weren’t careful.

“B-B--” she started and Bucky sucked in more air, composed himself as much as he could, wiping his stupid fucking eyes against his shoulder, the metal one, nearly scraping his own cheek if his armored shirt weren’t so thick.

“I’m sorry, I’m so sorry, I wanted this more than anything. More than anything Peg, you know that.” The little fingers in his shifted, wrinkled bottom lip trembling as she wrapped her frail fingers around his metal thumb.

Like he was the fragile one.

Oh, oh, was he ever.

The first tear broke over his eyelashes and Bucky exhaled, breath wild and shaky now as he scooted a touch closer, tipped his head, looked into the pretty brown eyes and swore one last confession to his saving angel in red.

“We’ll be together again. I know we will. One day, I’ll go home. I'll go home to him in the grave. We'll be together again in death. It was always that way, it was always the grave for us.” Peggy made another broken sound and Bucky shushed her softly, salt dripping into his mouth now, the weakest of smiles as he patted her hand, shook his head in mirrored sorrow. “But see. I can't off myself, I never did under seventy years of Hydra I sure as hell can’t now. I know you understand that, you understand everything better than everybody. But I'll wait. I'll wait for him and I'll be there. And one day, we'll be together again. I'll keep waiting, and one day I’ll go home. I’ll go home and Steve’ll be there the way it was always always supposed to be.”

Peggy was crying now too, weak chest shaking beneath that elegant white nighthrobe. Still Steve’s beautiful angel in red.

The fire, that fire he’d been so jealous of, the one he’d seen in her and wished he still had in him --

He’d still had it then, hadn’t he?

What a foolish young soldier. That’s why he’d been so jealous. He’d looked at Peggy and seen himself, without the darkness, with this light in place of all the black he’d ever tucked inside him and they’d both been red red fire during the war, clashing comets and now they were black and white again, angels and devils but death either way.

Fires so so long extinguished, only the smoke from hers never choked anyone to death.

Sitting around the war campfire, staring into the flames when only ashes remained.

“Never thought I’d make it home from the war Peg. Had no idea how right I’d be.” He rubbed the back of her hand and she squeezed back, tight, so tight for someone so weak and she still was so much stronger than him, wasn’t she.

The woman who’d given him life, it’d be the last life he’d take.

Enough about Steve.

He had to do this or he wouldn't do it at all.
All still for Steve anyways.

Sucked in a breath. Brushed his free hand over beautiful old gray falling curls.

“The war’s over. You can go home now,” Bucky whispered, pushing to his feet so he could be close, bend over her pillow and ask those sad sad eyes the only thing that really mattered, the only thing that’d mattered on those European fronts and the only thing that mattered now. “You have someone waiting on the other side for you?”

It took a second.

But it sunk in.

It sunk in and for the first time, Bucky saw a real reflection in those fearful eyes. The first time he’d ever seen Peggy Carter scared of anything. And he was the one to terrify her.

But then it sunk in further. And this was the part that still made her better than him. This was the part that made her the one who’d lived, who’d fought and survived and thrived.

The fear dissipated away. The fear dissipated away and Peggy nodded, just a touch of sadness as her strained neck relaxed, her squeezing hand softened. A simple nod. A tiny smile. Softness in those eyes.

She even understood this. She even understood this.

Bucky shook his head, sob catching in his throat but he squashed it down, a splattering of teardrops splashing onto Peggy’s strong, soft hand. She was going to let him kill her. As if she hadn’t done enough for him already, now she was giving him one more promise. One more thing, carrying straight to her grave.

She was ready to die, for him, for Steve. For them. Because she’d lived a life and she wanted Steve to live his, wanted Bucky to live his and the only way they could do that was when hers ended. When Bucky crossed the line he’d never come back from.

He didn’t deserve the golden angel in his life and he certainly didn’t deserve the fiery red one but he’d gotten both, been loved by both in such different ways and he could spend the rest of his empty lifetime trying to be half the person Peggy Carter was but he knew, he never could.

Never could.

“I know, for the end, there are a dozen other people you’d rather be with,” Bucky started and that little smile widened, something akin to fondness swimming in watery brown as she slipped her hand free of his, signed him one more thing.

“At least a baker’s dozen.”

Even on her goddamned deathbed. Bucky shook his head, the smile on his face the first real one he’d had in what felt like years now, with how old he felt, taking back the hand of this sweet, beautiful old woman. They were practically the same age, had actually lived all those years. Not like Steve, Steve was still so young.

And here they were, ancient comets colliding one more time, only this explosion, they were both blinking out. Blinking out for good.

“I’m so sorry, Peg.”
She nodded, already forgiving him for his most terrible sin, and Bucky pressed his lips to her cheek, both of them damp from tears, lingered just a moment, imagining them back seventy years, the same patient look on her face under those beautiful brown curls, the quirk of that red lipstick smile.

When his lips broke off Bucky kept his eyes closed, squeezing her hand one more time, feeling the strong, smooth calluses of that beautiful young army gal Steve really should settle down with some day, after this blasted war.

“You'll thank me for this one day,” he breathed, twinged in an accent but they were in a chilly army tent in 1944, scolding eyebrow raised, heels clicking as Bucky looked at her with that same defiant fire and the mirror smiled knowingly back at him. “It's the least I can do to repay you.”

The years flashing by, red lipstick smiles to tired frowns, manicured nails flipping open his file, remote dropping from a small hand as she covered her mouth, staring at the wreckage of Howard Stark’s car on the TV, the quiet promise she made as she closed Bucky’s file. Dropped the last vial Steve’s blood off the Brooklyn bridge, the shock on her face when she’d seen him in this room for the first time, the promise she made just once more. You get to love him last.

Bucky let go of her hand, voice breaking over one last thing.

“Goodbye, my darling.”

Peggy’s eyes slipped shut, soft smile on her face. Ready.

A black glove and a metal hand carefully emptying the IV bag, filling it up with air instead. The room was so quiet, so quiet--

Peggy started coughing and Bucky bit his lip, hands shaking now as he twisted the knob, filled it up with just a bit more air, and squeezed. Squeezed hard, shoving all that oxygen into her veins. God, if he only he could make this faster.

The coughs broke behind him, awful loud and then silent and he wasn’t gonna turn, couldn’t turn around, how was he supposed to look at that face--

“James?” A rough voice croaked. He nearly jumped outta his skin, breathing hard and hands shaking harder, slowly turning around on one heel. Peggy was staring at him like she hadn’t seen him in seventy years. “James, is that you?”

“Peggy,” he breathed, silently begging for the oxygen to pump faster, stop her goddamned stubborn heart.

“Oh, James,” she broke, tears welling up again, voice breaking. “I’m so sorry. Steve’s dead. Darling, Steve’s dead. I tried, I tried everything, I don’t think he wanted to be saved--”

Bucky couldn’t do anything but nod, tears dripping off his chin as he abandoned the IV, took Peggy’s sweet face in his hands. Even now, when she didn’t remember anything, her body wasn’t going down without a fight and he was so so so goddamned sorry.

“Miss Carter, I’m so sorry he’s not the one waiting for you. I’m so sorry I took him from you. I’m so sorry I made him crash that plane and--”

The hand wrapped around his wrist suddenly went soft.

Brown eyes shut, peaceful, and Bucky didn’t have time to break down crying at her bedside but he did anyways.
I'm so sorry I made him crash that plane and kill us both. I'm so goddamned sorry.

The heart monitor flatlined.

One loud beep, like an airraid siren, only there were no uniforms for them to grab and run to save the world this time.

No one left to save the world, because Peggy Carter was dead and the Winter Soldier wasn’t following far after.

~~I'd hate to step on your---~

The middle of the gym floor was shiny, wood platform they used to drag wrestling mats to.

The old dance halls, those were shiny wood too.

Walls further apart in this room, no tables on the sides, gold curtains hanging from the walls to soak up the sound.

When he stepped onto the shiny surface, the sole of his shoe echoed. He’d never been to an empty dance hall, but shoes would probably echo there too.

It was quiet in here.

Steve was good at being quiet now.

“How was it?”

“It was okay. She’s next to Dad.”

She’d be buried next to her husband too.

He drew in a careful, steady breath. Once upon a time, he’d been hoping that might be him.

Reached the middle of the wood floor now, holding out his left hand, slowly turning it in the minimal light. The ring on his fourth finger sparkled.

Just like both their eyes used to.

Once upon a time, that really was going to be him, for that beautiful boy.

Steve looked away, fingers curling into the weakest fist he had left. Just didn’t want to look at that right now. Didn’t want to look at much, but if he kept off the overhead lights, the dim gold ones outlining the gym weren’t so bad.

It was quiet in here.

He’d been quiet since he heard.

The two people he loved most--

“I might even, when this is all over, go dancing.”
“Then what are we waitin’ for?”

The first time they’d met. Steve remembered that day like it was yesterday.

For him, it was almost four years ago now.

For them?

He hummed to himself, a simple pitch. Didn’t have much else. Took one step to the side, toe coming up to follow.

Peggy hadn’t even answered Bucky that day. Not directly, anyways. Looked right at Steve, told him the clumsy words he’d stumbled over in that last car ride when he was small.

The right partner.

That was supposed to have been him.

His feet halted to a stop. He’d have to be careful, or he’d scuff the floor. He’d put on his nice shoes, the dancin’ kind Buck was always tellin’ him to lace tighter.

“Can’t be fallin’ outta your shoes, Rogers, you do know you kick in the Charleston, right?”

The Lindy was always safer, that rock-step triple-step. But see, he was sucker for the slow songs.

“We’ll have the band play somethin’ slow.”

Instead of coordinates.

He really should’ve given her coordinates. How different would all three of their lives’d been--

Halt, again.

Couldn’t keep thinking that way. He was here to dance, where was his head? Can’t dance with just your feet, Bucky used to say.

Bucky used to say a lot of things.

Steve closed his eyes. It was easier when he hummed. Hmm hmm hm hmm--

“Our romance won’t end on a sorrowful note,” he sang softly, stepping lightly to the side. “Though by tomorrow you’re--”

Halt.

This was getting frustrating. He’d scuff up his shoes at the least with all that constant stopping.

Steve cleared his throat, forced his closed eyes to relax. Lifted his arms, and tried again.

“The song is ended, but as the songwriter wrote…the melody. Lingers on…”

He’d never gotten to have that dance. Not hers, anyways.

Bucky, he’d danced with. It seemed a million miles away but they’d danced, to this song, a dozen floors above his head. They’d danced back then, waltzing between each other’s feet.

His voice wasn’t working so well on the next part. Didn’t try much of anything but a whisper, sidestep, one two three.

“They may take you from me--”

Halt.

Maybe he’d just try for the next verse.

“Though they take you from me, I’ll still possess…” Drums, a trumpet somewhere, and a beautiful fiery brunette in his arms.

“...the way you wear your hat.” Sideways, crooked smile to match undernea-- “...the way you sip your teeaa. The memory of all thaat. No, no, they can’t - take that away from me. The way your smile, just beams. The way you sing off key. The way you haunt--”

My dreams.

Sweep to the left, one two three. You alright, Cap?

I had a date.

I’d hate to step on your--

“We may never, never meet agai--”

His throat stopped him that time, welling up on something, eyes stinging at the corners.

He was fine.

“...road to love,” he finished, pulling that laughing smile with him into a beautiful spin, their bodies meeting up again closer, looking down at bright shining eyes--

“Still I’ll al-ways. A-Always keep.”

Pause.

He didn’t mean to stop, rearranging his arms, hands clasped in warm ones--

Only they were fading.

No. No, not yet, he wasn’t ready yet.

“Always, always k-keep the mem. The m-memory of.”

The way you held your knife.

Steve’s hand shot over his mouth. The sound came out anyways.

The way we danced, til three. He’d cover his eyes too but there was no use, not when he could already taste the salt on his tongue. The way you changed my life.

At some point, he’d fallen to his knees. Buckling down, but it didn’t stop his shoulders from shaking. Hands from shaking. Breath from cutting out.

No. No. They can’t take that away from me--
No, they can't take that away. No no, they can't take that away. No they can’t take that away from me.
(Only, they could.)
Always always keep...the only memories you chose.

And Bucky wasn’t keeping these.

~~Don't win the war til I get there!~~

There were a couple purchases he had to pick up first.

A backpack, some clothes. A motel room. Didn’t go with an apartment, because he didn’t wanna be the one to decide.

The motel room wasn’t far from the bank, which was good. Meant he’d be able to walk back.

Not from getting money, he had plenty of that now. Piled neatly in a new wallet, shoved in his pocket. The extra was in an envelope, sitting in his motel room drawer right on top of the paper he’d torn out.

Part of him wanted to keep the whole sketchbook, but it wasn’t a good idea. Couldn’t risk it.

Narrowed it down to one drawing, dumped the rest in a public garbage on the corner of Broadway.

It was the same with his music. The new phone in his room only had a couple songs on it. Neutral things, nothing too drastic. And, of course. No numbers.

The phone he had playing music now, that’d be trashed on the way to the bank.

Everything else was in The Journal, sitting in the middle of the motel room bed. So long as he found that, he’d be okay.

Just one more step before the phone call.

Bucky stripped down to a plain black tshirt, squared his shoulders, and looked that reflection in the bathroom mirror square in the eyes. It was time.

*Sometimes I start to wonder, was it just a lie?
If what we had was real, how could you be fine?*

Sucked in a breath, brand-new blades lifted to glint in the bathroom light.

'Cause I'm not fine at all

The guitar broke and Bucky sliced. The sharp sound echoed in the tiny space, lock of brown floating slowly to the tile floor. One more raven wing.
I remember the day you told me you were leaving
I remember the raindrops running down your face

Scissors swung open again, shut. One more strand, one more snake with its head chopped off. Violent, chopping shorter and shorter and shorter.

And the dreams you left behind you didn’t need them
Like every single wish we ever made

More dark, sliding off his shoulders, down his back. The beautiful long hair Steve slid his fingers through, that sweet smile as he pulled it into a bun for him, kissed the top of Bucky’s head and snip, the golden kiss was no more.

I wish that I could wake up with amnesia

Black glove of some Hydra agent, yanking his head back by it and snip, that piece was gone now too.

And forget about the stupid little things

Snip.

The giggle on that sweet pink mouth as Bucky hung upside down from that bar in the gym, making a face at Steve from across the punching bags. Snip.

Like the way it felt to fall asleep next to you

Long brown hair fanning out on his pillow, blinking open groggy eyes to callused artist fingers playing with the ends of it, some half-assed complaint about it tickling Steve to death in the night.

“You love it,” Bucky teased, squinching his nose up at sparkling blue eyes.

“I love you,” Steve combatted and Bucky rolled his eyes, then Steve’s hands were in his hair again, tipping his face up, mouths sliding together softly in the morning light.

Snip, snip, snip.

And the memories I never can escape

“C’mon, Buck! Hurry up, you’re gonna miss it!”

“Gonna miss you,” Bucky grumbled and Steve laughed brightly, kissing the side of his head, fingers brushing happily through silken strands.

“No, you won’t, because I am never leaving your side.”

“Never?”

“Never. Promise, on ma’s grave and everything. Now c’mon, really!”

Snip

Snip

Snip
It was supposed to be Steve, with a pair of doll scissors in the morning light.

Only it was his hands this time, again, same pair of hands that’d saved him last time. Only hands he could really count on, and one of them wasn’t even his.

Be his soon enough.

Bucky ran the metal through the short pieces, spiking up in a few places when he ruffled them like that. He could style it in a pomade, just like the old days. Only he didn’t wanna be the one to make that decision either. Jimmy could.

God he looked just like the soldier in that exhibit. Like the laughing bright young thing in his memories, in Steve’s.

Funny, the most he’d looked liked Bucky Barnes in the past seventy years and it was his last day getting to be him.

Bucky sighed, running a hand through the short hair one more time and scooping up his phone. Time to make that phone call.

He dialed the number he’d had memorized for the past year, making a face in the mirror and picking off stray pieces of chopped hair from the dark shirt while he waited.

Waiting is painful. Forgetting is painful. But not knowing which to do is the worst kind of suffering. Paulo Coelho said that, some poem or book or something.

Good thing was, he knew exactly which he was doing now.

The slime on the other end of the call finally picked up, a click and that paranoid, newbie voice in his ear.

“Who is this?” The man demanded.

Bucky’s gaze caught on his own again in the mirror, that murder-mischief smile widening on that sweet young innocent face. At least his final act as the Winter Soldier meant he gotta fuck with some Hydra goons.

“The дьявол,” Bucky replied, crystal flashing and metal plates shifting in anticipation. The choked sound across the speakerphone was so fantastic he almost laughed delightedly.

I mean, it was fair. He had said the devil.

But the guy knew who he was talking about, so. It worked.

A couple panicked breaths on the other end and Bucky flexed the metal arm in the mirror, glancing between the familiar shine and the short hair atop his head. It was a good combo. A really good combo, shame he’d never tried it before. Cause he looked pretty damn hot.

“I don’t know how you got this number or what you want but please please, don’t kill me, I haven’t done anything, Hydra’s not even looking for you anymore--” the bastard started blubbering and Bucky rolled his eyes, flicking a piece of hair off the sink too. Goddamned mess, and he’d already swept in here and everything.
“I know,” he interrupted, because he hadn’t called to listen to goons begging for their life. “But you have access to something I need. “

You know, it really was so fascinating, the man in the mirror. The short hair made a lot bigger difference than he thought it would.

It was the perfect mix between Bucky Barnes and the Winter Soldier in appearance, one last time. Bright pretty eyes you could see properly, debonair swoosh in the dark brown that, even without any styling, was still pretty much dapper as fuck. All to top off with that terrifying smile Stark would probably have nightmares about for the rest of his life.

Sergeant James Buchanan of the icy cold Russian Assassin league!

The Hydra goon was going off about something again, something about the organization disbanding or whatever but frankly, Bucky didn’t care. He knew all the shit Hydra’d been up to, he’d been keeping tabs.

Since the beginning, actually. Natasha Romanoff was right about that part. The part that he hadn’t told them everything he knew about Hydra, all the people and contacts he had memorized. Because he couldn’t let them take down everyone, never knew if he’d need something.

S’why he kept this number memorized, and look how great it was gonna pay off!

“Look,” he interrupted again, fingers brushing up the front of the short strands, making a contemplative face at the twenty-first century style. “There’s a machine, one I know you’re quite familiar with. You’re going to operate it for me.”

A couple more whining protests and Bucky sighed, flicking the goddamned speaker of the phone and wishing it was the little bastard’s head. But they couldn’t all have what they wanted.

“Listen. You’re doing this, or I will do very bad things to you and everyone you’ve ever loved! Great, glad we agree. I’ll be in the bank vault in half an hour.”

Click, hang up and that asshole was gone for now. He’d throw the phone, but Panic just came out with a new song and he was planning on listening on the walk over. It was his new favorite. Some just fantastic lines - ice has melted back to life, dress me up and watch me die, you just might see a ghost tonight.

Oh, oh, and his personal favorite, heroes always get remembered, but you know legends never die.

He was gonna have a great time walking over, and it had the perfect power-walk tempo too.

Bucky packed up the rest of his bag, throwing the scissors in the trash-to-dispose-of-somewhere-else. Hair was good for now. Let’s see, he had a change of clothes, a jacket, his wallet, his phone, where were his dogtags--

Oh yeah. That’s right. Steve had them.

Good. Okay. Yeah, one less thing for him to toss out, right?

Well, actually. It’d probably make sense if Jimmy had them, but. Whatever, it was fine. Steve could keep the damn things. Or maybe throw them off the bridge, then they could float right along to his engagement ring and they could chill at the bottom of the East River for all of eternity, just like the rest of his heart and soul.
Fantastic, looked like he was set to go.

Bucky took a deep breath, turning to the mirror one last time.

A smiling, beautiful boy with a metal arm, a bullet hole in his leg and a star-shaped hole in his chest where a heart should be.

Should be.

The Winter Soldier smile faded at the edges and Bucky stared at the man in the mirror.

And for just a moment, he was scared.

The Great Bucky Barnes was scared, of himself and his life and his situation, just about everything. Did he have to? He didn’t...he didn’t wanna lose all this. He. He didn’t wanna lose Steve again.

And there, for just a moment, was pure Bucky Barnes, nobody else looking back at him in that shiny glass.

Bucky Barnes trapped inside this war-worn body, sewed onto this arm but for a moment he could feel his real flesh and bone arm, like it was just trapped underneath the metal and all he had to do was peel it back and run, run straight to Steve’s arms--

There. There, in the mirror, was James Buchanan Barnes. The haunted eyes of the man at war, the short shaggy hair half in a pomade and half curling over his forehead, the way it was during the golden years, the day he’d shouted he loved Steve Rogers first, foremost, always.

Now it was finally time to let James Barnes die.

Chapter End Notes

☆

Somebody come cry with me because I got super emotional writing this and would love to cry with anyone willing to do so

Link to Tony's Breakup Mixtape

Okay so I’ve realized that after all the songs I’ve had in this fic, I’ve never had a country song (bc i really just don’t listen to country), but if you do, here everyone, the official TIMLB country song: The Dance by Garth Brooks

Songs featured & inspired in this chapter:
Boats & Birds - Gregory and the Hawks
The Kids Aren't Alright - Fall Out Boy
Hurt Me - Jezabels
Drag Me Down - One Direction
Wanna Get Better - The Bleachers
The Chain - Ingrid Michaelson
All You Wanted - Sounds Under Radio
Novocaine - Fall Out Boy
Sorrow - The National
Twin Skeletons (Hotel in NYC) - Fall Out Boy
The Phoenix - Fall Out Boy
They Can't Take That Away From Me - Fred Astaire
Amnesia - 5SOS
Emperor's New Clothes - Panic! at the Disco

Thank you so much readers. Thank you all so much.

xx
Penultimate chapter !! Wow !!

I'd like to formally apologize to everyone who read the last chapter and thought that was actually going to be the whole Major Character Death thing. It's uh. Not quite that simple unfortunately. Anyways.

Warnings: Major identity crisis, amnesia, adult language. Violent, morbid themes at like, the very end. Also, if you have a problem with cats or Cards Against Humanity? (told you, just papercuts in this one.)

Quoting this terribly painful post.

Jimmy's apartment link is being evil, but if you wanna look up what it looks like, it's 6917 136th St. Flushing NY.

Because I have literally no chill, the theme song for this chapter: Ever After - Mariana's Trench Enjoy?

xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Black and white. Shadows cast from frames on old walls, twisting iron bedpost, single window with the curtains drawn. Diffused light filtering through in dots and halos, black shifting over white sheets, compressed pillow—

Crystal eyes shot open, sudden splash of color – a single drip of ice from the rainbow-catching icicle, consciousness setting in the same time the panic did.

Whipped to the side, red digital numbers blinking through the black and white, one more splash of color with a halo of its own.

6:47.

“Fuck.” Quiet peacefulness shattered as the sheets ripped back, stumbling barefeet hopping down on cold ground, more inarticulate cursing as hands fumbled through a drawer in the dark, snatching a black shirt. Cotton over short hair, falling down over smooth bare skin, another panicked glance at the clock—

6:49.

“Fuck, no no no. No, that can’t be right, there’s no way that’s right—” Jacket snatched from the floor, a quick hand disheveling dark hair even more, wallet tucked in the pocket of gray sweats and a door flung open.

Half-tied shoes pounding down rickety steps in the dark, shadows flying by with the seconds, minutes—

How could he let this happen again?

Blast of cold air as he shoved outside, pounding feet down concrete, heart racing in his chest.

Fuck. How could he do this to himself?

He wasn’t gonna make it in time. Please, please, fuck, he just had to get there in time—

The bell smashed with a rather violent jangle as the door crashed open and he practically fell inside, oxygen seizing in his chest, words chopped and exhausted.

“Wait, wait, please dear god, say I’m not too late,” he gasped, chest heaving beneath the leather jacket, silver fingers curling around the edge of the door as a metal hand kept it propped open, lips parted and knees weak enough to fall to, begging if he had to.

The entire room of heads turned, eyes wide in various states of shock, distaste, curiosity. He didn’t notice, the only eyes he cared about were the blue ones blinking at him behind the barrier.

The blonde head glanced between him and the band around a pretty wrist, eyebrows raising as the familiar voice chimed,

“Twenty seconds til seven…I think that’s a new record. Impressive.”

The door slammed shut behind him as he fist-pumped the air, practically skipping up to the counter as Charlene rolled her eyes at him.

“Just the regular?”

“The regular? I wouldn’t haul ass outta bed and come bolting over here for anything less.” Crystal eyes flashed with a bright, one-sided smile as he leaned on the counter and took inventory of the little coffee shop.

Exact same as it was on Friday, except the old man in the corner looked a bit less grumpy today. Well, that was good. Less grumpy people in the world was always good.

“You come bolting down here because you sleep until the last possible minute and still want your early-bird cup’a discount,” Charlene tittered knowingly and he shrugged his metal shoulder.

“S’not my fault you guys close that at seven in the morning. And there’s no way I’m paying regular prices for morning coffee, thank you.”

“Not to like. Burst your bubble or anything, but wouldn’t it be easier to just get a coffee machine? So you don’t come charging in here like a lunatic with your wild, messy hair five days a week?”

“Aw, but where’s the fun in that?” He slipped a bill onto the counter and Charlene handed him the familiar coffee cup. “Besides, then I wouldn’t get to see your beautiful face every morning.”

Those nice blue eyes rolled at him and his smile got a little brighter. Nothing like some good old fashioned teasing to start out Monday morning right.

There was a smile on her face too as she waved him on, dusting off her barista apron. “Have a good one today, Jimmy.”

“I always do,” he assured her, backpedaling in the direction of the door.

“Oh! And Charlene,” a pause as he swung it back open, bell quite a bit cheerier this time and smile tilted in sideways mischief. “Short hair doesn’t get messy. The proper word is tousled.”

She swatted a towel at him and he laughed, waving her goodbye with a flash of metal as the door closed behind him and he was back on the early-morning collegiate streets, then up the five stairs to his apartment, white door with those numbers 6917 down the front, opening right up into the little foyer, the familiar wooden steps.

Well then. Now that the craziest part of his day was over, it was time to settle back into the rest of his life.

Which, he thought to himself as he swung around the banister into his beautiful small studio, was a pretty good life.

“Good morning New York!” The sing-songed words echoed in the empty apartment, bouncing off the cold window he’d just thrown free of heavy white curtains, shining all that morning bright into his apartment.

He spun back around with a smile, taking a moment to do a full scan of the open space. Yoga mat stretched out parallel to the stairs, array of potted plants happily propped on the banister rail, in the windowsill, atop his silver fridge.

To match his silver arm, he noted, glancing down to stretch out his left hand fingers. They rippled with a quiet whirr he was getting pretty used to. If anything, it was almost comforting now. One’a the only things he had from Before.

Which didn’t bother him much. There was the arm, and the journal, and that was about all he needed.
With those, his good looks, and the entire world laid at his feet, he was just about one of the most well-off people he knew. Not that he knew many, but that was alright too.

Besides, it was probably a pretty good idea to get to know himself before he started making a lotta friends, right?

Or at least, that’s what he’d thought. Until about two hours later.

He was just sitting there innocently, laptop on the tiny-ass piece of plastic Queens College called a desk, one of like. Six people in this lecture hall paying any attention to the end of Professor Ghivaad’s closing speech when a sudden voice from the left piped up, made him nearly jump out his chair.

“Barns?”

The metal arm spazzed the same time the rest of his body did, jolting in surprise at how goddamned close the girl had snuck up without him seeing her. Because now his big crystal eyes were looking up, wide, and there was a fuckton of red and black in his vision.

With hair that fucking bright, how had he not noticed her? The all-black outfit was cute, little red belt to match the loose-wavy-red-curls on her head and goddamn, she was pretty.

She’d just said something shit, she’d just said something.

“What?” He chirped in a stroke of rare eloquence.

“What?” the red lips repeated, slowly, and that made about as much sense the second time as it had the first, which was fucking null.

Why...was this random girl standing here, textbooks clutched to her chest and spouting something about farms to him...?

“Uh. Excuse me? I don’t....” he trailed, furrowing his eyebrows in deeper confusion as he watched sharp green eyes scan over his face, and dip lower to take in the rest of him. Obviously. Was she checking him out? Fascinated by his clothing choices? Sizing him up to take out back and rob or something?

This was the weirdest fucking vibe and of course, his first human interaction he hadn’t initiated and he was sitting here gaping like a befuddled fish.

Pretty lips pursed, shifting from accusing to something a lot more open, curious maybe? Satisfied, in a way, so whatever she saw was...good?

And then she finally spoke again.

“Everyone here looks like they’ve been raised in barns,” the girl finally elaborated, waving one hand at the rest of the class packing up their bags. He lifted an eyebrow, glancing around the various states of unkept college classmates.

“It’s the hair, isn’t it?”

“You are the only person in here who looks like they own a mirror,” she agreed solemnly and he couldn’t help but quirk a smile at that.

“Fair enough.” His hair looked pretty fucking great today, he could say that for sure. Swooped up and classy, like the leather jacket he’d thrown over his white tshirt, dark jeans.

Raised in barns. Huh. Still wasn’t quite sure how he was supposed to get that from the word Barns randomly being shoved at him twice, but. Y’know, to each their own.

“Hell of a way to introduce yourself, though.” He shot her a glance as he stood, stretching both arms out and not missing the way green eyes flicked instantly to the metal fingers on his left side. Well. He was gettin’ kinda used to that by now.

Now was either the moment she’d paste a smile and un-introduce herself, make clear for the door or maybe ask some awful awkward question or pretend like she’d never seen it at all, but he wasn’t gonna hold it against her either way, everybody made their own choices.

And apparently hers was to stick out one of those tiny, pretty hands.

“Natalie Roman,” she offered and he couldn’t help the rush of relief. Good, okay, he hadn’t had any awful encounters with his arm yet, but you never really know.

Thankfully it was the left hand though, so reaching out to shake her hand didn’t have to mean a bit of metal.

“Jimmy.”

An eyebrow raised at the name, which was curious because it was a pretty damn regular name, but she had a nice handshake, gave him back his hand before it got uncomfortable and everything.

“Jimmy...so, James?” Natalie crossed her arms over her chest, watching him and waiting as he started to pack up his stuff. Textbook, notebook, pen--

“What? No, just Jimmy,” he replied distractedly, shaking his bag open further and wrestling his laptop inside.

“Your parents named you Jimmy.”

It was worded like a statement and way too dubious to be anything but a question.

He paused halfway through zipping up his bag, physically stopping to think about the extremely simple question she’d just asked.

That he had no idea the answer too.

His face twisted up, contemplative mixed with confusion again, and if that was gonna be a pattern around this girl Natalie...

“I think? I mean. I assumed so. Maybe it is James.” Jeez. You’d think he wouldda put that in the journal though, right? Or maybe he did. He’d read the thing through, yeah, but not recently and there was always a chance it’d been mentioned. Or maybe he’d just assumed because yeah, wasn’t everybody called Jimmy actually named James?

Maybe he just never considered that he wouldn’t know that? Jesus that was a mindfuck, how was he supposed to know what he wouldn’t know anyways--

“How could you not know?” Natalie sounded just about as confused as him and yeah, okay, he was being positively brilliant with this introduction. Maybe he really ought to just, y’know, let it go and find another friend, not fuck it up in the first three seconds of shaking their hand.
“Uh. Long story?” He ran a hand through his hair, throwing a strap of his bag over one shoulder and glancing cautiously back at Natalie. She didn’t seem weirded out, just. Curious, still, which he could relate to.

“We’re leaving Philosophy class,” she deadpanned and he sighed, adjusting the bag on his shoulder and cocking his head with a reluctant touché face.

“Well?” Natalie pushed again and he hadn’t exactly told anybody this yet, but. If he made friends, he’d eventually have to, right? Might as well test it out. See whether or not he becomes some sort of pity party or something.

He shoved both hands in his pockets, lifting his shoulders a bit and steeling himself for whatever oncoming blow. Just like with basically everything, he’d never done this before and after the past couple weeks he’d just decided go with it was the only way he’d end up not being a recluse.

“Retrograde amnesia. Used to be a soldier, ended up in part of medical trial to erase memories and uh. Successful test subject A right here.”

Green eyes wide as saucers, little mouth popped open, and for a second he thought she was gonna call his goddamned bluff or something.

Then the shock kinda settled into this other emotion - she shifted through those a lot, goddamn - and the little o turned into a slowly spreading smile.

“Wow. You're probably the most interesting person in this entire school.” There was a genuine brightness in her eyes and he let out the breath he’d been holding. That hadn’t been so bad, had it?

“Thanks,” he said, because the hell else do you say to that? She wasn’t looking at him like he was a freak or anything either, so. Looked like it was Jimmy 1 World 0.

He opened his mouth to bid her goodbye, or maybe offer to walk her to her next class, when she suddenly blurted an interruption.

“You should take me out for coffee.” Well that wasn’t what he was expecting. It was more excited than demure though, so was she possibly hitting on him again or... “Or lunch. I have a feeling we could be fantastic friends.”

Okay, not hitting on him. Maybe? Well, he wouldn’t ever know unless he went for that coffee, right? Although he was pretty sure most people didn’t end up declaring themselves friends like that, but.

Nothing else in his life was exactly normal, so.

“Sounds good to me. You know a place, or…?”

“On one condition. do I get a full name? Or are you just sticking with Jimmy?”

“There's a great spot three blocks down,” he answered instead, dodging the repeat question just to see the quirk of that red eyebrow in response as he threw a thumb over his shoulder, started backpedaling for the door. “I have to grab something from the administration office, so I’ll meet you at the corner. Or, scratch that, it gets pretty busy, you can grab us a table.”

A bright smile with just a touch of sass thrown over his shoulder, quiet creak of leather as she conceded, started for the door on the other side of the room.

He spun back around at just the last moment, stood up on his tiptoes to call across the room, make just a bit of a scene.
“Hey Natalie!” The red hair whipped around and he smiled, all but cupping his hands around his mouth.

“It’s Jimmy,” he called, mouth curled up bright and real because this part, he knew. This part he knew for sure, because it was in the journal and it felt just about as right in his mouth as anything he’d ever said. “Jimmy Rogers.”

~~~

Paradise.

How many people dreamed about a better life?

The only word for the weather was crisp, browns and swirling wind late November, the taste of oncoming snow in the air but none of the bitterness of being so close.

It was the perfect day just to breathe, to walk outside and close your eyes, smile softly up at the sky and pull your jacket a little closer around your shoulders.

In the heart of the city it was walls of windows reflecting the dimple in his chin, sharp cheekbones and a solid jawline but out here, walking the empty sidewalks in the middle of campus, it was just greens fading to brown, nature shuddering in preparation for the long winter and he didn’t have a single echo following him every time he opened his eyes.

There, taking solid steps into his shadow, that distorted and dark thing - it may follow him too, but there were no unfamiliar angles, nothing to refamiliarize himself with. So he didn’t know the different colors in his eyes and the lighter streaks in his hair or what the scars on his shoulder meant, but the shadow didn’t know that and it didn’t matter there, it didn’t.

And today he’d like to keep walking, he’d like to walk forever and ever down endless empty paths with the trees twinkling falling coin leaves above but today wasn’t the day for that, there was a potential friend waiting for him at a cafe and he’d have the rest of his life to discover, to breathe in the sharp fall air and wonder if he’d always loved November so goddamned much.

Or maybe it was because November was all he knew.

Well. If he hurried up and Natalie was still in the cafe by now, he might get to add more to that list. That terribly, terribly short list.

Or maybe it was a wonderfully short list.

After all, with a world this beautiful around him, everything this clear and sharp and crisp - this was just about perfect to start writing new pages in that journal.

“Chemistry. Poetry. Woodshop. Intro to music. Philosophy, obviously.” Natalie set the paper down on the shiny table, giving him an impressed look over her hot chocolate. “This is a pretty eclectic schedule.”

“Well, I don’t know what I like or what I’m good at, so I figured I’d keep trying things until I found out.” He shrugged one shoulder, tearing a piece of bread off and popping it in his mouth. “It's been pretty fun, only thing is I kinda like all of it.”

She made a contemplative face and scanned down the papers again. For somebody whose newest acquaintance didn’t know whether his first name was Jimmy or James, she was taking this weirdly well.

Could just be curiosity though. Once that faded, she might too. It was probably better not to get too attached.

Although, really, that’d be kinda hard. She was the only one who didn’t look at him like he was either broken for having a metal arm or crazy for not knowing who the fuck he was.

Is that what he used to do? Before? Not get attached? Clearly, it hadn’t worked too well, or he wouldn’t’ve wiped his memories.

Well, maybe. Could’a been a lotta things, though. No point getting wrapped up in it, right?

A red fingernail tapped on the paper and he snapped out of it, glancing back at Natalie and his schedule.

“Bowling club,” she pointed out, somewhat fascinated under the deadpan tone that he was starting to pick up as regular. “Doesn't the arm give you an unfair advantage?”

Well that was definitely not blunt at all.

He hadn’t actually gotten any...direct questions about the arm. Like, at all. People skirted around it like crazy, but here Natalie was looking at him expectantly with the words “the arm” floating between them. Not even your arm, the like it had its own presence in the room.

“What? Unfair advantage? No way girl, I'm not trustin’ this thing to pick up a bowling ball.” The metal fingers flashed as he lifted his hand to curl them, responding just the way his other hand did. Sometimes it still awed him, how much his left arm wasn’t awe-striking.

“To strong?” Natalie offered and he nearly snorted, trying to picture the metal fingers versus a bowling ball.

“Uh, no. You don't know much about prosthetics do you?” The bell over the shop jingled and he looked up automatically, a glance before he was tearing off another piece of bread between them. “Wouldn't matter anyways, thankfully, I'm right-handed.”

“Do you ever use that then?” She gestured vaguely at his left side, sliding a spoon of soup into her mouth like she’d just said the most regular thing at a normal lunch conversation. Hell, maybe this would be normal for him eventually. It was kinda weird though, the way she kept referring to the metal as the arm and that.

“My arm? Do I ever use my arm?” He corrected, shaking his head with a smile tipped into amusement because yeah, the questions made him feel a little odd but it was so much better than all the dodging and staring most people did. “Sure. Opens peanut butter jars pretty damn well. It's just an arm.”

Another shrug and Natalie made another curious sound, another spoon of soup.

“Does it hurt?”
“Your graceful questions are amazing,” he informed her with about as serious of a face as he could pull off. “No, it doesn’t hurt. Now you gonna quit jabbering enough to read the rest of my schedule?”

“It shows you’re free tonight.” A dull tap-tap-tap of fingers on the table and one corner of her red mouth quirked up. ‘Do you cook?’

“Still debating.” The bread muffled it into sill debay-ing and Natalie rolled her eyes at him. He tipped his head, swallowing the bite and squinting as he thought it over. “Sometimes I think maybe, and sometimes I burn everything so. Who the fuck knows?”

“That sounds like an adventure,” Natalie dragged slowly and he could hear it in her voice, the you sound like an adventure. What exactly kind of adventure was that?

Before he could fumble to find some way to tell her he had no idea if hooking up was a good idea right now, Natalie was clapping her hands, brushing bread crumbs onto the table and announcing loudly,

“Alright. I’m sold. I’m in.”

“In?”

“We’re friends, it’s official.”

He couldn’t help the smile growing, some foolish wide grin that stretched to both his ears, probably crinkled up his eyes and everything.

“Friends, just like that.”

“Yep. Kindergarten all over again, just set and declared.”

“Except I don’t...remember kindergarten. Or anything before five weeks ago, actually.” He tipped his head to the side, counting silently - odeen, deva, tre. Well, more like four weeks and four days, but close enough.

“Five weeks? Goddamn.” Natalie shook her head and he snatched another piece of bread with a uh huh I know sound, glancing up at the clock on the wall. Wait, what the hell numbers had he just counted with--

“Did you just what, wake up in an alley and not know a single fucking thing about yourself?”

“Not exactly.” More amusement, which might not be how this conversation was supposed to go, but if he couldn’t laugh at her terribly blunt questions and the whole shitty situation what was the point in the goddamned situation in the first place? “How bout I tell you over dinner instead? I gotta get to bowling…”

He reached for his bag propped on the side of the booth but Natalie got there first, holding it out to him with those perfect red fingernails wrapped around one strap and a smile in offering like she was giving the whole damn thing as a package.

He shook his head at her, dislodging a piece of hair over his forehead he swooped back subconsciously, pulling his bag over one shoulder and throwing down a bill on the table.

“See you tonight,” she chimed, curling a strand of red hair around her finger and he was shaking his head all the way out the door.
Changes fill my time, baby that's alright with me.

“You have one...new voicemail.”

“Hey Jimmy, it's Morgan! Roxy got out, no surprise! I figured she probably climbed through your open window again. If you see her, can you shoo her back to mine? Or y’know, feed her and make her spend the night at your place again...surprised you haven’t bought her a damn collar...sorry, rambling. Anyways, I guess enjoy your night with my cat but I really would like her back at some point! Or you could just. Come over, maybe have dinner sometime? Just. Let me know. Okay, have a great day and sorry again and uh. Bye!”

A soft meow and he stooped over, rubbing the cat’s little black and white head, eliciting a purr probably half as happy as Morgan was every time the cat got out.

They were both sweet though, even if they liked him a little too much, but. Well. Most girls he met did, ended up asking him to dinner one way or another. Natalie was no exception to the dinner part, but. He gave everybody one shot, one night to see how it went and he had a feeling this time was different. Just friends, right? Right.

It wasn’t like he had somebody to worry about getting the wrong idea. That whole significant other thing, he’d never had one of those.

Well. He might’ve, once, back in the Before, but they’d either died or left him because here he was, alone, so either way he didn’t have one Now and it didn’t matter.

You’d think he’d’ve written that in the journal. There were a lot of things he kept noticing weren’t in there, a lot more than there actually were.

To be fair, he’d only read it through once - chance was, it could’ve been in there as some side note he just missed, right? He aught to check. Just in case.

The cat snaked between his legs as he popped off his bed, dodged the easel and mini fridge to go up on one tiptoe, grab the thin black book off the top of his bookshelf.

There was a thin layer of dust on it already, which felt pretty fast in the month he hadn’t picked it up. No point in pouring over the thing, obsessing over a few words in that nice handwriting that didn’t seem to match anybody else’s in this century.

It said, clear as day, he’d chosen this for himself because he deserved a future that didn’t have that past in it. If he’d gone this far to make that happen for himself, he wasn’t gonna fuckin’ put it to waste.

The pages of this were far too new, like he’d decided barely the day before it happened, but no point in fretting about that either. It was done, he was moving on.

Just should check, make sure there wasn’t anything about dating or other people or anything, right?

To the me of tomorrow:

Yeah, yeah, he’d read that part. Scanning time. Blah Blah pain, blah blah it was better this way. Don’t be worried I’ve taken care of everything, yadi ya. Start new.
Nothing about anything that wasn’t him--

Oh wait, no. That part about his arm, there’d been something there, right?

He licked his finger, thumbing through the few pages, flipping past the lines of script. Where had he been when he’d written this? Had he looked the same, hair pushed up off his forehead and bright eyes crystal clear?

No, no point in thinking about all that. Stick to the mission, just find that part about--

There. There it was.

...one of your war buddies painted the star on your arm. You can scratch it off, paint over it, whatever you want to do. It’s up to you.

The first time he’d read that he’d been too busy thinking about what decision to make about that red star to pay attention to the details. But there it was, probably the only mention of a past friend in this whole book.

It’d actually been one of the hardest decisions.

Picking where to live, what to do, how to style his hair, it didn’t matter because there was nothing from the past tied to it. But that, for some reason, hadn’t been scratched off before he wiped everything and honestly.

Made him a little queasy. Looking at it, seeing the sharp red marks in the mirror and knowing they were important enough to keep when there’d been nothing else. Almost scratched it off right fucking then.

But he’d kept it. For now. Scratching it off seemed pretty rude if one of his war buddies painted it there. A war buddy - apparently not buddy enough to not get erased forever. Okay, problem solved. He’d had friends during the war, no surprise, he seemed to make friends pretty easily everywhere. Known somebody artistic enough to put the damn thing there, aught to keep it as tribute or something right?

Wait. Wouldn’t that mean he’d’ve had the arm during the war? In order for it to be painted then? But that didn’t make sense, if he’d gotten his arm blown off they’d’ve shipped him home.

So did that mean this war buddy made it home with him, been there after his coma? Been part of his life after he’d lost everything else and now he didn’t even have whoever the hell that was--

Well. Didn’t matter. If he’d had a buddy, he wasn’t here now. No point fretting about it. Or the star, or whatever secret code he’d thought he’d find in here that he’d missed the first time.

He didn’t want himself to know, fine, he wouldn’t dig. Wouldn’t search, try to fix in the ten minutes before Natalie showed.

Now, his hair? That, that was something he could fix.

.

What makes you think I'm enjoying being left to the flood

“You ever heard of G-Eazy?” A pause in the insistent chopping, slide of a knife over a wooden cutting board to sprinkle chives over the second layer of cheese and pasta.

“Gee who?” Natalie asked, peering over his shoulder at the increasingly more colorful layers of lasagna.

“Apparently not,” he smiled, breaking open a clove of garlic and setting it in the middle of the cutting board, setting the knife to wood again in that familiar tap-tap-tap that made him wonder if all these utensil skills were related to cooking at all. Brushed aside, cut up until it was finer, lighter, agog tip of his head. “His new album comes out next week, I’m super pumped.”

A swooping energy as Natalie swung around the doorway between the tiny kitchen and his bedroom/livingroom, patrolling his apartment with the same quiet stalking feet as the neighbor’s black and white cat, who was currently eyeing Nat’s roaming quite distrustfully.

He raised an eyebrow at the feline and she rolled on her back, stretching out across the top of the fridge. Y’know, maybe he should’ve tidied up a bit more, Natalie was looking at everything like she was cataloging it all into some mental book with a label that was way too important…

“He’s got this song, Me, Myself and I,” he raised his voice to shout over the distance and the boil of the homemade sauce pot on the stove. “Dunno why I like it, it’s pretty depressing actually, but. Young Gerald’s my man...his I Mean It video literally made me cry I was laughing so hard.”

“Hmm. I’d’ve pictured you as a Fall Out Boy kinda guy.” Natalie half-shouted back, followed by a soft clatter. He sat down his knife, wiping the metal hand off on a towel and leaning backwards to sneak a glance at whatever she was doing.

Standing there innocently with her hands crossed behind her back, smile on her face. He narrowed his eyes, wiping his other hand on his shirt.

“Who the hell is Fall Out Boy?”

“Apparently not,” she shot back, coy smile as she ran a hand over the edge of his dresser, peering around books and his lamp like there was some secret hiding behind Carpentry 101. He watched her for a moment but she didn’t look up, hovering over one of his doodled-on notebooks, voice distant as she ran a finger over one of the margin-sketches. “How do you feel about old stuff, jazz?”

“Jazz...I like jazz. Frank Sinatra, Rat Pack. I mean, there’s something a little off about it, but the saxes, trumpets, they’re good.” He shrugged lightly, reaching back to turn down the heat on the saucepan, raising his voice again as Natalie wandered closer. “There’s an oldie G-Eazy sings - it’s actually how I found him. Called Runaround Sue and I swear, I knew the fuckin’ words before I ever heard it.”

A red head poked in the doorway and the cat meowed in annoyance. He threw a glance over his shoulder and rolled his eyes at their weird feline staredown, sprinkling the next layer of cheese over pasta.

One of them must’ve retracted their claws, because Nat was suddenly beside him again, taste-test fork hovering in her fingertips as she leaned closer, glanced up enough for their eyes to meet.

Her eyes were really green. And there was something about that smile, all tied up in secrets in a way his never could be. Open book, he was, everything he knew about himself was literally sketched up in a couple pages in an old journal and for just a moment, he wondered what it’d be like to have secrets, a real mystery, that treacherous danger behind the crystal eyes that looked back so easily at his reflection.
The only thing he didn’t know was what happened to the damn war-buddy that’d painted a red star over his arm, practically tattooed him with beautiful, sharp lines--

“That why you like him?”

It took a second to recalibrate and he blinked rapidly, turning back to the pan on the counter to shift some noodles around. “Who?”

“That artist you were talking about. The one whose lyrics you knew already. Do you think you listened to him, before your head...y’know.” She flashed her hand in a vague wavy motion that he supposed yeah, could indicate severe and irreplaceable amnesia. Before his head. Y’know.

“Nah. It was just the one song, the Runaround Sue part. Who knows, right?”

He kicked open the oven with his knee, avoiding more scrutinious looks as he swept the pan into the heat with his right-hand oven mitt - didn’t wanna risk hurting the metal of the prosthetic or anything, he wouldn’t even know where to begin with fixing it.

“Yeah, actually…” Nat trailed, because apparently all his awesome avoidance tactics were actually shit, or she was ridiculously blunt and there was no possibility of not having this conversation sometime, right, might as well straighten up, close the oven with a sigh and set the timer and turn to her with arms crossed over his chest even though he knew exactly what she was gonna say next.

“...how does that work? How much do you know about your past?”

“Technically? Nothing.”

“Nothing?”

“Well, I don’t actually know anything, but. I did write myself this fi--”

“That’s the mysterious book on top of your bookshelf, isn’t it!”

And that’s how he ended up showing her the Journal.

To the me of tomorrow--

“This is...crazy.”

“Yeah, well. Don’t have anything else to go on, and no point in frettin’, right? I mean, fresh start and all, I get why there’s not a lot of details.”

“How do you even know any of this is true? You grew up in New York, nothing at all about your life before you joined the army, not a single explanation or story there, and then half this is just weird passive-aggressive warnings about not looking for answers.”

“I know.”

“This doesn’t bother you? There’s not...what about all your friends? Everyone from before, do they just not exist anymore?”

He shifted uncomfortably on the bed, left thumb pressing lines into his right. “S’what I must’a wanted. Can’t change it now.”

“Hmm.” She flicked through a couple pages, backtracking a few once she hit the blank ones, and stopped on the final paragraphs, the handwriting still immaculate, sloping prettily into the initials
“J.B.R…" a funny look on her face, milder version of the hidden tumultuous as he’d shouted Jimmy Rogers from across the room. “What’s the “B” stand for?”

He raised one eyebrow slowly, passively studying the book in her lap, the three letters scratched in finality at the bottom of the lines.

“I….have no idea.” The eyebrow quirked, corner of his mouth twitching as they both sat there in silent for the time it took to sink in all the way, then he was shoving the leather shoulder right the fuck off his bed.

“Goddamnit, whyyyy? Why’d you gotta say that? Natalieeeeee I was fine I was living my peaceful content absolutely worry free life and now all I can think about is that I don't know my own goddamned middle name that’s been sitting right there, fucking letter sloping all perfectly and whatnot and what the fucking whhhhhhhyyyyyy?! Great. Great, just great, thank you. Best friend material right here like. Aggggggghhh.”

Burying his face in his hands didn’t make him feel any better and Natalie was still laughing, sounding surprised from her spot on the floor, echoing giggles settling down into a breathless, partially-amused,

“You really don’t know?”

“No! And now it's gonna bother the fuck outta me.” He flicked the journal poutily, making it clatter to the ground at Natalie’s feet.

“It doesn't have to,” she offered simply, snatching the journal back up again to close it properly, set it up on the windowsill. “Let's make one up.”

“You can't just make up names,” he scoffed, giving Nat a look that she returned with the polar opposite expression. Like he was the crazy one for not making up a dozen names for each day of the week. Not like Natalie did that or anything.

Her real name was Natalie, right? Of course it was. Why would she change it, she knew her name. Unlike him.

You couldn’t just make up names. But he didn’t exactly wanna go the rest of his life being Jimmy B. Rogers.

“You know what? Yeah. Yeah let's do this, we’re fucking doin’ this. Why the fuck not, right?” He scooted closer to Natalie, rubbing his hands together and thinking it over. “The fuck starts with “B”? Benjamin?”

“What about Buchanan?” Nat offered and he narrowed crystal eyes at her, blinking up innocently under her perfect red hair.

“Buchanan? What kinda name is that?” Weirdest fuckin’ name he’d ever heard is what it was.

“James Buchanan…” he trailed, squinting absently at the window. “Why does that sound so familiar? I could swear I’ve heard it before…”

The room in the air froze and Natalie was suddenly a perfect statue, not a single muscle twitching. Even the cat in the next room was silent, and he didn’t even notice, squinting a little harder before it hit him, one hand darting up in the air.

“Oh! The president, there was a president named that!” He smacked the bed beside him in victory and Nat jumped at the muffled sound. Tipping his head to the side he thought it over, chewing the inside of his cheek and repeating Buchanan to himself in his head. “I dunno. It's a little uh...unique. I think I like Benjamin.”

A deep breath and the alarmed look smoothed out into a small smile, “Benjamin it is.”

Jimmy Benjamin Rogers. Or James Benjamin, maybe. No knowing on that one either. His attention snapped back to Nat as she pointed at the journal on the windowsill, “This all you have?”

“Yeah. Well, that, and that.” It was his turn to twist around, metal finger extended to indicate the frame on the far wall, his only piece of art in here right now. It’d come with the journal, and hell knows this place needed some brightening up.

A funny sound from the floor and before he could ask Nat what that meant, she’d popped to her feet, crossed the room in three strides and was staring up close at the picture. He waited a moment to see if she’d say anything but the redhead stood silently, intent and unmoving. Another moment or two and he pushed off the bed, stepping up to stand beside her.

“This is a nice drawing,” she finally said, something off about her voice. He studied her for a moment before turning to the sketch on the wall.

It was kinda ridiculous, how tight and warm his chest got just by looking at the thing. It wasn’t like it was the most remarkable piece of art he’d ever seen, not exactly a masterpiece, it was just so.

Raw. Beautiful, god, it spoke to his soul. Couldn’t place what it was. It was pretty unique as far as sketches went, all that pencil mixed in with the red sky, blue flag in the water, purple skyline.

[Image of a drawing of the Brooklyn Bridge]

The silver Brooklyn Bridge arching across the center. He didn’t even live in Brooklyn. Hadn’t even been to Brooklyn, actually, too busy in Queens. But that bridge, that entrancing sketch of the bridge?
“Yeah...there's something about it that's just so beautiful. I think I'm a little in love with the artist,” he laughed, high and airy and Natalie blinked silently behind him. Maybe she just didn't get art. The sound faded, tapering down into a distant smile as he looked over the red star in the sky, harsh metal lines for clouds, voice dropping into some kind of awed hush. “Can you imagine how they must see the world when they draw things like that?”

More silence beside him, only it wasn’t the -nothing- kind of quiet, it was the negative-sound kind of quiet, sound sucked out of the room like there was something that needed to be said so desperately the words would rather burn than be spoken.

Another second and he would’ve leaned over, nudged her, made a joke, something to cut through the cold that’d suddenly settled over the two strangers in front of an even stranger art piece, only.

Speaking of burning.

“Shit, the lasagna--”

~~~

watch the only way out disappear

“Now carefully pour the solution into the beaker, keeping an eye to make sure it doesn’t combine too quickly, we’re not looking for any explosio--”

The boom crash couldn’t’ve been more aptly timed and half the class burst into shocked laughter, the other half blinking tiredly awake, looking around in vague confusion and disinterest.

His lab partner was thankfully the former, covering her mouth with a hand to stifle the giggles as he stared big blue eyes at the gas rolling slowly out of their beaker, splatter of gray smoke dusting his apron, the edges of his goggles.

Probably clinging to the cleft in his chin, making his hair stand up on end like some cartoon based on the way the eyes around him were flicking in their laughter.

Well. That was about the most graceful thing he’d done this week.

The teacher was looking at him with pained exhaustion and he couldn’t do much but lift a shoulder, wipe the back of his hand over his goggles and offer in his best radio-voice,

“And next time this week folks, I’ll be inventing flying cars!”

The few stifled giggles broke into real laughter and even his teacher cracked a smile. His lab partner nudged him in the shoulder with her wide-mouthed joy, metal plates shifting in reaction to the touch and he bit down the cocky grin into a smaller smile.

So he wasn’t normal.

And maybe...he wasn’t quite a scientist either?

He said let's get outta this town, drive out of the city, away from the crowds. I thought heaven can’t help me now, nothing lasts forever.

But this is gonna take me down.

“Say, you know anyplace you can rent a car for a decent price around here?”

The taxi driver gave him an odd look over his shoulder and he blinked patiently, metal arm propping him up on the back of the passenger seat.

“You lookin’ to go somewhere a bus can’t?” The driver asked dully and he shrugged his scarred shoulder, subconsciously running a hand through his dark hair and mussing it up a bit.

“Dunno, I have a feelin’ I’d like roadtrippin’ or somethin.”

“You ain’t never been on a roadtrip?”

“Uh. No? No. Don’t think so. Can’t imagine when I wouldda. But it’s good right, to get out and just drive, open road and a good stereo, right?”

“Yeah,” the driver agreed, checking his blind spot and weaving into traffic, replying distractedly, “Gotta find somebody to go with though, kinda the whole point.”

“Hmm.” He leaned back in his seat, looking out the glass at upper Manhattan and all the bustling millions shoving by, thousands of people he’d never even see again. And outta all of them, not a single person to go roadtripping with.

There had to be somebody in New York who’d tip back their head, holler at the wind with the windows down with him, racing across America like the whole world could never catch up so long as his foot was on the pedal.

Only problem was?

Brake always came in sometime, it was either that or the crash.

The crash and the fall.

I was just a bad dream.

It came with the dark. It came with the loud switch of the lights turning off and it was New York, he had a window, it was never pitch black anyway, it wasn’t like it should matter.

But the click every night that put him into this place, all alone, in the black? It mattered.

Because he didn’t feel alone.

And yeah, that was creepy as fuck and also the plot of every cheesy horror film ever, but he couldn’t shake the feeling, he really couldn’t. Just that someone was...not watching, but there. Waiting. In the shadows, in the dark hovering at the edges of the cutting moonlight, haunting thing always behind him, no matter how many times he spun around.
So what if he ran straight from the lightswitch to his bed like a seventh grader? He lived alone, it was fair he was a little freaked out sometimes.

It had to be nothing, he knew that. Even if it were someone, here, in his room, odds are he could probably defend himself. He didn’t know how much skill he still had from his military days and he really wasn’t looking to test that, but worse comes to worse it wasn’t like he was in any real danger.

Right? The...the creepy feeling, of not being alone? It wasn’t a super threatening feeling, just. A chilling one.

Sometimes physically, actually, he’d just go cold all over, frozen up like he’d spent years coated in layers of ice. Except even then, even frozen, there was still something, somewhere there, just outside the glass--

No, he was just freaking himself out again, he had to. Let it go, right? Let it the fuck go.

Let it all the fuck go.

~~~

He didn’t leave anybody behind, did he?

