Russian Roulette: Reloaded

by Vixen_Tail

Summary

Part 1 of 2.

No one ever said an SI gets a place in canon events, or that they would be ideally placed at all. How much would you recall if you had decades to go before anything in a long forgotten story comes to be?

SI/OC as part of the Russian Mafiya, liberties taken with crafting said Mafiya Family.

Chapter Notes

Yes, I got sucked into another fandom. Yes, it's another SI/OC fic. I'm going to try to avoid some of the issues my other one had, so expect updates to be slow since I'm going to try to stick to the plot worked out for this.

FYI: I actually have no idea how the Russian Mafiya works, bits and pieces of the lore for it I used in this story is cobbled together from different sources and tweaked a bit. Some translations of the Russian used is available at the end.

In Russia your name is legally written out like this: Family Name (Maiden if applicable) Given Name 'Nickname' Patronymic Name. One's Patronymic name is apparently the father's name with an –ovich for boys, -vovich if the last letter is another vowel. Though there is a Matronymic version, and my SI/OC's mother has one, it's not nearly as commonly used unless one's mother doesn't know the father's name (apparently unwed mothers). There is some conflicting sources for that, so I went to the first one I found and kept with it. (Which was a name generator site and why the mom has a female 'daughter of' Matronymic name.)

A discussion between myself and one of my Russian reviewers on FF.Net resulted in a bit of a story mechanic shift, notes about it are at the bottom.

I - (Thursday the 3rd of February, 1955. Saratov, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Nikishina Sonya Mikhailovna was born to Nikishin Mikhail 'Misha' Vladislavovich and Nikishina (ne Lazareva) Nyura Ruslanovna on the evening of December 28th, 1950, in Saratov, a port city on the Volga River in Soviet Russia.

Their daughter was 'typically' Russian in features, with her mother's wavy ash-blonde hair coloring added to her father's sharp Slavic features and grey eyes, and she could very well pass herself off as a Barbie doll with baby fat given a couple more years to grow in. Neither of her parents were bulky people, which made the very young girl assume she would eventually inherit a willowy frame though she hoped she turned out more like her mother. Who could probably put in a claim of having been a ballerina in her younger years and get away with it.

Much to the relief of both her parents, Sonya wasn't the type of child that demanded a lot of attention. She was quiet and kept to herself, fusssed little, and generally preferred to be left alone most of the time.

Which worked for them, they didn't seem too enthused with being parents at all.

Mikhail was intent on not being around much, when he was around he was either home to drink in the warmth of the house or try arguing with his wife about something or another. Nyura liked to pretend she wasn't a stay-at-home mother against what seemed to be the socially accepted norm around the local town to the point the neighbors thought little of the woman, the longer she could ignore the fact she had a daughter or husband the happier she was. Why either of them went through with the trouble of having a child was more than Sonya could answer, but in return for the food and shelter she didn’t mind staying out of their way like they wanted.

She had enough trouble on her own end, the whole 'hands-off' childhood thing worked for her too.

Sonya's odd personality for a typical Soviet child, just being aware of how strange her home life was being merely a symptom of something not being exactly as it seemed, was something caused by the dream-nightmares she had starting shortly after her first few months of life. Dreams where she was living an entirely different life as one Rachel Victoria Stokes, a daughter of an always working lawyer mother and a mainly absent chemist of a father.

An American college graduate, who had been trying to figure out what to do with her degree in International Affairs which she had worked hard for but had no longer recalled why she had wanted it.

Only Rachel had died, in a mugging gone horribly wrong on dark night, while she tried to wrestle with herself about what she was going to do with her life. Once she came to terms with the sudden and abrupt removal of anything familiar, Sonya was left trying to muddle through twenty odd years of another life heaped onto her personality as it developed from a childish self-centeredness and into a fully aware person of her own right.

An American born in the year 1987 and died in 2012. Now she was a citizen of the USSR in the 1950s, dreaming about a young woman who wouldn't be born for decades if at all.

There were any number of days when she woke still thinking she was a young woman called Rachel, and the disjointed feeling she got when spotting blonde and not brown hair then grey and not hazel eyes was often disturbing. The age/height difference was a headache all its own, causing more than a small measure of her early childhood clumsiness so despaired over by her so-called 'mother'.

Said early childhood was mostly a never-ending series of nightmares and confusion for her as she tried to at least not draw any attention to herself as she sorted her own mind out, but she still rather disliked the abrupt change in circumstances that happened early in 1955.

As awkward as being a child born to two less than enthusiastic parents was in a town where that seemed to never be the case, she rather preferred it to learning that her parents had used her to pay off a debt they owed someone else.

Nikishina Sonya Mikhailovna then became one of many children taken to the local Mafiya recruitment drive, due to either their parents or unrelated members tempting them in.

The Mafiya group specifically the group of children to young adults all now belonged to had once been part of the vory v zakone, the thieves-in-law. Remnants of those who had previously been condemned into the GULAG labor camps under Joseph Stalin's reign, and kept holding the 'brothers in arms against the government' idea that had been mostly discarded upon their release after World War Two by the rest of the Russian Mafiya.

Sonya learned all of that from her tattoo artist, who took pity on her obvious confusion but appreciated she didn't wail and moan about the little curled cat tattoo she was given on her right bicep like some of the even older children did. Discounting that most of his storytelling was probably a bit whitewashed for a child's sake, she actually liked the little kitten and shrugged her agreement to return to him when she 'earned' her next tattoo.

Valya was good at his art for something that wasn't quite 'mainstream' popular yet, and he was somewhat pleasant while she was under his hands, so she accepted the tiny slip of paper that held the address for his usual haunt on it in case she wanted him to add to her non-existent tattoo collection.

The next thing she learned was that her kitten denoted that she was brought in young to be a thief, the general standby for those not specifically courted on whatever kind of recruitment run this was, instead of for any of the other criminal branches their new thieves' clan dabbled in. She wasn't the only one getting a curled cat tattoo that same day, but there were about a handful of other designs getting inked on other, mostly male children as well.

Some of them were picked by the people that guided the kids of varying age ranges into the warehouse-turned-tattoo parlor, others seemed to be assigned by lottery. There were card tattoos, various symbols denoting several money values, pairs of dice, a handful of guns on the older if still young adults, mixed in with the more common cats and spider webs and one lone much older teen that was in the middle of getting a bullet crossed with a knife where she had her own.

Sonya was by no means sold on this new direction of life, but she was also not as stupid to think she might be able to just walk out. For one, although she had the intelligence of an American college graduate she had the physical form and appearance of a young child. For another, if her parents had her to pay off whatever they owed then whoever they owed their firstborn child to probably wouldn't like nor stand for it if said payment took off on him or her.

Third, this was well organized and practiced. Well supplied, prepared for, and things seemed to be getting done at an alarmingly fast rate. They had done this before, would probably do this again, and any kind of escape Sonya could come up with had probably been tried many times before therefore likely any escape attempt would be foiled quickly.

She would have to wait and see, for both an opportunity to escape or if she really liked this no matter how much as she doubted she would she might stay regardless of her irritation with her parents.

Getting sorted out by their freshly given tattoos was a mess and a half at the end of the night, because they were new and most were still bleeding even with the surprisingly clean rags passed around like candy to staunch it. Of course, there were the handful of children that didn't pay attention to what they were getting which resulted in time wasted checking the swelling flesh for what general shape said tattoos were in.

Sonya ended up sorted out next to a chatty redheaded girl that called herself Tatiana and another but older mousy haired boy that gave Dmitriy as his name, her fellow girl another thief who could've gotten a card tattoo but picked a cat and Dmitriy clarified his spider in a web as apparently just 'dedicated to a life of crime' rather than an actual future job class to be trained in.

II (Thursday the 10th of May, 1956. Arnseiy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Being fostered with Tatiana the to-be con artist was a distinctly different kind of situation than living with her own parents. Thankfully and strangely.

Taking stock again a year later proved… somewhat interesting.

For one, the couple the two of them were sent to learn under were accepting of Sonya's early independence from them only if she kept them informed of what she got up to. For another, she didn't have to find something to do out of sight every day by herself anymore.

Additionally, they weren't in Saratov anymore, they were in Moscow. It was apparently easier to hide the fact they were raising up the next generation of Mafiya members in larger cities, but equally so her 'father' didn't want her to remain in Saratov so she ended up elsewhere with a group of other 'displaced' children picked up by that Mafiya recruitment drive he shoved her into.

Vor Bazanov Arseniy Pavlovich was the girls' main trainer in everything an aspiring thief needed to learn the basics of, his partner but not wife who lived and certainly slept with him Primakova Elisaveta 'Lisa' Rostislavovna was the one primarily raising them and teaching them everything else a citizen of both the USSR and their Mafiya syndicate required them to know. They also stood in as their 'parents' in their little fake family, Tatiana claimed she had none and Sonya knew full well her own were still alive just utterly disinterested in her.

Arseniy only tended to teach the girls in the evening hours, and as such he slept most of the mornings away. The youngest of the household figured he worked a type of second shift, since being part of their Mafiya syndicate that upheld a variation of the vory kod prevented any of them from honest employment if one could support themselves by their criminal exploits. Elisaveta, who told the girls to call her just Lisa early on, took care of teaching them basic knowledge about everything else herself instead of sending them off to school like most children.

The older brunette first ensured they knew how to read and write not only in Cyrillic but several other Slavic languages first, then branched out into teaching them to speak in different languages as well as what Sonya recognized as basic geography, Soviet Union's variations and then foreign law, their own Thieves' Code they were being 'asked' to uphold, basic forgery in the guise of 'art', a very selective series of chemistry lessons, and mathematics.

Apparently neither girl could go to the public schools available as that would just allow the uchastkovyi, a cross between a Sheriff and a Constable but a local resident to their part of the city, to pick them out as Mafiya members before they ever stole their first mark. The two girls would eventually become known to the militsiya, and possibly the KBG, but Arseniy held the opinion the later that occurred the better.

Both children had ballet lessons in the morning, early enough that Tatiana usually swore under her breath every morning when Lisa woke them for the day. Sonya didn't mind the dance lessons, it helped with her still lingering clumsiness that she had yet to grow out of, and the other girl was enthusiastic of learning it if not appreciative of the early morning hours.

They also got to see a lot of the other girls they would eventually be working with then, as the woman who ran the ballet school was a minor clansman’s wife who didn't mind teaching more Mafiya girls to dance even if they never did go professional.

Breakfast was made shortly after that, mostly done and eaten without Arseniy, then another hour or so of gymnastics in the backyard or the basement to work on tumbling routines. A short break for hygiene reasons and so Lisa could go greet her lover when he woke, then they spent the rest of the morning on whatever the older woman wanted them to learn.

Lunch was taken a bit later than Sonya was used to at first, and very rarely did Arseniy join them for that awake or not. If he did join them they would move into what typically ended up being the more recognizable training a thief might use to escape, disguises and how to act like you belonged even if you didn't, how to use odd building features to escape that way, and the like. If not then Lisa would teach them how to lie, how to act in high society, how to tell someone was lying, and the less overtly stated parts of the code they were going to be held to as thieves for the Russian Mafiya.

Late afternoon was when the girls occasionally got to see Dmitriy again, as well as all the other children also in their neighborhood there for training and not more domestic reasons. That was more recognizable training in skills a thief needed to know that vor Arseniy handled for all of them; pickpocketing, lockpicking, safecracking, hot wiring both automobiles and security systems, how to lose a tail, how to fence what you stole, and the like. Every now and again when the older criminal wasn't available due to whatever they would go to a different location that seemed centralized to their various foster homes for combat training under a man called vor Aleksandr, for small arms, knives, and whatever else anyone wanted to learn to use.

Then the two young girls had dinner with their two 'foster parents', and the rest of the evening was left to practice whatever skills they wanted before bed.

There was no real schedule to anything. There were frequent days when either Lisa or vor Arseniy weren't available and some rare occasions when neither were around for a day or three. Sonya and Tatiana were encouraged to do whatever appealed to them during those times, but while the older redhead was content to crack safes or work on her vocabulary in different languages the younger blonde liked to take a book on whatever was handy and escape their 'foster home' to explore some of Moscow’s less traveled streets or get a bench somewhere quiet.

It was a beautifully austere if cold city, and always somewhat colorful with something new to investigate if she just looked. Some industrial pollution and cookie cutter architecture that tarnished the view fast, but she didn't think it was any worse than America's manufacture suburb hellscapes or even the Rust Belt of ruined factories a little south of where Rachel once/would live.

Unfortunately, in Lisa's and Arseniy's eyes, she didn't go out solely to practice her pickpocketing. Though she did tend to do that a little just so the vor didn't lecture her on keeping skills sharp and contributing to the household funds, as well as keep an eye out for the odd identification that either of her 'foster parents' might be able to use.

Sonya rather did like the rewards the occasional pickpocketing brought her, because even if she still wasn't sold on the whole 'thief' thing the Mafiya life she was living would prevent her from having the school records getting a decent legal job would require. Barring her from that side of the world until she had the experience and skills to dodge anyone sent after her long enough to correct that. The set of her own lock picks and the agreement for staff training she secured by acquiring the IDs were particularly useful, as she was very good at lockpicking and rather wanted to keep from getting a skull or tombstone tattoo that denoted kills any time soon or in the far future.

Tatiana tended to act like an older sister she never wanted, a high-maintenance one that demanded attention when she could, so she wasn't all that sold on the character of what could charitably be called her first real 'girlfriend'. The redhead also got a little jealous of the younger girl's skills, because hers were a little more immediately useful than safe cracking or forgery.

Lisa was more of an elder sibling-type role model, mostly because the woman didn't like being called 'aunt'. She was a cheerful early riser that didn't care if they swore or bitched if they did so while doing what she set them to do.

Vor Arseniy was more of a parent in the house, because no one wanted him angry or irritated. He wasn't abusive, but he also didn't hold off on smacking either girl if they got too mouthy or disrespectful of him.

It was also because of him that Sonya could wander on the rare occasions she had free. He had said it was alright and not even Lisa went against what he said when he wasn't home.

It was on one said occasions that she ran into something unusual, rather someone unusual, that clued her in to something being a little skewed from the reality she recalled in the bizarre dream-life of Rachel's she once lived through.
III (Wednesday the 3rd of September, 1958. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Three years into her next new life in Moscow, in the fall of her seventh year and a decent budding thief in the making, Sonya met Cherep.

Just Cherep, apparently. He who had bright purple hair with matching eyes and spoke his Russian with a distinctly Czech accent. Wandering around the streets just like her, even if it was a school-day where most of the kids their age were tucked away in dark and dreary classrooms getting stuffed full of knowledge they might not ever use.

He was mainly a little annoyed at the questions she kept pestering him with, but she was more than a little fascinated and too curious to care.

Purple wasn't a natural coloring, yet his hair was bright ass purple. Even his eyebrows and eyelashes were the same blatant shade of eye-popping violet, including the hair on his arms.

"Why does everyone keep asking that?" He asked the shockingly clear fall sky not three minutes after meeting her, and even if it wasn't directed to her Sonya answered him anyways.

"Probably because they want to know what dye they can use to get your hair coloring. It's pretty neat, really." While Cherep gaped at her, for what reasons the tiny pickpocket didn't care to know, she plucked out a strand of his chin-length hair to inspect the root.

It was purple the whole way through. Huh.

The violently purple kid she had found then squawked like an offended parrot, slapping at her hands well after she plucked a strand of his hair. He didn't even look too surprised that he missed her by a good margin, merely glaring with that same darkening lavender eye coloring the equally tiny blonde had to accept as being completely natural as well. "Don't do that."

Tucking the strand of hair into her borrowed book as a bookmark, she gave him a level look and tucked the bound stack of paper under one arm. "And how are you going to stop me?"

Floundering a moment as the question stumped him, he looked around then his features brightened as if he had thought he hit on the perfect idea. "By leaving, bye."

Amused at the weak attempt, she blatantly followed him out of the square she confronted him in. It only took him a street to realize she hadn't stayed behind, and the glare she got over his shoulder made her crack a smirk. "What?"

The kid, because he was more of a child than Sonya had ever been herself, huffed out his obvious irritation with her and proceeded to try and ignore the fact he was being followed. Badly.

As in, he tried running a few streets until his limited stamina ran out. She easily kept pace with his best effort to outrun her, much to his painfully obvious chagrin.

She politely, for her, waited out the gasps for breath before nudging the boy nearly folded in half and struggling to breath with one shoe. "Really? That was… pathetic."

Really pathetic. Like… not even the other civilian kids she sometimes watched from afar got out of breath that fast. He probably wasn't… well cared for.

The other child’s clothing supported that guess, given the sloppily done patchwork almost not spanning the hole in his shirt enough to contain one sharply boney elbow.
"Don't you have other people to bother?" Cherep gritted out petulantly at her, still breathing heavily enough she was beginning to become concerned for him. "Go stalk someone else."

She actually thought about following his bitchy advise, but since neither vor Arseniy nor Lisa was home that day and Tatiana was being a little moody bitch Sonya didn't really care to be home just yet. There was the possibility of going to bug vor Aleksandr for additional lessons in whatever was at hand or going across the neighborhood to see what Dmitriy was up to, but neither option was guaranteed because they had their own things to do most days and might not have time for a lone girl-child.

Most didn't. Sonya had never been stopped or bothered before she got a tiny bit distracted by the strange hair coloring.

It wouldn't pay to find a good target to pickpocket because no one was home to appreciate the new legal identity they had a limited time to use before it was reported. At home she had already picked most if not all the locks the vor had in stock for her, and was thoroughly bored with doing the same schoolwork that it seemed Rachel had once already done in her life and Sonya knew from that.

There was little else she had to do in a timely manner, sucked to be him.

"I actually have nothing else to do that's as interesting as you are right now." She informed him dryly, shrugging a little at his incredulous look that earned her.

Cherep gaped at her unattractively for a few moments longer, but eventually gave a kind of shudder-shrug and stuffed his hands into his pockets. "Um... okay."

She waited a beat, but when all the kid did was stare at her expectantly the blonde had to huff in bemused irritation herself. "You... are such a pushover."

"Hey!"

It wasn't until much later, when she got home and ignored Tatiana wailing about having to cook for herself to check if Arseniy or Lisa were home yet, that Sonya absently recalled what Cherep's name translated into English as and realized what had bothered her so about the kid she met that morning. Other than his apparently natural coloring, that is.

Cherep was a word she had for a skull.

A purple haired and eyed individual named Skull?

First off... who the hell named their kid skull?

Secondly... Rachel had watched an anime who had someone like that once. Sonya didn't recall most of the plot or anything about a lot of the characters in that show, all she really recalled was a wimpy son of some Italian Mafioso and boxers... and the cursed babies with the pacifiers.

She blankly stared at the ceiling over her bed as her 'foster sister' moped around a little downstairs and told herself it was just a coincidence, then tried to believe it.

She was part of the Russian Mafiya. The physically tiny thief would've heard something about colorful fire or creepy-strict zombie Mafia-Enforcers by now if that was at all true, and she hadn't. There had been a complete lack of anything supernatural or different from this life and her last.

However, she was a very minor baby Mafiya thief. Maybe she didn't qualify for that kind of information yet?

Maybe… maybe she should stick around Cherep until she sorted that out… because if something like that did exist… well…

Torn between wanting to laugh or cry at the impossibility, even if it was a connection to her last lifetime in a place she never thought to look, Sonya huffed a sigh as she rolled over to go to sleep.

IV (Friday the 26th of September, 1958. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Sonya's been meeting with someone!" Tatiana practically sang much to Lisa's tolerant amusement, grinning stupidly at the fellow baby thief almost two full years younger than her.

"And how long did it take you to figure that one out?" Sonya deadpanned back, following them easily enough as they walked to where the morning’s ballet practice was held. "It's only been going on for most of the month."

There was a kind of honor among thieves, or at least the Mafiya ones she had gotten to know here, but privacy wasn't something this version of them religiously practiced. If it happened regularly, chances were that both Lisa and Arseniy already knew it was going on and were planning something if you weren't supposed to be doing it.

Case in point, the first time she left their little home and neighborhood for another part of Moscow
Lisa had known the moment she returned. Whether or not that was due to spies or someone being a concerned neighbor and informing her, or just because she noted something not available in their section of Moscow on her, was up in the air. The first time Tatiana blew off practice or study when she had the free time to just laze about like a bum Arseniy had known and given her hell for it and the man had been gone for three days due to whatever it was that took his attention most of the time.

"Sonya?" Lisa questioned lightly, giving the youngest a serious look even with the grin on her lips and tossing her short brown hair out of her way with one hand.

She kind of wondered how the woman managed that expression so flawlessly. "He's got purple hair.

"Which would explain why he caught your attention." The older Mafiya member gave a semiaccepting and semi-dismissive shrug, holding them up just before the doors to the dancehall to continue posing questions. "Why keep meeting with him?"

"Because his reactions to me poking him are funny."

It wasn't worth it to lie, but telling the truth wasn't something Sonya want to do either. Telling the older woman that she was watching him for any purple fire suddenly appearing probably wasn't a good idea. She still wasn't too sure about the odd coincidence of the meaning of Cherep's name and his unusual coloring, so like the rest of the weird things that nagged her it was ignored.

Just like the memories of being Rachel and the fact she was used to alleviate the debts her parents had.

Lisa hummed instead of showing either disapproval or approval, waving both girls into the building for their usual morning activities.

It wasn't until they were stretching at the barre with their class that Tatiana asked a few questions herself. "Are you going to bring him home with you?"

'Was she going to bring him into the Mafiya' was what the redhead was really asking.

They were supposed to be on the lookout for additional blood for their syndicate, though it was more like a community in practice, and required to train them themselves if they found anyone.

"No. He's not really the type." Sonya informed her lowly with a shrug, trying to ignore the attention she was getting from some of the older girls for finally speaking up during this time. "From what I gather he's as innocent as can be, meeting Arseniy would probably cause him to faint or something. Clumsy too, he'd forever be trying to keep up even if he started classes with the boys right away."

Tatiana pulled a Lisa and hummed, not nearly as blandly as the older Mafiya woman could pull off but enough to convey the fact she wasn't sold on the younger girl's reasoning.

Much to her disgust Dmitriy pulled her aside just before their mass lesson on deciphering altered blueprints for hidden safes and panic rooms to ask her basically the same thing. The boy was kind of like the cousin that no one knew what job he had, he was generally good with whatever dropped into his lap and didn't seem to mind doing a bit of everything.

Dmitriy was also a solid friend she had somehow made over the last couple years, even if he tended to avoid the redhead she lived with when he could. "Well?"

Sonya rolled her eyes at him and the older boy snorted at her.

"Give me the quick and dirty version, then."

"Met him not too long ago, has weird but natural hair and eye colors, and he still freaks out when I track him down on my free days. No, I don't think he's Mafiya material. Anything else?"

He blinked at her a few times, frowning suspiciously. "This isn't the onset of a crush or anything stupid like that, is it?"

"Like the one Tatiana has on you?" She asked of him wryly, pulling him into her home's living room where Arseniy was setting up for his lesson that evening. "Hell no, don't think I'm even old enough to start that nonsense."

He gave an aggravated sigh, but willingly left her for the designated 'male' side of the room.

Their lesson might have been mixed in terms of ages and gender, but that didn't mean there were even remotely decent people on either side. Separating them out merely kept certain personalities from clashing and interrupting the lesson, both things that might just end up hospitalizing a handful of the younger but already established Mafiya members.

Arseniy hadn't been pleased the last time someone had the balls to interrupt him, he had tossed the offender straight out the front doors on his head. The last idiot that tried to grope Lisa on the sly ended up needing to get his hand reattached due to losing them to a pissed off vor, as well.

Sonya was always surprised when some moron tested his limits yet again, even if it happened nearly three to four times a year since she had started living and training under him.

Later that night, the older man's only reaction to learning she had admitted to knowing a civilian 'friend' was laying down the rule that only if she finished her work for any day she could go off to meet him if she wanted.
Tatiana was appalled at the favoritism.

He wasn't impressed with that assumption. "Maloletko, use your head. A true vor doesn't own property, it's against the code. Her friend can be used to buy and hold any property she might want, which gets around that nicely."

The younger girl actually suspected there was a little favoritism involved, if merely because she didn't tend to need lessons repeated to her so Arseniy didn't really have to deal with her often. Tatiana had been in trouble more than she had, both girls were rather sure Lisa reported to him everything they got up to given he never really needed to ask where they were in what skill or how much they practiced.

Both the insult and the mini-lecture was enough to get the older girl to shut up though, and the before bedtime safecracking practice continued as normal.

V (Monday the 29th of December 1958. Dmitriy's Garage, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana was among the first of them to be arrested.

Even considering the rest of the neighborhood baby Mafiya members around at various ages or rough skills, no one else had managed to screw up that badly yet.

Sonya skipped out of the house nearly the same instant Lisa reported the other girl's arrest to a freshly returned for the night Arseniy, spent a safe few hours with Cherep in a park then wandered over to the garage Dmitriy both lived over and worked at when he had little else to do.

The preteen, who was by that point eleven to her eight years of age, almost burst a rib laughing at the irony. "Who's the petty thief in your unit? What was she doing, pickpocketing?"

"Oh no, not picking pockets. The militsiya picked her up trying for a five-finger discount." Corrected the younger girl lazily, lounging on the hood of the car Dmitriy was hotwiring to show less mileage for later selling. Her nose wrinkled against the stench of motor oil and superheated metal that lingered in the shop with everything closed against the inclement weather outside even if they were the only ones there at the moment and nothing was running. "Shoplifting… poor Tatiana."

He actually stuck his head out from under the sedan, giving her a confused frown that she could see for once. "Why the hell did she do that? Tatiana can't be that stupid, to try a method she's not trained for."

"I bet you it has something to do with a few of the other girls around here." As the redhead did pour most of whatever free time she had into hanging out with the rest of the Mafiya girls living locally, while Sonya occasionally ducked out to see Cherep.

"No bet. That's too obvious." Dmitriy rolled back under the car, though the baby thief wasn't sure what he was doing now given the lack of metal on metal that would've sounded if he was doing something. Though from what little she knew of automobiles he might be manually rewinding the speedometer just to waste some time.

"I think I don't ever want to be arrested."

"You thinking of going straight?"

She gave that question some serious thought for a moment.
Over the years, her morals had changed a bit from what Rachel had to now. She didn't care much either way for the idea of stealing for a living, the only thing she kept to was ensuring that whoever she stole from would be able to afford the misfortune without too much trouble.

As it was, she did like the reward system she knew her two 'foster parents' Mafiya members were training her with, to mentally link positive recompenses with her stealing. Like a dog getting a treat for doing a trick but the 'treats' were generally either useful or desired, so Sonya kept up with it.

Rachel had floundered trying to pick her own job after college, she was surprisingly okay with having her own decided for her even if it was less than legal in nature. "Not really, I just don't want to deal with the hassle of getting arrested."

"That'd take some almost unreal skills, girl." Dmitriy informed her absently, finally fully rolling out from under the probably stolen sedan to pick himself up and look her in the eye. Just so they could have the rest of the conversation able to see one another, and so he could wind down from whatever he had been working on. "You know you're probably already on someone's watch list by now, right?"

An errant thought of her recent major wanderings made the young thief smirk at as was arguably her best friend right now. "Then I'll be the World's Greatest Thief. Never caught, only suspected."

"Aiming high, are we?" He murmured more to himself than her as he cleaned off his grease and oil marred fingers with a rag pulled from his own battered tool chest. "Aren't you going to have to get into the higher end heists if you want to aim for something like that?"

"Probably." Sonya shrugged and hopped off the bonnet of the car she had spent the last two hours laying on, giving the older preteen a short wave of farewell on her way out of the garage and through the piling snow back to her 'home'.

To be bluntly honest, she didn't abstain from robbing low-income people out of some displaced desire to respect her fellow citizens' property or wages. She never pickpocketed them because it frankly didn't pay off that well, and they tended to spot the difference in their wallets faster.

You got more from lifting half of a tourist's wallet than you could from cleaning out five warehouse workers on payday, and one person raising a fuss was less notable than five in the same area.

That also meant the young thief tended to relieve wealthier citizens of their money simply because she tended to be lazy and not want to stalk more people than she had to.

Risk management wasn't something her Mafiya syndicate taught, but it was something she could pull easily enough from a dream-life.

VI (Thursday the 1st of January, 1959. A flophouse, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep screeched a bit too loudly for Sonya's peace of mind when she popped open his window and let herself inside.

It was early, and one of the almost impossible days when the lady that ran their ballet classes was too sick to teach. Lisa was also gone for the day and possibly part of the next doing something no one spoke anything about, leaving vor Arseniy home with both Sonya and Tatiana.

The older girl was still basically grounded and confined to the house until she made up for the hassle the man went through to bail her out of jail in a mostly legal way that wouldn't stick her with the beginnings of a rap sheet.

Well… rather a rap sheet with more than any normal civilian girl would have.

That ended up giving her a downright out of the blue free morning in the middle of a Russian winter, when she generally tended to only have the afternoons or evenings to herself.

Only a fraction of which she had spent on him, all total, in honesty.

While she could appreciate Cherep's shock at seeing her in the morning, it was still too early for it. "Shut up already."

He flailed with his hands, as he usually did when she surprised him or did something he didn't think was polite. It was more panicked than Sonya was used to seeing from him, probably because he didn't know she knew full well he was bunking in a flophouse for beggars and the homeless.

She felt a little insulted at that possibly only assumed reasoning for the actions going on.

It hadn't been that hard to track him down, and the fact he usually wore ragged if serviceable clothing was a big tip off that he wasn't remotely financially secure. His health was another, but that could've been attributed to several factors if she was pressed to be honest. Figuring out he was an orphan, or at least without parental influences, was just as easy because in the half a year she knew him he never once mentioned either a curfew or limitation on his time to her and they did sometimes spend lunch and dinner together.

Sonya even kept a ready supply of rubles on hand for visiting him, tucking a few bills into his pockets now and again when it was either freezing cold or she hadn't seen him for a stretch of days. She had been curious how weather-proof his residence was and now she knew it'd do for deep winters, but it was a bit drafty.

Cherep wasn't doing too badly on his own, which was why she never really confronted him about his situation and still wouldn’t. He could go to a local trade school if he wanted, ate somewhat regularly even without her, so she never felt very guilty for leaving her friend to handle his own affairs.

He'd either manage to do better on his own or stay in the slums all his life, and unless he asked for help she wouldn't nose into his life that much.

Instead of anything she was sure the kid was expecting from her, Sonya merely slumped on his saggy bare mattress of a bed but left the two ragged wool blankets he used to insulate himself at night alone. "For fuck's sake, please stop."

"Sonya?"

"Yes?"

Blinking wide purple eyes at her, Cherep gripped then pulled his ratty blankets higher up his flannel clad chest and darted a few looks at his previously jammed shut window sill she had closed behind herself. "What are you doing?"

She peered up at him around her arms, not tempted at all to get upright. More sleep sounded wonderful to her. "Lazing around. Might take a nap. Why?"

He gave a full body twitch at her reply, the same one she always got for somehow irritating him.
"What are you doing in my room? How do you even know where I live?"

"Again, lazing. I've got a free morning, oddly enough." The tiny thief scooted herself to a more comfortable position, stretching out across the foot of his bed. "And it wasn't that hard, I knew where you lived a couple days after I met you."

The boy gave her what he probably thought was a disgusted look, but he ended up looking more like a disgruntled cat to her than anything. "You are… annoying."

"And still, you're a pushover. Go back to sleep."

He visibly thought about it for a long moment but did eventually lay back down.

Sonya curled her arms up over her face, to both block out the early morning light and bury her nose into her own clothing instead of suffering through the rather squalid stench of Cherep's tiny room. It was a mix of burning dust, unwashed bodies, and the cheap soap he used to keep himself and his clothes somewhat clean.

Lying in a pool of sunlight was the only plus. That, and the walls blocking the worst of the draft seeping through this building.

"Do... you want to go get breakfast?"

"Later."

"Alright."

VII (Tuesday the 22nd of March, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Technically, Sonya could probably afford to strike out on her own after she turned nine if it wasn't for the whole age/physically a pipsqueak thing.

By the end of 1959 she was a well-trained petty thief, a respectable pickpocket and lockpick any crew of thieves could find multiple uses for. All she really had to do was a big haul or two, at least big enough for Arseniy to approve and take a cut for both lodging and training her and one for their clan's treasury, and she'd be freed from her 'foster home'.

She could even find a crew to join for said hauls or stick to working alone as she mostly tended to do already.

Her half joking goal of becoming the World's Greatest Thief meant there were a few more rough edges she still had to polish up before striking out of her 'foster home'. Safecracking for one, hacking was also something she really needed to investigate given Rachel's memories of the internet and how it hindered criminal activity once it took off, hot wiring security systems was another.

Lisa was highly amused at the goal she set herself, how she found out was a mystery she wasn't poking, vor Arseniy not so much but probably more for the fact it would mean Sonya was sticking around longer than he had figured on initially. They eventually decided then informed her that if she wanted to keep on training she could very well live with them at least until Tatiana deemed herself finished and ready to strike out on her own. Only if she contributed to the household funds, their tribute to the clan's coffers, and when she had nothing else to do keep going to both training and the physical conditioning classes when they were held.
Tatiana scoffed when she heard, fully into the swing of puberty and still with the jealousy problem that marred the girls' relationship. Sonya mainly ignored her, hoping that the redhead would get over it and they could go back to how they were in the beginning.

That hadn't been bad, a bit standoffish but decent enough. There had been none of the hate, at least.

Upon hearing she was going to try for that goal Dmitriy personally guided her through some hotwiring exercises and set up more when she asked. In return for the effort the preteen demanded a future favor or two from her, which had Sonya staring at him for a long moment dubiously before reluctantly agreeing to.

She did wonder what he wanted that badly to try to gain a hold on someone that might get it for him without personal risk. Favors weren't traded around lightly even between the younger kids running around the neighborhood for a reason, it usually only took one or two bad examples to warn off the rest from going lightly with it.

For the time being, all Sonya concentrated on was planning her first big heist and keeping an eye on what was happening in the world.

She knew the Cold War was ongoing and had no plans on still being in the USSR for the few decades it would take for Communism to be replaced by Capitalism. She was pretty sure there was a fallout of some serious degree that wouldn't be very conductive to her lifestyle.

The ongoing Space Race was interesting to watch happen, and she was torn between the smug pride in America for eventually beating the rest of the world to the Moon and some enthusiasm for the burgeoning USSR's Space Program's successes. The excitement and pride were somewhat infectious to witness.

One thing she did plan on was being in Germany when the Berlin Wall fell, just simply because she could, and the first order of business the moment she got out of the USSR was to find herself some damn blue jeans.

Sonya planned to remain with Lisa and Arseniy for two or three more years as she built up her skills further just to be safe, then leaving the USSR for other pastures. As long as she sent back her tributes to their syndicate it was actually allowed because stealing where you lived tended to be a very bad idea, so thieves tended to wander a bit even without outside motives prodding them.

She spent a lot of time in January working up the nerve to steal a few building plans of high-end shops she intended to sharpen her cat burglary skills on. Then planning on how to get around the security systems and any possible guards, pricing what she was likely to pick up when she went so she'd know the order to prioritize, and how she was going to get to Kaluga and back with her 'hot' loot.

Lisa wasn't much for big heist planning, so Sonya spent a downright unusual amount of time with Arseniy as he overlooked her initial plans and pointed out the flaws that might get her caught before she learned the hard way.

She spent a lot of time in January working up the nerve to steal a few building plans of high-end shops she intended to sharpen her cat burglary skills on. Then planning on how to get around the security systems and any possible guards, pricing what she was likely to pick up when she went so she'd know the order to prioritize, and how she was going to get to Kaluga and back with her 'hot' loot.

Sonya wasn't impressed with the barely veiled mockery of the previous aristocracy's fall in the play but he had been, so she figured it was alright. Once she got back she would probably drag him to the cinema to see something impressive and find out what he thought of The Snow Queen, an animated film she recalled watching once upon a dream-time's childhood.

Packing up for her first big heist was both easy and hard as the young thief had been lifting small things for years, but this was the first time she would do something so blatantly illegal outside petty theft or easily hid targets.

Morally wrong or not, Sonya was excited to be formally entering her profession and that kept her fussing over her equipment and tools for a large part of the night.

Part of it might just be because she was tired of being viewed as a child, another part might just be the conditioning she had been subjected to for nearly five years making her unconsciously assume the big job would get her a big reward.

It could even be because she was anticipating a challenge, something she hadn't had since tackling the initial thief skills taught to her.

Lisa equipped her with the address of the safe house in the area she would be stealing from just before the young Mafiya girl got on the train with her luggage and reminded her to pay her dues for using them for shelter and operating in their territory.

VIII (Wednesday the 23rd of March, 1960. Kaluga, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

For all that Sonya had trained for years to handle something just like it, she had no expectations that her first heist would go smoothly.

It didn't, but at least she hadn't been surprised by that.

Her target was a jewelry store, a medium-sized one that had been in business for years and weathered the fall of the nobles shockingly well for a now communist run country. Probably by being somewhat affluent in their local section of the government. They had a few hired staff that would stall any formal investigation for a time and they were not nearly popular enough in designing their own pieces for their jewelry to be easily identifiable if she fenced them locally or in neighboring cities.

Not a good first target as there were a lot of semi-suspicious things going on there, but it was within her range and in an out-of-the-way part of the country so if she screwed up... she might dodge the worse of the suspicion she would then be due.

While she was a little concerned that they might have more than one method for catching jewel thieves, it was also an older building that hadn't been remodeled to have an alarm system in place yet. There was a night guard unfortunately, but her target wasn't the gems on display for sale unless she had the time and space for stealing them too.

What she wanted was the raw metal and gemstones waiting to be set. Much easier to fence and less noticeable to law enforcement and given the store did do repairs and a rare few custom designs?

They probably had the raw material on hand. Raw, harder to track, unworked silver and gold with maybe the loose gemstones due to be set into a piece of jewelry.

The afternoon of her planned heist, the physically tiny thief took an oversized piece of luggage with her and cased the store out under the guise of waiting for her mother to finish book shopping one building over. After a good look around and the preliminary inspection to ensure there wasn't an alarm system in place yet as the paperwork claimed, she wandered to the bookstore her fake mother was supposedly shopping in.

Getting the building plans for both buildings had taken a lot of time, but it paid off because she knew exactly where the vents ran in the bookstore and how to get to the roof of the jewelry store from there. A quick duck into the second-floor washrooms, after waiting for the only other lady to leave, netted her an easy access way that wouldn't raise awkward questions of what she thought she was doing.

Changing into long sleeved clothing, tying up her shoulder-length blonde hair into a bun, slipping on a pair of leather gloves, and the thief was ready to begin carefully climbing into the vents while juggling both the vent covering and her bag.

It was a tight squeeze, not to mention the luggage she had picked to hold whatever she stole tended to be unwieldy in its nearly empty state. She had to spend most of an hour carefully and silently edging her way up a sheer vertical shaft to the roof vent, then she spent the rest of the afternoon waiting behind the grill that kept animals from getting into the vent.

Next time, she was bringing a book or something for this part.

To play it safe, Sonya was only going to move between buildings under the cover of night. She had a black hood Lisa had made her, to cover her bright ash blonde hair from being spotted, as well as a thin scarf in dark blue that would cover her from nose to chin just in case. The luggage she had was reversible, the current 'inside' was a dark felt color and would be used to hold whatever she stole until she got somewhere to fence or pass it on for her tributes. Currently it held her lock picks, three lengths of rope, a screwdriver, a stethoscope, and her 'day' change of clothes.

When the sun finally sunk beneath the horizon, she carefully pried the vent covering off and slithered out onto the roof of the three-story building.

Emptying her bag of most of her tools she first tucked her lock picks into a pouch at the small of her back, secured the stethoscope around her neck, her screwdriver into a sleeve against her left forearm, then she uncurled one of her lengths of rope and affixed it to the sturdiest structure on the roof in preparation for later that night.

Another few hours were wasted as she waited for both the nightlife to taper off and for the security guard to have enough time to become complacent. Shortly after midnight was the point when she felt somewhat confident she would be able to reach the other building's roof without being spotted, and she finally got around to starting her heist already impatient and a bit antsy about how long she had been basically a sitting duck if anyone so much as got curious.

Dropping down a story wasn't that hard, and with her gymnastic training she managed it and the landing easily even if she could have lowered herself with the rope that instead lowered her bag.

It was once she got to the other roof that things started to go wrong.

According to the plans she had acquired the roof access door didn't have an alarm on it, but here in reality it was wired and clearly marked as a fire escape. Finishing her last-minute preparations for her break-in the thief also glared at said clearly marked door, wrapping the scarf over her lower face and fitting the hood over her hair and the excess cloth to keep it in place.

Instead of that plan, she had to look at this building's vents before maybe considering the windows.
The problem was that these vents had covers that screwed on in this building, and it was likely she'd have to force the interior vents off and that would make noise she wasn't sure she could afford.

There wasn't much left to do but try something, as her first plan was a bust.

Recollecting her bag from weighing down the end of her escape rope, Sonya removed the exterior vent with her screwdriver and left it on the roof. Sliding into the ventilation ducts was different than doing the same in the newer building next to it, as it was less smooth and more piecemeal in construction. Her clothes kept getting snagged on sharp lips of metal or the occasional nail, making for a very jerky descent into the building.

She took the first opportunity to leave the ventilation system she could, a hallway vent that was positioned near the floor she barely squeezed through thanks to her tiny size. Finally, on the second floor and in what seemed to be the store's main offices, the budding thief started casing around for anything she might want to take.

Scorning the office supplies, as most of it was both too heavy and not worth much, she stole into what looked like the business owner's office after picking his lock. It took her less than three minutes to find the safe, but almost fifteen to crack it.

The business ledgers were left as they were, but the number of old ruble coins in pure gold and silver became the first things she lifted from her first heist. The supply of paper rubles went next and a bag of loose gemstones were the last of the things she took out of there. Relocking the safe and the office door behind her would hopefully delay the discovery of her work that night, or at least just this bit.

More settled now that things were finally going somewhat right as planned, she padded off. She was off to a lucrative start, and she hadn't even had to evade a night guard or found her main goal yet.

One last cursory look around the second floor showed little else that would interest her, so the Sonya descended to the first floor carefully.

Then she made a rapid retreat back up the stairs just ahead of the security guard as he apparently followed his normal habits to patrol the second floor after a check of the showroom downstairs.

By the ticking of the office clock glaring out into the gloomy space, it was barely one in the morning. Sonya decided to follow the man to figure out his route before risking getting caught from skipping ahead of his usual path.

What she forgot was the loose coins that caused her to duck hastily when her bag shifted, and they clinked together clearly into the near-silence. There was a pause in the guard's stride, a long one that took almost a minute as he listened for any further odd noises that might signify her location or another thief moving around him.

She didn't dare breathe until he slowly started walking again, and only moved when his pace picked up back to what it was before she almost tipped him off to her presence.

Instead of following him immediately, the thief waited until he had gotten a decent amount of space between them before finding a place to temporarily stashing her bag on someone's office chair.

Screw following him with the bag in hand… that near-miss had almost cost her a few years off her life.

IX (Friday the 25th of March, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
Bleary-eyed and still exhausted, Sonya returned to Moscow with more jewels and precious metals than she planned on.

She did successfully pull off the heist in the end, but at the cost of scaling up a ventilation shaft then spending the rest of the night and part of the next morning in the neighboring building’s ventilation shafts with a bulky bag of loot to struggle with.

The jewelry store clerks had secured their stock of gems and metal under the display cases instead of leaving them in the mostly glass with brass fittings showcases, giving her the opportunity to lift them without alerting the lone guard that the store was being robbed under his nose. She had to take twice the amount of time she had planned on including that in her heist, as it took two shots to completely clear out with a guard wandering around, but she did it and got the jeweler's workstation located in the main floor's back room she had originally targeted.

Though she managed to get more than she thought she would and that was good in a way, it also proved to be a very heavy load for a young thief of her stature to manage.

She had waited until well after the robbery had been reported before even twitching from the lip of the vent she had spent more hours on than she was comfortable with inside of. Using the time she would need to make it down the other building’s interior safely to put even more space between the cops showing up and finally leaving the area to widen their search for the thief responsible.

Making her slow and careful way out of the bookstore after changing back into the previous day's clothes had been nerve-wracking, Sonya even got stopped by a operativnik who asked what a young girl was doing wandering around alone that morning and she was forced to bullshit about a visit to a uncle a few streets over on the spot while the stolen goods he was looking for pulled heavily at her shoulders.

Her heart had nearly hammered out of her chest while doing so, but eventually the press of 'more important' things had gotten her dismissed.

The rest of her big heist day was spent sleeping off the late night at the Mafiya maintained safe house, then doling out the cash and a few of the bigger gems she managed to swipe as her tribute for infringing on another group's territory.

Her last day in Kaluga was geared more to sorting out the loot she stole, earmarking a few pieces of actual jewelry for both Lisa and Tatiana and a bar of solid gold for both Arseniy and Dmitriy. If she was a little more certain to Cherep's character and what he would do if given stolen items she might have marked something out for him, but she figured paying for meals and things to do when she visited was safer for the time being.

Sonya would be keeping some of the loose gemstones and two of the ruble coins for herself. It wasn't wise to keep trophies, but... rare old coins. Something she could sell later if she needed cash for something unexpected.

The rest she would fence or liquidate, then pay her thieves’ clan tribute for a couple years with most of what was left and hoard a bit for a nest-egg.

Packing it all back away and in properly hidden locations took some doing, because the quilted blanket with the internal pockets she packed for it ended up too heavy to conceal everything. She had to acquire another and make simple thread loops to contain any noise all that metal would generate, just to ensure that if she was searched she would be able to get away with her loot.

Before she left the town, the tiny thief picked up the day's newspaper just for laughs. Her heist was secondary to the news about the successful launch of satellite Sputnik 5 and its later retrieval, but she was pleased to read about how the animals involved in the launch surviving perfectly fine.

She'd take the paper back with her but didn't plan on holding onto the article detailing the burglary of a mildly popular jewelry store for any longer than a week.

Her return to Moscow went off rather well, her two loot blankets hadn't rated a look beyond noting she had them by the conductor. Arseniy picked her up from the station, easily taking both suspiciously heavy blankets from her and not even twitching at the fact she had an additional one aside the one they sent with her.

Once home and her things were unpacked, she went to the basement with both older Mafiya members to sort out exactly what she had to give as tribute to both their syndicate and them as the ones that trained her. It was only after she started in on the second blanket, ripping the seams and spilling out the rag muffled jewelry and metal on the table set up for her, that Lisa started acting like a proud mother hen over her successful haul. All Arseniy did was smirk himself, but it did get bigger as more loose gems and metal ingots were set down for consideration after the complete jewelry sets.

It took them a few hours, and a bit of guesswork for general values certain pieces could be fenced for, to total up the amount she would be credited with bringing in. Sonya took the opportunity to distribute the tokens of her appreciation to them both under the vor's sharp eye and set aside the other pieces she intended to give Tatiana and Dmitriy.

Discounting the rare old coins that needed specialized fencers to sell or would be just buried somewhere and dug up once things got nice and muddled, she made away with nearly a million rubles in jewelry, gems, and metals. In USSR that might have been a lot, but it was barely a quarter of a million in US dollars.

Arseniy gave a slow nod as he totaled up their guesswork, finally giving Sonya a rare look of approval. "You may get a jeweled moon tattoo over your cat, to show you've successfully pulled off a jewelry heist at night. You could even get a grey dove, or even a pink rose, to show you did it without raising suspicion over your innocence."

"Even if I don't intend to be a jewel thief?" She quietly questioned tiredly, rubbing at her eyes with her left hand. "It's interesting, but something I'm probably not going to do again in a fast hurry."

He gave a dismissive shrug of a shoulder, picking through the heap of precious metal and stones to sort out the intricately designed pieces they would have to either sit on or sell fast. "You have time to waste, the proceeds of this will cover your dues for a few years if you want."

Lisa was pairing up the earrings, clipping them to blank cardstock they kept on hand for making fake business cards when needed for cons. "You can take a break, Sonya. No one can say you didn't earn it."

It was something to at least contemplate, so she gave the two of them a shrug in answer for now.

They were right, though. She had more than a little time to think about it before she had to do something or risk a hitman coming after her for flaking off her duties as an aspiring Mafiya thief.

X (Sunday the 27th of March, 1960. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

After a day simply for rest, and to reset her sleeping pattern to be less 'night owl', Sonya skipped town again to visit Valya's tattoo parlor in Saratov.
The man proved to be greatly impressed that she achieved the rights to be identified as a 'jewel thief' as young as she had. She gave him an opal gemstone in exchange for inking the crystal crescent moon positioned to cradle her kitten.

The man even touched up her first tattoo before she left his rather hidden alcove for tattoo work, because over the last five years she had grown a lot and it was looking both faded and a bit stretched out.

She promised herself that only if she reached her mid-teens without getting caught would she get the white rose on the other side of her cat. Pink wasn't all that impressive, honestly, and she didn’t remotely like the idea of murdering someone just to earn herself red roses.

Then she spent a few hours just wandering around her hometown, merely because she was kind of fascinated to see the differences half a decade had done to the city. She avoided the house she once lived in and general area she spent her first few years wandering around, simply because she was aware she had issues with both her biological parents and didn’t feel like encountering either just yet.

There were doubts now, but not enough to make confronting anyone about her possibly off suspicions.

Instead, she visited a few of the farther early haunts. Noting if they had been re-appropriated or not and by whom.

Her second return to Moscow was quieter than the first time, given she took the morning train out and came back on the evening one.

What she didn't expect was encountering Cherep, or Cherep encountering a few Mafiya members that didn't think he was amusing.

Sonya dumbly watched from the shadows as one of the drunk and tattooed men take a swing at her friend, absently noting they had prison tats instead of the professional ones her syndicate had their members get.

There were drunk Mafiya vory on the street... in a territory she was sure they weren't allowed to wander freely... disturbing the quiet street, likely drawing the wrong kind of attention to themselves and the baby-Mafiya-in-training in the neighborhood, and they were harassing her friend.

As far as being a Mafiya member went, she wasn't particularly violent. She slapped and punched her friends, lightly, but didn't go out of her way to harm others if she could avoid it. The one thing that always seemed odd to her was her deep appreciation for the combat training they were given, especially the staff training she had bargained for years ago. She had loved it, badgering vor Aleksandr for every bit he might know and asking around for anyone else that might be able to teach her.

Using that combat training as it was intended had never really crossed her mind, other than ensuring Tatiana's sometimes big mouth didn't end up harming her unnecessarily. The staff-training she had begged for but only got a small amount of had been more a curiosity to her than something she had planned on ever using.

Staff training she promptly put into use with someone's discarded rake, after quietly breaking off the metal head affixed to one end.

Sonya leapt in to wallop one of the men across the face without much issue, sliding her thin body between that man and his two friends and her own friend. The fact Cherep didn't even squeak at her sudden arrival was mentally filed away to be questioned later, because they had a bigger problem.

The vory she had just defied were all killers, given the general guideline of what tattoo meant what the tiny thief could identify that much at a glance. A knife through the neck was a killer for hire, one had the 243 police badge across the back of one hand that was for assaulting police officers and a collection of skull tats for murders on his chest, and the third had the Celtic cross style crosshairs that meant hitman scrawled across his back.

Thankfully, the hitman was the one laid out cold by her first strike. She wasn't too sure how well she would have held up against him if he wasn't drunk and caught completely off-guard. As it was his two friends/underlings/drinking buddies were apparently the easily offended and aggressively drunk types, Sonya had difficulty fending them off even as wasted as they were.

They outweighed her, would've had a longer reach without the length of wood she had appropriated as a weapon, and were more used to fighting with the other as a team than she was fighting two opponents at the same time. The fact they were intoxicated was really the only reason she managed to buy any amount of time or even survived the first exchange of blows.

The vor with the police battery tat finally managed to gain a brain cell or two to use, a very disturbing grin crossing his dirty face before he abruptly spun to reach pass her for Cherep.

Who had stood there behind her like a moron and Sonya swore to herself that she would teach him what not to do in a fight the very next day… if they survived.

Desperate and a little terrified of the situation about to develop with her friend in the middle, she slammed a two-handed swing down on his arm even as she mule-kicked his partner in crime away from her for breathing room to use.

She was as surprised as everyone else when her double-handed blow managed to break a man's forearm and her kick knocked the other Mafiya man backwards into a brick wall. She still retained the presence of mind to drop the wood to grab Cherep and haul ass out of there before anyone else could recover, but a very nasty suspicion started weaseling into her thoughts even as her friend finally started trying to keep up with her.

As a not even ten-year-old girl, she was nowhere near strong enough for what she managed to do not a minute ago.

She tried to tell herself it was just the adrenalin. People could do awesome things when in fear of their or someone else's life, right?

It was coincidence, the kid technically named 'skull' behind her wasn't going to be cursed as a rainbow baby for years and there was no such thing as multicolored Mafia fire that could bend reality.

Chapter End Notes

AN#2 : Promised Translations

Vorovskoy Mir – Thieves' World, Russian term for the underworld
Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one’s peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).

GULAG – was the government agency that administered the main Soviet forced labor camp systems during the Stalin era, from the 1930s until the 1950s.

Vory Kod – Thieves Code (I made it up, seeing as the Ponyatiya doesn't exactly fit in with the KHR! world developments)

Uchastkovyi – Quarter Policeman, someone who maintains close relations with the residents of his quarter and gather information among them. In particular, uchastkovyi should personally know each and every ex-convict, substance abuser, young hooligan etc. in given quarter, and visit them regularly for preemptive influence.

Militsiya – A kind of paramilitary law enforcement, less military and more police in nature.

Maloletka – Used to mean little slut in this usage (lit. underage girl)

Operativnik – Detective/Investigator of the KGB

Edit Corrections - Had to change the Family based build I originally had, due to the fact Russia's underworld are structured more like gangs or clans rather than the Italian Families and one reader pointed that my way didn't fit as well as it should. Still not quite a reflection of real-life mafia, but closer now. I also screwed up the GULAG acronym use, I'm American... sue me. Also corrected some of the translations, as it implied the wrong thing about the terms used.
First and foremost, a few story mechanics got challenged by a reviewer over on FF.Net and a couple things got tweaked in response after that very long discussion. Thankfully it's not a major change, but there is a little difference in terms and such so you may wish to reread the first chapter to see what.

Secondly, because I have to make this expressly clear, this is not real life. I will tie in history and how a very well connected Mafia impacted it, next chapter, but the Russian Mafiya you read in here is not the Russian Mafia in real life. There were several reasons why, but it mostly boiled down to the fact Omertà is somehow a world-wide law in KHR! enforced by creepy undead dudes with a bondage fetish. Which, if you didn't know, kind of goes against the Vory z Zakone values where if asked if you are vor, you have to respond that you are even if the police are recording you doing it. That being said, I pretty much started out using a kind of base in the Italian Mafia and thinking of how that model had spread out and trying to tie in Russian values. Which, again, got challenged a bit by one reviewer who knows the lifestyle I'm trying to represent here due to his work in the police in the same region.

Totally okay with me, actually. Entirely fascinating discussion, that.

That all being said, be warned my Russian Grammar sucks major butt. I have an awesome reviewer that is perfectly willing to challenge my usage of it, and I'm perfectly happy for corrections if you find any. Which will probably mean that if I do use Fenya, it will either be cringe worthy horrible or spot on by complete mistake.

XI (Sunday the 27th of March, 1960 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya managed to slow her panic-fueled flight eventually, snagging a firm hold on her errant friend before he darted past her.

She wanted some answers, particularly why Cherep had stood there like a moron instead of run for his life when confronted with three vory. Drunk off their ass ones, but they were still Mafiya men who worked the wet-work side of the criminal world she found herself in.

True killers that had been shamelessly arrested for it, one that worked for hire and one of the others worked within his own syndicate.

One look at the purple boy's oddly pale but flushed face told her that getting her answers would take a bit of finesse and probably a heaping amount of tact.

"Explain."

Pity for him she apparently had no tactful bone in her body when upset.
He was almost bent in half much like he had been just after they first met, hands on his knees and thin shoulders heaving like a bellows, trying to regain the breath he lost bolting after her down the darker Moscow streets to prevent anyone following them. He couldn't verbally answer her, but Sonya was familiar enough with his flailing habits to glean the idea that he hadn't intended for that to happen.

However, he didn't immediately deny any actual involvement with the vory from what she could infer from his motions.

"Were you looking for them?" If she sounded a bit betrayed and a little panicked, she figured she could be excused.

As she had never really cared to figure out why Cherep accepted her bothering him on random days, merely assuming he appreciated the company as much as she did. He didn't have that slick edge to him most of the Mafiya members she knew of possessed, and he wasn't likely to develop that given she had refused to pull him into her life to any degree.

She visited him, not the other way around.

The fact Cherep was a dork, was clumsy, was nearly painfully honest in his reactions, all of it made her appreciate the measure of normality he gave her very skewed life.

Which was incredibly childish of her, she knew, but two years had gone by and nothing more had come of her bugging him it was one of few options as to why he never protested left to pick from.

Sonya wasn't sure what to do if he tried to take advantage of her, either her skills or just her presence in his life for whatever reason. The sickly feeling that she might have misjudged him settled in her gut, and she stared at him blankly until the other kid finally managed a sentence.

In the semi-dark of twilight, his surprisingly vibrantly purple eyes glared out at her as he straightened up slightly. "I-I… was… looking for… you."

She blinked grey eyes at the half-bitten out rebuttal, a little nonplussed by that fact.

He knew she was Mafiya?

Since when?

"Why?"

Here he flushed redder, more than simply exertion would account for. "You… were acting oddly."

She kept staring at him blankly, causing the slightly older preteen to throw his hands in the air in a fit of pique only to bury them into his unique hair and tug as he figured out how to phrase everything he wanted to say.

"Usually you only have a few hours free to come see me once or twice a month, yet you spent a whole day with me after one of your usual visits. I figured something was up later that night, but when you didn't come back…” He trailed off uncertainly, stubbornly not looking at her anymore.

The urge to smack her own face with a hand was growing. It hadn't even been a week since she last saw him, which was typical for her usual habits. Cherep apparently got worried for her, when she broke said typical habits just because there had been a very real risk of getting caught on her heist and wanted to ensure she got her Cherep-time.
It was stupid fluffy friendship concern, and so a-dork-able of him.

Emphasis on the stupid.

"Please don't tell me you walked up to the first member of the Mafiya you found and asked for me by name."

The flush on his face turned into a blush that nearly glowed fire engine red in the dim lighting.

Sonya was torn between beating her head in on the brick walls hemming them in the alley on both sides and smacking him for the near heart attack she almost had.

"Cherep… skull, crossbones, and tombstone tattoos all mean that vor is a murderer. Same with dots on the hands. The number they have is how many they have done for the Mafiya, or how many they want to brag about or keep track of." The little thief informed him bluntly, cradling her now pounding terror-induced headache with both hands. Looking at him was out of the question, she would burst out laughing and probably make her headache worse, so she stared at her own palms and kept her voice level. "The police badge on a hand or arm means police battery. Just… keep that in mind and don't do that again. Especially don't go up to drunk ones."

With any decent amount of luck, those three drunk Mafiya men wouldn't recall the scuffle or what started it. She didn't believe in luck though, she believed in Arseniy and his probably violent reaction to the news they had been screwing around in territory that didn't belong to them.

Sonya, Tatiana, Lisa, and Arseniy belonged to the Zolotov Thieves Clan, known for their skilled thieves and strong presence in the middle-class suburbs of a wealthy neighborhood in Moscow. The younger thief of her ‘foster’ family rather suspected she lived not quite on the outskirts of the edges of the Zolotov claimed territory, far enough away from the main locations to be less suspicious to the militsiya but close enough in case of any true emergency.

Zolotovs had actual professionally given tattoos on their members. They did allow the prison given tats that, she knew from a different lifetime, were infamous for spreading diseases like syphilis and AIDS to mar their members' skin but only if arrested and in prison. Otherwise you got it done in the much more sanitary tattoo shops they protected, no exceptions.

Being thankful for that fact alone was more than enough for her to report the three probably fresh from jail vor to the older Mafiya members she knew.

The fact those three went after her friend no matter if he had started it was another, thieves were not known to be generous.

In fact, thieves by nature were sometimes malicious and always greedy creatures.

She, even after taking into consideration her unusual circumstances, was not unusual for a Mafiya trained thief. Arseniy was pretty much a typical vor as well, he could be just as cruel and greedy as most if more experienced and respected than she was.

Even if reporting the three vor, who could have easily wandered down the wrong street by mistake after stumbling out of a bar, would likely end up killing one of them neither Sonya nor her ‘foster father’ would lose much sleep over it.

A vor was expected to retain their control, no matter what they drank or what drugs they took. These had not, and that would be all that she needed to ensure they paid for what they did.

She abruptly dropped her hands, giving Cherep one last look to ensure he knew how foolish she found his recent actions. "Whatever. Come on, let's get you home."

He gave her that same seething wet-cat look she earned when needling him about something he did that proved to be less than ideal. She was alright with that, because it had been stupid and at least he knew it now.

"Sonya? You are okay, right?"

She managed to break someone's arm with a piece of wood and kicked someone hard enough they dented a brick wall, all because he had no sense of self-preservation.

"I…? Am fantastic." Assured the tiny thief tiredly with a flat tone. "I left Moscow for a couple days, Cherep, and it could've taken longer than it did. So I visited because it might've been a long while before I got back."

"…oh."

XII (Monday the 28th of March, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Arseniy's expression could have been carved from stone as the man listened to what reasoning Sonya had to violate her curfew. All that had been planned on was her getting her tattoos added to, something that would take only a few hours factoring in the round trip by train.

Her detour to rescue Cherep's skin and walk him home had not been calculated into her plans for the day.

She knew full well the purple boy's safety wasn't a good excuse, the older two Mafiya members knew she had no plans on pulling him into their world therefore she shouldn't put him before them and their lifestyle if she wanted to keep out of trouble.

Three obviously drunk Mafiya vory harassing her friend in Zolotov territory was a good one, even if she had to inform Arseniy about the brick wall denting after she kicked one into it. He'd figure it out anyways when he went to deal with the interlopers, lying would do nothing but get her into trouble with him for attempting to lie in his face.

Worse, getting caught doing it.

From the complete lack of expression on the vory's face, she was in enough trouble to being with.

The older man left shortly after she told him the street and approximate location she had seen the three drunk vory. Sonya had to accept the matter as dealt with unless he said otherwise when he got back. She really didn't want to know any detail other than if they survived the night or not.

Lisa gave her and Tatiana a bland smile and suggested they go to bed since it was so late. They did so without word, because when the older woman got bland like that it meant she was upset and that just made Arseniy more than a little aggravated when it happened.

Tatiana pulled her to a stop just before they entered their respective rooms. "Sonya? Were you hurt?"

"Bruises, mostly." The younger girl admitted, rubbing one wrist that might be sprained. "I'm a little scuffed up, but alright."
She might not have felt them during or just after the fight, but she felt every ache and bruise right after getting Cherep back to his dingy little home and the last of her adrenalin drained away. They ensured she held no illusions about just how lucky she had been that the three killers had been both heavily drunk and probably fresh from prison, had they not been she might not have done more than get herself majorly hurt or probably dead again.

There would be a very colorful collection of bruises on her skin by morning, and she didn't really want to think about how much they would hurt then.

Ballet practice and the gymnastic training were going to be hell tomorrow.

Tatiana frowned at her but didn't protest Sonya leaving her in the hallway for her own room.

The exchange gave the younger Mafiya girl some hope for their relationship, just as the silver charm bracelet the older girl was wearing did. She hadn't been sure if she would accept anything from her given the small jealousy problem Tatiana still had, but the bracelet she stole for her first heist was still on the redhead's slender wrist.

Maybe the older girl had grown out of it a little?

She was almost a teenager.

Sonya wanted her foster sister back the way she had been.

XIII (Thursday the 31st of March, 1960. Aleksandr's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Dragging Cherep to vor Aleksandr’s for the first time later that week was partially interesting and mostly irritating, partly because the kid only stopped protesting once she succeeded in dragging him to the rather remarkably normal looking home and mostly due to the complications she ran into.

Sonya presented her purely civilian, purple haired and eyed friend to the old vor and asked, "How hard do you think teaching him basic self-defense will be?"

The ancient and battered looking man, who had been the one to teach her most of her fighting skills alongside several other hot-headed young baby Mafiya, took one look at Cherep's pretty to the point of being almost-girlish features and just sighed heavily through his nose.

Admittedly the older boy just looked like he wanted to be anywhere else but right there with them, his expression more resigned than agitated much to her amusement. Apparently, he was alright with her introducing him to other Mafiya members even after almost having the brains smacked out of him earlier that same week by a few others.

Either he had no sense of self-preservation or he really did trust her that much.

"You intend to do this?" Rumbled the grizzled vor, dismissing the preteen for the equally young thief.

Sonya supposed she was the greater threat of the two of them and gave the old man a half-nod part-shrug. "Thinking about it, yeah. Why?"

He looked the so far silent Cherep over, and she copied him to figure out what he was after.
As Aleksandr was the man who taught her to fight, who still expected her to develop her skills more even if she quickly outstripped what he could teach her about her chosen weapon, she did trust his mostly non-verbal assessment of the challenge ahead of her. The old vor, and he was pushing either the lower or greater edge of fifty given his massive collection of scars, tattoos, and grey hair, used fighting with some of the older children as a punishment for the idiot baby Mafiya who thought a weapon in their hand made them unbeatable right away and didn't need training to use it. They generally didn't last long against Sonya, who had been training to use her weapon for nearly half a decade.

Cherep's entire form was practically screaming an unwillingness to be here, if no fear or terror to account for why. The fact he was still here even when it was apparent he didn't want to be gave him few points from the look of things.

He had probably watched as the boy allowed Sonya to manhandle him into his underground training hall without a word of protest, and how he was still standing there without speaking up in any kind of protest of her intent. Aleksandr probably thought Cherep had little to no backbone, and while that might be true it wasn't the best impression her friend could give a character like the man in charge of training budding criminal elements to kick some significant ass in time.

Then again, she hadn't been much better starting off… and now she could hold her own in a fight against two drunk and surprised vory in her own right.

"I may have heard from a little birdy that you managed something a little unusual a few nights ago." Spoke up the old vor, still eyeing the increasingly wary boy child before him. "Think you can do it again?"

She scowled a little at the reminder, since she had yet to figure out anything decisive about that moment of unusual strength she used a few nights ago. Logic would dictate that trying to repeat the feat would give her a more solid answer either way, but she really didn't want her recent fears to be confirmed.

If any of that mess was true it might end up helping her a little… but that would mean it was possible her Cherep was that Skull and he would be rather miserable in a cursed-baby way and she would have to let that happen.

...no. Fuck that. He was hers first.

"I can try, why?"

Aleksandr gave her a bland and very unpracticed smile, which made her suspicious.

Sonya didn't know what he would've asked from her to train her friend in basic self-defense, it was the whole reason she had intended to teach Cherep herself. This, though… wasn't an earth-shaking favor, but still something that would probably annoy the older man. He had more than enough to do training the children in the Zolotov's Mafiya version of a 'big brother' program to at least be less easy prey for when they were older.

The Zolotov Clan gave children with either no family or bad homes a new place to live and grow up within, in return said children grew up with a lot of loyalty to them. The bulk of which would become their next generation of Mafiya members, the rest would support the clan in different ways but would probably chose to bite off their own tongues instead of endangering the rest of them.

Aleksandr's implied suggestion wasn't much of a favor, and Cherep wasn't presenting himself as any type of diligent student.
Therefore, Sonya suspected something else was going on. "No, seriously. Why?"

"If you can do it again in front of me, I'll train your little kitten."

The young thief hesitated for a long moment. "Fine."

She still couldn't figure out how that equaled the favor of training her friend, but if he wanted to…

Cherep wasn't letting go of her wrist, though.

She turned to see what he was doing and frowned slightly at her pinched-faced friend. "Cherep? What?"

"Are you sure you want to do this?" He asked her, one eye warily trained on the old vor but mostly turned so he could see her too. "You can… uh, teach me, can't you?"

"I can, but Aleksandr is better. He taught me." That bit didn't address whatever it was that he was now highly concerned over and she scowled more, literally drawing a blank over what else might be bothering him.

The purple haired kid still looked incredibly uncomfortable with the whole idea and was still holding onto her wrist tightly enough she might be losing circulation in it.

"She doesn't have much of a choice, malchik." Aleksandr informed them both quietly, looking Cherep over keenly as if he had done something impressive but surprising against his expectations. "Arseniy knows she did it once, and what he knows eventually gets back to the rest of the clan. That might be what's taking him so long to come back, they're going to want that. It might be worse to stall off confirming she can do it if they become impatient."

Sonya was missing something. She didn't particularly like the feeling.

Her mostly civilian friend didn't look comforted by the information, in fact he looked downright upset, but he let her go anyways.

Giving him a twistedly bitter smirk that fit his aged face much better than the bland expression had, the old vor turned back to the blonde thief and gestured deeper into his basement-level training room. "Well? Hop to it."

Confused, suspicious, and feeling like she somehow stepped on a landmine, she did so.

The walls of the basement were lined with racks of wooden weapons, replicas of things that could be used in a fight and actual training weapons for teaching the use of. There were very few staffs, mostly there were a couple lengths of wood over in the racks used for showcasing things one could use in a pinch if a cleaning supply closet was at hand.

This was where she learned how to fight with a broom handle, or more to the point the shaft of a rake, if she didn't have her own weapon on her.

Which she didn't tend to carry around, as hiding a thick pole of wood taller than her was an exercise in futility.

She pulled out one of the broom handles, because it was the most like what she used that night. "It might take me a bit. I still have no idea what I did."

"We have all day." Aleksandr informed her calmly. "I can even help you get back into the mindset, if you tell me what you were thinking."

Sonya might not know what was going on, but she also wasn't that stupid. If she told him she had been scared for Cherep's sake, he'd probably use that and threaten the kid.

He might have trained her up, but she wasn't his favorite student. She was just one of many that he taught.

"I'll muddle through somehow."

XIV (Thursday the 31st of March, 1960 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep dragged her off the moment Aleksandr let them go for the day. Mulishly pulling her along in a reversal of how they arrived to the old vor's home, even if he was nursing probably bruised ribs and she was a bit more than winded.

Sonya put up with it because she was both curious and confused, and from the sound of it he might know a little of what was going on. She had her own suspicions, no matter how much she would like to deny it.

Once was happenstance, twice was a coincidence, but three times was an established pattern.

The vagueness and the hinting around threw her off a little, but even if her more remote suspicions were true… if her Cherep was that Skull, Sonya needed to know so she could plan for it. Additionally, that information might make an impact on her plans for herself and her line of work but that was at most a secondary concern when lined up against cursed rainbow babies.

There was also that thread of hysteria and panic lacing her thoughts that needed to be dealt with, as well. She was trying not to dwell on that though.

The purple haired preteen dragged her past her own home and in the opposite direction from the place he rented out a room at, she suspected he was aiming for one of the rare parks on the edge of the city for whatever it was he wanted. She was proven right too.

He ignored the pointed looks from the few childminders and parents out and about, collecting their charges for dinner or bedtime because it had been late already when Aleksandr allowed them to leave for the day. He also ignored the fact she didn't tend to allow him to manhandle her anywhere usually but was going along with him now.

She did so because the kid had been stiff and wary since their conversation with the old vor, meaning he probably knew a bit about what was going on and she wanted to know what the hell was going on.

"A-are you sure, Sonya? I-I mean," Cherep was stubbornly not looking at her even as he finally came to a stop in a little semi-glade carefully cultivated probably with the idea of late teenager couples in mind, "you don't have to do… that just for…"

"To ensure you'll be able to defend yourself from any more ideas of yours that go wrong?" She asked dryly, taking a couple steps farther when he let her go so she could turn and look at her friend fully. "Cherep… what is this all about? You're a little too stiff to not know anything."
He hunched his shoulders in response, keeping his vibrantly violet eyes away from her.

That was… alarming.

The other boy didn't tend to do quiet, unless he was highly uncomfortable or upset. Normally, she heard every grievance, opinion, or preferences he had with either her or the situation they were in no matter where they were or what they were doing.

It was more of a challenge to keep him from talking her ear off than to figure out what he thought about any given topic. His childish protests and rants were mostly amusing, if rather stark reminders she wasn't exactly the child she appeared to be.

Twenty years of extra maturing in another life tended to do that to a person.

"All I know is what happened to me." He told her slowly, looking nowhere near comfortable with the topic at hand. In fact, he looked rather like he wanted to do anything to throw the whole conversation off. "B-but if it's anything like that, then this isn't going to end well for you."

Sonya inspected her friend's face, pursing her lips and seriously considering if she really wanted to hear this or not. "What happened?"

"…my parents killed me."

As it turned out, Cherep had been first killed on accident and the near heart attack number two he caused her was unintentional. Other than the whole 'he was part of a statistical anomaly in childhood deaths', it really wasn't quite as bad as he had made it sound.

Sonya didn't quite know if she was more upset that something lethal had happened to her friend or if it was more that she couldn't explain that one away as any type of coincidence. She decided to go with the first one just simply because it made her feel less shallow.

An undead, immortal Skull. One being able to do certain things that weren't physically possible.

A very well developed, almost business-like type of Mafiya that skirted around the legal side of the world easily enough from what she had seen.

It did explain what her friend was up to, in that he was obviously not Russian by birth but in Moscow anyways. His accent had been only one of many things that made her think foreigner by birth but getting that confirmed was less amusing than she had counted on.

The whole story the other child told her boiled down to freaking out his parents with his non-death when he had clearly been dead after getting knocked down a flight of stairs, a series of shady doctor types stalking him for his undead abilities, and a kidnapping gone strange. His early life on the street before she showed up had merely hammered the weirder points of his life home, in that no matter how hard it got or how badly he got injured he would still end up physically fine given some time.

At least the kidnapping had informed him a little about what he had managed to do but getting stranded in a country not his own had complicated a lot.
All he knew for sure was that his abilities fitted into a certain type his once kidnappers had been looking for, he was unusually strong in said ability, and that others who displayed the same 'unique' skills were highly prized for some reason to the point there being a trade of such people flourishing. Fitting that with what Sonya knew from Rachel's leisure pursuits from another life didn't paint a very pretty picture for her or him.

Well... at least she now knew he really didn't have any self-preservation instincts to speak of.

Cherep literally couldn't die.

What did he care if anyone tried to off him?

It wasn't like they would succeed or anything.

The tiny thief took a deep breath, cradling her head in her hands because if she looked at him...

"So... huh."

The purple haired preteen across from her in the park's clearing fidgeted with his hands in her field of view, and without looking she knew he was cringing. That made her wonder if he tried to tell anyone else before her, and what had happened when he tried.

Probably not a whole lot of good things, honestly.

"Look, I understand that you can't die. But I don't ever want to see it, so you're still doing the whole self-defense thing." Sonya informed him slowly, raising her head to give him her best 'no-nonsense' look. Which sharpened up into a nasty glare when he opened his mouth to protest. "No, Cherep. I'd rather you didn't die, regardless of how temporary it is or not."

Because that was still terrifying to think about happening at all.

If she taught him a little now, then later when...

No. Cherep was her friend first. Screw everyone else, she found him first.

Baby rainbow curses could be dealt with later. Right now, she was only going to deal with herself and him and possibly her own Mafiya ties next. She would need information, a lot more information, before she could start thinking on anything else.

"...you don't think it's creepy?"

"It is creepy, and a little morbid." Allowed the slightly younger girl slowly, raking a hand through her hair. "So what? Apparently, I can do something a little similar too. Sucks to be us."

He snorted, a miserable expression on his girlish face. "Tell me about it."

"I just did, tupitsa."

She needed to either sit down and try to dredge up everything she knew of this world from some stupid comic book in her last life or sit down with Lisa and grill that woman for answers she might be able to use.

Rachel's life might not actually be much help, other than a very general guideline of what not to involve herself in a couple decades down the line, because Sonya didn't recall a whole lot from that. It had been nearly a decade since she had last thought of it, the details were damn blurry now.

It wasn't like she had known it was going to become so majorly important, and keeping notes of the future in a massive multilingual and privacy deficit neighborhood like hers...

Before this life, it hadn't been anything more than a pleasant diversion when she read the story and watched the anime. What her new life was apparently based from was just a fraction of what it had covered, and it hadn't been the only anime Rachel had been enamored with.

Hell, Sonya recalled more of Naruto's plotline and Inuyasha's cast than she recalled what her own life's apparent 'storyline' held in store for her.

Alas, the lack of silver-haired hotties in her life.

It made her wonder what story her last life had been a fraction of, and if she could find out here.

Either way, this life would probably hold the answers she couldn't recall anymore. All she had to remember was the 'Strongest Seven of the Era' would end up cursed babies until the Tenth Vongola candidate did something to fix the damn issue and avoid pissing off anyone along those lines. Which she might just end up part of, given she had apparently no intention to abandon Cherep to his future misery alone.

Wasn't there a time-travel war thing going on sometime between all of that?

Well… she'd figure it out eventually…

"Right… we're screwed, but at least we're going down together." Forcibly redirecting her thoughts, mostly because there was little more she could do about them for the moment, she refocused back on the other kid. "You ever think of trying to go home, Cherep? Your parents should still be alive, right?"

Looking a little blindsided from the change of topic, the boy shrugged at her in response without much care. "I've never really thought of it. They were… terrified of me by the end, Sonya. I think the whole fact I was kidnapped might actually have been a bit of a blessing to them."

"They might have been terrified for you, you know."

"I'm pretty sure it wasn't that way around, actually." Cherep looked damn depressed in his sopping wet kitten way by that too, which made her not want to try asking him to check just in case.

Well, he wouldn't be the first kid to run away from home… no matter what kind of help he had gotten getting away. Although she was sure there was more to that story than just 'I managed to get away a few days later'.

She was content to leave the options he had available up to him though, as she wasn't exactly the poster girl for family ties either. The very least she intended to do was wrestle his old address out of him and go double check, he might like getting his birth records to help him out and his birthday was coming up.

"Whatever. Go home, Cherep. I'll drag you back to Aleksandr's tomorrow, sometime after noon."

Her dork of a friend picked himself up off the ground with a small frown. "You're sticking around, then?"

He was also very carefully not looking at her again.

She beat back her desire to wing a rock at his messy purple hair for such a stupid question.
Cherep was annoyingly abuse-able, no wonder Reborn and that blond sniper dude did it regularly… and why did that make her want to hate the two of them?

She wasn't exactly better in that she did it too…

"Yes. You're stuck with me. Suffer my random visits gracefully, it won't end even on your deathbed… since apparently that'll never happen."

"And you're fussing over me from a distance? Cause I saw all the money you stuck on me, Sonya."

The idiot beamed at her, squawking and running for it when she rose up to her own feet and reached for a nearby fallen branch.

XVI (Friday the 1st of April, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Mafia Land?" Lisa echoed, a faint thread of surprise in her tone as she served up dinner to the empty place for the vor of the house before herself. "It's not really all it's cracked up to be, Sonya."

Well, if she ever really needed solid confirmation after talking to her purple haired friend… that was it.

"I've been there once, myself." Continued the older woman absently, either not noticing the face the youngest was pulling or not caring. "It's… not exactly much different than any other vacation destination, just less vagueness is needed to avoid getting arrested. It's perfectly acceptable to wander around with a fully loaded assault rifle, just so long as no one loosely classified as 'visitor' and 'innocent' dies from it."

Tatiana had been blindsided by this topic of conversation, but perfectly willing to continue it.

"Really?"

Their foster mother shrugged, waving around the fork she was eating with as she chewed. "It's basically an amusement park for mafia members, what do you expect?"

"Less stupidity?" Sonya tried, still wondering how such a thing had come to be… and how it hadn't been shut down yet.

Privately owned land maybe?

Who owned it, then?

"It's a good place to network a little, too." Lisa informed them both with a sly smirk. "There's Guild Halls for a whole lot of branches of underworld dealings, and countless other Mafia Families and Syndicates tend to scope out new blood there. We might actually go for a visit once Tatiana starts working."

The young blonde wanted to smash her head into their dining room table, in contrast the redhead looked excited. "Really?"

"You both should probably scope out the Thieves' Hall a little. I don't think you'd want to try that out, Tatiana, but Sonya might find it more to her liking."

Confused, she looked up at that news.
The brunette gave her a small smile from across their kitchen table. "Taking contracts to steal things for others will either convince you to go back to soloing what you want to do or find yourself a niche you like. You might even like bounty hunting or taking up hitman contracts, just promise me you'll try it out at the very least."

"Can we do that?" Tatiana butted in before the other girl could process that, looking and sounding bewildered.

"So long as you pay your dues to the Zolotov Clan? Of course." The very bitter note in her voice had both young girls staring at her in surprise. Lisa's smile had turned a touch brittle suddenly. "We're female, we'll never attain the vor status unlike the men. As far as most Mafyia syndicates on this end of the world care, we're support at most and arm candy at worse."

Apparently, women's suffrage hadn't quite reached the underworld just yet… or at least hadn’t reached them out in the USSR’s criminal underbelly. Sonya supposed that was why the older woman didn't have the status Arseniy did, even if they were about the same general age.

Well, their world was rather male dominated.

Tatiana was more surprised than her at the news, and probably more disgruntled. The physically younger of the two of them had put together the fact that all the vor they knew were male and every female was either married or merely making income for their clan and come to that realization. It hadn't bothered her much, seeing at this life wasn't really her original goal in the first place and she was perfectly fine with just 'thief' and not a 'thief-in-law'.

Her eleven-soon-to-be-twelve-year-old preteen ‘elder sister’ was probably realizing that only the boys she worked with in her little ring of thieves would get that label. Likely galling in a way when the group was mostly her own work in pulling little Mafiya brats together for large stakes heists later in their lives.

Before their discussion could continue the only male member of the household finally returned from wherever he had been, giving his partner a look that only Sonya's extra life experience allowed her to interpret. Arseniy was giving Lisa a 'why do you do that to yourself' look, edged in some downright rare exasperation.

She figured that a possible hang-up of gender in the Mafiya was an old topic for the two of them, and it was equally possible they knew each other from very early in their lives. It was even possible they knew each other since the same period in Sonya's and Tatiana's lives, and that was why a vor like Arseniy was teaching a pack of idiotic brats how to be Mafiya as Lisa taught them other equally important skills.

She found that kind of history together rather awesome and wondered if she, Tatiana, and Dmitriy would have something similar in a decade's worth of time.

The man thumped a thin book down next to her plate, a leather-bound affair with no obvious title, and wandered into the kitchen for a drink to go with his own food.

Despite the rule about reading at the dinner table, Sonya cracked it open to see what it was about. Cramp handwriting sprawled out in a neat hand mark every page she got a good look at.

"Sonya." Called the older woman with a frown, giving the volume in her hand a once over of her own. "You know better."
XVII (Monday the 4th of April, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa’s home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana didn’t start out a petty thief like Sonya had, the orphan had been earmarked to become a con-artist by her Zolotov recruiter. She could have gotten one of the card suit tattoos, but… kitty.

She had been the best of the crop in her recruited group, gone after because she had no parents to raise her but had a remarkable charisma that let her talk her way out of a lot of things in and around her orphanage, before a tiny blonde girl got tossed into the mix suddenly.

Sonya had not been expected at all, by anyone.

The man who had brought her in all those years ago had looked to be a relative of hers, and while giving up an unwanted or at-risk child to the Mafiya for their protection wasn’t unheard of... Tatiana hadn’t expected to see it happen in front of her.

That had been why the redhead took the initiative to approach the little girl, who she expected to be upset or scared by what she got shoved into with probably little to no warning.

She found out fast that Sonya had been neither frightened nor upset at all. The tiny midget, shortest girl there by virtue of her shockingly young age, had looked bored.

It wasn't by any means the first sign that whatever the blonde had escaped had aged her past her scant few years, the younger girl was like a morbid old woman in a child's body. The redhead had floundered trying to connect with her little foster sister, because she was both too old and too young at the same time as well as hard to talk to.

Sonya didn't play dress-up or play games at all, the closest the girl had to a leisure pursuit was reading novels and wandering around the city. She also usually had all the emotional range of a block of ice unless something interested her, or the situation was somewhat serious.

She also fucked off for long stretches of time, either not wanting to be in a house for a few hours or just to wander about. It made it hard to have a casual conversation with her, or even see her for more than just the mandatory stuff.

Tatiana gave up trying to get to know her after getting fostered together for a full year. Sonya seemed to do well as a socially retarded little prodigy, or if not well seemed content with what she had by then. Somehow one of her old friends from the orphanage managed to get the girl to talk to him for more than just the minimum, and that donkey’s butt Dmitriy refused to explain how he managed that minor miracle, so she had decided to respect the younger girl's choices and move on.

No matter how mature or understanding she liked to think of herself, it did hurt to be sometimes effortlessly outdone in certain subjects they were taught. Sonya always had little problems learning new lessons, barring history which she tended to screw up frequently, and with her natural quietness she had been stealthy long before they were fostered.

The thief skills were the only time the blonde lagged slightly behind her, while the younger girl was a better pickpocket and lockpick than her it was the redhead who was better at cracking safes and forging documents. She was better at the more 'hard-core' skills than 'petty', which their talents seemed to differ.

However, the little thief was also successfully stealing at a very early age. Nimble fingers coupled with her young face meant she could wander around at will and pull a decent amount of money in, to start paying back vor Arseniy for allowing the girls to live with him for what was left of their childhood.

Her first wake up call, that hinted maybe her icy little foster sister wasn’t as content as she appeared to be, was when she finally made her own friend outside of their collective group.

Cherep was practically the opposite of Sonya in almost every way, slightly clumsy and brightly cheerful instead of contained and reserved. Jarringly, the boy made the girl smirk and on one occasion actually crack a smile... and was the topic of the first non-awkward conversation between the two foster sisters in nearly two years' worth of time.

Tatiana had the thought maybe she had approached the other girl wrong. Instead of trying to bond over things she liked, maybe she should try finding something the little thief liked that she could get into.

Which didn't work out too well, because the girl was still a damn block of ice in terms of personality unless a purple colored kid was somewhere nearby. Sonya was also surprisingly protective of Cherep and his civilian lifestyle, which made it hard to see if she could befriend the boy too.

The slightly older redhead had to remind herself her little foster sister was socially inept in a lot of ways, and it was possible the younger girl just didn't know how to connect to another girl. Therefore, she refused to give up as easily as she had before because if Sonya had to start stalking her best friend in order to get him to accept her as one it was totally possible that it required something drastic to show the girl Tatiana wanted to be her friend and sister too.

She didn't think it was working until the other girl came back from her first successful heist, which was galling in its own way because the blonde was two years younger than her.

The charm bracelet had been one of the many little trinkets the younger thief had brought back with her. Getting presented with it was the first sign that Sonya thought something of Tatiana and her opinion, and the semi-hopeful but wary look she wore when she presented the present to her made the redhead think she was possibly getting somewhere.

She probably wasn't the greatest foster sister in existence, because she had pretty much abandoned her little sister to her own devices for years before realizing that probably hadn't been what the other girl wanted. However, she was still trying and the five years they had lived together allowed the redhead to read some of the tics the blonde had.

When Sonya came home one night, looking as if someone had shoved one of her practice staffs down her spine, Tatiana at least knew something was wrong. She spent a whole moment trying to recall what the younger girl had claimed she was going to do that day, then figured there was something wrong with her friend Cherep.

Since the two of them still couldn't communicate at all well without very awkward pauses or floundering for more topics, she took that conclusion to Lisa instead of asking her foster sister. Their foster mother agreed to ask about it and did so a day later, but she was a little surprised that whatever it had been had them both going to Arseniy with it.

That discussion took less than an hour, and she was still wondering why Cherep was suddenly living with them.

XVIII (Tuesday the 5th of April, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Union)
"He's a little scary." Cherep informed her inanely, still clutching what little belongings he had to his name to his chest instead of putting it away in the drawers being made available to him.

Sonya was still a little confused herself, so she figured his own hesitance over the whole situation was allowable. "Arseniy is only scary when he's angry, and that only happens if you actually try to piss him off or do something stupid. He's just usually surly seeming by nature, you'll get used to it."

The thief was not sure why the Mafiya vor had ordered her to relocate her friend to their house, but she did appreciate it anyways. The man hadn't twitched at learning her reasoning for not helping the purple boy out of his slum hole of an apartment, but his expression had gotten rather ticked off when she got into why she was sure he'd probably not be able to get out of it without help she was only then planning on giving him.

Some of what he told her in confidence had to be relayed to the vor, but she was hoping he'd forgive her that. She had stuck to the kidnapping, and the possible experimentation, rather than admitting to the still gut-twisting 'undeath' thing.

The kid kind of needed his paperwork, his birth certificate and traveling papers to explain where he came from and why he was in the USSR and not his native country of Czechoslovakia.

Sonya had planned on doing a heist in his hometown to get those, then asking either Lisa or Tatiana to mock up what else he would need to legitimize himself… but apparently Arseniy decided to take care of that all himself.

She might need to go out of the country to lift Cherep's paperwork from wherever it had gotten to, but she would only have to if her foster father struck out on his end now.

Speaking of certain redheads, Tatiana appeared from the staircase and flounced over to the guest room… which she now supposed was the boy's bedroom.

The older girl cheerfully ignored the purple haired kid's wary look and her semi-suspicious stare boring a hole into the side of her head at her arrival, flashing them both a small grin. "Isn't this great? Now we have a foster brother!"

"Eh?"

Sonya ignored Cherep's less than articulate response and shrugged. "At least Arseniy's no longer the only male in the house and Lisa might actually stop suggesting on a girls' day out for us all."

"Aw… that would be fun." She pouted at the younger thief, and after a beat turned back to the bewildered boy still standing in the middle of his new room. "So, hi! I'm Tatiana, Sonya's older foster sister. You're Cherep, right? Least, that's what she claimed your name was."

"It is." He confirmed slowly, still looking at the older girl like she was some new type of bug that had suddenly popped up out of the woodwork. "I didn't know Sonya had a sister… or that she was fostered."

"Yeah well, Sonya's social skills are a little… bad. You'll have to forgive her that."

What?

"I've noticed." Cherep reassured her dryly, a small smirk pulling up one side of his mouth.
Sonya blankly blinked at them both, still confused from before and now a little lost.

There was nothing wrong with her social skills.

"Do you think you can translate for me? Cause I've known her a few years now and I still have trouble holding a conversation with her."

"I've found that you can't wait for her to respond, because she won't usually. Just keep talking, Sonya will listen for as long as you do."

Tatiana had a look of dawning realization on her face as she spun to her with a very wide grin. "You're shy!"

"…what?"

"I didn't realize… you're always so self-contained and confident. Sonya, you don't have to be shy around me." Getting grabbed and smashed into the preteen's non-existent chest was a new if uncomfortable experience for her, the older girl also didn't seem too interested in letting the physically younger thief go. "That would explain why you're so quiet, didn't you have friends before we got taken in? I bet you didn't."

Well… no she didn't, but that was more because of the twenty years of another life getting dumped on her head during that time. She might have got out a lot, but there wasn't a whole lot of socializing going on at the same time.

Tatiana pushed her away, only far as her arm's reach unfortunately. "That explains so much. I can't believe you're shy."

"I'm not." She protested slowly, frowning up at her. "I just don't talk much."

Cherep made a noise, which sounded like a cross between a snort and a laugh. The blonde hoped he hurt himself, because although she didn't understand how the older girl came up with her theory she knew the kid hadn't helped at all.

XIX (Friday the 8th of April, 1960. Aleksandr's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You didn't tell him all of it?"

"Did you want me to?"

Cherep blinked his wide purple eyes at her blankly, jaw slightly unhinged. "But…"

"I could fix that, if you want." Sonya informed him easily, still a little sour over the misunderstanding he had perpetuated with her foster sister. She tapped the butt of her makeshift staff against the ground to be sure of its purchase against the hard concrete ground, stretching out her aching legs.

She was still trying to figure out the Flame stuff by using her own minor experience with the incident in Aleksandr's basement training hall. If a few very odd facts hadn't been confirmed independently, she might have been able to brush off the one possible use of her own.

Something as bewildering as the existence of Mafia Land was a very pointed suggestion that certain things she had been slightly afraid of were true.

He might just need that information sometime in the future, so she was going to suck it up and figure the damn thing out without him having to die again to learn something.

There was also that book Arseniy gave her… she should probably investigate that thing too instead of skeptically skirt around it suspiciously.

"Why?"

She gave a sideways look, then sighed through her nose. "Because."

Cherep still looked like he didn't understand, which made her feel slightly insulted.

The brat had told her about his undeath in confidence, out of worry for her and what she might be getting into. Why the hell did he expect her to turn around and tell everyone?

He had been kidnapped for that, keeping the information to only those that needed to know was just common sense.

She pushed herself up stiffly, using her staff as a cane out of respect for her still tender calf muscles. Before he could do more than squawk at the sudden moment the old vor who ran the training hall summoned him back over for his own lessons, effectively ending their conversation about what she had and had not told others about him.

A bit too irritated to appreciate the thought of the bruises the poor purple haired kid would walk away from the hall with, Aleksandr wasn't a gentle teacher and the man had taken it upon himself to teach Cherep how to defend himself, she went back to what she had been doing.

While her mind set wasn't conducive to experimentation, the stress relief in using her borrowed staff against the practice dummies was greatly appreciated. Sonya pretty much failed to think of anything but their little mini-argument and in the process of working out her irritation with the boy she might have hit the straw filled burlap sack a bit too hard.

Which naturally meant she broke the shaft of wood she had been using clean in half and the dummy somehow made a small crater in Aleksandr's training hall floor.

Somehow.

Like she had somehow kicked a man into cracking a brick wall one dark night.

She heaved a tired sigh, using the broken off end of her staff to poke the mess of straw out of the way to see what damage she had caused. It was one thing to suspect, another to learn it was possible, and an entirely different thing to see it happen again.

Aleksandr's voice coming from right behind her nearly made the young thief jump out of her skin. "I think a break might be in order, Sonya."

"Arseniy gave me a book, I think I'll read that before trying this again." At least she now knew she was either on the right track or close enough.

The old vor gave a completely noncommittal hum, eyeing the damage in his floor over her head.
XX (Saturday the 9th of April, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The book Arseniy gave her was a handwritten diary of a Dying Will Flame user, a Rain from about three hundred years ago.

Sonya despaired over her future for a full hour before getting past the first page.

While it was fascinating from a purely historical standpoint to read about a guardsman named Milos, one of the Regent Sofia Alexeevna’s personal guard and his daily exploits serving as a wall-figure in her court, there was little in the way of actual information she could use to figure out what she had done and what Flame she had.

Although the journal was something she could blindly stare at while she dredged her own memories from her time as Rachel for any hints of what to do, the tiny details that filled the accountings of one man's day filled in a couple holes for her.

From what little she could recall from her other life, it was called Dying Will because the ability was unlocked by using willpower that typically was mustered either at the edge of death or in defiance of it. Like she possibly defied the idea of Cherep's death before she learned he'd never have that issue.

That wasn't really something Sonya excelled in… given her lack of motivation all around. Dying and remembering it had dampened a lot of her previous personality into a laid back, quiet, loner type who didn't tend to make connections well. Tatiana and Dmitriy were exceptions merely because they both approached her and made the initial effort to get to know her.

Cherep was merely the exception to just about everything, freaky coloring and abilities included.

She figured it was either karma or irony that she would just suck at having willpower, and of course her only specifically chosen friend would come with a bucketful of difficulties.

As both Rachel and Sonya, she had pretty much gone with the flow of life. She had never bucked the system laid out for her until this one, and only because her eye caught on her brand-new foster brother's odd coloring and she got curious.

She supposed she could try defying her assigned role as a thief of the Mafyia, but that just sounded suicidal rather than anything else.

It was entirely possible for her to get out of her current lifestyle, just not realistic. A whole whopping nine years of age did not an adult make, and the Zolotov clan ran their little 'youth outreach' program with the aim of collecting new blood and skills from the lower-class and slum children who just needed a little something better to flourish from. Either a new home when they had none or a broken one, or a bit of guidance from someone actually taking the time to listen and teach them.

Her own situation was… possibly not what she had assumed it to be but given the conversation she overheard the night before her father took her to a warehouse-turned-tattoo-parlor there had been very little else she could make any assumptions from. The fact it was now five years into her new life and no one had yet to say anything about her mother's plan to sell her off to satisfy a debt just made Sonya a little wary of what had happened and what it might really mean.

That would probably not end well when it raised its ugly head, but there was little she could do if her initial assumption was wrong but wait and find out.

Other than finding her biological father and asking, but Sonya wasn't sure if she wanted to know and the man had told her not to go back to Saratov. Which she already flouted once, getting her tattoos touched up and added to in her hometown.

As it was, she had a measure of protection in the Mafiya rather than outside of it. That same protection had been extended to Cherep, who was pretty much allowed to come and go as he wanted and would probably only be known to have Zolotov sympathies in the fullness of time.

Unless he really wanted to get into anything himself, but Sonya was pretty sure that wouldn't happen unless something drastic happened to him.

"Sonya?" Lisa interrupted the young thief's train of thought when she poked her head into the girl's room. "Aren't you usually out and about by now?"

"Usually," Agreed the still youngest foster child wryly, wondering what panic attack her foster brother/best friend would have next since he was kicked out for combat training without her, "but this is... confusing."

"How so?"

Grabbing hold of the opportunity to ask questions with both hands, because one did not question the head of a Mafiya household lightly, she sat upright on her bed and turned to her elder. "Why was I given a book? Doesn't anyone know how to use this... stuff?"

"There used to be, but for some reason Dying Will Flame users have been light on the ground for the last century or so." The older brunette informed her easily enough, rubbing the back of her neck as she took the steps needed to enter the room fully. "The lack of any real users stymied a whole lot of things that used to rely on them, until the rare few that could use that stuff were guarded jealously by the ones who claimed them. Within our own group there aren't any others available to teach you anything. We'd have to ask another syndicate if you want actual instruction, and that carries with it a whole lot of risks."

Sonya had figured some of that out herself, given that Cherep had gotten kidnapped for his own talents.

The news of a decline was new to her, but that made a small amount of sense coupled with a twohundred-year gap between the sets of cursed rainbow babies. Which had its own mention in her journal, as apparently an oddly short Frenchman by the name of Pierre-Antoine Carpentier had once been 'the Storm Arcobaleno' and a friend of Regent Alexeevna.

That had prompted her to vow to take a very long look at a world history book or two, because there might be another reason why Lisa thought she was bad at history other than simply because her memories of Rachel's schooling was going and she had once learned America's version of it.

"Sonya?"

The young thief rubbed her face with her hands. "I'll figure something out, Lisa."

"Ask if you need to, sweetie. We might be able to get a few questions answered if we're careful."

Sonya heaved a sigh as the older woman left her bedroom.

She needed more willpower. Neither Sonya nor Rachel were willful in personality, right now it was likely she had next to none.

How did one build up willpower?
From what she recalled from her past life’s leisure activities, either by near-death experiences or over the top training… and that was only if she was willing to take a cartoon as the ultimate authority in her second attempt at life. Which she wasn’t intending to do, because of that all so wonderful term ‘artistic license' that might have twisted a few things from the reality she was now living in.

Sonya would take what little of the storyline she recalled and the names of the major characters and plan around that, but the story's less than clear occurrences might be enough to trip her up if she relied too heavily on that.

If she was going to take her current experiences as truth, then on both occasions when she had done something outside the realm of physical possibility she had been either scared or irritated to the point of distraction. Which was a very strong hint, but both emotions involved a kind of tunnel vision that would probably end up being lethal for her.

Which would also probably scar Cherep for life, and not something she wanted to do.

Flipping a couple pages of her book absently while still mentally assembling what she knew was possible against what she knew was truth, the tiny thief wondered what to do now.

Arcobalenos, Dying Will Flames, Mafia Land, an undead Skull verses a highly developed and organized Mafia underground that spread out over all corners of the world, possibly undead Mafia Enforcers, her own possible use of Flames, and thirty to forty years before Vongola's Decimo begins to move around and shakes up a few things.

Her friend probably had a little more or less than a decade before the Strongest Seven were assembled, whatever amount of time they would spend together, then the rest of that time he and several others would be cursed to baby form. Which meant she had just as little time to think up some way for the brat to support himself like that… and the only place that wouldn’t blink twice at pint-sized adults in a baby’s body would probably only be the Mafia.

Probably all thanks to Reborn's efforts and reputation as the World's Greatest Hitman.

…Sonya was pretty sure that would not start well at all. Cherep wasn’t Mafia, or even Mafiya like her, and she still couldn’t think of him that way no matter how hard she tried. He was just too nice and honest for that to work well for him.

Then again… with his initial circumstances, he might not have had any real options. A Czech boy in Moscow wouldn’t have known how to navigate around and find a Mafiya group that would take him in and not expect him to join up as soon as he was old enough.

Arseniy had taken the undead boy in and between the Mafiya members in the house they would probably set him up so he’d have options before sounding him out for the Zolotovs. He was probably a year or so older than Sonya who was already working as a source of income for her clan, but probably not much younger than Tatiana who was almost ready to start working with the rest of her ragtag gang of thieves.

…so, what was going to happen now?

Chapter End Notes

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one’s peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).

Militsiya – A kind of paramilitary law enforcement, less military and more police in nature.

Malchik – Little Boy

Tupitsa - Means dullard, bonehead, dunce, numskull. The general meaning is stupid and dumb.
As a warning, there will be 'historic errors' in the future. Mainly they are supposed to be there, but this is part of the story where our main character starts to note a few things are off from the history she recalls. Sonya will not catch all of them, but there will be bits and pieces you might be able to catch before she ever has the inkling there is something not right. We will eventually get to and cover the main ones in story.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

XXI (Friday the 3rd of June, 1960. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

To be honest Sonya didn't expect Cherep to protest, fuss, or come up with any sudden or not objections to the new living arrangements.

Being wrong in that at least forced her to pay a little more attention to her civilian friend and what made his personality up.

Through the two years they had known each other as mostly casual friends, neither had pressed the other's boundaries anywhere near the point a few months of living together under the same roof did. She wasn't exactly the most stellar example for using social niceties in existence, she didn't tend to talk more than once or twice a day before he started living with them, and he had a few issues himself over exactly what he could or could not do when it came to her.

That was before the fact his best and probably only friend was an unrepentant crook got shoved into his face in a way he could neither deny nor refute. He may have noticed before, but she hadn't ever been so frank with what she did in front of him. There was no real way to hide it, not with how their home was run and what training the girls still did on occasion.

She found out that Cherep wasn't inherently nasty, morally numb, or cruel minded enough to be indifferent to that. The most Sonya would say if pressed was that he was a wimpy pushover who was also way too nice for his own good. Which stood to reason that he would have a few moral problems with the fact she regularly robbed people of their petty cash and anything else of value they carried daily.

Worse yet, she robbed people and she got praised for it... or, at the very least, wasn't scolded for doing such. In front of him. Usually with a comment or two about how much she brought in or what they would like her to look for the next day she had little else to do.

Rachel might have seen the world like Cherep once, in shades of color but mainly in black and white. There were good people and bad people and Rachel had tried to be good, only to end up as a statistic of a good girl killed by someone who could have not meant to but hadn't changed a thing in the end.

Sonya, Mafiya foster child and budding thief, had that worldview shattered into tiny pieces before she could even walk. She knew just because one person said 'crime' and another said 'livelihood' it didn't mean either were wrong, they were just different perspectives across similar lines society drew out in shades of legality and morals.
Arseniy wasn't a nice or a good man. He was probably a murderer in his own right, had vices that could make a pastor weep, and seemed perfectly content like that. Lisa, for all that she tried to seem neutral and caring at the same time, had her own problems and struggles that she was only recently come to realize existed. Tatiana never really seemed to have an issue with what they were in training to do with their lives, Sonya didn't know if she really had no problems or not due to the fact they weren't all that close.

Cherep, getting suddenly shoved into a Mafiya household as he had, was only seeing the very end results of nearly half a decade of work the girls had put into their prospective jobs. Half a decade of social conditioning and training to be able to be thieves for the clan and live perfectly content with the consequences.

The tiny blonde tried to keep that in mind as she listened to him babble on while they people watched from a park bench, and the fact he still thought in 'good vs bad' terms rather than 'this faction vs that faction'. Trying to remind herself that he probably didn't know what he was asking of her, and she shouldn't hold it against him until someone with enough patience went through it with him.

Technically she should really be picking out marks to rob, but her still newish foster brother insisted they were 'people watching' and like to point out that robbing people just encouraged them to steal or cheat from others to get back what they lost.

It was a very interesting way to phrase 'an eye for an eye', at least.

"Why can't you just go after other criminals?"

Sonya gave up the pretense of watching for her next mark and buried her face in her hands, all the while thinking of the varied and many ways that suggestion could go wrong.

Beyond the fact that there was a kind of social pretense in place for all the Mafiya brats she knew in the neighborhood, a collective assumption of 'us against them' and a very shallow type of brotherhood of thieves still in the process of being worked into place, they all were still Mafiya. Vory, for all that Sonya would never actually hold that title due to her gender, had their own ways of fixing disruptions in their Motherland. Getting hauled into a council of vory and her actions being judged through the lens of hardened murderers wasn't exactly her idea of 'keeping her head down'.

Even if she was encouraged to steal from others, stealing from another Mafiya brat would gain her a reputation that would cause the other kids to avoid dealing with her. Which would just harm her in the long run, when she started getting into different jobs that might need different skills to handle.

She might be acrobatic and a deft hand at both pickpocketing as well as lock picks, but she knew safecracking would just get harder as time went on unless she poured a massive amount of time and energy into honing that skill. Tatiana was better than her in that, would probably continue to be better than her in it, and stealing a safe instead of opening it on site might just be something she would have to deal with decades down the line.

If she turned her foster sister against her by stealing from her little ring of thieves before they ever left their foster home, she would probably be forced to go to someone else with the right safecracking skills she might need that she wouldn't trust nearly as much as the redhead.

There was also the fact forgeries needed a well-developed network to be useful for more than a single use, and Lisa was teaching the older girl how to maintain her network if needed. Sonya didn't have the skills there either, as being sociable was a large part of that and she greatly preferred dealing with her foster sister to dealing with individuals she didn't know nor could get face to face with.
"Cherep, trust me when I say that will not be possible for a couple years yet… if at all."

"But you're going to think about it?" Her purple haired friend pressed, heedless of the worries that would dump on her.

"Sure, whatever."

Maybe if he thought he could 'reform' her she could actually get something to bring home today.

XXII (Wednesday the 27th of July, 1960. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

She knew, the same way she knew the sun would rise in the east and would set in the west, that when Cherep brought up maybe changing who she stole from the next time he got unnerved by the Mafiya overtones of their home life that Sonya would be hearing about the idea for the next couple of years.

…or however long she could get away with having her best friend at hand and not off by himself doing god knows what that might cause his undead/undying issue to come up again.

He was an odd fit in a Mafiya household, because besides the combat training he faithfully tagged along on and a couple of the gymnastic lessons when Aleksandr could force him into going he didn't attend any of the other general Mafiya or thieves’ lessons still ongoing on top of anything else.

She and Tatiana didn't have to attend nearly as many of those thieves’ lessons as they used to, even if they occurred under the same roof they all lived under. The blonde girl had blanket permission to miss as many as she wished if she was doing something productive since her first heist, and the redhead was in the beginning stages of planning for her first with the rest of her team.

While Cherep knew they went on, and that both girls had attended them for nearly half a decade, he never actually had to be in the house for them nor meet more than just a few of the Mafiya members in the neighborhood.

Sonya had no problems dragging him out so the older and more aggressive Mafiya brats around wouldn't catch sight of him.

Arseniy was providing him with some protection, a roof over his head, and three square meals a day for however long the kid decided he may need the help. Mostly for free, as he was a kid in some distress and a friend of hers, while the man took a hard look at his past and parents to ensure what happened to him never happened to anyone else... but it was more Sonya's job to ensure he kept out of trouble and out of anything he might regret later. It was her who brought Cherep to the vor's attention, and she was pretty much his only friend still with the semi-intentional isolation going on.

Additionally, she wasn't the most popular in the neighborhood. That distinction belonged to another, a friend of Dmitriy's that made her skin crawl for no apparent reason other than the sleazy charm that seemed to ooze off the kid. Bullying wasn't much of an issue, more of a non-issue since they were all combat trained at least at a basic level and encouraged to take care of any major fights under Aleksandr's weathered eye.

Cherep, unfortunately, was playing catch up in the worst way and would probably be considered a weakness she needed to deal with or rid herself of.
Targeting that weakness would be any Mafiya brat's first move if they ever had an issue with her, or even if they respected her. Admiration and envy went hand in hand, her maybe slightly unusual skills and young age hadn't earned her any favor among her peers. Her lack of social interactions had ruined what was left, to the point she was rather unpopular with her fellow Mafiya brats.

"To be bluntly honest, trying that around here would probably just make things hard on me without any real cause for it." She was forced to inform him one night, when the class Arseniy was holding would probably overrun by an hour or two more than usual and so she took him a bit further afield than normal.

On the edge of another Mafiya group's territory, but they would be safe enough if they held to the more universal vory z zakone principles and didn't make waves or trouble while in foreign territory.

"Why?" He even had the gall to look depressed by her flat refusal, in that stupid kitten way that made him look even more girly than usual.

Sonya felt like she had just sucker punched him in the stomach after kicking his puppy, and she hadn't even done anything to warrant either the look or feeling. It was the downside of being friends with him, and she hadn't even known she had heartstrings left to pull after everything else she had been through as both Rachel and Sonya.

"Because even if I'm as careful as possible, that would inevitably piss off someone who has Mafiya connections. That person would alert his or her contacts, I'll eventually end up with a bad reputation of stealing what my fellow thieves stole, and probably might end with my death before long if I'm not lucky."

She had really considered it only once, well before she had become resigned to the fact she would be a Zolotov thief, but the drawbacks outweighed the risks of that method to pander to her battered morals. It wasn't an original idea, someone else had tried.

Keyword: tried.

She didn't know what happened to that kid who stole from his fellow Mafiya foster children, no one did. All she knew was that he wasn't there anymore, either kicked out or sent somewhere else or worse.

Though, she was kind of doubting that worst part, given Cherep's situation and status as a fellow houseguest. Even her own situation made her doubt, if her presence in Moscow really had been because her father wanted to spare her whatever her mother's intentions were instead of satisfying her debt thing with someone in the Mafiya.

He still abandoned her without so much as a backwards glance, fuck him too.

"Everyone you can think of has connections like that?" It was a valid question, for all that it sounded like he was grasping for straws to keep his idea afloat.

Sonya answered him anyways. "Around here? Yes. It was why I had to leave Moscow in the first place. Before I could go after bigger targets, I would need practice. The only practice around here are my fellow Zolotov members, and that's just like shooting myself in the foot."

Cherep obviously hadn't thought of his suggestion/plead in the terms of 'steal from' paired with 'Arseniy' yet, but he seemed to be making up time in that from how white he blanched. That really wasn't the best thing to think about, she knew it just as well as the violence the man could wear like clothing when he had a reason for it.
She did at least throw her friend a bone, because it had been a valid suggestion if not a good one. "I can't do that now but ask again in a few years and we'll see."

He blinked.

"We… or at least I, don't plan on spending my whole life here. While hunting in my own home ground is a bad idea, hunting in someone else's might not be. Depending."

She still intended to avoid the Vongola and its allied Famiglias with all due caution, but that was just a large chunk of Europe and some of Japan. The Americas, the Far East, Africa, and an innumerable amount of smaller countries in between were still places she could go.

He looked thoughtful, so she cautiously assumed he wouldn't mind either tagging along with her or her tagging along with him for a few years.

XXIII (Monday the 8th of August, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep naturally had very low expectations. Something honestly earned over his short life so far.

That way he couldn't be surprised or disappointed, and it generally worked for most things.

Somehow, he had survived his own death without permanent impairment to either life or limb which was alright… but his parents had become frightened of him to the point both had to be in the same room with him or neither would be, which hadn't been. Getting kidnapped a little more than a year or so later hadn't been all that great either, but he did finally stumble on someplace to call home where he wasn't feared or flinched from so that balanced out a little. Living alone as a street rat had been hard, but then Sonya took an interest in him and cared a little just in her own strange way making everything that much easier on him.

Her turning out to be a thief in a Mafiya clan was almost unsurprising in the end.

Now, Cherep was still waiting for the other shoe to drop.

He wasn't yet one more beggar child lurking in the streets anymore, or homeless and going hungry like he had been before even that… or the possibly devil possessed child they would never be rid of his parents had thought of him when it all started.

He couldn't figure out if his new circumstances were a good thing or not.

On one hand, Arseniy was scary as sin, but he didn't have much to do with the man whose home he lived in now. He somehow now had foster sisters, one elder and a younger one no matter the face Sonya pulled at being called so by Tatiana. Lisa was nice enough but reserved and a little bland with him, which was kind of understandable.

On the other was the glaring fact he lived in a home of Mafiya members.

That his 'new baby sister' stole at all cast all the help she had given him over the last couple years in a very strange light. The money alone… he knew, now, that she had probably stole it and most of what she had robbed others of had gone to Arseniy and what little she kept as a twisted kind of allowance had gone to him.

It was a bit heartbreaking and thoughtful all at once. The only help she knew how to give was twisted up into the Mafiya already, and she was only a few months shy of her tenth birthday.

At least she didn't seem to mind that he wasn't at all alright with what she had done, was in the process of doing, and training to do with her life.

The only bright spot in the murky situation was that he wasn't expected to follow along into criminal activity even if he did live with Mafiya members. The combat and gymnastic training seemed to be compulsory for everyone, which he didn't mind doing so long as Sonya went with him at the very least.

She might be up to the point of trying to shatter an iron pole in her own training while he learned the basics of self-defense, but that was alright with him. The USSR, including Moscow itself, wasn't crime free, ironically enough not because the neighborhood contained many Mafiya members. Self-defense would probably eventually pay off later on and prevent his new baby sister from stressing out over him more than she had already.

What it seemed he was expected to do was... nothing he hadn't already been doing. Which made Cherep feel rather dubious over the whole situation.

From what Sonya had informed him, Arseniy had been the one to order her to bring him home. Why seemed to be because he might be at risk for another kidnapping attempt from what he understood from it. For how long seemed to be until the youngest foster sibling decided to leave home herself, or possibly even a little later given the lack of pushing to find other arrangements he was going through.

Lisa, the woman that kept the household running and very patiently helped all three children in their education, had been eyeing him speculatively lately so that may change sometime soon.

He was still confused, though. Even more when a copy of his birth certificate, a passport he wasn't sure if he never got, and immigration papers he was very certain he never had before got pressed on him one day by Tatiana.

At least he was legally in the country now.

XXIV (Thursday the 13th of October, 1960. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Adolph Hitler had been assassinated.

Sonya spent a whole half hour blankly staring at the history book she finally actually paid a decent amount of attention to, that she had thought would only need a glance over or two to refresh her knowledge of history. Tracing the same few lines repeatedly with her eyes out of sheer disbelief.

Hitler had apparently been killed a whole year earlier than if he was left to commit suicide, if what she recalled from Rachel's schooling was correct.

The results seemed to have been a mix bag honestly, making her wonder if it had been a good thing or not.

While if Hitler was left to suicide on his own terms, the Third Reich fell apart and a good portion of Germany collectively tried to distance itself from the Nazi ideals as far as possible. There had been the remains of the previous party lingering around which even eventually leached into even America's, highly paranoid at the time, culture via white supremacy groups… but it never got much popularity as a school of thought due to the horrors linked to it.

Nasty and horrifying because it was a world war against a genocidal war regime no matter how you looked at it, letting the notorious dictator commit suicide seemed to have been the best option from what she could see now from what would've occurred otherwise.

The changes made from assassination a year early included the fact many Nazi sympathizers deciding their dead Führer was some sort of a holy martyr for their cause and dragged WWII out a few more years. They had about a year, year and a half, to cover their tracks when it seemed as if their cause was destined to lose no matter how they tried to do.

Then they went underground with it. Taking their former fellow citizens hostage and continuing the war in a guerrilla kind of way. Which made the casualty totals even greater once the Allied Powers started sifting through to understand what had happened and more importantly how.

The European Jewish survivors of the Holocaust had barely seven digits to them across the former Axis Powers members.

Due to the sheer difficulty in tracking the culprits responsible down, because even with a head start the Nazi Party still got caught with their pants down halfway due to what seemed to be fanatically driven willful blindness, having Nazi sympathies was tantamount to social suicide now.

In both parts of Germany itself, it was still considered treason.

There was even a still ongoing manhunt for any former members of the German Nazi Party even a decade after the war ended, a civilian based hit contract that anyone could get into and not have to abide by the underworld mafia rules Sonya knew from getting lectured on it by Arseniy every month.

She made a mental note to be very careful in Germany if she wanted to see the Berlin Wall fall. If it would fall. The Nazi paranoia in that area alone would make her double check what she said or did.

The longer reaching effects of that event was more interesting, in a way.

The US had a significant number of boots on the ground in China and the USSR for the last year of the fighting, actually working together with the communist societies, when the Germans tried to continue the bloody struggle their Führer had started. Hopelessly, because between the Red Army and half of the American Forces on one side and the rest of the US military forces and the Allied Powers on the other they got crushed rather mercilessly where they tried to hold anyways.

Due to both the horrific toll of the Jewish Concentration Camps and a mingling of American, Chinese, and Russian soldiers which didn't happen in Rachel's time because the US got only as far as China's west coast in the Eastern part of the world, the Cold War hadn't got into the paranoid driven arms race because of somewhat greater understanding and a lingering brothers-in-arms sense from a year's worth of joint operations.

While the Iron Curtain was still a thing, the Cold War was more of a civilian driven space race/government model argument rather than a military buildup fraught with tensions between previously allied countries.

There were still elements of a communism vs capitalism death fight going on, viciously in the business sectors according to the newspaper, and nuke stockpiling all over the place. Spies obviously were busy trading information, counter-espionage efforts were on-going, and it was still treasonous to even speak of maybe defecting to either country, but there was a distinct lack of military or war-based aggression from either side… discounting the proxy-war going on in Vietnam right now.

However, it seemed the true 'public enemy' was more blind fanaticism to any one cause rather than any single physical group.

Almost as if everyone was carefully not being the next Nazi Regime to be dealt with, instead of paranoid warmongers looking for the next threat to fight. It moderated everyone's approaches into more diplomatic tones, and it seemed as if overtures were still cautiously going around for the United Nations' formation.

She couldn't recall when that started up, if that was early or late for the UN’s establishment.

The 'payoff' of an early assassination seemed to be a greater technology development and more diplomatic overtures. With more attention poured into a mostly friendly worldwide race for the stars it meant less was going into watching the military buildup and trying to counter it, most of that seemed to be explained away as recovering from the cost of WWII.

While horrific and terrible to deal with no matter which way it ended, as it was a World War against genocide, the price tag on the other hand… Sonya was rather sure it wasn't worth it for a ten or twenty-year jump start in tech and friendlier relations between nations.

The Jewish people could possibly qualify as an endangered species now, the only reason they had any kind of stable number was only due to their strong presence in America and Africa absorbing their freed European fellows.

Everything in her book was all civilian history. It made her rather reluctant to ask Lisa for what had happened in the underworld while all that was going on.

There were a few more things that directly contradicted what Rachel had known as fact, Italy hadn't been part of the Axis Powers but still not part of the Allied one either. Apparently, the country had been a hot mess through most of the Second World War and no leader lasted more than three to five months during it.

Due to Sonya's Mafiya education she knew the so-called Mafia Wars had been on during that time, a violent scramble that spread from Italy to France and finally into Spain. Ottavia Vongola had apparently beat the Vongola Alliance into shape during that time, ousting those that had violated her terms and firming up a border of Allied Famiglias to contain the madness.

The Mafia Wars had also made all three countries more vulnerable when they were invaded, so it wasn't entirely a good thing either.

France and Italy had been way too busy trying to oust the Nazi Regime that took up their government to continue the Mafia Wars before long. Spain had been the only place the underworld war managed to fight itself out to the bitter dregs. Meaning that to the Mafia worldwide, both countries were still hot and should be avoided unless you had to visit for life or death reasons and there just wasn’t much left of any Spanish Mafia Syndicates once the military finished mopping up their mess.

Given a decade or so that might just change, but even as far north as she was Sonya could still read some of the mess getting reported through the civilian news. If she could hear about it now without too much effort, it probably wasn't safe to go poke yet.
Politically speaking, once the mafia groups in the regions stopped killing each other and went after the invaders, the efforts they put into helping their old governments to get their seats back legitimized them in a way. Those that survived, anyways.

You couldn't award medals to criminals, so mafia cover businesses came to be. A sort of legal fiction in place that was still in use a decade after the fact.

Very little about the whole thing was known in the civilian world now, but Vongola and Cavallone were two names she vaguely recognized. A bit of cautious digging even got her the current CEDEF home office address.

It made her want to laugh, but she caught the hysterical undertones of that impulse and squashed it.

Rachel had studied American history more than European, Sonya resolved to visit the US as soon as she could to see if she could find any other major divergences.

XXV (Wednesday the 28th of December, 1960. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Birthdays were not typically celebrated in their home.

Lisa allowed a sweeter breakfast than they usually ate, and Arseniy patted whichever was the birthday girl on the head when he woke up for the day. There might be cake involved if someone had the time for baking it.

Which was pretty much it, other than the sparse gifts Sonya and Tatiana gave each other on occasion.

She hadn't been expecting anything different for her tenth birthday, and indeed it followed the pattern for the most part.

The redhead had quibbled over the date of her groups' first heist to be home for it, which had been appreciated and slightly touching. The almost twelve-and-a-half-year-old girl even gifted the younger thief with her old set of safecracking tools, which had been appreciated even more. Sonya planned on slipping her current set of lock picks into the older girl's traveling bag later that night as well, so a few more tools to make up for the lack was good.

Cherep managed to find and purchase a gift for her, but she had half expected him to do something like that because he had been putting his purple head together with Lisa lately. That had to be something to do with her or his newly semi-legal paperwork, and there hadn't been much else it could have been about.

While different, because usually it was Sonya gifting things to him like the coat he was fast growing out of, it also made her smile.

The fact it was a Russian history book on the Tsar Dynasties was a little strange but given anything else he had seen her doing lately was combat training or thieving when she could?

It wasn't exactly surprising he defaulted to the more innocent or at least civilian friendly option.

With the lack of anything else to do, and her foster brother's nagging about doing something special for her birthday at the very least, she took him to see a local showing of the Moscow State Circus mostly on a whim.

Sonya was now taking a break from shattering metal or wooden poles and putting holes in Aleksandr's training hall's floor. Something she managed maybe once or twice a night with excessive effort but told her little more about whatever it was she could do besides break bones.

She was toying with the idea of asking for more information for the additional help if she got that cracking-holes thing down to a science, which meant what she had planned on doing for her birthday was out since Cherep wouldn't leave her alone about doing something for it.

Probably because he never had the security or safety to celebrate a birthday for a long time, and he was still young enough that birthdays were special occasions.

However, had she known what that trip would spark she might have kept them both home for a quiet night in.

He was entertained for the most part, which had been the whole point of the thing, but when he spotted the human cannonball act much less the ring of fire motorcycle stunts the only stunt driver there was debuting…

Sonya was sharply reminded of why, in the two-going-on-three years they had known each other, she had never taken him to see any circus performance before.

…he would not shut up about it.

Then, halfway home where she could hide in her room and pretend to go to sleep instead of listening to him talk her ear off, Cherep decided that owning a motorcycle of his own was his new life goal and she needed to hear all about it and what he wanted to do with one.

Although she appreciated the fact there had to be childhood dream involved that turned her friend from a runaway orphan-type into Skull de Mort the Immortal Stuntman… she didn't really need to hear the details of what enticed him into such a perilous field of work.

Nor did she appreciate the fact her birthday present to herself slash bribe to get Cherep to shut up had failed so drastically.

"You're too young to own a motorcycle." The tiny blonde cut him off mid-sentence, rubbing at the temple that throbbed the beginning of her headache.

"There's an age limit?" He yelped in horror, looking as if her poking holes in his plans had mortally wounded him.

She had to look away before she smacked the look off him.

The question also made her think hard if there were any driver limitations around yet… probably not?

"Would your feet even be able to reach the road if you got one of those metal monsters?" She asked instead, stopping a few streets short of her goal and turning to look at him fully. "Aim for getting one around fifteen or so, when you're not a scrawny brat anymore. Until then figure out what you're going to need to keep one running."

"Huh."

"…we do have a garage, a friend of mine called Dmitriy works there. You could probably ask for some mechanical or engineering training too... but be aware that would invite the Zolotovs to ask something from you in return."

Cherep blinked wide purple eyes at her, but Sonya stubbornly kept her gaze off his face.

She'd leave this part up to him, fully aware if she did follow him or he followed her he'd end up dealing with a bit of the underworld in his own right before long. Keeping him out of it when he didn't mind getting pulled in slightly wouldn't help him any, and it was ultimately his choice.

No matter how much she would rather keep him free of it, it was likely no matter what she did he'd end up neck deep anyways.

"I'll... uh, think about it."

XXVI (Monday the 2nd of January, 1961. Dmitriy's garage, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep and Dmitriy got along just fine, especially when they had their heads bent over grubby machinery. They didn't even need introductions, the younger boy got distracted by all the shiny metal things the older one was working on.

Sonya was almost instantly jealous, not used to her best friend not paying the gross of his attention to her when they were in the same area.

After watching her fellow Mafiya fosterling lead her friend around his usual haunt and showing off what projects he had been in the middle of, she had to rephrase that thought to 'she was completely jealous over the boys' instant bonding'.

It had taken Cherep weeks to get used to her showing up to bother him, but not five minutes into meeting Dmitriy they were already buddy-buddy grease monkeys together.

Heaving a nearly silent sigh at herself, she had the mentality of a twenty-something jealousy shouldn't be a thing for her, the young thief retreated to an oil stained and grimy couch. Which she was somewhat sure Dmitriy slept on when he got too caught up in whatever he was elbow deep into.

Cracking open the book Cherep had gotten her, she settled in to read for the time being.

Engines weren't her field of expertise, her knowledge spread just far enough to ensure she got whatever maintained and looked at by professionals when needed. She'd be of no help to either unless they needed her to fetch them tools.

She spent several good hours like that, looking up only if a bit off curse reached her corner of the garage or something heavy and metallic dropped. By the time the two of them stopped for the day, or hour or however long it would be Dmitriy needed to eat and go back to work, the sun was well on its way to setting and Sonya had gone through several generations of Tsars and how they ruled according to the opinion of the author.

Cherep, nursing several small nicks on his fingers and liberally smeared with dirty oil and specks of grease, beamed at her as he all but skipped to where she had set herself up. "Can I come back tomorrow?"

"As long as you know the way," Sonya replied absently, folding over a corner of the page she was on to mark her place, "and only if Dmitriy doesn't mind."

"Wait, you're not going to come with?"

"I should really get back to practicing at Aleksandr's sometime soon." She demurred easily, exchanging a nod with her Mafiya friend. "Dmitriy. You do know this is Cherep, right?"

"Your civilian boy?" Sounding surprised, the oddly swarthy skinned Russian gave the slightly younger boy a searching look as he passed a rag to clean off on. "The one you befriended years ago? Why am I only now meeting him?"

"Because you're probably going to do something stupid, that's why."

Dmitriy grinned sharply at her. "Define stupid."

"I'm ten. He's barely over eleven." She rolled her eyes when the other boy shrugged that off easily. "Cherep's now my foster brother."

"Kinkier things have happened, but I can work with that." He claimed cheerfully, turning to the obviously confused civilian between them. "So… Cherep. Can I talk to you for a moment?"

"Make it fast, we need to be home and check in with Arseniy before full dark."

Dmitriy nodded absently, swinging an arm over Cherep's shoulders and forcibly steering the confused younger boy away a little. Sonya huffed, tucking her book a bit more firmly under her left arm.

Her foster brother's steadily stiffening body language told her all she really needed to know about what he was filling her best friend's head with and resolved to beat her old friend into the floor the next time they had combat training together. Everyone seemed to think she was socially inept, but that was just because she couldn't really connect with the others that had mainly childish mentalities… therefore she didn't try.

"I'm NOT asking Sonya to steal things for me!" Cherep squawked, knocking her out of her thoughts. "So, there's no way in hell I'd ask her to steal for you!"

Alright, maybe she had been a little off in her assumptions. "Dmitriy?"

The complete ass didn't even have the grace to look sheepish. "What? Tools can be expensive, and I don't have the time to go get new ones myself."

"Why not just ask?"

"Because you'd demand a favor in return, Sonya."

She gave her fellow Mafiya fosterling a narrow look, even if she had to give him that point… but there was a difference between asking one Mafiya member to convince another to do one a favor and trying to get a relatively innocent civilian to do it. Distracted as he was, Cherep finally managed one of the moves vor Aleksandr had been trying to drill into him by clumsily twisting out from the arm across his shoulder.

Sonya was sure he had let the purple kid escape him, but she could deal with that.

"You know the others will try, might as well know how he'd jump beforehand." Continued her more Mafiya-connected friend pleasantly, as if she wasn't probably plotting out how many pieces to separate his body into for easy disposal while Cherep scampered behind her to relative safety.

"That's a very pretty excuse. One wonders if you prepared it long before this."

"One would be right to wonder." Dmitriy was still pleasant sounding… mostly.

She was surprised to realize she wasn't too surprised that he could be as self-serving and cold to use an almost stranger to take advantage of her skill set. What she wanted to know was exactly how long had he been intending to do this.

"Then one hopes you are prepared to deal with the consequences of such things." All but purred the tiny thief lowly, probably taking way too much pleasure at how he turned slightly green around the edge of his nearly permanently tanned face.

She had to make an example, so such a thing wouldn't be tried until Cherep could deal with it by himself. He was right, others would try the same thing unless she could scare them off trying it.

"You'll get your tools, but you not only owe me a favor but a stint as my sparring partner. Both to be called in later." She flashed him a completely insincere smile before firmly steering one wide-eyed best friend out of the garage and down the street.

What made the whole situation all the worse was that she couldn't tell if Dmitriy had been honestly trying to help them but covering it up with the stunt he pulled or if the preteen who would probably become a Mafiya carjacker was merely the first to try and use her friendship with a nearly complete civilian to their own benefit.

Sony had known he could be arrogant and a little malicious simply by nature, but he had also been surprisingly brutally honest about it and level-headed for the most part over the past five years. Now she could add opportunistic and slightly callous to the things she knew about the boy.

It wasn't a pleasant realization.

XXVII (Tuesday the 17th of January, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya only belatedly realized she had a lot of books when Tatiana came home after a two-week long absence for her first heist and gifted her with a few more.

Somehow, in some manner that she apparently hadn't paid enough attention to, most of the books in their home were in the younger thief's room. With the three newest ones she had run out of room both in the little bookcase under her window and the stacks of additional books nearby were too high to risk adding more on top of them.

She had everything ranging from fantasy stories to foreign history books now, her latest obsession when it came to the written word, stacked neatly or shelved away in almost every available flat surface she didn't need to walk on.

Objectively thinking about it for a long moment, she realized she had been collecting books for almost all her life. Ever since the dream-nightmares of Rachel's life had started and she had desperately needed a distraction.

Reading had kept her quiet and out of the way and, other than the small obstacle of learning to read Cyrillic script, it had been the first thing she poured her efforts into doing to temporarily escape her twisted reality for a short while. The habit had continued even with the thieving skills she had been taught heaped on top, to the point it culminated into a library-esque room.

Tatiana realized what had made her pause after taking her own gift to her foster sister and was currently in the process of laughing herself sick. Mainly at the younger thief’s deliberation of where to place her new tomes only to become stumped as her options turned out to be already occupied with yet more books. "Just toss them on your bed. We'll go find a crate or something to put all of these in tomorrow."

She gave her the look she felt that suggestion deserved, setting the books next to her bed instead. Unfortunately, she couldn’t slide them under it as it turned out there were even more under there already.

She blankly stared at her latest find, wondering when those got there and if she should go along with the redhead’s suggestion as the preteen cracked up harder.

"What are you even going to do with all of these in a few years?"

"I'll buy myself a library, of course." Sonya retorted without thinking, a little nettled by the teasing and irritated over the fact she hadn't realized she had been hoarding books. "I'll make Cherep hold the deed, but it'll hold everything I might ever want to read."

"Or collect in your magpie like way?" Tatiana tacked on, smirking a fit to crack her face and apparently not interested in the least to allow her foster sister the time to think up a suitable excuse for it all. "I pity anyone who would want to borrow from that library, you're a little terror when someone borrows a book from you."

Was she?

Pausing a full minute trying to think of what she had done the last time her foster siblings wanted to borrow one of her books, the tiny thief stared at the other girl hard. Then she flushed slightly in embarrassment, recalling how much she had lectured her purple haired friend on what she would do if any of the books he borrowed ended up damaged in any way.

There were even a couple mechanical manuals freshly added to one pile because her foster brother had asked if she had any of them, and Sonya was still in the process of planning the acquisition of a couple more.

Heaving a sigh as the older girl left her to try and handle her issue with her room, she decided she might just have a small hoarding problem when it came to books.

Since she did plan on leaving the Mafiya household in as little as a couple years, she probably should start wondering where the hell she was going to store all of it until she had her own place.

XXVIII (Wednesday the 18th of January, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Right," Lisa told all three of the underage children in the house the next morning, "pack the bare essentials to last you all the week. We leave in two days."

Cherep paused in the middle of drowning his pancakes in syrup. "What?"
"We're going on a short little vacation." The woman informed him cheerfully, extending a finger to ensure the syrup he had been in the middle of pouring didn't overflow onto the kitchen table. "I wasn't sure if you would like to come with us or not, but as long as you stick close to Sonya you shouldn't have much difficulty where we're going."

Placing the bottle of maple syrup down now that he had been reminded, the purple haired kid gave her a sideways look. "Where are we going?"

"Mafia Land." Tatiana chirped at him brightly, slathering her own breakfast in enough jam to give her cavities. "Lisa promised to take us once I finished with… eh, well… with what I started."

Sonya nibbled on her toast, warily eyeing the amount of sugar her fellow children were intending to eat. For that reason alone, she decided to make sure she wasn't in the vicinity when the sugar rush kicked in. When Cherep turned wide purple eyes on her, the young thief paused and gave him a questioning look of her own.

"What?"

"The Zolotovs, while not a particularly powerful faction of the Russian Mafiya, are influential enough to be entitled to a short visit once a year for a few of its members." Lisa answered instead of the young blonde, who had a mouthful of toasted bread and didn't really care to try explaining things to him as she wasn't sure herself. "While I don't normally go myself when there is room for extra guests, Sonya did ask about the place and it's not a bad idea to go and let them explore a little. Arseniy has a bit of business to do there for our section's Brigadier, so you three will come with us this time."

He squeaked, sounding almost like he had hiccuped when there was no air in his lungs, then rather robotically started eating while sitting ramrod straight in his chair.

Tatiana gave her little sister a slightly sharp but bright smirk, which was ignored as the physically younger thief busied herself with her teacup.

While his reactions were entirely amusing, she didn't intend to allow herself to fall into the pitfall of abusing her friend to hear or see his rather strangely addictive reactions to certain things. That way lied a slippery slope she wasn't too sure if she could stop herself from traveling if she got far enough. She also intended to keep the redhead from doing it as well, because if she wasn't going to be able to prod such things out of her best friend then her foster sister wasn't going to be able to either.

Petty of her, she knew, but she was surprisingly alright with that.

Lisa was exempt from any retribution Sonya might manage, because that woman not only cooked for them but also had a strong influence on what they did each day. It wasn't worth it to irritate her. Arseniy got a reaction by merely popping up when Cherep didn't expect it, which was almost a daily occurrence, and he still slightly scared all the younger members of the household. Therefore, she wasn't going to bother thinking about it in respect to their foster parents.

Her best friend really did have to learn to stop being so abuse-able, it wasn't good for his health or her future mental stability.

Distracted by her thoughts as she was, she missed him finishing off the stack of sugar-soaked bread he was eating. She did notice when he tugged on her sleeve, because it jarred her cup of tea hard enough to slosh the liquid over her fingers.

Thankfully the black tea had cooled enough she didn't scald her hands. It still earned Cherep a dark look, because it was the closest thing to coffee Lisa would let her have.

"Can I talk to you?"

A sugar-hyper Cherep and a conversation… not the most idea morning she had ever thought of. "Go start packing, I'll be up in a bit."

He bobbed her a nod, giving the older woman a shaky smile and a mumbled thanks for breakfast before darting out of the kitchen.

Tatiana burst into snickers once he had escaped. "That boy… what's wrong with him now?"

"Cherep has a strange way of viewing the world, given what he's lived through." Sonya informed her blandly, considering the last few swallows of tea in her cup and wondering if it would be worth tasting cold tea for the caffeine boost. "I'm still working on him."

"You'd better hurry with that, before he decides you're not worth it." Lisa cautioned the younger thief, clearing away the plates that had been abandoned on the table before setting her own place to eat as well. "I'd hate to see that happen to you two. You're both surprisingly close for a Mafiya-civilian friendship."

Hiding her sudden scowl by draining her cup, as she hadn't really thought of that before, she collected her breakfast dishes to give to the woman before she sat down.

Which was stupid of her to think, because Cherep was his own person and it was entirely possible he'd might just decide to cut ties with her himself. If she was entirely honest with herself, that was more likely than him putting up with a thief for a friend for the rest of his life.

The older woman gave her a thin smile and accepted the empty cup and plate. "Good luck."

Grimly on the inside even if she was striving for calm on the outside, the young blonde gave her a short nod then followed the path her best friend took.

XXIX (Wednesday the 18th of January, 1961 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya wasn't surprised at all Cherep had made exactly no progress on packing, not even pulling out a bag to store his clothes in, and she had dragged her feet making it up to his room.