~~~

The sun came over the edge of the hill slower than molasses on a cold winter’s day and his arms lifted with the cool light, head tipped back to the soft wind, palms touching above his head, fingers reaching for the sky.

Early December chill creeping down his bones, settling on his skin like the promise of coming snow, but his long-sleeved under-armor kept it from getting too close. More like a refreshing, clarifying dip of cold air than the torture of winter months to come.

Energy dancing down his torso, waiting and hovering for the moment, the sweet shift as his arms circled out to the sides, bending in a swan dive, toes spreading deeper against the rubber cushion of his yoga mat.

His hair was too short to do much but stick up like those movie star quiffs when he was upside down, but uttanasana was still one of his favorite poses, there was something about the peace and strength of his arms hooked around the backs of his calves, feet planted in the earth--

Yoga in the quad was so so much better than yoga in his apartment, and so he didn’t quite match the scruffy, long-haired guys in ponytails he always ran into carrying yoga mats around campus this early in the morning, but he didn’t need to fit a damn well stereotype to enjoy some amazing physical activity and waking up to sun salutations.

Speaking of physical activity, there was that dance class Nat kept trying to convince him to join. Maybe he really should consider it. But there was something so intimate about dancing, with partners and whatnot, and he...didn’t think he was ready for that.

He’d stick with yoga for now, there was always time to try out all that fancy nonsense in the future. He had all the time in the world. Nothing but time, really.

And he was gonna make the damn most of it.

~~~

“Rox, you gotta moovve,” he groaned, shoving the cat off his pillow. She meowed in offense, but couldn’t’ve been that offended because next thing he knew, she was in his lap.

“Okay, fine, but you get to stay for one episode. And I swear, if you meow over any of Doctor Reid’s lines, I will not hesitate to throw you out the window.”

She snuggled in closer and he sighed, taking that as a submission of agreement. Well, of everything the cat did, insisting on watching Netflix with him wasn’t the worst of them. Besides, it was a pretty damn good setup, blankets over his legs, pillows piled up around, hot chocolate on the bedstand, computer propped against his thighs and a purring cat in his lap. Not a bad way to spend a couple hours on a Saturday afternoon.

Or, y’know, an entire Saturday night and red-eyed Sunday morning but what, bingewatch an entire two seasons? Who, him? No way. He would never!

~~~

It was getting late and for some reason he just couldn’t find his way home.

Maybe it was the snow. It was the first real snow yet, and everytime he wrapped his coat closer, squinted up against the windy white pummel of flakes - a vortex, only instead of wrapped up in some swirling space thing it was pulling--

No, it wasn’t pulling him, it was just like he was. Falling. Every time he looked up, all that swirling upside-down snow, it was like he was falling down a rabbit hole, wandering around alone forever and there was just so much white.

Was it following him forever or leaving him to sleep in the snow?

Eventually, through the bitter ice that was starting to make his face sting, eyebrows freeze over, the glow of that familiar line of distant lights. Soft and pale-gold, setting a straight beacon home. All he had to do was follow gold through all the cold and he’d be fine.

Throwing open the door was simultaneously the greatest and worst feeling ever. It was warm as hell in here, he must’ve left the heater on. He started to thaw the second the door shut behind him, ice slipping into water, but that blast of warm air also kinda felt like his insides were being turned inside out and blasted with a dose of poisonous summer heat.

Well. It was better than freezing to death and he’d made his way back to the apartment, so. Win win.
No more standing out there where everything was falling down around him and he could believe in all the possibilities of the world that’d been waiting for him sometime two months ago.

All he had was now, remember?

The quick shower didn't make him feel much warmer, just more dripping and melting, the sound of wet feet on tile echoing between white walls.

Why didn't he have a proper pair of pajamas? A tshirt and sweats would have to do. Thankfully his hair dried fast enough not to soak his pillow as he finally collapsed in bed, pulled the sheets up over his shoulders. Curled on one side, with all that empty space behind him--

And he was out of bed again, pacing with his hands in his hair and he was just so tired, so sick of being dizzy. Had he eaten today?

The white flakes knocking on his window were gone now, quiet and still outside, everything a long sloping blanket of untouched, shining white.

It was so peaceful. All of that blank, fresh snow down like looking at a painting, or a movie. Clean pure white without the slightest touch of human pollution to be seen.

If the cat hadn't wandered home she would've freaked at the loud sudden screech, wrapped herself around his legs but thank god he lived alone, no one to question or scream as he dragged his stubborn bed across the room.

Not as hard to pull as he'd thought it be.

Shoved it flush against the window, yanked his sheets off from where they were tucked nicely. If he was gonna sleep on it upside down, he'd have to reorient the sheets. Too exhausted to tuck them in at the other end, sliding in to drape them over like a thin blanket that didn't do much but tangle up in his legs too easy.

Pillow shoved under his head, close to the foot of the bed as he dared.

And there was all that snow. White and white and the occasional glimmer of reflecting gold. There'd never be the right words to describe that, what the world looked like pure and white and free of people, free of darkness and mud and everything he'd freed himself of too.

Maybe all he'd wanted to be was the snow. Pure, clean. Glittering, stunning under the pale gold streetlights.

So it’d follow him forever. He'd never know, and it'd follow him forever.

Wiped clean, blank slate like fresh snow and he was purified. He should be grateful.

There was a road in the distance, far off distance, occasional car lights tiny blinking orbs sliding by on their thin line.

One hand tucked under the cleft in his chin, watching the faraway lights of those cars, two speeding for each other, collide, kept going. And another two, colliding further left, disappearing in opposite directions like they'd never met.

Every collision, intersection point an illusion.

But for just a moment in time, for one second, the lights were together, burning twice as bright, covering each other to stand as one and then they were off, gone again, in different lanes all along.

In different lanes all along.

He fell asleep watching the highway, dreams swirling with pure snow glittering under pale gold until it melted away from the warmth of the lights pointing home that slowly slowly faded into nothing at all.

~~~

"Okay, next card...blank may pass, but blank will last forever."

"Ughh, I hate double cards," Chase whined and Jimmy leaned over to flick him on the shoulder.

"Well we hate you," Jessica retorted, not looking up from her handful of cards, thumbing through them before smacking two (loudly) facedown on the table.

"Or more accurately, your shitty seventies music taste," he offered and Kyle reached over Matthew to give him a high five, quiet thud against the whirr of his metal palm.

"It’s my dorm, we listen to whatever the fuck I want." Chase put down two of his cards and glared unconvincingly at the everyone else at the coffee table. There was a perfectly good dinner table, but it’d been shoved aside because sitting on the floor for Cards Against Humanity was way better that way.

"Besides,” he pouted, collapsing dramatically on his forearms. “Zeppelin isn’t shitty, y’all are shitty.”

“Fantastic comeback,” he drawled sarcastically and Jessica snorted, elbowing Kyle to put down his cards already.

"Okay,” Matt picked the pairs up, flipping them over and lining them up next to the black card, shoving Chase’s pie plate outta the way. “First pair...Men may pass, but Bees? will last forever.”

“Bees?” Everyone around the table echoed, bursting into various snorts and laughter, Matt shaking his head affectionately as Hannah fell sideways into Jessica’s shoulder with her bright giggling.

“Anyone want more pie?” Claire shouted from the kitchen and Hannah scrambled back up, barely avoiding Jessica’s hand shooting for Matt’s plate.

“Hey! That’s mine!”

“You’re reading cards, get over it.”

“Hey Jess! Get me some too!” He tipped his head back and gave her his brightest smile, crystal eyes all lit up the way he’d absolutely perfect in that one hall mirror.

“Fuck you Rogers, get your own.” She rolled her eyes and Chase snorted, signaling Matt to read the next pair of cards.

“Jessica?” Hannah called, leaning over Matt’s space and making him look up at the ceiling in feigned exasperation. “Can you grab me a piece?”
She batted her pretty blue eyes as Jessica paused in the doorway, almost eliciting a smile from that bitter-sarcastic mouth. “Fine, yeah, I’ll grab you one.”

“What the hell!!” He had to reach over Matt and Chase to shove Hannah with the metal arm and she gave him the sassiest smile, leaning back just in time to avoid getting smacked.

“What?” she blinked, brunette head cocked as he rolled his eyes at her, leaning back just as Kyle whooped triumphantly, attention drawn back to the game as Matt turned back over all the pairs of cards but two.

“Okay, these are all pretty great, but wow this one is fucked up. Dying may pass, but a lifetime of sadness will last forever? Wayyy too real.”

A couple of laughs around the table that shifted into cheers almost instantly as Claire came out of the kitchen with two plates of cookies balanced on her hands. “Wasn’t enough pie left for everyone, so.”

“We love you Claire,” Hannah announced, and Matt held up two cards in the air, looking around at the happy faces.

“I gotta give it to the Bees? one.”

“Boo-yah!” Metal fingers snatched the black card off the table and Chase groaned, making a face as Jessica sat back down and handed Hannah the last slice of pie.

“Jimmy _always_ wins, that’s just not fair.”

“Muahaha,” he shot back and Jessica pulled a fork out of her mouth, raising one eyebrow dully. “That was the least convincing evil laugh I’ve heard in my entire life.”

“How many evil laughs do you hear, jeeez.”

“More than normal,” she sighed, tossing a cookie at Kyle, who’d been trying in vain to reach the plate for the last ten seconds.

“Oh kay, it’s my turn, right? And let’s try to let anybody besides Rogers win this round.” Claire gave him a pointed look and he shrugged, smile split from ear to ear as he leaned back against a couch cushion and thumbed through his cards.

Best way to spend an afternoon, he decided. The very best way.

~~~

“Heyyoo, whatcha listenin’ to?” Natalie startled at the sudden noise, the metal fingers plucking one headphone outta her ear as he smiled mischievously and fell in step beside his new best friend.

She didn’t bother answering with anything but a raised eyebrow and the faint traces of a smile because truthfully, he was like this more often than not, just popping the headphone into his own ear. It was something kinda jazz-y sounding, but like. Tinny, and too fast?

“This doesn’t sound like the 50’s,” he pointed out, shifting the strap of his bag to better accommodate walking this close. The corner of Nat’s mouth twitched, moving her armful of textbooks to one side to fix the pull of the split earphones.

“It’s not. It’s the 40’s.”

“Oh? I didn’t know the 40’s did jazz.” Although it was like. Hardly jazz, but still.

“They did.” Natalie pushed open the door to the outside and he cringed, popping his coat collar against the wind. At least it wasn’t snowing anymore. Definitely different kind’a music than he was listening to last time he was out in this cold.

He let the song go for another verse as they walked in silence, paying a little closer attention this time.

“This is a lot peppy-er jazz.” Absently started humming along, thinking how not-Rat-Pack this sounded. He didn’t even know the forties had their own time period of music. That was like...world war two era, right? Maybe. He hadn’t been paying a lotta attention to history lately. Another couple steps and they hit the chorus again, multiple voices chiming in over the sound of drums, a faint harmonica, maybe. “You sure this is a 40’s song?”

“Yeah, why?” Nat dug in her pocket, producing her phone and lighting up the screen to show him the song, Hot Time in the Town of Berlin, pausing at the edge of the sidewalk to look up at him curiously.

“I know the words,” he said slowly, still looking down at the screen. The name wasn’t ringing any bells, or the band or anything, or even the style of music but. For some dumb reason, he knew all the words. “Weird. Maybe an army buddy liked the forties or somethin’?”

They started walking for their designated lunch spot again, in silence this time as the song played out. Well, in silence until Natalie couldn’t stand it anymore, turning down the volume a tad to look over at him again with that same pester-look she got like. Twenty times a day.

“Do you really remember nothing?”

“Really.” One side of his mouth twitched up in an amused smile. He should start keeping tally of how many times she asked that.

“You think anything would trigger back stuff? Like music, or a face? Maybe even subconsciously, like in your sleep?”

“I doubt it.” He shrugged, careful not to dislodge their headphones as they started up the stairs in front of the campus dining building. “Been pretty quiet so far.”

“And that really doesn’t bother you?” Yet another pause, just outside the door, looking at him with those big green eyes like she was seriously concerned for him and he sighed, taking her arm gently and pulling her to the side, sitting her down on the bench just outside the doors.

Kept his voice as even and serious as he could, which was saying a lot for him because life was way too short to be all serious about shit, but if they could finally lay this to rest then they could go back to joking about shit instead of all these random bouts of worry Nat kept having.

“Listen, Roman. I told you once, and I really meant that. I’ve come to peace with it. I chose this, for myself. It was what I wanted, y’know? If there’s some big piece of me missing now, there’s no point in looking for it. I can’t worry about something I don’t know to worry about. Tree falls in the forest and no one’s there to hear it, right?”
“And you’re sure. It never bothers you?”

“No,” he shook his head, smiling a little because really, it didn’t. When it was light outside and the world was all bright and everything, he didn’t even think about it. There were of course a couple moments of hesitation, wondering, in the middle of the night but that was normal. This was all normal. He was normal. “No, it really doesn’t. Just bothers you, with your terrible, serious, terminal condition of have-to-know-everything—”

“I do know everything!” Natalie interjected, smacking his arm and both of them were smiling now, which was exactly how it should be.

He popped back to his feet, holding out his crooked arm, old-fashioned style and everything. “Well, Miss Roman, I’m sure you do. And if you would be so kind as to let me escort such a beautiful, intelligent, absolute know-it-all—”

Rolling eyes as she stood, all bottled sass,

“Shut up Ba-- Rogers.” There was the oddest look on her face as she quickly looped her arm through his, eyes darting away as she indicated for the doors. “Well? You gonna escort me in or not?”

~~~

“What exactly are you looking for sir?”

He pursed his lips, running metal fingers through his hair as he tapped his foot and debated. Didn't quite know the answer to that question, or this whole thing would be over by now.

“Um. I just wanna make sure it's the right decision, for both of us, y'know? S’why I wanted to talk to you before I went and saw...god knows I wouldn't be able to back out then, right?”

The clerk smiled, sliding a clipboard over the counter.

“I understand. It’s good you’re looking at this responsibly, with hesitation. It shows this may be a good idea for you after all.”

“Well. I'm in school, so that's my biggest hesitation.”

“How many hours would you say you spend at school every day?”

“Just a few hours. My schedule’s pretty lenient otherwise. And I’m home basically every evening, don’t leave super early morning either, unless I'm out running.”

“Sir, I'm absolutely sure we can find you a match. Most of the dogs we have here are quite compatible with that lifestyle. Would you want to adopt a dog that could run with you?”

“Oh, yeah, that'd be really cool. But I just wanna make sure they'd be okay hanging out in my apartment for a couple hours. I mean, I'd love to take a dog to class, but. You know the rules.” He gave her a small smile, running down the sheet on the clipboard she gave him. He was pretty sure he could keep up with this.

“I don't mean to pry or offend,” the counter girl started slowly, chipped blue nail reaching over to tap a selection box on the paper. “--but have you considered getting your dog registered as a psychological pet? You'd have a lot more freedom with where you could take them.”

“I'd love to, but…” he trailed, staring down at the paper and smiling softly to himself at the sudden muffled barking from the next room. “I don't exactly have anything I could convince a psychiatrist with. It's not like I'm--”

“Missing an arm?” The girl offered, voice dropped entirely hushed and hesitant.

It took a couple seconds to sink in and he blinked, looking down at his metal hand and flexing his fingers.

Oh yeah.

“Huh.”

He'd forgotten about that.

But he wasn't exactly...a cripple. Or like, psychologically messed up or anything. He didn't even have nightmares, he was about the most regular non-psychotic person he knew.

“I'll think it over,” he promised her, although he wasn't so sure about that. He didn't exactly deserve to have a psychological pet when psychologically, he was better than most people. “But uh. You think I could see the dogs now? Only ones that'd be okay with being alone for awhile and everything.”

“Of course, sir. Right this way. I think we have a few you'll just fall in love with.”

~~~

~~~

“You're getting a dog??”

“I'm considering it,” he defended and Morgan’s eyes were wide, blinking up under her blue hair like he was crazy, hand frozen on her mailbox.

They didn't run into each other super often and he did wanna at least give her a heads up he was thinking over the idea.

“What about Roxy?” she demanded, crossing her arms over her chest and he snorted, closing his own mailbox and tucking a couple envelopes under his arm.

“She's not my cat.”

“But she thinks she is! What if she comes through your window one day and your dog attacks her? Oh god what would I--”

“Morgan, chill. I said I'm just considering it. Besides, you never know. They could be friends.”

“Friends? Friends? Is the moon friends with the sun?? They're two different species!”

“I don't see why they couldn't get along--”

“Sure, they may at first but at some point the dog’ll get fed up with all the cat’s evasive techniques and snap, chase her down, and Roxy could run away!! Never come back!!”

“The dog I found is a golden retriever, they're hardly vicious!”

“It doesn't matter! They're too different. Besides, all dogs are vicious, underneath that sweet puppy face.”

“Oh, what, and cats aren't?”

“Roxy isn't vicious! She's just...liberal with her claws.”

He sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose. “Look, I haven't made any decisions yet. I just wanted to give you a heads up. I really do think they could be the best of friends though, Morgan.”

“Jimmy, the only cat-dog relationships that actually work are the ones that’ve been raised together since birth.” Arms still crossed over her chest, chin lifted in defiance, although that was pretty regular with how small she was.

“Well. That's not exactly easy to come across, y’know? We can always see how it goes. I won't make any big choices until I'm sure though, I promise.”

“Thank you,” she breathed, arms tucking a little closer like just the idea seemed positively horrendous. He really didn't see why they wouldn't get along, but.

“I just can't have Roxy bolt on me. She'd be lost out there in the real world, y’know?”

“Yeah,” he smiled faintly, closing both their mailboxes for them, holding out Morgan’s mail in his free hand. “Aren't we all.”

~~~

The apartment was pitch black except for the distant green light on the ceiling, the fire detector that interrupted all that darkness. If he covered it with his hand, he couldn’t tell the difference between eyelids open or closed.

Could be anywhere like this. With all that darkness, the black could extend forever or just a few feet in front of him, a box or a warehouse or a snowy prairie with nothing but white for as far as the eye could see. Or not see.

Playing tricks on his tongue and that’s exactly what he needed to write this damn thing.

It’d been plaguing him since the moment he’d picked up the pen and he just couldn’t place--

All that darkness. That was it, wasn’t it?

A quiet victorious whoop and he flipped open the laptop on his thighs, everything lighting up around him at that impossibly bright screen but he didn’t even notice, pulling open a blank word document and tapping down everything before it got lost on the tip of his tongue again.

Who knows how much time slid by, but the next thing he knew there were the fourteen lines, exactly the way they’d been twisting inside his organs.
Fucking finally.

It took a bit of fumbling to find his phone, tucked between some random folds of his sheets, wrestling it free and shoving it between his ear and his shoulder, speed dial ringing out.

The other end clicked as she picked up and he didn’t bother saying hello or waiting for her to.

“Wanna hear this sonnet I wrote?” He typed the date at the bottom of the document, saving it for the hundredth time just in case. “It’s pretty great, honestly. About time too, it’s been stuck in my head since--”

“It’s Friday night...” Nat interrupted, words drawn out and he paused, readjusting and picking his phone up from where it’d been wedged. “…you’re twenty-seven...and you’re home alone writing poetry??”

“Uh. What else would I be doing?” He made a cross face in the dark and Natalie made some sort of disbelieving sound he had to roll his eyes at.

“Okay. Get dressed. I’ll be over in twenty.”

“Nataliiieee--”

“We’re going out.”

“Out? I was having a perfectly great night--”

“We’re going out! I will show up at your door and if you don’t come with me, I will bust it down.”

He...did not doubt that. Another aggrieved sigh and he threw off the covers, groaning at how fucking cold and not-comfy it was out here in the real world. Light, light, needed to flick on a light.

“What am I getting dressed into? Like, where are we going?” Closet door swung open and he glared at all his summer clothes, tidy and shoved in the back because it was so fucking cold out.

“We’re going dancing,” Natalie declared and his eyebrows tried to hit the ceiling.

“Dancing?? I don’t know if I can dance!”

“Well. We’re about to find out.”

“Dear lord.”

“Love you too. Be there soon!”

Click.

He was so fucked.

Or...not.

“I don’t get it!” He shouted over the blast of the music, pulling Natalie closer from the grip he had on her palm, leaning in to mouth the words right next to her ear. “Why are so many people scared of dancing??”

“Not everyone’s as good at it as you!” she shouted back and he shook his head with a smile, carefully spiked hair already fucked up, sweaty strands falling haphazardly over his forehead, dragging one hand through damp brunette to the sway of his hips.

The leather jacket he’d walked in here with was way too hot to wear, slung over one shoulder, fingers curled around the edge as he danced, low and dirty, black tank sticking to his chest, catching sweat and wandering eyes the same way his bare biceps were.

Even with the lighting fucking shit, he wasn’t missing the way all those guys and gals were looking at him. And then eyeing who he was with and decidedly not approaching, not so long as he and Nat were dancing together. Which was absolutely fine with him, she wasn’t too bad at this herself.

How had they not gone dancing yet? Well, first of all, he’d had no idea he’d be this good at it.

The song’d shifted, something not as heavy, almost pop-sounding as the crowd’s whole demeanor shifted, kids up at the front jumping mosh-pit style as everyone else stuttered to a stop, headed for the bar or the bathrooms, couples breaking right and left - their hands dropped too and Nat turned to him, cocking her head and shouting to be heard,

“You know this song?”

He shook his head no, taking her wrist again and dragging her closer to the blasting speakers, hips finding the rhythm again. “Good dancing music,” he offered, more mouthing it than shouting that time because Nat seemed to be pretty good at reading lips anyways.

“They’re a great band! Fall Out Boy, ring any bells?”

Man, again with the bell ringing thing. There were no bells in his head to ring, and one day that might sink in but for now he just laughed at that pretty, devious smile that always wanted to know if there was just one more thing he might remember.

“Doubt we danced much in the army.” Bury me til I confess. The smile on Natalie’s face looked fake in the flash of the blue lights but they were here to dance and he wasn’t gonna call her out on it, wasn’t gonna think about anything but the bass shaking the floorboards, the reflections spiking across the floor. “But no, it doesn’t.”

And I can’t get you outta my head.

Cheeks flushed, eyes bright, hair destroyed - if he’d been wearing eyeliner it’d be smudged to hell. Not that he wore eyeliner, but there were a couple guys in here with it and he had to admit, if anybody could pull it off it’d probably be him.

Although now, like this, dancing his ass off and rolling his body to the inescapable music, he felt about as immortal as he ever had. Could pull off anything like this. There was just something, about a dancefloor--

You’ll find your way
And may death find you alive

His heart pounding, endorphins rushing through his brain, everything from his feet to his head connected, zoetic, more present and simultaneously free than he’d been in anything he could remember, best friend right here beside him and skin tingling, soul vibrating with the heat and he could just drown in it, all his sense given over to that music.

I’ll keep you like an oath
"May nothing but death do us part..."
He saw him first.

Natalie’s gaze flicked up, saw his caught curiously over her shoulder and followed his gaze, red hair whipping as she flipped her head around, took in the man standing at the door.

And that fluid, dancing body went still so fast it was surprising she didn’t give herself whiplash.

“Shit.”

The song’d changed again, this one even louder but it didn’t matter, he could hear that word just fine over it. Was written all over her face anyways.

Natalie didn’t move, frozen in spot and he paused too, jostled by some dancing bodies around them as he peered over Nat’s head and studied the guy at the door with a whole different set of eyes.

Certainly didn’t look like a ghost the way Nat’s face said he was. In fact, he looked pretty damn real. Solid, broad shoulders and ridiculously ripped arms, the kinda muscle you did a double-take when you saw. Darkish-blonde hair kinda spiked up over light blue eyes, this sharp keen stare as his gaze flicked over the room.

And finally landed on them.

Now that was a double-take.

“You know him?” he leaned closer, pushing Nat’s hair aside to ask the question against her ear since she was still frozen staring at the door.

Still.

His question sunk in eventually, the little body jolting the moment it did, finally shot back to reality from her weird staring contest with the buff guy across the room.

“He’s…” she breathed, blinking rapidly before glancing at him, back at the door, eyes wide and almost scared looking now? She took a single step forward, eyes locked on the blonde like a sniper on a target, nearly forgetting he was standing right there behind her.

The guy didn’t though, those pale eyes kept flicking up to him, pure shock mixed in with some sort of hard-set rage and what the fuck was going on?

“...my boyfriend,” she finally finished, snapping back into full-on Natasha mode and shoving hastily past the grinding couple in front of them. He moved to follow her on instinct, metal arm whirring weirdly like it could sense the increase in his pulse, the sudden urge to protect.

Got half a foot before Nat seemed to remember he was there, glancing over her shoulder quickly and waving him off with a hand, shouting something like keep dancing.

He hesitated, glancing between her and the guy glowering on the other side of the room, making his way through the crowd towards them too.

The look on her face was dead serious though, something pleading in her eyes - confrontation will make it worse, those greens said and he bit back his tongue, forcing himself to still and shake it off. If she didn’t want him there, he had to respect that.

But since when the fuck did Nat have a boyfriend?

Why hadn’t she told him? Why hadn’t he met him? The guy looked fine enough, like he could maybe even be congenial if he hadn’t caught them like this. They’d just been dancing, it wasn’t like they were together, Christ, he hoped he didn’t just create a dozen problems for that girl.

He was still getting stared at by the time Nat reached Mystery Boyfriend, one little hand grabbing the sleeve of that purple shirt and dragging him towards the bar, away from where he was watching carefully.

Okay, clearly, she had this under control. He just had to...chill and trust her. So she had a secret boyfriend. No big deal, he’d probably be jealous at first too if he saw his girl dancing with some guy. Specially a guy as attractive as he was. Not to be vain or anything.

Well, he could stand here and wonder how much he didn’t know about Natalie, or he could go find somebody else to dance with. There were...quite a few from the looks of it.

And this song was hype, so. Dancing it was. Nat would find him before she left, all he had to do was slip back into the music until she came back.

Couldda sworn it was barely ten seconds later that Nat was tugging him away from Young Rich and Handsome, smile more of a grimace now as she dragged him for the door.

Although wow, door swung open onto the weirdly quiet streets it was almost gettin’ light outside, they’d been in there for a goddamned while.

The door shut quietly behind them, lid muffling the bass into this distant thing, all the warmth slipped right with it and he couldn’t pull his leather jacket on fast enough, damp skin and hair about damn freezing up into ice already.

“Fuck it’s cold.” Pulled the jacket tighter, finally got the chance to look over at Nat, inspect her state of well-being without the flashing lights and thudding music surrounding them. He’d glanced around on their blurred way out, but Mystery Boyfriend was nowhere to be seen. Which was to be expected, he supposed, if she was walking him home. “So...how did that go?”

“I convinced him to keep his mouth shut. For now.” Red flashing as she glanced both ways across the snowy street, words distant like they were more to herself than him before she blinked again, looping her arm through his as she guided them both across the street. “That’s gonna be a long talk later today, I’ll tell you that.”

“Mmm.” He supposed it was daytime, probably somewhere around four or five am. Already tomorrow. What time did that switch though, like nobody said yeah, let’s hang out later today at like. Midnight. Anyways.

He blew a snowflake outta the air as it tried to land on his nose, shivering at the crystals slowly forming along his hairline. Fuck the winter, that was what. The snow was loud as hell, crunching underneath his boots, but the silence was still there and apparently, that was all Natalie was gonna say which was. Not cool.

So he elbowed her in the ribs. “You never told me you had a boyfriend.”

She made a cross face at the sharp metal poke, but there was a touch of a smile at the edges of her eyes now and it was a bit easier to breathe in all that bitter cold air. So he hadn’t ruined everything, then.

“Never came up. You jealous?”

“Mm, no. Maybe of you. Those were pretty fantastic arms,” he teased, last puzzle piece of concern slipping away as she broke into a real smile, head ducking down against the wind. “How’s somebody even get that ripped?”

“He’s a really fantastic archer.”

“That explains the arrow necklace.” He tipped his head to indicate, too fucking cold to pull his hands outta his pockets. Natalie glanced down, little smile as the silver reflected in a streetlight. He wasn’t sure he’d ever seen her smile that way. Studied a moment longer, smile of his own now as he thought that over. “So he’s got a good heart too?”

“He does,” she replied softly, arm flexing like her fingers were worrying away at something. A beat or two before the softness passed, eyes hardening into that shiny surface again as one corner of her mouth twitched up. “But mm, you should see the rest of him.”

“I’m good,” he laughed, tugging their linked arms around another corner bend.

“I saw you eyeing that guy in the club,” she accused and he arched an eyebrow at the callout, thinking back to who exactly he’d been checking out. That Nat would’ve seen. It’d been a long night.

“Wait...the hot Brazilian one? Hell the fuck yeah I was eyeing him.” He gave her the axiomatic look that was calling her out right back, cause there was no way she had. Except, y’know, Mystery Boyfriend. But. He’d have to get a name, so he could stop referring to him--

“I see you more settling for the Irish type,” Nat declared and he glanced at her suspiciously from the corner of his eye.

“What, redhead and freckles? Little biased I think?”

“I’m Russian,” she shot back, rolling her eyes at him although how the fuck was obvious he had no idea.

“Are you really. I’d’ve never guessed.” She made a weird sound and they fell back into amiable silence, snow drifting kinda pleasantly down now, although his leather jacket sure as hell hated him right now. That whole leather+water thing. But the snow was kinda nice, when it was late and quiet and peaceful like this. Whole world all covered and soft.

“Hmm. I don’t think I have a type,” he pondered, watching the snowflakes dance downwards, counting that Nat wouldn’t run him into a pole or something. They were almost back to his apartment anyways.

“Soft sunshine-blond hair, blue eyes like the sky?”

“Aw, I really come across that stereotypical?” He had to tip his head back down and give her a mild glare for that, green eyes going all big and serious, halting at the edge of his front steps.

“I think it’d be a nice compliment to your look!”

“What, pretty angel to match my devilish charm?” A perfect execution of his most mischievous, trouble-maker grin and Natalie laughed at him, shoving his shoulder playfully. Although from her, that meant almost being shoved down in the snow, and he had to laugh too.

It was nice, even with all the drama tonight, it’d been nice to go out and dance, just spend some time with Natalie. Get to see another side of that multifaceted gem. She was pretty damn great.
“Thanks for tonight, I had a great time. And for walking me home, in all this awful, nightmarish cold~”

“I had a good night too, Mr. Devilish Charm.” She smiled at him and he couldn’t resist the urge, freezing his fingers was worth it to hear that jingling laugh as he lifted two fingers to his forehead like devil horns.

She was still laughing as she walked away and that was it, it was decided.

He let himself inside, warm air washing over his dance-worn bones, unbreakable smile lingering on his face as he trudged up the steps and thought to himself.

This really was the best life. The very very best life.

~~~

“Hey, hey, three o’clock!’’

Nat jumped, one hand going for her belt as her head whipped around, followed where he was pointing.

“What?!”

“That girl! Isn’t she just about the prettiest thing you’ve ever seen?”

Natalie relaxed, the hand on her belt drawing off slowly. Weird.

“Wow. She is stunning. You talk to her?”

He sighed, plopping down in the seat beside her, dumping his bag on the floor and digging out his laptop for notes.

“Yeah, once. Said hi all smooth and charming and whatnot and she raised an eyebrow at me so. Yeah.”

“Sounds like that old fashioned charm just does wonders on modern women.” She slid him a handout of the powerpoints and he silently issued a prayer for the gracious, studious Natalie Roman, sliding his laptop back in his bag as she kept talking. “What are you naming your children? I bet they’d have her eyes.”

“Hopefully not, mine are prettier.” He clicked a pen open, scratching his name across the top in that lovely, neat handwriting he was super grateful and had no idea how he’d gotten. “Maggie and Montgomery.”

“For the kids? Why?” Nat reached over him to grab a pack of gum from his bag, popping a piece of his favorite into her mouth as he glanced up, copying down the textbook page numbers scrawled across the board.

“I dunno. Just popped in my head.”

She studied his profile for a moment, could feel it in his peripherals. He let her look - she studied him at the weirdest times, he was pretty used to it by now.
One moment, another, and Nat got back to chewing away his stash of cinnamon flavored attention span, half-muffled as she tossed the rest of the pack into his bag from afar.

“Works for me.”

~~~

“You think Rox would like this?” He held up a jingly collar, wrapped red and green with a big gold bell and Matt outright laughed at him. Or maybe he was laughing at how well it matched his sweater and scarf, but hey, only one time of the year you could wear green and red together without judgment. Kyle at least had the audacity to cover his mouth with a hand and snort.

“She’s not even your cat,” Chase pointed out and he sighed, rummaging through his wallet for a five and holding it out to the street vendor.

“You tell her that.”

“Hell no. That cat is vicious.”

“You’re...vicious,” he shot back lamely and even Luke rolled his eyes.

“Christmas is literally the best time of the entire year.” Kyle wrapped his fluffy scarf around his neck one more time, tugging at Matt’s arm to hurry him up.

“You just like the shopping part.”

“Because he’s got somebody to shop for this year, unlike the rest of us.”

“Not my fault you’re all single and sad,” Kyle sniffed and Luke rolled his eyes at Matt’s indignant backhand to Kyle’s shoulder.

“I’m not single!”

“Doesn’t count, you two are practically married.”

“How does that not count?”

“Just doesn’t!”

“You know what I don’t get? How Jimmy’s still single.”

“What?” He looked up from where he’d been checking off his Christmas-shopping list, which was unfortunately not as small as you’d think for a guy who only had friends from the past two months. He was so much more broke than his taste in friends.

“Yeah man! I mean, we all know Natalie’s practically your sister, so why the hell aren’t you dating anybody?” Chase jostled his shoulder and he shrugged, glancing between the waiting faces of the rest of the guys and stopping in the middle of the cobblestone as he recognized that expression.

“C’mon, it’s guys’ night! We’re here to shop, not talk about girls.”

“Rogers, that was literally the gayest thing I’ve ever heard you say.” Matt flicked him and he dodged it, lining up his metal fingers to retaliate and getting a very girly squeal outta his retreating friend.

“So is there a guy, then? You know we wouldn’t care--”

“Obviously, like half of us are gay in some way. It’s college.” He gave Luke an unimpressed look and the man nodded his agreement, throwing an arm around Kyle’s shoulders and ruffling that purple hair on principle.

“But no, there isn’t a guy. I’m just...I dunno, I’m not lookin’ to date anybody.”

Thankfully the next vendor started calling at them, something about free gourmet hot chocolate samples and everyone’s attention was diverted before he had to look up from his list, meet all their kind, caring eyes and find a way to describe that yeah, he wasn’t looking to date anybody but.

He just couldn’t shake the feeling there was already somebody he was supposed to be with.

Just couldn’t shake the feeling that in some way?

He kinda. Already felt taken.

.

~*~

~~~

~*~

.

And Steve?

Steve Rogers, on the other side of New York, staring out the window at the falling snow below, the millions of people bustling around in their red and green sweaters, cheery and celebrating the Christmas season in the streets--

He couldn’t shake a feeling either.

The same feeling he hadn’t been able to shake since that day, years ago, when Bucky’d been on Zola’s table and the Colonel told him, The name does sound familiar. I’m sorry.

Hadn’t been able to shake it even when Sam sat him down, Pepper and recovering Tony and Clint and Bruce and everyone gathered at the door, all quiet and watching distantly, supporting from afar what they could, no one daring get as close as Wilson did, one hand on Steve’s shoulder as he pushed him down onto the couch, everyone watching quietly as Steve stared at him and those words floated right over his head.

“You know he. He may be gone, Steve. For good. In the way you don’t come back from.”

They weren’t talking about psychologically.

“You gotta face...I know it’s hard man, believe me, I know. But. You gotta face the chance that Bucky’s...”

Dead.
They wanted him to believe Bucky’d committed suicide. Wanted him to at least consider it, they said.

You can’t wait forever, they told him.

Steve didn’t ever reply.

Didn’t speak much at all, these days.

But he still knew. He had that feeling, that same feeling he hadn’t been able to shake since the beginning.

Bucky was alive. He knew it, he wouldn’t dare doubt himself now. Bucky was alive and Steve knew that. He could feel him. Could feel their souls, tied across whatever distance was between them. It didn’t matter.

Bucky was alive.

And so was Steve, in the quietest sense of the word, because he had to be here, whole, when Bucky came back to him.

Because he was coming back.

Bucky was coming back.

Steve knew that. Sure as cherry pie on a summer’s day.

Bucky was coming back to him.

One day, Bucky was coming back home.

~~~

“Hannah! You’re gonna be like, a doctor, right?”

“Jimmy? The fuck are you calling me at four am for??”

“You’re applying to get into medschool this semester, right? You did say that, didn’t you?”

“Uhm. Yeah? I’m gonna be a nurse, why--”

“Okay, close enough. I just had the weirdest dream, do you think you could decipher it?”

“I’m...not a fucking psychologist. But. Uh. Sure? Let me heat up tea or something jeez. The fuck did you dream about that was important enough to call in the middle of the night?”

“Okay, so. There’s details and everything, but I’ll give you the jest. There were these two like, forces? I dunno, like. They were opposites, and one of them ended up sacrificing itself for the other but it didn’t make any sense, like there was all this darkness that nobody deserved and the sacrifice ended up being for nothing, like there was all this pain that could be avoided so easily, but ended up sacrificing anyways and it was for nothing--”
“You need to stop watching Netflix before you go to bed.”

“I’m being serious!!”

“So am I!”

“You’re the one that gave me the list of shows I had to watch.”

“And it’s a fantastic list! But maybe you shouldn’t be watching all these creepy shows when you live in that apartment all alone? Or else you end up having weirdass creepy dreams--”

“Oh whatever, like watching those shows with somebody makes them any less creepy.”

“...true. Speaking of which, have you gotten to the season three finale--”

“Oh my god, I cannot believe the bastard would do that, it’s supposed to be a fucking team, the hell kind of show just leaves with that explosion--”

.

~~~

.

“Is it weird to think I have a guardian angel?”

“Um…” Morgan blinked at him and he closed his mailbox quickly, sound echoing in the awkward silence. “I don’t...know?”

“Is that a thing though? Like, do people have guardian angels?”

“I don’t….think so?”

“Hmm. Okay. Say hi to Roxy for me.” He started for the stairs and Morgan blinked after him curiously.

“Say hi yourself! I think she let herself in your window again…”

.

~~~

.

“Merry Christmas!!”

“Merry Christmas! We still throwing that New Year’s party at your place, Jessica?”

“If you guys are fine with kicking in the New Year with roaches and my loudass neighbors, sure.”

“Will there be alcohol?”

“It’s Jessica. Of course there’ll be alcohol.”

“Then I’ll fucking be there. Merry Christmas to you, Jimmy!”

“Who drank all the fucking eggnog?!”
“It’s fucking Christmas! Be merry and make more!!”

~~~

Time wasn’t something he thought about much anymore, not unless he was counting the days it’d been since they’d told him, on the hospital hallway floor with one of his team members dying in the next room from his throat being slashed, the days since they’d told him Peg was gone and that meant Buck was too.

But he noticed, when Clint went missing for a week and a half.

Maybe it was the residual Captain’s instincts. Another team member, who he’d actually been talking to at one point, hadn’t shown back up after he’d pulled Steve aside, concerned.

“Rogers? Can we talk?”

“Barton. What can I do for you?” There was no inflection on the question so it didn’t sound like a question at all but Clint seemed surprised Steve was replying in general, didn’t look like he minded all that much.

Sat carefully down on the chair beside Steve’s couch, arms tense and spine rigid, eyes flitting like he was nervous, scared. Something.

His shoulder had been outta a cast for awhile now, no more evidence left on Barton’s body that Bucky’d snapped and left them all.

If only Steve could say the same.

“It’s uh...it’s Natasha.”

Steve managed to make himself lift his eyes, meet Clint’s briefly before looking away again. If Barton was coming to him about love advice, he was asking the wrong person.

Steve didn’t know anything at all about love. Didn’t know a single damned thing. Look at him. Look at him now.

“Something’s just...been bugging me. She’s always been elusive and whatnot, but. We don’t have any cases and I know she’s not working on one. Those signs, that’s easier to spot than Tony Stark in a dark room. So it’s gotta be something else.”

He took a deep breath in through his nose, glancing over at Barton’s hands worrying themselves into knots.

“What does?” Couldn’t even bring himself to lift his voice, a simple inflection to make it a question. Even that was too hard.

“She’s gone. All the time. Most of the day, only comes back at night, even then only five days a week. I’m worried. It’s not like Natasha to be gone all day, the hell could she be doing? It’s not like she’s training somewhere; I can’t tell you the last time she came home with an honest-to-god bruise.”

Clint was worried about Natasha being gone. Well. He could at least relate to that. But maybe worried wasn’t the right word for how he felt about Bucky these days.
“Didn’t know Romanoff still bruised,” he offered, the closest he’d been to a joke, some spark of life in the past seven weeks and Clint didn’t even notice the comment.

Which was fair, he might not’ve said it aloud anyways. Who knew anymore.

“I’m gonna go check it out myself at first, but. If I need backup, can I call you?” The question was so delicate, quiet, not at all about Natasha anymore, all about Steve and he blinked so slow he wasn’t sure if his eyes could ever open again, bottom lip threatening to quiver if he so much as breathed.

All he had to do was breathe, he had to remind himself, couldn’t afford another asthma attack this month.

“Yeah, Clint,” he swallowed, forcing his eyes up again, only the desperation and sorrow in Clint’s was so heavy he wasn’t sure he could turn away this time. “Still got no plans tomorrow night.”

And maybe it was because that conversation had felt so monumental, in some odd way, that he’d actually noticed.

Noticed time passing in more than a number to add onto the calendar days that Bucky’d been gone.

Clint had been missing, for a week and a half. Right after they’d had that conversation.

Steve’d never gotten a backup call.

But he’d promised, one of his team, that he’d be there for them.

And Clint was missing, so. If that wasn’t a call of backup, he didn’t know what was.

It was his duty track Barton down.

After all, he still had an endless supply of plans-free tomorrow nights and he might as well. Really should.

Get outta the tower. It’d been a few weeks since the last time the team had dragged him up here, for his own good. Something about how roaming the streets calling his name wasn’t going to bring Bucky back. He didn’t quite remember those days anyways. Like some story, never happened to him, right?

For the tiniest moment, let it all be not true.

More than anything--

Just remembered running. Running and running and spinning, like that first day he’d been reborn, out of the ice and he’d ran into times square and ran and ran and span and everything had been too bright and loud and all wrong and.

That’s all he remembered.

Only it wasn’t I had a date.

That date was dead.

It was Bucky.
And everyone kept saying he was dead too.

He still hadn’t gotten over puking every time he thought about that.

Blur.

But it wasn’t gonna be like that this time. He just had to find Clint, make sure he was okay. Be backup. Maybe do something good for once.

Then he’d be back in the tower and they could lock the doors and he’d eat everything they shoved in front of him and pretend not to hear Jarvis recording his vitals and giving another dismal report--

Just. Had to go find Clint.

Maybe shower, first. Clean up a bit.

Then he’d go find Clint and he could pretend, on the way home, that one day it’d be that easy to find Bucky too.

~~~

“Hi. I’m looking for a friend of mine, maybe you’ve seen him?”

“He in trouble?”

“No. Just...chasing around a girl. I’m a little worried about him.”

“Ah. Boy, I hate to tell you. But you’re prolly not gonna see him comin’ back round again. Not if there’s a girl.”

He made a weak sound, eyes averting down. The photograph of Clint stared back at him, the jolting words echoing around his head in that teasing tone, the man there had no idea, Not if there’s a girl. Never come back. Right, never come back.

The man cleared his throat and he shifted his weight, lifting his eyes to see the sympathetic look on the stranger’s face, voice carved out into the tsk-tsk, don’t you know, sorry kid sound.

“You ever been in love?”

“Just once,” Steve told him softly.

The man stopped, looked him over properly, made the most pitiful sound and it wasn’t nowhere near the sound inside his chest but that was alright.

“You ever been in love?”

“Just once,” Steve told him softly.

The man stopped, looked him over properly, made the most pitiful sound and it wasn’t nowhere near the sound inside his chest but that was alright.

“Hey, kid, you okay?”

Don’t fall in love, there’s just too much to lose. He wanted to scream it. Wanted to tell everyone in the entire goddamned world. Don’t fall in love. There’s just too much to lose.

He nodded slowly, folding the picture up and tucking it back into his pocket, eyes on the ground as he started for the door again.
“Thanks anyways.”

There were still Valentine's decorations littering a few storefronts, snow raining down like a cataclysm and he hadn’t bothered getting a scarf but he almost wished he had one now.

It was chilly and bitter, but sweet in the saddest way. Reminiscent of Brooklyn, of those winters back when Bucky held his heart but wouldn’t hold his hand, not out here on the sidewalks, not in public like this.

But he wasn’t gonna find Clint in Brooklyn. Wasn’t gonna find anybody in Brooklyn, not anymore. Might as well start on the other boroughs. How many times had he done that taxi ride, the one he was telling the driver now?

Brooklyn to Queens, please.

Why? Where’re we headed?

The future.

He was late, fuck, he was late. His poetry professor was pretty cool, but she wasn’t that cool.

That was the weird thing. Half the teachers in college didn’t even know your name, let alone whether you were in class or not and the other half were offended to hell if you were so much as three seconds late to their class.

To be fair, she was passing back their poems today, and he’d really like to know what she thought. Grades didn’t matter because he was taking way too eclectic of a schedule to get a degree right now anyways, but feedback was fucking great and she always passed poems back at the beginning of class, individually and everything.

But Roxy’d been a fucking pain this morning and if he couldn’t handle corralling a feisty little cat, maybe he really shouldn’t get a dog. It was a nice idea, in hindsight, but could he seriously handle a beautiful, time-consuming, probably life-consuming golden retriever?

Probably not.

It was his priorities, he’d bet. His hair looked fucked great today, swished up seamless and Hollywood, outfit entirely on point, from his lace-ups to the debonair jacket he’d layered with that button up and sweater-vest. Sweater-vests were seriously under-rated.

Although god knows by the time he fucking got to class, he’d probably look like a goddamned wreck at the speed he was taking these sidewalks.

At least it was vaguely warmer today, and the pelting snow from this morning was taking a break which was literally his saving grace, there was no way he’d be able to make it to class if he had to deal with snow in his eyes too.

Mornings like these though, he just could not wait for summer, all that sunshi--

“Fuck!!”

It happened in slow motion, one second he was glancing over his shoulder and the next thing he knew he was colliding into somebody - that felt a lot more like a brick wall than a person, bouncing off in a comic-book twist, fumble of sprawling limbs, sudden scattering of all his books to the sidewalk.

“I’m so sorry,” he rushed, scrambling to scoop up the closest textbook, on his ass on the coldass sidewalk and his tailbone was smarting from the fall, one of his palms scratched up a bit on a piece of ice or something but he was still late to class and now his stuff was everywhere and he’d ran into some guy--

He noted somewhere in the back of his head that the guy’d swooped down, had half his books cradled in arms that put Natalie’s boyfriends’ to shame, that this guy was faster to drop and help him gather his books than he’d been to drop them, only.

Only that was all in the back of his head because the actual conscious part of his brain was too busy freaking the fuck out to do anything but stare.

The guy’s head was ducked, blonde-- no, gold, the color of fucking sunlight and he wasn’t saying that because he was on his way to poetry class, that was literally the only way to describe how the light reflected off like he was a light source himself.

Track pants and a tight shirt and holy fuck, that shirt was tight, he either gave himself a concussion or he was about to pass out from just all that. Overwhelming. Fuck.

Fuck wow, that was the most beautiful man he’d ever seen in his entire life and he was just sitting here staring at him but he literally couldn’t move. He couldn’t move, he was more frozen than the crunchy white underneath the curled hand propping him up.

And then the man lifted his head.

The sharp inhale was audible, in the way that exhales fogged up in cold, a harsh painting of a breath that should've been like any other only it wasn’t, this moment wasn't, that man wasn't.

Chest seized up and lungs convulsing, like he was physically falling, that awful weightless drag right before you snapped out of a dream with a scream only he wasn't snapping anytime soon, this wasn't a fucking dream.

But Jesus Christ. The color of those eyes sure were.

That blue, that stunning, wide blue, he’d seen it a million times and never before, like the first cool splash of an ocean wave after living on the beach for your entire life and never venturing into the water before now.

Their eyes met and something inside him shifted. Not just because those were the most beautiful eyes he’d ever seen, not because that was the most beautiful human being he’d ever seen, not because he couldn't breathe and the man was staring at him with the same frozen awe? he was, it was because.

Something clicked inside his chest. The same way the world looked different after the credits rolled on a fantastic movie, the click that came with shutting the best book you'd ever read after those last piercing words, the kind of shift that you could tell, in that instant, that your life was changed forever.

He'd never been more terrified and alive in his life.

The entire world was different now, he could feel it in the deepest part of him and he had no idea what he was supposed to do, how he would ever thaw enough to say a single word.

Heavens above. Those were the most captivating eyes he'd ever seen.
That entire man, that was the most beautiful thing he'd ever seen. Nothing else even came close.

He could hear his heart pounding in his chest, could feel the cold air swirl around them as those light pink Cupid's bow lips parted, eyebrows furrowing and blue suddenly shifting like a Ferris wheel, rolling out of shock, surprise, and into an unnamable emotion so deep he could feel it twisting, wrenching into his soul--

“Bucky?”

The word shook him by the shoulders, warm familiar too-big hands in leather gloves breaking leather straps, fractured moonlight breaking through the sea and he was slipping under the surface, dragged into the sky by beating white angel wings, delivered into the cold and-- --shocked back to life after flatlining on a dirty table in the basement of some cold distant factory.

Cold air breathed into his lungs, never let me go and the world was being ripped out from beneath his cut-up feet.

“Who the hell is Bucky?”

Devastation.

Gapping shock, pretty pink parted and staring and his chest was seizing and he was.

Late to class.

The man looked like he'd just ripped his heart out his chest with his bare metal hand and suddenly he didn't feel so well. He actually kinda felt like he was gonna be sick.

Staring at him and the panic was setting in, defense raising like an icy guard between them.

“Who the hell are you?”

Hands flailing, reaching, dropping through the cold and he blinked, disorientation seeping into his bones and suddenly the terror that'd been hovering at the edge of his peripherals smashed into his bones.

“No...no,” the blonde said softly, the first words he'd heard from that mouth and they were so quiet and sure and he could feel his bones crumbling.

“No, you wouldn't.” Those blue eyes were sinking him into the ground, voice deep and familiar and distant, like the man was drowning, trying to speak through the crashing surface of the waves, broken glass. “You-- Buck.”

A tug inside his chest like his heart was on a lasso tied directly to that word and he'd never been so scared, pulse loud and thudding, eyes wide and fingers slipping.

It took all the coordination in weak limbs to grab the last book on the ground, tuck it against his pounding chest. Scramble shakily to his feet.

“I don't. I don't know you, I'm sorry--”
The gravity beneath him was twisting, pulling him sideways and down and he struggled to stay up, upright, blinking rapidly as the wing-clipped Angel, solid solid rose to his feet, a touch taller than he was, shoulders wide, blocking out the artificial sun in the sky.

Those Blues were still staring at him, slipping shards of glass beneath his skin.

“You wouldn't.” He swallowed, somehow, and the man’s voice was so calm up to this point only now it was shaking, red and fiery like a volcano about to burst. “You wouldn't fucking dare.”

He still had his books.

Two of them, clutched to that broad chest like if those strong arms weren’t holding onto something they'd be breaking something and really, it was, what--

A book he had to read for English, his Chemistry textbook. He could do without. Had a feeling trying to get them back would...

He had to get out of here. He couldn't breathe and he had to get out of here.

“Look, I'm sorry, I really. I uh. I think you have me confused with somebody.” Backing away, slowly, unable to look away from the highlighted angles of that face, a flash of blonde pushed outta the way with his fingertips, small fragile shoulders and bruised ribs, lips parted in pain but they were the same parted in shock staring at him and that couldn't possibly be right.

He didn't have memories, didn't have anything, and it had to be a mistake. You have me confused with somebody. I promise, I promise, you do.

“I'm. M'late to class, I. I hope you. 'ave a good day, sorry again, I. I gotta go--”

Just go, get outta here.

He turned, hands shaking, head ducked and heart pounding and it was swimming down down falling for black water when there was glimmering sunshine in the other direction and he couldn't breathe couldn't feel his feet, only knew they were running.

Running and running and running. Just go, get outta here.

No not without--

Gravity wrapped him up in cold arms, lips parted around air that wouldn't come and someone was dialing nine-one-one and Steve couldn't think, couldn't think of anything but how chilly the ground was on his knees.

No one had to kick them out from under him this time.

Get on your knees, Captain! Get down! Get down!

“Get down! Get down, Jesus Christ! That helmet doesn't protect you from fucking machine guns, Rogers! Monty, you got Steve’s left? Can't get that angle from up here--”

Up there. A tree, a rooftop, up up and gone.

Down down and gone.

Gone.
You wouldn't. You wouldn't fucking dare. You wouldn't do that to me, you wouldn't.

I know what you're gonna say, Buck.

You wouldn't do that to me.

Bucky’s hands lowering him carefully to the pavement, one hand cradling his skull, silverblue crystals looking worriedly down at him under short hair, the hair from the war, the man from the war with that scar on his cheekbone, Brooklyn accent breaking over him distant, echoing--

“Steve? Steve? Stay with me, Stevie, c’mon. We’ll get you home, just gotta get you home--”

Home.

~~~

The wooden door was too heavy to burst open dramatically, but about twenty people still turned around when he shoved through it, out of breath and eyes wild.

Professor Jade was glaring at him from where she was passing out papers in the third row, but she wasn’t entirely done with the class and that meant he wasn’t gonna get marked down.

Jesus Christ, he had no idea how that was possible. It felt like his run-in with that man had lasted for an eternity.

Couldn’t’ve been more than a few minutes. Fuck, that was crazy, his entire life had been flipped on a dime inside of a few minutes.

Okay, he should probably sit down now, instead of breathing heavily in the lecture hall doorway.

Wading through fog, drifting thick enough that he could probably use a gas mask, almost felt like he had to wave his arms through the invisible mess to move at all but here he was, somehow, sinking down in his usual seat in the back quarter.

God, fuck, he was confused. What was he supposed to do?

That man had genuinely thought they’d known each other. What if they had?

No, he couldn’t think about that. He didn’t have a past, remember? It was gone, even if that guy’d meant anything in some other world, that world didn’t even exist anymore.

Memories into daydreams into nothing at all and now they were reversing the process, gold and blue drifting behind his eyes, jumping at the edges of his vision like fucking ghosts.

Jesus fuck, he wasn’t gonna be able to shake this thing anytime soon. Or ever.

Only another guy on the street, why couldn’t he wipe that heartbroken look from his head?

He’d never quite understood his own decision to wipe goddamned everything, but right now that sounded like just about the best thing he could think of.

How was he ever supposed to get the broken sound, echoing over and over in his head already,
Bucky?

That man had been so sure he’d known who he was. No, more than known. Whoever Bucky was, he’d been...extremely important to that man.

Fuck, he just wanted to stop thinking about it. Wanted to just. Start over, not run into any blonde angel-ghosts next time.

Was it crazy to want to wipe all his memories again just cause’a some look on somebody’s face--

What am I fighting for, if it ain’t you?

Whoa, whoa.

Wait.

Wait, what if that’d been why--

The first time--

He’d always figured it was like. The memory of his arm being blown off. But he had a good arm now, so that’d turned out okay. What if. What if the reason why he’d wiped his entire head clean--

That feeling, he had all the time, that he wasn’t alone? That he was taken? That there was someone, out there, somewhere, waiting for him. The star on his arm, that an army buddy would’ve had to drawn after they got back to the states.

The look on that man’s face.

The flashes, hand pushing aside blonde bangs, bruised ribs, that color blue that was so familiar he couldn’t breathe.

What if. What if that was why he’d--

That was it. That was it. It wasn’t about the war, was it? It was about a person.

By god. He’d killed the old version of himself because of a person.

It took a minute or two to recognize the taste of metal on his lips, blinking slowly back to reality and wondering how long he’d been sitting there with his hand over his mouth, staring at nothing at all.

A paper smacked down on the tiny excuse for a foldable desk and he jumped, retracting his hand and snapping his head up to look wide-eyed at his professor. She’d come all the way back up here to give him back his paper and he shook his head once, forcing himself to shove it all aside, look down at the red mark at the top of his poem.

It was a B, in a circle.

Bucky?

J.B.R. James Bucky Rogers?

Buck.

Oh my god. Buchanan. Buchanan, Natalie’d suggested Buchanan, it was James Buchanan--
Bucky.

He was Bucky. No no no, he was Bucky, he was Bucky, and Natalie, Natalie’d known? Did Natalie know? What the fuck was happening? He hadn’t seen her in days, how could--

“I hate to mark you down on this, but. There are some major flaws with it.” Professor Jade’s words were drifting over him and he couldn’t stop staring at the B circled on the top of his paper. “Lately, it seems your poems have really shifted. Frankly, it’s concerning, the...darkness I can feel in your words. This, it’s just. Heartbreaking. If we were studying Poe I wouldn’t be worried, but. This was supposed to be a love poem. It reads like horror.”

Horror.

“Have you ever been in love?” Words detached, like they weren’t even coming outta his mouth as he looked up suddenly, fingers curling over that red slashed B. His professor was looking at him with knit eyebrows, worried, and he held her gaze, voice not even his.

“I have,” he said shortly, clipped, and part of his brain was blinking warning signs and the other was so fucking confused, because he didn’t even know that, he didn’t know anything--

“I don’t remember it. Don’t remember anything but this brilliant color blue. Sunshine warmer than summer. Safety, pulling me off tables, laughter. Stars.”

He’d been so devastated.

The journal, he’d left himself, it’d been so careful but now it was so goddamned transparent, like the entire time it’d been screaming, screaming,

I was in love and it killed me and so I killed you.

Professor J was waiting. He looked back down at the paper, tracing the B once. A red star, on his arm.

Horror, in a whisper now, so lost harsh frozen, staring--

“And it leaves you...cold as winter.”

Faded to quiet smoke, wisping away in the harsh wind.

A movement in his peripherals and he glanced up, a business card with some gold emblem flashing dully in the lights.

“There’s a guidance counselor on campus. I think it might be good for you to talk to somebody.”

It took a second to connect. Reality. Right, he was...probably not looking all that stable. Should learn to keep his mouth shut, huh?

Metal whirred loud enough to be nails screeching down a chalkboard but at least his fingers cooperated, taking the card numbly from the outstretched hand. He stared at the letters, found he couldn’t process a single one. Nodded a dim thanks, looking away.

So much for being okay.

Drained. Devastation

He had a past, a real one, and it was waiting for him.

Missing him.
You wouldn’t fucking dare.

What, forget the fucking sun?

You know, he’d been pretty damn bright himself. Jessica called him brighteyes with that sarcastic tone a’hers. Chase used to make jokes about that “debonair smile” lighting up the goddamned room.

How was he ever supposed to light up again, when suddenly all that was zapped away, tangled up in the resonating bright from that man, who’d known him. Who he’d known. He didn’t even know his name, fuck how was he supposed to do this?

How was he supposed to do this?

The lecture seat creaked in complaint as he shifted his weight, gaze restless, hand rubbing over his mouth. Prof was up there starting lecture and he couldn’t fucking focus on a thing.

God, okay. One step at a time. He was way too emotional and confused to make any crazy fucking decisions right now. Just, poetry class first, then he’d figure something the fuck out. Track down Nat, figure out what the fuck she knew.

Okay, poetry. Poetry, he should be taking notes. Backpack, spiral. Pen. Flip through pages, new blank white page-- He’d wiped it fucking all.

Stop. Stop, fuck, write something then. The powerpoint at the front said Literary Devices, just write it goddamned down.

His pen started doodling on his own, he’d fucking swear to his grave.

It took him a while to blink back to reality enough to see he was drawing eyes, those fucking eyes.

A couple of people glanced over at the sound of ripping paper, crumbling up into a ball and tossing it at his feet--

Another flash, paper ripping, smudged graphite on his hand, and suddenly wind, and entire sketchbook launching off the side of something fucking tall, stories and stories below as papers fluttered down, heart pounding and flash flash--

“Fuck.” Both hands in his hair, gripping a little too tight but his fucking head was betraying him and he didn’t know what that was, what the fuck was happening. Was that a memory? Were they fucking coming back?

Or maybe his head was making it up. Fuck, fuck all of this, he couldn’t fucking handle--

Deep breath in. Foot still tapping to hell, but deep breath, force all that aside, he just. Had to get back to reality.

“You okay?” Somebody whispered, off to the side. One of his classmates. He was a college student. Having a fucking crisis about what, the dumbest of things.

So he’d ran into somebody beautiful when he was all riled up and the guy’d been mistaken and now he was concocting this whole fucked-up thing?

“Yeah, yeah, I’m fine,” he muttered back, wiping a hand down his face and forcing himself to look down at the front of the room, read the letters on the powerpoint title individually, process them as an entire word.

There were no answers. He had to fucking drop this before he lost his mind. He had a vivid imagination, that was all.

Besides, let’s be fucking real. If he’d known somebody that beautiful, who’d cared about him that much, he wouldn’t fucking leave.

What kinda lunatic would just walk out on that, throw it away forever?

_You wouldn’t, you wouldn’t fucking dare._

So much for going through the hell of having no memories to haunt him! Fucking look at him now!!

Fucking sunshine _ghosts_ fuck, just get OUTTA HIS HEAD.

Okay. Chill. Write something down. Just, copy the slide, nice and slow.

His hand was shaking.

Nice. And. Slow.

He was fine.

The structure of sonnets, they’d be studying Petrarchan versus Shakespeare. He’d already written a sonnet, see, one step ahead of the game. Fourteen lines so it’d been Shakespeare style. It was a good sonnet too.

Only what the _fuck_ was it about--

No. No, it couldn’t be about this. That’d be ridiculous. There’d been no way for him to know.

The sun metaphor he’d used, it was _entirely_ unrelated to the sunshine-angel he’d just ran into. It’d been a stranger! There’d been _no_ way for him to know. Psyching himself out for no reason.

Focus. Focus on the lecture.

“One of the elements used to enhance a poem is the poignant choice of punctuation, or lack thereof.”

Punctuation. Okay. All he had to do was focus on that. Literary devices in different sonnets, he could do that. Just, listen, listen and everything would be okay. It’d all work itself out, he just had to make it through his class.

“Caesura is a pause in the middle of a phrase, anywhere actually. And this makes it different from an end-stop. Those include a physical punctuation and they are always _always_ at...does anybody know?”

Twenty-five minutes, all he had to last.

“That’s right! For those of you in the back who couldn’t hear, caesura’s can be anywhere but an end stop _must_ be at the end of the line.”

Snap.

Like when you were sitting innocently in some cafe and somebody said the name of your favorite band, the most powerful of selective hearing and your head just _whipped_ around, snap up fast enough to get whiplash.

Ice water to the face. It hit him like ice water at 9.8 m/s times all of the distance between the top of that mountain and the black water below. Fast enough, hard enough, to rip his arm off.

The end of the line.

Frozen.

And he was falling.

Wind whistling, cold frigid on his fingers, metal wrapped under two human hands, side of the train car peeled back like a sardine can, red glove reaching for him, diving, and he was falling.

“BUCKY!! NOO!!”

The man, from the street, younger, in a uniform, diving for him and screaming, shouting his name his name, blood in the snow.

Two hands, lifting, one metal, fingers closing around someone's throat suddenly, vicious, heart pounding and terror sinking in, snapshot roll of fingers closing around throats, “Sergeant Barnes,” German accent, creeping cold, ice and the tiniest window, world disappearing.

Falling, falling.

“Bucky?” Older, confused, colorful shield in hand and a bridge, his name, but I knew him.

“Then finish it. Cause I’m with you--”

The man, falling, the crash and he was hanging by an arm, watching the water below. I knew him.

He let go.

And he was falling, again, only this time he hit something at the bottom.

No, not the bottom, he was falling against something hard. A loud crash, books and a spiral notebook smacking the floor, stumbling, tangled in the strap of his backpack. Metal arm catching dead weight as he crumpled against the row of seats in front of him.

“Rogers? Rogers, are you alright?”

Rogers.

The hell did you do?

The hell did you do?

Hands gripping his head, collapsed between the rows now and it was all swimming back, a lifetime of fights, red and black and blue, bruised ribs and lips and blood between the plates of his metal fingers and in the crescent bite on his hip--

Only he's not a fighter. He’s not a fighter but he’s here, on the frontline, scope settled on that vulnerable broad blue spine, bare spine under his lips, shuddering moan and he’s not a fighter, he's a lover but he's fighting and and Daydreams into memories and the deeper he goes the less he can breathe, heart too soft to pound this hard in his chest, beating bruised flesh and shocking brighter, faster, harder, electric soul--

Black and blue blue eyes.

When Bucky'd shipped out, for the war, he’d turned on one heel, too young to know everything that really mattered, fool hand lifting to his forehead, saluting the only photo he wanted to take with him, tuck inside his helmet but couldn’t, didn’t, both of their faces begging one last thing.

Remember me.

When Bucky’d been saved, standing there at the sun’s side, burning Icarus’s wings right off as he lifted his shredded vocal cords, promise me a place, and shouted over the crowd, Let’s hear it for Captain America! the blue eyes turning to catch the look on his face, one raised eyebrow, tipped head, knowing smile, swearing one last thing.

I won’t ever forget you.

You know me, the breathy familiarity, blue helmet cast aside and burning eyes ripping up his soul, all the puzzle pieces locking right back into place, terror lining every metal plate, you know me, promising one last thing.

I knew him.

If you’re a lover, you should know, the lonely moments just get lonelier the longer you're in love than if you were alone.

It’s not fights at all. War stories, they’re all love stories.

I don’t want to be afraid. The deeper that I go, it takes my breath away.

And all along, it was never a fight. Red black blue blue bleeding hearts, not breathing, and the fists had rings. Twin rings.

Heart to Heart and Eyes to Eyes.

Soldiers, blue catching across a battlefield, twin bleeding stars carved in chests.

And when your fantasies become your legacy, promise me a place.

In your house of memories.

Broken hands, the bandage wrapped around sweet artist hands, speakers blasting and smashing and rooftops begging jump jump jump--

You wouldn’t fucking dare.

Those past lovers will always haunt me--

Two hands on his jaw, lips pressed so tight he could feel his heartbeat in his throat, long hair fisted in callused hands.

I wish I could believe you never ruled me.

Scissors, silky brown falling, a decade each, younger and younger with each snip, and the man in the mirror who’d taken the lives of those he loved the most, owed the most, and snapped them in half, the man ready to throw it all away.

The man so.

So scared.

And the look in those crystal eyes, it was nothing. Nothing to the devastation in blue ones, cold ground and worn shoes, books scattered and the only voice that’d ever mattered, breathing his name his name--

Hands, ripped apart and sewn back together, hand in hand walking through hell, tipped back in laughter and a sharp gasp, eyes blown and hands sliding down spines, intertwining and shoving against pillows, falling falling and fingers catching.

Holding on.

Never letting go.

The flash of sunlight in his eyes and golden gravity staring at him in the middle of the street, world shifting under their feet, tipping sideways and falling into the only thing he’d ever known, the thing he’d been falling towards, all along.

All along, at the bottom of the ravine, at the bottom of the Potomac, at the bottom of every nightmare, it wasn’t darkness he’d been falling to underneath open windows, kids aren’t al-- I think you’re my best friend, he’d been falling towards, all along, towards that call, the word that shattered through every block of ice he’d ever built, ever lost, melting away everything cold for the rest of eternity.

“Bucky?”

Golden days.

Somewhere in a lecture hall in Queens College, a gasp of fresh air and a corpse electrocuted back to life with the same scream from that chair, in a bank vault, the chair that’d taken it all away, killed a man who couldn’t take it and let him live again,

Brought back to life, with more than everything he’d ever lost, a soul sparked into existence and gasped, a single word -- a prayer, a dying breath and the first gasp of air in a century.

“Yes.”

.

.

☆

Chapter End Notes

xx

I know, you probably hate me, but it had to happen man Idk. The idea of what their lives could be like without the hell they've been through. The whole debate of whether that's better, or if the pain of being together is worth the good of being together?

Ignorance is bliss, aight. But ignorance is also now over, and.

We've got places to go now, and one chapter left, so. I do hope you stick around.

I have no chill check out this gif it's absolutely Steve's face in that last scene ha

Much love to you all, thank you so much for reading. (Come yell at me if you like, as always.)

xx

Songs:
- Me Myself and I - G-Eazy
- Runaround Sue - G-Eazy
- Hot Time in the Town of Berlin - Bing Crosby & the Andrews Sisters
- Uma Thurman - Fall Out Boy (they actually played this at a club I went to and I was like !?!)
- House of Memories - Panic! at the Disco
- Ever After - Mariana's Trench

(And the drawing Bucky kept from Steve's notebook, that Jimmy hung on his wall - art cred to moi)

xx
My dear friends. To all of you who've hung on this long, I wish I had better words than thank you. You've supported this story since the beginning, and you'll never know how truly grateful I am to have had such an amazing team helping me create my first real masterpiece. Because, y'know, 75k chapter here and. Yeah, TIMLB is my masterpiece, and I never could've done it without you.

Anyways. On to the boys.

Warnings: Derealization, panic attacks, physical violence, discussions of eating disorders (specifically, not eating for an extended period of time), suicidal ideation, death, military funerals, identity crises (i know), memory loss

I PROMISE THERES A GOOD ENDING OKAY JUST PLEASE HANG IN THERE

Also, quoting from the first season of Agent Carter TV show, the Civil War trailers, and Captain America: White

References to these poems, novels, and posts:

xx
xx
(and from this incredible poet)
xx
xx
(shoutout to Farewell to Arms - Ernest Hemingway for quotes)

Before you read: the wrist drawing.

Songs:

* Carry On - Fun
* Collar Full - P!atD
* Art of War - We the Kings
* Incomplete - James Bay

If you haven't seen the TIMLB Art Masterpost, you can find all the chapter headings (and songs and everything else) there.

P.S. there may or may not be a link you REALLY WANNA CLICK in the final ☆ star =cough cough epilogue cough=

And please, I'd love to know what you think. Writing this sure has taken something outta me, if it's done anything for you, I'd be honored to hear.

Thank you. For every comment, kudos, bookmark. Every word you've read and said. Thank you.
Keep dancing, friends.

(And the crooked smiles fade.)

xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"A tragedy need not have blood and death; it's enough that it all be filled with that majestic sadness. That is the pleasure of tragedy."
-- Jean Racine

“Buck. Do you remember me?”

Hope. Broken hope, instead of devastation, the hope of two displaced soldiers finally fighting the same war.

A breakdown in a classroom in Queens and he finally saw all those long bloody battles piled up but it was 1945 and 2016 and that was the year it ended.

Breathe disaster ever after and this time, this time.

They might win.

“Wait for me, wait for me,” Bucky murmured, snatching the journal off its shelf and tossing it across the room to his bag. Journal, notebook of poems, Steve’s drawing off the wall, and he was off, storming down the stairs, door blasting open and sharp breath of cold air filling lungs, prismacolor world lit up and the sun just starting to set in the sky, lighting the way like the stupid-obvious North Star it’d always been.
“I’m comin’ Stevie,” he swore, broken over the months he hadn’t spoken it, the months long as those frozen winters behind glass. “I’m comin’ home.”

The sky tipped sideways and the ice creeping up his knees was settling in his chest, cementing his heart against the inside of his lungs; only thing that’d explain the vacuumed cavern that wasn’t letting him breathe, red shiny pieces crumbling chipped and sharded into his stomach.

“-u okay? Excuse me, sir?” Someone’s hand was on his shoulder, voices washing over a wave of paused business shoes, college sneakers.

Someone could get shot in New York City and no one noticed but this was Queens, college town. Books, backpacks, concerned teenage voices.

Kids his age.

Clutching books instead of broken hearts. He was clutching both. Why was he carrying...

It took awhile to feel his arms, unfolding, pages falling open.

“If people bring so much courage to this world the world has to kill them to break them, so of course it kills them. The world breaks everyone and afterward many are strong at the broken places. But those that will not break it kills. It kills the very good and the very gentle and the very brave impartially. If you are none of these you can be sure it will kill you too but there will be no special hurry.”

Farewell to Arms.

Bucky.

“Woah, bro, slow down there--”

“Sir, do you need help--”

“Move, move, you all need to move,” Steve gasped, shoving upright, tripping over the fallen Chemistry book, broken icy cobblestone.

No, not cobblestone, pavement.

Someone's shoulder, more shouts and his head was spinning but his legs were working now, enough to get him across, enough to get him out.

Enemy fire. From the only gun he'd trusted to watch his six.

The crowd gave up on him at some point because the next thing he knew it was strangers he was knocking shoulders with, blank faces passing in disorienting flashes and he was stumbling, wasn’t breathing right, a couple of seconds with a palm against a brick wall 'cept he couldn’t steady himself when his body was crumbling apart from the insideout.

Cars speeding past, metal screeching and horns blaring, axles shifting with this terrible highpitched whine he could feel behind his eyes, piercing into every sulcus of his brain, radiating in the ridges of his pallet, drilling into the roof of his mouth.

The edges of the world were too sharp, lights flashing fake colors over and no matter how far he stumbled forward there were still lights, noise, people, knives building up in his stomach.
He'd stopped feeling his body a few weeks ago and now shoving back into it was like twisting into something too sharp weak and small for him, broken ribbed and twisting twig arms all over again, shattering splitting spine with every jarring step and he hadn't felt this weak -- hadn't felt at all, for so long and now all he could do was feel and his body kept trying to drag him screaming to the pavement.

The clouds were covering the sky now, dark and gray and blanketing out all that arching brightness that'd flashed for just a brief moment.

Cold electrifying his skin in sparks, white dots colliding through the air and it took him a minute to figure out it was raining.

No, not raining. Snowing?

It looked like rain, pouring rain and it was cold, wet but when he held out his arms, looked at the ground there were tiny white dots, frozen raindrops mixed with snow and he didn't know if he was walking or dreaming anymore.

Staring at his feet meant they kept going, one in front of the other, but his balance was thrown and it took everything he had not to tip, weak bones in limp arms, heavy legs, empty cave torso and his head was pounding so hard he could barely hear how loud his heart was.

But he heard the shout.

He heard the shout and something inside, something deeper than the broken red glass tumbling between ribs and puncturing lungs, deeper than the lightheaded sensitivity crumpling organs --

Something underneath it all snapped, clicked, a sudden rush to his head and it was lifting, shoulders rolling, chin tipping up, the tiniest glimmer of a twenty-something, younger old old version of someone he knew,

Kicking and clawing and fighting deep inside, beneath the hunger, before even Bu--

There was a shout and he was so dizzy he couldn't see straight but he found himself in the alley anyways, breath heaving in too tight chest, dripping lungs, the pulse in his veins thudding as it registered, gun, mugger, bully.

His knees were smarting from the fall, fingers were shaking with the cold, chest too tight, the most familiar voice in the world echoing in his head and he could swear, the one thing that hadn’t changed in this city were the alleys. The alleys, and the soul buried deep underneath the trumpets, snaredrums, patriotic backmarch,

“Hey!” The mugger startled at the sound of his voice and Steve couldn’t look all that intimidating with one hand on his burning abdomen and his knees all scuffed up but that’d never stopped him before, throat protesting the same as back then but he lifted his voice, called out with the only real sense he had left. “Pick on someone your own size!”

It’d never been that easy for him in the thirties and apparently it wasn’t that easy now either. He wasn’t Bucky, after all.

The gun swung his way and thankfully he had some speed left, or else that would’a been a nasty ending to a pretty fucking surreal afternoon.
His heart was pounding too hard to hear, think, but somehow his elbow collided with something hard and the next thing he knew the mugger’s gun was in his hands instead. The man with the wallet had enough initiative to take off, but the mugger looked pissed as Steve’d ever seen a bully.

One gloved hand over a jacket pocket, either had a knife and was counting on Steve’s beading hairline to get his gun back, or maybe pissed and desperate enough to attack either way.

It took all the focus and strength he had to aim the muzzle at the mugger, tip his head with that silent warning, don’t even try it. Only he was breathing heavy, shirt sticking to his skin beneath his brown leather jacket, tight enough it could be that old old uniform, the first one, from the tour. Tights and flimsy plastic shields.

Or maybe trashcan lid shields.

It wasn’t enough, because the next thing he knew the mugger had a knife, advancing slow on Steve with this unafraid glint in his eye. Did he not see the goddamn gun--

The gun in his hands, that were shaking. Shaking a lot. It took a couple seconds to register, blinking dumbly at the wobbling end of the black muzzle only duh, he couldn’t shoot a bus at 20ft with his hands shaking like that.

His knees were shaking too.

Little and weak and broken and freezing and. Alone. No one to clean him up this time, no one to scold or patch him up.

Shaking.

He dropped the gun, safety flicked on, kicking it aside in one quick motion and pulling his arm back in the other.

Then his fist was cracking over the mugger’s cheekbone and things were shaking a hellofalot less.

Actually, wasn’t shaking at all. There was blood dripping slowly onto the ground and his chest was heaving but his heart was beating.

His broken heart was beating.

Who knew it could do that anymore?

“Sometimes I think you like gettin’ punched,” Bucky’s voice echoed somewhere behind him, scolding and affectionate and teasing all rolled into one and he was too caught up to dodge the first lunge properly.

The knife missed his arm by a centimeter, but the kick landed square on his shin, ripping black and blue up his leg like a dozen boots in the past.

See, he’d’ve been prepared if he’d known it was coming. But the mugger shouldn’t’ve gotten up that fast. Or at all.

Spent years now, knocking out enemy soldiers with one punch. When was the last time he’d hit someone? When was the last time his arms weren’t made of rubber? There was nothing solid in the punch because there were no bones left in his body, no mass left in his muscle. Emaciated as a perfect-celled supersoldier could be.
So he hadn’t anticipated the fight back. But he could win this.

Arm lifting, fingers curling, only before he could follow through there was a solid knock to his jaw and the whine in his pallet shot straight through his brain, peripherals blinking stars as he stumbled backwards, legs tangling him off balance, the way they had when they were young and scrappy. But he’d gotten up then, sure as hell was getting up now.

Staggering up straight, another swinging limb that once held so much power only he didn’t have any of the force, control behind it when his head was still spinning and he was gasping for air and if he hadn’t spent years fighting this way, disoriented and broken, he’d be down for the count already.

’Least he still didn’t know when to stay down.

“I can do this all day.”

Flash of silver and he ducked, aiming a jab for the mugger’s ribs. Funny, how much he could be throbbing and still dealing out blows that couldn’t possibly ache as much as he did.

A fist swung back, fast and dirty, landing right in his concave stomach. The sudden rush of bile to his throat made a hand clap over his mouth involuntarily, only then the mugger was reaching for the gun on the ground and Steve didn’t have time to be sick, snapping his knee into the man’s chest.

The quiet groan of pain wasn’t from behind the bandana-mask, couldn’t be when he could feel the bruise radiating up his thigh, skin and bones so raw they could split.

All he needed was one more well-placed punch and the fight’d be over, just had to time it right--

Arrogance may not be a uniquely American trait, but I must say, you do it better than anyone.

Storming in here like he could make a difference, change a damn thing in this state.

Last time he’d been this unprepared, unacquainted with his own lying body he’d snuck onto that Hydra shipping truck in ‘43, landing with a sloppy roll and one of the showgirl helmets lopsided on his head, two Hydra goons staring him down with guns as his little smile of victory sunk into reality and he managed a familiar,

“Fellas.”

Only he wasn’t vaulting up tanks, ducking behind crates, knocking on doors and knocking out guards, sneaking around an enemy base on his own thirty miles behind enemy lines.

He was in goddamned Queens in some alley and he couldn’t get some waste-a-breath mugger to stay down. Fucked up as it was, this was the most he’d felt like himself in months.

Fuck, he missed his shield.

Comfortable weight across his forearms traded for dragging bones, broken joints. Protection for vulnerability and he was nothing but slashed open from the inside out since Buck sank that first knife into his chest, hilt slamming a bruise over the deep cut that barely missed his heart.

Barely, right.

His fist connected with bone, still strong enough those ribs would be black and blue but they wouldn’t be cracked, not when everything inside was shattered twice over.
A whooshing sound and the stars in his peripherals collided into blues, air knocked free with the burst of pain from a hip, sliced insides exposed to the freezing air, what little strength he’d been gripping desperately shooting straight out like a well spout, red and fight spilling over his shirt, pooling down his side--

“But. There are limits to what even you can do, Captain.”

There’d been a few times in his life, when the bully’d landed the punch and it him right at the same time, wow, I can’t afford to lose that blood.

This was one’a those times.

Strong bodies didn’t like getting cut open with pocket knives, weak and stumbling bodies that hadn’t fed on anything but their own cells for weeks really didn’t like to be cut open either.

All those things that you never ever told me, all the smiles that are ever gonna haunt me, and it wasn’t the scuff of Bucky’s shoes on the pavement to come save him, it was the graveling echo of Buck’s laugh, grinding dark into the base of his spine, dirt and poison rubbed into the wound between his frozen fingertips clutching uselessly at the tear in his skin.

If he fell, he might never get up.

The bricks were shifting, grinding and spitting dust, concrete breaking under his soul, soles, and the world wasn’t gonna hold him up anymore.

Bare cold wrapped impossibly tight managed to kick, black muzzle skirting across icy cobblestone, over mangled tree roots, the patch of acorns his frozen fingers closed around slowly, picking up the seed of the earth and holding it up to block out the sun, brown and innocent, flash of metal--

Fingers hurled the acorn across the ocean, mountains, train tracks, plinking off dogtags with an indignant sound and a smile that ripped faces and split at the seams, bleeding red down bitten lips between squelching fingers.

His jaw lit up, blossom shooting behind his teeth, through his sinuses and filling the holes in his brain, draining down spinal fluid as the world spun into Brooklyn and back to Queens, that pointing finger we want you staring promises into his dutiful soul as the muffled sound behind the bandana cursed at the skull beneath his peeling skin.

Bucky.

The world didn’t stop spinning, his head wouldn’t stop spinning, and there was no telling what he’d hit if he kept swinging now but he couldn’t ever stop, not with the glitter of metal chasing every edge of his vision, metal so cold he reached dying, wrinkling, skeleton hands for the shifting bite of plate-and the world burst red in front of his eyes. Somewhere in a concave chest his heart stopped because everything was red and he had the brief moment to think, a stopped heart couldn’t be that much more painful than a shattered one.

Had stopped fists ever hurt less than shattered ones?

I’m just a kid from Brooklyn.
The winter stole his lungs and he tried not to think about how ironic it was that he couldn’t breathe running through this cold, wind and air somewhere behind him and there was this wall, freezing wall keeping him from going faster and his chest was seizing painfully but he wasn’t gonna slow down, slipping on ice and skidding past intersections but he couldn’t stop now, couldn’t ever ever stop again.

An open heart is an open wound to you, and in the wind of a heavy choice, a quiet voice.

Passed a dozen places from the past nearly-four months, college friend apartments and class buildings and that coffee shop and the club Clint had seen him in--

Jesus Christ, this was a fucking mess. A fucking mess.

The spot he and Natalie--

Romanoff.

...bitch. No, no, he didn’t have time to think right now, let alone rage about the fucking Russian spy who’d posed as his best friend for three months. Who he’d genuinely come to love and care for.

Who’d convinced him he had to leave. That leaving Steve was the only way to save him.

He’d never had a chance at saving Steve, never from the time they were six and Bucky couldn’t get to alleyways fast enough to stop bloody noses, the hell made him think he had a shot at that now?

After everything, after the fucking century of his life, you’d think he’d’ve figured out the only chance he’d ever had was at Steve’s side.

Steve was his only chance.

And it's nice to know when I was left for dead -- I was found and now I don't roam these streets. I am not the ghost you are to me.

Who was the ghost slipping through fingers now?

His only chance.

Steve, Steve, he could keep repeating that over and over and it wasn’t losing any beauty, swell in his chest, could say it a thousand times and it’d be just as precious but he needed to find him, to take those beautiful shoulders in his palms and look those drowning blues right in the eye and tell him over and over and over,

Steve. My darling Steve, I remember you, I remember you forever, I remember every single blessed moment and every single broken bone and I’m so so so sorry--

He didn’t have the words for how sorry he was. How could he ever possibly tell Steve how sor--

And I know, the scariest part is letting go.

He’d find a way. He’d spend the next century if he had it, he’d spend every single day proving to Steve that he was never fucking leaving again.

One more block. One more block, running so fast his short hair was catching in the wind and spiking into this crazy tousled mess, skidding around the corner to a stumbling halt as the pieces settled down in soft curling pieces over his forehead, brushing the senses of the last time it was this short and disheveled, staring down past his worn shoes and slit feet to the fire underneath that thin metal beam.
Only now it was ice, of course, instead of flames and fuck, there--

The corner, they’d crashed into each other, fate throwing them back together in the simplest most life-altering experience of his existence, and Bucky wasn’t leaving without Steve this time either, heart pounding as he stared across the distance between them and willed the gods to let Steve jump that gap.

Only the distance between them was a lot bigger this time. Because he skid around the bend and stared at the corner they’d collided like comets, stars and it was empty.

Steve wasn’t there, his books weren’t there, the light rain-snow earlier had dislodged their footprints and there wasn’t the slightest shred of evidence it was real, that it’d happened at all, but this time he didn’t doubt for a single fucking second what was real.

They’d collided, and the stardust had stained the very air itself and he could stand here all day staring at the lack of Steve or he could figure out where the fuck he went.

It was New York, this was his city, their city, and he was goddamn finding Steve Rogers, pulling him outta one more fight.

Red, flash of red and glint of metal and his brain was registering danger the same time it shouted get back up. Took him three more seconds to figure out he wasn't knocked down, that his swinging arm wasn’t gushing blood and the knife wasn't embedded in his skin and the flash of red wasn't blood or stars.

A snap, crack, voice sharp enough to slice through the thickest fog, familiar and so distant, months since he’d heard and never that harsh.

Scuttling feet and he was alone, alone again except the flash of red spun back to him, bouncing over black leather shoulders and he managed a cognizant - Found her, Barton before the world tipped and dragged him down with it.

Red hair flew close and it was a different red than the last time he’d seen her but he couldn't even remember when that was, how many months ago Natasha’d given up on him and stopped coming by.

And there was the ground-- or. Not.

Two small hands on his chest, arm, holding him upright only the gravity in his bones was too heavy, world pulling him too hard in too many directions and he crumbled against the tiny body, concerned voices, worry, drifting over the echoing heartbeat thudding in his ears.

“Rogers! Rogers, are you okay?”

Was he okay.

He’d gotten in a fight. Wasn’t too bad a fight even.

Only his chest was caving in.

Who the hell is--

Black leather over thin thin arms and he grabbed ahold like that could keep him from sinking, fingers wrapping all the way round the branch and some distant part of his brain screamed that he was going to snap the tree right in half and the rest was struggling to keep breathing, gasps between a single word, over and over, mumbling scraping audible for just a moment, mantra,

“B-bucky, Bucky--”

“I know. I know.” And there went the wobbling strength in his knees. Couldn’t feel ’em, couldn’t feel anything ‘cept these rolling ball weights attached to hips with chains, rattling and tugging to fall--

Brick, guiding hands and his shoulders hit brick and that, wall, wall he could do, he could collapse against all that red without crushing more bones.

Like his hand, those carpal bones that’d snapped under metal and it'd been a different life but that, that was closer to yesterday than any drifting day he'd had since.

Metal; metal glinting wrists, fingers, he’d known it was Bucky the moment he'd looked up but that, that was undeniable proof he wasn't hallucinating, wasn't projecting a broken soul into some beautiful stranger--

Had been a stranger. Seen Steve as a stranger. Who the hell is-- “Rogers, we need to focus on you right now.” Two stars on his chest, holding him steady and that wasn't right, one of the stars carved too deep and ripped red right outta him. “Are you oka--”

“Me? No. No, Bucky, you have to find hi--”

A punch to the gut, the kicking steel-toed from beatings past, wind-knocking clench of his stomach he used to be used to. Hit him outta nowhere, no boots to be found, and he doubled over just the same, face twisting in open-mouthed raw silent pain.

“Steve? Steve, hey, hey, look at me.” Turbulence on the shaking plane and he was deteriorating, sharp curl inside his chest twenty-thousand pound bag of sand crushing his ribs, caving his organs into shriveled wilting--

“C’mon, where are those pretty blues? Steve? Steve! There, there they are. Keep those eyes up, okay?” Couldn’t decide if the red mouth was pressed in worry or anger, stark clear or swaying, blurring out with the second crashing wave over his head, torso.

A hand on his neck, pulse thudding against white porcelain.

Had he cleaned the dishes in the sink? Ma always got so frustrated when he left the nice china to dry on floursack towels.

“Steve, listen, I need you to tell me what's wrong.”

His throat was closing slowly, the way walls in old horror films did, drawing closer and closer to the screaming bloody victim only he wouldn't be able to scream once the dry tubing in his throat won.

Air wasn't getting through right and his head was spinning, rush of too much oxygen or not enough and the wind from the peeled back train was whipping too hard to breathe right but he still managed one word, reaching and crying out over the distance,

“Bu-ucky--”

“Not with your heart, with your body, Steve. You're white as a sheet. I'd say like a ghost, but considering Barnes…”

The words kept going but his head cut off there, Barnes Barnes Barnes echoing off walls he'd slammed redheads into with a do better and no idea what to do with since, Bucky, back from the dead.

Find’ou what the ghost wants. Had to. The ghost, the ghost was.

Back from the dead.

Buck was back from the dead again, he was here, Steve’d just seen him, it was Bucky.

“Natasha. Natasha, he's still alive.” The alley swung bright enough he managed to flail for her arm, grabbing it wildly and blinking rapidly at green to keep them in focus, enough to make sure she heard, the whole world heard; he was alive. Bucky was alive. Here, he was here, in New York and Steve’s gut was right, again, knew Bucky hadn't left him, couldn't ever leave him like that--

“Natasha you gotta find him. He's here, he's here, in Queens.” Tightening fingers, sucked in breath through swollen throat, rattling painfully between ribs, abdomen contracting with this awful creak.

“I know. Fuck, Rogers, the serum never should've let you get this bad.” There was something off in her voice but he was focusing too hard on inhaling, simple inhaling, fill the shattered cavity only that made it hurt more, even more--

“Your heart’s beating too fast, hands all clammy; are your legs even holding you up? S’not possible for you to get sick, how are you sick?”

Sick. Sick, he just wanted to curl on the ground, blankets of skystars and warm arms wrapping around frail, betraying body, sniper round the corner to pull him out one more time.

It was just too hard, too much to hold upright and focus and think and keep everything rational. Caved. Eyes falling shut, throat bobbing torn, mouth twisted in pain.

Couldn't tell if the harsh canvas on the back of his eyelids was black or white, him or nothing, everywhere and nowhere and tip tip tip…

Sound, then motion, and the sharp burst of pain. Head to the side, handprint smarting on his cheek, fingers grabbing his chin, fixing his head up and he blinked open groggily and that wasn't worry on Romanoff’s pretty face anymore, that was panic.

Panic. He just wanted to sleep. He wanted to curl up and make his damn torso stop feeling so hollow, picture perfect porcelain hollowed out and filling slowly with salty tears to drown one final time.

“Did you take something?” she demanded and Steve distantly noted that no, it was Bucky who took his heart outta his chest and ran away with it, leaving Steve with a battered copy of a chemistry textbook somewhere in the alley and Farewell to Arms--

That was ironic, that book Bucky loved so much, all those WWI quotes and horror and he'd already said farewell to one’a his arms!

Live die they were soldiers and they were never allowed to fall and they were never gonna put down their arms, the only weapons that kept their hearts from bleeding in the alley streets only he was bleeding, sucked dry anyway.
Metabolized. Green eyes went wide and so did the edges of his vision, the joints in his hips, calcium all cataclysm and the wall wasn't gonna hold him up much longer when the waves inside his chest were making him sink down down further down.

The hands propping him up didn't seem to know he was falling in slow motion, running down his chest over the bump of burning dogtags and their seer against his skin until probing fingers reached the first layer of stomach muscle and red gasped quietly, a little sound to take what was left of the feasible oxygen.

Fingers tracing rib bones only it wasn't right, prodding curling against his belly button, flashing green staring at his wincing reactions to the touch, the concave pushed even further towards witherment.

“When's the last time you ate?”

Ate. Food, greasy complicated too warm food or clean easy too sweet food that was Bucky’s anyways, he wasn't the one with the propensity towards apples and he couldn't pop a slice in his mouth anymore, couldn't put much of anything in his mouth anymore that wasn't drizzling water. Poisonous water, maybe, one day and what would he’ve done to stop his sweetest downfall as the stars came fallin’ on their heads?

“When? It doesn't. It doesn't matter.” Apples.

Natasha asked him, at the very beginning, why he'd wound up at Steve’s side and that small, shadowed smirk from a younger boy who used to throw his arm around shoulders, curling up those pretty lips in that sweet promise just for Steve.

Hydra didn't have apples.

He blinked. Steve blinked and he had no idea what he was doing in this goddamned alley.

The echo of shouts, did he think Bucky’s shadow would simply follow him here?

Come and save me. Standing at the edge with his eyes wide open and the echo was the only voice screaming back at him.

It was his job now.

His job to find his best friend at the top of his lungs. Triple-click heels and reach one more red-leather glove hand for that metal glint in the distance.

All I know is the sun won't do enough to prove my love to you. In my heart, you'll always know, there is a place only you can go.

Brick dust scratched at brittle fingertips as he pushed off, single shaky step forward.

“M’best friend. Y’can’t save evryb’dy but y’don’t give up, don’t give up, I gotta go find my b--”

“Steve!” Two solid bars on his arms, leather straps he'd never really known, intensity burning the fire they’d set so long ago. Comets. “Steve. He doesn't wanna be found.”

Careful but sure. Sure’s’if she were Bucky Barnes himself. James Buchanan Barnes. His beautiful James Buchanan Barnes.
He always came back. Always came back.

Doesn't wanna be found.

“You don't know that.” He looked down at her curiously, skeptically, still and steady for a single brief moment, the shock of clarity in the eye of the hurricane because he was gonna find the star on his horizon and follow it home, he was gonna pull Buck off that table one more time, didn't care how long it took.

If he had to wait for those memories to grow stronger and stronger every day for the rest of his life, he was saving Buck off that table.

Never, never once did Buck not want to be found. Natasha couldn't possibly know, couldn't possibly understand--

“I do.”

Steady. Steady, and quiet, and it was a confession, the same kind he'd whispered to his mom's grave, I love him I love him and I don't know what to do without him.

It was a confession but he was already retorting, already arguing again before the seriousness, the sorrow in those eyes sunk in.

“You don't kn--”

He cut himself off. Stared, at Natasha, and the panic pity desperation sorrow guilt all finally...clicked into place.

Everything Clint had said. Natasha’d been gone, extended periods of time, on a case that somehow had nothing to do with being a Russian assassin.

Just a spy.

Even before, before Bucky killed--

Before all of that, she'd been elusive, claimed to be looking for Buck when she hadn't been, hadn't been at all.

Because she'd already found him, hadn't she?

There hadn't been an ounce of surprise on her face when he'd ranted that Bucky was here, in Queens. Hadn't been surprised they'd bumped into each other, none of it. She was here, somehow, showed up right on time and she'd.

She’d known.

For how long?

Look, I didn't want you doing anything you weren't comfortable with. Agent Romanoff is comfortable with everything.

Nobody spills the secrets, because nobody knows them all.

For how long...? Always? Since the very beginning?

“You...you knew.”
He'd been in misery.

She'd watched him deteriorate from afar and done absolutely nothing to intervene.

Worse, worse, she'd watched Bucky deteriorate and done absolutely nothing.

If they'd been anywhere else, kitchen counter, living room, quinjet, he'd've thrown something.

He'd've thrown something to keep himself from throwing Natasha across the room only they were in some backalley in New York and there was nothing to throw.

Nothing to spin and punch in anger but that brick wall. The same brick wall that sounded like the only solid, steady, real, reliable, honest thing in his entire life and he just couldn't bring himself to hit the damn wall.

Instead he stared. He stared at Natasha as she looked up at him in this strange horror of apology and heartbreak.

He still remembered that car ride, after they'd kissed for cover, her smile as she tipped her head and looked at him from shotgun,

Nobody special though?

Kinda hard to find somebody with shared life experience.

How could.

How could she do this to him? To them?

Bucky trusted her.

He'd opened up that steel heart and trusted her against his better instinct and she'd. She'd watched them tear each other apart. Tear themselves apartment.

How could she possibly have let this happen? How could she have been silent? Said absolutely nothing, not a single word of genuine comfort?

He couldn't see how pale and sick he was in the reflection of those eyes, couldn't see the shaking fingers or the shallow breaths or the way everything was swaying at the edges, couldn't see anything but the look on Bucky’s face. So much more open, vulnerable than the first time he'd said who the hell is--

He'd looked so young.

His hair was short.

Jeez, he hadn't registered that ‘til now. Bucky'd cut his hair. Looked just like that beautiful young army sniper all over again, but somehow…dark, with those scars underneath layers, metal glinting to reflect a brilliant smile, soft brown hair swooped up just as debonair as it used to be.

Huh. Bucky’d cut his hair.

Forearms shooting up in defense only it saved him more than her, spinning dizziness hitting like a freight train, again, no cold wind and careful Commandos to drag him back to reality.

At least the collapse was in the general forward direction, at least when his knees gave out Natasha’s arms went up and his big betraying hands landed hard on her forearms, keeping himself upright and he was in his second apartment’s kitchen, propping himself up on the counter with white knuckles as Sam told him it isn’t your fault and he was gripping so tight his fingers warped for just a moment and then crack, the counter breaking, shattering pieces to rain down all over the floor and Natasha’s arms were that counter now, bones to snap like twigs, shattering calcium dust into thin blooded Russian veins.

Every other time, he’d shattered counters, doors, walls, and he was gripping with every ounce of the raging inferno of emotions he had then, knuckles white and fingers squeezing into broken fists only.

Only now the counter wasn’t even caving a little.

Probably wasn’t even bruising.

This, him, at his strongest, was barely able to keep upright and all the strength that’d held him upright for the past five months was slipping away its last pieces now.

“You knew,” he breathed, broken somewhere in the middle over a sob that’d never leave his throat.

Never leave his spinning head. The dizziness wasn’t just nauseating, disorienting, it was dragging him down down down and everything was fading and the counter of arms shifted, hands reaching for shoulders only he kept going down down down and.

He didn't know how he was supposed to forgive her for that.

But Bucky was alive. He was here, here, all she had to do was go get him, go call him, lead Buck right back to him, let those strong strong arms lift him off the cold icy ground and carry him outta the storm until they were never cold anymore.

Cold. Cold, and everything went dark.

“Romanoff? You gotta lotta nerve callin’--”

“Tony, shut up for a second. I need your help. It's Steve.”

A moment of silence and Natasha held her breath, eyes closed, fingers over Rogers’ barely-beating pulse. She'd given up trying to wake him back up on her own, on handling this all on her own.

She'd been juggling every member of this broken family for months and she was worn so thin, too thin, she couldn't do it alone anymore.

“Where are you?”

“We’re in an alley in Queens, couple blocks from the college. He's still breathing, but there’s no color in his face and his pulse is erratic as hell.” The corners of her version were watering and she quickly wiped under her eyes, placing a hand on Steve’s chest. Still beating.

“Wilson’s already on his way. What happened? Why are you…”

Why was she the one who found him.

Why did she even care, he probably wanted to know, but Tony didn't know, didn't understand, it had to be that way and. Later, they could do all that later.
“He's. I don't know, I don't understand how the serum let this happen.” A shallow breath, hand propping Steve’s head off the freezing ground tightening. Was this her fault?

“He's. I don't know, I don't understand how the serum let this happen.” A shallow breath, hand propping Steve’s head off the freezing ground tightening. Was this her fault?

“Natasha. Just keep him stable until we get there. We’ll be there.”

Stark hung up before she could explain. And for the first time in a long long while, she let out the breath she’d been holding.

Relieved. She was actually relieved help was on the way. Couldn't do it alone anymore.

Couldn't do it at all. But God, Bucky needed her. Steve needed her. Clint and Tony and Bruce and Pepper all needed her, and she’d done everything she could to at least keep them safe, if she couldn't do anything else, but Bucky’d been off on his own all this time and she couldn't leave him, she had to be there. She’d known something like this was bound to happen sooner or later, everything’d built up too high and the ice was going to crack, better she had a hand in it when it did, better it happened now instead of on a mission overseas, better it happened in the tower when everyone was here and still alive and there was still hope.

She just.

Haden't expected it to be that catastrophic.

When she’d told Bucky the only way save Steve was to leave him, she knew he'd go one of two ways. Either he'd hear her and that fear inside himself he wasn't facing and he'd fucking attack that fear, he'd do everything in his power to prove her wrong and land him back at Steve’s side.

Or he'd listen. And give up.

She hadn't expected the latter. She really hadn't.

She'd expected him to react the way Steve would've, honestly...but he didn't.

He wasn't Steve. He wasn't anything like Steve.

His plan, though, to leave Steve and save him? It was perfect, executed brilliantly. Freed them both, as fucking painful as it was to watch Steve miserable and Jimmy an empty void, it was what Barnes chose and it protected their family.

She'd never respect him enough for that.

Only, there was one flaw she hadn't counted on and the entire thing was shredded now.

Agent Peggy Carter was dead and Tony Stark had almost died and Clint had almost been blown to pieces and now Barton was back to not trusting her, had skipped town entirely because he'd found her, with Bucky, and he couldn't face Steve after that but at least he'd understood that Steve could never know.

Only now Steve did.

He never would've. Never should've.

But apparently the universe had different ideas.

Of the millions of people you could bump into on the street in New York City.

It was them. Barnes and Rogers, because the stars brought them together once and she wasn't superstitious and she didn't believe in fate but the odds were impossible and yet, here they were.

Here they were.

There was no going back now.

The bell crashed more than rang, and half the customers in the shop snapped up in curiosity at the disheveled, outta-breath man who’d just barreled through the doorway.

“Hi, sorry, my name’s Bucky, and I’m looking for a...a friend’a mine, he might’ve stopped by earlier today, tall, blonde, all buffed up, real blue eyes, sweet as hell, you’d’ve remembered him–”

“Sorry, son. Haven’t seen him.”

They were just closing up after the afternoon crowd when the kid burst through the swinging door, dark hair curling over his forehead and parted pink lips matching the cold-burn on his sharp cheekbones, glinting arm catching everyone’s attention and just-as-flashy crystal eyes setting all the waitresses into some kinda awed frenzy as he put one hand on the counter, leaned over with this desperate tone,

“Hi, did anyone happen to see a collision outside your windows a few hours ago? There was a blonde, tall, I ran into him and--”

The manager rolled out from the back room, taking one look at the wide-eyed waitresses and snapping at the incomer who was clearly not there as a customer. He’d be surprised if the kid had more than twenty-five cents on him.

“You have any idea how many people come by here? I don’t even have time to look out those windows, let alone track down some guy for you, okay?”

“You mean that guy that collapsed? Blonde, good-lookin’, just tumbled down on the pavement?” The clerk paused, glancing between the sudden whirr of the weird prosthetic and the somehow bright-hopeful and dark-devastated look on the beauty’s face at her words. “Yeah, some people tried to help him out and he just took off.”

A panicked rushed huff and she could swear the guy’s heart was gonna burst outta his chest, the way it was straining beneath that tight black shirt, breathy words all but tumbling out,

“You know which direction?”

“I don’t, sorry. Rush came in.”

Distraught, distraught was really the only word for the look on the young’un’s face. Funny, something familiar about that look, about the whole way the youngster carried himself. Reminded him of his past, back in the years when this store was sellin’ things for a penny instead’a two bucks.

Or maybe it was all those old movies. He had that aura, that classic Hollywood look, not Brad Pitt, more Marlon Brando.
“Really wish I could help. But no, didn’t see anybody. I can ask around if you want--”

“That’d be great, yeah, thanks. And if you hear anything, or remember anything, you can call me at this number, okay? I uh. I just. I really need to find him.”

He took the card the kid held out, glancing down at the name. J.B. Rogers. Even sounded like a movie star.

“Wish y’luck, kid.”

“Thanks.” A tight smile that crinkled the cleft in his chin, lines next to his eyes that were deeper than they should’a been on a kid that young. Maybe he wasn’t so young after all.

Really did wish luck to that one. Might be a bit hard’a hearing now, but he heard the muttered, desolate words on his way out,

“God knows I’m gonna need it.”

“Did you happen to see--”

“This is New York, kid. Try the goddamned police station. File a missing person’s report. But if you’re not gonna buy something, there’s a line--”

What am I fighting for if it ain’t you?

It was stupid, but the remaining straggling members of the NY Hydra division knew he was here, and so did Natasha Romanoff, and Steve, in a way, so he’d like to have a weapon, that wasn’t totally irrational, was it?

Stealing was not a walk in the park, and he’d been outta training for anything that wasn’t goddamned college yoga since October, but he managed to pull off rounding up two knives and a gun. Everything else he’d have to depend on the arm, which wasn’t a big deal but.

Jesus, his arm. The arm that early this morning, hadn’t even been a weapon.

But now the sun was going down and Steve’d disappeared and no one had any idea where he went, spanned a ten block radius and there was nothing, no sign of anything that could point to Steve and there weren’t alotta options left.

Maybe the stupid part was that he’d really thought he could just bump into Rogers again, find him that easy. Like he’d be out wandering the streets calling Bucky’s name when they’d been right there, face to face and Bucky hadn’t had any idea who he was.

Just the sun. Always the goddamned sun.

Was it awful, how quickly he’d accustomed to having Rogers as a last name? How easy it was to respond to that when his friends called aloud?

How easy it was to have friends?

Bucky sucked in a freezing breath, willing the snow right down to his bones, a price he’d pay if it’d clean him free.
The metal fingers worked on autopilot, slipping the apartment key from his pocket, wiggling open the lock and pushing the door open, standing there at the threshold.

It was surreal, being back here, at Jimmy’s apartment. His, technically.

It’d been so easy. Even with the confusion, the total lack of answers, it was so much easier than any other life he’d lived.

There’d been a day, a day nearly a year ago, Stark tower bedroom, staring into blue eyes as Steve pinned him down to the bed and confessed, for the second time,

James Buchanan Barnes. I...love you.

And Bucky’d teared right up. Only hours after he’d ripped open his soul to tell Steve that he was the one who’d begged Hydra to wipe his memories because he couldn’t handle losing Steve and it was so fresh, big looming cloud right there to take the new sunshine rays I love you head on and he’d. He’d told Steve-- N-now that you know what happened last time? Don't you see why I can't let that happen again?

Blinked watery eyes open and Steve was propped on one elbow, gazing down at him with that serious, caring expression, hand shifting into Bucky's hair as he listened quietly. Now Bucky was the one pleading, running his hand up down Steve's arm, trying to get him to understand.

"I turned into a deadly assassin because I lost you. Can you imagine if I actually had you - like that, completely - and I lost you? I can't picture anything worse than the monster I became as the Winter Soldier, but I promise, somehow, it would be."

I promise, somehow, it would be.

Picture-poster walls and perky handwriting scrawled on the whiteboard and a simple meal in the little fridge he’d made last night while bopping around the kitchen, college textbooks scattered instead of AK’s, knives and.

And empty, empty, all that empty happiness staring him in the face, no reflection in shivering ice as he pressed a metal hand to the cryofreeze window, just swooping blue curtains over the empty view out a sweet little apartment window.

He couldn’t take this, not one bit of it. He wanted Steve. He just wanted Steve.

He was back here, when he should be out there, looking for Steve.

But if he wasn’t on the streets, it was pretty clear there was one place Steve was, and it wasn’t somewhere Bucky could go.

Not the place itself, anyways. But the people with him.

No point in doing anything tonight, Steve was already with Them, had to be, and he had to have a battle plan and that was easier to do with a pen in hand.

Anything you say can and will be held against you, so only say my name.

He didn’t wanna keep doing this. Just wanted back in those arms.

He was so goddamn. tired.
Just wanted this to be over now. Please, take it from him, please. Let the night slip into his soul and drag him back into starshine windows.

Sometimes the day just. Ends.

Ends, like someone’s life at the end of a bloody blade.

It took everything not to cry out as he dug the heels of his hands against his eyes, forcing the flashes to leave him be.

If you love me, don’t let go.

Promise, it’d be worse.

How could he--

Couldn’t think about that. He’d torture himself.

But how was he ever supposed to get back to Steve if he couldn’t face the fact that he’d slit the throat of one of their family members?

And. Y’know.

Killed the second most important person in both their lives.

No, no, he could maybe maybe make himself face what he did to Tony - he’d have to if he ever found the guts to go to the fucking tower and find Steve - but he did not once ever ever for the rest of his life have to think about the look on Peggy Carter’s fac--

Fuck. Fuck, fuck fuck, why hadn’t he left New York?!?

Steve never would’a found him and neither would Natasha, pretending to be his friend.

He didn’t have friends.

Just family left, and he’d betrayed them all and he couldn’t keep doing this.

How could Tony ever forgive him? How could he even ask Tony to forgive him?

Let alone what Steve thought--

No, he wasn’t gonna psych himself out. There was nothing now that could convince him to pull a stunt like that again.

Not with the memory of Steve’s shattered desperation all over his face when he said who the hell is Bucky for the second goddamn devastating time.

He couldn’t do that to Steve again. He’d never seen that twisted beautiful face in that much pain in all their years combined.

And that was a lot of years.

The wood was starting to creak from how much he was pacing but he couldn’t stand still, not when everything was hanging in this awful rock-and-a-hard-place balance. The hell was he supposed to do?
United we stand. Divided we fall.

He’d wiped his memories, gone blank, and still, Steve’d been there.

In every choice he’d made everyday.

Engraved in his soul.

The adoption papers for the golden retriever were still on the kitchen counter.

Leftovers of Steve’s favorite dinner meal still in the fridge.

Red blankets over his blue and white comforter. Yoga mat for sun salutations. Decor carefully placed to accent the frame on the wall, the colored sketch he’d stolen from Steve’s notebook.

The goddammed sonnet he’d spent a week on.

Bucky sucked in stale air, sinking carefully on the edge of the bed he’d slept in for months that felt nothing like his right now.

It was right there, in his notebook, all the proof he’d ever need.

Memory erasing wasn’t enough, not to get rid of Steve. He’d have to erase his entire brain. Everything. Even Hydra hadn’t dared do that.

And look. Look what happened when they didn’t.

He didn’t need memories to remember Steve Rogers.

::: Sonnet 14 :::

O’er glowing sun who whispers to the moon
Racing fast through fogging red mist slips night
The summer shines a light and darkness swoons
Ghosts of warming hands - no one hears him cry

It’s stepping concrete streets turned cobblestone
Years past echo beneath, barely unseen
Once was a promise through all black masks shone
Now the moon lies night, wonder what it’d been Broken bones this patriot bright and fierce

Who’d give that darkened soul a gold embrace
’Tis only dreams relive those fallen years
And slumber, crystal shards recall the face

But what of false consciousness does portray
If the sun is gone in the light of day?

JBR
January ‘16

Who was he kidding. He could no more leave Steve than he could carve out his own soul. To go back to that tower, to the people he’d betrayed…he’d have to. He’d do anything to go home, but Steve was the only home he had now and if he had to go through the one he’d broken to get there he’d do it.
Nothing could change the hell he’d put his team through, the family he’d sliced up and destroyed, and he’d give anything to be able to fix it but it was simply too late.

He didn’t have a place there anymore, which meant the one thing Bucky’d never wanted Steve to have to do.

He’d have to choose, between them.

The Avengers or Bucky. Because they couldn’t go back to how they were before. He’d never asked Steve to do anything like that before.

Bucky’d never even asked Steve to chose between him and the war. He’d already known the answer.

But this time? This time, there was no I know what you’re gonna say, Buck. This time he was blind, reaching out for Steve behind black plastic and begging whatever stars would listen that it wasn’t too late.

Like fireworks we pull apart the darkness; brilliance turns to ash.

The moment the sun rose, he’d be on the tower’s doorstep.

One more battle to ride, and this time he wasn’t leaving without Steve. No, not without you, never again without you.

Because now, now he knew life without Steve and he knew, it wasn’t living at all.

Worse, Bucky saw the look on his face and he knew for Steve, it was worse than not living. For Steve, it was death.

What am I trying for, what am I crying for, what am I dying for if it ain’t you?

The sun rose over the horizon and it was his best shot of finding Steve.

Sergeant Bucky Barnes still just looking for the best shot and the crosshairs were on the only place he’d never meant to target, the only place that’d given him an unquestionable home, the only place he wanted to be at, safe, more than anything and the only place he’d irreversibly, permanently ruined. The only place he was never welcome again.

And here goes.

“It could be worse.”
"There is nothing worse than war," Passini said respectfully.
“Defeat is worse.”

The tall glass rose in the distance, a peak amongst many only no one missed the enormous A at the top, the jutting quinjet platform.

Bucky squinted up through the glinting sunlight, metal shading his eyes as he rounded one block closer. He’d sat up on that quinjet platform, stood at the edge of it staring down and wondering how bad the fall would be.
Didn’t feel all that much better looking up at the fall now.

Don’t you wonder when the light begins to fade?

Only one more stretch of sidewalk, and he’d be at the lobby doors. A burst of cold wind made him pause, turning to catch his breath, tug his coat collar up higher.

It’d been so long.

A deep inhale and Bucky lifted his head, squaring his shoulders at the building that stood for all of it. Left, right, left, this soldier was going to march right through those doors.

He hadn’t been this nervous scouting a single Hydra base during the war, a single target with Hydra’s weapons in hand.

Because that wasn’t him anymore, neither of those were. And this life? Wasn’t his anymore either.

If he had time, he’d mourn the loss of every life he’d lost, but the last one might be the only chance he got to finally get it right, and that started here. Back from the dead.

Bucky Barnes ran a hand over his pomade, gathered every ounce of courage he had left, and pushed a metal palm against the doors.

His hands were over his face when his pocket started vibrating and the only thing he could think was Jesus Christ, not now.

He’d never been so kvetched with technology as he was in the flash second of the vibration, fingers twitching to hurl his damn cell across the plaster-white hallway.

They’d spent more time in the past year in these damn places than he’d spent in his entire life. Which said a lot, considering all the trouble he’d gotten into as a kid and oh yeah, their line of work.

But it wasn’t the Avengers that landed ‘em in here. Actually, counting every reason they’d crashed some sterile ward since SHIELD went down? All pointed to the same bloody (literally) reason.

Sanitarium might as well be an asylum at this rate.

Certainly felt like he was going mad, staring at the vibrating phone in his palm. Couldn’t everything just stop, for one second? Life just needed to stop happening.

First Natasha disappeared, then Clint, then Sam came to him with a plan for crisis intervention with Rogers only nothing was working and even Bruce didn’t have any brilliant ideas and his nightmares weren’t getting any better and Pepper had started sleeping in a different room on weeknights because she needed the quality sleep to run the company because he couldn’t even bring himself to think about right now because all those inventions, innovations he was always making weren’t getting anywhere because he couldn’t goddamn think when he couldn’t even fucking close his eyes without seeing that fucking mask and there wasn’t a single person left on the team who was remotely okay and then he gets a call in the middle of the fucking day from Natasha Romanoff panicking about how Rogers is fucking passed out in some alley and now Clint had appeared outta nowhere too and everyone was here and fretting around like fucking crazy and Tony couldn’t breathe, he really couldn’t breathe and he’d had to leave the goddamned hospital room before he had a panic attack but here he was having a panic attack in the hallway anyways and then his phone fucking vibrates and he can’t handle one single more thing on top of this shit right now.
Not one.

It physically hurt inside but he jammed the reject call button.

There was literally nothing Maria had to say right now that could possibly trump his ex-best friend in the hospital after fading off the goddamned planet for the past three months and Tony couldn’t remember the last time he’d even spoke to Rogers, let alone had those blank eyes return the gaze instead of staring out the goddamned glass windows for hours at end.

What was he supposed to do? He’d tried every goddamned thing he could think of and no invention was scraping his way outta this mess and he still! couldn’t breathe.

One step at a time, just one damn thing at a time--

Bzzz The phone went off again and he didn’t give himself time to curse because he was about to smash the damn thing if he didn’t pick the fuck up.

“What can you possibly need,” he snapped, technology whirring against his ear and he’d get Hill flowers or something to apologize next week but he couldn’t handle this right now.

“Sir, we have a situation.”

That serious, professional voice and what kinda fucking situation could be more relevant than Rogers in the hospital?

“Maria, handle it. In case you haven’t heard, I’ve kinda got stuff on my plate right now.” A nurse passing by gave him a mild glare for practically shouting in the receiver but he didn’t give a damn, he didn’t give a single damn. Nothing she said could possibly b--

“It’s Sergeant Barnes.”

His head snapped up, eyes wide in an unbelievable mix of total fear and bitch did you just-- shocked as he’d be if Bucky’d lifted a gun straight to his face and pulled the trigger, no hesitation - never expected Bucky to actually fire.

Or slit his throat with that Hydra pocket knife.

Still had the scar.

“He’s in the lobby of the tower. Security stopped him, but he doesn’t look like he’s leaving anytime soon.”

His home. His worst nightmare was at his home. What if he’d been there? What if he’d been in the lobby per chance?

How the hell was he back? It’d been months. He’d just been starting to think--

What, he’d finally be safe? Who was he?

“Sir? What action to you request?”

What action. Running all the way to the Eastern Hemisphere wasn’t really an option, so.

The funny thing was, he’d liked Barnes. A lot, he’d really felt for the kid. Some…connection between them, at least mutual respect for another scientific genius. Ever since that first day he’d snuck into Steve’s old apartment and cheap-talk bargained Bucky to come back to the tower with him to work on the arm.

It felt like another lifetime. Another man.

The kid he’d teased about their loud sex life, the friend he’d thrown popcorn at on movie nights, how could that possibly be the monster that’d shown him the first real terror he’d felt in ages?

But it was. And the monster was back. What action did he request?

Yeah, he wasn’t going back to the tower now. And god knows Barnes had no qualms about beating the fuck outta his tower when he was living there, so it wasn’t like barring him from the doors was gonna do a damn thing.

Only thing that probably would? Fuck, he didn’t wanna pin this on her. She’d dealt with his shit too long, she didn’t deserve to confront the fucking Winter Soldier on top of it all.

Barnes wouldn’t hurt her. He had to believe that. Had to have faith that while Bucky could bleed Tony out on some dirty warehouse floor, he wouldn’t lay a hand on Tony’s girl.

A panicked inhale and he couldn’t stay silent for the rest of forever, as tempting as that was. Maybe I ought to cut out your tongue. Do the world a real favor.

“Send down Pepper,” he breathed, eyes squeezed shut and fingers curled, digging into skin that couldn’t drag him outta this nightmare now.

~~Forever younger growing older just the same. ~~

Walking into the flames to call out Steve’s name.

Charred wood, metal with scorch marks and bullet ricochets, crumbling down around with that awful burning smell--

Clean glass, reflections and white smooth plastic, echoing scrubbed tiles all too-clean office building.

Pushing through fallen beams, shielding from another popping explosion, hands caked in dirt and blood dripping down his collar, voice hoarse as he called through a scratchy throat, bouncing haunted off dark corners,

“Rogers!”

Bumped shoulder against a glaring business man, a throng of clicking heels and solid briefcases, fake potted plants and speakers drilled into the ceiling, caught whisper on cracking lips echoing through light corridors,

“Rogers?”

Silent, silent war boots came to a quiet skidding stop, panicked rushing feet stammering into stillness as if his heart could ever do the same.

And a soldier stared at the reflecting glass mirage before him as it all came rushing back.
The Winter Soldier stood in front of a glass panel. Bucky Barnes exhibit and everything’d changed.
Now, Bucky Barnes stood in front of one more panel, blank glass, crystal clear reflecting glass and there was nothing in there but him, no rhetoric etched in white, no black and white flashing video of smiling boys in uniform.

This time the museum was the Stark Tower, the endless glass lobby of the Stark Tower, Avengers Tower, the only home in this century he’d ever known happiness in.

Only it wasn’t the man Steve’d danced with on the roof staring back at him, it wasn’t the sharp-mouthed, crooked-smile ghost that Steve ran fingers through long silky hair, it wasn’t the metallic-armed soldier carefully, slowly building a home, building friends, building family.

The 1945 war hero was staring back at him.

Brown leather jacket, short hair pushed into a subconscious sidesweep that’d dislodged those few, curving pieces in the brisk walk over, the exact same man that’d stared back at him from the mirror behind the bar as Steve’d leaned over and asked,

“You ready to follow Captain America into the jaws of death?”

Side glance, glass tipped to smiling lips, Steve’s soft, bashful smile in return, blue eyes cutting down as crystal sparkled, so sincere he scared himself.

Only, only piece left that didn’t match was those crystal eyes. Those weren’t Sergeant James Barnes’ sparkling, haunted crystal eyes, those weren’t Jimmy’s laughing innocent ones, the Winter Soldier’s cold terrifying ones.

He wasn’t Bucky Barnes and he wasn’t the Winter Soldier, he was somewhere in between and he’d never be able to shake either, he’d never...

The crowd was still passing by behind him, various employees and guests passing by, swishing suits and clicking heels, and one of them’d just come back from the river. The docks, the crisp smell of the docks washed over his head like a tidal wave and he was standing by the water laughing, tossing a rock at the crystal river to see if he could skip it more than Steve’s, ripple less tears from crystal sockets—

Chest expanding, a deep breath in and his eyes slipped shut, closing against the ocean, settling perfectly still in that quiet quiet absence of a whirr, and there. Just like the rain, he was always falling, two solid feet flying towards too-solid ground.

He was the closest place he had to home and he was terrified.

The hole inside his chest ached, rimmed with metal like everything else and he wanted to stay, he wanted to race up those stairs and go crashing through the door that’d open to that room where it’d happened, glass open over the city, right up top looking down at the broken rollercoaster, Brooklyn Bridge sloping in the distance.

He just wanted to come home, to Nat’s rolling eyes and Sam’s orange juice and Bruce’s brief smiles and Tony’s raised-eyebrow comments—

Tony.

The shut eyes squeezed tight, fists curling up and head ducking, crumbling instinctively against the horror that’d crawled up his spine and latched thick black claws into his shoulders, whispering low freezing ice into his ear.
What he’d done to Tony.

"The only reason you're not dead is because you have a key to Rogers' apartment. Why are you here?"

"To see you," the man answered simply, then his half-assed surrender hands dropped lazily to his sides and he strode into Steve's kitchen.

That's the nice thing about Tony. The rest of them? They only see the tragedy. He thinks...he thinks we're human.

"Spill." Tony swung his leg over the chair, straddling it as he blocked Bucky into the corner of the communal floor he'd escaped to.

"What, blood? I'm pretty good at that." Bucky raised a cocky, triumphant eyebrow and Tony could swear it was like looking straight in a mirror.

He stroked his beard thoughtfully, giving Barnes an unimpressed eyebrow-raise of his own.

"You and Steve. It's a fucking rollercoaster. He wants to help you and you want..." Tony trailed off, waving his hand in the air to indicate Barnes to fill in the rest.

Instead he scowled, leaning back and crossing shiny arms over his chest. "I don't need anyone. Or anything. I'm perfectly fucking functional on my own."

"You even listen to the boyfriends playlist I made you? Everybody needs somebody."

"Everybody wants somebody. And even if I did want Steve..." Bucky trailed off, staring down at his metal hand and twitching his fingers, sending a whirring ripple down his arm. Tony knew that look. Again, mirror.

"Let me guess. He's an American beauty and you're an American psycho?"

Bucky's head snapped up, staring at Tony with wide eyes.

"Yes, exactly," Bucky breathed, eyes glittering with relief that someone had finally said it aloud.

So when were you planning on telling everyone you guys are makeout buddies now?

"Do you think...there's a chance that I'm the best thing for him?"

"You heard the song," Tony replied quietly, swirling his glass around in his drink and right, Bucky wasn't the only emotionally destroyed person around here, he forgot that sometimes.

"...chased that feeling, of an 18yr old who didn't know what loss was," Tony broke into a reluctant smile, rolling his eyes as he took the next line and Barnes whooped. "--now I'm a stranger."

"Avengers Movie Night is still Friday and if you two aren't there, I know where you sleep. Actually, I setup where you sleep, I'd be careful if I were you--"

"We'll be there, Tony," Steve assured, knocking his shoulder against Stark's.

"Bucky--" Tony started and that was as far as he got.

"You're the last person to ever call me that," Barnes said thoughtfully, metal hand latching onto the rafter tight enough to make it groan, creak and compress. "Congratulations. I ought to cut out your tongue.”

C’mon, Stark, you ever shut that big mouth’a yours? Steve is trying to drive.

“I’m nothing—” A pause, crushing silence filled with quiet choking sounds.

“...but a ghost story,” Bucky finished and Tony gagged, blood splattering, dark eyes rolling back in his head.

This used to be his home.

Jesus fuck, his home. What was he supposed to do? Tony could never take him back in. He could never dream of asking him to. How could they throw popcorn at each other on movie night, work side by side in the lab on that flying car—

He didn’t belong here anymore. He didn’t belong in this tower, he could never come back to this life.

Everything Steve’d built, everything he’d built, gone. He’d ruined his place in Steve’s family, in Steve’s life, the hell made him think he could come beg for forgiveness?

But he couldn’t leave. He couldn’t walk outta here without Steve, he could not keep on surviving without at least trying to explain to Rogers, he couldn’t--

Never giving up on Steve again. Too late for everyone else in this building, but he wasn’t leaving Steve ever again. He’d fucking done that once. He’d thought maybe, without him, Steve might have a shot at happiness. Maybe the same way Steve’d thought when he’d shouted at him across that exploding fire, twisting metal, Just go, get outta here.

The surprise on Steve’s face, when he’d found out Bucky wasn’t leaving without him, it didn’t last long. Shoulda known.

And hell, Bucky shoulda known too. It went both ways, this thing. No not without you -- for him too. For him too.

He wasn’t leaving, not this time. Steve needed him, and he’d do whatever it goddamned took to pull him outta that alley.

Crystal eyes slowly blinked open, glass reflection staring back at him. Comets, and there was that fire. The tiniest spark yet. Hydra hadn’t burned it all outta him with that acorn drawing, even he hadn’t been able to burn it outta himself no matter how hard he tried.

Always kept burning for Steve.

One more bloody inhale and dancing heel spin. Cracked lips couldn’t unspill blood but parted anyways, one more broken confession to the snowy blue sky.

“I need to see Tony Stark.”

“And Tony expects me to be civil to him?”

“He was a member of the team—”

“Maria, he almost killed him. He tried, to kill Tony, he slit his throat and left him to bleed out in some-- some dirty warehouse, with nightmares to haunt him for the rest of his life!”
Maria pursed her lips, looking down and tucking a stray strand of brown hair behind her ear, giving Pepper a moment to fume before offering a sympathetic head tilt to the door.

“I can go talk to him.”

Pepper inhaled sharply and looked up at the ceiling, counting down from ten and reminding herself to be patient. If it were reversed, if it were Tony in that lobby, what would Steve do?

The air deflated her chest with a sigh, looking down and smoothing a hand over the pleats of her skirt. “Thank you, Maria, but I should handle this.”

Glancing back up, Maria still looked hesitant to let her go, worry etched in with familiar caution. Pepper offered a smile, mouth turned up resigned at the corners. “It’s what Tony and Steve would want.”

She nodded gratefully for the support as she started for the door, heels clicking sharply to match the grim expression. Maria reached out as she passed, a gentle comforting hand on her arm and Pepper paused, taking a moment to put her hand over Maria’s, trusting her to take care of them all if anything went wrong.

Then the powerwalk was off for the elevator, red ponytail swishing behind her and Maria turned her comm back on, headed for her desk and wondering distantly if this week could possibly get any more dramatic.

The heels came first. Same sound as the heels Peggy wore, clicking through that bar. Same sound as the heels Natasha wore, clicking to tell him he had to leave Steve. For good.

It’d almost conditioned him now, the sound of clicking heels and a new era of his life coinciding. Behind him, he could see that red hair in the reflection of the glass, standing waiting, and this could be the last breath he took before the end of his world again.

1) You love him. 2) You can’t love him.

3) He doesn’t love you?

“Sergeant Barnes?”

The expectant voice cut through the fog, his name echoing off glass and white corners, the title he wasn’t sure he deserved anymore.

One trained heel spun around, same way he did everytime a uniform addressed him like that, hand stiffening by his side and barely kept from lifting in salute.

And there was the face of the first family member he’d seen since this nightmare.

Ginger hair pulled back in an elegant ponytail, crisp white suit, perfect lipstick, perfect eyeliner, red heels planted on white tile, head cocked just a touch as she looked at him, stood there and simply looked at him, once-caring expression turned the blank expectance of the woman that ran a multinational billionaire cooperation, not the softie-aunt who’d lent him hairties and bright smiles.

“Ms. Potts,” Bucky breathed, broken sounds and a hell of a lot less breathless than he felt. He had to look like a ghost, turning to familiar green eyes with the face of the Sergeant who’d died, the cracked voice of the monster she’d beat at chess in her living room.
Or their old living room, the same name breathed panicked outta Steve’s swollen mouth, the lips that’d just been locked on Bucky’s moments before she’d walked in on them making out on the table and.

A different lifetime.

Something flashed behind green, the quickest of microexpressions before the statue shifted, head tipping to swish the sleek ponytail to the side as two deceptively thin arms crossed over her chest.

“What are you doing here?” Lips pursing as she looked at him, serious across all this white distance between them and he’d never felt so underdressed in his life. Here Pepper was, professional and cold and he was fumbling through memories and thoughts of family lost.

What was he doing here? What was he doing here?

“I need to see Steve.”

He’d been saying it aloud for the past day, battering shopkeepers and pedestrians in search of what intelligence he could gather but somehow this was the first time he’d spoken Steve’s name in months. It was the first time he’d said it to someone who knew exactly who he was talking about.

Who knew the blue eyes and callused hands and quick sarcasm, the man who ran through Brooklyn streets barefoot and told the story with red highlighting his cheeks over the shy, secretly proud twinge of a smile--

Pepper didn’t say a single thing. She just stood there, waiting, looking at him.

Distant. He’d never wanted to be on this side of her, the one that saw him as an intrusion, or worse, a dull threat that forced her into that powerful independent businesswoman stance, something to be intimidated by and intimidate right back.

A standoff in Stark’s lobby was the last thing he wanted today, but. It could be worse, Tony could’ve come swinging in here in full titanium-alloy suit--

Tony.

Metal fingers twisted subconsciously in the weathered seam of brown leather, wishing these army hands could ever get clean.

She couldn’t just keep him out. This was Steve. He was every exception in the world and his soul was crushed but talking to the cold CEO Pepper Potts was the only way to get Steve back.

Are you aware the shape I’m in?

“I need to see Steve,” again, slow, careful, as unthreatening as possible but he couldn’t help the fists his fingers curled, couldn’t help the single step forward in desperation. “Pepper, where is he?”

Red heels took one solid step backwards and Bucky’s chest shattered but he couldn’t focus on that, he had to get Steve back, that was all that mattered.

“Please, I have to see him.” Still thinks I don’t remember him. “I-I. Listen, Pepper, you don’t get what I did--”

“I know full well what you did.” Head tipped and gaze flashing, a sharpness he’d never had directed at him before. “I’m the one that Tony wakes up with his nightmares.”
Green narrowing colder and Bucky’s chest didn’t crack that time, all the air seized inside his chest as his lungs froze twice as icy as that look.

All the color drained from his face, pressing pale lips together as wide eyes cut away from hers, to the ground, his hands, back up again and his fingertips were shaking now, so long as he kept his knees steady that was all that mattered.

Tony’s knees collapsing, dull thud in the splashing puddle of blood and there was so much blood, everywhere, staining the brick and Tony’s choking throat and his crushing hands--

“I’m so sorry. I’m so so sorry.” The whisper ripped from somewhere deep, deep enough that he could be choking on blood now as metal worried through his hair, cold ripple down his spine doing nothing to keep the red from flashing and his knees were shaking now too. “Jesus, Tony, I--”

Lungs cut up, oxygen depletion making him gasp, flush of bright up his spine into his brain and he couldn’t take it, couldn’t think about Tony right now he’d lose his fucking mind.

Blue. Blue, not red, there was sunshine somewhere underneath all that blood and he’d done time, he’d pay for that for the rest of his goddamned life but he couldn’t leave Steve bleeding out on his knees on that street corner in Queens either.

He needed to find him, now.

“But Steve, Steve, he was never supposed to know, he was s’posed to think I was gone but I fucked up, I fucked up and he knows and I dunno why I didn’t just go for g-good, I should’a left New York, fuck, left the goddamned country but I didn’t and Steve, he saw me and it all came back and I can’t. and I can’t--”

Breathe, he couldn’t breathe.

He’d put his hands on his knees, fill his lungs up from the escalating rant into hysteria only if he did, there’d be no blue sleeve to reach out and catch this time, no shut the fuck up Steve I can’t breathe because there was no Steve, there was no Steve and he couldn’t keep letting Steve bleed out from this Stevie still thought Bucky didn’t remember him, again, and that was the only thing Steve’d ever wanted from him and the only thing Bucky’d ever really promised and he’d forgotten, no, worse, he’d lost Steve and then left him on his knees on the sidewalk and he couldn’t keep this diplomatic bullshit up anymore, he’d blow up the fucking tower if he had to.

“I have to see him,” Bucky gasped, shoulders heaving, human hand pinching the corners of his eyes, trying to get his lungs back, lips parted as he looked back up at Potts and forced himself to tone down the intensity in his eyes, didn’t want crystal murder here, but he wasn’t asking questions anymore, it was a demand as he barely managed words through ragged inhaled, “Right n-now. Pepper, where is he.”

“He’s not here.” Sharp gaze studying him, arms crossing tighter over her chest as she shifted her weight, watched him with openly cautious eyes, stark disapproval he’d only seen reserved for the cataclysmic events that ended in some sort’a explosion. It was remarkable, how steady her voice was as she leveled those pursed red lips and green eyes at him, eyebrows raised deadly serious. “And if you’re going to be a threat to anyone in this building, you need to leave.”

“Miss Potts, please--” Another ragged gasp and he shut his eyes, forcing inhaled through his nose so he could maybe get a fucking handle on himself. A few moments to gather himself and he was never gonna get Rogers back like this, he had to communicate, make her understand that she had to Take Him To Steve.
“James Buchanan.”

Stern, the way she scolded him sometimes around the tower and it was the least cold thing she’d said to him or maybe it was the most but either way it was familiar, in so many ways, Sarah used to call him that too and she had to understand.

“I need to…I need to see him.” Slowly blinked both eyes back open, sniffing once and wiping a hand haphazardly across gathering eyelashes. Watering crystal as hands dropped back to his sides, shoulders deflating and chest ready to cave in with just one more swing.

Pepper eyed him, gaze flicking over the single raintrack slipping down his cheek before he had time to wipe it away.

The anger shifted, some complex emotion stuffed with exasperation and betrayal she’d only reserved for Tony’s stupidest stunts, the ones that got people or himself almost killed and Bucky tried not to run forward and melt in familiar arms as Pepper carefully, cautiously took a few steps closer.

“How could you do this?” A shocked hush, arms falling out of their crossed anger, one manicured hand lifting to indicate the elevator behind her, the places that lead, the tower, all the memories he had to leave behind. “He trusted you.”

He didn’t need the betrayed bite in Pepper’s voice to hear what she didn’t say, and he doesn’t trust anyone, didn’t need the watering green eyes to tell him it wasn’t just Tony she was talking about.

There was nothing he could say, forgiveness he could ask for, but he lifted his eyes to try anyways. Sharp click with one more step forward and was close enough to nearly be looking up at him now, almost level on the pointed heels. Level like they were equals, like Bucky somehow even deserved this conversation.

He trusted you.

“Both of them did,” Pepper amended, sharp shake of her head as lips pursed again, tight with pain. “Everyone did. We were your family.”

Family.

“It was the only way.” The broken words didn’t do anything to alleviate the hurt and Bucky just wanted to plead that these weren’t the only green eyes that’d questioned and prodded him and Tony’d trusted him but he’d trusted Natasha and he still had no idea what she’d been trying to do.

Was this a test? If it was, he’d failed miserably. At least she’d still been there for the aftermath--

But she’d said. And he’d believed her.

“It was the only way,” Bucky whispered again, fingers uncurling to reach for her wrist, to show her how much he hadn’t meant to hurt them, to plead, to beg, something, anything--

And she flinched. She flinched like he was gonna strike her and he recoiled so fast he could feel the tears bubbling in his throat, making it hard to breathe again. “I’m so. So s-sorry.”

Wide green eyes stared at him and he could hear how much faster her heart was pounding now but it was nothing compared to the drums in his throat, in his head. Throats, slit, spilling droplets of blood over metal--

Pepper straightened, taking a step backwards and ducking her head to catch, force his gaze on hers as she held him there, paralyzed, and slowly, quietly, laid down the words to carve the tombstone he couldn’t face.

“Tony Stark was a prisoner of war held in captivity for three months. I know that’s a little less than four-thousandths of the seventy years you spent as a P.O.W, but you were the closest person to understanding him. You were more than family - you were his friend. A fellow scientist, a scholar,” waving hands as the facade crumbled, everything crystal fogging up around them, “--you worked alongside each other in his labs, you respected and valued each other in a way I don’t think many people ever could. He opened up his heart to you.”

Flash, lightning in the rain cold as the crystallizing reflection staring back at him.

“...and you tried to tear it out with your metal fist.”

Iron meets steel and metal screeched to crumple, knife sinking its final blow. He wasn’t gonna cry. He wasn’t. It wouldn’t help a damn thing. He’d spent half his life keeping his tears on the inside, fuck his eyes for watering now.

“In time, you know...there’s a chance he’d forgive you. You destroyed him, but he loves you, and he’d forgive you. But James? I’m not sure I’ll ever be able to. To get that call--” Pepper’s voice broke, a single crack betraying the pure facade. “...that call that he’s in the hospital? That he’s dying? That you were the one who’d--”

A rushed breath, hushed and horrified now and he could see it, could see the memory in her face, and it was the first time he wished he could look up under that veil of snakehair, hide behind anything that wasn’t ruffled pomade curling pieces nowhere long enough to hide the mirror in his eyes.

“And you just come waltzing back in here. Expecting us to hand Steve right over. Do you have any idea what it’s been like, to live with Steve after what you did?”

“He did live here?” Could barely manage the whisper. Pepper shook her head sharply once, burning etches into his soul.

“If you can call it living.”

Fuck. How was he supposed to--

Pepper just looked at him, anger and exasperation just sorrowful disappointment now. Course she was disappointed. Couldn’t forgive him. Like he honestly deserved forgiveness? Hadn’t deserved it the first time around, killing Tony’s parents, but Tony’d brushed it aside, said he understood POW’s, took Bucky into his home, into his heart.

And Bucky’d turned around to pull the trigger in his face.

Steve didn’t deserve this. None of them deserved the burden of Bucky Barnes. But he couldn’t keep hurting Steve either, he at least had to explain.

Steve’d stayed in New York. In the Stark Tower, somehow, stayed and waited for Bucky to come back to him. If you can call it living.

He didn’t know how he was supposed to keep looking Pepper in the eye.

“He’s not here now. He hasn’t been here in days.”
Days. Jesus, days ago Steve had been here, in the home they used to share. And now he was gone. For days, gone. But at least he hadn’t left the city, the state, the world.

There was a part of him that almost didn’t believe her, she’d lie to him as easy as Natasha had, he knew that much. But about this--

He’d know. Wouldn’t he? He’d be able to tell if he was in the same building as the love of his goddamned life. Fuck, what a damned life it was.

He’d tried. He’d keep trying. At least now the Avengers would know he was alive, still out there. Not that they’d ever thought differently. If they’d thought about him at all. He’d done nothing but fuck up every one’a their lives--

He really couldn’t be here any longer.

Bucky sucked in a breath lined with blades, nodding as quickly as he could, looking away from that hurt beautiful face. One more hand wiping over his eyes, clearing away all that water before it froze in the bitter wind outside.

He’d come in here worried Pepper’d tell him Steve didn’t love him anymore. It’d been worse than that though, in a way.

1) You love him. 2) You can’t love him.

3) We can’t love you.

The tiles creaked their goodbye as he turned on one heel, a single hesitant step but Pepper wasn’t stopping him, she wanted him to walk right out that door.

This was it. This could be the very last time he set foot in the Stark tower.

The pang that hit him in his chest at that thought, it wasn’t fair. Didn’t deserve to miss this place. But dear god, would he.

And there goes, one more goodbye.

Heaviest glass door he’d ever pried open. But somehow, couldn’t make himself step over the threshold. Bucky paused at the door, staring at the concrete just past the metal line, the line he might never get to cross back over.

"We looked for you, after." Following slowly, solemnly behind small legs as they trampled up those wooden, rickety steps. Course Steve just wanted to be alone. That’s why he hadn’t pushed it.

Pause at the door.

“Thanks, Buck. But I can get by on my own.” Sorrow found him in those soft blue eyes, those sad blue eyes, and Bucky’s hair was slicked back, crisp suit, the church boy look that made his cheekbones, jawline feel too sharp in comparison to Steve’s soft features.

“Thing is,” Bucky paused, air sharp and drifting wind brushing past them in the quiet sanctuary of Steve’s ma’s porch and this was the moment everything changed, the moment Steve really got it. Finally let go. Leaned on Bucky’s shoulder the way he’d been insisting he could for so many years.

Bucky was so ready for his turn.

So ready to stand in that threshold and look up to see those blue eyes in his place, soft blonde hair over the quiet smile as Steve looked at him with all that sunshine warmth, key extended in artist fingers,

“Thing is. You don’t have to.”

The Winter Soldier could get by on his own, that was the whole point, the efficiency, the safety, the fear, that one day he wouldn’t be able to get by on his own with Steve when all along, it was so much simpler than that. Thing is, he didn’t have to.

Bucky was so ready to let go.

Come home.

And Steve wasn’t here.

He was waiting here in this doorway, but Steve wasn’t. Just the expectant, waiting, disappointed, sorry gaze of Pepper Potts, one hand holding the door open and the other practically waving him through.

Waiting for him to go.

“If he shows up,” Bucky managed, pushing the fallen strands off his forehead the way Steve used to with those unruly bangs, metal fingers holding out the slip of paper from his pocket, scrawled phone number from a fading pen.

She took the folded paper, not bothering to look down as she waited for him to go. He could see the security guard outta the corner of his eye, and he’d bet anything they were gonna lock the doors the moment he stepped outside. He had it coming. Had so much worse coming.

_I don’t do that anymore._

“I’ll let you know if he’s moved here,” Pepper consoled finally, small pushing hand between his shoulderblades instead of a Skorpion, then he was on the concrete and the wind and cold enveloped his bones, wrapped him up in the only blanket he got to keep.

The door shut silently behind him, clicking into place and Bucky lifted his head, squinted out over the bustling street below. At least she’d said she’d let him know if Steve was mov--

Moved. Wait, what the fuck? Moved? _Moved??_

The heel in his shoe almost gave out as he spun back around again, opaque terrified version of Bucky Barnes blinking back at him in the reflecting glass, eyes wide as the green behind the reverberating barrier.

_Moved?

Pepper seemed to be expecting it as he rattled the door handle, expression wild as he stared past the mirror, begging her to let him back in, tell him what the fuck was happening, give him _something._
Please, just one moment of mercy, what did she mean, _moved._

Green held his. Then red swished, scattering across his vision and leaving him blinking in despair as clicking heels faded, too quiet to hear over the horns and traffic on the street, pedestrian rumble outside that sealed tower. Spun on one heel and gone, leaving him there with nothing but the bitter cold mirror of a man who’d never come home.
She knew where Steve was. And she hadn’t told him.

He wasn’t gonna break any more Stark glass. Not now, not ever again. Howard was probably sighing in relief in his grave and Bucky couldn’t let himself think about how he’d turned from the man who’d invented beside the Stark’s to the man who’d crashed through their technology with peeling metal and bitter cold wind.

Steve was gone. He was back to square one. Steve was gone.

But Pepper knew where he was. Which meant Bucky could damn well find out. Round two, here he came. Round twohundred, but he’d win.

So Steve’d evaded him, again, but Bucky wasn’t gonna let that blonde sunshine run forever.

I swear I’ll always beat you, golden da-ays