The kid had his own unique way of protesting, and procrastination was a big part of it.

"Cherep…"

His spine snapped straight, probably popping a few vertebrae while he was at it, and he turned to her with a pinched expression she hadn't ever seen on him before. "Mafia Land?"

"I asked about it nearly half a year ago, Lisa promised to take us after Tatiana started working. Since she finished her first heist, no matter how small it ended up being, we're now due for a visit." She slunk her way cautiously inside his room, taking a perch on his messy and unmade bed. "It might be your only chance to see it. I don't think Arseniy or Lisa will ever take us along again."

"Funny, Sonya, real funny." He gritted out, spinning back around to inspect his room. "Why am I coming along? I really, really don't want to."

"If we don't, the fact a child is living alone might get brought up to a member of the militsiya. Which would bring a whole lot of attention we really don't need to the neighborhood, not all of us here are Mafiya remember."

"But- …it's… mafia. I'm not… at all comfortable with this."

"It's still mainly a vacation destination, Cherep. An amusement park and resort, no matter the lawless members of society it caters to." Crossing her legs underneath her, Sonya set her elbows on her knees and her chin on her palms. "We're not going to be there long, most of the time we'll be gone is traveling there and back. A day to get to the port, an overnight trip by boat, a day to settle in, maybe a day or two poking around, then we'll pack up and leave. The most you have to do is go with, I won't care if you decide to spend the whole trip stubbornly stuck in whatever accommodations we get."

That took a bit of the steel out of his spine, but his frown stubbornly stayed in place. "I'll only do this under protest."

She sighed. "I'll owe you a favor for it."

Cherep blankly stared at her.

"You do know what that means, right?"

"Like how Dmitriy owes you one for that shiny new tool chest, even if you beat the tar out of him?"

"…yeah."

He cocked his head to the side, still considering her. "Then can I ask-"

"I don't owe you that much."

"…so, if you owe me more you might?" He asked instead, a slow smirk pulling the corner of his mouth up.

"…possibly." She intended to never owe her foster brother another favor, at least until she might realistically survive it. Stealing from other crooks would require a whole lot more skill than she had now.

If she was lucky, he might even use that favor up before she ever had to face owing him more.

…how much was being her friend worth?

Probably more than she was comfortable with… but that was way too late to think about. He was kind of a handful anyways, there had to be some balance in her favor on that end.

"So… can I ask you to run away with me and join the circus?"

Her mind literally blanked out for a whole moment. "The circus?"

"You can be an acrobat!" Her colossal dork of a brother nearly cheered, visibly warming to the idea even as he rambled on about her flexibility and putting her skills to some good use. Then he managed to work in his current life goal of owning a motorcycle into his rant, and then wondered aloud how he might end up performing as a stuntman if he could swing it.
It was entirely clichéd, running away to join a circus… much less a Russian circus.

She was also a thief, who apparently would become a carnie thief if she wanted to keep good track of her friend. Well… she did want more range before she continued her career as a criminal.

"I'm still telling Lisa and Arseniy where I'm going, we're going, because running away from them just sounds like a bad idea."

The boy cut himself off with another of his squeaking gasps.

"So, it'll be less of a 'runaway' situation and more of a 'move out' one." Sonya continued rather absently, lifting her chin off her hands so she could bury her face in them as she thought out the process such a move would require. "Damn it all… where the hell are we going to put my books?"

He stared at her for a long, silent moment. A snicker started it then, apparently, he couldn't hold it in anymore and burst out laughing at her… or her question, she couldn't tell.

"So…" He continued some time later, after both Lisa and Tatiana checked in on them to ensure he hadn't pulled something in his hilarity. "I'll go to this Mafia Land in return for you coming with me when I leave?"

"Sure… hell, why not?" She considered their situation carefully even as she made the rather flippant reply.

Cherep made a rather gangly looking eleven-year-old, and she was just shy past ten herself. They both didn't have much to their names, other than her entire collection of books that could probably get paired down a little if she discarded the easier to acquire copies. She'd have to figure out where to stash the bulk of that before they left the house...

Realistically speaking, it wouldn't be possible for a few years. Once he hit thirteen or fourteen, around or over Tatiana's age, it might happen if he could pass himself off as just a younger looking fifteen or sixteen. He was currently a foot or so too short to claim he merely had slow growth spurts, which didn't even get into Sonya's lack of vertical height or her still rather baby fat padded features.

All in all, two or so more years wasn't that far away… for her at least, Her foster brother might have a different opinion on that.

"I want veto rights to what circus we join. I can probably do a better background check then you can."

"Eh?"

"Just… pick a couple you think might be what you want, and I'll ensure they won't take advantage of us."

"Oh." Cherep blinked at his floor a few times, then smirked at her. "I'm glad you're coming with me."

"Don't thank me yet, we have yet to go anywhere." She slipped off his bed, stretching out a little as her ballet-sore muscles protested the movement. "Hurry up and pack."

XXX (Friday the 20th of January, 1961. Mafia Land.)
The travel to the port city they were catching the ship at was mostly uneventful, other than the fact it was Cherep's first time on a train.

The cruise ship that took them to the island Mafia Land was situated on was a first for all three of the younger members of their party, even Sonya who had Rachel's memories to draw from.

Unfortunately for Tatiana, the preteen proved to be one of those that got seasick easily. Which ensured she slept through most of the time the younger two used to explore the ship a little.

Before the preteen could knock out Lisa took all three of them aside and gave them a few rules to follow once they arrived, which basically boiled down to 'don't pick a fight/pocket you're not sure you can handle and stay out of trouble as much as you can'.

Cherep spent the five minutes after that conversation almost hyperventilating into Sonya's back. She spent most of her free time that night absently patting him on the back to get him to calm down, while wondering where she might find a bookstore once on the island and inspecting their fellow passengers.

The physically young thief elected not to inform her friend that the cruise ship was operated by mafia members, nor that most of the guests with them seemed to be much of the same. If he was already having issues not even five hours out from where they were headed, she didn't want to know what that information would do to him.

Disembarking from the ship was mostly painless, other than the fact her best friend finally realized who exactly had been on the ship with them. The concept of a mafia ran cruise ship seemed to baffle him, and she thanked whatever lucky stars she had it kept him quiet long enough for Arseniy to get them past the reception area and into the criminal resort town.

She wanted to say it was reasonably typical in its layout, once she got a decent view of things. There was a seaside wharf that held most of the tourist attractions on the southern edge of the island and the middle held both a general shopping center of a type and the hotels most that traveled there stayed at, the farther away from the wharf you got the more specialized the stores and services available were.

North was a very large open market for anything one could use to kill another, the western edge of the island resort had what amounted to twenty-four/seven nightclubs and bars seeded with what looked from a distance to be brothels, and the east held the different guildhalls and a few arenas. The decent number of maps posted around helped her figure out what was what.

Other than the fact the whole island was set up to facilitate the trade of violence and a haven for everything illegal under the sun and a few things not, it was a pretty interesting vacation destination.

Sonya probably wouldn't mind coming back one day in the future, so she'd have a couple days to spend poking around. When she didn't have a mostly civilian limpet who was making it way too obvious he was either fresh as a daisy to the underworld or incredibly uncomfortable.

She was pretty sure there would be a ring of bruises on her left bicep the same shape and size of his right hand later.

Much to her relief, and for her best friend's safety, the fully grown and dangerous looking Russian vor took up most of the attention their small group gained. Lisa, as a fully grown and pretty woman accompanying him, gathered most of what was left. Very little was paid to the two girls and one boy that followed in their wake, the most they did earn were a couple eyeballing Cherep and a few skeptical glances to Tatiana’s fiery hair.
Sonya was a bit torn trying to decide if she was insulted at the lack of attention paid to her or thankful her tiny size allowed her to skate under the general radar. Being underestimated could be a lot of fun, if she really wanted to press her luck.

What she did do, instead of either acting out to draw attention stupidly or try to keep her relative invisibility going and drawing attention that way, was keep an eye peeled for what type of stores they were passing.

She needed something other than one ancient Rain's diary to puzzle out her Flame type and how to use it, and if there was anywhere she wouldn't have to ask either fully grown Mafiya members to risk or barging for that information this had to be it.

Her main goal for the next few days was to find something supplemental for her experiments, because all she knew for certain was that she wasn't a Sky or Rain Flame user. She was also pretty sure she wasn't a Mist either, because that one would make no sense in compared to her stupidly ridiculous strength.

However, finding a book or someone with a loose enough tongue within two days in Mafia Land without Cherep getting itchy feet and wandering into something he won't be able to get himself out of would prove to be one hell of a challenge.

…and, if she could find a pole weapon that wouldn't shatter under her best swing, she'd be delighted.

Chapter End Notes

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one's peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).

Militsiya – A kind of paramilitary law enforcement, less military and more police in nature.

XXXI (Saturday the 21st of January, 1961. Mafia Land.)

Much to Sonya's delight, and Tatiana's not-silent-enough despair, there was a bookstore in Mafia Land's central shopping complex.

The shop looked to be a frequent traveler's store for paper items from all the port cities that serviced the island, holding everything from newspapers shipped in from around the world to popular fiction or nonfiction novels one might want to read on vacation. Given it was also a store run by former or current members of the mafia, it even had what looked to be gun manuals near the back next to cookbooks and a couple chemistry texts.

"We're going to a clothing store after this, you little bookworm." The older preteen warned her foster sister as she followed her into the brightly lit store. "Besides, where are you even going to put more books? We have weight limits on our luggage, and you're running out of room at home."

"Cherep will help, and these books I can't get at home." She ignored the question, valid as that concern was. Some of her books were now residing under her foster brother's bed, because Tatiana wouldn't hold them in her room unless they were useful enough for her to use every now and again.

The shop also had a couple mechanical handbooks on tanks, jeeps, and motorcycles, and she snagged one blindly to give to Cherep when they went back for the night… or when they went to drop off their shopping when it got too heavy.

She took some time looking through the cookbooks, because she found one that detailed a way to use basic kitchen supplies in everything from smoke bombs to a crude tear gas. It gained a snort from the feisty redhead, who decided that there was a book she'd rather like to have and took it from her.

The real target Sonya was after turned out to be a mafia child's storybook that looked to have been written a century ago. It was also in French, apparently just because the author wanted it to be.

There was no foreword to tell her where the story took place or was recorded from, nor what region of the world she might investigate for more stories or different versions.

Skimming through it, stripped of all the flowery terms and obvious pro-mafia propaganda, it left her with a very basic grasp on the various Flame elements and what made them up. The Classic or Hard types anyways, not the Inverted or Soft ones, but she might be able to puzzle that out herself.

She was also pretty sure there were more than the usual seven types, but damn if she could recall them. Something, something, Earth Flames at least...

Her quick look-through also reconfirmed her original thoughts, that she wasn't a Sky, Mist, or Rain. Harmony, Illusions, and Tranquility did not fit into the only example she knew of what she could do… but it was still an iffy thing given her physical youth and inexperience. Probably not her main type, if she had a secondary type to fuss with too. Which left her with Classic Lightning, Sun, Cloud, and Storm, and possibly five out of the seven Inverted as well, which the story book had cardboard cutout characters molded after.

Very flat characters. A nice and caring Sky that Harmonized, enthusiastic Sun with Activation, calm Rain with Tranquility, fixated Storm with Disintegration, deceptive Mist with Illusions, reckless Lightning with Hardening, and an aloof Cloud with Propagation.

Which was all only one facet of any Dying Will Flame user in the most obvious and overt ways, and most of which she already knew.

While nice to get solid and written confirmation on that, Sonya would have to take a longer in-depth look to see what would explain the unnatural strength she had. For while trying to learn to shatter wooden and metal poles on command was interesting in its own way, the sprained wrists and shrapnel that resulted on occasion were tedious to try and avoid and it was always rather painful to suffer through.

There had to be a less destructive way to figure it out, because she hadn't seen a hint of oddly colored fire yet that would let her guess and pure strength wasn't a specific trait of any one Flame type.

Activation might be it, if Sun flames could enable one to use more of the muscle than the percentage normal humans used at any one time. Propagation could do it, if she was using Cloud Flames to boost either her muscle mass or the force behind her swings. Lighting and Storm were possibilities, if she was doing anything to the staffs she had been using without being able to see herself do it by either Hardening the staff or Disintegrating whatever encountered it… if she was willing to stretch her disbelief a bit.

If she really wanted to, she could even make a case for using Mist flames in a non-typical way to convince everyone and herself that she did destroy everything she had. She really hoped not, but it was a possibility.

Staring at the book probably wasn't the best idea ever too, given that Arseniy didn't seem to want her to spread her little talent with breaking things around outside of their group. Instead of spending the time to puzzle over it in the store, she added the book to the pile of them she already had going.

There were a couple more in different languages, aimed more for teens and younger adults, so those were added in almost as an afterthought.

"Find anything good?"

"A couple things to read on our way back, maybe." Answered the no-longer-as tiny thief absently, still looking for anything else that might help her. There had to be something better than children stories, even if they were mafia ones, that she might be able to make a comparison with.

"Anything that reminds you of that… friend of ours?"

That was an odd enough question it pulled her attention to her older foster sister, who had an irritated expression on her face at odds with the light tone of voice.

"One thing so far." The younger informed her elder sister with a shrug, using the distraction to see what had the other girl's back up.

Oh.

They were being discreetly spied on by the clerk, possibly because they were mafia brats and shoplifting wasn't a particularly rare crime for them.

Another possibility, much to her paranoid imagination, anyone picking up books on Dying Will Flames were watched for if they were in possession of the Flames or not. Which would be a nice convenient way to look for users, and it was possible the information would sell for a bit if everything that pointed to Flame users being currently rare was as correct as she suspected.

Any further information she was looking for probably had to be asked for, which may or may not work and would probably put her on someone's watch list.

To risk it or not?

She considered the few books that might have the answers she was looking for, then back to the bookcase she had been pursuing.

If she needed more information after checking what she already had, it would probably be better to ask Arseniy for it. He could decide what to do, because she didn't know what was safe to risk or not. The vor had a better grasp on the underworld's movements and would probably continue to have it until after she finally made a stupid mistake to learn otherwise.

Mistakes in the underworld typically ended in one's death.

She didn't intend to make any mistakes that could be prevented with a dash of caution, she had a fair bit to do before she would be content to die again. However, that was intent-based.

Mistakes were… well, mistakes.

"How hard do you think teaching Cherep French will be?"

Tatiana's eyebrow rose in silent question, prompting Sonya to show her the storybook she pulled out first.

It was as good as any cover story, if questioned.

"...good luck with that. I'll give you the fact he's decent with mathematics, but his grammar on the other hand..."

"That's not his fault, it's his Czech accent that makes him sound funny to us."

She hummed noncommittally, which was ruined by the slow creeping smirk crawling up the redhead’s face.

"Oh, shut up. Where did you want to go after this?"

Her smirk grew a touch evil looking.

The clerk that had been trying to covertly keep an eye on what they were poking at and overhear their conversation eventually hurried them out, just so he didn't have to hear everything the older girl knew of current European fashions.

Given Sonya didn't really want to know either, as it was the early 60's when the hippy-bohemian look had yet to become popular and afros were fast becoming a thing everyone wanted to have, she tuned Tatiana out as well.

XXXII (Saturday the 21st of January, 1961 continued. The Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

"Do you know how to swim?" Sonya asked Cherep even as she handed a book to him and dumped the rest of the bags she had on her bed.
He looked highly amused to be automatically handed a stack of wire bound paper the moment his foster sisters returned from checking out what shopping they could visit in range of their hotel. "Yeah, why?"

"Cause there's a beach here, silly." Tatiana dropped all six of her shopping bags on the twin bed the girls were sharing, whirling around to grin at her younger roommates. "It's mostly used by families with younger children really, but still a beach. I don't know how to swim, and Sonya ever so thoughtfully volunteered herself to teach me how."

"There's also all the women that want a nice tan to show off when they go back to wherever." She chipped in absently, searching through the redhead's new piles of clothing to find the swimsuits they had picked out. "And, if Cherep doesn't want to swim, there's always the boardwalk to explore or the amusement park… but I'd suggest we go as a group for that one."

He gave her an unimpressed glare, and she had to suppress the desire to smirk.

Wet-cat had nothing on that expression.

"You can't stay cooped up here all three days. You'll drive yourself up a wall or two and take the rest of us with you."

"Watch me." Even as he said it, Cherep's face twisted into a distracted frown. "It'd be nice to go swimming again…"

"Sonya learned in Saratov, in the river. I can't imagine how cold that had to be."

"It wasn't bad, just… smelly." The industrial revolution might have tapered off, and the start of the environmental concerns might be making a small dent into the amount of pollution being produced, but her biological birthplace was still a port city.

Sonya didn't really want to think what might have been in the water that one time she took a dip in it when her biological father decided to ensure she wouldn't ever drown by teaching her even if she already knew. It wasn't like she could've told the man she already knew how, explaining the whys of that would've been difficult.

"Come on, you can laugh at all the seawater Tatiana's about to gulp down and we'll go find something greasy and fast to eat afterwards. We'll be back before dusk, when all the really interesting things are supposed to start."

"She means before all the really immoral and fun things start to happen." Tatiana mock-whispered, swiping the swimming suit she had picked out from the other thief's fingers. "Alas."

The younger girl rolled her grey eyes, shoving a pair of swim shorts at Cherep. "She's mad I said no to her bar hopping idea."

"It's a good idea!"

"It's not."

The redhead flounced to the door connecting their rather lavish bedroom to a bathroom, tossing a sniff over her shoulder at them. "We're legally allowed to drink here, so why-"

"We're not legal here, there just aren't any laws here." She interrupted her pointedly. "Just because you can doesn't mean you should. I'm sure if we ask nicely, Lisa or Arseniy will let us drink at home. At least that way we can be home and hungover rather than try to navigate a new place drunk off our asses while hoping everything goes okay."

Cherep blinked at her blankly a few times, even as their sister came to a sudden halt before reaching the bathroom’s threshold. "Really?"

Sonya gave the purple haired and eyed boy a disgusted look in return for the utterly disproving expression aimed at her before turning to their elder. "I'm pretty sure of it, since Lisa told us to ask them if we ever wanted to experiment with things like that."

"When was this?"

"Couple years ago, a few months after I met Cherep."

Tatiana opened her mouth, shut it slowly after a moment of hard thought, and then shook her head before she started speaking. "How... why... why do you recall that? I'm pretty sure I remember something along those lines, but... I forgot about it like a day later."

"Because you have the attention span of a gnat when you're interested in something. That was a little after they started us on safecracking, remember? You loved it and spent most if not all of your free time cracking practice safes when not forced to do something else."

"It's one of the rare few things I'm better at than you." She informed her haughtily, hand on her hip and a smirk on her lips. "I was fascinated with the novelty of such an event."

"I think I might have liked it better when we were ignoring each other."

"Don't listen to her." Cherep spoke up suddenly, softly smacking Sonya upside the head. Which she let happen, as she didn't understand the sudden tension in the room and hoped he had some idea. "She's just cranky you were going to have the last word."

Tatiana's smirk, which had dropped a little, returned full force as she spun around and finally entered the bathroom to change. "You're a doll, Cherep."

"The hell was that for?"

"Rude much?" He rolled his eyes at her when she glared at him. "Stop that, you are disturbing when you pout."

Sonya smoothed out any expression from her face. "I'm not pouting, I'm miffed."

"Same difference. Small hint for you, Sonya. Don't bring up that ignoring thing, Tatiana's a little embarrassed over that."

"Why?"

Cherep gave her the flattest stare she had ever seen from him. "You know that social incompetence she likes to tease you over? I don't think it was a joke."

"...I'm going to drown you."

"No, you're not. I'm going to sit in here and read while you teach Tatiana to swim, and maybe tomorrow I'll go with you to the beach if nothing happens to either of you."
Lisa woke them all up just before dawn the next day, flicking the lights on without care for what eyes she might burn with them. "Up, all of you. Yes you, Cherep. You need to come with us this time."

A few months of living with them under his belt enabled him to at least wait until their foster mother was out of the room to ask, "Why?"

"Lisa told us last night, but you were already asleep by then." Tatiana informed him groggily, rubbing a fist against her eye as she rolled out of her side of the bed. "We're supposed to get medical checkups and vaccinations boosters this morning. Oh joy."

"Normally Lisa does this at home, but since we're here I guess we are doing this now." Agreed Sonya, dragging herself over to her luggage only to stub her toe on one of the redhead's purchases from the previous day. "The hell is in this, rocks?"

"Shoes."

"My toes don't see the difference, Tatiana."

"At least they aren't books."

Their brother muffled a snort, grabbing a change of clothing and shuffling over to the bathroom in order not to follow in the physically youngest thief's footsteps in stubbing something. "Ladies, let's not force Lisa to come back and hurry us up. Please."

She grudgingly decided he had a point, since the older woman was never nice about it if she had to wake them or encourage them to get moving more than once. Dropping the only half-formed complaint she had been about to fire back, she instead stripped and dressed herself in the more comfortable of what clothing she had with. "Think we're doing vaccinations now or when we get back?"

"I hope back, if only to ensure the boat ride home will be merely miserable because I hate boats and not because we're all sick." Blinking at the closed doors separating them from their only recently acquired foster brother, Tatiana lightly nudged her shoulder blade to gain her attention. "Has Cherep ever gotten his vaccinations done?"

"Err… I hope he has, or he's going to be miserable for a good week." Given his history, she rather thought not.

Depending on how much time he had to himself before she ever spotted his oddly purple hair, it was likely he had gone without medical aid for a couple years. Add that all to the fact she thought very little of his parents, who had gotten scared of their good fortune to have a child that was unkillable when their incompetence had resulted in his initial death in the first place, meant she was rather sure he had gone five or six years without actual doctors looking over his health.

Normally, the Zolotov thieves had their medical records fudged by a registered nurse that came around every couple of months.

The man fabricated incidents that would explain away the usual and frequent training injuries they incurred, a broken wrist from a botched job turned into a fall off a playground jungle gym and the broken glass scars from smashing an inconvenient window turned into a fall into broken bottles instead. The point being all the fostered Mafiya brats she knew of had actual medical records… even if most of the background information in it was pure bullshit.

However, Cherep likely didn't have any medical records either. Or at least, no where that they could hope to make use of them.

Thankfully they were in Mafia Land, which had a fully functioning hospital. Most of the Zolotov used vaccines were taken from them, and they likely supplied most of the underworld with them and other medical services as well. In a hospital like that, hopefully being asked to fake a record for one orphaned boy wasn't going to be too odd.

"Erm… so…"

Sonya turned back to look at her foster sister shifting in place uneasily. "What?"

Tatiana threw up her hands in exasperation, then snagged her tiny purse with the money the girls had pooled to afford the things they wanted to purchase here. "Never mind. Let's go see what Lisa has in mind for breakfast."

XXXIV (Sunday the 22nd of January, 1961 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Even with the head start, it still took them several hours to clear out of the mafia run hospital.

Although the adults merely needed a checkup each, the children they were nominally in charge of only had basic incident reports and one had absolutely nothing in the way of medical reports. Height, weight, teeth oddly, a few x-rays, reflex testing, hearing checks, eye exams, tailoring several years of medical reports into a full medical file on each of them, and then recording various other bits and bobs took a bit of time each.

Sonya felt a bit like a horse after it was over.

However, mostly, it was Cherep's fault it took so long.

In between the blood testing to check what antibodies he had already and after the x-rays to check his bone structure, the doctor he was assigned to then found the long-healed cracks in his vertebra from when he broke his neck years ago. Then the fact he seemed to have broken his left arm and several fingers only a few years prior, a couple ribs showing suspiciously old damage like they had caved in, and some very odd results in his blood test needed some open-minded consideration of surviving what should've been beyond fatal poisoning attempts.

She got to return the favor of a bruise in the shape of a hand, clutching her foster brother’s arm hard enough so the brat didn't bolt like a guilty person. While Arseniy confirmed he knew of the neck incident and that was one of the reasons why the purple haired boy was with them now and not where he once was.

Mafia people weren't nice people, but when they had standards like the doctor that looked perfectly willing to murder the much larger Russian vor if he had been the cause of the boy's old injuries… things tended to get ugly real fast unless you had a very good excuse or could point them in another direction.

Lisa's pinched features kept Tatiana from asking questions while they were waiting for a medical history to be tailored to their foster brother's old healed injuries so any civilian doctor who investigated or read it wouldn't have a stroke, but Sonya wasn't stupid enough to hope no questions would be eventually asked.

When they were finally done at the hospital, the undead Cloud now possessing a new medical history that was only half bullshit and the rest of them updating theirs with Lisa collecting a box of vaccinations and booster shots that would need to be taken as soon as they got home, Arseniy gave her a look that basically asked if she thought he was an idiot.

She really could only indicate the boy himself, who was stiffly moving and paper-white. He was also not looking at anyone else in his stupid procrastination protest/fear of their reaction thing she had yet to figure out a reliable way to address without spooking him. Then she shrugged, to inform him she probably didn't know much more than he now did.

Which was pretty much the truth, since he hadn't informed her much beyond the whole first death incident and the basics of how he got to Moscow in the first place.

Noticeably, Cherep had left out exactly why he knew full well his death-defying ability would continue regardless of any 'special skill' he had been eventually stolen for… or why his parents knew that fact, or how many shady doctor types learned, or how long and how bad his kidnapping incident had been before getting himself free.

Which probably meant he had been killed a couple more times after that first time, but if Sonya ever learned who did it she would probably either tell Arseniy or that doctor the full truth as far as she had put together… or hunt the assholes down herself.

Probably one death from the incident that resulted in his previously broken ribs, a couple more times from the chemicals still lingering in his bloodstream, and any number of other methods that wouldn't show up if allowed to heal a month or more. Yet her best friend was alive, and not talking about it. They had proof of that avoidance in Arseniy's hands.

The vor snorted, a sound which jolted the younger boy out of his head given his panicky look at him, then rolled his shoulders as if shaking off some thought. "You peredniki have until noon, then get back to the hotel."

"We'll be visiting the Thieves' Hall after lunch." Lisa tacked on rather blandly, padding off after him when the man abruptly split off from them at the hospital's front steps.

"Cherep… if you want to stay in the hotel room you should follow them." Sonya prompted after an awkward moment, because Tatiana looked as if she dearly wanted to ask and the blonde wasn't sure if he wanted to deal with that or not or if the redhead had enough tact to wait until they were home.

"Or we could go check out the boardwalk." The preteen safecracker proposed with a fake and bright grin. "You did promise."

"I didn't promise anything… just that I might think about it if you survived your own adventure." Cherep hastily corrected her tightly, slowly unbending his spine the longer they waited on him to decide instead of asking or pushing him into something he might not want to do. "But… that sounds good."

He was still a little too wide-eyed for her to believe he was anything approaching remotely comfortable, so she gestured to the direction they would have to go to find the beachfront stores. "Whenever you're ready."

"Mmm, didn't you also want to check out the weapons on sale around here?" Gesturing behind them to where the road the hospital was on led further into the island, Tatiana painfully didn't bring attention to how long it was taking their brother to decide on what he was going to do. "We could always go take a look or browse a bit… but you know most of what's here is probably hitman supplies. Guns, bullets, knives, poisons, and those sorts of things."

"Probably yeah, but I just want something that won't break apart on me after a few hours work and that's specific enough I hope there's some kind of store already here with what I want."

Cherep muttered something along the lines of 'I'd rather see tacky tourist shops', seizing Sonya's wrist and starting off in the direction she had given him. Their older foster sister followed them with a more natural sounding giggle.

XXXV (Sunday the 22nd of January, 1961 continued. Mafia Land.)

They returned to the hotel with little time to spare, Cherep clutching a massive black teddy bear almost the same size as him Sonya bought just because it was something for him to maul without leaving her with more bruises… or her punching him for the repeated manhandling.

They also had a massive assortment of candy that she was planning on not being around for when they finally ate it.

Said over-sized teddy bear ended up occupying a chair of its own during their Asian inspired lunch, guarding all the sugar they had acquired. Arseniy having left again for whatever business he was here for allowing them to put the stuffed doll in his spot much to Lisa's visible amusement.

The woman was much more settled than she had been by the end of their trip to the hospital, making the blonde cautiously guess the vor filled her in a little with what he knew of the boy's situation. Otherwise the brunette would be a breath away from glaring at her, for the imagined crime of keeping pertinent information from them.

Which she was still doing because while she might know Cherep was probably a Dying Will Flame user himself with their generation's strongest, if Soft/Inverted/whatever meant opposite than 'normal', Cloud nature… she had no way to prove it just yet.

She'd rather like to keep going on with that too. If she had no proof, she wasn't technically keeping things from them and therefore possibly able to get in trouble for it.

If her foster brother was going to be that Skull de Mort in a few years, the Zolotovs might really want him to be firmly under their thumbs before he could skate by on mere technicalities of only be 'aligned' with the Russian Mafiya. Even the weakest of the Arcobaleno would be a very important chess piece to control, they wouldn't be called the 'World's Strongest' without validation, especially since two or three of them would end up in Vongola hands before long and another was spoken for by the Triads.

The thought was probably entirely treasonous in a way and probably not what good Mafiya girls did, she didn't care.

Again, Cherep was hers first. Everyone else could go screw themselves, even if everyone else included the Mafiya syndicate that prevented her from finding out what a childhood of slavery was like.

She already almost compulsively stole for them. That would have to be enough to show her loyalty to the Zolotovs.
After they finished lunch Lisa gave Cherep the option of going with them, but he refused rather neatly claiming he needed a nap and instead stalking up to the suite of rooms they were using dragging the massive stuffed animal and the rest of the girls' shopping after him. Their foster mother didn't seem to mind too much, beckoning both younger thieves after her as she left the path leading to their hotel.

Sonya wasn't sure what she was expecting from something called ‘The Thieves' Hall', and she wasn't sure if she found what she had been expecting or not.

It looked like a regular office building… but given that normal looking façade in a place called Mafia Land obviously something was off about either it or her worldview.

They were show in by the doorman, who probably doubled as a guard/bouncer, Lisa exchanged a greeting and a bit of gossip with what looked to be a secretary that sounded just odd enough to make her assume it was code or insider habit.

Whatever the older Russian did, it made the lady manning the desk show them into a ground-level meeting room. Lisa got a stack of files pressed into her hands, and she cheerfully let them smack onto the table that took up the bulk of the room.

"These are mostly low-level requests from our neck of the woods, but along the type of things this agency is typically responsible for. Take a look, the both of you."

"Any particular reason why?" Tatiana asked after both girls gave the manila files a dubious look each.

"Because there really are only a few ways to get noticed and respected in our line of business." Lisa informed them pointedly, ticking off the options they had off one hand. "Develop a well-connected and incredibly loyal network of contacts that can advertise what you do and who you did it to without them stabbing you in the back, do over the top jobs that will get you noticed and hunted by the civilian authorities and possibly risk breaking Omertà, or take jobs through a guildhall like this and let them deal with advertising and networking. While this may not be a problem you'll need an agency to help you make those contacts, Tatiana, every little bit helps when you finally strike out on your own. Sonya…"

"I'm screwed on that contact thing, I take it?"

"I can substitute for most things, and I'm sure Tatiana will be willing to help." Giving her a surprisingly awkward seeming shrug, the older Mafiya woman took a seat and gestured the other two to find their own. "You might even want to think about getting Cherep to be a point of contact for you, sending things to me for fencing them off instead of trying to find anyone local and not inclined to stab you in the back either during the transaction or after. But… lone thieves don't typically do well, sweetie. Safety in numbers is a phrase that especially includes us. At first, we thought you'd be a very fine petty thief who wouldn’t need a supporting network outside of the clan… but you were surprisingly skilled with that lone jewelry heist."

To be honest, Sonya had never intended to be more than any normal petty thief at first. Petty thieves weren't ones an even mildly affluent Mafiya syndicate like the Zolotovs worried about, and there was safety in being only one of many. Had things gotten unsustainably bad or troubling, it had been likely she could've ducked out without too much difficulty so long as she made sure to leave no links behind.

Then she met Cherep and her desire to do something notable with her life won out over her desire to keep her head down and not make waves.
Lisa was right, their society was rather isolated from other pockets of the underworld. Not only due to sheer distance from each other, but because one Mafioso from Italy would stick out like a sore thumb in the USSR and be easy pickings for the vory. That also made information and news hard to come by, and if she really wanted to make a serious go at becoming anything like the 'World's Greatest Thief' she'd either have to act out and draw dangerous levels of attention on herself or do something incredibly stupid like get herself noticed by the police.

An agency for thieves was probably her best bet to make that lofty goal without risking her neck… or Cherep's.

She wondered how well her foster brother would take to the suggestion of being a thief's agent.

…probably not well.

XXXVI (Sunday the 22nd of January, 1961 continued. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

"Well?" Sonya glanced up to Tatiana's expectant look, who had only poked a few files out of sheer curiosity. "Did you find anything interesting?"

The physically younger blonde looked at the file in her hands again, but given she had spent more than five minutes reading it though it wasn't likely either were put off by her stalling. "Maybe. How does a museum heist sound to you?"

"Oh, not good. Damned hard to fence, those things." Lisa interrupted before the older girl could comment, giving the file in her hands a scornful look. "Museums have ways to track the items in their exhibits, and if they can trace it back to you…"

"It's just for a few specific pieces, not a request to loot it to the bedrock." Spreading out the thoughtfully included pictures in the file, she showed them the goals for the requested heist. "I don't think I'd have to go into the museum at all if it wasn't for this one bit, as I'm pretty sure I could rob a wealthy home or two to find the others."

Most of the other requests had things like stealing from people Sonya already knew were shady and a possible killing or two, both of which were things she wanted to avoid for as long as she could. The one in her hands was less violent in request and less suicidal in intent, so she had bothered to read more than just the so called 'shopping list'.

The main objective someone was apparently willing to spend an obscene amount of money to get was one of the state seals from Russia's earlier years as a nation. Thief she might be, but she didn't understand why as it was almost useless as anything but an expensive and illegal paperweight one would have to hide if one entertained more law-abiding individuals.

Maybe a very patriotic Russian wanted it?

Unfortunately, or fortunately if you wanted to look at it that way, there was no name identifying who was asking nor who would be accepting the contract. Only a series of numbers she would have to give to 'turn in' the job and get paid for it if she did do this.

The seal wasn't the only thing the client wanted, but the rest of it probably wouldn't be so risky to hunt down.

The coin he, she, and/or it wanted was, hilariously enough, one of the old ruble coins she already had from the jewelry store robbery. That wouldn't be too tricky seeing as she had it at home.

Thankfully there was nothing else overly large or unwieldy needing to be stolen, just a couple fragile glass pieces she could probably find in any respectably old and venerated family estate. If there were any old and venerated family estates left in Soviet Russia.

Which would draw the problems of personal home security in a level she wasn't really looking forward to, but probably something she would have to tackle before long anyways.

Tatiana scooped up the scattered files, stacking them together in a very noisy way. "Then I think we may be done here, right?"

"Almost." Lisa interrupted her pointed shuffling of paperwork. "If Sonya is going to start working for the Hall, she needs to be formally contracted for it. It's a bit of an involved process, though I can expedite most of it."

"Formally?" Sonya echoed slowly, a bit bewildered that there would be more of a process to this than just picking up a job.

Would it be anything like the dues the Zolotovs were entitled to for her Mafiya education?

"It includes an employee pass to the island and accommodation when you need it. Hotel rooms and such." The older woman tempted, in an obvious manner. Equally as obviously she didn't think she really needed to, but she was sure their foster mother was pulling Tatiana's fiery red braid a bit. "You'll be in and out a bit if you keep up taking jobs here. It's supposed to help defray costs, so you'll keep coming back and taking contracts."

"But not travel expenses?"

"The island moves too much to guarantee that, but you get a schedule of all the ports that will supply this place for a couple months in advance."

"The island moves?" The preteen safecracker interjected incredulously before the younger pickpocket could ask for more information, looking up from her second look at the files to see if she was tempted enough to sign herself up alongside her own foster sister.

"It is completely man made, and we're currently in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean." She pointed out blandly, either ignoring the disbelief on both girls' face or not caring enough to sound less patronizing. "The only saving grace Mafia Land has, aside cutting-edge mafia developed technology and Omertà keeping this place a mostly guarded secret, is that it's in international waters and stays there. Even if the governments around the world learned about it and then wanted to shut this place down, they can't without putting their own warships at risk or starting another war with a lot of paranoid countries thinking they will go after them next."

Sonya blinked at the older woman as she processed that.

Well… that explained quite a few things, to be honest.

XXXVII (Sunday the 22nd of January, 1961 continued. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

'Expedite' apparently was Lisa's way to inform both girls that she had once been one of Mafia Land's contracted thieves once upon a time. She got a sign-on bonus for both herself and Sonya, so she decided she really didn't care much beyond that.

At least the Thieves' Guild Hall didn't require dues like her Mafiya clan, they merely got twenty percent of the payment as a referral fee on every job she did for them. The commission fee would drop to fifteen if she kept up with the work enough for a couple years, and it might even end up being merely ten percent if ever requested by the serial number the clients were given to identify the various thieves working for them. Had her foster mother not recommended her the initial starting fee would've been twenty-five, and only drop to as low as fifteen no matter how good she was.

It was very clinical, hands off, and strictly regulated to ensure no one inconveniently disposed of the thief that stole for them before anyone got paid. She could see why such a market was open and used, and why the Thieves' Hall was just across the street from the hitmen version of an independent employment agency.

While not impossible to identify and kill certain thieves after the jobs they did, it was certainly hard enough only the really pissed off or asshole-ish would bother trying. According to her new and rather brutally specific contract, while keeping herself anonymous was her job the guild would avenge any of their thieves that were killed due to their work for them by matching the gross pay from their last job and the job they got killed for then placing a hit on the one that ordered their death or the one that killed them with the resulting amount.

Which could get stupidly expensive very quickly if someone was resorting to an independent outside guild of thieves to get what they wanted, so very few criminal types would risk that. According to Lisa anyways, her contract didn't state that in so many words but had a lot of figures for finding out how expensive it would be to kill her depending on how much she worked.

Additionally, any injuries occurred 'on the job' were her own to deal with but they would pay for any Mafia Land hospital checkups to be done after whichever job was finished and 'turned in'. If she was bleeding out or horribly maimed and needed surgery right away was apparently inconsequential, so long as she delivered whatever she was supposed to steal first and by any deadline set.

Oh… and any drug or human trafficking she might do while employed by the Thieves' Hall was grounds for termination in the more final sense of the word via their fellow contracted employees that did hits more than heists.

Mafia Land apparently had very little tolerance for both happening in its territory or by its people, but you could take any drugs you wanted while employed as there was no drug screening or rules against using controlled substances when working for them. A bit odd, but Sonya could deal with that stipulation by not bothering with any drugs in the first place.

As an official Mafia Land employed thief, she got a serial number and a very bogus looking but apparently legal ID that claimed she worked for what was probably an international shell company in 'Acquisitions'. Which was practically useless right now, being she had only recently been elevated into an age that had double digits would mean no one would believe she was legally employed anywhere no matter what documentation she had on hand.

Lisa's promised pass for the island was worked into that ID card, meaning she could come and go as she pleased but couldn't bring anyone into Mafia Land with her for free. At least she'd put in effort to ensure she kept track of what book she was using it as a bookmark for.

If Sonya decided to keep up with contracted jobs, she would eventually end up doing a lot of traveling. It did sort of appeal, in a way.

She hadn't really seen much of the world in her last life, staying put wasn't really all that attractive now she had and was on her second chance.

Apparently one of the reasons why Arseniy hadn't bothered to get them round-trip tickets for the train they used to get to the port they left the mainland from was that Mafia Land was drifting up from the coast of Africa until they were a reasonable distance from Iceland. It would then swing around to skate down the eastern seaboard of America until they hit the Florida Keys where they'll bounce down to South America, then round the southern tip of that landmass before heading into the Pacific Ocean and hitting up the Far East before starting back to Europe.

Meaning when the little foster family went home they would only really need a fraction of the time it took them to get to Mafia Land in the first place, because the island was more north of where it had been when they arrived. A short trip by boat to England or Norway and an overnight ride on the train would probably see them in the USSR by breakfast, if nothing went wrong.

Well… a lot of traveling probably meant she wouldn't have to join Cherep's eventual circus to keep herself fed or pay her Mafiya dues, all she'd have to do is keep in mind where they were going and line up jobs in the same general region. Not area because that would draw way too much attention to whatever circus her friend joined, but a country away was probably do-able.

There would also be a distinct lack of looking for reliable fences this way too, which had been something she had been worried about ever since her foster brother asked her to go with him.

Sonya would probably end up joining as a temporary worker or last-ditch replacement. If only to have an excuse to cling to so she wouldn't have to have a very awkward and probably depressing conversation with Cherep about exactly how she could afford to follow him around or where she went on occasion.

…and maybe pigs could fly without catapults, but she could hope. The boy wasn't stupid… just a bit too nice, a little dense sometimes, and lacking in school-related bookwork knowledge Lisa was only recently helping him catch up with.

The best part about being employed by a shady organization like the Thieves' Hall from a place as bizarre as Mafia Land was that she would be assigned a storage locker to keep whatever she wanted inside if she did five or more jobs within a year, if she did ten she got a tiny flat assigned to her on the island itself. She would have to keep up with whatever number of jobs each year afterwards to keep whatever bonus she got and wanted to use.

While it didn't sound like a whole lot of effort for rather attractive rewards, that wasn't considering the time she'd have to spend getting from wherever Mafia Land was to where the things that she had to steal were or the time needed to plan and execute a heist then the time getting back without drawing attention to herself to turn in whatever contract.

Five jobs might be sketchy for her first year even if she only spent two or so months on each, ten was obviously a goal to work for.

Although the apartment accommodations would probably be cramped and shared with numerous other international criminals, the storage option was something she was interested in.

It'd be a place to store her books for a couple years until she had a permanent place of her own, held in trust by Cherep or not.

Sonya wasn't at all sold on living on the island even if she was working here, but it was something to think about and an option if she ever needed it.
The bonus Lisa got for referring her was nice, a semi-large lump of cash in a currency of their choice the two opted to split. She had been running a little low, given most of the money she had brought with her had been the proceeds from her jewelry heist almost half a year ago. The blonde had been wondering if she wanted to risk picking mafia pockets or not, and this would at least let her opt out of trying that.

She was somewhat confident she'd probably get away with it, but she was trying not to do stupid things that might end up killing her.

XXXVIII (Sunday the 22nd of January, 1961 continued. Mafia Land.)

On the last full day they would be spending on the island, the girls managed to drag Cherep out to the beach for most of the afternoon.

They kept to the more child friendly bits of the amusement park after spending a few hours in the water and, if you glossed over the fact most of the carnival games weren't rigged to ensure you lost or that the sharpshooting booths were set up on a live-fire range and had actual firearms and live ammunition used to play, it wasn't much different than any other carnival or fairground Rachel had ever seen.

There wasn't much that Sonya could use that distracted her best friend from the fact most of the game booth prizes were generally either lethal or something normal children probably wouldn't want, or that the various game was a lot more expensive than typical in exchange for the realism.

She did get him to smirk when she joined an arm-wrestling competition because the gentleman running the mini-tournament implied he was more than just girly-looking, and their brother cracked up with Tatiana when she won it with only slightly suspicious ease. Thankfully there were mostly fellow mafia brats in that round, and she could escape before any of the older members of the underworld decided to test how far her strength went.

Their older sister proved to be a better shot than either of them, but their dork of a foster brother stuck to playing games of chance instead of skill even if he lost more than he won. The redhead won herself a very nice handgun that probably wouldn't nicely fit in her hand for a few more years yet, while Cherep ended up with a rainbow-colored feather boa he decided to proudly wear even if the girls were laughing at him. The younger sibling won her foster sister an extra clip for her shiny new handgun and managed to find him an equally gaudy set of heels that matched his new accessory perfectly.

They returned to the hotel before sunset, merely because none of them wanted to find out what the Mafia Land nightlife was like and they still had to pack to leave the next day.

Admittedly they wouldn't be leaving until after noon, but both young thieves did want to buy a bit of everything they couldn't get in the USSR before then.

A combination of the morning fright, midday exercise, and a steady diet of sugary foods afterwards made both Tatiana and Cherep turn in for the night early enough that Sonya had a lot of time to spend pouring over the other books she had bought earlier the day before.

Not that it told her much else beyond what she already knew.

It did give her a couple more facets to the 'typical' personalities each Flame type was supposed to
It really did look like she'd need Arseniy's help to find anything else of value on the island, or risk it by asking around herself, or ignore the whole thing and keep on trying to develop something she only had half a clue how to do.

Instead of reading pro-mafia propaganda repeatedly when she didn't have to, she stayed up with Lisa long enough to catch the older man when he came back from his own business and explain the problem to him.

The vor made no promises, which she hadn't wasted time hoping for, but agreed to at least see what he could get on the subject before they left Mafia Land.

She did leave him with her mostly useless set of books on the subject when he asked her to.

As she hadn't decided if she would take them back home with her or not, the more useful information could be written down elsewhere and probably in a better manner than how they were as children's stories, she gave them up easily enough.

Besides, maybe he could pin down her Flame Attribute better than she could. She wasn't entirely sure if she was managing an objective view of her own personality.

That kind of brutal self-honesty was rare, and not something she was sure she had.

XXXIX (Monday the 23rd of January, 1961. Mafia Land.)

Sonya managed to get Cherep to go weapon shopping with her by ambushing him with the idea before he was awake for the day and coherent enough to refuse.

It wasn't a tactic that worked very often, as he was usually one of those disgustingly peppy morning people who were awake when they opened their eyes and usually he was quicker than her most mornings. She tended to get more out of Tatiana by resorting to asking before any caffeine was to be had, even if Lisa only allowed them tea instead of coffee.

Her newish foster sibling was inherently nice enough to keep his word to a friend no matter how crooked, even if their elder sister tended to see anything she agreed to in the early morning as promises made under duress and therefore not something she had to be held to.

That wasn't to say he was entirely happy with the idea, but he still didn't stay behind as he had for their shopping their first day on the island. Instead, her followed in her wake a little too close to be mistaken as a very young bodyguard and kept eyeballing the suspicious splotches of what was probably various bodily fluids spilled the previous night as they made their way to where the arms dealers had set up a block of shops.

As Tatiana had guessed the day before, the main trade in the violence industry was mostly guns, ammunition, and explosives with a side order of poisons, concealed knives, and garrotes.

How some of those poisons didn't count as ‘drugs’ with some of the claims their hawkers professed was a little beyond the younger thief, unless they all ended in death no matter what other effects tended to pop up while the target was in the process of dying.
"I don't know, Sonya. This doesn't look like it will have what you want."

She scanned the four closest vendors, and their 'display' pieces that she was mostly sure could fire bullets if someone wanted them to. "We're not looking for the cheapest or bulk suppliers, so we might have to go farther than one block in to find anything interesting."

Shrugging, the redhead wandered on ahead of them. Taking a moment here or there for a closer look at whatever was on sale that hour, most of which she would be hard pressed to aim correctly much less actually use.

Shotguns had nasty kicks, right?

Cherep still kept as close as a burr for the most part, almost tripping over Sonya a couple times before the lack of anything more violent than an argument or two happening around them made him relax slightly.

"I distinctly recall you mentioning I could spend all the time we were here in the hotel room and you wouldn't have been bothered."

"Well… yes, but I never said I wouldn't try to drag you out once or twice. Which you never said I couldn't do."

He gave her an unimpressed look, which made no dent whatsoever on her self-satisfied smirk. "The next time we do something like this, I want veto rights."

"So that means there will be a next time? I'm holding you to that."

Blinking in surprise a few times, the young Cloud heaved an aggravated sigh and carefully nudged her in the ribs out of protest. "This isn't as… bad as I thought it would be… but not something I want to do very often."

She rolled her eyes at him. "This is probably the safest mafia playground and black market in the world, simply because there isn't the ever-looming threat of a police raid possibly happening and ratcheting up the tension everyone is under. That means it is, ironically enough, safer than any other illegal market in existence. I would never bring you along to any in the USSR, simply because I would never trust them with you. Safe to say, unless you actually want to come back here sometime in the future, I'm not going to be the one getting you into anything illegal."

He gave her an incredulous look, then shifted those wary purple eyes to take in the closest of the arguments on-going around them. The wrinkled looking and middle-aged hitman looked pretty pissed off already, the vendor he was yelling at looked a moment away from pulling one of the guns he had on display and shooting the bastard.

"I said safer, not safest." She defended herself a bit waspishly, seizing him by the wrist and pulling him farther into the crowd so they didn't lose sight of Tatiana's flame bright hair.

"Right… that make it all better. I'm sure."

Cherep was turning into such a snarky little shit, much better than his spooked kitten face when he didn't know how to deal with her in the beginning. She wasn't sure if she was rubbing off on him or if this was purely just him, but she appreciated it all the same.

It made her want to hit him less, strangely enough.

Their elder sister put a stop to anything else they might have said, hurrying back to them with a wide "Grin. "Found something you might be interested in. How about a polearm instead of just a stick?"

"You complain about my sticks, but I can whack you from across the room with it." Sonya followed her anyways, because while she might really want to stick with something safe and blunt like a staff she may just need a blade or two if everything went to hell on her in the future.

The older safecracker rolled her eyes at her but showed her the store she had found. It was quite the find she had made, a catch all for melee weaponry instead of yet another ammunition store with a side selection of knives ranging from pocket sized to short swords in length.

The real prize of the store were the clunky gemstone rings locked into a very secure display case, which the young pickpocket only belatedly realized were for Dying Will Flame users after wondering why rings were available in a weapon shop.

They looked rather shoddy at a glance, the stones cracked and cloudy, and since Sonya couldn't recall when Flame rings became a thing to be used even if she vaguely knew they would be she doubted they would help anyone much.

If she recalled correctly, that kind of ring would shatter after a use or two.

They were also hellishly expensive.

Until she knew what Flame type she had and how to use it, it wouldn't be worth the hassle to see if she could get one.

"Sonya?" A nudge from Tatiana drew her attention, as she pointed out a specific weapon displayed on the wall. "What about that one?"

She was pointing at a slim and lightweight war hammer.

Sonya left the store with a Bec de Corbin the proprietor insisted was Flame resistant, though she had her doubts about that. If she managed to shatter it, she would be rather cross given how much the damn thing had cost her.

Her older sister picked up a couple of knives while the shop clerk tried to sell the 'specially designed to be damage resistant' weapon to the blonde, and both girls chipped in to get Cherep a set of brass knuckles when he lingered a moment too long over them.

Even if he spluttered in protest.

XL (Monday the 23rd of January, 1961. A Mafia Land Ferry.)

"That wasn't so bad, right?"

Cherep gave Sonya a very level look over the head of the stuffed bear he was resigned to be carrying around for their whole trip back home. His crooked best friend merely smirked wryly at him, lightly kicking her luggage under the bench they were sitting on.

They would apparently be disembarking from the ferry in France then take a couple of different trains to hit the main rails, for an overnight ride to get them most of the way back into the USSR, and they'd probably hit Moscow sometime after dark tomorrow.
He was looking forward to watching the scenery pass by him because everything even remotely questionable had been packed into a shipping container that would probably reach Moscow before them, so he didn't have to sit there with the wonder if they were going to get arrested by any border inspections or not hanging over his head.

The only sour point was the fact he didn't speak or read French, German, or any language other than Russian or Czech. Cherep could at least deal with that issue in time, Sonya promised to help teach him a couple of languages then he could read the signs like any other tourist in the next year or so.

Mafia Land had been rather baffling in that respect. While he appreciated being able to read some of the signs and managing a conversation if he wanted, there was still the tiny fact it was mafia that boggled his poor head. Until their trip to the amusement park it had almost looked like some beachside vacation spot, with packs of foreign speaking tourists wandering around. Much to his surprise they hadn't even been the youngest children there, which told him that mafia people were almost another subculture entirely.

He hadn't known some people allowed their children lethal weapons or viewed the act of carrying them as some kind of reward or prize, and he probably would've been perfectly happy to have never noticed that. Even his new baby sister had looked bemused, guiding him and Tatiana away with a sour muttering about cows and hand grenades he didn't understand correctly.

At least, he hoped he didn't understand her correctly.

"It was... different." Cherep temporized instead of admitting she had a point, propping his chin on top of the ridiculous stuffed animal she had forced on him. "Not entirely good…"

"…but not that bad either, right?"

"You're not going to drop this, are you?"

"Nope."

Rolling his eyes skyward, he gave an awkward shrug. "Fine then. No, it wasn't that bad."

"I found a book for you and Tatiana, got something long and surprisingly pointed to play with, and might actually have gotten something I'd been wondering about done." Sonya informed him almost haughtily, kicking her feet idly and leaning back against the ship's railing. "I think our stay was great."

"Hooray for you. One question. Is there going to be lunch on this boat?"

"Oh god." Tatiana complained sickly, already green in complexion and hanging onto the railing they were leaning against for dear life. "Cherep, shut the hell up."

"Lisa said we'd be getting lunch in France before we board the train, because of poor Tatiana's delicate stomach. Just think… raw snails served in their shell… frog legs…" The blonde trailed off with a wicked smirk, waiting for the redhead to regain some control over her rebellious stomach. "… raw oysters and sea bugs boiled in their shells…"

Cherep winced in sympathy as their older sister got sick over the side of the ship yet again. "You are a horrible little foster sister."

"I'm the little sister, I'm supposed to be either sweet and loving or conniving and evil. And there's no way in hell I'm ever going to be sweet so evil it is." Defended the girl with a prissy little sniff, giving their horribly ill sister a sideways look. "And hopefully this will teach you not to mess with my damn
"This means war, you little hellion." Tatiana hissed back at her, pulling a rather good glare for all that she looked a moment away from losing the battle to keep what little of breakfast she ate where it was supposed to be. "I didn't know the damn thing was there."

"And you leave your shoes all over the place too, so you have no room to complain."

Sighing, and wishing that Lisa hadn't abandoned him with his foster siblings when it became apparent this wouldn't be one of the little things Sonya was totally apathetic about happening, he dropped his face into his hands.

His crooked best friend didn't normally tend to get this vicious, so he was rather curious what had been in that book when he was sure she had already read all the ones she had picked up that first day.

Arseniy had given it to her… so maybe that was the reason she wasn't letting this incident go?

Chapter End Notes

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one's peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).

Peredniki - Brats
XLI (Saturday the 28th of January, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Only belatedly, during the rather miserable first week home while the younger members of the house were recovering from a round of vaccinations and booster shots, did Sonya realize that she might have missed a very good opportunity concerning her first heist and her stupidly tricky ability.

If certain gemstone rings enabled Dying Will Flame users to focus and more easily use their abilities, then she might be able to find a gem that would work for her without shelling out a lot of money for some already made ones and attracting attention at a specialty shop. The rings they had found available in Mafia Land were probably a quality better than anything she could find on her own, but they weren't exactly masterwork pieces either and it might be possible to find her own and less expensive alternatives.

Conceivably, she might be able to rummage around another jewelry store for their stock gems and have an entire array of stones to test. It would be awkward as hell, trying to wear fiddly jewelry while attempting to break another handful of staffs and watching for which jewels broke or cracked on her, but doable.

It might even help her out in identifying her Flame type, though she was aware any gem that worked for her might not be in the color the Flame. Gemstones came in a wide variety of colors, and while her memory might insist the stones of Flame rings matched the Flames themselves that could just be because of a rare variety and not because those stones were typically thought to be that color.

Likely, whatever she made or found would be clunky and fragile since she wasn't a jeweler and as amateurish as could be when it came to Dying Will Flames. However, if she found one then it would work in a pinch for… whatever they were typically used for. Probably prevent her from stumbling into that tunnel-vision problem she had already butted her head against several times.

That old vor Aleksandr had not been amused to be almost smacked in the face one of the times he tried to get her attention while she was working on drawing up that startling strength at will. He now left gaining her attention to Cherep, who did so unheed of the risks a startled girl who could shatter metal every now and again posed to the integrity of his skull. In response Sonya poured a lot of effort into not falling into a narrow mindset while training.

She sighed heavily once the pros outweigh the cons of that idea somewhat handily, added the idea for another jewelry heist to her list of things to do, and turned back to the slightly damaged book in her hands.

Tatiana was very, very lucky they were all feeling a bit under the weather. Booster shots might not be as bad as getting full vaccinations, and somehow their foster brother was doing better than they were even if his shots were supposed to be worse, but the girls did have slight fevers and the redhead had an annoyingly persistent cough Lisa was trying to soothe with honey laced tea.

The book Arseniy got her, which had a suspicious gouge into the back in the shape of the redhead's throwing knives from when she fumbled one undressing and it dropped point first onto the book, might not have specific answers for her but it did have enough that Sonya managed to strike off another two Flame types from her possible list.

According to the book, use of Disintegration by Storm users left small particles behind and was never uniform in any initial application. Instead, she might have Disintegrated part of the vory she kicked or broke an arm of if she had primary Storm Flames.

That was, if the possibility of channeling Storm Flames through a wooden stick without it turning into dust in the first place was possible... and she wasn't really sure of that.

Lightning Flames would've kept her makeshift staff intact no matter the force, and while Hardening would've explained some of the damages she had done it wouldn't explain the kick impacting a brick wall to the point it dented or her continually shattering her practice weapons.

However, according to her new book it wasn't likely she only had one Flame type.

Apparently being purely one or another type was almost as rare as a being a Sky. Supposedly.

Even if it wasn't likely anyone could utilize more than one at a time, it was entirely likely a trait or two conformed more for a different Flame type than her 'main'. It was more likely she had two or more, the main she had probably already tapped into and another that would just confuse her until she got a firm grasp on her own abilities.

That was… not right?

Something about that was off from what she recalled, and that reminded her that all books had a bias she had to be careful of. May or may not be correct, in other words.

Unlike Cherep, who she could almost confidently say was purely a Soft Cloud Flame user from the information she now had and what she knew of him, she wasn't likely as clear-cut.

Worse, aside from the fact she now couldn't fudge the point that she didn't know for sure what her foster brother was in Dying Will terms, Sonya now likely knew how he was keeping himself alive through events that should have killed him.

If he internalized his Flame almost to an insane degree, he was then Propagating himself instinctively to either cover the damaged or weakened parts of his skeleton with new bone cells or replicate more blood and flesh to seal up injuries. She had gone around his back and gotten her hands on his medical reports, all those x-rays specifically, and could now understand enough to tell why that mafia doctor had been so enraged.

The more he became injured, the more of his Flame he used. The more he used, the stronger it got and the quicker he was back on his feet. The quicker he was back to moving around and continuing whatever it was he was doing, the more he got injured.

It was a vicious cycle that started early and probably only recently tapered off a little.

Hence why her Cherep would become Skull de Mort, the strongest Cloud of their generation. All because the brat would enter a highly risky job of being a stuntman and internally use his Flames, probably unknowingly in a different life without her up until he met others who were the strongest of their types, to survive everything when all logic dictated that he should've been dead trying some of his tricks.

She didn't know how any head injury he might get would heal, and she was slightly terrified of learning how that would end. She'd buy him that damn helmet if she had to, because brains were tricky things and she liked her Cherep the way he was.

She also had to figure out if she was going to teach him to use his Flames or not once she got a handle on hers, but Sonya was leaning towards not anytime soon simply because of the idea of him running out of Flames then getting injured made her feel cold down to her bones.

The fact he hadn't burned himself up, and she had already read a whole chapter dedicated to the ways and how Dying Will Flame users could kill themselves via their abilities early on, was impressive already considering the amount of power it had to take to Propagate something even as tiny as bone cells at four or five years of age and then hold it until the injuries healed up naturally around the faked cells.

Cherep was kind of scary-awesome. The thief wasn't going to tell him any time soon, because then his head would get big and her brother would never shut up about it.

The Great and Glorious Skull-sama, indeed.

Dork.

XLII (Wednesday the 1st of February, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Recovering, but with a lingering and annoying headache persisting that made her want to spend most of the day in bed, Sonya was pouring through the newspaper looking for the old Russian glass goblets she'd need for her Mafia Land job when a fully healthy Tatiana bounced into her room.

"What are you doing?"

"Looking for idiots bragging about things they really shouldn't." She absently replied, paging through the Editorial section and wondering if the Lifestyle one would help her more.

Rich people could be some of the worst snobs, boasting about this and that. Hopefully some socialite had been stupid enough to comment on any acquisitions of a glass nature, so she'd know where to go to get them. She'd also use the time she wasn't completely healthy to Lisa's specifications and check out a few antique stores.

Nothing said she had to steal what she was contracted to get, and it was looking like the only thing she'd explicitly have to was that State Seal. "What's up?"

"It's my birthday coming up next." Tatiana needlessly informed her, bouncing on her toes and grinning like the cat that got the canary.

"Yes…?"

Sonya had known that her birthday was next, just like she knew there was little under thirty months between them. Tatiana was almost thirteen, gangly and almost all bony elbows and knobby knees
"Lisa agreed to get me alcohol, now instead of just on my birthday, but she said to ask if you wanted to try as well."

Blinking blankly at the redhead for a long moment, the tiny thief eventually sighed. She should've figured, of course she would recall that comment weeks ago about what they had to do to try 'adult' stuff like drugs and liquor. "Not particularly, no."

"Aww… but-

"How about, instead, I watch you get drunk and report anything stupid you might end up doing?" Sonya cut her off before she could really get into a good whine, settling the newspaper in her lap since she figured she wouldn't be getting back to it anytime soon. "Then on Cherep's thirteenth birthday we do the same for him, and so on for me when I get to your age."

She had been marginally impressed the preteen girl hadn't badgered the boy into telling her why his medical check went so strangely or took so long, but she really should've figured something else had the top spot in her mental list of things to do.

It had apparently come down to what interested her more, Cherep's probable past abuse or alcohol. Unsurprisingly, the liquor seemed to have won out. Tatiana probably, correctly, figured she knew and could tell her if she really wanted to know.

"Do you have to be so responsible sounding? I'm supposed to be the older sibling here." Slumping on her bed, the redhead pouted up at the blonde and batted her blue eyes up at her. "I wanted us to do it together…"

Sonya frowned at her but gave in with a shrug. It was for Tatiana's birthday, supposedly.

She wasn't going to put it past the other girl to try gaining her agreement to something else closer to the actual date later too.

"Fine, whatever you want. I'm still not going to drink much, but I promise I won't take any pictures of you doing stupid things in return."

"You're such a darling, Sonya." Muttered the older girl into her comforter, rolling languidly off her bed before she could do more than glare in response. "I'll let Lisa know, and go tell Cherep all three of us are going to do it."

"Cherep's going to be drinking too?"

"I asked him first, just in case you proved to be stubborn I could mention him and then you'd go along with us anyways."

Touché, thought the younger girl in amusement as her elder gleefully flounced from the room.

Tatiana was lucky she was her foster sister, as that sounded very much like manipulation via her relationship with a civilian. She'd have to think of something to counter that before the redhead thought to try that again.

Now she got to look forward to two drunk preteens, and probably the worst tasting swill Lisa would try to scare them off drinking with.
Joy.

Sonya turned back to her newspaper, wondering if there would be anything interesting in the personal ads section.

By the next day the budding safecracker greatly regretted her early birthday wish for liquor and, from what the younger thief heard over the course of their ballet lessons, the resulting hangover.

Lisa was looking distinctly proud of herself throughout breakfast, Cherep had copied her with sticking to the cheap box wine and was mostly fine, and the younger pickpocket herself at least had an interesting night watching the redhead drunkenly stumbling around the house.

XLIII (Friday the 3rd of February, 1961. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"What are we doing?"

"I don't know what you're doing, but I'm shopping." Sonya informed Cherep seriously, examining the address she had written down on a piece of paper and trying to find the antique store she was looking for. "Why are you following me, anyways?"

"I don't like visiting Aleksandr's when you're not there." He shrugged, as if informing her he skipped his self-defense training when she was occupied doing other things wouldn't get him smacked upside the head. "So instead I'd see what you're so busy with."

She opened her mouth to scold him for skiving off his combat lessons but shut it after a moment and just kept on walking.

It was his life, though she worried over him she really had little to no control over his actions. She might guilt-trip him later, just to see if she couldn't get him to take it more seriously, but right now wasn't the time.

"I thought you didn't want to be involved with anything in my world?"

He blinked at her blankly a few times, brow furrowed as he belatedly realized what she was referring to and why it mattered with what she was doing now. "Sonya… what are you doing? Honestly."

"Shopping… mostly for a target if I'm unlucky." After bluntly informing him of that, she pulled the doors she was looking for open.

Cherep would probably keep his mouth shut while around others, and she was kind of running behind on finding a few certain things.

The antique store smelled musty, dusty, and… well, old. There weren't a lot of ancient things for sale, most of what was on display looked to be less than a century old and typically furniture, but all Sonya was really looking for was ways to narrow down her selection list.

Possibly to steal a ledger book or two if someone made the comment of once selling old Russian glass to anyone.

A clerk, probably drawn by the bells attached to the doors, took one look at the two children standing in the front of the store and almost sneered.
Almost, because she spoke up before he could. "I'm looking for Imperial era glass goblets for my "mama", it's almost "ded's" birthday you see. We thought he'd appreciate it."

The man's face went carefully blank for a long moment. "Ah… do you wish to inspect the selection, miss…?"

"No, I'm just supposed to see if you have any. "Mama" will be the one to look at them." The thief blatantly ignored his fishing, telling him her name when she might be robbing the store later would be pure stupidity.

"Allow me to consult the books, miss." Giving the two of them another look over, and probably not thinking anything nice about how either of them were dressed, the man swept away again.

She sighed and rolled her eyes a bit tiredly, there was little that could make her dress up more than she was when there was little reason for it. Dress and tights were as far as she was willing to go for right now, this shop wasn't in any affluent neighborhood where her apparel might discredit her significantly.

Cherep hadn't been planning on going anywhere himself, he was in the same clothes he usually visited Dmitriy in. Which had some suborn oil and grease stains on them, to say the least about the condition they were in.

"So… if they have any?"

"Might come back later to take a look at them. Much later." She didn't really think so, but she was hoping the stiff old ass manning the shop wouldn't mind calling around to see if any local stores had some in stock. Whether or not she bought them legally or stole the glassware was entirely up to the reception she got.

"Oh…. well… that's… nice."

Her brother looked rather uncomfortable now, and Sonya was enough of an ass herself to think that was funny.

"You don't have to stick around, I'll understand if you want to go do something else."

His expression shifted strangely, part relieved, tempted, and resigned all at the same time. "No, it's just… I have nothing else to do."

She frowned at that. "Dmitriy?"

"He's gone for the week, probably some of next too. Something about a final something or another."

Well… her oldest friend was about fifteen now. She wasn't surprised to hear the older teen was pulling his end-of-training heist, what did surprise her was that he took so long to do it. She did kind of wonder what he was going to steal, and what he'd do with the proceeds if he succeeded.

Then if he would continue until being arrested for the vor path or stop there for a supporter type one.

Sonya might have been the first one in their cohort group, discounting her age because she had a different mental one which made it a whole lot less impressive than it sounded, but there were several Mafiya brats that had already moved out of the neighborhood and got replaced with new children. The last go around even had a group of thieves moving out, meaning five new children moved into their neighborhood all at once.
Thankfully she was no longer the youngest of their group of Zolotov fosterlings anymore, but it did mean there were new children that hadn’t learned not to bother Cherep because his baby sister would probably break their fingers in retaliation.

Listening to them whine to Aleksandr was funny in a way that almost depressed her. It amused her because the old vor had little to no patience for whiny little brats getting their comeuppance and depressed her because once upon a time she hadn't been this cruel-minded.

That was probably part of the reason why the Cloud didn't want to go without her, even if he didn't like it when she purposely stomped on some of the worst behaving brats that bothered him.

"Err… Lisa might be willing to help you learn more French, and a handful of other languages. She taught me and Tatiana."

Cherep seriously considered that option, rocking back on his heels while they waited. "That sounds like a good idea."

"Be warned, if you do ask she'll have us speaking nothing but whatever language she deems you need practice with. So, you'll have to look forward to a month or two of whichever tongue being the only language spoken in the house."

He pulled another face at her, which made her smirk again.

A polite cough drew their attention back to the store clerk, who looked a lot less snobbish suddenly.

Sonya carefully didn't let her features twist into a frown. Eavesdropping, probably.

She ran the conversation she just had with Cherep through her head to ensure he wouldn't be suspicious of her, then almost snorted when she realized why he no longer looked as if someone shoved something metal and pointed up his ass.

Multiple languages in the civilian sector meant middle to high business class sorts of people.

Her age, multilingual, and looking for antiques apparently equaled out her plain dress and her brother's less than wealthy look in his head.

"We don't have any Imperial era goblets in stock at the moment, young miss, but our sister store on the other side of the city does."

She sweetly smiled up at the bigot. "Oh? Do you have an address for them?"

XLIV (Tuesday the 21st of February, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Some experimentation and another solid month of working on it, Sonya knew a few more interesting things about Dying Will Flames… more specifically her own Flames.

For one, although the metal head of the Bec de Corbin she bought in Mafia Land was resistant to everything she could do to abuse it… the wooden shaft it had been mounted on hadn't been.

The handle had shattered as easily as glass in her hands. Aleksandr had been interested enough in the testing to volunteer himself to either find a more resistant shaft for her or see if he couldn't get ahold of more of the metal the head of her weapon was made of.

With that being dealt with, she instead turned her attention to the beginner's introduction book to Dying Will Flames Arseniy had found for her. More specifically, to the personality tests to identify one's Flame type located near the back.

She knew enough before to pin down her own types as a mix of Sun, Storm, and/or Cloud. She was hoping mostly for Sun's Activation, merely because being able to heal on demand sounded so much more useful than Propagation or Disintegration.

Scouring through the book and the hints about what certain types tended to do in their personal life and habits soured that hope, though.

What she knew for sure was that Cherep was a pure Cloud, Soft/Inverted though he may be.

Using that as a starting point and being as brutally honest as she could, Sonya had gravitated to him on her own without really knowing why at first then justifying it to herself later with his odd coloring and possible future. After that first meeting she had never really thought of his coloring as unusual again, just odd enough to identify him from a distance if she had to. His possible future was something she had mainly ignored until she admitted to herself that she wouldn't be letting him deal with that without her.

Which, according to her book, meant she was either a Hard/Classic Cloud or a similarly polarized Sun as those were the two most likely to put up with a Soft Cloud for any reason.

Storm Flames apparently only justified her continually clinging to him mulishly, regardless of which way those Flames polarized.

According to all three of the people she tended to hang around, Tatiana, Cherep and Dmitriy; Sonya was an icy little bitch if she didn't care about whoever she was interacting with. Once past that she was still a standoffish introvert, but she would give someone a moment or two of her time if she had to.

All of which were personality signs of a Hard/Classic Cloud Flame.

Her being more sociable to Cherep, and later Tatiana, weren't part of her likely Cloud instincts.

That, limited by the range of what she already knew, restricted her to a Soft/Inverted Sun or a Storm type secondary Flame. Sun wasn't likely, even though Suns typically did better socializing with Clouds of their same polarization and could put up with the opposite if they had enough of a reason to. Storm was much more likely to allow the socialization she did, but which Storm polarization she had was still murky.

Apparently, there was something to that social incompetence Tatiana liked to reference when talking to her.

Thus, Sonya manifested her Flames as a Storm-Cloud according to her book. More Hard/Classic Cloud than whichever polarized Storm she had, but with the remote possibility of Soft/Inverted Sun either in the fullness of time or if she really worked on it.

This was depending on if the book was accurate or not-slanted enough to take at face-value.

She carefully cleared off a spot on her desk and planted her face into the wood with a groan or exasperated pain.
Cloud and Storm weren't the best results a thief would want, besides Propagation meaning she could make her own fakes and Disintegration meaning she could make her own emergency escapes. Both were things that would probably only come up if she epically failed at her job and were a breach in Omertà just waiting to happen, meaning while not useless they weren't typically useful for her either.

If the Propagation failed at just the right moment… or the Disintegration was supposedly impossible and yet some civilian put the pieces together correctly to convince someone else… she'd get a visit from the Vindice in a way she wouldn't escape.

If she ever got to the point of needing her Flames to steal, she vowed to retire as a thief and do something less pathetic with herself.

Hell, Rain Flames would have been more useful in an immediate sense. She could've even made use of Lightning's Hardening more than Propagation or Disintegration.

According to her book, if polarized in opposite directions Clouds tended to work well together and occasionally were drawn to one another as that way they didn't think the other was infringing on their territory and lash out in response. The fact she and Cherep let the other hang around them at all was part of that. His initial reluctance was probably partly the fact he was stronger than her, but she was the one bothering him first.

That she was plotting to keep him out under the Zolotov's collective thumb was entirely her Cloud nature trying to keep her territory from being pinned down. Which according to the fact she didn't have physical territory she was driven to patrol or monitor meant that someone was taking that facet of her nature up, and three guesses for who that was according to the book.

Sonya was never telling anyone the fact her book insisted Cherep was her territory. It could go with her to the grave as far as she was concerned.

Storms just tended to fixate on things, her continued and fierce attachment to her brother and her mysteriously multiplying hoard of books were symptoms of that… as well as her strangely odd desire to exceed at a job she once had little interest in. Slightly or very reckless when fueling their fixation were signs of a Hard/Classic Storm, an almost insolent disregard for everything while in pursuit of their fixation was a sign of Soft/Inverted Storms.

Sonya could be either, certain oddities about her kept her from pinning down her Storm Flame polarization.

If she had to, she could then identify Tatiana with a main Flame of Classic/Hard Sun and Dmitriy as a Soft/Inverted Rain. The redhead she called her foster sister might even have a tiny amount of Sky potential, not enough to start drawing Guardians but enough to utilize a kind of Harmony manifestation to bond different personality types together.

Which would be interesting if she could prove it at all.

In theory, anyways. Figuring it out in practice was just as hard as it had been before she tentatively identified her Flame types.

According to her book, the next step should've been meditation. As in sitting in one place and trying to draw out one's Flames for both confirmation via the color of said Flames and as a control exercise.

Sonya had accidentally skipped that and headed into attempting to channel her Flame with her weapons practice, to the point she was basically a freakishly strong little girl who somehow managed not to burn herself up while getting a hold on one of her own abilities.
Backtracking into meditation probably would do wonders for her control, so that was what she planned on doing next.

That was, after she finished copying the more relevant bits of information on Dying Will Flames into the blank journal Lisa had picked up for her on a recent supply run to their clan’s headquarters. There was no real reason why all the information had to be spread out in several different books, masked with children's stories which may give someone the wrong idea about what skills they had or slanted to 'only this' when there were exceptions to the 'rules'.

Cherep wasn't a territorial asshole about his space, he moved in with her surprisingly easy if his freedom was so damn important, so the book was lying a bit. Or was misinformed. That was one of the few things she was sure of, but that didn't mean the rest of it was equally so.

Instead, Sonya was going to ensure it was all in order and laid out in an easy to read manner then donate the books she wouldn't need to keep to her clan. She might even make a copy of her resulting book and give that to Arseniy if she ever needed a favor from the Zolotovs later in life.

XLV (Saturday the 25th of March, 1961. Mafia Land.)

Antique stores were a hell of a lot easier to rob than jewelry stores, but the museum was harder than anything else Sonya had yet done as a thief.

Antique stores didn't have night guards, but museums had several 24/7.

Her take from robbing the sister store that bigot worked for included three different sets of old Imperial Russian crystal goblets; the contents of a display case of old jewelry and watches she planned on sitting on or selling in Mafia Land with the unneeded glassware; the ledgers of the store; an assortment of old books; and the contents of two safes as well as the register.

Antique stores also bought things brought in, which meant it was a lot more than the ready cash any shop needed to make change on any decent business day.

She couldn't take more than what she got away with as the glass had been excessively fragile, and she only made room for the jewelry and other small trinkets by wrapping them in old newspaper the store kept a supply of and using the bundles as packaging cushions along with the paper money.

It ended up being the oddest idea Sonya ever had for how to use her stolen cash, but it worked.

The ledgers were more for future research, being it had detailed accounts of who bought what she might be able to use to track down other items any contracted job asked her to. Tatiana rolling her eyes at her for stealing books was entirely unwarranted.

The other old books were just that, rare old books she just wanted for herself and couldn't talk herself out of taking.

The museum heist took a full month to plan, because the floor plan was open enough to eliminate any decent hiding spots and enable the guards to see more at a glance.

In the end, instead of waiting for night to fall and robbing the place when there was less security and civilians around, the budding thief stole one of the over glorified wax stamps out of the museum's storage area in broad daylight. She still didn't really see why someone wanted one, as anyone alive using it would probably get caught fast, but it was what she agreed to do.
That didn't mean stealing the damn thing had been easy, she in fact had to attempt it twice because she abandoned the job the first day when someone who was supposed to have been gone was still there. One of the restorers, who worked with old metal someone didn't want to melt down to be reused, apparently came in outside of his scheduled work hours to finish something up. Sonya had planned on using his office/closet as a staging area to find the seal she needed, so she was forced to wait a day.

The day after her botched attempt, when the man had been safely gone, she ended up looking for four hours due to a lack of recorded movements of certain pieces either about to be shipped off to another museum or displayed in an exhibit. When she finally found it the paperwork nearby claimed it was just about to be shipped off to a St. Petersburg museum, which made the thief very thankful she wouldn't have to go to that city to steal an extra bit of history.

The Grekov Gang ruled most of St Petersburg's underworld, and they were both more powerful and influential than the Zolotovs. Getting in there might not be much of an issue but stealing in that territory would've been a nightmare to arrange peacefully. Unless Sonya would do it silently, but that would just incite a manhunt for her as skimping on paying dues and fees like that was a very insulting snub.

Her Mafia Land job took her a total of three months to do, and due to the migratory nature of the manmade island it would take her another few weeks to close it out. Mafia Land was near the coast of South America now, air travel being what it was in the 1960s meant it was safer to take a ship across the ocean. Arseniy went with her, because neither adult liked the thought of letting her go off alone for all that she worked now.

Having the appearance of a child was starting to irritate Sonya something fierce.

It was nice to be overlooked and all every now and again but being treated like one all the time was different.

Since it was a day trip, the vor opted out of doing anything but following her around like an eerily silent bodyguard. She turned in her 'acquisitions' with her contract paperwork and picked up another one, not quite something she'd be able to do while remaining at home but something she'd be able to do while close to Moscow anyways.

Returning home would take slightly less time, but it was still a week of travel back and forth.

Sonya really hoped, but wasn't holding her breath for, being able to go alone next time.

XLVI (Thursday the 6th of April, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Un autre?" (Another one?) Cherep exclaimed incredulously, in French no less, peering over her shoulder.

Sonya twitched her papers away from his sight, frowning up at him even as she responded in the same language. "Oui, pourquoi es-tu surprise?" (Yes, why are you surprised?)

He just frowned back at her, running a hand through short purple hair as he thought through his words and mentally translated them. "Tu as dix ans, et tu as un emploi." (You have ten years, and you have a job.)
"J'ai presque onze ans." (I almost have eleven years.) She started to protest, then what they were about to argue about registered in her brain.

As well as the stupidity of her rebuttal, one year older did not make much of a difference taken with her current physical age. To be brutally honest, being barely three months past her tenth birthday did not make her anywhere near eleven either.

At her brother’s utterly deadpan look for her attempt to argue with that as her defense, once he worked through translating it, she sheepishly coughed once while smoothing the pages face down on top of a random stack of books she was using as a desk. “J'ai presque dix ans et demi.” (I almost have ten-and-half.)

In most of the world, and most of the USSR, ten-year-old children did not work. Even in the Russian underworld, Mafiya brats normally waited until they were at least classified as actual teenagers to do anything for their syndicate. Fifteen to sixteen, at earliest, and maybe a very fast growing fourteen on the rare occasions.

It was less uncommon elsewhere, but she wasn't elsewhere. Mafia Land was a blind spot in that respect, it dealt with other cultures that allowed children freedom earlier than her USSR typically did and was how her age didn't amount to a stumbling block in acquiring an actual job.

Contract-based though it may be.

When China and Italy both had five-year-old assassins and hitmen on some occasions, a ten-year-old thief from Russia didn't stick out too badly on an international stage.

Her foster brother also probably thought of her as younger than him. Which was both true and not, confusingly enough.

The thief had gotten used to thinking of herself as her physical age for most things, but the fact she used to be a twenty-year-old woman once upon a time still popped up now and again… however, she physically wasn't and that was the sticking point.

Mentally she might be able to handle the stress, but her body couldn't.

Taking another look at the limitations of her second contract, which boiled down to a time limit, then back at an increasingly wary looking Cherep… she decided she could wait.

It wouldn't kill anything.

"I have to do at bare minimum two contracts a year. Mafia Land’s fiscal year ends the same as everyone else, which means the thirty-first of December. This is the last job I have to do this year, Cherep."

"Oh…" He didn't exactly look pleased with that for a long moment, but he did shift the topic away from what she was planning on doing. He also seemed stupidly thankful she switched to Russian. "Have you given any thought to joining a circus?"

"You realize the same reason why you're not happy I'm working also applies to you, right?"

"It's as illegal as hell?"

She gave him a flat look, which made the brat smirk at her. "Non. Your age, Cherep. Tatiana and I, though we are perfectly qualified to be Mafiya thieves and work as such for our clan, do not plan on moving out of this house until we're at least fifteen. I'm pretty sure Tatiana's going to wait until I can leave too, so it'll be sixteen or seventeen for her and fifteen for me. That's a little over four years away."

The only really confirmed Cloud nodded slowly as he took that fact in. "So…"

"I'm not the one that wants to join a circus. You're the one that needs to look for one, so I can dig up information on who runs it and where they go. You might also want to think about adding more languages to your plate, so you can talk to people outside the USSR. I speak four myself." Five if one wanted to get technical but English wasn't something Sonya had to use just yet, so no one knew she could speak it. "Additionally, you might want to give some thought as to what, in a circus, you want to do. We won't be allowed to just tag along, operations like that need every hand it has to make it work right."

"Mes enfants... vous êtes supposés être en train de parler en français." (My children… you are supposed to be speaking French.) Lisa called in from the hallway, making both start in surprise.

"Je suis désolée, Lisa." (I'm sorry, Lisa.) She called after their foster mother loudly.

In all honesty, she needed to brush up her French just as much as Cherep needed the practice. Her grasp on the language had faltered slightly while she had been learning Mandarin Chinese.

"En as-tu trouvé in?" (Have you found one?)

"Err... non." (…no.) Stuttered her brother through his response uneasily, more out of uncertainty of being clear than for the conversation topic. "Je suis en train d'apprendre sur les moteurs et comment ils marchent." (I've learning about engines and how they worked.)

"Et les langues je pense. Tiens moi au courant quand tu auras trouvé un cirque que tu voudras joindre." (And languages, I think. Let me know when you'll have found a circus that you'll want to join.) Sonya smirked at him, waiting the few moments he needed to work his way through her statements.

His irritated wet-cat look was reward enough for her. She shrugged at him, smiled prettily, and shooed him out of her room so she could get back to planning.

Her latest contracted job wouldn't let her skate by without actually tackling private home security. From the minute details she had it looked as if her contractor had a relationship that soured, and he/she/it wanted to either reclaim or have something stolen from the other party.

Private property was a hell of a lot harder to get the blueprints for than public. Depending on the age of whatever home she'd be breaking into, there was the possibility there weren't any blueprints available.

On this next heist, it was entirely possible she'd be going in without much information to work off.

XLVII (Sunday the 9th of April, 1961. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Well?"

"Well what?"

"You're not listening to me at all, are you?"
"…no. What was it that you wanted again?"

"Oh." Sonya blinked at her a couple times, probably more to refocus than to look at her. "Erm… no? It's not going to be that hard."

"Do you even know which heist we're talking about?"

"The… private residence one?" She tried hesitantly, grimacing at the flat look the older girl gifted her with. "Oh, for the love of… Tatiana, do you want to come with me when I rob a jewelry store?"

She considered it for a minute, because pulling a job with a skilled thief did sound like some fun. Also, she wouldn't have to split the take with seven other Mafiya kids… just one foster sister. "I don't want to, but I wouldn't mind. You sure you not… I don't know… trying too hard?"

"Trying too hard for what?"

"To prove yourself a better thief that Lisa or Arseniy figured you would end up as."

Sonya blankly stared at Tatiana for a long, silent moment. "…what?"

"They pegged you as a petty thief! Maybe one that could open a way for others if you worked in a group, but mostly a pickpocket." When it didn't look as if she understood why her older sister was upset on her behalf, she pulled herself upright and set her hands on the younger girl's shoulders. "I would understand if you're doing so much to ensure you can make it as a cat burglar on your own, but it doesn't seem like it."

"I'm not, really. My first heist was for that. I proved myself better, so I'm no longer worried about it."

"So why… look. You've done two jewelry stores, an antique store, and a museum all within about a year. You're planning on adding a private residence and another jewelry store in the next few weeks. Why so many this year? There's no reason to overwork or overburden yourself. Mistakes are made that way, remember."

"I have to do this private residence to keep in good standing in Mafia Land for the year. The jewelry store is actually for a personal project I'm working on, which might end up being useful for the clan." The younger thief defended herself while peeling the safecracker's hands off, a normal reaction that was a bit depressing in full honesty, frowning slightly up at her. "I'm not planning on anything else until I have to go back and do another two contracts, so I stay in Mafia Land's good graces next year."

She gave up, flinging herself back down to the ground in a huff. "You're so much like an old woman. I don't understand why you're working so hard, you're only ten."

"Again, I'm almost eleven… sort of. I'm ten and some months, thank you very much."

That sounded catty and snotty, almost a reflection of her age that Sonya didn't usually act like.

She grinned up at the pickpocket-turned-cat burglar. "Cherep yell at you about this too?"

The completely flat expression on her face answered that question. "I don't understand why the both of you have to continually remind me."
"You don't act your age." Tatiana helpfully informed her, stretching out so she could cross her ankles and fold her hands beneath her head. "Be a kid for once, not a tiny and boring old woman."

Sonya's fingers twitched, even as twisted as they were in the grass beneath them. The book she had been reading while they spent time together in the park lay abandoned in her lap. "I don't feel like a kid, Tatiana. Why act differently when I could be myself?"

"Why push yourself when you don't have to?"

She gave her a disgusted look. "It's better than having nothing to do."

"But when we have nothing to do you can read all the books you want!" Obvious temptations didn't do the trick, but the redhead had half expected that.

"I ran out of books to read."

She hadn't been expecting that.

"What, really?" When all she did was roll her eyes, the older girl propped herself up and took the situation seriously. Mostly. "The world must be ending."

The blonde heaved a sigh, closing the book she had been reading and lightly smacking Tatiana on the head with it. "Not helping."

"Sorry, sorry… not really, but still."

If she was being honest with herself, she was a little surprised the two of them were wasting some time away together. Normally, Sonya would duck out to bother Cherep or wander the city when she had the time to spare rather than spend any amount of time being lazy.

Unfortunately for the blonde girl, or fortunately for Tatiana, their foster brother was currently taking his school placement tests. For Lisa would then be able to handle his education records for him and not have to send him to a school.

Which left the foster sisters home alone together, and with her slightly scrambling for something for them to do together. Occasions like this one were rare enough as it was, when the tiny thief slowed down enough for her to catch up.

Much to her own despair, the best option Tatiana could think of was the jewelry heist suggestion. "You really sure you wouldn't mind me coming with you?"

"For…? Oh, right. No, I don't mind. It's in three weeks, after I get back."

"An overnight trip?"

"Plan on at least three days. One to get there and scout the place, one to rob, the last to recover and leave. Doing it overnight that one time wiped me out, so we're doing this a bit more slowly."

"I'll keep that in mind."

Cherep deserved a damn medal. That was the longest conversation she ever had with Sonya on any one topic, and while she did have to mentally flail for another it hadn't derailed the whole conversation.
Stealing, either from or into and out of, private residences was very different from stealing out of public business venues.

When Sonya started looking for someplace to call home, she was going to nix all buildings that had balconies. A more obvious ‘steal from me’ sign there never was, and garden terraces with climbing vines were perfectly placed routes to the second floor… if not socially acceptable methods to scale a building by.

Getting in, and therefore getting out, was going to be stupidly easy.

The trickier of the features her latest heist gave her was the lack of guards. Instead, homes had people living in them that held to no specific routine and could pop up at any time.

That was slightly nerve-wracking to work around.

Additionally, homes old enough had creaking spots littered throughout its floors. Her ballet and gymnastic training allowed her to stop putting weight down the moment she heard any wood groaning, but if anyone was listening hard enough it was still obvious where she was.

It was slow going, both in being careful where she put her feet and trying to remain mostly silent while moving, which only increased the likelihood that someone would wake up and want either a glass of water or the bathroom and find a little thief wandering around instead.

According to her contract, what she was looking for was in the second-floor study. Yet again a rather useless paperweight, probably asked for because of the sentimental value attached rather than the price tag.

Sometimes what people wanted stolen from others occasionally baffled her, amusing as it was to wonder what events led to the requested contracts in Mafia Land.

After three bedrooms, two of which were occupied, and a rather nicely done bath Sonya finally found the upstairs study.

Since she planned on waiting ten or so minutes to ensure she hadn't woken anyone and it was mostly safe to make her ponderous way out, she located the small bronze statue she had been requested to steal. Then, with a little time to kill, peered at the book titles displayed on the bookcases littered around the room. The lights were off, so she only had dim moonlight by which to read.

It wasn't a good idea. She knew it, adding more books to both her load right now and the piles of them she had at home wasn't something she should do. While stealing other things to throw off any attempts to hunt her down was a thing she tended to do, if she kept stealing books someone might catch on the same thief was responsible for everything.

Tatiana would also tease her relentlessly about her developing bibliomania.

Distracted as she was, she still heard the creak of a less-than-ideally oiled door swinging open.

Diving under the ornate and heavy desk got her cover, if badly picked since under the desk was such an obvious move. Slinking around to the corner of the furniture in the still dark room, the tiny blonde pulled herself up short when the lights flicked on.

Moving now would be stupid, and she was just thankful the statue was still where she found it.
Whoever it was that was up moved in a lumbering way slowly, probably not quite fully awake. Sonya slid herself over to the other side of the desk, keeping herself low and as close to the wood as possible. When the footfalls sounded like they were rounding one side of the furniture, she carefully crawled around to keep the desk between whoever that was and herself.

"Vitya?"

With a wince, she rolled herself under a couch to take herself out of any possible sights from both the desk and the doorway. Curling herself up so her tiny form was solidly in the shadow the couch cast on the floor.

The grey-haired old man, who had probably been on his way to get an alcoholic nightcap, didn't bother to turn around at the woman's voice calling out.

Sonya kept an ear on where they both were all throughout their quiet conversation. She didn't really need to know the man had a drinking problem, as that was obvious since it was the early morning hours and he had gone straight for a glass already. She also didn't appreciate being forced to listen to what was probably his wife scold him for it either.

By the time the two of them finally switched the lights off and shuffled back to bed, their uninvited guest was firmly of the opinion they owed her some of their books. Not just for the indignity of taking shelter under the damn couch, but mostly for the gossip session she had been forced to listen to.

Since it would be another hour or two before she felt safe enough to take the statue and leave, she had the time to pick out a couple good ones instead of whatever she could grab. More deliberate picks would lend more weight to the assumption she had been after books more than the figure, at least.

There were a couple foreign history books on display, the type that looked old and probably not censored of anything the country would've been embarrassed by. Since she had been on the lookout for more, ever since she found that Adolph Hitler assassination thing in her world history text, a few of those would be going home with her.

As she packed up both the statue of a strangely stylized mermaid and a few tomes, Sonya decided the only way this heist could have been more uncomfortable that it had been would be if the owners of the home had dogs.

Thankfully, they seemed to be more partial to cats than dogs. She had already passed the housecat on her way in, and the damned thing had just glared haughtily at her.

XLIX (Thursday the 27th of April, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Cherep?" Sonya poked her head into his room, pushing the door farther when he waved a hand at her in acknowledgement. "Got a moment?"

"Um… sure?" His purple head of hair popped up on the other side of an engine he somehow convinced Lisa to let him bring into the house and set up in his room. Consequently, his room smelled like oil and metal and the scent was even clinging to his clothing nowadays.
She was mostly sure that was a car engine, but where he got it or what he intended to do with it was beyond her. "So… Dmitriy's leaving."

"I heard."

As he had finished his training and was a fully working thief, opting out of trying for vor for now, the young mechanic had decided to leave the more light-fingered jobs to other Zolotovs and instead work on their clan's fleet of vehicles. Dmitriy was entirely of the kind of guy you'd take a stolen car to, so it'd get reworked into looking like a different car than the guy that would do the stealing in the first place. He could if he had a reason for it, and proved that, but he hadn't been interested in continuing to carjack for a living.

Now, instead of living over a garage nearby, her old childhood friend was going to be moving farther into Moscow and working for the clan. That knocked off Cherep's favorite thing to do most days, going to the garage and getting dirty instead of following Sonya around and watching her pick pockets.

The main hangout and headquarters for the Zolotov clan was a bit too far for a casual walk, part of the reason Dmitriy was moving out of the neighborhood in the first place.

Which might explain the hunk of oil crusted metal currently occupying her brother's bedroom floor. It was entirely possible it was a pacifying gesture, so she didn't have a reason to hunt her friend down and express her displeasure to him again.

He hadn't tried again after his first meeting with her foster brother ending with her demanding a favor to cancel out the one she owed him and his presence as her sparring partner.

"Right, well… I had an idea."

Her brother hauled himself up on his bed, carelessly smearing the grease on his arms around with a similarly dirty rag, giving her an expectant look.

"How would you like to learn to pick locks?" She didn't let him do more than pull a face at the suggestion, continuing in a rush. "Not like for what I learned to do it for, just to know how."

He blinked at her blankly, and the thief bit her lower lip.

"Really?"

"It's a thought I had, since apparently you don't really like the self-defense lessons Aleksandr is giving you." Enough so that he'd been skipping them when she wasn't there. Again, Cherep's passive-aggressive protesting methods at work. "So instead of fighting off whoever would try to kidnap you again, I thought I might as well teach you how to escape if you need it."

He flushed slightly, raking a hand through his short hair out of both embarrassment and confusion and leaving an oily smear in the strands. "Was that why you wanted me to learn?"

"…what did you think I was doing this all for?"

She wasn't entirely sure if she wanted to know. Especially since he started fidgeting, something he hadn't done around her for nearly a year.

"Erm… I thought you wanted me to join… this." The colossal dork waved a hand around, as if to encompass the whole neighborhood with the multitude of Zolotov trainees that called it home.
Sonya made a rude sound, skirting around his engine block and settling herself on his bed too. "I knew full well you'd never really like this life. I've actually been trying to keep you out of it. Why do you think I warned you about all the ways my clan could sink their claws into you before you could do any of it?"

Cherep chewed on that thought for a very long, very awkward moment. "Well… um."

Reaching behind her, Sonya snagged his pillow and smacked him upside the head with it.

"That could not have hurt. It's a pillow."

"You forget your strength sometimes." Defended the preteen, still rubbing the side of his head she had hit. "Soft or not, they can still hurt."

She huffed, hugging the pillow to her chest.

She hadn't quite gotten the hang of the meditation exercises recommended by her book for Flame users, and rarely could she do more than merely warm the tips of her fingers. If she didn't want to be a circus sideshow freak with her stupid strength, she really had to get a hang of it sometime soon.

"Anyways, so… my suggestion?"

"You sure they're not going to ask something I don't want to do from me?"

"The worst you'll be expected to do is keep an ear out for any Zolotov thieves in trouble, or any rumor about trouble coming our way. That's for this living arrangement, and pretty typical for anyone a Mafiya syndicate helps out. Since I'm teaching you, I decide what to demand in return." Sonya stuck her nose in the air at his incredulous expression. "I demand you help me out if I ever get engine trouble in my life."

Cherep's expression twisted into amused, digging his still dirty hand into his hair again. "That I can agree with… as long as this 'request' has a time limit of a couple years."

"What? Why?"

"Locks change, right? Over time they'd get harder. I might need more lessons, so then you'll get more years on that warranty."

She blinked a few times, as she hadn't thought of that. "Well yes. I suppose you may be right."

"May?" He echoed, a smirk creeping across his face to replace the smile.

"May. We'll see."

L (Sunday the 21st of May, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

With all the traveling going on in Sonya's life, Tatiana got stuck with plotting out which jewelry store the foster sisters would rob.

Damn it all, she had new books to be read…
The moment Arseniy brought them both home after her last trip to Mafia Land for the year, the blonde was either showing Cherep how to figure out which picks he would need for different locks or helping their elder sister figure out the logistics of their future heist.

Having done a jewelry store once before she did have a few suggestions from hard won experience, but the redhead looked rather determined on putting the basis of a plan together herself.

Lisa was all for the girls doing a job together, claiming Tatiana would benefit from both the planning and doing and Sonya would get more experience in working with other thieves.

The safecracker then learned that older buildings weren't the best ones to target even if getting their blueprints was easier, planning the heist was radically different than doing one, and got acquainted with Sod's Law. The former pickpocket showed her how to use ventilation ducts to get around stealthily, and they both still had to play keep away with the three guards the store they were robbing employed.

Again, Sonya ended up grabbing more than she had planned on. Part of that was her foster sister's insistence that if the blonde had the strength to carry more then they should use that, and part of it was merely moments of opportunity that became available to them while on site.

Their target had been a newer branch store of a rather successful jewelry business, unlike the little and old privately owned one the younger sister had started herself out on. Since she only wanted certain gems herself, Sonya had been more selective in her stealing than her older sister.

They still started from the back rooms and worked forward, which left them an escape route in case something went sour fast or one of the guards were extra vigilant. The contents of three safes and one stocked workroom later, they poked around the display cases to see if there was anything they could take.

Unlike her last jewelry heist, the clerks hadn't secured their display pieces under the counters. However, the girls did get several pieces that hadn't been on display and were stored under the glass cases. Tatiana, running a risk that Sonya did not appreciate in the least, even managed to steal the necklace off one of the window displays in between guard patrols.

Instead of spending hours stuck in another building's ventilation shaft, they instead lowered the slimmer blonde and their loot to the ground via the rope they brought while the redhead found her own way down using two conveniently close brick walls.

It took them another day to get home, sewing the gems and jewelry into the same internal pocketed blankets the former pickpocket had used for her first heist and catching a train back to Moscow in the evening.

Spilling the loot out under Arseniy's eye went faster with four hands, and while gold and silver bricks were reserved for their clan's cut of the proceeds… the physically younger thief instead selected a few gemstones rather than have her take sold to the local fence.

"Why do you want the stones?"

"Remember the rings in that weapon shop? I think I might be able to find a replacement on my own, it's just…"

Tatiana smirked at the pile before them. "Just… there might be more rocks in whatever shade than you planned on?"

Sonya wrinkled her nose mostly in sour agreement but kept her eye on the pile that was starting just in front of her. Even if she only took all the purple and red stones, for Cloud and Storm Flames, that was still going to be a large chunk of money she'd be trying to destroy.

Maybe this hadn't been the best idea…

From one store purple gemstones came in variations of alexandrite, amethyst, purple garnet, purple opal, purple sapphire, purple diamonds, purple tourmaline, purple spinel, tanzanite, and purple zircon. Reds came in types like red beryl, ruby, red diamonds, imperial topaz, red spinel, red tourmaline, carnelian, red sunstone, garnet, fire opals, red agate, red fluorite, red jasper, and red tiger's eye.

That was all just one jewelry store's stock jewelry and gemstones, if she looked elsewhere she'd probably find different stones in the same colors.

…worst of all, she had the possibility of Storm Flames. It might just end up with her destroying any kind of ring she tried to wear anyways without it ever boosting her Flames enough to get a handle on her abilities.

"Well… this idea is a bust."

"Maybe if we get one of those rings, and get it appraised at another jewelry shop?" Suggested the redhead lightly around a yawn. "There's no guarantee those rings are gems, they might just be a kind of crystal shaped to look like one."

The blonde scowled at her out of petty irritability, not in true anger. "Stop poking holes in my plans. I need something to do, thank you."

"There's nothing to say you can't try, just pick one or two from every category and sell the rest." Lisa temporized, picking through the selection still waiting to be sorted. "Try a different gem every week, record the results, and we'll see if we can't find something that will work for you."

The younger thief eyed her still considerable pile once they finished parting down the unset rocks. There were still almost fifty different loose gemstones of varying sizes. "This will still take a while."

"You've got the time, why not?" Tatiana lightly shoved at Sonya's shoulder, getting up since her take had been sorted out to be sold off already.

"Point." Allowed the blonde girl, sweeping her gems into a small velvet bag they had stolen them in.

LI (Sunday the 28th of May, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

With several months Sonya had nothing planned for before her, she decided there was no time like the present to start on experimenting with her gemstones.

Taking a good long look at what she had gathered in the privacy of her own room, she then had to fight the impulse to smack herself upside the head.

She wasn't a jeweler, or a geologist. A tumble of loose gems of similar shades of purple in varying cuts all looked the same to her. While a few jewels were secured in settings, there were only a handful of those neatly labeled for use by clerks with little base knowledge to work from.

Apparently, her plan of 'secure the gems then figure the damn thing out once home safe' hadn't been the best one. Hindsight being what it was, she should have probably taken the time to ensure the loose gems remained in with their mounted fellows just to keep the types all straight.

The former pickpocket eyed the jumbled mass of precious and semi-precious stones on her bed in exasperation. She could pick out the opals, strange shades of tiger's eye, and jasper… but the rest that weren't labeled neatly would need professional help in sorting.

Considering it in the secured safety of her own space with time to spare, there might even be a less than legal option. Given all of it was stolen property in the first place, it would be risky to have them appraised by anyone not shady or without even the tiniest of Mafiya connections.

Her clan likely had a local fence somewhere nearby, it stood to reason that if the person took the results of two previous jewelry store heists and sold them off in exchange for a slightly inflated cut of the proceeds then he or she had a good idea of how to identify jewels. At the very least, they should know someone else that wouldn't mind identifying the exact types she had for her.

Gathering up the stones she couldn't tell apart, Sonya took the mess to Lisa… who laughed at her, delicately picking her way through a couple of them the young thief couldn't identify on her own. "All of these?"

"I've got the ones I can figure out upstairs still, but if I do get a good result and shatter the stone later on… I'm going to need to know which gem it was, so I can get a replacement."

Just to make the mess even more of a headache, the blonde had to think about settings and the cut of the facets too. If it would make any difference was debatable, but if she did get results other details like that might just tweak it in strange or different directions.

"I'm starting with purple shades, as supposedly I'm mainly a Cloud."

"Supposedly?" Lisa echoed without inflection, rolling several violet shaded jewels between her fingers.

"I've got a main Flame of Hard or Classic Cloud, according to the book Arseniy got me in Mafia Land. Secondary of Storm, I can't figure out which way that one polarized, and a minor possibility for Inverted Sun. Supposedly. I've yet to actually confirm that but I'm working on it."

"The strength?"

"Entirely possible it's just an unconscious use of Cloud Flames." She confided what little she had assumed to the woman uneasily. "Multiplication, Propagation, whatever you want to call it; it's an increase of either muscle mass or the force I can exert all at once. Which would be why my practice staffs all shattered and didn't Disintegrate in my hands."

"You don't sound happy with that." The older woman pointed out the obvious easily, letting the multi-colored sparkling gems fall back into the velvet pouch they were being stored in.

"I was hoping more for Sun's Activation. Which can be used to heal, among other things. I have the possibility, in the fullness of time, but that's not something I'm likely to get the hang of quickly."

She hummed, considering the girl.

Which merely confused Sonya. "Lisa?"

"Do you know enough about these Dying Will Flames to make a report about it?"

The younger of the two thieves very carefully didn't pull a face at that inquiry as she took a few seconds to fully think it over.

In all honesty, she probably could.

Most of what she knew was all theoretical so far, unconfirmed facts in a book she got someplace suspect that she didn't have the time or ability to verify using herself. Even still, it was a lot more information than she had started out with and probably more than enough for anyone else looking for instruction on their less than normal skill sets.

Part of her wanted to wait, though. The problem with that would be if she was asked to identify more Flame-capable around that she knew of with more information under her belt... she might not be able to keep Cherep's name out of it.

Sonya was not a people person by any stretch of the term, something possibly influenced by her Cloud nature or not. She had never been, nor would she ever, be one of those charismatic people that could talk rings around others. She couldn't really recall clearly if Rachel had been one or not, all she did remember was that in her last life she had a select group of friends and stuck with who she had known for the most part.

Her decision would be limited by two things. Time and her foster brother. Either make a report now with faulty information and hope future reports could be done by paper or wait to confirm it all and have less ambiguity to hide Cherep behind if questioned closely.

"I could, if you want me to. I'd like to practice on Arseniy before you arrange anything important, please."

Lisa, who was pretty much the mom of the household and had watched Sonya grow up for the last five-six years, raised an eyebrow at the bland confirmation. "Just like that?"

"I have possibly two out of the seven Flame types, three in a couple years at best. If you take the polarizing Flames into account, I have two or three out of fourteen. There isn't much I can do to make a complete report on this stuff, as I will not have the resources to find more answers in other directions." The younger thief wanted to pam... the brunette did know her very well and could probably guess why she'd get defensive or protective over what should be just odd knowledge she had.

The only things Sonya ever got protective of were her books and siblings. With her Mafiya clan, she did not want them to connect Dying Will Flames and her best friend until the purple colored brat could watch his back without her.

"I'll let Arseniy know when he wakes up."

LII (Tuesday the 30th of May, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Summarize what you do know, then get into what you should but haven't confirmed. Leave the unconfirmed rumors for last, and party tricks for the very end." That had been Arseniy's advice to her, so that's what Sonya gathered up in one handwritten journal she had started after her first trip to Mafia Land.

What she did know was disgustingly little for all the effort she had poured into learning about Dying Will Flames of the Sky.

Due to the name alone it was an ability one usually gained on the edge of death or when the possibility of death became unavoidably apparent and one reached for something different, one needed willpower in order to summon up the ability or use it in any practical sense, and they manifested as a kind of Flame that didn't harm the user so long as they weren't overused.

The physically young former pickpocket could also use very little of her own Flames, besides the still wonky sometime super-strength she was somewhat positive came from an innate use of Hard/Classic Cloud Flames.

The information she should know but wasn't yet positive about included her Storm secondary and the minor Sun she might have if she put effort into developing it, and the nature summarizations in the back of the best of her books on Dying Will Flames of the Sky.

As there were seven types of Dying Will Flames of the Sky, that also meant there were about fourteen different distinct personality types. If you counted the variations between the mainly Soft/Inverted and Hard/Classic types, like how it was possible Sonya's Storm wasn't Classical or Inverted but something in-between, then there were more than could be cleanly calculated. An infinite number of things could also change or affect how a Flame user's nature expressed itself, but supposedly the basics were typically the same.

According to the book that she got from Arseniy and what she managed to extrapolate then add in from every Mafia storybook she managed to get her hands on, a Flame users' base nature ran the gamut of doormats to violent psychopaths.

Classical Skies were the doormats, as they tried to attract their Guardian Elements by being accepting and encompassing to all and sundry but couldn't bring themselves to avoid or push away abusive characters that tried to take advantage of them at the same time. Inverted Skies were obviously the opposite, they could be elitist pricks about their Guardians' prospects and callous to those that didn't meet their personal standards to the point of being indifferent to their deaths.

Both variations were still an embodiment of Harmony, what all other Flame users were almost instinctively driven to seek out or attract. They also were mitigating or emotionally manipulating influences, the only point different Flame users could bridge to other users that had a nature that didn't normally tolerate another's.

Classical Suns were typically nurturing in nature, trying to bring out the best in everyone they met even if that someone didn't want it. Again, Inverted Suns preferred only dealing with those they knew were talented... and if they decided to teach or help someone in a skill their 'student's' willingness wasn't exactly a point they bothered with.

Both polarizations of Sun Flame users were active kinds of people, generally very physical with their 'help'. They could also be very stubborn, in varying shades of the word.

 Probably the most social of all the Flame types was Rain Flame users, and with their Tranquility ability also the Mafia world's answer to therapists. Which, since Flame users have been atypically rare for the last century or so according to Lisa, meant very bad things for the underworlds' collective sanity.

Classical Rains were supposedly passively tolerant, someone that was very difficult to irritate or ruffle and generally easygoing. Which left Inverted Rains to be aggressors, those that would poke every hot button one had until you snapped.

Storms were the more obviously 'eccentric' types of Dying Will Flame users, they were also as explosively tempered as their name suggested in either the fast and hot variety or slowly building and suddenly violent way. They were also the ones to hold grudges second best, only falling a bit short of Cloud Flame users... which said very little good about Sonya's temperament in a few years.

Storms of a Classical bent were fixated perfectionists, they catered to their fixations with almost fanatical enthusiasm and precision that another would be tempted to label as 'going overboard'. Inverted Storms were perfection fixated, what they did had to be perfect or they would spend an ungodly amount of time repeating their actions until they were.

Lightning users were the flightiest, in a few decades they would probably be labeled with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder. Classical Lightning users basically had the attention span of a gnat, attracted to the shiniest or flashiest things only to lose interest equally as fast and move on. Inverted Lightning users tended to get attached to one thing, but they as well tended to be interested in little but what attracted them so getting their attention onto something else was like pulling teeth.

The trade-off was that Lightning users could process so much more than normal. Their lightning-quick flashes of condensed attention was enough to tell them everything in one glance another person would take three times as long to understand the significance of.

As she already knew from her own personality and Cherep's, Cloud Flame users were just as opposing in polarized nature but not entirely as her books suggested.

Classical Clouds were territorial and usually loners, getting between one and what they decided their 'territory' was did not tend to end well as they generally didn't bother to warn you what would happen and instead just got violent. Inverted Clouds were 'free spirits' socialites rather than territorial, generally passive and rather rootless to the point that threatening their freedom was something only suicidal idiots tried to do. They were also probably the most 'long-ranging' of Flame types, even if one side of that coin tended to stick to a physical territory.

Her foster brother, who was strong in his Flames even if he couldn't consciously control them, was almost the perfect poster boy for Inverted/Soft Clouds. Not quite to the level of 'free spirit', but he was very ornery in a passive-aggressive way when he thought his personal freedoms were being infringed somehow and generally easygoing otherwise. Up and including allowing himself to be physically relocated if that would work best for everyone.

Sonya didn't ever try to hem him even verbally and let him have his way usually if she couldn't argue, trick, or tempt him into another path. Although if that was due to being a Cloud of the opposite polarization or just because she knew that wouldn't end well was debatable.

As the two of them got older and they grew into themselves, it would be questionable if how they behaved then was due to just Flame natures overtaking what they would’ve been like or if it was all just supposedly maturing outlooks behind their late teen personalities making them behave as they would. That was probably be something the former pickpocket wouldn't ever know, as she would never get a subjective look at the problem as close as she was.

Mist users were the most erratic and hard to pin down. Since they were generally the first to activate their Dying Will, there wasn't much on the basic personality beforehand available.

What little there was suggested Classical Mists were meddlers, the type of person that would stick their nose into anything and everything. Inverted Mists were introverted to the point of expressive in it, exaggerating a trait or two to the point that was how most tended to identify them by even if it wasn't a natural or even a true trait.

Then again, Mists were a headache and a half alone. It was entirely possible any Mists interviewed for the books she had taken the information out of messed around with their answers just to be difficult.

Unconfirmed rumors about Dying Will Flames were as similarly limited as what Sonya had managed to confirm or at least get information about.

According to everything she had read, her nature was supposed to get worse as she got stronger as a Flame user.

Which it wasn’t. Sonya had been more ‘Classically Cloud’ in nature when she had been five compared to how she was now that she was ten, and she had nearly gotten reasonable control of her strength by this point.

Or if not 'control' then able to summon it up almost at will and break anything she wanted.

If that was because of her Storm secondary getting stronger or her possibility of Sun nature was debatable, but it was just as likely as claiming it was Cherep's fault.

Hell’s fire, she was practically a chatterbox compared to how she had been.

Her 'territory' was also something unconfirmed, however much her book insisted her best friend was such a thing. It also insisted the damage she did to three drunk vory was her getting territorial but all she recalled from that incident was a whole lot of fear, and it just seemed iffy to her to have a person as territory.

People were not things. She flatly refused to even humor the idea.
Disregarding her foster brother, her territory could be anything from her biological birth city of Saratov to her role as a Zolotov thief. Getting confirmation on what it was wasn't likely to end well.

Sonya could look for patterns and possibilities all she wanted, but it would be her getting territorial over something that would confirm what.

A ten-year-old, or however old she'd be when it happened, girl who could shatter bones getting territorial would not be pretty for whoever tried infringing on her. Likely this was something she really had to warn both Arseniy and Lisa about before it happened.

From hints and suggestions in the book the vor got her, Flame users were supposed to start acting out in a few pre-established patterns after hitting their late teenage years. The other six types of Flame users that weren't stabilized by Harmony bonds by then would start seeking out the seventh and get progressively more entrenched in how they displayed their Flame's nature in hopes of such behavior would let them catch the attention of a Sky.

The stronger one was in Dying Will Flames, the earlier it happened and the worse it was.

How those Dying Will Flame natures, and Flame users themselves, interacted with each other without the buffer of a Sky at hand was… a hot mess. Allegedly.

Sonya couldn't decipher much beyond Classical Clouds Flame users were those she might end up killing and trying to rationalize to herself… and Mists, because apparently Clouds and Mists never got along well even with a Sky at hand. Storms were nice to Rains and Lightning users of their opposite polarization, and great with other Storms of their same, but generally had rocky relations with everyone else. At least they weren't violently opposed to Storms of their opposite polarization like Clouds.

If she never found herself a Sky, and she wasn't entirely sure she wanted someone to be that to her, those other Dying Will Flame user types might just incite homicidal tendencies in herself. She'd never know it either, unless it happened and she could somehow manage to catch the behavior before she harmed someone.

Rejection was… something the blonde wasn't even sure what it applied to when it came to Flames. There was Flame Rejection, Sky Rejection, and just simply Rejection referenced by her best Dying Will Flame book and a few of the storybooks aimed at teenage mafia members.

Obviously, it was bad. Really bad when it came to both Flame and Sky Rejection according to the plots in the storybooks, but she had little additional information. It was also something she would be happy to not know about, it sounded that horrible with what little she did know.

Flame Rings were… possibly not something Sonya would be able to understand in time. She had over twenty different stones to work through, which might just take her a year to do depending on if she spent a week or two weeks investigating each type. She also didn't have a comprehensive collection of gemstones, merely all the ones she could get in one semi-affluent branch store.

Either she'd figure it out in a year, or it would take much longer and require her to rob another jewelry shop or buy one of the ones available in Mafia Land and get that one appraised.

Tatiana was possibly a Classical Sun, Dmitriy an Inverted Rain, Lisa might be a Classic Rain herself or a similar polarized Sun of her own, Arseniy could be either an Inverted Lightning or a similar polarized Storm or both if Sonya was honest.

The little she could do with her Flames so far was bend iron, shatter steel, and lift more than her Arseniy helped Sonya work up a report to give while Lisa had her loose gems appraised.

Around the same time the young blonde thief got her jewels back, the vor took her into the Zolotov's main headquarters to make her report to the right people.

The first time she had ever been there, and her first thought was... eclectic. There was a lot of random things hidden in certain corners if you cared to look. Probably a lot of stolen things, and it all kind of clashed together.

The 'right people' according to the man posed as her foster father included the Avtoritet, or Brigadier, in charge of the Zolotov recruitment and training that took place in her neighborhood. Him and three other Avtorityets overlooked the personnel intake and management for their entire clan in Moscow for their Boss, their Pakhan, and were apparently the ones Arseniy reported to.

She had known the vor whose roof she lived under wasn't just any member of their clan, but it was still slightly jarring to know where he fell exactly. It should have been obvious since the vor in question was the one hammering several Mafiya lessons through thick skulls a handful of nights a week, and he could make decisions about security around the neighborhood without being reprimanded from what little she had seen a little over a year ago when Cherep joined them at home.

Arseniy was... either a Boevik or a Krysha. A warrior or an enforcer, in other words.

Why he was training Mafiya brats was still something to wonder about, especially the faction of their clan that mainly dealt with training thieves and not just Mafiya hopefults trying to become vor.

Sonya had thought Aleksandr had been the vor in charge of their neighborhood. The grizzled old combat trainer had his home to himself with no fosterling Mafiya trainees underfoot, despite the training hall under it that was used very often in any given day.

She snapped out of her mental wanderings fast when Arseniy brusquely introduced her and informed the four men what topic she would be covering.

Laying out everything she knew of Dying Will Flames took an embarrassingly short amount of time. What she might know but couldn't confirm took nearly three times as long, as it covered the other Flame types she'd never have the resources to understand herself. The rest of what rumors or facts that might be true, but she hadn't yet confirmed, was nearly as nerve-wracking as spilling what she did know.

Adding on most of the Flame possibilities in her household except for her best friend's did at least amuse two of the Avtorityets. As per Arseniy's advice to leave the party tricks for last, Sonya bending a respectively thick iron rod into a loop barehanded finished off her presentation.

She was dismissed shortly after the four men had gotten a good look at the metal she had twisted, which had been expected. Arseniy held the rest of the information they might want to look at and had the time and effort put in to be listened to by those vor.

She might be the Dying Will Flame user, probably one of few remotely active users in the clan due to the trouble she had in getting information on the ability in Moscow, but she was still a little girl in a Mafiya syndicate. One a few months shy of her eleventh birthday as well, to make it all worse.

To the Zolotovs, who were a recent addition to the Mafiya’s underworld, her Flames were still relatively new to them and not something they had precedents to help them utilize.

It worked for her, because with what Lisa informed the girls about Mafiya gender equality and the fact Sonya was a thief meant there would probably be little direct control her clan would try to exert over her future travel plans. She had her Mafia Land contracts to help in that respect as well, which would cover why she would be leaving the USSR in as little as half a decade.

If the little thief paid her dues and heeded the mafia’s and her clan’s laws, she was pretty much set.
There wouldn’t likely be any attempts on her freedom until after Dying Will Flame users became more common.

With how isolate the Russian underworld was, any attempts in the future would only happen a few years after the rest of the underworld realized Flame users would no longer be a passing if rare ability only very select mafia syndicates could boast of.

Probably only when the Seven Strongest of the Era made their debut and established themselves using said rare ability.

The only problem with that kind of behavior from her clan was the fact Sonya would be left to fumble her own way in the dark. Apparently, to the Zolotov Clan, if she succeeded great but if she screwed up and killed someone or herself… at least she’d be a great warning story for the next Flame user to pop up.

Dying Will Flames weren’t something the Zolotovs could ask around about without questions being asked why in return. Thus, the reason she had made the progress she had without guidance from anyone in the Russian Mafiya and why it wasn't likely she’d ever get a teacher for it.

Oh well… at least she could visit Dmitriy while here and ask if he’d like to learn how to use some dubious Flame ability called Tranquility the long and hard way.

While Sonya still intended to stick with Cherep, if her clan wanted to show off a Dying Will Flame user then she’d either be expected to come back when they called or supply a different alternative they would like better.

Rains were more sociable than Clouds, after all. Dmitriy was also male.

LV (Monday the 26th of June, 1961. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya had started picking her way through her gems before Lisa got the rest sorted out, but the purple diamond and alexandrite she had started with didn't so much as heat up through the two weeks she wore the diamond or the other two she had a hunk of alexandrite on her.

There was no reaction from them, or any perceivable change in her grasp on her Dying Will Flames.
Which, while not surprising, was a little daunting when paired with how few stones she had to work with and how many she probably didn’t have.

At least she could fence the purple diamond pendant, and alexandrite was a very popular if common stone in the USSR. The cash wouldn't be as much as an actual heist, but still respectable for the week's allowance even if Cherep wanted to go see the circus again for his upcoming birthday.

The whole concept had been a shot in the dark, so she really shouldn't have been so surprised it failed in application.

Learning meditation was tricky and boring without someone to help, but as it didn't seem to be hurting her control over her strength or her temper she kept up with it. The jewel of the next two weeks, a loose hunk of purple sapphire faceted as a teardrop, was clutched in one hand.

After several weeks of no reaction, Sonya had been understandably surprised when the gem imploded in her hand not five minutes into trying to control her breathing and thoughts. Feeling the sapphire crumble in her hand was odd, but also startling enough she blankly stared at her own fist for the first few seconds.

The pain registered next, and the thief opened her hand to see the extent of the damage to her palm.

"Shit." She wouldn't be selling that sapphire after all.

If she had clutched the gem too hard or if it shattering had force behind it was debatable, but she still had jagged pieces of sapphire stuck in her palm. The rest of it was in cracking chunks, with bits of fine sapphire powder mixing into the blood seeping out of the puncture wounds.

Sniffing irritably at the injury, she got up and headed for the kitchen as Lisa was likely there. The older woman preferred her fosterlings to eat something healthy for lunch before making Arseniy's first meal of the day. If she wasn't, there was a probably illegally overstocked first aid kit under the sink.

The older pair had made a point of all the kids knowing that, and that it wouldn't be an issue if they needed it for whatever reason. Not using it when they had a need would get them in trouble, not the other way around.

Sonya was pretty sure morphine was a controlled substance, but there was still a bottle of that in the kit.

"Lisa?" The blonde warily poked her head into the kitchen, grimacing when she spotted the brunette. "I may need some help."

"Oh?"

There wasn't enough blood to start dripping just yet, but there was enough to cover her palm and make it look worse than it was. "With this."

The older thief stared at the shattered mess of jewel and blood for a moment, heaved a sigh, and dug out the kitchen's first aid kit from under the sink. "What caused it?"

"A sapphire." She informed her flatly, taking a spot next to the sink so she could wash the blood away and so the woman could see the fragments of the gemstone that hadn't dug into flesh.

"It worked?" Asked the brunette, sounding surprised and confused at the same time.

"Not sure if this does qualify for 'worked', but I did get a reaction." Not a great one, and Sonya would make it a point to avoid sapphire jewelry in the future. "I think… I might try again next week just to make sure it was the gem and not me. I'm done for this one."
Lisa looked at her curiously, digging around the kit with one hand. Probably to find the tweezers. "It's Monday."

"It's also early in the day, and I'm already bleeding."

"Well… you have a point there."

Carefully washed her palm off for her, dumping the bigger shards of gemstone into a little empty jam jar instead of letting them go down the drain, the older woman started efficiently pulling the shard of jewel out of her skin. Her foster daughter got distracted inspecting the fragments for any other damage, but she couldn't even see a reason that would explain why the sapphire shattered as it had.

"So what did this tell you?"

The younger thief carefully considered the question instead of blurtling out something stupid as the pain really set in. If Flame damage couldn't explain it, then… "I think I am the wrong type for sapphires. If I could use one, then there would be some kind of discoloration from heat damage on the edges of some shards. Tatiana and I saw several Flame Rings in Mafia Land, and all of them had scorch marks from use. Probably from quality assurance testing, if they were new."

"And so?"

"Sapphires probably won't work for Clouds or Storms. Then again, sapphires are typically blue gems, so I'd expect a Rain to have better luck with one… or a Mist."

"Isn't Rain what you claimed young Dmitriy was?"

Sonya was a little surprised how fast that bit of gossip got around, even to the rather isolated neighborhood little Mafiya hopefuls were living. "Yeah… I have another two, so I probably should give him one and see what happens."

Lisa raised an eyebrow, plucking the largest shard out of the tiny palm in her hands and ignoring the twitch of equally tiny fingers flexing in response to the pain. "Are you sure you want to teach him?"

"I'm not even sure I can teach this stuff."

"Sonya."

The young thief winced as an awkwardly stuck shard of sapphire slid out of her palm under the older thief's control. "Dmitriy is probably going to remain where he is, and if Dying Will Flame users become more common he'd be the one to get any clan requests on it dumped on him rather than me. The clan will also prefer going to him rather than me."

"It is your discovery, your work clearing up the questions we have on it."

"Being special isn't always a good thing, Lisa."

Cherep had gotten kidnapped when one shady individual realized what he was looking at. Sonya was a very young little girl with a similar ability. All total, it wasn't exactly a safe hobby to be dabbling in.

Lisa wasn't stupid, and she also had a large hand in raising her up to the thief she now was. The woman pressed her lips together but let the topic slide by them as she picked out the smaller shards of sapphire stuck in her palm.
"Be careful."
"I'm trying."

LVI (Tuesday the 8th of August, 1961. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sapphire wasn't a Cloud or Storm Flame gemstone. The second one Sonya tried the next week shattered just as easily and she had merely warily held it on one flat palm while repeating her clumsy meditation exercise.

Dmitriy, who hadn't really been all that interested in Dying Will Flames in the first place, did at least get a visible but flickering reaction from within the stone she gave him. It was odd enough to attract the curiosity of the young mechanic, and interesting enough that he agreed to attempt learning.

She set him up with a stripped copy of her research journal on Flames, editing out everything on other Flames but Rains. Claiming the edited edition was just so he wouldn't have to pick through other natures or control building suggestions for other types, but privately held back the part of ’and so he wouldn't put two and two together and take a hard look at Cherep'.

The former pickpocket then tried an amethyst, purple opal, and a chunk of tanzanite in the following month. The amethyst scorched too easily in her hands, facets that had been clearly deep purple clouding up quickly to look lilac in the space of a day. The opal gave the best reaction, fitful spurts of light violet color ejecting itself from the gem but nothing Sonya tried influenced the reaction in any perceivable way. Tanzanite was almost opposite, instead of no response from the rock it fractured bit by bit but not as violently as the sapphire had.

Working off a hunch, late on Cherep's birthday she had him hold a fresh chunk of tanzanite in one hand and punched him in the same arm hard enough to bruise. He squawked at her but also screeched when the jewel set itself on fire, with lavender shades, in his grip.

He promptly dropped it, warily eyed the rock she had forced into his hands, then her. "The hell was that for?"

"Curiosity." She picked up the curiously warm gem, he hadn't held it long enough for that to be body heat. "I'm getting this carved or set, but I wouldn't suggest you carry it until you find what circus you're looking for."

Rubbing the spot that was likely purpling into an impressive imprint of her fist, Cherep pulled a face at her. "Nothing too girly, please."

She snorted, tucking the chunk of tanzanite into her pocket. "I was thinking more like a little skull you could wear."

It wasn't exactly perfect, but it would work for the time being until they had the space to poke Cherep's Flames without her clan catching on.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 19th of July, 1962. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The start of the winter months saw Sonya playing with purple shaded garnet, tourmaline, and spinel.
The last of her possible Cloud gemstone focuses, at least from one jewelry shop's contents.

The purple garnet fractured faster than the tanzanite, but it also showed fast growing splotches of scorching. Tourmaline gave a controllable response even as it burned up, but it required more effort to draw up than the stone she found for Cherep or Dmitriy's sapphire flickers. Purple spinel gave her nearly the same reaction tanzanite gave her foster brother, startling her into dropping it the first time it happened too.

The very last purple gem she had, zircon, ended up tried once then ignored as she played with spinel jewels and tiny tongues of light purple fire until her own birthday.

Spinel probably wouldn't be the best focus gem she would find but the important thing was that it worked, and she could find it in the USSR even with the lack of imports coming into the country.

With a Cloud gem found, and extras supplied by Tatiana when she heard the gem experiments bore some results, Sonya turned her attention to her red gems.

Since spinel came in variations of red and her foster sister gave her some, she started with those just to play with the jewels for another week. The results were pretty much the same, disregarding the fact the purple shaded stones were starting to show heavy wear from being used as a Flame focus.

Lisa and Cherep had collaborated to get her a decent book on crystal formations and gemstones for her birthday, and from reading that she learned spinel gems were sometimes known as false rubies and sapphires. Given her less than stellar reaction with sapphires, she gingerly tried rubies.

It gave a similar reaction as the spinel, except that Sonya burned herself on a jewel for the first time.

Dying Will Flames weren't supposed to harm their individual users, unless they were overused. The possibility it was more the stone than an overuse of something was possible, but risky to assume.

She tentatively decided rubies were too responsive for what she needed it for, then set them aside. The former pickpocket would revisit the problem after she had tested the rest of her gems.

Garnets, which she tried to see if shade did influence anything, gave a different response than purple ones. Instead of shattering with signs of scorching, Sonya got fitful flickers of reddish-purple fire as the stone clouded up.

Why garnets were different depending on shade when spinel wasn't was beyond her, but interesting to know.

Fire opals gave similar results as purple opals. Nothing the blonde did could get a more reliable answer than the occasional flicker now and again when she wasn't trying.

Red tourmaline, on the other hand, reacted interestingly. The flickers of Flame were fitful and weak, but ridiculously easy to coax out on demand.

Actual Flames. Via a sparkly rock. Proof in the flesh that things would get strange in a fast hurry.

Tiny and not reliably controllable, but a start.

She still had several other red stones to test but ended up deciding that for now spinel and red tourmaline would do. What jewels she had left were dumped into a jewelry box that was Tatiana's eleventh birthday present for her.

Sonya had two Mafia Land contracts to do and maybe another heist on her own to do that year yet, to afford next year's clan dues. The amount she had from the previous year's Mafia Land contracts and half the take from one jewelry store might not cover it.

It was 1962 and if the value of the re-issued ruble didn't keep up its value unlike the last decade, when one needed almost twenty rubles to buy a loaf of bread, then she would be left to scramble for more.

Which didn't sound at all fun.

Shortly after Tatiana's fourteenth birthday she set her Dying Will Flame research to the side and asked Lisa where the damn moving island was now.

LVII (Monday the 30th of July, 1962. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

Sonya's first Mafia Land contract for her eleventh year was more comprehensive than the two she had taken before, the closest contract to the USSR asked that instead of a target item to steal she was to rob a certain household.

To completely rob, as in go through the house and take anything not nailed down and maybe trash what was left.

Private residence burglary did not list on her favorite things to do. Arseniy looked rather disgruntled by the fact she'd have to go directly to Romania and then come back to the island to keep within the contract's time restriction, as he didn't exactly have a lot of time to tag after one of his fosterlings.

The tiny thief rather liked the fact he let her go anyways, but she pretty much hated everything else about the contract. She didn't speak or read Romanian, she disliked stealing from houses with canines around to guard the neighborhood, and robbing a home was a lot different than robbing a store of anything marketable.

She was pawning everything, she didn't want to take any of it back with her. Doing so in Romania when she didn't speak their language was also a hefty pain in her ass, especially since she looked like a little girl pawning off her parents' luggage.

She ended up with very little reward for the effort, which cemented her dislike from robbing people that probably couldn't afford it. Sonya couldn't even try and find something she'd like to keep, because that house had been home to a girl about her physical age and robbing it just made her feel three different types of disgusting.

Making it clear to the clerk/secretary that had been assigned to help her sort through contracts that if he ever gave her another home robbery contract like that again she'd aerate his head with whatever was handy at least soothed some of her upset.

"You asked for something near the USSR!"

"I asked for something lucrative near the USSR," she reminded him icily in her supposedly native Russian, "robbing a household is not lucrative. I barely broke even on travel expenses back and forth. If you are incapable of doing your job, say so."

The man was young yet, brown hair and dark eyes with a pockmarked complexion. Small pox or pimples or whatever. Probably not much older than twenty. He also really hated her, from all appearances. "A private residence would have an array of jewelry, bank or government bonds, and antiques. Two of which you're noted to deal in, miss."

"Costume jewelry, debts, and knock-offs, sir." Countered the young girl, still icy calm even if she was irritated to the point of picking a fight where she didn't need to. "None of which I can move would fetch more than twenty euros in any antique store, therefore my net gain would be tiny. The payment for completing the contract was the only thing of note the entire job. If you cannot utilize the assets given to you to manage, maybe you should look for a different line of work."

"Maybe you shouldn't bitch so much, little girl? Take what you get and be happy with it."

She arched an eyebrow at the insult, then gave a sharp nod. "Thank you for saying so. I'll have to remember to ignore you."

He spluttered, she ignored him and left the conference room just so she should sharply slam something in his pockmarked face.

Screw doing both jobs right then, she was going home for a couple months.

If the ass had claimed everyone had to do a bad job now or again she would've accepted it, not well but still. That he didn't meant she was going to ensure she never took a contract he recommended ever again, because for whatever reason he really, really hated her.

Sonya didn't know why, if it was her age, gender, country of origin, all three, or something else. It didn't mean she had to put up with it, while her Mafia Land job was convenient it wasn't something she needed to do.

It would just be tricky if she wasn't working here in a few years.

Heading out to the amusement park's reception area, which doubled as the docking area for ship travel, was simple enough. Even if it was Mafia Land, and she was physically eleven years old, no one tried to so much as look at her sideways or down their noses at her being alone.

While she did keep a wary eye out, because this was an island of Mafia dealings so robbery or muggings or the occasional murder weren't unusual, she didn't see anything too alarming or interesting beyond what she had already seen until just before the arrival/departure hall. A lanky older teenager with some wild and short black hair was facing off with two individuals down an alleyway. The teen was sharply dressed for a boy his age, but not quite to the point of wearing three-piece suits on a generally tropical island like the men trying to use their greater size to intimidate him were wearing.

Given how much they were sweating, it wasn't working too well.

One of the two men, who held himself like he was someone important, punched the teen in the face even as Sonya watched in morbid amusement from the street.

When his associate drew a knife and reached for the teen, she lost her amusement.

Reaching down, she grabbed a loose stone from somewhere near her left foot. Drawing back up to her pathetically short kiddy height she threw it to give a hard knock to Arrogant Ass Number Two's head before strolling on.

The teen could probably handle one-on-one on his own, and possibly could have dealt with two-on-one even with the knife in play.
Sonya just really, really hated people taller than her that day.

LVIII (Monday the 30th of July, 1962, continued. Mafia Land.)

"Parla Italiano?"

The lanky young man was following her.

"Dō ni Nihon wa dōdesu ka?"

How did Italian and Japanese collide enough for him to learn the language, exactly?

Neither were languages Sonya spoke, so she merely kept walking on trying to ignore her new tail.

She was kind of concerned that if she tried going home he would follow her, so for the time being she was wandering Mafia Land's less populated streets trying to wait out the teenager.

"English, maybe?"

"Unfortunately." Maybe he'd go away if she told him what he wanted?

"Ho? Well, then. My thanks for the assistance, miss…?"

"Isn't it rude to ask for a name before giving your own?"

The twitch of his mouth informed her he was amused at her stonewalling, and probably enough to try waiting her out instead of the other way around.

She hadn't used her family name in years, so it was what she gave him. "Nikishina, mister…?"

"Sinclair." He gave her a probably charming smile, tilting his upper body forward in a slight bow when they came to a stop near a strip of restaurants. "Renato Sinclair, miss Nikishina. A pleasure to meet you."

"Likewise." Sonya informed him tartly, the tone of her voice suggesting it was the opposite. "Is there a reason you are following me, Mister Sinclair?"

"You have some marvelous aim. You could say I'm rather interested in how, exactly, a young lady of your tender years could throw something hard enough to knock out a rather thick skulled, fully grown man."

"Curiosity kills the cat, Mister Sinclair." She knew perfectly well it wasn't going to budge him off her and would privately admit that taking her aggression out on one of his assailants probably hadn't been her best idea ever. "Besides, with you ever so Sunny personality… I'd assume you know full well what I am."

He narrowed pitch black eyes on her even while keeping up the charming smile, she kept her expression mostly blank and a little bored in return.

Her biggest tip off was the lack of bruises on his lightly tanned skin, even though she had watched him get slugged hard in the face. Either Mist user or Sun, and her mental hackles weren't crawling or aggressively raised enough for a Cloud faced with a Mist user.
Additionally, there was a speckle of blood on the cuff of one sleeve. A Mist user would've covered it up before confronting a little girl.

"I think... I owe you a cup of coffee. At the very least."

"I don't."

"I insist." Sinclair gave her a much sharper smile, his right hand finding a place on her upper back. "It's just a small thing, miss Nikishina. Won't you please allow me to repay you?"

Lashing out before he could jerk away, Sonya gripped his wrist in her left hand and squeezed warningly until she felt his bones grate together. "Mister Sinclair, since I am neither a relative nor your ward do. Not. Touch me."

Sinclair didn't even flinch, and she had to admire that level of pain tolerance. "...of course, my mistake. Clouds do not like being led or herded against their will, right?"

Okay, she walked into that one. Her apparently obvious irritation only seemed to amuse him as she let his wrist go.

"One would think you would hide an unhealthy interest in twelve-year-old girls, in order to be not thought of as a pedophile. I know I am concerned by the level of interest you hold for me, Mister Sinclair."

Her pointed comment at least wiped the humor from his face, so the smaller thief turned and headed straight for the first café serving coffee she spotted. The faster this was over with the happier she'd be.

He was still quick on her heels even taken aback, so she resigned herself to a very sharp and twisted conversation. The Sun would not be an easy verbal opponent but she had started it, so she had to deal with it.

She left picking out where they would be seated to the Italian teen, and merely followed him to a simple pair of chairs arranged on either side of a small table at the back of the restaurant's opened patio thing. "How do you take your coffee, Nikishina?"

"With cream, preferably." She eyed the list of beverages served over the counter. "I would rather a Russian Spiced Black Tea if you would, however."

She got a tilt of his head in reply, as he was already focused in attracting the attention of one of the waitresses. It was disgustingly easy for him, Sonya supposed he was rather good looking... but she wasn't to the point of puberty when such things would matter to her.

He placed their order, and since the counter bar was low enough for Mafia customers to keep a wary eye on what was going to be served to them both Sinclair and the former pickpocket kept an eye on their respective drinks being made.

It wasn't until his espresso and her tea were served that he tried to talk to her again. "Now then, miss Nikishina... could I have a first name?"

"You may not."

The refusal didn't seem to faze him. "If you insist. Young lady, since you know what I am and what you are why are you being so obstructive?"
She arched an eyebrow at him and sipped from her teacup. "Is there reason for me not to be? You are the one bothering me, even if I do not wish to be."

She had some sympathy for Cherep, if she had been as bad as this young man in the beginning.

"Suns and Clouds are known to be friendly."

"That is an old wives' tale, Mister Sinclair." One only had to look at Sonya's and Tatiana's early relationship to learn that. It was damn frosty until they started making an actual effort to understand the other. While they had the possibility to be friendly, it took effort. "It merely means I'm more inclined to assist you without a Sky at hand. Which I have, but if this is the thanks I get I might as well walk on next time."

Sinclair narrowed his eyes at her again, hiding the rest of his expression behind his cup. "I take it you are going to be stubborn no matter what?"

The thief gave him a taut smile of her own. "Of course. Give a little to get a little, Sinclair."

He at least conceded the point gracefully. "I'll see you around then, Nikishina?"

"It's likely, since I don't see you as the type to give up easily."

"I'm not."

Getting up and abandoning the rest of her tea, she shot him a bland look. "Obviously. Cute sideburns, Sinclair. I'll see you around."

Saluting with his espresso, Renato tugged one of his curly sideburns with his other hand as she left.

It was entirely likely he'd try following her, but she was certain she could use the train lines of Europe to lose him eventually.

---

LIX (Saturday the 13th of October, 1962. Mafia Land.)

Sonya took all of two hours to calm down on the boat ride back to mainland Europe, then she spent the rest of the trip with her head in her hands.

She couldn't believe how much trouble her temper had gotten her into, and how much bait Sinclair laced his words with that she had fallen for.

Yes, it had been a crappy job and her irritation was understandable. It didn't explain why the hell she had involved herself between a probably Inverted/Soft Sun and his assailants unless she had been looking for someone to take her aggression out on.

It also wasn't the Italian's fault she had behaved rather horribly, so taking her lingering aggression out on him had been outrageously ill-mannered of her. Lisa would've smacked her for being so rude to a made man, even one from another country.

The conversation afterward was sort of amusing in a non-mafia orientated viewpoint. Suns were stubborn, obstinate people and apparently Sonya had been a stereotypical Cloud with a Storm's temper in return. Her refusal to give an inch unless he managed to trick it out of her was probably only encouraging him to keep on bothering her.
She'd likely see Sinclair every damn time she returned to the island if he had the time to spare, so she'd better think up an apology to him between now and then in the hopes it would put him off.

If Arseniy had been there, she'd probably get her ass grounded for the information she had spilled so easily.

Sonya spent the next month looking up things to control her temper with, in between playing with spinel gemstones, trying to summon either her Cloud or Storm Flames without one, and Aleksandr's attempts to find a staff that would stand up to her abuse. Cherep got interested in the gemstones when Dmitriy stopped by to see if she had a different shade of stone other than purple for him to use, as his sapphire was getting rather brittle already.

There was one bad moment when an amethyst reacted to his attention when Sonya had been pawing through her jewelry box, but at least the two of them were the only ones in her room at the time.

The lack of more sapphires in her possession meant another jewelry store robbery was needed, but the young thief put it off until after her next Mafia Land contract. She could also probably get an array of blue shaded gems for Dmitriy to try, and maybe yellows for Tatiana.

She did wonder what had happened to her intent on not doing more jewelry store heists after her first one but put that thought aside just as she had Sinclair's silkily stubborn attempts to make her talk.

Her last Mafia Land job for the year had her traveling by herself. Arseniy wasn't at ease with letting her go back and forth from Mafia Land alone, but Lisa was surprisingly tolerant of the lone travel time. If nothing continued to happen to her between the moving island and the USSR, she'd likely keep on traveling alone.

Sonya was at least thankful she hadn't staggered into trouble like Sinclair with the vor around, he'd probably not be happy with her about it.

Said asshole Italian of some strange acquaintance did make it a point to greet her charmingly when she was on her way to fulfill her next contract using her first name, but at least said contract was not a home robbery again.

Instead she got to put her grasp of the French language to use and stole some information and the contents of a safe out of a very wealthy business with its home office in Paris. A modern, for the 1960s, office building had proved to be a different challenge than any of the other heists she had done.

The budding cat burglar was merely thankful there were no dogs, but a little disappointed that beyond needing her lock picking skills it hadn't been as hard as it should have been. No guards other than the ones outside to duck and dodge, so the overnight janitorial staff would be facing some rather hard questioning the next day.

"You look… disgruntled." Sinclair drawled lazily when she stalked out of the Thieves' Hall's front doors not a week after last seeing him.

"Why am I not surprised?" She looked up, mentally asking whatever was up there to send her some much needed patience. "What, Sinclair?"

"Well, I see that time away hasn't improved your temper much. Sonya."

Giving the smugly smirking Italian a flat look to start with, the young thief crossed her arms over her non-existent chest and scowled. "I do not recall giving you permission to use my name."
"We're friends, are we not?"

"You have a very interesting definition for friendship, Sinclair."

"Call me Renato. It's the least you could do after making me hunt around to learn something as simple as your first name."

"You mean it took effort to charm it out of the secretary on the ground floor? My, my, Sinclair. Not quite as charming as you thought you were, are you?"

The amusement on the young Italian man's face slipped off only for an instant, but Sonya knew she scored a hit. "Do you have the time to finish that coffee you skipped out on? I'd like to know what the youngest contract thief I've ever seen is so nettled by."

"You see many of my kind then?" She thought about it, but again being stubbornly non-talkative would only encourage him. "If you wish to hear me bitch, then by all means. I have the time."

The young man looked suspicious for a half a second, warily eyeing her sideways as she descended the front steps of the Thieves' Hall. "Just like that?"

"Surprise." Being she had a Storm nature too, it might be fun to twist his head around a Cloud that didn't always act like a Cloud. "I'll even pay."

Sinclair looked as if he couldn't tell where the punchline to the joke was.

Sonya decided it was his best look yet.

LX (Friday the 2nd of November, 1962. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Why, exactly, is my twelfth birthday coming up so soon?"

"Because it's almost been a year since your eleventh?" Cherep answered her dutifully, sounding distracted and as if he thought she had some kind of mental retardation.

Sonya thoughtfully smacked him upside the head, so he could share the same status. The fact his forehead hit the new engine block Dmitriy had forked over for his thirteenth birthday was entirely unintentional.

He peered over his shoulder with peeved purple eyes and a smear of grease on his temple. "Really?"

"At least your head didn't dent the metal, be happy with that." She defended herself, smirking at his deadpan expression. "This year went by too fast."

"You travel a lot and bury yourself in books when you are home. I'd be surprised if you hadn't lost a month or two of time somewhere in there." He turned back to the slightly different hunk of... she was only slightly sure the metal was aluminum alloy, it could probably be cast iron under the grit and dirt just as easily. "If I didn't have this baby and her predecessor, I'd think you didn't love me anymore Sonya."

"Really?" She echoed his previous question flatly, eyeing his back suspiciously.
"It was either traveling, books, or those shiny gems all year. Getting your attention from them was like herding a cat away from a beached fish." Her foster brother hauled himself up on his bed with her, ignoring the smears of oil and grease he was getting everywhere his hands touched.

Even with the chunk of motor sitting in the middle of his bedroom, the dirt and grease stains only traveled when he did.

"I'm actually surprised you put the book down to spend time with me again."

The thief had already read the book she had been reading a little while earlier and predictably lost interest easily. "Yes, well... have I been neglecting you, Cherep? Is this your official complaint?"

"Don't you love me more than books, Sonya?" He returned just as quickly, slumping sideways onto her and wrapping his dirty arms around her waist. "I feel so lonely."

"You're about to be dead if I can't get this shirt clean later."

Cherep sat bolt upright in response, smiling sheepishly over at her. "Sorry. So?"

"So, what?"

He rolled his eyes at her, and she did take a moment to marvel how different he was now than when he had been a street rat. "This next year, put some time into not being totally absorbed in whatever you have in your hands."

Sonya thought about it. "Was I that bad?"

"Not bad, just distracted way too easily." Her mechanically inclined best friend raised a purple eyebrow at her. "Why?"

"Classic Storm nature is supposedly hard to fixate but easily distracted, Inverted is fixated easily but hard to distract. So..."

"Can't it just be something about you personally?"

She blinked at him a couple times as she absorbed that. "Probably... if I didn't already have the Flame type. It just means it might get worse."

"You? Being worse? Stuff of nightmares, that." He slid himself out of arm's reach with a grin. "So, which is it? Is your magical, mystical fire power of the Storm Classically fixated on the books you have or Inverted and fixed on what you pour your effort into?"

"Or both on both, I don't know." With a groan, Sonya let herself drop to lay out on his bed and used her hands to cover her face. "Pick one, you have a one in three chance to be right."

"What do I get if I'm right?"

"Pick something."

He slid over, so he was looking straight down at her. "A motorcycle?"

She had to laugh as she dropped her arms. "Really?"

"One you bought legally. With money you earn legally." Expand the preteen, a wicked smirk stealing over his face. "Or... do you think you can't do it?"
"Are… you trying to dare me?"

"Maybe. Is it working?"

Snorting, she pushed herself upright with a huff. "Alright, I'll bite. I agree to the terms except for the legally buying thing. I've got rules to follow, so you'll have to buy it."

Cherep rolled his eyes but nodded. "Agreed. I guess Inverted."

"Why?"

"Because you're mainly a Classic Cloud. It would make sense if your secondary was Inverted."

"That would be if any of this mess of mysticism made some kind of sense." She sighed and shrugged. "Fine. If you're wrong, you have to steal something in front of me."

"WHAT?"

"What? Forfeits of being wrong. You're not chicken, are you Cherep?"

His jaw worked as he sought an argument, but his features fell into a pout before long. "You are a cruel, unusual little girl."

"You are the one that joined this foster family last. One would expect you to know that going in."

"Yeah, yeah. Whatever."

"You realize that your hands are covered in engine gunk and you just spread that all over your face when you rubbed it with both hands, right?"

Cherep pulled his hands away from his face, scowling at the smears of grease, oil, and dirt marring his palms. "Couldn't you have warned me a little earlier?"

"I could have. Did I want to? Nope."

Chapter End Notes

Some of this is pulled straight from Wikipedia, because I'm that lazy.

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one's peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank). Boevik – Translates to 'warrior'. Works for a Brigadier having a special criminal activity to run, a Boevik is in charge of finding new guys and paying tribute up to his Brigadier. Krysha - Literally 'roofs' or 'covers'. Extremely violent 'enforcers' as well as cunning individuals. Such enforcer is often employed to protect a business from other criminal organizations. Avtoritet (Plural Avtorityets) – Literally translates to 'authority'. A captain in charge of certain operations within a Mafiya syndicate, could also be called Brigadier. He gives out jobs to Boeviks ("warriors") and pays tribute to Pakhan. He runs a crew which is called a Brigade (Bratva). Pakhan - is the Boss or Krestnii Otets 'Godfather' and controls everything.

LXI (Sunday the 4th of November, 1962. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya was very, very tired of doing jewelry store heists. Therefore, she decided her next one was going to be big enough not to have to do another for at least half a decade or so.

Hopefully long after she had the resources to leave the USSR.

Bigger, in thieves' terms, also meant 'hazardous'.

If she was going to try to steal more jewels than she'd use in five years, given the rate of decay of gemstone focuses between herself and Dmitriy to base a guess from, then she was going to need more hands.

"Tatiana? I would like to hire your group, please."

The redhead blinked at her, mouth full of the dinner Lisa had made and they were in the process of eating. Swallowing hastily, she put her fork down and gave the blonde her full attention. "For?"

"Backup for tackling the local branch boutique for Cartier." She informed her grimly.

The name attracted both Lisa's and Arseniy's attention, but Cherep merely looked confused.

She wasn't really surprised, Cartier was a brand name in jewelry designs that was international by the early 1900s. They were once famed to be favorites of the old Tsar family and nobility of Russia and still famed for catering to European aristocrats, American Industrialists, Hollywood movie stars, and an array of Indian Princes. Now almost sixty years later, it was a French store that still did business even in the highly xenophobic USSR.

Everyone needed their shiny stones to show off, even a communist society that wasn't supposed to have an upper class.

"Sonya? Is that necessary?"

"It is if I want to stop doing jewelry sometime soon." The littlest thief at the table sighed and set her own utensils down to give their foster mother her full attention. "I'm going to need extra spinel and red tourmaline gems, Dmitriy needs sapphires and would probably like a different stone if we can figure out what's better for his use. As it is entirely possible Tatiana would like to learn, she'd need a yellow gemstone found for her. If I keep doing smaller stores at the rate I have been, it's entirely possible I'll mess up somehow or get caught eventually."

Sonya made a note to learn how to slip jewelry off people while they were wearing it, because she was going to be stubborn about no longer doing jewelry stores.

"Okay so… terms, little sister?" Tatiana spoke up eagerly, likely because the last heist the two of them had done had turned out rather well for her.

"So long as we are not caught, and we get a decent amount of what I'm after, the bulk of the take is your groups' to deal with. You may even credit the amount we're going to tithe to the clan to me. We'll split any cash available between us, and whatever isn't jewelry or paper money will be decided on later.'

The fourteen-year-old eyed her foster sister. "That's uncommonly generous of you."

"We will be doing this the week before Christmas' Eve."

"Ouch. Your usual style of slippery shadow take?"

The safecracker had a point, the security alone on all the custom orders before Christmas was going to be a nightmare to evade… but she didn't intend to do this like she normally did. "No. We're going to take out the guards and do it leisurely like."

"I think… you two should stop talking about this at the dinner table." Lisa interrupted them serenely. "You have all night to discuss terms. More vegetables, Cherep?"

The blonde winced, then glanced at her best friend. Much to her surprise, her fellow preteen looked rather bland as he accepted the older woman's pointed mothering and the ladle of soup.

Cherep gave her a glance, one that practically screamed 'did you want me to fuss?'

Aww… he'd learned tolerance somewhere. Just in time too, she was starting to get a little concerned about her latest habit of speaking quickly without thinking of who was around or what the topic was of.

Damn her developing social tendencies, apparently that paired with a Classical Cloud's nature did her no favors.

"My apologies, Lisa, Cherep." Sonya flicked her glance to the head of the table, but all she got out of looking at Arseniy was amusement. His sharp eyes were still on her for a long moment, but his attention returned to the meal before long.

She had been spending a lot of time with her supposed 'foster father' in the last year, but the vor was a rather hard nut to crack. She just wasn't used to trying to read people like him, and never got a very good feel for what he thought about anything of import.

Tatiana wolfed down the rest of her food, and the former pickpocket hadn't had the appetite after her realization to do Lisa's pirog much justice, so the girls relocated to the basement to plot not much later.

"So, everything loose and in certain solid rainbow shades is yours?"

"I only need purple and red gems of a certain type… but I really should do all of them available just to be sure. I would need all the blues and yellows like I said."

"If these yellow jewels are for me, wouldn't it be better if it was my part of the take?"

She gave her foster sister a look, trying to see if she really was serious about that. "Really?"

"Learning to do that fire thing you do? It means you'd have to spend time with me, hell yes."

The younger thief snorted. "Or I could do you like Dmitriy and set you up with a semi-responsive stone and some notes to make your own way."

She merely gave a smile in response, drawing up a loose contract she'd take to the rest of her group to get them on board with the heist. "So purple, red, yellow for me, but blues as well. Any other colors?"

"I suppose… green and orange. Maybe." Mist was what… a deep purple or blue shade?

That was already covered, so if she ran into a Lightning or a Sky she'd have the gems ready.

"You don't want the clear stones? Diamonds are a girl's best friend."

Sonya rolled her eyes at the slogan that made the colorless rocks so popular. "They also cut glass too."

"What? …really?"

---

LXII (Monday the 10th of December, 1962. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Since Sonya proposed the job in early November, and Tatiana got a rather seriously interested result from her group of rogues rather fast, the girls pulled every building plan they could from the store in question and the surrounding city block to study.

Arseniy had reported to their higher ups their target, because the affluent members of the Zolotovs did frequent the boutique on occasion. He returned with an order, from their Pakhan no less, to avoid certain custom jobs the store was working on for him and a few others.

That meant the foster sisters had to plan to fake an interruption that would allow them to miss certain things, for the follow up investigation after their robbery so no one pinned the job on the Zolotovs from that alone.

With some luck, it would remain a 'planned' interruption and not be an actual one.

The former pickpocket also had the opportunity to meet several of the safecracker's pack of thieves, who also got the opportunity to talk to her instead of merely see her around the neighborhood. It was a learning experience for all involved because the blonde still didn't socialize well, and she was enough of a 'client' they put in the effort to do it anyways.

There was Adrik, a slim and sly boy that liked teasing whoever was in range and specialized in circumventing electrical security measures or using them against any security force. Nikolai, who was probably the muscle of the group with his stocky build but could banter almost as well as Sinclair did. Ziven rounded off the male side of the pack, he was a fellow blond built more for speed than strength, but Sonya clearly recalled him from hand-to-hand lessons under Aleksandr.

Ziven could probably out punch her in speed any given day of the week, so long as she didn't have something in hand to keep him at a distance.

Besides Tatiana herself there was only one other girl. Galina was a mousy brunette that clearly didn't like the youngest of the temporary group, but she was professional enough to bite her lip and keep quiet about it.

Their ages ran from oldest being sixteen, Nikolai, to thirteens, Adrik. Sonya was still the youngest at almost-twelve, but conversely was the senior thief for their joint heist. Tatiana and Nikolai jointly shared responsibility for the 'face' of their group, and thus most of the talking. Galina tended to plan out what they did, Ziven handled scout work, and Adrik handled flouting security measures.

Which might be why the only other girl had an issue with the younger sister, planning their job was supposed to be her responsibility. However, as the foster sisters had done more of that type with the eldest's group supplying the muscle, Tatiana was going to handle planning with some aid from Sonya.

Since it was a much bigger job than normal, even their 'foster parents' got in on the prep work.

Lisa took the redhead with her to scout the showroom floor on the excuse she was shopping for a brooch for a made up 'grandmother' of their foster family. Arseniy and the younger sister went to commission a piece for the older woman's birthday in April, which got them a good look at the back rooms where most of the jewel crafting took place.

Doing the scouting like that meant the girls and the rest of the thieves would have to wear face concealment, but it was worth the detail when they got a good note of security camera placements before going in. Adrik needed the information to provide guesses of how long he could fool anyone and the time frame they were looking at for the actual heist.

Galina was eventually placated by being given the responsibility of narrowing down the ways the group could enter and exit the building, and individual escape routes from every floor if needed. Getting away free was just as important as the method used to steal, even if their syndicate Boss had a word in on what was going with them.

Given the layout of the building, it was decided Tatiana got the offices and back rooms with Ziven as backup and Sonya would have to handle the show floor and the workshops with Nikolai. Galina and Adrik would help whoever were closest to them when they had the time, but those two would mostly be on lookout so they'd have to load them with whatever loot they'd take in between different rooms.

The plan to get in and out again was trickier, especially since they would not be trying to avoid the guards.

What they had to avoid was attracting outside attention, so Adrik would cut the power and phone lines to prevent a warning from getting out first and they'd use either rope or a nearby building to reach the roof of the store. They would look for an opened window, but if there wasn't one to be had Sonya would be opening one for them via force. She'd use the vents again to get into the top floor, Tatiana and Nikolai would use rope to lower the rest into the building, so they could find the guards first. The blonde thief would then have to go back up to lend her Flame given strength in order for Nikolai could get in, and maybe help Ziven take care of said guards, but the risk was deemed minor since her vent crawling had been proven useful before.

Getting out relied on several different factors. If nothing went wrong they could escape the same way they got in, with Sonya revisiting the same vents to both close the window and rejoin the others. If there was an interruption… it would depend on what they got interrupted on.

Either way it happened once outside, with or without loot in hand, they'd have to split up in six different ways to reach a Zolotov safe house or prearranged meeting point. They wouldn't get back together until the day after, making the slow way home on foot to avoid being noted as a group and having the stolen items transported back by other clan members in clan-controlled vehicles.

The former pickpocket turned cat burglar mentally promised Cherep that she'd get him something nice and legal in apology for ignoring him in favor of planning a heist.

Even if she had less than a month to go before said heist.
The week just before their target day, Arseniy came home rather abruptly and snagged Sonya to go back out with him. She could do nothing more than shrug at both Tatiana and Cherep before they left the house.

There was a car waiting for them on the curb which informed her this, whatever it was, was a lot more serious than she had realized. "What happened?"

"Your boy Dmitriy is in some trouble." The vor yanked the back door open, gesturing gruffly for her to get in. "Our Avtoritet sent for you while they gather the right vory."

Sonya blanched and almost threw herself into the backseat of the vehicle, wondering how the hell Dmitriy screwed up enough to require a council of vory convening to judge his actions.

Additionally, what the hell did he do that somehow connected to her?

Wait… "Arseniy? Is this somehow a Flame thing?"

"That's what they're claiming." Her foster father slid in next to her, kicking the back of the driver's seat to get the man to start the car moving. "The two were in one room, the garage the brat likes to frequent. The other, the driver of a rival Pakhan, somehow ended up unconscious. They're braying betrayal, Dmitriy insists he did nothing, but it has all the signs of your Flame of Rain being the cause."

That made no sense whatsoever.

She knew where the mechanic was in learning about his Flames, he was a little behind her even if he was older and working off what she had gathered beforehand. She couldn't even get a flicker of fire to spout at will without a gem in hand, Dmitriy only had sapphires that flickered internally and couldn't put a dog to sleep from everything he'd said about it.

The fact whichever rival Pakhan knew enough of Zolotov internal happenings to know there was a Rain Flame user in their headquarters was alarming. That could be her old childhood friend's fault, depending on when and how he practiced or played with his gem.

Sonya didn't really think it was likely, but the concern was there.

"I doubt it."

"Enough to bet your life on it?"

The tiny blonde gave Arseniy a long look as she weighted that in her head against the nature of Inverted Rains and the Rain in question's personality. "Yes."

He grunted, slinking down in his seat a little as some tension she hadn't noticed left his frame. "Can you prove it?"

Could she?

"…I will try."
The vor flattened his mouth in a thin line, but probably knew there would be difficulties no matter what was true or not.

It didn't take them much longer to reach headquarters, Sonya's first act was to corner Dmitriy and get his side of the story. A rather hushed conversation later, she still didn't have any remote idea how such a situation came to be.

Her friend admitted quickly enough that he hadn't liked the other young man still out cold on the garage floor, but he also didn't try to Tranquilize him. Arseniy drifted closer to them both, a signal that time was running out quickly. She rapidly questioned him on any and everything he tried his Rain Flames on, which was when they noticed it.

She then informed her father of the how and what with literally only moments to spare, because the unaffiliated vor were all assembled and ready to begin. Two of the seven looked as if they had been yanked out of bed, and the tiny thief knew this wasn't going to end prettily.

At least, not for the other syndicate.

Predictably, the assembled council of vor were not happy to be called over a slight spot of theft that backfired on the thief horrifyingly. The truth of the matter turned out to be a stolen if rather badly fractured sapphire, which Dmitriy had been using as a focus and a crutch to gain control over his Flames.

A sapphire which had active if weak Rain Flames soaked into it. Which was leaking enough Tranquility to down a horse, much less a young man with little to no resistance to such things.

The Rain on trial had been immune to the effect and therefore hadn't known, it was his Flame therefore he was safe from it.

The fact a search of the insensible party's pockets by an unaffiliated vor until his fingers turned numb to find the gem also turned out a tranquillizing dart secreted away made the whole situation rather dicey.

Sonya and Dmitriy didn't get to see the results of that, they were escorted out with everyone else that wasn't necessary while the council debated what the consequences of assembling them unnecessarily should be. She got a rough hair ruffle from her foster father before that, who told the young mechanic that he was to guard her while there were unknown others invited into their headquarters.

"I didn't realize this Flame stuff was such a big thing."

"You're the one that stayed in the USSR, it's more common outside of it." She informed him blandly, poking around his tiny room.

It was a cupboard by nicer terms, had enough space for a small bed and a dresser but not much else. The location was it's only selling point, she was a little miffed this was what he had left their neighborhood and her foster brother for.

Dmitriy had collapsed on his bed, she had ignored that as it had been a rather stressful evening for him. "Did you know the gems retained enough to leak like that?"

"Nope, congratulations. You found something out before me. It might be something about sapphires paired with Rain Flames or just about Rain Flames themselves, but it's your bit of knowledge." It did give her some ideas, though.

"I'm ever so delighted to be of assistance." Said Rain grumped, shoving himself upright enough to look at her. "Why are you so insistent on teaching me?"

"You're staying put. Tatiana and I wish to be more long-range. If the clan requires someone with Flame knowledge, you're the best candidate I know of to dump it all off on."

"I feel so used."

"Get over it. After New Year's I'll come by with a different selection of stones, I'll need you to go through them and find one that works better for you."

"Loot from your next jewelry heist?"

"You heard that out here?" Sonya really did wonder about their clan's internal security. It really wasn't looking too good, with the news of a Rain being leaked out outside Zolotov control and news of her high-end heist already making the rounds so even a minor mechanic could hear about it.

Dmitriy flashed her a roguish smirk. "Have fun with that."

LXIV (Monday the 31st of December, 1962. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Relocking a lock with lock picks was tricky but doable. Sonya had almost re-secured the display cases she and Nikolai had cleared out when Adrik ducked into the showroom floor hurriedly. He gave the two of them a frantic wave to the windows, flicking his fingers to signify the flashing strobe lights of police cars.

She jerked her thumb up and flashed two hooked fingers to ask if the others had been warned, the slim youth just a year older than her nodded and gestured to his empty side.

Galina had gone to warn them, apparently.

Well, they had planned on faking an interruption. This was just… a lot more heat than they expected to work with. Loaded down with almost more jewelry, gemstones, and precious metals than they could comfortably move with. With a very flaky escape plan reserved for emergency extraction.

Joy.

Sweeping her arm around and then pointing down, the youngest thief got the two of Tatiana's thieves to follow her to the basement. Tatiana, Ziven, and Galina joined them and helped Nikolai barricade the only entrance behind them.

Palming a spinel jewel from the upstairs display cases, the tiny burglar took a deep breath and prayed to whatever power was out there that she wasn't going to destroy her hand.

Galina and Adrik marked out the likely location of an underground service tunnel from what they knew of the building's layout and the sewer lines underneath them all and Sonya punched the ceiling in, so they could escape that way.

As she had stood right over the spot she was attempting to weaken, she fell face first into the resulting hole in the floor and hit the rubble littered ground beneath that heavily. Nikolai was next, and even with his muscles he had difficulty moving her further into the now dusty gloom without Cloud Flame induced strength to help.
She bit her lip to keep silent, staggering up to her feet obediently so the others could get through even as she suppressed the desire to cringe at the pain radiating up her arm. It had been a lot worse than anything else she had used to hurt herself with, even when the practice staffs shattered under her and bits flew back to give her bruises or cuts.

Of course, she probably shattered a few bones in her hand this time.

They didn't have the time to do a field test on how Cherep did his 'never injured' trick, they had to clear out fast or risk getting caught red handed.

Or more 'red handed' than she was right now.

Nikolai left them first, he had the most weight next to Sonya and he squeeze her shoulder before he left. Adrik dithered only a moment but took off quickly as well. It took a few rather pointed gestures from her younger foster sister to get Tatiana to go off on her own, Galina had to provide the momentum for it. The brunette gave her a measuring look at the next turn off but stalked off on her lonesome easily enough.

Before Ziven went off he straightened the bones of her hand, proving that the worst of the damage was mostly fractures in her fingers and two messy breaks somewhere in her right hand. As the only thing they had to splint with was the jewelry they stole, and they were on a time limit before their arrangement with the nearest safe house was dropped, he couldn't spare the time to wrap them for her. What he did manage was more than enough for unasked for help.

She had the longest way to go, she volunteered herself to do so because of her Propagated strength. She cursed herself, the police, Flames in general, the gemstones she needed for her experimentation, Christmas merely because it generated some of the weight, and several other things in every language she knew… and several she didn't but picked up the swearing for due to the fact her neighborhood was multilingual in a broad sense of the word.

She was taking the next half a year off. No stealing, no Flames, no nothing.

Cherep would be ecstatic. Sinclair might just have a heart attack, given she usually left taking a contract to a bi-yearly thing and her fellow Flame user had been making a point of keeping a sharp eye on her.

The service exit Sonya had been assigned typically required fingers to open, she kicked it open instead. While it was an obvious sign that whoever blew a hole in the basement of a store exited right there, she didn't care much. It was next to a drainage ditch, it had the cover and length to confuse everything.

Also, she couldn't use her broken hand. She had limited options and was rapidly running out of patience for everything.

The long trek to her meeting point were some of the most painful hours of her life so far. The breaks ached, she could now feel the bruises forming, and there was sweat getting into her cuts from when she fell through a floor. Painful, aggravating, and very damn lonely.

Being able to unload the bulk of metal ingots and half a showroom stock to the waiting hands of her fellow Zolotovs was something the weary thief was pathetically grateful for, the fact they took the time to splint her hand for her even more so.

She would've kissed the person that gave her the painkillers had they not been older than Aleksandr and a bit toothless.
Getting home, injured or not, was something of a trial. The robbery getting noted mid-heist meant there were a lot of militsiya on the streets scouring for any suspicious characters. A tiny blonde girl walking alone in the early morning hours was just asking to be picked up, so instead the lamed burglar stuck to the backstreets and alleyways… which were never clear of their own type of trouble.

Being visibly injured meant they either thought her as weak or as troublemaking, it was only the fact one of the vor she had seen from the farce of a council called over Dmitriy's actions decided to shadow her to Arseniy's home kept her from making her hand worse.

In return for the aid, Sonya gave the man the spinel gem she used to try boosting her strength to smash through tile, concrete, and steel. The vor took it with a shrug and a bob of the head, stalking off since it wasn't territory he could work within.

LXV (Tuesday the 1st of January, 1963. Russian Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana demanded to be taught how to use Sun Flames, since she had heard Sonya bitching about not being able to heal anytime soon. Lisa merely arranged for the nurse that normally just fudged records to come by and double check the set of the bones the youngest thief had broken, in suspiciously quick order after she finally got home.

Arseniy blinked at her the moment he spotted her on the couch getting her hand put in a cast, cocked an eyebrow at her injuries, raised his eyes to the ceiling when informed why she had them, and then patted her on the head on his way past when she informed him of her plans for the next half a year.

Cherep was a little worried when he woke up the morning she got home. Hearing her plans made him both happy and likely to sneak guilty looks at said broken hand.

She was just happy she'd likely never have to do another jewelry store robbery for years.

The take from the job included a lot of signature pieces that would require being sold in Mafia Land's markets, they would never be able to be fenced locally without someone squealing like a stuck pig. Lisa would take care of that, she got all Sonya's couriered mail from the island already and could inform Tatiana when they were sold for splitting the money once there was some.

They had left some of the crystal statuary in the store, to help with the image of being interrupted mid-heist. A couple found their way into the loot anyways, as well as decorative eggs and watches that had to be fenced elsewhere as well.

Aside the traceable pieces, there was a literal rainbow of loose gemstones and a massive pile of less intricate jewelry that could be sold right away. Several different types of metal ingots were included, ranging from the usual gold and silver in several purities the youngest thief was familiar with to platinum, copper, zinc, a bar of tungsten, and two bars of palladium.

Most of the metals would be going to the Zolotovs for their tithe of the proceeds, the tungsten and palladium would be sold elsewhere too, and the amount split between everyone that had pitched in for the heist.

Sorting it out, and keeping the labeling with the right stones, had been a week-long task.

Tatiana and her gang excluded Sonya from helping on the basis on her injured hand, but she got to Aside the contents of jewelry shop safes they made away with, her elder sister and Ziven had managed a couple interesting finds themselves. There were more of the old-fashioned ruble coins available, which the girls decided was ornamental and therefore part of the take and passed them around. The redhead safecracker had cheekily grabbed several books from a bookcase on metallurgy, gemstones from around the world, crystal formations, and other geology assorted subjects. A few gold-plated pens, desk knickknacks Adrik wandered away with, and assorted personal items out of desks Galina found were tossed in the sell pile.

The former pickpocket was not surprised to be given the books as well as her half of the ready cash the store had held in the first hour of sorting.

There were also some very interesting wooden cases for loose gems taken, because of the interruption startled Ziven into grabbing whatever and running with them. He basically lashed them to the back of his backpack using the rope they had used to get into the store, but the slim cases with the velvet lined partitioned insides gave her an idea.

Emptying out the contents, she stored some of the colored gems she would be walking away with inside. A neat label written by Lisa, and the blonde had cases of gems to try to give whatever Sky, Lightning, and Mist she might run into within the clan. The remaining one was stocked with portions of the blue shaded jewels and would be sent on to Dmitriy to test out.

Tatiana pouted, but gathered up the yellow gemstones she'd be trying out in their individual little velvet bags. She really had nothing to complain about, all the purple and red stones Sonya now possessed were in the same little pouches.

She wondered if she should try to entice Galina to try the green gems, who was showcasing all the signs of being an Inverted Lighting, or if she should wait for her foster sister to realize it. She decided to wait, because she already had the redhead and Dmitriy to cluck after.

Although she'd take all the loose gems in certain colors, and a couple gems that had to be pried out of their settings even though she was dubious over the opals, Sonya was getting just as much as the others if getting paid immediately.

Very little of it was usable by her for purchasing personal things, but she didn't really care.

With a broken hand and a whole lot of empty months before her, the younger thief left the last of the sorting to her foster family and assorted thieves and instead spent a very nice New Year's Day with Cherep instead. They went to go see the fireworks, buying dumplings from street vendors and watching other children build snowmen and forts.

"Of course, you'd be stuck with a broken hand when you finally spend time with me." He quibbled at her dryly, hunching into his coat when a rather stiff and icy breeze tried sticking fingers of cold air down his back.

"You almost sound as if you think I deserve it." Biting into hot dumplings with only one working hand was a trial, because she couldn't really control her right very well and the cast prevented three of her fingers from moving.

When she burned her tongue, she couldn't yank the little meat pastry out and instead tended to drop it. Right now, they were cold but still tricky to eat with her left hand.

"Err… I don't. Really. It just sucks."
Sonya nodded absently. "Next time I have to do that, I'm bringing the thrice-blasted warhammer with me."

"Isn't that... I don't know, obviously identifying?"

"Aww... Cherep! Are you worried for me?"

Cherep's rather deadpan expression switched to a mischievous one.

"Of course, little sister." The sickly-sweet coo was paired with him wrapping an arm around her thin shoulders, and he knocked their temples together. "Do you need some help eating? Should I feed you?"

He let go of her with a laugh covered by a cough, backing up hastily. "Alright, let's not get violent. So, as for the hammer issue... how are you going to solve that?"

"The same way I solved my last issue." Propagation could do more than multiply, or the ability of Clouds everywhere would've been called that. She should be able to make something tiny become big, and that was her next project.

After her vacation.

"But for now, we're wandering. Aren't we?"

Her foster brother nodded a few times. "We are. Wander away, Sonya."

"Um... I was following you."

"But I was following you."

He blinked, then grinned as Sonya sighed. "I take it I should get us back to known territory?"

She pinched the bridge of her nose with her only working hand, ignoring the grease that had been on her fingers getting transferred to her skin. "If you would, please."

Cherep had never let her live down the occasion she had gotten lost going around the block back when he lived in a flophouse. The fact he had better navigational skills than her was a source of endless amusement to him.

The fact he could make it home from anywhere in Moscow was something he was stupidly proud of.

LXVI (Friday the 22nd of March, 1963. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

It took Sonya a week to get bored. She hadn't realized how much she had been doing before, after her first heist was over with and Cherep ran into trouble until her latest and greatest job to date.

Instead of going back on her word, because she was going to have a vacation even if it killed her, she took a hard look at her bedroom. Her tomb of a library type bedroom, which had the bare minimum of space needed to move around free and bound stacks of paper everywhere else.
Towering stacks of paper everywhere, including places that weren't even 'hers'.

Her foster brother decided he wasn't going to help her with it and voluntarily went to practice self-defense under Aleksandr. Lisa simply gave her a stack of crates and boxes to help. Tatiana pretended her gang really needed her help with something before she could ask.

Arseniy was gone again for several days now, and she wouldn't have asked him anyways.

She mentally labeled them all cowards and dug into the mess one-handed. It might be the worst of the rooms she had to clear out, because there were more books in her sibling’s rooms, but it couldn't be that bad.

She was wrong about that.

An avalanche of books was just as dangerous as one made of snow. Book-avalanches tended to give more paper cuts too.

It took her four days to work through her own room one-handed, another to pick up everything her best friend had been holding onto for her, an extra day to resort her various containers, and two to finish off what had been left in her foster sister's room.

The fact Sonya had a bookcase, it had just been overfilled and then had books stacked in front of it therefore she had long since forgotten about it, had been bemusing.

Then she recalled there were more books under her bed. Probably more under her foster siblings' beds too.

The grand total left her with four large crates, three medium-sized boxes, and a rediscovered bookcase full of books. Lisa did help her scrub down everything then sweetly asked a newly returned Arseniy to move the unneeded and packed up books up to the attic.

The tiny burglar still couldn't get over the fact she had floor space now. Occasionally she'd try to steady herself in the morning with a book stack and gracelessly fall to the floor instead.

That took up a week and a half.

Half a month out of the six she set herself. At this rate, she'd die of boredom.

Her next project was learning how to write left-handed. Cherep, who was left handed, decided to learn to write with his right at the same time.

They sucked for a solid month before any skill was perceivable. Before she got good enough to try her lefty skills with drawing she was cleared to take off the cast on her right.

It was sore and still a little swollen, but she rather adored her ability to use both hands again. It hurt, but it was the good kind of healing hurt. Mainly.

Tatiana found a gemstone by then, forgetting about it for a little while then practically trying a gem an hour and only looking for a good result, a yellow beryl crystal commonly named heliodor. She got a bit frustrated with the fact she couldn't instantly control the Sun Flames it emitted as a kind of glow instead of flickers of golden fire tongues, but it did radiate enough blessed heat to reduce the swelling in Sonya's hand when pressed into her skin and covered by Tatiana's.

It had to be repeated whenever the younger foster sister jarred or moved her hand wrong, or every morning, but the elder was curiously unconcerned by being used as a hot water bottle in that respect.
With her right hand now free, the blonde laboriously wrote up differently stripped copies of her research journal and gave the Sun one to her foster sister. The Sky, Lightning, and Mist ones were tossed into their respective boxes of gemstones. The Storm one was left on her desk, because even if she had a Storm Flame it wasn't her primary one and her Cloud might screw up her work on it.

In return the redhead safecracker lectured her on 'resting' and 'relaxing recent injuries for healing purposes to avoid relapse'. Lisa, overhearing the whole conversation/one-sided lecture, asked if the younger girl needed something else to do. When told yes, she left the house and returned with an amateur jeweler's kit.

Cherep laughed, and then nearly laughed himself sick on her very clean floor when she did make use of it to make a cheap, reusable bracelet setting for Tatiana's chosen gem.

The last three months of her self-enforced vacation was around the time the USSR entered the semi-thawed part of late spring. It was also when the circuses started doing outdoor shows again. The same time her best friend slash foster brother decided there was no time like the present to try his hand at scouting out one to join later.

Sonya ended up spending a large chunk of the petty pocket money cash Tatiana split with her on circus entry fees and snack food... and watching trapeze artists swing around in midair. She made dutiful note that her best friend gravitated to acts that had motorcycles in them, still. He didn't like the trained animal acts as much, sideshow events made him shy away, but the strong man affair made him smirk.

Probably because she could beat a strong man even with a broken hand.

The carnival tagalongs were what he spent the bulk of his time exploring between the big top shows.

She mentally tallied up what he liked and what he didn't as they reached their foster home at the end of another day exploring whichever circus was locally set up. Trained animal acts were unfortunately very popular, and sideshow exhibits were a staple of most traveling circuses. Both were likely acts they wouldn't be able to avoid when Cherep insisted on joining one.

Right now, she was wondering if she'd make a good gypsy.

"Sonya? I'm stuffing some of my old clothes in your closet, okay?"

The young thief blinked, then bolted up the staircase in a near panic that had Cherep blinking dust from his eyes. "Tatiana, wait! I didn't clear out-"

The crash of someone hitting the floor cut her off, the following thumps informed her there would be another crate or box of books to be dealt with.

"-my... closet yet. You okay?"

"...Sonya? Come here and get your damn books off me."

LXVII (Wednesday the 5th of June, 1963. Mafia Land.)

Renato was not amused. "You have to be joking."

Little Sonya Nikishina merely sipped at the cream laced coffee in her hands and ignored him.
If the Russian Cloud hadn't been so interesting, the hitman would've up and left long ago.

However, Dying Will Flame Cloud users were middling rare. The Hard Flame type also didn't tend to travel well, not without a Sky personally budging them out of the little corner of the world they claimed as territory.

Little Sonya traveling so far from her territory just to do jobs in different parts of the world was atypical of her breed, which therefore made her interesting on top of being a rare sort.

The self-possessed little girl, who spoke rusty and accented but old-fashioned English rather well for a communist, was sharp enough to give Renato some amusement bantering with him. It made the whole fact she was barely thirteen worth it, and her wicked sense of humor that Clouds were not known for possessing he rather liked personally speaking.

Of course, if she kept on doing things Clouds were notorious for not doing or bothering themselves over he was going to start thinking she had a split-nature Flame. She probably actually had one or two more and was getting a kick out of baffling him with her other Flame tendencies from how often the girl smirked at him.

The little box of coffee, particularly espresso, flavored liquor filled candies sat on the table between them.

Little minx, the Italian thought huffily to himself. "What, exactly, do you feel like apologizing for?"

"Eight months without contact, Sinclair. I had not intended to, mind you. However, I broke my hand doing a job back home then spent four more months after it healed up on vacation." The blonde took another pointed sip of her drink, reminding him that he had practically been forced to play tea party with her until the very end of their last meeting. "It was frightfully rude of me not to try to get a message to you... but I have no way to contact you either."

"What made you think I care?"

She blinked at him slowly, then just as pointedly admired her coffee cup's design in the harsh tropic noon sun.

Renato had practically abducted her off the street the moment he spotted her, just to find out what the hell had taken her so long to come back to Mafia Land.

She might have a point there.

You realize there are people hunting Flame users like us, right? I was merely concerned.

I have heard of it. She informed him shortly, the self-smug tone of voice fading into something more like the stubbornly held in violent irritation like tone she had used when they first met. "And thus, my apology. I couldn't get word to you that I was fine, and it's why I'm bothering to apologize at all."

He eyed her, particularly her eye coloring, suspiciously for a long moment. They remained stubbornly grey, without a hint of any color bleeding through.

Whatever way she found out about the rumors didn't have to do with her territory then, or she had more than enough self-control to prevent her Cloud Flames from giving herself away.

Damn. He was more than interested to know how she managed the traveling when she had such a strong and Hard Cloud Flames before even hitting her early teenage years. They were all supposed to be territorial and snub socialization, but Sonya didn't obviously do either.

Mafia Land wasn't her territory, nor was it likely back in her native country. The girl didn't mind getting delayed returning or him pinning her in place using social niceties she seemed to have been drilled in complying to automatically.

It was entirely possible she didn't have one yet.

Renato would pay to get her to claim Italian territory for herself but knew well enough that any hinting he might do would merely make her stubbornly snub the idea.

There was no guard quite as good as a Cloud guard, but they tended to remain where they were found and couldn't be budged for love or money.

"Fine. I accept your apology then, Sonya." He had started it, however it began with her aid delivered by a flying rock, so he had to continue with it.

If the hitman ever wanted backup in the form of a violently protective Cloud user, he could afford to indulge her a little. Having Sonya obliterate whatever was between him and her if he needed the aid in the future was well worth the headaches she delighted in giving him.

All Hard Flame Clouds got progressively more violent as they got older. This little Russian Cloud was just young enough to retain some measure of forbearance unless it was really required.

Screw the ribbing he got when he was spotted having a drink with a little girl, she would eventually drift over to the hitman side of the island to feed that lust for violence.

When she did, Renato would have the last laugh.

LXVIII (Sunday the 25th of August, 1963. Aleksandr's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Two Mafia Land contracts done, Sonya returned to the USSR three months later slightly sunburned but at least majorly uninjured.

She had sought out and obtained permission to use the Zolotov retained suite of rooms in a Mafia Land condo to stay in while she got herself caught up on her duties to the moving island. The clan vory coming and going had ignored her easily.

The contracts themselves were fast becoming less interesting, but she still liked the convenience and the traveling she could do with them. Sinclair's visits were becoming the highlight of her trips, depressingly enough.

More importantly, Aleksandr was finished with her proposed alterations to her Bec de Corbin and returning to Moscow got her in range to play with her new toys.

The warhammer/pick shaped polearm was now the length of her palm, two spinel gems embedded into the sides of the head. The extra material, since even though her miniaturized weapon was solidly metal they had a decent amount left over, had been fashioned into similar little weapon shaped charms. They were lacking gemstones, only waiting for her to confirm spinel was the gem she was going to use for anything Cloud Flame orientated or if she got good enough not to need them.
Cherep peered over her shoulder to see what she was smirking over. "I don't get it. It's tiny."

Ziven, who had somehow decided the blonde burglar was a very good friend of his and therefore her friends were his as well, looked equally unconvinced of the lethality of her tiny warhammer.

Taking a deep breath, Sonya gripped the head of her Bec de Corbin. She had more than enough control with a gemstone to funnel Flames into them just like Dmitriy could, and her polearm obediently grew with the more of her Flame's heat she pressed into the jewels.

The boys' expressions when she finally had a fully sized, if a little too big for her hands, Bec de Corbin made the whole nearly yearlong wait worth it.

"I get it." Her foster brother amended hastily, wide purple eyes on the wickedly sharp pick end of the hammer head. "Don't think I wanted to, but I get it."

She tried not to stagger under the weight of the metal, breathing rather hard for such a simple exercise. Apparently, she needed a lot of practice before using the Bec de Corbin could be more than just an emergency option.

"You sure you can use that?" Ziven asked lightly, eyeing her and the weapon she grew from a toy-sized one.

She had to let her Flames go, mentally noting she needed a lot more Flame practice with and without the jewel focuses. Her Bec de Corbin shrank slowly, the spinel gems retaining just enough and bleeding purple-tinted energy off slightly to ensure that while it would shrink if she lost hold it wouldn't turn into a palm-sized bit of metal before she could grab on again.

"At the very least, it's better than breaking some of the bones in my hand again." The younger thief informed him as evenly as she could, tapping the end of the staff on the ground as it shrank even more and finally was shorter than she was tall.

The spinel gems had fractured burn marks from the amount of Flames she had poured into them, unfortunately. Or maybe scorch marks from her wavering control?

The metal looked okay as it returned to palm-size, but Aleksandr would judge that himself when he looked it over closer than she could with an unpracticed eye.

While she had to have skin contact to the gemstones to Propagate the metal right now, it was at least likely it would hold up to Cloud Flames being poured into it on a semi-regular basis once she managed to figure out how to use them in a fight.

She would have to grow and shrink the polearm a couple times a day to get used to the effort, and likely pair that with trying to find a Cloud gem resistant to cracking so easily. She could conversely resign herself to exchanging the gems every time she used the weapon, but… she didn't want to do more jewelry stores so no.

To do both, she'd have to go through a lot of her stock of spinel gems anyways while she looked for a more resistant one.

If she needed more, she was going to buy the damn things.

"That's kind of cool, really… other than the fact you can carry around a warhammer easily without anyone noticing." Cherep spoke up, plucking the tiny form of her weapon out of her hands to get a better look at the queer metal.
"So," Ziven interrupted with a grin, probably tucking away what she had just shown him in a corner of his mind to dwell on later, "hand-to-hand practice then?"

Sonya gave the teen a disgusted look. He was going to kick their asses, then probably do it all over again and again before the day was over. Fighting against him with bare hands was just as bad to the ego as fighting against her with a staff.

He knew it too. He was one of the blonde burglar's fellow disciplinarians Aleksandr stuck tetchy Mafyia brats with eyes bigger than their brains on when they annoyed him too much. Getting one's ass beat by someone that didn't need a weapon was humbling, so was getting whacked upside the head with a pole repeatedly.

"One of these days, we have to see which is better. Your hands or my staff."

"So long as it isn't the warhammer you're using, maybe." Ziven temporized instead of giving an agreement, bouncing on the balls of his feet.

"It's a Bec de Corbin. It's technically a counterbalanced military pick on a stick."

They both blinked at her correction, looked at the tiny copy in Cherep's hands, then back to her.

"Still… I refuse so long as you want to use that." The hand-to-hand combat specialist in the making informed her seriously. "Tiny hammer toy or not."

LXIX (Thursday the 5th of September, 1963. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya had fucked up.

At least she knew it now.

Sprawled out on her stomach on the floor of her clean and orderly bedroom, she paged through all the information she managed to gather. From herself, from Dmitriy's plodding progress in her footsteps, and Tatiana's slow but steady developing mastery of using her heliodor crystal to make pretty yellow fire spring up at will.

She could've been stretched out on her bed doing this, but meh.

Rewriting it all into her main research journal took up a decent block of time and told her she hadn't left enough blank space between Flame type polarizations as she probably should have. At least there would be enough room for Cherep to add his side of the Cloud Flame equation later.

How did she screw up?

There had been no reason for her to break her hand on that last jewelry store job.

Adrenaline being what it was, it was entirely likely she would've broken or fractured some bone anyways. It had been a tight spot, the militsiya might have been only moments to minutes behind them, and screw-ups happened.

However, Propagation being what it was Sonya had known she didn't multiply her integral musculature in any great degree to obtain the strength she had. She remained a gawky stick of a girl no matter how hard she was trying to hit things.

She could recall that Skull de Mort could increase his muscle mass via Cloud Flames, but it was something he concentrated on doing and it was more showy than useful. Cherep's unconscious use of internalized Flames likely helped in preventing any terrible damage from being made internally.

...or covered it up.

Her initial use of Cloud Flames was her Propagating force. Her first unconscious use of it had dented brick walls and shattered wooden staffs, but she didn't incur damage from doing something no human could physically match without Flames. Unless whatever shattered under the force of her blows blew backwards and nicked her, but that had been a much later discovery with intentional usage.

She had just wanted to hit really, really hard... so that's what happened.

Multiplied force meant the former pickpocket could lift more by augmenting the force she pushed up with, hit harder with what she pushed out, and go farther than normal twelve-year-old girls using a fraction of the energy... so long as she had the Flame for it. She hadn't run out on the long trek from her service tunnel emergency exit to the clan meeting spot for her, but she had been nearly exhausted from the effort.

The entire fact she might have run out of Flames if the journey had been even a bit longer... was scary. She had just gotten tired of the weight, not noticing anything else about her exhaustion or thinking it odd. She was well trained, in both ballet and gymnastics, and so rarely tired herself out anymore.

...rather, she had thought she was well-trained.

If she seriously thought about it, she hadn't gotten exhausted for a very long time now. Unless it had to do with the amount she slept, but that was shaken off quickly these days.

Sonya didn't think she even used her muscles much anymore, she couldn't recall the last time they burned like how she felt after a spar with a hand-to-hand combat specialist like Ziven. Which she had practically emptied all the Cloud Flames she could pull on into her Bec de Corbin beforehand.

She needed more physical training. Possibly a lot more, to make up for the last three years of skating by on unconscious use of Cloud Flames doing everything instead of her own body.

That would not be fun.

Back to her Cartier job, though. If she had ever thought their emergency exit plan would be the backup plan they had to utilize, she likely would've at least attempted to punch through ceilings before they did the job. It would've told her that while possible, it wasn't what she had to do to obtain that result.

Once she got better at using her Flame, it was likely all she would need for emergency exits like that was a mere tap of a finger. A flick, if she had to.

Not a punch that could break her own bones.

She'd rather not have to do that again, but backup plans were always useful and there was the fact she didn't really want to see the insides of a jail cell.

Her new plan for her mornings was to wake up, Propagate her miniature Bec de Corbin and hold it as long as she could, go to ballet practice, try to get a reaction from the purple and red gem of the day, eat breakfast, go to gymnastic training, then try to figure out her Storm Flame ability.

While Disintegration wasn't a thief ability of any real note, it was still a method of Disintegration.
I.E. covering her tracks if she ever needed it.

It also meant it wouldn't be possible to detain her. With Cherep's early childhood misadventure of the twisted kind and Sinclair's own recent mention of people with a similar outlook if unknown motive as those that assaulted her best friend... the ability to be a cheating escape artist when everyone thought she was a violent psychopath instead would be worth its weight in gold.

Not that anything Disintegrated weighed much, but the point stood.

Sonya needed to figure out if trying to use Storm Flames was different then all the times she had successfully used Cloud Flames for anything, if using the jewels and crystals did or did not hinder the ability to use Flames without them, and a reliable method to ensure she was using her own muscles most of the time instead of her Cloud Flames.

Most of her recent efforts in controlling her strength had been poured into not harming anyone accidentally, now she had to figure out how to turn it off completely.

Again, joy.

LXX (Friday the 8th of November, 1963. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Two months was the length of time it took for Sonya to stop feeling like an overcooked noodle all day. Now, she was to the point she woke up sore at the very least but still dropped into bed like a limp ragdoll.

Draining her own Flames every damn morning then going to dance and gymnastic practice had been hard, and there were a couple of days she had been severely tempted to cheat like she had been for years before. She stuck with it though, mainly because Lisa had become concerned by the sharp drop in her physical capabilities and asked about it.

Cheating under her foster mother's eye when she knew full well you weren't supposed to be doing it?

She knew less painful ways of committing an embarrassing suicide.

Shortly after she started trying to tackle her usual daily schedule without Cloud Flames boosting her, she had to compare Dmitriy, Tatiana, herself, and Cherep with other similar-aged children/teens in the neighborhood just to be sure there wasn't any other handicapping going on. While it was possible her brother had the same problem as her, depending on how much of himself was unconsciously Propagated at any one time, only their foster sister had another possible cheat when it came to physical work.

At least she knew why it was so damn hard to tire Cherep out for a day. He could wear her out more often, which told Sonya he was still stronger than her. She did wonder if she'd ever really catch up but then again, he did have about five years of major Dying Will Flame use over her. It wasn't that surprising that her only shallow attempts to control her own Flames had no patch on someone that could internally use his for years on end.

Tatiana could probably heal herself from anything that might happen, including the small tearing of tissue that built up muscles. It was likely only a recent problem if one at all, so while somewhat concerning it wasn't likely a factor just yet. They would have to wait and see if it was happening, then try to find a way around it if it did.

It might just be a fact that Suns needed more physical training than everyone else to equate the same measure of muscle growth, too. The former pickpocket didn't quite remember too well... but the white-haired boxer Sun guy from Vongola's Tenth Generation Guardians might have been \textit{that} physically inclined just because he had to be, or he didn't bulk up at all.

If that was true, it was entirely questionable if he realized he had been different than others in that respect. Civilian kid, anyways. There wouldn't be any kind of help for him identifying any internal energy issues when it came to his Sun Flames.

Tranquility didn't have a physical impact, unless it was someone falling asleep standing up hitting the floor as consequence. Rains didn't seem to have any difficulty with physical ability, but once Dmitriy got his ability under control he would still be a rather tricky opponent to face.

Sonya had to rewrite her research journal on Dying Will Flames, because she had long since ran out of room when it came to Flames other than her and Cherep's Cloud. That task was still pending, because she wanted to see what her old friend, as the first person she helped learn the ability, got in the next few years. That would be both a 'Classical' and an 'Inverted' section together, which would let her make a more accurate judgement on how much room each section really needed.

She wondered, groggily as she pushed herself up to get ready for the day's ballet practice, if she should ask, bribe, or beg Sinclair to add in what he knew of Inverted Suns.

There was no way in hell her Mafia Land hitman coworker was a \textit{Classic} Sun, he wasn't nearly as peppy or exuberant to pull \textit{that} off. Hyperactive, possibly. Somewhat annoyingly persistent, of course.

No way in hell would she described him as 'peppy', 'bubbly', or even 'positively tempered'.

If he did decide to help a bit, she'd have a good idea what all the information on both polarizations would take up now and not later. That way she wouldn't have to rewrite the damn journal \textit{again} if something came up and she needed the full thing.

Sonya abruptly realized she was stalling and pushed herself up off her bed. She did recall in time that her stacks of books were no longer around to help her stabilize, so at least she wasn't starting her day out with an unexpected meet and greet with her floorboards. She grabbed her recently unearthed desk chair instead, and since Tatiana liked her showers in the early mornings the younger foster sibling decided to get on with draining her Cloud Flames first.

Groping in the early morning dark for the tiny Bec de Corbin where she usually put it before bed got her a whole lot of nothing. Trying to feel around for where she might have put it last night merely got discarded shards of spinel gems stuck into the pads of her fingers.

She blamed the recent rather sore mornings she had the last few weeks for what happened next after she picked them out.

Frustrated, irritated, and sore was not a good general mindset for a Cloud. Apparently, it was only a good mindset only if said Cloud wanted to pull on and materialize their Flame externally.
She'd forever deny it, but she really did scream like the little girl she was when she realized her gem pricked hand was on fire.

The thump from the room next to her told her she'd scared Cherep out of bed. His little sister was a little too fascinated with staring at the multicolored fire flickering on her fingers… and the whole not getting burned bit, to care much.

Mainly light purple, even the light it was giving off was lavender in shade. Deep flickers of red near the base of her Flame, her Storm showing up less developed since she hadn't done much with it yet.
Tiny fire tips in yellow showed the Sun she might gain control of eventually.

Sonya was in love. With her own inner fire. It was awesome.

Arseniy shoulder-checking her bedroom door open startled her into losing what little control over the Flame she managed to grab after having the life nearly scared out of her the first time. The vor, backlit by the hallway light in her broken doorway and having probably caught the sight of her being on multicolor fire but with no visible burns to show for it, flipped on her bedroom light to eye her severely first then a resigned look passed over his face before she could muster anything to say.

"Is Tatiana going to do that too?"

"…maybe?"

He eyed her severely again, and she was very sorry for probably startling him into charging for her room. Her father had likely been just barely asleep when she screamed out of fright.

He had an excellent reaction time regardless.

"If you burn the house down, you're paying for it."

"…noted."

Chapter End Notes

Pirog - or pyrih, is a baked case of dough with a sweet or savory filling. Usually meats and mushrooms, cheese, or fruit fillings within.

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one's peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).

Pakhan - is the Boss or Krestnii Otets 'Godfather' and controls everything.

Avtoritet (Plural Avtorityets) – Literally translates to 'authority'. A captain in charge of certain operations within a Mafiya syndicate, could also be called Brigadier.

Militsiya – A kind of paramilitary law enforcement, less military and more police in nature.
LXXI (Tuesday the 17th of December, 1963. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Comparing results from all of Sonya's fellow Zolotov Dying Will Flame users got her several rather strange theories to ponder.

The 'Dying' part... wasn't necessary. Flame users didn't have to face death to use their Flames or find it in the first place. As seen with Mists, Dmitriy, and Tatiana, it was possible to gain the ability to use their inner fire without ever really facing the possibility of death.

Dying Will Flames were probably named such since escaping death was the way it was discovered, not because defying death with one's own will was required.

Conversely... one gaining their Flames by defying death seemed to give the best results right away.

Cherep never would have survived as a child unless he had all the Flame and power he could muster to sustain his life in the face of lethal injuries. He had next to no conscious control with them, they wouldn't train him up until they had the security the clan wouldn't get around, but Sonya wasn't nearly as strong as he was in Cloud Flames even with three years of using it instead of her own muscles.

Learning that control would probably still mean defying death was the fastest way to go about using Flames if one didn't care about the side-effects, depending on how hard her best friend turned foster brother found developing control.

Tatiana showed remarkable progress catching up to Dmitriy, who was a full year and some ahead of her in using their respective Flames. The redhead Classical Sun user was very motivated, compared to the Inverted Rain who was merely going along with learning just because.

The safecracker's willpower to learn the Activation healing ability first also meant she wasn't doing too well in any other path a Sun should be showing, a mixed blessing when it came to the 'efficiency' aspect a Sun had. Exuberant without the annoying levels of peppy-ness as she was, it was getting worse and better all at the same time. Being more efficient with her energy meant Tatiana could do more, she was fast catching up to Cherep in the energy levels she had on a day-to-day basis.

If the Sun's muscle tone started fading, then they would have to give her more training to do. It hadn't happened yet in the half a year she had been learning her Flame, even with the new ability to heal small cuts and bruises the teenaged Sun just recently discovered she could finally do. Lisa was on the lookout now, so they would have to see.

Dmitriy seemed to have the most level growth of them all, if a lot slower than anyone else. Tranquility being what it was, he had grown to the point he tended to stop the engines he was working on if he got too distracted or into his work. The mere fact he could stop machinery with the ability provided him enough interest in trying to Tranquilize a living thing on purpose, but the best he could do now was put the housecat at headquarters to sleep without a gemstone in hand.

It was debatable if the Rain had managed it himself or if the feline had become bored and decided on
He had not gotten to the point of drawing out his Flames, but the chunk of blue jade he settled on as a better focus did radiate a watery kind of visible energy if he pushed it hard enough. He cracked his jade if so, and after the second time he had to come back for a replacement she had threatened to make him pay cash for his next one.

Sonya herself was halfway between her siblings in how she approached her Flames. A sharp jolt of death defying got her using them, but she poured effort into learning how to control them afterwards.

The result was a mix bag of good and bad. The half-step forward one step sideways way she was making progress was irritating, but she was rapidly getting back to where she thought she had been.

She was seriously thinking of pulling Tatiana's Lightning girl into the mix they had going but knew her limitations well enough that she'd probably botch the invitation. Galina wouldn't be going anywhere, and eventually either the redhead or the brunette herself would notice the Flame... or the group would risk death somewhere and then it would pop out.

Inverted Lightning, anyways. Galina would respond better to her gang's leader than said gang's leader's younger sister.

There seemed to be a very, very bad habit of any Flame user to think of any others around them in terms of possible Flame type. Sonya was perfectly guilty of it, having already identified the likely primary Flame of everyone around her and even got to guessing secondary possibilities.

She had a wonder if it had any impact on her greater social ability, or if her greater social grasp was responsible for her finally looking outward to the people around her.

She did wonder about her Classic Cloud nature, on the other hand. In her own opinion, she was back to being normal. As she dimly recalled being from Rachel, a lifetime ago.

Her first years as a Zolotov thief had been rather icy by choice, she hadn't known what the hell had been going on. Hadn't felt safe or secure enough to talk to others and so she hadn't and just worked up the skills to just defend herself.

To be honest, she still didn't know what the hell had happened with her biological parents. It might not have been good in Saratov with them, but it hadn't been bad either.

...

Sonya had moved.

A Classically natured Cloud, who moved from her home territory to a different one. One which might have another, older Classic Cloud in it... Aleksandr was entirely Cloud-like, in a way. To be honest, so was Arseniy.

She hadn't thought so, because everyone knew Clouds were territorial and possessive. Two in the same area would be asking for someone to die.

...ah.

Oh.

Well... old wives' tales and nature vs nurture. What happened if a baby Cloud was raised by another?
Trained by another?

Placed in their territory and expected to raise her?

Had her situation ever happen before?

More worryingly, was she going to have a problem with the vory in a few years?

Aleksandr… that would suck, she went to him for any and all weapon or fighting problems.

Arseniy… well, the man was practically her father. Especially since her biological one up and abandoned her to the Mafiya.

Sonya closed her research journal.

She needed more information, before she panicked.

LXXII (Tuesday the 17th of December, 1963 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Arseniy listened to her recent wonderings blandly, chewing through what was for him his breakfast even if it was high noon. "So, what happens if I don't use your Flame stuff?"

Sonya dropped into a chair across the kitchen table from him, wondering the same thing.

Dying Will Flame use was kind of like opening Pandora's Box. You got a mess of good and bad all jumbled together depending on how you went about opening the damn thing… but that was only after you started using it.

Apparently the better you got at it, the more it affected you. Worse, it started slowly and snowballed from there.

"I… don't know?"

A lot of people never activated their Dying Will, simply because they never needed it or knew it was possible if they had. An equal measure of the same people might but might never again use if after one or two occasions and merely think it a 'miracle' or a 'coincidence'.

A fraction of that might end up in the underworld trying to understand, along with the children of their predecessors and other mafia members.

Then everyone got sucked into Omertà and very few ever got out again… barring their own death.

"Then stop panicking about it. If it happens, it happens." The vor shrugged the issue off almost callously. "So far as I'm concerned, this just means in ten or so years after you move out you won't be the one to come back asking for room and board."

She stifled the probably hysterical giggle, because that was not something she was used to doing.

"Pack off, girl. You've got Aleksandr's this afternoon."

"Yes sir… um…"

"What?"
She slunk back into the chair she had almost slipped out of, cringing slightly. "What, um… happened to my parents?"

Arseniy sighed at the question, lowering his fork instead of taking his next bite of food, then scowled heavily into the air over her head. "I regret to inform you that your mother is dead. Very dead. Sorry."

He didn't sound it.

Sonya eyed him warily. "That's nice… you didn't get her then?"

"For trying her hand at child slavery? With her own daughter?" The expression on his face twisted darkly, and from how he was gripping his fork it almost seemed as if he really had wanted to stab her mother. "She's lucky it wasn't me. Her own problems caught up with her. No, I caught up with your father."

"…is he alive?"

"Define alive."

She probably shouldn't ask, the asshole abandoned her without a backwards look, but… "Among the living?"

"Yes."

"Actually living?"

"In a way."

Her foster father didn't want to tell her, obviously. The man was alive, and Sonya was morbidly curious if she had to watch out for him or not. "In one piece?"

"Nope."

That was way too cheerful for the topic. Especially for his prior expression.

"In what way?"

"…missing the family jewels." Arseniy stabbed his eggs a couple times as his left eye twitched irritably. "He had an emergency vasectomy done to save his miserable life."

…Sonya didn't want to know. That whole mess was painful and rather screwed up to begin with, what with her life as Rachel preventing any connecting she could've done with them.

Then… apparently her mother tried to sell her to cover her debts. Not to the Zolotovs obviously, but she hadn't known that at the time.

Which was baffling and rather sore subject matter the blonde didn't like to think on often.

What the hell had she done to deserve that?

"Aw hell. Don't cry." Dropping the fork on his plate and running a hand roughly through his hair in frustration, the vor eyed her closely. "We weren't going to tell you until much later on. He's… okay, he was a whiny little shit when I was dealing with him. Might have been the subject matter, that. But he got you somewhere safe first before running, it… counts?"
If she had been feeling better, or the subject was different, that would've been funny. No wonder Lisa dealt with the girls more often than he did back in the beginning, he sucked at being nice.

Sonya… kind of wanted to go hit things. It sounded nice, mindless destruction and maybe a spar or two with Ziven.

"He's alive, and you're the only kid he'll ever have. You get to decide if you want to see him, but I'm insisting on being there for that."

This was the most she had ever heard Arseniy say all at once if it wasn't Mafiya lesson oriented. "Okay."

He eyed her yet again, only a touch warily from what she could tell. Probably making sure she was alright like she claimed.

She hadn't been the best daughter ever in either life, really. There hadn't been a lot of expectation in her first one as Rachel and nothing done as Sonya.

She had tried?

A little at least, staying out of the way had seemed to be what they wanted.

…no, she wasn't going to dwell. The thief had things to do, she could think on what-ifs and the like much, much later. Probably end up thinking on it in the middle of the night, as it was.

It wasn't like she could demand answers out of her mother now.

"I'm… going to go, then."

His response was a rather pained sounding sigh. "You sure you don't want to talk to Lisa? First at least?"

Sonya didn't even know what she felt about the mess, talking about it just yet probably wouldn't help. "I'm going to go destroy Aleksandr's floor again, then maybe."

He didn't say anything as she slipped out of the kitchen, but she knew perfectly well he was probably still watching her.

To top off her rather bad day, Tatiana and Cherep were waiting for her in the living room looking way too guilty. It was harder to catch now, but her foster sister's smile was brittle looking and while her best friend might look less like a girl at fourteen… the wet-cat looks were still a dead giveaway.

"We're not talking about it until I've decided what I feel about it."

"Fair enough." Tatiana spoke up quickly, flashing a guilty look to the doorway behind her to where a vor might lurk if shadowing her movements. "So… combat practice. Yay."

She palmed her face, not even needing to look to know her foster brother was trying to say something but coming up blank with what it should be so he was just leaving his mouth open like a beached fish. "Let's just go."

LXXIII (Sunday the 5th of January, 1964. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
Hormones were terribly nasty things, especially when it came to little girls.

Sonya supposed she qualified for young teenager now, again, but her thirteen-year-old self was just as short and gangly as her twelve-year-old one. She maybe did a bit of growing in a vertical sense, but she was growing like Cherep did in beginning.

All sharp elbows and knees for the first bit.

At least her unbalanced body chemistry picked a semi-decent person for her to develop the world's most awkward crush upon.

Tatiana developed a crush on Dmitriy way back in the day, when the girls had still been sort of frosty as sisters. Her subconscious picked Arseniy to have her first crush on.

The vor, who very probably was the one to mutilate her father for abandoning her to the Mafiya and running for it when his wife got herself into more than just a bit of trouble. The same man who patted the foster siblings on the head when they had another birthday or did something remarkable, the same way someone would pat a dog on the head for doing a trick.

That man.

The one who was pretty much the foster father out of their ragtag little family unit.

Lisa at least thought it was sweet and amusing. It really was the only highlight of the younger thief's rocky start to her developing years, the fact the vor's actual lover didn't seem to mind too much. The older woman could be scary sometimes, and entirely sadistic when she thought she had to prove she could be a terrifying person to oppose.

Well… that, and the fact she hadn't ended up crushing on Sinclair. That bloody bastard would've been insufferable if he caught on, he still flirted with the waitresses when they had coffee.

Cherep would've been awkward about any crush on him too, now that she thought about it.

Of course, that would be if it all wasn't a little awkward already between the younger generation in the house. Added on top of her development problems, the atmosphere in their home got strange quickly when she was included.

Really, she just wanted to crawl into bed and pretend the next year had gone by already. It had started out rather badly, didn't look to be getting better anytime soon, and if she didn't have things she had to do she might have tried it anyways to avoid Arseniy.

Terribly timed crush or not, the news the vor gave her about her parents had been depressing.

Sonya still couldn't make out what the hell she felt about it all, the fact her mother ran afoul of her own plans backfiring or her father's response to it… or the way he ended up afterward.

Vor were not nice people. They did try to safeguard the children around them and could be a little more than just sexist sometimes.

A not even five-year-old girl getting abandoned on the doorstep of their recruiting efforts?

She wasn't remotely surprised with what Arseniy had done. If she had been more vindictive or violently inclined she might have thought to do it herself if she had ever caught up with her fath- with Nikshin Mikhail.
Curled up on her bed, she was currently trying to put the whole situation out of her head as she tried calling up her Flames without a gemstone. Sonya could and tended to do it every spare moment she could, but the multi-colored fire hadn't showed up again after her first breakthrough with them.

It was either a small wash of violet tinted fire on her palm, a tongue of red fire that licked up her fingers, or a couple fitful yellow sparks spat at her. The more she worked with one the less response she got from the others, which she had no idea how to counter.

The Sun was nearly gone as it was, the last reaction she got from it was a flash of a spark. Only the one, and it refused to pop again no matter what she tried.

Holding the working Flames steady and in place was proving rather difficult. Her first attempts to do it intentionally had proved herself to be a bit of a fire hazard. There was a charred mark on her bedroom desk when her left hand had lit up and not her right like she expected. Which only reminded her that will-Flame or not it was still a fire-based ability and fires was a hazard to watch out for.

Balanced on her bedside table was a cup of water, which Lisa had informed her would be present any time she tried the Flame calling exercise. Partially in response to scenting the smoke before the thief could inform her of the problem and being very unamused at the firebug she had suddenly turned into.

She was really waiting for Cherep to decide on if he wanted to try talking to her or not. He had been dithering over the decision outside her bedroom door. In the meantime, she played with her Flames because it was ridiculously soothing thing to do with a spare moment.

"Err… Sonya?"

"You done being awkward yet?"

"Me?" He squawked, both looking and sounding offended as he edged into view. "I… erm… yes?"

Her dork of a foster brother fidgeted, the blonde thief sighed. Then she wondered… if she slapped her face with a palm full of Flames would it burn her?

Maybe just singe her hair?

…that would be bad if she burned her eyebrows off. Eyelashes too.

Huh.

Did hair count as 'no personal harm'?

It had to, right?

Otherwise there would be a lot of bald Flame users wandering around.

"How am I any different from last month, pray tell?" She asked him flatly, trying to get the colors she had to appear at the same time and go up different fingers.

The Cloud Flames in her left obeyed her fine, the tiny amount of Storm Flames in her right spluttered all over the place. No yellow sparks at all.

Damn it.
It wasn't like she really understood how she did it. It seemed as if she wanted hard enough the Flames appeared and if she didn't they just went away. There wasn't any grasping for some fire power she never noticed or finding something internally that correlated to the ability.

Her Flame just was, and conversely it wasn't, at the same time.

Want, willpower, seemed to be the only controlling factor. Thought didn't do jack but distract her.

That was, once past the whole issue of 'being on fire and not getting burned is impossible' mental roadblock… or the whole 'internal rainbow-colored fire power' thing.

Why the hell were Dying Will Flames named after weather-related phenomena?

"Um… you're not?"

"So why are you still standing in the doorway?"

Cherep considered the question, looking backwards at the hallway wall behind him. "Fire safety. You're a little… combustible right now."

Sonya suddenly didn't miss her best friend as much as she thought she had. "You… are a brat sometimes."

"And you're on fire. Really, Sonya. Safety first you know."

He stopped looking so smug when she tossed her cup of water into his face.

LXXIV (Thursday the 23rd of April, 1964. Mafia Land.)

Sonya came to a stupid, utterly belated realization that Flame-resistant metal actually meant it was Flame resistant. Not just resistant to the damage Flame users tended to cause.

She felt like a moron for half a minute.

Then she decided that if Propagating Flame resistant metal drained her of Cloud Flames so fast, it was a pretty decent control exercise anyways. She didn't feel as moronic after that.

It had taken her about half a year to realize it, and by then she was already really attached to her Bec de Corbin and its miniature-super sized party trick.

Sonya might still be popping spinel jewels like batteries every time she used one of the mini-polearms she had. It was a decent price to pay for a staff weapon she could carry around on her in plain sight, in broad daylight, and never be arrested over.

As her three original mini Bec de Corbins were all made out of Flame resistant metal they'd do as a weapon against other Flame users. Rather expensive weapons, but decent.

Now she needed a semi-decent metal to make a little less Flame-resistant polearms out of but one that still wouldn't shatter under her hands, in hopes she wouldn't be buying or stealing spinel jewels for the rest of her life. If she could find a better alloy or metal mix, maybe she wouldn't need nearly as many jewels to regulate her Cloud Flames through one.

Problem was… she knew more about jewels, crystal formations, and such more than she knew about actual metal, minerals, alloys and their properties. Aleksandr didn't know anything about Flames and what they could do, only slightly about weapons and their makes as he did more makeshift combat teaching, so his help had been limited. That stumped them until she decided to see what Mafia Land had in stock and if she could get any without being questioned too closely.

While she was at it, maybe some way to carry around her mini-polearms in easy reach?

Like a… necklace, or something less likely to choke herself. Bracelets… pocketed bracers?

A magnetic pin maybe?

…was Flame resistant metal magnetic?

If this questioning thing kept up at the rate she had been going, Sonya was going to need a damn shopping list.

Her latest Mafia Land heist, a semi-decent one that asked her to steal the emblem of a rival business out of the owner's office, hadn't been too bad. It had a security force internally, so it wasn't so easy a rookie thief could do it and for all that she stole one thing it at least warned her she wasn't getting a sign-on bonus to pay her way there or back.

It had paid rather well after the fact anyways, so in a good mood and with money to spare the baby Cloud Flame user was not terribly surprised or upset when the invasion alarms sounded.

The reason she never tended to stay in Mafia Land long was entirely due to the fact it was an island of mafia related businesses that cohabitated. Eventually now and again, someone realized there wasn't one owner of the whole island and it was possible that if he/she/they took over the manmade moving island then everyone would have to pay them to use it as the black market/connection point/haven it was.

The fact there still wasn't one internal mafia family that ruled the island was because every time it happened, everyone else on the island not affiliated with the moron-flavor of the month tended to protest.

Violently.

Whichever mafia syndicate that did it also got banned for a year by the conglomeration of mafia groups that ran the island together, so the results of trying typically were their own kind of deterrent.

If they survived in any number, anyways.

The fact it still happened to the point it was an actual draw type of attraction nowadays?

She sometimes wondered about the intelligence of some of the people around her.

Sonya sighed as a cheer went up around her in response to the announcement of free-violence allowed against whichever attacking group, ducking into the closest shop before the bulletproof window shields could lock down to prevent looting from happening during or after the fighting. With little else really to do, she went back to shopping around.

The actual shops in Mafia Land were connected by slightly subterranean tunnels for that exact reason.

Entrances were at the back of the shops and ran nearly the whole length of the merchant and residential areas. You could only get out of the tunnels during an attack by certain station exits with revolving one-way doors that peppered the streets, and only the other store/hotel entrances when inside the buildings before lockdown. The service tunnels that led further down into the island's command center got closed off once the alarms blared out a warning, and the individual sections below that became remotely secured in their own ways.

According to Lisa, anyways.

The street vendors that sold weapons typically made a killing no matter who tried to grab their stuff, they stocked weapons and ammunition specifically just for these kinds of occasions. The cost of it all would be refunded by the island's staff after everything was over, and generally the vendors got highly popular afterwards as well.

She was not surprised to run into Sinclair not too long after reaching the tunnels either. All Mafia Land employees used the tunnels very often too, especially when they lived on the island.

At least, she was pretty sure he lived here for the time being. She saw him way too damn much.

"Sonya." Renato had been pawing through a couple boxes he slipped into a pocket, ammunition for a small caliber pistol or something of the sort.

The thief was only mildly interested in what his hand were doing when she caught his nod of greeting, instead she was trying to read the painted notes on the wall of which shops were in what direction. There was a Cyrillic translation in there somewhere, she just had to find it in the mass of scrawled notes. "Sinclair. Know any decent Flame channeling metal? Or at least a decent metal that won't melt under my hands?"

He shot her a questioning glance then flicked his eyes to what she was trying to read, pocketing a handful of loose bullets and pulling a revolver out from the small of his back to load with his other handful. "The only one I know of is titanium, but if that's because it's just harder to melt or dent than steel is questionable. I can occasionally melt it in a firefight."

"Actually, that makes me think of tungsten." She sighed as she considered it.

It had a ridiculously high melting point too, and maybe what she was looking for. She had just stolen a chunk of that metal not too long ago.

The hell was up with her luck?

"Thanks."

Renato's right eyebrow cocked up, and he gave her the bulk of his attention and not the loaded handgun he had. "Why ask, Sonya?"

"I need a less Flame-resistant metal for my day-to-day weapons." She gave the shiny silver revolver a smirk. "Playing into the stereotype a little much there?"

Hitmen and handguns. They were like the penny-dreadful staple of mafia people everywhere.

"Weapons, as in plural?" He asked leadingly while ignoring her question, sliding the barrel closed and a smirk or his own curling the corner of his mouth up. "Any chance I will get to see them sometime soon?"

They both ignored the muffled explosion that shook the ceiling over their head, the lights embedded into the walls not even flickering in response. Mafia Land was well built to cope with that kind of damage, especially after all the times morons had dropped the explosives they were trying to buy in the middle of the weapons market.
"Not today. Go shoot a couple idiots in the leg for me while I finish my shopping."

Renato rolled his eyes at her but gave a little mocking bow as he clicked the hammer of his gun back with one thumb. "Only if you call me by my first name, little lady Sonya."

"Renato Sinclair, do go away."

"Cheater."

Sonya gave him a pointed look that questioned if he had looked in the mirror lately.

He merely smirked in return as he sauntered off.

LXXV (Saturday the 16th of May, 1964. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

With Sonya's terribly timed crush on Arseniy still reeling its unsightly head every time she saw the vor, she got back into the habit she had long since gotten out of.

A Classic Cloud's patrolling.

It had been something she had started back when she had been even tinier, not that she knew it for what it was then so thus she made excuses for it rather than hide in a room or something. Even after losing what could have become her 'home territory' had she stayed in Saratov, she kept it up in Moscow until shortly after Cherep moved into their home.

If she had been doing Cloud patrolling after being fostered in a Mafiya home because of unease, habit, or because she had instinctively tried to understand the new situation before different but unconsciously more dominant Clouds impressed on her it was their territory was debatable. The fact any impulse to continue stopped after she and her fellow Cloud decided they were friends and he moved into the bedroom next to hers was slightly troubling for Sonya's desire not to see her best friend as 'territory'.

Since she was so out of practice at it, it could really be called 'free-ranging' more than patrolling.

There were different things to see than she recalled; new park benches in a few areas, several different shops that opened or were about to close here and there, and the always different people out and about now spring was trying to thaw the city were also things she noted in an absent kind of way.

Hopefully, her patrolling habit would fix the couple holes she had in her mental map of Moscow's Zolotov territory. Maybe that way Cherep would stop being so smug every time he had to get them back home after a walk to different circuses or cinemas.

Her walkabouts were also great times to ponder things, especially as she had stopped trying to meditate out of sheer disgust for her inability. Mostly, how the hell she was going to raise legal money in case her foster brother was right on his guess of her Storm polarization.

Sonya was still drawing a blank on that one, and she'd been wondering that over in her head ever since the bet started.

She stuck a leg out almost on automatic, tripping a cutpurse that tried to snatch the bag of the stooped over old lady not five feet in front of her. Snatching the purse out of the air, she absently handed it back to the startled woman ahead of her just as she opened her mouth to yell before hauling the thief up by the back of his collar.

Which is when her mind caught up to her actions.

"Adrik?"

"Wha- Sonya?"

She took an entirely inappropriate moment to wonder if he had been initially sorted like her, a petty thief, only to find his real talent lay elsewhere in a thieves' array of skills.

A cutpurse turned security system specialist?

Not as farfetched as a pickpocket doing solo cat burglary.

Then she pushed him behind her slightly, so he wasn't gaping at her in full view of his botched-victim. Sonya turned an entirely sheepish and apologetic smile on the old woman suspiciously eyeing them both. "Excuse us, baba. I need to go yell at my friend a bit."

She sniffed at both the boy still dangling from her one-handed hold on him and the insulting term. The thief slowly lowered the other, so his shoes at least touched the ground before the old biddy noticed.

"Blister his ears, devochka."

"Oh, I will. I can promise you that."

It did not pay to rob people who couldn't afford it. She knew that a long time ago when she had just been lifting pockets for cash and not doing businesses and shops. Adrik had to know it too, but here he was doing it anyways.

He waited until the little stooped old lady at least got a decent amount of distance from them. "Your hypocrisy is astounding."

She lifted him back off the ground, so he was at least a couple good inches off the sidewalk, and about bit his nose off. "You and I are going to talk."

LXXVI (Saturday the 16th of May, 1964 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Since Adrik was one of Tatiana's minions, Sonya dragged the cutpurse home with her.

In silence, too. Partially because she was very irritated with him, and partially because she wanted to be sure of her own mental state over his thieving habits.

It wasn't because he was stealing in home territory, it was because he was robbing old ladies.

Right?

She had difficulties trying to decide, so that was why they were going to her sister over it all. If it was her Cloud nature getting prissy, the Sun would have no problem telling her so and taking her to task for it.

Thankfully for her mental debate, her foster sister hadn't been amused to hear of Adrik's actions either.
"They have networked gossip circles! Why would you do that?" The teenage redhead, fifteen in age and a pretty decent Classic Sun Flame user if she had a gem in hand, gripped her long hair in both hands and wailed. "Once one of those old babas sees your face, they all will know! What they know their children know! Then everyone in the neighborhood knows! You might as well shoot yourself in the foot!"

Adrik's expression got progressively sulkier as Sonya's sister carried on berating him.

The blonde thief herself was just happy she hadn't been overreacting. That would have been rather embarrassing.

Tatiana eventually realized she was getting a bit too carried away and took a deep breath to try calming herself down. Passionate Suns, indeed. "Adrik, why?"

"There's rumors of a personal computer that might coming up for sale next year." Still sulky sounding, but at least it was a reason Sonya could sort of understand. "I wanted to be sure I could afford it and my dues, since we're only doing minor things until I'm old enough to leave Moscow."

He was about the same age as Cherep… which sounded about right. Sometime next year Tatiana would be leaving home for a different city, and maybe the year after the USSR itself for the surrounding countries.

She frowned thoughtfully as the Sun rubbed her face, all the while the cutpurse expanded on what he thought a 'computer' might be good for and why he couldn't ask the group since he wasn't sure on that yet.

Weren't the first computer designs clunky things?

Sonya didn't really know how the computer age started, but she knew a lot of people were involved. Different people and companies involved across the world meant more options, sure. It also meant they wouldn't work together well for a bit longer.

Compatibility, that was the word. Different computer systems wouldn't be very compatible for… ever, really. Apple versus PC issue from Rachel's life all in one word there.

"Adrik, you work for a thief who has a very good cat burglar as a sister." Said cat burglar tuned back into the scolding session when she was mentioned. Tatiana was even helpfully pointing at her too. "If it's that important to you to figure out, we can hire Sonya to steal one for you."

They could?

"We can?" Adrik put aside the fact he had been getting yelled at quickly to peer at the youngest thief in the room.

The Storm-Cloud supposed they could, just like how she had hired Tatiana's group for her last jewelry heist. It wasn't of the level of the favor she had done for her foster sister, being involved in a high-profile job like that boosted Tatiana's group's reputation rather high after they succeeded.

They would be considered less 'green' after a heist like that under their belts, and therefore more reliable for anyone looking for a group to do something similar.

On the other hand, if Sonya did then other thieves might want to hire her for a little aid or a job too. If she turned down too many, they would try to get Tatiana to ask her to do it instead.

Thus, why she didn't actually do any other thieves a job or two for favors or trades. The only one she ever made an exception for had been Dmitriy, and that had been because she could hold it over his head for a bit and everyone knew she made him pay through the nose for it.

"We're going to owe her a lot for doing it even after the favor from before, but yes." The Sun user gave a pointed look at her little sister.

Said little sister realized she was required to speak up. "…sure."

Adrik seemed to shrug off the whole incident that led to the conversation, lighting up like a Christmas tree. There was still an element of wariness to him, but since the physically younger girl had held him off the ground for at least an hour of travel or so she supposed she deserved that. "What are your terms, then?"

In other words, money or favors?

"A favor. I'll steal a computer for you, when they become popular enough to spread to the commercial side of the market, so long as you teach me to work one." She wasn't looking forward to that job, clunky computer equipment was probably fragile enough to make everything tricky.

The cutpurse had the whole geek look working for him anyways. She could easily see him being a hardcore gamer type like from Rachel's schooling years.

…what exactly would be the mafia's answer to the advent of the computer age, anyways?

"After a period of six months, so I know the thing, I'll do the teaching… so long as a better model doesn't come up."

That might be complicated. The blonde had known the other thief was sly from before, but that could potentially trip her up into stealing him a new computer every damn year if she wasn't careful.

From what she knew, competing companies would put out different models every now and again just to keep up with the fast-developing technology and each other.

"Four months, and perceptively better as in works faster than just more expensive."

"Three if you can get me everything I would need to operate one."

"Except for the power supply, I'd assume."

Adrik had the cheek to look amused at that. "Of course."

The cat bulger nodded her agreement. "Deal."

They shook on it.

She wouldn't be at risk with a deal like this until the Silicon Valley thing happened back in the States. Sonya might not recall clearly what happened, but she knew the computer industry boomed both during and after that to result in Rachel's old desktop.

Tatiana clapped her hands together, beaming. "So! Now, let's talk about robbing old babas we live next to."

It was an evil beaming smile for an expression on a Classical Sun user.

The cutpurse wilted a bit, his excitement over haggling the deal out fading rapidly in the face of his leader's attention turning back on his especially crooked misdeeds.
She decided to excuse herself, as she wasn't really part of Tatiana's group or under her influence. She reasoned that since the Sun had everything in hand and was a bit busy, and Adrik might not appreciate her listening in as he got yelled at, Tatiana wouldn't mind too much.

She wasn't running from her sister, really. It was called a tactical retreat.

Suns could burn away Clouds, too.

Now, had the situation been her Cloud nature getting pissed with the theft happening in home territory or not?

Sonya still didn't know for certain. While Tatiana didn't seem to think she was out of line, it was possible it was just the stealing and not the baba bit.

…shit.

What kind of thief collars other thieves working in front of them?

Not very popular ones… or dead ones. She needed to get both a clear answer and a handle on that problem fast.

LXXVII (Tuesday the 19th of May, 1964. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya wondered absently if Tatiana's group started because Nikolai was a bit of a beefcake.

The elder foster sister did start piecing her group together just after her crush on Dmitriy ended a swift death due to his grimy career putting her off him.

…she really did need to iron out her head, or something.

It was a wonder that stuck with her after Adrik had crashed a lunchtime of Lisa's, bringing everything he knew on the supposedly newfangled 'computers' with him and the other co-leader of his gang.

Nikolai had just wanted to get briefed on what the deal was and what they now owed Sonya, so while Tatiana had a conference with him Adrik nattered her ear off about a lot of things she couldn't recall.

She might have tuned him out in pure self-defense.

With her somewhat unorthodox background she knew the difference between a microprocessor, which was the latest gadget 'revolutionizing' computers AKA clunky calculators everywhere, and a motherboard, which was where said microprocessor was located. It was rather hard to profess any interest in the topic when Rachel's memories of laptops and sleek desktop computers looked nothing like what was currently on the market.

What she did now know that had been important from the geek-babble heaped on her poor ears, was that the best European 'computer' company was in Italy.

Olivetti was the name, and they were known for manufacturing typewriters and the like and had recently announced to certain circles the possible commercial production of the 'Programma 101'.

Which really was an overly glorified desktop calculator compared to what Sonya thought of when the word computer was mentioned.

Worst of all, it was entirely likely the company had connections to Vongola's CEDEF... or if it didn't yet, it might just end up a real part of the shell company that covers the greater Italian mafia Famiglia in the country when the personal computer thing took off. If she was a Don of a crime family, holding onto an up and coming security nightmare like computerized networks would be something she'd want a finger in.

She just did not want to go to Italy. She'd been learning Italian lately, sure. Mostly just because of Sinclair and the fact it might be useful much later when Cherep had an encounter of the cursed baby kind and if she couldn't do anything about it.

She'd be learning Japanese next for the same reason, even if she already knew Mandarin Chinese and that typically worked for most Asian countries.

However, she had made the deal... backing out because of personal wants would be rather bad for her reputation.

"I have a... associate, who I don't really trust but might help." The Storm-Cloud informed Adrik slowly when he paused for breath, turning the problems over in her head. "If the company does have mafia connections, I'm not stealing from them and risking my neck for something I can get easier in America for less risk. IBM does the computers for the US Space Program, and I'm sure one of theirs is just as good."

The cutpurse pouted, which still worked for him even if he was the same age as Cherep and getting out of the 'boyish good looks' category.

It was cute, but Sonya was unmoved.

Wet-kitty pouts were harder to ignore.

"But it's a European company. On the cutting-edge, too!"

She had to control the desire to snort, coughing a little into one hand instead. Cutting-edge for the 1960s maybe, not to her. "Look, the production estimates aren't even set in stone yet. It might not be next year or even the year after when they finally start selling the damn things. Even then, the first model off the production line isn't the best in terms of being debugged."

"De-bug-ed what?"

Damn it all, that was why Sonya talked like an old lady. She had slang and terms that wouldn't be used for decades in her speech pattern that occasionally popped out like that.

The youngest thief sighed and rephrased her point. "It won't be working perfectly, as in there might be problems with the manufacturing that won't show up until well after someone else boots--I mean, turns it on."

"Good point, I guess." Adrik looked as if she had gutted his hopes and dreams with her nay-saying.

Again, Cherep's tries to wring her heartstrings was better quality.

She damn well didn't want to go to Italy, so too bad.

LXXVIII (Friday the 7th of August, 1964. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet "What the hell qualifies as 'legal'?

Cherep blinked blankly at his best friend standing in his bedroom's doorway, who looked more than a little irritable over something. Probably her question continuing to be unanswered. "Uh… what?"

Eloquence, thy name was not Cherep.

"You said I had to acquire money legally, so what do you define legal as?" Sonya repeated a bit more slowly, kicking an old shirt he had been using as a rag away from her foot. At his continued blank look, she scowled and tacked on, "For the bet, you dork."

"Which bet?"

"Our bet, over my Storm polarization."

Now she sounded as if she found him a little slow. Which, to be fair, Cherep felt because that was a good point.

He never did clarify that, did he?

She had merely rejected the buying a motorcycle legally bit, not the getting money for it legally part.

The 'secret' Cloud Flame user in the household kicked out his legs, which had been cramping a little as he crouched to check the movements of the engine block that was this year's birthday gift from Dmitriy, as he thought about it. The engine was damaged and inoperable, but still serviceable as a learning tool if probably a little too low to the floor for him now.

The getting tall thing couldn't happen fast enough. Even Sonya seemed to agree, if she had once shot down his initial plans of getting a motorcycle based on his shrimp-sized height as a kid but was putting effort into it now.

Did that mean he was about tall enough for one?

Right, her current question. "Um… with a job?"

His fellow Cloud, and that was awesome they shared something as rare and as random as that Dying Will stuff, gave him a flat stare which made him a bit nervous. "In my line of work a heist is also called doing a job, genius. You really want to go with that definition?"

Cherep coughed, sheepishly grinning back at her. "Well… no. That would defeat the point."

His crooked best friend heaved a sigh at him, picking her way around his engine so she could crawl up on his bed and sprawl out while he thought.

He knew she knew what he was up to trying to get her to have a legal job, but the fact she hadn't immediately rejected the legal part gave him some hope Sonya wouldn't just be a thief for the rest of her life. It could be just that she was humoring him too, which was kind of awesome in its own way because she was still thinking of doing it just because he said something.

She hadn't tried to convince him to try for a less dangerous job herself when he made mention of his plans, just pointed out that a few different skills might help and where he could go to gain them. She did sigh exasperatedly over him and his plans to start with a circus stuntman job, but she'd be coming with him.
The least Cherep could do was return the favor of pointing out different things that might help her in the future, yes a day-job was a bit transparent but she might want a working cover a time or two so trying it out now might help, but as he'd learned in his years living in a Mafiya home… one's words didn't always mesh up to what one meant.

He'd also gotten over his instinctive flinch when something less than legal was afoot. Both his foster sisters tended to forget he wasn't just another thief when he was in the room and they started talking shop.

Which was another strange but awesome thing in a twisted Mafiya way.

Acceptance like that had been rather rare in his life up until then. It was more of the girls thinking of him as 'one of us' rather than 'that boy that lives with us but isn't one of us' they used to do thing. The lunch they had earlier was a key point for that fact.

He was pretty sure they both forgot he wasn't a crook in the weirdly working lunch thing they did with the other two boys that came by, who were apparently Tatiana's thieves and not just fellow thieves in general.

It had been cool to hear Sonya argue out of hurrying off to steal something right away.

Cherep was also rather sure they forgot he had been there, which might be part of that too.

They were used to him, of him being around. Again, awesome.

…he had some low standards, didn't he?

"For fuck's sake, Cherep. If you don't decide sometime today, I'm going to."

"I'm thinking."

"Think faster."

For a girl who probably had her brain plotted out in a book or five, which might now be part of the mass of paper that insulated the ceiling from the roof right now, his baby sister could be very impatient about getting the information she wanted.

He huffed an amused laugh and turned his wandering attention to the definition she wanted out of him.

Legal had seemed like a good word at the time. However, depending on how rigidly he set the limits Sonya could probably stall a whole lot. Under-aged workers were technically illegal, in a way.

Her fourteenth birthday was coming up next. If one couldn't get a legal job before sixteen, though probably more like eighteen, then it would be another two years before the bet would be solved in that direction.

Even if Cherep won it.

It was entirely possible he might lose it too. One in three chance to be right, otherwise he'd have to steal something for her… or was it in front of?

"Legally acquired wages, either from a job done for nothing against the law or by selling something you made yourself."

That about covered it, right?
"…this selling option. If the components are stolen before being assembled then sold as honestly as… uh, I can, does it count as legal?"

He swore she was now just questioning things to annoy him. "No."

Sonya rolled around his bed, so she could look at him fully. "If I use money I got illegally to buy the components legally, then sell it. Is that legal?"

Definitely doing it just to annoy him. "Where are you going with this?"

"Lisa got me that amateur jeweler's kit, but I swear to high hell… if I actually have to use that…"

"Yes. Yes, you do."

He probably deserved the smack to the back of his head for that one.

LXXIX (Thursday the 3rd of December, 1964. Mafia Land.)

Of course, Sinclair wouldn't be anywhere near Mafia Land the one time Sonya actually was looking for him.

One of these days, she'd get to have a word with whoever was in charge of her luck. Destiny too, whichever prick oversaw that was going to have their head meet a wall courtesy of her Bec de Corbin's hammer end.

Well… one of the weapons' end that she had, anyways.

Her search had turned up some information on the man, teenager technically at the time but a nineteen-year-old was more a young man than a teen. Renato Sinclair was a flirt of the shameless degree, tended to drink expensive wines but indulged in whisky now and again, bought bullets by the crate, and probably one of the most charming bastards to grace the island.

According to rumor, anyways.

Which, after a couple years of infrequent meetings twice a year with him, she had known already.

Hitmen weren't nearly as numerous as thieves were in Mafia Land's contract work sector, so they tended to rake up the most gossip anyways.

The day she had first met Sinclair, she had been told most of what made up his character nearly the same hour she got away from the man.

Mostly by semi-concerned thieves, most of whom were really after what she had that Renato had been interested in. A couple different hitmen had tried to chat her up to see what as well.

Which had been the other reason she had accepted the second offer of coffee from the man, just so she could take some of the irritation she had with him out on the subject of that ire.

After one full day of looking for the Inverted Sun hitman, the Russian Storm-Cloud gave up and went to pull the last contracted job she would do for the year. She'd find him when she got back, or he'd hear about her looking for him and find her himself.

As it turned out, after one rather weird job involving a jeweled dog statute of all things, Sonya found Sinclair.
Rather, he found her on his apartment building's front step.

"You are a tricky bastard to find, you know."

"Should I be concerned?" Drewled out the Sun while eyeing her warily, tucking away the surprise easily. Had she not known him somewhat, she would've missed it. "Usually I've stood a lady up on some occasion before they try to corner me, but I didn't think we had a standing date."

She rolled her eyes at his paranoia. "I want to ask you about a possible business I might have in Italy, you peacock."

"Peacock is a new pet name I've not been called yet." The tensed line of his shoulders broke though, and his left hand finally stopped trying to covertly inch to where she knew he kept a gun. Pushing a hand through his unruly black hair, he glanced from her to his apartment building. "I thought you didn't live on the island?"

"I do not."

Renato shot her a withering look for her tone. "How did you know where I live, then?"

"Thieves are good at finding a target's address too. Sometimes I have to just to know where the item that I am supposed to steal is." The thief waved a hand at the block of living quarters, which was another whole section of the island set smack dab in the middle of it at the base of the mountain they had. "This is not exactly employee only either."

"Point."

She sighed through her nose when he still hesitated. "I will buy you breakfast if you help me figure out if the Olivetti company is or is not involved with the mafia of your home country."

"The manufacturing company for calculators and the like?" Renato looked absolutely confused at her interest. "What could you be stealing from there?"

Sonya arched a challenging eyebrow at him. "Is that a yes?"

"Are you going to tell me why?"

"Only if you do help at all."

He rolled that around in his head for another moment, and she was sure he was doing so just to be difficult.

How hard would it be to bribe the same information out of another Italian on the island?

"Breakfast it is then. I feel like eating French today."

If she didn't know better, she'd swear the ass had read her mind and knew the exact moment she started thinking of bribing someone else. As her only Italian contact, or rather her only contact period, he really should be given the option of taking whatever bribe she had for information first. Hence why she was on the steps of his apartment building asking, but there were limits on the level of preference certain acquaintances got.

"I suppose you know of a good place around here that serves French cuisine?"

"Why of course, Sonya."
"Didn't get anything from the Thieves' Hall information broker, then?"

"Of course not. It was the first place I checked." Sonya informed him tartly, waving off the waiter that was hovering around her because she had abstained from ordering anything other than tea.

He shouldn't be as concerned as he was, she paid the damn bill.

"I would not be doing this if the information was so easily had."

Earl Grey this time, they didn't have Russian Black.

Renato twitched a little uneasily when the waiter she dismissed leaned a bit too far over into his personal space to pick up his empty plate, narrowly eyeing the poor, shaking young man and closely inspecting every movement he made. She wondered if he was thinking about shooting the kid, who looked terribly green and jumpy to be a seasoned staff member of a restaurant that catered to mafia hitmen and the like.

She did fully realize the irony of that statement coming from her. As a thief that started at the physical age of nine and was weeks away from her fourteenth birthday, she looked greener than the waiter did. However, after coming to terms with the irony of once dying by a crook and now living as one, she rather easily brushed that off.

"As far as I know, Olivetti is clean of any underworld dealings. My information is a little out of date, since I'm not from the region and don't keep tabs on it since it wasn't." Sinclair informed her easily enough now that he was fed, a slightly dismal look given to the French press brewed coffee he had been forced to order when he learned the espresso machine that was here was down for maintenance. "I could go and double-check for you, Sonya, if you tell me why you want to know."

Decisions, decisions.

She could, but that would probably devolve in a fishing expedition on her foster family that she didn't really want to let him know about if she didn't have to.

Hitmen generally worked on finding people with less to go on when they did a hit, she wouldn't fool herself into thinking he would never have a reason to go after her or her misfit family.

Renato Sinclair was perfectly charming to her in a bastardy kind of way, but it really was a rather superficial relationship between them at heart.

If she wanted to forget that, the fact he nearly shot her this morning when she turned up somewhere he didn't expect rather dispelled the illusion.

The Russian was the one taking a chance on him, in asking him for help like this.

"I do not wish to step on the toes of any mafia family there, as I would be a freelance thief on this job and have no help if I do."

If he didn't want the obvious reasoning, he should ask more accurate questions.

She wouldn't be aligned to anyone for the act of doing the favor because it was an internal Zolotov thing, more specifically a favor between herself and Tatiana's group as individuals and not as Mafiya thieves. Not a clan job nor a Mafia Land one, both of which came with their own protections for doing heists or jobs against different mafia factions she was abstaining from to spare Adrik the cost of hiring her through the clan's internal channels or through the island's services.

Renato's mildly annoyed expression was amusing too. He'd trapped himself though, so if he wanted their association to continue at a decent level he had to go and check for her because she did answer him.

Sonya sipped her tea and waited for his next verbal thrust.

"I suppose you would include the upper management positions and their backgrounds as part of that?"

Now he was just splitting hairs even if it was a good point, as what the company and what its CEOs do could be perfectly different in many ways.

Since he was doing the favor, she did have to give him that one for this to continue. "Not necessarily. Those are two different things on occasion."

"There will be a number of people to go through and find information on." The Sun using hitman informed her lazily, leaning back in his chair and probably very carefully deciding how to phrase the rest of his side of the conversation.

"Just the three top members, I think."

"Six in return?"

"Two. I am not asking for their life stories nor do I want to learn of it. Just if they are mafia related or not." He would be the type to go overboard and drown her in information if she annoyed him a touch too much.

He cocked his head to the side. "I can live with two."

Tatiana had better love her for this. She owed two favors to a damn Italian Mafioso.

Sonya didn't like owing people favors. There was a world of things one could do with a perfectly willing accomplice skilled in different areas, and there were another countless ways to entrap them into service using said favors for leverage.

She had gone almost five years only owing two people a favor in her Mafiya career, Dimitriy and Cherep. She managed to get the young mechanic to cancel out his, and she didn't mind owing her best friend one because he would just use it on silly things like follow him when she had already intended to.

Renato Sinclair was a different breed of beast than her fellow Mafiya brats. He'd either use his two favors to know whatever it was he wanted to know or use one for his question and hold the last in reserve for a rainy day.

Sonya rather suspected the latter, but the security would maybe be worth it on this job. She didn't know the region, or how the mafia worked in Italy, and had no way to get that information from anyone since this was an internal favor-type thing instead of an actual contract.

Mafia Land would've sent agents out to give her a few pages briefing her on what not to do and how to not offend, the Zolotovs would've sent her a vor or two for protection, but on her own? Contracting those agents herself would be more expensive than she could afford for something she wasn't sure when it would be possible to steal her target, hiring the vor herself would invite the rumors and speculation about how to hire her she didn't want to start.

Again, it was subjective when she could complete this little favor.

As a native of the country, the hitman did know what she needed to keep safe in his homeland for a stretch of time and how to not piss anyone off enough to come after her.

"I think, since we are going to be working together, you should at least address me by my first name."

Thus, why she had tried to look elsewhere before defaulting to asking the Inverted Sun user. He could be such an asshole sometimes. "Very well... Renato."

Renato's smirk could practically radiate his smugness all the way over to her side of the table. "This isn't time sensitive, is it?"

"A year or so before I would desperately need the information."

"I'll have the information before your usual time to visit next year, then."

Sonya nodded her thanks, getting up to leave with a rather unsettling feeling of foreboding hanging over her.

Why did it feel like she just sold her soul to the devil?

…shit. That arrangement wasn't self-updating if this favor for Tatiana's Adrik took more than a year or two to do.

The young thief hesitated… but kept heading for the door anyways. She'd seen more than enough of Sinclair for the damn year, and unless he used up the favors she owed him the Storm-Cloud didn't want to owe him more.

Chapter End Notes

Vory v Zakone (Singular vor, Plural vory) – Thieves-in-Law, title awarded by one's peers (like a peerage title rather than a military rank).
Baba – (Old) Woman
Devochka – Basically girl
1965 started with a bang, literally.

Sonya blinked a few times, looking to the hallway out of confusion and wondering what the hell her foster sister was up to.

Whatever it had been, it sounded painful.

…it wasn't Cherep, right?

He had that engine in his room, but she was sure he wasn't so stupid as to try starting it up while it was both in the house and not connected to anything stabilizing.

"Sonya! Come here, please?"

The young thief, because as old as she was mentally/spiritually she was physically and experience-wise a young teenager, sighed. Putting her book to the side and slipping off her bed to heed the Sun user's call. "Coming."

Unlike Sonya's room, which was a budding librarian's wet dream even after she removed the bulk of the books that migrated into her hands, or Cherep's, which still smelled like a garage even after Lisa forced him to clean it, Tatiana's room was more alike a fifteen going on sixteen-year-old girl's room in 1965.

Meaning a lot of clothes; go-go boots, hot pants, lacy camisoles, afghan knit shawls, and more scarves than there were colors in the sky cluttering certain parts. Black market vinyl records from the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, Mick Jagger, and Sonny & Cher just to name a few, stacked next to a record player on her desk. Posters of British rock bands she might or might not have records for on the walls, and her latest discovery of beaded curtains strung up behind her bedroom door.

…and the psychedelic colored bean bag chair, couldn't forget that monstrosity her sister found somewhere and dragged home.

Even if half the clutter she had was entirely out of place for a 1965 version of a USSR bedroom, since they were in the middle of a less hostile than could be Cold War, that bit still baffled the younger sister.

While Sonya would've stared at the multicolored thing that doubled as a floppy, misshapen chair normally when entering her sister's room, her attention was more drawn to the fact the redhead had seemed to have startled herself out of her bed.

Laying on the floor on her back. Staring at her left hand.

Not that she was stoned, it was because Tatiana was on fire.

Fascinating.

"You said you wanted to see the first time, right?" The older teen questioned warily, eyeing the Flames like it might just try biting her nose off even if it wasn't burning her skin. "This is really creepy, just so you know."

"Mmm."

It wasn't like the Storm-Cloud's tri-colored start.

Tatiana's inner fire was yellow all over... solidly a Sun and showing it. No flickers or a different color threaded through. Possibly the first time did show everything one had, but that would mean the redhead had no other Flame type to her.

Equally likely, the only reason Sonya's turned up in the colors it had was because she knew of them and knew it was possible.

Overall, this was pretty much inconclusive for trying to prove any theory over the other.

Well, that was Cherep and now Tatiana who had single Flames to them so far. If Dmitriy didn't turn up with a secondary Flame to him, or her foster sister didn't develop one later, she was going to start wondering how accurate her book was on other bits it had claimed.

She could easily see Dimitriy being a Rain-Storm, and if he did turn up and inform her he only had blue fire to him when he managed it then... it would still be all inconclusive.

Sonya was both running out of other people to gather information about Flames on and time to collect the data together. Once the older teen left home, that would be it for what Sun information she could get within their clan.

Unless the redheaded Sun decided to keep some sort of journal on it, but the younger thief didn't think Tatiana would do that for her. Out and about, it would be hard to both keep traveling around as much as she'd probably have to as well as write and keep a diary secure in a group containing three males and another girl.

The only thing she could learn from this incident was her theory on how fast a Flame user developed did have some effect on how they gained control. Her elder foster sister might have been the last one on the train in Dying Will Flames, but she outstripped the Rain in getting good at it.

"What were you thinking about? I was... well, pissed off myself." Sonya shrugged her slight embarrassment off when she thought of how girly her scream had been, and exactly how Arseniy had looked storming her own bedroom in response.

It was an incredibly stupid crush, she was not going to moon over the fact he did go to rescue her as if she had needed it.

It took her a few moments, but she belatedly realized Tatiana was blushing heavily.

"...nothing."

"Really?" She eyed her foster sister, especially the rather magnificent blush lighting up her fair skinned face. "It doesn't look like nothing."

"It's. Nothing." The young woman insisted stiffly, moving to pick herself up only to recall the fact her hand was on fire and jerk her left off the floor. She looked both disappointed and a little relieved to see her Flames were gone. "What...?"

"The next step is lighting up deliberately, and continually, until you end up getting a uniform result overall. Lose your will to be on fire, and it goes away." The information made her thoughtful, so she stepped farther into her sister's room to help her up off the floor. "Are you sure you don't want to tell me? I promise not to laugh."

"Liar." Tatiana snipped snootily, the mock-accusing expression faded after a moment when she was back on her feet. "Well... to be honest, I kind of don't want to leave."

The younger thief blinked blankly up at her. "Why the hell not?"

Sighing, the redhead let herself fall backwards onto her bed. "Oh, my. Lord. You might be getting better, but I swear... your incompetence when it comes to people..."

"What?"

"I don't want to leave you here for another year, alone except for Cherep. But he's a boy, and we're finally actually sisters." Pouting outrageously, only half faked as far as she could tell, the other thief peered up at her hopefully. "I end up leaving, and you might go back to being an ice block the next time we see each other."

Sonya frowned slightly. "We can always use Lisa as a point for letter exchanges until either one of us actually has a phone number. But how did that light you up?"

"I noticed you didn't address the ice block concern." The Sun shot back, getting herself comfortable on her bed again. "I was thinking about kidnapping you and making you come with me and my gang, actually."

"...no."

"It'll be fun! I promise!"

"No, Tatiana."

"...please?"

Sighing, the Storm-Cloud started rubbing at her forehead. "We'll be fine, even if we have to do a yearly get together in Mafia Land. I do not intend to give you the cold shoulder."

Pursing her lips in a pout, the redhead shrugged and picked up a magazine on the floor to read. "That sounds like a good idea, actually."

Eyeing her foster sister, the younger thief decided she was being derailed from the question. Tatiana didn't want to answer, and there was little Sonya could do to make her.

She wasn't going to do anything but annoy the Sun if she kept asking, so she left it at that.

LXXXII (Monday the 22nd of February, 1965. Arseniy & Lisa’s home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Since Sonya's usual times to visit Mafia Land was around late spring/early summer and once again near the tail end of fall, she had a decent amount of time to waste before Sinclair would be getting back to her on what she asked of him.

Renato, before Renato would be getting back to her.
She had to correct that in her head, or she'd slip up and continue to call the asshole Sinclair. It would be both frightfully rude, since he was doing her a favor in a place she had no good contacts or personal desire to be there, and rather petty of her.

Not that being petty would've stopped her, but she did occasionally like talking to the bastard.

They might have met when she had been twelve, but it hadn't stopped him from talking to her rather than at.

Of course, her physically tender age hadn't stopped him from drinking in front of her, flirting with just about every female that walked past them, or annoying her with just being himself. If she hadn't been as mature as she was, he could've been an incredibly bad influence on her.

While she waited, she got to see Lisa attempt to cram everything even remotely educational that any thief might find they needed into Tatiana's head. She and Cherep caught a little of that themselves, but the bulk of the attention was on the Sun's head.

The redhead didn't complain nearly as much as her foster sister expected, probably out of nerves over the idea of leaving what had been home for the first time.

The safecracker wouldn't be coming back after a week or two, or after a job was done and over. She'd be going out to first set up someplace for a home base, then to operate on her own in free territory or some other Mafiya groups'. How well she succeeded would either enable her and her gang to range farther and get into other jobs or drive her back to the clan's headquarters, but that was only if she did fail to get a foothold somewhere.

The only way the eldest of the foster siblings would be coming back was if she was here to visit or to live somewhere in the neighborhood herself.

Sonya guessed she did have a reason to be so panicky, even if she privately doubted the older girl would do badly out on her own. That was the point of having a gang, to help smooth the way and share the workload.

The bang of the backdoor slamming against the wall distracted all the members of the house.

Tatiana thankfully shut the math book, Cherep hiked up the chemistry one he was deciphering, and Sonya watched idly over the top of her history text.

"They sold it!"

Even Lisa was confused over that as a greeting. "What?"

Adrik skidded into the living room, giving an awkward shrug and a sheepish grin at the older woman's reproving look for his haste. "The Olivetti Company, they sold their electronics division."

The Storm-Cloud in the room set her book down slowly. For the love of fuck… if she had bartered with Sinclair for no reason she was going to kill someone. "Excuse you?"

"They were the ones developing the computer, the division sold I mean." Breathing rather hard, probably from running from wherever he had been to Tatiana the moment he heard the news, the cutpurse slunk into a seat next to his leader. "To General Electric, in America."

Hopefully, that would mean the younger thief could avoid Italy… but damn it all, that meant she hadn't had to ask Renato to check the company out.
Sonya sighed and rubbed her temple. "Then I'd have to steal you this computer thing in the US, right?"

"I… don't actually know." Adrik scratched the back of his head sheepishly. "It's so… well… such a new concept that it might still be with the company, and not with who they sold their branch off to. Depending on which it is, you might still have to go to Italy."

"You don't know?" She gave him a rather poisonous look. "Well then, go find out. This is your little baby project, I'm just stealing it when the time comes."

The young man flinched a little under her eyes, flicking his gaze to his gang leader but finding no help from that quarter either.

"You heard her, off you go." Tatiana waved him off, eyeing her own textbook as if it might grow some strange appendage and attack her. "She's already doing a lot for us, and this is what you wanted."

Adrik muttered something that, by the look Cherep shot him, he was lucky neither sister heard. He did obediently get up to leave. "I'll come back if there's any more news."

"Please and thanks." The younger thief muttered herself, thinking rather fondly of impaling him on her polearms.

"Sonya?" The Sun peered over at her curiously, probably trying to stall off another lesson session if she could. "Something the matter?"

"I made arrangements to have the company checked out while I was in Mafia Land last, and he might have just told me it hadn't needed to be done." Sighing, the Storm-Cloud shut her history book as well and set it on the floor of the living room. "If I don't have to go to Italy, I might have just bartered away a favor for no reason. I'm a little… irritated."

Lisa considered it, humming softly. "With who?"

"A… Italian Mafioso I know from doing my contract work." Sonya temporized, not willing to tell her entire foster family she knew and was dealing with a hitman.

Cherep was doing incredibly well as it was, but they were all mostly thieves. The vor he might not get were murderers before they became one, but there wasn't any way to fudge the fact a hitman killed for a living.

Even he knew what the term 'hit' meant in the underworld. It was ridiculously romanticized in the civilian world.

Stealing was markedly different than murder.

"Well… live and learn." The older woman shrugged. "Not everything is set in stone, and occasionally things like that happen. I hope it wasn't too dear of a price."

"…no. Not really. He's a bit of an ass, but he only asked that I addressed him by name."

…so far, at least.
Sonya had not actually equated her ability to Propagate force with being able to jump high on her own.

It was one of those things that started with an absolutely idle and banal comment that segued into something either remarkable or foolish… or both.

Cherep was fantastically good with basic mathematics. It was something he hadn't known before Lisa started to get his schooling up to par, and the young man was absorbed with engineering which just made it all the better when he started devouring math textbooks like she did everything else ever written.

That meant he got to physics and theoretical mathematics when his baby sister was still trying to make sense out of basic trigonometry again and why the hell she had to know it. Tatiana was even lagging behind their purple haired foster brother, and she had gotten to physics long before him.

It was in his physics books he showed her, that 'lift' was the application of force that exceeded the weight of an object dragging it down and the wind resistance. He was pretty sure she'd be able to get some height before her lack of wings brought her back to earth.

Sonya, rather pointedly, informed him that since humans weren't made to fly she'd keep her feet on the ground… thank you very much.

Cherep called her a chicken.

The incident didn't get any better from there.

Now… the Storm-Cloud was a little stuck. On their roof.

In broad daylight.

While she could… possibly… make it from their home's roof to a neighboring one, and thus find a way down that might not shatter her legs trying, someone would see and/or hear her.

Complete coin toss on who would spot her first, a civilian or a Mafiya member of the residential area.

The home they lived in was two stories, four bedroom, two baths, and a basement type affair. Three stories if you counted the attic space. It was also built like it had once been a barn.

Meaning it had a peaked roof, but sloping sides.

Sonya was stuck on the back of it, pretty much in full view of the backyard, from their neighbors' backyards, and maybe the windows of the house behind theirs. Cherep was being of no help at all, he was laughing a bit too hard to be able to breathe right.

She hoped he choked, it was a little uncomfortable sitting up here in early springtime.

His hilarity eventually drew notice, thankfully, from the other members of their home. Lisa stepped out herself to see what in the world amused him so much, and eventually caught sight of the youngest and her predicament.

The brunette, entirely unflappable even in the face of the weirdest incidents and always ready with support, simply smiled up at the thief stuck on their roof. "Need a little help?"
"…I didn't quite think this through well enough."

"No, it seems not." She eyed the distance, then spared a glance at her middle child. "Alright there, kiddo?"

"My… ribs… ha!"

"Alright then." Lisa wandered inside, probably to find a rope or ladder that would span the distance needed.

"I'm going to kick you in your damn ribs when I get down from here."

He spluttered, trying to stop laughing at her but being completely unable to.

Sonya sighed heavily, huddling a bit further into her probably way too thin coat.

It wasn't entirely his fault, she had contributed a fair bit into this little experiment. Neither of them had thought of getting down, only to figure out how high she could go alone. Figuring out how to apply her multiplied force into a downward direction had been a little tricky, during a few bounces of irregular height that told them Cherep had been onto something.

It hadn't been until Sonya foolishly tried to see how high she could go that she noted she might not do as well on the landing as she had been doing on the initial jumps. Hence her scramble for the roof, which at least wouldn't break her legs or at the very least twist an ankle on the impact.

She could manage a story worth of height on a drop as it was, maybe another half that on top. Two or three stories would hurt, especially if she hadn't been prepared to try and mitigate the damage.

If she didn't have the grace and flexibility nearly a decade of ballet and gymnastic training had given her, it was entirely possible she would've failed to grab hold of the roof and get herself somewhere stable.

While she could go up, getting down seemed to be her problem. If she ever did this again, a rooftop with a fire escape would be a preferable feature. At least, maybe some way to equal out the force down that would refrain from blowing out her knees if she wasn't careful on landing.

Nice to know, and it might just be a bit of talent that would save her down the line.

It would not excuse her supposed best friend of laughing at her when she got stuck.

Lisa came back outside with a rope and a simple grappling hook in hands, a whirl or three and the clawed metal went flying at her.

Catching it, Sonya hooked it to the weather vane a little higher up than she was sitting.

"Are you sure that's going to work?"

"Might not, but at least I'd be lower than I am now when I drop." She tugged the line a few times, once viciously, and swung herself off the side of the roof.

It groaned suspiciously, and bent a little under her no longer inconsiderable weight, but the young thief touched ground with it still upright.

Mostly.

Sonya gave the rope to Lisa, so she could try to unhook the grapple, and stalked over to her foster
"Oh, Cherep… hold still…"

LXXXIV (Monday the 29th of March, 1965. Mafia Land.)

"Olivetti is clean of any mafia involvement. Only shifty thing of note there seems to be a bit of sly misnaming."

Sonya pushed a cup of espresso closer to the hitman, silent offer for the drink she pre-ordered him and the waitress just dropped off when he reached the café. "Misnaming? This wouldn't have to do with the selling of a division to General Electric in the US, would it?"

Renato picked up one of the silver spoons that had come with her cup of tea, cleaning it off with a napkin then dipping it into the drink just to check for poison before taking possession of it. "Yes. So, you heard then?"

"It was fairly annoying to hear of." She wouldn't ever take another of these jobs ever again if she could help it. Brand new, fresh off the line, whatever, no more. "Would this misnaming have anything to do with the team in charge of the Programma 101 they were developing?"

"As a matter of fact, yes." He eyed her over the rim of his cup. "Will you now tell me why?"

"A favor, for someone rather dear to me. I am to steal one of those newly developed, overly glorified calculators. In return, I will be taught to use one myself." Her expression probably told him what she thought of that, being as it was merely a calculator no matter what functions it had. "If said someone had not asked, I would not have touched this job with such an unclear target objective."

"So, you will go all the way to Italia for this someone?"

"Likely sometime this summer, yes. Possibly only to check on the situation and ensure the terms of this job are as required." The Russian sighed lightly, blowing softly over the top of her drink. "So, one, at worst two, visits to Italy this year… alas."

The Italian across from her looked, frankly, insulted. "What is wrong with Italia?"

"Besides being the home of one of the largest and strongest mafia Famiglia in the world, which I do not wish to become known to if they take offense of a Russian thief on their home ground?"

His affronted expression melted into an amused mocking one, saluting her with his cup. "Well… yes. Point to you, little lady Sonya."

She rolled her eyes at him, setting her tea down. "Really, Renato. There is also all that nastiness left over in the underworld from the Second World War, as well. I do not think I heard if that had been resolved or not."

Humming instead of answering that concern Renato stretched out his lanky frame, so he was practically draped over his spindly café chair.

Since he had decided to stop being helpful, Sonya busied herself with her own drink again. She had two heists she had accepted to plan out, having taken twice the number of contracts she had been doing just to see if she could merely add a visit in the summer to her yearly habits or if she'd be better off trying for the ten contracts for an apartment deal offered.

The thief needed that storage space, especially if she wanted to keep her books. Getting an apartment could wait another year or two.

Thankfully they were close enough together she might just be able to do one after the other, but they also weren't as... 'sanitized', as she had been doing.

Meaning if she got caught, she'd be dead and not just arrested.

Civilian targeting contracts were all pretty much milk runs, really. She had been using them to get used to taking contracts and being forced to plan little while traveling to them but being this was Mafia Land it meant there were very few of those to be had. She'd been lucky enough to get the two years' worth she had as it was.

This would be slightly different, in that her first mafia orientated target would be first up. They wouldn't be nearly as loose or easy in terms of internal security, or even as easily infiltrated as a civilian business or home.

It was likely she'd never get hold of a blueprint for these either.

"Anything interesting?"

"Not likely. They never seem to like giving me actually interesting jobs to do."

She caught the dismissive look he shot her paperwork. "Think you might find a different Hall more to your liking?"

"Like the intel brokers, you mean?"

Renato snorted disgustedly, which made her smirk.

Aside the Thieves' Hall, which was right across the street from the hitmen's version of it, there was also an office building for those that traded intelligence and another for the international network of fences on the same street. Farther down one end there was even an assassin's' watering hole, which usually only took the contracts the hitmen didn't. Down the other and across a street was a rather large bar/hotel that freelance 'made men' tended to frequent if they were unaffiliated and looking for a group to join.

The street was called 'Body Avenue', a play on both the fact you could hire just about any crook there or get someone killed... if you paid.

Since they both did work on the same street, technically, it helped explained why Sonya saw Renato every time she got into Mafia Land herself if not why they didn't tend to miss each other more frequently.

Even if they were all located on the same street, it didn't mean they all got along.

Most of the rest of Body Avenue viewed the hostel/bar/hotel for the unaffiliated as best thugs, grunts, and maybe a bullet catcher or two. They, in return, disliked just about everyone that sold their skills instead of finding someone to direct their loyalty to and having them make use of their skills.

The fences might work with the intel brokers but tended to get along better with thieves since they did supply them with more items to sell. The intel brokers preferred hitmen, because thieves were apparently a bit overly picky with the quality of information they got. The hitmen apparently didn't really get along with anyone, especially not the assassins that lingered farther down the street.

Sonya was in and out of Mafia Land too much to get a good feel of her fellow thieves and what they liked, but it seemed as if they dealt with assassins better. Why she didn't know, just that she was unusual for her continued association with Renato.

LXXXV (Wednesday the 19th of May, 1965. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Once her doubled up contract work was over with, Sonya decided she might just be better off taking a season and trying to cram five contracts within three or four months.

If the jobs were at least lined up, so she wouldn't have to go too far out of her way back or forth, she'd be able to manage her Mafia Land job and following Cherep around the Continent.

Only taking a winter or winter-spring break to handle the rest of her work, at worst merely half a year at once away from keeping an eye on her best friend. If she did it, the whole thing could only be called a brief crime spree streak.

She'd try that next year, during the summer. If it worked, she had the next five to ten years of her life scheduled out already barring anything unexpected. Hopefully that would be for only long enough for her fellow Cloud to decide how the hell he was going to go about being a stuntman outside of a circus.

That part concerned her a touch, to be honest.

Stuntmen were not an injury-free group of people.

Sonya stopped in the middle of a sidewalk, wondered if her foster brother actually knew how to drive yet, and swore viciously in her head as she turned around to go home.

She had been driven out, mainly due to Tatiana's nerves sparking a bit of a competition between her and the purple want-to-be stuntman.

The redheaded Sun user had decided to try and recruit her little sister into her gang, so the sisters wouldn't have to be apart... or for their relationship to deteriorate any. Cherep had overheard one such attempt, made a rather stupid comment of getting there first so she would be tagging along after him, and thus why she got out of the house most days.

…and they called her socially incompetent.

The time away had at least allowed her the time to investigate and control her Cloud patrolling nature and decide that it wasn't crime that irritated her but stupidity happening.

Only perk so far, really.

She was at least mostly sure the tension at home was all in good fun, just a little more sibling rivalry than they ever really had to deal with before. Tatiana got a distraction, Cherep got to brag a little, and Sonya was... annoyed.

The young teen didn't even get halfway home before her best friend managed to track her down instead. That was a usual enough situation that she gave him her attention instead of asking if he had been taught to drive yet.

Him seizing her by the wrist and dragging her along confused her, she had thought he was out of this habit, until well after they arrived at one of the fairgrounds near the edge of Moscow and she saw a specific sign.

It was an advertisement for a motorcycle race, the prize being the very motorcycle the winner won on.

The Storm-Cloud supposed that answered if he ever learned how to drive. If he was this excited over the prospect of winning one of those deathtrap machines, obviously he had some experience to tell by. Enough to think he might win against someone that drove one for a living.

"I suppose there is a reason for this…?"

"I can afford the entrance fee." He came to a stop right up next to the sign-up booth, flashing her a bright, eager grin. "So, I'm going to try. Thing is, our bet was for one."

"…yes? However. One, we don't know who won that yet and two, it's mostly just for the funds to buy one."

"Which means if I win, we may need to change my stipulations on the bet."

Sonya narrowed her eyes on him. "You want to renegotiate your end."

"…maybe?" Cherep tacked on, flashed her another boyishly bright grin. "I might want a different motorcycle in a few years. So only if I win. Erm… in both cases, actually."

She looked at him, at the racetrack set up, and then at the crowd. "And why am I here, again?"

"Moral support?" He didn't have the genetics to sprout a lot of facial hair, meaning he generally got away with not shaving every day. The stubble when he forgot still seemed to itch, given how often he would scratch at it. "Please?"

"Are you nervous? You've only been wanting one for five-six years now." She rolled her eyes at the sheepish twitch of his features, running a hand through shoulder-length blonde hair to keep it out of her eyes in the wind. "Go win yourself an ear-breaking deathtrap, you dork. We'll talk later, after you decide what you want."

When he ran off to sign himself up, she took steps to ensure she had a good view of both the finish line and the bulk of the track.

Sonya, very firmly, put her hands over her ears and resolved to buy her friend a helmet for his birthday.

She spent most of the race despairing over the likely fate of her hearing.

LXXXVI (Wednesday the 19th of May, 1965 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana's expression could only really be called pained. "It's… very loud."
"I know." Sonya informed her flatly.

Cherep won himself a motorcycle. A red and black 1965 Planeta 350, built by the Izhevsk Machine Building Plant.

Problem was, they were thieves. Safecracking was just one reason why a good thief needed equally good hearing, and loud machinery like that did not help them there.

She was now nursing a headache, too. "I think… he can make it quieter."

The foster sisters had taken refuge in the house, since it seemed as if the ear-breaking noisemaker would not be shutting off until their foster brother got over his glee at winning it.

"Isn't that against the point of a motorcycle?" The redhead questioned lightly, stretching her long limbs out on the couch. "I mean, he has been looking forward to this for… how long, again?"

Her younger sister sighed heavily, sprawling herself out on the safecracker's legs in revenge for crowding her out of her little corner. "Way too damn long, honestly."

She'd be a little concerned for her spot as Cherep's best friend, if said best friend didn't already look a little in absolute love with his metal bike. Lover was entirely a spot the damn motorcycle could occupy, as far as she was concerned.

A little disturbing, but all the bloody bike's.

"So now you're slumming it with me, I feel so special." Tatiana mocked lightly, jostling her legs and by association Sonya's ribs. "Now what are you going to do? I'm going, Cherep's got a way to leave himself, and that just leaves you now."

"Probably leave sometime after you finally go."

Sighing a bit herself, the redhead pulled herself upright. "Yeah… about that. We're leaving in two weeks."

"Already?"

"No point in lingering. I'll be back for your birthday, and consequently Christmas, but that's really only to handle my gang's clan dues for the next two years." The Sun's usually cheerful mien faded a little, and the young woman quirked a wry smirk for her little sister. "This time next year, we may not even be in the USSR anymore."

Sonya blinked up at her, thinking.

It was going to be odd to be living at home with Tatiana gone. Ten years living in close quarters with each other, while it hadn't exactly started out well… she at least like to think the older girl was a very good friend now.

"Suppose I'm just waiting on Cherep to leave for good myself. Poor Arseniy. He's going to have to deal with Lisa after we're all gone, and she gets mopey over the empty house."

The confident young woman that grew out of that jealous little girl she met long ago scratched at her cheek, pursing her lips and making a show of thinking hard. "You want to… do Christmas every year? Here, I mean? I don't exactly want to never look back, this place was a lot of fun while we were growing up."
"I don't think we can manage that right away... but in a couple years I wouldn't mind trying." She gave the older teenager a smirk of her own. "I promise to drag Cherep back with me."

She barked a laugh, tugging her legs free to sit up fully. "I'll hold you to that. I also finished what I could of your little handbook for Dying Will Sun Flame users, it's on your desk along with the rest of the possible Sun gems I've never got to work for me. Keeping a couple of the heliodor crystals for myself."

The younger thief sighed again, drawing a hand down her face. "Alright. I suppose I should go see what Dmitriy managed on his end and write that all up, shouldn't I?"

"Might be a good idea to get that one out of the way." Tatiana nodded, rising to her full height and stretching out again. As if she hadn't gotten more than her own fair share of space on the couch.

"I reserve the right to ask questions like an annoying brat when I want to."

"Noted. It's not like you hold off on that as it is."

Sonya rolled her eyes, finally moving to get upright herself. "I'm going to write out a full copy of all that I've got for you to keep. I'm leaving the jewels here, under Arseniy's control, but... well... it seems as if when there is one Dying Will Flame user there is another somewhere nearby. So, you might want to have a quick reference if you find someone else."

Like Galina, because it was entirely possible the other female thief was a Lighting user without the active Flames.

"How many of those do you intend to write?"

"...five. One for our clan to keep, one for Arseniy, one for you, one for me, and one more just in case."

Her wrist was already hurting just thinking about it, and while that extra one wasn't entirely needed it was best to have extra than not enough. She had already learned that over the gemstone issue. Dmitriy could keep it for now.

The stripped copies would remain with their respective array of gems, being as the Storm-Cloud wondered what parts of Dying Will Flame knowledge was true and which ones were merely assumptions propagated by rumor. Not everything written in books was true, and she'd been disproving a few things already in her best book on Flame users as it was.

She couldn't objectively look at herself anyways. Best to leave it to those that hadn't been opinionated and biased a little beforehand.

"Well you best get cracking on that. I've got to go pack up my room."

"...what in hell are you going to do with that beanbag?"

"You mean you don't want it?"

She stared at Tatiana, shook her head, and climbed the stairs ahead of her.

"Hey! What's wrong with my beanbag chair?"

"The fact you're colorblind."
Gleefully abandoning Tatiana to managing her mass of clothing just as the Sun had done to her and her books some years ago, Sonya instead worked on making clean and full copies of her research on Dying Will Flames.

Her wrist ached even before she put pen to paper, but with a lack of a typewriter in the house she was forced to do everything by hand.

The younger thief carefully copied out her work of simplifying the Flame types and how to identify them by personality alone, wrote in the little she had on Skies and left twice the amount of space blank as she had for their application and nature since she didn't know much of anything on them.

Same for Sun and Rain, adding Tatiana's own work in after the little Sonya had done and what Dmitriy had learned over the years in their respective sections and skipping space for the polarized opposites.

Then she got to the Storm section.

To be brutally honest, she had not managed much with her Storm Flames as she had with her Cloud one.

The best she could do was atomize things... everything her Flame touched. Even if she hadn't wanted everything to begin flaking away under her red fire, her Storm was virulent enough to eat everything anyways.

She had started with a wooden board, at first. Trying to carve into it, or strip it bit by bit. Instead the board Disintegrated almost immediately, and successive experimentation hadn't improved that to any manageable degree.

Painting one of her practice pieces hadn't helped, it Disintegrated just as easily as an unpainted one.

Sandwiching a wooden board between two others didn't change anything, her Storm ate through all of it. Had she not been holding the testing materials in one hand, it might have tried eating away the ground too.

Getting her hands on stone slabs and then putting a wooden board between them resulted similarly to her earlier tries.

There seemed to be nothing Storm Flames wouldn't eat away at a steady or fast rate, other than the Flame user that called them forth. Even Sonya's clothing hadn't withstood the ability, though thankfully she only lost a coat to her inner fire rather than the very shirt off her back.

She hadn't tried one of her Flame resistant Bec de Corbins yet, and probably wouldn't at this rate. Not even one of the four new tungsten ones she got commissioned last year at a small local jewelry store and picked up this one for testing.

The Storm-Cloud gratefully liked buying jewelry more than stealing them, and those had to be custom ordered as miniaturized weapons of war 'display pieces' weren't a popular style.

While her Storm Flames were still useful even in an uncontrolled state, it wasn't exactly something she'd be able to use on the sly. It was more like the very last option, if her own will and Cloud-imbued strength failed she could always melt things from reality instead.

The best result with them, that she ever got no matter what she tried to do, was with a pointed crystal of red tourmaline. Even if Sonya could summon her Flames without a stone needed to focus them for her, the tourmaline cut into a teardrop shape worked almost as a laser pointer instead of as a wash of Disintegration fire that ate everything.

That didn't mean to say the Storm Flames didn't eventually eat everything anyways, but it started slowly and from only one point at all.

She went back to the store that did her tungsten Bec de Corbins and asked they cut a crystal she supplied in the shape of a slim skeleton key. That had been way too amusing to give a miss to, and if she managed to figure out how not to overly power Storm Flames in the future her red crystal key would work as a master key to everything.

By melting the internal workings of any lock, but the point stood.

Even if she couldn't manage that in the future, the delivery of Storm Flames into the mechanics of a lock would allow her to open doors or lids before it Disintegrated. Both the container/door itself and whatever/whoever was behind it.

The only problem was that she wouldn't be able to use that key in anything but a dire emergency or within mafia held territory.

Something Disintegrating without apparent cause other than red fire in front of a civilian would give rise to a panic that she wouldn't be able to stop. In the unlikely event such a civilian kept his or her head and tried to investigate how and why, the lack of physical agents apparent to cause such a thing would either incite the same kind of panic or trip some poor civilian onto the existence of spiritual Flames of the Sky without mafia involvement to keep it quiet.

Same reason why she didn't copy fakes with Cloud Flames to help cover her tracks, other than the point of it taking time and power she didn't usually have to spare. If one winked out of existence at an ill-advised moment, like say when someone was filming it due to whatever reason… the obvious lack of how could likely give police agencies around the world a clue to several other incidents that probably traced back to Mists and a few other unwary Flame users that got caught in bad situations.

She might use that if she was dealing with other mafia people, but not something she'd ever do when just out stealing from civilians.

Sonya didn't want a visit from the Vindice. She had only heard rumors so far, only when in Mafia Land, about them appearing when Omertà was breached or the concords between major groups was violated and it risked large-scale turf wars happening. Knowing what and who they were once made her not want to meet one, or touch that situation with a ten-foot-pole.

She grudgingly added in the very little she found out about Storm Flames, then pointedly turned the pages to start in on Lightning users and their quirks.

That one she knew Tatiana might need, so she was especially careful in copying that down.

LXXXVIII (Thursday the 3rd of June, 1965. Ivrea, Italian Republic.)