~~~

It took some severe caffeine-induced self reflection and life intervention to get a damn grip on himself, but he finally managed to inhale enough shitty coffee and Manhattan cafe air to think somewhat in a rational direction.

Steve was being held somewhere. Because Pepper said if he’s moved, meaning it wasn’t his choice.

So that left three major possibilities - jail, a hospital, or an insane asylum.

Bucky inhaled more gold-flecked chocolate oxygen and tried not to choke on the cloying familiarity of the coffee shop. Coffee shops were about the only thing in this city that hadn’t turned 360 on its ass with the new generation.

Jail, hospital, or an insane asylum. Which of those was the least awful at this point?

Jail. He’d start with jail, because the other two...he couldn’t think about the other two. Bail Steve outta jail, he could do. He could definitely do. Punk kid never could keep his nose outta trouble, he’d been bailing Steve outta fights for half his life, one more was fine with him.

God knows what Steve Rogers had to do to land behind bars, but Bucky’d seen the look on his face when they last saw each other and at this point, it really wasn’t that much of a stretch. Like. At all.

He’d been pretty upset.

All Bucky had to do now was get his head on straight, march his way to the closest police station, and give the apology of his life through iron bars.

Okay. One more swig of caffeine his cells would metabolize before the bell over the door announced his exit and off he goes.

Of all things in the twenty-first century that hadn’t changed, he was most grateful for the good ol’fashioned debonair smile. Couldn’t dance his way outta things the way he used to, but Bucky Barnes’ Charm still went a long way in the frigid city.

Threw out one hip as he leaned on the edge of the front desk and flashed his best, most beautiful 30’s boy smile at the pretty fella working secretary.
Quickest strategy, and it worked a hellofalot better on people that attractive, used-to-being-hit-on meant less suspicious of ulterior motives, which he totally did not have.

"Excuse me sir, I was wonderin’ if you could help me out? I’m lookin’ for a friend, might’a been picked up some time yesterday?"

The desk officer glanced up sympathetically, slowly morphing into a smile as he picked up on Bucky’s body language. Well, if it were the thirties, he’d be hauled into one’a those cells himself. Hadn’t anticipated the cop stuck at the front desk to be a fella, but lucky for him the twenty-first century not only employed both sexes, but also tolerated flirting his way past both.

"Um...I don’t know if I can...do you have any I.D. on you, sir?"

Shit.

Lean a little deeper, smile a little wider. Take it slow, let the words catch up, bashful averting eyes and patting down pockets--

"Mm...oh no. Aw, man, must’ve left my wallet in the taxi--"

Another sympathetic sound and the officer glanced over his shoulder, back at Bucky’s carefully distraught face, offered a shy smile up at him.

"Tell you what, I’ll just glance in the system, see if there’s anything. It’s a shame about your wallet..."

Victory, phew, resume flirty smile and..the guy told him they didn’t have anything in their precinct. Well fuck.

"...any chance you still have your phone? I could always call you, if something came up?"

Bucky shifted his weight, trying not to look suddenly uncomfortable. It was just, all this flirting, the way that guy was looking at him--

It was the wrong color blue. Same way Steve’s uniform, all those years ago, had been the wrong color blue. Shoulda asked him, he had the damn color etched into the veins of his wrists.

Should be that blue lookin’ up at him like that. Should be Steve’s soft blonde hair, bashful ducking smile, runnin’ his fingers along the edge of that pretty jaw. One eyebrow cocked up, head tilted to the side with that half-smile as he lured his beautiful boy with some line straight outta the forties, tapping teasingly on that big white star in the middle of Steve’s chest, over that too big golden heart--

Fuck, he wanted to flirt with Steve. Wanted to see that hungry light beneath sweeping eyelashes, touch his fingertips lightly to the pounding pulse on Steve’s neck, red flushing down from his cheeks to his chest in that precious fullbody blush.

Tip forward, lean up on his toes as he let his lips ghost over the shell of Steve’s ear, whisper something low and obvious, free hand running metal shivers down Steve’s arm to entwine with graphite-smeared artist fingers--

At some point he must’ve seriously lost his step, because suddenly the officer was standing, looking at him concernedly as his fingertips brushed the edge of Bucky’s hand, taking his outstretched phone.

“You alright, sir?”
“Hmm? Yeah, just. Worried about my fel-- my friend.” He smiled tightly and it really wasn’t any use, he’d dropped the ball already, haunted frown drained all the innocence right outta his flirting act and that meant, fuck, he’d need a new strategy at the next station and.

The officer handed back his phone with one eyebrow up and he really was a good-looking fella but he wasn’t Bucky’s good-lookin’ fella.

One more shattered bright gaze and Bucky brought up his right hand, tapping it once on the man’s chest with the most charming smile he could manage and he was out the door before the officer could realize he’d gotten his badge lifted.

“And you couldn’t submit a formal request?”

“See, the thing is ma’am, I was on my way into station when my partner called and I was close enough to the neighborhood figured it’d be easier if I just dropped in and asked, avoid a couple days worth of unnecessary paperwork and bureaucratic hassle, jurisdiction disputes, all that red tape and whatnot--”

“Yes, yeah, okay kid. What’d you say the perp looked like?”

He cringed at the word perp but hey, if Steve was in jail, the punk had’t’ve done somethin’ or another. And right now finding him mattered more than any of that, so.

“Blonde, 6’2, buff as hell, ridiculous shoulder to waist ratio?”

The female officer typed something in the computer, signaling for him to scoop his stolen badge back off the counter while she searched. Took everything in him not to dive over the desk, type goddamned faster. It was just, Steve could be in this building, sitting dejectedly on some bench while he waited for Tony to come pick him up--

Would he call Tony? To bail him out? Or would he call Sam? Or Natasha?

Would she pick up? Was she even on the team anymore? How the hell had she managed to avoid all Avengerly duties for the three months she’d been going to college with him?

“Alright Officer Jones, it looks like we’ve got one guy who might fit your profile. Irish fella?”

Bucky’s heart stopped in his chest. Sarah’s bedtime stories about the boat over from her motherland, the little Irish phrases they’d picked up as kids, the songs in Gaelic she used to sing, the Stiofan! when they were in big trouble.

“Yes, yeah, that might be him,” he breathed, leaning over the desk a bit, fingers curling tight in his driving gloves. “You gotta picture?”

She straightened up and swiveled the screen his direction, electronic file pulled up. Blonde, buff, even had the blue eyes. Known affiliations: Irish Mafia. It wasn’t Steve.

It wasn’t Steve.

Somehow managed not to crumple. “Damn. Ain’t him...thanks though, for pullin’ that up.”

The smile was weak, knees weaker as he pushed himself off the counter, straightened out his jacket and wished distantly he could take the damn gloves off.

“Sure, kid. Wish you luck findin’ him.”
A quick nod and through another set of glass doors, imprint of leather fingertips for just a moment before they faded in the cold, bustling sidewalk opening up around him again, fingerplates twitching underneath the all-black cover.

He’d spent months not even thinking about the arm, but now he was slipping back into the habit of covering it up in public and fuck, he’d like to be comfortable around himself again but now wasn’t the time to dwell on that, not til he had Steve. Not til he knew if there was anything he was living for anyways.

Four precincts down, two dozen more to go. Great. This was going so wonderfully, just. Great.

“We can’t just give you that information.”

“Look, here’s my badge--”

“I see that, and you can get your superior to call if it’s really that important. Come back tomorrow kid, we’re pretty damn busy in here, ‘case you hadn’t noticed.”

At least he held in the aggrieved groan until he was on the sidewalk again.

That was his third come back tomorrow. It’d already been a day and a half. Almost two, with the way the sun was hugging the horizon.

But he wasn’t gonna quit, couldn’t quit now. He’d check every goddamned station in this city through midnight, if he had to.

Which. Four hours later, looked like he might have to.

It’d be easier, to just hack the police system, right? But that meant time and money and equipment and he still didn’t have a damn thing to his name that wasn’t on college-kid budget and it wasn’t like the computers at the University library were gonna do a damn thing. Besides, odds are he’d run into somebody he knew--

Another two stations and he’d call it a night. Get some food in his system, maybe get his hands to stop shaking, think out a goddamn battle plan.

What you were then, I am today.
Invisible. I’m turning into you. This is some horrible dream.

What would he say when he found Steve in the first place? What could he possibly say?

It didn’t cross his mind until he was walking halfway down the temporary cell block for the 13th precinct, uniform leading him towards another buff blonde that’d been scooped up and didn’t have a photo on file yet, he’d just take Bucky into the back to look--

And it wasn’t, again, but he’d nearly had a heartattack in the hallway, feet faltering and nearly tripping over himself as he stopped, suddenly realized, he had no idea what he was gonna say. If it’d been Steve, he’d’ve been fucked. It wasn’t, and now he was staring at the East River from one of a million lone park benches, skyline glittering at him from under the reflection of the Williamsburg Bridge.

He hadn’t found Steve today. And he had no idea what to say to him if he found him tomorrow.

What could he possibly say? I’m sorry?
That didn’t exactly cover I left you in the rain, slit the throat of your friend/estranged nephew, then proceeded to commit first degree murder on the only other love interest you’ve ever had in your life who was also your best friend and sole confidant in this century before I came along and fucked up your entire world.

Yeah, no, I’m sorry didn’t cut.

But it was a start. It was a goddamn start, and he had to believe in the smallest chance of a future. Had to believe that somehow, through everything he’d done, he hadn’t broken the final straw and Steve didn’t want him gone for the rest of their lives. Had to believe that yes, they’d fucked up, he’d fucked up, he’d done the worst imaginable and then he’d topped it off with doing the one thing he’d promised Steve over and over again he’d never do again, erased Steve from his memories and ruined them both but it wasn’t over.

Couldn’t go back to that blank empty life he’d wiped for himself. It wasn’t living. He’d thought, with a fresh start, he’d be okay, they’d both be better off but they weren’t. And he had to keep believing this was where he was s’posed to be, chasing after that lil’ guy from Brooklyn. Had to keep believing he and Steve belonged together. That nothing could take him away from his best friend, that they’d always come back to each other. Steve’d forgiven him the Winter Soldier, could only hope for one more, just one more chance at the love of a lifetime, at life, the life they both deserved.

They were still the only thing for each other.

He had to believe that.

Or it was all for nothing.

Three words that became hard to say—

He finally wound up in Queens. The dawn had barely broken over the horizon, sunrise lighting up red orange fire in the sky.

Sunrise.

Once, a long time ago, on some night shift in the middle of summer - August, 1944, if he remembered correctly - Steve’d told him, “See you at sunrise, Barnes.” It was the simplest of goodbyes, nothing that should’ve stuck out, struck his chest like an odd tuning fork, resonating in his fingertips and collarbones, starting back down the hill to camp and just repeating it, the simple words, over and over.

Should’ve been nothing. And he’d spent hours lying awake, wondering if that sunrise would ever come.

Because it was more than a sunrise, it was that sunrise, and somehow he’d always known that this time, when the light flooded the sky, this wasn’t the one that counted. Wasn’t the sunrise Steve was talking about. For some reason, it wasn’t that sunrise, and he just. Kept waiting. Through all these years, always just been…

…waiting for the sunrise he’d promised to meet Steve.

And every morning the sun came over the horizon, even the ones with summer wrapped in his arms, tangled in his bed with warm limbs and hands tucked under his sweet cheeks, blue eyes blinking sleepy content at his own, gold on Bucky’s pillow, even those mornings of soft, barely-there kisses and warm hands sliding content over smooth skin, even those weren’t that sunrise.
But today, the end of February, 2016, Bucky Barnes paused at the edge of Central Park to watch the sun break the horizon, rise over the fading darkness, burning up blue sky with all that warm, soft fire and today, today felt like maybe. It could be.

See you at sunrise, Rogers. I’m coming home.

Your dreams to catch the world, the cage.

So he finally ended up in Queens. Wouldn’t started there, but he’d told himself there was no way Steve would’ve got into trouble mere minutes after they’d parted ways on that icy street corner. Besides, he’d been in downtown Manhattan, made no sense to go all the way out to Queens and work backward, might as well start with the closest precinct to the coffee epiphanies.

’Cept there was nothing in Manhattan. And he wasn’t gonna pretend anymore, that he hadn’t effected Steve enough not to get him thrown in jail within minutes of saying, one more time, Who the hell is Bucky?

Queens, instead of Brooklyn, fingers carding through his hair and surprising himself with how short it was for the hundredth time since he’d woken back up. See you at sunrise.

“Nope. No descriptions like that.”

“Nothing?”

“Sorry. No blonde guys through here in the past couple days.”

Bucky drew his bottom lip into his mouth, nodding slowly. What had he been expecting? Only he’d just. Been so sure this’d be the place. The morning he gotta see Steve again, it was supposed to be this sunrise.

“Well uh. Thanks anyways.” Funny, how quiet destruction could find a soul. How quick a hopeful smile turned into a plastered one.

How all the spinning heels felt like endings of chapters he never gotta finish reading.

But. But there was something else he could try--

If Steve got in some kinda fight, ended up in a jail-cell, that wasn’t gonna be one-way, right? Maybe he couldn’t find Steve for whatever reason, but he could try’n find whoever Steve’d got in a fight with?

If it was a fight. Probably been a fight, knowing Steve. Everything was a goddamned fight.

What you were then, I am today.

The desk clerk looked surprised that he turned back around, but no less kind as he drummed his fingers on the desk again.

“Hey, could you do me one more favor? Would you mind checking the database, see if anybody was dispatched to that street day before yesterday?”

“Just...any units at all?”

“Yeah, the whole gamut. If you can.”

“Hmm. Maybe, I can try.” The clerk tapped away, staring intently at the screen and Bucky curled his fingers up, tucking fists in his jacket pockets and rocking forward on his heels.

“Sorry this is...computer’s bein’ bitchy.” A furrowed line of stress and the clerk’s fingers typed faster, clearly getting more annoyed and distressed and that just. He wasn’t gonna drag anybody else into this, he’d had plenty his share of dishing out pain, even something as simple as putting somebody out. There were other precincts, couldn’t all be having computer trouble.

“Hey, listen, thanks for trying, but it’s fine. Kind’a long shot anyway, y’know?” Bucky gave the best grateful smile he could with all that sadness dragging down corners and the clerk glanced up apologetically, giving a little wave as he started to back for the door again.

Definitely a long shot. Steve was gone, from everywhere he was trying to look and. It’d been so long, two days now and he still couldn’t find him and that meant he was gonna have to start doing illegal things to find him, dangerous things and he didn’t wanna be that person, not anymore, that was the whole goddamned point--

He might not have a choice.

But wasn’t that what it was all about? Wasn’t the entire fight about having a choice? Wasn’t that why they went to war - for freedom, for the bloody red, white hands, blue veins that pulsed for each other with the freedom to make that choice?

How else was he supposed to find Steve?

Maybe the universe just didn’t want ‘em to be together. Maybe he was supposed to suffer alone in agony for his crimes, the rest of existence.

“Wait!” He was already pushing open another glass door when the clerk shouted out from behind him, glass slamming right back shut as he took one careful, disbelieving step towards the anticipation lighting up, scrolling screen.

That dashed spark of hope, again, little flame ready to be extinguished the moment the snow set in again.

“There’s a report here...okay, it actually may not be what you’re looking for. But according to the emergency responder logs -- two days ago there was an ambulance call to that area, couple streets down from the one you asked about. I know an ambulance isn’t a police dispatch b--”

Fuck.

An ambulance. An ambulance.

If Steve’s moved here. No wonder Bucky couldn’t find him in any of the jails. He wasn’t behind bars. Just white sheets and heart monitors.

An ambulance.

Steve, picked up in an ambulance. That meant hurt. Hurt, bad enough to go to a hospital, that wasn’t fuckin’ easy for a supersoldier--

“Do you have what hospital?” The question betrayed all the cracking pieces of his soul, breathless and terrified and euphorius, wide as his tired eyes and rushing quick as the thudding pulse under thin skin.

“No, sorry. It’s not our division.” Worried gazes and Bucky couldn’t see anything but flashing red, blue, red, blue. Sirens, flash of white streaking past.

An ambulance. Of course it’d crossed his mind but he couldn’t take that seriously, it was Steve, he didn’t do hospitals when he was breakable, there was no way he’d end up in one now, even if he was broken enough to need one which he really never was--

“She thanks,” Bucky managed, and he was somehow on the sidewalk again, drifting snow landing on his nose and blurring up his eyelashes.

A hospital.

Here comes the snow, but a hospital? Steve wouldn’t still be there, if he’d been taken to one. The serum would’ve healed any injuries by now, right?

He could hack into the medical system database, but it’d take time, equipment -- he didn’t have time. He’d had nothing but for the majority of his life, years upon years upon ice, seventy of it and now he’d wasted seventy hours searching businesses and working up the urge to go to Stark Tower to be turned down by Potts then interrogating police stations and.

And he’d wasted so much time. Same way he’d been wasting time, all along, he could’ve been kissin’ on Steve since they were teens and he’d done nothing but waste, but this time might mean gone forever.

Odds were Steve wasn’t in the hospital anymore, he healed so damn fast, even after the helicarrier so he was either out, or about to be out, and.

He was never gonna find him like this.

Fuck. The slippery ice of one more street corner and someone knocked his shoulder, spun him out sideways, and another shoulder, Times Square was spinning and the world was all wrong, but he couldn’t stop staring at his hands and picturing those white walls.

See if it was jail he’d just keep looking but it wasn’t, Steve hadn’t been arrested. He was hurt.

He had to find Steve now. No more guesswork, no more slipping under the radar, Steve was hurt, bad enough they’d called in sirens, flashing white over what, dripping blood, pretty blue eyes sealed shut, four EMT’s hauling that precious body up onto a stretcher, laid out like a coffin with no one to ride in the back and hold Steve’s hand--

A hospital, and not even Stark’s, Pepper said she’d let him know if Steve was moved there and. And that was yesterday, he could’ve gotten outta the hospital by now, could be off in the wind or could be barely alive, could be dying and Bucky wasn’t by his side.

There wasn’t time to search hospitals, to run across the city and ask every front desk clerk in the world. He didn’t have time, because Steve could be dying and he was standing in the middle of some New York sidewalk instead of holding those precious artist hands.

Where could he go? There had to be a way, to find him. Pepper wasn’t gonna break, she would’ve told him then if she ever would. Who else would know? Tony, but Bucky couldn’t--

Clint? Would Clint know? Clint fucking Barton would tell him.

Fumbling through pockets for his phone, jamming in the memorized number and shoving through the morning rush hour crowd, corner of his mind wishing for the curtain of unruly to hide behind - no one looked at him terrified, waters didn’t part when he was a ruffled soldier from Brooklyn.
Managed to squeeze past enough bodies to duck into an alley, actually hear the ringing against his ear just in time for the dial tone to end abruptly.

“We’re sorry; you have reached a number that has been disconnected or is no longer in service. If you—“

No. No no no.

Sam? Would Sam tell him? Clint was forgiving, Clint understood, but Sam loved Steve almost as much as Bucky did and he might not--

He had to try. Steve was in the goddamned hospital, he had to try.

“You’ve reached Sam Wilson. Leave a message and I’ll get back to you as soon as I can.”

Bucky hung up before the beep, metal fingers twitching sporadically in leather as he fought the urge to crush the phone. Throwing it against a brick wall wasn’t gonna do anybody good, he had to come up with a plan and Pepper could always still call him--

She wasn’t gonna call him. Steve could be moved to Stark Tower yesterday and she wasn’t gonna call him.

If the Avengers had to choose between protecting Steve and protecting him, Bucky was glad Steve’d picked such good friends.

No way in hell they were giving him anything.

He couldn’t--

He had to. It was the only thing left. Only thing left.

Two leather gloves shoved through his hair and Bucky sucked in a deep breath, storms hovering on the edge of the air, the tip of his tongue. There was only one place left to go.

Welcome to Brooklyn.

~~~

I cut the ties and jumped the tracks, for never to return

You’d think all those hours he’d spent running around DC getting lapped by Steve Rogers woulda gave him more leg strength than this.

He blamed the wings. Spent so much time training in the new model Stark built he’d been skipping quads day here and there. Okay, maybe a bit more than here’n’there. But the Stark Tower had elevators, and with his running buddy outta commission for the last, what, six months, he hadn’t gotten in all the working out he shoulda.

Not like that mattered right now. He’d give up running for the rest of his life if it meant he got his running buddy back.

Either way, by the time he hit the tenth floor of Rogers and Barnes’ apartment building, his legs were about to give out on him. To be fair he’d booked it the entire way here from Steve’s hospital room, add on the stairs on top of that?

So yeah, he was huffin’ and puffin’ by the time he wrestled the key into Steve’s apartment door and shoved it open, practically collapsing against the door as it shut behind him.

Every military bone in his body was rolling its eyes. His superiors would be nothin’ but scolding voices of disapproval. And Riley would be laughin’ his head off at Sam right now.

“You need a medic?” that teasing smile he hadn’t heard in so long, back when everything was beautiful and easy and the biggest worry he had was if Stark was gonna steal his orange juice.

Man, what he’d give to see Steve Rogers smile like that again.

Well, s’why he was here, right? He’d been playing Troubleman at Steve’s bedside for the past day and half, Tony’d insisted he got outta the hospital for a bit, go grab some of Rogers things from his apartment. And he was insisting on another iPod too, which yeah, Sam supposed he could bring back but really, Marvin Gaye was the best bedside music Steve was gonna get.

And maybe it had something to do with the fact that the last time Sam’d camped out at Steve’s bedside playing it, he’d actually woken back up.

Just wanted Rogers to wake back up.

Sam shook his head and pushed off the wall, groaning at sore legs as he headed for the kitchen. Water first, then he’d grab some things Steve might need and run back to the hospital - maybe pick up food on the way. God knows that hospital stuff was awful and considering he was the first one to leave the place since they’d all gotten the call, everyone’d probably appreciate some takeout soup from that place around the corner.

He didn’t like not bein’ there, but. If he could bring anything back that might pull Rogers into recovery, it was worth a shot.

Hmm. What would Steve want the most--

And, ironically, that’s the exact moment he heard the sound. And froze.

It had to be an intentional sound though, because even with his water glass on the table and the place graveyard quiet, he wouldn’t’ve have heard it without the explicit permission of those silent feet.

The only silent feet he knew that could sneak up on a vet that way. Only silent sniper who could make the hairs stand up on the back of his neck before he even saw him.

Because you didn’t need to see the Winter Soldier to be terrified of him. Fury stood in front of a solid wall in a dark apartment off the grid and that hadn’t stopped three deadly shots blasting through the sheetrock.

What exactly was the protocol here? What, was he supposed to just turn around, lift his hands and offer a hey Barnes?

It’d been a long long time since he’d seen Bucky.

It hadn’t felt real, for the longest time. Clint’s explosion, Tony’s throat, Agent Carter’s murder. Steve’s entire shutdown. Like he knew it happened, knew it was that last straw, but he still couldn’t quite picture it. The fellow soldier he’d handed engraved dogtags to, that was the guy who’d terrorized their lives?

Sam spent his days at the VA, he’d seen and heard some awful shit. He’d had to fight Barnes, before he got his memories back, he knew exactly how hardcore and scary the guy could be. He’d ripped off Sam’s wings and kicked him into oblivion, after all.

But he still couldn’t picture it. Bucky wouldn’t do that. Bucky Barnes wouldn’t hurt any of them, he loved Steve too much.

Only he did. He did a hell of a lot more than hurt, and here he was, somewhere behind Sam, probably with a gun aimed at his head and a dozen knives tucked between metal fingers.

Hey Barnes wasn’t gonna cut it.

So he didn’t say anything at all. For all the experience he had with veteran trauma, he had no idea where to begin with Bucky and at this point, the only option he really had was to keep his mouth shut and turn around slowly, hope Barnes didn’t shoot him in the process.

Sam blinked, eyes adjusting to the shadows and going wide the minute they did.

That wasn’t the Winter Soldier pointing guns at him.

Wasn’t the Winter Soldier at all. That was a kid. A young army Sergeant with big scared eyes and a sharp clean jawline with that same dimple Barnes had, hair smoothed into the same vintage wave it had in all the textbooks, clean and tidy. Didn’t look a day over twenty-five. Didn’t look the slightest bit dangerous, not from the tremor in plush lips to the shaking fingers carefully open at his sides.

No weapon in sight.

“Bucky?” Sam said anyways. The whole keeping quiet thing was for the enemy he was expecting to see when he turned around, not. Not this.

“Where is he?”

Once, last year, when Bucky’d finally told Steve he’d been drafted? They’d fought after, the two of ‘em had broken into a screaming match that turned into a shoving match and there’d been so much angry muscle and fiery eyes and sharp snapping as they pushed each other to breaking points and broke and Sam’d witnessed the whole thing, sat frozen on the bed at the edge of the room.

After, Bucky’d broken down, looking ready to curl in a ball and cry and Steve’d looked at him with that stern, serious look and opened up his huge, bodycrushing arms and offered a gruff “c’mere,” pulled his shouting-match equal into his chest, let Bucky just fall apart in his arms as he held one hand tight in Barnes’ long hair, rocking them gently from side to side.

“You two okay?” Sam’d finally asked, and Bucky’d choked on a laugh, lifting his streaked face from Steve’s shoulder and looking positively destroyed as he shot Sam a weak, embarrassed look “oh my god, we forgot about Sam,” and muffled an apology with his chin on Steve’s collarbone.

He’d been so strung out, bent twisted raw, pure emotion carved up like a cadaver, peeled open for Steve’s eyes only but Sam’d been there, even if they’d forgotten, and Sam’d seen, all that pain Bucky was so good at tucking away.

That level of vulnerability, of hurt and weakness--

It was the exact look on his face now, black sharp lines dramatic across the exhausted face in the shadows.

Where was Steve. God, he had no idea where Barnes’ been in the past three months or what he’d been up to, but he could tell in this exact moment right here, he wasn’t in any less pain than Steve was. It’d ruined them both, one glance at the shattered eyes and it was obvious.

Bucky’s betrayal cut everyone in this family so deep the blood was still running, but nobody was suffering like those two. Barnes and Rogers, never catching a goddamned break.

But what good would it be, to take Bucky to Steve now, when they were both already destroyed? What happened when he just. Left again.

They hadn’t been okay before, no way enough’d changed since then for them to work now, was there?

“Man, I don’t think that’s a good idea.” Sam was careful as he could be, non-threatening, simple advice. Barnes used to come to him for advice.

Hell, they’d camped out in Stark’s basement in a pop-up tent once, it wasn’t like Bucky didn’t trust him.

"You win your war?"

"Not over yet." Sam shifted his head, tucking his arm under his temple. "You win yours?"

"You read the textbooks," Bucky shrugged, sleeping bag whispering around him.

"Not the one I was talking about."

The tent fell silent.

Only they weren’t in the safety of a tiny gold bubble, wrapped in green and black snivel gear with a lantern flickering quietly between them. There was nothing golden about this bubble, not since the sun set and forgot how to glow, forgot how to open those blue eyes. All that soft blonde against white hospital sheets...

If it was fucking him up, how was Barnes supposed to see Steve like that? How the hell was he gonna react? What if he went mad, what if Barnes couldn’t take it and he Winter Soldiered out on them--

“Where is he?” Bucky asked again, taking one step closer, outta the shadows. Sam swallowed, scanning over the shaking fingers and mouth pulled down in sorrow, perfect pomade making him look more like a ghost than anything.

Let’s find out what the ghost wants.

When Tony’d suggested bringing back something Steve’d want, Sam was pretty sure this wasn’t what he had in mind. But. Odds are, Bucky was. Or maybe not. There was no way to know.

Either way. It wasn’t up to him. Steve should be the one to decide if he wanted to see Bucky again, and since he was currently indisposed at the moment he couldn’t make that decision and Sam couldn’t even guess what he’d want based off the past few months. There was just as much of a chance that Steve wanted to see Bucky again as there was that he wanted to kill him for real this time.
“Listen, Barnes. I wanna help you man, I do. But tellin’ you where he is...” The shoulder he lifted implied everything Bucky needed to hear, it’s something I can’t do.

Sarge himself had asked him once, if I go off the rails, you’ve got Steve, right? You keep Steve safe.

That’s all he was doin’. Bucky had to understand that.

Well.

Based on the gun suddenly propped in Barnes’ hands, he was gonna say understand wasn’t exactly the word to choose.

“You’re one of my best friends, Sam,” Bucky started slowly, one step closer, wide shoulders rippling, wave echoing down his arm, metal plates shifting on the loose trigger finger.

He should be scared. And yeah, his heart was pounding, he knew exactly how dangerous Barnes could be. But there were no demon horns or wicked eyes, blood dripping between slates of metal. That wasn’t a monster standing in fronta him. All Sam saw was a desperate kid.

A really heartbroken, desperate kid.

“Bucky--”

Sam didn’t know he was the first person to call him that since he’d slit Tony’s throat. He did, however, see the flash behind crystal eyes. The recognition, the shift and suddenly that desperate kid was a hellofalot more desperate, arms lifting to aim the gun half-heartedly, silent steps stalking to the side, predator after prey and Sam held still, kept his hands up, watched Barnes carefully as he cocked his head, lips rolling in and back out before the pretty face lifted an eyebrow and tipped the muzzle at Sam’s pounding heart.

“I love you man, and I owe you the fucking world for taking care of Steve when I couldn’t.” Pistol propped easy in his palm, wavering just a tad as crystal eyes studied him over the top of the sight.

“You’ve been better to me than anyone could’ve ever asked for.” Sam was holding his breath, waiting for the shoe to drop as Bucky studied him, inhaled deep and settled into those broad shoulders, and there, something clicked and the gun was pointed between his eyes and that was a whole other world from a chest shot; if he pulled that trigger there was no chance of surviving, and from the look on Barnes’ face? He knew that.

“I’ll be grateful for that for the rest of my life.” Blink and there goes the shoe, right out the goddamned window, metal whirring and soft crystal settling on his with every ounce of seriousness.

“But I will kill you. Where is he?”

Odds are, it wasn’t a bluff.

But Sam couldn’t help but think, this was Bucky, he wouldn’t pull the trigger, not now, not after everything.

Sam took a single step forward, mouth open to tell him to put the gun down, let them talk this out--

And Bucky cocked the gun. All the hesitation and softness vanished, like it’d never been there in the first place and the man staring him down wasn’t the Bucky that’d never shoot him. Hardened cold and terrifying in a split second, blinking at the whiplash, at how innocent that pretty face still looked as he angled a bullet between Sam’s eyes and dropped the first real-sounding threat to echo in the empty graveyard apartment.
“Don’t make me ask again.”

~~~

Two white doors.

Two white doors burst open, highway road to nowhere and a white, blank long corridor. Dashed yellow lines disappearing under black sprinting boots, wind whipping through short dark hair, the ghost of artist hands over strong thighs as the snow tumbled through cold air too slow to catch falling dark skies.

“Maybe...you’ll fall in love with me all over again.”

"Hell," I said, "I love you enough now. What do you want to do? Ruin me?"

"Yes. I want to ruin you."

"Good," I said. "That's what I want too."

It was Steve Rogers, sideways showgirl helmet running down musty green corridors to the open door spilling light at the end of the hallway and Bucky Barnes running down one more hospital corridor past all that white white blank and there was a ticking clock with an explosion somewhere in the distance and a boy locked down in a torture room by leather straps and a boy lying still in a hospital bed with white sheets and all he had to do was burst inside, all he had to do was skid around the corner and inhale a prayer, a dying breath, the first gasp of air in a century and free him. Free him.