Sonya didn't like doing goodbyes.
Instead, she followed Tatiana's group out to the first leg of their journey. The Sun's gang would be lurking around the southern edge of the USSR for her first few months on their own, close enough for getting help in an emergency but far enough away not to suggest they were Zolotov members on the hunt.

She also handed over the full result of her Dying Will Flame research on all of them, which had more holes in it than she liked but was also comprised of everything they had compiled and sought out together. Before she left them to it, the Storm-Cloud did inform her foster sister that she could be reached by sending a letter to Mafia Land in care of the Thieves' Hall.

Once the sisters broke off, Sonya headed further out.

Italy awaited her, especially if she was going to clear off the favor she was doing Adrik sometime this century.

Olivetti was headquartered in Ivrea, province of Turin, in the Piedmont region of northwestern Italy. It was at least far enough into the mainland part of the country the thief could take the train lines the entire way and not have to switch to a ship or ferry to finish her traveling faster.

The basin the town thrived in did have a fair share of lakes dotted around it, but as this was business related and not just traveling for the sake of it, the thief ignored that.

Roberto Olivetti, who had left his namesake company late last year, had been the one that suggested a table-top computer about three years ago. From all reports that Adrik managed to learn of and was confirmed by Renato, while the electric division of the company was now in General Electric's hands the team that developed the idea for him into a working project did something tricky.

They changed their project's definition from 'computer' to 'calculator', because no matter the memory it had for all of eight calculations it was still a computing number machine. Renaming the project spared them from being sold, and part of the mechanical division of the Olivetti company.

Thus the 'computer' was still in Italy under Olivetti, technically.

Sonya had last heard some conflicting reports on whether the computer would still be marketed. Which confused her, because computers would become something greater from this clunky beginning. It might just be confusing because she knew what kind of fire it would light under other companies, but if a company had done all that developing then why were they waffling over the decision to start selling it?

Her first order of business would be to find out what the bloody hell was going on, then if she could steal one of the damn things here or not.

Which, as an obviously blonde-haired Barbie doll from the inner Soviet Union, would be harder than just asking around. Thankfully the country was in the middle of the Italian economic miracle, meaning that while she stuck out like a sore thumb among the dark haired and mostly tanned natives they wouldn't be necessarily automatically hostile to her.

The only major problem was that she didn’t speak fluent Italian. Hers was broken, barely enough to speak simple things, read a slight bit more, and maybe ask for basic help.

She hadn't been able to devote a lot of time to learning it between traveling around and stealing.

She did wonder if Renato would mind helping her out a little on that. Native speaker as he was, he was the best to teach it to another.
...on the other hand, he was an Inverted/Soft Sun. Those Dying Will Flame users and the word 'help' didn't go together well for the student.

Sonya sighed again, put her 'Russian to Italian' dictionary into her luggage, and waited for the train to finally pull into her station.

For the time being, she was pretending to be a backpacker. Foreign, but also notable as such. She'd ditch the ruse and her 'backpack' in a hotel or hostel somewhere, then sneak her way to the Olivetti company's manufactory to scout it out once night fell.

If she did do a bit of theft, the fact whoever saw her knew she went into her room or apartment alone and didn't use the door to leave again would supply her with some cover. Even if she got caught sneaking around.

With some time to kill, the Russian played tourist. She found the bed and breakfast she'd be using, the Olivetti Company factory, a castle, a cathedral, and that was as far as she got before she found a library.

A capitular library of religious books, but it did distract her for a good few hours. Not letting herself walk out brazenly with a tome or scroll had been hard, but religious books were something she had to draw a line at.

There had to be one somewhere, or Sonya really would have a serious addiction problem with the written word.

Having killed her mood to go sightseeing, not even seeing the cool and high bridge on the edge of town made it better, she checked into the bed and breakfast using her broken Italian and a large number of euros.

Which the nice elderly lady pressed back on her, only taking as much as the price for a night when the thief double checked why.

Then, after spending enough time until dark fall brushing up on her Italian with her host in the vain hope it would help her at least a little, she went hunting for answers.

She had to resort to copying down whole reports and notes, then hightailing it back to her room over the course of three nights to make sense of what she got. At least the elderly couple that ran the bed and breakfast were nice about her taking up their extra room for four days.

They even helped her practice her Italian even more than just the basics, laboring under the mistaken impression she was looking for a good city to find a man and settle down in.

Days of painstaking translations, four major errors that she had to go back to correct, and three nearly incomprehensible pages of notes later, and the Russian Storm-Cloud finally knew what was going on.

The project lead, one Pier Giorgio Perotto, had gotten fed up with the stalling his company was doing on his project and would be traveling to the 1964-65 New York World Fair in order to first show off then sell the Programma 101 to the public. With or without his company's permission.

She would only have to wait until October, and she could avoid stealing in Italy entirely.

Vongola's reach spread farther than the region their 'Iron Fort' resided within, which it seemed as if no one outside of Italian mafia, the Famiglia itself or their allies knew where it was, but the 'rules' laid down by them was enforced widely enough to be… suggestive.
Instead of risking more that she could know of before she trod on someone else's territory, it was time to plan a visit to the good 'ol US of A.

LXXXIX (Tuesday the 3rd of August, 1965. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Again?" Cherep protested from her bedroom's doorway. "You just got back."

Sonya paused in her repacking, because he had a point.

After clearing up the situation in Italy with the first-generation computer design, she had gone southwest to a port town to hitch a ride to Mafia Land. One-month round trip later to handle her third heist of the year, the thief had returned to Moscow to resupply for a trip to and from America via the Mafia Land smuggling routes.

Once she stole the Programma 101, it would have to be shipped to Arseniy's care using the same route until Adrik could pick it up while she went back to Mafia Land herself and finished the last two heists she would do this year alone. That would take her right to the end of the year, and she was probably only just home long enough for her brother's birthday, so she had planned on gifting him a damn helmet before she left again.

Maybe a month or two of rest, of which her own fifteenth birthday and Christmas were included in, then she'd have to start next year's rounds of heists to keep the storage unit she would be packing up her wealth of books within until she had a permanent home.

"Well… yes." She considered her best friend closely. "Hey… Cherep?"

He gave her an inquiring wet-kitty look, which really didn't work like it had when he'd been nine anymore.

"Want to come to America with me? I'm going to the World Fair, mainly to steal something… but I think we might be able to fit in some sightseeing for a week or so."

Cherep's expression as he floundered between hesitant, not wanting to be involved on one of her jobs, and excited, wanting to go just because sounded interesting, was fascinating to watch.

Sonya really should have thought of this before. Tatiana being gone left a rather big hole in the house, much worse than the week-long absences they were used to when she went off with her gang for either practice or minor jobs. With her bouncing in and out so much this year, that left Cherep home alone with Lisa and Arseniy.

There was little for him to do in the neighborhood without his sisters around, besides learn the ins and outs of his Russian made motorcycle and maybe visit Dmitriy once or twice a month.

She already knew he continued to fail to go to Aleksandr's without her and Ziven had spilled the beans of how he got typically treated when she wasn't around, so she didn't greatly mind anymore.

Besides, the two of them should at least get used to traveling together.

There would be a lot of it between next year's end and whenever it was she got fed up with it and demanded him to buy a house for them to use as a home base. They had done a small bit on Cherep's first visit to Mafia Land, but that had been under 'adult supervision' and had Tatiana as a distraction.
Speaking of…

"If you want to come with, grab whatever you would need for a month and shove it somewhere portable." She informed him, returning her attention to folding her newly laundered traveling clothes. "And your paperwork, all of it."

America was currently in the middle of fighting in the Vietnamese war, and there was a draft in place. She did recall that much at least. He would need to prove he wasn't a citizen probably regularly, even if a World Fair would be attracting a lot of foreign attention from all corners of the world.

Vietnam was not something she even wanted to touch until well after the last of the chemical warfare was over and done with. Napalm and Agent Orange were just two things she didn't ever want to know if her foster brother could survive contact with.

That was part of her drive to leave the USSR herself, her biological home country was getting into some questionable nuclear testing and she couldn't recall if asbestos was a problem over here just like it would become in the States.

The Storm-Cloud didn't really care if the nuclear testing over here were supposedly for 'peaceful' purposes. She was damn sure the lake made by one such attempt, Lake Chagan, was now radioactive and would be for years.

One of the things she could clearly recall was that one of the cities would become just as hot as that lake, or it might have been region, but the point was the same.

She'd like to go somewhere safer, thank you very much.

"How… long are you planning on being there?" Cherep sounded a bit off, and a glance at his face didn't help her figure out why.

"All I know is that my target will be there in October, which could mean any part of the month." Sonya tucked the traveling hygiene supplies away into their own pocket, musing on the fact she seemed to live out of her luggage on a regular basis. "So, at best maybe a week at worst the entire month of October."

He ran his hand through his shaggy but short purple hair, considering it. "That's the New York one, right? The one that was implemented even if they didn't have permission for it?"

"Yes, which means it might not be all that great but it will be different enough to us so we'll not care much."

"Think there will be anything on mechanics or engineering there?"

"Its theme is influenced by the space race and the industry heavy culture over there." She informed him, shutting her luggage closed to check it would. "Might be."

"Like… maybe Harley Davidson?"

Cherep and his damn motorcycles. She shot him a narrow look over one shoulder. "Probably."

"Well," the absolute, utter brat informed her with a smirk, "we never did fix the terms of our bet, and you may just still owe me a motorcycle."

"If you're coming with me, go pack already."
Lisa had given them an entirely knowing and accepting smirk when they announced Cherep would be going with Sonya to America, so the older couple had the house to themselves for the first time in a decade.

It had been a touch sad, which made the younger woman weakly echo it.

The thief was mostly living on the road now, she had spent less than half the year in Moscow and wouldn't really be going directly back with her brother after they were done in the US. She had two more heists to do this year for Mafia Land, to get a storage locker/unit they would shove her books and what little Tatiana decided to keep herself next year.

She might be able to take Christmas, and consequently her birthday, off. Then she had to start managing the last of her loose ends in Moscow, like her father.

Next year was also the year she'd be leaving home for good, once her fellow Cloud picked a semi-decent circus to join. He had found a couple, but after she poked into it she hadn't liked a few of the rumors that persisted among the respective members of the groups about their experiences on the very edges of the Soviet Union.

It seemed as if Lisa already knew Sonya was half gone already, merely waiting on her best friend even if those plans hadn't been stated as much to them in so many words.

Arseniy had given her an incredibly awkward hug when he saw them off at the train station himself, which… again, touching but awkward. There was also a small fact of a childhood crush she still had the lingering remnants of, which didn't really help the situation nor Cherep’s curiosity at all.

She seriously wondered what they would do after she was gone, as it didn't look like either would be taking on more foster kids to raise. Even if there were new Mafiya brats in with Tatiana's gang leaving the neighborhood, no one was now living in the redhead's bedroom turned guest room yet.

Quite frankly, she wondered what their foster mother would do to occupy her time now that there weren't two little girls in need of some guidance of the womanly sort.

"Sonya?"

"Hmm?"

Cherep turned his attention away from the scenery their train was chugging past, peering over at her curiously. "I probably should've asked this before, but… how are we getting to the US?"

"By way of my other workstation." Answered the Storm-Cloud just as casually as he asked, turning a page in her paperback novel. Lloyd Alexander's The Black Cauldron

Not exactly new to her but still a good reread. Even if it was just freshly published.

"Err… great. Fantastic."

"Oh, stop pouting. We're not even going to disembark, it's just a pit stop midway through the Atlantic Ocean." She dug one-handed into her backpack, digging up a Russian to English phrasebook. "You might want to take a look at this anyways, so the extra time will only help."
"It's always a book with you, isn't it?" He took it from her anyways, giving it a weird look. "Why would you even have this? I didn't think English was a language you spoke."

"It is, actually. I learned... years ago." Sonya wondered, vaguely, if she should put effort into making Renato and Cherep meet since they would be nearby.

Then again, they were vastly different men. Her brother was still way too damn nice, he even let Dmitriy take possession of his beloved motorcycle for the duration of their trip. Mainly to ensure the bike would come to no harm being left for what could be a month in a Moscow fall/early winter season, but a little because the mechanic had begged to be allowed to play with it.

The thief wasn't sure if the motorcycle would be in one piece when they got back, but it was likely the Rain already figured that if he did something to Cherep's baby then she would do something to his head.

Renato was a charming asshole, but he was still a hitman with the screwed morals of a magnetized compass.

That... might not be a good mix, now that she thought of it.

"I take it your on translator duties when there, then?"

"Of course, unless you prove to be a linguistic genius somehow I don't see how you could gain fluency in just over a week." Sonya tapped the spine of her book thoughtfully, looking at him over the top of it. "If you had been, you might not have sucked as badly with the French or German immersion practice Lisa had us go through."

"Or the Italian?" He asked dryly, which did make something twinge guiltily in her.

That had been rather sprung on him by surprise, when she had asked their mother for a month or so of Italian practice after her one visit to the region. The fluency she got by just speaking with that elderly couple had helped her immensely, and so she asked for more on a month she spent at home before this trip.

Cherep hadn't known Italian, and Tatiana was gone already. He ended up keeping his mouth shut for a couple weeks if the older woman had been around.

She was very sorry about that. Her brother did pick up a bit, but not nearly as much as she had to her.

Learning Japanese would have to be done on her own but she had a lot of languages under her belt as it was, so she didn't mind that was going to have to be her own effort.

"Really, I am so sorry about that."

"The smirk you're wearing says otherwise." He refuted dryly, cracking open the books she gave him.
XCI (Monday the 16th of August, 1965. Mafia Land Ferry.)

Cherep might not be disembarking when their ship docked at Mafia Land, but Sonya would be.

Mostly to change money from one currency to another, the Soviet Union's ruble to American dollars, and partially to check in just in case Tatiana sent her something. She hadn't, but no news was good news in their business.

She got semi-decent rates at the money changers that had set up shop right in the middle of the arrival port terminal, though she lost about ten kopeks per ruble to switch a decent amount over. Technically she was trading a ruble for ninety-three cents and due to the slight imbalance, she got a small amount of her euros swapped over to make up the difference.

With their traveling funds ready to go, Sonya returned to the ship. It really was merely a stopover rather than an actual destination so there wasn't a whole lot of time left.

It wasn't until she got back to the berth she was sharing with Cherep that she cracked open a few of the brochures that had been available in the currency exchange branch. Money laundering wasn't a skill she ever expected to know herself, but it could be interesting to see what services the island had for it.

Then the modern European history she studied as Rachel came back with a vengeance and gave her a headache.

As far as she had known, studied, and then got a degree in another life; the euro hadn't been in circulation until just before the twenty-first century. It had been an idea suggested just after World War One, the very forerunner of the attempts to simplify the various currencies Europe was the European Unit of Account. That had only happened in the late 70s, which had been followed by the European Currency Unit four years later until the actual currency named 'euro' came into being on the first of January 1999.

Yet… Sonya had been using euros since their first Mafia Land visit, nearly four years ago. It was practically the only currency the various shops and services on the island used, though certain places could make change in other ones by request.

She picked through several more brochures, which were pretty much mostly things the island's various banks offered as services. Offshore accounts, round-robin investments for the actual laundering of cash, the currency exchange and their current rates, advisement for other countries and their tax laws, a couple warnings for counterfeiters about trying to exchange fakes on Mafia land.

It was only when she reached the few handouts on various denominations available and where they were accepted that she got any sort of answer for the euro question.
The 'euro' was billed as a mafia-wide approved fixed currency, something that had taken some effort to implement but allowed a standard rate to be enforced for certain services.

Apparently, that had once been a problem. Certain merchants/services had been competing to be cheap and affordable but only if you paid in their currencies of choice. The 'new' euro was claimed to have fixed that, even though the blonde thief knew of a French restaurant that rather preferred being paid in francs if possible and tended to give a slight discount if so.

How much all of that was true or not was questionable, as her only source was currently a Mafia Land flyer for it, but it billed the implementation as a 1957 occurrence.

Which beat out what Rachel had known as the first implemented version of a spanning European currency, the Unit of Account, by about twenty years. It wasn't entirely widespread, but enough so that if you traveled in Europe the best bet was to carry euros on you unless you knew what country you would wander into next.

Sonya tucked the fold out into her current leisure book, trying to adjust to that.

What else had a widely active mafia influenced?

As far as she had been able to look, there wasn't anything else that stood out in history… though, of course, the 'euro' was probably modern history and not in older editions of textbooks for the subject.

…or as modern as possible given that the Storm-Cloud was somehow living in a variation of Rachel's history.

She sighed and gave up on worrying about it, as there was nothing she could do nor was there anything she had to do about it. The euro just was, thirty-forty years before it should have become a thing.

Another Berlin Wall thing, from the look of it. It had happened, a hell of a lot sooner than she had expected, but at least it was a good thing.

Rather, a thing that helped ensure she wasn't getting underpaid for her work rather than a 'for the good of Europe and preventing WW3' thing.

"Hey, Sonya? Why... are there fake passports and identification papers being given out?"

She broke out of her thoughts, peering at the paperwork Cherep had walked into their stateroom with. He had two passports, what seemed to be French birth certificates, and was fingering a driver's license that looked to be issued in the same country.

"Huh. I wasn't sure if they would get done that fast."

He gave her a suspicious look, cracking one of the passports open to compare the names and dates given. "It's me... but I'm sure my name isn't 'Charles Monraeu'... and I'm sure I'm not born in France."

"Of course, you're not. It's a name close enough to your own you can answer to and French is a language we speak." She left her luggage alone next to her bed and stalked over to snag her own fake passport. "Mafia Land has an arrangement with certain ports and port authorities around the world. This is kind of like a mafia work visa, in a way. I'll let us into the country for a certain amount of time, until the fakes are removed from their immigration database when said time runs out and we need to be gone."
Her brother's expression was a fair cross between bemused and incredulous. "Really? They're going to just let us wander in and out of the country… just like that?"

"No. They're going to let me wander in and out of the country for a hefty price, you're just along for the ride."

Mafia Land was pretty much the height of 'international' in the underworld. It could work as a smuggling point for all sorts of different things, but the main use was getting in and out of countries in a fast hurry.

It might be cheaper and at least for long term to do it on your own, but if you needed speed Mafia Land's ship routes were the best way.

"I think you've blown whatever faith I had in international border patrols."

"Oh good. At least I did something this week."

XCII (Thursday the 19th of August, 1965. Skidaway Island, Chatham County, Georgia, United States of America.)

Cherep's deadpan expression as they moved through the mafia version of immigration was a work of art. Given Sonya had pretty much done everything from steal to beat the tar out of fellow Mafiya brats in front of him… that was saying something.

Both sets of passports got looked at and the fakes stamped, their real ones secreted away in a false pocket of her luggage. Their fake paperwork got verified as coming up 'legal', a short reminder given on the deadline they had to be out of the country by, then they were released into the southern edge of the state of Georgia.

"If you really want to lose faith in humanity, I could tell you that no one there was actually a legal representative of the US government. They are from the mob that control the drug trade and smuggling rings in this part of the country, who get paid a decent amount to let this kind of thing happen." She informed him in French, smirking at his less than impressed look. "Oh, come on, Charles. It's probably not the most illegal thing you've ever done."

The thief's French was attracting a bit of attention, curious more than suspicious, but not nearly as much as her supposedly native Russian would have. Her fellow Cloud, having already been warned repeatedly about speaking it, responded in the same language.

"Again, not helping… Sarah." He pulled a face at her given alias, grabbing the door handle before she could. "Who came up with these names?"

"Trust me, they do get worse if you try to complain."

Mafia people either had no sense of humor or had a very twisted, strange one. She was just happy there was some measure in place that ensured at least initials remained the same.

'Sarah Noel' wasn't the best name she had ever gotten stuck with using that service, but it wasn't the worst either. She really preferred the 'Serra Novae' identity she used in Italy.

They were posing as a couple, just simply because she didn't want to dye her hair purple to make the cover work as siblings. The purple fading would turn pink with her blonde hair, and she didn't want to go around with pink hair for a couple months until it faded the rest of the way or grew out.

Trying to figure out how to bleach Cherep's hair was entirely more effort than Sonya really wanted to bother with.

"Good morning! How can I help such a lovely couple?"

Blinking and turning her gaze from her supposed 'significant other' to the salesman with a very painful looking smile, the thief tried for her own awkward smile. "Yes? We are here to rent an automobile. We will not need it longer than a month."

"Oh good, you do speak English."

"Hey, can we get a sports car here?"

"Well… one of you do."

She gave the salesman a smaller but more real smile, backhanding her brother in the gut maybe a touch to hard. "Excuse me a moment, sir. We do not need a damn muscle car for this trip."

The man gave an awkward head bob, hesitated for a moment, then wandered off to prepare some paperwork for them.

"If you're going to be… 'moving' something in a fast hurry we might." He informed her haughtily, sneaking a couple glances out to the parking lot and all the shiny cars sitting in the sunlight they had walked past. "Might as well have one ready and not need it than get chased down driving something old and clunky."

"Moving is the best term you can come up with?" Sonya scoffed lightly but knew herself well enough to start calculating out how much she'd have to shell out for his desired model of car. "And Charles, my work is not so shoddy it will require us to pull out like that. I'm insulted you even suggested it."

"Sorry, sorry." Neither looking nor sounding very contrite, Cherep scratched the back of his head and tried for a very charming smile. "Please? For me? Oh… for my birthday!"

"I gave you your present already."

"Ah… miss? I need you to fill a few forms out. Only a formality, really, but the company needs to know where you're going, and a few insurance liability papers signed by the… uh, driver."

The blonde thief frowned at him, casting her fellow Cloud a glance of his own before walking over to see what it was they wanted her to fill out. "I don't suppose you have something 'sporty'? My boyfriend wants something fast, you see."

The salesman might be painfully ill-equipped to deal with French speaking customers, one of the reasons why they weren't in Louisiana, but he was still a man trying to sell a rental car for a company. He grinned like a shark, probably thinking of conning them into renting something highly expensive and not suited for long travel plans.

However, he was dealing with a professional thief. She knew cheating, dishonesty, and lies just as much as the next thief.

Sonya got a Cadillac Eldorado convertible instead of the compact Buick Skylark he tried to foist off on them, mainly on the tiny detail of luggage space. Which honestly wasn't much due to the fact they both were convertibles, but at least the Cadillac had more.

She also had to pay a lot more than she had planned on for their security deposit, but it was entirely worth it to see Cherep light up when she pointed out their red and white car for the month.

"You're driving."

"Damn right I am... wait, why?" He paused in the middle of loading the trunk to suspiciously look at her. "You don't want to drive?"

"We used your driver's license to rent the damn thing, and I don't have one nor do I know how to drive." She informed him flatly, sliding into the passenger seat. "But please remember they drive on the other side of the road here."

Sonya did know how to drive... just not with a stick. She couldn't work a clutch and had yet to get Dmitriy to teach her either.

There were automatic transmissions in some of the rental cars, but not the one they got. She supposed that was something her mechanically inclined foster brother could teach her too, though she didn't know when he went in to get a license himself.

Probably at the same time the Rain had gotten his done, actually.

XCIII (Wednesday the 15th of November, 1965. World's Fair, Corona Park, Queens, New York, United States of America.)

"That's what you're here for?" Cherep asked lightly, eating a rather quick lunch as they watched the reveal of the Programma 101. "That's pretty cool, actually."

"Mmm." Sonya wasn't listening to him very hard, she was eyeing the pavilion the Olivetti Company was using as their stage speculatively.

He wasn't surprised, or really bothered by that.

Making his peace with what she did for a living and how she went around about it had been somewhat difficult for him at first, but Lisa had put a lot of effort into trying to get him to understand their culture as criminals and how his foster family had been brought up. He might try to change it now and again, but it was her life and although he was her best friend he couldn't decide how to live that life for her.

A tabletop computer, though.

What he thought of when someone said 'computer' was a large room sized machine, crunching away at some vastly complicated and difficult equation. That was sort of the thing a university or a government used for things like the space programs, or maybe a large company that dealt with sciences.

Having that associated with that little typewriter sized computer?

Well, he could see why Adrik wanted one. Enough so to ask the blonde teenager to steal him one.

The price tag attached explained why they hadn't bothered considering a legal way to get one, other than what the slim youth had tried to gather on his own before Tatiana suggested their little sister. Three thousand and five hundred dollars was a grand and a half more than the new Ford Mustang would cost.

No, he didn't specifically look at the ones available at the dealership near their hotel… it just happened to look that way. Salesmen were pushy, pushy people even if you didn't understand one word they spoke out of twenty.

Cherep figured this was probably the end of their little vacation/road trip. That was Sonya's target, which she had to chase around for half a year and halfway around the world to find. She'd probably greatly appreciate finally getting this whole job over with.

"Right… well, now that I know it's here and ready to go, what else did you want to see?"

He started slightly, more than enough for her to catch him doing it and give him a strange look.

"Charles?"

"Uh… ha, Sarah… I thought you're here for… just that?"

The thief sitting next to him gave him a flat stare that questioned his sanity. "We're also here to sightsee and wander around like tourists. Which, may I point out, we are."

The secret Cloud Flame user of the family coughed sheepishly, quirking a wry smirk for her. "I thought you'd go and… um. Yeah."

Rolling her eyes at him, his blonde little sister got to her feet and pulled him up by his arm. "No, absolutely not. Not the very day they reveal it, I'm not stupid. End of the week at earliest, when news has a chance to circle around and there would be more suspects than just who is in this crowd."

…so, he had the rest of the week?

He could deal with that.

"I swear to high hell though, you make us go through 'It's a Small World' one more time…"

"It's cool." Cherep protested, grinning at the very disgruntled image Sonya always presented when he managed to badger her into going around again. "I still haven't spotted the Russians in that yet."

"They're not there, the US is at war with the Soviet Union… however 'cold' it's all been." She sounded disgusted, probably at the false advertising.

She had no room to complain, given they were ‘falsely advertising’ the fact they were a couple.

Which he thought was kind of weird since they were foster siblings, but she had put some effort in explaining that siblings that didn't look alike would be more memorable than just a couple out to see the attractions.

The disbelieving glance she shot his hair was entirely uncalled for, they'd seen all sorts of different colors in the first week of being in America. Including the rarer blues and greens, which he thought deserved her scorn more than his purple coloring. Pinks, purples, and reds were not exactly rare hair and eye colors to have in the Soviet Union.

They were sharing a hotel bed, as part of that ‘cover’ as a couple, but his standoffish baby sister was more likely to whack him with a pillow if he stole all the covers off her than cuddle. She at least ensured she wouldn't give him a bloody nose when she did, but it still surprised him now and again to get a semi-hard lump of fabric forcefully introduced to his face in the middle of the night.

"Well, if we have the rest of the week... how about the General Motors display?"

"That one is supposed to be rather brilliant." Allowed the professional thief, glancing around to see what landmarks there were near and comparing them to her little copy of the park map. "It's back a way, you can rubberneck at the Ford display again when we go past it."

"That is a fantastic car, Sarah. I don't care what ribbing you do, I like looking at it."

"You and your damn toys. I thought it would get harder to distract you as we got older, but no... all I have to do is ensure you have something mechanical at hand and you're as happy as a clam, aren't you?"

"Yeah, pretty much." Cherep didn't care about the mickey she could take out of him for it, he was a kid at heart and that was still an awesome car after everything was said and done.

XCVI (Sunday the 3rd of October, 1965. Mafia Land.)

One Programma 101 safely shipped via underworld routes and Cherep on his way home to Moscow later, and Sonya managed to finally finish the favor for Adrik and Tatiana.

Stealing even an armful of technology proved to be almost stupidly easy, compared to the mafia jobs she was currently getting into. Her next two jobs for Mafia Land proved harder, though those targets didn't have a few million people wandering in and out of them daily.

The Russian thief didn't rightly care much either, getting the storage unit assigned to her and taking possession of the key alone finally ticked off the last of her boxes that needed to be dealt with before leaving Moscow finally.

There were a couple of other things still pending, but those weren't majorly important in any way. Just... a little more than personal. She'd have to go see what time Arseniy had free to help her deal with her biological father.

She finished up her Mafia Land business the second week of December, so instead of immediately going and arranging passage on a ship heading to the mainland of Eurasia and possibly catching the start of her older sister's visit home she staked out a good café and cracked open yet another book.

She had scouted around the bookstores nearby the in city of Queens for a much more modern history book for Europe than she had back in Moscow. The euro question was still bothering her, and she had intended to look harder for any more differences popping up.

It was questionable if she would catch any. Fifteen years since Rachel breathed her last in a grimy and dark alleyway and Sonya's memory of that life was an iffy thing. Especially if she went four years with using a currency that shouldn't have existed for another two decades at the very least.

Additionally, she was pretty sure there was no such thing as a mafia history book. Any changes influenced by the underworld residents of the world would probably be untraceable by her, unless she knew of the people involved personally.
Like that Programma 101. Had she stolen it out of the Olivetti Company manufactory, it was entirely possible it wouldn't have been marketed this year… or even more worrying, at all. Not if there had already been dire questions on if it was something they could sell.

Which… would mean some probably bad things would be delaying the computer market.

Therefore, Sonya was never doing another 'cutting edge technology' job. Way too much stress over if she should steal or not for her.

She ignored it when someone took the chair opposite of her at the café table she was sitting at. If it was Renato, he knew how to get her attention. If it wasn't, she didn't care.

There was no one else on Mafia Land that she could count as more than just a casual acquaintance. Pitiful, but true.

"A history book? That's a new one."

Then again, Renato was a little older than her and probably did know something about it. The Russian girl glanced up at him, just to check he was in a good mood and likely to answer one of her random questions.

Then promptly wished she kept her eyes down, because he was flirting with the now blushing waitress again as he placed his order.

…so, probably in a good mood.

"Renato? What do you know of the 'euro'?" Asked the Storm-Cloud as he sat back to watch the progress of his espresso through the windows of the café. "How it came to be, that is. I cannot find it in my book."

She would admit it was a very odd question, but they did get paid in that unit of currency. Euro was also the major denomination Mafia Land used, alongside the dollar, yen, renminbi, pound, and ruble. One was sometimes favored more in certain sections than others, but all of them could be used with minimal griping.

"It's called the European Unit of Account, euro is just the shorthand nickname it acquired since it was implemented." At first that looked to be as much as he wanted to speak on the subject, but something occurred to him and he shot her a sly smirk. "It was suggested back in the nineteen-twenties, didn't get traction as an idea until after World War Two when the Treaty of Sicily was signed off on nearly three decades and a half later."

Sonya took a hard look at her book. No wonder she couldn't find the Treaty of Rome, it hadn't been held in Rome.

"Okay… so what am I missing?"

"That Italian Mafia Famiglia you wish to avoid were key supporters of it. They got the meeting of the first European Economic Union to use the Island of Sicily as their meeting place."

Vongola had something to do with the euro?

The Russian thief figured that explained why she was having such difficulties trying to dig something up on the subject. "I am just trying to avoid irritating them, not avoid them entirely. Freelancers do not tend to do well when against a structured group like that."
Renato only huffed at her and her reasoning, giving the waitress a charming smile when she arrived with his drink. "You know, this thing you have against Italia. I'm going to feel hurt if you keep it up."

"Ivrea is a beautiful city, and the Turin region was very pretty as I passed through it."

He shot her a flat look. "That's it? Not trying very hard, are we?"

"Mmm… no, not really. Only been once, you see." The teenager shut her book. She still had questions, but it wasn't very likely she'd get answers now.

"Maybe I should show you around myself? You really can't see much of the country without a decent guide." Suggested the hitman slowly, looking a bit more devious than such a suggestion should warrant.

She wrinkled her nose as she thought of what that would likely result in. She might be able to travel with Cherep halfway across the world, but she could also hit him when he was being annoying.

"I think… I'll pass. Thank you."

XCV (Monday the 27th of December, 1965. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana's visit home happened the very last week of December, she blew in and practically abducted Sonya to go and get their tattoos touched up.

Which, looking at her arm before she pulled on a coat, the younger thief figured she really should've done a year or two ago.

"So... question." The slightly taller and much more settled seeming redhead spoke up, seeming both happy and sad to be wandering around Moscow again. "Clouds, huh?"

She sighed slightly, long since resigned to the topic of this conversation and how best to defend her choices. "I am... more of what one thinks of when someone says 'Cloud Flame user', he isn't. Therefore, if the clan would need one of us, it would be best to be me."

Her older sister slid her a sideways look in response, humming noncommittally.

That was a horrible, horrible tactic Lisa had them trained up to spill everything when she pulled. "How's Galina?"

"Oh no, we're not going to talk about my Lightning. We're talking about your fellow Cloud." Tatiana made a face, probably thinking of said Lightning. "We're going to borrow the green gems though, just so you know."

"You can deal with Arseniy about that." Sonya patted her foster sister on the shoulder when she pouted. "Whole reason I left them with him, you know."

The Sun user shot her a sour look, grabbing her by the wrist and dragging them both into a side door the Storm-Cloud had probably passed hundreds of times before without giving it a second thought.

The man who greeted them from another room before joining them was likely Tatiana's tattooist, like how Valya back in Saratov was the blonde thief's. His kitchen was set up for tattooing, from what the sisters could see from the doorway.

Pushing her little sister forward, the redhead shot the man a brilliant smile. "She's been neglecting her artwork, Boris. No longer a little kitty, she needs a bigger cat."

"Well then… let's see the damage." Boris gave her a bland smile and gestured to the kitchen chair apparently waiting for their type of customers.

The former pickpocket sighed, stripping off her coat and thin sweater so they could see her faded cat and moon tattoo.

Her kitten had greyed out, after nearly five years it was no longer a black cat but an almost greenish grey. The crystal moon that had cradled it was now less crystal and more 'rock' in looks.

The tattooist clucked disapprovingly, fetching one of his many binders of designs and flipping through it. Tatiana reached over and stroked the faded kitten on her little sister's bicep. "Poor kitty, we'll make you a big cat soon."

"Please tell me you are not talking to and petting my tattoo."

Their host interrupted whatever would have been her reply, showing the girls his art collection for 'cats, jewels, and nighttime' themes. Thieves, jewel heists, and overnight work, in other terms.

Sonya admitted, privately, he might just be better than her old tattooist.

"What else are you good for?" Her older sister asked as she paged through the designs, settling herself in a kitchen chair and cradling her chin in one hand. "I'm sure you can get a rose like me too by now."

"Paw prints." She was a traveling thief, after all. "Do you want to put our Dying Will Flame types on it too? I'm pretty sure we could work it in here."

"I already have it." The redhead gave her a smug smile, stripping out of her outerwear to show it off.

The Sun was an image given to those that brazenly worked in the daylight, which Tatiana certainly qualified for and Sonya could probably get. The only times she had ever worked overnight was when she was working with her foster sister on one of her heists.

The younger thief eventually selected a much larger tattoo design that what she had already, mostly to cover up the bare beginnings of her tattoo work.

The moon mostly stayed, being recolored to a lighter purple shade instead, half concealed by a darker purple and red cloud. Her curled kitten got covered by a wash of nighttime sky in the 'emptier' part of the design, a much larger cat pawing its way across skin-shaded 'snow' or 'sand' into a green thicket of similarly uncolored roses near the middle of her bicep. A blush of dawn backlighting both the horizon and the underside of her cloud.

It was a lot of work for a tattooist and took up several hours to carve and ink into her skin.

The safecracker merely needed to touch up the colors of her own. Getting her own uncolored roses filled in with red.

They tipped Boris a fair bit, since redesigning another's tattoo work was a lot of effort. The Sun was sure it would turn out well once it healed up, as well.
To prove it, she covered Sonya's arm with a wash of Sun Flames to seal her skin and brighten in the inks.

"So… Cherep." Tatiana continued when they were on their way back to their childhood home.

"Yes."

"Why?"

"At first, it was merely because he wouldn't do too well if he got shoved into our little corner of the neighborhood and expected to swim." Started the Storm-Cloud slowly, dredging up her long-forgotten motives regarding her best friend as she flexed the last of the soreness out of her arm. "I still don't think he would like it much. Then it turned to preventing him from getting taken advantage of, which he is still way too nice to avoid that happening."

"And now?"

"He has not expressed any desire to join, so I will continue to do what I've been doing for him."

Cherep could probably make a go of being a Mafiya man now, if he wasn't so dead set on joining a circus and becoming a stuntman. If she did allow her clan the knowledge and a way to try holding on to him, it was likely he would resent the chains they would insist on.

He might then resent her, which was not something she even wanted to entertain the idea of.

XCVI (Saturday the 8th of January, 1966. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Having all three of them home, even if it was only a two-week long visit, proved to them all that they were outgrowing living together and their childhood home. Cherep and Sonya might still actually have bedrooms, but they did pack up the stuff the youngest thief would store for them all in preparation of the last two moving sometime this upcoming year.

The house was slowly going back to the way it had looked when the sisters first moved in to be fostered under Arseniy and Lisa. Tatiana claimed it was odd to sleep there when it didn't look remotely as it had when she was living there.

She also told them the highlights of getting her gang set up using their own efforts and supplies in a different city, even if it was temporary. In return the Storm-Cloud told her the story of how far she had to chase Adrik's favor, and that Cherep had gone with her.

It was halfway through Tatiana's leave taking that Dmitriy showed up, in one of the clan's automobiles no less.

"Five ruble on it being Flame related." The Sun informed the younger thief, smirking slightly as she hefted the case of possible Lightning gemstones over one shoulder.

"Sucker's bet, Tatiana."

Sonya had to agree with Cherep on that one. Sighing, she gave her elder sister a hug goodbye and went to see what had the Rain coming for her.
The rumors that spread of the Zolotovs having a Rain had resulted in a family taking their very... gifted young son in to them. An attempt to both safeguard said son and figure out how the hell he kept on conjuring animals and images out of thin air.

Mist, the blonde cat burglar thought… and semi-decent parents.

At least the brat was luckier than her brother and herself had been in that.

On the drive to headquarters, Dmitriy revealed he had finally gained some conscious control over his Rain Flames. The kid apparently had freaked out about maybe talking to someone that knew what was going on, again the parents had tried a doctor first when he mentioned a few strange things. That doctor's shady connections went for the Mafiya, so instead of more shady types he sent them on to the only syndicate he knew of that might be able to help.

The Rain had calmed the kid down using said Flames, only to realize his jade wasn't on him at the time when leaving to fetch her. A mental misstep, but one Sonya took note of as a working method.

Not that the baby Mist would need that kind of information. He was already spamming his Flames like a broken sieve, from all reports.

The Storm-Cloud took the last five minutes of that trip to mentally asset herself. Though annoyed this had interrupted Tatiana's farewell, she hadn't immediately thought bad of the poor kid. She had instead thought him lucky, maybe a little sourly but she wasn't a very sociable or decent person at heart.

Not looking too good on the 'Cloud and Mist equals hate' issue.

Maybe that was a personal problem. Mists reportedly tended for flamboyant or misleading, neither of which Clouds tended to understand or appreciate. She certainly didn't, it gave her a headache. A tendency for dislike wasn't the same as an assurance of it.

Dmitriy pulled into the garage he probably took the car out of, and Sonya let herself out while making a mental note to get him to teach her to drive stick-shift sometime this year.

She got very distracted from asking him about that, because she was mostly sure there hadn't been plants growing out of the walls when he had left. Judging by the swearing going on, it had to be a new feature.

A new Misty feature.

The blonde touched one lightly, figured it wasn't going to try killing her for it, and used a sharp jolt of Storm Flames on it. The only word that did the result justice was popped as her Flames ate the weaker Mist ones.

It also prevented her small amount of red Flames from trying to eat anything else because the Mist Flames immediately disappeared once her Storm ate its stability away.

Bonus.

The Rain that drove her here started copying her, but his Flames only had the Mist Constructs fading from where they touched rather than the destruction hers caused.

Leaving him to it, she started in on freeing up a way inside. Whoever the Mist kid was, the only fact that he wasn't trying to hurt the Zolotov vory was probably preventing them from lashing out in response to the hemming in a full corridor of their own headquarters.
He probably panicked without the Rain at hand to keep him calm, and probably tried barricading himself into a room or something. Sonya in fact found him in a closet, huddled in the back corner and about crying his eyes out.

"Stop it, fear is only making it worse."

The snotty little brat jerked his head up, giving her a watery and sour glare from red rimmed brown eyes. "Like you know what's going on. I don't want to leave my parents, I don't want these things to happen, I just want to go home!"

She reached out with a flat expression, and one hand popped yet another of his illusions growing out of the closet's walls with a palm full of red fire. "You, I, and your parents will be talking about this, and there is no way in hell we're taking you from them as you are neither an orphan nor a child at risk that needs a new home in the first place. I'm insulted you even suggested that."

He stared, first at her hand then at her. "You can make it go away?"

"I can Disintegrate your Constructions, yes."

The kid apparently decided she was his new best friend, crawling out of the closet a lot more cheerful than the Storm-Cloud had found him and even giving her a hug around her waist.

She was flat out confused. Her Flame had proved to be a threat to his, why the hell was she so acceptable?

XCVII (Monday the 17th of January, 1966. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The boy's name was Samuil Usov Maximovich, baby Mist kid who scared himself into using his Flames after an incident with a half-feral dog tried attacking him.

Sonya admitted to herself that sounded better than her incident, she would've preferred the dog against three vory attacking her best friend.

The following week tasked every shred of social competence she had, and Dmitriy had to rescue her from a conversation more than once. Most of the talking between the baby Mist's parents and the Zolotov clan was done by the Sovietnik, their Pahkan's right hand and one of their boss' advisors.

The blonde thief had to figure out a semi-reliable way for the kid to keep on living with his parents but also get some help developing some type of control. Using Tatiana's rush-job search as their method of working through the gemstones available, they figured he did very well with both rubies and sapphires.

Better than either Rain or Cloud could make use of them, even.

She was again confused but took note of it anyways. Information was information, even if she wasn't sure what help or use she could put that to.

He didn't need the gemstone to Construct things, or to summon up his Flames at all. What it was good for was a physical reminder that it was possible for him to control everything he made.

His best result was with lapis lazuli, so Sonya fashioned him a necklace with a pendant of the mineral he could carry around with him.

He wore it on a leather band wrapped around his wrist like a bracelet instead, the brat.

Usov was proving to be a very wicked minded little Mist, badgering her on every scrap of information she ever managed to collect on his Flame type and how or why she managed her own control over hers. While somewhat annoying, it wasn't so much she minded answering his questions than the volume of queries he posed to her at once.

He was also all of six years of age, meaning he wouldn't get less annoying anytime soon and she wouldn't be allowed to swear near him for another few years yet.

The week proved to be very helpful in learning to control her own Storm Flames, as when Usov drew out an illusion he didn't intend to the former pickpocket got to pop them. It was still unwieldy, virulent fire that ate everything she touched with it, but she got to the point of being able to use just a dab to destroy Mist Flame Constructions.

She couldn't wait to try carving things again, wondering if she had just overpowered everything with Storm Flames because that was how Cloud Flames seemed to work and that was what she had started with.

The end of those eight days was when Usov stumbled onto a way to de-Construct his own illusions, once he felt safe enough to play with his ability more than freak out when it happened.

Meaning he didn't need a Storm Flame user around to pop what he didn't intend to create or a Rain to calm him down enough for the illusions to fade on their own.

It also freed him from Sonya's side, allowing him and his parents to return home.

Usov pouted at the news, insisting on giving the female teenager a hug goodbye. She nearly swore he did it just to make her twitch but he was also a little boy who had a very traumatic experience, so she put up with the touching. Also, his parents thought it was adorable he liked her so much.

They were also watching him hug her.

She could not win in that.

What she did manage was to insist Dmitriy should be the contact point for Usov. She was both the wrong type to help him develop much and intending on leaving Moscow soon herself. The first point getting her more leeway than the second unfortunately.

Little Mist brat did like the Rain himself, it was just that the Storm-Cloud had been the one to fetch him the second time he panicked and taught him what little they knew that made him so attached… Sonya was pretty sure that was how it went…

Mostly… maybe?

The incident didn't improve the Zolotov clan's regard for Dying Will Flame users, but it did make their Pakhan decide that having one at hand just in case was a good idea. When he took a hard look at what Flame users their clan had to them; the fact Dmitriy was already in place and the girls, even the new Lightning, on their way to supporting the clan from afar led him to think the Rain was the best one for that position.

Sonya snickered, only a touch guilty. The man she manipulated into the position mostly willingly rolled his eyes at her.
She supplied their clan's boss with the extra condensed research journal she had, tacking on that she would be sending in periodic updates via Arseniy if she ran across any more information and Dmitriy would update the Mist section when young Usov got there.

It was the first time she had met her crime boss, the man himself well over the age of fifty and currently in the middle of teaching his son how to manage their clan. Zolotov Milos Danilovich didn't hold himself as one of his vor or as a gentleman, he gave off the impression of a slightly violent-prone banker.

…or a loan shark. A very successful loan shark.

Then again, he ran a clan half made up out of thieves. The impression was probably either deliberate for the very action of dealing with his thieves or just how he was.

All in all, she liked him well enough. He was shrewd enough to know what she had been up to teaching Dmitriy how to be a Rain, and content to allow that effort free her from being needed at headquarters indefinitely.

The blonde had also pulled a lot of money for the clan in the last few years, chasing down the jewels to try focusing Flames through them. It bought her goodwill with her clan and her boss, enough so that she would be allowed to wander freely after her best friend.

Which, really, had been all that she had been after.

XCVIII (Tuesday the 1st of February, 1966. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I do not see why we must be out right this moment." Sonya groused at Cherep's back, following him down the icy road to wherever it was he wanted her to be.

"Circuses recruit mostly in their offseason, which is winter." He reminded her cheerily over his shoulder.

Point of fact, she disliked being cold. Since they lived in the USSR, she was generally cold most of the year. Thus, she tended to be snappish and irritable when outside during winter or spring.

Fall never really bothered her too much, somehow.

If her brother's circus panned out this time, then he would be set to leave with the onset of the spring thaw. Well… as much of a spring-thaw as possible in the early months of the year. Which for Moscow wasn't until mid-way through March, really.

This circus, the latest of her fellow Cloud's finds, was a bit larger than the others he had inquired around about and got invited to join. One of the 'Moscow Circus' branches, mostly made up of graduates of the Moscow's State College for Circus and Variety Arts but there were a few other performers scattered about.

It was a good size, never really had a major problem getting in and out of the Iron Curtain, affluent enough to afford wintering lodging for their actors, and likely well reputed enough so Sonya wouldn't be able to nix it easily.

Even if it was off-season for the circuses, that didn't mean there were lazing about instead of still practicing or performing. There were several amphitheaters within Moscow itself, some of which merely required a decent donation from the proceeds raked in over a night to be used. There was also the circus college, where performers could go and compare notes, practice, or find themselves an understudy or three.

The blonde thief had visited each, sometimes with Cherep dragging her along and sometimes just because of him but not with him. She did not understand his preoccupation with show business and becoming famous, because to her becoming famous, or rather infamous, was a bad thing.

Then again, she didn't really have to understand to support him doing it.

Cherep had gotten invited as a mechanic, more stagehand than performer but it was an in. The fact he had his own motorcycle and was perfectly willing to try his hand at stunt work was probably only a bonus. If they went with this that likely wouldn't happen until next year, when and if he developed an act or show for it or the circus master decided the act was needed.

"Cherep! My young friend. I take it this is the lovely Sophia?"

She very carefully didn't pull a face at the automatic assumption over her full name.

'Sonya' might be a nickname variation of Sophia, but it was on her damn birth certificate as Sonya. Since she could recall, her name had been Sonya though this life and she rather that didn't change if it didn't have to. It was difficult enough already, and she still responded to Rachel occasionally.

"Sonya, Master Liam. This is my little sister Sonya."

'Liam' was a very robust older man, with some very carefully arranged facial hair and very tattered 'work clothes'. He probably doubled as an announcer when the circus was on the road, not just the one that went out to promote the circus at any town or city they stopped at. The fact he was so willing to be seen out of his finery was a good sign, at least.

Her brother grinned good-naturedly at the older man jogging up to them, sheepishly scratching the back of his head while she gripped tight on her irritation.

If she blew this for him, he would sulk for days.

"We're here to poke around a little, and hopefully get her stamp of approval."

"Oh? And why would Miss Sonya's approval be needed?"

"Because Cherep is way, way too nice and someone has to stop others from taking advantage of him." The irritable Storm-Cloud gifted the man with a smile that was probably a little sharp around the edges.

Surprisingly, he didn't take offense.

Liam chuckled instead, waving them on to join him as he made for his troupe's lodging area. "Will you be coming with him then, little sister? You seem protective enough to chase after if you felt the need to."

"I likely will, yes. I do hope you don't mind."

"And you will not care even if I do, I take it." Stroking one of his rather fiercely waxed mustaches, he considered her as they walked. "So then... what can you do, Miss Sonya?"
“I am classically trained in ballet and dabbled a little in gymnastics.”

Every female thief in the Zolotovs was given the same training, the grace and balance helped them get in and out of some rather compromising situations sometimes. Best of all it doubled as a cover, one that was both difficult to lie about having and an explanation over why they had some not so middle-class skills.

Sonya was tempted to tack on the sleight of hand skills she had, but this seemed to not be one of the shady circuses that allowed such things. She could adapt to that if so, though.

"I… also, can make simple jewelry. What I am interested in learning about is magic tricks, myself."

Liam smiled broadly at her, including Cherep as well even if he had remained silent as the two of them talked. "I think we might just be able to use you, Miss Sonya. If you don't mind performing in front of crowds or heights, I mean."

"I have no great fear of heights, it's merely the fall that gets to me." The thief seriously thought about the crowd question but had to admit she didn't know at all and told him so.

"The fall is something all sane humans fear, even my trapeze artists. As for crowds, we shall see soon enough." Liam considered her, then Cherep, then them both together. "If we do meet your approval, little sister Sonya, I would like to invite the two of you to practice with us this winter. If we all decide it is a great fit, maybe even the first show of the season or more. Yes?"

The younger Cloud sibling smiled back weakly, thinking hard.

Liam was very certain of both his circus and his people making a good impression if he was already angling to get her to agree to something in the future. He was either in desperate need of a mechanic, of a showgirl, or maybe even just that nice.

It still made her suspicious, though.

XCIX (Friday the 4th of February, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Liam's ever so imaginatively named Groβes Volksfest had nearly a hundred people to it, most were performers and a good chunk were the carnies that ran game booths, but there were a range of other types sprinkled through. He even had musicians, though most of them made better acrobats.

Sonya reluctantly decided this was probably the best one Cherep could find within the Soviet Union, or at least one she couldn't dig up more than their fair share of dirt on.

The circus planned to move out, back onto the road, in mid-April. After a show or two to knock the winter rust off and generate a bit of traveling cash to last them to their next destination. That meant she had to do some rearranging in a fast hurry, especially if her brother was so dead set on going along with them.

There was both her stuff to move into storage and the last of Tatiana's, some jobs for Mafia Land to be done since she wouldn't likely get the summer off to handle other business, and the last of the things she wanted to get done in Moscow needed to be finished.

Somehow, she had to get that done while also making a good impression on what was likely her future co-workers while with this circus… and figure out where she'd fit it.
The former pickpocket was just happy she managed to both finish off Adrik's favor and took a raincheck on the teaching bit.

She eventually got herself apprenticed to 'Madam Crina', an elderly woman posing as a gypsy fortune teller... or who was a gypsy fortune teller. While she wasn't entirely sure how that came about since she met the woman when the old bat had been blind drunk, it was at least helpful in sorting out herself when it came to circus life.

Master Liam did accept the suggestion that she had the very last of her personal business to handle yet, that would probably repeat every winter. If she didn't harry off during the working season he claimed he didn't mind.

With that all done, Sonya informed their foster parents about the whole 'run away to join the circus' bit she and Cherep were going to do. Lisa laughed until she cried, oddly enough. Arseniy rolled his eyes at them both, asking when she planned on cleaning out the attic.

That had been a nightmare of shipping logistics, which Tatiana would be made to pay for her share the next time the foster sisters were in the same general vicinity.

The Storm-Cloud had to follow right after, so she'd be able to shove it all into her storage unit and try to grab two or three Mafia Land jobs at the same time. She might have had to heavily abuse her Propagated strength to muscle everything in place, but she managed it.

It was only halfway to the Thieves' Hall that the slightly harried thief noted she was being followed.

Mafia Land was such a volatile mix of criminals that it was sometimes hard to tell, especially when one faction of people was suspicious of everyone else who were suspicious of them and everyone else in return and so on. As she was running a little short on time, instead of counter-stalking them to figure out what the hell she noted what she could and kept going.

She'd leave it be for now, but if they kept it up when she came back then she would have to do a little digging herself.

As far as she was aware, a minor thief like her didn't rate special interest. A Flame user might gather that much, but very few people knew of her ability in that and if they had talked she would've heard something.

...or someone managed to connect the Zolotov Rain and her together in the last few months.

Usov was a snotty brat, but it had been impressed on him not to talk about his or any Flame ability to those that didn't know. However, a lot of people could outsmart a six-year-old... even a Mist using one.

It could've been his parents, but she had been sure they were too thankful for her assistance to sell her out.

Okay... there were several ways her Flame use might have gotten out. Renato might have even done it, he never did promise to keep it to himself. All she had on him was his own use of Sun, and she even owed him two favors to boot.

Sonya stopped once fully inside her Hall, palming her face and flatly refusing to panic. Dying Will Flame users were becoming more common, it was obvious she'd never be able to fully keep that from circulating around if anyone noted something a bit off about her.

She was being stalked... it didn't necessarily mean it was Flame related. It could be a mafia syndicate looking for a thief to use, or it could just be because she was pretty in a 'classic' way.

It could just be because they were bored.

C (Thursday the 17th of March, 1966. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya managed three Mafia Land contracts within a month.

None of them were clean affairs, one even forced her to run for it due to incomplete intel gathering on the situation. The Russian managed it in the end, without a new or interesting injury to try explaining away other than bruises from a bad landing and a few cuts from the running.

One also paid nowhere near the amount of risk mandated, and she lodged a complaint against the individual that commissioned the job in revenge. It would probably go nowhere, but it made her feel slightly better about getting duped into stealing from a government office while it was in use.

Hopefully that was the last time she would have to grab whatever in a fast hurry.

That left her with one month to try to integrate herself in the circus she and Cherep were joining. He had used his month without her to fit in rather well, his natural people skills at work in being cheerful and helpful.

The blonde was known as 'the young mechanic's sister', which worked for her. This was her brother's dream, she was just along because no one would be able to help him with it as their foster parents had helped the girls and the dork was way too damn nice still.

Madam Crina proved to be just as cankerous sober as she was drunk but held up her word in taking on the thief as an apprentice in the art of fortunetelling. Also, the tarot cards she had were awesome.

The incense she burned to cover the smell of alcohol abuse, not so much.

The older woman, Romanian if Sonya was any judge of accent, dressed herself like a serotyped gypsy. Scarves and shawls wrapped around her boney frame, a vest of garish colors, billowy sleeves, a full skirt with an elaborate apron over top, and knee-high boots with low heels she could probably wade through a tar pit in comfortably.

The Russian thief was jealous of her boots.

As Madam Crina’s apprentice/draw girl/gopher, she was expected to dress like her. That was simple enough for the most part, swaths of fabric were easily gotten if you knew where to go.

Getting them in the patterns and styles Crina approved of had been the trick.

The haughty old woman had not been interested in holding her apprentice's hand through her shopping even if she was a picky old bitch, which had been annoying. The acrobats rather liked the bolts of rejected fabrics, so while irritating Sonya figured it wasn't a complete loss.

They, particularly the trapeze artist named Ivanna, informed her that she was the third such 'apprentice' in fortune telling Madame Crina had gotten. Several others had gone in under her for various other trades but none of the others stayed longer than a year as such, so they weren't particularly holding out hope she'd remain with the circus for long.
Cherep rather heartily disliked the old fortune teller when he learned of that. Sonya didn't really see the point in getting upset.

It would either work out or it wouldn't, and she'd find something else to do if so.

"...I still don't see why you put up with that."

"I put up with you for years, didn't I?" The Storm-Cloud peered at the seam she was sewing using a bit of sunlight peeking through the rolling clouds overhead to highlight her work.

That looked straight... right?

"Madame Crina is not much more of a chore, really."

Learning how to sew clothing had not been a skill she ever thought she would need. The crotchety old woman she was now working for begged to differ, as when they were on the road all mending or alterations had to be done when it came up. The thief would be stuck doing it for her now, and making her 'traditional dress' for when they opened the circus to customers.

Sewing a skirt hadn't been too hard, it was the shirt that proved to be tricky. She had cheated the hell out of everything and took apart one of her older long-sleeved shirts and a skirt way too short for her anymore, using the fabric as templates for her hand-sewn ones.

If the fortunetelling gig failed, she might just try her hand at costume designing.

"Are you seriously going to try to tell me you don't mind the old bat?" Her brother asked of her incredulously, finally finished 'tuning-up' his motorcycle for the nth time that same month.

He really was almost chomping at the bit to leave Moscow, now that he finally had a decent circus Sonya hadn't refused thinking about.

"Yes, pretty much." She stabbed herself in the thumb for a similar nth time and figured out what a thimble was for after examining the pricks of blood curiously.

She was sure sewing leather would be harder than fabrics, even if she had Cloud Flame boosted strength. The thief didn't care if Crina sniffed at her for months, she was going to buy the damn boots and vest somewhere.

…and probably a set of bracers she could keep some of her mini-Bec de Corbins on or in. They were too long to work as charms on a bracelet, and her red tourmaline key was on a thin chain around her neck. Sonya could wear two as earrings, and had the magnetic ear hooks to do so, but that was a bit too liable to stab her in the neck if she wasn't careful.

Those earrings would require mini-hammers without sharp ends to be less hazardous. A maul, maybe.

Oh hell, and a belt.

Pausing in her work, the Storm-Cloud glanced over to the skirt she finished after two weeks of work on it.

She forgot belt loops.

Sonya felt the corner of her left eye twitch, so she carefully gathered up her sewing supplies and set it aside with the shirt she had been trying to make. "I need something to do, not circus related or stealing or whatever."

"Um… like what?"

"…I'm going to go and destroy Aleksandr's floor one last time. Want to come with me and snicker at all the dumbfounded faces the little brats make when I do it in front of them?"

Cherep only thought about it for the sake of it, from what she got by looking at the smirk that crawled across his face as he stalled to tease her a little. "Sure."
CI (Saturday the 2nd of April, 1966. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Of the things Sonya rather needed to get done and over with before leaving Moscow, her list started with her biological father and ended with getting a driver's license.

With things as they were, she had the time to ask Arseniy about dealing with the former weeks before the circus she now belonged to opened for the first time that year. Well after she managed to gain her driver's license by using one of Dmitriy’s automatic transmission cars.

She knew herself enough to know she had been stalling and putting it off… but what in hell was she supposed to say to him?

Thanks for the genetic contribution that led to my existence and for dumping me in the Mafiya. No, I hadn't really needed you around. By the way, I stole your wallet.

Yeah… she was of two minds over even seeing the man again.

Taking a bit of precaution about what could likely happen as she still didn't know what she thought about the man and her childhood situation, she left her assortment of miniaturized polearms with Cherep. Since she could certainly do more than enough damage with her own fists if need be, it wasn't as if she was going in unarmed.

Any Cloud Flame user would quite literally need to lose their arms before they would be less than lethal at short range and even then, they could probably inconvenience someone greatly. She wasn't very skilled, because Cloud Propagated strength didn't equal indestructible bones, but she knew how to punch and the weaker bits of the human body due to her haphazard and targeted education.

The thief closed her eyes tightly, pinching the bridge of her nose and tried thinking less lethal thoughts.

She only had one facet of her childhood incident that lead to her becoming a Mafiya foster child, there might be some semi-agreeable reasoning he had for what he did. Not to say she would appreciate it or any reasoning, but there might be.

Sonya decided she sucked at trying to give someone the benefit of doubt.

…and she was stalling again.

Palming her face, the young teenager turned to Arseniy. He looked perfectly willing to sit and wait for her to decide to continue or not, and it was very tempting to ask him to blow the whole thing off.

"So... he's in there."

"Yeah."

Sighing at that unhelpfully short confirmation, she glared a hole at the closed door to her left.

Nikishin Mikhail Vladislavovich hadn't proved to be too hard for the vor to track down again. He hadn't even left the USSR, just merely relocated further down south to a tiny town that didn't know him, the fact he was a widower, or that he should've had a tiny daughter in tow.
Said daughter wasn't too sure if she was happy this would be over with quickly or disappointed she couldn't put it off for another year or two.

She only got one step towards it before the vor spoke up again. "Leave the door open."

Giving a short nod to show she heard him, she opened the door to the small receiving room on the first floor of the Zolotov headquarters.

Mikhail looked almost like someone had shot him when he got his first good look at his daughter in nearly eleven years. "Nyura?"

"If the woman is dead, how could she be opening doors?" Sonya snapped at him bitterly, almost reflexively irate even if she had tried to ensure she'd have a level head for this… discussion.

Apparently, she was nursing a grudge.

She looked enough like her mother to be mistaken as such. A childhood goal of hers, but not exactly a warm and fuzzy thought now.

Damn it, after she had ended up in a Mafiya foster home she had hoped she'd turn out more like him in looks just to prevent that kind of thing. Her mother was a bitch.

The thief shoved those thoughts away and gave her father a long look over. Even if she rather heartily disliked him and what he did to her, he was family.

Mikhail was… a lot older. Almost fifty by appearance alone even if she knew he was only in his late thirties or possibility early forties. Silver peppered his light brown hair, much more than mere age would account for. His body language and posture was currently cringing from her sharp words making him seem more like a bent old man that one just at middle age.

He managed to recover his composure as she noted the changes he had gone through over the years, straightening up just slightly. "Sonya… you look… well."

Almost immediately he seemed to regret his choice of words.

"Rather well, considering you dumped me off on strangers the first chance you got and never looked back?" She finished for him blandly with a nod. "Why thank you, father. I am glad you noticed."

"I never had the choice to come back for you, that… man out there saw to that."

She crossed her arms under her chest and pinned him with a flat look. "Arseniy only found you after three years of looking. You had between my fifth birthday and then to try to salvage your own mistake, do not try to pin the blame on him."

Sonya had gotten the whole story from the vor when she finally asked for this meeting. All the details, even the bits she hadn't wanted to know of or learn about.

Like the fact Nyura had sold her own daughter to a Turkish human trafficking ring that managed to sneak up the Volga River from the Black Sea. The vor of Saratov used the tip off Arseniy managed to figure out looking into her family history to demolish them, but not before the slavers caught up to her mother.

Mikhail made an expression halfway caught between a sneer and a scowl, aimed towards the doorway behind her. "I did not know the risk of running afoul of Nyura's blunder had abated by then, I had been planning on waiting five years before trying to find you again."
"Find? You dumped me on a Mafiya recruitment effort!"

"I didn't know that either!" He snapped back just as irritably, informing which parent she had inherited her short temper from. "I had only thought it was an orphanage collection point for street rats, not a gathering of little criminals."

"And that makes it all better, does it?" She ran a hand over her face again, trying and probably failing to gain a bit of restraint for that temper they shared. "Shot yourself in the foot there, father."

CII (Saturday the 2nd of April, 1966 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Had Sonya not ended up with the Zolotov clan… Mikhail probably would've succeeded both hiding her and getting himself free from his wife's stupidity ill-thought out actions. Even if she ended up under a vor just a little less thorough than Arseniy, he might have still succeeded just without being able to pick her back up again half a decade later.

She had, though. Her foster father wasn't one for half-assed efforts, getting a rather precocious girl barely out of toddlerhood to foster had incited the investigation that led to her biological father being found out.

"You know, had you said a word of why before dumping me like so much baggage… I would've been so much less angry with you."

The former pickpocket had a bad habit of always assuming the worst. It made a few things pleasantly surprising, but she tended to lash out first before thinking of why something was happening or how it got that way.

Slavery was illegal and getting placed in a group of want-to-be criminal types had led her to assume she had been sold to the Mafiya.

Stupid in hindsight, the Russian Mafiya did not do child slavery, but she had been a tiny girl shoved into a very strange world and expected to keep up without an explicit explanation. Between Rachel's knowledge of the worst kind of humans throughout time and the appearances Sonya managed to see, it hadn't been a bad assumption.

Technically, she had been sold to criminals… just not these criminals.

The difference between Turkish slavers and Russian Mafiya, one had a standard of living to give their members… and much less unpaid slave labor.

"I barely knew what was going on, Sonya. Should I have told you? That your mother sold you? You weren't even five, a tetchy bit of a girl with her head in books." Mikhail sounded both insulted and derisive. "We never wanted to be parents at that age, you were an accident I tried to do my best for."

"If you hadn't wanted to be parents, then you should have kept it in your damn pants." Sonya informed him icily. Telling a Storm-Cloud they were a mistake was apparently not a very good idea, given her slipping temper. "A little warning? Maybe a comment of how you weren't up and abandoning me? Mentioning the possibility that I would see you again? That was too hard for you to do in between packing up and hightailing it out of the city?"

Her father acquired some unhealthy looking color, his slowly reddening features was something she was thankful she didn't inherit the genetics to pull off. "It did not occur to me to give you false hope, it was just as likely that would have been the last you saw of me."

"At the moment, I am entirely sorry that isn't true."

"You don't mean that. You are my daughter."

Sonya leveled a neutral gaze on the man, tucking every scrap of irritation and hurt away to be dealt with later. Much later... like never. "Arseniy was more a father to me than you ever were. If it wasn't already filed away on my paperwork, I'd ask to change my name to reflect that."

Once she had stopped considering the vor as just scary/not to be pissed off, anyways.

"That... that beast of a man mutilated me! You cannot be serious, Sonya."

"You were the one to abandon your own flesh and blood to him, without trying anything to mitigate the damage your wife did or would cause us before fleeing like a coward."

Figuring that this conversation would go nowhere else but around the fact she was a thief or fully part of a Russian crime syndicate, or the hurt they were stubbornly holding on to, she decided it was well past the time to leave.

"Sonya! Don't you turn your back to me, girl." Mikhail's tone was taut, angry or irritated or whatever.

She was past the point of willing to try and figure it out but had enough family fidelity in her to glance back at him. "What now?"

Her less than caring, or interested or even remotely bothered, tone of voice made him turn an even darker shade of red. "Your so-called father was the one to brutalize me, don't you have anything to say to that?"

"If you ever want kids again, adopt one of those so called 'street rats.'" With that, Sonya shut the door behind her sharply.

Then came face to face with a highly amused but trying to hide it Arseniy.

The vor's lip was curled up even as he fought to keep his expression clear, the most lopsided smirk she had even seen on him. "Sassy little thing when poked, aren't you?"

She coughed awkwardly, having forgotten he was listening in on that conversation.

Arseniy rose to his full height from the chair he had been waiting for her in, giving the door she had shut a dark look but gesturing her to lead them out of the building. She did so just a touch jerkily, trying not to recall what she told her biological father about said man behind her.

It wasn't until they had started the long trek back to the neighborhood she grew up in that he spoke up again.

"Lisa can't have kids. Childhood illness took that from her, so we agreed to take a few years to foster a brat for the clan instead." The vor informed her quietly. "Tatiana was that brat, but you weren't any difficulty tacked on top of her."

The blonde swallowed thickly, blinking rapidly so she wouldn't cry. That did explain why a vor as highly skilled as him was doing spending a decade or so teaching a bunch of snot-nosed little brats the ins and outs of Mafiya life.

"I don't mind, if you want to go through with changing your name a little."

"I'd… have to file for new paperwork, though. Cherep and I are planning on leaving in a matter of weeks."

"Or Lisa could finesse it through and get you a new set, she's good at that."

A slow, almost bitter smile twisted Sonya's lips. "She is, is she? I'll ask as soon as we're home."

Arseniy hummed lowly, ambling along as if they were only out on a walk and not going home after she confronted her own father about his less than stellar care of her.

The Storm-Cloud gave the situation, more specifically her foster parents' situation, her attention in favor of stewing in her own thoughts on her blood family.

Sun Flames… they healed, right?

Was it only freshly done injuries, or could it heal something like old impairments from illness years after the damage was done?

CIII (Monday the 18th of April, 1966. A cargo boxcar, a freight train, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

A violent, screeching halt to her rushing around hadn't been what Sonya had been expecting.

She had been expecting the crushing crowds, the very loud music and talking, and late nights… she was at least not surprised by those parts.

However, circuses were… slow. It was the best term she could come up with.

Every week there was a Friday to Sunday long fair, the rest of the week they weren't putting on the big-top shows or moving around they still had customers wandering in that needed entertainment. Half a month spent in every city they would stop at, so two weekends and a week-long stretch between at most in every stop. The slow crawl across Asia and Europe would be… entirely different than what the Russian thief was used to in her own traveling.

Preparing for their Moscow opening day and the rush to pack up for getting the circus underway afterwards were not nearly as hectic as some of the things the Russian thief had to rush through. It was almost lazy rushing in comparison, but that less urgent feeling was more than made up with the sheer volume of packing and transporting logistics that had to be done.

In as little as a month, Sonya learned that she probably wouldn't be a fantastic fortuneteller herself and she had some issues putting herself in a spotlight. It went against the grain for what kind of thief she was, as her stealing was done best without witnesses.

All in all, while she didn't mind circus life it wasn't likely something she could put up with more than a handful of years.

That was alright. She was mainly just following Cherep around until he had some measure of protection as even a semi-popular act. Kidnapping a well-known public figure was harder than trying to snatch kids or minor young mechanics.

Her brother was kind of interested in learning how she did her Propagation of strength, while she really did want to learn how he Propagated himself. That would have to wait for him to figure out how to consciously control his Cloud Flames, and how to explain how it felt/seemed to work. Extrapolating it from there would take some work from them both to attempt learning the other's skill... but might prove to be more than worth the time spent.

For the time being, circus tricks would take some time to learn. Throwing knives, juggling random things, card tricks, and some stage magic were all things she might eventually make use of. Which would take some effort to master after she got the hang of the tricks. She might even actually try her hand at trapeze and tightrope walking, eventually.

They could be use in some not-quite-legal ways, so it was all good on her end.

That had been her plan, until her fellow Cloud revealed he already had conscious control over his Flames.

They were on board the train heading northwest to Kuzhenkino, where the Großes Volksfest would set up for a scant three days before moving on again. Cherep was with the heavy equipment cargo car, seeing as he was both the newest mechanic and didn't mind getting duty to ensure no breakage or theft happened between loading it all on and off.

The palm full of bright purple fire he showed her made Sonya a little... annoyed. You're screwing with my data points, damn it.

He shrugged that off with a slightly wry smirk. I've been able to do this since you punched me in the arm that one night. To make the tanzanite light up.

She chewed on her lower lip as she thought. She had been thirteen then, and still barely able to call up or consciously control her own Flames until just before her fourteenth birthday. Her brother had outstripped her by... years, really.

Then again, Cherep also had needed his innate skill with his Flames more than she had.

There was probably a correlation... Usov hadn't had any signs of being a Mist Flame user until he thought he needed something to save himself, then that fear of the unknown prompted them to remain. Which didn't end until a Storm-Cloud and Rain showed him it could be controlled at will.

Sonya needed the boosted strength to damage the vory assaulting her best friend, but she didn't require that ability to continue with her daily life, so her control and power waned. Redeveloping both control and power might've meant more to her drive to learn it rather than practice, possibly.

Dmitriy didn't have any conscious control until he got faced with a crying and hysterical child, but he had known it was possible and was now developing fine control over his power.

Tatiana only had the motivation to learn when her little sister ended up injured, and bullheaded her way through to learning a Sun's Activation based healing ability only until she had it.

Different motivations and requirements translated to different innate starting skills and control... probably controlled how strong one's Flame was, too.

Unfortunately, she didn't have the data to support her theories. There was way too much misinformation floating around for her to feel comfortable trying to push that information out somehow.
"You're not going to ask why I never told you?"

She snorted at him. "It was probably safer to keep it to yourself for while we lived with Lisa and Arseniy anyways. Plus… you are your own person. I don't need to know everything about your life, just that you're alright and alive."

"You know, I had wondered why you never demanded to know what I did most days… Lisa said it's an etiquette thing." Cherep ran a hand through his shaggy purple hair, his expression faintly bewildered.

"It is actually rather rude to ask what one does most days. Typically, because the usual response is to lie about it but occasionally because some think you don't deserve to know if you can't figure it out yourself."

There were spies to consider too, because the only ones that typically asked what one did usually ended up being government agency or police spies, information brokers, or other mafia group recruiters. All of which were semi-lethal things to try in doing in the underworld.

Therefore, if you didn't know what someone did in their days you would either find out yourself or be content with not knowing. Asking was hazardous to your health.

That was why she never asked why the hell Renato had so much time to bother her in.

"So… you didn't know Arseniy had me running messages around Moscow when you were otherwise occupied?"

"Uh… no, actually." That was… news to her. Stupid in hindsight, because everyone pitched in under that roof. "Is that where you got the money to win the motorcycle?"

"Yep."

Sonya didn't waste time feeling annoyed, Arseniy had given her fellow Cloud shelter and food and it was his prerogative to decide how the kid paid that favor back. Running missives was tame compared to what the rest of them had been doing, really.

It was his life too, she didn't know everything Tatiana got up to. Equally, they probably only knew a fraction of what she got up to. She had no right to demand that kind of information.

"Alright, do you know how you do that internal Propagation thing then?"

Her brother stopped fiddling with a recently replaced piston that had broken down, peering over at her suspiciously. "Why do you want to know?"

"For the next time I get injured."

He opened his mouth, blinked at her, then looked down at where his bike was stored. "I suppose telling you that a career that injures you isn't a good one would be highly hypocritical of me, wouldn't it?"

"Just a touch, brother dear."

"I don't really know how to explain it… just that it hurts a lot." Cherep shrugged his shoulders, probably a tossup between being uncomfortable with the topic and phantom pains from old injuries being recalled. "It doesn't burn so much as sting at first, but the clearest thing I can tell you of what I thought when this apparently happened to me was the drive to continue. To get up despite the injuries."

That was… painful sounding. Not like her breaking her hand and then refraining from using it, more like the mechanic had broken a leg or something and kept on walking on it.

Sonya beat back the desire to question her best friend closely on who exactly kidnapped him.

He had never offered that information up and she'd never ask, because more likely than not he wouldn't want to tell her.

Either out of a desire to shield her from that part of his life, or from knowing full well if she knew stealing wouldn't be the biggest crime she was guilty of.

It also sounded like either a skill she'd have to attempt learning the next time she got in a tight spot and broke something… or she should start with small cuts and try to use her Cloud Flames to replicate skin to seal them.

That was a lot more self-destructive than just destroying physical things and maybe getting a cut or bruise in the end.

CIV (Monday the 25th of April, 1966. Kuzhenkino, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"St Petersburg is next?" Sonya almost yelped, and consequently got whacked in the shin by Madame Crina's walking stick for raising her voice in constrained quarters.

"Yes girl, don't make me repeat myself." The sour old bat snipped at her while the thief packed up most of the contents inside their little tent, handing the large crystal ball and more ornate bits of her 'shop' herself. "I suppose that means St Petersburg is more to you than just the city of palaces then?"

More like the territory of a notorious underworld Mafiya group the blonde didn't want to tangle with. "It's just… surprising. I didn't know we are going that far north."

Either she had to keep her head down… or barter for safe passage. Safe passage would be the smart thing to do, trying to sneak on through could get a bit riskier than she liked when surrounded by civilians.

Thankfully they wouldn't be staying longer than a week, the circus had gained more initial operating funds their opening week than planned on so pushing out of the USSR fast to be the first outside the Iron Curtain was what they were trying to do.

"Hmph." The old gypsy woman didn't look remotely convinced, but the younger of the two thought it was more like the old bat didn't really care. "Ensure any trouble that you attract doesn't end up bothering Master Liam, girl."

Case in point. If it didn't affect the circus or the circus master, Crina didn't give a damn. Why was something she was kind of interested in learning.

Sonya tossed the last silk pillow into the chest built specifically for the delicate and easily molded cloth items, looking around once more to be sure she had gotten the bulk of their 'stage' packed up. "Right, whatever. I'm going to go tell the men they can break down the tent and move our things onto the railcar."
"Don't hurry back."

"Will do."

Their relationship might remain semi-antagonistic for the entirety of their time working together, but the Russian thief didn't really mind the thought. It was a hell of a lot better than the leering and sneers she typically got from the crowd attracting Madame Crina more customers, or the painfully faked friendliness of the trapeze artists and showgirls.

Cherep even got annoyed when the younger woman in the circus tried being friendly to her when he was around, so she was at least sure it was all faked to her. Probably.

Eh... people gave her headaches. Even her best friend at times. Straight-forward and semi-hostile was easier to deal with than simpering friendliness or snooty behavior.

Sonya located her brother easily, with his vibrant purple hair standing out in the sea of brunettes, blondes, and the occasional random colors. He wasn't the only one in the circus with vibrant or slightly odd hair and eye coloring, but he was the only one with purple as both.

"Madame Crina's tent is ready to go." She told the nearest male paying some attention to the ongoing picking up efforts in German, their circus' main common language. "What's going on?"

"We hit ground frost here, froze peg at night." Jaq, who played the exotic African strongman for the crowd looking for semi-unusual feats or exotic things to gawk at, informed her in his broken German easily enough. He was leaning on his massive wooden mallet, which showed dirt and mud where he likely hit the troublesome big top peg to loosen it up. "Nothing makes free."

She hummed her understanding. German wasn't his best language, but she couldn't speak Arabic or Berber at all just like how he couldn't understand Russian or any more of her French.

They watched in rather companionable silence as the people gathered around argue about how to get the stake of steel up, and the few attempts to just brute force the dratted thing out of the mud. They couldn't exactly leave it behind, the big top only had so many extra pegs that could take and brace the stress and weight of the massive circus tent.

She would not be offering her Cloud Flame strength as a possibility, only if they decided to finally abandon it would she yank the steel up and sneak it back into the supply carriage.

Cherep suddenly fell backwards onto his ass, flinging a lot of icy mud everywhere. The very stake like peg in question in hand. "Got it!"

Jaq harrumphed, swinging his massive wooden and iron prop over his shoulder. "I likely knocked up for him."

"Cherep's strength against your hammer? Very likely indeed." Sonya agreed with the burly and bald black man, patting him on the elbow. She couldn't reach his shoulder, she might only just be able to reach it with her full growth in a few years. "You might've given up a touch too soon if he got it so quickly."

Except... she could probably out lift the man if cheating by using her Dying Will Flames. The young mechanic had been listening and watching her utilizing her Cloud Flames for years, and they had been trying to use each other's ability lately.

Her best friend might not share her opinion on the showcasing of Flame abilities.
The thief had to obey Omertà, her brother didn't.

…and likely wouldn't. Even if it had gotten him kidnapped before, he was still planning on trying to become famous for his death-defying abilities.

Sonya, at the very least, should probably have a word with him about not confirming anything merely to help him stay off the underworld's radar. As well as some coaching on what to do if approached by any shady or too good to be true characters.

It was the biggest risk her fellow Cloud was taking with his plan on becoming a stuntman, especially if he did some Flame enabled death-defying in front of a full house.

CV (Saturday the 30th of April, 1966. Saint Petersburg, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

St. Petersburg was situated on the Gulf of Finland, part of the Baltic Sea.

Which was part of how the Grekov Gang became so influential, they had a sea route to the Atlantic Ocean and the countries not under the Soviet Union's rule. More than the vory of Saratov, who had miles of river to traverse before any goods were shipped in or out.

Smuggled black market goods, the smuggling people in and out of the Soviet Union, and the acquisition of anything outside of the Iron Curtain you might ever want was what they had built their little empire from.

The Grekov Gang was also better informed than the more mainland Mafiya syndicates. Partially, they could also control what the rest of them learned of those far from their icy home territory.

Which would also mean they knew more than what any syndicate generally tended to know about the rest of the world.

Additionally, it meant Sonya had not wanted to set foot in the admittedly beautiful city for any reason. Even if the ports here served Mafia Land more than any of the smaller ones farther south, and that trip took her longer, the Russian thief always went either more west or south to get or settle a contracted heist.

Hopefully the sexism in mafia life and generally 'unknown' umbrella most Flame users currently labored under would keep her from being too interesting.

While to the Zolotovs Dying Will Flames were just a strange fire ability some of their younger members could play around with… that would change fast, with Usov there to show them how much even a young Mist could fuck someone over.

To the Grekovs, it might be more like how the Vongola viewed theirs as desirable traits to be coveted and the users made loyal any way possible.

No, Vongola didn't have a shiny reputation. For one, they were mafia. For another, World War Two was only two decades from being over and a lot of that nastiness was still lingering around.

In an effort not to draw undue attention to herself, Sonya bit a bullet and went into one of the 'known' contact points for the Grekov Gang.
"Sonya of Zolotov, eh?" This Boris wasn't as amicable as Tatiana's tattooist Boris, but likely that had to do because she didn't belong to the local syndicate in power. "What are you doing with a bunch of civvies?"

As a fifteen-year-old, she no longer qualified for the blanket protection young children enjoyed in the Russian underworld. Getting protection or slipping in and out of other territories was a lot harder than her occasional heists around the Soviet Union few years ago.

"Laying low, of course." The blonde gave him a bland smile, ignoring the fact he likely wasn't the one in charge or who she really should've been speaking to. Likely, the vor in charge of this little hideout was one of the ones playing 'bodyguard' or not quite in the room with them. "I did a few jobs that might have been a bit too high profile to handle the resulting heat. So now I'm hiding with the pigeons and pretending to be a good girl."

Which was a big fat lie, but she was a thief not a schoolgirl. They would be expecting one anyways, it was better to give them what they thought they wanted then to leave.

Preferably before Madame Crina decided to finally get herself and her 'shop' set up for their opening day in this city. The old bat had lingered about that the last two times, until most of the others had set up where they would be for the two or three days they would be operating for a mere weekend long stay and poached a convenient 'corner' or the closest thing to it.

That wouldn't spare Sonya's shins if she was late getting back, but it was a risk she had to run.

There was some hemming and hawing, and some frankly insulting insinuation passed around, but she kept the pleasant façade up and ignored the harassment until her 'bribe' to get ignored for the week was accepted and she was free to go.

Keeping herself from stiffening up when a few snips of gossip about the Zolotov Flame users proved almost too tricky for her. The Grekov Gang knew about Usov, not his name but that he was very young and a Mist.

Scarily well informed could be added to what she knew of the most influential Russian Mafyia syndicate of St Petersburg.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 1st of May, 1966. Saint Petersburg, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Predictably, that wasn't the end of it.

Of course not, the Storm-Cloud didn't apparently have that kind of luck. She might've used hers all up keeping Cherep mostly out from under the Zolotov clan's collective thumb.

The Grekov Gang responded to a Zolotov in their territory by sending in a much more personable man the next day, a vor who charmingly introduced himself as 'Valera'. Then he tried buttering her up to learn the truth behind a few of the stranger stories coming out of Moscow, and coincidentally Zolotov, territory.

If Sonya had not spent some of her developing years around someone like Renato Sinclair, who was both a charming bastard and totally unapologetic about using it for his own ends, or her foster father, who wasn't nearly so charming but still eye candy in a way, she might have gotten distracted enough to fall for his pretty face slightly.
There was also her two decades of life as Rachel to consider, who hadn't been considered nearly as 'pretty' as the thief was now. She had dealt with things like popular cliques playing with 'lesser people' and college students jockeying for a professor's time and attention.

Added to all that was Jaq, who couldn't speak to her much with his broken German but was a marvelous bouncer for the girls of the circus anyways. The strongman did tend to beat away the overzealous admirers the trapeze artists and showgirls tended to attract as it was, he just didn't seem to mind when appreciated for doing so.

Jaq was also someone who Valera couldn't charm, given he didn't understand much Russian and understood about one word of five in German.

Renato was harder to dodge than Valera. She wasn't sure if that was a bonus in favor of the Italian Mafioso or against the Russian vor, but it was true.

The problem was the fact that the Storm-Cloud wasn't speaking to Grekov Gang's man proved she did have something to hide. That something only partially included Cherep, but he was still part of it.

Sonya didn't have the charisma to avoid confirming the bare basics, or apparently to pry a leech off her. The fact was annoying her greatly, more than getting Valera sicced on her at all had.

It stood to reason that she wasn't remotely happy when the mechanic popped up at first.

There was less than a day left to go, Großes Volksfest would be packing up at the end of this night and leaving for Finland, Norway, and Sweden in that order. That was where they would leave the Iron Curtain, as well.

The slick man probably sensed a weakness, because for all that he was getting stonewalled by her he was probably a good intelligence gatherer for their age group. The St Petersburg vor turned an ingraining smile on the purple haired mechanic. "Now, now? Who is this?"

"Someone, nice to meet you." Cherep eyed him, then her probably flat expression. Then took the conversation somewhere his little sister didn't quite expect. "Are you coming to the after-party?"

"Not planning on it, no." She responded hesitantly. "Why?"

"You know, you don't have to stick so close to Crina. I don't think that bat would mind if you tried socializing a little."

"I stick to said bat because at least she's honest about herself and how she views others."

"The women around here might not be collectively the nicest girls ever, but they're not all that bad. There's a couple I think you might actually like somewhat."

Sonya gave that some thought, because her best friend did know her better than anyone else around for kilometers. If he thought she might like someone, it was possible. "Uh… maybe. Depends."

"Excuse me-"

The Cloud siblings looked at him, then each other, then looked back at Valera and spoke at the same time. "No."

The thief then ignored him, because she had better things to do. "I don't have to bring something, do I?"
"Like what?"

"Liquor or food? It's a party, isn't it?"

"The food is mostly leftover concession stand fair, so no food. We do chip in for the cost of the booze, though."

"Then I'm chipping in for Jaq, because I had to hide behind him yesterday."

Cherep snorted dryly. "You realize that's why he does it, right?"

"It would be rude to not, taking advantage of him like that without giving him something to show for it."

"You should probably go tell Crina you're abandoning her for the night, then." Somehow, the mechanic had managed things which ended up with Sonya no longer cornered against a block of fair food stalls.

She took the obvious opening Cherep made for her, not entirely sure how he managed that but greatly appreciative of it anyways. He waited until she was obviously out of sight before turning to the vor that had been harassing her.

"Stop bothering her, before I spread the news some faction in St Petersburg has no problem interrupting normal business hours on whims."

"You're the devotchka's little guard dog, then?"

"A concerned bystander, at the very least." Her brother demurred easily, not reacting to the insinuation at all.

She was a little impressed at that, as she couldn't keep from getting defensive when pressed.

Maybe he had a point when insisting she should socialize more, she couldn't really get people to stop pressing if the icy thing didn't turn them off and she wasn't allowed to retaliate freely.

A mental note made to bother Cherep the next time she couldn't get someone off her, and the former pickpocket left him to it. He was doing a lot better than she had done trying to get the vor to leave.

CVI (Thursday the 5th of May, 1966. Helsinki, the Republic of Finland.)

Passing part of the Iron Curtain from Soviet controlled countries into non-Soviet territory still bemused Sonya no matter how many times she did it.

From what Rachel had once known, the phenomena of the Cold War called the 'Iron Curtain' blocked off access between a large chunk of Eurasia and the rest of the world as a halt of all things. Trade, immigration, and outside news, none of it was supposed to leach through without underground, either underworld or spies leaking information, help.

Both a physical and mental barrier, an eyesore of a scar that split Germany’s capital city in half.

Which… wasn't how it worked as far as she knew it in this lifetime. She had made it a point to know, given her work on a non-stationary floating island that moved far in as little as a week.
Under a less hostile Cold War the Iron Curtain merely meant a boundary line that Soviet communists didn’t tend to cross and where trade being imported into the region tended to dry up. The ‘war’ was more one of ideology fought with business models and the continued successes of government rule, not one fought by suggesting the possibility of murdering another’s populace and armies before they could murder you.

Still an eyesore of a scar that separated East and West Germany, and a distinct 'regional' mindset was found in those that lived within it that was less than hospitable to those outside of it. More mental than physical in places, but enough was physical that it was similar enough as it was.

Part of that bewildering pacifistic warfare was fought by the entertainment industry, in the Russian Circuses that toured around and showcased the talents of young Soviet men and women to the rest of the world. They didn't quite stack up to Hollywood, but they were more real than fantasy people on the silver screen in return for the lesser spotlight.

While traveling for a vacation outside the Soviet Union made the border guards peer at their foster family suspiciously all those years ago… it also meant the thief traveling for 'business' was just barely tolerable, no matter what age she was at, and being one part of a circus troupe actually 'favorable'.

The circus master Liam got them through the Iron Curtain at St Petersburg and to Finland's capital of Helsinki in what seemed to her record setting time.

Rachel had grown up hearing the result of the fall of the Berlin Wall and the rest of the Iron Curtain, which made what Sonya know of it more confusing.

Of course, that was until she bothered to touch base with the local faction of mafia in the area.

Not something she tended to do when outside the Soviet Union, for usually at best she was in whatever city or town for a night before leaving again. The slow crawl progress the circus was doing made her look around for something to distract her, and underworld neutral points were interesting to scope out if you had the time.

They weren't the safest thing to do, however.

Randomly wandering into one made for a very hostile reception, until you could prove you belonged to the underworld yourself. The Russian thief's tattoos did help slightly, but that wasn't something she could walk around showing off freely this close to the Soviet Union.

She ended up smashing some overly slick ass of a man's head into the bar, not hard enough to pulp the bone and brain but enough to knock the so called 'gentleman' out for the night. That got her a free shot of whisky she wasn't drinking and a bit of local gossip, as the man had been annoying the owner of the little watering hole before he switched targets to her.

Gossip about how hard one of the local syndicate's bosses was working to keep the trade going even in the face of Soviet stinginess. Getting more out of the bartender took a respectable amount out of Sonya's purse of loose funds, but she robbed the ass that had lewdly propositioned her to make up for it.

Finland's mercantile side itself was supportive of the views and policies of the Soviet Union, even if they didn't belong to it itself. Meaning they were probably the best place for trade to happen, as any imports into the Union were tariffed heavily. While obviously imports were scorned heavily deeper in the USSR, trading raw materials for consumables were less ostracized the farther one got from the Motherland.
An absolute lockdown on trade wouldn't help the economy in this part of the world, meaning the metal and minerals coming out of the Soviet Union wouldn't be traded for the surplus of food the Finnish somehow had.

She was interested in hearing it and wondered if that would allow her birth country to avoid the fall Rachel knew of. While she might recall a coup and some dubious policies were involved, sometime near Rachel's original birth date, she did not exactly know what led to the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

"Interested in shutting it down?" The bartender asked hesitantly in Russian when she pressed him for more.

"No, my job requires I travel. If there is no trade, there will be no travel. Not very good for a thief who wanders." The Storm-Cloud informed him honestly enough. "I would like to know if you know any obvious obstructions to my continued business."

"No… the most I know of obstructions were all dealt with already."

She mentally debated if he understood her incorrectly or was just being unhelpful. Maybe she should attempt finding someone that knew Finnish or Swedish to teach her. Sonya belatedly realized half the problem might be the fact she wasn't ordering anything to drink… but she also didn't want the whisky shot she hadn't watched being poured.

"You wouldn't happen to have any vodka, would you?" She would have to watch her intake closely, but at least she knew her limits with that poison. A couple shots wouldn't do more than make her tipsy, her limit for casual drinking.

Playing a snooty Russian connoisseur of liquor got her more information on the ongoing trade issues, go figure.

CVII (Sunday the 29th of May, 1966. Muonio, the Republic of Finland.)

Setting up the Grobès Volksfest took two days, while breaking it down took one. With a general three days of operation a week if they were going fast and eleven if it was a slower visit, that left a day of travel from point to point.

The combination of the slow crawl up Finland, where they would cross over to Norway near the most northern edge of the country then zigzag across to Sweden the way down to England, and the amount of time between opening the circus and closing for the weekend literally drove Sonya to drink.

At mafia bars, but the point stood.

Why wasn't there a mafia library or something?

The biggest variation she found was a quaint little sandwich shop in Tampere, or a cigar shop and smoking lounge in Oulu, but mainly underworld gathering spots were all bars.

The Storm-Cloud would kill for a simple café… but mafia cafés likely started in France and it would take another two or three months to get down there.

The more she visited the underworld hotspots, the more she regretted her personal view on using her Dying Will Flames obviously until they became more common. Which was not to, at least until she wouldn't be preemptively attacked or courted by someone more annoying than Valera from St Petersburg.

Local news in this northeastern corner of the underworld was that while Dying Will Flames were making a small trickle comeback, they weren't widespread yet. Syndicates were still zealously guarding their few users, even if their abilities were of a more party-trick variety than useful.

Like Dmitriy, and his ability to calm hysterics or stop machinery. While that might get to the point of Tranquilizing someone to death if he had the motivation, it wasn't apparent just yet.

At the very least she started buying bottles of whatever local brew was available and giving it to Madame Crina, who cut back on the sour sniping and bitchiness in return. It probably wasn't the best idea to enable the old bat's alcoholic tendency, but she seemed happier at least.

Sonya herself took up a very bad habit of smoking, but she'd stop… eventually. She had to, with her book hoarding issue the fires that could start alone would make her.

Admittedly, that issue could be solved by smoking outside.

She gave the, very annoying, cancer stick in her hands a dark look.

…fuck it, at least the habit was relaxing if not great for her health. She'd be coughing out a lung by the time she was thirty.

Besides her increasing alcohol tolerance and picking up a nasty habit, the freelance thief also learned a bit about the Obtshak and how it operated. The local conglomerate of mafia groups was at least an equal opportunity one, in that they had a thriving human trafficking ring ongoing.

She spent more time than she'd ever admit keeping track of the circus and ensuring the people she and Cherep worked with were not likely to meet anyone they would only meet once down a dark alleyway. Getting the information to do so made her feel three shades of disgusting, mostly because she wasn't going to wage a one-woman crusade against any underworld syndicate involved in human trafficking.

Sonya likely wouldn't survive trying that. She couldn't afford to. Therefore, she wasn't planning on it.

No matter how closely that scraped against her sensibilities or made her irritable.

The misplaced Russian stopped short, flicking her nearly burnt out cigarette butt to the sidewalk and grinding the still burning cherry under her heel. It didn't make her feel better.

Though she itched to light up another one, just simply because it was something to do, Sonya didn't particularly want to become a chain smoker and refrained.

The whole reason she was out that night was because her best friend and a few of the other young men from the circus decided to go out drinking. Strictly a guy thing in a tiny tavern of Muonio, their last city they would be visiting in Finland. Sort of a celebration of a kind, in getting free and clear this far with a semi-respectable amount to travel on.

Even if they did badly in Norway and Sweden, they had the funds to absorb that and continue to move on.

Instead of spending yet another night darning whatever Crina wanted fixed or seeking out a bar of her own to get slightly tipsy at or try socializing with the other carnie workers, Sonya had decided to wander about.

It was a nice night, slightly warmer than Moscow. Pretty too, with the stars and everything overhead.

The scream that escaped the nearby alleyway she had just passed sent knives up her spine, and she hesitated.

On one hand it really wasn't her business… and yet she just as fast turned around to see what the hell was going on and if it was one of the circus workers.

Damn her bloody, paranoid curiosity.

It wasn't a girl, even if the scream had been shrill and ear breaking. Someone rather youngish hadn't been able to keep it in when someone else broke their hand.

She eyed the group suspiciously, but figured it was likely a thief that got caught out stealing from the wrong person.

Again, not her business.

That didn't mean they decided she was just as irrelevant as she thought them.

Sonya got something spat at her before she could keep walking but being unable to speak the local language kind of hampered the communication. She tried anyways, holding up her hands and repeating 'I'm not involved' in all the languages she knew. German, French, Italian, Russian, English, Chinese, and trying what broken Arabic or Romanian she had been adding lately.

It didn't help, she was almost unsurprised by that.

CVIII (Monday the 30th of May, 1966. Muonio, the Republic of Finland.)

Sonya didn't particularly want to kill.

It wasn't so much a moral, 'respect all living things' ideology she held fast to as it was a semi-troubling slippery slope in her shadowy underworld life. A kind of 'do it once and never stop' kind of assumption prevalent in her lifestyle.

Stealing one's valuables probably wasn't nearly as lucrative as stealing someone's life.

Therefore, if she ever had to… for the sake of her own life or her safety or whatever reason she would try to justify it, she would rather it happen much, much later.

However, these… people were armed and didn't look very happy with her moment of curiosity. They also had no issue pointing firearms in her face.

If she didn't want to kill them, she was a little limited on the Dying Will Flames end. Nothing overt, anyways. That ruled out her Bec de Corbins, because she wasn't obviously armed with large polearms.

The brat the four gentlemen of questionable morals had been roughing over collapsed, from pain or stress or just a combination of both or more, pulling down the arms of one man and attracting massed attention.
The thief moved directly afterwards to take advantage, abusing the hell out of her Propagation enabled speed and the combat teachings Aleksandr drilled in all the Mafiya brats that got shoved at him. An elbow to one's throat, a punch to someone else's guts, kicked out knee and her own drilled into someone's nose, and that left her the last man holding the collapsed brat.

He almost shot her, but the aim was off enough it didn't even skim her skin. Sonya did feel the heat of the bullet pass her stomach and likely put a hole through her clothes, so she punched his lights out.

That left her with four unconscious bodies and a whimpering brat, but at least she had no overt Flame use here that might come back to bite her.

Kicking the kid lightly in the thigh didn't get her much of a response. Sighing heavily through her nose, the Russian thief hauled the skinny kid up and tossed him over a shoulder.

She did interfere, so she had to take responsibility for what had happened. Sonya intended to dump him off at a hospital or, if he woke up, home if he had one.

Much to her irritation, he took the opportunity to throw up whatever had been in his stomach all over the back of her coat.

Well… if this didn't teach her to mind her own damn business, nothing would.

He was at least weakly twitching and somewhat moving under his own power, so she set him on his feet once they were free of the alleyway. Taking off and tossing the coat he soiled on him, the Russian promptly left him there.

He was alive and awake… ish. He could make his own damn way home… or to a hospital.

She dug into her pockets of her slacks, came to a sudden halt as something missing occurred to her, and turned back.

The brat was no more awake than he had been before, but he was at least aware enough to know she was possibly lethally violent and not something he wanted to draw the focused attention of. Him stiffening up when she approached was probably a little too late to help him much in that.

She just wanted her pack of the damn cigarettes back, and after digging them out of the coat turned to continue.

Small little parlor trick she had learned, a brush of Storm Flames could light things on fire if she was careful enough. It was less holding her red fire to an object and letting the Disintegration feature leech into whatever, more holding it close until it combusted itself under the heat, but an interesting trick that meant she would never require a lighter to smoke.

Kind of like using a laser or magnifying glass to light things on fire, but the versatility appealed to her. Possibly even her Cloud Flames could do it, but Storm Flames were how she discovered the ability.

Sonya expected that to be it, she had beaten up a couple of mooks and the kid was… alright-ish. The circus was leaving for Norway the next day, she'd wouldn't be in range of any retaliation in just a few hours. The brat probably knew to keep his head down until he was healed up.

Win for everyone, right?

She did not appreciate the inept stalking.
It took the brat a few streets to decide to do it, and she had almost forgot him by then. Likely he went back to see if he needed to run or something and decided following closely to her was somehow a great idea.

What about her was such bait for bratty little boys?

He followed her six streets, out of the city proper and into the suburbs and eventually into the fairgrounds themselves.

It wasn't that late, so instead of just shaking the kid off her tail or dealing with it she ducked around the last remaining tents a bit until he got closer. Close enough for her to shove him at Madame Crina's feet.

The gypsy woman wasn't remotely amused.

Her apprentice in mysticism hefted over a bottle of whisky from the semi-obvious stash of alcohol she had stored away, and at least the old bat agreed to translate.

The brat's name was Björn, and he had apparently decided to stick it with Sonya until the next city she visited.

Kid looked nothing like a bear, why Crina translated his name as such was beyond her.

The Russian thief shrugged it off, if it wasn't a permanent arrangement she'd deal. That gibberish that came out of his mouth made her itch, because it sounded like German but wasn't and she couldn't understand him.

Björn gave her a gap-toothed smile, or grin or whatever that arrangement of his mouth was supposed to be. She glared flatly back at him.

She had Crina tell the brat he was making his own arrangements, because she wasn't doing anything else for him.

Before she left him to managed his own way, she did at least straighten out the bones of his hand. Not to be nice, just so it didn't heal up crooked and have him following her even more. The fingers of her right hand were crooked from smashing them in a heist years ago, it wasn't really all that fun.

Turns out, she probably would've been better off just ignoring him.

He didn't stop stalking her.

CIX (Wednesday the 15th of June, 1966, Tromsø, Kingdom of Norway.)

"You're using math to prove you can do stunts." Sonya summed up Cherep's excited babble shortly a few weeks later, picking through the few he had completed.

It wasn't really a bad idea, honestly. Even if it did make her want to grimace.

It was also more than what she ever figured math would involve in her life, but since he was actually very good at the subject she wasn't surprised he had done this. A bit nervous, and a little wary, but not surprised.

"Think Master Liam will go for it?" Her fellow Cloud had long experience in knowing what her less than expressive tones meant, so he shamelessly ignored the non-enthusiastic mien of his best friend.

As far as Sonya had pegged out circus life, the moment they did less than adequately in a month Liam would go around asking for what the circus people thought they could add to their main show or side attractions. If her mechanically inclined best friend showed his work then, it would likely get at least considered.

Since she was his best friend, she told him so.

"That's... a great idea."

She rolled her eyes at his surprised tone, then rolled up the paper Cherep had used to calculate out angles, forward momentum, and likely distance he could get on his Russian made motorcycle for safe keeping.

They didn't exactly provide the circus with a lot of cash draw on their own. He might enable continued operations and had been doing rather well in that from what was bandied around where his little sister could hear, but she didn't generate a lot of income herself either.

Madame Crina was a niche thing. Fortune tellers were just a staple of visiting a circus. Being a draw girl, or occasionally subbing in for the old bat, didn't increase how much money their booth took in by a lot.

Enough to validate having an assistant, but not enough to make her invaluable.

This stunt thing, if it became popular, would change Cherep from being an expected expense for operations and become a revenue draw in his own right. Master Liam would likely at least try it out, since he was a very good circus master and seemed perfectly amiable to trying different things when he could from what they saw of the big top shows' rotations.

"Just... don't annoy Master Liam asking about it." Sonya ignored his suddenly innocent look. "I know you've been after this for years but try to be patient for a little bit longer. You're almost there. Don't screw it up at the finish line."

Her brother took back his plans with an entirely too angelic smile, tossing them into the steamer trunk he was living out of without looking. "So, what are we doing?"

"I don't know, do you want to go get something other than campfire food for dinner?" She wasn't really a fan of stew and crackers for dinner every night, which was what they typically ate if the circus wasn't set up yet or the cold jerky and dried fruit passed around when they were on the road.

"You're not going drinking tonight?"

"Not much of a point." The mafia hangouts were becoming more and more like simple local watering holes and less like what she'd expect for an underworld hangout.

By all appearances the farther north one got, the less actual syndicates operating.

Sonya had a theory those supposed mafia bars were all along smuggling routes, and only operated as such when their local faction of the mafia came through. Which made the northern end of Norway, Sweden, and Finland somewhat unclaimed territory in the underworld.

There wasn't enough crime to warrant a dedicated den or two. Freelancers abounded in territories like this so there was crime, but if there was a larger networked syndicate she hadn't found them yet.
Not that she'd try to stick it out up here, but it was interesting to know.

"We're going to need someone that speaks the local language." Cherep pointed out, locking his trunk and snagging himself a coat.

It might be the beginning of summer, but they were still in the northern tip of Norway. Biting cold at night didn't really describe it.

"How about that kid?"

"What kid?"

Her fellow Cloud slid an amused look at her as the left the 'dormitory' tent encampment for their night off. "The one that hasn't stopped stalking you since the last town."

"Bear boy?" Sonya asked incredulously. "We are not bringing that annoying brat with us."

Bjørn had disappeared for a short while, then somehow popped up once they had crossed the Finland/Norway border. The fact the Russian thief was flatly ignoring him didn't seem to bother him too much, and he kept any thieving away from the circus at least which didn't exactly motivate her into dealing with him.

Likely because she rescued him once he probably thought he could duck behind her again if he pissed off the wrong people. Which she wasn't going to do, because that would only encourage Bjørn to keep on doing it.

Actually, she wasn't even sure the brat was a thief. He might've just been a runner, for messages or other bits of less critical information.

Sonya narrowed her eyes on Cherep, who grinned mischievously back at her.

"How about Crina?"

Yes, the only reason she suggested it was to see him blanch. It was funny.

The fact the old bat overheard them and decided to invite herself along was just her luck.

They at least didn't eat stew again that night, and Norway had some fantastic bread. Crina stole half of Sonya's pack of cigarettes, annoyingly enough, but at least kept a civil tongue about her over dinner.

CX (Friday the 1st of July, 1966. Luleå, Kingdom of Sweden.)

Stealing while working for a circus wasn't the best idea, or at least doing them both at the same time wasn't.

That kind of thing could be traced back to the Großes Volksfest and Master Liam to make trouble for them, so even if Sonya got annoyed at the idiots that wandered into the circus just to gape at everything but not spend money she didn't lift their wallets.

She was on such good behavior it was depressing.

A circus troupe was enough of a close-knit community that any theft was rather quickly tracked down and dealt with, meaning it wasn't even worth it in the first place.

The former pickpocket didn't really want to lose her skills while here either. If she couldn't practice them as they were meant to be used, or at least how she tended to use them, then something else had to be found.

She could practice ballet with some of the other girls and helping with the trapeze stunts did count as gymnastic in a way. It didn't really help her muscle tone, because by this point exhausting her Cloud Flames before exercise was a difficult thing to do.

When she went back to being alone, that would hurt like hell to fix.

The only way she'd get combat practice in was if she went out and picked fights, which was so stupid she barely gave the idea any thought. If one found her that was another thing, but violence like that could be traced back to the circus just as easily as stealing.

Sleight of hand tricks were likely the only way her fingers would remain dexterous enough for her main job. She had a semi-small selection of locks she practiced picking now and again, that changed as she found newer ones and discarded the simpler ones she had already learned by heart.

In four months the Storm-Cloud had learned to juggle and throw knives, some basic card tricks that she might be able to make a bit more impressive with Cloud Flames, and how to breathe fire.

Not because it was something she thought she could use, but because that was really freaking cool and Jaq's friend Faris didn't mind teaching her in return for some of her wine stash to supplement his supply.

Sonya might be a slight pyromaniac, given her fire ability and her willingness to use it.

The knife-throwing and juggling she incorporated into her gypsy girl costume, and the immediate downswing in how many leers and insulting propositions she got from local single men was gratifying. Faris had her help him out in a couple shows, mixing up the fuel that he lit on fire as needed instead of having a premade mix for every show limit his act.

Which was in truth lamp oil, not pure alcohol. The wine was just to mask the flavor and the bottle to deceive the audience about how it was possible, apparently.

Eh, still a cool skill.

She was in the middle of looking for more people to send Madam Crina's way for her day-job when Cherep sought her out.

He had a hopeful grin on his face that made her suspicious. "Think you could jump from a moving platform?"

"…probably, why?"

"How about a moving vehicle?"

"I've… never tried, so I don't know. Again, why?"

"Want to help me with a stunt? Master Liam said if I could impress him, he'd let me start doing stunts for the circus next year."

"So you want me…? To jump from the back of that motorcycle… on to what?"
"Not onto anything." The want-to-be stuntman informed her as if that was going to reassure her. "Up to one of the trapeze artists."

Sonya stared at him flatly as she tried to work that out in her head. "If I do this, it's cutting some time off how much I'm willing to be a circus performer."

"I just need you to do it once or twice, to convince the others it's not a really hard concept or trick."

Jumping off the back of a motorcycle and hoping someone caught her wasn't her idea of easy.

The Russian thief sighed and reassured herself that at least the practice parts would include every safety measure the circus used to safeguard their performers between shows. "When?"

"Once we reach Oslo, we're sticking it out for two weeks there."

That would... be in another month or so, as they were speeding through Norway and Sweden rather fast compared to how they went up Finland. Then again, it was fully summer now and it had been the mid to late parts of spring for when they were traveling north.

She shrugged off her misgivings, because this was what he'd need to avoid the mafia without an underworld criminal nearby to counter the attention any unconscious Flame usage would draw. "Alright, whatever. As long as I don't have to actually perform the damn stunt with you in front of a crowd, I'll help you out."

Cherep wasn't an overly muscled young man, it didn't seem as if Cloud Flame use would allow that, but he was strong enough to make her wheeze if he gave her a bear hug. "Thanks, Sonya."

"Just make sure to add into your calculations what the sudden downward force would do to your bike, and what the sudden loss of my weight would do to you. Please."

"How much do you weigh, exactly?"

His fellow Cloud felt perfectly justified punching him lightly in the gut. The grin he wore told her he knew asking would annoy her and did it anyways.
CXI

CXI (Sunday the 31th of July, 1966. Oslo, Kingdom of Norway.)

Jiayi was a tiny Chinese woman with dark hair and eyes, about middle-aged, and long since retired from performing for crowds. What she did for the Großes Volksfest now that her show days were behind her was choreographing the flying circus acts and managing the performers that showcased them to the public.

She was also the one that slotted time on the trapeze for any needed practice, and the lady that Sonya had to go through to pull off what Cherep wanted her to do once they reached Oslo.

The tiny and fierce woman's rapid-fired Mandarin Chinese was hard for her to follow at first, given how long it had been since she'd last spoken or heard the language. The fact she bothered trying to keep up at all at least won her some leeway from Jiayi, as well as the fact she did sometimes participate in the gymnastic routines the trapeze artists used to stay flexible.

The Storm-Cloud's bad habit of smoking rather negated all of that, however. The lady would huff and puff, but since the Russian thief wasn't the only one of 'her girls' to have nasty habits that impacted her breathing she let her go off now and again when the blonde was getting frustrated.

Trapeze swinging and tightrope walking was harder than she had counted on.

Ballet training and gymnastics only got one so far in the art, and before the tiny Chinese woman would sign off on Sonya using the big top's rig she had to prove she wasn't going to panic or fall off like an idiot. Which meant several days of practice on the much lower practice rig set up when they had the time to put in the hours to make use of it.

Day four of the 'rest' week they were taking in Oslo, almost a full month of working on the art whenever she could spare a few hours, was when she finally stopped trying to treat the tightrope like a solid balancing beam and could judge the momentum of the swinging trapeze bars to make a rather clumsy transference without arresting their momentum.

Meaning day five of that rest week was when Jiayi finally gave a reluctant green light for Cherep's stunt attempt.

Not before the fierce little Chinese woman wrangled a concession out of the Storm-Cloud to keep practicing on the trapeze. Her trained balance and hand-eye coordination a thief like her needed for certain skills apparently impressed the older woman somewhat, and the younger teen's flat refusal to be part of the big-top shows didn't seem to daunt her.

Having an emergency option if one of her girls got hurt too badly to perform seemed way too enticing for Jiayi to pass up.

Sonya, after the first bumps and bruises wore off, didn't mind putting in the hours the tiny lioness of a Chinese woman demanded. It wasn't nearly as intensive as what she really did need, given her Cloud Flames rendering any light or mild exercise routine ineffective, but every little bit could only help.

Her brother hadn't been idle while she learned the 'ropes' of trapeze swings, so to speak.
He and some of the other menfolk had cobbled together two ramps, one angled to give him the most height he could safely get and the other with a gentle slope back down to land on. It probably wouldn't last very long, and if he got the approval to go ahead with stunt work they'd have to make a better one for future shows, but it would work for the few days they needed it.

A few test jumps, some of them with a large bag of sand to simulate her weight, and he was as confident as could be. A slight change, though. No one else really wanted to be involved in something so risky, so it would just be the foster siblings trying out his trick stunt.

Now, the former pickpocket had to try to mix her newly acquired skill in trapeze swings and recovering from a fall while tightrope walking with Cherep's jumping of his little Russian made motorcycle.

It was… rather more nerve-wracking than she had counted on.

"I did say I was going to get you on one eventually."

"I entirely regret you were right in that claim."

Her fellow Cloud had the American made Bell Star helmet she had specifically ordered for him in his hands, the only full-face helmet of the era. Getting it when the USSR was so against imports or anything made in the US had been a headache and a half, but entirely worth it and the expensive price-tag.

Even if he misjudged the forces at work in mid-jump, at least he likely wouldn't be suffering a severe head injury.

The fact it was bright ass purple, nearly the same shade as his hair and eyes, merely meant he didn't tend to forget to wear the damned thing. For some reason, Cherep rather liked his coloring and wore purple whenever he could.

Sonya sighed heavily through her nose, vowing that the moment they were done she was taking a permanent smoke break for the rest of the day. "Let us get this over with."

Her brother, like the brat he was, flashed her an excited grin before tugging on his favorite birthday present from her.

A 1965 Izh Planeta motorcycle looked like a bicycle with a gasoline engine attached, as far as aesthetics went. There was more to it, but she didn't really feel charitable towards her best friend's favorite metal thing.

His plan for this stunt was to have her standing on the back seat of his bike, which while unadvised wasn't too hard for her if she braced her legs against his back and gripped his shoulders. Balancing while he got up to speed was tricky, and she started swearing under her breath when Cherep gunned the throttle and aimed for the jump ramp.

Sonya wore the safety harness attached to the performers when trying out new tricks, which was her only reassurance she wasn't going to get her fool head splattered open trying this. Jaq was on the other end, easily being twice her size in body mass made the strongman a very good counterweight if anything went wrong.

Actually hitting the ramp made her stomach drop into her toes, but to her surprise just letting go of Cherep's shoulders actually seemed to make everything easier.

Rather, putting space between herself and his deathtrap of a machine was something she was keen
Her brother bore down on the front end of his bike, tilting them rather disturbingly, which was her signal to jump for it. Doing so actually forced the back end of the bike to dip and evened him out, but then she was a little too concerned by reaching the swing left to hang to watch what was going to happen to him.

Getting a one-handed grip on it wasn't the best thing ever, the stress it put on her shoulder hurt until she got her other hand on the wooden bar. Then she looked down, trying to ignore the dizzying height.

From the look of the tiny people below her, the want-to-be stuntman had landed safely and was very damn excited about it.

Great. Fantastic. She was never doing this kind of crap again.

Sonya huffed, then glared at the next platform she needed to build up the momentum to reach to get down.

Never the fuck again.

CXIII (Monday the 8th of August, 1966. Oslo, Kingdom of Norway.)

The good news was that she hadn't torn something in her shoulder. That would've sucked.

Cherep was also given the news that he could start thinking up of other stunts and Master Liam would try to work it into the circus acts next year. Maybe not a big-top show, but at least a side-show display at first. Only if it proved popular would they start showcasing him as a stuntman.

Sonya supposed that might count as good news too.

The bad news was none of the other girls were keen on trying what she had done.

She could sort of understand that. She trusted her fellow Cloud a lot, enough to follow along with whatever crazy plan he had cobbled together and at least try it out. Not that she'd always do so, but generally if she couldn't find a reason not to she'd still do something he suggested once or twice.

The trapeze artists of their circus had known him for about half a year, mostly just casually as one of the 'stagehand mechanics', which wasn't the basis of any great relationship. The fact he finally had an opening to try for his dream of becoming a stuntman alone was impressive, really, but he was still unproven to be anything remarkable to the rest of their fellow circus performers.

The Russian thief still wasn't doing his trick stunt again. Once had been bad enough, but she hadn't had any expectations for it to make her even more wary of mixing the height and lack of support it required.

If she absolutely had to, she would. However, she didn't and now that she did have some idea of how risky it was baulking wasn't quite descriptive enough to explain her feelings on it.

Her brother was at least totally understanding of her reluctance for doing it again, he had brushed off her slightly stilted apology for that easily and merely gave her a rib-cracking hug for trying it with him once.
He made an awesome best friend, even if he did drag her into carnie life.

The open circus week that followed had been just as trying in its own way, even if they only opened officially at ten in the morning they closed near two in the morning the next day. Children, young adults, family units, and the elderly generally visited in the afternoon and the rowdier singles and parents, sans their young, made up the crowds out for the evenings.

It paid off, though. They had more than enough funds to charter a ship to cross the Baltic Sea once they reached Stockholm, Sweden, and enough to last maybe two or so months on the road even if they didn't open the circus up during that time.

The only downside Sonya really wanted to quibble about was being expected to breakdown and pack up the day after they were finished showcasing the Großes Volksfest. Everyone was tired and more than a little stressed from lack of sleep or straining to squeeze out that last bit of effort for the grand finale Sunday night.

She wasn't alone in cursing out the city's officials that specified what time they had the fairgrounds for, but the fact another circus would probably need a week break like they had the week before stopped it at just cursing. For anyone else to get it they had to move, preventing anything but dirty words being uttered in various languages instead of actual disgruntlement being felt.

By the time the Russian thief had gotten Madame Crina's junk packed up and told the men the tent was ready to be broken down, her legs and feet were aching. No wonder the old bat zealously guarded her damn fine boots and took a seat every moment she could.

Those boots were probably made specifically for the old woman's tiny feet, and to cushion the extreme amount of time she spent on them. She wanted her cobbler's name, and a whole week to commission herself a pair of them.

At least the circus was done with Finland and Norway, in as little as a week they'd be out of Sweden too.

France was next, and Sonya had a few plans outside of it that made her happy Cherep would probably be a little too distracted by choreographing his future stunt work to really pay attention to what she was up to.

Pierre-Antoine Carpentier, who had once been the Arcobaleno of the Storm almost three hundred years ago, had been noted as being a Frenchman. The Storm-Cloud wanted to look him up, because for one human memory was not the most accurate of things and for two... at least then she'd have a ready excuse for how she knew what bits she still did.

The thief herself still didn't know what she was going to do about the next set of Arcobaleno.

Yes, they would be the last set and yes, it would only be for about three or less decades… but, Cherep was hers first.

Sonya didn't particularly feel like sharing her brother, thank you.

Unlike the… hitman of that to-be group, the dark Sun, Skull wasn't necessary. Not from what Rachel had known. If that was true or not was questionable, in her last life she only saw very little of the purple-haired stunt baby.

The story she recalled had been about the Decimo of Vongola, not the immortal stuntman of the Arcobaleno.
She couldn't really plan for anything, because her fellow Cloud might just decide on his own he didn't need to associate with a group that contained several mafia types and a pair of soldiers.

He might just decide to help them anyways, despite how competent they were, and so the thief would just have to watch and wait.

Either way, that wasn't something she'd leave him to struggle with himself.

CXIII (Friday the 19th of August, 1966. Versailles, French Republic.)

If there was anything Cherep was greatly appreciative of about his Mafiya-flavored childhood, it was meeting Sonya and the many language lessons Lisa pressed on all of them.

French had been his first foreign language, aside Russian but he had lost a lot of his native Czech before brushing up on it a few years ago, meaning while the circus was in France he didn't have to find someone that spoke the local dialect just to sightsee… or grab Bjørn.

His foster sister's little fan boy hadn't left as he claimed he would do, the kid was still hanging around and pretending he wasn't following the young Russian woman. Said young woman and his little sister was pretending she didn't notice him in her day-to-day life right back.

He wasn't sure what was going on, but suspected it was something mafia related. Sonya was only that blasé when it came to mafia dealings that made his head hurt, which made it a fair guess. It didn't mean he wasn't keeping an eye on the boy, or how he tried to shadow his fellow Cloud around, but it didn't look all that bad.

He did notice when his best friend shifted her usual habits, instead of going off and drinking in various shady local watering holes she was poking around several old parishes and asking questions. She wasn't getting very far from all appearances but she didn't remotely look annoyed when she returned to wherever the circus was set up for the week.

Honestly, he was starting to wonder if she was bored or not. She wasn't really made for show business, however well she managed the vagrant like lifestyle inherent in circus life.

It hadn't seemed as if his sister had noticed their one-on-one reception in Finland, and to a lesser extent Sweden, had been a tad hostile. Cherep was chalking that up to her lingering, worsening social blindness and her bewildering preference for hostile or aggressive behavior in her personal dealings.

France had less difficulties with those of Russian descent, meaning that instead of a cold shoulder or suspicious eyeing they got semi-amicable greetings and smiles.

Which made Sonya suspicious, hilariously enough. It didn't mean she refrained from using that friendlier outlook to her own advantage, but just that she was more cautious in using whatever she got by it.

That might have had something to do with the recent reduction of bar hopping, now that he thought about it.

The Cloud Flame user decided he had hesitated long enough, as distracting as actually being assured of his dream to be a stuntman was or not, and he hunted down his foster sister for a handful of answers before she left the circus again.
"What is Bjørn doing, anyways?" The question had been far enough from whatever she had been thinking about it pulled the thief up short halfway to Madame Crina's tent, and she gave him a considering look.

"One of two things, if I had to guess." She started slowly as she put out the ember of her mostly burned up cancer stick, her French starting out a touch slowly then speeding up as her annoyance bled on through to her tone. "One, he could be looking for a patron of a sort. He's not much of a fighter apparently, therefore he wants someone stronger to be beholden to yank him out of any trouble that may come up. If he makes himself useful to me, then I'd be that person beholden to ensure his safety. Another reason might be that he could just be curious, but if that curiosity has any actual basis for being is up in the air."

"Didn't you rescue him?" Cherep pointed out blandly, ignoring the fact a smirk was crawling up his face.

He heard the story, and what she had thought about the incident. It still amused him she had such a problem with understanding the motivations of others she didn't know to not comprehend how some of her own actions looked from the outside.

His crooked best friend had just been annoyed she'd been pulled into something that didn't concern her, Bjørn probably believed she rescued him.

Indeed, the thief snorted harshly at the very thought. "Not willingly, it merely happened to look that way."

Sonya knew that but failed to connect that information to what Bjørn did or didn't know himself or didn't realize the kid might not care what her intent had been and only cared for the results.

Cherep figured this was like how he ended up with a Mafiya thief for a best friend. How nearly a full month of her stalking him equated to a friendship he wasn't sure, but after she stopped annoying him on principle he hadn't minded having a semi regular visits from a friend. There was just less intent on keeping an eye on someone from her end this time.

"Why not take him on?" Whatever it was the kid wanted couldn't be too bad, right?

"I'm having enough..." His fellow Cloud trailed off uncertainly, frowning rather hard out into the distance.

"Enough?"

"...trouble just keeping up with you. I don't need yet another person to keep track of." She finished rather forcefully, looking rather belligerent as she dug out another cigarette. "Besides, what the hell would I do with him while we're wandering the length and breadth of the Continent?"

That was a fair question, really. Sonya had enough difficulties with merely following the same circus he was, especially since she had started looking outside of it for something to occupy her time.

"Whatever it is you're so intent on learning about around here?"

The thief gave him a sharp look for that quip after lighting up a new tube of tobacco from her pack of them, but she did give the possibility some consideration after a moment.

"Just a thought, anyways. What are you looking for?"

"Someone that I read about, but he's long dead. I'd thought I'd at least find a gravestone or something by now, but I haven't actually come across anything that even remotely suggests this guy once lived in the country even if I know he was born here."

"Somehow, I'm not surprised this has something to do with your books." Cherep ducked the automatic smack aimed his way from her, grinning slightly. "Give it to the kid, then."

His little sister's annoyed batting at him stopped, or to be more specific she froze, at the suggestion while she considered his point. ". . . that would mean I have to pay him back for it."

"Either humor him on your terms or his. I don't think Björn is going to be leaving you alone any time soon."

CXIV (Thursday the 25th of August, 1966. Reims, French Republic.)

Sonya had to give Cherep the point of his argument, but it didn't mean she had to like it.

However, lately she had been chafing against the rather restrictive nature she was under while with the Großes Volksfest. There were things she rather wanted to get around to doing outside of the circus and France was, post WWII, rather… strange in a patchwork way.

It hadn't been more than fifteen years since the official end of the war, and great swaths of land were still abandoned with charred farmhouses dotted here and there or mass-produced home 'blocks' were what signified one was coming up on the suburbs of some village. Sometimes the circus came across roads that hadn't yet been rebuilt, resulting in some strange roundabout routes used to get to the next city.

That contrasted rather startlingly with the refurbished farmsteads and the cities, which had more of the rebuilding efforts concentrated on it since it would likely cost less to house the greater amount of people.

Paris had been shockingly colorful, in comparison to Moscow's severe utilitarian grace.

It had been harder to locate any older buildings in the capital city, there were new façades or straight up new buildings lining the streets and paint could cover any number of discolorations if the surface it was applied to was even.

That, the still obvious destruction that had been wrecked on the country that lingered long after the end of the war, was why Sonya was mostly sure Pierre-Antoine Carpentier was going to end up being a dead end.

If there were any records of the French born Arcobaleno of the Storm three hundred years ago, they might have been destroyed a decade or so before she had even been born. It was entirely possible that some records still existed but finding the information would probably take longer than she had left in the country.

Not if she was going to keep on following the circus as Cherep asked of her.

The Russian thief rather wanted that information if it was at all possible… but she was also rather keen on keeping up with her best friend while he didn't have the umbrella protection of being even slightly famous.

Obviously, she couldn't be in two places at once… but she didn't have to be.
Of course, that didn't mean she wanted to resort to that kind of measure.

Björn was an unknown element, little Finnish boy that he was.

Sonya didn't trust the brat, or why it was he still tagged along after her when he had previously claimed he would do otherwise.

He might only have mafia connections in the loosest sense of the word and thought she could enable him to cut them entirely. The scrawny kid could also be really interested in her personally, for whatever motivation any young adult might have about a rescuer no matter how unwilling. Björn could also want to deepen his underworld connections further than his homeland could enable.

Mafia life was both sticky and slippery in that way, hard to shed but equally as hard to swim deeper if the possibility wasn't opened for you by another in deeper than you were. She wasn't going any deeper than she was, not on her own, as she couldn't in the USSR and didn't intend to in Mafia Land.

The Russian Mafiya didn't have women vory, so she was as respectable within it as she'd ever be. Assassination and hitman work didn't appeal to her, seeing as killing was only something she'd have to resort to if she royally fucked up a heist somehow.

However, the thief really did have to decide about what to do with the kid sometime soon.

If the brat kept hanging around he might note that she and Cherep had oddly colorful fire at their command and ask a couple questions from the locals she probably wouldn't appreciate. Björn was a security risk in a way, a possibility, and a threat all rolled into one little Finish teenager.

The major problem between making use of the kid was going to be the language barrier. Björn might have applied himself to picking up every scrap of Russian he could, but they were in France. The kid's French was better than his few partly words of her second birth-language, but it was still broken enough she wasn't going to trust it.

That would mean she'd have to use Madame Crina as a translator, learn Finnish herself, or wait until the kid's mastery of the French language was good enough to be certain he understood her.

Obviously, using the old bat was out. Sonya didn't intent to give the crotchety old woman any more ammunition than she had by now, Crina was bad enough as it was. Even if she likely didn't know exactly what kind of undesirable criminal type her apprentice was. That old bat had been around long enough to know her latest apprentice wasn't strictly legal in a sense, but for some reason was making the effort to be so for a time.

It was looking like she would have to deal with her anyways if she wanted things done in a timely manner, because she was the only person the Russian knew who understood Björn's Finnish and could possibly teach her unless or until his French was more understandable.

As it was, since nothing could be done straight away she'd keep on with what she had been doing. Looking for a man she was rather certain she'd never find while the circus made its ponderous way through the still recovering French countryside.

The Großes Volksfest would be going through Germany next, although they would be nicking into Switzerland for a grand total of a week before making a more southern approach to the USSR and Moscow. Thankfully where they were wintering again this year.

The Russian thief might just be happy they were avoiding Italy on their way back through the European Continent and into the Iron Curtain, but she did wonder if they would be traveling through Czechoslovakia and what Cherep thought about that.

She was mostly sure he hadn't intended to return to his birth country at all, ever.

CXV (Wednesday the 31th of August, 1966. Strasbourg, French Republic.)

Sonya gave the man a dubious look. "Really?"

"Of course, miss. I know of the Carpentier family, they have owned the vineyard a few miles north of the town for generations." The man, an older gentleman with silver streaks through formally dark brown hair and wrinkles framing watery green eyes, informed her cheerily. "Good wine, although the members of the family are rather reclusive."

The Russian tried not to show more of her disbelief than she had to but was mostly sure it was obvious anyways.

She had been scouring parishes and old church baptizing records, trying to find one specific family line using a three-hundred-year-old name, for the last half a month. The remote prospect of finding anything had made her certain she'd never find anything concrete, and the final week the circus had left in France was the point of which she succeeded?

Letting out a sigh through her nose, she gave the man's words some consideration.

There was really nothing to lose by checking it out. It might not be the Carpentier family she was looking for, as she had come across others with the same surname before but without a Pierre-Antoine in their family tree at the right time period. At worse, this would just be another such family.

At best, she'd finally find some solid evidence on the Arcobalenos or their existence to explain what little she recalled from Rachel's life reading about the story… or boost her own limited knowledge of 'the Seven Strongest of an Era'.

"Where is this… vineyard then, sir?"

"Near the border, next to the Forest Robertsau. If you follow the edge of the forest you can see the front door not too far outside of the city's limits."

She vaguely knew what he was speaking of. It wasn't that far from here; the former pickpocket could probably check it out and still return to the circus before nightfall. She wouldn't be able to go the next day, they were leaving France via West Germany for Switzerland.

Which would be interesting, to say the least. How did Switzerland's neutrality translate into the underworld's mafia?

Sonya had abstained from actually digging into France's mafia connections due to her little distractions and was slightly overdue for touching base with the local underworld.

With a shrug, the blonde teenager decided on the rest of her day's itinerary. "My thanks, sir."

The man nodded cheerfully, making her think there might be something to Cherep's insistence that civilians were less asshole-ish than most mafia members and she didn't have to be so suspicious of them.
She tipped the man a few of the francs she had and left him to his work.

Strasbourg, the border city that was the \textit{Großes Volksfest}'s last stop in France, was a little tenser than most of the French villages and towns they had passed through so far. That likely had something to do with the mass exodus of East Germans shortly before the Iron Curtain got a physical boundary in the Berlin Wall.

Part of the reason she still thought the Wall would fall eventually, that was not only awkward but unwise to try and physically separate an established city that way. The fact the Berlin Wall went up so late also attributed somewhat, a lot of the people who could read the writing on the walls had abandoned their country the moment they realized what was going to happen.

With the end of the Second World War and that mass defection, Germany’s population had to be reeling slightly if not scrambling to shore up sorely needed infrastructure. That was, after exercising the remnants of the Nazi Party out of whatever offices they had ended up in if the people themselves didn't end up executed or arrested for war crimes.

That exodus and the mere fact Strasbourg was one of the border towns made it rather deeply seeped in mafia connections, as all the mafia men from Germany used the town to plan their next move once free from any governmental scrambling that might restrain them. Which also contributed to the town having a bit of a suspicious air to it, mafia people weren't nice people, as Strasbourg developed into a more city-like area. Mostly due to the immigrants, but it was also more developed than the surrounding infrastructure explained.

All of that meant the city was a bizarre mix of urban developed streets and businesses, mixed in with a half-demolished main thoroughfare and semi-shifty city planning.

Only mafia people would place large pawn shops on the main street next to the train station and restaurants, for easy access to illegal weapons and a fence or two, rather than civil-minded city planners who would probably prefer to put those pawn shops on the very edges of the rebuilt city.

It was on a smaller scale but actually worse than Paris itself, even if you took into account the capital city's sheer volume of underground tunnels and hangouts implemented during the French revolutions over the age and expanded by the French Resistance only recently.

Strasbourg was almost, almost like Moscow in that respect. Not nearly as shady and with so many bolt-holes, but in open mafia neighborhoods and obviously claimed territories. It was smaller than the city she had spent over a decade living in with Cherep, but it had the same general air.

Sonya rather liked it.

\textbf{CXVI (Wednesday the 31th of August, 1966 continued. Strasbourg, French Republic.)}

She didn't like what she found when she followed the Frenchman's words to the supposed Carpentier homestead and vineyard.

So much for Cherep's insistence that civilians were less suspicious on average.

Instead of following the road, because she really didn't know what roads to take or not, Sonya had followed the edges of the Forest Robertsau up north. Checking in now and again on the houses that might have been her aim.
Since she wasn't the most sociable thief in existence, instead of knock on the doors she lurked around and waited for someone to say the family name before moving on to the next home.

It took her longer that just simply knocking on doors, but also kept her from notice.

Which made the presence of several unsavory types waiting in a semi-abandoned homestead jarring enough to catch and hold her attention fast.

She didn't know them, which didn't really surprise her.

She also didn't know what they were doing, nor what they wanted her for. If it was her specifically they wanted, or if it was her asking about a former Arcobaleno or Flame user that attracted their attention.

Like any good thief when presented with something they wanted that might be owned by another individual, she lurked around and stole it.

They had orders, tersely written physical ones one occasionally referenced while they waited. Meaning they were either locals hired through a third party or stationed abroad for other reasons and were expected to report back. The Russian didn't really care other than getting her hands on the papers and figuring out what the hell was going on.

Written in Italian or not, she could still read it.

Instead of finding out she triggered a defensive strike against anyone looking into one of the supposed 'pillars of the universe', this was merely human in nature.

As in a specific hitman in her acquaintance had pissed off someone with a whole lot of pull.

Enough pull to bother going after Renato Sinclair's associates and allies just because the magnitude of whatever offense the Mafioso had given pissed someone off that much.

The thief it was inconveniencing was a bit torn on what the hell to do about it.

It could answer why she had been stalked after that last visit to Mafia Land, she hadn't been back all year since joining the circus and it was entirely likely the Sun hadn't been able or knew to warn her about this. It could be something entirely unrelated to that stalking she had noted, which had to be borne in mind no matter what happened.

Said hitman she owed favors to might need a bit of help, or he might be perfectly able to take care of this himself.

However, Sonya was a bit committed to the circus thing Cherep was so hung on. She couldn't really afford to go and abandon her spot on a whim, even if Renato really did need her help after all.

She might not get that spot back after everything was said and done, and her brother wasn't safe yet.

Her fingers itched, but she refrained from digging out her latest pack of cigarettes. She was smoking way too much as it was and was trying to cut back a bit. The distraction held her still a moment longer than she liked.

The hired henchmen weren't stupid, for all that it proved laughably easy to steal the terse and suggestive paperwork from their gear. They were simply skilled in different areas than she was.

The Italian that spilled across her ears was just as musical as any native speaker, slightly quicker than she could keep up with after so much time since the last time she heard the language spoken.

She caught the gist of it though, given their subsequent actions. Spreading out, checking high and low for any hiding spots someone might use, meant they were suspicious of someone lingering where they 'shouldn't'. They hadn't thought to look up, most never did, so she merely moved to keep herself out of any line of sight just in case someone did think to look in her direction.

Now she had a decision to make.

The Russian could go confront them herself, in hopes of narrowing down why this was going on. That would possibly mean she'd have to kill them to continue moving around unmolested or unhunted.

She could try to find a bit more on her own, pawing through the rest of their gear and maybe pickpocketing them for anything else of intelligence or monetary value. That wasn't likely to pay off, as something all thieves and criminals were taught was to shed anything identifying from their person before engaging any acts of dubious moral nature. Semi-official looking orders in her hands or not, she probably wouldn't get that lucky again.

Sonya could leave and pretend nothing had happened.

After a few moments, of delicate balancing and wall scaling around to avoid detection, she decided that abandoning this wasn't going to happen. If it would have, she would have left already the moment something suggesting violence appeared.

That probably made her a very stupid thief, really. Thieves like her were, by nature, creatures of stealth and avoidance, fights were only things of last resort unless they had a secure upper hand and escape route nearby. Tatiana might be a different sort of thief, but she could afford to be with her gang close at hand.

She was on her own here. Her methods had to be undetectable or lethal in respect to that lack of support, or she'd never survive it.

However, she also didn't really want to kill anyone.

Musing on the problem, she kept on shadowing the Italians as they hunted around but eventually grouped back together in the main room of the abandoned homestead.

"Where is the bitch?" One muttered to another, a simple enough question Sonya understood him clearly.

She didn't quite follow the response, but it was probably crude and rude in nature by the gestures and what sentence structure she understood.

Cute.

One, the man she was mentally labeling the 'leader' of this little mission, snapped something else at the two underlings of his. Something about the dawn and the next day.

Probably telling them it was likely she had decided not to check out the lead she had been given that same day and instead try tomorrow.

Which was entirely possible, it had been rather late when she set out from town. Her meandering walk up here had not helped, seeing as it was pitch dark outside now.
...her brother would start to worry if she left it much longer.

Sonya tentatively decided to riffle through their belongings before making any other decisions, when something new was added to the mix.

A middle-aged woman pulled up from the cellar.

…the owners or residents of the building were still present?

Broken French was more understandable to her than their Italian had been. The lurking thief clearly heard the order to fix dinner for the three men… or the 'children' would get it.

'It' wasn't understood on her end, and frankly the Russian didn't care to learn either, but the woman seemed to know full well what 'it' was.

Civilians, especially civilians that ended up in the middle of mafia operations, didn't tend to survive long. It was highly unlikely any of the original residents of this broken-down house would out-live this incident if she didn't do anything.

…and she was enough of a Russian Mafiya member to be instantly irate over the possibility of child abuse or mistreatment.

CVII (Thursday the 1st September, 1966. Headquarters of the Campo Famiglia, San Giovanni in Fiore, Italian Republic.)

Renato Sinclair rather desperately pawed the 'cellular phone' brick thing the former Don of the De Campo Famiglia once owned.

The older man's cooling corpse wouldn't have need of it anymore. Spoils of war and all that.

He didn't really understand the damned device, nor did he hold much hope he'd get anything done using it. Hell's take it all, the hitman didn't even understand exactly why the old bastard had decided to devote so much of his resources into isolating then trying to kill him off.

It would take some time, and Renato was nothing if not through, but he would understand by week's end.