I thought you were dead.

I thought you were smaller.

Time was frozen. Time, this time, instead of two boys from Brooklyn. Bucky’s heart, pounding in his wrists, in his fragile chest as warm human fingers closed around the metal handle.

And he opened the door.

In the end, I'd do it all again. I think you're my best friend...don't you know that the kids aren't al-

He didn’t know, until after, long after, why the nurses rushed to the window when he stepped inside. It wasn’t the intruder, they knew he was coming.

They all did - Sam’d called, convinced Natasha to round up everyone, get them outta there. Just outta sight round the corner past Steve’s room; it’d be no use trying to stop Barnes from getting there now.
The team of them could try to take him on, but there was no way there wouldn’t be casualties. So Natasha stood guard down the hall Avengers tucked behind her and Sam took the back staircase up, let Barnes go on his own.

The nurses were warned too but they all came rushing to the window, peering through blinds worriedly. ‘Cause, see, they knew Barnes was coming, but that didn’t explain the sudden jump in their coma patient’s heartbeat when the door opened.

Only, it really did.

“Steve?”

The thing about memory loss, it’s not just images, flashbacks, people that are gone. It’s everything, it’s you. A person’s soul is composed entirely of memories.

What are you, if not a compilation of every moment you’ve ever lived? So, by extension, without memories, can you be anyone but no one?

There is nothing worse than being nothing, except perhaps having nothing, and that’s exactly what he had for so long.

Seventy years, and another three months now.

Except, one thing. One exception.

Even when he’d had nothing, he’d had…

Sunlight. Blue skies and bright smiles and the Brooklyn Bridge and red stars and warm empty spaces between his fingers and 40’s music and dancing and the red white and blue striping his shadow, empty space in his heart and crystals in his eyes.

Only now, he had everything and nothing all over again but still, the only thing that’d ever mattered, the only steady thing in his entire life, catching and falling over and over across the starlit sky, there it came. The sunrise.

“Steve?”

It’s me. It’s Steve. Warm hands, golden blue, wide spreading smile as Bucky jostled and blinked up at the angel leaning over the torture table.

White table, blinking long long lashes, blue eyes opening into the new world, a new century, thawed and defrosted and cold empty alone in that too white room, baseball on the radio and Bucky’s name on the back of his tongue, wake up into the new era one more time.

But.

Blue eyes didn’t open.

The windows could be real or fake or something in between, like him, but there was no sunlight in this room and the gold was too pale to give off anything but this eerie, floating clarity--

Once, a soldier murmured that name on his lips, opened into dingy dirty drag me home.

Except now, standing in the doorway, the soldier couldn’t move, staring at white skin on white sheets, pale, closed lips, soft blonde hair over shut, hidden blues. Not a single muscle moved. Just a distant heart monitor, beep, beep, beep no sign of life in the entire blank universe, stepping outside into the warmth to find the sky white, drawn on paper and folded in boxes in sketchbooks all along, surprise, nothing but a pencil-sketch falling apart in red flecks of eraser on white.

Why. Why wouldn’t Steve open his eyes?

“Stevie?” whisper.

Bucky was here, Bucky’d come for him, and he’d known Steve would be in the hospital but there wasn’t a single scratch on his face, there wasn’t a single wrapped limb or visible injury he was just lying there, an angel on a casket and it didn’t make any sense, why...why wouldn’t he open his eyes?

Blue skies turned white and the years between them crushed oxygen like crumpling paper and he was curling mismatched hands around the edge of that white bed.

He couldn’t bring himself to touch the fragile white skin, was too terrified to find it frozen, cryodammed, too terrified to feel it fall apart under blue-bruising metal, crumble into snow-powder dust and slip away on the ghost of his last breath.

Don’t do anything stupid until I get back.

How can I?

Took everything with him. Everything those rough artist hands could give him.

Why wouldn’t Steve open his eyes?

He heard her before he saw her. Again, leaning back in tandem as the bar fell into a silent hush, bodies apart for months and still moving in perfect sync in the swarm of gold.

Only Steve couldn’t spin around with him this time. So Bucky didn’t bother.

“What’d he do?”

Sounded as rough and raw as he felt and he wondered if Nat’s face was twisted in sympathy or cruelty. Or maybe that perfect, careful blank he’d gotten to know so well.

Three and a half months, she’d let him call her his best friend for three and a half months and he couldn’t even bring himself to be mad.

It’d been three and a half months, that they’d been apart during the war too, during their tours.

Steve’s USO tour had been a bit different than Bucky’s European tour. Surprisingly probably had more ammo on Steve’s end, but there were a lot more bombs on Bucky’s.

He still didn’t know why Natasha’d bothered. Why she’d tried to trigger back his memories, all those little hints. Or maybe she’d just checked all those times - Buchanan, 40’s, dancing - to make sure he really was gone.

He hadn’t been. Had she known? How much had she known?

She better know now, what was wrong with Steve. Eerily silent behind him, but clearly, it had to be something. Steve was in a goddamn--

Sympathy, cause I don’t wanna get over you.
The hospital bed wasn’t as surprising as he wished it were. Steve Rogers had a pretty reckless habit of doing stupid things that landed him hooked up to a heart monitor, as much as it scared him, he wasn’t blind enough not to see that coming. Just assumed he did something stupid. But what stupid didn’t end up bloody knuckles, red staining blank bandages, blank sheets?

Quiet shuffle, creaking leather as Natasha crossed her arms over her chest, shifted her weight. Watched his spine a moment longer, studying, maybe wondering why he hadn’t taken Steve’s hand yet.

Why hadn’t they ever grabbed each other’s hands when it counted? What was one more time.

Finally she cleared her throat, voice nearly swallowed up in the distant white harsh empty.

“He’s been in and outta Stark’s hospital for months.”

It took a moment to sink in.

“What?”

Bucky spun around like it was the 1943 World Fair and Steve’d disappeared again, only the dread in his stomach sunk a hell of a lot deeper and there was nothing now to hold back the terror on his face.

Steve hated hospitals. Why could he possibly be in and outta one? Fighting? Why? Why the fuck was he in the hospital now?

Natasha studied him openly, arms crossed over her chest, exact same hairstyle as the last time he’d seen her. Which had been in class, hadn’t it? He didn’t much like his head being fucked with. And from the look on her face she was still deciding whether or not she was gonna fuck with him some more.

But if anyone was gonna tell it to him straight, it’d be her. She owed him too much now.

One more comet to face off with and he’d be damned if he was the one pushed outta the sky now.

“He...” a deep breath and Natasha looked away, red hair swinging and if it was bad enough she couldn’t bear looking at him or Steve-- “…hasn’t really eaten since Christmas.”

The bomb dropped out of the sky.

“...what?” He couldn’t feel his hands. Couldn’t see anything but the numbers running through his head, jaw dropping as the words tumbled out before he could process those either, “Eight weeks??”

He hadn’t...eight weeks.

It was his fault. Of course it was his fault. But why, why that, why not eating, of all things?

Why the only thing that could break down those perfect cells? How could he do this to Bucky--

Bucky hadn’t been there. He hadn’t been there to stop him.

He’d always been there to stop him. Since the first day Sarah got sick. Bucky’d been so heartbroken, watching Steve give his portion of the soup to Sarah and insist there was more downstairs for him when they both knew there wasn’t, that tiny frail sick body getting sicker and Bucky’d intervened real quick, started skipping on his meals to make sure Steve was getting something on those tiny bones.
There’d never been enough food for them, and it didn’t help that all those bullies’ kicks against his stomach had Steve hurling in alleys more often than not and maybe it all started all the way back then but where was Bucky to make sure Steve stayed fed now?

It was his fault. It was his fault, not just cause he’d been gone but cause he’d been down this road, it’d been him first, the one barely stomaching apples then pretending he could do more and hurling his way through road trips and after.

Until Steve caught him. Until Steve tricked him, walked in on him on his knees hurling up breakfast he couldn’t take, and the fucking fight that ensued--

Almost broke those pretty little artist wrists. Only it wasn’t him that almost did, Steve almost did and that was so much worse, Bucky’d pinned him to the couch and yelled and there’d been so much fight in those fucking blue eyes.

"Have you gone out of your fucking mind?" Bucky demanded, leaning down closer. Steve tried to pry his hands free from the metal fingers, but there was no give. He struggled a little more, trying to wiggle away as he glared and finally opened his mouth, shooting off his own fiery, pissed response.

"No, but you have! You hid an eating disorder from me for months, you bastard!"

Bucky leaned even closer, hissing directly in Steve's face. "It's not an eating disorder."

Eight weeks.

Steve hadn’t eaten in eight weeks.

This was all his fault.

And all he could do was push back the tears, water down cheeks and breaks in his heart, fight off the cracks for one moment longer as he found himself standing over the frail, sick body of his best friend, one more time and nothing in the world could stop him now from taking Steve’s hand.

His fingers were cold. His fingers were so cold.

Bucky squeezed their weaved hands carefully, choking back another rough tug in his throat, gaze darting over every flicker of Steve’s face, waiting for the moment he caught on, woke up, felt Bucky’s touch returned to him. Only it wasn’t flickering, not at all, not even a twitch--

“They’ve been keeping him on IV’s. It’s not the first time, but it’s never been this bad.”

This bad. Jesus Christ.

“Steve, baby,” Bucky whispered, dragging his thumb over the cool, eerily smooth skin, waiting for the muscles to twitch to life, groggily flicker and blink up at him. But there was nothing. There was still nothing.

He almost couldn’t bring himself to say it. Maybe he was just being impatient, maybe Steve hadn’t gotten sleep in a long time and he was super out of it, maybe he was sleeping off the effects of being under and.

The words slipped outta his mouth anyways, more terrified than horrified and heart clenching tight in his chest with both.

“Why isn’t he waking up?”
Eternity flew right under his feet, raggedy creaking wood as he knelt by Steve’s bedside, fingers wrapped around that fragile hand as he gasped, broken and desperate, tears choking his tongue as that word kept running through his head, pneumonia, pneumonia, he has pneumonia, the crippling pain as he pressed his forehead to Steve’s cold skin and it really sunk in, truly sunk in that Steve might die tonight. That Bucky might lose him.

A shuddering breath and Bucky shook his head, shoving the memory aside, forcing his head back into this hospital room, this Steve’s cold hand--

That he was squeezing, fuck, again. He forgot how strong the nonmetallic was too, instantly releasing the bruising grip on unresponsive fingers. Fuck, Steve’d hissed in pain last time, why wasn’t he doing a goddamn thing? When was he gonna wake up, when--

“He’s...” Natasha paused, voice dropping almost fearful, hesitance coloring the stale air until finally, the words leaked, pooling red instead. “...in a medically-induced coma.”

And there went all of the oxygen in his lungs.

“A medically induced coma? He--”

The world tipped sideways, gravity suddenly reclaiming his body and rushing everything to his head all at once, Steve’d been in the hospital for weeks, hadn’t eaten anything this year, it’d gotten so bad they put him in a medically induced coma and Bucky hadn’t been there, he hadn’t been there. It hadn’t been him, squeezing Steve’s hand on the way to the hospital, him, scolding Steve to eat something, him, moving heaven and earth to keep his boy safe.

The metal arm still had some instinct left, darting out to grab the rail of the hospital bed before he collapsed, catching just as he tipped for the ground, hardened thigh muscle giving out on him and it was all his fault.

Fuck. Fuck, even the metal plates were trembling now, he had to stop shaking, had to talk himself through this because Steve sure as hell wasn’t gonna drag him outta a panic attack now, not when Bucky was the one who--

Inhale, fuck, all he had to do was inhale, he couldn’t breathe but he had to pull it together for Steve because he needed him and there was no way in hell Bucky’d fail him now. It’s real, you did this to him with your absence but he’s here now, you’re here now, get a fucking grip and breathe. Breathe, he’s not dead, it could be so much worse, he could be dead.

Medically induced coma, c’mon Barnes, what would Steve say? Be smart for once in your life, the way Rogers always goddamn insisted you were. Okay, you can do this. Deep breath, straighten up, focus back in on the sharp lines of that beautiful face--

No, okay, maybe focus on the coma, these people don’t know Steve the way you do, you gotta take care of him, what do you know about this? You know everything about Steve, so just start from the beginning. No food, what were the consequences for no food--

“What are they doing for bone tenacity?” The sudden bark caught her off guard and Natasha furrowed her eyebrows, glancing between the comatose sunshine and the barely-contained fireball starting to leak sparks at his side.

“...bone tenacity?”

And somewhere, a switch flipped.
“Goddamnit, you’ve gotta be kidding me,” Bucky cursed rapidly under his breath, practically flinging himself round the corner of Steve’s bedside, quickly scanning the clear bag hooked up to muscled arms, spinning uselessly as he looked for a medical chart, finally catching sight of a small stack of papers on the bedside table.

“Fuck, if he’s been on IV’s or nothing for that long without chewing anything his teeth will start to break down.” He didn’t even look up at her to speak, rambling off with the same frantic energy as his hands flipping through the stack of papers that were apparently deemed useless, tossed back on the table without a second glance, flying back to Steve’s bedside, checking the tape and needle against his skin, “They’re made of a different kind’a bone, teeth weaken if they don’t have something to bite down on.”

The whirlwind kept going, spinning again and leaning over to jam a metal thumb into the nurse call button, right back at Steve’s side, running a finger up the length of the IV line, checking the pressure all the way up to the bag, “Hydra had me on IV’s for years, so they took care of that with mouth guards but Steve sure as hell ain’t gettin’ one’a those--”

Natasha blinked, quickly swiveling to the side as a triage of nurses burst into the room, door slamming loudly and the worry-terror on their faces even louder.

Bucky didn’t so much as look up, still, thumbs feeling carefully along Steve’s slack jaw, making a pained sound at something and finally, finally, glancing up. Only for a single moment, gesturing wildly at one nurse,

“Do you have him on calcium?” Wide eyes in reply and Bucky waved an arm impatiently, setting right back into whirlwind mode again as he caught sight of a clipboard.

“Somebody go grab calcium, he’s gonna lose bone strength--”

Blur, metal flashing and if his dark hair was still long she could just see the messy bun he’d toss it up in, ponytail in his mouth as he kept ordering everyone around only it wasn’t long anymore and she wasn’t used to seeing this Bucky, this side of Barnes, being the one taking care of Rogers.

Although, she supposed, their whole lives it’d been this way. Short-haired, bright-eyed, young beautiful Bucky Barnes was the one who grew up fussing around his boy this way.

“--shoulders should be elevated, someone get me another pillow--”

She slowly backed for the door, keeping one eye on the crowd that’d gathered outside the glass and the other on Barnes, the perfect storm, stars swept up in a hurricane tide with only sunshine lifted above from drowning.

“--he’s got an allergy to--”

“...it’s not on his medical charts, are you sure that wasn’t before the seru--”

“Listen, I am not willing to take the chance, find a substitute or take him off it but you’re not putting him that in him for another goddamn second…”

Demand after barking order and not a single one of them was harsh, not really, couldn’t be with that much worry and love in the killer’s hands fabricating such chaos so gently, crystal swimming with softness every time they flickered back to the sleeping angel on white sheets.

They watched, Natasha, Sam, and the doctors, standing outside the hospital room window with arms crossed and hearts broken in their chests.
But nobody near so broken as the shaking savior who’d finally, finally, rounded that corner.

Hey, pick on somebody your own size.

One by one the nurses all filed out of the too-white room, leaving behind the water he’d asked for, the pens and paper, the full file of Steve’s medical chart that he was gonna annotate with accurate information goddamnit and Bucky was shaking, his hands were shaking and his knees were shaking and his head was spinning, legs seconds from giving out beneath him.

There was the tired that came with late college nights and early morning coffee classes, then there was the deep-seated overwhelming exhaustion that weighed down fragile bones - it was the second of the two that dragged him down, collapsing in the chair at Steve’s bedside with the last gasped breath whooshing outta his lungs.

My head is on fire but my legs are fine.

After all, they are mine.

Mine. They were, these were his exhausted legs, his thrumming heart, his deep ache. He’d been so afraid of himself, for so long. They hadn’t been his for so long but look at him now, look at them both. Here they were.

One arm reaching out blindly, taking Steve’s hand without thinking about it, fingers weaving together automatically and the other running down his face, fingertips over his forehead, closed eyes and heaving chest slowly settling down into something quiet, distant, one breath in and another out.

Three words that became hard to say.

Hadn’t been this worn in years, hadn’t been this rough in tangled worry. Hope.

Fuck, Steve sure knew how to do a number on him. If there was one thing the kid was good at.

Bucky sighed, blinking back open to the pure surreal white, gaze cutting over to watch that beautiful sleeping body beside him, all peaceful and extinguished; a soft, sad smile tugging one corner of his mouth.

Don’t look down.

Steve’s skin was smooth, absent all the white scars and bumps it should’ve had and Bucky shook his head, rubbed his real, flesh-and-bone thumb affectionately over clean, pretty knuckles that weren’t foolin’ anybody.

“You always were so much trouble,” Bucky told him and the quiet white room beeped a hollow echo over fading, distant promises.

How exactly, had it taken him this long? To come full circle, to sit by Steve’s bedside the way he had that very first promise, that very first night he’d thought they’d be torn apart for good.

And after everything they’d been through since, since that first broken til death, they’d still ended up here. Hands entwined.

Was this a second chance?

Or a hundredth, but.

The last time he’d been here, he hadn’t even been able to say it back. I had you, til death. And everytime since, every I love you Steve had whispered, dropped in his ear, he hadn’t been able to say it back.

And jesus christ, here he was, getting to live the moment all over again, and this time, he’d be damned to let it slip by him again.

It being the love of a lifetime. With Steve.

The love of his life.

A sharp inhale that practically echoed, stealing all the available oxygen left in this godforsaken crystal white room as fingers detangled from chilled ones, two palms smoothing over short hair, ruffling it up like that boy in the black and white videos of the war, leaning over a map as Steve pointed, straight home. Fuck. FUCK--

Bucky forced his head back up, inhale, hold, exhale, look around the room and exhale again, just keep breathing, fuck. FUCK, what was he doing, he couldn’t, how could they--

Maybe he should’ve gotten flowers. There was an empty vase on the bedside table. Vases were for flowers.

Steve brought him flowers once.

Stood in that stairwell doorway, looking up under long lashes as Bucky swung open the door and stared, colorful bouquet in the extended hand, blonde swooping up over those mischievous sparkling blues--

“Hey Stevie, guess what?” Bucky interrupted, snapping his gaze off the stupid empty vase, over to the comatose features, smooth brow. God, his eyelashes were still long as fuck. Dark sweeps over high cheekbones. How many times had he shattered--

“D’y’know I’m a poet now?” No, course he didn’t know, Bucky fucking split. Into millions of pieces. Y’know. “Well, I am a poet, and I was just thinkin’, I could read you the Sonnet. Got it right here, in my jacket pocket. Same pocket I used to carry around that damn pencil sketch from the woods, December ’43? ‘Cept this one didn’t get burned to ashes. Well, not yet.” A raised eyebrow, single pause and he reached inside his jacket, fumbling to unfold the paper. “Can you believe it? I wrote you a bloody sonnet, Steve.”

He’d written a sonnet. He’d had his head wiped and he’d written a goddamn sonnet. And it really shouldn’t be funny, at all, but it was because see, the thing was he’d told Steve. The very same day Steve brought him those fucking flowers.

He’d told Steve.

Nearly a year ago now, wasn’t it? Blondie punk over there brought him a goddamn bouquet and Bucky’d had to sit him down, on that couch, back in Stark Tower. Nearly a year ago.

"You think this is sweet, don't you?"

Steve looked up, glancing from Bucky to the bouquet and Bucky shook his head, swooping a hand as he clarified. "Not the flowers. I’m talking about the whole thing."

That got an even more confused glance so Bucky shifted, turning his torso and sitting up straighter, body language as accusatory as his tone.
"You think this is some sorta...romantic Shakespearean play." Soft lips parted to protest but Bucky shut him up with a hand because he wasn't done. He wasn't anywhere near done. "Best friends their whole lives, one almost dies and the other can't live without him and tries to die too."

Blue eyes narrowed but Bucky ignored them, waving a hand and continuing in his mock storytime voice. "Then they both get a 'second chance' so they play it right, fall for each other. Get to be together after decades of pining and unrequited feelings..."

With hands as gentle as his words had been harsh, Bucky took Steve's face in his palms, running thumbs over the chiseled jaw and forcing Steve to look him in the eyes, serious and close.

"Stevie," Bucky chided softly. "This ain't some sonnet."

Blue eyes searched his, wavering between confusion, offense, and fear and this was so much more complex than Steve was pretending.

"Bucky, what're you saying?" He managed, hesitant and small and it wasn't like that.

Steve was painting their picture in pastel colors - but it'd never be them without harsh blacks and reds and grays. Bucky was only trying to change his color palette. Look at this thing without rose-colored glasses.

Don't forget what this thing was really about.

"We're not a love story, Steve." Bucky smoothed his hands down Steve's neck and shoulders, gripping his arms and holding them both stock still. "We're a war story."

A war story.

Nearly a year ago. They're the same thing, Steve'd told him, love stories and war stories.

Stevie, this ain't some sonnet but here, lemme read you mine. Sonnet 14.

A fucking war story.

Fuck.

He made so many promises. They made so many promises.

And here they were.

That sonnet...that wasn't the poem he needed to read. That poem, Steve already knew. He couldn't be sure of a lot of things, but he knew everything in those jilted fourteen lines, Steve already knew. Ain't some sonnet, right, Bucky'd just proved himself so right with that one. How many things had he said, believed, and been so so wrong about?

Steve already knew. Of course. The ache in his chest had a twin and that twin was golden blue and he could feel it, in the chilled fingers between his again, in the steady heartbeat blinking behind them on the monitors he didn't need, could feel that heartbeat just as sure as he could feel his own.

That poem, Steve already knew.

It was this one that he didn't.

Inhale, slow. Exhale. Manic tears swallowed down in place of that deep ache, deeper than his body had the space for, shredding his words back down quiet, soft. Gentle, careful, the way he spoke on that sensitive side, one ear couldn’t hear so well n’ the other could be too loud and--

“Got a poem to read you, Stevie. It’s not mine, but...I was actually in poetry class when I remembered that-- when I remembered everything. Thanks to caesuras, right? Anyways. Um. There’s this poem I read, little while back and for some reason I really latched onto it before...before I came back and remembered um. Why…”

That breath wasn’t slow or stable and the hitch in his throat was gonna make him cry, he couldn’t cry cause if he started now he was never gonna stop and he had to be strong for his Steve.

“God, Steve. I’m so. I’m s-so sorry I let go again--”

Raggedy inhale, pause, and his thumb was rubbing the back of Steve’s hand so hard he could feel the tendons shift beneath smooth skin.

Exhale.

By God. He’d spent lifetimes staring at Steve’s face, memorizing every single little angle of it, but it still shocked him, stunned him with a bright flash, old 40’s photographs in blinding white for a single moment and the rest fading into something beautiful, eternal.

Forever younger, growing older just the same.

That was such an incredibly beautiful boy. The crease at the corners of closed eyes, sloping lashes, high cheekbones. The solid, unmistakable curve of his nose, gentle slope of smooth, relaxed forehead into dark roots, fading slowly golden blonde, nearly white at the tips.

I won’t let it fade away.

The first time they slept together, moonlight black and white room with Steve in full color, that golden hair had lit up palladium. Pink bow lips parted, peaceful in the deep and disastrously complete, the stark smooth beauty as they reached for each other with bare fingertips on bare skin.

Golden days.

The corners of blue eyes crinkling up, the sharp line of that angled jaw, strong neck sloping up into the soft exposed spot behind round ears--

Where he used to press kiss after kiss until Steve was smiling, giggling, laughing underneath him, strong naked broad shoulders shaking, tightening lines in muscle wrapping around Bucky’s sides, wide smiling mouth against Bucky’s collarbone.

Warm, real fingers squeezed Steve’s hand tighter on impulse, memory racing. Laced together, the way they’d been since they were kids, two tiny kids holding hands as they jumped off the shallow pier in July--

And this romantic story, you never could control me.

Holding the hand that’d been through so much - he hadn’t been there to hold Steve’s hand for his last coma. For the ice.

Frozen and thawed and woke up alone in cold white when Bucky should’ve been there, and he never wanted to miss a single goddamned moment of that beautiful life again.

That soft smile, those precious faces as eyebrows shot up and his head tipped, beautiful twinkle as the morning sun caught its rise in blue blinking awake, big hands curled up against his face, all that harshness only softened edges, polished a pounding golden heart and sunkissed skin and the dark furrow between eyebrows that’d take on the fucking world, beautiful hands curling into fists and uncurling to carefully brace a thin pencil perfectly against white blank pages, beautiful mind lighting up the room the moment the ruffled sweet angel strode inside--

“You are so mesmerizing,” Bucky told him, soft as he could, near mush to slip under white-gold spun sugar, the silence fallen where there was once such sparkling crystal loud pulling him in with thin red thread wrapped round caving wrists and a metal heart -- trying not to choke, “God, Stevie, you’re my fuckin’ everything--”

Inhale.

Bucky blinked, tendons in his hand releasing silently, no whirr as he snapped outta the daze, ran his thumb over soft skin again and slid back into reality. Fuck, how easy he still got lost in that boy.

“Sorry. Got distracted, I uh.” Take one breath and take another. He’d been telling Steve something. Telling his best friend something, what was that again?

Up close at his bedside, crumpled paper in his lap. The poem, right. He’d been telling Steve. Should tell Steve. Because Buck was pretty sure, this part, Stevie didn’t know.

“I’ve...got a poem to read you. Not my sonnet, though. It’s not mine at all, but. I kept it, because when I first read it I couldn’t stop reading it and now…”

Now. Hospital, after all those broken knuckle fights, ‘course they’d ended up here.

“Now, after everything that’s happened…”

Everything that’d happened.

It’d be enough, that Bucky’d fought a World War for Steve, wasted away inside from the love he’d been so afraid of. The love that abandoned him in the bottom of a snowy ravine, the love he depended on too much, the love he let break him. The love that twined so richly with fear he couldn’t tell them apart anymore.

Until a day on a bridge the world flipped upside down and a dead soldier gasped his first breath, promise of a lifetime placed in metallic murderous hands and a soul offered on the line he was so close to crushing, the whirlwind of past trust and broken looks pulling them together, nightmare synonymous to memory, the hands that reached for him when he screamed until screaming meant broken hands instead.

Too much light flooding through the darkness until they both went blind and combusted, until the bomb went off and they didn’t make it out of the building in time, countdown to one and the shared soul, double rings exploded into a thousand pieces and--

...he’d thrown his off the Brooklyn Bridge.

One more promise to break on the shore of icy waves, freezing metal sinking until the drowning buried them alive.

And they’d ruined each other.

...where was Steve’s ring?
It wasn't on his hand. He'd...he'd gotten rid of it too. Bucky didn't know what he'd been expecting, but. It wasn't that.

Did he think Steve would just hold on?

Actually. Yeah, yeah, some part of him had.

You told me once dear, you really loved me
And no one else could come between us
But now you've left me…

A hitch in his breath and Bucky squeezed his eyes shut for a moment, made himself get a fucking grip.

And you have shattered all my dreams.

They’d broken so many things with twin fists but the worst fight, the worst war was this one, he’d take a thousand bloody noses over the cold, limp fingers entwined with his.

A lifetime trying to drag Steve outta the fight and he’d been the most disastrous fight of all.

He’d been so worried, about finding out what to say to Steve. Running the streets of New York racing thoughts instead of panting sass, on your left speeding past Sam and if Bucky couldn’t repent to the family Steve’d made, how could he possibly find the words for Rogers?

How--

How to ask for forgiveness, for the things he’d done. The lives he’d taken. Especially mine.

And now...it didn’t matter.

He could say anything, everything, nothing.

Steve wouldn’t hear a word anyways.

Look what he’d done. Look what Bucky’d done.

The world kept turning and they were so far high in the clouds, stars, sky - he was so scared to look down, ever close drew the ground--

They had to touch down.

Couldn’t keep catching each other, forever. They’d tried, so many times, and they’d slipped through red leather gloves and bare hands and metal fingers and nothing could save them, red skin or silver between.

No more.

No more.

I’ve got a poem to read you. Not my sonnet, though. It’s not mine at all, but I kept it, because when I first read it I couldn’t stop reading it and now.

Now, after everything that’s happened.

“Hell. Now I don’t wanna think about it ever again. Stevie, fuck, I--” Shaky inhale.

“Okay. Um. tell you what, I’ll read it to you and that’ll be the last time. Which is fitting for the poem and all.” Bucky forced himself to pause, blinking rapidly to clear the fogging water because he wasn’t gonna cry and he wasn’t gonna let go of Steve’s hand and he wasn’t gonna think about how this was it, the last moment he might get to have because the moment he stepped out that door--

Bucky cleared his throat, crystal cutting away from that pale soft face. “‘Cause it's about you and me, Stevie. You and me.”

One hand fumbling to smooth out the crumpled paper in his lap, water pooling in corners of the aching heart inside a chest turned sanctuary to empty cage.

“It's uh...by Elizabeth Hewer. She's pretty new, 2013, but she's amazing. Okay...” Metal thumb wiping a streak under watering lashes, anything to keep the rain from staining frozen skin. “Okay.”

Inhale, black and white, the letters Steve sent in the war and the sketchbook dreams they’d set fire to like Fourth of July. Welcome to the world, beautiful boy, and watch it burn.

Bucky breathed one more time and read Steve the poem always waiting behind the icy smoke.

“‘In one timeline we kiss, but the stars don't come down. In another, you set a world on fire for me. But...I perish in the flames. Another, and we're strangers on a b-busy street, brushing by close enough to- to send each other reeling off-balance but not. S-stopping.’”

Stars and flames and strangers on a busy street brushing shoulders and dropping books and picking up bruises but Bucky’s voice was shaking and there was water staining the crumpled paper and he had three more lines left and somehow that carried war let the storyteller sing one last verse.

“‘One universe has us right.’” Shaking, both hands were shaking and Steve’s bed was rattling quietly like the cough sweet lungs never choked on anymore. Just Bucky’s lungs left to choke now.

“‘One universe has us right, of all the m-millions stacked on. Millions. So it's...not this one. I. I can live with that.’”

I can live with that.

The inhale wasn’t an inhale at all. Last breath caught, wet tears in bruised throats instead of slipping hands and choked on the miserable thawed snow gathering on eyelashes as shaking shaking cut lungs into pieces he’d never pick up now.

My hands they shake, my head it spins.

Brooklyn Brooklyn, take me in.

Dim lights, too far from the bridge in the wicked cold, damp downfall of the thirties, a tiny frail angel tucked under thin sheets, pneumonia bouncing echoes around the room as a young twenty-something dock boy squeezed the bruised hand of his fragile best friend and shook, shook, hurricane.

"You with me?" Steve's voice asked quietly into the darkness. It was a simple question, just to check if he was awake or not. But it made Bucky wanna cry and scream and run and take Steve somewhere where this wasn't their life, where he didn't get triple whammied with bruises, lingering weakness, and freezing cold wetness at the same time. Because fuck, Steve may not be with him much longer.

What he’d give, for bruises and weakness and cold rain. For pneumonia. To hold that hand again. feel that fear again, over this one.

Bucky lifted his head, a rush of cold air hitting his cheeks, streaking cold. So he'd been crying, then. He had no idea for how long. Maybe since the nurse had told him. Pneumonia. Maybe since right now.

Maybe since the moment he’d met the angel that’d pull him outta the darkness, only to be dragged down in hell by a blood-stained metallic smile.

The tears weren’t gonna stop.

Not this time.

The crumpled poem in his lap was nearly soaked through with salt and melted ice and the metal hand curled, crushed words in the whirring fist, tossed aside--

--white baseball, faded muddy red stitches that spun in the air as small hands lifted over his head, grin bright as the summer sun and that game they’d been to just last week--

Shoulders curled and the sound was awful and sharp as it broke between the silent shakes, empty ribcage rattling and parted lips breaking breaking breaking.

Fingers curled so tight in comatose ones they might break if it were metal instead.

The snap, echoing in the studio, Steve’s hand crushing, the sharp cry as black paint dripped and black masks drained free.

Another hospital bed. Another frozen body, another sick white rebirth and The Phoenix could cry all the vintage misery red and gold had to sing, the ashes burned too bright to ever come back from this one.

Well I never really thought that you'd come tonight, while the crown hangs heavy on either side.

Give me one last kiss while we're far too young to die.

“I was c-counting on growing old with you. Didn't matter how, didn't matter when, I just knew that when I was sixty you better be on the rocking chair beside me. I...I never imagined we'd lose each other th-this young.”

Endless romantic stories, you never could control me.

“B-barely thirty, still don't have a single...crinkled line on your face.” His voice cracked too high, so young, thumb reaching for the closed skies, the shocking soft tenacity to the corner of pretty eyes that one day might crinkle up in crow’s feet and he wouldn’t be there, he’d never know, for all the times this thumb slid over damp corners and wiped away precious tears, for every year he’d-- from those blurry engrained days he was so tiny and young, youthful wide eyes looking up at him with that gap tooth smile behind trembling lips.

Trembling lips.

Give me one last kiss cause I'm far too young to die

“I can't believe...I can't believe I never get to see what you look like as an old man. I know you'll live a long long time, Stevie. I just...I can't bear the thought that outta your whole life. You knew me for less than half of it. For...maybe a third. Maybe you'll live to be ninety, for real, and I'll only have been there for. For the first third. That scares me so bad, Stevie. My god that scares me. You gonna forget me? You gonna forget me the way I've made myself...oh God, Steve. I can’t...you know I’m never. I’m never gonna forget you again. Never really did, never really could. You’re in more than my head, sweetheart, and nothing could ever burn you outta my veins. I’m so-- I’m so sorry.

“You brought me back. So many times. Over and over, you saved me from tables and my own head and you brought me back and every time I try to forget you the sun’s always around. The next corner Steve I’m so sorry I c-c-can’t-- Wh. What’m I s’pos’d to do? I. We. We were supposed to have forever.”

Far too young to die

“But. Stevie. Only one third...one third of your long beautiful life, I can’t. I can’t be that small, not with you, please, dear god. Please. Steve, not with you. Not with you.”

Shake shake shake and he was never gonna breathe without breaking again.

Not without you.

“Let me s-stay.” Whisper, he couldn’t speak without sobbing, and the whisper wouldn’t do a damn thing but nothing did a damn thing. Who are you? Nothing. “Please, p-lease, let me st-stay.”

Soft blonde halo brushed off too-warm skin, cold lips pressed to the worry crease between dark eyebrows, silent feet careful as they stepped backwards over creaking floorboards their landlord was less likely to fix than America was to join that European war and Steve was so sick he’d only make the fever heat worse--

“Buck?” Quiet small voice croaked hoarse and he froze, baited breath over whirring wheezing lungs. “Stay with me ‘til I fall asleep?”

Stay with me until I fall asleep.

Seventy-seven years later he was still tangled with bruised artist fingers.

Seventy-seven years later,

Bucky Barnes held Steve Rogers’ hand at his snow white bedside and cried. and cried. and cried.

The glass was thick enough to block out individual words. But from this side the sound was practically audible anyway, the shaking hunched shoulders and broken sobs over squeezing hands screamed loud enough.

Loud enough for Clint to have twin tear tracks running down his face.

Loud enough for Sam to excuse himself from the scene, try to regroup in the bathroom, dark hands shaking under the faucet and pararescue wings exploding back at him in the mirror.

Loud enough for Natasha to step away from the glass, watch Clint and Tony instead.

Tony, who wasn’t saying a single word.

It was so loud Clint eventually excused himself too. Natasha watched him go, turn the corner of the hallway, and Stark still hadn’t moved.
She stepped up to the window beside him, both of them looking blankly inside.

She didn’t stand at Tony’s side very often. They were nearly the same height. She’d never noticed. She knew the specs of his file, knew scientifically they were close, but she’d never just. Stood next to him to really notice.

And it was silent, for a long time, silent through all that loud and after everything maybe she should’ve learned to keep her mouth shut, but this was the only family she’d ever had and she couldn’t idly watch it tear itself apart.

They were all already too torn.

“Do you remember…” It was the first thing that’d been spoken in this hallway since Barnes’ rushed into that room and it was ironic, wasn’t it, considering the state Bucky’d been in the last time she’d seen him, how much memory’d haunted all of them.

Tony too, she knew about those nightmares. The panic attacks, when someone so much as said New York.

Tony too. That was the point. All of them.

“...when you promised to catch Pepper’s hand?”

If he hadn’t been paying attention before, he sure as hell was now. Tony’s sharp eyes shot to her like knives, arms crossed tight over his chest and Natasha didn’t look at him, staring straight ahead until he eventually did too, silent and stiff as the memory flashed through that tortured genius mind.

“She trusted you to save her, to catch her hand, and you couldn’t. She fell.”

That time, it wasn’t sharp shock and offense as his gaze snapped over, as the smart mouth dropped open to say something, to bark whatever veiled hurt he’d concocted now only she wasn’t going to give him the chance to shove her aside.

“And she was gone, you honestly thought she was gone, for good. You watched her fall to her death. Do you remember that agony? That despair, that rip inside your soul?”

Shocked into silence now, into trembling silence and it didn’t look like a panic attack coming on but she could feel the edge of that cliff in his memory, that weakness he pretended so ardently not to have. Softening in dark eyes every time they turned to Pepper Potts’ patient smile.

“As you clutched that metal beam, fire burning all around you, and watched the love of your life fall into the flames?” Natasha paused, settling over the shuddering assassin curled over that pretty, vintage soldier they’d all let slip through the cracks.

“Now make it snow and ice. Off the side of a train. And instead of saving your ass a minute and a half later, try a year and a half. That's how it was for Rogers, only worse, because when he woke up in this century there was no chance of getting Bucky back. Seventy years too late to even find a body.

“But...there, there they are, standing right in front of you like every dream you ever wished came true all at once and the love of your life is miraculously alive. Somehow, they froze their way into the twenty-first century with you and it shouldn’t be possible but there they are-- Your best friend. Your lover. Your only hope.”

And I have to protect the one thing I can’t live without. That’s you.
Even when I had nothing, I had Bucky.

Natasha paused, sinking silence. Pure silence, and she turned her head, gaze finally flicking to meet the stricken, too-shiny brown, laying the only kind’a punch no armored suit could block.

“...now make her forget every memory she ever had of you.”

Tony stared at her like she’d just blown up his house - no, worse, she’d actually seen that face - and really, she had no idea how that’d never occurred to him. How similar he was to the supersoldier he’d idolized so much as a kid. To the kid he’d come to befriend.

How well they could understand each other, if they took a single moment to try.

Natasha turned back to the window, scanning the silent white hospital room one more time. Barnes was nearly as still as his counterpart now, slumped and positively drained in that chair, hand gripping Steve’s hand so tightly she could see the white knuckles from here, exhaustion settling in bones that’d never been so broken.

And wasn’t it ironic, that she almost forgot to call him Barnes in her head. She’d just gotten so used to calling him Rogers. Tear-stained, short-haired soldier pretty boy Rogers, only he was brunette instead of blonde and his arm flashed instead of bulged. Tony didn’t see them, not the way she did, but he was still staring blankly in that stricken horror and the thing was, that was barely the half of it.

Shifting heels, a click as she stepped to the side, turned to go. She’d seen enough. And Tony was still looking at her like she was a ghost, only today, for once, it wasn’t her.

“That’s just Steven’s story.” Three steps, three loud clicks brushed past stubborn shoulders and Natasha paused, letting the silence echo for a single moment before red hair flipped, stopping and looking at Stark one last time; wasn’t all they had left just one last time?

”Now try to picture Bucky’s.”

If you’re a lover, you should know. The lonely moments just get lonelier, the longer you’re alone.

Not counting all the ranting from his childhood, he’d known Steve Rogers a few years now. In all that time, Tony’d seen him in alotta different lights. At the beginning, so stiff and high-strung. Chalked it up to an ego-complex, but the months went on and the way Rogers ran the team, gave orders, disappeared--

It took a while to recognize, but it took one to know one and duh, Cap was pretty damn depressed after defrosting. Then DC rolled around. He thought he knew Rogers, exactly how messed up he was, how easy things rolled off broad shoulders. Before Barnes.

But then he’d seen him smile. And laugh. The first time he’d seen Rogers laugh had been in a Smithsonian exhibit (yes he’d seen the goddamn exhibit) and the second time he’d seen Rogers laugh had been because of Bucky Barnes and everything’d kinda hit him then. Everything’d changed.

And it’d been...surreal. They’d. They’d been a family. Then Barnes left, and everything broke. It broke hard, because there’d been so much to lose.

He’d let his heart soften. More than just for Rogers, for Barnes.
He’d thought he’d understood. Then Romanoff dropped that in his lap and now he was staring at another smoking bomb he didn’t know how to engineer his way outta.

Tony thought he was the soft heart, electric soul. But here was Bucky Barnes.

Terror was still thrumming in his chest like another arc reactor, even if the broken American Psycho straight outta WWII and Brooklyn alleyways collapsed in that stiff hospital chair looked more haunted than Aliens in New York and it couldn’t be that kid, that kid that’d been so close to stealing his life, one more person he’d finally trusted so deeply turning their back on him and it was still that shiny arm in all his nightmares, but. Natasha’d painted quite the picture and he saw it now, saw him now. Here was Bucky Barnes.

They had more in common than anyone else he’d ever met.

And that was exactly why Tony’s broken pitying heart couldn’t ever forgive him.

Eventually, the rain stopped. The roof fell in and the wind knocked bones in knots until the storm couldn’t rage anymore, until every ounce of life was drained dry and Bucky crumpled quietly at Steve’s bedside, fingers loose and eyes closed, occasional hitch in slowing slowing breath, empty ribs rattling around under battered skin.

Battered skin too tight over his cheekbones, temples, dried salty tears making everything cold, corners of eyes hard.

Head tipped down against his chest and there should be long hair hanging in blurred-edge vision but there wasn’t, not anymore, not when all those dark snakes were tamed into that sideswoop, few dislodged strands curling over his forehead and he could be sitting beside Steve on a barstool smiling about keeping the outfit, glancing between Peggy Carter in her bright red dress and Steve Rogers with his soft shy smile, eyes cutting to the ground as it sunk in, as it all sunk in.

They traveled so far.

You carry people, Buck. You carry me.

Carry on.

The room tipped as he pushed up from the chair, white horizon fading for a moment before it snapped back into a line he knew, feet solid on this too-clean floor too many stories too high up. The world faded at the edges as his fingers slipped free from Steve’s, but they were sharing the same oxygen and that meant he could move, all nearly-ninety-nine years weighing down every stumbling step to the side table, scrape of a sliding clipboard as he fumbled for the Sharpie he’d ordered a nurse to bring earlier.

Cap between his teeth, twist and pull and the smell filled the air sharp and poignant, black ink tip holding all that dark paint.

The last time he’d smelled Sharpie, Steve’d been drawing a ring around his right-hand finger.

A line, with a dash, a never-ending line like the one he’d drawn around Bucky’s wrist in the hot-tub, with a marker in bed, with his fingers and his lips and his heart, over and over, line line line dash.

Where we begin and where we end, but the line never ends.
He’d proposed with a fucking Sharpie, drawing that goddamned never-ending line into his skin and Bucky was shaking too much to do this.

Bottom lip trembling, shaky halting inhale but he had to get it together, there weren’t any tears left in his body to cry and his stomach was already cramped from the shaking and his hands were clammy and the custom ring Steve’d made for him with the promise of being married and together for eternity was lying at the bottom of the river under the Brooklyn Bridge.

The skin on the inside of Steve’s wrist was so smooth, blue veins shifting easily under the gentle stroke of Bucky’s thumb. Pretty little artist wrists.

It was the worst kind of emptiness, the silence where there should’ve been snark, the stillness where fists should’ve been curled, the blank where there should’ve been golden soft sweet smiles. Steve wasn’t fighting him back this time. Might never fight back again.

His hands were shaking.

He couldn’t very well draw when his hands were shaking, he knew that much.

But the good news was, of all the training he’d had in his life, the first he’d learned was stillness, the quiet frozen behind a sniper scope and artist hands couldn’t stitch up his bulletwound in that forest so long ago because he shook too bad but when it came down to it, Bucky knew frozen long before he knew cold.

A deep breath, just breathe, and the trembling fingers curled, uncurled. Shifted, and he was steady.

One more inhale and he lifted Steve’s wrist, black tip setting carefully to clean pure skin, and drew.

The first time Steve’d drawn it with water. Over and over around his wrist, stopping at the same place every time to draw that little dash.

The sharpie slid down in the dash first, black mark over thin pale skin. Then it was the careful line, the line to trace all the way around that beautiful wrist.

Except. Except this time it wasn’t to the end.

So careful, tracing straight with perfect pressure, turning Steve’s hand just a little, moving around to accommodate the angle better, didn’t wanna twist even if Steve couldn’t feel right now.

Bucky could feel him, the pulse in his wrist, soft thudding so slow and peaceful, the heartbeat in a chest he’d spent his life matching black marching boots to.

He didn’t connect the line to the dash on the other side. How could he? They hadn’t made it.

They’d never make it.

The end of the line together, that. It was outta reach now. Out of reach the same way he’d been, gripping the metal bar on the peeled train wall just an inch too far.

No, the line didn’t connect. The black dragging ink wrapped around the edge of a wrist bone and all he had to do was keep going to drag that line to the dash but instead the sharpie lifted. Touch down, touch, touch.

Three words, a dot for every word, three words that stood between two soldiers in love and the end of the line.

Our last breath.

You, me, death, and our last breath.

Bucky capped the sharpie.

Picked up a pen and paper instead. Might as well explain it now.

’Cause he wasn’t gonna be here to explain it when Steve finally woke.

“Alright, pal, here’s how it goes. The dot closest to the line, that’s you. And it’s breath too, because you...you were my breath. My air, the thing that kept me alive even when I didn’t want it.”

Another steady sniper inhale, couldn’t start shaking now. Couldn’t start crying again. Steve’d see it, in his handwriting, in the dots his tears would mark all over the page.

No, he had to focus on those three black dots on the inside of Steve’s wrist.

“‘Sides, breathing’s kinda been a hassle for you, ‘specially when you were young. So that dot’s you, and breath. The next one, the middle dot, next to you, that’s me.”

Rolled his lips in and glanced up from the paper he was sketching on, taking in the pretty angles of that face one last time.

See?

“It’s me, and it’s last too. Last is for me because I loved you first and guess what pal, even if this is it, I loved you last too. You better go to your damn grave believin’ that.”

Pencil over white, clipboard so oddly hard and foreign in his lap. They should be drawing under trees in the forest, not here, not in this.

One more dot.

“The third dot, that’s death. ‘Cause hey, guess you’re not the only one with a twisted sense of romance, right? And it’s our too. Our is for death since that’s the only thing that’s ever stood between us and the end of the line and baby, we could never run from that if we tried. Til death, remember?”

Exhale, pencil scratching one more arrow, make sure Steve understood. Always understood.

“...til our last breath.”

The clipboard was louder than his feet as he sat it back down on the side table. Sharpie too. They’d communicated with enough pencil sketches in their lives he could only hope Steve would forgive him for leaving with something that goddamned simple.

The whole thing was pretty simple, really. It was too bad by the time he’d figured it out, he’d been too late.

As the world’s leading authority on waiting too long? Don’t.

When the moon found the sun, he looked like he was barely hanging on. But her eyes saved his life, in the middle of summer.
He...was never gonna have a summer again.

It was like watching the stars blink out from the sky as it slowly sunk in, that the world was done spinning, that this was just.

It.

That it was over.

Endless summer somehow became endless winter and now there was...nothing. No seasons with no players left on the board, no soldiers left to push from trench to ocean to plane to train.

Nowhere to fall because there was nowhere to go, no sky to fall from.

There was nothing left for him. For them.

You, me, death, and our last breath.

Goodbye, summer --

all was golden when the day met the night.

Until golden days became nothing more than memories.

And memories weren’t something he had a good track record with anyways.

Resignation.

Railroaded.

That’s not alphabetical, Steve’s voice teased and Bucky glared affectionately across the pillow between them.

I had to put that one last. It’s a primary emotion, after all. It needs its own effect, don’t you think?

26 letters, Stevie.

"What was next on the list after amazement?" Steve whispered and Bucky couldn't fight the smile because what a fucking idiot.

"Anchored. Anxious. Awestruck."

"Do you really have a whole list?"

"26 letters, Stevie."

"Buck...what about the eight I told you earlier?" He rolled his lips in, suddenly nervous again, and Bucky's heart was pounding fast enough Steve had to hear it.

He swallowed and searched between the two blues. He wasn't sure he was ready for this. How was he supposed to face--

Bucky sucked in a breath, running a tired hand down his face and forcing the memory aside before he got so swept up he never escaped the black and white movie reel.
It was all he ever wanted, for the longest time, to smile like that black and white movie reel.

What an exhibit they were.

He blinked down at the closed eyes, white hospital gown over the broad chest. Jesus. If you wanna fight a war, you gotta wear a uniform, right?

He’d never learned how to face those eight letters.

Not those.

If only he could lie with Steve. Lie beside him, wrap his arms around under those muscled arms, around that sloped, thin waist, hold his best friend to his chest the way all those heartbroken hospital couples did in the movies.

Only Steve wouldn’t slowly awake, long shadowed eyelashes fluttering. Fingers wouldn’t twitch, suddenly curl around his own. Those callused fingers were frozen. Frozen like the last coma he’d been in.

That ocean must’a been so goddamned cold.

Believe it or not, it's kinda hard to find someone with shared life experience.

Weren’t they all so goddamned cold.

But the skin stretched over high cheekbones, the skin Bucky’d bruised and broken orange a lifetime and a half ago, it still ran warm under his fingertips. Still made from fucking sunshine.

He’d never believed in bittersweet, never understood sweet sadness, not until this moment, right here. Fingers brushing down the precious angle of Steve’s jaw, that beautiful face peaceful and quiet beneath him. Could almost be sleeping. How many mornings had he woken early, just to watch Steve sleeping?

Not enough.

Dear lord, he hadn’t had enough. Just one more, one more of everything, please.

One more smile. One more laugh. One more happy shouted, “Buck!”

One more dance. One more night under the stars. One more song. Please, just one more song.

Thumb in the middle of that strong chin, where Steve kissed him when he was laughing, the crease they didn’t share. If only there were more. Nearly every mark he had matched a parallel - how was he supposed to look at his hands if they only scuffed the same way Steve’s did?

You’n’me raised in the same part of town, got these scars on the same ground. Remember--

Remember.

For all the memories he’d won and lost, for all the lives he’d lived, the hills they’d ran up, the skies they’d chased, it was never the shooting stars or the comets that burned red first.

“It took me too long to realize, Stevie.”

The bullet lied deeper than knives could carve. Inhale. Maybe never breathe again.
“Took me too long to see, neither of us were the monster,” Bucky told him, and Steve’d spent a lifetime trying not to bleed on anyone and it wasn’t their fault they’d both been stained so red and blue.

“The only villain in our story was time.”

A sketchpad, only moment Steve was ever peaceful. Bucky pressed his forehead to the smooth, worry-free one beneath the blonde halo, crystal slipping shut slowly and this, this was the only peace he’d ever know.

All the times they’d touched like this. Foreheads pressed together, lips parted, eyes shut, hands clutching necks, jaws, spines.

After Sarah died, that first night down on the floor, couch cushions pulled close. When Falsworth stitched him up in the forest outside the city he’d been shot in the thigh. The first time they’d kissed. The day on the beach, hey sugar you rationed? Dancing on the empty floor, just minutes before Steve led him into that black and white bedroom. Nearly every time Steve rocked slow inside his body, smooth and slick warmth drizzling up his spine. That afternoon Steve’d shouted fine, he had PTSD, crumpled right into Bucky’s arms.

I didn’t win the war til you got there. I didn’t win the war at all.

It took nothing, to tip down. Noses brushing, lips centimeters apart.

He hadn’t kissed Steve since the morning they broke up, in the pouring rain. Goodbye, to the sunshine.

Goodbye, sweet sunshine. My only sunshine.

Bucky pressed his mouth to Steve’s. Soft pink lips carefully compressed under his own, so gentle and breakable like this. The world had done nothing but try to rip Steve Rogers apart and he’d done nothing but grown softer, tried harder to save it.

This job...we try to save as many people as we can.

Sometimes that doesn’t mean everybody.

Break.

That’s what you don’t understand. This isn’t about me.

“I’m so sorry, Stevie,” Bucky whispered, suddenly the tall one again as he straightened, suddenly the one looking down again as he forced himself to blink back open, lips parting around a quiet breath. One hand sliding through silky blonde hair.

Right. ’Cause you got nothing to prove.

The exact same way Bucky had nothing to lose.

The first time, he screamed I loved him first. I love him. I love him, I’m in love with him, dear god. How could I let this happen?

I highly doubt it was under your control, Peggy Carter reasoned. That’s what she’d told him.

And just like with everything else, she’d been right.
Control. And it was in that moment, then, that Bucky first realized he’d lost control.

And that's all the Winter Soldier had ever been about. About keeping control. Efficiency was only ever created to control. And if he loved Steve? He gave that up. He gave up control.

He's my world, and he can't ever know. God save me,

I loved him first.

Even if it cost us our souls. Even if it cost you control.

It’d surprised him, how comforting Peggy was, reaching over in the middle of his breakdown to squeeze his hand.

But if Steve were awake, he wouldn’t be surprised at all, the way Bucky squeezed his hand. This was all he’d ever known. This was all they’d ever known.

Even when I had nothing.

Steve shouted it. In the middle of a fight, no less, and that wasn’t surprising either. What was surprising, was how quiet and simple it came out of his mouth now, how small it was, how little it changed anything, but he said it anyways because Steve Rogers deserved to hear it, once, in his life, even if it was like this.

“I loved you first, darling,” Bucky told him.

That day with the painting he’d parroted what he said to Peggy but this time, this time he was saying it right to that beautiful young face and hopefully, somewhere underneath all the ice, his best friend heard it. His best friend heard what Bucky’d been saying to him every day in a thousand ways since they were seven, in the way he’d been wanting to hear it all along.

Let's fade away together, one dream at a time.

His hands were cold. The moment they left Steve’s skin they were cold, but they’d have to be this way. Forever. He’d have to learn.

One step backwards. He couldn’t tear his eyes away.

Soldier lift, pivot. Pivot on a heel because that was the only way he was ever leaving this place. As Sergeant James Barnes, of the 107th. Shipping out for England first thing tomorrow.

He got his orders.

“Hey Steve?” For the life of him he couldn’t make himself turn the doorknob. Couldn’t decide which hand would open the door that made him leave the love of his life for the rest of his life.

But he’d already said it, and if Steve really could hear him he might as well tell him the rest.

“If...this is my last breath?” Staring at the metal handle and Bucky inhaled, tainted oxygen, final drops of sunlight fading over the horizon. “--then I leave with no regrets.”

He had to lift his head. Crystal was watering again, somehow, and who was he kidding, this was still Steve.

Bucky turned back around, the corners of his mouth turning up affectionately as the rest of him melted into nothing at all.
“This life is over but.” Shrug, scarred shoulder lifted to his ears, hair too short to brush against mottled layers now.

Steve was so quiet. Laying there so clean, quiet, surrounded by pure white like the angel Bucky’d painted onto poured canvas. It was one hell of a way to remember him. Remember him, he would.

Exhale.

“I had you. Til death.”

Til then.

Til death.

Bucky Barnes always thought death for him would be some bullet to the head, bomb beneath his feet. But that'd just be mercy now – real death was losing Steve.

So. At least he had Steve til death.

~~~

There were only a few things he could do.

What he should do, he should just end this fucking tragedy Romeo & Juliet style, eat that bullet he’d never had the chance to.

But see, he couldn’t off himself. The only time he’d ever been blessed enough to allow himself trying was when he thought Steve didn’t love him. He couldn’t deny that now no matter how hard he fucking tried.

He could get wiped again, he supposed. This time for good. No journal, no fake memories. Blank slate. Tabula rasa. Everything just...gone.

Hydra had always asked him who he was without Steve, and he had answered nothing. It was only fitting, right?

To be nothing?

No. Unfortunately, couldn’t do that either. Too big of a risk.

Not to him, to Steve. He’d broken Steve, last time. And the time before that, right yeah, can’t forget about all those times you fucking wiped your brain so you didn’t have to deal with the pain, leaving the love of your life to suffer all of it double for you both!

He’d been a coward for so long. He’d been scared for so long.

No loose ends this time, he couldn’t risk the repeat of Steve finding him. He couldn’t. There had to be some other way, he had to come up with some other plan.

But see, that plan had one major flaw in it.

Steve was the one who came up with the brilliant plans.
Which Bucky would rather be caught dead than saying out loud, because Steve’s plans were brilliant but they were dangerous, almost always had the chance of him ending up splattered on the pavement somewhere--

Wait.

Stupid reckless, that...wouldn’t be his fault. It was a risk they were willing to take anytime they stepped into the field and Steve wouldn’t hate him for that, Steve would understand, that was the goddamned rule he lived by in life, right? He’d let Bucky fight at his side in reckless battles a thousand times, it was the only on the battlefield that the threat of death was so imminent they just had to fuckin’ embrace it and jump.

That was it. Fuckin’ embrace it and jump.

He’d lost all his other brothers in the war, Steve had, and he was okay. He missed them, sure, but soldiers died in the field, that’s just what happened. Taps at the funeral and a folded flag and it’d suck, it’d be awful, but with metal tags around your neck you were always prepared for that kind’a end.

Well, Steve had his dogtags currently, but it was the thought that counted.

If he’d’ve thought of it earlier, he’d’ve stolen his toetag back off the chain, left Steve with just the one. Split em, the way they should’ve in the war. Well. It was a little late now.

Bucky took a deep breath, pushed open the hospital’s front doors and stepped into the glaring sun.

~~~

White. A sense of encompassing, piercingly-bright white. Steve blinked, stared up at the ceiling, and could only process the too-clean color above him.

There were sounds too, drifting through the room. Recognizable, only this time they weren’t voices over a speaker; monitor sounds, metallic and modern.

He was clean, cold, surrounded by too much white, a strange chemical smell, and an empty hospital room.

Back to reality-adjacent.

Steve looked around, bed in a blank room, twenty-first century blank. No radiator by the window, no half-paneled walls, just fancy beeping machines and a discarded chair and a sidetable with a clipboard on it, a piece of paper he couldn’t read from here.

A recovery room. Which meant...he was alive, then.

And so was Bucky.