What Don De Campo had succeeded in doing was murdering off probably most if not all the freelance hitman's carefully cultivated contacts. The ones he had from his rather laughable version of childhood on up to now.

Most of them, so far, because he hadn't realized what had been going on until too late and missed warning them to go to ground before they got caught out. Deaths happened, one or two a year wasn't all that suspicious even for the more civilian of those contacts. When five of them ended up dead when he tried to reach them, then he got apprehensive over the coincidences.

Learning how much of his associates and allies were gone was another such thing that would require some investigation, but Renato wasn't confident any decent number of them had escaped the reach of this famiglia. The bulk of those contacts weren't hitmen, some weren't even remotely connected to the mafia.

The mere thought of the number of people he might have inadvertently doomed by simple association had the hitman's grip on the clunky block of circuitry tightening until it creaked, and he almost pitch the thrice-damned thing at a wall.

The subsequent click and droning beep it suddenly emitted extended its life expectancy by a great margin.

Renato eyed the thing dubiously as it did something, the receiver box on the desk lit up in response to that something and it seemed to ponderously decide if it would work or not.

There was another 'click', an oddly echoed sounding one, and a voice came through the handheld part the hitman was still holding.

"Boss? We ain't done yet, the thief-girl hasn't shown up-"

A distant but audible meaty thunk cut the man off, even as far removed as he likely was Renato winced internally when the sound of something puncturing bone reached him. A woman's shrill scream sounded then cut off with a harsh gasp, a wetter suction sound following. Swear words, several rather inventive ones, were spoken by the first man who had been speaking until his voice was cut off by another of the meaty thunk sounds... a much closer one.

As if a butcher had chopped bone, if he was pressed to identify the sound.

There was suddenly a clatter, light footsteps on creaking wood, and a very different voice suddenly spoke into the hitman's ear.

"Whoever the fuck this is, if you-"

"Sonya?"

"…Renato?"

It had been a little difficult for the hitman to place that feminine voice speaking almost unaccented French, seeing as the last time he had ever heard the Russian thief so pissed off was back when she had been a young preteen girl and their association had been new.

Tisk, tisk. Rather saucy words for a little lady to be speaking.

Somehow, the young Cloud had avoided the trap the former Don of the De Campo Famiglia had set for anyone that would even remotely call Renato Sinclair an associate.

No, the hitman corrected himself dryly, the thief hadn't avoided it. She had obliterated it from the sounds of that fight. He idly wondered how many she had to kill and what state she had left them in. Clouds weren't the type to do things halfway.

"…the fuck is going on, Renato?" Sonya's tone was still flat as she switched to English, almost expressionless as she pressed him for answers she probably did deserve.

"Sorry, a little ah… miscommunication occurred."

"Miscommunication?" Echoed back the young blonde teen dubiously, the very word dripping in sarcasm. "Really. Exactly how did something on your end translate over to mean something lethal on my end?"

"I assure you, Sonya, I'm on the issue." Renato fingered the trigger of his favorite gun, not that there was anyone left for him to kill in the mansion. There were probably a couple handfuls still at large, however. "It won't bother you again."

There was a moment of silence on the other end, from what other noises he could hear there was a rustle of cloth and someone dragging a booted foot across wood. "Strasbourg, France, is dealt with. Clean up the rest on your own."

"Will do."

A huff of breath from her translated into something staticky through the telephone lines they were tying up, not that it seemed either of them really cared all that much. "This better not happen again, Renato. Or at least, give a girl some warning if you could."

A faint grin stole across the hitman's face, which he was man enough to admit was mostly relief and a bit of dark humor. He had one contact left, it seems. "Of course, dear lady Sonya. It would be entirely ungallant of me to endanger you in such a way twice."

"I am sure you would not dream of ever being ungallant, Renato." Her dry return sounded much like her usual tone, startling a bark of laughter out of the Mafioso she was talking to through a dead man's equipment. "I will see you later in the year, then."

"Later?"

"Sometime this winter, I have taken a bit of a… sabbatical, in a way."

Probably how she avoided being killed off with any other associate of his, she hadn't stayed long in any place they could easily reach her.

"October?"

"Around then, maybe."

"I'll buy the next round."

There was a snort. "Very well. Till then, Renato."

A click then dead silence informed the hitman that she had hung up on him.

Well… how rude.

Renato slid to his feet in one movement, ignoring the rapidly cooling body on the floor of the opulent study one minor Don had formerly occupied, tossing the brick of technology behind him.

Time to cover his tracks, but first… some answers.

CXVIII (Thursday the 1st September, 1966 continued. Strasbourg, French Republic.)

Talking to Renato did at least let Sonya put some distance between what she had just done and her mental state.

Taking a deep breath, the thief wrenched the pick end of her Bec de Corbin out of the tangled mess of electronics and allowed it to bleed off the Cloud Flames that made it full-sized. Another of the spinel gemstones cracked, but she had expected that.
The moment she was apparently unarmed, the older woman slapped her across the face.

The Russian figured she deserved that. Still, it earned her an icy look in return. "Do you have anywhere to go?"

"Why? What else will you cost us?"

She could understand the woman was distraught, being held captive for however long had to be stressful. On the other hand, the thief wasn't going to let the older civilian woman use her like a punching bag. "Because I'm going to set this house on fire, madame. If you wish to be inside of it when I set it ablaze, then by all means."

She looked to be on the edge of tears but glared defiantly back at the younger woman even still. "My children are locked up downstairs. Get them free, and I will be entirely too willing to put you and this incident behind us."

"Be warned, you speak of this and even I couldn't prevent your demise."

Vindice officers weren't picky about who they arrested, that was as little as Sonya had managed to get on the shadowy enforcers of mafia life. Just that, and the fact the ones 'arrested' weren't ever seen again.

However, the thief did step to where the staircase down was while gingerly avoiding even looking at the dead bodies she had caused.

Breakdown later, emergency clean up now.

There were in fact three children caged in a small wine cellar the mother called out to get them away from the door. From the looks of it, the older woman had been desperately trying to claw the stout wooden door hinges off in between… whatever she had been doing. She even succeeded slightly too, from the wood shavings she hadn't managed to conceal on the ground.

Not nearly enough to free her little family on her own, but an impressive effort for a civilian anyways.

The blonde didn't bother trying to find a key or another way into the storeroom the children were locked behind. She had a red crystal skeleton key, a dab of her Storm Flames focused through that melted the internal mechanisms enough to wrench the thing open.

A male teenager, a young preteen girl, and a just out of toddlerhood boy stumbled out of the cupboard closet and into their mother's arms.

Sonya drifted away from them as they rather desperately greeted one another, instead pretending to inspect the quality of the wine stocked.

It would prove to be a semi-decent accelerator if it was old enough. Even if it wasn't dusty wood was, and Storm Flames would eat away at everything anyways. A more generous dab of Storm Flames and it would likely go up in an instant and take the rest of the house with it.

"We're leaving." The older woman snapped from behind her, and the thief waved the older biddy off.

The moment the footsteps of the unbalanced mother sounded near the main entranceway overhead, she threw up the little remains of lunch.
Killing… was altogether too easy for her. It was one thing to know, in an abstract way, that she could put enough force behind her hits to shatter heads like rotten pumpkins. It was entirely another to do it, slit the throat of another before he could use that motherly Frenchwoman as a human shield, and then bury the pick end of her war hammer into the chest of a third man.

Taking a deep breath and ignoring the tang of bile from the previous contents of her stomach and the taste of it in her mouth, Sonya drew one forearm across her mouth to scrub any evidence away. She still had to search the place, just to be sure there wasn't anyone else she needed to deal with like she told Renato, but then she'd set the house on fire and pretend nothing had happened.

Then there was the Frenchman, who pointed her in this direction. She had the suspicions the man was the father of this little family unit she was about to make homeless, and if that was true she'd let him go. If not… her body count this day would be four.

She was entirely too thankful they were just about to leave France behind. Another day and the circus would be in the lower reaches of Germany. She'd prefer to never come back, really.

…there was blood on her boots, too. While walking through grass to get back to the circus might wear that off, there wasn't much she could do about the full skirts she was wearing. Something to keep blood stains from setting in would be needed, or a different skirt.

Which she didn't have on her. Cherep would notice the change in clothes, if she sought out something of the older lady’s to wear instead.

Then, no… maybe a bit of wine, to cover the blood?

She could then explain it away as someone spilling wine on her instead of risking bloodstained skirts being noticed.

A cover plan in mind, the thief stole her way up the stairs where three dead bodies needed to be frisked were lying and the rest of the house still waited to be searched.

She couldn't wait to set the whole mess on fire.

It was almost unsurprising to find out the family that had lived in the almost-wrecked house for decades had been the Géroux family, not the Carpentier one she was looking for.

Sonya broke her resolve to smoke less and resigned herself to becoming a chain-smoker for the foreseeable future. The palm-full of Storm Flames she lit her cigarette with was tossed into the wine casks instead of snuffed out.

CXIX (Friday the 9th of September, 1966. Bern, Swiss Confederation.)

"Are you alright?" Cherep asked her in slightly clumsy German.

It wasn't a language he had a whole lot of experience speaking, even if it was the last one Lisa had helped him learn and they did hear some of the scraps of the tongue around the circus every now and again. In the next few weeks, he'd get that lacking experience speaking it to sound fluent again.

Too many would speak Russian instead to him, especially if they were seeking his help.

Keeping multiple languages straight when you didn't speak them for months on end was a little trying, especially with the number of them they had. She had it slight worse, given that she knew a fair bit of nine different ones to his five and a few of those shared words in different meanings between them.

"I'm fine, just... haven't been sleeping well." Sonya rubbed at an eye, scowling slightly at the gritty feel.

Thankfully, nothing she was going to be doing for the foreseeable future in West Germany involved any great coordination. She could afford to be less than her best.

Killing was supposed to come easier the more one did it, right?

She wasn't at all sure she ever wanted to do that again, or to the point she could claim a hitwoman's title. Stealing would be her limit of selling skills, and if she could get through the rest of her life without another death on her hands she'd be pathetically grateful.

It wasn't likely, and some of her actions in France might have been her wanting to get that phase of her life over with already. Tatiana was already 'blooded', made her 'bones', or was a self-made woman as her red roses tattoos signified.

This thief would not be counting kills as it seemed was popular in the Mafiya, but an acknowledgement at least would be required. A tattoo touch-up was probably in her future, the moment she and her sister had some time to kill next Christmas.

'Revolted' might cover what she felt about the trade of violence, the one based on buying and selling the service of death dealing. However, it was so much a part of the underworld she wasn't likely to escape that either.

The downsides of her rebirth. She might be able to live again, but death and destruction was so much part of her trade it wasn't likely she'd be able to go another five or so years before killing another person.

"Seriously, Sonya." Cherep pulled her out of her head with a touch to her elbow, a slight frown on his own face. "Are you sure you're alright?"

Depressing herself in public wasn't probably the best idea ever. Especially not in front of her best friend, who was also her foster brother. He'd want to know, and she was of two minds of telling him of what she had done.

At least Sonya wasn't so seeped into mafia life to ignore the fact that murder was wrong, even if it was an inevitable fact of her lifestyle. That bit of mafia brainwashing she had managed to avoid through her second childhood.

Though, it was entirely annoying that she had to wait to grow up twice.

"I... don't feel like going around drinking this week. Want to play tourist with me?"

"We're here for work, Sonya." It wasn't a no, and indeed her fellow Cloud looked thoughtful.
"Maybe... do you think Master Liam would let us go for a couple days?"

"We'd actually have to ask Madame Crina, honestly." As the old bat was her keeper, in a way.

"To bad it's not October."

The Russian laughed, slightly but she did. "I just said I didn't want to go drinking this week, Cherep."
Octoberfest is just as much as a drinking holiday as anything else. BMW has a headquarters somewhere around here, we could go claim to look at something for your future stunt work."

"...but you hate it when I spend hours to go look at motorcycles."

"I said claim, not that we'd actually do that." The sulky look Cherep pulled in return made his little sister finally smirk. "You know we're not likely to get time off, right?"

"Probably not, but it's nice to daydream."

It was, in more ways than one. If she could get a little time off from the circus, she wouldn't have to run multiple contract heists in the winter for however long she would be staying with the Großes Volksfest.

Heaving a sigh, the thief rubbed her face again. "Get lost, Cherep. We've work to do."

"Yeah, yeah. I should probably..." The purple colored, want-to-be stuntman trailed off as he looked to the end of the fairground the carnies had set up the more mechanical attractions and rides. "Do you feel better, at least?"

Surprisingly, she did.

"You don't have to look so surprised, you know."

"I'm just admiring the fact I can put up with you for months on end. I really don't know where I get the patience to do so from."

Her brother's flat expression was reward enough for her, she even gracefully ignored the punch he aimed at her shoulder for it.

CXX (Thursday the 15th of September, 1966. Salzburg, Republic of Austria.)

It took until Austria for Cherep to realize exactly where their circus was heading, exactly.

Sonya had eventually put her actions in France behind her just as she had with the country itself, with generous amounts of help from multiple puffs of nicotine laced smoke. It still gave her the occasional nightmare, but she was alright with that.

Switzerland was just as interesting as she had thought it would've been, given the reputation the country had for amnesty and neutrality.

Its underworld was similar in respects, as close to 'free-trade' in nature as possible for something landlocked. Possibly the forerunner idea of what Mafia Land was built off from, just a touch more stationary than the island was. Mob Families, syndicates, and formally structured criminal enterprises were startlingly thin on the ground there, made up by the sheer number of unaffiliated that claimed the country as home.

There was also the fact that if you paid just enough it was possible someone would 'erase' your history and hide you away for a couple years. It was a hellishly expensive service, but also a highly tricky one to perform. It was only done by one specific group of what the Russian was sure were Mist users, or at least they had enough quirky mysticism going on to suggest it as a façade to hide whatever it was they did behind.
Austria's underworld was almost an echo of that. It still had a very low number of structured criminal groups, but the few there were normally just ensured everyone was spread out far enough not to step on anyone else's toes as they collected the dues to operate in their territory.

Enforcer orientated, rather than criminal enterprises like the Zolotov clan or a Family one like Vongola.

She still found it easier to find and insert herself into the local mafia hotspots than she had it back in Norway, Sweden, and Finland. Most of that was due to the fact they were swinging back around to Moscow and so her tattoos garnered more interest by those that knew how to read them, but also some of it had to come from the fact Austria had less structure to its underworld so foreigners weren't so uncommon.

More to the current point, the thief found that she rather liked the more tavern-themed mafia hangouts she could find the closer they got to the Iron Curtain's southeastern edge. It was a hell of a lot more neutral too, so she wasn't too upset Cherep tracked her down on a night she generally went drinking to freak out about visiting the country of his birth.

Dinner and a show, Sonya thought as she took another sip of the pale märzen she had been forced to order.

The wiener schnitzel she had ordered just to say she had actually eaten it once wasn't all that bad, for how silly it sounded to her once American ear to hear pronounced. She could've done without the beer, but they were curiously out of the hard liquors she tended to favor when ordering alcohol.

The bartender had suggested it instead, but she was never going to trust the man when it came to beer ever again.

No, it didn't taste like horse piss... but that didn't mean it was good tasting either.

"Do you like beer, Cherep?" She asked of her brother idly as she looked into the glass stein, wondering what he was like smashed out of his mind.

She had yet to see him completely drunk and really was interested in seeing how that would result.

"Are you even listening to me?"

"Not really, here." Passing him the tankard, the blonde Russian busied herself with the breaded veal cutlets. "Why is this such a problem, anyways? The... difficulty that happened to you happened years ago, the likelihood they would know you on sight is rather remote even accounting for your wildly noticeable coloring. Additionally, 'returning to the scene of the crime' is more of a fantasy novel gimmick than something criminals actually do once we're done in a location. We tend to avoid doing that, just because it's such a stupid way to get caught."

Cherep already seemed to have realized what kind of place he had tracked her down to, the mention of anything remotely smacking of illegal natured acts didn't have him flinching or looking around like a green newbie and the non-affiliated.

He restricted himself to gripping the handle of the beer stein and glowering at her over it. "I never wanted to go back, Sonya."

"I never wanted to go to Italy in any depth, either. I think Master Liam intends to take us east next year and come up the African coast through the Mediterranean Sea, including Italy in that, and then back to the USSR." She gave an absent shrug, stabbing her next bite and shoving it into his mouth before he could interrupt her. "Point being, we don't always get what we want. Why not make some plans? You know, instead of panic like a headless chicken?"

Her mechanically inclined foster brother huffed rebelliously, then curiously peered into the beer she had passed off on him.

Sonya suppressed the desire to roll her eyes.

His stupid procrastination protesting thing was getting old, not to mention a rather bad response to things going wrong on him. She had little hope she might get him to do something proactive when he protested in his own little ways, Cloud users were nothing if not stubborn creatures, so she supposed planning for the circus' next country of operation was her responsibility.

"Here you are." The new voice had the thief blinking out of sheer shock.

Really, was it too much to expect the man to refrain from bothering her outside Mafia Land?

"Renato, what brings you to Austria?"

"Sonya?" Cherep chipped in before the hitman could respond, eyeing the sharply dressed Italian warily and then her with a bit of concern.

"He's a… associate of mine. From my other workplace." His fellow Cloud tilted her head back to see the newcomer fully. "Renato Sinclair, meet Bazanov Cherep."
Sonya looked between the hitman and the mechanic, mildly interested in how they would get along. She did expect, and indeed it looked to be leaning that way from how distastefully the two men eyed one another, that they wouldn't care much for the other.

Renato Sinclair was a bit of a snob when it came to the people he interacted with, truth be known. He couldn't keep all of that out of his interactions with the various waitresses and other people she had seen him talk to. He was even that way to her from time to time, as she wasn't a hitwoman or Italian and occasionally he was a charmingly bastard of an asshole.

Over the half a decade the Russian thief had known him, and she knew that just as much as the fact that he favored handheld pistols for his work.

The hitman also had an air of leashed violence to him he wore just as easily as his silk shirts, which would turn off anyone not immune to the mere thought of murder and homicide.

Cherep, her lovable dork of a foster brother, wasn't at all keen on mafia affiliated people.

He could deal with it when it arose, but he didn't favor those kinds of people or places at all. He knew just as well she was more inclined to mafia flavored relations, but he could also deal with that fact rather cleanly for someone only slightly affiliated himself.

They both, rather quickly, decided to merely tolerate the other just so they could talk to her without wasting time to scare the other off and possibly annoy her.

At least Renato did, Cherep just gained a rather stubborn edge to his normally cheerful mien as he took what was probably a pointed draw from the beer she had passed on to him.

The girl caught between them herself sighed and gave up on the wiener schnitzel. “Renato?”

At the prompting, the Mafioso turned his attention to her possibly a little more sharply than warranted.

Vaguely, the thief realized the supposed tolerance was probably more like something to hide some passive-aggressive posturing they didn't want her to catch on to for whatever reason. Why was beyond her, but it wasn't very likely either man would get along with the other for anything less than an emergency.

Oh well, it wasn't like they had to or anything.

Renato seated himself at their table, which gave Sonya the opportunity to notice exactly how tired the hitman seemed to be under that veneer of arrogant confidence he always wore like a mask. He was also a little... travel-stained, now that she gave him another look over.

Not even after that first meeting, when he had been assaulted and punched in the face then used his Flames to heal the damage in seconds, had she seen him even remotely stressed.

She passed the food she had been eating to him, because in such an unknown social setting he probably wouldn't order anything himself.
"How bad was it?"

"Bad enough." The Sun user informed her flatly, suspiciously peering at the food she had been eating before his arrival. "You're one of a few to escape without a scrape, feel special."

The Russian nibbled on her lower lip at the news. Someone had really hated Renato to hunt after anyone remotely connected to him, then. That was a lot of manpower, a lot of money, and a shit-ton of effort to burn through just to hate on one man.

She did kind of wonder who, and exactly how long they lived before the hitman caught on.

Cherep set the beer stein down firmly with a thump, attracting their attention. "This have anything to do with last month, and whatever upset Sonya?"

Oh dear, the thief thought.

She had yet to explain that situation to him, actually. Would probably never really admit to what happened even if he asked.

"It was not the situation, Cherep, it was how that situation reached me." Sonya clarified before Renato could comment, digging through the messenger bag that was working as her purse for the time being for her pack of cigarettes. Skirts had a sad lack of pockets, which meant she had to compensate with an easily stolen purse of all things, or she'd wear them more often. "That part wasn't Renato's fault."

He gave her a repressive look in return, both for her bad habit and the attempt to clear the hitman of any responsibility. "And you wonder why I don't like it."

"I do not need to wonder, I know. Really." She mustered a sheepish if weak smile for him, one hand paused in the air between them with a cupped palm full of Storm Flames just tiny enough not to cast much light beyond the three of them. Renato was eyeing the backwash of colored light cast on her blouse with a touch of confusion even after she lit her cigarette. "Just... sometimes it does not work out all that well. And when shit goes sour for us..."

Her fellow Cloud rolled his eyes at her, draining the beer to the dregs in the next moment and letting the heavy glass mug clatter to the tabletop. "If you insist. I'm going to head back, Sonya."

"If I do not see you before you turn in, goodnight Cherep."

She got a short nod, Renato got a shifty eye, but the mechanic did leave them alone.

"So... your lover boy?" The Mafioso asked dryly, stabbing the breaded veal he apparently decided wasn't poisoned or too suspicious to eat.

Sonya snorted, turning to give a baring of teeth masquerading as a smile at the hitman. "Cherep is my foster brother."

He blinked at her, fork still in his mouth.

"Yeah, this better have a good reason behind it. Not that it is all that annoying to see you again, Renato."

Swallowing, the hitman let his utensils rest on the plate and leaned forward slightly. "What do you know of baby Mists?"
A faint frown tugged her lips down, and she considered the man seated next to her closely for a long second. "The wispy but lingering Mists that rises from a fresh battlefield or the fog-like Mists that arise now and again on their own?"

"The former."

The Russian thief took a long drag from her cancer stick, deciding what to tell him. He did have a very good reason, then. "I have... some experience in that. Ideally, you'd want a Rain-Storm to help calm a new baby Mist. The water bearing weather phenomenon seems to boost them a little and wash some of the blood out while they gain more substance from what I've seen."

"I'm calling in one of the favors you owe me." The Italian informed her bluntly, stabbing another piece of meat. "Get me in touch with someone who can do either or both."

"Renato, you're looking at a Storm-Cloud."

He froze, flicking a glance to her hands, and she smirked lightly even if the topic of the conversation was a little concerning. Apparently, he hadn't gotten to the point of being even slightly sure of what her secondary Flame was.

"I'm supposed to be traveling a bit farther north for the rest of the fall, but I will have time this winter. Not a lot, but some."

"Is that...?"

"I will consider it included, as long as I get the story behind that little... scuffle this winter too."

Renato regarded her from out of a corner of his dark eyes for a long moment. "Thank you, Sonya."

She shrugged that off, but it wasn't as much of an inconsequential thing as she was pretending.

She didn't like killing. Why not get him into her favor just in case some killing was required in the future?

He was the hitman between the two of them, after all.

CXXII (Friday the 16th of September, 1966. Salzburg, Republic of Austria.)

Renato finished off what he suspected had been Sonya's dinner, the thief herself didn't seem too bothered by his lingering. Instead, she sweet-talked a couple bottles of mead for the price of one out of the bartender for them to share.

The Russian seemed rather more interested in eavesdropping on the conversations around them, which allowed the hitman to consider what he had learned that night.

This was not turning out to be his year.

The unlamented Don of the De Campo Famiglia had gutted his contacts, an attempt to isolate and then corner him. Which was only foiled by one of his once-fellow hitmen getting him word before he died. An old childhood... acquaintance, of a sort.

One of the few he might have been able to call a friend once upon a time.
Working his way around between hits, checking up on the people that either owed him favors or were inclined to assist him every now and again, hadn't been a pleasant occupation. Only a rare few, like the young blonde teen herself, managed to evade or avoid anything too lethal happening to them.

Most of the others had ended up dead in short order. Either not combat inclined or unable to just run for it when it became obvious the men sent after them intended to kill them.

Nearly half of whom were left didn't want anything else to do with him.

Renato had initially sought out Sonya just to get good news. He had already known she didn't intend to distance herself from him or simply stop regarding him as an associate, but after the last couple weeks he had? Catching up with someone at least moderately friendly had been an attractive proposition.

That baby Mist, Shamal, seriously needed help the Mafioso wasn't sure how to give. It was the hitman's fault the kid was now both orphaned and homeless, fixing that and figuring out how to train the brat so he'd survive on his own as an adult was his responsibility now. Shelter and food weren't that hard, the kid was surprisingly self-sufficient for something as tetchy and tiny as he was.

He knew the basics of Mist users, but that was all. They were too flighty for the Sun, he didn't tend to associate with them on average. Asking a Cloud user about them was just him covering his bases.

To be honest, he hadn't expected any kind of help from this quarter.

The Russian was just one of a handful of competent Dying Will Flame users he knew of and still had good ties with, who was just as good to catch what his attribute was in their first meeting. Asking her what she knew of Mists had been just common sense even contrasted with her own nature, which did pay off well.

Although, given his luck, almost tripping right into what little Cloud territorial nature she had to her was probably just his due. Very flexible for her primary Flame type she might be, but he had known she did have Cloud Flames and might have things she would guard zealously like any other user of the element.

The fact the thief had a foster brother probably could've been discovered well before this.

Renato had no other excuse for his ignorance other than wanting to get her to tell him instead of being forced to investigate it on his own. It was the same game over her Dying Will Flame types, he guessed the first one correctly and so he wanted to figure out the rest himself without asking.

By some kind of grace, he had managed not to trip off Sonya's protective territorial aggression.

Even when he cornered her and her brother like an unwary moron. The fact they were somewhere public had probably helped, the kid's disinclination to be overly bothered by it salvaged the rest of the situation.

Though... the brother of a Cloud. Foster brother, even.

That 'Cherep' character probably had a Flame type to him too, Flame users tended to stick to their own, even if it was unknowingly. Guessing what that was might be a very dangerous game in and of itself.

The hitman hadn't missed the flash of purple tinted power in Sonya's normally grey eyes when he made a, in hindsight, stupidly dismissive comment on the teenager.
What little territory she had included something about her foster brother. Probably not the teen in and of himself, because Cherep wasn't a Sky by any measure the hitman had gotten, but something. Par for the course for Clouds, actually.

They were very, very defensive when it came to family. Proactive and aggressively defensive.

That brother of hers probably didn't know how lucky he was to be considered family to her.

Sonya might not be a hitwoman, but that didn't mean she wasn't dangerous herself. Given she cracked open some grunt's head the day they met, with just a pebble and her own strength, that should've gone without saying.

A Cloud, with Storm Flames.

Renato rolled that around in his head. Hard Clouds like her tended to have territory they refused to give up, Storms were intense creatures that didn't give up their motivation or thoughts too well.

A Storm-Cloud?

Possibly explained how Sonya could go without a physical territory yet not be a Soft Cloud. Although that would mean she was probably more stubborn than him, if possible.

Not exactly a bad night, in all respects. The Mafioso had learned a few interesting things, solved a major problem out of sheer luck, nearly got his fool head bashed in by an ally, and actually managed to eat something.

Given how his year had turned out, it was actually a very good night's work for him.

The very thought drew an unwilling snort, attracting the attention of his tablemate.

Sonya gave him a look over one tattooed shoulder, but Renato shook his head, so she turned her attention back to whatever her attention had been on before him.

He had eaten, and she hadn't killed him, so the hitman figured he should stop pressing his faulty luck. "I'll see you in a few months, Sonya."

"Try not to kill yourself, or me, if you please."

CXXIII (Thursday the 15th of September, 1966 continued. Salzburg, Republic of Austria.)

"You are a brat sometimes, Cherep."

"You didn't really expect me to leave you with some man I don't know alone, do you?" He informed her snottily, elevating his nose in the air to round off a rather ostentatious declaration with a similarly pompous expression.

As if that explained why he nearly gave her a heart-attack, lurking around the stout wooden door of the mafia friendly tavern while she let Renato eat something before the damn obstinate Sun Flame user collapsed from exhaustion.

Sonya leveled a narrow look at him as they slowly made their way to the fairgrounds their circus was set to leave from the next day. "I expect you to trust me to know not to get in over my head. Renato's a rather long-term associate of mine, I known him only a few years less than I have known you for."
"I do trust you!" Cherep squawked at first, visibly offended in nearly every line of his form. That changed to silly and campy in the next breath. "But you're also a pretty young woman, sister dear. And I, your dashing older brother, have certain responsibilities to your virtue."

"This entire conversation had become too ridiculous for me to continue." She dug out yet another cigarette, even if she had exceeded the limit she had been trying to keep to for any given day. "Leave my virtue alone, please."

He gave her profile a searching look. "You're not really mad at me, are you?"

She kept her expression as neutral as she could, refusing to look at him. Lighting a cigarette took concentration, didn't you know?

"You're not! Come on, give me a smile."

"I will punch you in your smile if you do not-"

Her fellow Cloud suddenly lunged, sweeping her off her feet in a bear hug before she could raise her arms. "Come on."

"Cherep, I swear I will-"

"You know you want to."

The thief stopped struggling, because he did have a bit more Cloud Propagated strength than she did herself when he wanted it, and bared her teeth at him. "I will bite your nose off if you do not let. Me. GO."

He gently placed her back on her feet lightly. "You know you love me."

"I am blaming genetics." Sonya didn't exactly regret the fact she had dropped her cancer stick but wondered if she should light another one.

"Excuses, excuses." He rather tactfully didn't bring up the fact they were foster siblings, and genetics didn't bear any weight in that argument.

Since he hadn't, she didn't bring up the point that the arm he had tossed over her shoulders was in violation of that demand to stop touching her.

"Seriously, though. What was that all about?"

The Russian sighed, not particularly looking forward to this conversation. "Renato made a... very influential enemy, who had a much greater reach than he probably planned on when doing some pissing off. As far as I know of it, just from my own end mind you, a fair number of people got killed because of it."

Cherep came to a sudden halt, tugging her to follow suit because he did still have his arm around her. "And you got caught up in that?"

"I did not have to be, actually. I spotted the situation before they spotted me. I could have just left and done nothing."

"So why didn't you?"

She gave him a long, sideways look. "A very nice man pointed me in that direction, who I later found out was a father."
"Oh... no."

"And while poking around to ensure I knew the situation, I finally spotted the mother. There were three kids caught up in that. Had it just been the man and the grunts waiting for me, I would not have involved myself."

He knew the price mafia life extracted from the unwary or innocents caught up in it, he had to even remotely utilize his connections to his benefit if it ever came to that. Cherep's expression showed he understood exactly why she hadn't avoided it. "That doesn't exactly fill me with confidence, Sonya."

"Renato might have messed up once, but that will just mean he will be more careful from this point on. Careless members of our lifestyle do not tend to become survivors of it, through either getting caught or other more final means of stopping our activities."

He gave her a dubious scowl.

"I do not bitch over the fact that you are likely to end up almost killing yourself chasing this dream of yours." She patted his chest before shrugging off his hold on her. "You are not allowed to bitch over the fact my connections might end up killing me."

The mechanic had the audacity to roll his eyes at her.

Darkly, Sonya vowed to get him smashed once they were back in Moscow. She'd take pictures, too, just to embarrass him more. She might even dress him up as a girl, she was pretty sure Tatiana would gleefully help if their elder foster sister managed to make it back for Christmas.

With a snort, the thief dug out her pack of smokes yet again.

"...at least I'm not killing myself slowly, one stick at a time."

"Instead you are going to kill yourself slowly, one trick at a time. Leave my smoking alone, I need it to deal with the stress you cause me."

A bark of laughter greeted her snippy words.

CXXIV (Thursday the 6th of October, 1966. Masaryk Circuit, Brno, Czechoslovak Socialist Republic.)

Czechoslovakia was... very different than anywhere else Sonya had seen so far.

Unlike the post-war rebuilding efforts lending an air of cooperation and friendly aid in France, West Germany, and the more western parts of Europe, Czechoslovakia was suppressed and subdued in feel.

More than likely, that had to do with how hard the Soviet Union tried to directly control the subordinate state.

Of course, that repressed feel to the population made a circus, even a Russian traveling Circus, rather popular as an attraction. The only drawback was the sheer mass of unhappy population trying to get happy shifting uneasily under their strict government oversight. It all made a very combustible mix to be dealing with.
There was a glacier slow creep into a more capitalist mindset, despite the fact it was part of the Soviet Union. Only just recently, from the less weathered look of the broadsides and flyers Sonya could catch sight of, had there actually been progress in that respect. Which lessened the risk somewhat, but not by enough to let her metaphorical hackles relax.

It also made her rather sure the Soviet Union probably wouldn't outlast what Rachel had known of it.

Trebon, the rather smallish city they had stopped in first, had some cheerful facades and a lot of tourist hotspots to it. There was the expected petty crime on the streets, pickpockets were as common as they were in the USSR and small-time burglary seemed to be a semi-popular pastime for the underworld residents. What kept the Russian thief from actually fully appreciating the small tourist town was the emergence of the human trafficking trade this close to her home country.

Even by the time they reached Brno, she wasn't enjoying this part of the circus' traveling plans any more than Cherep was.

They both had near-misses when it came to the underworld slave trade, him more closely than her own situation. However, while her brother was more distracted by trying to put his childhood kidnapping well behind him his fellow Cloud was more concerned with slinking her way around the outer edges of that. Keeping tabs on the people she had spent almost a full year working with and taking note of who watched the circus' ponderous way through the country.

It wasn't entirely unheard of for children or young adults to go missing in a circus' wake, and not all of those were runaways.

That thought also made her finally keep a wary eye on Bjørn's progress in following her into the Iron Curtain. Even an annoying tagalong didn't deserve that kind of fate.

The young teen seemed rather capable on his own, even with the higher risk he was running stubbornly following in her wake. Yeah, that was kind of impressive and it did speak rather well of his competence if she really did take the kid on as a kind of personal assistant.

However, he didn't have to.

Again, the Storm-Cloud really did wonder what the hell was driving him so hard.

Speculating about it would only give her unrealistic expectations, so she merely resigned to asking one day.

As the purple colored want-to-be stuntman had said, better for her to conform on her own terms rather than wait until the Finnish boy had a hold over her to get what he wanted.

In his attempts to mentally distance himself, Cherep dragged her to the Masaryk Circuit on one of the few 'down' days she normally went drinking on. When the circus was being set up or packed up and they weren't needed to keep it running.

Well, it was called a Circuit, but it really was only a handful of streets cordoned off for motorist to race on. Rumors held it that an actual racing circuit was in the planning stages, but she'd believe that when she saw it.

Sonya couldn't even smoke while she waited for her fellow Cloud to get his fascination out of his system, her hands had taken residence over her ears. Mufflers needed major improvement sometime soon or she wasn't sure how she would survive her mechanically inclined foster brother.

Her distaste for the loud vehicles and the sheer monotony of watching them speed around in circles in the hope one crashed made her more inclined to watch the crowd rather than the race. She did have some fun spotting pickpockets working and keeping watch for the reactions as some found out they were robbed.

That allowed her to note that yes, Bjørn had followed her at a distance yet again.

Also, that he seemed to have attracted attention. Ironically, from the local branch of law enforcement. Finally, though the boy was usually more than careful about attracting the wrong sorts of attention to himself.

The Russian only watched for a moment, judging if the kid really did want to keep on following her when a more legal option was offered.

From the way Bjørn was slowly backing away from the spat of Czech aimed in his direction, she figured he was rather hung up on attaching himself to her. When he bolted instead of accepting whatever aid was offered to him, understood or not, the thief sighed heavily and wandered off to recollect him.

Cherep didn’t notice she left his side right away, but he did notice when she planted the Finnish boy right next to him in her previous spot.

Even if the mechanic spoke the local language Sonya didn’t, so he switched to French. Which Bjørn did understand somewhat, more than he could speak of it. "Finally gave in?"

"Something like that. We now officially have a cousin." The thief gave the preteen a slightly disgruntled sideways look. "A very distant cousin."

The Finnish kid clearly knew she wasn't happy with him, but he grinned in his gap-toothed way at her.

Well... if ignoring the brat hadn't worked, maybe overworking him would scare him off.

Sonya fully knew she wasn't likely to be right in that either but trying wouldn't kill anything.

CXXV (Wednesday the 19th of October, 1966. Minsk, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

Poland itself was almost a breath of fresh air, even if despite her newer worries involving a Finnish teen and new money troubles she hadn't expected.

The farther north the circus got, the more the vory v zakone principles started re-emerging.

Murder, theft, and the drug trade were popular methods used in Poland’s underworld, but the human trafficking that had so bothered her fell off until the worst of it was the occasional kidnapping and extortion rumors.

Sonya was under no illusions that the underworld slave trade wasn't still attempting to emerge in her second birth country, she had almost became one of many unfortunates that got caged by it. However, it was also much less tolerated and had no foothold or aid in the underworld of the USSR unless someone decided to try being suicidal.

The Russian was just greatly appreciative that she no longer felt like she had to watch her fellow circus folks' backs for them. Nothing might have happened had she not, and it was entirely likely it never will, but Cloud instincts weren't so easily brushed off. She seemed to at least be willing to guard those she associated with, even if she really didn't care when she was no longer aligned with them.

Interesting but not really something she wanted to object to. It was useful, sort of, and something she didn't mind as a side-effect of her Dying Will Flame use.

The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, or rather the BSSR, was the second-to-last country the Großes Volksfest would be visiting that year.

Two more weeks after they crossed the second to last border, then Sonya and Cherep would be in range to go visit Arseniy and Lisa in Moscow if they didn't mind a couple extra hours on a train.

Only visit, for although the thief would cheerfully steal the British crown jewels for two or three hours in a bathroom she didn't have to share or conserve water for the next person... neither foster sibling could claim the house they grew up in as home anymore.

As for the country itself, the Storm-Cloud was sensing a pattern.

The BSSR was, again, suppressed. Almost subdued. A direct and rather disturbing contrast to the capitalist countries on the other side of the Iron Curtain or even the USSR itself. The Soviet Union had a heavy hand on the government of SSR Byelorussia, and it showed in ways. Poland had been easier, although probably only due to contrasting that with the lessening worries they had once they left Czechoslovakia.

Sonya wondered if she never saw it before because she had become immune to the air and feeling of a suppressed population, or if it really was just worse the farther one got from the capital of the USSR. She had spent a lot of time, probably more than was healthy, avoiding everything remotely social in her youngest years in this life.

Ignoring everything, actually.

It hadn't seemed that bad to her but then again, she had become used to it. Used to the heavy feeling of oppression and a fracturing social order trying to re-secure itself. It had become normal to her.

It was, now that she had a look at both sides of the equation, clear that the Soviet Union wouldn't outlive what Rachel had known. It was already breaking down, the Berlin Wall and the growing social movement in Czechoslovakia would spread out to this country. From here to the USSR itself.

Which, she was semi-sure, wouldn't fall the same way.

The underworld, and more specifically the Mafiya world that was likely greater in number and more influential here and now, probably had their fingers in a couple pies the fall of the Soviet Union would ruin.

Mafiya people like Sonya were slightly capitalists no matter the views of their birth countries, they liked getting paid for their work first then doled out however much for their expenses for their next job.

However, for all her work in Mafia Land and her nest egg from her jewelry heists, she was still more communist than anyone in her old birth country would've been comfortable with. Her tithing the Zolotov clan was just her preparing for any possibility of injury or illness that would make her bedridden for any significant stretch of time, and firmly within that school of thought.

The vor and their attached people like Arseniy and Lisa were communists through and through, who tithed the clan their proceeds and were taken care of by the clan in return. Their clan owned the home they raised their foster kids within, the clan also took care of the cost of housing and the food bill in return for their services.

They were all still Soviet Union members, and so they outwardly supported the communist faction so long as their country did no matter the slight capitalist tendencies many of them had. It worked for them, because they were already criminals and didn't tend to fuss where the living expenses and lifestyles of others came from.

Sonya, through the grace of Rachel's once-life, wasn't quite the good little communist Russian girl she probably should've been. Never had been, given she had half expected her birth country to still fall the same way it had in another reality/life.

Which didn't address the problem of Bjørn and the impact the Finnish preteen would make on her finances.

The thief planted her face in her hands and thought hard.

She had only very minor things for Bjørn to do, but since she did grab the kid she was responsible for ensuring he had work or something to do to keep him out of trouble. She had no responsibility to his health or anything outside of what she set him to do until and unless she wanted him specifically trained for something, but she was still in a mostly unstated agreement to provide work.

Which also meant she had to pay for said work.

Sonya had planned on only herself in this little hiatus from theft, which would get slightly bolstered when she went back to Mafia Land and completed a handful of additional contracts.

Herself and a little minion was a different story, for all that Bjørn wasn't constrained by a circus' working hours and could probably run errands to the island for her.

...eventually. Once she or someone else taught him how to defend himself better than just standing there and taking it.

She would not be formally taking the Finnish brat on as a personal assistant or helper unless that changed. Thus, Bjørn had the option to leave her for better work elsewhere without her protesting unless she wanted to be a bitch. Which also meant she still wasn't going to be trusting him with sensitive things anytime soon.

However, she was still employing him which meant he was probably going to run into something she wanted hidden for the time being. Dying Will Flame use was very... visible, unless a friendly Mist was around to conceal it.

The whole situation made the Soviet Storm-Cloud uneasy, but there was little more she could do. Bjørn had already proved he wasn't leaving, she couldn't afford to hire him as a permanent minion, meaning a middle ground had to be found.

To make it worse, she still didn't trust her Finnish or his French to ensure no confusion happened in any conversation. That situation needed time to resolve, and she wasn't entirely sure it would have said time before something happened.

At the very least, she could hope to be within range of Moscow before anything too upsetting occurred.
CXXVI (Wednesday the 26th of October, 1966. Smolensk, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

After half a year playing at being a gypsy woman's fortune teller apprentice in a circus, Sonya's daily life fell into a very repetitive pattern.

Once the Großes Volksfest had arrived in a new town, everyone pitched in to set the circus up. Including Madame Crina and her thief of a draw girl. That would take two days, since everything had to be tested or inspected to ensure it was in working condition or appropriately mended for showing off.

The nights of those two days would be when Sonya went looking for more underworld watering holes or just poking around at the new town to get a measure of its residents.

Day three, which generally was a Saturday, in any town or village would normally be the day the circus opened. Meaning mid-morning to the wee hours of the next morning were spoken for.

The Russian had branched out for that part out of sheer self-preservation, because while she could apparently fake some social interactions well enough she didn't like the press of crowds.

Several hours were reserved with pulling more people into Madame Crina' grips by faking a mysterious air and speaking nonsense in the hopes someone was superstitious enough to pay attention, but that wasn't all she could do for those days.

The stage magic tricks ended up being something she could do without being expected to speak much. Pulling scarves out of pockets in her sleeves, pulling small pieces of candy or coins out of 'midair', and even the odd card trick was usually more than enough to entertain children.

The knife tricks, and knife juggling if she was forced to be honest, was something Sonya reserved for much later.

She couldn't guarantee she would never be knocked into and miss catching a dagger, after all. Best not to risk dropping one on some poor kid.

On the alternating months Faris had a slot juggling or breathing fire in the big top shows, the thief got to ditch being a wandering attraction and instead help him. While not a very visible role, it did help her be less overwhelmed by the crowds and a nice break now and again.

Jiayi kept trying to get her into the trapeze act, and the Russian kept on dodging the tiny Chinese woman. She had more than enough to do already, and she really didn't have any fond feelings for the art.

If they were lucky, the circus would be set up for more than one day. Even if not, after the show hours were over with packing up took significantly less time than setting the circus up.

Moving between cities and towns could be interesting, because depending on where they were affected the method of moving. Rail lines were preferred, as then everything was shipped overnight including the performers themselves. Occasionally waterways were used instead, sometimes a mix of the two if they were just crossing rivers or lakes to a nearby city or town.

Every now and again, though, there weren't any alternate options available and they had to hoof it. Trucks would handle the heavier stuff, the carnival rides and booths but mainly the big top, then alternate shipping would have to be found for the rest of the tents and equipment. They had not, yet, had to try transporting everything with only the circus folk to do that with, but everyone was aware that might happen if they were unlucky.

Sonya had added Bjorn to her, which meant she needed to pay the kid for enough work for him to afford something hot to eat every day, someplace clean to sleep, and his ticket to the next town via whatever method being used. She eventually started sending him out to locate the underworld watering holes for her, getting him to scour the rumor mill for who was top dog in whatever region, and maybe off to buy things for her instead of going out to get them herself.

Bjorn rapidly got better in French with her demands to try and fulfill.

That first month with him dodging her steps was still hard, because the thief had to independently confirm whatever he was trying to tell her. Half because she wasn't sure how far to trust the kid and half to correct his atrociously spoken and handwritten French.

Immersion was a very sink or swim way to learn a language, a method both she and her brother suffered through under Lisa to gain a competence in foreign languages. Bjorn, who had only Madame Crina that could understand his Finnish until he started working on broadening her grip on his native language, learned that the hard way.

By the time that first month ended, the Grobes Volksfest had returned to Moscow and was starting in on working up the money to afford semi-decent winter quarters for the performers.

At the end of the October month of 1966, Sonya went to Master Liam and gained permission to leave for her winter business. Giving Cherep a hard hug goodbye and a promise to return before the end of February next year, the thief grabbed her Finnish errand boy and dragged him to their childhood home.

CXXVII (Thursday the 27th of October, 1966. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Arseniy eyed Bjorn critically as he ate, who Sonya had sat firmly in the chair on the opposite side of the table from the vor. The street rat from Finland looked slightly unnerved by the scrutiny, but the thief was a little more distracted answering Lisa's questions after suffering through a rib-cracking hug.

"I can't take him with me, Lisa. Until I can actually employ him and be sure of his loyalty I won't risk myself by taking an unknown like him along." She palmed her face tiredly, running her mind through everything she had to do yet that winter. "I've got too much to do, and in order to afford actually hiring him I have to go find something lucrative to do. However, I can't do it when he's with me because I don't trust him that much."

"So, what do you want us to do with him?" Inquired the older woman simply, setting another two plates down so her foster daughter and her tagalong could eat too.

"Teach him to speak fluently in French, please?" Sonya picked up her fork, glancing over to the vor. "And maybe have him run a couple errands. I'll provide the ready cash to pay him from, I just need him elsewhere so I can afford him."

"Any reason you can't just set him down somewhere and come back later?" Arseniy asked idly, which the younger woman didn't trust at all because the man was playing with a knife when he asked.

A hard or scrambling life on the streets or as a minor runner for whoever had aged Björn more than he had years. Although she now knew the kid was twelve, he did look almost like a gangly if slight fourteen. At a glance, Arseniy's vor outlook pegged him old enough to be responsible for his own actions.

"He followed me from Finland all the way to Czechoslovakia, and I did nothing but prevent him from suffering the rest of a beating." The thief seriously gave some thought to what Bjorn may or may not have been or been up to before she gracelessly tripped into saving him. "I might have accidentally made him a pariah in his hometown, or maybe he just wanted something exotically different to do with his life. We can't hold an in-depth conversation like that with our language skills so diverse. So that's part of the reason why I'm asking."

Lisa pursed her lips slightly, giving the Finnish boy a hard look over of her own. "I can see why you would want that kind of perseverance if he's got a good reason for it, and I understand why you would bring him here to at least try to figure it out. So, I'll say yes so long as you understand you owe me a very good birthday present sweetie."

Well, that was one down. Sonya turned to Arseniy, who looked just as unimpressed as he always was. ":...because you like me best?"

The vor snorted, a very dry smirk pulling up one side of his mouth. "Are you sure about that?"

She nibbled on lunch a bit, nodding slowly. "I'm the one you let take on your name."

"I let your boy do it too."

"Because of me. So, if we had to use our foster sibling relationship as a cover for any sneaky things it wouldn't seem too odd that we didn't share a name." She finished for him, batting her lashes at her foster father. "I need to know if I can trust him, so while I handle my other responsibilities I brought him to people I do trust. Aren't you flattered?"

"It would be very depressing if you couldn't trust us, girl." The man countered, almost lazily.

"True, I would cry." Sonya couldn't quite keep her face straight as she said it, causing Lisa to snicker to herself.

Arseniy's mouth gave an unwilling twitch into a more real smile.

All the kids had learned a happy Lisa was the way to get the vor's approval, and they were Mafiya trained so of course they took ruthless advantage of that chink in his stony armor when they could. That, and the fact the man sucked at handling things when the waterworks appeared which everyone but Bjorn in the room knew that full well, had Arseniy giving in with a sigh.

"No more than four months, right?"

"Probably less." Conceded the former pickpocket thoughtfully, tapping her fork's tines on the side of her plate. "I have a way to pay back a favor I owe an associate for some help he gave me last year, and there's five contracts I need to do between now and February of next year. I promised Cherep I'd be back before the end of February, start of March, so there's that."

"Hmph." Arseniy bit into his pelmeni as if it had insulted him, glowing at Bjorn enough the kid shrank back from the table a little. "I want you to spend a couple days getting used to some of the newer locks and safes on the market, Sonya. Then you might want to present yourself to Aleksandr
"I was going to ask if I could." The thief agreed wryly, pushing the remaining half of her food over to the Finnish street rat so the kid could eat until he wasn't hungry anymore.

Lisa would fix that, too.

If Sonya had the time, she'd investigate maybe scheduling a check-up at the Mafia Land hospital for the kid. If not this year then next.

She set her spine against the chair's back, crossing her arms under her slight chest and looked around the kitchen curiously while everyone else ate.

Not much had changed since she and Cherep had 'run away to join the circus', but it did feel decidedly odd being back here again.

It might have been the lack of Tatiana's vinyl record player cranking out some bohemian pop, no clangs of metal or the odd thump from her brother messing with whatever mechanical thing he had gotten ahold of lately, or even just the fact that Bjorn was sitting next to her.

It was still odd. Rachel hadn't gotten to this point of her life, where she could visit old childhood haunts and feel too big for them, so it was her first experience at it.

She didn't think she liked it much.

CXXVIII (Saturday the 29th of October, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Renato met her on the docks, which earned him a dubious look from the Russian thief.

For one, she hadn't sent word to him exactly when she'd be arriving or what way she'd get to Mafia Land by. For another, the fact he knew anyways was kind of creepy.

No one, not even Sonya, was happy to see a hitman waiting for them no matter where they were or what was promised to said man. "I... would say it is a pleasure to see you again, Renato, but actually...?"

"I'm aware, thank you." The Italian gritted out, shifting back on his heels and uncrossing his arms as she wandered up to him. Dark eyes flicked to the other passengers disembarking with her, some of whom were cringing away from him.

That might have to do with the near air of irritation he had to him, but Sonya wasn't betting on it.

"How soon are you free?"

"I have only a few errands to run. A duck into the Thieves' Hall and checking in with the fences on pieces I have commissioned them to sell for me from old jobs, but that's about it."

She also had to set up somewhere for her to stay at least a week, because she wasn't sure if this would go faster or slower than Usov's situation. That would have to wait until she could get a grip on the situation.

Actually, she could probably cut the visit to her hall for now. Until she knew when she'd no longer be needed at a baby Mist's side she wouldn't have an idea of what deadlines she could abide to.
Renato unbent a bit further, snatching up the larger piece of luggage she had with her. "Where are you planning on staying?"

"A hotel, probably nearby where you live, but I need to see your baby wisp first." That got her a sideways look from the Mafioso, and she couldn't do more than shrug. "Until I know what will be needed or how long it might take, best not to plan too far ahead."

"...you may wish to know..."

"Did he scare himself?" At the almost unwilling, disgruntled, barely there nod Sonya tried hard not to smirk.

His baby Mist had probably all but made Renato's apartment, assuming that was where the hitman has stashed the kid, unlivable. Usov had done the same to a very large chunk of the near mansion/office complex the Zolotov Clan operated out of. Renato's baby Mist had probably done something similar in scope.

"I can fix that."

"Can you?"

"One word, Renato. Disintegration."

"Storms, right." He hefted her luggage over one shoulder and started off, in the direction of the more residential sectors of the illegal island held.

Any hope she had that this wouldn't paint a very big target on herself or him died a messy death the moment she got a good look at the hitman's apartment complex.

His baby Mist was apparently even stronger than Usov had been. The Construction illusions barring the way to him had spread out in a tangled webbing of...

...was that fishing line?

Nets, too, the kind someone would transport fish from boat to dock in. Complete with algae ridden weights and buoys. It laced around the building from specific exits, stringing closed several outdoor walkways and probably clogging up the inner ones as well.

Sonya eyed the building, even from five streets down, and the crowd that had gathered to gawk.

She would privately bet there was fishing tackle and anchors twisted up in there too. It fit with the fisherman theme going on. "Renato..."

"I know." There was a thread of frustration in his voice, and enough disgust it caused her to look fully at him. "But I can't get to the brat to shake him out of this with everything in the way. And if you need to destroy some of the building-"

"Nothing so drastic." The Russian cut him off with an eye roll, shoving the smaller traveling pack that held her overnight things into his free arm. "Give me fifteen, then try to make your way in."

"Three-thirteen." At her inquiring look, the man rolled his eyes back at her even as he set her luggage down next to his shiny black shoes. "My apartment number."

"Mmm... right, wish me luck." She didn't wait to see if he would or not, she immediately headed for the service tunnel entrance in a nearby apartment complex.
She didn't really want to deal with that many people, who would undoubtedly want to know what the hell was going on and who fixed the situation if she could. Renato could tell them whatever he wanted, so long as he kept her or baby Mist brat out of it.

She'd slap him one if he didn't. Hard.

The underground service tunnels were just as clogged up as the surface entrances to the building she wanted, but her contract employee ID was enough to let the service staff to allow her to start using her Storm Flames to eat away at the Mist ones in privacy. There weren't any active users among them, or at least no other Storms, so they crept along in Sonya's wake instead before breaking off to handle whatever.

As it had been a year ago, the stronger the concentration of Mist Flame Constructions were slinking out of the gaps around Renato's apartment door. The closer she got the harder it was, and the more Storm Flames it required from her to clear a way.

She didn't use the red Flames much, and whatever control she got from this would probably weigh in little next to how much easier it would be to call on the destructive fire afterwards. By the time she stumbled into the hitman's apartment, mentally swearing to replace the lock herself after melting it and part of the door off, she was not a happy thief.

She was in fact a very tired thief.

The kid she extracted from the nest of fishing net under the tiny kitchen table was similarly exhausted though, so she decided they were going to crash on the hitman's couch for a few minutes.

Baby Mist kid only stirred after they had laid there in a daze for a while, cracking his brown eyes open to give her a suspicious glare before almost spitting out a question in rapid Italian. "Are you miss Sonya?"

She cocked her head to the side, eyeing the brat sprawled across her chest warily. "Yeah, Renato told you about me then?"

He nodded slowly, still inspecting her suspiciously. "I'm Shamal."

Sonya, bemusedly, shook the tiny hand thrust at her face politely. Then the name registered, and she felt ice slide down her spine.

Shamal?

As in Trident Shamal?

That perverted asshole doctor-assassin the Sun Arcobaleno called up when something medical was needed?

That was this kid?

"Did you have to melt my door?" Renato asked acidly as he shoved it more open for his bigger frame, lightly tossing Sonya's luggage into a nearby corner.

"I did not have to, but melting my way up here was tiring enough I did not have the patience to pick it instead."

She informed him, a little inanely, still caught up on that tiny fact of the baby Mist's name.

...was Renato actually Reborn?
Eyeing the young Russian blonde bombshell sprawled gracelessly out on his probably rather uncomfortable couch, Renato bit his tongue against another sarcastic observation and gestured for an equally as drowsy looking Shamal to the kitchenette part of his apartment.

Sonya was way, way too pale under her recently acquired tan. If she was anything like him then food would help, and something hot and sweet for the time being. She'd probably prefer tea to coffee, but he didn't have anything but the beans in his cupboards.

Luckily Shamal's fear or paranoia inspired Mist Constructs had rapidly faded once he was removed from contact with them and suitably distracted by the thief's appearance. He might have gone a bit overboard scaring the brat into obedience, if he worked himself up to smother the apartment complex with illusions without a clear grasp on what he was doing.

Kids were not the hitman's thing. Especially likely traumatized little boys that decided to leak uncontrolled Mist Flames like a busted pipe. Shamal wasn't quite to the point of being able to control himself reliably yet, and the probably typical nightmares spurred his lack of control to even more unmanageable heights.

"Renato, exactly how did young Shamal end up with you?" Sonya asked quietly, still in Italian, the heel of her left palm rubbing her eye tiredly.

"...I knew his father," Renato forced out between gritted teeth.

If she asked, he was sort of expected to tell her since she was here to help him. That wasn't a story he wanted to spill in front of the kid until he was old enough to think rationally about it.

"So... how old is he?"

That drew him up short, and he shot the brat a look to try and judge the answer from appearance alone. "...five."

Shamal puffed up his tiny chest, but she snorted quietly behind the two of them. "I would've guessed three from how lanky he is."

Baby Mist turned and scowled at her, edging into Renato's personal space enough to gain him a sharp look for that alone. "I'm not a baby. I'm almost four."

"So, three and a half. At most." Spoke the thief levelly, as if it was inconsequential.

It wasn't, not nearly as much as she was pretending. The hitman tried rather hard not to throw his coffee maker into a wall, because that would probably startle the boy.

Sparking another outpour of Mist Flames he would have to try containing before the rest of the island learned there was a very young, very vulnerable Mist living in the apartment building for the time being.

Somehow Sonya was suddenly on her feet and approached him obviously, slim fingers prying his own off the death grip he had on the coffee pot.

"Calm down before you scare him."
The bland smile on her face was a stark contrast to the hissed out words, probably too low for the kid to pay attention to since he was more wary of her person that what she was saying.

Renato concentrated on getting his control over his temper back as she poured them coffee and got Shamal a glass of water. She left his black but repurposed his milk to add to her own.

"Are you Mister Renato's lady friend?"

"I supposed you could say that, yes." The Russian replied calmly, some rather fancy footwork pulling the only kitchen chair around so she could collapse onto it. "I am a girl, and we are... friends... mostly."

Not quite as graceful as she normally was, obviously the expenditure of so much Storm Flames was still affecting her somewhat.

His mind then caught up to what she had claimed and almost choked on his next sip.

Sonya ignored him and any expression he might have been making, setting her mug down and squarely looking at Shamal seriously so he'd answer honestly. "Alright, I'm going to need to know what you know about Mist Flames. What you know you can do, what you guess you might be able to do, and what you want to do with it."

Said baby Mist blinked wide brown eyes at her innocently. "What are Mist Flames?"

Her expression went from politely inquiring to flat.

"...perfect. Just perfect." She shot him a blistering look, obviously annoyed. "Mist Flames are one of the seven types of Dying Will Flames of the Sky..."

CXXX (Saturday the 29th of October, 1966 continued. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Dinner ended up being Chinese takeout, because Sonya had to go through the entirety of what Flames were and what they could do with a damn three-year-old.

Excuse her, a three-and-a-half-year-old. Who, like any child everywhere, asked too many questions all at the same time. Which made it take even longer to get through the basics than it should have.

She couldn't decide if Renato had refrained from clarifying what the hell was going on with the kid out of politeness, since she had promised to help him with Shamal, or out of curiosity over what she knew of the subject.

The Russian thief also could not get up the energy to really bother worrying about it either.

Storm Flames weren't her primary ones, or even the easiest to control either. Shamal, by the grace of a young and uncluttered mind, had poured a lot of himself into his Construction based illusions. Probably more than was healthy, too.

Popping Mist Constructs of that kind of purity had been harder, especially since they hadn't been made from unwilling fear.

As apparently, from the story she awkwardly prompted out of the kid, it was something his late father had instructed him to do if he was somewhere he shouldn't have been and uncertain.
Purposely done illusions were stronger than unwilling Constructions, meaning a dab of Storm Flames hadn't been enough by half.

The hitman had told him to stay indoors and away from windows while he was gone, and Shamal had lost his father recently enough to be unsure of everything. Hence why the thief found him under the table in a cocoon of his own Mist Flames.

Sonya had a headache by the time the brat's bedtime came around, and she couldn't decide if it was just the stress of travel, the day she had, the lack of nicotine, or just the situation causing said headache.

"Sonya?"

"The hell are you going to do with a three-year-old?"

Renato shrugged idly, a bit too stiffly to be really that nonchalant. "I know a place."

The young woman sniffed at the non-answer but let that go. It wasn't really her business. "I... need to get some sleep."

He frowned faintly, glancing between her, the clock, and back to the hallway the young Mist had been escorted down when he got way too tired to continue. "You could stay."

She shot him a suspicious look. This was likely way out of the Mafioso's comfort zone, and no one wanted to be around edgy or uncomfortable hitmen.

Then she rethought the situation to include baby Mist boy likely asleep not fifteen yards from her. "...your couch is uncomfortable."

Baby Mist who had no other security than the not-so-obviously stressed out contract killer.

It was entirely out of her comfort zone too.

"I highly doubt I'll be getting much sleep." He responded rather dryly, leaning his lanky frame up against the wall. "You can use my bed."

She blinked at him blankly.

"So long as you don't steal anything."

"I," she insisted with blatantly faked injured innocence, "have never stolen from you."

Which was likely a very, very good thing. Especially if Renato really was Reborn, and she had been unknowingly socializing with a young version of the next Arcobaleno of the Sun.

Why the hell she never made any connection like that in her head before this was something she intended to sit and think about sometime soon.

"You, little lady Sonya, are a thief. The fact you haven't yet stolen from me is suspicious."

Said thief snorted harshly. "This coming from the one that harassed me first?"

Renato waved one hand as if to dismiss the point. "I have no idea what you may be talking about."

Sonya eyed him sourly, then forced herself to sit up. "More seriously, I have to run two contracts before New Year's. Two or three next year before I leave again next year before the spring thaw sets in back in Moscow. I do not know how fast or slow this is going to be, because your Shamal kid does not trust me."

"At least he listens to me."

"That is not exactly helping me right now, Renato."

The hitman's features twisted, but if it was supposed to have been a smirk or a grimace she wasn't sure. "You've gotten things out of him."

"Yes, but he looks to you first to see if he should speak or not." Rubbing a hand up one side of her neck, the thief set her chin on the palm of her hand and blew out a sigh. "I am also rather sure he has discounted about half or more of what I have already told him as not true, which will make this take even longer."

"Some of the things you've said I haven't heard before." Pointed out the Italian, as if that was cause enough.

"I have references."

He gave her a long look, then tilted his head back slightly. "Ho? Really. With you?"

Alright, tired or not she still knew he was fishing there. "You damage my books, I will damage you."

"With you, then." Eying her luggage speculatively, the Mafioso pushed off the wall and stalked to the middle of his open kitchenette/living room. "You should get some sleep, Sonya."

Huffing, the thief kept right where she was and frowned up at him.

"More complaints?"

"I can smoke in a hotel room." She offered sarcastically, as if that was more important than the effort it would involve to drag herself and her luggage to a nearby hotel. "I also will not have to worry about jumpy, trigger-happy hitmen that might shoot me in the morning."

"It's late enough the night-life is out and about." He countered smugly, not addressing his state of health which probably meant he was fully aware he wasn't in the best condition. "You don't like to be on the streets at this time of the day."

"You know, it is a little creepy how well you know my movements." Spoke the Storm-Cloud as if talking to the air, more than a little disgruntled. "Am I going to have to worry about stalkers?"

"Of course not, it's not like I'd let myself get caught that way."

She gave him the most disgusted look she could, which predictably bounced off his arrogance without leaving a scratch.

"...the small messenger bag in my backpack has a box of gemstones and two books. Leave the stones alone, I don't know enough about gems to tell them apart without labels and those are for Shamal."

"Gemstones? As in...?"

"Ever see those Flame conducting rings?" Sonya gave him a truly sly smirk. "I started out as a jewel thief, you know."

"No, I didn't know." Renato informed her slowly. "But... that is interesting."
CXXXI (Sunday the 30th of October, 1966. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

The door opening woke Sonya up, and she spent a very disorientating moment wondering where the hell she was and what she was doing in a man's bedroom.

Shamal reaching the bed and his struggle to climb up the side of it distracted her from that mental musing. She sleepily snatched the kid by the back of the oversized shirt he was wearing and sat him on the edge of the bed to get a good look at him once she woke up more.

Computing her location and the events of last night together was proving a bit tricky for her right now.

Baby Mist wasn't content to merely sit though, instead he buried his face in her stomach and started crying in earnest.

Absolutely befuddled, she blinked owlishly down at the kid.

On one hand... did Renato let the kid do this?

Aw...

On the other, she had no blessed clue what to do now.

The Russian awkwardly patted the kid on the back, trying to dredge up from memory what Dmitriy had done when Usov had his crying jags. That baby Mist wasn't nearly as touchy-feely as Shamal was being now, but hugs had seemed to work. She didn't particularly like being hugged or used as a handkerchief, but a three-year-old who recently lost his father was due some consideration.

Excuse her, three-and-a-half.

"Shamal, breath. You're going to make yourself sick at this rate."

Her contralto tones, sleep rough though it may be, wasn't anything like the hitman's baritone. It was different enough to permeate whatever had upset the boy, and Shamal tried to cut himself off.

Obviously, she wasn't who he expected to be in this bed.

The squeak, as if a mouse had been surprised, didn't quite manage to stop the sniffles. Watery brown eyes peered up at her, then the barely out of toddlerhood child rather hurriedly dashed a forearm across his eyes. "Wasn't crying."

"Alright. Not crying." She agreed slowly, wondering why he was denying it. "But you'll still make yourself sick if you keep doing... whatever you were doing."

"You needed a hug."

Sonya stared at him dubiously. She didn't even like hugs when Cherep wanted to give her some. Admittedly, her best friend/brother went totally overboard when he decided to be sappy and practically smothered her normally.

"And you were having a bad dream."
"I was, was I?" No, the thief didn't believe that for a moment.

Shamal nodded solemnly and blinked teary brown eyes up at her, looking as if butter wouldn't even melt in his mouth.

He'd be a damn fine liar in a few years, but he wasn't there yet.

She snorted softly and ruffled his already messy hair. "Fine then. I take it you don't feel sleepy enough to go back to sleep?"

She got a rapid head shake, which almost knocked himself off the bed and onto the floor with the violence of the motion. The kid also looked rather scared, and not of the near-tumble he almost took.

Steadying the Mist, the Russian thief pushed herself upright and stretched out her arms with a yawn. "Alright then, what... err... is there anything you do need?"

"No."

She blinked at the abrupt refusal, aware she was being lied to but unable to figure out what he was lying about. "...is Renato up yet?"

"No."

Eying his expression, which was steadily getting stormier by the second, she gave up.

Three-year-old children were a damn mystery to her, and no one was paying her to do it anyways. "Is there anything you want to do?"

"Can't. Mister Renato's sleeping, we can't wake him up for nothing. It's a rule." Shamal informed her tiredly, as if she was the one being difficult.

"I, little one, am a thief. Stealthy is what I am by trade alone, I will not wake Renato up no matter what it is." Sonya sniffed in offense at his obviously unconvinced expression, swinging her feet out from under the covers and off the bed to stand up. She also snatched him up, because like hell she would let some little brat doubt her skills to her face. "Be quiet and I'll show you."

The brat still looked highly skeptical on the superiority of a thief's silent steps to his own crashing elephant gait, even when she eased the door open quieter than he had managed.

The Storm-Cloud spotted Renato damn fast, the man had fallen asleep on the couch.

One of her own books, the one she had condensed several different books' worth of information on nature of Dying Will Flames into not her master research journal, was serving as a light blocker covering his face while his long legs were hanging off one side of the couch.

The ass had better not smudge the ink in her book, or she'd introduce him to her Bec de Corbins. Forcibly. Using the pointy end.

Huffing slightly as she irritably eyed the hitman, Sonya then cast her gaze around for her backpack and found it next to the couch.

...of course, it would be there.

Shamal's sharp intake of breath when she started moving forward was in violation of her order to be silent, but she didn't do more than throw the brat a sharp look.
When she reached the hitman's side, right before she bent slightly to lift her pack in a method that wouldn't let the stones she knew were inside from clacking against one another, baby Mist brat spoke loudly into her ear in what he probably fondly thought was a whisper.

It wasn't.

"Wow… you are stealthy, miss Sonya."

Sonya gifted him with an annoyed stare, even as Renato tugged down the edge of the book he had likely fallen asleep reading to see what they were doing. "Generally, Shamal, one does not speak when trying to be quiet."

The kid, who was practically only just out of toddlerhood on the cusp of being a young child, clapped his hands over his mouth as if that would help take back his words.

The Mafioso might have been trying to remain 'asleep' for all intents and purposes, in order not to give the game away… but the snickers he wasn't very successful in suppressing was shaking him slightly. Disgusted with being busted just that far from validating her sneaking skills to the child, the Russian thief picked up her backpack and dropped Shamal onto the hitman's stomach.

Ignoring the fact the man was now outright laughing at her, she dug out a box of gemstones and a pack of cigarettes out of her traveling pack. The box went on the coffee table, the pack of smokes went with her. "I am going to go have a smoke. You two figure out what we're doing for breakfast."

---

CXXXII (Sunday the 30th of October, 1966 continued. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Renato could easily believe Sonya had done this before, at least once for another Mist.

She didn't get too irritated with Shamal's meandering questions, not even when it went back through the information she had just finished telling him in attempts to trip her up. The thief was irritated nonetheless, but it was more… dealing with a very young child annoyance than a Cloud being forced into close quarters with a Mist aggravation.

Everything the hitman had ever gotten on Dying Will Flame users and the type of people they tended to be insisted that Clouds, by nature, weren't sociable nor tolerant of irritations. Any and all passages that described Cloud Flame users also never failed to hold some kind of warning about their interactions with Mist users.

More to the point, they always warned to keep the two far apart unless a Sky could bridge the space between them.

He had even personally witnessed a fight that started between a Cloud and a Mist over a minor slight that had nearly destroyed an entire wing of a manor once. It had been stupidly inane, but apparently the little tiff meant more to the two of them than the good opinions of anyone around them at the time.

That was why he insisted on being present when his Storm-Cloud associate ran his Mist using… ward through the basics of Dying Will Flame types and what that would mean for him, as well as an overview of what kind of skills, tricks, and abilities she knew a Mist could have.

Yet… Sonya put up with getting patted, poked, prodded, and tugged on by Shamal. Who was sitting pretty in her lap while she went over how he was likely to fare against other types if he ever found himself in trouble.

This was the same woman who, at the tender age of thirteen, nearly broke Renato's wrist for grabbing her arm. She always sidestepped any possible brush with even pedestrians on the street, glared when someone tried getting into her personal space, and generally treated people talking to her as an annoyance she wasn't sure if she should beat the tar out of or ignore.

That woman, mainly a Cloud user of some impressively icy behavior, with a kid in her lap. A Mist kid being annoying because he somehow felt safe enough to do it.

Renato was staring. He knew it, and could probably help it, but… still… staring.

"No," Sonya repeated herself for the seventh time in as many minutes, "just because you're a Mist doesn't mean you automatically 'kick the butt' of any Lightning users."

Shamal gave her a disgruntled pout. "But you just said-

"That Mist users, who are properly prepared, can really mess with a Lightning using their unique attention span. But that's Hard Lightnings, Soft Lightnings are harder to fool. It's all subjective, while a tendency means more likely it also doesn't mean that will always be true."

"What does subjective mean?"

The Russian thief sighed into his hair, releasing her book to rub the bridge of her nose. "It means that it depends on the situation."

"Oh... what does tendency mean?"

"That it is more likely to happen."

The brat considered that for a few moments. "What does differentiate mean?"

"I think," Renato spoke up before the twitch in the Cloud woman's right eye got worse, "we may need a small break."

The glare she tossed him contained every tiny bit of aggravation she wasn't letting the child in her lap know about. "We, huh?"

He merely smirked at her, pleased when the twitch got noticeably worse. He hadn't ever really managed to safely irritate the hell out of her before, so this was new to him. "Didn't you say you needed to visit the fences?"

"And the Thieves' Hall, and actually get myself a room nearby for..." Sonya looked at the kid still occupying her lap, "...longer than I'd like to. I don't think a week's going to cut it if we're going this slow."

She shut the book, nudging Shamal off her so she could stand and recollect her things.

Those books were something he rather dearly wished to question.

It was her handwriting, he knew that much at least. One book had great scores through some of the information, as if she had investigated then discarded whatever bit, the other had the bare minimum of information on all seven different types recorded within and a few rare selections on the benefits and drawbacks of certain specific types.

Bare basics, without the slants for or against certain types the Sun using Mafioso kept coming across in any of the books he found. Without expecting said types to conform or only show to specific personality traits.

Obviously her own work, but what he wanted to know first and foremost was how big of a pool of Flame active people she had worked with to cut whatever available information she started with to those bare bone descriptions. He could guess at least one of Soft Cloud, Soft Rain, Hard Sun, and Hard Mist from what she told Shamal. There were even hints of a young Lightning starting to submit some information, one not able to commit to hard answers yet but able to answer a few misconceptions.

It wasn't something he could ask, because Sonya likely wouldn't let that be included into just one of the favors she owed him. He'd have to find a different way.

Renato slanted a look at the child of one of his old contacts, of whom he was the only one available or able to take in when he ended up an orphan. The young Mist blinked teary brown eyes up at the thief, who did look slightly torn on leaving as she stared back at him.

Even if she was wildly uncomfortable with how clingy Shamal was when he found you didn't limit his contact time with your person.

He wondered if she would answer in her brutally frank way if he got Shamal to ask her questions instead.

CXXXIII (Monday the 31st of October, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Sonya didn't quite get around to the rocks she brought with her until the evening of the second day she was helping Renato out.

Discounting that first night, since little of anything really got done.

Baby Mist had, like all children at his age, no concept of patience or limits. It was all or nothing for him, and before they got to the actual attempts on learning de-Construction she'd greatly appreciate it if Shamal wouldn't keep exhausting her limited skills with Storm Flames when she kept his illusions contained for him.

Hopefully, the ease of utilizing a Flame through a gemstone would temper than a little… otherwise it would be incredibly useless for him like the other Mist she had helped through this part of his life.

The thief ran him through the gemstones in the safety of her hotel room, checking first to see that he could use sapphires and had a strange reaction to ruby before looking for a different fit.

Given the fact she imploded a sapphire, she wasn't going to let a young child run around with one.

"Why do I need a rock? You said it probably won't help."

"I said it likely won't help you when you're older. For now, though," she shoved another mineral, a clump of lapis lazuli Usov had favored, into his hands for him to try, "it may prove to be a decent emergency option."

Shamal pulled a little pouty face at the lump of rock, but not even a spark of Mist Flames appeared after a full minute. "Why?"
Breathing in through her nose to calm herself, Sonya vowed to get back at her hitman contact for this shit even if it took her years. "Because a focus stone like the one we're looking for can be used as a decent anchor for your little fishing net trap. Everyone will think you're inside of it, but instead you can sneak away and find Renato while they're distracted."

"I like that idea." Said hitman observing the trial and error testing of various gemstones put in lazily, tipping the chair he had commandeered from Sonya's hotel room even further back so his heels could rest on the top of a small side table.

"You would." She shot back repressively.

The Russian hadn't decided if the touch too complicated questions the kid kept posing to her was his fault or not, but she still suspected Renato was nudging the kid into asking them. It sounded a bit rehearsed to her, too much so to be questions a Mist as young as him thought up on his own.

That, and she was trained to catch that kind of falseness. She may not be always right guessing the why behind it, but she could still tell when something wasn't natural.

Shamal huffed at them, side-eyeing the sapphire she wasn't going to let him walk away with.

Blindly groping for the next stone while so distracted, he didn't notice right away that the oval chunk of turquoise started glittering when his baby-fat pudgy fingers closed around it.

When he did finally give it more of his attention, tiny flickers of darkly blue Flames started spiking up in response.

"I think we have a winner." Sonya informed him blandly, poking the kid in the side. "Even better than the sapphire, isn't it?"

Too distracted to respond, baby Mist kept staring in fascination at the rock glowing with his inner neon indigo fire.

Renato shifted, letting the legs of his chair thump back to the floor, and smoothly rose to his feet in a smooth movement. Taking the few steps to where she had set herself and the kid up on her hotel bed, he peered down at the results. "What is it?"

"Turquoise." She sighed again, rubbing at her temples. "Which correlates with no other results I've gotten just yet either."

"What do you mean?"

"Everyone I've tried this test with so far have preferred wildly different stones. Or minerals. Even those that share the same type if not polarization."

Picking up one of the discarded rocks, moonstone the thief identified on reflex, the hitman rolled the smooth round rock between his fingers curiously. "How many have you tried?"

Snorting softly, the thief looked up at him reprovingly. "I'm not answering that."

"Any particular reason you've never asked me?"

Sonya was about to tell him that she frankly didn't trust him that much with the people she did but didn't. Her eyes caught on a bit of tension lacing his frame, in how stiffly he held himself upright and the flex of his shoulders, but mostly she was distracted by the faint flicker of yellow in the rock he was rolling around his fingers.
"No... damn it, that's not even a yellow gemstone!"

"What...?" He followed her gaze down to his hands, and the moonstone now glimmering with a hint of Sun Flames. "...huh."

"Miss Sonya?" Shamal interjected, clutching his own not-indigo stone and sounding both baffled and concerned.

The Storm-Cloud ran a hand down her face, tiredly detailing what that was going to mean for her. "I... need more research... on... oh screw it. Screw color too, because apparently that has no bearing on anything."

Renato twisted the chunk of pale, almost-white but more bluish rock in his hands around, then dabbed a bit of yellow fire on the surface and watched it sink into the semi-transparent depths. "Well... I'm taking this."

"Fine, whatever." There were a few stones lost trying to match one person with a rock, so it wouldn't be too hard to hand wave the loss to Arseniy.

She could at least go poke Tatiana and see if moonstone would work for the Classical Sun as well, so this wasn't a complete back-step.

The color coded gemstone method of searching might not be the best way to match a Dying Will Flame user to a focus stone, but it was a working one nonetheless... and if she had done all that work for it in the first place it had damn well not prove to be a waste anyways.

CXXXIV (Tuesday the 2nd of November, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Since a baby Mist did have such an obvious episode of uncontrolled Construction smack dab in the middle of the free-floating island controlled by criminals, Sonya had been expecting it to have taken them less time to start asking questions of the uncomfortable kind.

'Them' being the representative of the coalition of mafia groups that ran Mafia Land's day-to-day business. They weren't stupid, no one that remained in control of an island of criminal-types like this could be without being brutally murdered and replaced in short order. Crafty and patient were the more likely culprits.

Four days after the fact, there was an elderly gentleman sitting at the café table she and Renato had typically used for the past five years when they had the time to spare. The thief herself was just thankful the hitman was keeping Shamal close to the more 'family-orientated' and residential sections, neither were present since she had volunteered to pick up lunch from a less 'peaceful' part of the city-like island.

She knew he was there for her, he was staring right at her meaningfully and as she watched one silvered eyebrow rose in expectation.

Considering the situation thoughtfully, she decided this was likely as close to neutral ground as anyone connected to those that ran Mafia Land could get. It was even partially her 'territory', someplace she was known at and well thought of if only for the tips she and a certain Sun user left after they were done with a tea or coffee break.

That being the case, it would've been very rude to turn the invitation down. The obvious suggested 'or-it-will-get-worse' threat the older man's stare was telling her just made that course of action the more prudent one.

The location choice was well thought out, after all.

After a moment to gather her thoughts, the Russian corrected her course to approach him while ensuring it was the more obvious path and he could see she was visibly unarmed. "I take it you wish to speak with me?"

"Sit… please." He gestured to her usual chair brusquely, turning his own around to face her directly across the tabletop rather than sit sideways with it between them as she normally did with Renato. "We have reports that you volunteered to… handle a little issue for our service personnel."

"That would be correct." There hadn't been any other way to get around that, there would've been witnesses no matter what she did. Sonya at least ensured her Flame use was at least revealed in a way that wouldn't come off as her being just destructive with it. "May I ask why you are approaching me about this?"

When the first three days had passed without word, she had assumed that Mafia Land had active Flame users so her showing up as one all the sudden wasn't that alarming. The thief had expected it to be added to the intelligence the island masters likely kept on everyone that visited, but that would've been par for the course.

Nothing was ever for free in their lives. Especially not a 'safe haven'.

This, a meeting taking place after more than twice the time they would've needed to hunt her down for answers or to arm twist her into being an active Flame user for the island on staff?

Was suspicious. Alarming too, if only because she didn't know what kind of allegiances or views the people that ran this place had on Dying Will Flame users.

"It was an accident, correct?"

"It will not happen again, if that is what you are asking." The thief admitted slowly. She'd blow off her circus life it that was what it would take to teach Shamal not to smother a building in Mist Flames again just because he was scared.

Cherep would understand when she explained this to him.

"The interests that I represent are not that concerned of a repeat." The gentleman claimed, straightening his lapels as if to hammer home the point that the people he worked for were too highly placed to be worried much. "We are more interested in… who it is you needed to correct the mistakes of."

In other words, 'whose aid did you go to?'

Sonya was intensely uncomfortable with the direction this 'discussion' looked to be heading to. The frown she was giving him seemed to answer some kind of question, and the man leaned forward slightly.

"There will be no blame laid out," he offered as if that was what was stalling her tongue, "but we do tend to… collect very special young people and offer a sanctuary for them."

Like that didn't sound disturbing at all.
Placed next to her brother's unfortunate experiences being 'collected' and Renato's past warnings of people hunting Flame users, this did not have undertones the Russian was willing to assist with.

"Just… something to think about." He rose to his feet, rather spry for a man of his advanced years, and strolled away as if he had nothing to worry about.

He probably didn't. If he was the only one here from whatever group was pulling the strings, she was a fish.

Slumping back in the spindly café chair, Sonya quickly ran that probing conversation through her head again.

If… if they were making an offer of protection for a supposedly younger Dying Will Flame user to an older one, didn't that mean they were really looking for users that didn't come with pre-existing allegiances?

She didn't know, nor did she really like any of it.

However, the Sun using Mafioso was Shamal's current and likely only guardian. She'd repeat the offer to him, speak up with her concerns, but it really was up to the hitman.

She rose to her own feet, continuing down the street to the restaurant they had picked for the day.

Likely if they knew exactly who she was and where she liked to frequent on the island, they knew what she had been up to lately. That whatever it was had to do with Renato… and possibly a little brown-haired boy that stuck close to both the hitman and the thief.

She'd look for any obvious tails, or anything that smacked of suspicious activity, but playing coy wouldn't do anything but delay the mid-day meal.

Cranky, hungry Shamal was not her favorite to deal with anyways.

---

CXXXV (Tuesday the 2nd of November, 1966 continued. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Renato's features didn't change as she reported what had delayed her to him.

Which was scary enough given her suspicions of who he would become, she could've dealt without the tension that wracked both him and his little apartment the more ticked off he got.

Shamal was already preemptively cringing, not out of actual fear but what seemed to be expectations for something to blow up. He only flinched when the hitman shot his living room lamp to pieces, Sonya almost jumped out of her skin.

Obviously, household expenses for him likely included the odd fixture or three when he got pissed off.

"I know you said you weren't one, but could I possibly ask you to babysit a short while?" The too broad toothy grin he gave her, wreathed by the still smoking barrel of his pistol pointed at the ruins of pottery and wiring, made her more nervous.

"…sure. Take your time." Folding her arm under her chest, the thief gave him the most level look she could muster. "Renato, do please be careful. You live here, and this may not be-"
"Do you really believe that?"

Huffing slightly at getting cut off, the thief glared back at him. "Do you really believe all things are so straightforward?"

That knocked Renato back a mental step, and he considered her thoughtfully.

"It may not be as bad as it sounded to me." The Storm-Cloud finished her original words forcefully. "I only know of experiences that sound similar that were not so great for the people involved. It may be even on the up, and the fact it was a Mist and they tend to pop so young that led to the word choice the man used. So again, be careful."

Before you shoot someone you can't heal, went unsaid under her words. If he heard it or not was something she refused to speculate on.

"...I'll be back by morning."

She sighed as he turned on his heel and strode out of the apartment.

Shamal's tiny, but more importantly sauce covered, fingers fisted into her skirt and tugged lightly. "Is he mad at me?"

"No. Did you wash your hands before digging in?"

The child looked at his small take-away box of beef ravioli smothered in tomato sauce and cheese, at his hands, at the stain in her skirt, then back up to her. "Um... no?"

The thief gave him a highly unimpressed stare.

"Is Mister Renato mad at you?"

"Not this time, no." Sonya peered down at herself, and at the greasy mark Shamal had left behind. "Go wash your hands."

"Are you sure? He looked mad." Baby Mist was also not moving an inch, looking at her stubbornly.

"I've irritated him a time or two, and to be fair he's irritated me a couple times too. Just now? That wasn't my fault. Our... bosses, they aren't being... nice. Or polite. He's going to go... complain."

Of course, that was assuming they knew Renato had some kind of involvement with the young Mist they were sure she knew. It was entirely possible they didn't know the hitman was involved, or what she was doing visiting him so often or why he had been visiting her hotel room lately.

Something about that thought rang a bit off to her, but after puzzling it over a bit she shrugged it off.

There was a kid involved, it couldn't have been because they thought they were sleeping together or something along those lines.

Shamal considered her gravely, with all the seriousness he had to him.

Sonya blinked blankly back, confused over what the kid was trying to say silently.

"Okay then." Baby Mist turned back to the cheap plastic takeout box that held his kiddy-sized portion of lunch.

"What part of 'wash your hands' escapes you?"
A pause, and the brat very pointedly stomped his way to the bathroom.

She sniffed at his back, then glanced at the watch she had strapped to her left wrist when she got dressed for the day.

It was maybe an hour and some change after noon Greenwich Mean Time, meaning that the streets of Mafia Land were likely packed to the point of being uncomfortable. If she took the kid outside for a bit, just so they weren't anywhere anyone watching them would expect them to be while Renato ensured his ward's safety…

Where would they hide, on an island controlled by the people likely to want to do them some kind of mischief?

She didn't particularly want to think of her ultimate temp-work bosses like that… but they were all criminals here. The only rules they abided by was no drugs, no human slavery, and no employee violence allowed to the paying guests.

Kidnappings, abductions, the odd death here and there, all that still happened even in the more 'public' parts of the floating mafia haven.

There wasn't a fully functioning hospital on site just for making up bogus medical histories tailored professionally, or for ensuring the criminals that the island's trade relied on were as healthy as their lifestyles allowed. Its main business was patching up the idiots that thought they could throw down against Mafia Land's best, or worst in this case, and survive without a bloody beating to hammer home how outclassed they were or that and a headshot in the end.

Sometimes it worked out the other way, and revenge hits weren't an uncommon reason to visit either.

Once upon a lifetime, she had put her faith in the inherent goodness of her fellow humans and ended up murdered. The Russian thief that survived from that experience didn't intend to allow herself to fall that way again.

Now?

Sonya put no faith into people she hadn't met, hadn't at least gotten even a half-assed measure of, or anyone she didn't know the reputation of. Until Renato told her otherwise, she'd be assuming the worst and planning for it.

The only problem she could see so far was that the hitman hadn't said anything about if she could take his ward outside of the so far established 'safe' areas.

…two problems, how to leave a message for him that only the two of them could understand?

CXXXVI (Wednesday the 3rd of November, 1966. Mafia Land.)

"Sometimes," Sonya informed Shamal seriously, "we have to make sacrifices in order to get what we want. I want us to be as safe as possible, so we have to do this."

"So... why am I the one wearing the dress when you're the girl?" Baby Mist questioned mulishly, plucking at the straps of his new little sundress.

"Because they expect a woman and a boy, not a young man and a girl." The thief informed him primly, crossing her newly trouser clad legs in a less feminine appearing way. Ankle over knee, not ankle over ankle.

Thank the ever-loving hell Lisa had insisted on ensuring they knew how to act as if they weren't girls or merely thieves in any kind of social setting. Tatiana might have outshone her in that art, but the blonde wasn't any slouch at it either.

Not a master of the art of disguise, but a semi-decent one even if she still didn't understand why certain actions were only 'acceptable' by one gender or the other. It might have been just Lisa's expectations, or the culture of the late 60s, or any number of other things.

All she really knew was that to act male and at least get the casual observer to dismiss her as one, she had to perform to Lisa's expectations.

Thankfully, Shamal had greatly enjoyed exploring the more 'family friendly' parts of the island's amusement park. It was a decent distraction for him while she collected the odd bits and bobs from tourist-trap spots that allowed her to effectively swap their genders without trying to rely on the baby Mist's Flames to hold for long periods.

She wasn't even sure how well the kid's control extended and given what she already had him doing, making them seem less interesting to avoid scrutiny… it was best not to risk burning him out.

Risky move on her part, but with limited supplies on hand and a threat to try planning to counter?

There really hadn't been much else she could try that had a better chance of success.

Renato would be jumpy enough. If he thought she was trying to take advantage of the fact he left Shamal with her?

While baby Mist was in a dress, Sonya had forgone her skirt and blouse in favor for a pair of the hitman's pants and one of his buttoned-down shirts. Picking up a vest to go with the predominantly darker colors the Sun favored and would suppress her developing chest had been tricky and getting the young Italian boy out of his original clothing and into the slightly too big dress had been a touch harder.

Her bright, shoulder-length, ash blonde hair was twisted up and shoved under the wide-brimmed hat she had bought the same time as her vest. Without makeup, she could pass as a slightly younger teenage boy not quite of the point of being able to shave just yet. With a bit used in unusual ways, she could appear to be anywhere from a couple years to about a decade older.

Shamal didn't particularly like getting his hair styled differently, but the current fad for female hairstyles did currently favor shorter hair and that wasn't too hard for the thief to pull off.

He made a very cute little girl, but it was likely he wasn't ever going to forgive her for this.

She made a slightly androgynous adult/caretaker for him. It was the best she could do, because Sonya was a little too pretty to be really mistaken as fully male. Her small but still apparent bust made that hard to conceal, even under a vest.

All in all, they looked like a caretaker/bodyguard and charge waiting for the rest of their party in the lobby of Sonya's hotel.

The thief really had yet to decide if she should've checked out of her room just to ensure the trail was muddy, but this was the only place she could make a suitably vague hint for Renato to follow to. At least in the lobby they had three different lines of escape, and they were set up to watch for either the hitman or anyone else looking for a thief and a baby Mist.

Unfortunately, when the Mafioso did eventually track them down well past midnight, it didn't do much for her nerves.

The Inverted Sun was still as blandly tense as he had been the last time she saw him, but he still noticed her and Shamal without much effort she could see.

Sonya wryly assumed she needed a better disguise for herself and tipped her hat's brim up to see the hitman better as he strolled to the sofa where his ward was sleeping.

"I have to get him off the island." He informed her bluntly, nudging Shamal awake. Tossing her the moonstone and turquoise jewels she had left on his kitchenette's counter once the kid was rubbing bleary eyes.

"I can play decoy." She still had to do her last two Mafia Land contracts for this year, she couldn't quite leave just yet. "They have only approached me so far, you should be able to get him on land before they realize I am no longer in contact with him."

He didn't look particularly happy in the first place, but that suggestion earned her a rather dirty look of its own.

He probably didn't like the thought of using her as a shield. Even if he really couldn't do much against any pursuers besides stand his ground and fight, weighed down with Shamal as he would be. It was likely inevitable she would be used as a decoy even if he tried to say no.

The hitman even seemed to know that, because he gritted out a very belligerent, "Thank you."

CXXXVII (Thursday the 4th of November, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Sonya waited a whole day longer, then ditched her male disguise and checked out of her hotel room.

She visited her storage unit to stash a couple things, wasted a bit of time eating something for breakfast, then did a bit of window shopping. The thief got another contract from her Hall in the late morning and was halfway to the docks before anything remotely concerning happened.

By then she'd put good money on Renato having Shamal free and clear of Mafia Land controlled territory, so she wasn't so jumpy anymore.

"Bazanova Sonya."

It was the same elderly gentleman that had approached her the first time, and she gave him a long look over a shoulder. "Can this wait? I really do need to get on with my job, or I will not have the funds to stay much longer."

"The interests I represent want to know if you have given any thought to what they have suggested."

"You have given me no details of which I can think about." The thief reminded him a little pointedly, because the fact she didn't know what kind of threat made the hitman bail out of a supposedly safe haven rather concerned her. "Only a very vague suggestion that sounds a little sinister."

"They would be willing to discuss terms if you would consent to a meeting in a less… public
Turning to face the man, having him behind her while they talked was a touch unnerving, she gave him a perfectly bland smile. "I have commitments at the moment, but I may be interested in such a face-to-face meeting upon my return."

He gave her a very distinguished looking reproving stare, which made absolutely no dent in her resolve to stall them as long as she could. Sonya even shifted her grip on the coded contract in her hands, because that was a very firm detail to confirm she would be coming back anyways.

She had to, people that tried running off with contracts for Mafia Land jobs didn't tend to last long.

"They would be delighted to, the very moment of your return."

As if that wasn't suspicious as hell, but the Storm-Cloud merely smiled again. "As long as I may refresh myself beforehand, for this is a rather farther-flung contract for me."

"We will be waiting." With that, the gentleman walked off as if he had wanted nothing more than what he had gotten from her.

Sonya turned back to the waiting ships and figuring out which one she needed.

Since she was rather sure the hitman would take his baby Mist back to Europe, as that was likely the place he had more or better contacts than in Mafia Land, she was going to China. Halfway around the world would tie up any kind of investigation into where she could meet or join back up with any baby Mist, and Asia was vast enough to be a real drain on any kind of search.

The only problem with this whole situation, other than her Mafia Land bosses being dicks of a sort, was the contract she had taken.

It was a first for her, because it required her to present herself to the client that requested a thief to get the full details of what she was supposed to steal. Obviously, the risks for this kind of contract were higher than the usual anonymous ones but it was still less of a risk than just waiting for someone that was looking to 'collect' Shamal getting suspicious of her lack of things to do.

It also paid a lot more than anything else. There was even a 'security deposit' the contractors had to pay. If they got the thief that eventually reported to them killed that deposit was forfeit.

Not much of a safety feature, but the Russian could understand that risk.

She also needed the money, for minion-reasons.

This contract was also open-ended, which meant it would take as long as it would take. The only part of that which made her uneasy was the fact she needed another contract done before the end of the year, but she still had two months before New Year's Day.

Overall, it was a very good method to stall any demands on her time. Once she accepted the contract, Mafia Land's own policies would ensure word was passed on to the contractors that their thief was in route.

If anyone in Mafia Land tried waylaying her, those contractors would not be very amused.

Now she just had to figure out how to end the contract in a month's time.
The directions in her contract sent Sonya to a very quaint little tea house, and while waiting she ordered herself some spiced orange black tea.

Very different to what she normally drank, but she decided it was a good kind of different.

The point that she was in China made the fact that the man who slid into a kneeling position across her low table obviously Asian in appearance. It was just… red.

After waking up to the possibility that Renato was possibly one of the Arcobaleno, she had tried to dredge up the rest of that cast of immensely powerful characters and what they looked like.

The details had faded rather alarmingly on her, but she did recall little things.

One of those Seven Strongest of the Era had belonged to the Triads, and mainly wore red. This wasn't likely the Arcobaleno of the Storm, but if she kept her eyes open…?

"Do I have time to finish and pay?"

A sharp nod was her answer.

Obviously not a very talkative person, but she could deal.

After she had bought her tea, and a bit of loose leaf for when she was back in the USSR to share with Lisa, Sonya followed her guide out of the teahouse and into the city of Hong Kong.

It only really occurred to her to wonder why one of the Triad groups of China needed an outsider thief once it was a bit too late to back out, but by the point she realized which underworld group had contracted her it wasn't something she could realistically question.

From what information she had been able to get from this part of the criminal underworld, there were several 'Triad' groups in operation. About twelve major ones and a handful of less powerful ones so far.

And a shit-ton of minor branches that were or were not actually connected to any similarly named Triad branch.

Which made the fact she was led into an obviously less central location to any main operations rather worrying… or reassuring, depending on what the situation was.

There was a group of people waiting for her and her escort, one obviously very important person seated cross-legged in a very tiny office space and a lot of bodyguards. The more 'boss' like man didn't look too impressed with her, likely due to the fact she was female, but shortly gestured to the floor before him.

The Russian didn't argue, blink, or dismiss the suggestion, as he was likely her paymaster for the time being. She folded herself down to sit patiently, waiting for him to speak.

"You are hired to remove or eliminate any information the police have on Triad operations.
Whatever way you may choose to accomplish it." He informed her in a tone of voice that suggested he didn't care why she took on the job or who she was at all. Which was alright with her, really. "Do Giving a half-seated bow, mainly to show she would do so and hopefully he wouldn't get irritated if she posed a question, the Storm-Cloud opted to stare at the flooring for a moment instead of glance up. "May I know the worst offenders, so my efforts will be more immediately useful to you?"

"That information will be supplied along with the assets given for you to use." It didn't seem if he was that annoyed at dealing with her, but she still wasn't going to push it.

Sonya could spare a month keeping Omertà secure on the Triad's dime. The code of silence failing would attract Vindice attention, and no one wanted that.

The young Asian man, who she wasn't really sure if he was a boss or the next boss or just a highly ranked officer type, rose to his feet and gave her a barely there nod of acceptance. He left the little office room in short order, and most of his men when with him, leaving the thief and her guide alone.

Sonya turned to her guide herself, more settled on the contract she had taken and how likely it was she'd be able to finish it without getting herself killed.

It was more reasonable to her now why they would hire an outside thief for this, with the current unrest and 'Cultural Revolution' on-going the Triad was likely a bit more than overworked with keeping the Red Guard out of their spheres of influence or off their people.

She still didn't know which of the Triads had hired her, but they also didn't tell her or even ask who she was. This was obviously going to be as clandestine as possible, even if they hadn't wanted to admit to anyone in Mafia Land that keeping Omertà was proving a little difficult for them.

Getting free with that kind of information was going to likely be tricky, but that kind of risk she had expected.

"I need that information first, in order to ensure my efforts are not in dire need before I can plan to eliminate the rest all at once."

Her watcher/guard/guide gave her a slow nod, obviously rethinking something but she wasn't sure what. "I will take you to the residence you are allowed to make use of."

"Perfect. Then we're going to play tourist. Or actually I am, a rather tacky tourist that will mangle your native language and you get to play my long-suffering translator slash guide."

This obviously confused him, given the furrowed brow and slight frown. "Young miss, you speak my mother tongue rather well for a foreigner."

"I am about to not." She informed him seriously, getting up and brushing off the locally made dress she had bought to make up for her lack of Chinese styled clothing in her possession. "I need a name for you, not your real one."

The look he gave her for that reminder informed her it had been unnecessary, apparently he wasn't quite as green as she had initially pegged him. "You may call me Liqin."

"For the time being, I am Yu."

Mafia Land had wanted to name her 'Sen' for the time being, but she had argued that was Turkish when used as a name and that she needed something different and short to suggest that it was a nickname instead.
Thus, she was 'Yu' for now. A shortened form of Yuliya.

CXXXIX (Saturday the 19th of November, 1966. Fúzhōu, Fujian Province, People's Republic of China.)

1966 China was a very disturbing place for Sonya.

The communist power in charge did at least mean a USSR seamstress tourist wasn't given a very hard look or three from the forces in play, but it was still unnerving to be forced to deal with the Red Guard. She was still 'officially' restricted to only visiting certain locations, and she would do so if only to keep up the appearance of a tourist, but that actually only meant she was allowed to be legally noticed within very small parts of China.

The 'rallies' for the Red Guard were worst of all, and the sheer amount of destruction it ended up dealing to historic sites made her itch internally when thinking of all those books being burned, but it was the mass public humiliation and outright torture going on that she despised.

Thankfully she wasn't in Beijing, but the news that reached her anyways painted the streets of the capital city as worse than Mafia Land's nightlife activities.

If any of that got out, and she really only knew what was going on because Liqin actually brought her unfiltered news while she was planning a spot of police-related arson, Sonya suspected the Großes Volksfest would be changing next year's plans in a fast hurry. She might even tell Master Liam what was going on herself, given what he knew when she reconnected with Cherep.

To that end, she was saving the few newspapers she managed to get a hold on.

Going through this country with the circus was going to be a trial. As it was, since she was here for a job, she had a fair bit of things to get on with while all that civilian unrest and those so called 'political investigations' were going on.

The news that the police were no longer allowed to interfere with Red Guard actives meant she had more work to do, and with more people walking around that might notice her.

That would also return the police's attention to the Triads and other related troubles, the only parts they could now interfere with, increasing the number of people she had to check out to ensure they didn't have backups of certain information.

It took nearly full a month of work, within which she had noticed and gotten tired of Liqin attempting discreet peers over her shoulder and instead deputized him as an assistant. If he was going to report on her anyways, best ensure he knew full well what she was doing and why it was taking her so long to move on it.

There were five different Bureaus involved with anti-gang and Triad business she had to investigate. Any number of officers she had to locate the homes of just to ensure they didn't have personal copies of any Triad records. Several branch offices of each to investigate and locate the main Intelligence Records Offices and where all the hard copies of the information were stored.

Sonya has started with a base of some information, mostly which police headquarters dealt with the Triads more and which officers were the best in each branch, but another set of hands was of immense help to slog through the bulk of the intelligence she needed to pull her 'information wipe' off.

Since she couldn't actually do the tailing herself, as she was obviously not Chinese and tourist weren't allowed in certain places, she had to get the Triad organization she was hired by to do it instead.

There really was too much for one thief to handle, but apparently this was enough of a big deal that she wasn't going to be the only one working on it. While she was expected to handle the parts where her contracted paymasters were a little too well-known to be seen nearby, they would take care of the farther-flung targets.

Then she had to process the information they sent back to her and try to work up a viable plan to destroy all of it in as little time as possible. Adjusting said plan to changes in police patrols and schedules, and the fact she would have to be both in a visible area when things went up in flames.

Or Flames, as the case was going to be.

Storm Flames were really the only Dying Will Flame that looked like fire in both color and behavior. Hot fire, rather, Skies were the only thing that beat out her Storm in that aspect but she had no Sky Flame.

They were also the only way she'd be satisfied that everything would be destroyed no matter what, it was just controlling it from doing massive damage to other things that had given her pause.

Until the National Police Chief, Xie Fuzhi, claimed it was 'no big deal' that people were getting beaten to death in the streets by the Red Guard. At that point, Sonya didn't care if she accidently removed information they would need for other criminal investigations.

Obviously, they had a very skewed sense of what was right and wrong and she highly doubted the veracity of what information they might have had.

It took longer than she liked, it was edging past the middle of November and she was getting heartily sick of China in general, before she was happy with a nearly eight-hour long plan for everything.

Liqin went with her for the main node of information that had to be taken out, evidently the one in charge of ensuring she did as they wanted and more than likely her murderer if she didn't.

The fact that didn't bother her too much deserved a closer look, but that was for later.

She left her 'guard/guide' outside in a nearby park, sneaking into the main Hong Kong Police Headquarters and to their Records Room. As it was just dusk outside, there was a pick-up of activity in in the lobby as officers either came into work, left it, or brought in some petty or not-so-petty criminals.

Masking herself in that hadn't been too hard, most attention was on the arrivals and departures. With her hair dyed black, with something easily washed out, and dressed in the local fashions ensured she was just one more face.

A face a bit too pale and pointed to be Chinese, but she only really asked for the location of a washroom and that was common enough they likely assumed she was there to make a report of something. She asked in perfectly humble Chinese, a pointed difference from the seamstress tourist Yu who couldn't even manage that much.

Once past reception, it merely took a bit of sneaking past overworked officers trying to tackle paperwork and the odd open office similarly occupied for her to find her way.
It was even labeled for her on the walls.

Sonya merely eased the door open, checked for anyone inside, then entered fully and locked the door behind her. Dabbing the target file cabinets with a touch of Storm Flames each, she willed them to consume everything and warily watched to ensure it didn't burn through the floor.

By the time she was sure everything remotely connected to the Triads had gone up in Flames, using a touch more Storm Flames here and there when it ran out before being done, people were already knocking on the door she had locked. Trying to get in, either in response to the smoke or because they noticed the heat on their way around the offices.

Instead of retracing her steps, the thief melted the bars and glass out of her way so she could dive out a window and up to ground level. Leaving obvious melted parts to suggest the fire had done that, not someone wielding a blowtorch or something.

The only problem with that kind of exit was the melted and glowing hot glass and metal. Sonya had to use her Cloud given Propagation strength to jump through it and outside without burning herself.

It would be hard to explain why a file room or fifteen, the number of places she had to hit up and set a-Flame, burned up without anyone knowing about it. Sonya didn't really care how the police would handle that, they were letting the murder of their civilians go without bothering themselves.

Maybe this way, that Chief of Police letting murder slide would get sacked or something.

CXL (Monday the 12th of December, 1966. Mafia Land.)

Liqing dearly looked to want to ask how she burned everything she has been contracted to find and eliminate; paper, glass, metal, everything that needed to be. However, he displayed a remarkable restraint in not asking for the week they waited for the news that everything that had to go was destroyed.

That chief of police Sonya despised got executed instead of just fired, but she was perfectly happy over that.

The Russian accepted her completed contract paperwork from the same young, likely important Triad officer, and agreed to an escort back to the ship she was taking to get back to Mafia Land.

She still didn't know who it was that contracted her, but that didn't really bother her much either.

It was kind of usual for her, especially considering most of her Thieves Hall work was done anonymously. That disinterest likely kept the Triad organization she had been hired by from deciding she was a loose end they wanted cut.

Overall, it had taken a month and some change. Time enough for a certain hitman to have finished covering his and Shamal's trail, if whoever that had been in Mafia Land was waiting on her to sell out the baby Mist.

Which wasn't going to happen and would be interesting in likely lethal ways to see how this would work out.

There was no help for that, she had to return to close out the contract she had taken in Mafia Land's name otherwise they'd still hunt her down for skipping out on them.
Much to Sonya's surprise, it looked as if Renato had gotten himself some fairly-major backup and dealt with whoever it had been that wanted to 'collect' Shamal. When she disembarked, instead of being greeted with the same older gentleman that had so bothered her the hitman himself was impatiently waiting for her.

"We really must stop meeting like this." The thief informed him dryly, coming to a stop next to him and the other slightly older gentleman that wasn't so creepy seeming to her.

The Sun user didn't bother much with pleasantries. "Are you alright?"

"I was in China until about a day ago, under the Triads' protection. Since I assumed you would head to Europe, I went the opposite direction to draw attention as far from you as I could." She eyed the other man curiously but did return her attention back to him. "Is everything…?"

"Vongola took care of it." He indicated the man waiting with him, who looked as stony as he had when she first spotted him. "This is Tyr, the Sword Emperor."

…and the head of the Varia assassination squad, Sonya finished in her head with a measure of both alarm and irritation. She made a curtsy to the older Mafioso anyways, because there was no point in taking her irritation with her asshole of a hitman contact out on a man who ran a house full of assassins.

Not right now, anyways. She'd get irritated later.

"China then?" The master assassin said instead of greeting her or returning the silent salutation.

He gave a sharp nod, more to himself than either of the two standing with him, and turned just as sharply on his heel to walk away.

"Renato…"

"What other choice was there?" The hitman grouched at her, rubbing at his face tiredly. "Just… be happy we got here before you returned."

That didn't make anything of what would've happened sound good, but she had expected that. It still didn't make her happy that she had gotten this close to any part of Vongola, but in hindsight it was a very good reason for a freelance Mafioso like him to have become aligned even slightly with the largest underworld power in his home country if he started off free-lance.

Depending on what this was going to cost him, he would likely be known as one of Vongola's hitmen no matter what happened in the future.

"What did you buy in China, anyways?"

"Silk." For a sewing hobby she didn't mind but wasn't particularly enthused over doing. Sonya would likely resell most of the material she had purchased to support her working cover as a seamstress in China, maybe even for a bit of profit if she was smart about it. "Is Shamal alright?"

"For a certain definition of alright." Renato informed her with a touch of humor, seeming less tense now she wasn't going to try murdering him for this clusterfuck.

"He is alive, anything else will improve eventually." She dismissed that easily enough, picking up her rather bulky luggage and starting to move out of the way of other travelers. Curious how they didn't jostle either the thief or hitman when the master assassin was still there. "Is everything around you so hectic?"
He snorted, following her out of the dockyard and into the terminal she had to return her fake passport within. "I have been reliably informed that chaos follows me everywhere."

"I know we did not quite get around to what this favor was supposed to be for, but I am calling it done anyways." She informed him a touch more stridently than she intended. "You still owe me a story, two of them actually. This little situation I want the details of, if only to be sure I do not need to keep a watch over my shoulder."

Another snort, and he was still following her.

Sonya assumed he really had been irritated he had to hide behind her for the last month and was doing this just to ensure she really was alright. He was a rather womanizing kind of gentleman, but he was enough of one that a female covering his escape must have upset his sensibilities something awful.

"I want to know how you got the information for your books."

"Fair enough."

It wasn't really that earth-shattering, just a touch expensive for mostly useless information and maybe slightly risky at the outside. That trade was a bit heavy in her favor, but the hitman likely knew he wasn't her favorite person right now.
CXLI (Tuesday the 13th of December, 1966. Mafia Land.)

"The... incident this summer actually started about late last year," Renato informed her over the restaurant's table once they were done eating, "I took a hit that ended up being a contract kill for the last living son of some Don with a respectable reach, even if he lacked the power to effectively operate that far outside of his sphere of influence."

That Sonya could easily believe. Someone that had the reach to go as far as France from wherever he had been had to have significant amounts of power. In this world, power was usually in the hands of the heads of various criminal outfits.

Those grunts she had... killed, hadn't been particularly talented ones, but they likely hadn't expected a thief to be more combat capable than any other female they knew.

"Alright, so why did it end up with me getting attacked and Shamal orphaned?"

The hitman tisked, slouching back into the dinner chair he was practically draped over. "Use some imagination, Sonya. Before that hit he was the second to last member of his family, elderly, semi-powerful man. His last hope to pass on his legacy to his own flesh and blood gunned down by some freelance hitman? If he couldn't pass on his famiglia to his own blood, why not take his revenge on who did the hit instead?"

She set her wineglass down, settling her folded arms on her end of the table between them. "I am sorry, I had assumed his efforts would have been better spent finding a new heir so his famiglia would not scum to in-fighting and come to ruin in the event of his death. Instead, obviously, I should have assumed that revenge's temporary satisfaction would have sated his grief."

"Obviously." Renato mocked sourly, glaring downwards intently as if the dinnerware had insulted him personally. "He somehow found out which hitman had taken the contract, a leak I have yet to find or seal up within the Halls I work in. So, with a name and a description, he set his rather considerable network of contacts and men to search out everything about me or those that would associate with me. You can likely guess what happened to most of them afterwards."

She really did wonder about the standards of Mafia Land's security, internal or external.

Eventually, in a couple decades, that blond sniper man would come here and pitch in. Would that happen because standards had fallen to the point even mafia people like the Mafioso across from her or she herself were no longer safer than most places working here, or because someone eventually decided a completely neutral individual had to oversee security?

"...so, since you probably killed this Don, do you take over his famiglia?" Sonya wondered out loud, as right of conquest wasn't a foreign idea to people like them.

It was a rather common thing, in truth.

Planning on being able to pass your newly amassed criminal enterprise to whatever child was more of a gamble than anything, because more than likely someone would murder either you or your kids in hopes to be the only one you could leave your power and wealth to. It was more usual to hear someone butchered someone else and took over their territory than to hear some Don or Boss had stepped down and his so-and-so heir took up his place.
Those that managed something like passing on leadership of some group from one generation to the next were all mostly well-established syndicates… or about to become well-established.

"What there is of it." With a dry smirk for her, which was tinged with more than a little bitterness, the Italian picked his own glass of whisky back up and finished it off. "Most the Mafiosi left alive abandoned the place once their Don was murdered, and those left I wouldn't trust with a pet rock, but I do now own a rather shot up mansion not far outside of San Giovanni in Fiore."

…Renato now had people. Actual, minion-y people. That was… slightly scary to contemplate.

Even if they weren’t good people, it would still enable him to get better ones and branch out from there.

"That Don nearly ran his estate into the ground before I caught up to him." Continued the hitman a touch tiredly, setting the whisky glass down with a thump. "I'm going to be busy hauling it out of the dirt and salvaging what I can, if I don't just sell the place and let someone else bother with trying to salvage anything from it."

"You sell it, and I can easily see other Dons asking you to knock off someone they hate just to sell the home and belongings to them."

"I can too, unfortunately."

If he gained a reputation for murdering the heads of criminal enterprises, he'd get hunted by every other criminal in charge of more than ten to twenty lives until someone managed to kill him.

Not something he'd likely want to deal with.

She wondered if she should ask about the fate of any other contacts the Mafioso had before a crime family's boss started gunning for him, but since that likely would turn this conversation even more sour she abstained.

If she wanted to know she'd look it all up herself, it would take a bit of searching and it was possible she'd never get a clear view of everything… but it was still an option for information she really didn't need to know.

The fact she and baby Mist survived at all was good enough for her.

Speaking of? "When is Shamal's birthday?"

"February. Why?"

Sonya leveled a flat stare at him. "…the…?"

"Ninth." He gave her a suspicious look. "Again, why Sonya?"

"Birthday presents." She informed him, tone suggesting she found him a little slow. "Mmm… I am going to need to find something for Christmas, too… what does he like, anyways?"

CXLII (Tuesday the 13th of December, 1966 continued. Mafia Land.)

"Alright," the thief said a short time later, rubbing her left temple as she spoke, "so that's that. Now then, what the hell was up with the Sword Emperor Tyr waiting with you on the docks?"
Renato didn't really want to get into the deal he struck with the Don of Vongola in return for a bit of indirect help, or what it would eventually cost him, but he did owe Sonya a fair bit.

Had she decided not to help beyond what that one favor had maintained?

Shamal might have been in a little trouble right around now, and the hitman might have only just learned how much of that trouble would be aimed in his direction. Her report of what offer was made to her was really the most he had any right to expect from this association, the fact she genuinely liked the kid was likely the only reason she decided to cover his tracks when he spirited the young Mist off the island.

If she hadn't done that, he would've been in a worse position to bargain with Nono Vongola to deal with the problem. Likely while his ward was in someone else's hands.

Which was rather ridiculous if you thought of it in another way. He owed a Cloud for his Mist ward's safety.

The gallows humor of that thought made him smirk, because if there was anything Sonya represented it was an upset to what was thought of as normal Cloud natured behavior.

"Of the six syndicates that run Mafia Land together, there was one called the Mataraci Group from Turkey. They're enforcers for underground trade routes and generally dealt with security here as well. Since they are originally from the middle of the main drug trade routes, they do know most if not all the ways to smuggle shit like that in just about everything and how to find it."

Sonya blinked at the information, a slight tilt to her head as she listened to him talk. Renato wasn't surprised she hadn't heard of which groups ran things here, that information was kept quiet to keep people or other syndicates from thinking of attacking them outside of Mafia Land for their stakes in the island's operations.

"They, being a security conscious group of complete scum, were the ones interested in finding and training up any Dying Will Flame users they can find for their own purposes."

Her features went suddenly blankly neutral, and when she spoke it rang a couple warning bells in his head.

"They would not happen to have operations in Czechoslovakia, would they?"

"It's... highly likely. They were a powerful group before this, and that's in their general region. Why?"

A twist of distaste made her lips curl in a snarl, and the stainless-steel fork she had been idly toying with in her hands suddenly bent into strange shapes under those slender fingers. "Take a wild guess where my foster brother hails from originally, and how it was he ended up fostered in Moscow with me. Your first two guesses do not count."

Renato blinked at that tidbit of information and scowled as he connected the dots to other bits of information she had given over years ago. Like how she knew some people were looking specifically for Flame users before the age of twelve.

Discarding the now ruined eating utensil with a sigh, the thief finally allowed her posture to slump as she leaned back against her chair's back. "Is there any way you can think where I can substantiate that theory without stepping on anyone's toes?"

"I'll check for you."
It was really the least he could do, and it would assuage some of his personal feelings of cowardice at ditching her on her own to draw attention from people she likely couldn't have fought off him and Shamal. Not alone, anyways.

Cloud she may be, but she was only one person.

"So, the point was to get Flame users young enough and raise them up loyal to whatever. In an attempt to get said Flame users to pull security… likely against other Flame users. Okay, not really a bad plan. Why the hell did they want to go about it in…?" Sonya looked to be searching for a specific word, but eventually shrugged it off. "How did this not trip whatever off as human trafficking? I am pretty sure that is still not allowed here."

"They pulled security, it was nearly child's play for them to ignore their own people abducting young Flame users." Renato reminded her grimly. "Thankfully, they're not in charge of that anymore."

"Are we getting to the point where you tell me what the ever loving hell the Head of the Varia Assassination Squads was doing here?"

The hitman nearly choked on his own spit, sheer surprise that she knew that tidbit making him sit up ramrod straight. It really shouldn't have, given how much other information she tended to know, but it had still shocked him somewhat. "How do you even know that?"

He had thought she avoided Italian affairs, how the fuck did she catch that tidbit?

"I hear things, and I know a lot of random stuff." Sonya informed him blandly, arms crossing over her chest. "So?"

Obviously, she was lying about something, but her posture said she wasn't going to say anything else about what she did or did not know.

"Nono of Vongola contacted the Vindice and got countermeasures against the Mataraci Group condoned by them due to violating the pact the island is held to, mostly to remove them as one of the six syndicates in charge and take their spot." He bluntly informed her, feeling a little vindictive and gratified when she shivered at the mention of the mafia world's enforcers. "The Varia were handed the orders for the clean-up. However, even if I was the one to bring up the breach to someone able to deal with it, I also needed Shamal's safety guaranteed for the duration of this… mop-up. Since I was expected to help guide them to where they needed to go."

She considered that, frowning thoughtfully at her empty wine glass. "Are they at least going to ensure his safe childhood in return for whatever they have over you now?"

"Until he's around ten, but yes. He'll even get instruction for Mist Flames while he's with them. Why?"

"This situation is not that bad, then. You were always going to get tied down somewhere because of Shamal, at least this way there's safety in greater numbers." Sonya suddenly tossed a more forceful scowl at him. "Make sure they do not teach him stupid shit, like Mists must be long-range fighters with no physical strength."

"Stupid?" Renato echoed slowly.

"That pure bull of 'Mists and Clouds hate each other'? There is a tendency for dislike. Hard Clouds do not appreciate frivolous pet-peeves or silly behavioral habits, and most Mists tend to pick those up to deal with or bolster their very active imaginations. Hence it is more likely a Cloud and Mist will not cohabitate well… however, that's not immediately a reason either would pick a fight with another or something equally as stupid."

The hitman gave his dinner partner a very long look. "Are you going to tell me how you got the information for your books now?"

"It is not earth-shattering." She admitted to him slowly, obviously a bit jarred by the subject change. "I merely got hold of every book I could, rewrote all the actual information into another, and investigated the truth of those claims with my own nature and several others. It is a still on-going project. New information keeps on shifting what I thought was or was not true on me."

"Like moonstones working for me?"

"Do not talk to me about that."

CXLIII (Friday the 30th of December, 1966. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Rumors floating around that the Vongola's Consulenza Esterna Della Famiglia, the CEDEF advisory branch, would be taking over security for Mafia Land due to 'internal problems' earned Renato a kick in the shin the next time Sonya saw him.

The ass could've warned her that was happening when they had dinner earlier in the week to hash out what were the details behind each other's recent actions.

In fact, she kicked him twice because Tyr hadn't exactly left the island yet and the man kept inspecting her like a scientist with a specimen every time he saw her.

The hitman hadn't had anything to defend himself with, he instead huffed at her like an offended cat and stalked off with a slight hitch in his step. Apparently, he found the fact the Head of the Varia's interest in her as disturbing as she did.

Sonya grabbed her last, for the year, less interesting than ever contract from her Hall and vacated the island for two weeks. Returning just long enough to shove a present for Shamal onto Renato and remind him that visiting the kid was something he needed to do, then left for the Christmas meet-up back in Moscow.

She spent a day being the only 'kid' in the house, picking Lisa's brain about better methods to disguise herself, then left the day after to drag Cherep back with her.

The thief then abandoned her best friend/brother to his own devices, because by then Tatiana had shown up and the Inverted Cloud merely rolled his eyes at her behavior. Instead she dragged her foster sister off to test her compatibility with moonstones.

"Why is it such a major matter?" The Classical Sun user questioned when the bluish-white stone flickered yellow fire with a weak response for her. "Your own spinel gems are the worst offenders for not always being purple."

"But there are purple variations of spinel." Sonya rebutted tiredly. "There aren't any yellow moonstones, the closest this stone type comes is pink, a pinkish-orange, or brown."

The safecracker blinked at that news, looking at the gemstone between her fingers. "Oh. Well... does this Inverted Sun user you know have a better match that is occasionally found in yellow
"I don't know yet. We only just found his Mist kid's stone and he picked one of those up." The younger thief nodded to the stone the older one was still holding. "I suppose... that I should give him the entire range to pick from and see if there's a better jewel for him."

"A male Sun user, huh? With a kid, though. Hmm." Handing back the loose 'Sun' stone so it could be put away with the rest of the color-coded kits, the redhead crossed her arms under her considerable bust and regarded her younger sister thoughtfully. "Do I get to meet this Sun user you know?"

"If you want...?" Sonya answered uncertainly, not too sure why the older thief wanted to meet her hitman contact. "He lives on Mafia Land, so..."

"I've been there a couple times in the last two years. Apparently not when you've been there, though."

"I've taken the spring-fall stretch off, following Cherep's little circus dream. I'm pulling out after next year, I don't think I can keep taking this kind of time off."

A fine red eyebrow rose, and Tatiana shrugged slightly. "I'm surprised you managed that even for a year, actually. How in the world are you affording that?"

"I've been saving up ever since Cherep suggested it... but I've been thinking of pulling another heist before returning to the circus for some extra cash." She admitted to her with a sigh. "Likely another jewel heist, since I don't think I can explain why I'd need the Sun gems to Arseniy to his satisfaction."

A twitch of her lips answered the Storm-Cloud. "I thought you said..."

"Shut up, Tatiana."

No, she didn't particularly want to do another jewelry store... but she had the experience in it and the reputation for selling high-end jewelry. As something to earn petty cash for more than just herself to cover a year, it was the best option she had.

Especially considering the extra expenses she had to somehow afford.

"I have one more thing to do, so go on without me."

"Oh?"

Sonya jerked a thumb behind her, and Tatiana peered over her shoulder.

Björn had returned from the errand Arseniy had tasked him with to late last night, making this the first time the younger thief had seen her tagalong since dropping him off nearly two months ago.

The young Finnish teen was also standing right behind her.

"Ah, off I go then." Obviously, the redhead wanted to ask but was apparently going to leave the questioning for later.

Turning around to face Björn herself, she cocked her head at the kid. "So? Will I understand you now?"

"Yes, miss." His accent was still thick, but he followed the words up with a slow nod to be sure he was understood. "Herra Arseniy says to say 'not well', but... ah, good for soon."
She frowned slightly at the teenager, more out of puzzlement than any true negativity. While 'herra' was a word for 'master' in Finnish, now that she was listening closely to how he pronounced it… the thief no longer thought he was. "You're not Finnish, are you?"

"Nei, Icelander."

…Björn was from Iceland? Why in the hell had she found him in Finland?

"I take it there is a story behind this?"

Sonya got a very slow, slightly grim nod in answer.

---

CXLIV (Sunday the 8th of January, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Björn's story wasn't exactly unique for the world Sonya had found herself living in.

He had been born in the fishing town Höfn, in the south-eastern part of Iceland. His father had been a fisherman and his mother a washerwoman for whoever would pay. His father got afoul of the local mafia presence, and ended up dead before long due to a sketchy debt he was supposedly in. Then the mafia members twisted Björn's arm into becoming a runner for them in his dead father's place, to pay off said sketchy debt Sonya doubted existed.

Unfortunately, his mother didn't last much longer after that. Either grief or the lack of income from her husband had stressed her a bit too much. She had built up a fair bit of money before her death, working herself to the bone even though her health had started to fail, which he used as well as the proceeds from their home being sold to escape the mafia men that had dragged him into their world.

Even escaping to the mainland hadn't really improved his situation much, despite showing him how to cross borders illegally.

In order to keep himself fed and so no one thought to deport him back to Iceland and to the mafia group that conned him into running things for them, Björn had offered his services to different criminal groups as he wandered around to find someplace that might semi-legally employ a kid as young as him.

He hadn't found one by the time someone got the bright idea to ambush the message running kid for whatever information he had from such-and-such group.

Which was when Sonya accidentally rescued his skinny ass, and then set his broken arm and left him her coat for his own use. Fighting back and winning then not calling the police after that one-sided fight showed she knew the mafia lifestyle, the unwritten rules, and that she wasn't nearly as powerless as him… but also that she wasn't nearly as mean as the people he had been working for before that.

A bit of a loner, but that would just mean he would have no competition to truly worry about if he managed snagging her attention.

Björn knew a fair bit of the mafia practices and customs even though he was pretty much kept on the outside of most of it. He'd watched a fair bit of the internal politics happen as an outsider and grabbed his chance to have a better lot in life through her.
Which… fair enough. She likely would've done the same thing had she been in his place.

Although, understanding what point he had didn't mean she was happy about getting a little minion of her own… or that she had to come up with some way to pay for him to get through the next year before she went back to being a Mafiya thief full-time and could afford a damn extra dogging at her heels.

Sonya had to use all the experience working heists for Mafia Land to pull off two jewel heists in the USSR, one she nearly flubbed due to a new-model safe she hadn't known how to crack and the other she nearly got caught doing when the silent alarm tripped on her and she got surprised halfway through.

She resolved the first one with the safe by prying the door hinges off and literally breaking the bolts that held the safe's door shut closed with sheer brute strength and her trick weaponry to suggest power tools. The second incident took more… creativity to work around, especially since she was halfway through robbing the store when the local militsiya showed up.

Finishing her heist while the police were checking the store's security out wasn't possible, so she snagged what was nearby and escaped abusing circus-level gymnastics with only half of what she had gone to get. She did at least manage the higher paying items first, which was something at least.

The bulk of newly stolen jewelry Lisa was going to sell for her directly through the fences and then pay off her dues for the year, as the clan had already gotten their tax of the proceeds from the solid metals and what petty cash she had managed. Whatever was left afterwards would be waiting for her when she returned to join back up with the Großes Volksfest.

That took her to the week after Christmas, for the USSR anyways. For the rest of the world, it was the week after New Year's Day.

Freshly sixteen and not too long after the start of 1967, Sonya pressed a couple smuggled Chinese newspapers on Cherep to take back to the circus and Master Liam, gave Tatiana and Lisa a hug, a nod to Arseniy, and dragged her little Iceland teen back with her to Mafia Land with about half of the jewels she had yet to sell.

Most of those were yellow gemstones, and a couple sets of jewelry too specifically detailed to be sold in the same country they were stolen from.

Bjørn got kicked into the Mafia Land hospital for a probably badly needed physical, the Storm-Cloud spent four hours waiting for him to be finished while sorting through the yellow gems she'd be giving to Renato to test for a fit.

She needed a check-up herself, but since the pre-teen had not seen a doctor for about three or four years he was getting his done first. When the kid was done getting poked and prodded, she then got to listen to what health problems Bjørn had and how to fix some of them.

The vaccinations weren't too bad, expensive but not unexpected, and she knew he had a bit of damage likely from getting kicked around by his previous mafia affiliations.

She did not expect a Sun Flame using nurse offering to fix some of that old damage. For a price, of course, but that was something she would deal with. Plans of asking Tatiana to try a bit of that herself when they got back to Moscow or not.

However, when did Mafia Land get a Dying Will Flame using nurse?
"Vongola." Renato informed her when she made mention of the Sun in the hospital, poking through the selection of yellow, tan, and gold colored gemstones she had offered for him to test. Each in their own little velvet bag, with a written paper tag naming a number to a stone. "They're putting people everywhere they might help security. Mainly."

It would be easy to get around that little trick, just by getting the gems appraised, but then she'd have no real reason to help him more with the rocks.

Yeah, and Sonya would bet the CEDEF’s other duties was to keep up what the last criminal syndicate in charge of security for Mafia Land had done in looking for more Flame users. Possibly more humanely than the last group, and maybe they could take no for an answer, but she doubted it was anything more than a small upgrade in respectability.

"You know, I've been getting a couple questions on Shamal's… not typical behavior." The hitman started casually, tucking the packet of carefully labeled gems away into his pockets. "And that shiny blue rock he's not particularly inclined to give up."

Sniffing as she pulled a lit cigarette from her lips, a smirk crawled across her face even if she tried for disinterest. "Oh, really?"

"He is entirely too willing to tell anyone that he knows a Cloud and that she's really nice to him, whenever the bullshit you made mention of last year is repeated to him."

"...you know, that's entirely typical for a Mist." She informed him faux casually, leveling a bland smile at her drinking partner across 'their' café table. "They're very… opinionated. And seem to love informing others of their opinions."

"Well… aside Shamal being a bit of a loudmouth," Renato continued in a deadpan, "that bit of turquoise he's got has attracted a fair bit of attention. Especially since it sparks indigo fire with his temper."

"Even matched jewels shatter or splinter if used too much." Sonya warned him, a small bit more seriously. "I pop my own rather frequently when I actually make use of one."

"The point, little lady Sonya, is that some people connected a Cloud Flame user that tetchy Mist user knows and the rock he refuses to be separated from."

Which would explain why Tyr had been watching her after already dismissing her as inconsequential, and what he had been looking for. She considered that information and the ember cherry on the end of her cancer stick, as well as what it may eventually mean for her.

"So?"

She sniffed in his direction, still a little distracted. "So, what?"

He gave her his most disgruntled look, which really wasn't a patch on how well Cherep could pull that look off. "So, can I tell anyone where he got his shiny rock from?"

"You, and Shamal, were one thing." Sonya started off slowly, seriously thinking through the consequences of such a thing and the likely few benefits. "I do not mind assisting you, nor did I mind helping you with a kid you are guardian to. It was to repay a favor, so digging into my own personal things to help was not an issue. Anyone else? I do not care for, have no reason to aid. First and foremost, I am a thief, not a scientist or researcher."

"You're claiming that after the work you put into those books of yours?"

She clicked her tongue at him, mildly irritated with the subject matter. "I do that for my own benefit. As my foster brother maintains, I am more like the mafia's version of a librarian. I read a book, I question said book, then I find answers among other books. I may occasionally condense that into yet another book, for ease of access or to strip said information of biased slants."

The Mafioso frowned at her slightly, which confused her slightly until he spoke his next question. "You have more books on Dying Will Flames?"

"I have a lot given what is available around here, actually. Most of which is rather useless."

"Then… you also have better books on the subject."

"Of course. But Shamal is a Mist, he needs a base of solid and correct information with little mental restraints to become a very good one. Pigeonholing him in one of a bare handful of ways some other Mist became a great one will do him no favors."

Renato made a face, half-disgusted and mostly thoughtful, as he mused on her reasoning. "…can I see one of your not-so-stripped books?"

Sonya pinned him with a level stare across their little table. "Will you keep my name out of whatever comes up from your little ward's actions?"

"You realize they likely already have your name, right?" The hitman pointed out with a fair bit of exasperation. "Shamal isn't exactly the discrete sort just yet."

"A three-year-old is not a reliable source of information."

"…point. And, if the brat was here," he continued in a markedly more amused tone of voice, "he would insist he is almost four."

"Another month needs to pass before I will call him four years of age." Dismissed the thief with a snort, then thought through the proposal that wasn't really a proposal as she busied herself with another lung-full of smoke.

Renato was being very chary with that last favor she owed him, trying to press for more information without directly coming out and demanding it in trade for that last debt. The curiosity must be eating him alive for him to be so direct about it.

"I… will… trade you access to my research journal in exchange for your help with it." The Russian eventually offered.

With Tatiana and now him, that would be both halves of the Sun Flame Polarization. Like how well the Cloud Flames were already sorted with, now both she and Cherep could contribute information to it.

With a little luck, Polarization would not turn out to be more of a sliding scale of outward/inward intensity rather than a one side of a coin or the other type of thing.

Which… yeah, she didn't really believe that anymore. Not with how hard it was to pin down Polarization of whatever Flame type was being.
She also had the suspicion the Hard/Soft and Classic/Inverted titles for the extremes of Polarization got a bit mixed up or had been mislabeled in the first place.

"Deal."

CLXVI (Saturday the 14th of January, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Sonya ended up looking for her next three contracts for Mafia Land rather carefully.

Given her near-misses in the USSR, it had become apparent she had lost some serious skill to disuse while in the circus. No matter what acrobatic practice she could put in or small tricks to keep her fingers nimble she tried to cram into each day.

Combing through the Thieves' Hall and the available contracts, she selected a set of three in hopefully increasing difficulty. Mostly so she could measure that decrease in skill. The selection process kept her on the island for five days alone, during which she sent Björn on random errands for her.

Mostly to fetch things to eat but once to her storage unit for her copy of the Dying Will research journal she had compiled for herself and a few other Flame users in the Zolotov Clan, and once back to Moscow with written letters to both Tatiana and Lisa.

While the older redhead thief still hadn't had the time to check if her Flames would heal old internal damage, there was a Sun Flame using nurse on the island who could probably answer that question rather well.

It was going to be up to them who asks, and what they did with that information.

A certain hitman who was after her rather unique information gave the Icelander teen a hard look over, but mostly dismissed him from his attention. Renato was a little put out she wasn't going to let him walk off with her master research journal, and even rolled his eyes when she gifted him with a flat stare in return for that complaint.

Sonya wasn't entirely surprised when Tatiana showed up with Lisa, the day before she would've left to hit two marks in a row and come back for a third contract instead of try arranging everything at once. She had included her possible travel plans in her letters.

The thief was surprised to immediately get smothered in a brief hug by their foster mother, though. Who knew well enough her issues with others in her personal space, so the older brunette kept it brief. "Thank you!"

"Hello to you too, Lisa."

Tatiana made a show of looking around pointedly, then cocked her head at her little foster sister. "So? Where is this Sun guy you were talking about?"

Lisa's eyebrows flew upward, and she gave the youngest of her foster children a hard look as she drew back to arm's length. "Yes, Sonya. Where is this... young man?"

The Storm-Cloud sighed heavily at them both. "Renato's off on a hit this week. I think he said he'd be back... in two weeks? Somewhere around there."
"This guy have a surname?" The only capable Sun user between them asked archly, then frowned a bit as something else occurred to her. "Did he find another gemstone?"

She let her expression smooth out, but the safecracker wasn't above poking her for the hell of it. She wasn't above pulling her older sister's fiery braid either. "Sinclair, and he picked yellow jade of all rocks but likes the moonstones better. Now stop it."

"Girls." As it hadn't been that long since either of them had left home, the redhead stopped poking the younger woman as the oldest one spoke. "We have a hospital to visit, do we not?"

Lisa looked impatient by this point, so after a glance to each other they both nodded.

"Where's Bjørn?" Sonya asked Tatiana quietly as they followed their foster mother.

"Knocked out on one of the beds in our hotel room. I don't think he slept at all on the trip out from here to Moscow or back."

She sighed again, this time pinching the bridge of her nose. "Remind me to tell him about that wonderful thing called moderation."

The redhead snickered, but the blonde didn't really think it was that funny.

Sonya could see the bear named Icelander as several different Flame types by now, a mix of a couple if she squinted.

Inverted Lightning, a similarly polarized if not as extreme Rain, Classic Storm, or any variation within those types for his mule-headed stubbornness alone. He was all sorts of focused when directed through, which put more emphasis on his possible Lightning or Storm. Then there was the inability to be bothered with what she had him doing, which was mainly busy work for now, that spoke of a Rain or Lightning attribute.

Bjørn could even be all three like her, which she really wouldn't wish on anyone.

She was mainly and foremost a Cloud, her innate ability with Flames was drawn from her Cloud nature, and while she could use some of her Storm Flames… she could not get more than sparks for her Sun attribute on rare occasions. That inability irritated her, and so she didn't tend to try for her Sun Flames much.

There was even the possibility Bjørn was a Cloud, but she doubted it. Clouds in his situation would've likely either gotten themselves killed off early by not bowing his neck… or finding something far removed from mafia work to do after he got free.

"Sonya? Did this Sinclair guy write anything in your journal for the Sun Flame section?"

"What he had already, yes." The younger thief informed her, giving the Sun user a sideways look. "I take it you want that information?"

Tatiana fluttered her lashes back. "If you would be so kind."

CXLVII (Saturday the 14th of January, 1967 continued. Saint Julian’s Hospital, Mafia Land.)

The short of it was yes. With a bit of help and a dab of Sun Flames, which Tatiana was obviously itching to ask about, Lisa might be able to have a biological child of her own.

Problem was, the older Mafiya woman was thirty-six-years-old already. According to the Italian-born nurse, named Celia by her name-tag, now was the latest she had to start any Sun Flame based therapy. To correct some of her internal damage to be able to conceive, before it would become more than just a little risky by nature to try.

Lisa… hadn't exactly informed Arseniy of what this trip to Mafia Land was for.

"Don't tell him." Tatiana begged in their native Russian, on her knees with hands clasped and held up in a begging pose that had the nurse smiling into her hands. "It'll be the only opportunity we have to see him faint."

"And the rebuttal from the good child?" Asked their foster mother calmly, looking over to the blonde thief on her other side.

"Why am I the good child? Isn't that the only brother we have so far?" Sonya wondered out loud first, wincing when the older woman swatted her thigh. "Fine, tell him."

That didn't exactly earn her the older woman's forgiveness, by the look on her face.

"Tell him it's possible, but don't inform him exactly when it's likely to happen." She amended hastily, because Lisa could slap and make it hurt even on a highly active Sun user's skin. "I kind of want to see Arseniy fall on his ass when he hears too. Can we plan this to happen over Christmas break?"

"YES!" The redhead safecracker surged up to her feet happily, grinning a fit to crack her face. "Come on, Lisa! I'll even leave my gang and become a nurse to help you do this!"

She gave a painfully faked exasperated sigh, placing her face in her hands so either girl she had raised wouldn't catch the smirk forming on her own lips. The older woman had taught both too well though, and they did catch it.

Sonya sniffed at her bad acting, turning back to the nurse and switching to her rusty Italian… even if she highly suspected Celia could at least understand Russian perfectly well. "You wouldn't happen to have a phone line to the mainland we could utilize, would you?"

"Yes, miss. A room off the lobby is available for calls, but they do cost…"

"Don't worry about that, just add it to the bill." Thankfully Tatiana was going to split the cost with her, so Lisa wouldn't have to worry about it.

The older woman rose to her full height, giving the younger of her foster daughters a look that reminded her that one of the languages she knew was Italian, and gracefully walked off to place a rather long long-distance call.

"Tatiana?" Asked the younger thief when the nurse moved off to make a few notes in whatever file she had in hand, switching back to Russian because appearances had to be kept no matter what suspicions she had. "Are you really going to leave your gang?"

"I just might. It's fun and all, but I actually like having a permanent roof over my head. Nikolai is better than me at leading the group in tight spots and I tend not to go on very many heists anymore, because it is a lot easier to steal a safe and haul it elsewhere than it is to crack a safe on-site while you might get caught. Nowadays I'm mostly just the one that knows the most about how to handle medical emergencies who can crack a safe on occasion." The Sun user shrugged diffidently, not looking too concerned by the fact she was getting edged out of her old spot of ringleader a little.
"And you're okay with that?"

She laughed easily enough, grinning over at the slighter blonde. "I'm perfectly fine with it. I got interested in medicine on those quiet days when my boys were out, especially since my Sun Flames enable the shit out of healing others as well as myself. I'm honestly interested in becoming a nurse, for the clan or here if I can swing it. Even maybe a doctor, because this? Is pretty damn awesome, not just for Lisa's sake."

"We would love to have you, if you want." Celia interrupted earnestly, clipboard pressed to her chest. Then she seemed to realize they had been speaking Russian to each other, not the Italian she had been pretending was her only language, and blushed heavily. "I mean, um…"

"What would I need to do?" Tatiana interrupted, before the poor girl stuck her foot in her mouth about anything she shouldn't have been saying. "I really only know a little beyond first-aid and how to use Sun Flames on flesh wounds and the odd broken bone."

"Well..." Started the nurse slowly, recovering her mental balance when they didn't press her for her slip, "you will need an internship, for here anyways. Since university level education is rather... hard to get, for mafia people anyways, they do supply the classes to make up that difference as long as you can afford it."

"Otherwise I think you'd have to apprentice yourself to one of the shady docs the clan has a sway over." Sonya offered, thinking of all the shady doctor types she had ever heard of back home.

Too bad Shamal was a little too young to practice medicine... on the other hand, with how perverted he was supposed to grow up to be?

Maybe that was a good thing.

The expression that crossed the Russian Sun user's face said she hadn't heard much good about those types either. She thought it over, ignoring the fact the Italian girl looked to be on pins and needles, and finally shrugged. "I can't just abandon my boys out of the blue, so... it'll have to wait a few months at least."

"I'll get you the forms." Celia gushed happily, clicking away out the waiting room's door and down the hall on her impractical looking high-heels with respectable speed.

Sonya and Tatiana watched her go, then turned to each other.

"Do you think you could walk around all day in heels like those?"

The redhead pursed her lips. "Not me, no. I wonder if she uses her Sun Flames to avoid blisters or sore ankles after a few hours."

"Maybe she's just used to that kind of abuse?" The blonde Storm-Cloud suggested weakly, looking down at her scuffed and weathered but still sturdy knee-high boots.

Tatiana snorted inelegantly, kicking out her own slightly dressy but practically booted feet so she was more comfortable while they waited for the others to come back. "Hard core little nurse, then."

CLXVIII (Wednesday the 15th of February, 1967. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)
Sonya left Bjørn under Lisa's eye, because if anyone could hammer home the idea of admitting when enough was enough it was her foster mother.

Her first heist for Mafia Land of the year was a civilian target, which required more of her gymnastic skills than anything else. Afterwards, a couple rare and mostly whole tablets of ancient Egyptian origin in hand, she decided that skillset was at least up to par.

Even if she was heavily abusing Cloud Flame derived strength to handle it.

The second was a few paper files in a military base of the Albanian Kingdom which, after fruitlessly trying to recall why that country sounded a little odd to her, ended up being not too difficult either. A bit more lock picking, a safe crack that didn't stump her, and a whole lot of sneaking around obstructions like people standing in the middle of the hallway talking or guard patrols.

A little frustrated by the inability to understand where she had messed up in the USSR heists, Sonya returned to Mafia Land to drop off her two completed contracts and pick up the last one and her minion.

Lisa lightly smacked her upside the head when she heard the issue. "You are known for doing jewel heists, which would also mean that those back in the Moscow Oblast and some distance outside of it are aware there is a very successful jewel thief running around. Why are you surprised they increased security in response? Especially after that Cartier job you did with Tatiana, that break-in was all over the news for weeks."

Sonya rubbed the back of her head, smoothing down her hair and edging away from Arseniy before he could offer another slap. "I've not actually... had to deal with that before."

The older woman gave a dismissive shrug, sinking back in the rather plush couch in the Zolotov owned condo on Mafia Land. "That's probably the best part of this place, the opportunity to spread out your work so the locals where you steal don't wise up so fast. That being said, you may have over-worked the jewel trade back home. A decade or two, and it may not be a problem anymore... as long as no one else decides to steal gems."

In all actuality, said jewel thief would greatly appreciate never doing jewelry again... but she had claimed that once before. Honestly, since jewels were what she cut her teeth on in this criminal trade, it was likely always going to be her first choice for a fallback plan if she needed cash quick.

"Or you could steal in other countries and avoid the damn problem entirely, girl." The vor chipped in dryly, looking perfectly menacing even with Lisa snuggling up to his side.

He probably was only putting the effort up because Bjørn was obviously eavesdropping down the hall.

Sonya needed to teach him to sneak better... or she could not. Really, what she needed was to decide what to do with the damn brat for most of next year.

She had nothing for him to do, herself. Arseniy and Lisa had already dealt with him for a decent amount of time already and would keep on doing it for half a month at most. That left...

She wondered where Tatiana went to, or if she should put in a visit to Dimitry.

"Tatiana is immigrating here in a few months, apparently." Lisa continued in a different vein, smiling wryly at the youngest of her brood... so far, at least. "She's rather set on helping with this... ah, therapy."
"Can she do that?" Questioned the Storm-Cloud dubiously, slinking over to sit on her foster mother's free side. The one not occupied by nearly two hundred pounds of heavily muscled and tattooed vor.

"Our Pakhan is not getting any younger." She informed her seriously, looking thoughtful. "I guess the idea of a Sun Flame nurse, or doctor if Tatiana likes the job that much, within the clan is appealing to him. The clan's also paying for this little procedure of mine, with an eye to offer it to others if they prove dedicated enough to our syndicate."

"I thought he wasn't entirely sold on the reliability of Flame users?"

"You haven't been back in a year, sweetie. Things change." Gifting her youngest foster child with a sweet, sly smile, her mother elegantly shrugged. "Your efforts have made us the place for any Flame user to go, some syndicates even opting to forge alliances with our clan specifically for the information you've supplied to help their own people. Young Usov was really just the tip of that, and since it is your childhood efforts that are proving so valuable?"

Sonya blinked blankly at her foster mother, then had a dawning sensation of horror overtake everything else in her mind.

She had political heft in the clan?

What the hell was she going to do with that?

Arseniy snickered wickedly, then broke out laughing wildly at her expression when Lisa attempted to hit him in the stomach for it.

CXLIX (Saturday the 18th of February, 1967. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Leaving Mafia Land for the year wasn't that hard. While she may have only done two contracts, she had the other end of the year to make that up.

Tatiana wouldn't bother Renato as it was, without Sonya neither really had reason to bother with the other. Without the blonde thief to handle introductions, her foster sister wouldn't do more than gather rumor on her own end.

The hitman might get interested enough to seek out Sonya's sister, but the redhead likely wouldn't do anything to harm her little sister's association with a contact.

Dmitriy, the heavily tanned Rain she had left to her clan's Pakhan and his use if need be, regarded her evenly across his desk.

Which… needed emphasis. Her childhood mechanic friend had a desk. In an office. Within Zolotov's headquarters.

He also didn't particularly seem happy behind a desk in an office, either. "Do you realize what kind of mess you left me to handle?"

Sonya paused in the middle of adding a few sections to his copy of her research journal, mostly on Inverted Suns and general additions to both Mist and Storm. "I have some idea, yes. Although, to be perfectly frank, I had not expected this upsurge in Flame users to impact the clan so heavily. No so quickly, anyways."
The Rain, who didn't particularly look much happier at that admission, glowered at her. "So, you did have an idea."

"Dying Will Flame users seemed completely exotic things when I started." She reminded him calmly, only a little wary over his temper. Inverted Rain meant he wasn't as calm and easygoing as Classic, and that his temper could turn into a monsoon if she wasn't careful about this. "Even when you started. Then Tatiana joined us, Usov, my sister's little Lightning assistant, and then I started running into other users outside of the Soviet Union. Yes, I knew this would become something that would need some kind of help to manage and that's part of why I nudged you into this spot."

Dmitriy's expression didn't change. Sonya leveled a flat glare back at him.

"You are also the only male in our little grouping, of age to actually be listened to. You are also a Rain, Inverted though you may be, and you are also the most level-headed of us all. For now, you are the best to handle and manage the clan's interest in Dying Will Flames."

Rubbing a broad hand across his face, the only slightly older man gave a resigned sigh at her reasoning. "You... sometimes, are a trial Sonya."

"Admit it, you'd be bored without me."

Her swarthy skinned childhood friend shot her a look, which informed her that her words weren't really appreciated.

"You could have complained at any time before our Pakhan decided one of us had to be on hand at all times. I would not have liked it, but I would have pitched in here instead of go mostly free-lance outside the Iron Curtain."

"I really should have. Unfortunately, I hadn't expected an upsurge in Flame users either." Dmitriy admitted sourly, leaning back in his rather plush office chair. "That being said however... there are a lot of random people I'm pulling information from."

"I've noticed." Sonya informed him a touch dryly, as there were bits of information he had added to the journal that she hadn't yet had the time to investigate. "How many of what?"

"Two more Mists, both of whom are younger than Usov. We still can't figure out which one is more Classic or Inverted among them."

"You can add another boy Mist to that, three-excuse me-four years of age. And an Inverted Sun and Cloud on my end."

The Rain's mouth twisted with some unknown emotion, and the man sighed. "There's also two new Lightnings, too new to decide more than both are Classic according to your work. A Storm, we can't figure his Polarization out either. Somehow there's four Rains, all Classical."

"When it Rains it pours?" She coughed quickly and smoothed out her expression, and his mouth twitched into what was almost an unwilling smirk.

"Another Sun, Classic, in the same neighborhood we just left. No Clouds though, at least none who've come forward or gotten his syndicate to contact our clan for help." He gave her a sideways look, one part calculating and three parts suspicious. "I wouldn't happen to actually know this Inverted Cloud of yours, would I?"

Sonya gifted him with a mostly bland smile, mostly except for a very sharp edge of too many teeth. "Possibly. No Skies yet either?"
"That..." Dmitriy trailed off, looking contemplative. "I think there is. An older one, actually."

"An older Sky... in Moscow?" Repeating it didn't really make the fact sink home very well, and she did wonder how he came to that conclusion. "Actively a Sky...?"

"No, I highly doubt it. We can't actually do anything with the information anyways, either." The Rain sighed heavily, giving the Storm-Cloud across his desk a contemplative look. "He's over thirty, and a public figure as it is."

"Why does age matter?" Sonya questioned slowly, wondering if that was in any of the books she had gotten or not.

"It seems one is more likely to show Flames during childhood or around puberty, and if they admit they can set themselves on multi-colored neon fire then...?" Dmitriy shrugged that off. "Either way, he's too often in the public eye for him to go missing for a stretch of time without suspicion or for him to suddenly gain Guardians without a lot of questions being asked."

She frowned slightly, but the Rain behind a desk had a point. As much as she'd like to go poke him into her apparently wider than she thought pool of Flame users to draw information from, doing that was way too risky for a Sky unable to actively use his Flames.

Children, on the other hand...

"He have any kids?"

"Two, so far. Very young ones."

She stuck her tongue out at his completely flat expression. "No, I'm not suggesting we go kidnap the poor brats. But... we might want to watch them. Not just for Sky Flames, if they have them. There's just been a big bust of some kind of Flame hunting group in Mafia Land... and if such things went on there...?"

Dmitriy's non-expression twisted into a understanding but disgusted snarl. "I'll arrange something for their protection."

---

CL (Monday the 27th of February, 1967. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You finished arranging everything to your little black heart's content?"

"Oh, shut up." Sonya hip-checked Cherep, who didn't even have the grace to stumble down the stairs under her non-Cloud Flame boosted strength. "Yes, everything that I needed to do is now out of the way."

"Good. Ah... where's Bjørn?"

"With Dmitriy. Until we get back, he's going to be his office gopher."

"I thought you said-"

"I did not want to formally link him and the Zolotovs, but Dmitriy convinced me otherwise. Claiming it would be cruel to leave Bjørn on the outside of that for another year, when it really is "What he wants."

"Poor kid." The purple haired mechanic spoke, face tilted to the ceiling. "Poor Dmitriy, actually. Did you see…?"

"Where he ended up? Yes." The thief admitted, pulling her last cigarette out of the now empty pack. "Better him than me."

"It's kind of odd, now. Dmitriy's got a desk-job, Tatiana's becoming a nurse. Or a doctor. Depending." Running a hand through his short hair, Cherep turned to her with a bewildered expression. "You've stolen things recently, but you're also about to go another ten months without doing it again. It's almost like you're all respectable…"

"Except that Dmitriy's job includes training certain gifted people to be particularly inclined to shady criminal jobs using said gift, Tatiana is training to put shady criminals back together when they try to kill one another, and I'm…" Sonya paused, thought about it, then shrugged. "Gaining traveling experience in a safe environment in order to know how to enter and exit other countries better, as well as learning some cultural norms this next year and how to navigate them."

"Sonya…"

"Yes?"

"Stop ruining my childhood dreams."

"No. Your despair is amusing to me." His fellow Cloud user stuck her cigarette between her lips and lit it with careful application of Storm Flames. After a moment, and once she had less smoke tainted air to breath, she looked at her foster brother queerly. "Is that really your childhood dream?"

"It was, once." The mechanic admitted cheerfully, without an ounce of shame. "Of course, that was back when I was an idealistic little kid. Who thought that good equaled right and anything shady was inherently wrong. There was this daydream of somehow convincing you to abandon your life of crime and we'd go… do more legal things for our lives."

"Well… if it helps any," she started slowly, "we are respectable. Dmitriy's in charge of a very in-demand service for the clan, Tatiana's going to become the go-to healer for most of our own that end up in Mafia Land eventually, and I'm… uh, highly respected for some contributions I have helped midwife… apparently."

"Yeah… no, not helping." Stopping next to the front door, of the house they grew up in which seemed achingly empty without Arseniy and Lisa in residence, he turned and gave her a wry smirk. "Anything else?"

"I think I can make a case for another subject, yes. What… legal things did you have us do in these daydreams of yours?"

With a snort, Cherep buried his face in his hands. "No, don't ask about that."

"I am going to guess we went to rescue some princess." Sonya started in a deadpan, waving the hand holding her lit cigarette around for emphasis. "Which, really? Stereotypical. Why not a prince? A handsome, if useless, prince? Of course, I do not think anyone would really want a useless prince… so there is that… is that not technically the kidnapping of already kidnapped royal person…?"

"Sonya…"
"Then we likely fought dragons… before or after the rescuing slash kidnapping of gender ambiguous royalty? Why not a dragon prince? Just to make it all the more life-threatening. Because nothing says you are screwed like the, for some reason that escapes me, legal murder the last or next heir of some ancient and possibly reptilian royal family just because for some reason he, and or she, is evil by some… incredibly vague reasoning that may or may not exist."

Her brother snorted, clapping a hand over his mouth and trying not to let the full-blown smile surface.

"Or did we fight crime in this fantasy world of yours?" She carried on ruthlessly, tapping her lips with the filter of her lit cigarette. "I suppose there is a case of criminals helping police officers catch their old, equally shady, back-stabbing friends. Because apparently nothing says friendship like backstabbing at the last possible moment it could be remotely useful as an option. Even if it is not a very good option."

From how ragged her fellow Cloud's breathing had become, she could guess he was very close to losing grip on his laughter.

"Did we go hunting for some witch in a creepy swamp? Because, you know, persecution for religious beliefs and or lifestyle choices is really mean yet somehow perfectly legal and something no one seems to think should be pointed out as being an inherently wrong thing to do. As is burning of witches for equally racist reasoning, discrimination is not a good thing. Maybe the witch of the creepy swamp just wants her toadstool and toe jam soup and to be left alone, and yet you have us go murder her in some kind of fit of misplaced righteousness."

"Really?" Cherep wheezed out, a little painfully from his expression.

"I am listing off the plots of the books I have read recently, and why they are so stupidly illegal if you look at it in a slightly different way." Sonya informed him blandly. "And if I can realize they are the wrong thing to do in any situation, they have to be really bad plots."

He drew in a deep breath and shook his head at her. "I thought you were guessing for my childhood fantasies?"

"That is how it started." Admitted the thief easily. "I got distracted around the completely legal murder of ancient and possibly draconic royal lines for dubious reasoning."

"I will buy you better books, just… don't do that."

She opened the front door, searching her pockets for the key Arseniy had given her to lock it up behind them. "Admit it, you love my humor."

"Your sense of humor is a little dry, Sonya. And requires some getting used to."
CLI (Friday the 3rd of March, 1967. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Since she knew full well there would be a scarcity of hot water and full bathing facilities in her very near future, Sonya took shameless advantage of the rather rickety but fully functional ones in the woman's barracks their circus was wintering within before they formally got underway out of Moscow.

Rather, that half of their circus was lodged within. The men had their own section of buildings they were sharing with a few other operations, same with the girls of the Großes Volksfest. The woman's version was basically a scaled-down carbon copy, merely with the bonus of a scarcity of males within.

With… actual full-length mirrors in a dance studio in the ground floor as well as the showering gym-locker like shower room.

It hadn't been that long since she saw herself through a reflective surface, but she hadn't really had the time to really compare herself now to what she blearily recalled Rachel looking like in a dream-life that seemed strangely removed from this one.

As someone now sixteen-years-of-age, rather than say a ten or twelve-year-old, Sonya looked even more like her thrice-cursed mother than she had as a child. Her nose wasn't quite as prominent as it had been in a life before this one, it was more aptly described as thin-bladed, but it also wasn't small enough to be called 'pert'. Her lips had been thinner in her last life, and she at least had more defined cheekbones than the norm for Russian bone structure.

She had her father's more rounded stubborn chin at least, not her mother's pointed one even if she inherited her jawline.

Sonya didn't fully inherit her mother's frame, either. Depending on how one looked at it, it was either down to her father's genetic contribution or a very robust lifestyle, her body type was still too thick to be considered a classical ballerina's.

Which… given how thin and sickly some ballerinas looked, was likely a good thing. Her bust line was perceivable, if smaller than she had once had.

She at least, even with the out-of-season tan, didn't have freckles anymore. Her ash blonde, shoulder-length hair did have a bit of sun-damage right now. It looked a bit streaky and a little like old straw now, but she knew it would soften to a more natural gold-blonde given enough time out of the sun.

While trying to decide if she liked how she looked or not, Jiayi cornered her with a curiously anxious expression.

"You… were in my home country." The lioness of a woman started needlessly in her native language, coming to a decision and returning her attention to the blonde woman she had sought out first.

"I was." Sonya admitted frankly, as there wasn't really a reason to deny that given what she had Cherep bring to everyone's attention for her.
Nodding shortly at the confirmation, Jiayi's flat Asian features tightened as she braced herself. "How bad is it, girl? Really?"

"Murder in the streets while the police look the other way, condoned torture in the open getting applauded, your cultural history is getting gutted while politicians and even the public looks the other way." She wasn't going to sugar-coat it, as that wasn't something she was any good at and might harm what friendly relationship the two of them had.

Finally turning from the mirror, she could see that their mistress of the trapeze had expected some of it and appreciated the frank reply of the full extent of what she saw.

"It is not all their fault, we are... too used to such things. My people have not had a peaceful century before the Great War. Events afterwards did not improve anything." The older Chinese woman wasn't trying to make excuses but explain why they might have done what they did. At least, that was what she got from the slightly bitter expression and from her tart tone. "We have known nothing but war, famine, and atrocities for an age now. From all appearances, things will not become better any time soon either."

"I... am not as sure of that as you may be, Jiayi." She admitted slowly, thinking of exactly what had drawn her to China in the first place. The Triads, while more than just a little overcommitted and in need of a touch of help, was up to something massive.

The Chinese version of the criminal underworld was a very large organization. Even if you discounted the various fewer illegal branches and home-grown groups, that was a lot of people in every fully criminal branch of the Triads.

Despite that, they had needed a Mafia Land thief?

The excuse of needing someone the local police didn't have a file on was solid at first glance, but a little flimsy on a second look. It was more likely their people were committed to something else, then a small emergency that couldn't wait forced their hands.

"You would be able to see more in that than just anyone, wouldn't you?"

It was the closest anyone in the circus had gotten to admitting they knew exactly what type of individual Sonya was, or if they might or might not have a problem with that. At the sharp look the thief tossed her, the Chinese woman scoffed and glared back fiercely.

"Pretend all you want. I am not as air-headed as most of my flighty green-girls, and neither are some of the other 'old-hands'. You were never just a dancing girl following her brother out of any useless emotion as worry or panic." Jiayi turned sharply on her heel with a short nod of farewell, then briskly strode out of the showering room.

The thief narrowed her eyes on the tiny woman's back until the door swung shut behind her.

That had been... interesting. She wasn't sure if it was a good interesting or a bad one, but it might not matter.

The Russian had maybe nine or ten more months with the Großes Volksfest before she would be forced to go back to the Zolotov clan as a full-time thief. The best she could do was be a tiny bit more careful, but if that little secret was out already there might not be a point to that.
CLII (Tuesday the 7th of March, 1967. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

They were still going to be traveling through the People's Republic of China.

Eventually.

There was the other southern half of the USSR to work through, then China.

Sonya had, before this, very pointedly not taken a very hard look at the government or policies in place in her birth country for a very specific reason. Mainly because Rachel had no fond memories of the word 'communist' or the Soviet Union, nor very good thoughts about it like any other American girl.

That had left an impression on the thief left alive in the aftermath of her death.

Foremost of those reasons was Khrushchev Nikita Sergeyevich, the Premier of the Soviet Union. Rather, to be more truthful, the not very mourned former Premier who died last year.

Thinking about it, the fact the man had been a healthy-looking seventy-three when he was… pronounced dead in office, probably meant he wasn't dead of entirely natural causes.

'Entirely' because she was pretty sure it was perfectly natural to die once you lost a certain volume of blood, or once shot through the head, or even after someone shanked you in the lung. Those may not be a perfectly natural causes of death, but natural enough to die from.

Mafia logic didn't always have to make sense if it was widely accepted enough.

She had refrained from taking a very long look at the United States' history for similar reasons.

Beyond the fact she knew of one very major incident that was entirely against what Rachel had once known, Hitler's assassination and how that had caused certain events in Europe to spiral out of control, the thief hadn't been in any great tearing rush to see how that would've resolved itself in her former birth country.

Besides which, the background information about Rachel's lifetime had faded quite a bit. She couldn't really recall much solid information from her previous life that hadn't directly impacted that life, now that it was comfortably fuzzy she wouldn't have jolts of sickening realization of how it should've gone when looking at how it had.

There would be an increase of uncertain knowing that something was off but being unable to recall why, and the thief was alright with that thought.

Sonya had a few more pressing things to deal with as the circus she and Cherep had joined got underway for the spring.

More specifically, her fellow Cloud's now developed stunt work.

Part of the reason why Moscow was a popular wintering destination for traveling circus was the Moscow State University of Circus and Variety Arts, and the pool of freshly trained performers looking for their first gig. Another part of it was the free trade of information about various routes and the ability to pass on or get warnings of worldwide events, before a traveling circus risked themselves going through the countries involved.

Yet another part of it was pure showing off.
A very tiny bit was left for collaboration efforts, two or more circuses getting together and pooling resources and sharing costs for renting out one of the larger indoor stages for a night or week to generate a bit more cash to wait the icy winter out.

Occasionally there was even a bit of tip and trick swapping, when there was the time available in-between developing new acts for the coming year and fixing anything major that needed intensive repairs that couldn't be done on the road.

Cherep had found other stuntmen during his time on his own over the winter. While Sonya was off in Mafia Land dealing with Renato and Shamal or in China working for the Triads, he had been comparing notes about how their acts were received and what worked the best as far as they knew.

Even well after the short Christmas break, he had been incorporating some of that advice into his long-dreamed of circus act.

She was well acquainted with the possibility of injuring herself and only recently resigned to the possibility of death personally. In her line of work and lifestyle, becoming injured was almost guaranteed and death wasn't much of a stranger to her as she would like.

However, that also meant she was well trained enough to try to minimize the risk of injury when possible. If that wasn't possible, then how to fake not being injured until she had the time and space to deal with it.

Watching Cherep risk his neck, which had been broken once before, on his USSR built motorcycle for the spring opening show... made her almost physically ill.

With fright or worry was entirely questionable. It may even just because it was a reminder of the only stunt she had helped him with. What she did know was that she heartily disliked watching him launch himself in the air and flip around on that deathtrap machine.

He was very good at it, irrespective of her feelings on the matter. From what she could overhear when he had a spot of time to practice on the ramps set up for his and other stuntmen's acts, he was actually greatly impressive for a rookie stuntman with how high he was willing to go or what kind of tricks he was willing to try.

Sonya's feelings on the matter didn't care how impressive he was, she just wanted to rip him off the damn bike and plant him firmly on the ground.

Since her foster brother/best friend wouldn't thank her for that, the thief instead tried to figure out how the hell she would learn to adapt to seeing him risking himself like that. Additionally, if worse came to worse, how to buy his innate Cloud Propagation ability of un-death enough time so any crashes didn't tip of the entire circus or anyone in the audience that the stuntman wasn't killable.

Alarmingly, Sonya was drawing a blank on both options.

---

CLIII (Wednesday the 22nd of March, 1967. A cargo boxcar, a freight train, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Have you thought of a stage name?" Sonya asked in English, sounding painfully nonchalant about the whole thing even if he knew better.

Cherep was entirely aware she didn't like his profession very much. That was obvious when she came back to the circus a little before the opening spring season and he showed her what he had. Even with a tan entirely out of place for her wintery homeland, she had gotten alarmingly ashen watching him do a couple easy trick flips.

It was rather pathetic for them both, this little no-comment on his profession. He had complained about hers for years, but she seemed unwilling to complain about his.

Admittedly, he _may_ have annoyed her a little with his complaints. Purposely. Several times. In a row.

Maybe.

"Cherep?"

Right, she'd asked him a question. "Uh… actually… I was thinking about that all winter."

Sonya peered over at him curiously, letting the pile of cloth she had been messing with fall to her lap but keeping hold of the sharp needle. "Really?"

"You don't have to sound so surprised, you know." He quipped at her sourly, just to hear her snort at him. "I know you rather like the English language… or at least you tend to talk in it when you can."

"Practice makes perfect, and this _is_ a very widespread language for business."

"Yeah, yeah." The mechanic yanked a little too hard on his wrench when the train went over a bump, meaning while surprised it slipped off the bolt he had been tightening he wasn't too irritated at his hand slamming into the part he was currently servicing. The train's rocking motion wasn't helping him at all keeping things unbroken while on the way from point A to point B. "Damn it… anyways. You know how my name translates to skull?"

"Really?" His sister's tone of voice was entirely flat and dryer than a desert. "I knew that years ago. Matter of fact, I am pretty sure I was the one that told you."

"I like it, and that's all that matters." He sniffed at her in mock disdain, finishing off tightening the bolt he had been messing with and tossing the wrench back into a toolbox. "Especially since…"

"Since what?"

Hauling himself up on a nearby crate, Cherep gave his semi-concerned looking best friend perched prettily on it a wry grin. "Since I know you're a little worried about this show business stuff I wanted to do with my life."

"…I do not follow."

"You're worried that my… abilities of a Cloud sort will draw unwanted attention to me." He started delicately, because this was a worry he did share with her. At least a little, anyways. "I figured why not hide in plain sight, then? Draw attention, boast of an immunity to death, that sort of thing."

Sonya didn't immediately protest… but she also didn't look remotely enthused with that suggestion.

"I figure this way most would discount anything too… wild, when it comes to me. Rumors of any un-survivable crashes would then seem more like propaganda rather than a… Flame thing."

Fidgeting with her cloth didn't seem like a good sign. In the end though, the thief merely sighed heavily.

"I cannot actually argue with that. You are right, anything you would boast of would be immediately discounted at first. After a while that would not exactly aid your efforts to evade the underworld, but as long as you become widely-known as a stuntman no one would be able to risk approaching you or your abduction."

Not exactly a ringing endorsement, but Cherep could work with that. "Going with the 'immortal' propaganda angle, and that I might not want to actually use my real name for performances, changing my name into another language seems the best way to get used to it fast."

"Alright… but why Skull? Why not the French translation of you name, Crâne? It sounds more alike to your real one. Or even Tòu ē, from Mandarin Chinese?" Sonya huffed at him, but it was more confusion based than actual irritation.

He'd irritated her more than enough times to tell. "First off, I can't twist my tongue around Chinese. Yet anyways. Secondly, too similar and I'll never be able to ignore it if I need to. And Skull because I like my name, what it means, too much to really want to give it up entirely."

"This is not going to end up like that childish attachment to a skull and crossbones motif you are all but addicted to, is it?"

"I am not addicted."

His fellow Cloud user wordlessly held up the cotton in her lap, the hellishly expensive and imported patterned cotton she traded two bales of Chinese silk for on his request. Which had a print of purple skull and crossbones on a blue background, being painstakingly stitched into a few pairs of lounge pants because he asked for that in lieu of a Christmas present.

Cherep coughed awkwardly, pressing her hands down to lower the cloth back to her lap. "Current evidence aside."

The look she gave him spoke massive volumes of 'not-impressed'.

"Look, with the scant handful of languages I can speak, my name translates mostly to just Cherep or a similar variation. Skull is the most different yet the same word, so it's what I'm going to go with."

"Fine, whatever." The thief muttered, mostly to herself, as she picked up her sewing once again. "Go with Skull, then. I am not calling you that."

"I'm not asking you to." Mostly because he was sure she wouldn't ever listen to him when he did. He grinned at her, nearly bouncing in place. "Speaking of, though? Are those done yet?"

"Obviously, the pair in my hands are not." Sonya spoke mostly evenly, the exasperation sounding more like an afterthought than anything she really felt. "There may, may I remind you, be one done already."

He did not jostle her, especially not when she had needles in her hands. "Where?"

"I do not know, Cherep. What does one do with Christmas presents before they are gifted?"

"Wrap them?" He replied to her bland question, grinning widely at the dry look she gave him for that.

"Very likely. One would assume such wrapped gifts would be places where another may find them, as well."
CLIV (Sunday the 26th of March, 1967. Chita, Zabaykalsky Krai, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

With nearly a full year spent outside of it under her belt, Sonya could now appreciate exactly how...bland the Soviet Union was outside the larger cities.

It might have been a greater maturity that allowed her to appreciate the severe beauty of her Motherland's harsh winters whitewashing most everything and gilding everything else in silvery ice; the fact Rachel grew up in a heavy industrial society and she was still somewhat used to seeing factories and their resulting pollution; or maybe just nearly fifteen years of living here that blinded her to exactly how drab some of it could be in summer.

It might have even been the fact the underworld did a roaring business in smuggling black market items and luxuries even in the middle of Soviet Russia, and the underworld and the places connected to it was where she spent the bulk of her time.

However, in the more civilian side where the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic's reach started to strain it was almost... depressive.

Just the civilian side, when compared to such places as a faintly lingering impression of a war-torn France or even the less controlled borders of the Soviet Union.

The Mafiya side had a lot more color to it most everything, unless they were trying to hide it.

Now that she had some experiences in different countries to compare it all to, the underworld here was closer to the surface than in most other places. A lot more, even when set next to places like a pocked-marked France, the northern tip of Italy, and the greater north-west region of Europe.

Admittedly Sonya really did need to take a long look at the southern parts of Italy, the heavily immigrated parts of the US, and maybe some more of China's underworld before deciding on how unusually civilian-friendly her homeland's Mafiya was.

There were two ways to get any kind of aid in Soviet Russia, one was to find the correct government division of their oblast or to search out and locate the local group of vory closest to you. There were risks involved in approaching either, beyond the fact one was legal and the other not so much, but generally the difference boiled down to how much one wanted to pay for aid and if they wished to risk their neck or not and in what way.

Notably, it was equally risky either way you wanted to handle it.

However, that showed a marked difference between Soviet Russia and another mafia heavy place like China's Hong Kong, or even what little she had seen of France's Paris. If only because France was still in the middle of rebuilding some parts of its infrastructure, meaning a lot more could be slipped past those in charge, and Hong Kong was... in the middle of something else. It meant the underworld of Soviet Russia could spare that kind of attention for their civilians.

While the rural divisions of the Soviet government might help, they also might just report it to someone else and the wait for that someone to come help you. Which could take months if not weeks. That ran the risk of having your issue reported wrong, having it not reported at all, or having your problem blown out of proportion for whatever reasons and having to explain that to whoever responded.
Conversely, while the vor would help if they didn't react badly to being asked in the first place… you would end up owing them a favor or two no matter how short or how inexpensive whatever fix was.

It was a choice between overworked public servants and possibly violent but more networked criminals, and the balance was leaning more towards the criminals if only because they were more reliable.

Being that helpful wasn't just the vor being good neighbors, it was also motivated by self-interest. If everyone respectable in any section of a city were all indebted to a certain syndicate, then those civilians could be encouraged to look the other way when… less than legal things went down. Beyond whatever skills or aid the civilians could pony up in thanks or to repay any help, that accepted blindness was allowing several syndicates like the Zolotovs to operate more openly than ever before.

The Soviet Union wasn't quite on its deathbed just yet, but the signs were starting to appear.

The breakdown of public services here and there, the occasional uncovered corruption of some uchastoks that may or may not be part of your quarter. In contrast, the public and most of the minor government officials were trying hard to pretend it was all business as usual… even when it wasn't.

There was actually a bit more cheerful air around some of the places affected by corruption, the assumption of 'it was hard, but now it has to get better'.

In the month and a half it took the Großes Volksfest to make it through some of western Soviet Russia, Sonya got a very good look at the more distant rural parts of her home country and the general feel of the places.

The parts that didn't have a strong underworld presence to offset the more strident and harsh government policies that may or may not be hastening the Soviet Union's fall.

The 'Khrushchev Thaw' had started breaking down the isolationist world-view that had been more prevalent before Sonya became an officially working thief, but that ended with the death of the Primer who engineered it. Brezhnev Leonid Ilyich was in the middle of taking office and working through his predecessor's economic and likely foreign relations plans to get a feel of where everything was.

She expected to get some word of how the man would handle his time in office in the latter half of the year, especially given they were almost ready to leave Soviet Russia itself and it might take coming back to Russia to figure it out.

CLIV (Thursday the 30th of March, 1967. Urumchi, People's Republic of China.)

They crossed the border between Soviet Russia and the People's Republic of China in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, just south of the Altai Mountain Range and southwest of Mongolia's southern border. They stopped first in the tiny village of Chi-mu-nai for a night.

Which was a literal frozen hole in the mountains, as far as a village went.

It was only a brief stopover. The circus was headed for the equally tiny city of Urumchi in the southern part of the Dzungarian Basin and the train station there.

Problem was, there weren't very many ways to cross the northern border of Soviet Russia and Communist China except through the tiny stretch of land bordered by two different mountain ranges and a few stones' throw from the Gobi Desert.

That also meant it would be cold at first, then hot as hell, then freezing cold again.

The border patrols at Chi-mu-nai were not quite unnerving, but stringently through and almost non-compromising. Had anyone been smuggling things into China though that border, Sonya doubted the guards would've missed it by anything other than pure luck.

It was also the point of which her absentminded understudying of Faris' performances became more of a thing than just something to do when really bored. The fire-juggler had a selection of swords and other pointy things he could swallow and incorporate into his juggling/fire breathing act, playing up his native region's reputation for performing exotic feats that seemed hazardous or painful.

The native Egyptian's luggage easily outweighed most everyone else's, just simply because of the amount of steel to it and that it couldn't be used as something else in a pinch.

Master Liam had one silver tongue, but that wasn't really buying the circus more leeway when it came to how much sharpened steel they could bring into the country with them.

Madame Crina looked highly amused at the fact she was suddenly sharing her apprentice with Faris when Liam finally hit on a way that wouldn't make them leave the man's expensive weaponry behind.

The thief herself just really wished she didn't rid her own baggage of any liquor, and that she could've kept a bottle or two of vodka on her.

As the juggler's semi-formal apprentice, at least for the duration of the time they were in China, she was allotted the other half of Faris' allotted steel baggage. Which solved the situation nicely, even if it made things a bit awkward between two of the strongman Jaq's friends for a week.

Jaq mourned Sonya's lack of alcohol too, during those few days on a train when there was very limited privacy.

It could've been said she had gotten herself apprenticed to Faris without even asking or consideration of how hard his act could be, which was where the awkward came from. It wasn't really that way, and a week was exactly how long it took to fully convince the man of that, so by the time the circus reached their first official stop of Ha-mi and set up for a week-end show she could go back to being his assistant with little issue.

By that point Sonya was rather fed up with performers and their moments of dramatics, mostly due to the fact that last upset wasn't even her fault and she had to be the one to smooth it over, so she wasn't particularly understanding of Cherep's bout of it.

Her foster brother had known full well that he was only going to have a stuntman show a month, as that was what Master Liam had granted when allowing him to branch out and add that to their circus, so why he was complaining about the fact to her was beyond her.

She stuck one of her few remaining cigarettes between her lips in lieu of actually addressing his whining, because this was her break-time and damn it all if she didn't get something done during it. The motion didn't do more than buy her a few seconds to light it, and when she looked back at him he was still pouting at her from his spot on a battered camp chair.

Sighing through her nose and enduring the sting of smoke that accompanied the act, she ran her non-smoking hand through her loose hair before picking a language they had in common that wasn't English or Russian. "Frankly, I don't care."

"That's not very understanding." Cherep was quick to point out in return, in German like her instead of the Russian he stared in because they both needed the practice. "You're supposed to sympathize with me."

"Says who? I don't really like watching you risk your life and bones for an adrenaline rush in front of spectators, nor the fact you seem to want me to support it. I didn't require you to support what I do, why do I have to do it for you?"

Sonya clamped her mouth shut probably a sentence too slow. His mostly-faked pout changed into a smaller but real frown, and in return she shifted awkwardly. Not quite guiltily, but still somewhat sorry for how bluntly that came out.

"You know, sometimes I think Lisa did you a disservice with those acting lessons." Her fellow Cloud started, his light tone at odds with the serious look on his face. "You can fake most things really well, so it's hard to keep in mind that you're not really as understanding of some conversational gambits or why we use them as you seem."

"For the last damn time, I am not socially incompetent."

"No, but you don't really have the tolerance for a lot of social interaction." He countered easily, waving a hand. Mostly to disperse the smoke, partially to wave off her oft-repeated denial. "When you reach that limit, then the nicest you are is socially incompetent."

She finally gifted him with a dirty look, more than tired of trying to talk to people that weren't at least semi-content or indifferent with whatever was going on.

"I wasn't asking you to support me doing something I know you don't like me doing, I was… in a roundabout way, inviting you to complain with me." Cherep pointed out with an impressively straight face, which made it hard for her to understand if he was mad at her or not. "At most, I was expecting you to roll your eyes at me or snort. Maybe even bitch in your dryly witty way that no one ever gets everything they want, and I should be happy enough with what I have."

She eyed him warily, still trying to figure out if he was irritated or annoyed or something.

"Calm down, sister dear." He grinned at her, which just made her suspicious. "Is it just the thing with Faris, or the whole 'we're in China' thing in general that's bothering you so much?"

A waved hand to the opening of the tent he was stuck within in case something mechanical broke down probably meant to incorporate the country they were in.

"Both." The Storm-Cloud tiredly admitted, giving up on understanding and just resigning herself to the fact she had upset him. "Faris and the luggage thing with him was just the latest in what's been bothering me."

"Poor Sonya," he gestured to a spot next to his chair, inviting her to sit, "no one really appreciates you that much, do they?"

"…are you patronizing me?"

"Little bit, yeah."

Sonya supposed she deserved that, if only for snapping at him first.
It took them another week to get out from the borderlands of the Gobi Desert region, which then left the performers of the Grosses Volksfest into the middle of China.

Instead of high and cold mountains contrasted with low-lying near-desert heat, they got to enjoy a muggy wet and nearly oppressive heat of the famed bamboo forests of Asia.

Sonya wasn't sure why that was worse, given they had just been crossing plains of baking grasslands and nearly arid scrubland when not trekking across the foot of a mountain range or two. It just felt that way, no matter how strongly she reminded herself of Soviet Russia's blackout winters or even the mountain ranges they had left behind recently.

The middle region of China was also the point at which things like 'curfew' and 'escorts' became a thing.

She really did wonder what they were trying to hide. Jiayi had already independently confirmed what news the Russian had sent to them via Cherep during the winter, using some of her more far-flung family connections and her obvious nationality to encourage some gossip her way.

'For our protection' her pale white ass, she could probably murder a platoon of those Red Guard members without too much difficulty. Wet behind the ears, utterly puffed up on their own arrogance, little shits that they were.

She wondered if she should feel disturbed over that thought, and then wondered if the fact she didn't was good or not. She eventually decided that moral questions of that magnitude deserved more than a few minutes to deliberate over and shoved it aside in favor for other things to ponder.

The difference between this year of traveling as a circus performer and last year was Sonya's distinct lack of desire to explore or even leave the areas set aside for fairgrounds and the like.

She had already decided she didn't like China, knew well that anything she'd get up to in regard to the local underworld would draw some very unwanted official attention that probably wouldn't be worth it, so she stuck close to the circus' assigned locations.

It wasn't until Crina made a faux-casual comment in Romanian about her normal habits and what she hadn't been doing that Sonya realized a few things.

"So, when do you think it will be safe enough to go back to wandering around like a stray cat?"

Okay, not so much faux-casual as it was bluntly spoken and rather frank. For the two them, on the other hand? It was the equivalent of genuinely spoken concern.

Sonya neatened the stack of tarot cards the old bat had been absentmindedly instructing her on the use of while she thought. "Likely... the moment we are on a ship for our next country."

Her master of all things mystic snatched her pack of cigarettes, stealing one from the thief shamelessly. She had her own lighters, due to the incense she burned when her drinking got a bit out of hand, so the lack of one on the younger woman's person still wasn't a thing to hide.

"You think it's that bad, then?"

"Think?" Her not-so-legal apprentice repeated slowly, giving the crotchety gypsy a measured stare.
"Crina, have you looked around lately?"

The question netted her a shrug, as well as the return of her pack of cigarettes. "I've heard a little from Jiayi, over how bad it's getting. But for us? Those that will leave and possibly spread word to other countries about what's going on?"

"That's part of why I'm being overly cautious. There is little keeping those in power from arranging a 'terrorist attack' or some completely 'natural' disaster that so unfortunately took out a wandering circus troupe."

That earned her a sideways but sharp beady-eye stare. She merely shrugged then returned her attention to try memorizing the meaning of various cards again.

The thief wondered…

Crina's comments now and Jiayi's from earlier in the year seemed to imply that certain members of the circus knew full well what her usual job description entailed. That made her wonder if there was another reason why Master Liam was so accepting of a mere mechanic's little sister joining up with him.

There was… some sense to that logic if so.

Mafia people tended to avoid interfering in other mafia operations unless they knew what was going on. It was easier, not to mention more cost-effective, to let some other group or syndicate to establish a smuggling route or underworld business then take it over by force.

Additionally, more time to plan or gather information to take over said route or business meant it was less likely someone would end up massacring their own people because of some unknown detail or there being more combatants than assumed.

A Russian thief popping up with Mafyia tattoos within a circus would've taken a lot of syndicates near or around the Soviet Union aback at first.

Sonya shuffled the oversized cards, wondering if that was part of the 'why' Master Liam allowed her to tag along after Cherep in the circus and not just as a wandering traveler in their wake.

CLVII (Monday the 17th of April, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Renato considered what he had learned carefully as he followed a rather busty redhead dressed as a Mafia Land hospital nurse down a busy street.

A certain someone was picking up Sonya's mail, and she was on the island with him when the thief herself wasn't and wouldn't be for several more months yet.

Mafia Land had some rather strict limitations on who could pick up or handle their employee's personal effects, even if those employees happened to be six feet under. Rarely did any Mafioso attach anyone to their personal accounts, not even if they shared a blood relation to another did they authorize them to basically be free to paw through their apartment or storage units.

Much less allow others to handle the sensitive things sometimes sent by mail.

This woman was either someone the touchy Russian Storm-Cloud allowed closer than most mafia people allowed very many, or she had gotten to Sonya's accounts either through her work or because of him again.

By an average Hard Cloud's typical behavior alone, the first option wasn't likely if she was currently with her brother-figure again this year. Which left the second to be the more plausible one.

Unfortunately, the young woman in question wasn't a typical Cloud in nature. Nor did she really conform to what was usually thought of as Cloud behavior and gained some amusement by baffling anyone expecting it from her.

Renato only had Sonya's Mafia Land employee ID number because he was a suspicious and probably paranoid asshole, he had twisted it out of a particularly slimy clerk in the Thieves' Hall not too long ago after she agreed to help him with Shamal. She would probably not be impressed with him for having it and would likely actually go through with that threat to break a few bones from the very beginning of their association if she learned he knew her number at all.

Even with a recent changeover, security breaches like that could've happened before Vongola got into the island's operations. The redhead could've even gotten Sonya's ID number afterwards or during the inevitable confusion of the switch.

It was a lot easier to keep an eye on the Storm-Cloud's movements if he could use that ID to be alerted to her coming and going from the island. Especially since she preferred sea-routes to what air travel was allowed on the island.

Additionally, the hitman didn't really want to press his luck with how much backlash from his work she would be willing to brush off. There had been more than enough of that to last him a long while as it was.

However, there were limits to what he could use Sonya's Mafia Land employee ID for. Since he couldn't lose a bit more than half-foot of height, nor somehow slim himself down to her lithe but still growing willowy frame no matter what disguise he wanted to try, he couldn't access her records.

Not even through his shiny new association with Vongola, as it was the outside advisory branch in charge of security. Which meant he was stalled on ruling out that first option from being possible.

Given Renato was likely already on thin-ice where the Russian was concerned, a misstep could cost him a contact that was proving to be rather fascinatingly diverse in her knowledge base.

…and Shamal would pitch an annoying fit if the hitman couldn't somehow sweet-talk Sonya into visiting Vongola territory this winter or sometime next year so the baby Mist could prove all those doubters over a Mist tolerating Cloud wrong.

She had to be alive for him to do said sweet-talk, as well as somewhat endeared to him.

Though he was sure mentioning Shamal alone would work there even if she still wasn't happy with him.

Which left him in this particular bind.

The risks were obvious, but the possible results were less clear. His lifestyle as a hitman meant he rather preferred better odds for success, but there were always occasions he could afford ensuring that.

Worst comes to worst, he could always stalk whoever it was until he understood more of who it was.
Somehow, in between hits he still had to do. For both Mafia Land and for Nono Vongola.

Renato raked a hand through his short and spiky black hair distractedly, noting the turnoff the red headed nurse swung herself down and calculating a different route to keep tailing her by.

Just following someone even a few feet back was suspicious as hell, meaning he had all sorts of tricks to pull out to keep a target from getting wary of him.

For all he knew of Sonya's personal life, this woman could be someone important to her. The hitman had, by sheer accident no less, only just last year learned the thief was fostered with a brother in Soviet Russia's Moscow.

Given it had been four years since he met the girl-turned-young-woman, that was... bad.

It was equally likely she was just that good, or they both weren't too interested in more than a casual acquaintance until just recently. The Soft Flame Sun user was leaning more towards deciding he had been badly neglecting a surprisingly interesting information source he hadn't known was at hand.

The alleyway he had been walking down suddenly opened on to another street, the one the redhead nurse was supposed to be on. A glance down the street in both directions informed the hitman she had already taken another street or entered one of the buildings nearby.

Well... this was a rather expensive area, but still a residential one.

He now had both where the woman was working and where it was she likely lived or reported to after picking up Sonya's mail.

Where this trail ended meant little more than he had to be a bit more careful than he had been. This section of the island was generally filled with condos and long-term apartments sometimes sold to various underworld powers.

Meaning if that redhead woman was a friend or more to Sonya it was likely a good thing. If not, then he might be getting into another thing that may prove to be over his head.

CLVIII (Saturday the 22nd of April, 1967. Lan-Chou, People's Republic of China.)

Crina became markedly less popular in a short enough amount of time it nearly gave Sonya whiplash.

While it hadn't been too obvious back near the borders of the People's Republic of China, the further in the circus got the more obvious it was that the superstition a fortune teller relied upon for business dried up.

It had been more of a novelty service than any actual fortune telling business, apparently in more rural China the act of getting one's fortune read by an exotic and genuine gypsy was worth the price for some cryptic babble spouted off at them. That did not extend into more developed cities the further south they went.

She had noticed it as far back as Chiu-Ch'uan, when it Crina's usual draw dipped from the normal rate and Sonya's success rate of acquiring less certain business increased.

That didn't prepare her for the outright scorn exhibited by those visiting the circus by the time they reached Lan-Chou.

Her master of mysticism rapidly shut down her little tent in response, not three hours into the day.

It was apparently a baffling enough treatment the old bat immediately made tracks to where Master Liam was setting up the later big-top show. Sonya hesitated for a full minute, but eventually decided to default into just entertaining the younger visitors in lieu of her usual job.

She also, just in case, purposely kept an eye on several of the worst offenders that had mocked her mistress' fortune telling.

The Russian had known the Red Guard was being given more and more power, the mass rallies paid for by the government still being talked about last year had told her that much. She hadn't known they would become bold enough to go after examples of another country's cultural history.

The fact members of the Red Guard were here and had gone after Crina, on the other hand, said nothing good about where the upsets in China were about to go.

She wasn't surprised when Jiayi swung around to collect her when she was in the middle of juggling a set of throwing knives for said Red Guards' entertainment in hopes of distracting them from making an even bigger scene than they had already. Extracting herself took a few pointed hefts of the knives and a sharp smile, but they had been impressed enough with her knife skills to 'allow' it.

The old bat the thief worked mainly under was a tough woman. Even though she probably likely knew what might have happened had she not shut down her tent quick enough, she merely looked as crotchety as ever.

Master Liam was stressed looking enough for the both even as he prepared himself to act as the big-tops ringmaster instead of the, currently sick, gentleman that usually did it.

"You may not be able to go back to work, Crina." The circus master informed Sonya's master in all things mystic lowly in Mandarin Chinese when they finally reached them.

He was carefully waxing his mustache, so it would stay no matter how loudly he would have to be shouting in the next few hours, and the man gave a short nod to them as she and the Chinese woman got close enough for him to see them in the performers tent's mirror.

"This isn't the first road bump we've weathered, nor would it be the last of them." Crina scoffed rather loudly in the same language, striding over to her apprentice and holding out a demanding hand. "But this is a different one, and I don't think I can go to selling herbs and the like here."

If Confucius' home and grave hadn't survived the current unrest without damage, then it wasn't likely a lone gypsy's trade would either.

Sonya obediently ponied up a cigarette for her.

"We cannot simply have her as a 'holistic' healer." Jiayi chipped in, looking as fierce as the little lioness the thief tended to think of her as. "They will not accept that either, not if just simple fortune telling started this mess and we already said we had nothing beyond first-aid training among us."

"And she must do something, if only to be of use for the performer's visa she's in the country on." Master Liam agreed with a slow nod, then turned to the three women in the tent with him.

"Suggestions then, ladies?"

"I've got nothing." Admitted the old woman sourly around the filter between her lips, searching her pockets for a lighter she probably didn't have on her.

Their native expert kept her mouth stubbornly shut, but she looked equally unhappy as the gypsy woman. She tended to handle the acrobats of the circus troupe, so it wasn't really that surprising.

She kind of wondered why she was in this tent for the discussion. Was it because she was 'officially' Crina's apprentice, or because they thought she had more to give over?

Liam turned his attention to her when it appeared the Chinese woman had no idea nor intents on making that clearer. She supposed that answered that question, they were wondering if she could do something more.

"I… have a jewelry making kit."

"I forgot about that." Muttered the old gypsy woman as she peered at her apprentice. "What would you need for it?"

"Copper or silver wire, preferably." She only could do simple things with it, and with a lack of precious stones but for the spinel gems she had on her Bec de Corbins or the red tourmaline key necklace around her neck? "And… a lack of questions on how I do some things."

Without gems for any ornamentation, that would mean local stones if they were going to have more than just braided wire jewelry. Like the natural granite or basalt in the area. Since she didn't have any stone-cutting tools, it would mean she was limited to what kind of control she had over Storm Flames to shape anything.

This was… not really a good idea. She couldn't think of another, though.

The circus master smoothed a hand down fiercely waxed mustachios thoughtfully, considering the Russian carefully. "I feel… uneasy over such a condition, little sister Sonya. But… we do not have the luxury to demand an explanation as well as a service you were not hired to do."

"It's not that I do not trust you," she didn't really, not with this, "it is more that this will complicate a fair few things that do not need to be. For both you and I."

They would likely find out eventually anyways. Cherep wasn't really going to get away with a stuntman's lot in life without a few crashes or broken bones. Sonya decided she was merely… testing the waters before they had to commit to this circus to hide her foster brother's Dying Will Flames and his innate use of them.

---

CLIX (Saturday the 22nd of April, 1967. Lan-Chou, People's Republic of China.)

With a very limited amount of time that could be spent outside the circus' designated fairgrounds, Sonya took off immediately.

To avoid more questions that she really cared to deal with, she did it in a way that allowed her to evade an 'escort'. Nominally by simply waiting for a moment or two of inattention to anyone watching her movements, and mostly by abusing Cloud Prorogated jumping and circus level gymnastics to be in places that wouldn't be checked or looked at normally.

Even if anyone did look for where a lowly apprentice was.
There wasn't much of a reason to try sneaking around at night, not only would there be more interest in who might leave or enter the fairgrounds at that time but also the thief didn't really know the area that well and light would be a necessity to find what she needed.

Stumbling around in the dark also didn't really appeal to her anyways.

Sonya took with her a few empty packs and used her limited geological knowledge to find herself some rocks with pretty patterns or solid colors. Getting back into the city of Lan-Chou with three full packs of said rocks clicking and shifting on her took a fair amount of time and the occasional backtrack or three.

Crina stubbornly sat herself down next to the thief when she returned just before sunset, looking mulish enough the younger woman ignored the old bat instead of try protesting the scrutiny.

Her expression when the Russian took hold of her red crystal key and snapped off the teeth with her bare hands was an interesting study of shocked and wary.

Sonya was taking a leaf out of her own book. Since her control over Storm Flames did suck for anything other than complete Disintegration, she needed something to help her not melt whatever rock she was trying to cut into. Instead, she used the sharp broken end of red tourmaline to carve stone.

Which worked surprisingly well for something makeshift. She mourned her poor key but replacing it later wouldn't be too difficult.

"I suppose this would be how you light your smokes without an actual lighter." The old woman mused slowly, fingering the still warm rock Sonya had tested her theory about her Storm Flame control on.

She had carved that bit of shale with Crina's name. Given that it worked, didn't look to be melting any more now that she had stopped applying her focused Storm Flames and was no more crumbly than usual for a bit of shale, the thief decided this really was going to work out.

"You realize you're going to have to make a few hundred of these things, right?" The gypsy continued when her apprentice didn't respond to the leading question.

"...can you get Jiayi to write down common Chinese characters for reference? I do not think I recall all the simple ones I can carve."

"I can do that." Crina admitted wryly, heaving herself up. "They didn't find a lot of silver wire for you, but Master Liam did put in an order for it we can pick up in the next stop. They found you copper, though."

"We will also need string or leather for necklaces if you want to sell them that way and not just charms to wear on such things." The Flame user shrugged the limitation off, more interested in examining a bit of granite and wondering how she would melt enough of it off for a flat surface she could carve and not waste half the rock to get it.

"I've heard stories, a long-assed time ago, about those able to summon an inner fire at will." Posed aloud her master just before she ducked out of the tent they usually lived and worked out of. "Funny how those old stories seem to have a bit of truth behind them."

The thief pursed her lips as the old bat left to find her more things to use in her amateur jewelry making.
That was an... interesting thought.

Did Crina's culture have stories about Dying Will Flame users and their abilities?

She wondered if the old woman wouldn't mind sharing those stories, and how much she would be asked to explain in return.

Her infrequent dips into history hadn't reached any contemporary period just yet, she was currently picking at ancient Greece and Rome. Familiarizing herself to a history that was almost but not quite the same as what she recalled was a little tricky, especially since a fair bit of it had yet to be discovered but she knew some things happened differently from Rachel's school lessons.

Which made everything a rather confusing mess for her. Instead of trying and find differences, she had instead started working on recalling this history as what she needed to think of instead of Rachel's.

It wasn't as if she'd ever actually use that version of history again.

CLX (Monday the 8th of May, 1967. Shanghai International Settlement, People's Republic of China.)

In the month more it took the Grobes Volksfest to work through the rest of China, the Storm-Cloud made upwards of four hundred little stone charms. The outside edges and a loop to thread a string or a leather thong through in mostly copper wire but some had silver instead, they were little square tiles with a word or two at most carved into the faces.

Crina sold about a hundred of them in each stop, meaning while not really all that popular they did at least cover the lowest base of her usual amount earned. Her apprentice was just happy with that, and the fact they could go back to being fortune tellers with little trouble from now on.

Cherep had to work hard not to laugh when he learned of what his foster sister had been up to while he got a stunt show set up, and why she wouldn't be there for the next one either.

Sonya chucked a bit of basalt at his head anyways.

Frankly, by the time the circus reached Shanghai, the thief was more than ready to put China and her hopefully only stint as a professional jeweler behind her.

Master Liam arranged for a ship with some decent swiftness, obviously to his circus performers if not to anyone outside of it. He also lied through his teeth when the port authorities asked why the haste to leave, citing they were about a half a month behind schedule due to sightseeing and enjoying the countryside... when in fact they were about a month ahead and had done no such things.

Since Shanghai was a British controlled port city, the circus relaxed some of its guard over their performers. Which meant curfew or not, they finally got around to doing the bits of shopping that had been put off while in more uncertain areas of the country.

Her fellow Cloud and a few other mechanics got sent out for parts and the fiddlier bits of machinery that were prone to breaking, Jaq and Faris ended up fetching canvas and tarp repair kits, Jiayi and some of her girls left to find more fabrics for repairing costumes and tents.

Sonya kept herself armed to the teeth anyways, especially after their mistress of the trapeze got wind of Red Guard groups starting to interfere with the People's Liberation Army installations.

It turned out to be one of her better ideas.

She got suspicious enough to send Crina back with some of the preserved food they had been sent out to purchase, around when the civilians cluttering the streets started to rapidly find other things to do well outside of the neighborhood.

The old bat didn't look entirely pleased with getting sent away but left when she noticed the same thing.

It was when the fishmonger she had been haggling with suddenly ducked out of his stall entirely that she decided that pretending to ignore the reason for the situation wasn't going to cut it.

…and that she possibly wasn't getting the preserved snapper she had been tasked to find.

She turned around and was confronted with the three Chinese men who had been rather impatiently waiting for her to notice them.

Liqin was one of those men, who did at least look a touch apologetic about this. There was a man in a red Gi with a long braid of dark hair, which might be a member of what Triad group her old guide belonged to, and another man in darker clothing with a sour expression.

"May I help you?"

"Miss… Yu, was it?" Obviously, the long-haired spokesman understood wasn't her real name.

She didn't particularly want to make this easy for them. "That will work for now, yes."

To his credit, that didn't seem to faze him. "I was wondering if I may ask you a few questions."

"This have anything to do with a visit I may or may not have done last winter?" At his nod, the thief pursed her lips thoughtfully. "No."

It earned her a slow blink from the man standing front and center, and a cringe from Liqin. The other man, the one standing off to the side a bit, looked irritated.

Actually, he started out with an irritated expression. His face turned rather red and angry at her flat refusal.

"Miss Yu, I really only want to ask a few questions." The first speaker tried again, without a trace of exasperation or irritation in his tone.

Sonya was impressed with his calmness, but that wasn't going to help. "By law, and you know full well what laws, I cannot help you this way. Not that I would be particularly inclined to do so suddenly accosted by three gentlemen out of the blue like this."

"Yu-"

"Stop messing around, Fong." The last man snapped, reaching out one hand to grab her arm. "We don't have the time."

The Russian wasn't amused, nor willing to see where that would go.

Her hand grabbed his and crushed the bones to splinters without warning. That man's knees suddenly hit the planked walkway they were standing on, and he gave out a choked off gasp of pure
She locked eyes with the first man, who still seemed weirdly calm even with her crushing one man's hand to rubbery uselessness in front of him. "I. Cannot. Help. You. If I say anything beyond 'I don't know', then the organization that allowed me to be hired for some job I may or may not have done will have me hunted down and killed for speaking of things they promised anonymity for. Find another way."

"Would you be willing to answer if I did?" Fong asked lightly, still unconcerned by his fellow's pained whimpers.

"Not particularly, no."

Liqin sighed, if in exasperation or tiredness it was debatable.

"Then we seem to be at an impasse." Crossing his arms over his chest, the long-haired triad member regarded the thief thoughtfully. "I must ask, and if you cannot or will not answer…"

"You may be stuck, I am not." Sonya reassured him with a tight little smile, finally letting go of the ruined hand.

"I will not allow you to just leave." The spokesperson of this little 'intervention' warned as he adopted a looser stance, sounding slightly apologetic about that.

The man who had, rather unwisely, reached out to try manhandling a Cloud managed to drag himself away a little bit. Liqin had been standing a way away anyways, wary of a woman that could make metal spontaneously melt on command as well as the individual confronting her.

Sonya was entirely not apologetic about the sudden dunking her former guide/personal assassin and Fong experienced when she jumped with enough force to not only reach a second-story balcony but also to crack and shatter the dock planking under their feet.

She didn't hang around to watch them deal with that, nor long enough to find out if they had more backup even if the target was only one woman.

She got the hell out of dodge, mentally planning a slightly alternate route to meet up with the circus and wondering how to warn Cherep that she had to find other traveling arrangements for the next ocean-going bit.

The thief would meet up with the circus in Singapore, or worst came to worst, India.
Sonya had to give Fong some credit, he was markedly persistent even when taken by surprise.

After getting a message taken to Cherep by paying one of the boys running around the wharf to do it, she had to bolt again to keep him from catching her.

The man chased her up the Shanghai fishing docks, sopping wet and still dodging pedestrians with enviable skill, and down the connected market street, only a bit damp that time, until they started attracting attention neither really wanted to deal with. When the Red Guard members and the Shanghai police started popping up with alarming frequency, the thief ducked into the busier traders’ markets with Fong hot on her heels.

Annoyingly persistent, but at least the Chinese man was considerate enough about the inconvenience as he tried talking her into helping him with whatever in between streets or when scaling a building or two to get around traffic-clogged streets.

She could fully understand why he kept on chasing her, even between the port's midday foot traffic and through Shanghai's oppressively wet almost-summer heat. Beyond whatever it was he wanted to ask or was responsible for asking of her, if she got loose and reported to Mafia Land that the Triad organization she had taken a job for had tracked one of their supposedly 'anonymous' thieves down...

The Triad organization responsible for this little game of tag would be blacklisted from Mafia Land for a few years. One year if nothing else came from this incident and two if anything semi-serious or lethal happened.

From the looks of things, especially since Sonya had to be hired to help keep up Omertà, they probably couldn't afford that.

That didn't mean she was only amused by this little diversion. Rapidly becoming annoyed was a better explanation for her state of mind.

Her brother and fellow Cloud would start to worry when Crina got back to the circus alone, that message of hers may or may not help that much. The stuntman wasn't a fighter, he was way too much of a pacifist to be comfortable harming another person. If he attracted attention to himself and the fact he was her brother got mentioned...

Well, she wouldn't restrict herself to maybe a bit of property damage in response.

It really should've occurred to her to wonder why only three men had been tasked to approach her when they probably knew full well she was at least a Dying Will Flame user of the Storm, or where any other triad members were during that little chase one of their own was doing.

Her general feeling of rapid annoyance changed suddenly to flat out irritated when Fong managed to corner her in a strangely empty warehouse district.

Liqin looked cringingly apologetic behind the first rank of very angry looking Chinese men who likely belonged to the local chapter of the Triads. He was still somewhat damp, the only reason the Chinese man in red with the braided hair wasn't was because of the speed the two of them got up to while racing up and down a dockside or three.

Fucking fuck nuts.

She couldn't just beat them bloody or murder them, if she could in the first place, without the Triads actively bothering the circus she had been seen with. Cherep was likely to stay with them for another few years, and he might not be able to afford that kind of attention even if he got wildly popular. "I am never coming back to China."

The man who had done most of the chasing slid to a halt a respectable distance behind her, probably only that far away because she did just crush a man's hand in front of him not an hour before.

"I cannot allow you to leave it at this time, unfortunately."

Tilting her head back, to see Fong a clearly over her shoulder, Sonya gave him a wan smile. "Know the problem with assumptions, Fong?"

"Other than that delightful pun thought up by the American soldiers?" He asked pleasantly, and she did admire the fact he wasn't even breathing hard.

She wasn't either, but she had a cheat for that. She was a hell of a lot sweatier than him, but that might be because he was wearing recently damp and loose clothing while she had some leather and a few layers on.

"Other than that one." The thief agreed easily, sliding a hand to the leather bracer on her left forearm.

Fong meant the 'assume makes an ass- out of -u- and -me' saying, which was a play on the English spelling and pronunciation. She had a different one in mind.

"Sometimes, when you assume, you overestimate things. Namely yourselves." Sonya had all seven of her mini Bec de Corbin copies on her, and she slipped a Flame resistant one out into her right palm. "Other times, you do not assume nearly enough. Namely me."

A twist of will, not quite a desire or a demand but a flex of something innate in nature she had long gotten used to doing over her childhood, and in a flair of lilac Flames she had a fully sized polearm in her right hand.

The purple would out her as a Cloud Flame user, but right now that wouldn't exactly impair her any.

Sonya set the butt end on the ground next to her feet and twisted around far enough to squarely face the man behind her. "I really do not wish to damage anything, yourselves or this city, but I really must insist to be let go. You are trying to trap a Cloud, and I should not have to inform you how that typically ends."

His expression was interesting. He wasn't surprised, which meant he had paid some attention when she dunked him into the harbor by shattering the docks from under him. He also didn't look as enthusiastic as he had trying to chase her down earlier, but that may be attributed to anything from her gender to a lack of desire to tangle with a Cloud Flame user.

The man sighed heavily after a long moment, adopting a martial arts stance Sonya couldn't identify.

Not that she had much exposure to many martial arts.

"I am afraid I have to insist you remain, Miss Sonya."
...great. They knew her name.

She allowed a wry smile to twist her lips, turning back to the no-longer-so-angry looking men that were part of this little confrontation. "You... are a very stubborn man."

"I have been informed of such."

"... will let you have this one. I don't really want to deal with angry Triad members actively hunting me."

She could no longer see him behind her, but there was a shift of a soft shoe's sole over hard packed dirt that let her know he had shifted slightly. "Are you giving up?"

Fong was suspicious. Good for him, but a bit too late.

"No, I merely meant I won't report this. So, you no longer have a reason to chase me more." Sonya flashed him a smirk, then gripped her Bec de Corbin in both hands and smashed the hammer end into the earth.

With how dry the dirt underfoot was, a sudden effusion of sheer overpowered force threw up a great cloud of dust and grit.

His aborted dart forward gained him a face full of it, and the consequence of applied force through her swung polearm vaulted the Russian up and forward at a rate they probably didn't have time to adjust to.

She twisted in mid-air and easily cleared the heads of the men that had barred her way forward, then a tuck and a roll once her heels hit dirt meant she was back on her feet and running for the outer edges of the city before they could clearly see what had happened.

Screw Shanghai, she'd catch a boat in another port.

CLXII (Tuesday the 6th of June, 1967. Bengaluru, Karnataka, Republic of India.)

Given how worriedly Cherep fussed over her when she reappeared Sonya assumed Crina had reported some of what she had seen, and rumors probably did the rest of informing him of why it took her so long.

Civilians only fled from their usual areas like that for a few things, namely either military or underworld operations taking place in their midst.

Also, the fact that it took her nearly a month and until India to join back up with the circus might have had something to do with it.

She'd had to head south-west out of Shanghai to Hangzhou on foot, catch a lift to Mafia Land and snatched her mail from Tatiana, then catch another boat to Singapore. Then track the circus' route to Chennai, India.

Then she had to skip town almost immediately and head off to Bangalore on her lonesome.

Which she wasn't ever doing again. If she lost track of the circus, they could go on without her.

Sonya told a small fib to Master Liam, claiming the stone carving without actual tools for it attracted attention she couldn't afford. It did at least prevent any awkward questions of being asked, and she didn't mind lying for Omertà.

Actually, she had to figure out if Dying Will Flame use was actually covered by Omertà or if it was just something 'everyone knows' but wasn't quite true. If it was, then how the hell did Cherep get away with an innate use of Cloud Flames to survive any crashes in another life?

The Vindice weren't particularly concerned with if you knew the laws you were breaking or not, just if you broke them at all.

She wrote off India as a lost in terms of searching out the underworld, because she had already sped through half of the region the Großes Volksfest would be passing through. Which wasn't much of a pity, because the countryside was interesting enough she had more than enough to do.

India only had about a decade and most of another as an independent country anyways, the underworld was probably not quite settled enough for foreigners to poke their noses into it without risking said nose.

Additionally, her brother wasn't interested in letting her out of his sight any time soon. Which was cute of him, but not helpful.

He spluttered at being called so. "CUTE! Sonya, you just-

"Stop." She even helpfully held up a hand to get his mind the time to process things again. "Think. You know full well what am. This last month? Will become more and more of a common thing the longer I go on doing what I am trained for. You know this."

"...you can't go back to China."

"Probably not. And when you go back, you are going to have to be a little wary of what you say and to whom." The thief shrugged that off easily, scuffing her boots deeper into the sandy earth they were taking a break on from setting up the circus. "China is a big country, though. I could probably do one-day jumps across the border, but that would be my limit from now on."

Cherep slouched down next to her, gazing in the same direction at the distant city, digging his fingers into the same gritty ground. "I don't like it."

"I will be sure to convey your dissatisfaction to them the next time I see a Triad member."

Snorting, the stuntman let himself fall backwards to stare up at the starry night sky overhead. "Kick one for me instead, yeah?"

Sonya laughed lightly, leaning back to stare up at the same sight he was looking at. "I will. A bone-breaking one even. That will certainly show our displeasure at their audacity."

He kicked out his feet, so he was fully comfortable while they stargazed, and laced his fingers together behind his head. "So... someone missed my last few shows."

"Not my fault. You may blame Crina... or Master Liam."

His next show was the very next stop, and they were only about halfway into their first day in Bellary. Which was, from what she had seen of it on the circus' way into the city, a rather cool city built right on top of the bones of the old city.

The thief kind of wanted to go exploring but there was more than enough to do as is, so she was putting it off until they broke down the circus again.

"I will be there this next time." Even if she didn't really like watching him performing.

A sharp tug on the back of her vest had her dropping back to lay supine as well.

"Perfect." Came her fellow Cloud's annoyingly cheerful voice. "You can bite your nails to the quick, maybe put some more finger-dents into a metal rail, and I'll... what did you call it? Get myself an adrenaline rush in front of spectators."

Sonya blindly thumped his chest with a free hand. "I said I was sorry."

"No, you didn't."

Blinking, she cast back for what she had snapped at him in a fit of pique. "Oh... no. I did not, did I? Sorry Cherep, I did not mean to take out my frustration on you."

A hand patted her on the head, which was rather annoyingly patronizing. Probably the point.

"It's alright, I had already known you're socially incompetent."

"...I will stab you."

"No, you won't."

"Want to bet?"

There was a pause, then Cherep scrambled to his feet and bolted. With a snort, Sonya pushed herself upright as well and followed him back to the fairgrounds at a more moderate pace.

India was hot country, after all.

CLXIII (Thursday the 15th of June, 1967. Hubballi, Karnataka, Republic of India.)

Hubli-Dharwad was... strange. Sonya had never seen a twinned city before, and she frankly didn't understand how it worked at all.

However, her inability to understand didn't change the fact it was basically two cities in one massive area. While Dharwad was the administrative headquarters the city it was Hubballi, situated south-east a respectable distance away, that was the commercial center and business hub of north Karnataka.

The Russian thief was also somewhat suspicious of the recently established Hubli-Dharwad Municipal Corporation, which governed the entire thing. That had some of the signs of a mafia cover business, yet... it still seemed too civilian to be really connected to the underworld.

She wanted to poke it a little, so she could understand what it really was, but that also wasn't the best idea ever.

Frankly, she had already had way too much mafia involvement in her little 'hiatus' already, she didn't need more.

The Groβes Volksfest had set up in the more southern city, not only was it closer to their last stop but it did deal with the more trade-central and entertainment orientated services than Dharwad.
Due to the troubles up north, the circus was really only hitting the bigger cities on their way through to Saudi Arabia and then Egypt, Faris' home country. Which did mean longer hours for their performers, but more income was generated.

Sonya kind of wondered whose bright idea it was to go through the Mediterranean and northern Africa in the middle of the bloody summer, but she'd live.

It was very hard to avoid heat exhaustion or a heat stroke, given the mainly Russian and Scandinavian homelands of the bulk of the circus' members. A lot of them had already experience some bad sunburns before they even left China behind, and when she caught up to them it seemed as if Singapore had been just as bad.

There were buckets of water set aside for any performers stuck in the hot sun or performing for the big-top shows, and the biggest cost Master Liam was shelling out a crazy amount of money for was just water.

For the thief herself, she came to love her canteen.

The only thing her minor amount of Sun Flames did, as far as she could tell, was crank up her internal body temp a small bit. It made it hard for her to become sick, and winters weren't so bad for her aside the whole not liking the cold part, but hot and muggy temperatures like the middle of the Indian peninsula?

Sonya was a miserable thief, for sure.

While she watched Cherep gear up into his Skull persona, she was taking semi-regular sips from her personal water source. In between making her foster brother drink some himself, because he was wearing a large amount of padding, she wondered over the changes she was seeing.

It was... interesting, to see him go from a mechanically inclined, bit of a math geek, but more importantly understanding when she screwed up lovable dork of a foster brother into... a reckless and silly daredevil with maybe a bit of an ego that sorely needed to be popped.

Lisa didn't just teach Tatiana and Sonya how to act unlike themselves, Cherep had a flair for dramatics and drama the younger thief just didn't have that the older woman had adored developing.

'Skull' was a daredevil, of course because stunt-work was something only an adrenaline junky would attempt doing for a living. He had an ego, which both explained why he would boast about himself loudly and why he was performing for a crowd. It was also shallow and off-putting, which would hopefully steer away anyone too interested in the man under that mask.

Unfortunately, it also made him a reckless loud-mouth. The silliness made him seem untrustworthy, flighty. Someone that only knew mechanics of motorcycles because 'only the Great Skull can work on his stunt-bike', which would also prevent sabotage as well as allow him to tune his motorcycle to do all those tricks and hopefully catch any mechanical problems early.

She could understand it, and marvel over a mastery of acting she couldn't match... but she still didn't like 'Skull' too much.

Give her plain old Cherep any day of the week.

Skull flashed her a grin when she made a comment to that effect, putting on a heavy silver ring bearing an amethyst carved in the likeness of a skull. She had given him his first birthday in the circus and he loved it to pieces. "I know, bear with it. It's just for the moment, or really, for the show."
"Had I met you like this... I probably would have punched you in the mouth." Sonya informed him blandly, nudging his arm with his canteen until he obligingly took it.

"If you had talked to me at all, you mean." He commented with a self-deprecating laugh, taking a swallow and passing it back. "That's the point, really. It's enough not-me that, even with the hair and eye coloring staying the same, Cherep wouldn't be automatically connected to Skull. Hiding yourself in plain sight, Lisa called it."

The thief smirked a bit tiredly, settling in to watch him poke through the rest of the dressing-tent to see if there was anything else he could incorporate into his 'Skull' personality.

She did wonder how Skull came to be if she had never met the little Czechoslovakian run-away named Cherep, and... if Skull could ever shed being a reckless daredevil and just be Cherep in that other lifetime.

"A-HA!"

Glancing up, Sonya almost dropped her face in her palms out of sheer exasperation.

Skull was holding a tube of purple lipstick aloft, probably a bit of makeup left over from the Arabian Night themed trapeze show from yesterday. He was also beaming at it.

She didn't want to know why.

CLXIV (Wednesday the 21st of June, 1967. Bombay, Maharashtra, Republic of India.)

"No," Sonya informed him flatly, "we are not doing that."

This year's midway rest-stop was in Bombay, which the Russian thief highly appreciated. Not only was it a highly-traveled international port city, it also had direct service to her other workstation.

Which was decently close for the time being according to the schedule it stuck to, in a few days it would take an additional day by ship to reach land again.

The circus' performers had an entire week off, allowed to go where they wanted and do what they wanted to do without too much worry of where they would live and eat during that time. Next week was a full week of performances and shows, but the rest was appreciated anyways.

They had to leave before monsoon season started, or risk getting set back weeks in traveling time.

Since she had the free time, she wanted to spend it how she preferred.

Especially since Saudi Arabia and most of the Middle East was dry country, meaning no alcohol. Jaq was way ahead of her, and he had given her an open invitation to go bar hopping with him.

Cherep let his knees hit the sand, hands folded before him in a begging pose. "Please? It looks so cool."

"You go learn to surf, I would much rather sit on the beach and watch." She would rather catch a ride into Mafia Land for a few days, but that kind of went without needing to be said.

Tatiana had said something weird was up when the foster sisters met up earlier, and she kind of wanted to know what. She hadn't had the time then, especially since dodging the Triads out of Shanghai then in a close port to that city ate up nearly two weeks and caused her to miss the circus in Singapore.

He probably knew that and was determined not to let her out of his sight. That, or he knew she was itching for a decently connected bar to drink half her weight in liquor within.

Sonya was knocked out of her thoughts when he wrapped both arms around her right leg, hugging it to his chest and batting big purple eyes up at her. "Sonyyaaa... please? For me? I won't bug you for anything else, I promise."

"I call bullshit." No, not even his wet-kitty pout was getting her to budge on this. "You will bug me exactly fifteen minutes later, about whatever shiny thing happened to cross your path."

"Totally true, yeah. Although in this case the shiny thing would probably be sun glinting off the water and you could just push me in." Her fellow Cloud agreed with a sage nod, then shook his head quickly and yanked up on her leg. "Not the point, stop distracting me. Please learn to surf with meee...?"

Getting fed up with the touching, the thief tugged her leg out of his hold. "Will I get the rest of the week to do what I want then?"

"...that's not fair." He pointed out after a beat, obviously trying to think of something to stall her on. "One day for six? And this day's half over."

"Take it or leave it."

Cherep scrambled upright, because he was taller than her and used that to imply he was being the bigger person. "Three and three?"

"Two." Sonya countered tiredly, for some reason being reminded of her haggling with Renato about how much she'd owe him for a favor outside of his specialty.

Not surprising that her brother was turning out to be the cheaper option.

"Today and tomorrow?"

The thief sighed heavily, because that would mean the rest of her time-off was going to be spent on a boat. "Fine."

"...what are you going to do, anyways?" He questioned after half-pulling her down to the end of the Juhu Beach where some enterprising local was set up to teach tourists how to surf. "There isn't really a whole lot of time you've got, so..."

"Checking up on Tatiana. And probably Lisa."

Her brother came to a sudden stop and peered over his rapidly tanning shoulder at her. "Oh... well, in that case, you can have tomorrow."

"My thanks." Sonya quipped at his back dryly. "That would mean I could possibly rustle up another day free."

"So I get three?" The insufferably cheerful ass commented, as if he won something. "Awesome."

She sighed and punched his back lightly, then swept around him and headed for the little shack he wanted them to take lessons at while he choked on his little chortle.
A slightly wind- and sun-burned thief departed the dockyard of Mafia Land in the late afternoon the day after, heading straight for the condo the Zolotov Thieves Clan maintained.

Tatiana probably had class or lessons right now in all things nurse or doctor like, so the younger would catch up with the elder sister later.

Lisa was very happy to see her, especially since a result of her Sun Flame therapy had just been discovered and she had yet to share it with anyone other than her nurses.

"What are you hoping for, a boy or girl?" Sonya asked as she sank into the couch next to the older woman.

She gave the younger thief a sly smile as she lowered the book she had been reading, and a few bats of her eyelashes as she set it aside. "I, my dear, am just too happy this can happen at all. I won't care, so long as he or she is healthy and has all the correct toes, fingers, and appendages."

Arseniy wasn't in. Apparently, he had been recalled a bit earlier in the week for something the clan needed from him, so it was just her and Tatiana living in this wing for right now. There were a couple vory hanging around, but they were either on vacation or working on something and had very little to do with another vor's woman or foster daughter.

Especially since they valued their lives. One didn't have to be an active Cloud Flame user to be territorial or possessive, and Arseniy was both in spades.

"Is Arseniy hoping for something specific then?"

Lisa shook her head. "Sweetie, we came to terms with my inability to bear children long before we took on foster children for the clan. The fact you found us a way is just..."

"It wasn't me." Protested the blonde hesitantly, wary about hormonal mood-swings and the like which she would probably be woefully ill-equipped to deal with. "I only thought about it because of Tatiana, and it was Bjorn that allowed me to find a fully-trained Sun user. He, badly, needed a checkup anyways."

"But," the older Russian tacked on the end with a smirk, "you did the leg-work. Tatiana probably could've found it had she gone through with becoming a nurse anyways, but only long after the risks would outweigh the reward. Little hint for you, Sonya. You are a smart girl and when you produce results like this? We will appreciate it and show that."

Huffing a little, the thief sulked in her spot.

She felt kind of strange accepting praise for things she really had little to nothing to do with, especially this Sun Flame thing. She couldn't even use her own Sun Flames, in her head Tatiana deserved more credit since the older girl was likely learning how to do it for anyone else back in Soviet Russia who wanted the same thing but suffered from a similar problem.

However, she knew she wasn't going to win that argument. She didn't know anyone that won arguments with Lisa.

"How is Tatiana doing in her... is she becoming a nurse or a doctor?"
"You can ask her when she gets home," her foster mother suggested, taking a backwards glance at the clock mounted on the wall behind her, "sometime soon. So far, as much as I know, she's decided to start as a nurse and expand from there."

"So far as you know?" Sonya repeated dubiously. "Why don't you know? You always know."

"While I am flattered in your faith of my all-knowing mother abilities," she teased gently with a grin, "you girls don't tell me, or even Arseniy, everything anymore. Like say... Cherep's rather unique little Flame type that just so happens to not be that unique to us, apparently."

"...to be frank, that was because I was..."

"A suspicious little girl?" She finished when the thief trailed off, sporting what had to be a magnificent blush on her face from the feel of it. The older woman's grin turned into a wry smirk, and she patted the younger one on the knee. "I understand why you did it, you were protecting him the best you could from something that had once already hurt him. But you could've told us, Sonya. We wouldn't have let him be taken advantage of again if we had known."

"...more selfishly, I also didn't want to tear you two between what you should do and what the clan would've wanted. I didn't need to know that much about Flames back then, and what they could do, to understand how badly Cherep could've ended up if that got out."

The other Mafiya woman shook her head at her. "Not even then, sweetie. Arseniy would've murdered anyone that would have tried it. Even if they were our own, because then we wouldn't have wanted to be associated with them. Had that gotten out, it would've been sanctioned as well."

"Yes, well... I was a very messed up and confused little kid."

"More than that," she agreed with a sage nod, "you were so icy and quiet, at first we thought something really damaging happened to you before you found a way to us. You worried Arseniy quite a bit, you know."

That was so out of the blue of what Sonya had thought of her childhood, and out of character for the man she had thought her foster father as back then, that she stared at the brunette blankly for a long moment. "I did?"

"You did. Why do you think it took him only three years to find your biological father, when the man had successfully hid himself from slavers and the vor of Saratov when they were actively hunting for him, you, and his miserable whore of a wife? He only found the bitch's corpse halfway through that search, the vor of Saratov stopped looking when Arseniy swore to them you were with me."

She planted her burning red face in her hands, desperately resolving to smother that damnable childhood crush of hers somehow. Maybe if she repeated 'foster father' in her head enough times it would go away?

Lisa laughing at her didn't help much. "Your sister will be home in a little bit, and I think I'm going to make something for us to eat while we catch up with another. It's nice to see you again too, Sonya."

"Alright..." Sonya was just going to sit there and nurse a blush until it died down to acceptable levels.

That was, after all, how Tatiana found her little sister when she got home for the night.
"Why a bar?" Tatiana asked dryly as she followed her little sister.

"Why not a bar?" Countered the thief, sniffing in mock irritation as she waved down the bartender.

The Sun user noted that her fellow Russian didn't even have to speak, she got a strange mix of vodka and what looked to be coffee cream over ice with little fuss.

"White Russian," the bartender announced with little fanfare, and was paid accordingly to the prices listed on the blackboard behind him.

Sonya was a drinker, who knew?

...who also could smoke like a proverbial chimney.

The prospective nurse sighed, rubbing at her forehead and taking a seat in an out of the way booth across from her little foster sister.

Why couldn't anyone realize their habits were unhealthy and do away with them?

Drinking she could understand, they had stressful lives in the underworld, but the smoking?

Her fellow thief was at least a very conscientious smoker, if you didn't smoke she wouldn't nearby unless you were outside. She also refrained from smoking in buildings on most occasions unless it was indicated that it was fine to do, because she knew not everyone was a smoker or alright with the habit.

It was still incredibly bad for a person, as recent investigations Mafia Land's hospital was finding out as well as contemporary and unaffiliated ones in Britain.

Sonya sat her half-drained glass of alcohol down and peered over to her through the gloom of dim-bar lighting. "How is Lisa doing, anyways? She seems fine... but I thought this therapy thing would take longer."

"It was supposed to, but the early pregnancy took us all by surprise." Tatiana admitted, feeling rather grateful that at least someone else in the family understood that it was going to be risky. "Lisa won't hear of maybe terminating this one until she's in a better condition for childbearing."

"That's entirely understandable, given how unlikely she thought it would ever happen."

"That doesn't mean I don't worry."

The blonde snorted at her. "Of course not. But given her stubbornness, we'd probably make better use of our time planning for the worst and hoping for the best."

'Pot, meet kettle,' Thought the former safecracker wryly, examining her younger sister's almost grown features and committing the changes to memory.

Coming from someone that started her career at age nine just so she could decide what to do on a day-to-day basis, it sounded a little hypocritical.

Growing up as the older sister of a little criminal genius like Sonya had made Tatiana rather insecure sometimes. Which was stupid, because she was sure the Storm-Cloud didn't realize she had cast that shadow over the Sun.

Nor what that would eventually mean for Tatiana herself.

She had felt inadequate often through their childhood, especially in lessons where her frightening maturity paid dividends in. Sonya applied herself faithfully to the lessons and skills taught to them for self-defense and combat, she preferred the dance lessons.

The blonde could crack a lock with picks in half the time it took her older sister, could pickpocket anyone that passed her, and kept herself out of trouble all at the same time. Said older sister got herself arrested taking a stupid dare from another girl in their neighborhood.

The Sun user's few areas where she could outshine the Storm-Cloud in had only soothed the hurt, not fixed it. History, safe cracking, and social settings. Things the other girl probably could do without rather happily.

Then Cherep happened.

Tatiana honestly owed her current relationship with that ever so icy and intimidating little foster sister to their foster brother. He highlighted a crack in that off-putting little girl, showing that Sonya wasn't quite so icy or cold.

Just uncertain, a bit lonely, and socially retarded.

The thought made the older Russian crack a helpless grin, because it was funny.

The younger woman had the skills, the maturity, a drive she didn't... but she also could not make a friend the normal way to save her life.

Poor, poor Cherep. He suffered the worst of that inability. Did a damn miracle with it, but still...

"What the hell is so funny?"

"Cherep. Aside him? Just a thought." Tatiana mustered a, probably shoddy, wry grin for her foster sister. Who was peering at her again, this time out of sheer confusion.

Probably caught the lie but couldn't understand why she was lying to her face.

Alas, their brother wasn't a miracle worker for all he pulled a minor one off once before. "Aside plans of depressing nature, what is up little sister?"

"I learned to surf yesterday." Sonya's expression said exactly what she thought of that, and it was enough out of the blue that Tatiana assumed surfing was their foster brother's suggestion for a hobby. "Besides, that? You said, when I was between China and Singapore, that something strange was going on."

"Yeah... I think I'm being stalked." The Sun Flame user admitted slowly, because even if she was sure there was someone following her this was still a relatively small island. It might've just been a coincidence.

Even after being informed of that, the Storm-Cloud looked dubious over any such coincidences.

"There... was... a group actively hunting Flame users. Even here. You've made no bones about being such a thing, and the Zolotovs' aren't... known to be combat orientated."

"You mean because we specialize in stealing things, not piking our enemies on stakes outside our gates." She had run into that a couple times so far.

It was as prevalent as sexism in the mafia, somehow killers and men were more respectable than thieves or women no matter how you looked at it.

Her baby sister opened her mouth, blinked and jerked her head to the side, then sighed as she shut it without saying what she had been about to say. Instead, she jerked her thumb at a man with dark spikey hair who was rather casually sauntering up to the sisters. "This, Tatiana, is Renato Sinclair. You find out who's stalking you when Arseniy or I'm not here, he might be convinced to take care of it."

Tatiana blinked at the sudden change in their conversation. The man she had pointed out almost jerked to a stop. "You know her?"

Sonya turned to look up at the lanky, sharply dressed hunk she had pointed out. "Renato, this is my foster sister. Primakova Tatiana."

"You have more siblings?" Sinclair asked dubiously while giving the redhead an appreciative look over but turning back to the blonde easily enough.

"Since when do you know Russian?" She asked instead of answering that rather personal question.

He flashed her a sly smirk. "Since around when you learned Italian."

Tatiana... was fascinated. Were they flirting?

It was horrible. She couldn't look away.

No, wait. Sinclair was flirting, Sonya was merely being difficult. It might just be how the man acted around women, but...

...her little sister didn't realize the man was flirting with her, however casual it was or was not.

You couldn't pay for entertainment like this. She dearly wished she had a camcorder.

CLXVII (Thursday the 22nd of June, 1967 continued. Mafia Land.)

"...another thing, it's a little creepy how you keep on finding me." Sonya continued to snipe at him, looking into the milky dregs of whatever she had been drinking. "Especially when I've not been on the island that long. Maybe an hour and a half, and you can track me down to a specific bar?"

Renato huffed at her admittedly valid complaints, snapping his fingers at the bartender to get them another round of drinks.

The redhead nurse seated across from the thief and the hitman, who he was very damn happy he hadn't gone with his first suspicion and just shot her, was still staring blankly at them.

Sisters, fuck.

That would explain why she trusted the other woman to pick up her mail.
At least he hadn't shot her sister. It would make it damn hard to get the blonde to trust him enough to go visit Shamal in Vongola territory if he had.

Thankfully he hadn't gone through with his latest idea either, to seduce the woman to figure out what she was doing with Sonya's mail. He'd staved off doing so because the thief managed a small visit that seemed just specifically to meet with the nurse earlier in the year.

That would've been... awkward.

He was sure he could've gotten around whatever reaction that would've caused, eventually, but women tended to be touchy about sharing men with their sisters. Unless it was their idea first.

"So... wait. This is that Renato Sinclair?" Spoke up the busty redhead after another long pause, finally actually blinking her baby blue eyes. "The one that's going to collaborate with me on the Sunny side of the research?"

...Sonya's sister was a Flame user as well. Renato wasn't sure why he was surprised.

Sun and Cloud, and the little thief still claimed that relationship being warmer than most others was an old wives' tale.

"That would be me, yes. I look forward to working with you, Miss Primakova." Purred her fellow Sun at her, but like always Sonya didn't even twitch and for some reason the nurse suddenly had a wicked grin.

"The pleasure is all mine, I assure you." It wasn't flirty, but it was still wicked, that grin. The woman turned it onto her little sister. "Sonya, forgive me for this."

Tatiana burst out laughing, almost slumping across the table while she did so.

Eying her shaking form, the younger Russian shrugged when Renato shot her a confused look. "I think she either might be coming down with something, or the strain of her studying is getting to her. It's the second time she's gone strange on me tonight."

"I heard the medic's course at the hospital was hellish." The hitman offered uncertainty.

It was the first time a woman had laughed after he flirted with her, and he found he didn't like the experience.

"S-speaking of..." Offered the nurse unsteadily, sliding herself out of her side of the booth. "I really should get back to that. Sonya, I'll see you later tonight. Sinclair, I've got the Sun's version of her research journal and you can find me at the hospital most days."

"Night Tatiana." The thief offered to her back, more interested in the refreshed drinks a server brought them.

Renato merely offered a nod to her, a little unsettled still.

"So, you told her about me, but didn't tell me about her?" It wasn't surprising, but it still had to be said.

She scoffed at him and his weak complaint. "I trust her more than I had you for the longest time. She knew I knew you not too long after I asked you about a little favor. To be honest, you two probably would've met this winter anyways. Especially since you seem to want to be let in on my research efforts."
It was a little strange to hear Sonya talk in her native Russian. It was faster than her English, and a lot less old-fashioned or proper. Sort of like suddenly hearing a queen swear like a sailor.

Interesting, but a little jarring at first.

"...someone is stalking my sister. A year ago, it was me. While I think you took care of whoever it was stalking me, can you look out for her?" She asked quietly, more to her drink than to him, when the woman in question she was concerned over was well out of the bar. "With the nurse courses, I'm not entirely sure if she can watch her own back and the security I'd trust to do it instead won't be staying for the entirety of her studies."

Well... Sonya's sister had a good eye. A few months of tailing someone would make them suspicious, if they were paying attention. The hitman nodded anyways, even if the culprit was himself.

It wouldn't hurt anything to agree, would make her think better of him, and since that was so... "Shamal wants you to visit."

The thief's lips twisted down, showing she didn't like the suggestion at all. "He can't come here?"

"I... would rather not, truthfully."

She sighed, accepting that as a reason easily enough. Shamal was Renato's little Mist ward, security was his to control.

"Maybe... sometime this winter. I can't stay long right now. I'm actually leaving tomorrow. And since we're probably spending Christmas here, but I've got a fair few major things to handle next year that can't wait any longer."

"Understandable." The fact that she was considering it at all was enough for now. "You know... Vongola hosts a ball on Christmas..."

"A ball." Sonya blinked as she repeated that, then shot him a rather acidic look that questioned his sanity. "A... Vongola Ball..."

"I am, unfortunately, forced to attend myself." Renato agreed sourly with the feelings she managed to press into her statements. "But then I could put you up in the guest quarters. Much nicer than any old hotel, and probably safer as well. A lot of people will be trying to kiss up to Timoteo Vongola, you could probably slip on through and see Shamal without much fuss to deal with."

She didn't look remotely sold on that idea. Skeptical, if he was pressed to be honest.

"...let me think about that one."

That was probably a no.

CLXVIII (Sunday the 2nd of July, 1967. Bombay, Maharashtra, Republic of India.)

Sonya didn't understand Lisa's smirking, or Tatiana's.

She was very confused when she left Mafia Land behind, wondering what the two of them were sharing behind her back that made them so amused.
She would've liked to know. Good news was always appreciated.

Cherep insisted they go surfing when she reached Bombay, and it was only the thief's long years training in ballet and a more recent grounding in circus acrobatics that allowed her not to embarrass him in front of the more skilled natives of India by wiping out frequently.

Surfing wasn't really her hobby. Her foster brother was, unfortunately for her, good with any kind of sport put in front of him. She would've liked that kind of skill, but frankly she preferred less risk to her off-time leisure pursuits.

There was more than enough risk as it was in her life.

The week of circus performances started out as last year's had, it was long hours in hot weather entertaining people who ran the gamut of happy to sourly begrudging to be there. Muggy beach weather this time, but the added water made it all seem worse somehow.

Sonya didn't really mind, she could care less what the crowd thought if they paid, which probably meant she was a bad showgirl. Maybe a good one.

She couldn't decide.

The problem with week-long showings of the Großes Volksfest came with a price the thief hadn't expected.

Cherep had an uncommonly good luck with his performances, as he had gone almost half a year without so much as a hiccup in his ever-developing stunt work. It stood to reason that when he pressed it for nearly an entire week, something finally went wrong.

She didn't hear the crash, but the screams caught her attention fast. She blessed the fact she was a roving draw girl for Crina and promptly abandoned her duties, bolting for the big-top.

The 'Great and Glorious Skull' had a show scheduled for that very moment, and she wasn't surprised his luck finally ran out.

It was... horrible, really. Aside the panic in the stands she ignored as useless to the situation, which the ring announcer was rather fruitlessly trying to quell with rapid reassurances in several dialects of the native language, his motorbike was lodged halfway into the front of the stands that were thankfully raised high enough to avoid getting someone else injured.

Her brother, or rather Skull, was laid out on the 'landing' side of the ramps set up. He also wasn't moving.

Sonya flatly ignored the closest thing the circus had to a medical professional, brushing him aside and crouching down next to her foster brother. His ring was still gleaming strangely, so she knew he was alright.

Or alive. Mostly alive.

...somewhat alive?

One of those.

Maybe if she repeated it enough to herself she would believe it more.

With a lack of things to do anything remotely helpful for this situation she instead straightened out his limbs, removed his helmet, and pressed a finger to his skull ring. Even if it scorched the pad of her index finger it was a sign that Skull's Flames were still working, and he was still alive.

After this, they were going to figure out exactly how one Flame user gave another a boost of Flames. If only to give her something to do instead of bear witness.

Fingers twitched under hers, and Sonya pinched the skin of his wrist harshly. "Get up. Now."

"...normally, one adds 'please' when asking for something." He cracked an eye open, and the thief rather blessed the fact the medic had left in a huff to fetch Master Liam and probably an actual doctor.

The stuntman's already purple eyes were effused with Cloud Flames. Which was creepy to look at, glowing purple eyes, until he blinked it away.

"...help me up?"

She wordlessly stood, pulling him up when he held up a hand.

Skull heaved himself up using her first as a lever then as a crutch, a hiss of pain escaping him when his ribs left the ground. The announcer seized on his 'recovery' quickly, and the panicking crowd finally calmed down now that they 'knew' they hadn't seen a man die in front of them.

Sonya felt a little cheap, or maybe used, standing next to the stuntman that could have died a little just now. The man in question waved a hand at the crowd to reinforce the idea he was fine and jostled her with his other arm that was thrown across her shoulders.

"I'm fine, Sonya. Perfectly fine. Calm down."

"Who said I am not?"

"Your eye coloring. Which is as purple as mine are." He informed her quietly, squeezing her in a sideways hug lightly. "Calm down before we have to have an awkward conversation with Master Liam about things of a fiery nature."

She just really wanted to murder whatever harmed her brother, which wasn't possible because Skull did it to himself. She couldn't even 'kill' his bike, it was likely not going to be removed from the stands in one piece as it was.

Frustrated, she instead jabbed him hard in the ribs then started pulling him away from all the damn eyes that paid to watch him cheat death.

Besides a painful sounding grunt, which she did regret drawing from him, the immortal stuntman didn't complain.

"You realize we may have to have a conversation of a fiery sort with Master Liam? They likely went to fetch you a doctor."

"Luckily, my talents don't actually spread to clearing up bruises instantly. There will be more than enough to explain a nasty tumble… just they won't be sore, and I won't have cuts or any reason for the blood."

Sonya opened her mouth to say 'good' but changed her mind before she could sound the first syllable. "Your bike is a loss."
"...yeah, I was afraid of that."

"...bloody nose to explain the blood?"

Skull peered down at her warily from the corner of his eye. "Why do I have the feeling you'll enjoy that?"

"...probably because I will."

CLXIX (Monday the 3rd of July, 1967. Bombay, Maharashtra, Republic of India.)

They did have to have an intensely uncomfortable conversation with Master Liam.

Uncomfortable in a different way than the thief had been counting on.

The doctor yanked from a nearby hospital scolded the unrepentant Sonya in heavily accented English for moving Skull after a 'nasty spill from a motorized bike', but since the stuntman wasn't showing any signs of broken bones or even a concussion he had to leave it at that.

The circus' medic, who she learned was named Vincent, got dismissed after marveling over the fact that a broken arm he knew her brother had wasn't there.

Master Liam turned a puzzled frown on the two of them. Broken arms that disappear in mere minutes, a fall from thirty feet at high speed that didn't kill young Cherep... I suppose there is a reasonable explanation for this, yes?

"Depends... on your definition of reasonable." The purple haired stuntman started sheepishly, glancing at the very silent thief sitting next to him. *I didn't know you had an estimated height for that."

Léonard is a good friend of mine, I have not known him to make mistakes in all the years he has worked for me. He knows the height of the ramps you use, as well as the height of the stand's lower railing. The circus master informed them both easily enough, naming the announcer Sonya knew he substituted for when the man became sick or his voice became hoarse. He was sure you were dead, or at least grievously injured; ½ and yet, here you are. Marked, but not broken. Unlike your charming motorcycle, which I am informed is very badly mangled.

"About that..." Cherep started uneasily, scratching at the side of his jawline where purple stubble was starting to grow in. *I suppose you could say... I'm what one would call a... bit... gifted."

*A great gift indeed... for physical harm to not touch you."

One thing, Master Liam. She finally interjected, slowly rising to her full height. She had been sitting on her brother's cot, but now moved herself so she was between the circus master and him. *Cherep may be immune to physical damage... but you are not."

A flash of lavender fire, and then Liam had to tilt his head back in order not to stick himself on the pick end of her Bec de Corbin.

*Any harm comes to him due to you, and you will wish for a death he cannot sustain."

The older man, strangely enough, smiled warmly at her. So, I was right. You are here to protect... your brother in more ways than one. I admire that, you know."

Sonya blinked at him blankly, a bit more than just bemused. What part of her threatening him did he miss?

"Err... Sonya? You... uh, should probably put that away." Cherep tugged on the end of the staff part of her weapon, flicking his eyes warily around to the canvas walls they were hidden behind.

"Little sister Sonya, you need not fear I will lead your brother astray." Nodding grandly when she did finally take the sharp end of her weapon away from his neck, their circus master glanced between them considering first the still armed thief then the stuntman. "But I take it from that little comment of yours that you will not be staying to ensure it yourself."

"...I cannot." She confirmed shortly, still highly suspicious of his behavior and lack of reaction."I have, in the process of certain things, made myself too noticeable to be easily hid or ignored. Cherep may be able to remain free, but as for myself..."

"I am a thespian, my dear. You need not say more, for the unspoken sometimes is louder than what we say. Which is why I was not worried when you held something sharp and pointed at my throat, you see. Your body language said you did not wish to actually harm me." Liam confided to her cheerfully, then looked at his functionally immortal stuntman. "As for you, young Cherep? I am greatly relieved we will never have to arrange your funeral. A bit of warning would not have been amiss, but I was certain that your sister wasn't the only one hiding strange and unusual talents. Even before China, if I must be honest."

"You are taking this... surprisingly well."

His cheerful mien gained a bit of a mischievous edge to it after Cherep's comment. "Unlike what most of the... I suppose we shall call it the world under, seems to believe... the stage was the first place unique and breathtaking skills of wonder and talent first appeared. Rather Misty such things were back in the day, I am lead to believe."

Sonya blinked at him, then at her foster brother. Who looked to be trying hard not to laugh.

Fucking Mists. Dramatic, flighty, aggravating, annoying Mists.

She let her Bec de Corbin's Propagation go, palming her face instead.

...how far back would she have to look to find wildly popular 'illusionist' stage magicians? Mystics with surprising skills in strange fire arts?

Damn it all to hell, wasn't one of the future Arcobaleno something along those lines?

The Mist one?

She really should've seen that one coming.

"How long can you stay with us, little sister?"

"...until the end of fall."

Liam nodded thoughtfully. "And... when were you going to inform us we needed to replace you?"

"...this fall."
The man's smile was wry that time. "I see. I am sure I have taken up more than enough of your time. Miraculous escape of injuries or not, I am sure at least one of you is tired."

"Well..." Cherep offered when the circus master swept out after a courtly little bow. "That was... interesting."

"Suspicious."

"Interesting." He corrected with a measure of asperity, slumping back onto his cot. "You need to get out of that world more often, Sonya. You're always so mistrustful of everything when you spent too much time in it."

"...I would rather my suspicions be unneeded than need suspicion but not apply it." She informed him quietly, playing absently with the slowly shrinking polearm and prying out the cracking spinel gemstone. "Also... he knew."

"Yeah."

"I…. do not know if you can tell him more or not. I would like to check on that before you do so."

Her still alive, it's fine brother yawned heavily and stretched out on the medical cot. "...sure."

She quietly tried not to panic.

CLXX (Friday the 7th of July, 1967. Dammam, Eastern Province, Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.)

Dammam, Saudi Arabia, was exactly as hot and dry as Sonya had assumed it would be.

She wanted to know who it was that suggested this route to Master Liam, then punch them in the face a few times. She was from the icy north, the desert wasn't for the likes of her.

"So... were you ever going to tell me you weren't staying?" Crina asked, her voice as dry as the desert stretching before the circus' intended route.

"Aw, Crina. Don't tell me you're going to miss me." The thief dropped the chest of random 'mystic' things the old gypsy used to tell fortunes next to her, then wiped the sweat off her forehead under her head-scarf thing.

The one thing she did not like about the Middle East was the clothing.

Abaya cloaks were black, and she wanted to know why they had to be. It was a hellish color for a desert people to wear.

Yellow would've worked for her, hell even Cherep's favorite color purple if it was light enough.

The Groβes Volksfest couldn't open when nearly half its troupe weren't allowed to do away with the covering clothing all women had to wear while in the country. They also couldn't pretend all those women were men instead, which was something someone suggested, because those women did not have the contours to suggest so.

Meaning this would be a two-day long trip to Egypt instead.

Thankfully it would be on a train at least as far as Riyadh, the capital of Saudi Arabia, but then they would have to hire trucks to get them to Jeddah. A day on a boat to cross the Red Sea, and then they'd be in Egypt. Faris' home country. Jaq was a little sad they weren't going to go south enough to reach his this time around, but with how much she had risked heat stroke so far she couldn't really say the same.

After Egypt it would be Greece, and after a month or so spent there... Italy.

Which, Sonya wasn't looking forward to.

The thief hadn't investigated India's underworld, and she wasn't going to even try to peek at Saudi Arabia's. This country was harsh enough on their women she just didn't feel comfortable trying while she was with such a large target. Greece maybe, but then Italy's underworld may end up being even worse than anything Saudi Arabia could have.

...maybe it had settled down a little?

She couldn't really risk pissing off Vongola as she probably had the Chinese Triads. Renato knew not only her foster siblings, but he had a fairly good idea of where and when she usually was around certain places.

While she would not bet on either, the hitman or Arseniy, she was still pretty sure she wouldn't like the result of any kind of fight between the two of them.

Blinking, the thief looked back at the old gypsy woman when the silence stretched a bit too long.

"I'll miss your alcohol, not that you had much this time around." Crina offered after another long moment, managing to sound sincere.

It probably had to do with the fact they couldn't see the other's face, so if there was smirking or strange faces being pulled neither could tell.

"I'll probably stock up once we hit Cairo, and you can probably spend the last half of the year soured out of your mind on wine." Sonya admitted candidly. "So how about now that you know that?"

"I really will miss you, girl. Best apprentice I ever had."

"...that you never had."

"True enough." The old woman gave an exaggerated shrug and nod, so the motion was clearly understandable. "But with me, you were mostly out of the way and fairly self-sufficient. You two turned out a lot better than anyone else Master Liam ever took a risk on."

She turned sharply to look hard at her, who waved a robed arm rather gracefully even under the hot body-cloak that got in the way a lot. "Don't be so jumpy. You knew, didn't you?"

"I had wondered why Jaq was so friendly to someone he could barely string a sentence together to talk to, yes."

"And now you're leaving your dratted, overly cheerful brother to us twisted carnie types, how do you feel about that?"

"...a lot better about it, actually."

Her master of all things mystical paused in moving another load of things she generally used for 'creating ambience' and looked up at the thief. "You sure you can't stay? I think we might actually end up getting along one of these days."

"Be still my beating heart." Sonya muttered dryly, snagging the crate of silks and crystals the gypsy was paused over when she barked a laugh. "I am sure. If I didn't, things like China would start to happen more and more often. You all will have enough trouble just with Cherep."

"The more I hear about whatever it is you two of you share, the more I dislike it. What the hell is it about the two of you snot-nosed little brats that is so damn important?"

"Crina, you saw me carve your name into a rock with a fragile bit of crystal. You know full well what it is that Cherep cheated himself out of. Now think of what not-entirely-legal people could do with abilities like that."

The old woman paused, pressing a hand to her back and stretching out her spine as she stared up at the blue sky above them. "...if you need a few months, you've got a spot with me open for however long I last."

"I'm sure you'll be annoying anyone around you with your alcoholism and cryptic bullshit for years yet, you old bat."

She... would probably take her up on that. Sometime in the future.
CLXXI (Thursday the 13th of July, 1967. Qena, Arab Republic of Egypt.)

Faris was happy to be mostly 'home'.

Nearly everyone else?

Not so much 'happy' as 'disgruntled and overheated'.

Being a traveling circus based mainly out of Soviet Russia meant they did avoid some of the strident anti-western discrimination abounding around these lands, but the communist aspect of the operation earned them a very stern look over on their way into the region anyways.

The southern portion of the United Arab Republic, which she knew better as just Egypt, was another mostly-religiously mandated male dominated country. Since the major religion in the region was still Islam, it meant that half of the circus' troupe still needed the black over-robets that 'protected' or 'shielded' their femininity.

In the middle of a desert.

Sonya knew respecting the major religions in different parts of the world was something they had to do, but her tolerance for doing so was rapidly drying up. At least in Egypt it wasn't so uncommon for women to work, so the circus was still performing unlike the Saudi Arabian leg of their journey.

The trapeze artist were shouldering the bulk of the issues, especially since they couldn't wear Abaya while performing in mid-air. Instead, they had to wear wrist-to-ankle clothing and head wraps that didn't flatter their figures unlike how they normally dressed for such acts.

Again, dark or layered clothing in a north Sahara Desert region meant the circus was still shelling out a phenomenal amount of money for water alone.

Once they hit the Nile region, since they would be traveling up it downstream to Cairo, that dress code relaxed a small bit. One of the rare few things she would thank insensitive tourists for.

Crina got them both pass the worst issues by breaking out the bulk of her cotton or silk patterned scarves, which they could drape around themselves in a similar fashion of the Abaya cloaks. Her light-fingered apprentice greatly appreciated it, because the old bat's predominantly brightly colored swaths of cloth shed heat instead of retained it.

For herself, despite the issues she had needing someone male with her in most of any social situation, Sonya was more interested in yet another culture that had a more 'dominant' underworld just under the surface.

Unlike India, where at most she caught a glimpse or two but had to leave them alone, she could spot the occasional thief or... someone that reminded her of her native country's vor in most crowds. She was also pretty sure the port of Marsa Alam, where the Großes Volksfest entered the country, had at least three black markets the circus passed by getting out of the city.

The apparent 'hot' items of them?

Ancient Egyptian artifacts. From sandstone tablets inscribed with hieroglyphs to small jade-inlaid scarab beetle charms, elaborate canopic jars to papyrus scrolls.
Of which, Sonya was at least somewhat sure at least half or more were fakes. She dealt with them once and had a very interesting time waiting for the artifacts she stole to be confirmed as the real deal instead of cheap reproductions. How long it took to be verified as genuine also suggested that either the field was too unknown or swamped for many experts to be ‘corrupted’ and trusted with hot items.

That raised an interesting detail to muse on. How much did the underworld of Egypt appreciate, or not as the case might be, the fact their history was becoming such a major ‘trade’?

They had to know, seeing as in the forty years since the Pharaoh Tutankhamun's tomb had been found there had been a score or more different 'archeological digs' that peppered their sandy countryside. The Soviet Storm-Cloud had dealt with some ancient Egyptian items in her sporadic thieving, meaning they were likely still sought after.

As for right now, most archaeologists were little more than tomb raiders. Very little respect was being paid to the dead, most if not all 'treasure' found went to either paying their bills or sent back to various museums, and they all had wildly different methods to document their digs.

There was a change being trumpeted, but it was still something 'in-progress' with a fair few detractors to such a thing.

Unfortunately, Sonya didn't have the freedom to figure it out now since while the circus had been in Bombay the Six Day, Third Arab-Israeli War, had been going on.

Which... she hadn't really recalled if it happened in Rachel's life.

It might have, but Sonya hadn't known it was coming. She did recall that before America got into the Middle East there was large amount of 'conflict', and if this was that then conflict was a rather unassuming term for the difficulty.

Given the already beleaguered Jewish persecution happening while the Großes Volksfest made its way farther and farther into the country, it wasn't so much conflict as it was on-going open hostility.

She hadn't really had an opinion of the Jewish people and what they were doing ever since the Second World War, she had winced over the greater European death toll that happened due to Hitler's assassination but didn't follow that thought through to a very hostile or aggravated Jewish community.

Which was, apparently, turning on themselves somewhat.

The mess of reports on the Egyptian side of the conflict was mostly biased and slanted on the topic of the 'surprise and unwarranted attack', which was par for the course. Given that United Arab Republic had lost territory to that surprise attack, the Syrian Arab Republic and Jordan losing just as much, it meant there was a fair amount of backlash against the native Jewish groups.

Rather, the native Jewish locals that hadn't for whatever reason pulled up their roots and fled to Israel to begin with.

There was still a very large number of them, in fact the rash of counter-conflict arrests were starting to creep up to half a thousand in number. It would probably get worse before it got better, but for the time being it was still in the 'worst' end of that.

It did mean that a circus troupe going through the region was a semi-favorable distraction, if rather heavily scrutinized for any positive Jewish sentiments or communist propaganda.
Which the thief did wonder about, now that she knew the people she was working with rather well for mere acquaintances.

Sonya had thought Master Liam was German but given exactly how good of an actor she had recently found him to be... that could be entirely incorrect.

Given her coworkers rant the gamut of Romanian gypsies to African strongmen, Egyptian sword jugglers, Czechoslovakian stuntmen, and Chinese acrobats... it was entirely possible 'Liam' wasn't what he appeared to be.

CLXXII (Wednesday the 19th of July, 1967. Minya, Arab Republic of Egypt.)

Cherep had a habit of tasting the local cuisine as much as he could.

A habit which Sonya didn't entirely appreciate, to be honest. Especially when he dragged her into it.

The less 'exotic' dishes he wanted to at least taste she didn't mind trying, different meats were okay and sometimes strange combinations of foods turned out interesting, but she drew the line at truly strange food items.

Even as Rachel, she had never tried pickled pig's feet. Which was a southern United State delicacy she once had the option to taste. If she wasn't going there, she wasn't trying the rest of the stranger bits of cooked or not animals or delicacies available around the world.

There was the sheep's head in Norway, which she could've gone her whole life quite happily without knowing how that tasted, to the recent crocodile meat back in Edfu she didn't really mind all that much. Crina had happily informed her that the thief had missed out on the monkey brains and scorpion soup, which her brother had apparently tried just before the circus left China, and the dung beetles from when they got into India.

Sonya would try the maḥshi ḥamām, pigeon stuffed with wheat and spices, but he could keep the fried locust.

She was damn sure dying of food poisoning would be a fairly uncomfortable experience for her fellow Cloud, especially since she wasn't even sure if that would be nixed by his Cloud Flame fueled immunity to death.

Given Cherep's rather bitter, twisted smirk when she mentioned the possibility?

He probably knew he was at least mostly safe from ingesting anything unusual... or at least would survive it.

How he knew that was another thing she didn't dwell on. Renato still had to get back to her about if or if not that once-partial controlling Mafia Land group had operations in Czechoslovakia or not.

That didn't mean Sonya was at all sure of her ability to mimic his immunity at all, especially since she hadn't had the time to suffer a major break and then try Propagating an internal fix.

The stuntman had a comparable difficulty in learning her ability, while he could use her 'super strength' with enough concentration it left him with odd bruises on his hands she never got. Of course, with his immunity to physical damage, he never really kept said 'bruises' for very long, but it was something they both noted.
She had never bruised herself with her ability. She'd sprained an uncountable number of wrists and suffered cuts when whatever she was doing shattered on her but hadn't noticed any bruising.

Since her being able to use his ability was rather iffy, she wouldn't be trying fried dormouse meat patty-thing either.

She wasn't even sure where he got that.

"Street vendor, about two turns down that-a-way," Cherep even helpfully pointed out where with his skewer of bugs, "he said it was something the old Romans ate once."

"Yeah... you got food from a back-alley vendor and did not even question why he was being 'frank' about what his food was made from?" Sonya picked another bit of shredded pigeon and a forkful of stuffing to eat, eyeing his meal of mouse and bugs before trying to maneuver it under her face veil. "Still not touching it."

"It's not bad. Kind of crunchy."

"I wasn't talking about the bugs."

Her brother inspected his shish kebab of insects thoughtfully. "What's the difference between this and sea-bugs like crab?"

"With sea-bugs, they are large enough we can at least clean them before eating." She eyed the same thing he was examining. "With those? You are not only eating them, but what they have eaten recently, whatever else is included in their biology, and what waste it did not manage to rid itself of before getting skewered."

"...thank you so much for that lovely thought."

"You are welcome."

The purple stuntman kept eyeing his food, but eventually shrugged and popped a few more of the bugs into his mouth. Then he eyed the fried mystery-meat in pita bread while he chewed.

Crunched, actually. Lisa would be appalled to be able to hear him eat.

"What are you going to do about your motorcycle, Cherep?"

The question distracted him from his 'fried dormouse', which she really didn't want to see him try.

"Master Liam said that even if I could replace it right away, I wasn't doing any stunts for another month or so." He shrugged that off, only a slight frown suggesting he wasn't happy with that. "For the 'illusion' of recovering from any possible injuries I might have gotten. Going straight back to trick driving after even a 'nasty spill' would've been... not so smart."

That was surprisingly conservative of Liam, given the fact he knew full well the stuntman didn't need any such thing. Cherep had defaulted back to a mechanic for this 'recovery' period, but Sonya had only assumed it was because he had yet to replace the bike he used.

"So, in Greece or Italy I'll have to start looking to replace my poor motorbike."

"Do you have enough for that?" She was honestly curious, because as members of a communist circus they weren't paid a whole lot.

Most of the money generated was put into the circus itself, which was home for a lot of the members and took care of the living costs for most if not all the performers. There was an allowance given out, especially when passing through capitalist dominated countries, but it wasn't all that much.

"Eh... so long as I buy something second-hand, sure. There's also the scrap metal they got out of my bike before they junked it, which was a neat and tidy sum for the steel and iron that went into it." Her fellow Cloud suddenly blinked at his hands, which now clutched her half-finished pita sandwich of pigeon with stuffing and not his mouse meat patty.

Sonya discreetly tipped the mystery meat into the gutter she was sitting next to, put away her fork for the times she didn't want to mess around with local methods when trying to eat something, and blinked innocently at her foster brother when the silence stretched on long enough. "What?"

He looked at her, skeptically inspected the food now in his hands, and shrugged then took a bite. "You sure you don't want some bugs?"

"I... will be fine, thank you."

CLXXIII (Friday the 28th of July, 1967. Cairo, Arab Republic of Egypt.)

Cairo was a lot different than most of the Middle East the Groβes Volksfest had gone through so far.

Part of it was the fact that most of the cities on the Nile were mostly textile manufactory orientated or food shipping ports, another was the fact that most casual travelers didn't explore much of the Nile River past Cairo.

Another part of it might have been the fact that until recently it had been under British rule, which meant they still had a few British laws on the books.

The Nile River Delta also held a vastly different ecology than just the river's banks had proven to hold, because the desert didn't start a mile or two away and made everything still scorching hot and dry.

Mostly, it was because the women of the circus were no longer required to wear the hot, full body concealing Abaya cloaks. There was a cheer that went up when Master Liam announced they could finally do without them.

They couldn't strip down to the bare basics, as a lot of the girls were itching to do, but they didn't need to conceal everything anymore. Cairo was more tolerant, or more immune, to women not following the Muslim requirements of concealing themselves than most of the country.

It wasn't exactly a wise thing to do, but an allowed one. When leaving the fairgrounds that the circus set up on it was still recommended to be fully covered but wasn't required.

More than the dress restrictions being lifted, Sonya was concerned by the reports of what the United Arab Republic was claiming was the reason for the previous month's' small-scaled warfare.

Namely, that they had received faulty intelligence from the Soviet Union that Israel was mustering up for an attack on their country. Which seemed to be correct from their standpoint, but it was starting to become apparent it was the Egyptian movement to militarize Sinai in response to that information that started the conflict.

That meant those that had a nationality like Sonya's or even a traveling Russian circus like the Großes Volksfest were not very popular now in Egypt's capital city. It was going to take a bite out of the running costs of the circus, and she was rather sure Master Liam would have to dip into emergency funds to get them out of the country in as little as half a month from now.

It was also the point the Russian finally got into contact with the local underground. She found the underworld pretty much matched the civilian side, if only different in the shades of legal it had to it. There was massive black-market trading, not so much smuggling going on unless whatever was destined for the more interior African countries, the expected but rampant petty crime, and a whole lot of fraud and counterfeiting going on.

Tax evasion and money laundering was apparently another popular side-job for the local underground, she got several offers to help her do it before her first night of bar hopping was done with.

Human trafficking was still a bit of a problem, but then again Saudi Arabia's civilian government only just this last decade did away with the practice of owning slaves entirely. Sonya wasn't sure if that was the remnants of the previous 'legal' routes still trying to gasp out a last breath or two or not, but she didn't really care to find out either.

Again, drawing that kind of attention to the circus she would be leaving her foster brother in the care of was not a great idea. If she took a hard look at what the hell they were doing, attracting attention might end up as the least of her worries.

Instead of possibly getting herself into a fair bit of hot water, the Soviet Storm-Cloud took up Jaq's offer of barhopping with him. Which turned out to be a semi-hidden request to be taught how to move through underworld hotspots and mafia bars, something she wouldn't have minded teaching the ebony-skinned strongman.

He had been a semi-decent friend to her, in a way. Initial inability to properly communicate or not for most of their time as acquaintances.

Sonya wasn't sure if it was her mafia connections that let her brush the implied 'babysitter' insult of his friendship off or if she really did just appreciate the fact that Master Liam had someone watched who he really should have not trusted in the least. Even if it was herself, that kind of caution was something she could appreciate.

The fact that the 'someone' set to watch her had been Jaq wasn't the strongman's fault... but not the reason she turned down the possibility of teaching the man to gather the information she could.

After all, the thief still had to respect Omertà. As much as the idea appealed to her, and it did if only because this was Cherep's childhood dream she had inadvertently set him upon so Jaq being able to gather up mafia gossip and news would help safeguard that, she couldn't afford to do so.

There might be a few questions she would've liked to ask a Vindice officer, but only if she wasn't the one getting arrested at the time.

The only way that would work was if the African native took up the Vow of Silence himself, and he wouldn't if only because he would likely report everything he heard to Liam. Who was another that Sonya was sure would not be taking a Vow of his own.

She paused as something new occurred to her, a shot glass of vodka halfway to her lips even as Jaq ordered them a new bottle.

...did Cherep ever take that Vow himself?
The thief took hers at nine, Tatiana at twelve... but she couldn't recall if he had.

---

CLXXIV (Thursday the 3rd of August, 1967. Cargo ship hold, Mediterranean Sea.)

"Was I supposed to?" Cherep scratched at his shaggy purple hair, which was turning a bit on the lavender side in response to the several months spent in the middle of a desert region. "I didn't, Arseniy asked if I wanted to, but I said no at the time."

Well... Sonya really, really hoped that Dying Will Flames and everything about them weren't protected by Omertà.

If it was, then she had violated the fuck out of it already telling her brother the bulk of what she knew.

"Sonya?" He prompted cautiously while she adjusted to that fact. "Is it that much of a deal?"

"I... do not know. Yet." It could be, but it could also be a bit of a loophole. If the thief couldn't teach Jaq how to pick up underworld news, she might just be able to teach her brother how to do it. "I think you might be covered by me... or Lisa and Arseniy's vows, so try not to screw us over for the time being until I can sort that out."

Her fellow Cloud made a face at her as he tapped a random rhythm out on the brick wall he was leaning against. "I'll be sure to try. Not too, that is."

Crossing the Mediterranean Sea had not taken them very long, it was just loading and off-loading that took up the bulk of any transit time.

Master Liam had even hired several locals from Alexandria's dockside to hasten the unloading once they reached Athens, Greece.

That smacked of several shades of suspicious, because that was a first as far as the thief was aware. She was also pretty sure that while the women did make up almost half of the circus' troupe, there hadn't been nearly as many of them when the circus entered Egypt. Even if she could not, for the sake of her own life, put more than a handful of names to certain faces.

Also... Sonya was supposed to be the youngest performer in the Großes Volksfest. Who's not-entirely-accurate paperwork claimed seventeen as her age when in fact she only 'officially' had sixteen years in this body. The little kids you could glimpse now and again if you looked hard enough weren't there when the thief boarded the boat.

So... Jewish refugees, more than likely.

It was a very neat little operation. While said 'dockworkers' were a bit nervous, that could be anything from leaving the United Arab Republic to being this far out to sea for the first time. The older women of the circus had 'congealed' around the newcomers and were perhaps chatting a bit too casually with each other.

However, it was the younger children that had been the likeliest to blow that cover operation sky high.

Admittedly, they were anywhere from baby to pre-teen in age. Holding still and quiet for the length of the ferry trip between the ports of Alexandria and Athens was probably an unheard of feat of impossibility for them.

Which was why, when Sonya pointed it out to Cherep, he got them a lower deck for the kids to play on for most of the trip with only a bit of sneaking needed.

Obviously, a mechanic of the circus they were attached to would need to check over said mechanical equipment. If he asked the ferry workers not to bother him unless the boat was sinking it was more so he didn't surprise himself and slam a head into metal or lose his grip on expensive, heavy, and irreplaceable equipment parts when he was already occupied compensating for the ship's rocking movements.

Not for a group of fifteen kids to play or just be without having to worry about getting caught.

For the thief herself, she just wanted to know why she had to be there too. It had been sweltering hot below deck, not that it had been any better on the main deck but at least there had been a breeze up there.

Also... she didn't really like kids. Hadn't even appreciated being one herself, even the first time through.

Shamal was only an exception because he had been a traumatized baby Mist, who was not anywhere near 'alright' or 'okay' after losing his likely only parental figure and getting stuck under Renato's probably intimidating eye.

Usov had been panicky baby Mist, but he didn't bother her nearly as much as this nor did he make her want to be as careful as she had been with Shamal.

Sonya could deal with a lone little tyke with some difficulty over their need for touching, nearly a baker's dozen of brats in a comparable age range all at the same time made her... testy.

The Cloud siblings had also given up their meager shipboard fair for these kids too, which didn't improve her outlook on anything.

Now that the trip was over with, and they were a few hours from not having to deal with it anymore, she was slowly getting back to 'not-pissed-off'.

The only bit she wished to quibble with now was that she got to play 'swooning maiden'.

Since spending several months in what was literally a desert region, and to explain why some members of the circus troupe weren't involved in unloading that certain people had been hired to do, some of the Groβes Volksfest members were playing lame or frail roles. Sonya, as the youngest but more importantly a slim young female performer, was recovering from the 'vapors' brought on by trying to keep up with her older brother's antics.

It was loudly proclaimed she had heat exhaustion and was now 'recovering her breath'. The kids behind her were sheltered by both her and Cherep taking up the obvious reason why an alleyway was partially blocked off.

Crina was at least equally pissed off as her apprentice, for the moment she was 'too frail' to handle transporting her own damn tent or equipment to the waiting trucks. She was getting her revenge for the indignity by loud and caustic corrections of how her things were getting handled.

It had the happy side effect of distracting the port authorities and making them pity the 'workers' hired out to help the old crotchety woman.
Greece, with a whole lot of islands and the bulk of its landmass farther north than where the Groβes Volksfest had landed to offload their unusual cargo, was another of the countries that would not take them very long to work through due to excessively turbulent political climates. They would be crossing the peninsula of Greece, not island hopping, to reach the shores they could catch a rather cheap fare to Italy from before leaving nearly immediately.

Much to Sonya's dissatisfaction, because she rather liked this country now that she took a look around. Military coup being awkwardly cemented in place or not.

It wasn't just that Greece was a sea away from the desert that made the thief sad they wouldn't be staying long, it was the underworld hangouts. Which was so easy to slip into it was almost jarring.

Better than Norway's little bars, or even France's still recovering cafés, Greece had mafia nightclubs. Which needed to be said again, mafia owned and ran bars and clubs. Where a Russian thief didn't stick out like a sore thumb, because she was no longer the only Russian there.

Sonya kind of wanted to retire to Greece, maybe. If she lived that long.

It was practically warm all year, there were an unnumbered amount of little private beaches and islands dotting the seas around the country, and the nightlife was almost to die for.

After growing up in Saratov and Moscow, in Soviet Russia's icy near-arctic tundra climate, she really wanted a more temperate place to set down 'roots' when she got around to it.

She could've done without the current uproar in the underworld, but she supposed she should pay it some attention anyways.

Especially since some Turkish and Albanian mafia groups were trying to work out some kind of deal with the major Greek 'Godfathers of the Night' to allow their human trafficking rings to go through their territory. The mere fact they were trying to had the faction of Russian Mafiya in Greece up in arms, but it didn't look as if that would be enough to prevent any kind of arrangement from happening.

Russians and Russian policies weren't popular in this corner of the globe. Business dominated Cold War or not, the trouble in Vietnam was still going on and both the United States and the Soviet Union were not making very many friends funding and supplying troops for that conflict.

Especially since the general outlook of most news agencies Sonya had taken a look at seemed to imply that no one but either superpower was happy to hear of any more conflicts after WWII.

Merely the fact her countrymen were trying to prevent Turkish slavery rings from getting a foothold in Greece likely just made it more palatable to the Greeks' native mafia syndicates.

Being able to understand that didn't make the Russian thief any happier to hear about it, or to ponder what would likely happen if the Turkish underground managed to barter out a foothold in the Greek islands from the natives.

If it happened, she might not really want to retire to a private island around the Mediterranean.

There would be no telling what kind of neighbors she might end up having, and she had gotten way too close to Turkish slavers for her own liking already once before.

A second encounter might not work out for her in the same way again.

"Μην κοιτάς ξινή, μικρό λουλούδι?"

"I do not speak Greek, sir." Sonya informed the bartender flatly in Italian, eyeing the drink he placed in front of her that she didn't order suspiciously.

"Italia's native tongue is close enough." He informed her with a slick smile that didn't reach his eyes. "But I said not to look so sour, little flower. We are here to enjoy ourselves, are we not?"

"Not." The thief informed him repressively. Renato had better lines than him, and she had been hearing him flirt at everything in a skirt since she was twelve. "I am here for the news around the region."

"Oh, indeed? Do you have an opinion you would like heard as well?" The smile dropped as if it had never been there and his tone was a touch acrid, probably already knowing her views on what kind of bed his homeland was about to make just by taking a random stab for her nationality.

"I have no opinion on those that deal with slavery. I merely think they deserve to be dead." Sonya pushed the untouched drink back across the bar, so the man could try selling it to someone else. "Is there any other reason you are bothering me?"

"You are very opinionated for someone that claims to have none on the subject."

"And when you are in chains, waiting for your so called 'master' to decide what he's going to do with you, you may end up sharing the same opinion as myself." She batted her lashes a few times, sliding off the stool she had been sitting on. "Now... I think I shall see if another club has less pushy bartenders. Or at least someplace else that will be less likely for me to wake up as the property of another if I happen to accept the wrong drink."

The man shrugged that off with the air of 'your loss', which she didn't buy into for a moment.

Frankly, if she wanted to listen to someone flirt she'd just go bar hopping with Renato. At least the hitman had a better understanding of when not to flirt and knew how to keep from insulting the women he was trying to chat up at the same time.

CLXXVI (Saturday the 12th of August, 1967. Former Headquarters of the Campo Famiglia, San Giovanni in Fiore, Italian Republic.)

For all that the previous and unlamented Don De Campo tried to ruin just about everything he had spent the bulk of his life building up, Renato managed to salvage a fair bit of it.

Not just the physical manor or the grounds around it, those had been pretty much unspoiled before a hitman with a grudge paid a visit and shot a couple things up. The nearby township San Giovanni in Fiore, a province of Cosenza, had needed a fair bit of personnel to keep vultures out of the normal day-to-day operations of both the civilian and mafia sides.

With what Mafiosi were left in the nearly murdered to a man famiglia, he had been lucky to keep hold of just the town for a couple months.
Scouring said township for semi-decent individuals and turning them into Mafiosi the hitman could trust with more than a single sheet of blank paper, keeping said vultures out of the territory, and ensuring those who were left got up to no mischief?

All while Shamal was getting into things a young boy probably shouldn't have when his attention was split between more than just three or four issues.

Renato had been a very tired hitman by the time Sonya put aside a block of time to help him out a little, and the little thief probably hadn't caught on to how fatigued he had been while she had been working on the little baby Mist at his behest.

Now with the Mist brat safely ensconced in Vongola territory, and a bit more breathing room with their reputation tied however loosely to his own, the hitman had dragged this famiglia out of the dirt and hauled it back on track to being respectable and not just a loose collection of criminal types.

Figuring out what to do with it now that it was no longer a near-certainty some other famiglia would have to take over the territory this one should have been managing was another issue.

The Soft Sun Flame user could probably make a semi-respectable Don. He had practically done it already, he was the one calling the shots and managing the day to day paperwork with a dash of finance juggling while his little 'minions' scurried around carrying his orders out.

If pressed to be honest, he didn't really like it much.

Give him any number of sketchy hits to do, contracts just a touch on the risky side of almost suicidal, rather than days of paperwork. Renato was not made to sit behind desks all day.

Indefinitely wasn't something he apparently liked working towards. He could deal with a year or two focusing on other things, which he had done long before this and was getting into with being Shamal's guardian, but when it stretched on without an end in sight...

If he kept on being honest, the hitman would admit to grabbing the flimsiest excuses to leave Italia and this headache behind. He probably should've stopped taking hits once this problem got dumped on him. Which he hadn't, because if he had not then more than just a few of his little underlings would probably have ended up six feet under.

Again, he was not made to sit behind desks while others did more interesting things.

Especially when they screwed up things that had been rather straightforward and simple that he could've done blindfolded.

Thankfully, now that the worst of the problems were dealt with, he had a small amount of time on his hands to ponder exactly who he was going to drop an entire famiglia onto. There weren't very many good 'Don' prospects among the few Mafiosi he had built up, and the previous Don's men didn't bear thinking about, so Renato was a little stuck.

...and wondering if Timoteo of Vongola had anyone he would like to 'promote'. It would equal out a fair bit of the debt on the hitman's side, maybe enough not to have to swear himself to Nono Vongola's service for the rest of his miserable lifetime. Not a whole lot, as much effort he had put into salvaging this famiglia aside there was still years of work left to do to turn it into something remotely able to sustain itself again.

Renato tilted the ridiculously comfortable desk chair back a bit, it was a bit back heavy so he couldn't balance it that far back on two legs, kicked his heels up on his desk and thought about that.
If he had to be connected to any famiglia, loosely if he had his way, Vongola wasn't a bad one to be under the protection of. A particular thief of his acquaintance had even admitted that, for all that she seemed dead set on avoiding the massive famiglia entirely. Sonya had, in fact, looked satisfied over the news Shamal was going to be cared for by Vongola resources in return for the hitman's nominal allegiance and a couple favors.

Odd little Cloud, for sure.

Unfortunately, thinking about the Russian Storm-Cloud made him think of her equally Russian Sun of a sister. Who was... he wasn't entirely sure, but he was betting that something about him amused that nurse more than anything he had done really warranted.

Tatiana had been entirely too helpful with her little foster sister's Sun research journal. He was pretty sure it wasn't his charms, because the woman kept smirking when he flirted even a little with her.

Which made everything a bit weird, so Renato didn't flirt with Tatiana anymore.

"Boss?"

The hitman suppressed a sigh, tilting his head to the side to pin one of his better minions with a semi-irritated look. If he had more paperwork to be signed he was going to shoot something.

Probably the paperwork, and coincidentally his desk. He didn't have enough decent people to afford shooting one every time they annoyed him.

"You said to tell you when one of the words you wanted the news scoured for popped up. One... well, two did in the Gazzetta del Mezzogiorno." The man held up a rather ruffled copy of said paper, as if that could shield him from his 'Boss' and any fit of temper that might end up aimed his way.

"Well?" Drewled the hitman after a beat, then held out his hand in demand when the minion hesitated but also didn't open his mouth.