It didn’t take a radio and a ballgame this time, didn’t take sitting up and soaking in, it socked him less than ten seconds from fluttering eyelashes parting, smack across the face and punch to the chest, heart aching.

It hit him outta nowhere and suddenly Steve was very much not alright. His breathing picked up and the room was crushing him, one question rushing through: Where was Bucky?

And just like last time, the door opened at that exact moment. Except that ex-SHIELD agent wasn’t bothering to pose as a slightly-out-of-time nurse.

No, he was the only one out of time here.

Running and running lights flashing Times Square spinning snow falling warm leather glove tugging his along through streets and cobblestone echoed empty under dull gold and everyone was there and he hadn’t seen anyone in months, years, an entire lifetime--

The voice broke through like shattering glass, flash of red as Bucky dropped the crystal on the kitchen floor and Steve yelled that he couldn’t blame everything on Zola and Natasha Romanoff was pinned up against the wall with scared wide eyes and bubblegum in her mouth and she was.

Standing at his bedside, looking at him with arms crossed over her chest, same sounds floating over him only this time they sunk in.

“Barnes just left.”

Steve stared down at his hands.

The faintest tremor, that strange steady almost-calm right before he exploded and punched out a glass screen for absolutely no goddamn reason other than pure, bubbling rage. Reignedin rage.

Words didn’t shake him hard as look on that face. Bucky finding him, Steve just missing him, that merry-go-round he knew better than anything else - he wouldn’t’ve come if he didn’t remember Steve again and even that wasn’t surprising, he’d always known Bucky always would, he doesn’t remember you; he will.

Bucky’d been here, came back for him and that meant it was Steve’s turn to go track him down again and here they go, one more time, one more round, he’d do this dance for the rest of his life, long as it took, he’d waltz through endless snow until his feet caved underneath him, it didn’t surprise him anymore, didn’t make his chest seize.

She did.

She used to be his best friend. Sitting on the floor of his old apartment, some girly chick-flick on TV while Natasha chewed her popcorn too loud and threw every fourth piece at his face, falling over on her side from laughing so hard as Steve teared up at the final chase-down-in-the-airport I-love-you-confession.

The undercover missions and training together, a thousand ways to launch her spinning off his shield and a dozen jabs another date she tried setting up over coms. Same way Bucky used to.

The :) SHIELD extractions at the curb, the easy silence when he needed it and the understanding glances when the rest of the team were rolling their eyes. That first long car ride, DC to New Jersey with her feet on the dash in those strange civilian clothes she’d picked out for him, a smile as she looked over at him from the passenger seat and teased him, teased him the way Bucky used to too.

She’d been his best friend. In every way, she’d been his best friend. She’d been there for him when he’d been so alone, and she’d changed his life. She’d pulled him outta the aftermath of New York and dragged him to DC with her and went apartment shopping for him and taught him all the ways of the internet and jumped right into his war when he was an international fugitive, no questions asked, stood there at his side as the world shifted, bleeding out in a van reminded him none of that’s you fault Steve, and went through god knows what to pull those strings, find Bucky’s file for him and.

What felt like years ago now, she’d sat on Sam’s bed in front of him, shock and gratitude on her face in the quiet gravity as she told Steve he saved her life. And asked him if she’d trust him to do the same.

I would now.

And he had, trusted her to do the same.

I’m always honest.

She’d been through so much, they’d all been through so much, but he did trust her to save his life.

And she hadn’t.

Steve stared down at his hands, slowly turning them over against the white sheets.

There was something on his wrist.

Barnes just left.

“How long?” Steve asked, gaze flicking up to the silent figure barely inside the doorway.

How long what? How long since Bucky’d been gone? How long had he been in a coma?

How long had she known where Bucky was and lied to Steve’s face?

How long was she gonna let him waste away before she finally told him?

Would she ever have told him?

“You’ve been out seventy-nine hours.” She was studying him, calculating, and the first time they’d met he’d known instantly. May be a clutz in the presence of beautiful women, but he was still a soldier - recognized the face of another fighter.

Maybe that’s why he’d been so blindsided when it was her, when she was the one to betray him.

Seventy-nine hours. That was nowhere near seventy years.

When I went under, the world was at war. I wake up, they say we won.

They didn’t say what we lost.

He hadn’t been able to bring the world back then. Couldn’t bring his world back now.

The only thing left to fix was already gone. This time, he didn’t miss a date. Didn’t have a single person left waiting behind for him. But he still had a boy to catch.

And Natasha’d proven already, she wasn’t gonna be the one to help him do that.

The machines started beeping in protest as he yanked out the needle in his arm, threw back the sheets. Swung his legs over the side of the bed, one hand steadying on the sidetable and the other on the bed, pushing shakily to his feet.

“I’m not sure that’s a good idea,” Nat started, like she genuinely cared about him or something, sounded so damn sincere he almost stopped and applauded whatever role she’d flipped on this time.

“Yeah, well, excuse me if I don’t really trust your ideas anymore,” Steve muttered under his breath, trying out standing on his own. Shit, not quite there yet.

Natasha was halfway across the room but she heard him anyways, freezing in place and normally that’d be great but his balance wasn’t super hot and the hospital gown certainly wasn’t either. He plopped back on his ass, glancing around for his clothes.

“Can you grab those?”

He didn’t wait for an answer, already untying the back of the dressing gown, glancing away from the hurt flickering behind green eyes.

While Natasha took her damn sweet time he scooped up the paper on the sidetable, inhaling slow and carefully controlled as he recognized Bucky’s handwriting. Course it was. The hell was Buck up to now?

The clothes fell in a pile beside him and he was pretty sure they’d been folded a moment before. Funny, Romanoff had never struck him as the childish type.

Another closer inspection of the drawn line on his wrist, the explanation on the paper and Steve held his breath for a few seconds, getting a grip on himself before the crackling and crumbling took over.

The floodgates were terrifyingly flimsy but he had to fucking keep it together ‘cause the moment that dam broke they’d never let him outta this goddamn hospital. How was he s’posed to go bitch slap his best friend across his stupid pretty face if they didn’t let him outta here?

“Rogers--”

“Romanoff,” he replied stubbornly, pulling the hospital gown off over his head so he didn’t have to look at whatever disappointed combo of emotions she was giving him now.

She waited by the window while he got dressed and Steve wasn’t sure what she was waiting for, wasn’t like he was gonna apologize for snapping. She sure as hell didn’t sound like she was gonna apologize for putting him through hell either.

But it was fine, the world was spinning a fraction less than the last time he’d been conscious, he’d manage. Had all his nutrient levels back to normal, but the whole coma thing kinda fucked him over regardless. He had to stop doing that, waking up all alone in what felt like another century. Again.

Soon as he found Bucky, the horizons would settle out straight again. The colors would turn back to normal and he’d stop stepping over crumbled, burned out building pieces in the goddamn tile.

He was gonna get his best friend back. He was gonna go fight for him. Again.

But honestly, after all the shit he’d gone through pulling Bucky back into his life over and over, that first time storming an enemy base all by himself - not a lot was really gonna top that. He’d been emotional, untrained, never landed a solid punch a day in his life, didn’t understand his own body, and decided to walk across Europe if he had to, on the slight chance his best friend from back home might’ve survived a firefight that killed almost his entire regiment and captured the rest of the unit to work as slaves in weapons factories.
So yeah, whatever was standing between him and Buck now? He wasn’t all that worried about it.

He’d go through whatever he had to, and he’d get Bucky back to his side. Again.

“Steve, I know how much Bucky means to you.” It was so quiet, honest and low and that was probably the first time he’d ever heard her admit that. She did know. She knew him so well, so how could she— “But running isn’t gonna help anybody. Stay outta this one, please.”

Would Peggy? If the situation were weirdly twisted somehow, and it was Peggy who was supposed to keep Bucky’s fucking existence from Steve, would she do it? Peggy Carter always did the right thing, always knew exactly what right, moral was and if she’d been faced with the same decision as Natasha, would she’ve made the same choice?

Did he hate Natasha for this because in some twisted way he expected it from her, with her past and all the lies she’d told, while if Peggy did the same thing, he’d simply understand she was trying to protect him?

Was that what Natasha was doing? Protecting him? Protecting Bucky? When Peggy’d kept the secret about Bucky being in love with him, it’d been for that reason but it wasn’t like Peg knew about the Winter Soldier and just wouldn’t tell him.

Would she?

His lungs weren’t filling up the way they were supposed to and his heart stuttered for a brief moment, the sudden fear that he was back in his old body again only he’d just wrestled into the Captain America blue plants and those fit him fine, he was fine, he just had to.

Fuck. Breathe.

The shoes felt a little loose as he forced himself to stand, took a moment to inhale, exhale, one hand propped on the back of the bedside chair. Bucky’d been here, and he couldn’t think about that, couldn’t wonder what he’d said, if he’d cried, he couldn’t do a damn thing from in here.

A heavy thumb pressed to the sharpie on the inside of his wrist, proof, this was real and Bucky was waiting for him, in whatever leather bounds Steve had to untangle this time, bombs he had to dodge and shield he had to drop, he was fine. He was ready.

Shove all that other shit down, pull on the invisible blue helmet and step back into whatever shoes were on solid enough ground to handle this and if right now that was Captain America instead of Steve Rogers, so be it.

“Steve.”

“Natasha, I can’t just stay cooped up in here, you know that.” He finally forced his head up, bones clicking painfully as he rolled his shoulders back, fist releasing from the chair to turn to the hurt eyes, crossed arms over black leather.

“I’m the only one that can fix this. It’ll get worse, the longer I’m not out there.”

“It’s not that simple.”

“It is that simple. This team is short a Captain, and the only one you’ve got around happens to be an expert. We’ve taken on armies of aliens, we can pull one soldier back from the dead.”

She didn’t budge, looking at him with tight worry and that fight she only ever had for them, the team, nothing like the fire she carried in all those enemy wars.

There was...a chance. That she really had been trying to protect him. Them.

“I can do this,” Steve told her, calm, lying straight through the red white and blue and something in that hard beautiful outer shell cracked, bleeding through and all he could see was the soft torn insides behind the unfolding arms, slightly shaking head.

Natasha was so smart, how could she possibly think keeping Bucky from him would help either of them? It had to be some other reason. Peggy wouldn’t’ve, she’d never hurt him like that.

“I don’t like it.” A sharp sigh and Romanoff pursed her lips, gaze flicking reluctantly for the door. “But if you’re going after him, we might as well come with you.”

Some other day, he might’ve clapped her on the arm, smiled and held the door open for her 1940’s style, but today he just nodded, because the masks could cover a lot but he didn’t even wanna try pretending he wasn’t upset with her right now.

Well, actually.

Upset’s not exactly the word he would use.

_I know I’m bad news, I saved it all for you._

Keep your chin up, Steven. Shoulders back, head on straight. So long as you’re upright, you’re not losing.

It could’ve been a bad alleyfight, way he was coaching. But Natasha was studying him so closely and he didn’t have the helmet or a uniform to hide behind, had to force himself in a straight line, keep on walking no matter how many footprints it felt like he was walking in right now.

Forward, keep going forward and she’d have no idea he couldn’t place a damn thing. He’d been nonexistent for days and now he was back in the world and twisting the doorknob opened the door but wasn’t it already open and hadn’t he just opened it two minutes ago--

Stop. Stop trying, stop thinking about it. It’d only make it worse. So what if cause and effect didn’t exist, so what if he knew objectively it was 2016 and he just couldn’t shake the feeling he’d never left the twentieth century. He could handle it, everything falling down inside him, it was only the outside that mattered. He could fake the outsides. Always had.

Thing was, he knew a lot about comas now. While the last one’d been a lot longer, all the disorientation and disassociating wasn’t just bout waking up in a different century. Then, they’d all expected him to be confused, treading through two lives and stumbling into personal hell.

What he hadn’t known was that happened to all coma patients, no matter how long out - seventy years or seven days.

After, he’d done some research, thanks to the internet. Apparently a coma as short as three days could fuck up your brain’s entire timeline and memories for like. A week.

Like having all the events of your life thrown into a giant messy pile and being asked to sort it without any reference points.
But he couldn’t afford to space right now. Couldn’t afford to let himself focus on the fact that every nurse in scrubs he passed was his next-door neighbor or his mom while he’d simultaneously never seen any of the faces in this dystopian-white building before.

If circumstances were different maybe he could have a second to adjust, but there wasn’t a second left on the melting clock he had left to spare.

Last time, the only life on the wire was his own. But now it was everyone's.

He had to find Bucky.

So here he goes, shoving a world and a half of hospital memories echoing tiles awful smells down the back of his throat to make room for the sounds he was gonna have to make, the words that’d have to be damn near perfect to convince the Avengers he had to assemble when he got outta this place.

Or, y’know, they could all just be. Waiting in the lobby too, that was fine.

Fuck, did he ever catch a goddamned break?

The halting stutter in his step, there was no way everyone in this room didn’t see it and there were too many pairs of eyes staring at him to count and Steve could keep walking straight to the desk but the chance of him walking out those front doors without a fight would be pretty slim if he did.

‘cept who the hell was he s’posed to face right now?

“Uh. Thanks for being here,” Steve started slowly, awkward, shoving both hands in pockets and before he could attempt something better Tony was stepping out from beside Sharon, dark eyes flashing under the harsh fluorescent lights, voice cutting even harsher in its cloying lightness, in the awful casual, offside-comment tone,

“He was here.” Took everything he had not to bristle, not to curl his fists as Tony lifted one arm across his chest, the other elbow propped on his wrist, waving one arm in the air, dripping pure sarcastic scorn, “Your buddy, your pal.”

Signature smart mouth tipping up in a sneer and Steve wasn’t breathing calmly enough to take this.

“Your Bucky.” It bit like an accusation, all Steve’s fault, like Steve’s Bucky was about the worst goddamned thing that’d ever happened to this town. Even Nat was frozen at his side-- no, beside him, not at his side. Right now, nobody in this room was at his side.

“Y’know, it’s remarkable, how many of us he’s landed in here and he still comes gallivanting in like the goddamn hero--”

“Okay. That’s enough.” Steve cut in a little sharp, shooting Tony the same disapproving look from the beginning. Of all the things to come full circle in his life the misunderstanding fight between him and Stark wasn’t one he’d ever wanted back. But stalking pissily past that indignant genius face to politely, quietly ask the desk nurse for his release forms, leave Tony stewing was more than a little satisfying.

Steve got it, Tony was mad. Scared, even. Bucky’d done a lot of damage to them all, and Tony’d had it bad. Really bad. But that didn’t mean he had to be a fucking dick. Literally minutes after Steve got outta a coma. Damn, it never stopped, did it?

This wasn’t what he wanted, fuck this wasn’t what he wanted. But Steve Rogers was too shattered and shaky right now to take Tony’s ridicule and he’d been Captain America around his team for so long, that’s what they thought was normal anyways, right? Call him Cap and shove him into the streets with a red white and blue target strapped to his back and watch him fight with boots too heavy to dance.

The boombox Tony’d given him, to dance, up on the rooftop of the home he’d opened to two troubled souls that Bucky’d shattered with his metal fist and the pencil in his hand was creaking from being squeezed too tight, on the verge of snapping and he nearly dropped it loosening his fingers so fast.

“How can you just...forgive him. Go after him.”

God, no. Bring back the bitter fighting and the scornful sarcasm. He couldn’t take Tony like that, not all edgy and hurt. That’s not what Steve wanted either.

Go after him. Running through German cobblestone streets, black shadows slipping into an alley and Sam’s voice shouting behind him, wait up, heart pounding and--

When the city goes silent
The ringing in my ears gets violent

Deep breath, angels choking on halos and he’d never wanted this, he’d signed his name on the dotted line to take out bullies, not all these thudding lives that kept getting cut up darker red and black in collateral damage.

How many paid the price before you did?

Steve sat down the pencil.

“I’m sorry, Tony.” The lobby was so quiet, settling over in freezing waves, shards of glass embedded in forearms and hands and Steve pushed off the counter, spun around to face those heated eyes, furrowed hurt lines as Tony stared accusingly back at him. “But I don’t have a choice. I know bad guys, I’ve fought enough evil in this world to know. Bucky’s not that.”

“What about Peggy?” Natasha interrupted and Steve was so. freaking close to losing it.

Hands curled in fists around the nurses’ counter how many counters had he broken in fights he had to get a fucking grip on something that wasn’t about to shatter the second he snapped.

Wasn’t gonna fucking snap.

What about Peggy.

Well fuck Natasha Romanoff, that’s what.

He’d spent months asking himself the same goddamned question.

Pretty green eyes he’d once trusted, cared about, were looking at him with that wide-eyed open honesty a thousand screams in the silence, if you can’t forgive me, how could you possibly forgive him that?

Peggy was the only reason he’d been able to save Bucky’s life.

Not just ‘cause she’d been the one to tell him - your audience contained what was left of the 107th.

Because she’d been the one to believe in him. The first person since Bucky Barnes to believe in him.
and Buck didn’t count when they were kids, same way your ma had to love ya, there was an obligation Bucky had to him for being his best friend since all eternity to believe in him but.

Peggy was the first person to see both sides of him, all wrapped up in days of basic and USO tours and still seen past the tights and the too-big helmet crooked on his head and still believed in him. She thought he was made for more than this. Before Buck even knew.

He’d’ve never saved Bucky if it weren’t for her.

That was just the first thing she’d done to save their tangled lives.

She was a war hero as much as he was, only no one made statues for her, no one saw all the power she had, all the asses she kicked and days she made with a beautiful bright smile. She believed in him, in the good of the world, and she deserved so much more than losing all that in twisted, grayed memories.

She’d hated that place. She’d never said it but she’d never had to. He didn’t know her long enough to understand everything in that complex beautiful mind, but he knew her enough to know she hated being stuck in prolonged limbo, kept alive by beeping machines and frail bones, nothing left to live for and nothing left to give the world.

Stuck in sanitarium, walls not so different than the ones boxing him in, that’d boxed Bucky in in whatever basement table Hydra’d kept him strapped to with not enough people at her bedside to make up for the hours she spent wasting away, losing the brilliant, sparkling mind.

Peggy hated not being able to remember.

Same way Bucky had. And he’d saved her from that. Saved himself too, because apparently, according to the feisty brunettes he couldn’t keep away from, there was no fate worse than losing the memory of summer sun shining.

“I can’t hate him for killing Peggy...sometimes I wish I could. But if you're looking for blind anger, I’m sure Buck hates himself enough for that, he doesn’t need it from me too.”

“.....only person I know tough as Sarah Rogers is Peggy Carter.”

"You knew Peggy?" Tony interjected curiously, leaning forward on the bar as Bucky blinked wide and pretty. Perfect time to hop back in the conversation.

"Barely, they only met once," Steve answered, at the exact same time that Bucky started, "Really damn well, she's the one who--"

Buck froze, suddenly snapping his mouth shut as widened eyes flicked to Steve, looking unmistakably guilty.

Steve crossed his arms over his chest and stuck his tongue in his cheek. He’d had no idea.

Well. Considering that he’d trusted her enough to tell her he loved Steve in the middle of a World War when he could’ve lost his position as the Commandos’ sniper - scratch that, as a fighter at all - his army pension, his dignity, and his best friend?

Really damn well made a lotta sense, now.

And as hard as it’d been for Steve, to lose Peggy like that? How much fucking harder had it been for Buck?
To pull the trigger on a life that sacrificed so much for yours?

It hurt like hell, but it was her time. Hell, it was all their time, a long time ago. Steve was still kinda amazed that Bucky hadn’t lured him there and double-homi-suicided them all in one final dramatic scene.

You were always so dramatic. Affectionate smile, easy understanding. You saved the world.

I have lived a life. My only regret is that you didn’t get to live yours.

“All Peg ever wanted for me was to be happy...and after everything it’s taken to get there...she’d understand.”

She’d probably smile red and pretty, shake her head of bouncing brown curls, knowing she was still the one to drag them back together after all these years, all these decades they should’ve learned and never had. Still the one to take Bucky’s secrets and hold them so tight they both fumbled through the next trial, next battle, quiet steady sure waiting just behind his shoulder with the offer of the best civilian pilot around and a plan to bring the love of his life back from the dead.

There is not a man or woman, no matter how fit he or she may be, who is capable of carrying the entire world on their shoulders.

She was Bucky’s way out. And maybe, in some weird twisted way, she’d saved Buck. He’d killed her instead of himself and that was no kind of trade, but that’s exactly the kind of trade she’d make.

“Even after she died, Peggy was still saving my life...” Steve stared down and he wasn’t seeing this hospital, not this room, just hers. The old beige curtains, bedside tables littered with photographs. Bottles of numbing pills. The glass of water, when the cough came--

For as long as I can remember, I just wanted to do what was right.

I guess I'm not quite sure what that is anymore.

One more time, Peg, help him bring back Bucky one more time. All this time and it was still her, who could do this. If Bucky hated himself for killing Peggy, thought that was the worst thing he’d ever done?

Imagine, what it’d prove, to show Bucky that...Steve forgave him.

“I’m forgiving him Peggy. And once Bucky understands that, that I forgive'm his greatest sin? He’ll understand.” He’ll understand. There was nothing, nothing that’d make him anything less than the love of Steve’s life. He’ll finally fucking understand, “...I'm never fucking giving up.” Steve muttered under his breath and the tiles slowly faded back into focus, two feet blocking his vision.

Fuck.

He blinked twice, looked up.

No warm brown eyes, cold green ones.

The first thing he’d thought about Natasha Romanoff was that she reminded him of Peggy, a little, maybe the leather jacket or the short curly hair or the smile to match the guns on her belt or maybe because it was the first beautiful girl he’d been able to talk to since Peg without tripping over himself.

“Steve. You can’t trust him.”
She was nothing like Peggy fucking Carter.

“No, Natasha. I can’t trust you.”

Kinda hard to trust someone when you don’t know who that someone really is.

Who do you want me to be?

What the fuck kind of friend let him agonize over Bucky being gone when he wasn’t, when he was right there all along, waiting for him and Peggy would never.

“I know exactly who you are now.” Innocent car rides and undercover kisses turned daggers. “You’re the best friend I depended on, that didn’t tell me the love of my life was alive.”

Natasha’s eyes were red hot as her hair, mouth popping open around a retort he’d never hear, but later, so much later he couldn’t help but look back and wonder if maybe, she’d been about to say, no, he wasn’t.

Not without you.

And, ironically, with or without him now.

Natasha opened her mouth and she never got to say whatever it was she was planning, because Bruce was staring and Pepper had a hand over her mouth and Clint was waving a hand at them to cut it out a second, leaning over the counter to ask the chagrined desk nurse to turn up the TV.

And that’s when he heard it.

They all did.

The corner TV in the the lobby was announcing some tragedy and because they were all still superheroes to some twisted level underneath the bullshit convoluted mess this’d become, everyone turned, eyes on the screen.

“--and this is Gav, reporting live with the ABC7 Eyewitness New York. Breaking news, it appears a commuter train crossing from Manhattan to Midtown earlier today nearly hit a pedestrian that’d wandered onto the tracks, reportedly listening to her music in headphones, when an unidentified man at the station leapt in front of the train, shoved her out of the way and was unfortunately struck himself; saving her life and tragically ending his.

“The train station footage of the tracks caught the rescuer just at the corner of the screen, see there, as the girl doesn’t look up, taking that first near-fatal step onto the tracks. And here, right as the train cuts into the frame, there comes our figure in black. Running in, bolting so fast for that girl-- Is that something shiny in his hand? And there he goes, he must’ve been an incredible athlete, there is a marathon somewhere missing him right now. Wow, what a shove, she just goes tumbling and there’s the moment, that pause of hesitation while he’s still on the tracks and the train is just so close, there’s nothing either of them could do. ABC7 Eyewitness News and we’re cutting to the survivor now…

“...I j-just wasn’t thinking, it was a platform and the trains always stop, I thought the trains always stopped but it just kept going, pulled through and I didn’t even see it until it was too close, until it was too late and suddenly I was rolling in the dirt on the other side of the tracks and I c-can’t believe…”

“Eyewitness reports are saying the man seemingly leapt out of nowhere, apparently moving so quickly the conductor didn’t realize he was on the tracks until the man paused in the face of that looming headlight and froze. What a time to hesitate, but one could imagine how overwhelming it’d be. Deafening screech, pulled those brakes hard as he could but the man was just too close, there was nothing that could’ve stopped that train. Oh, and here’s Kris now, coming in with the official report--

“Looks likes there’s no injuries for any passengers on board, only the scrapes of the surviving girl, who’s family is riding with her to the hospital now. While train collisions most certainly aren’t always lucky enough to end with a casualty count of just one, the people of New York can be comforted today, that sometimes even in death, there’s a bright light somewhere. Official reports state that New York’s finest are still trying to identify the fallen hero…”

Identify the fallen hero.

Steve stood in the middle of the lobby and stared at the TV in the corner as the news station ran the footage again, grainy video of a girl on the tracks, incoming train speeding into the frame, fast as the one he’d jumped on top of. Should’ve jumped out of when Bucky did.

The last thing Bucky’d said to him, left on his wrist, was I had you, til death.

Til death.

And now there was one more train.

Colliding with the man on the tracks.

Bucky.

That was...Bucky.

The floor dropped out from under his feet.

And he was falling, helicarrier exploding debris around him, falling and falling and crashing as the plane hit ice and the train peeled back, reaching up and screaming and there was no one, no one reaching out with red gloves to catch those freezing hands, silence, pure silence instead of the scream, shout,

Bucky! No!

There was no one there to shout it. Just the scream as the train collided with that sickening clunk--

Too fast to even see the body crumple, fly. It didn’t matter, he was on those tracks the same time the train was and nobody, not even them could survive that.

Only.

He...had that exact same feeling. The same tug in his gut, slowly still-spinning world.

Nothing...nothing changed.

Bucky couldn’t be dead.

It was that simple. He didn’t feel it, the same way he hadn’t felt it at Azzano, or after the fall. He’d still had that pulse, that sure pulse in his veins that told him Bucky was alive.

And...he still had it now. The world. Hadn’t. Stopped.

So Bucky couldn’t be dead.
Please tell me he's alive, sir.

He was standing in a tent, dripping rain, heart pounding in his throat and hair sticking to his forehead, gravitational shadow standing behind his shoulder, Peggy’s solid presence and rank he didn’t have, showgirl storming an army tent with his heart shredded in fear, hovering despair.

B-A-R...

I can spell. I've signed more of these condolence letters today than I would care to count. But…

He knew it in his soul, same way he’d known it the moment those words sunk in.

The name does sound familiar. I'm sorry.

Steve hadn’t been able to see, anything, for god knows how long. Couldn’t be true. Not Bucky. Not his best friend from back home, the one he’d shipped off for the 107th without him.

Bucky wasn’t gonna die over here. He’d promised he’d come home. They hadn’t--

Steve hadn’t--

Bucky promised he’d come home.

Peggy grabbed his shoulder. “Steve.”

What do you plan to do, walk to Austria? If that’s what it takes.

“You told me you thought I was meant for more than this. Did you mean that?”

It was raining and the soft brown curls were damp enough to flatten, sticking to her skin and she was so beautiful standing here soaking wet and still shining the sharpest diamond, pair of stolen polish dimes, pretty accent so sincere he didn’t doubt, couldn’t doubt, for a single moment as she looked at him and swore,

“Every word.”

Now was the part he threw a backpack in the jeep, turned to her and pleaded, for him, for Bucky, for all those soldiers they weren’t gonna save that Steve couldn’t leave behind, please, couldn’t she understand,

Then you gotta let me go.

The rumbling engine of a civilian plane drowned, drowned out by a scream.

"STOP, let go," Bucky squirmed, tremble as he yanked his shoulder but Steve just shoved him harder against the wall. "Let me go!" Hysteric that time, bloody hand knocking at Steve's arm, tightened grip and Bucky made a pained sound, tipping off into rambling, shaking head.

"Let me go. Let me go!!" His voice shot shrill, heart pounding so fast Steve could feel it in the rotting air between them and crystal was rimmed red and wet, like the kitchen floor, hovering tears on eyelashes as Bucky twisted, voice cracking over a sob, "Why can't you ever let me go??"

Steve froze.

He froze, mouth open around the pleading response, staring at Peggy with the rain pouring down only it wasn’t, the tumbling drops were hardening, gathering up crystals and freezing, on eyelashes turning away, in mid-air, ice sculpture to box them in and the words were on his tongue, burning fire on the tip of his tongue,

Then you gotta let me go.

The world was shifting.

No, no, the world wasn’t allowed to shift, wasn’t allowed to flash black and white oversaturated, hospital lights and fire, spinning so fast he was tipping and ramming to a complete halt, no no no--

Bucky wouldn’t. The ground under his feet was caving mud, ready to swallow him up and the pavement burned bare feet as he ran, ran, cold metal against his toes as they shoved him in a box made of jagged ice and he was falling, _fuck_--

One last jolt forward, fingers reaching as he dove across icy rain and muddy boots, red red closing around the only extended hand he could see and Peggy held on tight, pistol calluses on hands that looked so soft and fragile, hands he’d never held in war, flashing war around them as she flushed up at him with _you’re late_, machine gun in those hands as he looked down at her and echoed back.

The echo didn’t stop carrying. Didn’t stop, _you’re late, you’re late, you’re late_, and she was holding tight to his hand but he--

He couldn’t hold back tight enough. Her hand was shrinking, weaker. Red lips turning down at the corners, eyes creasing tired, tired and sad and the fingertips laced over his knuckles were shriveling, chestnut freezing around her face, silver ice to dead gray, pale white snow and he couldn’t move, couldn’t move in waves of glacial water, glass crystal cutting open his palms, riding up his arms and he couldn’t stop it, he couldn’t stop it as Peggy shriveled and cracked, fading, fading as his fingers fumbled to catch hers and she was crumbling, crumbling into ash, rusting Phoenix ash dissipating, dust the wind swept into a morbid pencil-shaded swirl and she was gone, flew from his fingertips just like that and Steve still couldn’t scream.

The wind kept blowing, hard enough to threaten knocking him over and Steve was so cold, these clothes didn’t fit him right, hanging loose and billowing but for the tie around his neck, so tight he was choking and he was so cold, spinning around on one worn-through heel--

Gravestones.

Black, black dresses and hats and shoes and black notebook clenched in his fist as he stared at Mom’s coffin, hovering over the ground. Sarah’s funeral. How was it? It was alright. She’s buried next to Dad.

Paper crumpled, loud, and Steve looked down aghast at the sketchbook in his hand. His hand was too big. It was too big, too strong, and the birthday gift he’d gotten from Buck last year was crushed.
The leaves under his feet were crushed. Brittle, crinkling under shoes that were too big on feet even bigger, gleaming fancy with that smell from the shoe-shiners down the street in Midtown.

His whole body was too big. Pumped back full of serum and this wasn’t his suit, he’d never worn this suit, black and sleek, didn’t fit broad shoulders emaciated stomach right with all its crisp lines, and maybe it should’ve been familiar to not fit right in a suit because he hadn’t for the first twenty years of his life but this was a whole different kind’a wrong. Nothing like the ratty suits he used to bundle in - dark and brooding, sharp jacket, black vest, black tie, buttoned up white shirt -- only that didn’t belong, it was the white button up he’d worn to dance with Bucky that night they’d made love the first time and.
Steve looked up.

This wasn’t Sarah’s funeral.

It was Bucky’s.

He’d looked so good, that day, stepping up behind Steve on the porch, just take out the trash, shine my shoes, looked like a damn church boy and if Steve didn’t feel guilty as hell for flushing at that because he knew exactly the kinda things that came outta Buck’s mouth and how could he even be thinking about that at all on a day like this, on a day they put his mom in the ground then Bucky’s hand was on his shoulder and Steve looked up at him with big affectionate eyes and he could melt, he could melt because Buck was gonna be at his side for the rest of forever.

At his side, now.

Only it was a coffin at his side, and Steve was staring down at that young face, the one from that day, and Bucky’d been dead the moment he doomed himself to Steve but he couldn’t be dead, he couldn’t be dead, the world was shifting and dropping under his feet but he couldn’t be dead.

Shaky, numb hands dug split knuckles into the corners of his eyes. Fuck, get it together. Get a grip, Rogers.

He opened his eyes.

Short hair, that was the first thing he registered as he recognized crystal eyes, staring at him blank under pale skin on a street corner in Queens, overwhelmed and confused and not the slightest bit of recognition as Steve reached for him, cried out, Bucky?

It was that face staring back at him from the coffin now.

The cool grass beneath his feet tipped and any second now, his knees were going to give out and at least they’d bury him here, in the open dirt grave they were about to lower his boy into, at least they were together in death and--

“Captain?”

Steve spun around. There were so many faces, voices, so much black he couldn’t tell who was who and who’d spoken and why there were so many people at a funeral for some backalley dock boy from Brooklyn, but someone was wearing a military cap and there were outstretched hands, carrying an American flag.

Not the kind from his uniform. The kind Bucky painted over a casket and handed to him on pure, clean canvas. Red white and blue, America.

“It’s time to fold the flag,” Howard Stark told him softly, quick engineer hands already poised on the other side.

Your best buddies were the ones that folded your flag, everyone knew that. And the Commandos weren’t here, the Commandos had left him a long goddamn time ago or he’d left them, back of a golden bar as he whisked a beautiful boy off to dance but they weren’t here and that hit just as hard now as the files deceased did, deceased deceased deceased but Bucky’d stuck to Howard like over-eager glue, from the minute he’d been asked to test out weapons efficiency and they’d worked together in his shop, had tossed around ideas and made plans for the future, a drink together in Brooklyn after the war.
Howard, who’d Bucky sent flying off a cliff in a car that most definitely couldn’t fly.

Did he know, that shiny red from the beginning, Bucky’d taken that car and finally designed it so it could? Did Howard know?

“Cap,” Howard called softly and Steve’s hands shot to two corners of the flag, fast as soldier’s hands snapped to foreheads to salute only his fingers were curling in the smooth material, the most careful cautious fists he’d ever made but he couldn’t stop, brandishing the only weapon that’d ever saved him only it hadn’t been enough to save--

Breath caught on the sharp inhale and he forced his chin up, snapping his eyes back forward and Howard was.

Tony. Howard was Tony and Tony’s throat was painted with a mottled white scar and he was looking at Steve with raised eyebrows, impatient, waiting for him to lift hands, fold, fold.

To stand here and mechanically fold Bucky’s flag as Howard and Tony flickered and someone was weeping, some girl from some double date that Bucky’d left at the dance hall, dragging Steve off with that angry line in his forehead, dimple in his chin furrowing as he growled something about not being able to stand how disrespectful and.

Fold.

The flag on his chest, it was nothing like the flag in his hands and Bucky turned to him, asked if he was gonna keep the uniform. That sly, tipped eyebrow flirting tone and Steve hadn’t thought about it, then, but now Bucky had a flag and it didn’t matter, if he’d been flirting or not.

How many of his soldiers had died this way? How many came home to waste away, was Dernier’s girl so happy to have him home she finally said yes to that proposal or did she split after the first nightmare he broke something? Had Dugan’s mom made everybody that Thanksgiving dinner he’d promised? Did Monty ever get the homemade soup in front of a fire he’d wished for back when Steve didn’t have anything left to live for?

Fold. Straighten.

One more step.

Barnes was the only Howling Commando to give his life in service of his country. The others just gave their existence, nothing more. Just their hope and their dreams and their normalcy and their queasiness to blood and their pure white innocence, drifting down snow and dark eyelashes as someone pelted one more snowball.

Fold.

It was so heavy.

Why was it so heavy?

It was just a flag, but he could feel every stitch against the raw skin on his palms, like sackcloth weighing down his wrists, almost like it was filled with something and all that pride, that was supposed to be stuffing Steve’s chest right now? Where was that? Shoved in this damn flag instead?

Fold. One step closer to Tony’s waiting hands. Snapping bite, we’re not soldiers and Howard’s wide eyes, staring after Peggy Carter too, whatever you want, pal. Glowing gold, blue arc reactor in his chest and the patience that only the war man knew, younger than he’d ever known Tony, what father, son was his brother and the flag was. So. Fucking. Heavy.

One more fold. Lift the edge of the triangle and he was in uniform, Class C’s, the uniform he’d only gotten to wear at base, gold and official and Steve wasn’t sure he’d be able to face standing here, holding up the edge as Howard tucked in the final piece, and salute.

How was he supposed to salute.

Bucky’d promised.

The day he’d shipped out, standing there in his Class A’s, saluting Steve goodbye, he’d promised. He’d promised he’d come home.

Gold gloves, gloves rolling the edge of the triangle tighter, tucking it clean and precise the way they’d tucked their beds he didn’t get to share anymore.

Folded. Steve took a step backwards, a single marching step backwards and dear god, fuck, he didn’t wanna do this.

There were tears in his eyes, tears shaking his chest under the shining pins, gold tie, brown uniform, hair slicked perfectly, carefully to the side and the only stars he had left were on the goddamned flag Stark was holding but he’d taken so much from Bucky Barnes, he wasn’t taking this.

Steve lifted his arm slowly, angled the tips of his fingers to his forehead, and saluted Sergeant James Barnes of the 107th and the flag they were to bury him with.

He’d never gotten married.

For all the girls that’d thrown themselves in his lap, all the chances he’d always had, Bucky’d never gotten married.

He didn’t have a spouse, they gave the flag to your spouse, but Bucky never married and they’d put in the ground, bury it beside his cold body--

“Captain Rogers?”

It took him a second, to blink fast enough to see past the watery lashes, gasp in a shaky, hitching breath, and register the man in uniform beside him.

Pararescue NCO Sam Wilson, two white gloves cradling the vibrant red, stark blue. White stars arching across the top, Bucky’s burial flag only it wasn’t laying on his casket. Sam was-- Sam was holding it out to Bucky’s...spouse.

To Bucky’s best friend.

“As a representative of the United States Military, it is my high privilege to present to you…” Oh. “…distinguished service rendered to our country, and to our flag by your loved one.”

To Steve.

His loved one.

On March 2, 1945, Steve Rogers stood in front of a foggy mirror propped haphazardly in the back of an army tent, staring at the shadow of a man about to embark on the last mission of his life.

And he could remember, thinking then, about the future he’d have. If he survived that last mission, going after Schmidt. Under the arch of a canvas sky he’d stared, the empty void where crystal used to shine over his shoulder in the mirror, and just. Thought about how he much he hadn’t said.

He’d spent most his life so far gone, under and he’d thought maybe he’d break the surface when they pumped his cells perfect. But he’d gotten the serum, and his feelings for Buck didn’t budge an inch.

And nothing changed. Why would it? Steve spent his entire life in love with Bucky Barnes, so what? He loved Bucky and the sky was blue and snow was cold as hell. There was nothing to think about, nothing to confess.

Until now that Bucky was dead. And Steve couldn't help but wonder if maybe he should've confessed.

It was too late now, though. Steve could whisper I love you to Bucky's grave when they won this war.

The empty grave. He’d wondered, all the way back then, in that empty dismal tent in 1945, if they'd hand Steve the folded flag.

Of course they had.

Of course they had.

If he survived this. If he made it out alive on the other side. Part of him didn't think he would. Part of him didn't think he'd last past this next battle. Part of him didn't want to.

That was the worst part of him and Steve stared with dead eyes in a foggy mirror and wondered when he'd turned into the coward that couldn't keep breathing without Bucky at his side.

There was no mirror, now, to tell him he was wasting away in this cemetery with Bucky’s coffin and a burial flag on Steve’s upturned palms, the red gloves that’d failed to catch precious cold hands curling around the edges, terrified of clutching it close, more terrified to drop it.

And he’d been right. All the way back then, he’d been right.

Whisper I love you to Bucky’s grave, only.

They never won the war.

The embroidered stars left imprints on his forehead, cheekbones, but better there than the empty empty hole in his chest.

He couldn’t stop crying.

He couldn’t stop crying, curled in the middle of the floor of their apartment in Brooklyn, the place he’d taken Bucky down and kissed his stomach between murmured I love you’s, watching the beautiful face sink further further down into hopelessness, the fragile, terrified, desperate affection as Bucky wrapped his fingers around the back of Steve’s head and begged so quietly,

Say it again.

Steve’s knees were aching, stomach ripped up from all the shuddering but he couldn’t stop crying, triangle burial flag pressed to his face, curled in the middle of that floor and shaking so hard through the loud sobbing sounds he couldn’t hear the soft murmur as Bucky called to him--
Spattering. Gunshots, seven rifleman, three volley salute and Steve didn’t startle at the overlaying blasts when he’d been hearing nothing but gunfire since he lifted his head off that numb white hospital pillow.

And again, gunshots painted into the sky and he could smell the smoke and powder, the way Bucky smelled at the end of the missions and.

Again, crackling fireworks lighting up the sky as Bucky took his hand, pulled him to his feet, and ran. Color exploding above them, ground shaking beneath their feet and the cold was pulling water from his eyes, the crystal was pulling tears down his cheeks and all he could smell was the burning heat, hellfire flames as Sam slipped the last hot brass into his hand.

It was the last time he’d touch something metal that belonged to Bucky and Steve couldn’t breathe, he wasn’t sure how long before weak legs gave out on him with no one to scoop him up this time.

And for just the smallest, tiniest moment, he couldn’t help but think. It couldn’t be worse than this, there was nothing worse than this.

Then the trumpet started

A single note, again, and five steps higher.

Day is done.

Something seized in his chest, some awful mix of panic and terror as he realized, one more time, he didn’t reach far enough. Bucky was lying in the bottom of that ravine and he was about to crash a plane and damn his best friend to hell for eternity and there was nothing he could to do to stop it.

Steady pitch, half-octave, octave.

Gone the sun.

Ringing loud and clear over empty fields and it wasn’t panic seizing his chest, it was grief, the kind of grief so heavy it’d drag him down, crumple him on his knees if he weren’t in his Class C’s.

One five eight, one five eight, one five eight.

From the lakes, from the hills, from the skies.

Couldn’t they just go back, go back to when it was one two three and the only thing seizing his chest was butterflies and affection and blushing smiles as Bucky swept them across the floor, waltz, one five eight.

Half-octave, octave, and one higher.

All is well.

Sheer beautiful, loudest thing he’d ever heard and he’d never wanted this, knew he’d never survive lowering Bucky’s body into the ground, never survive standing stock still, silent at his best pal’s funeral while a soldier played Taps and--

Octave, half, down.

Safely rest.

He could...never go home. He could never go home.

A single note, again, and five steps higher.
Falls the night.

Один, Один, Пять.

And the sun can no longer rise.

“That is what death is like. It doesn’t matter what uniforms the soldiers are wearing. It doesn't matter how good the weapons are. I thought if everyone could see what I saw, we would never have war anymore.”
— Jonathan Safran Foer, Extremely Loud and Incredibly Close

No matter what uniform the soldiers were wearing, be it gold or black or red white blue, there was a part of his subconscious that never stopped being that kid in basic, the kid that tried so hard to become one, to understand how to fight a war in perfect lines with a helmet strap chafing his chin.

And that soldier was still in him, somewhere, because the thread in his spine shot stiff bite to the next knob of Steve’s spine, every bone thoracic to lumbar and down down—like he could thread Steve’s spine outta his body with his teeth, rip his skeleton apart through his skin—chin flicked up before he registered the shout across the white-cross field, “Attention!”

Bucky’d drawn these straps.

On that painting hanging in their apartment, straps wrapped under the casket, the one Steve was currently gripping tighter than he’d ever dared grip the body in that box. One bare hand curled around the wood of the casket and it was the same one, the exact same one from that painting and he’d never noticed that until right now and he’d been so wrong, so wrong because Steve hadn’t saved him, Buck wasn’t curled crying helpless on the casket lid, he was inside, he was g-gone--

The casket was closed. Stood at the head of it, in the fucking place of honor, and eagle eye view had Buck where he always was, covering Steve’s right. The two of them, one more time, lined up together above another gaping hole in the ground.

The casket was closed, wood panel between him and looking at that pretty face one last time and in 1945 he’d told himself it’d be an empty casket and.

It could be. Nothing imprinting the red satin cushion down.

The body, the body could be anyone’s. Everyone’s, he stood here with a strap in his hand to lower a casket into the ground and it could be Peggy trapped behind the mahogany prison.

It was Carter’s funeral, and Dugan’s, Jones, Falsworth, Morita, Dernier’s. It was Riley’s, and Clint’s, Sam’s, Natasha’s.

Steve’s.

The pallbearers were supposed to prompt the family to leave their personal items on the casket they were burying with the body, but he was the only family Buck had.
And there was only one piece he had left to give.

Only piece left of Buck in this world and if he was losing everything, might as well bury that with the rest of his heart in this grave.

They clanked, as he lifted them from around his neck.

He almost expected the signature click of Bucky’s metal fingers against the tags, corner tipped up on one half’a his mouth as he mouthed the name, closed steel around the ballchain and pulled, dragged Steve down into a smiling kiss, dogtags heating up between their bare bodies.

There was no one left to smile absently as Steve cooked shirtless in the kitchen, burning a brand into the center of his chest, no one to teasingly complain about bruising under his chin from getting smacked with the things on repeat, no one to trace the name, numbers into his shoulderblades when he thought Steve was asleep.

JAMES B BARNES.

Never belonged to him anyways.

Of all the punches, split knuckles, scarred from broken crystal, battered, shattered, bruised and used, it’d never been harder in his life to uncurl a fist.

Had to let go some damn time, but he just couldn’t bring himself to open up his fingers, to let the metal just drop to the top of that beautiful wooden casket.

The edges of the tags were rounded, enough so they didn’t slash open skin but they were cutting into his palms anyways.

His hands were shaking. His head was spinning, and the dogtag chain was rattling.

Rattling, like lungs used to. Like bullets used to. In the barrel of your best man’s gun.

One more time.

Just open your eyes, Stevie, c’mon.

The metal was slicing hard enough to hurt, to hurt a lot and he just kept pressing harder. But they weren’t caving, weren’t crushing, not even with the serum strength.

Y’gotta get up, pal, you’re scarin’ me.

Buck? A-ah, Buck, it. It hurts.

I know, I know. I’m gonna take care of you, sunshine. Just open those pretty eyes for me--

Long lashes fluttered, once more, and Steve opened his eyes.

The grave was glowing golden. The inside of a bar, flickering walls of a canvas army tent and harsh white fluorescent and the casket was lowering and the scuffed wood dancefloor was freezing over and all he could feel was the bite of metal in his hand.

The TV was rattling about upcoming elections, now.

There’d been a story, about a train.

The metal against his skin was starting to cut circulation to his fingertips but the woods were flickering out, fading into background with Arlington, a canvas tent in the rain.

It hurt, freezing metal digging into bruises already formed; he was squeezing harder than the cells in his hand could rapidly heal. Two rectangles and the silver ring he’d slipped on the chain with them when he couldn’t bear to stare at it anymore. Fiancé.

And he stood there, in the middle of a hospital lobby, clutching the dogtags around his neck so tightly he could feel the numbers, letters engrave into his skin.

Sergeant James Barnes, 325570…

Maybe he was mumbling it or maybe that was Bucky, a thousand years ago, but it’d been burned into twin skeleton flesh and the pain was so fucking sharp it kept snapping him back to the white, stinging slash so bad his eyes would water if he had any tears left in this godforsaken body.

I’m turning into you. Th-this is some horrible dream.

As soon as Bucky saw Steve dripping blood, abandoned post and barreled down the hill cursing every expletive he could think of, mixed in with a lot of you can't do that to me Rogers's.

Steve had been amused, actually. He'd shot this look at Gabe and they were both snorting at Bucky, red in the face from yelling. All Bucky could think about was Steve coming back with a bulletwound, or not coming back at all, and then what would Bucky be fall apart Hydra find him drag him to that table no one’d come screaming no one’d hear strapped down heavy leather scent of blood--

He'd promised to say when everything was too much - world spinning and suddenly lack of ability to breathe, he'd say this was probably that too much. Braced hands on knees staring at the ground while Steve and the Commandos jostling above him nothing sinking in, couldn't anchor, all he could see were fluorescent lights and the glint on the edge of a scalp, TV screen, and he couldn't move, he was pinned down and in the serumcoffin all over again and his screams were making ripping up his throat until he coughed blood--

Bucky reached out a single, panicked hand for Steve.

Except. He wasn’t there.

Who was Steve supposed to reach for, Bucky wasn’t there.

Bucky wasn’t here and Steve couldn’t separate the white clean from the dirty forest, who was s’posed to put an arm round his waist, let his fingers curl into a strong arm, suck in shaky breaths until the world straightened out again?

Kept chanting this mantra in his head - he'd gotten out, he'd gotten out, he wasn't hallucinating this whole time – couldn’t make himself believe it. Brain kept swirling, stuck between deciding whether the table or the trees were the hallucination. If he could convince himself that this -- the forest, Steve - - was real, he'd be okay.
There was no forest, the only thing the pain kept shaking him back to was the hospital and Steve didn’t want that to be the reality.

That couldn’t be the truth.

He’d never been so elated and devastated to be in a hospital in his life. Because he wasn’t at that fucking funeral. That fucking funeral wasn’t real.

But. The hospital couldn’t be either. No, no.

That hospital lobby couldn’t be what he shook himself back to, let it be something else, let the forest and the raging war fires take him now--

It’d be so much easier to pretend it was all a dream.

But there was the truth, the truth in the zinging metal his hand couldn’t stop clutching so tight. The pain couldn’t lie, couldn’t, only truth he could hold onto.

The only truth he knew. Bucky was alive. Coma or nightmare, hospital or table or funeral, reality or 1944, Bucky was still alive.

That was all he knew.

Maybe he couldn’t hold onto anything but the bite in his palm that kept bringing him back to the hospital lobby and the deep soul ache but no matter where in the timeline they threw him he still knew. Bucky was alive.

_Soldiers fight for their country. They fight for themselves. They fight for each other. And sometimes they die for these things, too. The ones who don’t carry the memory of the ones who did for the rest of their days. Steve Rogers is no different._

The funeral wasn’t real. The embroidered stars in that burial flag pressed to his face as he sobbed, that wasn’t real, right? Right? He wasn’t...he wasn’t flashing back _now_, trying to escape the cold wind, standing with shaking legs as they called three volley, Taps echoing in the background wasn’t real, he wasn’t shaking the hospital to make himself never hear it, never watch that train hit--

Bucky was alive. He was alive. Bu-cky was _alive_.

And he had no idea what was real.

Bucky--

“Steve?” Tony’s hand clapped carefully on his shoulder, flash and he was wearing too much blue as Tony fucking Stark put his grimy little hand on Steve's stiff uniformed shoulder, cajoling again, _why shouldn't the guy let off a little steam?_

You know damn well why! Back off.

The storm rumbled overhead and Steve blinked at the hospital wall, white, metal holding his hand. Crushing bones, was gonna make him bleed, but it was here, he was here on solid ground.

It took a second to tell himself this was his body, he had control of -- late July all over again -- and finally managed to turn his head, blinking wide dry eyes at the man with his hand on Steve’s shoulder.

Howard’s face, a single moment and then it was definitely Tony, older, more pain boiled up behind those dark eyes and he was looking at Steve like he was about to either crumple or explode and Steve could see now, the nurses gathered in the hallway behind them and none of them were his mom, or his neighbor, and.

They probably all thought he was a fucking psychopath.

The world was the one turning on its fucking side, not him, everything was wrong and he knew all the faces staring at him in their big circle and they were strangers on a cobblestone street, a week older than the last time he’d seen worry lines next to Stark’s eyes and in the wrong century all over again and.

Bucky wasn’t here.

The train.

Steve smacked Tony’s hand off his shoulder hard enough to echo, the same motion he’d used the first time and the walls were shaking with the rain and he had to snap out of it right the fuck now.

Bucky wasn’t here, he needed Steve, he needed Steve had to keep it together.

Was that how Barnes made it through all those firefights back in the war?

Steve took a single step backwards, rotating with his back to the wall, and let his fists curl.

That was real.

The tighter they curled the more real he felt, and his epidemic fists were dragging his feet to the ground, hard tile, too white too clean tile with scuffing shoe marks from the running shoes he had laced to his feet, 2016 and his fists kept curling tighter.

"You don't have to bury it."

He peeked a glance at his best friend, wondered how much had changed since they'd laid on a beach together like this. "I know I've given you shit your whole life, but. You're a fighter. A soldier. You don't have to be sorry for that and you don't have to have some...happy ending that doesn't include that. If you're home fighting, then fight."

"That's not a life."

Not a life. Not alive.

They were surrounding him. The way storm chasers surrounded a tornado in their tumbling Jeeps, riding after the wild storm -- the whistling storm, down streets, at the beginning of the song.

They were gonna block him in here, weren’t they?

How wild were his eyes, as he darted between their shifting stances, carefully lowering weight stable, bracing to take him down--

Those men on the elevator, sweating, he’d known, floors before the doors shut and they turned around with cuffs, electricity shooting like the fence Bucky’d ripped off his boots so long ago.

He was shaking.

He needed to get outta here. Now, he had to find Bucky. Before it was too late again.
Not a life, the only life worth living was if Buck was there - Bucky who’s life hadn’t ended.

Not on the first train and definitely not on that one.

“Get out of my way.” Steve warned slowly, dark and careful. They were the ones shaking, breaking promises to rain down like papers ripped from sketchpads thrown off that big ugly building in New York. “I don’t wanna have to go through you.”

Sam took three careful steps forward, hands up and Steve couldn’t help but see that same guy from morning laps, shaking smile carved into the VA face, calming down somebody in hysterical tears while Steve stood stiffly in the doorway with a rolled up lunch bag from that street down the place and he wasn’t fucking crying hysterically, Sam.

“Steve, think about this.” Quiet, placating, and Steve was about to break another counter just to get him to stop looking at him like that. “This isn’t what Bucky would’ve wanted.”

Would’ve wanted.

“He’s not dead.” Sharp. Sharp as the blades Bucky threw at walls when he screamed and the scream in his chest was bouncing around inside all that starlit empty but he wouldn’t cave, wouldn’t let ‘em win, he could take this pain, he could do this all day--

“Please.” Even from his peripherals, he could see the melting mask on her face. “You’ll only make it worse.”

Nat was so hurt. Never let ‘em see her like that, everyone else, all pained and vulnerable, only Clint’d ever seen that before the day she’d confessed so quietly, I thought I knew whose lies I was telling. But I guess I can’t tell the difference anymore.

“He stayed on the tracks. Rogers, he could’ve jumped outta the way and he didn’t. Bucky wasn’t coming back from--”

Steve whirled around so fast he left skid marks on tile.

“Fuck you! Fuck you, we were. We could’ve fixed it, this is your fault, you let this happen. You let him--”

Inhale.

The escalating shouts weren’t gonna get him to Buck any faster. Had to be smart, c’mon Rogers think with your head instead of your fists for once.

Fuck though, he was angry.

Fuck, how could she say something like that? After all the shit she’d already put him through? Put Bucky--

Shit. Settle down, you were smart enough to interrupt yourself now gather all that righteous indignation and control it. Control. That’s all that mattered, right? Control? Efficiency?

Exhale. That fucking control.

“He’s not dead.” Steve rolled his broad, threaded shoulders, twitching muscles in arms settling at his sides, the words echoing in every empty space, bullethole Bucky’d left with the cloud of black smoke. “I’m not gonna leave behind him this time.”
Zola must’ve--

Finger point, at all those skeptic faces and he wasn’t on a stage in tights but he damn well could’ve, I Want You, except he hadn’t been able to carry the Cap smile in years, not since. “I’m gonna find him.”

The Avengers assembled and it wasn’t on his command, Sam stepping passively closer, Clint shifting in front of the door, Pepper in front of the hallway. Bruce by the nurses’ station, Natasha’s hand sliding to hover over the gun on her hip, and Tony Stark didn’t budge an inch, staring at Steve like he was seeing his dad’s collection room instead of the man that’d lead his team.

He’s my family, Steve told Tony, and those big brilliant brown eyes had watered right up, shock and pure serious as he’d said back, clear as day. So was I.

When it rains, it pours. Shoulders squaring, and his eyes weren’t darting around the room anymore, shifting, assessing, running routes and battleplans and this was a hell of a lot harder without a team to back him up.

Without anyone on his six. Even when he’d had nothing, there’d been someone on his six.

The boys, Peggy, the Avengers, Natasha, Sam. Buck. His family.

Steve sucked in a breath, lowered his weight, clenched fists vibrating at his sides. Dropped his voice an octave, low scary, black mask, and lit the spark to burn the building down.

“I’m not lookin’ for a fight. But anybody gets in my way…”

Tony Stark yelled that they weren’t soldiers but with that burning flame in sharp eyes, he sure damn looked like he was tryin’ to start a war.

“That’s it, huh? You just...become as bad as him, then?” Tony bit back and the fight music started, deep bass and gradual crescendo somewhere in the distance, genius engineer flashing heat brighter than the suit he’d’ve been smart to wear, watching dark clouds gather in devil rafters for the second time and hell if he was gonna go gentle into that fucking goodnight again.

“You both need to be put in check, whatever that takes.” Rogers bristled and Tony took one menacing step closer.

So he didn’t fight with knives pressed to throats the way Barnes did or shiny star metal the way Rogers did, but his dad never gifted him with shields guns uniforms homemade crutches for detrimental bulletwounds. He’d learned that pretty damn young, the greatest weapon he had wasn’t something from H. Stark. No, this mind was all his, and so were these fucking words.

“Y’know, the Captain America my dad was so proud of? That red white’n’blue soldier, his best fucking creation?” Rogers was vibrating, more ready to leap than he’d ever seen in his life and that was saying a fucking lot. Threatening them, Steve was threatening them, and for about the thousandth time Tony reminded himself to put Time Machine on the To Build list so he could go back and slap his dad across the fucking face for creating the formula that landed them all in this fucking shitstorm.

“...if that war hero was here, he’d punch you in your perfect teeth.”

Steam’d be rolling outta Rogers ears right now, if this were a comic.

Those perfect teeth were grit hard enough his jaw was aching, throbbing more than the beating in that parking lot off Duffield. I can do this all day. No point to inhale exhale anymore, not when his blood was boiling so hot it sucked the oxygen from his lungs.

Fists curling, uncurling, every knuckle clicking in morbid claws and clenched back again. Control.

The tempting leap forward, blast of shattering glass as the screen with Zola’s rotten robotized face split into a million fragments.

Natasha had been there. She'd seen him, the first time he'd lost his temper since the serum. That wild swing at Project Insight's televised face, glass suddenly shattering, spiraling out with a crash. The surprise and sudden flash of fear on her face.

She knew exactly what he was capable of. He wondered, if she knew how hard it was for him not to snap a fist at her pretty televised face right now.

See, she'd made sure his death amounted to the same as his life. He was nothing but a zero sum.

His life here, with them, with the Avengers. A zero sum, this wasn't freedom, this was fear.