Let whoever was going to be stuck here after him deal with the timidity of these Mafiosi, he had put far too much effort into this famiglia as it was.

He blinked at the paper in his hands, which had been ever-so-helpfully opened to the page in question before being handed over. "How do you feel about the circus?"

"The... circus? Boss?"

Renato ignored his minion's question, folding the paper and tossing it to his desk. "Time to go irritate a thief."

He had been getting a little bored.

---

CLXXVII (Sunday the 7th of August, 1967. Bari, Puglia region, Italian Republic.)

"You are ridiculous." Sonya informed him slowly, deciding that taking her mid-morning break early was probably a good idea.

"I came all the way up here to see you, and that's what you call me?" Renato, and she really wasn't surprised anymore when he popped up nearby, sniffed in mock disapproval and straightened his cuffs fussily. "Ungrateful, that's what you are."

"Yes, very ungrateful." Since they were pretty much in the middle of a crowd, the thief started making her way to the alleyway behind the 'curiosity' tents.

It was pretty much Madame Crina's, a local herbalist that asked to set up a stall, and a couple other knick-knack vendors selling everything from cheap jewelry to the balloons most of the other 'walking performer' clowns used in their street acts.

"Did you really come all the way just to get my opinion on your sense of dress?"

"No. Happy coincidence, that."

She shot him a look over her shoulder, then rolled her eyes at his self-smug smirk.

The hitman was in a three-piece suit. A not-quite-black suit and tie, with a bright yellow shirt and snazzy black shoes with a high polish. Which while interesting, because he had favored dark toned button up shirts and slacks with slightly less shiny shoes before this, was an entirely frivolous reason for him to seek out a non-working thief.

"So... I have to ask, why?"

"Mostly?" He drawled out sardonically as he followed her steps, curiously looking around at the narrow little enclosure when she turned to face him. "To get out and about, really. I've spent way too much time cooped up in the last few months, and my grunts need fieldwork experience."

Sonya blinked at him blankly, then scowled at the hitman as she realized what that meant. "Do you mean to tell me there are more Mafiosi here? And you just let them...?"

"No." Renato gave her the disgusted look he probably believed she deserved for that accusation. "They're paying customers, they have orders not to disrupt anything, and all they are supposed to do is learn how to blend in with a crowd in territory they aren't well known within and find a few things."

That was... not actually a bad kind of thing to try in mostly neutral settings. The Russian rather wished it wasn't this neutral setting, but given who she was talking to?

It could've been worse.

Now there were mafia mooks running around the Groβes Volksfest. Minions of the Sun's, who may or may not be completely loyal to him depending on if he 'inherited' them or not.

She really wished she had managed to find decent vodka somewhere the last time she stocked up on liquor. It was probably going to be needed, if anyone of her current coworkers figured it out and decided to risk asking her what the hell was going on.

"So... what are they trying to find?"

Her question made the hitman smirk again, which just made her suspicious.

"I told them a member of this circus has Mafia connections, and they're supposed to be scouting around to find such a person. Then report back to me who it is, what they do, and where they are."

"So... basically, they're looking for me or Cherep." Sonya summed up flatly.

"In a word? Yes." Renato buffed his nails on his lapel, then inspected them before glancing up at her out of the corner of his eye. "More you than your brother, but I suppose he does fit within that criteria."

"Me? Sure. Tatiana? Fine, as long as you are careful. Cherep? No. Understand?" She glared at the man until he warily nodded.

She knew her eyes were probably purple, but that wasn't something she had enough experience in to try controlling.

"I'll correct that."

"...at least tell me they are not dressed like you as well." At his suddenly completely innocent look, she sighed and dug around her leather vest's pockets for her pack of cigarettes. "Really? Why would you think that was a good idea?"

"Is it my fault if they didn't think to change before setting out for a..." The hitman gave a pointed look to their surroundings. "...more casual area than they were dressed for visiting?"

"You did not bother to change."

"I, little lady Sonya, have class." Renato informed her prissily with a scoff, holding out a demanding hand.

The thief blinked at him over her lit cigarette.

"Well...?"

"Really?"

He rolled his eyes at her. "I'll buy you a new pack when I see you next. Give me one."

Sonya kept on eyeing him suspiciously and keeping her smokes to herself. "That will not help me now. I have to actually go into town, find a store that sells them, buy whatever is local, and then walk all the way back to whatever fairgrounds we are at in order to have these."

"And they cost you a thousand lira for two packs. Three if you're lucky." He countered quickly. "I will steal them if you..."

He blinked, and she raised an eyebrow at him as he seemed to recall exactly what he was talking to.

"I dare you to try."

"That sounds like a challenge." The hitman drawled, then snagged the cigarette she tossed at his face with a scowl. "Do you always have to be so difficult?"

"Yes. It amuses me." Sonya watched him pat down his pockets curiously. "What are you doing?"

"Looking for a lighter." By the tone of Renato's mutter, he thought that should have been obvious. She lit her fingers with a lick of Storm Flames and held them out. "What is the point of having fire-based skills if you cannot light a fire with them?"

He blinked at her red burning fingers, flicked a glance to her lit cigarette, and scowled again but this time at the one he held. "Ho? Can I do that with Sun Flames?"

"They are Flames, are they not?"
The hitman touched a burning yellow finger to the tip of his cigarette, looking ridiculously pleased when it started to smolder and stayed lit when he removed his hand. "Interesting."

The thief rolled her eyes at him. "Why you never thought of that...?"

"Oh, shut up."

CLXXVIII (Sunday the 7th of August, 1967 continued. Bari, Puglia region, Italian Republic.)

"You again?" Cherep eyed the man standing next to his sister suspiciously. "There isn't anything else you caused that she's going to have to deal with, is there?"

"No." The man, who he was pretty sure had a name that started with an 'R', scoffed and glared at the purple colored stuntman.

"Probably." Sonya countered dryly in the next moment, looking slightly regretful. "Did you see all the men in suits on your way over here?"

"Yeah...? They're milling about over by the concession stands." He informed his fellow Cloud slowly, belatedly realizing those men were probably connected to this other man he was sure was mafia as well. More mafia men themselves, probably. "So... this isn't another Shanghai thing, then?"

"What happened in Shanghai?" The man he still couldn't recall the name of asked sharply.

The tiny blonde being towered over next to him tossed him a pithy glare. "Nothing happened in Shanghai, Renato."

'Renato' eyed her suspiciously, then turned to him with what was at first going to be a severe or imperious look but changed at the last moment to be less demanding at the last second. "Those men, are they just stuffing their faces or actually trying to plan?"

"Or plot, you mean?" Corrected the younger man, sheepishly scratching the back of his head and noting he probably needed another haircut. "Um... I'd say they're just eating. Didn't get close enough to do more than see they were out of place, were kind of messy eaters, and are being rude to the servers."

The news didn't seem to surprise the man hanging around his little sister, in fact it made him weirdly pleased for some reason. "Well then... apparently my men need a little... ah, behavioral correction when it comes to how to treat others."

"Do not hurry back." Sonya informed him with a roll of her eyes. "I will head back to work if that is all you needed from me."

"Actually..." He drawled out slowly, turning back to the thief. "Have you given any thought to what I've asked you earlier this year?"

"The visiting Vongola territory thing?" She clarified slowly, seeming to think about it in a negative kind of way.

The stuntman was instantly curious. If his baby sister disliked something, she didn't normally bother contemplating trying to deal with it unless she had no choice in the matter. She was more of a 'hold it at arm's length and ignore until it goes away' type of person when it came to things she hated.
What did this man ask of her that she disliked thinking of?

More importantly, what kind of draw or interest did she have in it to make her think of dealing with it?

"I do kind of want to see Shamal, and if this Ball thing is the safest way you can think of for me to do it...?"

Okay, who was Shamal and... BALL?

Cherep only realized he had spoken that out loud when Sonya answered him absently.

"Shamal is a kid, about four-almost-five. I met him last winter. And yes, Ball. Vongola's Christmas Ball. Which I do not want to go to, but it is likely safer for me to try visiting the boy while all that is going on."

"Yes, safer." Renato repeated almost blankly, looking highly interested in them both all of a sudden. "So...?"

"...I am still thinking about it." The thief decided after a long moment, looking slightly uncomfortable.

Confused, the stuntman looked between his foster sister and her mafia friend. Whom he had found in one of Sonya's usual haunts, alone together.

His little sister didn't like young children. She could deal with them and older teens decently enough in small doses, one-on-one or with very mature young children, but that was about it.

Yet she thought enough of this one Shamal kid to consider doing something she didn't like just to see him?

"You'll spare me the displeasure of dealing with matronly wives of various Dons' looking to match up their younger daughters with strong husbands." Renato tempted, which made no impact on the young woman's expression.

Actually, the thief looked slightly incredulous. "We are mafia."

"Which is just another way of saying 'those behind the ones in power'. Politics are unfortunately something we have to deal with up on top." He pointed out sourly. "That includes all the jostling for position by flaunting how wealthy or powerful one is."

She snorted harshly in return. "Tell me about it. I have not the foggiest of what to do with my own pull in that."

That was apparently not something this Renato character expected her to have some idea of, by the flicker of surprise that crossed his face.

Cherep, even if he had been here for a good part of this conversation, felt like he was missing something rather major.

"Shoo. You have mooks to corral, I have to get back to work." Sonya even flapped a hand in the other man's direction, turning to the stuntman before seeing what his reaction to that dismissal would be. "Cherep? Did you need something from me?"

"Actually... Master Liam sent me to ask about all those guys in suits, and if you knew what they were doing." He grinned lightly at the dismayed look that crossed her face.

His fellow Cloud also didn't have the slightest clue how to treat the circus master now that she knew he knew about things of a fiery nature. After having her suspicions confirmed in such a way that derailed her protective hostility over him out of sheer bafflement, she had been left floundering how to treat the man.

Master Liam was in no hurry to help her through it, especially since Sonya didn't suspiciously glare at him anymore whenever he was in range.

"They... are not going to make trouble." His baby sister stated a little woodenly. "If they try to approach you, find something else to do very far away. Preferably after letting me know they're trying to approach you."

That, oddly, made the man suddenly bolt out of the little enclosure made up out of the backs of several tents.

Still very confused, Cherep nodded slowly.

CLXXIX (Monday the 8th of August, 1967. Bari, Puglia region, Italian Republic.)

"Are you sure...?"

"Damn it, Cherep." Sonya sighed heavily, shoving him lightly with one hand as she shoved another crate into the back of a truck with her other. She was heavily abusing her Cloud Flame Propagated strength to make things go faster, but at least they were alone right now. "Stop worrying. This is not another Shanghai thing. I swear it. But this is Renato's home country, I did expect him to be able to find me here."

It wasn't like it had been any difficulty for the hitman to track her down anywhere else, from all appearances. She still had no idea how he found her in Austria of all places.

"Sorry... but, the last time something related to that... other thing you're mired within came up, you went missing for a month."

"I did not go missing," She corrected sourly with a sniff, "I knew where I was. Although... I wish you had not mentioned that to Renato."

"Why?" Her brother asked, sounding genuinely confused. "Wouldn't his knowing be a good thing? In case it happens again, but this next time somewhere like that island you work at sometimes?"

_Dork_, she thought fondly. With only the slightest undercurrent of exasperation. "Renato is not the type to do something out of the goodness of his heart unless it is in his best interest. If I did need his help, I would probably end up paying for it for years. Even if I could handle it myself, if he came after me specifically to help me out of any trouble...?"

That tidbit of news had the stuntman pulling a sour face at her. "Ouch. Never mind then, you go silent for more than a month or two, I'll just tell Tatiana."

"Preferably Arseniy." That got a bark of laughter out of him.

Cherep shoved at another heavy crate of props without budging it an inch, took a deep breath, and then copied her innate skill of force Propagation to finally move the wooden container to where it needed to go.

Sonya sighed again, damned her foster brother for making a vague mention of their Cloud Flame derived strength to Master Liam, and muscled the next crate around so it could be shoved into place next.

She had to specifically point out to him that Mist did not equate to a familiarity of Cloud, and that any more fishing expeditions the circus master tried on him should be sent to her. The fact Liam was looking for what else their 'extra' abilities would allow was just the man looking out for his traveling operation, but she still didn't appreciate it much.

Hastening loading time with Cloud Flames was edging into that borderland of unknown that Sonya had rather wished to avoid until she got solid answers on if Omertà covered Dying Will Flame use. If so, they were already ghosting the edge of allowed uses even if Liam had turned out to be 'in the know' already.

Although, if not made more sense.

There were all those children, born yet or not, that would pop up with mystical magical inner Flames of various hues who might experiment with said fire. They would technically be in violation of Omertà if that was covered, and since everything she heard of the Vindice had pegged them as uncaring if you knew the law you broke or not...?

There hadn't been any mass 'kidnappings' of children, anywhere. Not that Sonya had heard of anyways.

There were the occasional one or two, kidnappings or runaways, which happens mostly locally she could hear of. Given how Flame users pop up more and more often in groups, with a little work there had been four in her 'generation' of one neighborhood of Moscow and eleven that appeared not long after them, no mass arrest of kids happening had to mean Omertà didn't cover Flame use.

However, it could even be Cherep was covered through her because she did know and was sworn to the Vow of Silence, therefore they were in violation of the law regardless if Flame use was included in Omertà or not.

Figuring that out for sure was something she was nearly itching to solve, but short of contacting the Vindice...?

Sonya wasn't sure where or how to confirm her suspicions on that.

"So..."

"I swear, if you ask one more time..."

"Hey! I just worry, okay?" Her fellow Cloud shot a glare over his shoulder, looking more than just a little put out at her. "This was supposed to be not-mafia related. You know, mostly legal work in the so-called 'civilian' side of the world? Instead you got chased out of Shanghai... and now this."

Sonya eyed him, or more specifically his taut back. "I am sorry about that, Cherep. I did try."

"It's the thought that counts, right?" He spoke rather whimsically, hauling the next crate of what sounded like spare metal parts he would probably be much better at identifying than her. "I never did put a time limit or constraint on that favor I asked of you, did I?"
She kept silent, a bit regretful of how much the mafia had encroached on his dream job all because of her.

Even if she could afford to take another year off, she probably would've had even more trouble than this year had given her to deal with.

"It's fine." Cherep suddenly interrupted her train of thought, turning back and quirking a wry little smirk for her. "This kind of life is driving you up a wall anyways. I know it is, so don't even try."

"It's not the traveling that does it..."

"It's the volume of people and the constraints on you." He finished for her with a nod and a shrug. "So... Acquisitions, wasn't it? Ironic."

Sonya sniffed at him in mock-disgust for his picking on her 'official' Mafia Land cover story.

It was at least better than the hitmen's version of it, they were known as 'Cleaners'.

CLXXX (Thursday the 24th of August, 1967. Martina Franca, Italian Republic.)

Originally, the Großes Volksfest was supposed to have gone from Moscow to China, then from there around to Africa's southwest coast, work their way up and west some more until Libya, and only then into Europe.

However, those plans hadn't been made to consider two different wars breaking out across Africa's southern tip in the middle of last year. What was being called the Namibian War of Independence, by the locals at least, had sparked a rash of conflicts up and down the coast of the nearby countries.

From what hazy memories Sonya could recall from Rachel, that would end up being collectively called the South African Border Wars. Namibia would eventually gain their independence too, if she recalled right.

Everyone just had to stop being assholes to those with darker skin color first.

Compared to risking two active war zones and all the complications that entailed, risking China had been tame in comparison.

However, the unscheduled detour through Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Republic had cost the circus a lot of income. Gained them some time, especially since they no longer had to work through the empty savannas and deserts of Africa, but that time was being used now that they were less likely to risk death lingering around.

Despite how quickly they had gotten out of Greece, and Sonya suspected that was due to the small spot of Jewish refugee smuggling the circus had done and the current military takeover of the country in question, they were crawling through Italy.

It wouldn't have been so bad normally, as she was now reluctantly used to slow traveling as it was, except the Russian thief didn't know where Vongola's territory started or ended.

She was pretty sure she was within it, Renato probably lingered on the border somewhere to not trespass on that Famiglia's grounds while he had been more freelance. Which meant, since he could spring the time for a visit no matter how small, that the near-coastal city of Martina Franca was probably within that.

Sonya also knew, from history the hitman had told her no less, that the Isle of Sicily was also part of Vongola's territory.

Somewhere on the southern end of Italy's peninsula was Vongola's headquarters, and knowing she was within it but being unable to tell for sure unnerved her enough she was sticking close to whatever town or city the circus stopped within. She had legitimate, and more importantly civilian-orientated, business being with them.

While that wouldn't really stop any Maﬁosi that were suspicious of her from attempting to do her mischief, it would enable the Zolotovs to get her a bit of revenge... well after the fact.

Which Sonya would like to never have need of, really.

Instead of going back to her usual standby if bored, go drinking at whatever shady bar she found, she unnerved the hell out of Crina by taking the old bat to tour vineyards. The suspicious peering was amusing enough, and the thief found a couple wines she didn't mind drinking, but after the three weeks it took them to reach Naples she was about ready to crawl out of her skin.

"For fucks' sake, girl! Go!"

"Crina."

"You're making me antsy, and I've lived through two World Wars." The old Romanian woman informed her, voice as dry as the desert of Saudi Arabia. "Suspicion has its place, but when you start using it to shackle yourself? You only live once girl, make something of it."

She had to work to not snort in the old bat's face.

She was on her second life, thank you very much. She knew as well as anyone else, except maybe Cherep, exactly how cheap a life could be.

"Don't give me the 'this old fraud knows nothing' look." Crina snapped in her face sourly. "No, I may not know what it is that crawled up your ass. But you're either going to have to grab whatever it is and make it not matter or decide when enough is enough and continue in spite of it."

The gypsy was even gesturing with the wine bottle as if to make her point, and from the sounds of it she had been more than halfway through it. The thief frowned absently, wondering if her brother had a point about enabling Crina's alcoholism.

Then again, the old bat could hold her liquor well.

"Pick one or the other but stop mincing around as if you expect someone to pop out of the dark to murder you."

Huffing, the thief dug around her stuff to find her pack of smokes. Which she was going through with alarming alacrity, but the stress was really starting to get to her.

Crina eyed her severely but seemed content enough to leave it at that.

Sonya wondered if she was blowing this out of proportion. Vongola might have a large territory, but surely the entirety of the southern end of the peninsula and the larger of the nearby islands had to be difficult to control with any degree of finesse.
They had an outside advisory branch, and probably a lot of people like Tyr the Sword Emperor or Renato himself. That also had to mean they had to have a lot of oversight going on over their people. Especially since Vongola had no current rumors of 'weakness' or 'fractures' floating around.

Which just might be PR and rumor control, but she'd never know unless she actually went out to find a couple answers.

Maybe, if she didn't pick a fight with the locals, it would be safe enough.
Sonya mourned the low level of alcohol in her glass. "Please tell me you are joking."

"Mmm... well, it's mostly all just rumors. So, I can't tell you that." The very chatty bartender she had found informed her cheerfully, absently scrubbing at a whisky glass with a rag to dry the insides out quickly.

The thief was pretty sure he was just going through the motions so to appear busy. It was just them in the bar so far, and she wasn't sure why he was bothering with it.

"But Vongola's parties, they're fairly notorious." He continued as if she wasn't looking a moment away from lunging at the bottles of liquor at his back. "I think it's their Don's birthday bash that is the best, rumor wise. We always love hearing how those go, especially who ends up winning."

...how did one win at a birthday party, exactly?

Furthermore, was she really going to try braving such madness all to see a techy Mist brat she could probably visit just as well on his birthday?

Sonya had a weird little itch when it came to Shamal. She wanted to go check up on him at the very least, ensure he was doing okay after their sudden split-up, and the longer she went without doing so the worst said 'itch' got. Making her think of the kid more and more often, which then made her want to see him more, and that cycle didn't seem to be short-circuiting any time soon.

Thus, why she was contemplating braving the lion's den just to ensure the brat of a Mist was doing alright... and ensure no one was trying to teach him stupid things.

It was ridiculous, because the hitman that was now in charge of the baby Mist's wellbeing wouldn't allow any kind of upset to happen to him. Not again. Shamal was Renato's now, and the man was a jealous, possessive asshole where his things were concerned.

She had only asked to see his gun once, interested in comparing it to Tatiana's backup weapon she won in Mafia Land years ago. Notably, it both didn't happen and Sonya had never asked again.

As for the stupid-teaching thing... well, the man was Italian. He had some weird expectations for other Flame users.

In fact, she had been mildly surprised to be asked to help with Shamal at all. It was for the best given how that had worked out, but at the time it was mostly curiosity that drove her to accept the slightly altered trade of favors that canceled out half her debt to the hitman.

Well... that curiosity and a wish to be firmly on the man's better side.

"Any reason you're asking, miss?"

"A... friend of mine asked me to go with him to a Vongola party, and I was wondering what he had asked me to." Sonya informed him blandly, sourly wondering when the asshole that asked her to go with him as arm candy thought she had time to shop for evening wear. "Now I'm just wondering if I should go or not."
She was not what one would describe as a people person. She had learned tolerance, forcibly in the past two years, from being Crina's draw girl. If Renato thought she'd do anywhere near decent in the little chit chat part of social gatherings, he was in for a rude surprise.

...and since she was already trying to plan on shopping for a dress and dealing with whatever difficulties came with attending a Vongola Christmas Ball, she should probably resign herself to going.

Sighing heavily, the Russian thief polished off her glass of what the bartender had called a 'Moscow Mule' and let the glass thump back onto the bar. "My thanks for clearing up a bit of my confusion."

"Well now... I didn't peg you as the type to be attending such things."

"They're not really my type of thing, but... he's a fairly good... friend." With a decent bit of luck, Sonya might get a couple questions answered. Probably any questions she'd get answers to would be Vongola orientated, but even that kind of information was still information she could likely use.

If her suspicions on Renato's eventual cursed baby fate held water, and she was more than sure it would be given she knew Skull damn well, then the hitman would probably linger with Vongola for however long it took for the curse to be reversed.

Decimo of Vongola coming to power and getting around to said reversing, however, was still about three to four decades away still.

That was a lot of time to span. Since she knew the man well, it was possible she'd get dragged into some of it.

"I wish you luck then." The bartender cheerily informed her, brightly enough to be a little condescending.

She wondered why he was wishing her luck, and that might have shown on her face because he continued as if she had directly asked him the question.

"There is usually a costume contest at the Halloween Ball, and a snowball fight battle royal at the Christmas one. Competing in them is generally the highlight of each event." He was grinning broadly now, and the thief belatedly caught on to the sly amusement the man had at her fishing for information. "I look forward to hearing how you do."

Sonya's eye twitched, because sure as fuck Renato hadn't mentioned anything like that to her.

"May I ask you something in return, my dear?"

"...sure. But I may not answer." Even if the man had been semi-forthright about the information she wanted.

"Your tattoos, they have a meaning?" The bartender's grin gained a slight edge, which she figured the answer was the 'real' price of the gossip she had managed to get so far.

"The cat means I'm a thief. Nighttime background shows the time of day I usually work." The Russian brushed her fingers over the corresponding parts, then tapped the next few. "Paw prints shows I wander for my work, and the roses... I need to color them in, but they show I am not afraid of killing."

He pursed his lips, taking a long look at her artwork. Which she pulled up the sleeve of her shirt, so he could see more of it. "Thank you, miss. Anything else?"
"No, that about does it for now." She should probably be getting back, before the bar's regulars started wandering in for the midday rush.

Convincing Crina to let her go for a morning hadn't been too hard, not with how badly she managed to unnerve the old bat in the last few weeks.

CLXXXII (Tuesday the 29th of August, 1967. Venice, Italian Republic.)

Cherep was perfectly happy to drag her along with him to go shopping in Venice, mainly for a new motorcycle.

Especially when a certain little letter from Tatiana reached Sonya.

The Sun had sent on the news Dimitry finally found an Inverted Storm, and the very real possibility that their baby sister's Storm Flames were not Classic but Inverted. Judging by what personality traits and ticks the kid was showing that matched up somewhat to what habits the she had, anyways.

It only meant the Storm-Cloud was likely perfection fixated.

Her work in Dying Will Flames research alone showed signs of that, she got frustrated and irritated when she kept running into things that weren't correct or that she had assumed wrongly until she fixed whatever it was in her own collection of information. Rewriting several books worth of information was a sign of obsessiveness, especially since she was striving to keep them all updated as much as humanly possible.

Realizing what drawbacks Clouds suffered when it came to physical fitness then fixing it with almost single-minded intensity was another. Chasing down what other drawbacks might happen with other types had been part of it as well, especially since she would never have much use for that information.

Supposedly, anyways.

It stood to reason that her book hoarding was likely another symptom of that. Maybe even a sign of her mixed nature.

Her territorial-ness over certain people was likely a Cloud thing, somehow.

Sonya appreciated the new tidbit to puzzle over and the news of Lisa's pregnancy going as well as could be expected... however, that tidbit about her Storm Polarization also meant Cherep probably won their little bet.

Which now meant she owed her foster brother a motorcycle. Rather, the funds to purchase one.

He was a bit too happy over that news, but she wasn't really bothered.

A year and a half of working at a communist circus wouldn't have amounted to a lot of money... but she had been mainly living off 'dirty' money she earned on Mafia Land. All the 'allowances' paid out to keep capitalist countries happy they had no major communist influences within their borders added up to a semi-decent amount.

Cherep's expression when she dropped that on his lap had been amusing enough for her to make up for losing that little bet. He wasn't that upset for long with her wiggling out of a few more years of circus work, especially not when with what she had given over. With that, the price of a semi-decent second-hand motorcycle in cash at the very least, and what he had from his own shows and the sale of scrap metal from his old bike, the stuntman was dead set on getting himself a 1966 Triumph Bonneville. New.

She was trying to get him to delay a bit, because there was some very strident pressure on Great Britain to lower their side of the conversion of currency again, which meant if he held off for another month or two it might get as low as two and a half grand in British pounds instead of a grand over that.

"We would have a better selection to browse anyways, even if it would be within the Iron Curtain." She tempted again to get her brother to hold off spending an exorbitant amount of money he might or might not be able to afford.

It didn't look as if it was working.

"It might be more expensive now," Agreed her fellow Cloud lightly with a shrug, "but it will also be as expensive in time to wait for later. The show must go on, Sonya, and in order to do so...?"

The thief blinked at the back of his head, a little confused. "Why must it go on right away?"

"I might not have had a following of any strength, but I do have one. A reputation, you know... the one you're banking on me hiding certain things behind." The stuntman waved a hand around in the circle, as if trying to pluck the words he wanted out of thin air. "If I wait too long, it will look like I'm scared of getting back on a bike after the stumble earlier in the summer."

"Or that you actually have a sense of caution?" She countered a bit tartly, because... Sonya really didn't like Skull much.

Who the hell called a near-death experience a 'stumble', anyways?

"Exactly. And no one likes cautious stuntmen." Cherep finished with a nod, turning to look at the salesman waiting for him to make up his mind.

He was also a bit nervous, because little sister didn't seem very happy with him at all and that might affect the sale.

"I think this one will do." He informed the man in clumsy Italian, who suddenly looked very delighted even if it had taken the Cloud siblings a couple long hours looking over the different models available.

A Bonneville T120TT was what her foster brother decided on. she didn't understand what the difference between that one and a T120C or T120R model was but was sure he would just adore explaining it to her if she had to know.

"Very good, sir. Ah... you do realize they cost...?"

The stuntman rolled his eyes, then reached for the military surplus canvas bag his sister had been holding onto for him. "About three and a quarter thousand in British pounds, a little over thirty-eight hundred in euros, and almost five million in lira? We'll be paying in euros."

Walking around with a couple million in lira, even if they were in denominations of a thousand or more, had been something the thief had vetoed a little more stridently than was apparently needed. He had just been a little more than dubious over the exchange rates anyways, and he was a fan of a European spanning currency with what traveling he was going to be doing for the rest of his foreseeable life.

Sonya elected not to mention it was the mafia he had to thank for that one.

---

CLXXXIII (Thursday 31st of August, 1967. Undine, Italian Republic.)

The assumption that Vongola probably operated out of the southern end of Italy seemed to have been borne out, especially since the closer they got to Venice the more the Famiglia was gossiped about. Once past it, the gossip turned more from rumor to actual guesses of Vongola's strength or aims.

It made a bit of sense, historically.

Given that Sonya knew of a Cosa Nostra of another lifetime that spread out from the same general region, she wasn't surprised to learn of it.

What she was more than a little surprised to hear of was how little it seemed Vongola cared about how it was gossiped about even, likely, close to their home territory. Some of it was positive, but just as much if not more wasn't nearly so flattering.

Most of it was about Ottavia Vongola, better known now as Daniela of Vongola since she handed off the reigns of the Famiglia to her son.

The fact the Donna had kept in control of Vongola throughout the Second World War and refused to say just who her son's father was, made her a bit of a hot topic even long after the woman retired from being the Boss Vongola.

Nono of Vongola Timoteo wasn't being spared from the gossip mongers much either. While his mother favored a seemingly straightforward leadership style, at least until she seemed to figure there wasn't much of a way to get what she wanted like that, Nono had went in the opposite direction. He was described as favoring negotiation more than confrontation, at least by what a lone Russian thief had managed to overhear.

Which, again, made a bit of sense. Daniela had to lead through a time of war, so she generally had very straightforward opponents to face. Opponents that all probably underestimated her a little due to her gender. Timoteo had both the post-war economic boom as well as the building recession to maneuver around, so his opponents weren't so forthright.

She tried both Scotch whisky and bourbon whiskey, found she didn't really like either and preferred brandy if no vodka was available, while she gathered that little bit of gossip.

Since it seemed as if her current targets to listen in on were a bit more preoccupied trying to guess who Timoteo's father really was, the thief let her mind wander a bit as she contemplated her brandy glass.

Tyr the Sword Emperor, according to gossip, had been one of Daniela's people before she stepped down as Vongola's Donna. He had been left to her son's command, by appearances alone, as an enforcer if her son's own version of mafia diplomacy ever failed.

From the sounds of it, it had a couple times.
It was already to the point Tyr was more than a bit notorious, and there were the whispers of him taking up a leadership role for an entire squad of assassins.

Sonya assumed that was the Varia... and she now knew why Renato had been so surprised she had identified the Sword Emperor as the head of it.

The title was just shy of a year old. The hitman probably learned when he went to Vongola for help, and a Russian thief somehow knowing that before he could make any kind of mention or word of it to warn her not to piss the man off?

That was... she really needed to start thinking before she spoke. Maybe the man wouldn't ask, but she should probably start trying to think up of an excuse before he got around to trying to prod her sources out of her.

Actually... if Tyr was only recently made the head of an assassination squad...?

When Renato went to Vongola to both report a massive violation in Mafia Land's ruling syndicates and get help to uproot it the master assassin was detailed to assist. That had to mean the 'Varia' wasn't very large at this point of time. Likely, probably only around a handful or two members strong if their boss was taking jobs.

Then why did Timoteo send the man off with the hitman?

That spoke of a severe manpower shortage or a bored assassin, at the very least. The Sword Emperor didn't seem the type to allow boredom to happen to him, or to even care. From what little she knew, Sonya would put her money on a shortage of Mafiosi.

Which still didn't answer the question of why Nono Vongola humored a freelance hitman's request for a hasty reordering of the powers in charge of Mafia Land. It all happened within a month, from the point when Renato left the island with Shamal to her returning to it from China.

Said thief was still appreciative she didn't have to find out for sure what had been planned for her, but the entire reasoning behind the help was starting to baffle her.

If Vongola was suffering from a shortage of manpower, a show of strength or three would've been needed to keep anyone from thinking they could challenge its supremacy. The Second World War, in which it seemed as if Daniela had been a major player in keeping Italy from being subsumed by the Axis Powers and the rapid expansion of industry of the Italian Economic Miracle, had to have put a strain on Nono's available men.

Even if they were only trying to cover their expanding territory when the cities and towns developed more to handle the growing population, it would probably outstrip the available Mafiosi from the previous generation. Only around the next five years would the first of the post-war baby boom be of an age to pitch in, which left not just Vongola but several syndicates in various countries strapped for just men.

That was probably the 'why' behind Renato gaining the help he needed to prevent Sonya from venturing into probably lethal confrontations with Mafia Land's ruling syndicates.

A show of power, a reminder of what was and wasn't allowed in the free-floating haven to the underworld at large, and a showing of exactly how well connected Vongola was. Stripping themselves of the bulk of the CEDEF to replace the syndicate formerly in charge of Mafia Land's security was probably a cost Nono decided he could afford.

She eventually decided the hitman had some weirdly bipolar luck.
Lost most of his contacts, ended up a temp-Don and gained a kid. Had to entreat another more notorious Famiglia to help him protect said kid, was in just the right spot in the right time for said Famiglia to help him.

...almost like those radio dramas Crina liked to listen to when they were close enough to Romania to do so. Even the soap operas she could vaguely recall as Rachel.

CLXXXIV (Friday the 8th of September, 1967. Belgrade, Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.)

Instead of heading north to copy the route they took back to Moscow last year, the Großes Volksfest headed for the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Sonya was at least thankful they weren't going to go through Germany, either one, again. It might have been getting better, the West more than the East, but she still had mixed feelings about the entirety of Germany and its people.

 Crossing a border into the Iron Curtain so far south was a new experience, and the Russian thief finally found a way into the Soviet Union she wouldn't mind taking it slow through again.

Although, she was somewhat sure a country named Yugoslavia hadn't existed at the time of Rachel's death... or wouldn't exist. Maybe it would be renamed?

It was a thought that distracted her from really appreciating a satellite state of the Soviet Union so well managed it was a popular country to visit, because it was also the point in which she realized what she had been doing had some drawbacks as well.

Ignoring Rachel's lifetime of slightly skewed history, that is.

She didn't recall how history had been supposed to go anymore outside the main points.

Which was both a good thing and a bad one.

On one side, she could learn the relevant history of this lifetime without recalling a different one's slightly altered reality instead. The Russian would also no longer have a worry of spilling state secrets a decade or two before they became common knowledge, and therefore making a big target of herself.

Flipside of that coin was recognizing something was a little off but being unable to tell what.

Sonya would no longer be able to plot out how things were likely to go and evade the worst of it.

She knew the highlights. 1989 would be when the Berlin Wall was to fall, a few short years after that the Soviet Union would follow, she would probably want to avoid the north-eastern part of the Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic until the scientists declared it safe, avoid Cuba and Vietnam entirely until a decade or so after the conflicts there were done, and maybe abstain from visiting New York at the turn of the millennium.

Silicon Valley was something to invest in. Google, AOL, and YouTube as well. The emergence of bigger brand-names from Rachel's lifetime should be watched for.

Sometime within that, she might want to find out if there would be a Rachel Victoria Stokes in this existence or not. If so, then what the hell she wanted to do about it.

Puzzling over it for a few good days merely gave her a headache, so Sonya decided that since she failed to take notes the loss of valuable information on possibilities was her own damn fault.

Not that taking notes in such a massively multilingual neighborhood would've stayed secure. Someone would've known English, even if Lisa didn't know it, so note-taking on another life's history had never really been an option.

All she could really do was hit the history books she had been collecting for years as soon as she could keep one with her without worrying about weather-related damage or it being on some country's banned list. Which she would do the moment her Mafia Land issues were handled, and she had a little amount of time before she had to check in with the Zolotovs and Dmitriy to see if they had anything major for her or if she could go free-lance for a few more years.

Sonya absently sidestepped Cherep, who had tried to throw an arm across her shoulders. "What?"

"You're not doing whatever it is you normally do." He informed her briskly, grabbing her coat from the pile of cloth in one corner of Crina's newly set up tent. "You're coming with me before I go back to stunt work, and we're going to go sightsee or people watch or just get ourselves lost."

She stared at him hard, trying to figure out if he was being obtuse over what she usually did or not. "...why?"

"Because you're probably going to dive right back into that 'world under', as Master Liam labeled it." The stuntman flashed her a grin, tossing her coat over her head cheekily. "So, I'm building up Sonya-time before you abandon me here."

"I am not going to-"

"Yeah, yeah. You'll visit, right?" Her fellow Cloud sounded entirely unrepentant as she pulled her head free of the heavy wool, and from the look on his face he was feeling something similar even with her glaring at him. "Still, I've got what? Three months? Maybe less? Of you here and not being sneaky and elsewhere. We're going to put it to some use."

The thief huffed but did pull on her coat. "It is not as if you will never see me again."

"But not every day. Or whenever I want."

"Well... no."

Sonya had to give him that. With the new spat of Dying Will Flame users Dmitriy was handling and her own thief-reputation to build up, she'd be rather solidly occupied with Soviet Russia for probably a few good months when not working for Mafia Land or anyone else.

Stuffing his hands into the pockets of his grime and oil stained 'work jeans', Cherep quirked a wry little smirk for her. "So, just like old times. We'll go gawp at the scenery, get ourselves a little lost, and maybe buy something local for dinner. You speak a native dialect, right?"

Comparing that to the option of going to sneak a bit of local gossip from stingy bartenders, who were probably on the lookout for any Soviet Union government agents trying the same thing with more dire consequences for what they learned, it didn't sound half bad.

They would only be in this part of the Soviet Union for about a week, anyways.
"I am not sure if Romanian counts as 'native'."

"It'll be a learning experience."

"...fine."

CLXXXV (Friday the 15th of September, 1967. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

It wasn't until they were mostly set up in Budapest, in the Hungarian People's Republic, that Sonya remembered.

Italy had been pretty much a non-entity when it came to World War Two. The Mafia Wars had consumed the country from the inside out, preventing anything communist from gaining a hold on them and the rise of Fascist Italy. Nothing really gained a hold on them, but nothing went out of it either.

It seemed stable now, more than she would've guessed since the underworld did affect the civilian side of the world without a major break in Omertà. If that was Vongola's efforts in bridging a gap to control the excess of violence or what was still questionable.

However, that did mean that anything Rachel would've known from World War Two was mostly defunct when it came to Italy or the countries nearby. The Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Hungarian People's Republic were probably two such countries that might have had dealings with a Fascist Italy in one reality.

Which didn't in this life.

Her spotty education in this world's history was woefully inept for the purpose of answering 'then what happened' question. She had the idea to ask Crina, as probably someone that knew a hell of a lot more than she did about the subject. She had claimed to have lived through two world wars, so it was a safe bet.

The Russian asked during a short break the two of them took after setting up the actual tent they'd be entertaining customers within, but before they got around to decorating the two-man canvas enclosure for either them to live out of for a few days or for the gypsy to tell fortunes out of.

Which, judging by how white Crina blanched, had been a very bad idea.

"You don't have to answer." The thief hastened to tack onto her question in the old bat's native Romanian, feeling incredibly awkward and a little sorry for bringing the subject up. "It was just a wonder."

"Stop cringing, girl." The older woman snapped, almost under her breath as she regained a bit of color. "I wasn't expecting a question like that out of you, took me by surprise."

What was with people and lying to her face about what they felt?

She didn't understand it or knew of a way to call Crina out about lying to her, so she remained silent about the blatant mistruth.

She could counter the other one, though. "Why does everyone seem to think I'm some unfeeling, human-looking robot? I can feel sorry for upsetting you, you're pretty awesome for an old crone."
"Thanks... I think." Crina muttered with more heat, but the banter did put a bit healthier color into her skin.

Whether it was just simply a needed distraction or real amusement that did it was beyond the Russian. The results were fine enough for now, so she concentrated on the other issue.

The one that made the old gypsy look as if someone had stabbed her in the chest without warning.

"You really don't have to answer, I can find out some other way."

Crina snorted softly, casting a quick glance to the pallet Sonya slept on and usually had her liquor stashed nearby. "Didn't your history classes cover it in all its gory glory?"

"Err... Crina? My education was a bit more... targeted than that. History wasn't exactly what you could call a core class."

It was as close as Sonya would come to admitting the mafia of her homeland had homeschooled her, and it wasn't for something as small as a degree in world history. Her ability to steal the contents of someone's pocket was of more value than her understanding of historic events she could learn on her own time.

A sour look passed over the native Romanian's face, which was the first little hint the Russian had ever seen of her personal history bothering the gypsy woman. "Fair enough. What, exactly, did you want to know?"

"Just the basics of what happened in this region, for a general understanding." She would look up the rest herself, if only to not unduly bother her master in mysticism.

Going nearly grey in shock wasn't a good look for the nearly sixty or seventy something old woman.

"Germany invaded the southern parts of this area, tried occupying both that region and invade your Soviet Union at the same time through this part. The split pull on their manpower, between the winter fighting and suppressing the local resistance to Nazi rule, enabled the Allied Powers and the Red Army to bisect the Nazi war machine near the end of the war." Clipped and short, Crina summed up the pertinent information while glancing for Sonya's stash again. "Anything else you wanted to know?"

"No, that covered it." Even if she did have a worry she might be enabling the old bat's alcoholism, the thief pulled out one of her remaining bottles of wine she kept just to bribe the old woman with. "Thank you."

"Don't mention it."

Sonya slipped out of the back 'room' of the tent, leaving the gypsy to hit the bottle in privacy.

Crina was likely from this region. Romanian, the native language of the Socialist Republic of Romania, was widely known to be her native one. While not a solid bit of evidence of one's nationality, Cherep was Czechoslovakian but spoke Russian as well as she could, it was a good regional hint.

Whatever it was Sonya's question had startled out of Crina, it was likely not a good memory.
What, exactly, did the Groβes Volksfest do during World War Two?

It was a question that only occurred to the thief to wonder well after a midday conversation with Crina, after the circus got through the Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic and well into Soviet Ukraine.

It was very late to be wondering, if she was pressed to be honest.

Sonya had only checked into any possible mafia connections this circus might have had before joining up with Cherep, which it didn't possess beyond random happenstance. The underworld would've also kept track of any nasty rumors, if only to take advantage of it to hide their own bloody work behind or to muddy the trail for any police looking for them.

Most positive rumors, at least in the mafia, wouldn't travel very far from where any incidents happened.

Since the question only occurred to her very late, a few weeks from ending her time as a gypsy's apprentice, she wouldn't be able to answer it.

Not without a major lucky break.

Which she wasn't going to hold her breath for. Luck wasn't really her thing, it was more Cherep's.

This show business thing required more than a little, and the man that grew out of her dork of a best friend did fulfil his childhood dream of being a stuntman.

That being the case, she hunted down her foster brother and put that little question in his head. Even if he was gearing up to be 'Skull' and not 'Cherep'.

Skull's only saving grace, in Sonya's eyes, was that he tended to be more caustic and careful when not performing for a crowd. Cherep would've wondered why she wanted to know but do it anyways, Skull would ask questions on why and what she'd do with that information before agreeing.

It probably wasn't wise to treat both sides of him as different people, but the dichotomy would probably help him prevent others linking him and her brother's identities together.

If he really was her foster brother, then wouldn't they get along better?

Getting asked why she wanted to know was fully expected, and Sonya answered with the truth.

"I scared Crina by asking about local history during World War Two. It was a little... concerning, how white she blanched when I asked her about it."

Skull considered that, rubbing one side of his freshly shaven jawline. "Are you asking out of concern? Aw... Sonya, I didn't know you cared that much."

"It has been almost two years," the thief defended herself a little awkwardly, "and Crina's been more than accommodating about me. It is professional courtesy."

"It took you over five to accommodate Tatiana as more than just 'that girl I live with'. Nearly seven to actually adjust yourself or your schedule for her if need be." The stuntman pointed out with a grin, looking highly amused. "This is almost as fast as you adjusted for me."
"Crina's useful."

"And that sounds like an excuse, not a reason." He countered just as quick.

She thought about it, but frankly didn't understand why she latched onto him so fast and therefore wasn't going to attribute whatever it was to Crina. "I think it is more a common ground we share, because I do not like her nearly as much as you... well, Cherep anyways."

That knocked her fellow Cloud back a step mentally, and the man shut his mouth without saying whatever else he had in mind. Instead he studied her a moment, then shrugged it off. "I'll keep an ear out, but I'm not going to go around asking. If they tell me, they tell me. If not..."

"That is fine." It really was only an idle wonder. Had she thought to ask that back near the beginning she might've spent some time figuring it out herself.

"You know, I find it ridiculous how hard it is to shake you off something." He continued on another tangent that made the thief backtrack mentally to see if there was a reason for it. "Like a dog with a bone, you never really give up once you get something stuck in your head."

Baffled by this new conversation's aim, Sonya suspiciously regarded him. "...what?"

"You're so self-honest, you never argue about things I can nitpick to change the subject." Skull clarified, which didn't help his little sister in the least.

At her continued silence, complete with what was probably a lost look aimed in his direction, he sighed. "And I can only do this when you're not interested in learning something."

"I... am confused."

"I know. I did it on purpose." Skull admitted wryly with a snicker. "Just to check to see if I still could."

Well... he was a bit of an ass like this. She shrugged it off and latched on to something else, so she didn't flounder for the rest of the conversation. "I am not self-honest. Trying to be, but I can be blind sometimes."

Rachel had died being blind to her surroundings and the risks she took. The Russian thief she became in death had tried to correct that once she could understand, but it was harder than she had counted on.

She failed more than she succeeded at it, too.

"But you can mentally adjust when something's pointed out to you." He interrupted her musings on the only death she had to her, pulling her attention back to issue he was referring to. "Normally, a person gets a little defensive or disgruntled when their flaws are pointed out."

Sonya blinked at him, then ran their conversation through her head again. "Skull... were you trying to pick a fight with me?"

"Maybe." He showed her his hand, with his forefinger and thumb only a breath away from touching. "A small one."

"...why?" She really didn't understand why he would want to.

"Mostly to see if I could." Skull admitted candidly. "But you're not very confrontational with me usually, and since Dmitriy and Tatiana solved the question of what your Storm Polarization was I got to wondering what is up with your Cloud nature if you're not what a Cloud is normally."

"Did you figure anything out?"

"You know how a 'Classic' Cloud is usually thought to be a 'lone wolf' at best or a 'territorial aggressor'? You're not, so if you aren't a loner in that extreme then maybe you're more of a 'pack' minded Cloud."

...pack?

"Like Arseniy's the 'alpha', so you fitted yourself under him after an adjustment period." He continued in a thoughtful tone. "But I don't think there's such a thing as a pack of two, so you added in more when you finally understood that. Lisa, Tatiana, and myself."

"Are you suggesting I am a 'domesticated' Cloud?" Sonya concluded incredulously, feeling a bit strange as she followed his line of thought.

Skull shrugged nonchalantly. "A 'beta' Cloud, maybe."

That was... weirdly fitting. "...let me get back to you on that."

"It would mean your 'territory' thing is really people, but more of your fellow pack mates instead of just individuals." The stuntman suggested, as if it would change her opinion of it.

The thief was certain he was pulling this from the local warnings of wolf-packs and how they behaved. She had heard the same thing herself, from Jiayi. "I will think about it."

...but it was strangely apt.

CLXXXVII (Saturday the 23rd of 1967. Kiev, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

Going from the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the Hungarian People's Republic and then through the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic was Sonya favorite way into the Iron Curtain of all ways she had found herself or had followed as part of the Groβes Volksfest. Even despite what she learned on the tail end of that route.

Yugoslavia, for a border state on the edge of the Soviet Union, was well governed instead of suppressed and feeling like it. She didn't know quite what all happened in that country, and the lack of knowledge bothered her, but since she only had herself to blame for that blindness she refrained from asking around.

As it was now, it was a mostly pretty countryside with many farms and very little political unrest. There was some, and even Jaq could hear a bit of news when he went for a drink after helping set up some of the tents. The thief didn't hear some of what he had but given her tattoos and nationality that had been expected.

Hungary recently had a lot of political trouble that was only now dying away, but the new build-up their government had was proving to be rather popular with the civilians. Frankly, Sonya appreciated the trees and sights more than the local government. It was another country where she didn't really get a whole lot from the mafia hangouts, but she did get to hear a lot about major and current Soviet Russia dealings.
Ukraine, on the other hand, held most everything in terms of mafia gossip she had missed.

Yugoslavia's underworld widely specialized in security, which apparently hailed back to the time it spent occupied under Nazi rule in World War Two. She had found nothing of concern while going through the country because they hadn't wanted her to find anything.

Learning that made her want to either crack open a history book to see what they had to have dealt with or go back and take a harder look. The first would have to do until she had an excuse to go back there, but it was still a jarring bit of information to learn.

Hungary's underworld was still recovering from the unrest only half a decade ago, so Sonya found really nothing in terms of organized syndicates but more freelancers starting to group together again. The fact there was no local information in what she got there would have either been a lack of any to be had or another attempt to conceal how vulnerable the region was.

Likewise, it could've covered the encroachment of foreign syndicates getting into the country.

She felt jarred at how badly she had misjudged territory so close to her 'home' one, but not really surprised. Lisa hadn't been all that encouraging when it came to a lone thief's ability to keep adequately informed, so the Russian Storm-Cloud figured this rash of bad luck in terms of intel-gathering was just proving the woman's point.

At least she hadn't been working and needed that information to prevent herself from pissing off yet another syndicate she wouldn't be able to handle on her own.

Something for Bjorn to do for her. The kid would probably like feeling as if he was contributing, instead of being mostly ignored from time to time. If the Icelander was good at it, then great. If not, then Sonya would figure something else out for the kid to help her with.

She wasn't really surprised it was Ukraine where she got corrected on what she'd missed, the Russian Mafiya was neck deep in this country. Her tattoo worked more than just a picture in her skin and more like the sign she was entitled to some information they were supposed to be for.

Other than as a blatant record of her criminal career and acknowledgement that she was Mafiya.

Sonya did wonder how Omertà was kept up if the Russian Mafiya liberally plastered themselves with a normally easily seen record of everything they did. One would think the police would've noticed the color and at least asked about it or noticed a trend.

It was encoded, sort of. However, a whole lot of thieves getting arrested with the same spider web or cat tattoos in various designs should've been at least something interesting to comment on. Vory getting busted for murder or fighting back against the police showing up with graveyard tats or police shields on their arms had to be somewhat alarming.

Well... something to wonder.

CLXXXVIII (Monday the 25th of September, 1967. Kharkiv, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

"Where are we, anyways?"

"Someplace." Crina snapped back, the irritation in her tone almost more reflexive now than felt.
"You made a couple threats of stealing my boots, but if you like them so much I thought you might want a pair of your own."

Sonya eyed the Romanian woman's back thoughtfully as they continued down a little side-street in one of Kharkiv's less affluent neighborhoods.

The pair of boots she was wearing now were in fact old cast-off of Crina's, which were still insanely comfortable for second-hand footwear if a little too broken in now for full comfort. The heels had started to go, so the thief had been playing with if she wanted to get herself her own pair of boots or branch out into different shoe styles.

Boots, anything ankle to calf in length, were popular choices for footwear in Soviet Russia. The winter alone meant sandals or canvas shoes didn't do much to protect the feet, and given how much of Russia's year was comprised of winter or winter-like weather?

Well... it was the thought that counted.

Sonya could appreciate the old bat's attempt as it was.

Her Romanian was very rusty since she had switched back to Russian for the last three months, in fact all she caught was the name of Crina's cobbler when she greeted the man in her native language faster than the thief could keep up with.

Horatiu was a graying gentleman with a pinched expression on his narrow face, making him look akin to a rat or some other pointed snout mammal. It also gave him a semi-permanent glare, or maybe squint, on his cleanly shaven face.

Her inspection of him went unnoticed, because the man was a lot more interested in her feet than her reaction to him.

"Crina... are you really letting the poor girl walk around in boots so old?" Horatiu tossed the gypsy a dirty look, sniffed at the flat expression his was met with, then set his hands on his hips and gave a measuring look to the thief herself. "So darling, I suppose you would like your own pair?"

"If you wouldn't mind." Sonya told him slowly in Romanian, a little bemused. "I take it you work on commission?"

"You would be right, miss. Step inside, lightly now." He waved both master and apprentice into his slightly dismal looking shop, which proved to be a lot different on the inside than out.

She, merely as a thief, greatly appreciated the trick.

Horatiu's shop might be in a slightly run-down neighborhood in a mid-sized Ukrainian city, but it seemed as if the cobbler himself wasn't doing nearly as poorly as the façade of his shop suggested. He had whole skins of leather from various animals on display alongside a glass case of buckles and various finished boot style examples, a very nice little parlor one could wait within, and the whole place smelled of the material he made his boots out of.

_PETA would've abhorred him_, Sonya thought absently, looking around curiously.

She should probably also correct her mental title for the man. Cobbler weren't the type to fashion new shoes from fresh leather, those were cordwainers. There _was_ a distinction, and the man would probably throw a fit if she called him by the wrong professional title.

He seemed to be the type to, a fashionista if she was any judge of character.
"One pair or two, darlings?"

"One." Crina shot over her shoulder, heading straight for that little parlor corner.

"Two. One now and one more this winter, then probably another the year after that." Corrected the thief, still waiting for the man to set her where he would want her to do his work. "Even if these are old, I still would rather wear them than break in a new pair I would not like so well."

She had learned the art of flattering clothing makers at Tatiana's elbow, so she knew how this went for the most part.

"Oh?" Horatiu snatched a couple of things that paid a passing resemblance to the shoe size measuring devices Rachel had used once upon a lifetime, making his way swiftly back to where she was in the middle of his store. "I take it the 'another a year after' is for when you're finally fully grown, but this fall? So soon?"

Sonya ignored the jab at her age, because the man had a point with that observation. "I have a little... party to attend to this winter. I don't know how long it will be, so having a pair of your insanely comfortable boots to ensure my feet won't suffer is an attractive proposition."

She obediently followed his expansively given gesture to a stool setup in back and hauled off her right boot when he made another of those with a wrist flick at the end.

"Do you have a dress?" Free advertising via patrons was likely how the man stayed in business, but the thief wasn't sure if she would direct any attention her boots gained to him.

Becoming a mafia client might or might not hurt his business, and that would be a poor way to repay Crina for this.

"I figured I might as well build an ensemble from the ground up."

It was the right thing to say, even if Sonya was mostly sure she was lying through her teeth and would instead get her foster sister's help. However, this was the way Tatiana had instructed her to flatter her outfitters when you wanted them to think kindly of you.

From the look on Horatiu's face, he knew it full well even if he was pleased she had given the 'usual' flattery.

"How dressy?"

"It's a black-tie event."

"How droll, little black boots then?"

The Russian smiled a bit slyly. "I was thinking more of a little red dress with knee-high boots, so if you think black will work...?"

"Oh... oh." The older man smiled back, just as slyly and a little wicked. "I think we can do something with that idea, and your marvelous legs."

She blinked and looked down at her stocking clad feature in question with a measure of confusion.

In the background, Crina started to cackle.
Sonya didn't know how Crina managed to pull them from the circus for a day but appreciate it greatly.

She might be a tad bit in love with her new boots.

"I really do wonder what that says about you." Cherep commented idly, tuning up his motorcycle while she perched on a crate of miscellaneous circus items.

"I might have a fetish for boots?" She suggested dryly, flexing her calves and pointing her toes. "These are wonderful, though. Even if they are a little stiff still."

"You're not going to get to a Tatiana-level love for clothing, right?" He asked, sounding genuinely worried.

Sounded worried, but from the smirk he was trying to hide by working on his metal deathtrap it was in tone only.

Scoffing, the thief folded her leather clad legs underneath herself and leaned over to block some of her fellow Cloud's limited light in the moving boxcar. "Christmas is going to be in Mafia Land this year."

"What? Why?"

"We don't want to move Lisa." The news had the stuntman frowning thoughtfully instead of nearly panicking. "She's been on bed-rest for a few months already and since the hospital there is the one that enabled her pregnancy, taking her away from that was decided to be an unwise move."

"So..."

"Just for a few days, please. Lisa's baby might even be born by then, and you might be able to come back to Moscow with them if all goes well."

He considered that for a long moment, eventually giving her a shrug. "I can do a few days for Lisa. Do you know what they're going to call him or her?"

"No, Lisa didn't tell me when I asked about what gender she wanted." Sonya watched him tighten down a few bolts idly, absentley digging around in her purse for her cigarettes. "Are you going to be alright, Cherep? Going on without me, I mean."

"I half expected you to bail eventually." Standing upright, or as well as he could in the cramped confines of the boxcar they were 'watching', he leaned back against the crate she was seated on and gave her a crooked grin as he crossed his arms for the warmth. "I knew this wouldn't be a life you'd like, so the mere fact you were here for the beginning is awesome enough. So thanks, little sis, but I can take it from here."

She shifted, just enough to dig the toe of her boot into his ribs to make him yelp. "Seriously, Cherep."

"I'll be fine, I swear." The stuntman amended himself hastily, rubbing at his abused side. "Master Liam knows what I can do and didn't panic, if I need help he's probably the better bet. So, you're not leaving me without any support. I'm sure Crina wouldn't mind telling you all about anything you'd want to hear about in the years to come."
Cherep's expression when talking about Sonya's master in all things mystic was torn between sour exasperation and disgruntled amusement. He had found it somewhat reassuring and annoying that the thief got on so well with the crotchety old bat, after some time that was.

"So, what about you?"

"...what about me?" She parroted back, confused.

Settling back again, the stuntman ticked various people and things off on one hand. "Well, let's see. I'm set for the time being, Tatiana did a switch and is settled in on her new job, Arseniy and Lisa will probably be occupied for the next twenty years raising their little rug rat. So, what about you? Are you really going to try for that title you said you'd get to Dmitriy years ago?"

What title she told Dmitriy...? "The World's Greatest Thief thing?"

"Yeah... that." Waving one hand around, for what purpose Sonya was too distracted to guess at, Cherep continued in an only mildly sour tone. "If stealing for you is anything like my stunt work is for me, I can fully understand why you don't want to do something else with your life. So? Is that what you're going to work on for the now?"

...it wasn't a bad idea. The Storm-Cloud might have only suggested it in a fit of childishness, making light of the skill and dedication such a thing would really require, but given she was an associate for the 'World's Greatest Hitman'?

"...are you trying to support me in stealing things?" She asked instead of comment on her 'childhood' life-goal, a little amused at the change in view her foster brother seemed to have gone through.

"You are my little sister, who supported me doing what makes me happy." Cherep returned dryly. "Even if me doing it gives you fits. Like... denting iron railing fits."

"I replaced those."

He gave her a sideways look for that, a smirk pulling up one side of his mouth. "And why you think that excuses the very act...?"

"...mafia etiquette."

"Really?"

"You can destroy anything you like in Mafia Land... so long as you pay to have it fixed." His fellow Cloud informed him, only a little embarrassed over knowing and making use of that information.

Like Renato's apartment door, which apparently the hitman had replaced within an hour of the thief finally going to bed that one night.

Cherep whistled lowly. "Well... surprisingly thoughtful of you all."

"It really only happens in Mafia Land."

"And there would be the catch."

Sonya sniffed at him in mock-disapproval, finally lighting the cigarette she had pulled out a little while earlier.

"Well...? An answer to my question, please?"
"I just might." It was an overarching goal to work for, anyways. Something to do besides seriously dig into history to see if she could find any mention of the Arcobaleno, I Prescelti Sette, or just where this world's history deviated from what little she could recall from Rachel's lifetime.

"...huh." Was her brother's answer to that, looking only slightly conflicted over the subject matter. "Well... good?"

She sighed and toed him in the ribs again then ignored his squawk of protest.

He was still such a dork sometimes.

CXC (Monday the 2nd of October, 1967. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Actually leaving the Großes Volksfest for the last time was a quiet affair. She had only made a few friends who she really cared for the opinions' of, so the short and sweet farewell suited her just fine.

Checking in with Dmitriy and informing him she'd be finally 'back' officially after the New Year gained her a semi-disgruntled, semi-thankful glare and a neutral look from Galina. The Lightning's presence in the Rain's office surprised her, but she supposed the other female thief might not have wanted to continue without Tatiana's presence in a mainly male ring of thieves and this was a decent alternative until she found a new group.

She did manage a small meeting with Björm, and marveled over the fact he had shot up a good foot and didn't look borderline staved anymore.

In decent clothing and only slightly illegally employed, he finally looked like the gawky young teenager he was. The Icelander was a bit nervous over seeing her again, but as far as the thief could understand it was more of a 'want to make a good impression' one rather than just being unnerved to see her.

Explaining exactly what she had figured he could do for her distracted him nicely, and she left him to plot and plan how he'd work it out with a warning that he'd start as her 'lackey' in three months.

She really did hate the title, but it was what the kid had worked so hard for. Björm looked perfectly happy with it too.

Mafia Land hadn't really changed much, on the surface. There was an slightly alarming change that happened on a more personal level.

Tatiana's letter hadn't mentioned the fact Lisa was on bed-rest within the hospital. Just that Arseniy had solidly decided not to move from Mafia Land until the pregnancy was over.

"I'm fine." The older woman started before Sonya could say anything, a wry little smirk on her lips. "I made Tats not inform you of this, so you wouldn't panic."

Sonya sank onto her bedside, feeling a little out of sorts. Panic would've been a good assumption for what she'd feel over this, and it did describe what she felt now. "Lisa, are you-"

"Tats' asked me that a fair few times already, Sonya." Lisa reassured her calmly, smoothing down the blanket that was spread over her expanded waistline and legs. "This is happening."

Huffing at her stubbornness, the thief sat back and gave her foster mother a look over. "Are you
"You know, it's fairly silly how much you and your sister like to fuss over me at the moment."
Waving a hand at an entire stack of what looked to be fashion magazines, probably Tatiana's offer for a distraction, and a rather lived-in looking armchair next to her bed, the older woman shook her head. "While I wouldn't say no to some of your more frivolous books, I'm fine sweetie."

"Where is Arseniy, anyways?" Sonya asked, mentally trying to recall the titles of the books she had deposited into her storage unit on the island over the last two years. They would be the easier ones to grab, until the foster sisters cleared it out to sort through.

"Out for lunch, he promised to bring me back something with ham in it." Lisa pursed her lips and gave the armchair, the thief was sure her foster father had taken residence upon for the last leg of her pregnancy, a considering look. "I wish I had thought to ask for some pineapple slices before he left."

"I think the hospital could handle the fruit." She suggested, watching as the older Mafiya woman's expression lit up as she reached for the phone on the bedside table. "Anything else?"

"Anything more and I'll start to feel fat." Taking a moment to place an order, for cottage cheese and the pineapple, the brunette gave her youngest foster daughter a more serious look. "Now, how was your little vacation?"

"Alright, Cherep's doing well and has promised to come here for Christmas."

"I'm asking about you, sweetie, not your brother. Although, it is nice to hear a little more about him than his 'I'm fine, whatever country is very hot or cold' messages."

"...I'll remind him to write more when I go fetch him." She promised awkwardly.

"I'll do it myself when I see him." Lisa countered cheerfully. "Now, about you?"

"I've decided I fail at gathering intel and figured Bjorn could do that better than I could." The thief started hesitantly, encouraged by her accepting nod. "I'm... probably going to attend a Vongola Ball right before Christmas, so I'm probably good for distracting Tatiana for a day or two."

"I'm delighted to hear it."

The tart comment surprised a huff of laughter out of Sonya. "I might have pissed off the Triads this summer."

That obviously surprised Lisa, and the woman frowned slightly. "Might?"

"I don't know what they wanted, or if they needed me or just someone I fitted the profile of. I'll let you know when I figure it out."

"Hmm... odd." Offered the older woman but made motions for her to continue without explaining why she thought that was odd.

"Cherep made a suggestion about why I'm not a typical Classic Cloud, which might pan out. If I, or we, ever find another Classic Cloud user to compare it to." The thief wasn't sure if she liked the idea but liking it or not really shouldn't have a bearing on if it was or not. "He was right about my Polarization of Storm, even if his reasoning was rather... stupid."

"Arseniy won't work as another Cloud?"
"He's not active." She shrugged, of two minds about her foster father's disinterest in Flames.

While not diving into that Pandora's Box of issues would keep the man mainly the same without exaggerating his 'Cloud'-ness, it also meant he was a little vulnerable to Dying Will Flame users.

It was a personal choice, so she wouldn't try to get him to change his mind.

"While interesting and all, this wasn't quite what I wanted to know." Lisa interrupted her thoughts, giving her foster daughter a stern look. "How are you doing, personally?"

"...I made a friend? A very crotchety, old crone of a friend?"

"Much better, sweetie. Continue."
Chapter Notes

The story format is going to change after this. While I liked the thousand word shorts at a time for a short story… this isn't going to be short so that's changing. We'll have a ten-thousand word-cap per chapter still, but it will be more 'story' than 'snapshots'.

CXCI (Thursday the 5th of October, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Tatiana, who had a lot more free-time to just explore than Sonya ever had, took her younger foster sister to her favorite gym when she commented on needing to build up some of her lost skills.

It wasn't called such, it was officially a 'dance studio'. Mafia Land was a resort, however unlawfully inclined the normal clientele was it still had the wives and children of various criminals to cater to as well as the crooks themselves.

The Storm-Cloud found that a little sexist, what was she if not a criminal?

The redheaded Sun's favored dance studio was mainly just that, a building full of empty rooms with mirrored walls and a barre in most of them. There was, in the basement, an entirely equipped gymnastic training room… but little else of a more 'gym' bent.

Tatiana ignored Sonya's dubious expression, cheerfully reserving them a somewhat smaller studio for the next few hours.

Well… it couldn't be worse than Aleksandr's underground training room. The former pickpocket turned jewel thief would be surprised if the man had ever cleaned it himself, leaving that up to the younger generations going through his doors.

"So!" The safecracker turned nurse whirled on her little sister, distracting her from inspecting the automatically locking doorknob with an eye to pick it. "Renato Sinclair, spill. How did you meet tall, dark, and snarky?"

"Technically… he met me." Sonya corrected with a measure of bemusement, wondering why she wanted to know and unable to divine a suitably convincing reason on her own.

Curiosity, maybe?

"Back… way back, I think I was eleven. A few months before my twelfth birthday."

Looking entirely unsatisfied with that, her older sister planted her hands on her hips and pouted.

"That's all you're going to give me?"

"Why not ask him?"

"I think he's avoiding me." She informed her cheerfully, as if that wasn't so out of character for her associate it was slightly concerning. "Sinclair made a personal copy of your Sun book, asked me a couple questions about the missing sections, and I haven't really seen him much since."
As the younger woman wasn't all that sure of the etiquette of one's hitman associate meeting a thief's foster sister either, so she supposed that might have been the safer bet until the thief herself was there to mediate. "Oh... okay."

"That's all you're going to say, huh?" Sighing in disapproval, the redhead practically bounced over to the barre and threw a leg up to start stretching. "So disappointed in you, Sonya."

"What? Why?" Baffled, the blonde nearly tripped over her own feet when she was still halfway across the room as she tried to understand what it was her older sister was disappointed over.

Tatiana spun around, looking like she was a breath away from saying something bitingly sarcastic or snarky, then blanched slightly at Sonya's confused stare. "Oh, no. Not like that. I swear."

"What the hell are you talking about?"

"Relax, Sonya. I was teasing." Holding up her hands, like you would to try reassuring a cornered animal, the redhead tried a slightly timid smile. "Sorry, forgot about your social awkwardness."

Exasperated, and feeling a little sore over the whole thing, she gifted her elder sister with a glare. "Try speaking plainly. Please. I'm a little young for a heart-attack."

Of course, then her sister continued to confuse her completely.

"What do you think of Renato?"

"...he's an ass." The thief started warily, encouraged by the nurse's nod and hand wave to carry on. "Flirts with everything that moves and is remotely female, although... I haven't seen very many ugly women on the island."

"And how does that make you feel?"

Still not following where she was going, Sonya gave her a sideways look as she finally reached the barre. "I... don't follow."

Another sigh, then the redhead elaborated. "Are you annoyed when he flirts?"

"Not really, so long as he doesn't do it when we're in the middle of a conversation." She admitted candidly, thinking back over years of coffee/tea meetings the two of them had for the last couple of years. "That is annoying, because then I have to figure out where his comment to me ended and where his flirting with the waitress begins."

Tatiana sighed yet again, sweeping her loose hair over her shoulder. "Somedays, I really do wonder..."

"Wonder what?"

"Never mind." Answered the Sun cheerfully, then gave her little sister a sly look. "So... are you still a virgin?"

Sonya froze, in a very uncomfortable pose. "...what?"

"You are, tisk. So sad, Sonya." The older Russian in the room grinned widely again, then leaned up against the mirror wall. Blatantly disinterested in getting some exercise in for the few hours they had the room for. "All that time out and about, and you never found someone that you wanted to jump into bed with?"
Scowling, the younger sister unbent and edged away from her. "Tats, I love you and all... but there are these things called sexually transmitted diseases. Some of the places I've been? Would not be surprised to learn they had a few of them lurking around."

"You have an answer to just about everything, don't you? Well... everything you understand, anyways." The redhead mused aloud sourly, batting one hand in the air as if to physically dismiss the point. "What about now that you're not babysitting our dorky foster brother in the wicked civilian world? Are you going to find yourself a man or not?"

"Cherep's not a... well, I guess he is. Kind of." Sonya corrected herself mid-sentence, her scowl fading into a frown. "And why would I need a man?"

"To reach the top shelf, of course." She informed her seriously, rolling her eyes after a moment and huffing a laugh. "To loosen up a little, hopefully. Maybe you won't be as uptight after a wild night or two."

"...how did we get from Renato being an ass to my non-existent sex-life?"

"Oh god." Hand firmly planted across her eyes, the Sun made a dismissive gesture in the air between them. "You know what? Never mind, Lisa can have this conversation with you."

She stared at the elder for a long moment. "...I still don't understand."

"I know. Not much help, am I?" She drew her hand down her face, then gave her a small smirk. "Seriously, put it out of your mind. You wanted a little help getting back in shape, right?"

"Why did you start a conversation just to end it like this?" Sonya asked instead, a little more than frustrated.

"Girl talk, which backfired rather spectacularly might I add." The redhead answered dryly. "You suck at it."

"...sorry?"

"Practice makes perfect." The smirk turned rather nasty all of a sudden. "And I intend to make sure you practice."

CXCII (Friday the 6th of October, 1967. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

After twenty months of little physical training, except the weekly gymnastic and acrobatic training she could maybe sneak in under Jiayi's eye, Sonya wasn't surprised to feel as if someone worked her over with a metal bar after just the first day of keeping up with Tatiana. Unfortunately, she also had to manage three contracts for Mafia Land and not just work on shaping up after her little 'vacation'.

"Actually, you don't." Tatiana corrected, while the foster sisters were taking lunch in Lisa's hospital room. "Since I am currently an employee of Mafia Land too, I have a storage unit of my own. I've been meaning to ask you about my stuff you've been storing, and we could totally just shove your stuff in with mine."

"You also have an apartment of your own you don't use." Their foster mother added dryly, stealing a little of Sonya's Chicken Lo Mein to supplement her own meal of Sweet and Sour Pork.

The thief let her, since she wasn't the one eating for two at the moment. "...that's-

"Speaking of," the redhead carried on over the blonde, "I wanted to know if you wanted to share an apartment with me. Instead of getting one of the rinky-dink little singles. The doubles are a lot better in terms of space."

"That's -"

"You are kind of homeless at the moment, ya know."

"Tatiana. Let your sister speak." Lisa interrupted before she could carry on, looking faintly exasperated.

"But she'll say no!" Pouting, the Sun batted wide eyes at the older brunette. "Cherep had her for two years, I want some time too!"

"It's fine, Tatiana. If that's what you want to do." Sonya raised her voice at the beginning just to catch her attention, sighing when the redhead gaped at her. "I don't know what kind of roommate I'll be, so if you want to risk that...?"

"What risk?" Tatiana scoffed, looking both a little sheepish and mollified at the same time. "You're a neat freak unless it comes to books, then you might end up entombed by them."

Sighing heavily at them, their foster mother polished off the last of her younger daughter's Lo Mein and set the fork she was using on her hospital bed tray. "Sharing an apartment is a lot different than living in the same house, girls. Sonya, you also have to think of Björn and where he's going to live."

"We'll clean out a closet for him."

"We're not doing that," Sonya corrected in the next moment, faintly irritated. "How hard would it be to get a triple with only two of us?"

"Harder than I think you want to deal with." Lisa admitted a little wryly. "Thirty to forty contracts a year for a thief. Even with Tatiana, whose steady work here would probably amount to the equivalent of five to ten contracts?"

She barely managed five over the course of four months currently, so that probably was not within her grasp right now. "And if I qualify for a double then Tats and I apply to share an apartment?"

"That would be much easier. Very sly, sweetie. Twenty to thirty, but since you're about ready to work full-time?"

Tatiana looked faintly confused. "Then what are we going to do until you pull that in?"

"Lisa? How long can we abuse the Zolotovs' hospitality?"

"You two are Zolotovs, there is no way to abuse it." Their foster mother answered with a serene little smirk.

"We'll try out living in close quarters at the condo," Explained the Storm-Cloud for the redhead's benefit, "Bjorn could live in your apartment until we're ready to move in. If we decide it's not going to work out, I'll still need a double and he'd probably keep your place clean if we remind him to."

"Awesome!"
"You may hate me as a roommate." Sonya cautioned, still feeling rather pleased with herself for settling this. "Or hate my multitude of books."

"I'll hate your smoking." Predicted the nurse easily enough. "And you'll natter at me about cleaning the kitchen, or the bathroom."

"...I don't actually know how to cook beyond the simple basics Lisa showed us."

"Right, you clean and I'll cook."

With a snicker, their foster mother made a shooing motion at them both. "Off you two go then. I think I need a nap."

"Well... after finishing both your own and my lunch?" She ducked the flannel pillow she was certain was Arseniy's before it impacted her face. "Are you still hungry, Lisa? Because I still need to eat, and since somehow I lost all my food?"

Grabbing the younger thief's arm, the Sun ducked out of the hospital room before Lisa reached for the standard issued hospital pillows she was propped up on. "So, you can tease someone, but can't understand when you're being teased?"

"It's easier to get if there's a joke or something leading up to said teasing. Cherep figured that one out." Sonya admitted bluntly. "It's not that I don't understand, it's shifting mental gears to account for it instead of take it seriously. I apparently don't do it quickly enough."

"Noted." Tatiana slated a sly look her way. "Still going to insist you're not socially incompetent?"

"...shut up. I'm not that bad." She muttered sourly. "Awkward, maybe."

"Mmhmm, whatever you want to call it by."

"Don't you have work to be getting back to?"

"Don't you have a gym to be hitting?" The nurse countered cheerfully, with a completely evil looking smirk. "You look a bit sore, Sonya. Want a little help?"

Sticking her nose in the air, her younger sister slightly limped off to find something else for lunch. Tatiana's snickers followed her out of the hospital corridor.

CXCIII (Monday the 9th of October, 1967. Mafia Land.)

The café Sonya liked had set out a little metal ashtray at her and Renato's usual spot.

It couldn't have been for anyone else, as the ashtray was anchored to the table by a couple artistic looking welds and was present on no other little café table around it.

The thief was a little confused, because it had been a while since she was a semi-regular customer. Appreciative nonetheless, she made a mental note to tip the wait staff a little better than normally and dug into one of the history books she had picked up over the last two years.

It was old, which didn't mean more accurate. Just more biased for the country it was for.
Sonya didn't get into it very far before a certain hitman took the seat across from her.

She had heard rumors of his return before he could track her down for once.

"You still want me to attend that Vongola party with you?"

Renato stole her pack of cigarettes off the tabletop, looking queerly at the Marlboro brand across the side as he plucked one of the premade tubes of tobacco out of it. "Are you still thinking about it?"

"If you made no other plans, I will go with you. I do want to see Shamal, after all." Sighing, the Russian marked her spot and set her book on the table.

The Inverted Sun lit his cigarette with the trick she showed him earlier in the year, tossing the pack back across to her. "Well... who am I to say no to little lady Sonya?"

"I could easily just not go, if you rather?"

With a disgruntled little huff, he sank backwards into the café chair and moodily glared across the table. "You spent all of the year thinking about it, and barely two months before it happens you decide to go along? What, exactly, will I owe you for this?"

"...owe?"

That pulled the hitman up short, and the man frowned as he took a very long drag from his stolen smoke. "Sorry, Sonya. I've had a very bad couple of weeks."

She nodded to the waitress that brought out their drinks but fixed the Italian with a mildly confused look instead of try a sip. "Do I want to know?"

"The famiglia I... for the lack of a better word inherited, had a few dealings before me of which came due." The Mafioso informed her bitterly. "So, I'm a bit... stuck, until I can sort it out."

"Tell them 'so sorry, should not have let them be taken over'?" The thief suggested, surprising a bark of laughter out of the hitman.

"If I wanted them murdered to a man after I was gone, that wouldn't be a bad suggestion."

Renato had a smirk on his face now, which she decided was better all around.

Pissy hitmen were... well, pissy.

Sonya flexed her aching calves absently, finally taking a sip of her rapidly cooling tea. "Right, so. This party, any color I have to avoid or conform to?"

"It's generally a thing to dress in your Flame colors." He informed her dryly. "Which one did you want to play with?"

"I was thinking red, with gold and purple highlights. Mainly in jewelry." She admitted, even if that suggested a Storm more than a Cloud from what he told her about the color choices... and a tiny bit of Sun.

No reason to give a solid warning if she could help it.

"You just adore confusing people, don't you?"

"A little, yeah." It made up for the times she got baffled over other people, so sue her.
Renato snorted at her, abandoning the cigarette he stole from her in favor of his espresso. "I can work with red and purple."

"Are you not going in yellow?"

"For you, Sonya, not me." He corrected her, just a touch drier than his tone had been before. "What are you going to need, anyways?"

"The jewelry, which I have to get done custom." Sonya started, a little confused. "And a dress, but I will get Tatiana's help for that. What in the world do you need to get me?"

"Generally, it's polite to get the lady something for the consideration of attending an evening out with oneself." The womanizing hitman informed her haughtily, with a small toss of his spiky head. "So, what would you like?"

She blankly stared at him.

He scowled back. "Are you going to be difficult about this?"

"...what is wrong with flowers?" She asked after a moment, now really confused.

She had expected that much, but what the hell was up with him?

It wasn't like she couldn't afford her own dress or jewelry, especially since she'd be the one supplying the stones for it.

Renato blinked at her, taken aback. "Flowers?"

"For my hair?" Sonya suggested, more than a little exasperated as she ran a hand through the shoulder length mass. "I suppose I will keep it this long until after this little party, but then I am getting it cut be more manageable."

"Ho... I can do flowers." The hitman gifted her with a bemused look. "Is that really all you want from me for this?"

"I am also taking up your suggestion of quartering me in Vongola's guest suites, so I can see Shamal, so... yes?"

He snorted into his espresso cup, lowering it to shoot her a rather crooked grin. "You might just be my favorite date so far."

"...just to be clear, we are going to spend most of the night either making snarky comments on our fellow mafia members' snooty behavior or mocking their brown nosing, right?"

"Definitely my favorite date."

Sonya was going to take that as a yes.

CXCIV (Saturday the 7th of October, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Fashions in late 1967 included mini-skirts only falling to mid-thigh, stockings in styles from fishnet to lace, bare arms and shoulders, paper dresses, box-dresses, a lot of bright colors, plaid, and vinyl.
Sonya vetoed most of it right off, to Tatiana's face. If she was going to be shelling out the cash for a high-society dress, she was going to get some decent mileage out of it.

She used some of the money she earned hawking a few extra pieces from various jobs over the years to pay for her jewelry, commissioning a set of Nordic inspired pieces in gold plated steel.

Given that it was Mafia Land, the fact the axes on the charm bracelet was requested to be sharp enough to cut flesh wasn't even blinked at. The thief got a weirder look for the Thor's Hammer pendant, which wasn't obviously a 'last-ditch' weapon.

To anyone aside her, that is.

Turning a few of her Bec de Corbins into additional if oversized bracelet charms wouldn't be too hard, except they had a silver sheen to them. She would use two of the tungsten ones as hair sticks, but she wasn't going to obviously wear them.

The Flame-resistant metal was still an unknown alloy, until she found someone that could identify them she'd stick to using the ones she did know what metal made them up.

The sisters argued over what, exactly, Sonya had or didn't have to do. Tatiana was of the opinion the thief would be representing Russian interests, which said thief wasn't entirely sure of. "I'm going as a plus one, not as someone invited on her own merit."

"As a what?" The redhead parroted back, entirely confused.

"A plus one, you know? 'You and a guest are invited to' such and such event, you and plus one." Waving a hand as if to pluck a way to describe it better out of the air, the blonde eventually huffed and resigned herself to doing badly at it. "Point being, I'm arm candy. Renato asked me to go to spare him the matchmaking attempts aimed in his direction."

She pouted up at her, having seated herself on the floor to stretch out her legs. "That's still not a reason to not look smashing."

"I'm not objecting to look smashing." Countered the younger sister out of exasperation, returning her attention to both draining her Cloud Flames through one of her Bec de Corbins and her upside-down stomach crunches hanging off the pole set into the walls by her knees. "But I will not be pandering to the latest craze of stupidity in fashion. There will be a snowball fight, so no one with sense would wear paper."

"So... basically all the mafia Dons' wives, pretty much."

"I don't know, some of them have to have a brain to live like that."

"I've met a couple. Probably minor ones, but they didn't really impress me as serious thinkers." Commented the older Russian with a one-shoulder shrug as she twisted herself into a split. "But you will be probably one of a tiny handful of foreign mafia people at this party, shouldn't you try to impress and dazzle them so they'll think better of Russia's underworld?"

"Next time, I'll tell him to take you." Sonya muttered, a little irritated by the party talk.

She had forgotten how annoying Tatiana could be when it came to fashion.

With a sigh, her elder sister rolled up off the ground with the grace a childhood of ballet training had impressed on them. "Alright, so you've got the boots and are in the process of getting your jewelry done. But we still need to find you a dress. Red, maybe with some purple, and not the 'shapeless "bags' currently in vogue. Right?"

"Right."

"You know, Twiggy made being shapeless all the rage...?"

The former pickpocket slanted a flat look down at her foster sister. "I'm not Twiggy."

That fashion model had the body type any ballerina would envy, but both thieves in the room were a little too well built to pull the same look off.

"Fine." The redhead huffed, making an annoyed little mope in her younger sister's direction. "Let me see what I've got in my closet. There might be a style you'll like, even if it ends up being a little out of date."

"We can always modernize it a little after we find a style." Shot back the Storm-Cloud with a huff, allowing herself to swing off her polearm acting as a pull-up bar to the ground when she started to feel a slight burn in her abs.

It took her about two hours to drain herself of Cloud Flames now. Sonya wasn't sure if that was a good thing or not, or even what it meant. When she had been fifteen, it took an hour and a half of constant use to do the same thing. She didn't feel any stronger, in fact she had let her Cloud Flames go for the last two years.

Her Storm Flames had seen more use, which did pay off in a tiny bit of control in it. she could light things on fire specifically instead of just watching everything go up in red Flames.

Well... it was progress of a sort. If she ever found out how to use her Sun Flames, then she'd be set.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 20th of December, 1967. Mafia Land.)

Out of all the dresses and fashion magazines Tatiana had, the sisters eventually settled on a halter-top dress that fell to mid-thigh. A fitted bodice would prevent Sonya from conforming to the 'shapeless' style in fashion, and with no sleeves or shoulders and a bare back it at least fit into the current trends.

With that settled, she raced around from Ukraine back to Mafia Land for her boots and fittings, then helped her sister move her own books and the redhead's old teenager-era stuff into the other storage unit. Within that, she also had to pick up her finished jewelry and find the last few touches for her outfit as well as find something to give Shamal for Christmas.

By the time the week before her birthday, which coincidentally happened to be the week before the Vongola Ball, the former gypsy's apprentice was just barely done with everything she needed to do.

Had she still had to take contracts, she wouldn't have been able to manage it all and her retraining.

"You're still going to pick up Cherep, right?" Tatiana asked the thief as she checked over what she had packed for a few days long visit to Italy.

"On my way back, yeah." Sonya confirmed absently. "We might be a tad bit late, but we'll be here for Christmas. By the USSR calendar, anyways."

The nurse nodded in response, nibbling on her lower lip. "I don't think Lisa's going to go into labor anytime soon, but it might happen. I'll call if it does."
Their foster mother was now almost eight months pregnant. With the uncertainty over the mother's health to give birth, the doctors in charge of her case were sounding out both Lisa and Arseniy for a C-section instead of a labor.

The younger woman sighed, tossing her make-up bag onto her suitcase. "Thanks, Tats."

"Mmm... have fun."

CXCV (Friday the 22nd of December, 1967. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Miss Sonya!"

"Shamal! Get back here, your imaginary friend isn't a reason to disobey directions."

"What the fuck did you just call me?"

A rather harassed looking nursemaid skidded to a halt in the middle of the foyer, openly gaping at the Russian Storm-Cloud glaring back at her while a tetchy Mist brat took refuge behind her legs.

Renato coughed, likely to cover a snicker, behind her. He also, noticeably, didn't bother to try to set either the maid straight on her existence or interfere between his thief associate and the older woman.

With a huff, Sonya dismissed the ignorant woman from her attention and looked down to Shamal. "Kid, why are you hiding?"

"She's mean." He informed her as if the thief was a little slow to catch on to the obvious, tugging at her pant leg a couple times.

She obediently bent to pick him up, absently noting how much he had grown since last year. "That isn't a reason to hide, that's a reason to irritate her until she quits in disgust."

The hitman shamelessly loitering in the background suddenly had an attack of coughs, which he was trying to hide his laughter behind.

He failed miserably.

"Shamal... what's this?" The Russian gently poked the kid's cheek, where a fading bruise was still apparent.

"He fell." Nursemaid that was fast getting on her nerves informed the both of them hesitantly, only to squeak when she shot her a disgusted look.

"I fell." Shamal echoed obediently.

"Try again, brat. I've been in enough combat practice to see what the imprint of someone's knuckles looks like after a few days."

Tetchy baby Mist scowled at her, but he was way too young to really convey any serious disgruntlement. "I got into a fight with Jacopo, but I kicked his knee and he fell on his butt."

She sniffed at the news, then gave an awkward shrug given she had about thirty to forty pounds of kid hanging off her. "Well, so long as you got the brat back for it I suppose it's alright. Next time try to make him think you're closer than you are using your Flames. The best way to avoid getting hit is Renato huffed, but whether in agreement or to clear his throat after his muffled laughter was debatable. He did reach over the thief's shoulder to use a bit of Sun Flames to clear away the last of the bruise. "Sonya, this lady is Daphne. One of the minders for the nursery Vongola runs."

"Yeah...? Don't care. She's both blind and easily led." Dismissed the Storm-Cloud in the room with a touch of irritation.

"She's also another Mist."

"Still don't care." She reaffirmed, shaking a finger under Shamal's nose. "That is a bad example of a Mist, kid. No imagination, unable to conceive of a 'supposed' impossibility, and way too gullible. Don't turn out like her, I don't associate with bad Mists."

He nodded seriously, which really was a touch cute.

Nurse who Sonya already forgot the name of huffed. "Excuse me!"

"You're not excused. Did or did you not call me 'imaginary'?" She scoffed, giving the appalled woman a sneer. "Maybe we should check to see if you're not the figment of some other Mist's imagination?"

Coughing again, that time to either cover another laugh or to gain attention like he had, Renato planted a hand on the thief's back and gave a light push. "Sonya, Miss Daphne, we're becoming a bit of a spectacle. Thank you, Miss Daphne, but we'll take Shamal from here."

Looking around curiously while resisting the guidance simply on principle, the lone Russian noted that the hitman was right. A fair number of people were gawking in their direction, craning their necks around various doors and halls that branched off from Vongola's grandiose main entranceway.

"The children have history class now." Said nurse who had a backbone if no brain cells insisted, reaching out to take Shamal from the blonde's arms.

She froze when Sonya pinned her in place with a glare that begged her to be that stupid. "He said we'd take the brat from here, miss."

Renato's hand immediately disappeared from her back, and the nurse gave another squeak.

Shamal hugged her around the neck. "You look really pretty, Miss Sonya."

"Thanks kid, but I think you're supposed to tell me that after I get dolled up for this party thing." She informed him with a bit of bemusement, patting him on the back with the arm holding him up. "You're a little early with that."

"But you are pretty."

Blinking, the thief shot the hitman a sideways look. "That sounds like a line."

"I would never tell him to say that." He insisted with fake wounded dignity, pressing a hand to his chest. "That was entirely too tawdry to come from me."

Nurse who Sonya barely recalled a name for gave a gasp and fainted dead away.

Entirely baffled, she stared down at her insensible form then shot a look at the Mafioso that invited her here. "What's wrong with her now?"
"...I have no idea." Renato drawled dryly, giving her a moderately exasperated one in return. "It might be the fact she just had a close encounter with a Cloud that didn't really care for her much, and almost ticked said Cloud off enough to have her arms removed and beaten with them?"

With a huff, Sonya snatched her luggage from the man with her free arm. "I am not that bad."

"You can be, it's just that you're not usually." He countered calmly, entirely unbothered by her actions. "It makes you a little... unpredictable, you know. Your eyes were also purple, when she tried to take Shamal from you."

"Yes, well... she's not all that bright, is she?" She bit back her annoyance over the news the girl did manage to provoke such a response from her. "Where are you sticking me for the next few days, anyways?"

"This way... on second thought, just follow me."

CXCVI (Saturday the 23rd of December, 1967. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

She had managed to guess the right region of Italy for Vongola's headquarters, if not the right landmass.

The massive Italian Familia was based out of the southern end of the country, just at the very tip of the 'boot' shaped landmass and not on the island of Sicily. The Consulenza Esterna Della Famiglia was based on the island, and the thief assumed that when it came time for it the Varia would probably end up near or around where Renato's inherited syndicate was currently.

In short, basically the entire southern half of the country was practically Vongola territory, counting various alliances and lesser familie that looked to them for protection.

The 'Iron Fort' itself was still in the process from being converted from a fully functioning World War Two bunker-war headquarters into a stately if grandiose mansion. Even if there was going to be a ball in as little as three days, there was still scores of what seemed like personally maintained construction crews reshaping the fortified walls into less bland eyesores.

It would still be an 'iron' fortress, just a prettier one.

Sonya didn't see a whole lot of it, because the staff had a nasty habit of staring at her.

That unnerved her, especially for a foreign criminal in a native's home base, making her both twitchy and a little nervous. She couldn't figure out why they kept sneaking little peeks her way or blatantly gawking at her passing, other than the fact she was a Russian in Italy.

Unfortunately, 'twitchy' and 'nervous' weren't good states for any Cloud. To distract herself, the thief practically abducted Shamal for long walks around the local town while Renato had 'Don' duties to attend to.

Also... to not get herself in trouble with the massive libraries and her little book hoarding issues.

The hitman was still trying to fob his newly acquired familie off on Nono Vongola, if he could only solve whatever little problem that popped up. He got highly busy in the few days they were waiting for the Ball to kick off, making connections for his inherited syndicate and trying to search out a decent candidate to replace him from Vongola's pool of Mafiosi.
Much too busy to spend any time showing her around or just presenting her as his Soviet 'contact', which irked him something fierce.

Since she did recognize he had values and some kind of honor thing tied into his 'ladies' man' persona, she only asked he show up for breakfast with her and insisted she would be fine with the brat.

He was the reason she agreed to any of this after all.

Renato hadn't been exactly happy with that, shooting her a look to say he knew perfectly well what she was doing and that she wasn't really alright, but at least he didn't imitate her Flame type while in those meetings.

Baby Mist was not at all opposed to spending time with the Russian thief instead of whatever school things his Vongola caretakers were trying to cram into the kids' heads before the winter-New Year's break. He took ruthless advantage of her upset state with the Iron Fort's staff and got her to buy his guardian a Christmas gift, guilt-tripping her into it by claiming she had missed the hitman's birthday.

Sonya's sour mutter of 'he was going to forget hers' didn't buy her any leniency.

It was on the return of that specific trip the day of the ball she was there for, with the tiny Mist holding his prize aloft like a victorious soldier returning from war, that she finally met Nono Vongola in the flesh.

The Don of the Famiglia she was staying with was returning from some appointment at the same time the Russian Storm-Cloud and her bratty Mist tagalong were from their walk.

"Miss Nikishina!" Timoteo Vongola called out before the two of them reached the front doors, causing the thief to start and look around for who was calling her by her maiden name. "A moment, if you would?"

Since the man was hosting her in his... fortress, and she was genuinely curious if a Sky had a 'feel', she collared Shamal before the brat could get more than a couple steps further and gently pulled him to a stop by the back of his light jacket. "Of course."

The Boss nodded in acceptance of her acceptance and turned to speak rapidly with one of his Guardians, which one she was too far away to tell but she was pretty sure that was Ganauche either the First or Second.

When the man finally reached her and the Mist brat, Sonya dipped into a curtsy and poked the brat in the back of the head to get him to bow at the right time. "Did you need something from me, Don Vongola?"

"I've been meaning to have a word with you for a few days now, but you seem to be a very active type of woman. Never in the same spot twice, as it were." Timoteo informed her with a small smile, which curiously reminded her of her Pakhan's. Like a shark's grin, a bit too much teeth showing to be genuinely well-meaning. "Is there a reason for that?"

"Your staff will not stop staring at me." The thief admitted bluntly, keeping half her attention on the baby Mist so he wouldn't get up to something while 'adult things' were going on. "While a typical Cloud of my Polarization would not care... I am not typical."

The man, who was arguably one of the more powerful figures in the mafia at the moment, gave her a look over and a slow nod. "I... see. I shall be blunt then, for I know Clouds prefer it. They cannot decide if you are a Cloud or not for you are, as you said, not typical for one."
"...I could knock someone through a couple walls, if you believe that would aid them?"

"You know, my dear, I cannot decide if you are being serious or joking."

"Entirely serious, Don Vongola." Sonya reassured the man blandly, poking Shamal in the forehead before he did whatever it was that required such concentration on the nearby rose bush. "They have irritated me more than enough for me to enjoy it, even if none but that one nurse has actually made a bad impression."

Timoteo's eyebrows flew upward, and the man she was sure was no more than a decade or so older than her rubbed at his jaw thoughtfully. "I heard about that incident. Was it necessary to scare poor Miss Daphne so?"

"Forgive me, Don Vongola, but all I did was glare." The thief was at least somewhat sure he was talking about that fainting nurse. "She was also the one who called me Shamal's 'imaginary friend' when I was standing in front of her."

"Ah... well, I understand then." Nono Vongola's shark-toothed grin was exchanged for a slightly more humor inspired one, which also looked a tiny bit more real on his face. "I would be most upset to be called imaginary to my own face as well."

"Sir, I hate to interrupt... but you do have a meeting in only a few minutes." The man wearing the ring of the Vongola Rain Guardian interjected, sounding completely bland and unruffled at the sudden attention aimed his way.

Well... Rain. He probably had to be one of the best to become a Vongola Guardian out of every Rain that called the Famiglia home.

"Ah, thank you Schnitten." Sonya blinked, but apparently that was the man's name... or title. "Save me a dance, Miss Nikishina? I've been meaning to ask you about how your Soviet Union sees Dying Will Flame users."

"Of course, Don Vongola. Although, I am not sure how much help I will be."

"From what Sinclair had to say, a little more than you will admit to in polite conversation." Timoteo hinted at with a sly seeming smirk, then gave her a nod and the still silent if somewhat sulky Shamal one as well as he finally entered the door the footman had been holding open since the blonde Russian got in range of it.

Huh... the thief couldn't decide if a Sky did have a 'feel' or not. She forgot to check.

CXCVII (Sunday the 24th of December, 1967. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Renato irritably straightened his tie again in the mirror, not remotely looking forward to the evening's 'festivities'.

At least he had managed to get himself out of next year's Valentine's Day Ball, and hopefully he wouldn't have to attend very many more of these in future years.

While Sonya would improve the quality of the company he was going to be forced to accept, it wasn't like he held much confidence in getting her to agree to come along again. Unless the Russian really enjoyed the night, which wasn't likely for even she didn't particularly like dealing with a crowd of people.

The hitman spun on his heel, giving the watching Shamal an expectant look. "Well?"

"You look the same as you always do, Mister Renato." The annoying brat commented, idly playing with the box that had held the fedora he had somehow convinced a Storm-Cloud to buy for him. "Can we go see Miss Sonya now?"

Well... if that wasn't a sign of where he fell in the kid's esteem the hitman would give up drinking. Really, Sonya was only that highly thought of because she had more free-time to spend on him than he had lately.

"Yes, fine. Let's go collect a thief." He muttered mulishly, snatching up the rather fetching hat he had been gifted with.

At least Shamal had some taste, even if it was only for what Renato would accept. Maybe the thief had chipped in a little on that end?

It was a rather fine piece of work.

Black felt and with a band of bright canary yellow positioned just above the brim. His favorite colors.

Tetchy Mist brat scrambled to grabbed the bouquet of flowers the Russian had asked for, and practically bounced to the door of the hitman's guest suite. Rolling his eyes, the man himself followed him more sedately.

Shamal had been back and forth from Sonya's suite to everywhere else in the mansion so frequently over the last few days he would have traveled the distance blindfolded, so the Sun user was not remotely surprised the kid reached her door long before him.

He was surprised that she promptly answered the door instead of calling out for a 'minute'.

...so, he wasn't going to have to be fashionably late this evening. Pity.

"Shamal? Oh... perfect. I've been waiting for those."

Baby Mist rather dumbly stumbled into the thief's suite, which made Renato curious enough to pick up his pace.

Sonya was in the middle of picking out a couple red lilies from the flowers he had supplied, turning back to the floor-length mirror in the sitting room to thread the stems into her messy bun. "One moment, I'm almost done."

'When the hell did Sonya grow up' was the hitman's first thought, followed closely by 'damn...'

She really did have very nice legs, and with them clad in black leather to offset her bright red dress they drew the eye almost automatically. Not conforming to current fashions by showcasing she had curves in her fitted dress, she was also obviously female and proud to show it.

Her bicep full of tattoos would be a little out of place, but he didn't really see a reason for her not to show them off since he knew full well they were marks of her accomplishments in her native part of the world.

While she might not be in fashion, she was still shockingly different in a way that was very familiar.
He wondered if she was wearing stockings or garters for the strip of skin between knee and the hem of her dress.

"You look really pretty, Miss Sonya." Shamal informed her seriously, still holding onto the bundle of flowers until the thief took the rest of them and placed them in a nearby empty vase. "Really."

"You know, you use that line too much and it starts to get a tiny bit stale." She informed him a touch dryly, bending down and planting a wet kiss on his cheek. "But thank you."

Her action left a bright red lip mark on the Mist's rapidly reddening face and answered the hitman's internal question. Garters.

Sonya's grin was entirely roguish. "I dare you to leave that in place all night."

"Y-yeah? Well... I double dog dare you to do it to Mister Renato."

She glanced up at the hitman then back down to the kid. "We unfortunately have a party to attend... so maybe later."

Shamal sniffed at her.

"He'll have one by night's end."

"Do I get a say in this?" Renato managed to find his tongue in time to prevent this little counter-dare from going farther, huffing when the Russian shot him a bland smile and pulled her lipstick out of a bag on her couch to reapply the coat she lost to Shamal's still red cheeks.

Recapping the tube of makeup, Sonya cocked her head at him. "Are you dressed up? You look like you usually do."

The hitman glowered at her, which turned into a glare when she tossed her pack of cigarettes and her damn lipstick at him.

"What? This dress doesn't have pockets."

...no, no it didn't. At least, not one that wouldn't crush whatever was kept in it. "Why didn't you buy a clutch?"

"I don't do this kind of thing that often to recall every bit that goes into it." She waved that critique away with a shrug of barred shoulders, pulling a sheer red shawl out of her suitcase to loop around herself. "Also? I find it a tiny bit suspicious you know what that word means."

Renato glared at her harder, but the damn thief merely blinked back at him innocently as she attached a gold charm bracelet to her left wrist.

...were those axes?

Odd choice for jewelry.

Shamal, the brat, snickered.

CXCVIII (Sunday the 24th of December, 1967 continued. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)
Sonya took a sip of her entirely too sweet champagne and then winced again as her eyes protested the sight of yet another party-goer. "Nine o'clock, the girl in the box-dress of neon pink and green."

The Iron Fort's ballroom, or one of them anyways, was a very beautiful room. High walls with mirrors inlaid on the wall that didn't have expanses of windows, three crystal chandeliers spaced evenly apart overhead, a theme of gold and orange in the decor offsetting the massive evergreen dressed up as a Christmas tree behind the orchestra pit.

It was a glittering high society showcase for a room full of major criminal puppet masters and their better socialized enforcers.

There were a good hundred or two people already within the ballroom before the hitman led her in, and it seemed as if there was yet another hundred or so more to go before the Ball really kicked off.

"...almost too easy." Renato informed her almost lazily. "Candy Cane reject that auditioned for Easter. The gentleman three groups away to the back-right."

Humming, she considered the man in houndstooth tweed for a moment. "A Sherlock Holmes wanna-be with too much pork. Same group, the man in blue."

"Someone who desperately needs Sherlock's pork instead of him. A group one closer to us from them, the girl with the hat."

"Which one? The girl with too much love for birds on her head, or the one that looks like a mourner in her Sunday-best?"

He huffed a light laugh, tilting his brand-new fedora up with one long finger to get a better look at the both of them. "Well... I suppose that counts as two."

"Why thank you, kind sir." She snarked back, slitting a sideways glance to him and taking in the smirk he was wearing. She was rather happy she could amuse him so, considering the last couple days he had been elbow deep in syndicate business he apparently didn't like much, and this was fun. "The bitch holding up the line."

Glancing over to Don Vongola and his current issue, the hitman snorted in disgust. "Croc-zilla. I actually know that woman, she's been trying to set me up with her eldest daughter."

"Not your type?"

"She looks like a horse," Renato muttered darkly, "and has all the personality of a dead mouse."

Sonya hummed noncommittally, ensuring her staring in that direction wouldn't attract attention by scanning the entire greeting line either waiting to say their few words to Timoteo Vongola and his Guardians or working past them to other famiglia Dons and their sons and daughters or seconds who had an alliance with Nono.

"I believe that will count as an extra, given you gave me both ladies a round before." The younger girl behind 'Croc-zilla' really did look like a horse.

"Much too kind, little lady Sonya."

"Probably." She agreed a touch dryly.

"Twelve o'clock, the lady in green." A new voice interjected, causing both hitman and thief to turn to see Tyr the Sword Emperor standing slightly behind them fully.
Sonya glanced that way, frowned, then took a slower look across the area the master assassin pointed out. "I actually can't get an impression of her, although I do see her."

With a puzzled sniff, Renato had to admit the same thing. "Odd... Mist?"

"Why hide it, then?"

He gave her red dress a pointed look. "You are."

"I am, only for this rumored snowball fight." She shook a red painted nail under his nose, ignoring the disgruntled look that passed over his face. "I didn't want to get multiple requests to help whatever team or group."

"You know, you weren't supposed to know that before attending." The hitman drawled, batting her hand away irritably. "Takes some of the fun out of it."

"Please, you're the one taking a Cloud to a snowball fight."

Renato sniffed in mock-disapproval that time. "My cheating isn't what's on the table, little lady Sonya."

"Right." She muttered in his direction, then looked back over to the master assassin still lingering on her other side. "Did you want to join our little game, Sword Emperor, or was there something else?"

Tyr slanted a sideways look at her of his own. "...do you have any ranged skills, Miss Sonya?"

"What, for the lady Mist in green? Range isn't really my thing." The thief admitted honestly but looked around anyways. The ballroom was large, but she wasn't really that far away. "One second."

Raw cranberries bounced, right?

Snagging one of the little berries off the table decoration behind the three of them, the Storm-Cloud placed it just so in her fingers, so she could flick the fruit with one hand, and took careful aim.

"A cranberry?" The hitman scoffed at her, sounding rather dismissive over her choice of weapon. "What kind of damage do you expect-"

He cut himself off when she flicked the berry, her Propagated force easily driving it the needed distance. It impacted the Mist woman's forehead a little high and bounced off with only a red mark left behind, she slumped to the ground in what appeared to be a faint in response.

"Oh dear, the lady in green seems to have been a little overwhelmed." Sonya commented idly, fighting hard to keep a smirk off her lips. "Master Tyr, does Vongola have anyone that can take her out for a bit of air?"

He gave her a deadpan stare in return, because one of the waiters was already moving to help the lady.

"What is with you and throwing things?" Renato asked tartly, taking his hat off to run a hand through his spiky hair once. "That rock when we met, now berries that you flick?"

"If I need range, I throw things." Sonya dismissed that with a shrug of bare shoulders. "With my strength, I don't need a gun to kill from more than ten paces away."

Huffing at that crack against his favored weaponry, the hitman all but sulked for a moment.
"Save me a dance, Miss Sonya." Tyr requested from her in his even but silky voice, giving them a short nod before striding away.

"Well... that's Nono Vongola and Master Tyr I owe a dance to." With a sigh, the thief regarded the low level in the champagne flute she had set down to fuss with a piece of fruit. Probably not safe to take another drink from, she had ignored it for a small bit and she was in a ballroom full of criminals. "There is not enough alcohol in this glass."

"When did Timoteo ask for a dance?"

"This afternoon. We, Shamal and I, met him coming back." She set her flute down again and looked around for the waiters circling with bottles of various liquors. "Do you think there's any vodka in the room?"

In the most unfair thing Sonya had seen yet, Tyr didn't really look at that dressed up either.

Why did she put so much effort into dressing up if the men weren't going to do it too?

---

CXCIX (Sunday the 24th of December, 1967 continued. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

While Renato managed to use dancing a turn with her to dodge the previously nicknamed 'Croc-zilla' and her daughter, Tyr cut in for the next number.

"You are not easily anticipated, Miss Sonya." The master assassin informed her in perfect London-accented English, demonstrating both knowledge for her preference in languages and very smooth movements on the dance floor. "I have worked with Hard Cloud Flame users before, but you are nothing like them."

"I wonder about that sometimes." Sonya easily admitted, keeping up with little difficulty in the waltz. "I used to be worse, or more Cloud-like, in my childhood."

Lisa had ensured they all knew how to dance, even Cherep. Admittedly, Tyr was a bit taller than her brother and a bit smoother in motion. It was an interesting change.

Her fellow Cloud was a touch more durable, which did make dancing with the Italian fair a touch nerve-wracking.

"Any reason for the change?"

"I have some theories, a few I puzzled out myself and a couple suggestions."

The Sword Emperor's lips twitched, in either a still-born frown or smile it was hard to guess. "Do I need to ask?"

She huffed through her nose, wondering why he was so interested to be as direct as this. "A few of them are slightly obvious. A Cloud can raise another Cloud, their children who follow their parent's Flame type are example of this. With varying degrees of success, but still. I also moved, around my fifth birthday. If that disrupted whatever 'territory claiming' a young Cloud does or not is questionable, and so is the results for a Cloud that does not establish a territory of their own. A few others are more personal, so I will refrain from speaking of them unless they prove true."

"The problem would be finding a Cloud early enough to test that." Commented the master assassin neutrally, spinning them around to avoid a less graceful pair. "Your type is... not easily found."

"Are they? Or do only the 'strongest' Clouds within each region become the only active users of it and their 'patrolling' suppress any others so it merely appears that way? I know another active Cloud, my foster father would be if he chose to, and another vor I know of has the same type and isn't actively a user either. Is that 'rareness' really because Clouds are rare or because we are less eye catching or eccentric when young and rarely get the chance to grow into it?"

"Those are good questions," Tyr admitted after a few beats of musing over her queries, then pulled them to a smooth halt when the orchestra finished the piece with a flourish, "ones I look forward to hearing how they are answered. Thank you for the dance, Miss Sonya."

The Russian curtsied as he gave a half-bow to her before walking away, wondering if that last comment meant he wanted to be kept informed or would be watching her to see when she could answer them.

It wasn't really clear, and it could be that both were correct.

Looking around at where the master assassin left her Sonya couldn't see Renato in the nearby crowd, but she could see Don Vongola and his Guardians.

Timoteo spotted her practically at the same time.

"Miss Nikishina, I believe you owe me a turn on the floor." He informed her a touch loudly, smoothly disengaging from a knot of other men his Cloud Guardian apparently named Visconti moved to block from following him.

"Nono Vongola, I believe I do." The thief greeted and admitted in return, wryly musing that this was probably why Tyr left her there instead of in range of the hitman she was attending the ball with.

"Imagine that, the next number is about to begin." Taking her offered hand, he whirled them out onto the dance floor just as smoothly as the head of the Varia could. "Forgive me for using you like a shield, but I really could do with a break."

"According to Renato, that's pretty much my main function for this party." Sonya informed him with a dry smirk, noting that in closer quarters Timoteo did have a 'pull'.

One that made her spine snap straight and gave her an... odd feeling.

A Sky like Nono Vongola apparently made her want to do something probably foolish. She squashed the urge with some difficulty, because not only was now a bad time for anything like that but the man already had a Cloud Guardian.

"You two aren't dating?"

"What? Oh... no, I've known Renato for a while now, he's... well, we're trying to be friends." With an only slightly awkward smile for that comment, the thief shrugged her bared shoulders. "We started out as casual drinking partners, even if the choice of poison back then was tea and coffee. Or espresso, for him anyways."

The Sky apparently hadn't known that tidbit, as he hummed as he considered the news.

"Um... Don Vongola? May I ask a question?"

"As long as you do not mind I will ask one in return later."
Fair enough... even if he already got a question in. "Aren't you married?"

If he was, his wife had been missing all night. Sonya hadn't caught a glimpse of anyone that could've been Mrs. Timoteo Vongola all night, and that bugged her slightly.

"My Fiorella is currently pregnant with our third child, my dear." The man informed her willingly enough.

She blinked in surprise. "Oh, I see. My foster mother is also pregnant, so you have my sympathies. As well as my hopes she has a safe birth."

"Thank you." Timoteo graciously accepted with a nod, spinning them to a halt right next to a very vexed looking hitman. "Renato, your lovely date."

"Thank you, Nono. Especially since Tyr didn't quite have the manners to bring her back promptly." The man kept the snark to a minimum, but the tacked-on sentence sounded a little bitchy.

Probably because there were two middle-aged women standing near him currently eyeing Sonya as if their disapproval would matter to her. They had probably been trying to get his attention, either on their person or to try to get the man interested in their daughters.

The Russian gave them a sharp, toothy grin and the two biddies promptly found something else to do.

Probably because she purposely allowed her eyes to glow with Cloud Flames. She had the time recently to at least figure out how to specifically cause that, which might help her prevent it happening unconsciously.

Timoteo turned what was probably a laugh into a very convincing cough and handed the thief back over to the hitman with a nod of his head. "You are very talented, Miss Sonya."

"Thank you, Don Vongola. You aren't half bad of a dancer yourself."

---

CC (Monday the 25th of December, 1967. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Given the hitman decided unilaterally that she had been remiss in her 'shield' duties, Renato didn't let Sonya go very far from his person for the rest of the night.

Which, although the two dances she owed to Tyr and Timoteo were the cause, the thief didn't really mind all that much.

She didn't know even a percentage of the native Italians crammed into the ballroom, meaning any conversation she would be getting for the night was either with the hitman or with people she didn't know and probably wouldn't care for the opinions of.

The Russian blessed her Cloud Flames more than once before the Ball finally closed for the evening, because not only could she keep up with a Sun hiding out on the dancefloor but Clouds were 'discouraged' from actively participating in the snowball fight afterwards.

Mid-winter at a tropical climate or not, Vongola imported snow for their 'traditional' snowball fight. Cloud Flame users were generally in charge of making snowballs, and greatly abused their ability for Propagation to do so.
Cloud Flame snowballs were a little slushy, but if it had been a touch or two colder there might have been a way to slightly refreeze them using the coolers... probably hence why Clouds were discouraged from actually pitching their snowballs about.

Including Sonya and Visconti, there were six Cloud Flame users at the Ball. One man she was fairly certain was one of Tyr's people, a man who she was sure had been hanging around Don Bovineo, and two others she didn't recognize at all.

The Russian did figure out that Cloud and Storm Flames mixed into a snowball made them explode. Into warm water, but they did splash everyone nearby when they went off. Renato gleefully monopolized her recent findings in 'snow-warfare' for the fight, even nailing 'Croc-zilla' in the back of the head with one.

Clouds weren't very social people, so the continued silence for most of the snowball fight suited Sonya just fine even with her slight Storm natured influence.

It wasn't until the fight was over, read 'everyone that hated someone else was done trying to soak them to the bone' so it took until the early hours of dawn, that she overheard a comment that made her start.

"Wait... we weren't supposed to be armed during this?"

Ganauche, the First apparently, gaped at her. "You are armed? Where the hell are you hiding it?"

He even gestured to her tight red dress, probably alluding to the fact she had zero pockets where something bigger than a card could be hidden.

Sonya scoffed at him and his crude gesturing. "You need imagination."

"Sonya... really?" Renato asked with a smirk, apparently still close enough to overhear her conversation with Nono's Lightning Guardian. "...what is it?"

She gave him an equally disgruntled glare, plucking at her bracelet of mini axes. "You can't guess for yourself?"

"Those things? They're tiny."

The thief twitched at the dismissal, shooting the Lightning a dark look of his own again. "How much do you want to bet on that?"

"They are tiny. What were you going to do, papercut someone to death?" Ganauche insisted, actually having the gall to look insulted.

His yelp when Sonya ripped one of her ax charms off and re-sized it with a flair of Cloud Flames before burying it in the ground a hair's breadth away from his toes was satisfyingly high-pitched.

"Repeat that, I dare you."

"...you brought a battle ax, to a ball." Renato clarified for everyone suddenly looking in their direction, sounding as if he was repressing his laughter by sheer will.

"I prefer polearms, but those are a little too long to wear like charms." Admitted the Russian blandly, touching her bun to ensure they were still there. "So those are in my hair instead."

The hitman grinned darkly, taking her broken charm bracelet from her to inspect the other six gold axes still hanging off it. "Anything else?"
"My pendant, although that would be a rather awkward hammer to try and wield. I was planning on throwing it if I had to."

"So... you weaponized your jewelry." He summarized gleefully, letting her bracelet dangle in the air so Nono Vongola could get a good look of his own in. "Really Sonya? I didn't even bring my gun."

She shot him a dry look. "The gun you 'didn't bring' is strapped to the left side of your chest. Right this very moment."

Renato coughed sheepishly under Timoteo's level gaze, and the Russian shrugged when the man turned it on her.

The Ninth head and current Sky of Vongola sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose. "I wonder if I should bother feeling surprised... or be more irritated my security missed the both of you sneaking weapons in."

The hitman jerked a thumb at the thief. "She's the one that snuck in her own armory."

She flipped him off. "You're the one packing heat."

Schnitten chipped in with his own two cents. "The armory is a little more impressive, actually."

"I would think a gun is of more concern." Bouche Croquant, the dark-skinned and redheaded Mist Guardian Sonya only met an hour before this, countered in his deep voice.

When Timoteo started to laugh as his Guardians started to bicker which one was 'better', Sonya actually has some hope they weren't going to get into trouble for this.
"I actually don't really see the point," Sonya admitted, threading her fingers through her hair and pulling both the red lilies Renato got her and her Bec de Corbins out of it, "as you can't really completely disarm any Flame user worth their inner fire anyways."

Ganauche took the flowers from her while also juggling her broken gold ax-charm bracelet, a steadily shrinking golden ax, and her hammer pendant in his other hand. "So, what? Have you been armed this whole time? All week?"

"Of course I have." She informed him blandly as she ran a hand through her now loose hair, seriously wondering why he would think she would give up any weaponry without prompting in the first place.

Visconti took possession of the two mini-polearms that had been holding up her bun. "We will return these when your visit comes to an end, Miss Nikishina."

She blinked at him, looked at her two of three tungsten Bec de Corbins in his hands, and tried for a non-awkward smile to give the Ninth Generation Vongola Cloud Guardian.

From the flat look he aimed at her over those sunglasses, the Russian probably wasn't going to get away with it.

"Sonya? Anything you would like to share with the rest of the class?" Renato asked, still highly amused even if he had to give up his own weapon to Coyote Nougat.

It had been under his dress shirt, which had been how he had snuck it past casual security screening in the ballroom even if the thief could feel it just holding his arm like a proper piece of arm candy.

The gun now in the Storm Guardian's possession had a strip of moonstones inlaid on the grip.

She couldn't decide if she felt flattered he had adjusted a holdout weapon for what she had inadvertently showed him or a little annoyed he pointed her out as the one who helped identify them as his stone.

Since they arrived days early and had been already within the Iron Fort before the Ball, they had also escaped the normal strict searches all guests were subjected to at the main doors. The Sky of Vongola had been a little chagrined to learn that was how they snuck their weapons through initially.

Unknowingly or not.

"...I may or may not actually have seven of those things. Two with me, the rest in my rooms."

Ganauche choked on his own spit, edging away from her slightly and dumping the rest of her jewelry into the Cloud Guardian's hands. Including the now hand-ax sized battle ax still shrinking into its pre-Propagated dimensions as her Cloud Flames bled off it.

He then made a beeline for the abandoned tables, seizing the first opened bottle of wine he found and necking what was left in it.

Timoteo Vongola sighed, rubbing at his mouth likely in an attempt to hide his stubbornly lingering smile. "I think I am very happy Clouds are not particularly common."

"Since I can, as Renato so charmingly put it earlier this week, 'rip off someone's arm and beat them with it' with my bare hands, no Cloud can really be called 'unarmed'." Sonya tacked on in a conversational tone, reaching over and fishing through the hitman's pockets for her cigarettes and lipstick. "Not so long as we still have arms."

Renato huffed at her, still buttoning up his dress shirt after giving up the gun that had been strapped to his chest under it. Which had been why she didn't bother asking.

Since the party was over, most of the sopping wet Mafiosi and their dates for the evening more interested in getting dry and warm than remaining to talk after a midnight snowball fight that lasted until dawn, she had no problem lighting up especially since she had abstained for most of the ball. Taking a long drag before continuing to try and clarify why it was she never thought to even ask if having weapons was allowed.

Other than the fact the man who invited her here had done it too.

"Where I am from we don't actually disarm for anything, so we assume everyone else is armed as well. My foster father even used to wear a garrote wrapped around his arm to bed, until my foster mother made him stop because it started to chafe her skin badly. She got him a knife he could strap to the small of his back instead in compromise."

Timoteo opened his mouth, closed it, shook his head, and gave a slightly unwilling huff of laughter. "That... that is fascinating, Miss Sonya. And I suppose it would explain a few things, but next time...?"

"If there is a next time, I will give up my weapons to whoever is at the door." Sonya agreed, only a tiny bit sheepishly.

"What, you're going to abandon me to the masses just like that?" Asked Renato, seizing her wrist to snag her pack of cigarettes and take one for himself. "I'm hurt, little lady Sonya."

"Parties aren't really my thing." She reminded him a little pointedly, letting him take possession of her smokes because she knew arguing about it could take a bit longer than she really wanted to linger for. "I only came along this time for Shamal, really."

"You like the brat more than me?"

"Yes."

He glared at her for the bluntly honest answer.

With another huff, and a smirk that just wouldn't let itself be smoothed away, Don Vongola checked to ensure that his guests really were either gone or on their way out then gestured for everyone to follow him. "I think we should end this night on that note."

The hitman twitched, scoffed as he ground the half-finished cigarette under his heel, and stalked along after the Sky. The slightly chilly Russian did the same before following the men, fingering her tube of lipstick thoughtfully.

Since it did look as if Timoteo was going to escort them back to the guest suites they were living in for the short term, probably to ensure she did give up the rest of her weaponry and the hitman didn't have any more, she wondered if she minded the audience for the last thing she planned on for the night.
Shamal had double dog dared her, after all. She couldn't let that go without at least attempting it.

There were more than enough ornamental mirrors scattered about the mansion to ensure she had a very fresh and thick coat of red lipstick, with only Schnitten of Rain and Coyote of Storm to become curious over what she was planning.

She knew full well the tetchy Mist brat would likely either stay up all night or try to be awake when they came back, Renato wasn't amused to learn he had actually asked one of the maids to wake him up for it when the kid stumbled out of the thief's suite.

Shamal blinked brown bleary eyes up at them all, still sporting a smudged makeup imprint of her lips on his cheek, then scowled cutely at the hitman glowering down at him. "Hey… Miss Sonya, didn't-"

The Inverted Sun caught on only a split second too late.

Sonya planted a kiss to his cheek, ducking away quickly and grinning at the bright red lip mark she left behind. "Merry Christmas, Renato."

From the dark glare she got in return, he didn't share the sentiment.

"Eww… she got you too, Mister Renato." Baby Mist chortled, eyes widening when the Storm-Cloud grabbed him in response. "NO! Miss Sonya, you already got me!"

"Well… you shouldn't laugh at other's misfortune. Where they can hear it and plot revenge, anyways." Pressing her still red lips to his cheek again despite his squirming, she smirked at his pout. "You're going to need a nap, brat."

Said brat grumbled over her 'nasty' makeup, rubbing at the new lipstick stain on his face and merely smearing a new red mark all over himself.

Timoteo cleared his throat, pressing his lips together and pointedly looking between the thief and her guest suite. He also looked highly amused, especially when Renato pulled out his handkerchief to try scrubbing the thief's lipstick off of his face. "Miss Sonya?"

"Right, weapons. One second." Shifting Shamal to the side to sit on a hip, she opened her door and made a beeline for her suitcase.

Through the open door, she could faintly hear the Lightning Guardian's voice as she dumped the Mist brat on her temporary couch. "If she didn't scare me a little, I would totally ask if I could have one too,"

One what?

A lipstick mark?

That was kind of… stupid. He could do it himself with any tube of the stuff, why ask her for it?

Digging out her remaining Bec de Corbins after telling the sleepy brat to climb back into bed without her since she needed a shower, the thief retraced her steps and was promptly baffled at the sight that greeted her.

Ganauche had a new bright red mark on his lightly tanned face, somehow acquired while she had been in her guest suite living room. He was also pointedly keeping the Rain Guardian between himself and Renato for some reason.
The hitman was ignoring him just as pointedly in return, but he also had her lilies in his fist now instead of the man she had given them to after pulling them out of her hair.

Entirely confused over what was going on, Sonya handed over her remaining five Bec de Corbins to Visconti to add to the rest of her 'arsenal'. "Erm… is everything…?"

"We are fine, Miss Sonya." Nono Vongola informed her as if she hadn't caught him trying to give one shameless Inverted Sun a reproving look. "Good morning, and Merry Christmas."

"Merry Christmas, Don Vongola." She parroted back, flicking her eyes from Renato back to the man's Lightning Guardian. "Good morning, gentlemen."

She got a various array of responses back, and her flowers from the hitman along with a curt 'Sonya'.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 25th of December, 1967 continued. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Shamal only really let Sonya have a four/five-hour nap, he was bright-eyed and bushy-tailed before ten and ran out of patience about ten-thirty.

The party ended around five, but she didn't get to bed until around six.

At least, ten was when he woke her up and demanded his presents the first time.

The second time the thief groggily informed him Renato had to be awake first before they could do presents. When baby Mist darted off she blinked blearily after him a few times, wondering if she should risk going back to sleep or drag herself out of bed.

Sonya did, eventually, stumble into her guest suite sitting room. Tiredly curling up on her couch to wait for what was going to happen next, and somewhat dozing a little in the meantime as she warmed up her corner of the overly stuffed cushions.

Shamal pulling an equally groggy, probably grumpy, half-dressed hitman into her rooms was at least expected.

The kid huffed and puffed out his still slightly chubby cheeks, looking highly exasperated. "Why'd you two have to sleep in different rooms? You're making me do more work."

"Alas, the whine of all children everywhere." She got in before Renato could do more than just generally glower around, limply waving a hand to her suitcase. "Now fetch your presents, I'm too tired to do it myself."

The outraged look she got in return was at least making up a little for baby Mist's general lack of patience.

Throwing himself to the other end of the couch she was curled up on, the shirtless Sun muttered something probably uncomplimentary about the kid under his breath. Then he glared over at her. "Isn't that my shirt?"

A squeak and a crash of pottery had both thief and hitman craning around to see one of the maids with a fire-engine red face standing over a mess of broken crockery and spilled liquids.

She had probably been alerted to them being awake when Renato and Shamal entered her suite and tripped or something across the threshold.
Sniffing at the mess, it wasn't her floor so she didn't really care if someone wanted to make a mess of it, Sonya looked back at the man. "Yes. You failed to ask for it back, it's mine now."

He was enough of a clothes snob to have been wearing silk shirts from the first time she met him, and this one was nicely broken in and very comfortable. She liked wearing it to bed now, ever since she wondered what to do with the outfit she had stolen from his closet, so she wasn't giving it up.

"Steal." She tacked on after a moment of complete silence.

Somehow magically sensing the mess, a footman appeared at the thief's door with a mop and broom. He swept up the broken pottery, mopped up the mess left behind on the hardwood floors, and then a little less than gracefully swept away.

There was probably a kitchen station somewhere nearby, because that was also around the moment another maid ducked past him carrying a new tray also past the still heavily blushing maid standing stock still in the entryway.

She didn't really care about the audience she somehow acquired. They had Spiced Black Russian Tea and was pouring her a cup, everything else was pretty much secondary.

The next unknown that entered her suite wasn't similarly ignored, but that man dismissed both maids with an arched look while handing the hitman a wrapped box done up in gaudy Christmas colors. That man, who she wanted to label either a footman or a butler, shooed everyone that didn't need to be there out when he left, finally pulling the thief's guest suite doors shut behind him.

Well… so much for the morning show.

Renato tossed the present, which she assumed was for Shamal, onto the coffee table so he could clutch at his espresso. "Don't expect anything then."

"I hadn't anyways." Scoffed Sonya, actually expending the energy to pull herself somewhat upright and balance her teacup at the same time. "Front pocket, Shamal."

Baby Mist brat guiltily lowered the makeup bag he had been investigating back into her suitcase, unlatching the front pocket instead.

The hitman blinked at the two plain wrapped parcels the kid surfaced with, shooting the thief a dryly amused look. "A book, Sonya? Entirely predictable, coming from you."

"…shut up." She managed around a yawn, blowing out a sigh as Shamal brought his prizes back over to the couch where the two of them were. "A copy of my Mist findings, in Italian. More for his education than for Christmas, but I never did really manage to help him much last year."

The dreaded 'education' word had baby Mist handing the suspiciously book-shaped package to his guardian quickly, pulling the second one free of wrappings with an overabundance of haste and a minimum of fuss.

Shamal spilled a collection of small turquoise figurines out into his pudgy palm, ranging from horses to dogs to actual figures of people but mainly in various sea-themed creatures.

"Merry Christmas kid. Go wild with them, and I'll replace what you shatter later."

"But I broke the piece of this you gave me before, Miss Sonya." He protested, looking a bit unwilling to actually try anything with the carved rocks now in his hands.
Rather sweet of him, but a little silly too.

"I figured you would, the gems we use like that don't tend to last very long." She admitted with an absent shrug. "The shards can still be used, slip one into the possession of someone bothering you and they'll start hallucinating on Mist Flames. Then you can either mock them or get away clean. I know a Rain that does the same with Tranquility laced sapphire shards."

Baby Mist suddenly looked evilly contemplative of what she just told him.

Renato pulled his nose out of the kid's copy of her research, opened his mouth for something but seemed to realize something else, then blinked a bit wildly as he shut his mouth without saying what he had originally wanted to say. "Don't do it to anyone in Vongola, Shamal."

"Aww… but-"

"No." The hitman repeated sternly, side eyeing the thief lounging on the kid's other side. "Not until you're ten or so."

Sonya didn't have an opinion on that, so she sipped her tea silently when the brat looked to her for some help to change his guardian's mind.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 25th of December, 1967 continued. Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Don Vongola, you wished to see me?" The Russian Storm-Cloud asked as she was led inside the man's office by one of the timid-seeming maids.

Instead of gawking, which half of them finally stopped doing and started being professionals, some the Vongola staff was now cringing around her. It was fast getting on her nerves even worse than the staring had done.

That was probably showing in her expression, because the maid made some fast tracks out of the room.

"Miss Sonya, is there any way you could stop unnerving my people?" Timoteo asked a touch dryly as she swung her gaze back to him.

"I now stand still and they will flinch from me, I fail to see how I might affect that in any positive manner."

The Don gave a very put-upon sigh, which she really was only half-certain was faked, setting his pen down on a blotter and leaning back in his chair as he studied her.

Raising an eyebrow at the action, and only idly wondering why he was doing it, the thief flicked her eyes around at the office instead.

Because… books.

Built into the wall behind him, Timoteo had an entire wall of bookshelves she was itching to investigate and maybe abscond with one or two. He had a very nice big window she could probably sneak through.

Which would've been a bad idea, not only was this an office of a Sky but likely the room was heavily guarded when he wasn't in it as well.
Three of his Guardians were even in the office with them too.

Coyote Nougat was apparently guarding the man's back, Ganauche was doing some kind of busywork, and her fellow Cloud Visconti had apparently been helping his Sky deal with his work.

Tyr the Sword Emperor was also lingering against the wall behind her, if she wanted to just overlook the Flame users in front of her in her estimation of the security of this room.

"Miss Sonya," Timoteo called her attention back to himself after a long moment, "I was wondering if you wouldn't mind discussing your research into Dying Will Flames with me."

Sonya blinked at the man, wondering why he wanted to know. Italy had to be far ahead of her in terms of knowledge base, she barely started a decade ago. "...I suppose?"

"Renato had a few things to say about your research, including the reasoning behind the jewel you gave young Shamal." He started, giving her a mildly expectant look.

...she didn't quite know what it was he wanted, since that wasn't a question. "Yes? And?"

"Young Shamal ended up doing a few things I had previously thought outside the range of a Mist that young, including but not limited to very..." the man considered for a moment, then continued when he found the word he apparently wanted, "...robust creations that ended up terrorizing some of his equally young contemporaries while your jewel lasted. He now seems to be a bit ahead of where he should be for his age."

"...and?" She repeated herself, still confused.

Shamal was a very skilled little Mist for his youth, even stronger than Usov had been when he started tripping over his Flames. While slightly proud a Sky of Timoteo's age and experience was impressed with the baby Mist's strength and skill... that also wasn't a question.

"Oh... I also gave him a few more this morning, so you may wish to watch for that happening again." Sonya tacked on after another beat.

Ganauche's forehead suddenly impacted his Don's desk, entirely baffling the thief.

...that guy not only had a bad habit of choking on air, but apparently liked to damage himself. She couldn't see any Lightning Flames either, so that will probably leave a bruise.

Wasn't there supposed to be three Ganauches?

Maybe Ganauche the First ends up unwittingly killing himself?

That would be pathetic.

"Miss Sonya, are you not going to explain why you gave Flame focuses to a child that young?" Timoteo tried again, sounding a little stern that time.

"I gave Shamal that first rock for defensive reasons, if he weaponized it then it is your own fault he does not feel safe here or is bored." The Russian returned, frowning slightly at the Boss that was not hers trying to sound disproving over her actions. "If Shamal doesn't feel safe, I'm sure Renato or I could find somewhere else for the brat to stay for the rest of his childhood."

"I am sure he was only bored, and maybe a little irritated at the repeated claims that you did not exist told to his face." He reassured her evenly, lacing his fingers together and giving her a level stare over them. "I am also sure that problem is now solved, with your visit out here to see him."

She felt another twinge of that odd feeling a Sky like him gave a Storm-Cloud like her, reminding her that not only was this Vongola's Don but she was supposed to be on her best behavior.

"So, the brat's bored? Huh." Baby Mist needed to put some time into learning to read.

Sonya could before the age of four and the kid was almost five. Admittedly she had completely cheated in terms of maturity and already knowing how to read English but learning to read Cyrillic had required some effort on her part.

Renato only told her that Shamal wasn't yet reading by himself when the kid got preoccupied with his Christmas gift of shiny new Lego bricks to build houses for his new turquoise figurines with and leave underfoot.

Those fucking things hurt.

She was halfway convinced the hitman had given that as a present just to have a good laugh at her swearing a blue streak in Russian when she found that out firsthand. Not very graceful of her, but she had less than five hours of sleep and just wanted a little more damn tea to wake up properly.

Also, Sun Flames being used on one's foot felt weirdly ticklish.

Shamal had looked so sorry about her getting hurt Renato healed up any possible bruise just to avoid the waterworks.

Maybe it was the hitman touching her foot?

That had been kind of weird.

A sigh, pitched just a touch too loudly for her to believe was real rather than merely attention catching, drew the Russian out of her thoughts.

Timoteo was rubbing at his temple, looking strangely exasperated as he sank backwards into his overly ornate looking, burnt orange padded chair.

Why did he look exasperated?

She had answered his questions so far, hadn't she?

She was being nice and trying to make the good impression Tatiana had wanted her to do.

"How did you stumble onto the jewels you gave both Renato and young Shamal, Miss Sonya?" The Sky asked pretty bluntly.

"I started as a jewel thief." Hadn't she told the hitman that too?

Why was he asking if he likely already knew that?

"You steal them, then give them out?" Ganauche tried to clarify out loud, earning himself a deadpan stare from the thief.

"Of course not, those are from my collection of gems to try fitting to Flame users."

Visconti gave a little cough, stubbornly gazing sedately out the window when she glanced in his direction. In response, Coyote Nougat dug out a couple high denomination bills in lira from his wallet to shove at the Cloud in disgust.

Sonya wasn't sure what was going on but had the idea it was something to do with her.

Especially when the Lightning Guardian sighed himself, dug out his own wallet, and threw a large wad of money he rolled up over the thief's shoulder likely to where Tyr was lingering.

Nono Vongola pinched the bridge of his nose, now looking strangely amused as well as a little long-suffering. "Miss Sonya, how did you stumble upon the idea of these gemstones you fit to other Flame users?"

"Mafia Land, they sell these rings for Flame users and I wondered what stone they held."

"Did you ever find out?" Visconti asked, thumbing through the Storm's money and pocketing it when he was satisfied with how much was there.

"I think they're sapphires, or a similar crystal type."

The Cloud Guardian nodded, to show he was still listening to her even if he was watching his Sky's expression. "Personal experience?"

"Unfortunately." Frowning, Sonya thought back to the glimpses she had gotten of the Flame rings in Mafia Land and compared them to the results she had gotten from various stones. "I cannot be certain just yet, so don't quote me on that."

Sapphires didn't scorch, which was the only other feature she had yet to match to that gem-type to be certain.

Actually… maybe the Flame rings were made out of industrial sapphires?

She had yet to try those instead of jewel-quality ones.

"Unfortunately?" Echoed the other Cloud, shifting his gaze from Don Vongola to her.

"Sapphires implode under heavy use." The thief explained, holding up her left palm where she still had several small scars from the first sapphire she ever tried. "I don't hand them out for that reason, too risky."

"Do you have a method to sort others to certain gems?" Visconti asked next, after getting a good look at her palm.

"No, everyone I've tried prefer wildly different stones. Even if they share a Flame type."

Polarization might explain that, or the degree of it. Sonya had to start over with the new knowledge of the color of the stone not mattering much to what type of Flame she was testing, and her personal theory that Polarization was more of a degree of inner or outer demonstration of Flames than an either-or thing.

"Sapphires are the only type of gemstone that will reliably work for everyone I've tried, but it's not something I would recommend actually using for anything."

She probably needed to pull another jewel heist or three to either substantiate or reject the theories. Joy.

"Would you mind informing us when you find out a reliable method?"
Likely, this was what the whole conversation was driving to. The thief wondered why it was it took a Cloud to get to the point when the Sky was supposed to be 'Harmony' incarnate.

Shouldn't Timoteo have understood a Cloud, even one like her, wouldn't appreciate roundabout conversations?

"…Shamal and Renato are one thing," the Russian repeated her words to a hitman almost more than a year ago in a neutral tone of voice, "I have no reason to go out of my way for anyone else just yet."

Just yet, because the future was a very perilous thing to plan on. Giving them the hitman as a possible link to her because it was the man's fault she was here at all. Hopefully this would enable Vongola to assume they had whatever they wanted from her and would mainly leave her alone after this.

…yeah, she wasn't banking on that either.

"Thank you for taking the time to answer a few questions, Miss Sonya." Timoteo told her in an only slightly pained tone of voice, also for some reason looking mildly amused. "I heard you may be leaving in a few hours?

"I have to get back, hopefully in time for my foster mother to give birth." She confirmed with a measure of bemusement.

He only asked four questions, and half of those were during the 'small-talk' part of it. Was that all he wanted to know?

"Tyr will return your weaponry." The Sky informed her, glancing to the assassin himself behind the thief. "I hope you enjoyed the Ball, my dear."

"It was surprisingly fun, for something that had way too many people for me to really enjoy attending." She responded obediently to the conversational gambit she did recognize from Lisa's lectures and giving the man a small curtsy. "Thank you for hosting me, Don Vongola. Merry Christmas."

"Merry Christmas, Miss Sonya." He repeated, now for some reason looking strangely resigned.

Tyr opened the door of the Sky's office, allowing the thief to pass him into the hall first.

"Tungsten, steel, gold, and spinel?" The Sword Emperor questioned quietly halfway to her guest room suite, holding out a hand full of precious metals and jewels to her.

"A Flame-resistant metal, a less resistant but still durable metal, something shiny to qualify as jewelry, and my personal stone." Sonya answered with a touch of amusement as she took her 'arsenal' back, wondering if he sent someone else to get her weaponry appraised or if he went himself.

No comment about the Flame-resistant metal, so either he was opting to ignore it or didn't have those checked. Which… slightly irking, if he was going to check on the rest of her jewelry why didn't he identify what alloy the original Bec de Corbins were?

Tyr in a jeweler's store asking about her tiny gold axes or the tungsten Bec de Corbins should not be that funny of a mental image. It should be scarier, the man was an assassin, but was he as polite to everyone else as he was to her?

It made him seem a lot less intimidating.
"I can use red tourmaline as well, but my last piece with it was broken this past year and I have yet to replace it."

The master assassin hummed, a small lilt at the end informing her he was interested. "The key necklace you used to wear?"