Last time, he'd stood down, almost a moment too long. But this time? He wasn't shutting up, turning docile away. This time, he had it.

They almost have what they want.

Absolute control.

And fuck, he was powerful. Standing here with his chest heaving, surrounded by Earth’s Mightiest Heroes all ready to drag him kicking and screaming into another hospital bed, in a padded room, leather straps over his wrists.

Yanking them off Bucky’s. Mumbling that damn serial number he’d never studied enough to know it meant drafted, the damn serial number burning black into his chest, reflecting fluorescent and he wasn’t going to lose the only thing he’d spent his life fighting so fucking hard for.

Whatever the cost. The price of freedom is high, it always has been

And it's a price I'm willing to pay.

Steve Rogers lifted his head, met all those defiant, guarded eyes he’d spent so long softening, gathering into the family none of them’d ever had, and gave his team one last order.

“Stand down. This is your final warning.”

The living legend, who kinda lives up to the legend. Sure, he’d been bitter towards the Great Captain at first, anybody’d be. But how quick had he figured out that Steve was exactly what their team needed? That, for the first time in his life, he could be the smartest guy in the room without being the only guy in the room?

Lab's all set up, boss. Actually, he's the boss. I just pay for everything and design everything and make everyone look cooler.

The soldier they’d all followed into battle. Kid they’d appointed as head of the Avengers, friend he’d come to respect, even if Steve totally miraculously called him out everytime he cheated at Risk.
Steven Grant Rogers, who he’d sacrificed everything for. Capsicle Stevie Rogers who he’d had to watch freeze and deteriorate in front of his eyes, barely months after he’d finally seen him alive for the first time, smiling and laughing and happy for the first time only to get it all wrenched mercilessly away.

Captain Steve Rogers, who just barked the last order he’d ever give his team.

Stand down.

He wondered if Steve knew how he’d idolized him as a kid. Tony hoped he did, so Steve could see he was just another person to fucking let him down.

Romanoff broke the silence, new darker red curling away from her face gentle pretty and normal he could hardly reconcile her with the badass that destroyed them at pool and shrugged mischievously when Sam demanded to know where his orange juice was hiding.

How new was that hair? When was the last time he’d seen her? When did she start dressing like a civilian?

Had any of them made it out the otherside of this alive?

Natasha stood with those pleading eyes, the face of an ex-best friend who used to pick him up curbside and now crushed him heartside under those deadly sharp heels.

“You know what’s about to happen. Do you really wanna punch your way outta this?”

Steve glared the coldest he could, jaw set and clicking, blue eyes flashing as his body trembled to keep still, chest puffed up with the star-shaped heart carved right outta where he used to be so proud.

Proud of what? Fighting for a country that didn’t stand for any of the things it used to?

Maybe never did. How much of war was propaganda? He’d always assumed it stopped the minute he stripped the blue tights off but.

Didn’t matter now. There were no posters in this war, no speeches left when they all knew what he had to say, and what he was gonna say it with.

Did he really wanna punch his way outta this one. One of those moments that struck a chord somewhere deep, the realization of how much gravity was weighing down Atlas’ shoulders.

He could step into that machine - either die or maybe save mankind.

He could stand staring in this tent - either climb back on that stage or maybe save the love of his life.

He could knock on that door - tell Natasha there was nothing they could do or maybe their little team of three could suitup and the rest of the team would join them just in time to save New York from an army of aliens.

He could get outta here now before the helicarrier exploded - use all the gifts he’d been given to stop evil again or maybe he could climb down through the metallic rubble and breaking glass and save the trapped, forgotten soldier stuck under that metal beam, the exact same kind he’d walked so carefully across not without you, metal beam he hadn’t been able to hold onto the side of the train, always snapping, only.
That one wasn’t a maybe. Steve was gonna save him this time.

He could try and convince them, write one more speech and risk them taking him down, letting Bucky get left behind again or. Steve would have to cross a line.

A line he could never come back from.

If he went through with this, if he fought the team to get to Bucky, especially after knives bombs and betrayal, they weren’t gonna forgive him for that. If he crossed this line, there was no coming back to the tower, no coming back to the Avengers.

There was no coming back, period.

And it dawned on Tony Stark the moment Steve took that breath, rolled his neck, and lifted two fists slowly, ready boxer backalley-style, in front of the pounding chest.

That was it.

“You really would.” Almost to himself, realization hit the way it always did and normally only Jarvis overheard but now they all could, Steve’s sharp glare and raised fists so loud Tony sounded like a damn afterthought, sidenote as it hit, started to sink in. “You’d kill us, to get to him, wouldn’t you?”

Steve’s chin lowered, eyes on fire, and he didn’t need the black mask, blank devil-glass covering his eyes to be the most terrifying thing Tony’d ever seen.

And how had he never seen it? All this time, years with Rogers that’d been lurking inside how had he never seen it?

I don’t trust a guy without a dark side. Call me old-fashioned.

Well, let’s just say you haven’t seen it him yet.

Whatever it takes, that didn’t include them. That didn’t include him, Steve would watch Tony burn, would shoot him outta the sky if it meant protecting Bucky. He’d...he’d start a fucking civil war to run with the ghost who had his heart, wouldn’t he?

“I was wrong about you,” Tony told him, torn and roughened, smoke over gravel, ripping guilt doing a damn fine job hiding behind those pretty blue eyes. Or maybe there really was nothing human left in there anymore, at all. The Savior, the Good One, the Moral. The Right. Fire-born phoenix with eager curling hands -- everything he knew was wrong.

There was nothing perfect in those deadly cells.

“The whole world was wrong about you.”

For as long as I can remember, I just wanted to do what was right.

“Shh. Listen to me, sweetheart. It’s okay. You were following orders, just like the rest of us, right?” Shadows shifting, war fog fading into deep clarity, dark settled blanket.

“Buck, they were just kids, like us, how could I--”

“Wasn’t up to you.” Balanced pressure, palms pushing down between shoulderblades, slow. Kind. “Much as you wouldda liked to, you weren’t making the executive decision, okay?”
A warm hand skirted up, ran over his jaw and Steve turned wet cheeks further into the pillow, fists clenching Buck’s sleepwarm tshirt, corner of his mouth trembling as broken cut into a whisper.

“What if they were wrong?” Horror seeping between cracks beneath the door, spiderwebbing window, “If I wasn’t good, if I killed like that ‘cause bad becomes. E-evil--”

“Y’gotta be kiddin’ me, pal. You? Evil? C’mom,” chiding strength settling low around his waist, mouth dropping heated to mumble against skin. “…y’know that’s nightmare talkin’. Or Fury, or anybody else who don’t understand what we had to do.”

“Feels like. Ev’ryone.”

“It’s not. Steve, it’s not.” Deep sigh and a metal arm wrapped over his shoulders, “C’mere.”

Dragging him closer across the whisper of the sheets and Steve pressed his cold nose to Bucky’s neck, fingers drawing letters over his spine.

“You have any idea how many people you’ve inspired, Rogers? What you’ve given this country, this world. More than your life, you gave ‘em a symbol. Somethin good, somethin gold they can strive to be. You fought noble as any soldier you brought home. How many families exist now ‘cause you saved their great grand-dad in 1944? You always did the right thing, Steve. And the world ain’t gonna ever forget that.”

If you’re lost and alone--

I wanna come home to you now.

Maybe once, he’d fit here, on the outskirt edges of personal lives, deep in the heart of battlefields, but.

They’d seen him as gone for a long time. And maybe he had been.

The serum’d made him afraid of how easily he could hurt, but then he’d gotten a team so strong, matched every punch. They had his back. He was one of them, in some twisted way.

Built his first family since the Commandos and. It’d be dead if he did this.

I don’t wanna look down.

Steve steadied himself, gaze shifting between each shell-shocked member, redgoldgreenpurpleblack rainbow, colorful friends he’d trained, fought with in Stark’s gym, Beyoncé blasting over loudspeakers and laughter between shield tosses - knew every battlemove, memorized every one of their fighting styles.

Except Tony, he’d never fought Tony without the suit.

Steve calculated his last Avengers battle plan and he was so fucking sorry.

If he could say goodbye aloud, by god he would. If he could say I love you, to every one of them, then maybe his throat wouldn’t be trying to strangle him with latent tears.

Tears bottled for years he’d never gotten to cry, all the forgotten goodbyes.

If he wasn’t pinned, had any other choice, he’d take it in a heartbeat. The choice was between fighting the people he loved, isolating himself for the rest of his life or. Letting Bucky die.
There was no place he could go.

*Pain is alive in a broken heart, the past never does go away
We're born to love and we're born to pay the price for our mistakes*

A half circle, empty space for two missing members. Dernier sniffed as they lifted glasses, only the dim lighting kept them from seeing tears in the others’ eyes.

Same practiced sync clinked glasses together, five-way toast to the realest heros they'd ever known.

"To the Captain," Falsworth said. Rogers - the one who deserved to see the end of this war more than anyone here. They all tipped back their glasses, burn of whiskey down throats.

Til then.

This was it then. No going back for Bucky and no going back for him either. Sorrow washed over clenched fists, battling against the anger bubbling in his gut - how could they do this to him, force--

Please don’t make me do this.

There goes his family.

Blood thrumming, heart racing, tears stuck in his throat, crescendo, crescendo and-- pause.

He’d never gotten to apologize to Sam, for showing up at his door that day, dragging him into this world and abandoning him to the horror without ever covering his six.

Fuck. Sam, he was sorry.

And Natasha?

...this was gonna hurt.

Один, два and bare fingers closed round the edge of a clipboard, industrial metal scraping protest as it slid off the counter. Whistled in the air, fast and sharp, burst of papers scattering – smoke bomb built just for the artist jumping into one more battlefield.

Paper bursting; Romanoff was the highest threat, cold and fast enough to shoot, which was why the clipboard was frisbeeing across the room shield-style to crack a bone in her wrist.

Snap.

All hell broke loose.

Natasha’s gun clattered to the floor and Clint darted to her as fast as he was counting on.

Papers floating slowmotion barrel to the side, surprised yelp as a heavy shoulder whipped Tony’s unprotected ones and knocked Stark tumbling off balance, bought the three seconds he needed before he was spinning behind the coffee table and kicking it up -- no trashcan lid, car door, red white and blue star here -- blocking the possible wave of fire if Nat got ahold of a left-hand gun anyways, or if Sam actually risked shooting at him.

He didn’t, but that didn’t stop him from kicking the table right into Steve’s chest.

Didn't do more than startle him but that's all he needed before there was an elbow against wood and a fist across his face. Sharp, succinct, same surprising skill Sam’d fought with barehanded on the bridge and it hurt like hell, but fuck if he hadn’t spent a lifetime taking worse.

Sam wanted him down, not hurt, and that meant Steve was gonna win. Because if there was one thing he was good at, it was not staying down.

Jaw smarting, another quick apology sent up and the table was flipping across the room, slamming for Natasha and Clint – odds are they’d see it coming - and he really didn’t wanna punch Sam, shot for kicking out the back of a running knee instead, sharp roll and he was sweeping out Tony’s feet too.

Pepper’d ran to the side, orders into a phone and the nurse at the desk was calling hospital security and there was another punch landing on his cheekbone and Steve kicked to the side, ducking to narrowly avoid the clipboard spiraling back at his head.

All that counted was getting away and he’d do anything it fucking took to not hurt anyone even if it was a little late for that but that wasn't gonna be his downfall.

He hadn't fought solo in a long time. Never, against people trained like this. He'd gotten used to fighting with Buck at his side, offense sniper pointed over his shoulder while Steve held the shield to protect them both.

His right hand wasn’t here, and his left was never as good as Buck’s.

That was the only excuse he had for how they managed to pin him down.

Really couldn't say how it happened, he didn't see it coming and maybe they'd paid more attention in training than he thought, knew his fighting style too but either way the next spin aiming a low punch to Tony’s gut was suddenly hitting air.

And something hard and heavy was tackling his side, something else hooked around his ankle and pulled, one arm yanked behind his back, faceful of tile and suddenly he was in 1945, dimlit tent as he screamed, memories ripping him apart and Bucky’s shout, flailing reaching hand on repeat, Bucky’d promised he’d never leave him--

"YOU LYING BASTARD!!" Steve screamed, uncurling just in time for Dugan and Jones to grab his shoulders, shove him onto the closest medical cot. Commandos held down his screaming body, struggling fighting but five men managed to keep him secure enough he couldn’t get up, couldn’t swing back.

Down down down.

If he'd broken free and ran after Bucky then, found him in the ravine then, they'd’ve never been here. Never would’ve lost everything.

Couldn’t let his team hold him down now.

Hip twist and one heavy boot shot sideways, deflating Clint’s chest with a gasp, tipping Sam’s hold offbalance and freeing his left arm enough to reel back, clock Tony across that sharp mouth that’d teased him and given him a home when the world turned its back.

A fistful of Sam’s shirt, the shirt he’d cried into so many times and he was tossing his closest friend as hard as he could, thud as he collided with Natasha and Steve rolled, popping to his feet to shove through Clint again, breaking free from the throb and nearly tripping over Tony, then he was running, running running.
Footsteps barreling after him. Dear, please god, don’t be Sam.

He couldn’t hit Sam, the only goddamn friend who’d never turned their back, always fought by his side, stood up the moment Steve asked him to, only one question-- what do we do?

We fight. Only this time it didn’t get to be together.

So instead, he ran.

The hallways were slick and pulsing white, too many lights too many straight lines, sliding round the first corner and nearly taking out a wall with him. Couldn’t afford to crash into glasswindow bridalshops now, couldn’t afford to bounce off flimsy walls without the shield to make the dent.

But he couldn’t slow down, either. Bruised shoulders and cracked glass, skidding, slowing for turns and taking off again; this place was a fucking maze, there was no way outta here, was there?

Loud bang and fuck, that smarted without the shield or armor but the metal door crashed open anyways, nearly flying off its hinges as shaking hands grabbed the stair railing, held on for dear life and hauled himself up four steps at a time.

One misplaced step, slipping over a landing fuck he couldn’t trip now soar crash into the wall, two hands on the ground and he was doing fucking everything he could but this century wasn’t meant for him and there was nowhere he could run to-- Get up, Steven. You always gotta get up.

Rough groan and he was pushing up, footsteps getting closer sounded like Sam’s, Nat was shouting something and he had to run, had to keep going. Heaving breath, no air left in his lungs as he sprang off, stumbling into another hallway, faster, faster, dodging two nurses with carts and more shouts, skidding corner and there was nowhere to go--

Elevator ding, three doctors exiting Natasha and Sam catching up, fast apologies as he shoved through, jamming the door button closed, sliding shut just as they came round the corner and fuck, he needed to catch his breath. Slumped against the wall, eyes closed head tipped up clear airways and he didn’t have asthma, he didn’t, it was the stupid fucking coma and he could do this.

Last elevator he’d been in, he’d jumped outta; crashing glass, even he knew it was a bad idea, taser in his ribs electricity running through his veins from that electric fence and Bucky’s smoking, charred hands--

No, Stark had an elevator, he and Bucky’d kissed in that goddamn elevator, fell against each other with smiles on their lips--

Ding.

He shoulda known his team was smart enough to guess the floor he chose, shoulda known Clint and Natasha’d be there when the doors opened, 10ft away running but at least it was the second floor, at least the window he’d have to jump out of would barely be a fall but too high for them to jump after, right?

Steve curled his head under one arm and threw himself at the glass. Running rooftops, his old apartment in DC, chasing after the metal arm sniper, chasing crashing through that window, landing in a roll and throwing the shield, both arms up to placate, careful step closer to the seething, masked assassin with one gun trained on Maria and one on him, hissed don’t look for me and Bucky was crashing through the glass--
The ground still hit like a train.

Fuck. Wasn’t thinking about that.

2016, he was in 2016, get up up and keep running--

Where was his bike when he needed it? Steve shook his head, trying to make the horizon stop fucking tilting and all he had to do was make those legs move faster, faster, unfamiliar surprise as he found exactly how fast he could go, running over cobblestone with barefeet, jumping on top of a 1930s taxi, arms shooting over his head as he dove after a submarine, little kid’s words echoing in his head - go get him! I can swim.

Well, it was too bad Steve crashed a plane and found out he couldn’t.

But he could run. Pick up, keep going, time to be amazed at that newfound strength later, just go go go.

Run.

“Did you have something against running away?” Peggy asked him, raising one stunning eyebrow and looking over from her half of the backseat, so close and pretty and she smelled like spring, like flowers in spring and Steve was about to change his life forever, no coming back; took a deep breath and told her.

“You start running, they’ll never let you stop.”

You start running,

They’ll never let you stop.

~~~

Did they get you to trade your heroes for ghosts?

Worst thing about ghosts was how damn quick they disappeared. Into thin air, a swirl of white smoke.

At least he didn’t have it as bad as his dad. Howard lost him over the arctic, lost an entire plane with bombs on board. Spent months, years searching. Never could find him.

Tony just lost a person, just Steve with no plane - and hopefully no bombs - attached. In a city they both knew, it couldn’t be that hard to find him, right?

Only, it really was.

And it was all his fault. All of this, this was his fault.

Yeah, he’d been pissed, yeah, Steve let him down so hard he got blinded and snapped right back, pushed him over the edge and that was his fault, he shouldn’t’ve blown up when Rogers needed him, moment of truth and Tony lit a hotter fire instead of calming the flames and.
It wasn’t worth it.

He had a responsibility for Cap. Not cause of Project Rebirth, cause he was family.

What has he done?

“Well, Dad, you proud now?” Tony mumbled, dragging one more input scan report from a bot camera over the map of NYC that was currently projected across the entire room.

Maybe he understood now, why Howard was so goddamned obsessed. You don’t lose somebody like Steve Rogers and just get over that you can’t find him. You fucking search, til the day you die. Hopefully not by the hand of his war-boyfriend this time.

Take us to the next grid point.

But there's no trace of wreckage. And the energy signal trace stops here.

Howard shook his head, staring at the ocean water they’d lost Steve to, and gave the order he’d give for years. Just keep looking.

His dad never found him, not in his lifetime. But Tony could do this. He could figure out how to bring Rogers back. To save the world, his world, one more time. To prove Howard wrong, one more time.

Or maybe prove him right. My greatest creation is you.

Tony pushed off the counter Barnes used to sit on stealing his blueberries, wheely chair gliding across polished floor and swept up a blue-tinged report, rotating it in the air, checking sidestreets spanning out from the hospital.

He’d never thought Rogers would run. The right thing to do was chase him, right? Not like it mattered, Tony could no more give up looking than he could give up inventing. Not for Steve.

“C’mon, Dad,” he murmured, pushing the road back in place, scanning a finger over a possible route, pulling up traffic cams, looking for something, anything. “How’d you let him go?”

If only Peg were still alive. If he could go visit Aunt Peggy who ruffled his hair and called him Anthony.

If only she could tell him what she told his dad -- the only way he’d survived, only way he started inventing good again.

“Howard, turn the plane around. Come back, and we’ll talk about it.” British accent heavier with all the tears gathering on eyelashes. How many planes would she try’n talk down, how many of them put that on her, all the crying she never deserved?

“I can’t do that. I’m done talking.” For the first time in his life, done talking, and Tony didn’t even know what speechless felt like.

“Howard, Howard. Steve is gone. He died, over a year ago.”

“I can fix this. Peg, all I’ve done my whole life was create destruction. Project Rebirth…he was the one thing I’ve done that brought good into this world.”

“Howard, Tony, I know you loved him. I loved him too. But this won’t bring him back. Howard, you are the one person on this earth who believes in me, I cannot lose you. Steve is gone, we have to move on, all of us. As impossible as that may sound, we have to let him go.”

“...Peg?” Deep breath, pause, crackling over the line. Steve? “He was good before I got ahold of him, huh?”

“Yes, h-he was. He was.”

Come home.

Blue, empty streets blinking back at him. He was.

There was no one to turn his plane around, no one to drag him out before...

He couldn’t just. Drop this.

Steve couldn’t be that hard to find. The guy thought a damn baseball cap and sunglasses was incognito. Where would he go? First place he’d go?

Maybe the train station, where Barnes had--

The other half of the Rogers duo he’d come to accept as family. And yeah, he was pissed the guy had triggered all Winter Soldier and tried to kill him, but. He’d never kick him out for good. How could he? Bruce had done the same, and Tony’d begged him to move into the tower.

So one of them went green and the other slit throats, he had so many fuckin’ nightmares anyways, it wasn’t like one more made that much of a difference.

But jeez, he’d been so mad, so hurt for so long. After Bucky’d done that, betrayed all that trust he’d bestowed-- Betrayed Steve, too, every single member of their family and just fucking disappeared. Yeah, he was mad.

And it hurt like fucking hell to stand there in a hospital lobby, watch that corner TV play some video on loop, unable to tear his eyes away from the screen until the tears built up enough he consciously had to wipe his eyes, sniffle, look away from What Couldn’t Be Happening.

And that’s when he saw Rogers.

Frozen dead to the world, eyes entirely glazed over - found on ice all over again.

But see, Tony couldn’t cry. Not over Bucky, not over the asshole that had the audacity to do this to them all, how could he just leave them, destroy everything they’d taken so long to built, one more person to fucking let him down.

Couldn’t let himself cry over that, cause the moment he let all that hurt in it’d rip him to shreds. So he got pissed. He got so fucking mad because that’s the only way he knew how to deal, fuck Bucky Barnes for ever bringing them down this fucking spiral with him. He had to. He had to. He’d been hurt too many times. And he had to protect Rogers, now. So he’d turned to him, put a hand on his shoulder. Steve.

And then, just one more fucking betrayal.

He didn’t have Peg to talk him back into his senses. None of them had Peggy Carter to talk them back to their senses.
The difference she’d’ve made, if she’d been young enough to be here, scold them all into some sort’a sense.

There was nobody here with enough strength to pick up everyone else’s broken pieces.

How many paid the price before you did?

But...he wasn’t alone.

Pepper was right there, as always, perched on the edge of his desk. Beautiful, understanding, looking at him soft, softer than he deserved.

And there was the rest of the team, waiting patiently around the room in chairs, on tables, quietly stitching themselves back together while Tony stared at the blue map.

They weren’t letting go this easy.

“I’m gonna calculate out whatever goddamn equation I have to. I’m gonna find out where he’d go. I’ll search every street in Manhattan, Brooklyn, New York. Whole U.S.A. if I have to.”

Tony Stark spun around, blue streets winding silently behind him, and told his team.

“I’m gonna bring him home.”

Quiet eyes, quiet mouths, nodding silent confirmation they had now - the solid platform he’d somehow built when he’d taken out those floors of the tower and turned them into Avengers Headquarters. A floor for them all, and a tower to call home, and somehow?

A single echo across tile floors as Sam Wilson took the step closer, one big fightin’ hand clasping Tony’s shoulder.

“When do we start?”

*We’re insane but not alone
You hold on and let go*

In a cemetery what felt like years ago, she’d heard Sam Wilson say that same thing to Steve. The thread she’d warned him not to pull; look at them all unravel.

And try to tie themselves together again. She watched the suddenly unexpectedly hopeful team, Sam’s finger pointing over Tony’s shoulder, Pepper offering suggestions, Maria’s skype flashing in a corner as she gave input too, reports and ideas piling.

Stared blankly at the enthusiasm and wondered how they could all shove the guilt aside long enough to stand on two feet.

Then again, nobody was as guilty in this as she was.

She was friends, with Bucky. Tentatively before all the shit had gone down, but during those months he’d been J.B. Rogers? He’d been the only thing in her life. They’d been such good friends and it was supposed to be fake, but it’d felt as real as any role she’d ever slipped into and that’s all she was, all she had. And she’d honestly, truthfully, come to love him.
She was friends with Bucky, now he was dead. And if she’d never told him to--

The only thing she’d ever wanted was to spare all their broken hearts. Now she couldn’t feel the cold excuse she had for one, let alone the pieces it scattered.

How stupid was she? How could she let herself get attached to someone like that? She knew him. She’d been him. Right to the Russian-killer roots and that deep affectionate draw to the man she had to protect. All he’d ever wanted was to touch the sunlight and she’d been so afraid for what that’d do to all of them, she’d been so afraid he wouldn’t survive it--

She was right.

And she wasn't ready to let go of Bucky Barnes.

She wasn’t ready for the end of teasing over movie night, wrestling in the gym, nights out dancing and philosophy discussions at 2am. The one that could’ve potentially, after all this, been one of the greatest friendships she’d ever have.

But he was dead. Gone, forever.

At this rate, Steve Rogers might be too.

Let Stark search what he will. Tony wouldn’t find him. Howard couldn’t. Losing Steve Rogers, the new Stark legacy. The only thing Tony could hope for now was a son, someone to keep looking after he lost his mind trying. Maybe he’d have smooth red hair like Pepper, Tony’s big brown eyes.

But the only Stark who’d find Steve would be the one to find his bones.

She didn’t know when she put her head in her hands, but there was a strong, familiar hand closing around one of them and Natasha lifted, blinking wearily at Clint’s patient, hurting expression.

God, he didn’t deserve this either. She wasn’t the only one here who’d lost two of her best friends today.

So she let Clint take her hand, weave their fingers together.

Wondered if he was thinking about that day too. The day she and Steve’d wandered down to the shooting range during Barnes&Barton training hour, peering at them from behind the glass and raising eyebrows at each other cause damn, that was a fine view.

But of course Bucky and Clint caught on, turned around and made faces, waving hands to signal them inside. Twin shit-eating grins as they opened up the booth right next to theirs.

“How bout a little friendly competition?”

And it really wasn’t fair, Steve and Natasha with their pistols up against the two best shots in the world. But Steve didn’t back down from a challenge and Natasha rolled her eyes as she followed him - always would - right into battle. She did tweak Bucky’s ponytail on her way past him though, smiling deviously at the fake glare that twitched into a smile as the bow lifted to his shoulder.

It was only fair that Bucky be on arrows and Clint be on rifle, but. Steve and Natasha got their asses kicked anyways. Not without laughing so hard her sides had stitches for days.

What she’d give, to have those stitches instead of straining ones barely holding together now, fraying and fraying.
But it was gone. They were gone, and everything Tony Stark could do in the world wouldn’t bring either of them back.

She wondered distantly, how long ago she’d lost one of the greatest things that’d ever happened to her. How long ago she’d lost Steve Rogers.

Or maybe.

She’d never had him.

Maybe none of them ever had.

They’d let go, with time. They’d never get over it, she’d never get over it, but they couldn’t keep searching forever and she knew Rogers well enough now, if he ran? If that little guy from Brooklyn had finally wisened up enough to run away from a fight, he’d never stop running.

If he didn’t wanna be found? He was gone. Avengers count: 5.

What she’d give to start over. Go back to the beginning, when the scariest thing they had to face was a sky full of aliens.

Take me back to the start.

After their first battle as a team - edge of victory pulsing through veins only thing keeping them awake - they’d done the simplest, most mundane thing.

Just...gone out to eat. Like regular people did. Piled the whole colorful Avengers team into this dingy, rundown restaurant that served calories and shawarma.

Restaurant after restaurant since. It’d become a tradition, the only one they had: after big battles everybody patched up wounds and lumbered into some hole-in-the-wall with more grease on the menu than food.

Squeezing all of them - suits included - into the biggest corner booth they could find, dragging over chairs and apologizing to the entire wait staff between orders.

But god, the pretty laughter, all those smiling, rowdy boys. Bruce snorting as Tony clapped a hand on his shoulder, beaming wide enough to split the cut on his nose back open if he wasn’t careful. Thor’s booming echoing off peeling walls as that white-blonde head tipped back and laughed and laughed and laughed. Clint’s cheeks stuffed with half the food off Bruce’s plate, flicking a straw at Natasha’s cheek, affectionate glare and ripped the corner off Tony’s napkin to wad into a spitball she aimed perfectly into Rogers’ ruffled blonde hair, making him hey! in indignation then Bucky was leaning over Steve’s shoulder to flick Natasha’s forehead and she was laughing, they were all laughing and.

"Well," Dugan finally said, standing up from the booth. "It's been an honor, boys."

He shook each of their hands. Dernier handed him his bowler hat from the seat and Dugan nodded, fitting it firmly over his head. And then he was gone.

They all left, then. One by one. Handshakes to go around.

And then the sun broke over the sky, lighting up the world in bright color again, and it was over.
Don't do anything stupid til I get back.
How can I, you're taking all the stupid with you.

The stupidest thing he could do would be to go to his and Buck's apartment.

Which is why that's exactly what he did.

If Buck was part of the search party, he'd suggest it. Tony and Sam would shoot it down, he's not stupid enough to do something that obvious and Buck would snort, raising one eyebrow. Oh, he's stupid enough.

Only Buck wasn't there to suggest it so the Avengers wouldn't try it first, which meant he had time. Buck sure as hell wasn't leading 'em to Steve anytime soon.

And the Avengers weren't leading him to Buck either, so.

Here he was.

No one to see him dip into the alley, circle round to the back to squint up at the roof, taking a deep breath and a running start before coiling and springing up, nearly losing the baseball cap as he caught the second-story fire escape with on fingertips.

A bit of maneuvering and he had two solid feet on rickety metal, slow and quiet as he creaked up the remaining chutes and ladders, climbing patient as he could all the way to the tenth floor.

Something caught his attention, around floor seven. Flash of movement, something black above but when he looked up there was nothing, just darkness and night and he couldn't let himself lose his goddamn mind now.

All the way up one step at a time until finally, Десять.

One two wrench and the window was popping up, locks snapping as he slid the glass on its frame, to listen for movement, then he was ducking his head and crawling through the window.

Into their old apartment, Brooklyn 1.0 tiny and beaten bloody raw, didn't wanna face the wrath of his mum or Buck before he could clean up a little, it wouldn't look nearly so bad without the caked blood on his face.

Only somehow, Bucky always heard him anyways. Roll inside, tumble to the ground and look up from the broom-swept floor to see a very unimpressed friend looking down at him from his spot leaning casually in the doorway, making Steve look like an absolute fool.

Duck, roll, tumble and he couldn't help but look up, hope pounding in his split chest, eyes straining in the darkness for that figure leaning against the wall with impatient arms crossed over his chest.

But there wasn’t a best friend waiting for him this time. Empty, just like him.

Crawling inside with blood dripping inside his skull instead of out. Still beaten bloody raw. Still never giving up.
Not til he found Buck this time.

But he didn’t, in the living room where they’d kissed on the floor and slept tangled in limbs on the couch and laughed breathlessly against the wall as Steve moved inside that beautiful boy--

Delirious.

Didn’t find him in the studio, in the laundry room. Didn’t find him curled in the bathtub, smiling over his shoulder as he flipped pancakes in the kitchen.

Not in the hallways, on the fire escape, in the closets, under the sink.

Didn’t find him in the empty, empty bedroom.

Steve stood in the doorway of the dark bedroom and stared dejectedly at nothing as walls boxed him in like the painting on the wall.

He didn’t know if Buck could remember as far back as their sunburnt summer, or the conversation they’d had about it in the middle of some Commandos battle in early ’45, but Steve drew Bucky with angel wings long before Buck returned the favor.

Gave him a life he never chose. Where it stops, nobody knows.

Fuck, he had no idea where to go from here. He’d been so sure--

Steve’s shoulders sunk a little lower, two feet stepping slowly, tiredly into the bedroom where everything came together and everything fell apart.

Moonlight filtering through the windows, slowly, and he’d missed exactly when the sun sank under the horizon but it was long gone now, drowned off to some other side of the world and all he had was the silver to keep him company, the silver and the empty house that refused to collapse on top of him but couldn’t release its fucking claws either.

Funny, after all this time, it looked the exact same.

Same dresser, same door he’d slammed Buck into, same window he’d almost lost Buck outta, same bed they’d rolled together, same beautiful painting hanging over the center of two empty pillows.

That painting. He breathed in slowly, forcing his lungs to expand, contract, take one breath as his fingertips trailed down, tracing patterns over the empty bedspread.

The painting was crooked. You’d think, having two artists in the house, they’d be able to keep a damn painting straight on the wall. Showed how much they knew.

Steve climbed up on the bed, sighing softly as he reached out carefully, fingers hesitating just before they hit canvas.

Not straight. He almost smiled at the memory. You’re not straight. Steve’d mumbled back and Bucky’d rolled his eyes, starting for the door but he’d never made it. Shoved into white wood, chased down after Steve’d scrambled to him wildly, demanded from those beautiful crystals the truth, the honest truth, you love me.

Get a grip. Swallowing thick around the lump in his throat he couldn’t cry now, he had to find his best friend.

Steve’s chest expanded on a shuddery breath, reaching fingertips those last few centimeters, canvas rough as he tipped the heavy thing back straight.

It slid in place easily, just off a peg so simple back to perfect, couldn’t they all.

He rocked back on his ankles, still looking up at those beautiful brush strokes, vibrant colors, and he almost missed it. Wouldn’t’ve caught it at all, if he hadn’t brought a hand up to his face to wipe watery eyes before the dam broke.

Saw it the moment his hand came into his field of vision. Fingertips dotted with that much red didn’t just slide by.

Blink and Steve cocked his head, brought a hand up closer in the fading light, eyebrows furrowing as he registered the blood on his hands.

Fuck, he was hallucinating again.

Touching a goddamn painting made him bleed and somewhere in his twisted mind that was s’posed to make sense?

What the fuck. Another inhale, sharp and quick and.

...what the fuck.

Copper didn’t hit him. Linseed did.

Again, to repeat himself, what the fuck. Linseed was what they made oil paints with. Why did his fingers smell like paint? Was that...red paint?

So the painting wasn’t bleeding, that at least made sense, but wet paint honestly wasn’t a lot closer to rational than blood at this point.

Steve pushed up on his knees, peering around the side of the painting and yeah, there was red paint, wet red paint on the side of the canvas.

Okay, that. Wasn’t possible. Paint did this fancy thing called drying and the last time he’d seen this painting, there hadn’t been a touch of stray red on the sides. What the literal fuck.

Well, he wasn’t gonna find out by staring at it. He shuffled his weight, both hands coming up to carefully lift the painting up, smush his blonde head against the wall to peer behind, eyes taking a second to adjust to the darkness.

And that’s when he almost fell off the bed.

Room sideways tipping off the mattress and fuck, fuck, no way. He was definitely hallucinating now but he had to see that again.

Scrambled back up, grip slipping but he got up anyways, almost fast as he’d scrambled to pin Bucky’s confession, only this time the confession wasn’t offered up with blood, it was carved in it, on the back of his goddamn painting.

And okay, it wasn’t blood, it was red paint but it might as well be blood for all Steve’s was draining outta his face right now.

Because he’d taken the painting down and now he was sitting in the middle of their bed staring at it because.
It was there.

He hadn’t hallucinated. It was there.

In big, red, arching painted letters. Red as the paint carved into his soul, as the star etched silently into his arm. A message, on the back of canvas.

Everyone knew not to touch it. It was on impulse Steve’d noticed, taken it down. But there was a message. The back of the canvas sure as hell wasn’t empty anymore. It had nine words. Written carefully, letters arching and rounding prettily. Unmistakable.

Only, it had to be a mistake. Because the canvas said I love you.

The canvas said...I love you.

And worse, right under it, right underneath the three words he’d never heard aloud, it…

It said. To the end of the line.

I love you, to the end of the line.

Bucky’s handwriting, sloping across the back of the canvas, taking up the entire space behind Steve’s wings, Bucky’s curled naked spine, the American flag stretched tight over the coffin on the other side, the coffin he’d seen with his own two eyes for the most horrifying flash of the future he’d experienced in his entire existence.

That couldn’t be the future.

No, the future was changed now.

Bucky’d painted the words I love you. And then right under them, he’d painted...to the end of the line. And Steve Rogers sat cross-legged on a bed with a four foot painting upside-down in his lap and realized for the first time in his life in the stupidest lightbulb moment, it wasn’t an extension, neither of them were. It was. A reiteration.

Bucky'd been saying I love you...all along.

His timeline, fucked up brain snapped in place like a string. Serum finally kicked in, common sense finally kicked in, adrenaline, whatever it was.

What it was, all the memories came rushing back, in perfect order.

From the first time they met in an alley to the last time he’d seen that beautiful body, seconds before the train barreled him outta sight on that tiny TV.

“You think...now we’re older, we can. Keep on bein’ best friends?” I love you.

“Ah, c’mon, y’know she don’t mean nothin’. You’re still the best thing I got, Stevie.” I love you.

“The thing is, you don’t have to.” I love you.

“Don't do anything stupid until I get back.” I love you.

“That little guy from Brooklyn who was too dumb not to run away from a fight. I’m following him.” I love you.
“I can’t lose you asshole, the fuck you think’d happen to me then?” I love you.

"You ain’t getting rid a’ me that easy, Rogers. I'm sticking ‘round 'til the stars fall from the sky.” I love you.

“You are my sunshine, my only sunshine.” I love you.

“Your job description doesn't have anything to do with protecting my ass, sorry.” “But my life description does.” I love you.

"Yes, Steve, 'course I would. I'd take on anybody who fights you, idiot. Why do you think I'm out here?" I love you.

The look in his eyes, as that metal fist lowered on the helicarrier. And every time he’d lowered that metal fist since. I love you.

To the end of the line. I love you.

Silence. I love you.

Silence.

It was perfectly entirely silent. In the bedroom where he’d undone it all, the answer from the day he was born staring him in the face.

And suddenly he was left in the stark moonlit black and white, alone. No memories to sweep parallel gold green crystal gray blue. No memories to overlap and save him - it was all there, every bit, and the pieces of the puzzle he’d been tripping over his entire life finally resembled something real.

Something he’d taken a fucking lifetime to see. But that’s all they were, pieces in the past. Living in his head, and there was a lot more to him than his head. There was this moment, right now. That was all he really had. The moonlight, the darkness, the soft cushion of the bed, hard corners of canvas making dull marks against his inner knees.

Just the empty apartment. Him. And the painting.

The paint was wet.

.
.
.

The paint was too thin to still be wet.

No wait, seriously. That was physically impossible. The paint was too thin to be wet, it’d dry by now, it couldn't be dripping on his fingertips, couldn’t be lifting and staining, there was barely a single layer here, it’d dry, faster than --

He may not know a lot but one thing he did know was art and this was painted less than fifteen minutes ago.

It was in Bucky’s handwriting.

Jesus Christ. He'd just been here.

He'd just. been. here.
He'd known Bucky was alive but fuck, he'd never been so dizzy with relief in his life. Actually scratch that, he'd never been so dizzy in life period, punches concussions and tank explosions included.

Bucky was alive.

One more time, he'd been right; fuck he'd been right. Buck hadn't died, had somehow gotten outta the way in time, maybe staged the whole thing but it didn't matter how, all that mattered was that he wasn't crazy, he'd felt it and he'd been right, all the proof was right in his hands and Bucky was still breathing.

Bucky was alive and knew him and loved him and painted it on this very canvas less than fifteen minutes ago.

Bucky was here.

But…but he wasn't, still.

Shouldn't he be--

He'd come in here, in this room, knowing Steve'd show. Left this for him and...left. Kept going.

He'd left him behind.

Steve blinked, staring at the red sloping words, the bloody paint seared into his soul. Reached out two tentative fingers, carefully brushing the slope of an “e.”

Red came away on his fingers. The sound he'd heard, black shape he'd seen earlier. Bucky'd seen Steve coming for his message, and. Left him behind.

Alone.

Oh.

Steve’s fingers curled away from the canvas, bloody red smearing his palm as they kept curling, loose empty fist. There was...nothing left to fight, now.

Careful hands laid the painting gently on the cold dark earth. blank, slick bedspread.

Creaked as he slowly inched off, two feet landing on soft carpet stretched over wooden boards he could almost feel through plush threads.

It took a lot more strength than he had to walk across the room, stoop to balance on sturdy heels as numb hands flicked on the stereo, but he did it anyways. Never used this stereo, but his portable boombox was broken.

The iPod was still hooked up to the aux cord. Should be doing this on a turntable. Thumb through records, lifting a needle, waiting as the first few chords cracked out, black disk spinning spinning.

They’d never gotten a turntable. Wouldn’t that be easier, dramatic crackling voices instead of a thumb scrolling down a detached highlighted screen. Didn’t take long to find the song. It'd taken a long long time to get here, but there was the song a touch away and he pressed the little rectangle that'd take him from here.

A single pause and the first chord began, straight into crackling voices without one intro melody to soothe the blow and Steve’s lungs filled up so fast he worried for a moment he might burst.
But he didn’t, cause the song kept playing. The voices kept singing. And he kept breathing.

Til then til then, my darling please wait for me. Til then til then, no matter when it will be.

Well. About as much as one could breathe when every inhale hitched over stuttering tears he wasn’t gonna let himself cry.

One day, I know we’ll be back again, please wait...til then.

I know we’ll be back again. Bucky’d been so sure, that they’d come back. Next November, Thanksgiving in Brooklyn with the Commandos, right?

And they had come back. They’d finally come back to Brooklyn and the stars they’d sang to flickered on, fading as they slipped through bloody fingers and silently watched as two boys lost every damn thing they fought for in that war.

Our dreams will live, though we are apart.

The canvas was starting to dry. Just the ends were wet enough to drag trails of red on his fingertips, sliding over all the white, muddying tiny flecks. Steve just watched, traced fingers over the familiar strokes of Bucky’s caring hands.

Minutes. He’d missed him by minutes. Seconds, maybe.

It’d been inches, last time, inches further and red fingertips could close around those bare, freezing hands.

Apart.

Our love, I know will live in our hearts.

The song was recorded off a record player, crackled a little, fog layering in the background behind combined voices.

Soldiers’ faces in torn reminiscence, distance of two separated hearts. Steve glanced at Bucky, wondering who he was thinking of to have the same painting cross his features.

Til then, when all the world will be free. Please wait for me.

When all the world will be free.

Bucky drove and Steve pretended to sketch the road car clouds, anything but the perfect swoop of Buck’s hair back into its ponytail. Bucky hummed under his breath and Steve watched the wide open road stretch in front of them, epitome of the American Dream and the Western Frontier and wondered if anyone in that war knew this was what they’d been fighting for.

Although there are oceans we must cross and mountains that we must climb,

"I hate mountains," Bucky bitched, trudging up the snowy ground. "They're obtrusive and pointless and take days to climb."

"It's more like an hour," Dugan supplied, climbing up a few feet behind. Bucky made a face and kept stomping.

"Is it snowing even more?" Jones complained, looking up at the clouds above them. Bucky glanced to Steve, styled blond hair dusted with white, sparkling flakes. He looked kinda like an angel.
"Yep," bitter, pretending it was the snow he was pissed at and not his own stupid head.

"But at least it's--" Falsworth started.

"S'il vous plaît, ne parle pas," Dernier groaned.

"--insulating," Falsworth finished.

Less than two steps later, a distinctive smacking sound and a shout made everybody turn around. Falsworth was glaring at Morita, who'd pegged him in the back with a snowball.

Bucky snorted and turned back to hiking up the mountain. Having a snowball fight sounded like wicked fun right now, but it was a time sensitive mission and they couldn't stop or delay.

"Hey Steve, we almost there yet?" Bucky asked, shoulders so close to brushing.

Steve glanced over at him, blonde ruffling in the wind. "You haven't gotten an ounce more patient with time, have you?"

"And you haven't gotten an ounce less stubborn. So here we are, stubborn and impatient climbing a mountain in the hellish snow."

"Think we'll make it to the top in time?" one of the boys called behind them.

"We'll make it," Steve promised.

"Especially if you all pick up your feet instead of throwing snowballs," Bucky pointed out, his legs starting to strain a little from keeping pace with Steve.

Something cold and heavy thudded between his shoulderblades, explosion of snow. There was an instantaneous splattering of laughter as Bucky spun around to glare indignant and at whichever Commando had thrown the snowball. Thing was, they were all laughing - even Steve - so he had no way of telling who'd thrown it. Not like it mattered, anyone of them would’ve.

"I'm getting you all back after this train thing," Bucky swore, fake-glaring over the mountain between them.

I know every gain must have a loss. So pray, that our loss, is nothing but time.

They never had that snowball fight.

But boy, did Bucky have his revenge.

Til then, til then, let's dream of what there will be.

A dream, a hope, the soft-palette painted future, the edge of the sunstreaked horizon.

Bucky hummed in the dark, waiting for Steve to come and storm the damn place already. He was gonna, he could feel it in his bones.

Bucky hummed Til Then and propped his chin on his only arm, smiling cause the Commandos would throw a damn party when he got back. It'd be great.

Maybe he’d even convince Steve to get drunk. Last time he'd spent the night in Bucky's lap, clinging to him like a koala bear and it had probably been the cutest thing he’d ever seen. He could just picture the serum version of Steve doing the same, tripping to land his huge body drunkenly in Bucky's lap.

The Commandos would howl with laughter and Bucky would smile, pinch a red cheek as Steve pouted, curled down to wrap himself around Bucky's shoulders. The boy'd break into aw's and Bucky would roll his eyes but rub his hands down Steve's back, call him a dame and tell him he still can't hold his liquor, his Irish roots would be ashamed of him.

Bucky was never ashamed of Steve, though. Steve was a goddamn angel. He was Bucky's goddamn angel.

When Steve finally came for him, when he pulled open that door and gathered Bucky into his arms from this hellish Hydra hole, Bucky was going to tell him he loved him.

It'd be the first thing he'd say.

Til then, we'll call on each memory.

The back of Bucky's hand brushed up against Steve's. He pressed back automatically, rush of warmth sparking up through chilled skin, muscles flickering as Bucky's fingers curled. If they were to overlap their hands, they'd be weaving their fingers together.

Neither of them moved.

Til then, when I will hold you again. Please wait, til then.

"I walked through hell for you," he started, eyes shining down, a hundred stories of army fields and bloody battles. Peggy'd told him, on that day, something Steve'd said when he found out Bucky was a prisoner of war. I'll walk there if I have to.

Steve'd walked through hell for him and maybe Peggy was right, maybe that was all that counted in the end.

Artist fingers found his, taking both Bucky's hands and entwining them onto the sheets. How many times had they entwined fingers? How many times?

"...It'd be an honor to burn hand in hand."

Bucky blinked up at him and Steve lowered his arms in a pushup to kiss him one more time. Bucky closed his eyes and his lips slid against Steve's, then oxygen filtered through parted wet lips and the air without Steve was cold as it'd been that day, wind and snow.

Hand in hand.

Until I hold you again.

Steve spread his red-smeared fingers over the back of that canvas, energy tingling in all that empty space between them, where letters were poking through.

End, line.

Just empty space between his fingers now. Empty space where metal slipped, where the same warm hand from the forties curled against white pillows, digging deep into his skin as Buck’s head tipped back, lips parted around the soft breath of ecstasy.

Empty.
There are oceans we must cross, and mountains that we must climb.

Waves crashing over toy soldiers, standing chest to chest, arms around each other and ocean lapping at their waists. Steve pinned Bucky's hair back with two palms, saving him from the salty wind, hands not shaking anymore.

"You alright?" Bucky puckered his lips to kiss Steve's cheek gently. The ocean reflected, then eyelids closed and another deep, controlled breath.

"Thanks to you," Steve murmured, lifting his arms to rest on Bucky's shoulders, caging their faces in close and personal. A soft press of lips, a breathy sound, and they were both pressing in deeper, tilting heads.

Water and chunks of ice flooded into his throat and Steve choked on reflex, lungs seizing heart pounding throat convulsing. Burned worse than fire, than the cold tingling fingers hands feet. Lungs filled as eyes spilled over with tears of pain the cold water sucked away. No one to see you cry in the ocean--

Gentle rocking, rustling wind, breaking waves.

Staring up at the treacherous sky
 maybe I am worth the fight
 tears gathering in his throat instead of his eyes.

Oceans they should've crossed. Oceans they should've ran, jumped, flew free, gotten away. Into the dark.

If you’ll be my boat, I’ll be your sea.
I live to make you free.

He’d been torn and didn’t listen to the right voice.

Part of him wanted to pack up with Buck and leave this place, never come back in their lives. Forget the bloody fists, forget everything but some beautiful green hillside in Ireland and waking up next to Bucky's sweet face.

Part of him couldn't imagine hanging up the suit, ever. What the fuck would he do? What good were these hands if they weren't killing to save a life, what good were these legs if they weren't standing between his country and chaos?

He should've gone.

Should’ve followed Buck right into the dark.

I know every--

"--gain must have a loss," they sang and Steve's eyes cut to Bucky, the peaceful expression as wind battered loose strands on his forehead. He'd never considered himself all that lucky, but he had so much when he had Bucky.

Steve couldn't lose him, couldn't imagine what it'd be like to live with that. To live without Bucky. Steve’d go headfirst into this war, give it his all, just so long as it didn’t take him.

"So pray that our loss... is nothing but time."
A long, long time. Seventy years. Longer, on both ends, all that useless fighting, waiting, pining.

I-It’s been...so long. So long.

The only villain in our story was time.

Til then, let’s dream of what there will be.

It could’ve been...they could’ve had anything. In some other universe; not the one they kissed and the stars didn’t come down. Steve couldn’t imagine a universe like that.

And he didn’t wanna try imagining the one where he lit the world on fire for Bucky to lose him to the flames.

But maybe that’s exactly what Steve’d done. He’d always thought the best yet to come, but maybe they’d been doomed the moment the moon stitched his heart into the bloody hands of the burning sun.

He’d just never could’ve imagined this as their future.

Never could’ve imagined.

Til then, we’ll call on each memory.

Only, Bucky couldn’t.

Not when he didn’t have them. And he’d lost them now, how many times? To the open arms of the sea.

Wait for me, wait for me,

Disappearing into the dark over and over and the punches to Steve’s gut hurt less from metal than that.

Always thought Bucky didn't love him enough to remember him. Now he knew, Bucky loved him too much.

Couldn't decide which ripped his heart deeper.

Til then, when I will hold you again.

When he held Bucky again. Would he ever hold Bucky again?

How long, how many more years until the spaces between his fingers filled, until he breathed in real oxygen, until familiar muscles wrapped around his spine and Steve pulled that precious boy into his arms again?

Maybe...he’d never get to touch Bucky again. Maybe everything he dreamed was something he’d never have. Floating away on some starry sky, lost fire smoke drifting to some beautiful new place.

"Please wait," The backs of their hands pressing closer, Steve's thumb running over the side of Bucky's.

The harsh, cold wind whipping around them as their heads turned, eyes met. The last streak of pink in the sky slipping to black. Stars twinkling through, a beautiful icy blue silver moon the color of Bucky's eyes washing light all over them. Something deep in those eyes Steve’d never had permission to see before, didn't have the slightest clue to what it was.

I love you.

"Till then." The last notes slipped away in the wind, a whisper in a lover's ear. Steve leaned over, soft smile on his face as he knocked his shoulder into Buck's.

Bucky rocked, rocked, and disappeared into the wind, smothered flames in cold dissipating phoenix ashes, scattering on the wing of the last, fading words.

The turntable should scratch, needle readjust, pick up and start new only this generation didn't do that, didn't wait, didn’t stop.

He didn't register the next song playing, wasn't hearing much of anything right now. Wasn't seeing anything but the ashes settling in his palm, blowing away free.

Bucky’d never be free like that. Bucky’d never get to die and scatter on the breeze, lower a cold body in a frozen box one more time, no glass window to press, nothing but dark mahogany to stare up at Steve from the bottom of that open grave.

Arlington National Cemetery didn't fill in graves until after nightfall. No handful of dirt thrown on top, no soil to be seen, all cleared away before the ceremony.

And all those military funerals left the distraught spouse next to the grave for one last conversation before they left.

Before he left Bucky behind, one more time. Six feet under.

Steve’s knees were shaky, legs straining to lower him carefully to the perfect grass. It was chilly, damp against his uniform. The other soldiers had marched out, already dispatched and it was just him and Buck now, isolated to the back of the bar, the two of them surrounded by a thousand white stones and a burial flag folded in its careful triangle.

How was Steve supposed to say goodbye?

Deep anguish had his throat by its clawed hands, ripped out medicated heart and the serum couldn’t save him now.

Two fingers running over the cold blades, green slipping between his fingers like those days in Central Park. All those days in Central Park.

A shuddering gasp and he finally broke, “Buck.”

Bucky Barnes, his right hand sniper, his eternal best friend, the Sergeant he trusted with his life and the Winter Soldier who’d frozen by his side into the next century, the shadow under his feet, the stars in his eyes, and the love of his life.

Bucky'd said he couldn't believe in love when he'd been so in love it’d ruined him.

They’d had it. They’d had it all. It was so brief, so short, in all the years they’d been alive there’d only been months, a few in Brooklyn, a few in the war, a few with everything they’d ever dreamed in this century.

There’d been fewer nights in peace than there’d been years in pieces.

For so long, they’d been kept apart for so long and for what?
Too scared to face the overwhelming, crashing waves of it?

Too blinded by each other, too much light shed on shadows that’d been building darker since the beginning of days?

Too broken from the past?

Or maybe…they just weren’t destined to be together, not in this life. Maybe not even in the next.

“B-bound to be together,” Steve whispered to the grave, fingers reaching for smooth wood too far down beneath his feet. So far away, never touch that beautiful skin again.

There wasn’t even a quote on the headstone to run fingertips over, embed in his skin. Just that simple white stone: Buck’s rank division World War II day he was born and day he died, but that day couldn’t be right, he’d died so many fucking times.

It wasn’t enough, didn’t say enough for everything he’d done and sacrificed, single white arch for a red-star soldier. If he’d died back in the 40s when he really was just a war hero, if Steve’d attended that funeral, where’d they bury him?

Maybe in Brooklyn. Next to Sarah and his dad. All Steve’s family in one place.

That’d be his new drawing spot, spine curled up against Buck’s headstone, flowers for Sarah two graves over, oak tree casting shadows over his drawing pad as he sketched one more crooked soldier hat over shining crystal eyes.

Run graphite-stained fingertips over the etched words in old Brooklyn stone. That tavern song, spelled out like one’a those poems Bucky’d always accused him’a writing.

Oh! dig my grave both wide and deep
Put tombstones at my head and feet
And on my breast carve a turtle dove
To signify I died of love

That first night in the tavern, Peggy’s shining dime eyes, red dress, that’s what the boys’d been playing. The song in the background on piano with lifted drunken voices and how’d he never thought about that before?

He left me for a damsel dark
Each Friday night they used to spark
And now my love, once true to me
Takes that dark damsel on his knee

Why that song, that moment, the only moment he’d ever been with them both? Bucky’s sarcasm she’d dodged so easy and Steve’d never thought about it, why Buck’d glared at her so, in that tavern so long ago.

What if that’d been the night he’d first thought Steve was leaving him? My love, once true to me--

Fare thee well, for I must leave
Do not let the parting grieve
Remember that the best of friends must part Adieu adieu kind friends adieu

Best of friends weren’t supposed to part. Bucky’d promised. He’d never leave Steve. He promised, he promised.

I can no longer stay with you
I'll hang my harp on a weeping willow tree
And may the world go well with thee

That'd been what all the other soldiers sang that night and he couldn't, he couldn't say adieu. Not then, not the first night he'd had his best friend back. But...what if Buck had?

Was that the night he realized he was in love with Steve? He'd said once, that Peggy'd known before he did. And if all, I loved him first, all of it was about Peggy, it must've been that night. Farewell, do not let the parting grieve, and remember the best of friends must let go.

He'd never told Steve that. And now, he never would.

Pieces of stone crumbling under the edges of red-stained fingertips and Steve could crumple against this headstone or the white one in Arlington but nothing he did was gonna bring Buck back.

To signify I died of love.

He loved Steve, burned so bright and fast and hard, and Steve'd wondered if he did, if he loved him and lord.

He had. He had. He still did.

He'd spent his entire life fighting for a hundred different causes, wars, battles. But the one that mattered the most, it'd been about nothing at all. Bucky loved him. He loved Bucky. They'd always both known, even if they couldn't admit it to themselves.

Well. Now Bucky'd admitted it and Steve'd finally heard him. Here, at the grave, heard him one day too late.

The Commandos weren't here to pour bourbon on his grave. He sure as hell doubted the Avengers were going to.

No home to come back to.

Steve's turn to admit. This entire time, every battle war wound scream punch struggle to keep afloat...had been for nothing.

They'd fought for nothing. And somehow somewhere, they lost the line.

Gravestones, gravel, grass disappeared. Dark, empty bedroom, iPod singing soft in the distance, burial flag turned bloody canvas. He'd never get the honor, closure of going to Bucky's funeral. Buck wouldn't let him go that easy.

A long time ago he'd stormed a base in Azzano alone, absolutely sure Buck was alive. And now, he could still feel that, Bucky's breathing soul tethered however far. Just couldn't feel his own anymore.

If Bucky died, honestly died, then maybe, eventually, he could move on. He'd mourn cry haunt his grave and miss him every day, but. He could recover, maybe, from losing the soldier he loved. He'd spent half his life preparing for it, a couple months nearly believing it. Bucky'd been gone, but Steve still had him, still had his ghost and his memory.

But Bucky wasn't dead. And if he hadn't offed himself when he'd taken Peggy's life, he wasn't gonna. So Bucky was alive, and loved Steve, and chose not to be here.

He couldn’t ever move on.

Still givin’ him hell, all these years later.

Fine. Steve Rogers was a soldier, and he was fighting til the end. Live and die for the Art of War and he would never fall. Neither would Bucky Barnes, ever again.

We’ve waited so damn long, we’re sick and tired.

Inhale.

Steve scooped up the painting carefully, turning it to carry secure against his chest as he pattered outta the bedroom, past the kitchen the bathroom into the living room, absentmindedly pulling the couch cushions to the floor, kicking them together with the side of his foot and sinking down to prop on both.

We are the beginning of the end.

You’d think, after the number of times he’d looked at this damn thing he’d’ve memorized it by now. But no, always found new things everytime he studied it. But right now, he wasn’t being an artist or a critic, ran fingers over the light spilling in bright blue windows to see the world, for one moment, the way Bucky did.

‘Cause see, Steve was gonna find him.

I won't leave any doubt or stone unturned.

He wasn’t gonna go out and search the planet, that’d get him caught and found embarrassingly fast. You can’t run away and chase at the same time, he’d learned that much by now.

Didn’t wanna know what’d happen if the Avengers ever found him. Didn’t wanna know if they were even looking. If they knew what was good for them, they’d let him go. Once his fists were raised, that was the finish line. Should’ve learned that much by now too.

Baby tonight I'll be...the liberty.

Night closed in, darkness slowly settling over his bones, growing shadows across all those sharp colors and he sat there on the couch cushions and thought.

If he was gonna find Bucky, he’d have to before he started running. Didn’t have long before Buck could be anywhere. But he’d been here and that meant he wasn’t far. Just had to figure out where.

Problem was, Brooklyn was the center of their lives for most of their lives and he could be...so many places. So many memories to sift through and it had to be the right one.

This was his last chance. He had to stop, think, form a battleplan and do this right. No more youth running into alleys with fists raised, no more swinging round corners with nothing but a shield. Settle down, ’cause he had something to prove this time. And he was damn well proving it.

Show me your love your love

Canvas slowly rotated, lingering moonlight cutting cold silver through windows, glass doors to the fire escape.
Steve sat on the couch cushions on the floor and ran his fingers over the words on the back of the painting until the paint was long past dry.

Bucky’d written I love you on the back of a painting that’d already said it in every brushstroke. He’d just never seen it.

Once, Bucky’d screamed at him, you didn't let me down, you let me fall.

"Jesus, Steve, I had to. It was the only way to get you to shut up. You know I didn't--"

"No, Bucky. Don't insult me like that. I know you. And I know you meant it."

Inhale. Quiet. "Not in the way you think."

You didn't let me down, Steve, you let me fall.

He wasn't talking about the train, was he?

Steve watched the sharpie mark on his wrist flex, shape with him as he traced every red letter, over over again.

I love you. To the end of the line.

He'd never heard the words like that, but wasn’t every other time enough? Wasn’t every memory of Bucky’s affectionate smile and whispered confessions in the dark enough?

Wasn’t everything Bucky’d given him enough? Without this, even without this, wasn’t it enough?

Show me your love.

It’d always been enough.

‘Course it had. How stupid had he been, how long did it take to realize, he didn’t need these three words when he’d had a lifetime of hearing them everyday in 9000 ways.

Of course he did. ‘course, he always had.

...before the world catches up.

All he had to do now was catch him.

Cause there's always time for second guesses, I don't wanna know...

Was everything fixed? No. Was there a fucking lot they had to talk about? Hell yes.

But here they were.

’course.

The couch cushions slid as he pushed off, cradling the painting again as he started back across the dark apartment, moving as easy in the shadows as his ghost had.

Nothing was fading, now. Crystal, crystal through all the dark as he didn’t turn on a single light, propped one knee up on the bed, reached over, and calmly hung Buck’s painting back in place.
He’d needed this, he’d needed Bucky’s confession, for so long. He’d been so sure what they had couldn’t possibly be enough.

But that was the thing.

On the best days, Bucky made him feel like he was worth the air in his lungs. On the worst days, he was the only thing Steve kept breathing for. And maybe he left him behind in the end, but he never once left him alone.

“You didn’t really need me,” Steve whispered to the beautiful dark. “But thank you for letting me need you.”

If you’re gonna be the death of me, that’s how I wanna go.

Eventually, barefeet found their way to the cold metal grates of the fire escape. Breathed in the open air, New York skyline blinking over the water in the distance.

They used to sit out on fire escapes when they were kids. Watching the stars.

Imagining what life’d be like past the black sky, world of their own with no more cold.

No more bloody knuckles.

No more reasons to have them.

We got it all worked out, so little time.

"This doesn't change anything," Bucky told him, softly. He blinked, repeated it in his head, then it kicked in.

"What the hell?" Steve threw his hands up and stared at the sky because of fucking course that was his luck. They were never going to catch a fucking break, were they?

He had to take a few breaths - probably needed them for going so long without oxygen anyways - to calm himself down before he turned back to Bucky, one hand on his hip and the other waving in the air.

"I just kissed you--"

"I noticed," Bucky interjected with a sideways smile.

"--and doesn't that change everything?" Steve continued, ignoring the sassy comment.

Bucky shrugged.

"I mean, I'm definitely not going to hit you if you do it again." The twinkle in his eyes made Steve's chest clench and that wasn't fair, they were trying to have a debate here. “But it's not some magical band-aid to fix me, Steve.”

"I don't want some...magical band-aid." Steve stepped forward, not missing the way Bucky eyed him warily as he took the metal hand with both his own. "I just want you to talk to me. To take comfort in...this."

Kissing Bucky had changed everything.
But those three words...I love you.

They didn’t.

He’d thought they would, Steve’d thought they’d mean everything. Thought it’d make that last piece of the puzzle slip into place, thought he’d finally understand, finally know.

But seeing them written for him, in Bucky’s handwriting...nothing changed. That was the part that shocked him, how...unsurprising they were.

Because...they weren’t some amazing revelation, confession he’d never known. Bucky told him he loved him but see, that’s just it. Steve already knew. Steve’d always known. He’d just been too stubborn to admit it, too insecure to fess up that yeah, after everything, he could. Maybe. Have it all.

So those final red words painted on the white spine of the angel didn’t change anything.

But time? Time had.

Memories that I'd block out if you were mine

Bucky’d forgot him twice, and came back to him both times. That screamed louder than the red bitemarks littered down his own white spine.

It hurt. He loved him so much it hurt and it wasn’t that Buck never said it.

you've got a pocket full of reasons why you're here tonight

It was everything else. Suicide lies pain masks, it was all so much and Bucky’d hid behind those three words like that was the problem, so long as he couldn’t say I love you they didn’t have to face everything else they’d never talked about and now that those three words were slid aside, there was this giant rearing red black dripping, terrifying face of everything they’d never solved.

tonight may be the death of me

And there was…the solution. The simple, easy, obvious solution. It wasn’t gold like the sun and it wasn’t white like the snow, it was red & navyblue like them. Black & blue, like them.

But it was simple. They’d faced war and brainwashing and memory loss and terror and identity crisis and in the end, it was so fucking simple.

Spent his entire life pushing and pushing and fighting, above beyond and impossible, always proving something, reaching one star higher, pushing for one step more.

He just had to. Breathe.

Stop, breathe, and realize. Forget the stars. Forget the stars. Peel away the five point carved into his chest and he was just flesh, blood and bone. Warm skin, feet on the ground. He’d been reaching up for so long he’d...forgotten to look down.

To realize he already had everything he needed. Spent a lifetime carrying the world on his shoulders while he stood on Bucky's and Buck pushed him higher, held him up on mountains and. It was time he hopped down. Everyone he knew had wings, but.

Not them.

Two people, flesh and blood human. Two boys from Brooklyn who spent so long staring at the stars they missed the most beautiful light of all, standing there beside them.

Maybe he really did have nothing to prove. Not to Buck, not anymore.

All he’d ever had to do, all along, was ask Bucky to stay.

Show me your love, your love, before the world catches up

Maybe Bucky wasn’t a hero. And maybe Steve wasn’t his tragedy. But they were almost bloody and battered enough to taste freedom on each other’s lips.

And god, what Steve would give to have Bucky here with him one more time.

If you're gonna be the death of me, that's how I wanna go.

Today was the day he finally figured it out. Soldiers fight so they can come home to their loved ones.

The war was over.

There was only one place left to go.

It’d only taken him, y’know, the better part of two lives to figure out how fucking simple it all was. Talk, don’t leave, fight to stay, don’t fight to take. You don’t get to have all of him. But you get to be there, beside him, if you play it right. You get to have his arms around you and his smile at midnight and his bitchy groans when you wake him up at dawn.

God, that was so much more than enough.

So here, today, marks the day that Steve Rogers finally got his shit together and realized y’know what, the only place he’d ever called home had never been far at all.

Only took him 71 years. Today was what, Februrary...17th. Three days after Valentine’s Day. Eleven days before the day Buck fell from the train in 45.

...which also meant it was the anniversary of the day they went dancing.

Which could arguably be a great day for an anniversary in general but no, he and Bucky’d had that conversation once.

They’d been sitting on Stark’s barstools, on that floor with the landing platform, big arching crystal windows, two glasses of Sam’s stolen orange juice sitting on the bar while they bitched at each other and argued.

“No! No, you don’t getta pick some random day!”

“Buck--”

“It’s at least gotta be somewhat romantic, Stevie. Anniversaries last forever--”

“Buck!”

“--and I for one, refuse to have some anniversary in the middle of April with no significance whatsoever--”

“Buck, Bucky, Bucky. There’s no way we’re gonna be able to chose one day. There’s the day we met, the day we became friends--”
“Arguably the same day.”

“Ehh, debatable, I’d say it was a week later—”

“Do you even know that date?”

“Of course I do! But does it count as an anniversary?”

“It could be the day we finally went on our first date.”

“The hell was our first date? Soup at my mom’s house? Coney Island? The WWII museum?”

“Okay, okay, fine. What about the date you finally got over your stubborn ass and kissed me?”

“Bucky, I will push you off that barstool.”

“I’ll push you right back and Stark will walk in and rip into us about wrestling on the communal floor again, how bout that, Rogers?”

“Wait, what about the day I asked you to go steady with me?”

“Way too much bad shit went down that day too. Ooo, we should do the date you saved me from the dead.”

That lilting tease in Bucky’s voice and Steve couldn’t help but smile coyly, lean over to invade Bucky’s warm personal space and catch those bright eyes before dragging his gaze purposefully down to Bucky’s mouth. “Which time?”

Metal fingers curled quick in blonde hair and Steve was laughing before their lips smushed the sound, smiling into Bucky’s mouth as they tipped between barstools and soft pink was not-so-soft in its point-proving.

Their lips dragged on the pull away and Steve could feel it in his gut, heart stuttering in his chest as his breath caught on the edge of Bucky’s mouth, little pop as they separated slow, lips stuck a second long.

Bucky took a moment to recalibrate, dark eyelashes fanning as he finally opened silver-green-blue and blinked slow at him, noses brushing from how close they were, voice dropping low and velvety between them, “Or maybe the date you first rocked my world…”

“I’ve been rocking your world for years,” Steve teased, outta breath and too smiley to have any kick but it sure lit off something in those comet fire eyes.

Bucky surged against him, kissing him so hard and fast Steve couldn’t even gasp, tight all over until he sunk into the rough fingers holding him close and melted, giving in to the crashing wave of arousal, shuddering in Bucky’s hands as he closed his fists in the soft plain black tshirt he really really wanted off now.

“I’m k-kinda likin’ the anniversary,” Bucky gasped, Steve’s eyes still closed as the breathy words washed over the damp traces Buck’d left on his mouth, please fuck, let Bucky kiss him again, “...for the first time we banged.”

Mmm, fuck. Steve groaned low and tipped his head slowly, mouthing his way up Bucky’s jaw, eyes still cemented shut, just breathing in that warmth, memorizing all these lines and angles with a dragging lip, sucking up all the whining sounds outta that pretty throat.
“Or maybe it should be today,” voice an octave lower as Steve mouthed Bucky’s neck and curled his fingers tighter at the little shiver running down that pretty spine, “...’cause I'm about to give you the most mind-blowing experience you’ve ever had.”

A shot of cold between them as Bucky tipped his head back in a bright laugh, Steve’s eyes popping open, just as bright as he took in that bursting smile, the flush high on that pretty face as he tangled their fingers together and dragged Bucky off the barstool.

And then they were laughing, and gasping, so turned on and happy as the world spun perfect, running for the elevator with their hands entwined and their mouths catching again the moment they could breathe, Bucky’s laughter echoing behind them as twin metal doors slid shut.

It’d been seven, eight, nine months since they’d been that happy.

They might...never be that happy again.

If Bucky kept running.

If Steve couldn’t find him.

If either one of them got caught, got dragged off to some Stark care facility, he might never get to see his best friend laugh again--

The hollow pit in his stomach could knock him flat, gasp rattling empty chest raggedy lungs, blood-stained palm over bloody lips as his fingers curled, digging into his jaw like that might ground him, like pain might possibly still ground him.

All he knew was pain, only it was internal and he didn't know how to stitch that kind himself.

The Stars still danced behind his eyelids when he closed them shut this tight, soft breeze chilling the corners as water-tight started to crack.

All those walls were starting to crack.

Head spinning like Coney Island Cyclone with no anchor point, no warm hand on his spine, no laughter and giggling sincere apologies as he hurled out his insides in the grass this time.

Brooklyn, Brooklyn, take me in.

Crumble crumble and look at him, this broken young soldier who'd seen too much, been through too much, fought so hard with so many masks that he couldn't just peel off like the Winter Soldier did, he didn't get to do that, didn't get to do anything but break inside and try not to bleed all over everyone he knew--

But he bled all over ‘em anyways.

Time he stitched up those old war wounds. Stopped dragging families down with him.

’Cause here we are
We are shining stars
We are invincible
We are who we are

Shaking hands ran leather-red tips over the mark on his wrist. Traced, all the way round, black solid all the way to that dash, the three dots. Thud of a solid steady pulse under the thumb pressed to those dots, invincible, and everything was still gold.

Golden flames for golden days, two stupid boys in war, best friends sharing a secret language, private eyebrow raise, smile across the distance between them and Bucky shook his head with that exasperated affection and Steve had the world.

Standing on the edge of a burning cliff and they weren’t so far now, fingers laced, the only arm Buck had. A deep breath, twin blues caught on each other as they looked, one more time, before one more something stupid.

“Meet you at the bottom,” Bucky whispered and Steve squeezed, glancing down to the fingers between his, last bit of fuel he needed. And there was that damn sharpie’d line, drawn round both their wrists. The promise, the only one they’d end up keeping, wasn’t it?

Locked wrists.

Leather-locked wrists and what would it be, if Bucky left him for good, if he let go off the cliff this time.

What was the worst place he could go and still leave Steve with these hollowed out rib bones?

If Steve was too late. Maybe Steve was already too late.

Where would that tortured hero go? Would he lose it, one more time, the only piece of Steve he could bring himself to erase? Would he kiss those memories goodbye one final time?

Come ’round with no line drawn round his wrist, who’d be there to trigger it all back next time?

Buck had chosen - twice - to destroy himself to get rid of Steve. What if that's what he chose now?

What if for him, the only way out was erasing, pink flecks dotting a smudged white paper that'd been so complex and beautiful only moments before. What if that's why Bucky left him behind in this apartment in the dark with couch cushions on the floor and his sentence painted red as their shared veins? To erase himself, one more time?

Where was he now, some rickety chair in an abandoned warehouse, devil machines blinking barrier as he held his breath and held back tears and stared up at the sky and tried to picture stars.

A sharp gasp and Steve’s hand shot over his mouth, eyes squeezing shut to the image of stars dancing on some dirty ceiling as the body he used to dance with carved itself out into nothing but a shell.

Maybe he’d get rid of it all this time. Wipe everything, no name, no life, no schoolbooks clutched in strong arms. Just blank. Nothing.

The way Hydra always told him he was. Nothing.

We've only ever been reunited in death. We've only ever been together in death.

Asthma attacks and pneumonia to torture tables to war to bullets in the leg. Fury's death Hydra’s death Steve's death. The Winter Soldier only came back on the verge of death or covered in it.

That's all they’d ever been. So I’ll meet you there one more time, my love.
In a chair seven blocks away, Steve could feel him, could feel the invisible gravity as the sleeping sun shone echo on the moon and was he screaming, Screaming when no one could hear him.

Just like on those tables he’d been left to rot. During those nightmares he’d woken soaked in sweat and alone. Just like when Steve left him.

Screaming for Steve and Steve couldn’t hear him, couldn’t do anything but feel that goddamn fucking ache in his soul and what that beautiful mind had to be thinking, as the machine closed round his split, throbbing head.

This is it. My last breath.

Surrender...

No. No, he wouldn’t, not Buck. He’d go in there thinking he could but he’d remember, the very last moment, that final inhale, he’d remember that flash of shining light, the one in his own chest, and he wouldn’t leave him, he wouldn’t.

He’d promised Steve they’d have each other ‘til death.

Bucky couldn’t go through with this. Steve was his entire world, he’d take all the pain of everything for every day of his life, 70 years of condensed horror and the two wildfire burning since, take the worst of anything he’d ever felt, he’d take that on the 1% chance he got to see Steve’s beautiful smile one more time--

He couldn’t do this.

The metal arm flashing, angry whirr as he struck out, aiming for the closest scientist only no one was there, it was just Bucky this time.

Bucky, struggling to get out only the machine wouldn’t let him, they had him now and he was screaming, screaming into loneliness as the quiet buzz powered up, electricity crackling and it was gonna take him, Steve was running so goddamn fast to catch up, to stop it, Bucky was there and Steve was gonna get to him in time, stared at the door and imagined Steve coming for him, barreling to his rescue, sweeping in here with that shield and the Commandos flanking him, barking orders and rushing to Bucky’s side, so young and water-run and beautiful--

Flash. Flash, black, and the dream was gone, something was gone he’d just been thinking of something, remembering something he didn’t know what, just that he was missing it, that there was a void now and no, no, they didn’t get to take Steve from him, not like this.

Steve. Steve, no, he’d never know, Steve no no no no,

Bucky thrashed and the lightning shot straight to his brain.

Hands curling burnt and charred around electric fence wire and then nothing, blank, fishing for something and he could remember the smell, the burning flesh but when, what’d happened, more black--

The outline of Steve’s shoulders, spine in the dark, shadowed in the middle of the night, rose softly, slowly, settled back down again, quiet quiet breaths and Bucky was holding his, watching, barely able to believe Steve could trust him like this, lay in his bed like this and fall asleep without a lick of clothing to cover that beautiful body, sheets tangled haphazardly around his legs and not covering a damn thing, long smooth curvy lines down that mesmerizing spine he was too terrified to reach out and tou--

Ripped away, empty, black but hadn’t there just been shapes, there’d just been something, flash,

He was losing it. Losing it all and Bucky was screaming screaming couldn’t stop screaming and Steve had to be just outside the door, could swear those were bootfalls coming to save him one more time, please god be Steve, Steve, and he didn’t realize the screams were sliced into words until the echo came back to him, love you I love you I love you I love you I love you-- and they're all disappearing, every drop of sunshine and light and punched shoulder and sidesmile, draining the lifefluid right outta him down to the last memory he ever got, the last memory he always had.

Just Steve, small and sweet and feisty again, curled at the dinner table in their first apartment; pencil in hand as he scratched over faded paper. The sunlight was filtering through the windows, playing solar systems in the soft blond hair that kept falling over his forehead. One peaceful hand lifted, subconsciously brushing the bangs off glowing skin just for them to fall back down again, not a single noise to echo against thin walls but the simple scritch scratch of that pencil over paper, gray turning white into an entire world.

Bucky’s entire world.

The last flash of lightning came and he closed his eyes, soaked in the sunshine for just one more moment, just ten more seconds, please.

He wasn’t done here, didn’t wanna go--

It crackled and Bucky couldn’t risk it, they always pulled him out so soon he never got to see what Steve was drawing.

(It was him. It was always him.)

All he could do left was whisper into the darkness before it took him, forever, and maybe Steve’d at least get the chance to hear these, as he busted down that door ‘cause Bucky still knew, still knew he was coming.

And so he whispered.

“I’m not leavin’ you, pal. To the end of the--”

Then it was blank.

It shook him, the smell of New York’s rough streets, salt off the docks to focus on, fists curled so tight ‘round the fire escape ledge there were imprints of his hands and every breath could be his last.

The sound of metal creaking, the whisper breeze dancing through the light streaks in his hair.

Steve would be just as empty as that shell. Left to walk, talk, physical puppet they’d strung up on stage and nailed to the walls of museums.
Stripped of everything inside, stuffed to the brim with nothing at all as the memories left him, the only thing he had left left him. Even when he had nothing.

Buck’d left him, like that, twice now. It’d be a fucking miracle if Buck chose the end of a bullet instead of that damn machine. At least then he wouldn’t be taunted everyday of his life by the living ghost of the man he’d loved to the fucking ends of the earth and back.

I walked through hell for you. It’d be an honor to burn hand in hand.

It’d be his fucking honor to burn hand in hand.

Steve didn’t wanna start crying again, he didn’t, but there were already tears on his cheeks and at least none of it was real, just exulansis.

Every word in his story, every word he’d imagined and drew and felt inside, every word they’d spoken and screamed and never said, exulansis for it all and honestly, maybe Arlington was as real as that Fourth of July in Brooklyn that Steve’d wondered what it’d be like if Bucky kissed him.

But it didn’t matter, right?

Because Buck’d left that poem behind, in the hospital. The one he’d read, by Steve’s bedside, hadn’t heard but he knew. If there was anything he knew, it was the fucking mouth on that punk.

One universe has us right, of all the millions stacked on millions. So it's not this one. I can live with that.

But Steve couldn't live with that.

Had Bucky read that to him with a straight face? Without crying?

It was alright, though. He hadn't been alive for a long time anyways.

More poems, found the other one in the gun drawer. Only Buck wrote that one, which was worse, but his handwriting was off and the only goddamn time he could’ve been writing poetry was over these past months that’d he’d left, that he wasn’t Bucky at all but the damn Sonnet 14 was still about them.

Steve didn’t read that with a straight face. Or without crying.

He’d spent years, without crying.

Look at him now. Goddamn Bucky Barnes, look at him now.

There had to be some switch inside, something crossed in his wiring, wrong, but he didn’t know how to live when Buck just left him behind like this.

Or maybe Bucky was right, maybe neither of them’d ever been alive. They loved, but they weren't living creatures.

A love without life. A love entangled with the opposite of life. What was it that Buck always said?

Death, love entangled. Love stories were war stories, right?

Who was the weak one now?

He didn’t have the strength to get up. To pick himself off the metal rungs of the fire escape floor hanging over the city, over that beautiful river as the dark blue sky shone lighter, the color of Buck’s winter peacoat now, not the black it’d been for hours, years.

But Steve didn’t have the strength to get up. Not even with the serum running through his veins, couldn’t do it, he couldn’t lift the bones that dragged on dirty cobblestone in back alleys. Where’s the sniper to come round the corner, pick him outta the dirt? He couldn’t keep doin’ it on his own.

"A weak man knows the value of strength. and compassion."

Compassion.

He’d been chosen, for Project Rebirth, because he was a good man. Because he knew compassion. Passion, fingertips on burnt fingertips.

And on the outside, he was weak no more. But Steve still knew the value of strength. Still, beneath all that, all the red white’n’blue bullshit and the fighting and the Captains and the shield and the running, knew compassion.

And compassion wasn’t to hate Bucky for a single goddamn thing he’d done. Steve didn’t know, had never been through that, but if it’d happened to him? Who’s to say he wouldn’t’ve turned out worse?

Compassion was forgiveness. More than forgiveness. The strength to take them both forward, to carry Bucky when he couldn’t fight any longer.

A weak man knew the value of strength.

You carry me.

And oddly enough, through all this, through everything Bucky’d done, everything he’d done, the world on fire as they rose one more time from ashes and flames?

Steve was a weak man again. And in his heart, where he was weak, he knew exactly what he had to do.

He knew Bucky Barnes, I know what you’re gonna say, Buck. And that’s all that mattered.

That’s all that mattered.

He knew exactly where Bucky was.

~~~*~

James B. Barnes.
32557038 T42 43 A

Steve ran his thumb over the embedded letters, the name hanging ‘round his neck, dangling, clanking against the engagement ring. Barnes always had complained about Steve stealing his stuff. He should probably give these back then, shouldn’t he?

Two solid hands, planted on metal, and Steve Rogers pushed himself to his feet, one more time. Made himself stand, one more time. All he had to do was get up. And, y’know, sometimes storm enemy bases on his own just to get his best friend back, but.

All he had to do was get up, and stand. Stand by his side.

What do you plan to do, walk to Austria?

If that’s what it takes.

One foot in front of the other and Steve started down the rickety metal stairs. I always fall from your window to the pitch black streets, careful – see, careful, you’re welcome asshole - jump down and the soles of his running shoes were on solid ground, pitch black Brooklyn streets, for maybe the last time.

And Steve started home.

Bucky was alive. Bucky’d been alive, all this time. All this time. All. This. Time.

The team should be coming with him, it was the final battle after all. But the Avengers were gonna think he was crazy, for the rest of his life. He could show ‘em the damn painting, they wouldn’t believe him. Because Steve knew Bucky was alive and they’d never get that. They’d throw him in some padded room, get him help. But he couldn’t be Captain America, not for them. Their team captain was gone. It’d crushed him, it’d all crushed him and none of them would believe that. Not Nat, not Tony, not Clint, not Sam.

No one’d ever believed him about Bucky being alive, but this was different. This time, he couldn’t let the plane crash. It’d happened too many times, this feeling of Bucky being alive, to ever stop believing in it now.

Jane’s carousel was sitting dismal and dark, no lights to glitter off the water, spinning and flashing gold for the briefest memory and then it was cold and empty again, a hollow piece of what used to be Brooklyn. They used to be Brooklyn.

Steve shook his head and tipped his head back at the open, glittering New York sky. Goodbye, New York, Bucky’d made him the mad one again.

If you’re gonna be the death of me, that’s how I wanna go.

Just one more inhale. Brooklyn air, one more time, and Steve took the first step on the stairs older than he was. The stairs that hadn’t changed a bit.

He could swear the cobwebs were already forming, this darkness falling behind him but he wouldn’t be the fool this time, he wasn’t turning around. Wasn’t looking back.

Wasn’t much a home without those cobblestone streets and smiles round the corner.

This wasn’t the home he got to keep. This wasn’t where he got to stay. But that was alright, he’d leave it all.

On this bridge, one. last. time.

And off, in the distance, over all the sloping lines and beautiful arching brick, the water underneath was glittering and the horizon, on the horizon, the sky was just beginning to glow.

It was sunrise.

Of course, it was sunrise.

The thing about the Brooklyn Bridge was the foot traffic really wasn’t as busy as you’d think, even now. It was a long bridge and taxis were fairly cheap. Not to mention that it was dawn, in February, cold breeze ruffling his hair – if he didn’t have the wicked metabolism and body mass that came with the serum, he’d be freezing his ass off. So, for once, there was no one in sight.

Well, no one but the figure in the distance, that dark silhouette he’d recognize anywhere.

Steve stopped in the middle of the footpath and breathed in.

There he was. Bucky Barnes, propped up on the ledge overlooking East, feet dangling over the edge, over the rippling water below.

They used to sit on the ledge as kids. Not as often as Steve would’ve liked, but Bucky was the more cautious of the two, kept soccer-moming Steve’s chest every three seconds, chewing his lowerlip in worry, so goddamn careful to make sure Steve didn’t fall.

The sky looked like it might snow, any second, the slow soft, peaceful kind. It didn’t, but he could feel it, in the air. That edge, that warning edge as distant clouds threatened low and passive, hovering, only this time not even the heavens were putting them through hell.

Steve took three steps closer, and that’s when he heard it. See, he’d known, in his heart, that it was Bucky sitting there on the ledge. But knowing it and hearing it, for yourself, for real, in that beautiful singing voice Buck’d always had, those was two entirely different things and Steve’s heart stopped in his shaking chest.

He’d recognize that voice anywhere.

He’d recognize that song anywhere.

And what a fucking best friend he had, sitting there with his back to Steve, all quiet and peaceful as he sang to the glow breaking the line where the ocean met sky, and Steve fell in love with him all over again.

“You are my sunshine, my only sunshine. You make me hap-py, when skies are gray.” Soft and beautiful, floating on the wind and Steve’s feet were working again, somehow, silent as Buck’s as he walked slowly, so agonizingly slowly, closer. Closer.

This was the place, this was the sound. You can hear it on the air, feel it in the breeze, it’s comin’ for us both, before we try to leave.

“You’ll never know, dear, how much I love you.”

Oh, but he did.

Oh, but he did.

He shouldn’t have made it this far. This shouldn’t have worked.
But there he was.

Here they were.

Two ordinary people, too stubborn to let the world pull them apart.

On our darkest day, when we’re miles away,

I leave with no regret.

Fall.

The fall.

He was about to drop.

Steve could feel it in his bones.

The same way he’d felt it on that train, couldn’t believe it then, could barely believe it now. They were so close, so close he could run forward and pull that beautiful body into his arms and Steve couldn’t breathe, couldn’t speak, drowning in the gold of that beautiful song,

“Please don’t take...my sunshine...away.”

Sun will come. We will find our way home.

And Bucky fell.

The sun broke the horizon, and Bucky dropped off the side of the bridge.

Steve dove.

The first flash of bright in the distance, the tiniest sliver of light more blinding than the round glow at noon. It almost blinded him. It almost blinded him, and he almost missed. Almost.

Steve dove, and his fingers locked around that falling hand.

The yank almost tugged him right off the edge too but he dug in his heels, fought gravity with every ounce he had, pulled back just enough, timed it just perfectly, this time, and.

Steve caught Bucky.

The first thing that crossed his mind, the suddenly light, summer mind, maybe should’ve been something beautiful and peaceful and romantic but the first thing, the only thing he could goddamn think, hanging on for dear life to that hand, that precious hand, body bent in half over the rail ledge, was: Jesus Christ, Bucky was heavy.

That brilliant head snapped up, fingers curling automatically around Steve’s wrist, crystal eyes wide as the wind rustled through the short dark pomade, little strands curling around the edges of his forehead, the way they had the day Steve’d saved him, the first time.

(It’s me.) Because all they’d had was each other, then. Me, the one for you. Me, when you heard it, it’s me, there was only person that could be and for Bucky, it’d always been Steve. Different body, different country, torture chamber hallucinations and all they’d ever had was each other so all Steve’d had to say was, It’s me.

(Steve.) There’d been such broken relief in those eyes as he’d blinked up from the table, registering with that flash of light that’d scare away shadows down all the rail-lines and dark forest nights, soft, feeble pink mouth offering that prayer, dying breath and the first gasp of air in a century, Steve.

This century, all that terrified confusion bubbling behind mumbled words, clutching hands, dirty blood caking the side of his face, all that was gone.

This century, Bucky looked up at him and it was a Bucky he’d never seen before, and the only one he’d ever known. Innocence, comet fire all gone now, those sharp crystals were just as haunted as the soul that lay behind them - and in the facets, in the wide open sincerity, pure clean, there was nothing but white, silver. All those shadows almost killed his light. But there he was, there Bucky was, still holding on.

Literally, right now.

What a dramatic fucking asshole. The drop wouldn’t kill him. The ice below would be cold, maybe slash open a leg at the worst, but that drop wouldn’t kill him. It was pretty far down, but this was an assassin that’d survived a hell of a lot worse in Russia. So, dramatic asshole. He was just giving Steve one more chance to catch him.

How many sunrises was he prepared to jump off this bridge until Steve finally figured it out and showed up to catch him?

He had no idea, but Steve had a feeling it might be all of them.

Bucky was looking up at him and Steve’s heart was beating so damn fast, chest heaving, breathing so damn fast, looking back down at Bucky, at his best friend on the whole planet, right here, alive, and their hands were locked.

“Hey, Buck.” Steve said, with tender eyes and shaking knees as the river rushed below them.

“Stevie,” Bucky replied happily, lit up fond as hell, pure joy, sweet affection dancing through the shining eyes, mouth curling up on one side before it broke out wide, sincere smile taking over that whole beautiful young face.

The fist around Buck’s tightened a little, fingers curling against that warm, callused skin.

“About time I caught you, huh?” A little outta breath, a little shaky, and Bucky softened, just smiling up at him, all peaceful and sweet, slight twinge of Brooklyn as the pretty lips parted.

“I always knew you would.”

If it was possible, for someone’s heart to simultaneously stop and pound so fast and loud he might pass out all at the same time, Steve’s chest was doing exactly that.

Fuck, he was gonna cry. He was gonna cry and the tears were gonna land on Buck’s stupid face and he’d never live that the fuck down, he had to get his shit together right the fuck now.

And he should probably, y’know, pull Bucky back onto the bridge sometime soon, no point in catching him if he just left him to dangle there.
Steve blew out an unsteady breath through pursed lips, steeling himself before he engaged those ridiculous triceps, moved to hoist Bucky up--

When it suddenly struck him.

“Wait, hold on,” Steve muttered, squeezing Buck’s hand a little tighter with his right, freeing up his left and glancing down as he patted through the brown leather jacket pockets, searching--

“Hold on?” Bucky sounded more incredulous than Steve’d ever heard him and that was saying a goddamn lot.

But he could wait a damn minute-- there, there it was. He dug the Sharpie one-handed outta his pocket, biting the cap off with his teeth, popping the marker part free with this weirdly loud sound.

“What’re y--”

He spit out the cap over Bucky’s head, furrowing eyebrows looking up at him like he was crazy, that look on his face that said Steve Rogers, littering, how dare he? and it took a lot of internal strength right now not to roll his eyes at that sassy expression.

But Bucky thankfully shut up, the moment the tip of the marker brushed the inside of his wrist. He drew the three dots first, center out, the reverse of the way Bucky drew it. Complementary, like two strands of DNA, winding round on that twisted ladder they’d slid down to so so many pitch black waves.

Starting from the beginning, that’s how he drew it. Frankly, Bucky was left-handed now and Steve was still right-handed and of course they saw it as fucking opposites. Either way, he was matching Steve now, line wrapping over that dangling wrist, had to be pretty careful to keep a solid grip on Bucky’s arm while he angled the marker around that clean skin, pulled Buck right through the flames with him.

“It was never death standing in the way of you and me, stupid.” Bucky huffed in indignation and Steve kept right on going, right on tracing that dark line as he talked over that sassy look. “That last breath’s what’s always kept us together.”

Wasn’t looking at Buck, too busy being careful drawing that line straight, but he could guess the expression on his face, the three ways this could possibly go.

That brief dangerous moment as the silence closed in --

The last time, I’m sticking round til the stars fall from the sky, it’d come down to this: They could finally close that gap between their mouths, lean forward and seal the final nail of Bucky's coffin because once he kissed Steve he was never going back, not ever.

Or Steve could start crying. He’d done that before, and it always tore Bucky up. He used to pull Steve into his chest and squeeze him tight, but that might be harder with Steve big now. He may have to figure it out though, because Steve's eyes were wet enough to maybe start watering over.

Or there was option number three.

Silence and a promise laying between them, raw emotions and wounds opened up and exposed in the slowly blooming sunrise, wind whipping between them as Steve held Bucky’s hand tight, alive again. Bucky blinked a few times, looking at Steve as he opened his mouth, words spillin’ out sweet as honey.
“...jeez, Stevie, I didn’t know you were a poet.”

_Bucky grabbed his pillow before he could think, smacking it down over Steve's head. Steve laughed in surprise and fell backwards, flailing to try to catch the pillow before Bucky could hit him with it again. He got a grip on it and flung it across the room, leaving Bucky ammo-less._

_The silence fell again for just a moment, then Steve was looking at him with big doe eyes and Bucky glared, crossing his arms over his chest._

_“Shut up,” Bucky pouted._

_Steve laughed again, tossing his head back as the sound echoed in the tent. Bucky managed to sit and pout for at least ten seconds, then his mouth was cracking a smile at the corner too. How could he not, when Steve was so loud and perfect and beautiful, arms clutched over his stomach as he gasped from laughing too hard, giggles still slipping past the gasps._

_“I hate you,” Bucky tacked on, the smile on his mouth counteracting his declaration so strongly that Steve knew he meant the opposite._

_“I know,” Steve said breathlessly, finally sitting up straight again and meeting Bucky's gaze. The smile on Steve's face kept wavering at the corners like he wanted to smile even wider._

_If Bucky could have any picture of Steve in the world, it'd be of this moment. Of the look on Steve's face right now because it was more beautiful and shiny and happy than Bucky'd ever seen him. And Bucky’d been the cause of it. Somehow, Bucky was the one to make that smile._

_He didn't need a photograph, then. He'd just spend the rest of his life trying to get that same smile outta Steve. That was all he'd ever need._

_The fond exasperation Steve was aiming at him now, that single raised dark eyebrow under the soft blonde halo - which really did look like a halo right now, first glimpses of sunrise lighting him up gold, ‘specially from this perspective, hanging from those solid artist hands with his head tipped back, wind feeling weirdly detached as it ruffled the hair he still wasn’t used to having nice, short, cleaned up -- anyways, that fond exasperation was just about the furthest fucking thing from Steve’s smile in that memory, but Bucky’d never wanted a photograph of that beautiful face more._

_Maybe he’d paint it, or something. And, and, he got to spend the rest of his life getting that same smile outta Steve, and this same fond exasperation. Because what were best friends for if you couldn’t get both?_

_“Really? Really?” Steve was complaining, shaking his head down at Bucky and Bucky was pretty sure he was gonna break his own damn face from smiling this much. “You’re gonna give me that shit when you left a fucking sonnet in the gun drawer?”_

_That’s right. He couldn’t really tease Steve about being a poet anymore when Bucky was, y’know, actually one. However, he was also still Steve’s best pal and there was more in that complaint than a poem._

_“Why were you in the gun drawer? You weren’t gonna…”_

_His heart was pounding too fast in his chest, about to damn explode because he knew it’d been bad, knew he’d wrecked Steve nine ways to Sunday and if he’d crashed a plane into the arctic on purpose without all this shit on top of it, sue him, Bucky couldn’t help but be a little worried.

But Steve didn’t even look up from the careful line he was drawing to circle around the far bone in Bucky’s wrist. “The only bullet I was planning was one in your dumbass head.”

Fuck. Of course. The relief rushed through him in an electric wave, every bit of tensed up muscle relaxing all at once.

It was all a lot, and he was still kinda torn between crying or cheering, so he went for the next best of both, which was fucking teasing Rogers right back.

“The person that you take the bullet for is behind the trig-ger--” Bucky sang, maybe a tad obnoxiously, that last Fall Out Boy tag and that, that made those pretty eyes snap up from his drawing, all on fire as Steve stared him down and threatened, perfectly dead serious,

“I will drop you.”

He couldn’t help it.

Bucky started laughing. Metal arm curling over his stomach, dangling legs kicking as it wracked up through his chest, tipping his head back against the gradual warmth of the sunrise, laughing and laughing because this, Steve had just threatened to drop him, so beautiful and strong and confident and this, this wasn’t gonna terrify either of them ever again.

“Hey, hey! Stop fidgeting.” It took him a couple of seconds to wrangle the laughter into giggles, fucking giggling as he hung here off the side of a bridge and let Steve fucking Rogers draw things on him with Sharpie.

“You messed it up!” Steve whined, right back to the tiny complainy version of himself, a flash of the little Steve he’d fallen in love with hidden right behind the layers of the big Steve he’d fallen in love with again.

Bucky held his breath, lips rolled in amusement as he watched Steve chew the side of his mouth, creased line between his eyebrows as he thought it over, paused, and finally lifted the sharpie again, tracing double spikes, “Fuck it, I’m turning this into a heartbeat.”

“You can’t just improvise!”

“Bucky. That’s all I’ve been doing my entire life.”

That was….devastatingly true.

He tipped his head back in an aggrieved sigh, the same one he gave after all those stupid reckless battleplans, and okay yeah, a heartbeat in the middle of the line on the back of his wrist definitely wasn’t a big deal, if anything it was a little fitting, but still.

“What else am I s’posed to do? The line’s not straight!” Steve defended, all raised fists and fireball and of all things to never change about that punk, it had to be that. And okay, he’d never admit it aloud, but. Buck was...really glad it was that.

“You’re not straight,” he shot back, lame and childish as their comebacks had always been only that one, he really liked using that one.

Mainly for the mixed-emotion glare he got back, the deep respect for pulling a pun that good tumbled in with the annoyance of being pulled one over, only Steve wasn’t so grumbly this time, sighing high and histrionic as he pursed his lips, all woe is me and pure, no-chaser Steve Rogers dramatics.

“Clearly. M’over here professing my undying love off the edge of a bridge,” Bucky’s heart skipped a beat and Steve just kept right on going, the kid he knew, the kid he loved, the rascal of a jerk barreling right on like he hadn’t stolen all the breath outta Bucky’s lungs,

“...to somebody who not only has a dick, but also most definitely is one.”

“I love you,” Bucky told him.

Steve froze, mouth still open over whatever next part of the aggrieved ramble he had planned, eyes still on the sun breaking over the horizon for a moment before something clicked and those beautiful blues snapped down to him.

Bucky exhaled and smiled up at that pretty face. That same smile Steve could decipher just perfectly, the smile that said, c’mon Rogers, you knew all along.

Steve, Steve fucking sniffled. Teared right up like the softie he’d spent all those years pretending he wasn’t and maybe Bucky was being a dick but he couldn’t help it, Steve was being all--

All that and Bucky just. Had to roll his eyes. Affectionately, mind you, but yeah, he fucking rolled his eyes because duh, duh Steve. Which one of them was the stupid one, again?

Well, Steve sure was the nice one because he didn’t chuck the sharpie at Bucky’s head for it, sucked in a deep breath and marked the final dash on the inside of his wrist then tossed it aside like a kind, considerate human being, and Bucky’s head was safe. For now.

He’d’ve thrown it at Steve’s dumb head, personally.

Then that pretty blonde head was shaking, once, like Bucky was just the epitome of a clenched fist and exasperated sound at the sky but hey, something worked, because those hard artist hands were finally - finally - hoisting him up the side of the bridge.

Sharp inhale and blues rolled right back at him, shaky corners of his Captain’s mouth all wobbly and.

Jesus fuck, he wasn’t sure he’d make it back onto that bridge at all, his heart just might about give out in his chest first.

But Steve was pulling him up, over the ledge, feet away from solid ground - well, bridge, that wasn’t exactly solid or ground, but it’d been here longer than both of them so y’know what, good enough for him - and Bucky’d spent way too much time with Steve Rogers in his lifetime because he couldn’t figure out how to shut his damn mouth.

“This poor river,” Bucky murmured, looking down at it sadly as Steve’s hands jumped, searing summer into his biceps, his shoulder, helping him climb over like he’d climbed over that metal bar, not without you. “...it’s got your blood, my tears, a sharpie, my ring--”

Steve had a grip on both his arms, looking down between them to make sure he made it over the edge okay but when Bucky said that that wide gaze snapped right back up and Steve’s hard-angled beautiful-line jaw popped right open.

“You asshole, you dropped your ring off the bridge? How the hell am I supposed to make you a new, one, now?” Strained as he hauled Bucky off the ledge, didn’t even stumble under the extra weight, placed him down heavy and solid, two feet on the bridge, huff of an exhale and Bucky was standing again.

Bucky was on his feet again. Steve’d caught him.

Bucky always knew he would.

It took a couple seconds, deep breath before his fingers uncurled, releasing their grip on Steve’s shoulders, all that brick swimming away as he finally dared to lift his gaze to the one that’d been watching, sketching, memorizing him for decades.

Fuck.

He was so fucking sorry.

He’d take it, any damnation Steve thought he deserved, but those blue eyes were looking at him so sincere, simple, like he was just Bucky Barnes from Brooklyn again. Bathed in gold, sunshine had just barely made its way over the line of the horizon now.

And Steve Rogers -- from Brooklyn -- pulled Bucky close, hand clapping his arm, soldier, brother-in-arms style. Radiating down metal plates with this impossible vibration and Bucky was warm all over, could barely breathe, Steve was so damn close.

Then he was dragging him in, for real, chests colliding hard and after everything, solid palm against Steve’s shoulder, the brutally short, rough, passionate hug he’d spent a lifetime wishing could be something more, this was all he ever wanted.

Bucky tucked his chin over Steve’s shoulder, didn’t dare close his eyes, squeezing as damn tight as he could with only one arm, the way they’d hugged so long ago and somehow, they’d made it back here. Standing there, and they’d made it back here.

One more clap and Bucky was leaning back, holding Steve at arm’s length, giving him the good lookover the kid hadn’t had in a damn decade. No visible bruising, no visible cuts or wounds or marks or anything, and that meant Bucky had his work cut out for him, he’d spend the rest of forever, however long it took, stitchin’ up all those battlewounds on the inside.

One’a which was about to leak over right about now. Stevie’s sweet face was twisted up, just a little, nose scrunched as the corners of his eyes gathered up with water, blue shinier than that spit-slicked shield in the war.

Bucky’d heard what he’d said. He’d always heard Steve, always listened to every damn word outta that radical, crazy mouth, and how’im I spos’d to make you a new ring now told him everything he needed to know.

So it was official, then.

They didn’t have Tony Stark anymore. Which he’d guess extended to the rest of the colorful winged team who’d flown through the clouds over their sparkling city.

The look on Steve’s face said enough. Behind those hands that refused to bleed on anybody else, that same broken, hollow as the moment Sarah Rogers disappeared from their lives.

Their family was gone. Fuck.

Fuck, Steve’d left it all behind for him, how was he supposed--
Stevie looked like he was damn near ready to cry, he’d be followin’ right behind if he thought about it too, about everything they’d fucking lost, but they’d be okay. Eventually, they’d be okay. Bucky’d show him. It was over, but they’d keep going, they’d keep breathing, because that’s what you did when you woke up and all your boys were gone, that’s what you did when the band of misfits you’d joined wanted you dead or locked up.

When all the golden days were gone.

But this, Steve’s hands grounding him to the earth and Bucky’s gaze holding the wild fists at bay, this was all they needed. They’d always miss them, forever, but. This was a hell of a lot happier ending than he’d ever thought he’d get.

The price of freedom was high. It always had been.

Bucky’d fought for a lot of things in his longass lifetime; he’d like to cash in that card now. He’d like to be free.

They would be enough.

“Hey now,” Bucky softened, running a hand up Steve’s shoulder, all those strong muscles under his palms he never thought he’d get to touch again, blue eyes steady on him - don’t you dare look back. keep your eyes on me - as he cupped a palm against his vulnerable, thudding neck. “I do happen to know a pretty good engineer who trained in two of the best Stark labs in both centuries.”

I thought you were dead.

Never again.

It took a few seconds before the wobbly mouth curved into a bit of a smile, just a little one, but Bucky was as in love with that one as he’d ever been, that tiny admission like it’d simply destroy that stubborn heart to smile any wider.

“Both centuries, huh?”

“Yeah,” Bucky said slowly, watching the light grow behind the morning sky, the stars blinking out, one by one. “Dumb kid, fell so hard in love with his best friend it almost tore him apart.”

Fingertips sunk into his sides and Steve was about to cry underneath those desperate, barely-believing tipped up corners and they weren’t gonna have any of that.

“Both centuries…” Bucky echoed, biting the inside of his cheek, nodding to himself. Of course. “...a damn lifetime ago. Figured it out some crazy night in a bar, this badass lady walked in wearing this killer red dress--”

Steve broke into a smile, a real, watery smile and Bucky could fall at his feet, could kiss the soles of those shoes and the shoes of that soul. He’d been right. He’d guessed, y’know, that if Steve came to catch him off the side of a bridge, givin’ him shit the way he had for the first twenty-five years of his punk life, he’d figured. But he’d mentioned Peg, he’d brought up that hell he’d put them all through, that awful thing he’d done, and Steve was looking at him with those kind eyes, the understanding furrow between his pretty eyebrows and Bucky was right. He was forgiven.

He didn’t deserve this. God, he didn’t deserve this, but he’d told Peg once, if anybody deserved to love Steve, it was them. The only ones who ever saw him, so. No, he took that back.

They deserved this. They deserved this.
Spend forever proving it.

“But hey. He always knew, deep down...” Bucky ran his thumb over that fightin’ jaw, for once clean of muddled bruises, red purple blue but that was fine, there was enough red and blue between them now to last a fucking life time. He’d always known, fuck, he’d always known.

“...from the first time he saw that punk kid lower his fists for one. damn. millisecond.” His fingers paused, looking right into Steve’s blue eyes and told him, “…even if it was just to pick up a sketchbook.”

Bucky was always stealing glances of Steve drawing. Calm and almost mindless as he swept pencil over the page, white turning gray with the guidance of careful hands. Bucky liked watching Steve draw almost more than he liked the drawings themselves. It was just the only time he got to see Steve peaceful.

This could count for peaceful, maybe, if Bucky wasn’t making Steve tear up. To be fair, Bucky’d never told him any of that before. And now, Steve was gonna have to spend the rest of his life hearing every little piece, probably a dozen times over, at least, see, what exactly did he think was signing up for?

Bucky remembered it all, every single moment, and jesus fuck nothing in the world could make him forget it again. He’d trace over every time he’d looked across the dark sky, dark room, seen Steve’s beautiful shining face and fallen in love with him, he’d tell Steve about every single fucking one until he got sick of hearing it, until they made a hundred thousand more.

Blessed be the boys time couldn’t capture.

“You think they’re gonna be alright?” Steve whispered, two fists curling in the bottom hem of Bucky’s shirt, back to the very beginning and they were still so young, had the rest of their goddamn lives ahead of them. Just two kids from Brooklyn.

Don’t you know, that the kids aren’t all-

And in the end.

Bucky wrapped both his mismatched arms around Steve’s strong shoulders, folded that soldier into his chest, eyes slipping closed as he tipped his head against Steve’s temple and told him the only fight he knew left.

“I think they’re gonna be just fine, pal.”

I’m yours.

Didn’t mean he stopped being his own, too. Didn’t mean he let go of everything he’d ever known, every reservation he’d ever had, but if he’d never been captured by Hydra he would’ve loved Steve all his life.
And, in the reality of things, he had just released that terrified tight grip and jumped off a bridge to prove to them both, so. In a way, you could say he’d let go. But in a way, he’d just decided to hold on forever too. To carry on. Together, hand in hand.

But fuck, you wanna talk reality, real reality, he was never gonna be able to stop touching Steve fucking Rogers. Fuck, he’d missed this, the summer pressed up against his skin, both palms on Steve’s neck and the world dangling in his fingertips.

I and love and you.

Steve’s fingertips raked down his shoulderblades and Bucky reached up a metal hand, brushed aside that swoop of misplaced bangs that’d fallen from the high side-swoop, all polished and whatnot and when the hell, between now and the hospital, had Steve had time to do his goddamn hair?

It wasn’t fair, that boy was fine as hell and it wasn’t the least bit fair. Bucky had to work a half hour on his hair to get it right sometimes, and that was before it was long.

Which it wasn’t now, wasn’t anymore, but maybe, down the road, he might grow it out again. The short was great, he knew he looked hot as hell, but there was something about having those artist hands tightening in the long dark strands--

Mm, yeah. Yeah, he was pretty sure he was gonna grow it out again. On his terms, this time, and he’d actually - miracle of all miracles - fucking wash it more than twice a century. Or better, he’d get Steve to wash it. One more excuse to get that beautiful body naked and wet--

“What’re you smiling about?” Steve asked him, long fingers scratching in the short hair at the base of his neck. Bucky cocked his head, one side tipping up higher than the other as he studied the patient, curious expression on that face that’d get them into trouble a dozen more times this week alone.

“You,” Bucky answered simply, and Steve’s arms dropped, circling low around his waist, pulling him in close and proper now and Bucky couldn’t help the smiling crinkles next to his eyes, bottom lip snagging between his teeth as those glittering blues filled him up to the goddamn top.

He’d said it. Didn’t matter that Steve hadn’t even needed him to say it aloud, not in that many words, because he already had. So, so many times. To the end of the line, right?

I got nothing, but I love you, and that’s enough. They both knew now.

(...and Steve was pretty sure neither of them were ever gonna forget again.)

You are my sunshine, my only sunshine. You make me happy, when skies are grey. And now you know, dear, how much I love you. Please don’t take, my sunshine, away.

Bucky cupped Steve’s face, looked him over one more time, for good measure. They’d been in a lot of fights, he had to be sure. But there was nothing to clean up this time, they’d both seen the very worst of battles. And they were still here. That was all that goddamn mattered.

Steve’s eyes slipped closed as Bucky went up on his tiptoes, leaned forward.

Tipped that fiery head down and closed crystal eyes of his own, crossing the years between them, the distance that’d separated them too long, leaned forward, delicate, tender, and kissed Steve’s forehead.

The knit between his eyebrows, lingering residual mourn as the metal slipped up to cradle the back of his head and Stevie’s closed eyes softened. His lips pressed to smooth skin, holding tight, and the curled fingers in his skin let go.

Peace. True peace, that smooth, gentle only white blank pages and a pencil could ever bring.

Breathe.

He could give him this. Bucky’d been so sure, for so long, he didn’t have enough to give, but he could give Steve this.

It’d be his honor.

The wind rustled him cold as he pulled away, freezing a streak before he realized the single tear that’d slipped down his cheek. The corner of Steve’s mouth turned up and he reached up one big artist hand, thumb swiping over his skin, and wiped the tear away.

Here they were. Bucky Barnes and Steven Rogers were best friends since childhood. Inseparable on both schoolyard and battlefield.

Time to kiss this battlefield goodbye.

And run into the sunset together. Well, actually, sunrise, as cliché as Bucky spent his life trying to be, just to annoy Rogers, you couldn’t have it all.

Only, maybe, with Steve looking at him like that?

Maybe you really could.

This time when Steve's hands landed Bucky's jaw, there was no mask in the way. Just Bucky's soft skin under his palms and Steve's heart pounding loud enough that Bucky could hear it, could feel it. Beat in time with his.

So I’ll blame it on my optimistic heart.

Steve tightened his hold, short dark strands brushing the curl of his fingers, his stomach twisting in knots as the wind whipped around them, Bucky's crystal eyes staring at him, staring into him, and it was jump now or never, a lifetime of waiting, and with fists raised and blood pumping Steve leaned forward, destroying the space that had been between them for decades too long.

He tilted Bucky's face up and pressed their lips together, eyes slipping closed as their mouths connected and the world stopped turning.

Steve Rogers kissed just like he fought, with every ounce of that beautiful heart and soul and Bucky was hopeless to do anything but cave under the pressure of those lips - barely parted, a touch of lingering wetness against his mouth and the jolt of it spiraled through his body, rippling down his spine because god, this was Steve in his hands, Steve's face tipped down to meet his, their - their - lips pressing together. Agape.

In the middle of this carnage, this wreckage of memories and haunted New York streets, somewhere in the goddamn twenty-first century; he never thought he'd live to see this day but fuck, wasn't it fitting.

Fit just like Steve's mouth to his, crushed close and solid and so warm and--

Metal fingers tangled up in the front of the brown leather jacket, fabric catching and threatening to tear as the arm that'd done nothing but crush things permitted its favorite mission and hauled Steve closer, their bodies crashing together this time.

He took it all back.

Everything he ever said about being too scared for this, he took it back. He was terrified, still positively terrified, but he’d spend every day of the rest of his life making up for it with this, the only thing he was sure in, the only thing he’d ever had faith in, ever fought for, and that was Captain Steven Grant Rogers.

Bucky arched up against his mouth, kissing back messy, hungry, and neither of them could breathe, he needed more than just his hands on Steve's face, he needed him so close he could never get away again. Crushed their mouths harder, Steve’s arms lifting to wrap even tighter around the muscles threaded over his spine, leather creaking as he squeezed their chests flush, twin hearts skipping.

Metal and real fingers shoved into that blonde halo, forget the Heavens, forget Hell, just dragging Steve down further, closer, and Bucky tilted sideways to adjust the angle, lips interlocked and pressing, hard enough to bruise, hard enough that Steve could taste the desperation, the fear he wasn’t afraid to show anymore. Fuck the masks, let Steve see this, the truth, the broken, terrified way Bucky was clinging to him like he'd disappear the moment their lips parted.

Let him see it so he could prove it, every single day, he was never leaving Buck behind again.

Cause you’ve got nothing to prove-- damn right I do. On va voir.

A stuttering wave of emotion, promises, only they weren’t making a single damn one this time but to always come back to each other and that was the one thing they’d never really had a problem with.

If seventy years and assassin horror stories couldn’t keep them apart, they’d make it through whatever war story was waiting now.

(They were all love stories anyways.)

The waves crashed on the shore, sunlight rushed through all the darkest corners of the shadows, threatening to knock him right off his feet.

Steve just bundled him close and kissed him deep, let them both drown in the sparking heat of their chests, carry on; all senses on fire to melt, melt years of freezing ice cold. Maybe this was how they were supposed to heal, in the warmth of their hearts combined, in the comfort of each other's bodies. Real, alive, here.

Real, alive, here.

Jesus Christ, it was hard to remember they hadn’t been doing this his entire life.

They’d taken each other apart and picked up the pieces, put themselves back together again and fought for, with, against each other but for the first time in a long long time, tomorrow sounded like the dream he never could've had yesterday.

Bucky’s lips parted on a gasp, breathing the oxygen straight outta Steve’s lungs as their overlapping lips slid so so slowly apart, barely apart at all as he exhaled, filled those precious lungs up again. He’d trade every yesterday for the chance to spark that fire back to the warmest it could be. He’d trade everything for the chance to bring Steve back to life again.

For the chance for him to come alive again, under the summer sun.
Your love is anemic, and I can’t believe that you couldn’t see it coming for me.

This was it, the grand finale to their war, their last battleground.

They drew apart, darkness blinking to soft red, gold as the sunrise lifted higher, higher, in the big bright blue sky.

Bucky's hand on his chest was solid and unbreakable, smile widening the longer Steve stared, breathless, those crystal eyes dancing with laughter at the eternity etched in his one-sided smile and he was so goddamned beautiful, stunning, breathtaking. It was a goddamn miracle Steve’d survived this long, that every risky stupid thing he’d ever done had ended just right enough for him to end up here and.

War was kind of like hell. But for this soldier?

It was worth it.

It was worth it.

Their foreheads pressed together and Steve breathed him in, breathed in the air ghosting over his wet mouth, over his stitched-up serum heart and god, there weren't words in any language he knew to describe this.

Well, Bucky’d been right about one thing.

They finally won the war.

And they finally came home.

“Where are we going?” Steve asked and Bucky smiled.

One hand carded through Steve’s hair and Bucky pulled his best friend into his side, throwing an arm around Steve’s neck.

Leaned over to kiss him on the temple, then twin footfalls started across the Brooklyn bridge, sunrise arching ever higher in the distance, in the New York distant stardust, to remember them by. Goodbye, goodbye.

“The future.”

So I cut the ties and I jumped the tracks. For never to return.

Gold flickered in the distance, and one by one, the stars blinked out in the blue blue sky.

Summer slid free from the night and Steve paused, in the middle of the bridge, and held out his hand. Bucky took it.
Follow me into the dark and I will lead you into the light.

Fingers laced, Bucky’s right, Steve’s left, mismatched sharpie marks overlapping, twin dashes on never-ending lines, to the end. The human hands that’d held on, burnt, lost, clutched, thrown, punched, and caught.

Hand in hand, they were never letting go.

He meant it, this time.

There’s no place like home.

There's a quote, something about living on the edge of death. Steve doesn't think that's true about them. They don't live on the edge of anything. They can't afford it.

No, instead they live deep in the throes. They live in the very core of it all. They live in the constant ever-wakeful presence of the feared shadowy darkness.

They live in death.

Till then, I had you.

Til Death.

He'd get to take his last breath against Bucky’s lips.

☆

And what a sweet last breath it was.

Chapter End Notes

☆

Final Playlist, This is My Last Breath.

Til Death - Barcelona
The Kids Aren't Alright - Fall Out Boy
No Place Like Home - Mariana's Trench
I and Love and You - The Avett Brothers
Better - Tyler Ward
Strong Hand - Chvrches
Boats and Birds - Gregory and the Hawk
You Are My Sunshine - Elizabeth Mitchell
Till Then - The Mills Brothers

xx

☆

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!