"Well… it was a key, wasn't it?" Sonya asked in return, strangely fond of something that had been really more of a joke than something necessary.

"What thief needs a key?" Tyr asked blandly, looking at her out of the corner of his eyes.

"I didn't, thus the joke." She admitted sheepishly. "It was more of a timesaver than actually ever needed as a key to what I couldn't unlock."

The man frowned, thinking it over, then looked at her fully. "That, Miss Sonya, is a bad joke."

A thief in possession of a master key, which would never see much use as a master key.

"I know." It really was a terrible joke. She blamed Cherep for infecting her with a bit of his dorkiness. "Since I failed to say so last night, Merry Christmas Master Tyr."

The Head of the Varia nodded shortly in return, tilting his head as they came up to the hallway she had lived out of for the last week. "I do not qualify for a Christmas Kiss as well?"

…oh, was that what Ganauche wanted last night?

Sonya blinked as she realized it, since it made more sense that the Lightning wanting a makeup smear on his face, then considered the comment. "I have my lipstick in my room, if you wish?"

The assassin merely smirked at her, the first real facial expression she had seen on him. "I will abstain this year. Merry Christmas Miss Sonya."

(Monday the 1st of January, 1968. A Mafia Land Ferry.)

Cherep was entirely bemused to learn she had attended the mafia ball, after filling her in with all the circus news she had missed since leaving, but at least did seem accepting of why she did so. "Right, Renato. I keep forgetting his name."

"How hard is it to recall it?" Sonya asked out of confusion. She never had a problem like that, did he crack his head open practicing for his stunt work next year or something?

"He's not… someone I like very much, so I don't put effort into trying to remember." The purple colored stuntman admitted casually with a shrug. "With luck, might never have to deal with him again so why bother?"

"…because he's my friend? I think…” At what point could she call the hitman a friend?

Hadn't they reached that point yet?

"You… don't sound too sure of that, Sonya." He pointed out a little needlessly, kicking his duffle bag back more squarely under the bench they had monopolized for the ferry trip out to Mafia Land. "Why? Haven't you two gotten to the point of stalking each other?"

"He stalks me, doesn't that count?"
"Wait… what?"

"Renato can show up in the strangest of places, sometimes not too long after I reach either Mafia Land or in the middle of nowhere." She elaborated blandly, pulling her pack of cigarettes out. "It has gotten to the point I am no longer surprised. I think that does count."

"Sonya… stalking someone is not a sign of friendship." Her fellow Cloud informed her slowly, wide-eyed. "I know that was how we became friends… but that's not really socially acceptable behavior."

"…I thought it was?" The thief managed around the filter of her cigarette, frowning as she really thought about it. "I wanted to spend time with you, because you were interesting and not quite the same as everyone else I knew of. Since you were not exactly predictable in your daily habits, I had to find some other way to do so if my own schedule did not allow for convenient times to meet. Is not following someone to gain an understanding of their preferred locations stalking? Do not friends who wish to spend time together find a place they both like in order to do so stalk one another for such a place?"

The stuntman considered her, frowning thoughtfully as he mulled over her words. "Well… while interesting and somewhat informative to know in terms of how your head works, and yes it is and sure why not, this Renato dude does have a meeting point with you. I'm pretty sure you've told me that. A café on this island we're visiting? Since there is one, anything outside of that is odd and not really healthy behavior."

"Maybe it is mafia friendship behavior?" Sonya wondered, because Tatiana would've said something.

Right?

"Besides, 'outside of that' would also include anything that would change a relationship from 'casual acquaintances' to 'friends'."

"If it is? That explains sooo much." Cherep muttered with a slightly strangled sounding laugh, planting his hand on his forehead then raking it back through his newly cut short and spiky purple hair. "I don't think you're really able to see this that clearly, Sonya. He started popping up when we were in Austria, which is weird no matter how you look at it."

"Renato was chasing down the damage to his contact network, which I was part of." Defended the thief, confused over what she had thought to be a fairly good relationship with the hitman and not appreciating the corrections. "So, no, Cherep. That one is explainable."

"When we were in Italy?"

"He is from there and likely does have a very good network that would inform him of anything new."

"Okay… you know what? I'm going to talk to both Lisa and Tatiana about this and see what they say. Agree to abide by what they decide?"

"Sure," Sonya agreed, scrapping plans to ask their foster mother herself, "as long as if they say it is not strange you drop it."

"I'm mentioning this to Arseniy." Cherep muttered, grabbing the strap of his bag as Mafia Land's docks appeared on the horizon.
"Why?"

The stuntman gave her a sideways look as she flicked her cigarette over the side of the ferry. "Just trust me on this one, Sonya. Arseniy needs to know."

She frowned, wondering if she had missed informing the vor of something majorly important. "Did I do something wrong?"

"No." He gave her a brief sideways hug, letting go just as quickly out of respect of her intolerance for extended contact with others. Her brother's way of trying to reassure her using his preference for tactile touch while not upsetting her own sensibilities. "No, you haven't done anything wrong. You're just kind of dense sometimes."

"Hey…"

"So, this kid," the stuntman continued in an obvious change of subject before she could protest the slight on her social awareness, "Shamal. He's kind of like my nephew now, right?"

Letting the change go, because arguing about that was already old, the thief considered the new question. "No? I mean, I am not his mother or anything. Shamal is just… a kid I know."

"And actually like." Cherep tacked on for her, shooting her a grin over his shoulder as they made their way to the middle of the deck where they could disembark the ferry from. "From what you've told me of him, he's an orphan. Right?"

"…yes?"

"And this R-dude only told you about the death of the kid's dad before he got him?"

"Renato, and…?"

“So, you're pretty much likely the only mother-figure he knows of." The stuntman finished, finding them a place next to a wall because she got itchy when people lingered behind her too long. "Or at least the only female-influence he's got that he likes very much. Shamal sounds like a brat, you know."

"He is a brat." Sonya confirmed a bit wryly, thinking back to the dare the hitman had still been glaring at her for when she left Vongola's Iron Fort. "Do you have a point, Cherep?"

"Wouldn't all that make you, by default mind you, this Shamal brat's mom even if he doesn't call you that?"

"…um." Was her oh-so intelligent answer, wondering the same thing now. "…I do not know."

"You might wish to inform Lisa she may have a grandkid… before she learns of some other way."

"…then by that reasoning would Bjørn not count too?" She countered, trying to find some way that didn't leave her a teenage mother.

That was bad, at least she was pretty sure teen-moms were not good things. Didn't Rachel's lifetime have a lot of bad versions of those mom-types?

"Nope! Bjørn's mom sounded completely awesome, but the point of fact there is the kid can recall his mother and doesn't need an older female role-model in his life to supply a mom-like feel for his childhood." Cherep explained cheerfully, now full out grinning at her.
Sonya glared back, well aware he was exaggerating something if not able to divine what.

Damn it all, he was doing it on purpose too.

She might have neglected to inform their foster brother that Lisa was on bedrest in the hospital.

"Don't start." The older woman told Cherep with a pleasant little smile, patting him on the arm and motioning for him to set himself down on one of the chairs that had migrated into her room. "So, how's life been for you since last year?"

"Okay," the stuntman fumbled, making his little sister wince and his elder smirk, "broke my old bike, and then got a new one."

Their now heavily pregnant foster mother exasperatedly sighed, smoothing her hands down over her very big baby bump covered by her thin green hospital blanket. "What is with you and little Sonya? I want to know about you, Cherep, not your work."

"Oh." He inanely responded, but then actually managed to pull a cheerful smile out of somewhere for her. "Alright, really. It's been a bit weird since Sonya left the circus, and I keep getting questions from her friends about how she is doing every month, but other than that it's going fine."

"Friends, as in plural? She only told me about the one, the elderly Crina lady."

"Crina's one of them." Cherep, the total traitor, admitted with a smirk and a nod. "There's also Jaq, he's the African native strongman she went drinking with a couple times a month. And Jaq's friend the Egyptian native Faris, who taught her to breath fire and juggle really hot or really big pointy things. And then there's Jiayi, from China, who's the coordinator for the trapeze acts."

Lisa slanted an expectant look at the youngest of the foster siblings, who could only sheepishly shrug. "Sorry Lisa, I didn't know they cared that much."

"You and I need to discuss what terms 'being friends' covers then." The older Russian dictated neutrally, pointing a finger from herself to the thief and back again. "That is a bit more than just an oversight, sweetie."

"Yes, yes you two do." Chipped in the stuntman, sprawling out his long limbs as he got as comfortable as possible in a hospital waiting room chair. "Ask her about this Renato character's so-called 'friendly' habits while you're at it."

"Oh?"

"We're not having this discussion now." Sonya refused flatly, crossing her arms over her chest and shooting him a dark glare. "Lisa? In other news, Cherep seems to think I may have made you a grandmother."

"WHAT?" Tatiana almost slammed her forehead on the cupboard shelf, pulling her head free in the nick of time and almost spilling the tea leaves she had gotten up to fetch all over the floor. "You're not pregnant or something too, right?"

"Would it be a 'seem' if I was?" The thief snapped irritably, disgruntled at the automatic assumption. "No, it's this kid I know he's convinced I'm the default 'mom' for."
"How is someone a 'default' mom?" The nurse questioned curiously as she checked the teapot to ensure it was clean.

"By being the only womanly influence in his life, from all accounts." Cherep informed her over the blonde's head, ignoring the flick of nails she hit his ribs with. He turned back to their highly amused foster mother with a grin. "I am right, right? If she's the older female in the relationship, it's being this kid's mom by another name."

"He's pulling your leg, sweetie." Lisa clarified for the scowling young thief, giving the stuntman a light backhanded smack to his shoulder. "Unless this child's other parent asks you to be, or the kid does himself, you're not his mother. You could be the older sister figure, or maybe an aunt instead."

"I like aunt, can we go with that?"

"Only you, Sonya." Tatiana gave her two kopeks, leaning up against the counter as the teakettle started to boil. "Only you could somehow acquire a kid without dealing with the fun, messy hormone-involved activities that usually goes into baby production."

The door to Lisa's hospital room had opened while the redhead gave her opinion, and Arseniy blinked a few times trying to sort out why that was the current subject of discussion. "…I'm going to come back later."

"Bye Arseniy!" Cheerfully called out the Sun user as the door closed.

Cherep buried his face in Lisa's bed, near their mother's hip. His shaking shoulders nearly rocked the pregnant woman's entire body as he tried not to let his laughter out.

Sonya looked at the older brunette. "I don't get it."

"Fathers don't particularly like to hear about their daughter's sex-life or contemplating if they have one at all." The ever helpful Mafiya woman tried to clarify for her. "You should have seen what Arseniy did to Nikolai, just before Tats left home."

"No, I got that part." The young blonde clarified, waving a hand to dismiss it and privately thinking it wasn't that funny. "But why did he leave again? He just got here."

"Sonya... did you know I was seeing Nikolai?" Tatiana questioned curiously.

"Everyone knew, Tats."

Cherep nodded a few times in agreement as he sat back up straight, smoothing a hand down his slightly red face. "We did, sorry Tatiana. It wasn't much of a secret."

The redhead pulled a pout at all of them, sniffing and pulling the kettle off the hotplate to make the tea Lisa had asked for.

The woman herself shook her head with a smirk. "To answer your question, Sonya? Arseniy left for two reasons. The first was to adjust to the idea that the youngest girl is really a young woman now, without glaring a hole in the wall and making any of us uncomfortable as he does so. The second was to escape any further uncomfortable realizations before he had to deal with it."

"So... Arseniy is hiding?" She tried to clarify. "Why is that funny?"

"It loses a lot of the humor when you have to explain it." Cherep informed her brightly anyways. "But Arseniy's a big guy, right?"
"…right."

"You wouldn't think anything normal or mundane would stump or intimidate him, yeah?"

"…sure?"

The stuntman nodded again. "So, we can agree he's a masculine man, not particularly the type to get stymied or scared of anything. Yet he fled pretty damn fast when he overheard a comment about the possible dating life of his youngest, and forgive me but, very feminine daughter. Slim and tiny Sonya making big bad Arseniy flee for his sanity. It's funny."

"But how would he know we would continue to talk about it?" Sonya protested in exasperation, as that was the part she was confused on.

"There are three girls in this room." Pointed out her fellow Cloud dryly. "Why wouldn't you keep on talking about it?"

"Girl talk." Tatiana labeled with a smirk, handing the first teacup to Lisa.

"What does that make Cherep then?"

"A necessary sacrifice." He answered for himself, slinking down in his seat. "He's abandoned me here… the bastard."

"Do you want some tea too, Cherep?" The nurse asked brightly, giving Sonya the next cup. "For this little tea party going on?"

"Hell, why not? Let's go all out." Accepting the cup she passed to him, he saluted their foster mother. "Well what do you know, Lisa? You've got three daughters all of a sudden."

"Are you gay?" The youngest thief in the room asked him, completely seriously, making Cherep spit his first sip of tea out on the floor.

Tatiana was overcome with a fit of giggles that made it too hard for her to manage the teakettle, it made a hasty stop on the counter as she tried to recover.

Lisa coughed a couple times, blinking rapidly. "Sonya, sweetie… were you joking or being serious just now?"

She took a sip of her tea before answering. "Joking, I know Cherep's not gay. I've seen him flirt with girls before."

"Oh my god." The Sun using nurse breathed out, the occasional snicker escaping her. "That was epic, Sonya. I love you so much right now."

"That… was a low blow." Accused her brother in the next second, coughing slightly to get the tea he accidently inhaled out of his lungs. "I will get you back for this. Tatiana! You've corrupted Sonya, this means war."

"What are you talking about?" She denied, peering over her shoulder at them. "Sonya's just more human now."

"What is with people and thinking I'm a robot or something?" The thief herself questioned aloud, looking into the bottom of her teacup and absently reading the leaves drifting in it. Omen of death, omen of death, omen of love, omen of money… or was that one 'harvest'? "Lisa, make them stop."
With a sigh, the older Russian woman put a hand to her temple as her foster children started to squabble. "You want to clarify on that 'seeing your brother flirt' comment, Sonya?"

"He flirts with some of the girls in the circus, which was the other half of the reason I didn't associate with the trapeze girls very often." She readily admitted with a shrug. "Other than the fact they were all a bit too flighty and gossipy for my tastes. I didn't want to know if he slept with one or two while we were both there."

Cherep made a wheezing noise, dropping himself back into his seat and clutching his cooling tea. "Damn it Sonya, you're not supposed to tell her that."

"Why not? Personal things, Lisa told me she wanted to hear personal news out of us and I do believe that qualifies."

"So, Cherep, now that you can no longer try to distract us with Sonya's ongoing social problems...?" Lisa gave the stuntman a sharp grin. "Care to fill us in on the rest of how your life is going? Is there a serious girl you're seeing maybe?"

"This is where you got it." He accused the thief, pointing at their foster mother. "That inability to be shaken off whatever subject."

"That's nice." Sonya patted his knee absently, letting Tatiana refill her teacup. "You should probably answer her."

"Yes, yes you should."

Cherep gulped as Lisa beamed at him with maybe too many teeth showing.

(Tuesday the 2nd of January, 1968. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Sonya eyed her foster sister warily in the early morning light the next day. "Tats… are you losing weight for a reason or just because?"

"It's stress." The redheaded nurse supplied, rubbing at her face tiredly. "Lisa said no for the C-section, not unless things go really bad, so the doctors want one of the Sun active nurses on her all the time just in case. Given that there are two of us, and it's Lisa?"

"And where, exactly, are you getting the time to study in that?" Cherep asked absently, gnawing on a bagel as he pulled his head out of the fridge. "I thought you wanted to be a doctor?"

"I am going to be one." Tatiana all but snapped irritably, snatching the other bagel from the stuntman's hand and biting into it viciously. Frowning as she tried to understand the reason why she couldn't be, the thief shot a confused look to their foster brother from her spot at the Zolotov's condo guest room kitchenette table.

"Tatiana? Is there something wrong?" Asked the stuntman instead of addressing her confusion, which probably meant he had no idea either.

"…there are some sexist assholes in the hospital, and I just so happen have the luck to be assigned to work a floor with a couple of them stationed there." Clarified the redhead through her bread grimly, sighing and rolling her neck to loosen stiff muscles. "Don't worry about it, I'll live. And show those utter asses that I can do more than just look pretty."
"Erm… okay?"

Tatiana glanced over at Sonya, then rolled her eyes with a huff. "Don't worry about it, being able to light my hands on fire pretty much guarantees me protection from most of the shit like that. It's just… aggravating sometimes."

"That does not address the weight loss." The younger thief clarified hesitantly, eyeing her sister's much reduced frame from what she recalled from two years ago. "Tats, this doesn't look like a recent problem. More an ongoing issue."

"Sonya, it's just the medic's courses." She tried to reassure the both of them tiredly. "Your friend Renato wasn't kidding when he called them hellish. I crammed what amounts to four years of formal education and learning basic hospital duties all into one year, then this year is the basics of pharmaceuticals and biology lessons after work with a side order of medical emergencies and maybe a dash or two of weekly difficult patients."

"…hellish indeed." Cherep managed after a moment of blatant staring. "Why are you doing that to yourself?"

"Universities might be a lot less intensive, but I don't have the records for that or the inclination to take five to six years to do it." Their elder sister raked a hand through her long red hair, wincing when her fingers snagged on a few stubborn tangles. "This will take three, four if I'm unlucky. A couple more years to build up experience aside, it's quicker and a lot less questions will be asked over why I don't know some things or what I'm going to do with it."

"So… you're cramming a few years of leisurely study into a shorter term of working study?"

"This is also a place I won't have to take the Hippocratic Oath." She agreed with the stuntman, giving him a dry smile. "You'd be surprised how many assassins come out of the hospital's study-work course."

"No, no I don't think I would be." Cherep muttered, giving them a backhanded wave as he left them to get dressed for the day.

Tatiana looked back to Sonya, who was back to nibbling on her toast. "Any other concerns?"

"I thought you were becoming a nurse first?" The younger Russian posed after swallowing, glancing at the clock to see if she could go visit Lisa yet or not. "Then a doctor?"

"I am a nurse, Sun Flames cheating all over that."

"So why not stay a nurse a year, then start in on learning to be a doctor?" She asked, because that weight-loss wasn't just ten or so pounds.

It was more like thirty and then some.

"I might be able to become a nurse faster with Flames making me all the more special, but I do have to work up the knowledge base I skipped formally learning sometime." Answered the redhead wryly, stretching out her arms over her head to loosen up the muscles of her back and shoulders. "So right now, I'm making that up. Learning the basic first-year stuff any hospital intern needs to know and taking the courses I'll need to start in on a doctor's license. Well… a mafia one anyways."

The phone on the wall started ringing, distracting them before Sonya could pose her next question to her elder sister.
Tatiana sniffed, glanced up at the clock, and then frowned. "Who the hell calls at this hour?"

As the redhead got up to answer it, because in order for their suite's phone to ring the number had to be specifically dialed in order to not get the main suite's phone instead, the Storm-Cloud drained her teacup and wondered what to do today.

The nurse had to work, Cherep would likely hide out in his room, and she didn't really feel like going out and about herself.

Maybe a book?

"Lisa's gone into labor." The Sun shot over her shoulder, hanging up the phone and darting for her room. Likely to get dress so she could run to the hospital and relieve or assist that other Sun nurse. "I'll see you there, but you may want to wait an hour or two!"

The thief blinked, a little worried. "Why?"

"It's probably going to take a few hours!" Tatiana practically fell over herself coming out of her room, shoving her sweater down with an irritated motion and scooping up a random pair of shoes to wear. "Spend some time elsewhere, instead of pacing a hole through the waiting room."

Sonya was pretty sure those were Cherep's, actually. "Erm… Tats?"

"No time! Baby sibling to help bring into the world!"

…she should probably bring her a pair of her own shoes.

Sonya looked down at her empty teacup and plate, then at the dishes piled in the sink from the nurse's own breakfast. Lastly, she glanced at her fellow Cloud's temporary bedroom door.

Which was actually her room he was living in while the sisters shared one to accommodate him.

Wait a few hours Tatiana said. Doing what, exactly?

All she really wanted to do was head to the hospital too.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 2nd of January, 1968 continued. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Cherep winced as Lisa's scream petered off. "Well… this is…"

Sonya gritted her teeth as the next shout nearly made her rip through the book she couldn't muster the interest to read.

"…really unnerving." The stuntman finished, hunching his shoulders uncomfortably. "Are you getting the same urge to bust into there and maybe murder the doctors too? As if that would help Lisa?"

Exhaling through her nose slowly, the thief put her book down before she destroyed it. "Yes."

"I'm pretty sure that's-" They both winced again as Lisa shouted something intelligible at Arseniy in a very loud, pained voice. "-not quite normal."

"It is not." A new voice interjected.
She snapped the arms off of the chair she had planted herself in, dropping them to the floor and glaring over at the newcomer. "…Fong…"

"Miss Sonya." The Chinese man returned evenly, arms behind his back and bouncing slightly on his toes. "I must admit, I did not expect to see you here."

"This is a very bad time, Fong." The thief informed him needlessly. "Leave, before my restraint snaps."

"To be frank, I am a little surprised it had not already." Fong informed her warily, still keeping the bulk of the room between him and both Clouds. "The hospital has called in any Flame actives currently on the island, however. In case two snap, is what they informed me before I came here. I do believe you two are unnerving them."

"…both of us?" Cherep questioned him, looking both highly suspicious and a little green.

He inclined his head only low enough to confer agreement without breaking eye contact with the younger Cloud. "Both. You both have very purple eye coloring at this moment."

The stuntman managed a huff of laughter, a very dry one. "My eye coloring is always purple. And?"

"Well… I suppose that may not have a point with you, other than very suspicious shining being apparent. Miss Sonya, on the other hand…?"

"Is starting to get pissed off." The younger of the two Clouds in the room answered for herself, remaining in her broken seat by sheer will alone. "Go away, Fong."

The Chinese man did back away slightly, closer to the doors he likely entered the waiting room by. "I will, as long as you promise me a moment of your time later."

"…fine. Leave."

Fong swiftly did so while telling someone, was likely a hospital coordinator lingering out in the hallway, not to allow anyone else into the waiting room if he did not want deaths to occur. In rapid fire Chinese, actually.

The two Clouds sat in silence for a long moment.

"So… the screaming stopped, at least?" Cherep tried, with a sickly looking smile.

Sonya heaved a sigh, looking up at the bland tiled ceiling. "You wanted to know about Shanghai? That was one of the men that tried cornering me there."

"Oh… why…?"

"I broke someone's hand, then I dumped him and two others into the sea by shattering the docks."

The stuntman gave her a sideways look. "That doesn't explain why he wants to talk to you."

"I never found out why, Cherep." She tiredly admitted, rubbing at her forehead. "He tried cornering me, I did not appreciate it."

"Well… at least you can ask now?" He tried, shrugging when she glared at him. "What? He seems to be the type to be annoying about it if you try dodging him. Actually, all the men you know in the mafia seem like that… wonder why?"
They both snapped their heads around to the doors to the operating theater when Tatiana shoved it open to poke her head out and give them both a tired grin. "Hey, we've got a little brother."

"Is Lisa okay?" Her brother asked before Sonya could.

"She's lost a lot of blood, but other than that?" The Sun nurse shrugged wearily as she stepped out into the waiting room with them. "Touch and go for a bit there, but you won't believe it."

The stuntman frowned at her, puzzled. "Won't believe what?"

"Lisa broke Arseniy's arm in three places." Tatiana answered, a crooked smirk on her face. "That's why I'm so tired, healing him while she kept breaking him was kind of tricky."

"And thus why Lisa scares me sometimes, worse than Arseniy occasionally."

"Sonya? What happened to your chair?"

The thief glanced down, at the broken arms that were now lying on the floor. "...I will pay for that."

"Doesn't really answer the question, little sister."

(Friday the 5th of January, 1968. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Primakov Valerian Arsenevich was born mid-morning on January 2nd, 1968. Lisa was still on bedrest three days later.

"Everyone's going to forget Sonya's birthday now," Tatiana offered to the weary looking Lisa with a bright smirk, "we'll be too focused on little Lera's and completely forget her."

The new-mother did not look impressed as she shifted her baby closer to her neck instead of cradle him across her chest. "Did you wish your little sister happy birthday last year, Tats?"

"No, no one besides you two did." Sonya informed her with a shrug. "Then again, it's a little hard to remember it's my own birthday on the road, so..."

The thief was kind of concerned how pale Lisa still was, but the nurse in the room insisted everything was fine and the pallor would fade given enough time.

Cherep suddenly bodily tackled her, being careful not to jostle the hospital bed their foster mother and new baby brother were on. "Happy seventeenth birthday, Sonya!"

"Put me down or lose something important."

"No rough housing around the baby, until he can move himself anyway." Lisa informed all of them stridently, rubbing said baby on the back to keep him asleep while his siblings shuffled around.

Arseniy, who had situated himself carefully to be just out of reach in case his lover decided to break his arm again, pulled the redhead back to her feet by the hold he had taken on her sweater and finished her command with a threat. "Or I get to finish it."

"I thought you were eighteen now?" Asked her elder sister as they vacated their foster mother's room, so she could get into the wheelchair the hospital supplied to get her home in.

"My paperwork says eighteen. In reality? Seventeen." Sonya answered with a shrug, checking around to ensure a Chinese man she didn't want to see again wasn't lurking about. "I would greatly just appreciate finally finishing growing into myself, because I'm tired of looking coltish."

She might be dodging him out of spite but knew perfectly well she would have to talk to Fong sometime soon. If only to finally get the man off her back.

"Don't think you're going to get much bigger, or broader." Tatiana informed her, running a skeptical eye down her form. "You do look fully grown, if slim. You could use more chest, though."

"Well," Cherep interjected dryly, staring at the ceiling, "this just got awkward."

Lisa looked incredibly happy, and a tiny bit better, when she wheeled herself out of her hospital room. "Oh, thank heavens. I thought I was never going to get out of there."

The vor, who looked a bit irked to be the one carrying both baby and the baby bag the siblings had assembled for their foster mother since she was on bedrest, ambled out after her. "Worth it."

"Even me breaking your arm?" Lisa asked self-deprecatingly, more than a little sheepish over both what she had apparently threatened him with and the actual breakage itself. "Three times?"

Her lover and now father of her baby shrugged, depositing Valerian on his mom's lap and tossing the bright pastel baby bag at Cherep's head. "I've had worse, don't worry about it."

"This was a very, very bad idea." The stuntman muttered to Sonya, having barely caught the pack of baby supplies wrapped in garishly pink shades and gesturing to it so she knew he was talking about their choice in baby fashions.

"We didn't know the gender, consider it revenge." She glanced at both him and the bag in turn. "That may have backfired… on you at least."

(Saturday the 6th of January, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Jesus -oh-fuck!"

A yelp and an oath, and it was a very girly yelp, distracted Renato from some of the last bits of paperwork he would ever have to do for the famiglia he had obtained before a new Don took over.

Curious over what was bothering one of the ladies of the house and one of Nono's men, the hitman gleefully abandoned the half-finished papers and strode out of the study Timoteo had graciously loaned him for the time being.

He wasn't the only one attracted by the now identified Lightning Guardian's raised voice, there was a gathering of a couple other Vongola servants as well as Tyr and Coyote Nougat.

Ganauche had a hand fisted over his chest, right over his heart actually. He was gawking in the direction of a distinctly familiar image. "Miss Nikishina! I… uh, didn't know you were still here."

"Idiot." The Storm leveled a disgusted look at his fellow Guardian. "Miss Nikishina left a week ago, that's not her."

There was a very tiny exhale of relief from the gathered watchers.

With a derisive snort, Renato inspected the two victims of this little prank. "Shamal, what are you doing?"

"She was being mean, and Miss Sonya said to make her quit in disgust." From under one of the fainting couches, set up in various halls for the occasions one or two of the maids became a little overwhelmed by audacious criminal behavior, popped up the named baby Mist.

Shamal dusted off his pants and completely forgot his slightly wavy brown-now-grey-streaked hair, edging around until he was standing before his guardian and not in arm's reach of any of the other bystanders come to gawk.

"Nothing else worked! Not spiders in her hair or bugs in her clothes but she was scared of Miss Sonya, so I tried using her instead."

Eyeing the brat and noting he did have one of the turquoise figurines he got from Sonya for Christmas clutched in a fist, the hitman hummed as he turned to inspect the Mist Flame image of that particular thief. "Not bad, brat."

A footman was trying to rouse the nursemaid Daphne, who had likely fainted again when she came face-to-face with a glaring Russian Storm-Cloud that had frequently dismissed her as inconsequential and repeatedly forgot her name if not her face during her visit. Sonya had made it pointedly clear she didn't like the weaker Mist at all, while simultaneously spoiling the baby Mist almost without thought at the same time.

The duality had completely baffled the bulk of Vongola's housekeeping staff.

They were educated on Dying Will Flames even if they couldn't use them in order to anticipate or avoid triggering any errant traits that might make their jobs harder, so they had thought they had known how to deal with users of the various Flame types.

While a Cloud disliking a Mist on sight was pretty much par for the course, that same Cloud heeding the whims of an entirely different Mist willingly enough didn't mesh with that prior knowledge base.

"I think Sonya would be a little irritated to know you used a half-dressed version of her, though." Renato tacked on when Shamal had his moment to preen at the praise, waving a hand to the outfit of the shirt the thief stole from him and the drawstring pants she had been wearing Christmas morning. "Why did you pick that?"

"So it'd be extra scary, 'cause Miss Sonya's always grumpy in the mornings." Baby Mist brat reminded him with a pout. "And specially until she really wakes up. How can someone 'really' wake up if they're already awake?"

"The word is especially, and the answer is caffeine." The hitman corrected then informed his ward blandly, having to agree with the kid about the Russian's early morning temperament. She had nearly kicked him in the face when he grabbed her leg to heal her foot. "Pronounce your words fully."

It really wasn't a bad Mist-likeness of her, although the features were tilted a little off because normally Shamal was looking up at the thief and not straight at her.

"You need more practice with faces. Work on that."

"Okay..." Shamal agreed, then kicked his little shoe against the carpet runner. "Does this mean I don't have to go back to class?"

"What's being taught today?" If it was math, he could handle that. Probably better than the tutor teaching the various younger children of Mafioso and the Vongola servants.

"World history."
He could handle that one as well. "You know, Sonya likes history too? She likes to read, and lately it's all been history books with her."

Tyr leaned forward a bit, imposing enough that the slight action was more than enough to center attention squarely on him. "Young Shamal, could you unmake your illusion before Miss Daphne wakes? I think."

An entirely different scream, not matching the tone of the yelp that accompanied the Lightning Guardian's invoking of Jesus, rang out and the nursemaid fainted again.

Shamal unraveled his Mist Construction a bit sheepishly, a little too late to not scare the woman again.

Speculative attention turned to Ganauche, who flushed beet red under the disbelieving scrutiny as the onlookers put the earlier girly yelp with him as the cause. "What? It surprised me. She's fucking scary, okay?"

"You're only saying that because she nearly chopped your foot in half with a battle ax." Coyote scoffed, turning on his heel to stalk off to wherever he had been heading before the Lighting loudly swore.

"You'd think so too if you were the one she pulled an ax out of nowhere to threaten you with!"

"It wasn't out of nowhere, Ganauche." Renato reminded the man derisively, flicking his ward in the head and jerking a thumb in the direction of his temporary study to get the brat moving. "The damn things were in her hands when you just had to needle her into actually showing she could defend herself with them."

"Hey! I was doing my job, making a threat focus on me." He defended himself. "And you didn't know she could do that either!"

"I wasn't stupid enough to try mocking them... especially to her face."

Sonya had a nasty habit of being surprising, after all. Bringing a battle ax or seven to a mafia ball, sneaking them and another set of weapons in under everyone's nose by accident?

...heh.

Seeing he was getting no help from either the hitman or the assassin, or the tetchy brat now glaring at him behind his guardian's leg for the news of how he may have treated the Russian he adored, the Lighting huffed irritably and crossed his arms defensively. "A little solidarity between men would be appreciated."

"With that little girly scream of yours?" Renato mocked over one shoulder, nudging his unwilling ward to start moving. "Are we sure you're a man?"

"Hey..." Ganauche scowled at the man's back, then frowned harder as something else occurred to him. "Hey, Sinclair! You didn't tell your brat not to do it again!"

"Not going to! Live with it!"

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 6th of January, 1968 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)
"The... fuck man." Running a hand through his short curly hair, the Lighting turned to the assassin still observing the ongoing events. "What? You've got something to say too?"

Tyr leveled a flat look at Ganauche. "You should have disarmed Miss Sonya, then asked how she could utilize a miniaturized armory of jewelry in her defense."

"Fucking... yeah, Timoteo read me the riot act too." Edging away from the assassin slightly, he rolled his shoulders uncomfortably. "I heard it, okay? No insulting armed guests, especially if they're guests we want good relations with."

"Especially when she might be able to save us a fortune in the cost of Flame rings in the near future, if we no longer have to go through Talbot and can manage our own supply organically." The Sword Emperor tacked on dryly, narrowing his gaze on the cringing Lightning. "Or may eventually agree to follow our Don or have children with her unique Cloud-Storm Flame mix who might do the same."

"Isn't Master Sinclair and Miss Nikishina in a relationship already?" One of the maids asked of another, a puzzled expression on her face. "They seemed to get along really well at the Ball."

"I think they're hiding it." That maid confided to her quietly. "For young master Shamal, so he won't lose another set of parents if either ends up in more trouble than they can handle alone. Like what drove Master Sinclair to request Don Vongola to help him last year. They do seem to share custody of him since neither had to clear what they were doing with him to the other, and they tend to bend to the young master's whims."

The footman, who had given up trying to rouse Daphne again and merely moved her to the fainting couch, gave the two of them a chiding look. "Stop gossiping about Don Vongola's guests. If they are or are not in a relationship is entirely their business. Particularly if it's to protect their joint-ward."

One maid defended herself as merely sharing news, because Miss Nikishina had been wearing Master Sinclair's shirt Christmas morning.

Ganauche slanted a confused look to the Head of the Varia. "I thought Miss Nikishina told Timoteo they weren't dating?"

Tyr raised his eyes to the ceiling for a long moment, then stalked off with one word of explanation. "Gossip."

"Well... yeah but... is it true gossip or not?" The Lighting Guardian muttered, scratching at the back of his head.

Sinclair had punched him in the face at the end of that night. Was it because he had inadvertently said he wanted a kiss from his girlfriend?

Was Nikishina more his female friend and technically his ward's mom-figure than an actual girlfriend?

Was that why he got punched in the face?

Utterly confused, Ganauche started off for Timoteo's office to report back in after his diplomatic trip to another famiglia. His Sky probably knew he was back, and what happened in the hallway.

Coyote left in that direction.

Damn it, he was never going to live that high-pitched yelp down.
Lisa's haste in having her long wished for biological child did result in a complete inability to have more, even with Sun Flame therapy, but the older Russian did not care. "I have my baby, Tatiana. It's fine."

Little Valerian sneezed in response to the baby powder in the air, blinking his apparently likely to change blue eyes in bewildered surprise and tearing up as he decided he didn't like the sensation. He hadn't particularly liked the wet-diaper feel either, so he was probably of the opinion that the last half hour of his life pretty much sucked.

"Aww… little Lera, don't cry." Tatiana cooed to the baby, lightly tapping him on the oh-so-offensive nose to get baby attention on her instead of his upset. She then held out one of the various stuffed animals she had bought in the past few months and wiggled it back and forth in an invitation to play. "Look, your big sister got you fuzzy things to play with."

"Stop calling him that." Lisa sighed, strapping the baby's new diaper shut and starting to wrap him back up in a swaddling blanket. "That's a girl's nickname, Tats."

…and they called the Sun by a nickname that referred to ink embedded into skin. Sonya didn't quite see the issue there, other than being perfectly happy she didn't have one herself.

"Here Sonya, hold him a moment." Gently placing her baby in the youngest foster sibling's arms, the older woman hoisted herself upright off the floor a little painfully. The thief held herself very, very still. Hoping beyond hope Valerian didn't decide to blow out eardrums all of a sudden.

Her brand-new baby brother shifted, as much as he could do wrapped up as he was, but apparently decided she would do if mom wasn't holding him.

"Okay, he screams at me but likes Sonya just fine? Unfair."

"Maybe because I'm not trying to saddle him with a girl's nickname?" She posed to her elder sister dryly in a soft tone, feeling kind of good about not somehow bothering the baby into crying.

For what amounted to an armful of almost non-interactive human, Sonya decided Valerian wasn't too bad. He stunk sometimes and had an impressive set of lungs for being the son of two people that never seemed to need to raise their voices, but he was kind of cute in that useless chubby puppy way. Admittedly it had only been a day, he could get worse.

He apparently decided she wasn't that bad either, gripping the thief's blouse in the next to useless hand that snuck out of his swaddling and shoving it into his mouth messily. Just so he could drool all over her naked collarbone.

She was going to need a new shirt.

Lisa snickered at the sight the two of them made, stretching out her limbs one by one. "That's too cute, Sonya."
"Lisa, you shouldn't-

"I'm fine, Tatiana." The older Russian claimed a bit tiredly, now rubbing at the small of her back. "Spending a few months lying in bed will make anyone restless. I would like to simply stand, I promise to do nothing but stand here."

Their foster mother looked even worse than Tatiana did, still exhausted and a bit drawn even a full day outside of the hospital and into her new role as mother of a newborn. She didn't look quite as bad as she had yesterday, or just fresh from her very difficult labor, so Sonya kept silent and just patted the newborn on the back lightly to keep him content with gumming her blouse collar.

...and leaking a bucket of drool down her shirt.

"Where is Arseniy? He wouldn't let you do this." Demanded the eldest sibling, warily keeping an eye on the brunette for any overt signs of pain.

"He and Cherep went for lunch, before we pack up the rest of our things." She admitted calmly, flicking said eldest on the forehead in reprimand. "Arseniy has no say on what I'm allowed to do, young lady."

No, but Lisa had a habit of gleefully snuggling up to the vor when he sprawled out on a couch.

That would get the woman off her feet and nicely prone, thus the nurse's wondering of where her man was.

"They're certainly taking a while." Suggested Tatiana a little petulantly, pouting for a long moment before getting up off the hardwood floor herself.

She swiftly cleaned up the evidence of little Valerian's third diaper change in his life, without even a wrinkle of disgust crossing her face at handling baby produced biohazardous waste.

Sonya wished her the joy of it, perfectly happy to be the one supporting Valerian instead of help clean.

The menfolk only returned well after the baby mess was completely cleaned up and Lisa tired herself out of wanting to stand. The thief wondered if one of the other vor hadn't been keeping a discreet eye on them and warned Arseniy when it would be safe to come back.

Cherep looked entirely too cheerful, even if he was the one managing the various take-out containers for all five of them. He made a beeline for the coffee table and placed the boxes of food down.

"Ladies, having fun?"

...yeah, she was now sure the two of them had been waiting for an all-clear sign before coming up.

The vor suddenly loomed up behind her armchair, which she was half-reclined into while his son did his baby-doze thing on her chest. "Sinclair?"

"Renato Sinclair, Italian Mafioso, somewhat of a friend... I think." Sonya clarified slowly, feeling a bit confused.

Her fellow Cloud had said she hadn't done anything wrong, right?

"A hitman I met six years ago."

"Sun user! He's the other side of the coin from me." Tatiana tacked on cheerily, plating up Lisa her portion before serving herself. "Tall, dark, and snarky."

Cherep snorted, unfortunately attracting the nurse's attention.

"Wait... Cherep? When did you meet the man?"

"Austria and Italy. Last year and the year before that in reverse order." The stuntman supplied readily enough, taking a quick bite of the fried pork cutlets on his plate before continuing. "Sonya seems to think his stalking of her is a good thing."

That earned her two incredulous stares and a dark one from over her head, her older brother eating more than staring like the rest of the family, and the former pickpocket sighed. "I stalked Cherep for two months and it wasn't a problem then."

"You were also like, seven. Stalking an eight-year-old boy. That was cute, this is...?" Clarified the nurse unhelpfully, sitting back with a full plate of Korean food to munch on. "Seriously, Sonya? No, wait... back in the bar, you even said it was getting a little creepy how he could keep on finding you. How often does it happen?"

"Once or twice a year, but I really only think he keeps on doing it to annoy me. Besides, I know him."

"And that makes it alright?"

"If I know who it is stalking me? Sure." She shrugged, carefully holding a hand to baby Valerian's back when he decided he didn't like the motion happening under him too much and let her know with a fussy little grunt. "If I don't, then it's outright concerning rather than just mainly annoying creepiness."

Tatiana sighed theatrically, giving their foster brother a droll look. "I can't tell if that's a double-standard or just her being oblivious."

Sonya privately thought they had the double-standard, if it was alright for her to stalk Cherep back when they were kids and Renato stalking her now wasn't.

"Sonya, sweetie, does this Sinclair ever make you uncomfortable?" Lisa drew her out of her thoughts by asking, with an actual thread of concern in her tone that the blonde gave it serious thought.

"No? I mean, everyone makes me uncomfortable at first until I get used to them. He's just... annoying. And likes to annoy me. Annoying him in return is just..." She shrugged again, giving up Valerian to his father when the baby decided he really didn't like the motions of a shrug and started fussing louder. "Renato's a shameless flirt who does so even in the middle of conversation with me to the waitress or some female passerby, but I do like talking to him because he's at least amusing when he's in a good mood."

"And when Mister hitman isn't in a good mood?" Cherep asked between bites, looking a bit disgruntled.

Probably over the fact he was only learning now that the man was a hitman.

"I can usually nudge him into one if I mock whatever it is he's gotten pissy about. If he tells me what it's about, otherwise I ignore him."

Shifting herself, Lisa took Valerian back from Arseniy and let the vor slide in behind her. Handing off her plate to the man in favor of fussing over her unhappy baby. "Well... it doesn't sound too bad.
"I would like to be kept apprised, sweetie."

"…about?" How their friendship was going?

While Sonya could probably do that easily enough, reporting every meeting to her foster mother would get old fast.

"Anything that he does that confuses you. Or that you may not understand right away. If you have to think about it, I want to know." Their mother specified, tucking her son into the crook of her arm and tickling his belly to shift his attention to something new. "As a matter of fact, any male you know and are confused by I want to know about."

"Okay?" Well… did that mean every male she knew of, even Cherep?

There were a few things from the Vongola Christmas Ball she was kind of confused by still.

"Lisa? Is there a reason for choking on nothing? Or slamming your head into a desk?"

"Surprise, and maybe exasperation." She answered in a cautious kind of tone, looking puzzled. "Where is this from?"

"Ganauche, the Lightning Guardian of Vongola's Sky Timoteo. He was kind of… weird." Sonya considered her few interactions with the man, frowning a bit. "Why would he be surprised then? He already knew I was… or… was he exasperated with me? How rude."

Tatiana's expression lit up, but Lisa gave her a quelling look. "No, Tats. Only if Sonya asks you for help or is willing to talk about it. It's her life, she may live it how she wishes. Sonya, I hope you will remember that I am always available to help you if you need it."

"She's not going to mind! She barely cares half the time." The nurse dismissed the implied reprimand, still grinning at her younger foster sister. "Sonya, sweet sister of mine, how did the Ball go?"

Arseniy blew out a sigh, looking both irritated and a bit disgruntled himself now. Given he was still holding the plate while Lisa nibbled from it and played with her baby, she could understand why. "This Sinclair guy, when is he around?"

"All the time usually." Sonya pounced on the subject change gratefully, not wanting to admit to the fashion-inclined Sun that she spent the bulk of the ball picking on the fashions other people were wearing with Renato so she didn't really remember what everyone was wearing too well. "He's got some business to do back in Italy, so I'm not expecting him to appear for a few months more yet."

That apparently wasn't what the vor wanted to hear, glancing down at his lover and newborn son then back up to her. "He ever makes you uncomfortable from now on, I want to hear it."

The thief nodded slowly, wondering if what she had been telling them about her life before this hadn't quite been enough. Were these specific requests from that mistake? "Alright."

Arseniy shot a look to Cherep, who silently gave the man a salute then ignored the questioning look she shot him in turn.

"Are you going to eat, sweetie?" Lisa asked curiously, shooting the nurse a stern look of her own to get her more interested in her food then grilling her younger sister for news of a party she could get another time.
"I… have a Chinese Triad member to go talk to. I promised." Under duress, but Fong really had looked surprised to see her in the waiting room.

That man had terrible timing, and a very unfortunate skill in edging into rocky ground when it came to Clouds. At the very least, she should probably go see what he wanted before leaving for Moscow. Who knew what else he'd trip into if she put it off.

"The… that guy from the hospital? What was his name, Faugeu?"

Sonya blinked at her foster brother. "…was your mouth full or something? It's Fong."

Her fellow Cloud stuck his nose in the air, sniffing in mock offense. "I don't speak Chinese, Sonya. Fawng."

"Now my ears are cringing." Tatiana claimed, smirking. "Say it with me Cherep, F-ong."

"I will be back in a few hours." The thief told their foster mother, who looked pretty amused at the stuntman's butchering of Chinese names.

"Have fun, sweetie." Lisa informed her pleasantly, letting Valerian grasp at her fingers and tug to his little heart's content. "Let us know how it goes."

…but this would be business, not personal. What…?

Sonya nodded absently, trying to figure out why she wanted to know. Eventually, before she even reached the main doors, the thief gave up and just resigned herself to telling her everything that happened from now on.

That would just about cover anything Lisa would want to know.

(ooo000ooo)

Fong did not make himself easy to find. Sonya eventually had to backtrack to the hospital to figure out where he had been before getting called in yesterday then spread out her search from there.

In the end, she found him in one of the dojos that allowed for practice rooms to be rented out by the hour. It wasn't a small one, which rented tiny personal rooms, but one of the more mid-sized ones that rented out halls to groups of people that wished to practice whatever fighting style against another's with spectators and judges around.

The man she had been looking for was not the only Triad member in the hall, and a fair number of them seemed to recognize her. She flatly ignored her old temp-aid/guide/personal assassin Liqin as he cringed slightly in place, even if she took a seat on the floor next to him to wait for the man who asked her for a word to be done.

Fong had a red Chinese dragon tattoo curling up his left arm to his shoulder, she wondered if it was like her feline one. Did it have a meaning behind it?

Since the martial artist, or at least the hand-to-hand combat specialist, was in the middle of his practice, the thief had been perfectly content to sit and wait. The stances were pretty interesting, if nothing like ballet moves.

Liqin, apparently, was not content to wait. "Miss Yu-"
"Sonya, since I'm sure you already know my name I see no reason to pretend." She corrected flatly, glancing at him from the corner of her eye. "If this has anything to do with the last time we saw each other, I don't want to hear it."

"I must apologize anyways, Miss… Sonya." The man insisted a little stiffly, appearing and sounding slightly distressed. "I... we, knew the rules and discarded them anyways. You did not deserve that."

"Funny, because I'm pretty sure you had no problem with carrying out said violation of the rules until you realized I wasn't exactly what you thought." Sonya returned, already irritated and fast moving on to ticked off. "Was there at least a reason why your Triad group decided to approach me like that?"

"That was a bad miscalculation on our part." Fong interjected for Liqin calmly, smoothly withdrawing his limbs into a resting pose and glancing at her with what seemed to be naturally red colored eyes when he came to a halt. "We assumed you were a Storm, not a Cloud."

"Three men cornering a young woman does not suggest anything good, Fong."

"You were not alone until you sent the elder woman away."

She wasn't remotely sold on that being a mitigating detail. "She was civilian, who knew nothing of my mafia connections. And, as you said, elderly. Since our little meeting did end up slightly violent, I still believe I was justified in sending her away."

Crina hadn't known for sure, anyways. That was the Russian's story and she was sticking to it.

"...ah." The half-dressed man did finally looking something other than pleasantly bland, a slightly sheepish grimace made itself known for a split second before he smoothed it away. "We may owe you more than just an apology."

"Yes, yes you do." Sonya informed him tartly, folding her arms under her chest. "However, I don't particularly care to hear it. What do you want, Fong?"

"I would like to give said apology, and to ask you a few questions." Holding up a hand before she could do more than glare, he tried for a smile. "I will also explain our actions. If you decide then that you want nothing more to do with us, then..."

"You'll try to leave me alone but will unable to uphold that because either you or your bosses still want something from me." Finished the thief for him dryly, sighing through her nose when his smile turned a bit wry around the edges. "What do I get out of allowing you to, however politely, harass me more?"

"Lunch?" Fong suggested, the hand he had been holding up making a sweeping gesture to the floor-to-ceiling windows on the eastern side of the dojo. "It is around that time."

...Sonya had skipped out on what Arseniy and Cherep brought back in order to do this little meeting. "Fine."

"I know of a good steam bun vendor. Or, if you would rather, there are some decent teahouses around."

"The vendor will be fine." She had tried Chinese steamed buns, back when her brother got interested in what duck blood and glass noodle soup was like. The buns weren't bad, just not something she ate very often.
The broad and slightly tanned hand held out to her made the thief blink and stare.

Fong had watched her crush a man's hand in front of him, with only her own hand to do said crushing. Why the hell would a martial artist risk his livelihood in such a way in giving her an easy target to crush if she got irritated again?

He didn't twitch under the dubious look she shot him, actually giving her a small smile when she accepted the help up.

Well… he had good manners, at least.

(ooo000ooo)

Long story short, China's Triad organizations were still hoarding any and all Flame users they found, had, or discovered. If one wasn't with a Triad, they were 'asked' to join up when found.

Sonya went and made herself special, in her haste to get back to Mafia Land to ensure Renato and Shamal had gotten away clean and continue distracting the former group in control of security.

A competent, highly skilled Storm selling her skills in the ultimate criminal temp agency known as Mafia Land?

The Russian had used her Storm Flames not only to burn to cinders only what she wanted gone, but somehow had the control to carve rocks into delicate tiles then carve a character into them without melting the rest of the stone.

Most Storms, even decently experienced ones like the man who informed her of all this, were more arsons in nature. They could start fires, and obliterate a large chunk of area if asked, but usually their Disintegration was too uncontrolled to be handled in close quarters or urban areas.

With her control, on the other hand…?

Apparently being a competent thief already trained up and the ability to somewhat control her damage made her downright valuable.

Fong's Triad group had been trying to recruit her before any of the other groups involved in the Omertà-safeguard job, thinking she was freelance since she worked for the island and not one of her native syndicates. Cue misunderstandings between Cloud vs Storm behavior and her elderly civilian company, which ended when she got fed up and actually destroyed a good few yards of road after shattering a dockside wharf.

While the proper way to go about it was to use her personal identification code in Mafia Land and request a meeting she could then accept or refuse, Sonya had been spending most of the year outside of it. Worse, before they could decide if chasing one lone thief down would be worth it she had popped back up within their country.

With a civilian circus, carving rocks into jewelry.

Fong had gotten interested at that point, because being a Storm himself he knew perfectly well how their Flames behaved normally. The best he could do, he informed her without a trace of chagrin or care, was obliterate whatever he used his against and most of the nearby acre if things weren't handled carefully.
She was still not amused. "I am not freelance, Fong. I belong to the Zolotovs of Moscow."

At least as long as Arseniy was.

She really had no feelings about her Pahkan or the rest of her clan, besides maybe some fondness for Dmitriy and Usov. However, so long as her foster father, mother, new baby brother, and sister were loyal the former pickpocket turned jewel thief would stay with them.

That would likely change when she actually had the time to get to know her fellow Zolotovs better now that they and she were grown adults, but that was yet to come still.

The martial artist accepted that easily enough with a nod. "We have become… aware of that."

…was this the 'odd' that Lisa commented on?

Had Fong, or one of the members of his Triad, encountered either of her foster parents?

Sonya considered it, and squarely decided on that she was annoyed to hear it.

Her mother had been pregnant, she had not needed any further stress.

Either feeling the glare that was being drilled into the side of his head or being acutely aware that any Cloud would not appreciate the news that their family had been approached for whatever reason, the Storm lifted the order of steamed bun he purchased for her into her sights. "Hungry?"

If only because he had paid for it as part of his apology, the thief accepted the plate. It would probably be boiling hot, so she didn't try picking it up. She had watched it be made and cooked, she knew it wasn't tampered with.

"So… what exactly did you expect from that confrontation? As far as you had known, I was a freelance thief for some reason hanging around a civilian circus."

"I was ordered to bring you back with us," He admitted easily after swallowing his first bite, "as you did not seem happy with where you were. Unfortunately, you never did let me actually talk to you instead of chase around Shanghai's streets."

"If you are expecting an apology for dunking you into the sea, you're not getting it." Sonya informed him flatly, testing her own food with a fingertip.

It was still boiling hot, how the hell was he eating his?

"And as far as you could have known, I was perfectly happy with where I was."

He shot her a perfectly skeptical look.

"…alright, maybe not, but maybe it was just the country. China's gotten a little… hot."

That made his features flatten out back into neutrality as they started wandering down a few streets aimlessly with their food.

"While I will admit we misjudged that situation, and my homeland is currently in the middle of some unrest," he ignored her snort, "I personally had wanted a word with you even if you had refused the offer."

"The man whose hand I crushed." Sonya reminded him tartly. "He did not seem intent on giving any 'offer', more like an order."
"They had to amputate his hand." Fong countered calmly. "You mangled it too badly to be healed."

"...that has nothing to do with what he tried which refutes some of what you've said."

"Gen always was a little... brash." He temporized after another bite, likely using the food to buy him thinking time.

"One should not try to grab a woman they do not know," Shot back the Russian, yet again checking her lunch's temperature and still deciding it was too hot, "especially not one who is a known Flame user. That was more than brash, that was stupid."

"...agreed." The martial artist offered slowly with a nod that made his braid bob into her sights and let her catch sight of something going on behind them.

Sighing, she shoved her plate at him then lunged for the kid that was trying to pickpocket the martial artist when he took it. She went slowly enough that the brat bolted before she got her hands on him, ensuring she didn't have to actually deal with him as well or see what the other Storm would do to someone trying to steal from him.

Sonya snatched her food back when Fong scowled at the kid making fast tracks away from the two of them. Deciding her food had cooled enough, she nibbled on the bun to ensure she didn't burn her mouth and took a small bite when she was sure it wouldn't.

It wasn't that bad, actually. Better than the ones she tried in Ha-mi.

Wiping off the trickle of pork juice that escaped her lips, the only downside to letting steamed buns cool was that they got drippy, the thief licked it off her finger then checked the time.

If she was going to catch the ferry with her foster family, or most of it because Tatiana was staying, she had to get a move on.

…and she was pretty sure this watch was Cherep's, she should probably give it back before he returned to the circus.

"Was there anything else, Fong? I do have places to be."

"...um. Yes, actually." He sounded distracted enough she glanced back at him curiously, but whatever it had been had passed and the man was now fishing something out of his pocket. "There is this."

"...I'm pretty sure I gave that to Crina." Sonya informed him flatly, her gaze flicking from the broken teeth end of her red tourmaline crystal skeleton key to the equally red eyes Fong had.

No wonder she hadn't seen it since Shanghai, the gypsy had lost it... to the Triads.

"You have a control over Storm Flames I have never seen." He defended himself, or explained rather, with a one-shoulder shrug. "A control I am interested in acquiring. Even with the discipline my fighting style requires, I have not gotten to the point I can only burn away what I want instead of everything in range."

"Yeah... that's pretty much par for the course." She admitted blandly, then frowned at the man and snatched her crystal back.

Tried, actually. The much taller Chinese man closed his fist before she could actually retrieve the broken key piece. "Please?"
"Ever think it has to do with Storm Flames themselves?" She demanded, holding out her free hand for him to return the crystal.

"I would not think you were so interested in getting this back if it was."

"It doesn't work for you very well, does it?" It had looked a bit more cracked than the last time she had seen it, so all the damage wasn't from her snapping it off the rest of the crystal.

"Well… no." Fong admitted pleasantly, raising his clenched fist over his head and well out of her reach when she reached for it again. Likely realizing she could probably pry it out of his hand with brute strength if need be. "But since you know that, you know where I could find something like it that would work better."

Sonya needed different stones, and to broaden her search parameters. She had specifically settled on red tourmaline because it had been a bad focus stone.

"Storm Flames overwhelm, Fong. Everything. That's basically all they do."

That tidbit had the martial artist inspecting the broken crystal curiously in the strong tropical mid-winter sunlight, which she used to her advantage and plucked it from his grasp with a little jump. Uncaring if the sharp edge cut him or not.

"It's red tourmaline, which you could have gotten from any jeweler appraising this." She jabbed her finger into his chest to help make her point, then tucked the piece of broken crystal into her pocket. "Try using the least bit of Flames possible, dabs and trickles. Now, leave me alone."

He looked entirely unbothered by her poking, merely giving her a pleasant little smile. "Ah, but Sonya… if I have more questions, where else would I take them?"

She rolled her eyes, finally getting around to eating her lunch and flatly ignoring him as she walked away.

Yeah… she'd be seeing him again.

(Thursday the 11th of January, 1968. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Valerian's first night in Moscow happened at the Zolotov Clan headquarters. Mainly so his mother could show off the son she had finally been able to bear one of their vor and partially so Cherep and Sonya had the time to completely scrub down their home.

A year and a half worth of grime and dust wouldn't do the baby much good.

Tatiana's old bedroom was also turned into a nursery, being the one closest and next door to Lisa's and Arseniy's own room. Her fellow Cloud's mechanical skills did at least translate over to carpentry skills, but he still got irritated with the directions to assemble the baby crib enough to politely ask her to burn them with her Storm Flames when he was done.

Mostly politely, but there was that rather concerning tick in his left eye when he asked. The grin as he watched them crumble to her red Flames was also a little disturbing.

Their foster mother's delighted laugh the next day when she realized she wasn't going to have to juggle Valerian and a deep spring cleaning at the same time was more than enough of a reward for them.

The vor sheepishly scratched the back of his neck when she turned that amused and delighted gaze on him, still holding the napping baby in the crook of his arm. "I asked the kids to do it for my Christmas present. Since they did the baby shopping for your own."

"I suppose that is why Tatiana said she'd be the one to clean out our rooms back in Mafia Land too?" She asked dryly, a smirk she could do nothing about still twisting her lips up.

"...yeah."

Lisa pecked the father of her baby on the cheek, then looked over to the two foster siblings watching them. "Well?"

"Can I stay for a month?" Sonya asked, flicking her hand in the direction of their headquarters. "I've got to catch up with Dmitriy about the Dying Will Flame research and what tidbits I've recently learned. You can think of me as a live-in nanny."

"You freeze when I give you Valerian, Sonya."

"Well... yeah. He screams."

With a huff that did nothing to cover her amusement, Lisa gave a nod then looked at Cherep expectantly.

He held up his hands, shaking his head. "I probably should go back to work, but I'll try and visit on the free weekends to ensure Sonya doesn't terrify little Val."

"I would not-"

"I like Val, better than Lera anyways." The older Mafiya woman interjected before her youngest foster daughter got the two of them into an argument. "Sonya, if you're staying then the usual applies. Let us know where you'll be, at least generally, and if you're not going to be sleeping here whichever night."

"Sure."

"What about Valera?"

The suggestion got their foster mother to pause before she went up the stairs as she thought about the nickname her lover offered. "Well... Tats won't pout about her suggestion being nixed. Even better, thank you."

"How are you going to handle that?" The vor ask of Sonya while Lisa probably checked out the nursery they had set up, patting his son's belly absently as he woke up. "It might be your work, but he's the one putting the effort into it."

"So, it's ultimately up to him." The thief finished with a shrug. "I told him last year that if he really wanted I'd come back and fill in for him so he could do whatever, but if he doesn't want to give his position up I'm not going to argue. I'd rather that, actually."

"I have to get going." Cherep interjected before that could continue, replacing the watch she had given back to him into his jeans' pocket. "I'm overrunning it by a bit as it is, Arseniy."
Their foster father gave the stuntman a nod, and a pound to the back, before shifting the now awake Valerian higher up his chest. "Don't be a stranger, Cherep."

"I'll try not to." He responded, blinking a bit and flexing his back with a wince. "Sonya, see you later."

"Oh wait, give this back to Crina." The thief dug out the crystal bit she had gotten from Fong, tossing it to him. "And be careful."

Her brother knew perfectly well where the jewel bit was from, giving her a strange look. "Back? Did she lose it or something?"

"Or something." His fellow Cloud agreed sourly. "Don't ask."

He accepted that with a nod, giving the both of them a wave as he left through the still open front door and shutting it behind him.

"I swear to high hell, if he crashes not a street or two down from here..."

"That sounds like ill-wishing." Arseniy informed her dryly, Valerian still trying to figure out what the ever-loving hell he was doing with dad rather than mom as he wiggled to get comfortable.

Cherep had some decently good luck, with his bike and stunt work anyways, so Sonya accepted that. Baby Valera decide he didn't like the noise that accompanied the stuntman's bike any more than his sisters had years ago. He then let dad and one of those sisters know it by wailing.

They responded by cringing, in tandem.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 11th of January, 1968 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Dmitriy glared at Sonya, who looked to Galina, who shifted her gaze to the Inverted Rain again.

The office hadn't changed much since the first time she saw it, done up mostly in dark wood and shades of dark blue. There were a few new touches of green, again a dark shade of it, here and there she did wonder about.

Brass accented fixtures were new, at least. It was a very nice... ugly lamp on the desk.

"Well?" The Storm-Cloud asked, settling back into the seat across the Rain's desk. It was blue too, and the one next to it was green.

"You are a colossal pain in the ass, Sonya." He informed her flatly, kicking his boots up to set on the corner of his desk.

Galina sniffed in disapproval of the action, clicking her way to the bookcase set up next to the windows of the Rain's office. "I believe we will be staying in charge, Sonya."

The thief herself was gazing at her high heels, wondering how the ever living fuck she could stand to wear those for hours. She was a Lightning, no instant-heal for her to bullshit her way through it.

Did she Harden her ankles or something?
"Alright." Seriously, was there some kind of secret she and Tatiana were never let in on? "So then, next order of business is the few new things I've found."

"You were with a civilian outfit for two years." Dmitriy reminded her in a blank tone of voice, looking highly skeptical.

"Not the entire time." Sonya waved that off, rubbing at her temple. "Last winter, when I borrowed the Mist gems? The Inverted Sun who was guardian to the Mist brat found out he could use moonstones. Since they don't come in variations of yellow, closest would be brown, the color of the stones probably doesn't actually mean much."

"Fuck… do we have to rematch the kids?"

She frowned at that suggestion, shaking her head after a moment. "Not until they have some kind of control, I think. You're starting them all on what? A matched color gem?"

"It works better than sapphires in the long run, even if those give better results quickly." Admitted the Rain with a short nod. "The shattering, on the other hand…?"

Her left palm twitched at the reminder, and she smoothed it down her jean clad thigh. "I know. I think we're going to have to rematch at least all three of us, and Tats, but the kids can wait until they have reliable results without a gemstone."

Galina let a couple heavy books slam into the former mechanic's desk, which made the owner of said desk jump enough his boots slid off it. "We will be recording results this time, to ensure a stone for one Flame user will not work for all."

"Except for Mists." Sonya corrected, shaking her head when the Lightning glared at her. "Look Galina, I'm not even sure any Mist even needs a stone, much less can actually make use of it like another Flame user can. Usov ended up with a mineral, the other Mist brat I fitted ended up with turquoise. Which, again, is a mineral."

"That's… still going to be a lot of rocks." The only male in the room informed her slowly, jerking a thumb over to a heavy chest set up in the corner of his office. "And we're already running low on a few of them already, ran out of a couple too."

"I will resupply the gemstones needed." Which would likely mean even more jewel heists and, since there wasn't a limitation or a sorting method found yet so that meant all gems she could find in any one place, a lot of risk if she did it within the USSR. "For both us to test and for fitting any new Flame users."

"Better you than me. We're going to need Cherep and a few other Flame users. Like an Inverted Sun, both Skies, even if we're nixing the Mists from the official results we should probably at least test them."

"Can you tell between a Classic and Inverted Mist?" Sonya asked of him dryly, shoving a hand through her hair and mentally reminding herself she still needed a trim. "I can likely pull an Inverted Sun, probably around the time Tatiana's free for a little rock testing. I might, might mind you, be able to ask a Sky to help us. Classical, I think."

What was Tyr?

She was pretty sure he was a Flame user as well, if not really confident on what he was.

What the mere act of asking and getting said help would cost, on the other hand?
She wasn't entirely sure she wanted to do that at all. Renato would be enough of a headache.

Dmitriy whistled lowly, eyebrows raised. "How the hell did you manage to meet a Sky?"

"I was invited to Vongola's Christmas Ball, as arm candy. I met Vongola's Sky Timoteo there." She admitted wryly, still musing on the logistical and supply problems such massive testing would cause. "I think... we may wish to test several of each, not just one of every type and Polarization."

Galina, who was jotting down their conversation into an actual plan to implement gave the look of her list-like notes, looked up sharply at the thief. "Why?"

"I think Polarization might be a degree instead of an either-or thing. Outward or inward expression of Flame."

"You're the one getting the rocks, you want to do that much work...?" The Rain shrugged that off, looking at the Lightning's neat rows of handwriting. "This will take a couple years anyways, so you might as well not ask those outsiders for some help. We might just have the types on hand when we're ready for new testers."

"Fine." It likely would've cost her more than she was comfortable giving, so it didn't bother her in the least to scratch any plans to ask for help from Italian Flame users.

Again, Renato was enough of a headache on his own. Actually, giving the hitman what he probably wanted while also owing him more?

Owing Vongola and its Sky favors?

"Second order of business, this nature shit." Dmitriy snagged the master copy of her Flame research journal and waved it in the air. "The 'such and such Flame user hates/loves/will not care for such and such Flame user'... you sure about that?"

"No." Sonya informed him shortly, irked at the reminder of the disinformation she tended to run smack into. "It was a warning included in most if not all books about Flame types. However, Classic Cloud I may be, I get along fine with non-stupid Mists. As an Inverted Storm? I should have major issues with Galina, which we don't."

The Rain nodded sharply, flicking through his well-thumbed copy. "Yeah, figured that one out myself. Rains get along with everyone my fucking ass."

"Well..." The Lightning drawled out cooly, with a sharp smirk. "...that might be due to being Inverted, Dmitriy. That gaggle of Rains, all Classical mind you, do tend to be the less disruptive as a whole."

"I still think they're all high on their Tranquility." He shot back quickly, with a scowl. "We really should separate them out, because I'm pretty damn sure if they're not doing it to themselves they're doing it to each other."

That sounded like an old argument. "You are the Rain, Dmitriy. You would be the one to know."

"See! Even she thinks I should deal with them."

Galina rolled her eyes, giving Sonya a sideways look. "They're not, I checked."

"He'll be less stubborn if he can at least check in his own way."
"I'm right here."

"Last order of business," the Lightning continued as if she hadn't heard the only male Flame user in the room, gesturing to her books, "I took notes on all the brats as they developed into Flame users. You get to help us sort out what is Flame related and what is not."

…her wrist already hurt just looking at the heavy pile of paper and journals.

What did Galina's Lightning nature bolt to when it kicked in?

Shouldn't it have been Tatiana, or something about the thieves' ring she was part of?

Maybe the tiny bits of paperwork that had needed to be done?

The Sun using nurse that was her elder sister wasn't exactly fond of paperwork.

"...fuck."

Dmitriy snorted. "Tell me about it."

"Less talking, more sorting," Galina demanded, handing out the piles equally to all of them.

An Inverted Lightning bureaucrat with a fixation of paperwork. That was kind of scary.

(Saturday the 10th of February, 1968. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Even as Rachel, she never did manage to get a nine-to-five working job. The best the college student had was a waitressing job that didn't pay nearly enough.

Sonya never wanted to do anything like it again.

Besides learning all about teenage Flame-boosted angst and drama about people she didn't particularly care for nor would have the time to get to know, and the wrist cramps she suffered through from week one to week four, she and the other two Flame users got maybe a page of information for each type over the course of a month of solid work.

Mostly in the many different ways the preteens/teenagers thought to utilize their various Flames. The most interesting so far was one of the baby Mists basically 'enchanting' mirrors to show what the onlooker desired.

The month did allow Bjørn a very good crack at attempting to plan out ten different jewelry stores Sonya could rob in a row, accepting the corrections the thief supplied using her knowledge of how hard or easy it would be to smuggle hot jewels across certain borders and trying it again.

It was midway through that second try when they finished the paperwork, on the Classic Storm that Sonya would probably get to know. Who, unfortunately, shared a name with her biological father.

Mikhail the younger had fixated on the idea of becoming/being a vor, which while all well and good actually grated against her a bit.

Might be because the boy didn't look too convinced she was a Storm until she shoved a fistful of red Flames under his nose. Even then he seemed a bit dismissive of her, if for either the fact she was a thief by trade or because she was female was questionable.

As it wouldn't matter in the long run, Storms were more the type you pointed in a direction and then got the hell out of the way of as they burned everything to the ground, she dismissed the issue for the most part.

Milos Zolotov had little to nothing to do with the efforts of the Flame group of his thieves' clan, but he did check in on them a few times. Mostly due to the fact she was planning a crime spree to 'restock', and the logistics of getting her illicit goods back to the clan was an issue. Their Pahkan was a bit more silver around the edges than the last time the thief saw him, but still spry and as shark-like as ever.

His son, on the other hand, was a lot more expressive of his doubts about their skills as he followed his father.

Gedeon Zolotov had apparently become friends with Dimitry, even if the Inverted Rain was about half a decade younger than him. Sonya really had no room to wonder, given Renato was about four years older than her. Galina didn't like him much, but the Inverted Lightning apparently had issues with non-essential people looking over her shoulder.

Hence why the woman didn't stay with her former gang after Tatiana left the group, apparently.

The thief really did wonder exactly what happened at the end of that.

Thankfully, for her sanity if nothing else, she also had to finish the last of her retraining and deal with new parents at the same time as a distraction. Pitching in for Lisa at least got her some major experience in the kitchen, and after burning a meal or two a day for a week straight she did graduate into being a halfway decent cook.

As long as it was breakfast.

"I am never taking a hiatus again." The blonde muttered into her arm, shaking Valerian's rattle absently for baby's amusement.

He looked entirely unconcerned by her comment, trying to smack the noisemaker out of the air so he could both investigate and drool on it.

"How did you...?" Lisa trailed off, looking highly confused over the char mark on her biggest pan. "Sonya? Did you use your Storm Flames on this?"

"If I had, you would no longer have a pan. No, that was... I got distracted because Valera needed a new diaper."

"Better you than me." Arseniy offered blandly from behind his newspaper.

Somehow, the vor not only knew when to dodge soapy pan wielded by his baby's mother but could do it without ever looking. That took some real skill, or intimate knowledge of his lover's habits when irked.

Looking a bit irritated himself at the nice big wet spot on the paper, her foster father folded it up and looked over to where she was amusing his son. "You said a month, Sonya."

"Not that we don't appreciate the help." Lisa hurried to tack on, giving her likely ruined pan a hard look. "Mostly."
"Bjørn and I leave in two days." She offered calmly, shaking a rattle again to regain the attention she lost when Valerian got distracted by soapy water flying from over in the kitchen. "We're hitting up Mafia Land first, where he's getting that Lackey title he's been after for a few years, then a bit of a crime spree will occur."

"Oh?" Arseniy asked, moving from his spot at the kitchen table to amble out and see both her and his baby better. "Where to where?"

"Francoist Spain to Austria." Spain would be a new country, but she had gone through a large part of France and some of Switzerland already which laid between Spain and Austria on the route they would take.

It was going to be uncomfortable no matter how she wanted to do it. The research needed more stones, Sonya needed the money, and if the USSR was still too hot for jewel thieves then outside of the Iron Curtain she went.

At least afterward she would have the money to splurge on a hotel room of her own, instead of crash with her foster parents for another month or however long Dmitriy wanted her help with.

Bjørn would at least get some time to season, even if they were about to do six to ten jewelry stores on the fly. Taking a leaf from the circus' traveling arrangements, she planned on maybe two each week at best in the capitals of each country.

Anything more would entirely be up to how much she was pulling and how hard it was becoming.

Well… that was the plan anyways.

She knew perfectly well plans didn't always succeed, or go according to plan, but she needed a better look at what she had proposed to do from the city she would be stealing from before making any big judgement calls.

"Good luck." Arseniy offered, leaning up against the doorjamb between the hallway and the living room.

"We'll be rooting for you!" Lisa called over her shoulder from the kitchen.

Valerian misjudged, or didn't care about, his next swing and slapped Sonya's cheek.

…she couldn't tell if that was another encouragement or a sign he thought she was trying for too much.

(Tuesday the 13th of February, 1968. Madrid, Kingdom of Spain.)

In Madrid, Spain, Sonya made a rather startling discovery.

"There are white sapphires?"

"They look kind of blue to me, Dama Sonya." Bjørn commented from her elbow, peering at the same display she was looking at.

…she had to give the kid that one, they did have a bluish tinge to them even if they were mostly clear.
Bjørn's Russian was indefinitely better than it had been the year before, and she guessed that the Icelandic words that slipped in were mostly on purpose. 'Dama' was probably not a title she'd ever get him to drop, so it was another thing she ignored.

If it made him happy, he could keep on doing it as long as she didn't have to acknowledge it.

The display she was sourly eyeing was part of a rather smaller scale jewelry store, not one the thief had decided would be the main jobs to pull but one to hit if she managed the time to or if she badly botched the other jobs and needed something quick.

Her brand new 'Lackey' marked the store down as a likely target if they had the time in a weird mash of Cyrillic and a jumble of the Roman script she learned a lifetime ago. His writing was cryptic, in a code he could read easily, and entirely headache inducing for her to look at.

At least it wasn't immediately suspicious, even if the sheer difficulty of reading it would make anyone linger over trying to decrypt it.

"Right, I think this will do it." Spain was, even if they suffered a fair bit of backlash from Italy's non-involvement in World War Two and it was about a decade later, still a militarized state at this point. Sonya wanted her Lackey off the streets and safely tucked away in a hotel room long before she started working. "You do remember what I told you, right?"

The face Bjørn pulled at least reassured her he did, even if he was making it a point that he was busying himself with his notebook.

He was not happy the official cover story for them included him as her 'brother' and her posing as a 'streetwalker'. A whore, in other words. If someone asked why he was alone in their hotel room, he had specific instructions to imply it indirectly.

She wasn't entirely thrilled with it either but didn't quite get why he was so upset.

It was, at most, a one-use kind of thing. After that one use, which she would have to bust out her little aide afterwards and scrap just about anything else planned on in the country, she'd figure out something different.

Romanian may not be a language that would escape scrutiny entirely this far into Europe, but since he could only speak that, Icelandic, Russian, and a smattering of French and German it was going to have to do.

At least until she could work on him with other languages, but Spanish and Italian had a fair few differences that kept tripping her up too.

(Wednesday the 14th of February, 1968. Madrid, Kingdom of Spain.)

Spain, which had still been a dictatorship of all things somehow until a few short years ago, was still scrambling to prop up their government after the recent assassination of Francisco Franco Bahamonde, the El Caudillo of Spain.

The scramble did help Sonya a fair bit, there was a curfew in effect that got the bulk of any possible eyewitnesses off the street and the military had much more important things to do than guard jewelry stores. It also hampered her, in that there wasn't a nightlife she could blend in with and any guards would likely be military instead of civilian.
In response, the Russian took to the rooftops and put her gymnastic and circus training to some actual use.

Her only problem with that were crossing the bigger streets, she had a choice between tightrope walking across likely live wires and pole-vaulting across. Eventually, she settled on vaulting. If only because she wasn't sure how secure those wires were going to be.

A few awkward uses of her Bec de Corbin later, and Sonya reached her goal.

An older, if still somewhat popular, jewelry store in the middle-class sector of Madrid. She didn't know what brand it was, as it really wouldn't matter to her much in the end, only that it had very big windows she needed to avoid attracting attention through and weirdly had a selection of scarves.

Which… okay. Scarves?

Whatever, padding for any loose rocks and metals then.

She spent a good five minutes of her heist rewiring the outdoor security box, cutting and hot wiring it into redundant loops to monitor so it wouldn't trip halfway through her heist. She had no desire to be surprised again, especially not in a land she had no real support to fall back on if she got into trouble.

Since she wasn't entirely sure it would work as she wanted, or that she did it correctly at all, the Russian thief used the next half hour watching the patrols on the streets. Estimating gaps of time where no one could be looking through the show room's big ass windows and trying to see if they were able to be timed.

However, Sonya had broken her last wristwatch.

That had been why she stole Cherep's to use in Mafia Land. The store likely had a couple for sale, and she could use them for the night, but she really did have to buy a non-hot one for herself sometime this next week.

While she was pondering what kind of watch to get, someone did come around to check out the store she intended to loot.

A probably really ill-advised contortion hanging half-off the building’s roof later, and she could see the watchman shine a flashlight through the windows a couple times. He moved on after that, but the mere fact her was there at all was concerning.

Was it a local watch-guard, or a guard responding to weird reports from her hotwired box?

She didn't know, so she resigned herself to waiting another hour or two in order to be sure of what he was up to.

Sighing, the thief resettled herself back against the lip of the roof. Checking to ensure her Bec de Corbin was about back to its original size and she hadn't cracked the spinel stone.

Really?

She had better things to be doing than wasting time on a roof.

(owo0000oo)

(Wednesday the 14th of February, 1968 continued. Madrid, Kingdom of Spain.)
A very irritating night of stealing and playing keep away with flashlights and marching patrols later, Sonya almost buried the sleeping Bjørn under her ill-gotten loot. "Wake up."

The Icelander, who had promised to sleep through the night and did seemed to have kept it, scrambled awake and away from the heavy pack that nearly landed on him. "Dama Sonya? What-?"

"We've got to sort this in a fast hurry and send it off." She snapped, tired and probably cranky from her miserable waiting on a roof and the dodge-happy heist. It had started to rain while she had been waiting, so she was both miserable and wet. "I'll pry the gemstones out of settings, I need you to keep what's what straight and ensure they end up packaged together or if you can't tell they end up in a package that will be appraised later. Then we have to go find something for me to 'acquire' for Mafia Land that would need shipping in the first place to hide it all in."

All the metal would be sold, even the bar of tungsten she would rather keep to play with. She got some petty cash out of the store manager's safe, as well as the cash register and a weekly deposit that had yet to be deposited at whatever bank, so she could send in something at least marginally useful.

As an 'Acquisitions' agent of Mafia Land's umbrella corporation, the Soviet Storm-Cloud could literally send the island anything from glassware to bedding to food to even live animals.

It would either be used or sold off again, but the main reason why she could was for smuggling. Her hot items would be hidden under the more legally acquired items, and when it reached Mafia Land, as long as it was packaged correctly and labeled with where it had to end up, they would reship it elsewhere for her.

If what was hot and obviously wasn't part of the 'legal' shipment was left as is, or even if it wasn't labeled correctly, it would be fenced and her business account credited with what money was made after the island's fees were taken off.

All the metal she didn't need for her Zolotov dues would end up that way. The watches, everything not jewels in nature, the thrice damned scarves she was still confused over.

Sonya didn't have a lot of credit on that service just yet but would likely end up with a lot by the time she was done with her little crime spree.

Bjørn scrambled for the packaging material she had bought with the very last of her money the day before, pulling the smaller boxes and padding out of the pile. The Russian herself reached for her pack.

Which was a backpack with a couple extra straps added on for extra stability but held a lot of random stuff if she needed it.

Right now, it weighed about sixty to seventy pounds. Most of that was the metal at the bottom, but at least half or more was in jewels.

Dumping it out on her bed and stripping off the dark, skin-tight clothing she had worn for the night, the thief decided she was fast getting sick of glittering gems and metals.

She pulled Renato's shirt on over her clammy skin, if only because she would like to be comfortable while her damp skin warmed up, and grabbed the labels to fill out with the address for the house she grew up within.

Her little Lackey gaped at the small mound of precious gems and metals put a bit of elbow grease to spill out on his bedspread.
"Don't look too impressed, we have yet to sort it. Trust me, you'll get sick of the sight too."

He shot her a disbelieving look which she snorted in the face of.

It wasn't a particularly big haul, just one she could do in a fast hurry to get the cash they would need to keep going. Mainly to ensure this wasn't going to be too different from her previous heists and because, again, Sonya had needed the money.

End of the week, when she hit the bigger chain store, and he would likely be just as sick of the sight as she was.

(Friday the 16th of February, 1968. Mafia Land.)

"Where is your sister?" Renato demanded of Tatiana when the nurse practically skipped down the steps of the hospital.

Sonya had said she was done with whatever the hell she had been doing with a circus of all things, the hitman had expected the thief to be more available rather than missing more.

How the hell was he going to entice the Storm-Cloud over to his side of the island if she wasn't even around to be tempted?

"She's… a little bit busy." The Sun Flame nurse claimed, a little smirk on her face. "I've a question for you, Mister Sinclair. What, exactly, is your intention in regard to my little sister?"

The other if Inverted Sun blinked at her slowly for the off-the-wall query, scowling as he picked up on something he wasn't sure he liked all that much. "What kind of question is that?"

"An important one, because… Sonya will listen to me. Even if she doesn't quite understand why." She informed him, that little smirk still present but somehow gaining an edge of utter nastiness. "So I would like to know, as a very concerned big sister mind you, why it is Sonya isn't too concerned by you stalking her."

Six years after he met the girl, and only now was her family becoming concerned? "Flame users, back when we met, were still being hunted, Miss Primakova. I kept an eye on Sonya, if only because she was twelve and a Cloud."

"Out of the goodness of your heart, then? Please."

"No, Clouds are rare. I know it might not seem that way to you, given your sister's nature, but they are."

The redhead pursed her lips and considered him seriously with those bright baby blues for a long moment. "Mister Sinclair, bear with me a moment. I may not be half the fighter or the thief my little sister is, who could break bones by age nine and started her criminal career around the same, but I'm a nurse. I make my country's vory feel better. If I ask those mean, violence-inclined men to pretty please take care of this Italian Mafioso who's bothering my baby sister…?"

…for a nurse, that was a respectable threat.

"I would rather not do it. Sonya likes you, for whatever reason." The Hard Sun user continued pleasantly, as if she hadn't threatened to sic a large number of hardened criminals on him. "And if I Clouds and Storms were the types to hold grudges to insane degrees.

"Miss Primakova, I'm insulted you think so lowly of me. I am a gentleman, if a lady says no then a lady says no." Renato returned with a purr, sweeping the fedora Shamal got the lady's sister to buy him off his head before giving the young woman a charming smile. With a bit of an edge of his own, as he didn't really appreciate the insinuation she was hinting around. "But Sonya's more than just a young lady, she's currently someone who helps me out when I ask without asking for something in return. Who is adored by my tetchy Mist brat ward, because she spends time with him without looking for something in payment. Why would I mess that up?"

"Why indeed." She remarked in a bland tone, before shrugging. "Sonya is currently on a bit of a crime spree, look into Spain if you want to see how she's doing. I'll see you around, Mister Sinclair."

The nurse walked off down the street without another word or so much as a backwards glance.

Huffing, the hitman replaced his hat and stalked off for the newsstands.

Spain, hmm?
Chapter 23

(Saturday the 24th of February, 1968. Madrid, Kingdom of Spain.)

Sonya let the two members of the Policia Local into the hotel room, still trying to bolt down what was left of her breakfast as she spoke thickly in Romanian around it. "Bjørn, the receipts for the nice gentlemen."

Her gawky little Lackey made a dive for his notebook, pulling the various receipts from different stores out of it and ordering them quickly. "Here, Dama Sonya."

She gestured to the uniformed men instead of taking possession of them. Her mouth was full and her fingers were sticky, her handling paper would do nobody any good.

"Gracias, la señorita." One of them muttered, pulling out his own little notebook to markdown what she was buying and sending from their country.

The other looked at her expectantly. "¿Qué pasa con las entregas?"

Sonya slowly worked through that as she swallowed, as her Italian was not up to translating Spanish very well but it was the closest language she knew. "I do shipping, gentlemen, not receiving. I sent my last shipment yesterday, as I did not know there would be more than just customs that would need to look it over. Pottery and house fabrics, mainly."

That, apparently, did not translate well. "¿No hablas español?"

"Not my usual port of call." She explained, flicking a hand at both Bjørn and her hasty made-up packing corner. "I normally get northern Europe."

A different voice interrupted. "English, then?"

"Oh, thank god." She really did have to either learn Spanish, or make her assistant learn it for her. "Yes, English will be easier all around."

"I can do English as well." The police officer with the receipts offered, handing the slips of paper back to her Lackey and flipping his notebook closed. "Repeat all that, if you would. No sense on trying to rely on bad translations."

"I do not normally get Spain to handle and have not learned Spanish. But as I do speak a related language in Italian, and my company's clients wanted Spanish goods now not later when the usual agents are available again, here I am. My last shipment was sent off yesterday, checked by customs. I did not know you would want to look at it, no one said, and so I do not have one for you to inspect."

"We expected that." He admitted, waving the problem off. "All we wanted was a look at what it is you are doing, and since we have that we shall leave you to it. Thank you for the cooperation, miss."

"Of course." Sonya dipped the two of them a small curtsy as they left and looked at her little assistant when they shut their hotel room door behind them. "Breathe kid."

Bjørn's breath left him in a little wheeze, clutching at the receipts from their entirely legal purchases yesterday. Wide-eyed and a little paler than normal, he sank onto his bed shakily. "Dama Sonya, can we not do that again?"
"They'll probably want at least a look at another of my shipments, so... sorry. Once more." The thief informed him dryly, huffing in amusement at his groan of pain. "We'll need to talk to the Mafia Land customs agent to get him to slip the next few jewel shipments in after inspections and pay him off to do it."

At least she could give the man warning what she was doing was stirring up law enforcement interest in his nominal sector of work, which might actually knock some of the price off the top.

Two jewelry stores down, two more to go.

...actually, only one. It was getting a bit hot in Spain, but she wanted those white sapphires.

Sonya had a plan for those.

---

(Tuesday the 27th of February, 1968. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"First shipment!" Lisa called out cheerfully, bouncing baby Valerian in her arms and proceeding Arseniy, who was carrying a medium-sized crate himself with a measure of visible strain.

Bright and early a morning barely a month after Sonya had left them to resupply, actually.

Neither in the office had really expected any news for another month or two, even if the thief hadn't run into trouble getting what she and they needed.

"First?" Dmitriy questioned as he looked up from Galina's newly amended training schedule, wincing when the vor dropped the heavy box on his desk with a slam.

"Sonya planned a spree, this is only the beginning." The older Russian woman in the room informed him, patting the upset baby's back when he let her know he didn't appreciate the loud noise the box made.

His 'secretary' uncapped her pen, shoving the nib into the crack between the lid and the rest of the crate and wrenching it off with a flash of green Lightning Flames to protect her writing utensil. The lid came loose with a faint screech of nails against wood, revealing a number of brown paper wrapped packages.

Grabbing the freed wood before it broke anything, like his lamp, Dmitriy dumped it on the floor next to his chair and scooped up one of the packets to look at.

Neatly printed in a familiar hand, the word 'emeralds' in Cyrillic was listed under a Moscow address. Ripping the paper spilled out a number of green jewels all over the Rain's desk with a multitude of little musical clatters.

"Any malachite?" The Inverted Lightning commented blandly, plucking one of the smaller oval cut emeralds from the package he was still holding and inspecting it closely. "I need a new one."

"Where the hell are we going to put all these?" He asked aloud instead of answer her, digging through the box's contents of little packages one handed for another to see what it held. "Is Sonya going to drown us in jewels or something?"
"She didn't really intend to do very many more jewelry stores after that first one. I think she intends to be sure you never need any more. Ever." Lisa informed him, still cheerful. "I think we could get you a couple boxes to put these in."

The Rain swallowed uneasily as Arseniy informed him that he had better not ask for that. Silently, with the power of his glare alone. "We can do that much, Lisa. Thank you."

Even if it had been a couple years since the vor taught him the ins and outs of Mafiya life, the man still scared him a little. He distinctly remembered what happened to that upstart that had tried to go after the vor's lover, and dismembered hands were still a private nightmare for him.

Galina tossed another package of emeralds onto Dmitriy's desk, still looking for her stone-type. "I take it this is more than only one heist?"

"Probably." The older Russian woman informed her, picking up one of the lighter colored emeralds to amuse her son with the sparkles. "Mafia Land ships things out in bulk, usually at the end of the month. So, this might be the contents of two or more stores that Sonya robbed."

"This one…?" Enquired the younger brunette, lifting a larger than normal package merely marked with an address and a question mark. Peeling the paper back slowly revealed an entire jumble of jewels in different hues and colors.

"Sonya had all the stones she wasn't sure of appraised before giving them over to the clan's use." The mother of the thief in question informed them both with a small smile of vindictiveness. "Since she's in the middle of something, you're going to have to get those identified yourselves."

He opened one of his desk drawers, sweeping the loose emeralds and the two packages of the rocks into it. With a less cluttered desk, he started pulling all the small packages of various jewels out of the crate. About halfway down he found the Lighting her package of preferred gems, but it was the very bottom layers that gave him trouble.

"Oh… I should probably inform you Sonya likes to pay her clan dues in gold and silver. Gold and silver bars, I mean." Shifting baby Valerian to a more comfortable position and putting the loose emerald back on the desk, Lisa smiled prettily at Dmitriy as he strained to pull two heavy packs from the depths of the crate and from under a few more packages of rocks. "So that's probably the bars she's marked out for the clan."

The heavy bundle of metal clashed to the desk with a heavy thud and a clang, startling the baby in the room into messily smothering his new bout of crying into his mom's shoulder.

The Inverted Rain ripped the paper off one end of the bigger pack, revealing the four bars of gold and four of silver. As well as a note tucked into the package on top of the metals.

Plucking the note out, and sniffing at the torn edge from his disgruntled tearing of paper, Galina read off the message. "Not sure how much this is total, sent extra to be sure to cover my and Bjørn's dues for the year and their take from the jobs. Kept the loose cash, sold the bulk of metal. Will total it up and calculate everything out when I'm back. Galina, I rather appreciate Bjørn's new bookkeeping skills. Sonya."

Arseniy opened the smaller pack of metal, but that one didn't have a message. Just another four bars of gold and silver.

"Well… at least someone appreciates clerks." The Lightning announced with a sniff, looking rather pleased with the note in her hand.
"We'll take the clan's cut to the treasurer. You kids have fun." Lisa announced before Dmitriy could do more than glare at Galina for her snippy and a little bitchy comment, jerking her head at the father of her baby to prompt him into taking possession of their foster daughter's dues. "Try not to drown."

"This is your fault," the only remaining woman in the office remarked, smirking at the owner of said office once the door closed behind their mid-morning guests, "you did tell Sonya we ran out of jewels."

"A few of them, and we might be low on a couple others, but this is... what the hell does she expect us to do with all of this?" Shoving a hand through his short-cut brown hair, the Rain looked from the pile of different packaged gemstones to his drawer and back to the still half-full crate. "And, since the girl isn't back yet, she's probably going to send us even more."

"Lisa said Sonya intends to not have to do any more jewelry stores." Galina shrugged, opening up the pack of malachite and picking out a new stone for herself. "I don't think we'll need more for a couple years after she's done."

(Friday the 1st of March, 1968. Madrid, Kingdom of Spain.)

"Money does smooth out a lot of bad translations." Sonya informed the very same English-speaking police officer with a shrug, idly shifting on the loose gravel for better footing. "If I cannot find another language to speak with suppliers with, usually a written translation of what I want to buy helps."

"It just seems... a bit of a hassle." He commented as they waited for her shipment of Spanish fruits to be inspected and cleared from both customs and the police.

"It is," the thief admitted with a sigh, "but we are done in Spain. France is next, but at least we speak French."

"Ah... I've been meaning to ask, but the kid?"

"My cousin. His parents are... well, they are not with us anymore. I got him a school-sponsored internship with my company and will probably set him up with a job with us when he is a tiny bit older, but it is only for the now until a more stable home can be found for him for a year or two."

"Lucky kid to have a cousin like you." The Spanish police officer commented, marking down a few more notes into his little booklet of notepaper. "That's all we need, you're free to go señorita."

"You are not going to wait...?"

"I'm pretty sure you're not trying to smuggle anything with fruits." He told her over a shoulder dryly, waving the offer to wait for the end of the inspections off. "No, I'm pretty satisfied with what we've found."

"Trying that would ruin the fruit..."

He laughed, shaking his head as he made a shooing motion to his partner to have him get back into their police car.

Entirely worth the slightly exorbitant cost of having her real shipment hid and another offered up for customs to inspect, complete with receipts and all.
Sonya was actually sending Mafia Land machinery parts, figuring that the moving island would like the replacements if needed. Some just general hardware replacements that she knew her brother had fussed over for the circus' few mechanical rides, some more for industrial standard replacement parts, and a bit of specialized car parts she was sure would end up sold more than used. Her last Spanish jewelry heist was already packed away in that, meaning she didn't have anything illegal on her at all.

Bjørn was slowly getting used to being both criminal and interacting with the police, at least. He looked a lot less shaky and pale than the first time around as the law enforcement officer walked away. Still nervous, however.

"He's not going to somehow magically know, kid." She informed him in Romanian, because it was still entirely less suspicious than Russian this far into Europe. "Your expression, on the other hand, might let him know something was up."

"It's nerve-wracking, Dama Sonya." The teenager defended himself, clutching his notebook to his slowly filling out chest.

Two years of decent food and care had turned the scrawny street rat from Iceland into a healthy-looking teenager, the combat training all members of the Zolotovs were encouraged to at least attend occasionally gave him the beginnings of muscles. Bjørn's Slavic origin gave him dirty blond hair, blue eyes, a blunt nose, and a square jawline as well as an unfortunate need to start shaving early.

He could easily pass as a short sixteen or seventeen-year-old even if he was only barely fourteen, his years on the streets would likely always make him seem older than he was. That kind of stress was... difficult to shed from one's features.

"It's not, really. He has his work to do, and as long as I do mine correctly he'll never suspect me. Therefore, there is nothing to worry about." Sonya had gotten over her nerves years ago, now she was either immune or used to the stress.

That might not be a good thing, actually.

"You have nerves of steel, Dama." The Icelander muttered rebelliously, checking his seemingly ever-present notebook for something he wrote down. "I am to remind you we have a three-fifteen train to catch, and that we still need to eat."

As it was two in the afternoon, and they were still stuck watching a shipment that wasn't really Sonya's be inspected in the late winter afternoon. The thief was pretty sure she was going to have to run to catch that train.

However, there was no reason for Bjørn to have to do the same. She dug out her wallet and her cigarettes from her purse, handing him a handful of peseta coins she had. "Head to the public entrance for the station and pick us up something to eat on the way. I'll meet up with you there."

She had more than enough euros to cover their traveling expenses, he could probably use the Spanish coins up before they left the country.

"Anything left is yours to deal with."

He accepted the money with merely a nod, having gotten over his surprise at being handed large amounts of money from her over the last two weeks. "Anything in particular you would like?"

"As long as it's not too odd, I'll eat just about anything. Avoid mushrooms, though. I don't like those."
She never had, not even as Rachel. It wasn't so much the taste, because mushrooms didn't really have one, as it was the texture that got to her.

Sonya actually used a lighter, because this was so civilian it sometimes made her want to wince, and then tapped her lit cigarette on boxcar next to her as her little Lackey walked away.

Train stations were not pretty affairs, at least not past the reception rooms and into the shipping part itself. There was nothing to look at besides the trains themselves or the train cars, and that in front of her was just a train car full of fruit. The sky overhead was near-boiling with steel grey clouds from the recent rains, even if they had dumped most of the humidity out of the air and back into the groundwater tables, there was a shit-ton of gravel and steel tracks laid out every which way.

A whole lot of buildings and train cars around to hem in one's sightlines, a couple engines puffing this way and that, and… almost nothing else.

The thief's grey eyes slid to the not-really-a cargo loader, seemingly watching the inspections going on during his mid-afternoon break. He gave her a toothy grin back, revealing the small number of gold teeth he had.

Her shipment was sent. Good to know.

(Sunday the 10th of March, 1968. Paris, French Republic.)

"Well, you're a restless one. Aren't you?" Sonya muttered to herself, slinking backwards into a vent as the guard she was trying to work around got up for yet another wander around the store he was guarding.

She was fast coming to hate restless guards. They were unpredictable, even if that frequent movement meant she could likely… adjust things to her liking and he wouldn't notice it on average.

A slight, minuscule dab of Storm Flames had the last stripped screw melting away once it was safe, the broken metal reduced to ash with only a scorch mark and a little uncomfortable heat to deal with. With the vent cover that had decided to give her difficulty finally out of the way, she bent it in half to get it up past her and stuck it up into a branching vent for safekeeping.

A quick check around, to ensure Mr. Guard wasn't in range, and she slipped to the ground.

There were only few ways she could cover up her Flame use in this job, and that was by making it seem as if she hadn't somehow snuck a blowtorch in with her and the guard never noticed the noise or light.

She'd appropriate another screw from a different vent cover and reaffix the vent once she was done. That crease she made in the metal would still make it obvious how she got in, but with four screws and four screw holes and a bit of cleaning it wouldn't be too obvious that she burned her way in.

However, that was a lot of detail work to do. Sonya didn't feel like doing it around a guard's patrolling.

The restless guard was about to take an entirely unanticipated nap.

(ooo000ooo)
"At least we did not have to deal with the police this time." Bjørn commented sourly, poking his pasta a few holes so the ravioli would cool down a bit quicker.

"Stop playing with your food, cut it up if it needs to cool." Sonya informed him from the other side of the restaurant table, reading the police report on her first heist of France. "And yet, you mean. They might want to ask us some questions too."

While her little Lackey could speak a respectable amount of French, this wasn't a conversation to be overheard by any civilian off the street so it was still Romanian. Which wasn't quite as foreign to this country as she would like, but since her Icelandic still sucked and he didn't know a word in Chinese it had to do.

The thief folded up the newspaper and tucked it away for later, content in knowing her Flame use was adequately hidden. The guard she knocked out wasn't even going to be fired, since he was 'assaulted' before the store was robbed.

He just had no explanation of why he never heard a thief or thieves break in.

The local Paris police were operating on the assumption there were two thieves that were responsible, breaking in from the rooftop air duct exit and leaving the same way, given the volume of gemstones and metal stolen from the store.

Which, okay. Sonya was a little stronger than the average woman, or even a male twice her size. She would even accept the estimation that she was stronger than two or three bodybuilders put together when she really wanted to be.

However, how did that translate to doing the work of two or three thieves?

Whatever, it was a neat cover for her stealing. A lone woman with a bratty tagalong would not instantly equate a thief and an assistant thief so she might even be overlooked in this country.

She was contemplating scaling up the volume of what she was stealing, because she had yet to run into anything too major that might upset her work entirely. If she stole more, if her equipment could take it, would the local law enforcement assume there were more thieves running around when it was just her?

…she would likely need to reinforce her backpack, at least. It was showing some wear, from the heavy loads put into it.

Maybe a new one?

A bigger one, if she wanted more loot to handle. She might want to look into a purse… a new one, as she was running out of room in that dratted thing too.

Well… they were in Paris. "We're going shopping after this."

"Dama?"

"I'm giving you my old pack, so I need a new one." Sonya informed him after swallowing her first spoonful of lobster bisque. "A more… sturdy one."

She'd have to alter it a bit too, sew on an extra buckle to go around her waist as well as another one to secure the shoulder straps in place when worn. All things she could do while waiting for Bjørn to attempt scouting out a store on his own.

Most if not all in-country attention was more on the Winter Olympics happening to the south east, in Grenoble. While the possibility that the police might catch on the thief from Spain had moved north around the time they did themselves, the fact it was now assumed to be more than just one might actually keep her work in Spain and her more recent heists in France unlinked.

She could maybe afford to run another job here before they had to move on.

(Saturday the 5th of May, 1968. Bern, Swiss Confederation.)

"Really?" Sonya asked with a touch of amusement, cradling the wired phone receiver between her ear and shoulder as she fed the pay phone box a few more Swiss franc coins.

"They're none too pleased with you at the moment. But even I have to agree, the second shipment was a touch over the top." Lisa confirmed, sounding entirely cheerful about the fact and a bit tinny from the phone line. "I think young Dmitriy is regretting allowing the store of rocks to fall so far, and for relying on you to get them more."

Hey, unintentional revenge. "Are they good? I mean, if I don't have to do these last two stops then I won't. There was… a bit of an upswing of general suspicion crossing the border this time around. Landlocked areas are just harder all around, too. No convenient ports included, alas."

"Don't risk it if you don't have to." Her foster mother agreed a touch more seriously. "They're good so far, sweetie. You go too far overboard, and someone might get suspicious. But, since you're out there, why not take a look around for something a bit different? You said you didn't want to do anymore, but you've really haven't put effort into finding something else."

"That's… not a bad idea, Lisa. Not too sure if I have time for that instead of just some sightseeing, but thanks."

"Have some fun with it, sweetie. We'll see you in a couple weeks."

Sonya gave her own farewell, hanging up once she knew the older Russian had done so too.

Björn looked up expectantly as she stepped out of the phone booth, but the thief shook her head at him. "What do you want to do?"

"Dama?"

"I mean it, anything you'd like to do? Go see? We're free, for the time being."

She had more than enough money, and if she could sell some of the more common but less responsive jewels she had stolen the last two months then she'd probably be set for at least a year or more. Not that she was going to stop working for another year, but it would be a nice nest egg just in case.

The teenager perked up a bit hesitantly. "Can we go see the clock tower?"

"Sure." With a shrug, the thief jerked a thumb behind her. "It's this way, come on."

Bern, Switzerland, had a medieval clock that really was quite a work of art. Sonya had first seen it with Cherep, and it was still really cool to watch it tick away. Björn probably just wanted to see it ring the hour, because that was done by a clockwork man-figure as a couple other clockwork figures put on a show.
The Old City of Bern was a bit confusing in layout, even if it was a pretty place to get lost in, only because the streets followed the curve the Aar River imposed on them since that part of the city was built almost four centuries ago. It was still a bit of a nippy walk, as they were solidly edging into spring, while the two of them wound their way further into the city.

There was actually a crowd wanting to see the same thing, so she set them on the edge of that and turned to her Lackey. "Okay, here's the thing. We're going back to Moscow in a week or two, for another month or so while a few things get sorted out. I'll get us both a hotel room. You need to pack up everything you want to keep for the next few years, I'll store what you won't need for you, then we're heading back to that island. The one we went to in order to get your medical files straightened out."

As he had none until she took him to Mafia Land, that should be more than enough of a hint to ensure he didn't require a clarification.

"Are we staying there?"

"For the most part," the thief agreed absently, digging out her cigarettes again, "and for the foreseeable future. You know what that place is like, so you need to be a bit careful, but you'll have your own place for a year or two."

"Really?"

"Until I can afford us an apartment for us all, yes. My sister, the redhead? Tatiana agreed to allow you to stay in her apartment while I pulled that in, then we will live together." She pointed a finger under his nose, shaking it sternly. "You will keep it clean, and at least somewhat in good repair. Do you hear me?"

Bjørn nodded hurriedly but got a little distracted as the clockwork across the street started to move.

A small spinning plate showcased a few animal figurines, statues of knights, and what she was sure was a flutist as a jester pulled on two ropes to get the bells over its head to ring. When the figures stopped spinning and the ringing stopped, the rooster on one side of the façade waited a long moment before crowing in musical tones.

"Two minutes."

Her Icelandic Lackey was barely able to rip his eyes from the spectacle. "Dama?"

"The main bell rings in another two minutes." She pointed back at the clockwork figures. "The old man in front will turn the hourglass, then he and the figure on the other side from the rooster will nod in time to the bell ringing. When they're done, the rooster crows again. Watch carefully."

It happened exactly as she said it would, but Bjørn was entirely happy just watching the show.

What was with all the easily amused men in her life?

First was Cherep, who was just happy covered in grime and mucking about with gears and machinery. Renato could hold an entire conversation by himself, even if she did no more than snap something once or twice for his every thirty or so words. Shamal just liked hearing her talk, apparently.

Now her Lackey?
(Wednesday the 29th of May, 1968. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You know, I think we've done this before." Sonya remarked idly, folding her hands together and resting them on her knee.

Dmitriy was glaring at her from across his desk. It was getting old.

Galina looked up briefly from Björn's notebook, and the estimation of what was stolen and the general price a halfway decent fence would pay for it all. The Lightning flicked her dark eyes from the Inverted Rain to the Storm-Cloud then back again, but the woman returned to checking her Lackey's work on estimated prices and clan dues of five different jewel heists instead of comment.

"Since it seems we have more than enough supplies to last us this year, the year after, and likely the year after that," commented her old childhood friend sourly, still glowering, "we should probably finish up here."

To get rid of you for the year was left unsaid but clearly heard.

"Cherep is…?"

"I'll get him next year." Sonya informed the Rain easily, uncrossing her legs and accepting a pen and blank notebook of her own from Galina. "He and the circus he works for already left the city."

The young man grunted, getting up himself and rounding his desk to the far corner of his office.

Which had been taken over by a number of little boxes piled on more boxes sitting on yet more boxes. All of them had a different type of jewel sitting in them, some types had more little cardboard boxes to them than others but there were easily a hundred of different sorts.

"Right… start from the top?" Dmitriy posed after they had a good look at the work ahead of them.

"I suppose… but I don't expect anything from diamonds."

Folding herself down on the floor in a neat tailor fashion, Galina grabbed for the box of said clear rocks. "I don't either, but we're looking for both a uniform and a complete set of results from each of us. To be through, we're starting with them."

"So… I count as both Classic Cloud and Inverted Storm, right?"

The twitch the Lightning gave at her comment confused Sonya, until she turned to glare at her.

"…right then. Test both Flames one at a time rather than both at once." That was going to be exhausting, but the other woman intimidated her a little.

"Hey, Sonya. Those white sapphires you wanted us to leave apart?" Dmitriy shook the box of them, showing the few handfuls of only lightly blue tinted stones the thief had acquired. "What are these for?"

"Sapphires give the best response for untrained Flame users." She reminded the Rain, plucking a few of them out of the box and holding one up as she flooded it with her Flames.

The mix of Storm and Cloud Flames made it throw off red and purple light, even as the sapphire acquired an ill-placed crack down the middle under the stress that widened the longer she held on.

"I think I can use these to figure out who is a Flame user and what type they are without taking a couple stabs in the dark."

"You think." The Lightning repeated, passing out the diamonds they were starting with and accepting the cracked sapphire in return. Already knowing how easily they fractured under Flames, she didn't try touching the stone with Lightning Flames.

"I'm going to test it out on Bjørn first. We'll see about it, anyways." Sonya mused, a diamond in each hand as she called on her inner Flames to try gaining a response.

"Ow fuck hot!" Dmitriy suddenly shouted not a moment later, dropping the diamond he had been testing with Rain Flames to clutch at the burn now present on his hand.

She and Galina exchanged a look, then looked at their own stones bathing in their respective Flames. The Inverted Rain's was making a char mark on the wooden floors of the office but didn't seem about to start a fire.

There was no flicker or waiver of the distinctive watery Rain Flames either, or the sharply jagged Lightning in Galina's, or the thief's own more fire-like two Flames in either of hers.

"Non-responsive?"

"Agreed."

"Fuck you both."

Sonya finished marking down the agreed upon results, tossing her diamond back into Galina's box of them. "Next?"

"Rubies." She informed them, glancing at the Rain still glowering at everything. "Go really slowly with these, Dmitriy."

"Yeah, yeah. I know, alright? Just as bad as sapphires. Just more risk of burns."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 29th of May, 1968 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You know," Sonya informed Galina, who was nursing a massive exhaustion headache from the testing, "I don't think sapphires actually aid control or anything."

"How would that make sense?"

"I think they're amplifying Flames." She admitted slowly, rubbing at her burned and nicked fingertips with the burn ointment Bjørn had fetched them on her request. "Which would be why they shatter so easily under our hands but coax out the slight amounts any newbie user might grasp, like how Dmitriy could once learn to use his Flames on them but can't use them now. And why they don't scorch, just shatter."

"Would explain why the more facets it had the faster they exploded." The Rain sourly commented, glaring at the marks in his office's ceiling and tending his own injuries clumsily.
She coughed sheepishly, since it had been her Storm testing that caused that violent reaction.

They were all very lucky the gem blew outward from the flatter face facet rather than the pointed end of the brilliant cut sapphire.

It was also very lucky they were so cautious of sapphires to begin with, meaning they had picked different corners to test them in so as to not harm the others with any mishaps.

Sonya had a weird little burn mark from the pointed end of the sapphire she used with her Storm Flames, one that actually had eaten into her hand before she felt the pain and the rock exploded on her. There was a nice little pockmark in her palm now, that didn't particularly like the continued testing and let her know it by aching something fierce.

Why was it always her right?

"Well… it's a thought." Likely the only reason Galina wasn't writing it down was because she had her own burns and nicks littering her fingers, and probably didn't have the energy to grope for her pen and paper.

She wondered if she could use her Cloud Flames like Cherep did to cover that pockmark. The flesh around it might be a little… well-done, but surely she could at least cover it up.

Right?

A trickle of Cloud Flames responded to her will, slowly replicating her skin and flesh in a very painful fashion.

How the hell did Cherep do this to himself?

Unconsciously?

Was he always in pain?

Sonya let her breath out, hissing between her teeth, and gripped her right wrist with her left as the injury faded from sight but not her awareness.

As a burn, it had ached. Now like this, in twanged in a decidedly more painful manner. Like it had been rubbed raw, actually. Every little bit of it.

Like in her life before this, as Rachel, the one and only time she got into her father's chemicals brought home from the lab. Acid burn, just without the acid and tingling like someone was scrubbing with steel wool and a dash of bleach.

"Fuck…"

"How do you have more Flames left?" Dmitriy demanded, as if the mere fact was a slight on him or something.

Flexing her not-really healed hand curiously, she watched her palm flicker with lavender fire as the area she had pockmarked stretched and contracted a few times. More so near the edges, where she had supposedly healthy cells not barbecued by a glassy rock. "I'm… um, not sure. I just do?"

That still hurt.

Fuck, Tatiana could heal it up, screw Cherep's method.
"She started before us," Galina informed the Rain tiredly, rubbing the pads of one hand against her thumb as Bjørn switched to her other to tend to, "of course she's stronger than us."

"But I'm not any stronger, actually." Literally not any stronger.

She had always been able to do pretty much the same things always, ever since getting a grip on her Cloud Flame born strength. Sonya's Storm Flames might have, but they had seen more use… didn't they?

Well… wouldn't her strength be a continuous use of Cloud Flames as well?

She abused the fuck out of that, all Clouds did.

Sonya knew she wasn't getting any 'stronger', no matter how much she used or didn't use her inner Flames, she was getting… "I have a lighter touch with Flames, I think. I don't use more than I have to anymore."

That was, apparently, news to the other two Flame users.

"Explain that." Galina demanded, straightening herself upright and waving Bjørn off when he tried to follow her movements to finish bandaging her left pinky.

The thief gave her a mildly reproving look, because damn it all the teen was her Lackey and he wasn't going to be mistreated for shit. "Storm Flames, and even Cloud Flames if I must be honest, overwhelm. It's pretty much how they work. I want something either bigger or made again, I either pour the Cloud Flames I need into something to make it grow or pool my Flames into a similar shape right next to what I want duplicated. Storm Flames? Just obliterate, I had to actually learn that soft touch just to stop destroying everything it brushed against."

The Lightning frowned as she absorbed that bit of news. "Well… if constant use doesn't make us stronger, that what would?"

Willpower, probably. It had to be called Dying Will Flames for a reason, right?

Sonya posed that to the Rain and the Lightning, but that avenue of discussion eventually petered out without any of them having something new to add.

(Friday the 7th of June, 1968. Mafia Land.)

Sonya returned to Mafia Land at the start of summer with two new stones, one of which didn't match the color of her Flames at all.

Galina had taken her theory on industrial stones possibly reacting differently than jewel quality ones and ran with it, using the bulk of the diamonds and other jewels they now had in excess to hawk. Mostly to pay off the clan's 'fees' for hiring a thief for stealing the gems for them in the first place, but also in order to buy up a few testing lots of semi-precious and industrial stones.

Much to their exasperation, there were an uncountable number of those compared to jewelry grade ones.

No, industrial sapphires didn't really act much different than jewel sapphires. They just crumbled into dust faster. They also weren't as… stable.
Which was saying something.

A bit of green feldspar called Amazonite, which got her the clearest results for her Cloud Flames, and a piece of Cinnamon Stone garnet, for her Storm. One was a semi-precious rock, the other a gem.

She was going to send Galina her geology books, to see if the Lightning could narrow down the 'why' to any physical property of the rocks giving different results. There had to be some kind of difference between the various bits of garnet for her to get wildly different results from two different pieces.

A garnet would actually match the red stones of a Storm Ring, at least. However, there were apparently at least two different types of garnet that gave similarly different results. Possibly more.

The Russian showed Bjørn Tatiana's still empty apartment, promising to take the teen shopping for the bits of things he'd need to live there for a year or two later and left him to make plans for the next few hours.

Instead of anything else she really should've been doing, Sonya wandered over to the café she met up with a certain hitman at. It was mid-summer, it was freaking hot, and all she really wanted was an hour or two of non-exploding-gem risking sitting time.

She really had to rethink these bracers, leather in hot weather didn't equal comfortable wrists.

He greeted her with four little words. "You forgot Shamal's birthday."

"I did not..." …yeah, yeah, she did. Pursing her lips, and feeling incredibly sheepish, she glared at the smirking hitman. "…what does he want?"

"Really? Sonya, you bitched at me about not forgetting the damn date last year." Renato huffed at her, cradling his espresso between his long fingers and still smirking up a storm. "And you are the one that forgets?"

"I, Renato, am more like his damn aunt. I can forget and send really expensive presents as a way to make it up." She returned shortly, slumping down into her usual chair with a sigh. "Now, what the fuck does Shamal want for his slightly late birthday present?"

"Slightly late? It's June."

Shamal's birthday was at the end of February, meaning she had missed it by a couple months. Quarter of a year, actually. "I was busy, and in Spain, for his birthday."

"Excuses, excuses." The hitman dismissed with a prissy sniff, folding the newspaper he had been reading into quarters and setting it on the table. "You're not the one Shamal pouts at."

Sonya glared at him again, moodily wondering what she could get tetchy Mist brat that would give the asshole a migraine to deal with.

"He wants you to visit."

"I was just there!"

He rolled his eyes at her. "He's five, it's not like he has any great grasp on time constraints or needing to work just yet. Shamal would like you to visit him, it's all he said when I asked him what he wanted."

Sighing, she cradled her forehead in her hands and winced as her right protested. "Aw... hell's fire. Really?"

"Yes... Sonya, what did you do to your hand?"

"I burned a hole through it." And then tried to Propagate a fix over it, she really wouldn't recommend anyone else try it. "Think you can heal it? I would ask Tatiana, but she's working right now."

"Then you should've gone to the damn hospital to get it fixed. Give it here." The Sun gingerly sized her reluctantly extended wrist, inspecting the lavender Flames that could be seen through the cracks of her little patch-job when she so much as flexed the area. "...what the hell is this?"

"Cloud Flame skin, it is not what I would suggest relying on if one had to." Sonya willed it to fade, or more to the point stopped willing her Flames to cover the injury, wincing when the inner part of her hand stung viciously when exposed to the salty sea air.

The Propagated flesh had a bad habit of winking out of existence on her, when she got distracted or slept or even occasionally when she was trying to remember there was a hole in her hand. Sometimes she didn't notice until it started pouring blood on everything. It made her respect the hell out of whatever Cherep was doing to himself with his own Cloud Flames, especially since she sucked so badly at trying to copy him.

"There is a hole, in your hand."

"Yes, I said that."

"Sonya, it's about a teaspoon worth of flesh missing hole."

"I burned it, I said that too."

Renato shot her a dark look for that, pressing a finger to either side of the gaping wound in her palm.

"This is what happens when you try to use sapphires at our level." Sonya informed him blandly, trying not to let her hand twitch under the Sun Flames pouring into her injury. Itchy. "I do not recommend it."

His dark eyes fell to the slowly closing gap in her palm, inspecting the rate it was closing off closely. "Noted. Was that what had you so distracted you missed baby Mist's birthday?"

"Something like that. We needed more stones for empirical testing purposes as well as the usual reasons. We're trying to find something that would give a uniform response for each Flame type." The thief commented tiredly, thinking back to the five in a row heists she did from Spain to France to Switzerland. Thankfully she only had to do those five, ten probably would've burned her out or something. "And since I am the jewel thief...?"

"Shamal will be thrilled to learn he takes second place to sparkly rocks."

...that sounded like blackmail. She shot him a suspicious look, and indeed the Italian was smirking at her again as he let go of her newly healed hand.

"Next year, don't make me late for his birthday too." He informed her, plucking his espresso cup back up.
The Russian flexed her right hand, feeling the difference between Propagated flesh cover and actual Activation healed skin, scowling. "…give me a month to get two contracts for Mafia Land over with, then I will go see Shamal."

Bjørn could probably use the time to settle in and learn his way around a bit before starting in on managing her Mafia Land business. The bits he could handle as her Lackey, anyways.

"Be prepared to deal with pouty little Mist brat, then."

---

(Saturday the 8th of June, 1968. Mafia Land.)

There was a bazaar in Mafia Land that was, quite frankly, bizarre.

All those random things thieves hid their smuggling within had to be sold somewhere, and if it wasn't sold off again in bulk to the civilian sector immediately when it reached the island or used by the island's maintenance workers and staff, it was sold in the open-air markets.

Sonya was pretty sure all of it wasn't the results of only just the thieves of Mafia Land, because the bloodstains on a couple items didn't look like they came from any thief. Did the hitmen and assassins use the same service for their own work?

What for, grisly trophies?

Proof of kill?

Actually, the latter sounded more likely. Especially in their lives, with how suspicious and backstabbing a great number of them could be.

…eww.

Aside materials needed for questionable smuggling reasons, this was also the dumping grounds for anything the fences needed rid of to make room or for the island's various services to sell off unneeded or old supplies. Everything was basically on sale all the time and, as long as you could ignored the questionable bloodstains that would never come out or the occasional knife or bullet hole, a decent place to find anything you might need ever.

"Right. I would suggest you be very wary, and clean the fuck out of, anything you get here." She informed Bjørn, digging out her Mafia Land charge card from her jeans back pocket and handing it over to her Lackey. "I highly doubt you could reach the end of my credit in any possible way, so get what you know you need no matter what it ends up being."

She had actually exceeded the max amount allowed of business credit in as little as three months, or so the woman who confronted her in the Thieves' Hall informed her. The island had chipped off an extra twenty percent off the top, before their fees were taken off of course, but she got most of what went over back. Now she had a shiny new bank account as well as maxed out credit with the island, the account which she intended to split in half at least the next time she got to Switzerland.

Keeping a bank account on an island full of criminals just seemed… ill-advised. A Swiss account sounded so much better.

He accepted the card curiously, likely never having seen one before.
It was basically a forerunner to the credit card, but American Express didn't exactly have a branch office in Mafia Land. It was also made out of metal, painted over to be mostly white with raised black lettering.

"The merchants will make an imprint of that on a sheet of paper, then you need to sign it with the name you're registered as my Lackey under. You don't want to know what would happen if you tried to sign the receipt any other way."

Sonya would get the bill at the end of the month and pay it off then, but this at least prevented them from being mugging targets.

"Additionally," she continued before the kid realized she had basically given him a small fortune to spend on his temporary apartment, "that is yours to hold onto. I prefer to pay in cash, but I can actually make anyone attempting to mug me regret it greatly. With that, you can buy anything you might need or want here without walking around with a thieves' target on your back, but I will be looking over what it is you're buying every month. Ensure you can justify it if you spend it."

The Icelandic teenager looked like he couldn't decide between being scared of the card, scared of her, or excited over the fact she had basically given him free-reign to live how he liked on her dime. Within reason.

He did, eventually, start wandering away to see what was available, so Sonya found herself a bench nearby and lit up a new cigarette.

Björn would either be an impulse spender or an extremely frugal kid, according to Lisa. Since the thief did now have the money to blow, they'd see what kind of marks his life on the streets had left him. She could afford it, and then she'd know to either put strict limits on her credit line or if she wouldn't have to worry about the kid living on an island full of shady swindlers and other criminal types.

She had her money on him being frugal, if only because debts had been how the teen's father ended up under the thumb of a local faction of the mafia. It wasn't exactly a certain thing, hence why she just gave him a large amount of money to go spend.

She spent most of the time she was waiting people watching, even if that was a risky kind of thing to try in Mafia Land. Sonya wouldn't be needed as muscle, the merchants had ways of ensuring deliveries reached where they had to go… especially if that address was on the island.

In the end, it turned out she and her foster mother were half right.

The teen was frugal with her money, but everything he had scraped together from either living in Moscow or from tagging along after her had been spent when he found something he wanted.

That couch needed a deep bleaching session and might change colors to eventually be less of an eyesore, but who the fuck was GoldStar?

It was obviously a company that made color television sets, which the Icelander had blown most if not all his personal money getting for himself.

TV, great. It was a very nice set, she supposed. Clunky and blurry and entirely a piece of technology of this particular era.

When did she turn into such an electronics snob?

She barely used anything like them anymore.
While Sonya was dubiously staring at the, powered off, television set, Bjørn had finished shoving the rest of the random things he bought into their approximate spots. "Dama Sonya? We would normally turn that on before staring at it."

Her Lackey was becoming a smart-ass. The Russian thief was now sure it had been her that rubbed off on Cherep, and now this teen.

"Tomorrow, eight in the morning, I'm taking you into the Thieves' Hall. I'm picking out the next couple contracts, and you'll watch me do it, so eventually you can line things up for me while I'm gone."

She also needed a check-up, too. At least she managed to get her damn haircut, in Paris.

Why was it called a bob?

A little too short for her liking, but it would grow out again.

"Is that what I am to do for you, then? Mainly?"

"Yeah. I would prefer it if you could slot things in a row to hit either on my way out or back. Oh, but leave the weeks before and after, as well as the week of. Christmas free for the foreseeable future. And," because she didn't intend to forget ever again, "the last week of February and the first week of March."

Sonya would probably get an ear-full from Tatiana if she nixed going back to Moscow for Christmas and for Valerian's birthday. Also, Renato bitching at her for forgetting Shamal's birthday should never happen again.

Ever, thank you very much.

Bjørn dove for his notebook, hastily scribbling down something. Either her orders or ideas, whichever.

"If you can find related mafia gossip or news about whichever area I am to be stealing from as well, I would greatly appreciate it."

The teen gave a few nods, still scribbling down what he wanted. "Um… Dama? Anything else I should know of before starting?"

"Avoid China for the time being, I don't want to go back there. Italy too, I know the people likely in charge all over there and don't intend to piss them off. And… avoid most if not all of the Middle-East. Muslims are… just no. Religious police are a headache I don't want to deal with."

She would have to dress up as a male again, which… she wasn't entirely sure she could do without major padding to mask her curves or bumps. Major padding in a desert was just way too hot to contemplate.

"Anything else we'll have to see about in the near or far future. Any more questions?"

The gangly blond teen looked contemplative, then gave a slow nod. "When you're not here, and I have time of my own?"

"I don't care what you do. You can literally go anywhere in the world from here, see anything you might ever want to gape at, and probably get yourself killed doing anything too stupid." Sonya admitted with a shrug. "As long as every year until you're eighteen you go into the hospital for a check-up, you don't overrun whatever little vacation and make me wait more than a week or two, and don't spend all my money, you can do whatever you want."

"Really?"

"I will eventually find out what you're up to. I handle the bills, kid. Either get shameless or be smart about it, because I will know."

Having put a damper on any wild kiddy-plans to tour the world, the thief made for her Lackey's front door.

"I… am going to the hospital for my own check-up. You have the rest of the day to yourself. If I'm not at the hospital, you'll find me at the condo we spent last night in."

"Have a good day, Dama."

She flicked a wrist in a farewell, musing on if she could get Tatiana to give her the physical she needed or not.

She counted, right?

Tats was a nurse.

(ooo000000)

(Saturday the 8th of June, 1968 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Sonya didn't really like hospitals.

They smelled, for one. No matter how much bleach or ammonia was used, it still smelled sickly and had the faint tinge of blood and bile lingering around. Fluorescent lighting was irritating too, they sometimes buzzed in her hearing and flickered annoyingly when they needed to be changed.

Bland color schemes, very few things to look at, shiny tiles with dull walls and weird fake ceiling foam tiles made it all very depressing.

The thief had known all that from spending time in Mafia Land's hospital when Lisa was pregnant with little Valerian, this time around she found more things to hate.

She didn't really like the doctors and their touching. Getting poked and prodded with needles was fine, blood-pressure measuring cuffs were irritating. Stethoscopes, when used properly for their original intended use, were cold. Those ear and nose lights were odd, as well as the fact she had to be blinded in both eyes by a pen light.

The reflexology test was just stupid, however. "Look, you really do not want to do that."

The doctor's little examination room was cramped, the likelihood of her kicking something through a wall or two was high.

"Miss Bazanova, it is required." The hooked nosed doctor insisted shortly, waving his little ax of rubber around as if that could magically change her mind about it. "I must test your reflexes, and this is how it is done. Stop controlling your involuntary reflexes."

Sonya merely glared at the ass, having already said her piece.

"Doctor Kappel, I think you shouldn't."
At least she knew German too, having learned it with Tatiana herself.

"Nurse, enough. We are not going to reward difficult behavior from any patient." He snapped at the thief's foster sister, even more irritable than he had snapped at her. "Now, Miss Bazanova, let us try that again."

Doctor asshole bent gingerly, then tapped Sonya's right knee just above the kneecap.

The thief kicked his counter, which sat across from her, smacking it through the wall and into the next little office room. A broken brick teetered precariously before it tipped just a tiny bit too much and joined the rest of the broken masonry that made the two examination rooms a bit less than sterile.

"...yes. Well. I see." Clearing his throat uneasily and tucking away that little rubber ax into a lab coat pocket, he refused to meet her eyes. "Excuse me a moment, nurse, Miss Bazanova. I must see the maintenance workers for a nonce."

Tatiana held it in until the man left the room and sharply shut the door to the little physical office behind him. She burst into giggles, trying to smother them with one hand ineffectually. "You did that on purpose."

"Yes. Well, I see." The thief admitted in Russian, looking at her now bruised and swelling toes. That really hurt, but strangely not as much as Propagating her own hand had. "Tats? I think I broke my foot."

Bouncing over to the doctor's rolling chair, the nurse lifted her little sister's foot into her lap to lavish it in Sun Flames. "You probably shouldn't have done that, but thanks. I needed a laugh."

"Is he always as much of an asshole as he seems?" Sonya asked, idly watching plaster and another brick fall out of the hole she made in the wall and impact the little pile of rubble on the floor with a puff of grey and red dust. "Because I probably would've either killed him by now or broken a fair few more bones. Preferably his."

"Doctor Kappel is a bit of a self-important asshole, sure. But he really knows his stuff, instead of merely assuming he knows it. Kind of strict, and he's right about how you went about refusing to do a test. You really should've told him you were likely to break the walls in it instead of just refusing."

Tatiana shrugged the questionable nature of her assigned doctor off, tugging each of the thief's toes and pressing against the ball of her foot to ensure she got all the breaks. "He learned his stuff through most of World War Two, he defected from the Nazis and joined the Allies in the war. But, since he started out as a Nazi doctor, and defected? No one else would hire him once the war was over."

"You sound kind of..." Gushy. Was this another crush?

Like Dmitriy and Nicolai?

"He's also one of the fair few doctors that doesn't think I'm here as eye candy at best and an occasional extra hand at worse." She admitted, only a bit sourly. "So, I'd rather keep this doctor, if you don't mind."

"No brutalizing or scaring Doctor Kappel. Got it."

"I'm delighted to hear it, ladies." Said doctor announced through the hole in the wall, in perfect St. Petersburg accented Russian. "May we then finish Miss Bazanov's physical? Without further structural damage to the hospital?"

Right, the other door had been open. He probably heard all of that.
Tatiana coughed sheepishly, likely embarrassed to be caught gossiping with her sister about the man himself.

Sonya merely shrugged. "We have the room now for reflex testing, so sure. Why not?"

Kappel didn't look at all amused at her flippant comment, peering over those half-moon spectacles she wasn't even sure he needed to see with.

"Sonya, Miss Bazanova," The elder sister corrected herself, clearing her throat under the man's still unamused look for the informal mode of address, "is what is referred to as a Classical Cloud user of Dying Will Flames, doctor. Extreme physical strength, an unfortunate habit of not relying on their musculature, and a very ornery outlook in regard to orders she doesn't agree with or are given by those she doesn't respect. Mainly, anyways."

The German doctor looked a bit more interested than irritated or annoyed now. "Another one? I had heard Flame users were rare, yet it seems as if more and more of you are showing up every day."

"Surprise." The thief shrugged unhelpfully again, having thought the same thing ever since the Vongola Christmas Ball.

Maybe it had just been because Soviet Russia's underworld was a bit isolated?

Well… Lisa had said there had been a dip in reported users, hadn't she?

Then there would likely be a pick-up in Flame users appearing, too. Urg, she should probably have a plan for that, or pass it on to the Rain back in Moscow to give him a bit of a head's up.

"Right, well then." Doctor Kappel took a few ginger steps over the pile of destruction the younger Russian had wrought on his office, ducking the upper lip of the damage and taking up the spot the redhead had been in only moments before he started to move. "Again, then. Without the kicking of holes in walls, if you please."

…she was coming to hate that little rubber ax.

She was proven right. Her reflex test would've ended with the hole in the wall anyways.

Kappel's fascinated look at the flick of lavender Cloud Flames his light hit caused down her calf probably didn't mean anything good for her, on the other hand.

Tatiana sold Sonya out shamelessly, informing the former Nazi doctor that the thief was the one to clue in on possible drawbacks a Flame user might encounter. For the younger Russian herself, she just really wanted her pants back before getting drawn into any discussions that didn't need to be made while she was in a hospital gown.

"I would like to be your main physician, if I may." Kappel informed her at the end of her check-up, noting down a clean bill of health for her medical records. Both the one the hospital maintained and the doctored up 'civilian' version. "I think someone should probably document the health impacts these 'Flame' things cause. And, as your physician, you will not encounter the same issue twice. I can be taught, unlike some of my contemporaries."

"There are seven types of Dying Will Flames of the Sky." With possibly weird mixes of one or two or more that would cause different issues if it did at all. "I have three; Cloud, Storm, and Sun. Mostly Cloud, can use Storm Flames, and never gotten the hang of Sun."

"Understood. Your answer, Miss Bazanova?"
"He is a really good doctor, Sonya." Tatiana chipped in, as if she hadn't sold her sister out just minutes before. "You might end up with someone worse next time."

Shrugging, the thief buttoned her jeans under her flimsy hospital gown then stripped the paper clothing off. "Fine."

"Sonya! Put a shirt on, or at least a bra!"

"He's a doctor, he's seen it all before Tats. I don't think I've got anything he hasn't seen yet."

"Not the point!"

(Monday the 24th of June, 1968. Mafia Land.)

There had been a reason why Sonya hadn't really contemplated living on Mafia Land before Tatiana suggested getting an apartment together.

Occasionally, once or twice a year or so at the least but upwards of every other month sometimes, the island of criminals was invaded.

Cue various amounts of destruction, hyped up criminal types, and delays all over the place.

After so many years ducking in and out during the winter months, or just not being here for it, the Russian had forgotten about it. Forgotten how annoying it was, how destructive it could be, and the general way most of her fellow mafia members tended to respond to it.

She was not entirely amused to be stuck in the dockyards for this next round of idiots trying to take over the island. Especially since they decided to attack by boat. Right after she disembarked from her transportation, which was also a boat.

She was very, very not amused to be nearly hit with a bullet either as she walked into the site of the latest idiot flavor of the month attempting a hostile takeover.

Sliding her gaze from the bullet hole next to her head in the beige painted concrete wall to the idiot that decided to try intimidating her, the thief cocked her head. "Is that it?"

"Look, lady. I ain't sure how they do it where you're from," slick and greasy informed her haughtily, "but where we're from? Dames usually hit the deck when the bullets start flying."

That was… no one talked like that anymore, right?

What was he, an import American but not a native?

Trying to impersonate Elvis or something?

Sonya was not remotely impressed with the man, the outfit he was with, or the fact they had come from her old birth country. She tossed her paperwork on the ground, dropping her purse on top of it to ensure it would still be there when she got back.

Then she turned, planting her hands on her hips and considered the ass thoughtfully. "So… are you... what? Some kind of impersonator? That's a very… bad, Bronx accent."

He might've been trying to sound like he was from Chicago, actually. Badly, but… maybe she was just unused to American accents now?

Slick and greasy developed a tick over one eye, and he took a deep breath and smoothed one hand over his greased hair. Flicking oil off his hand, he re-cocked his gun and leveled in squarely at her chest. "Ain't telling you again, lady. Get on the ground or feed the fishes."

"Cute..." There was no way in hell he was actually prepared to deal with a Flame user, she bullshitted with Propagated speed and slammed the hammer end of her suddenly full-sized Bec de Corbin into that gun before he could aim right.

It fired once, while shattering under the force of her blow. The bullet hit the wall behind the Russian while slick and greasy's hand pretty much splattered all over the floor.

"Where I am from, sugar, threatening someone invites reprisal." She informed him calmly as he clutched at the ruin of his right wrist to try and stop the blood spurting out, her fingers itching for her smokes but unwilling to actually turn her back to these idiots to fetch them. "And since you did threaten me, I own your damn fingers. Payment is due, jackass."

She flicked her, likely glowing purple, eyes to the other gawkers. Half of who looked to be slick 'n greasy and missing his hand's close and personal buddies.

They had probably been left behind to secure either their way into the island or their hasty exit plan. The bulk of whatever fighters they had with them were probably already trying to work their way into the island.

"Who else wants some?"

The best they were armed with, now with the gun in shattered fragments?

Switchblades, a baseball bat, and a few pairs of brass knuckles.

Against her warhammer?

Sonya was almost disappointed, really.

What were they, the dregs off New York City's streets?

A bullet almost impacting her left calf attracted the Russian's attention to the fact these younger brats hadn't been left without a babysitter or two. Mister Babysitter was still a shoddy shot, his hand was shaking way too much to actually get a bead on her even standing still.

She easily evaded the first shot, almost avoided the second, and drove a double-handed swing of her hammer end into his stomach.

...whoops. She didn't mean to break the man's spine. Tats could heal that, maybe.

Lightly kicking the broken man, just to see if he was alive or not, netted her a pained sounding inhale-gasp thing. With a shrug, he was alive and that was all she really cared about, Sonya stomped down on the second gun to render it into non-use as well.

It was really bad for her boots, though, so she only did it once to flatten the barrel.

Absently rubbing at the fresh, bleeding nick across her right shoulder, the thief turned back to the really young criminal babies guarding a boat. "Anyone else, gentlemen?"

(ooo000ooo)
Bjørn marked down a few more lines of reminders in his notebook, while he wandered to find his patron's sister.

'Check the hospital or nearby eateries', he had been told. If he needed help, the nurse was a better bet than trying to gain aid from the Zolotov vory that were on the island or the related people with them.

It was around lunchtime, the Icelandic teenager found Tatiana Primakova at a strangely set up salad bar restaurant. It wasn't French, it actually looked American in style.

She looked highly amused at the little jewel Sonya had left with him and told to try out while she went to complete a contract she picked up.

Bjørn hadn't quite understood, until it started to sparkle with lights that didn't come from the sun or lamps around him. With his patron gone off on business, the only one that might know what she wanted him to do with it was her sister.

"Lightning Storm, hmm?" The red headed nurse commented idly. "Sonya was betting more Lightning than Storm, but she had also bet Rain would be more apparent too."

"Is… that good?" Was not being a Rain cause for concern?

"You are what you are." Tatiana offered unhelpfully, flicking a hand to dismiss the issue. "Sonya will be pleased to know the white sapphires do work to identify new or possible users."

That did not help him very much, other than at least knowing he had succeeded with what his boss had wanted from him. She was a very difficult person to please, and if he wanted his quality of life to continue improving he probably should ensure the Russian was pleased with him.

This island of criminals proving to be better to live in than the streets of Finland was probably very ironic but really, he was just thankful for that. It was even better than Russia, in that he was no longer the outsider but one of many Lackeys doing their patron's errands.

"You'll crack it if you keep doing that." Tatiana pointed out, her leafy fork jabbing in the direction of the mostly clear but naturally tinted blue stone in his fist.

Bjørn almost dropped it, but the nurse snatched it out of the air with a quick snap of her hand. Showing the speed and skill she had as a thief of the Zolotovs, even if she was not one any longer.

The white, slightly blue, jewel suddenly threw off a bright yellow light… and developed a crack down one side even as he watched.

"See? Oh, don't worry. I'll tell Sonya I cracked it." The nurse reassured him, tossing it to the table and picking up the fork she had dropped to snatch the jewel from the air. "You'll break a lot of gems in the near future. We all have. Sonya still pops spinel ones all the damn time when she feels like being threatening. I had to stop using mine for healing because that was getting expensive even if I can heal more with one."

"Ah…" Well… as long as Sonya wouldn't be too irritated with him, he didn't mind.

"Sonya will sit you down and tell you all the risks and benefits for continuing with this," Tatiana nudged the now cracked stone sitting innocently on the table, "but for right now... when was your last check-up, Bjørn?"
"Last year…?"

"So, you need a new one done." She continued, inspecting him closely. "Well… Doctor Kappel did wonder what the difference is before and after a Flame user becomes active. He'll be delighted to have a subject to study."

What?

"Come on! Let's go to the hospital!" Tatiana gleefully abandoned her lunch, sized him around the bicep with one hand and snagged Sonya's stone with her other.

…at least he had his boss' charge card on him still. Hospitals were expensive…but she had told him to get a yearly check-up, so hopefully she wouldn't mind the cost.

A siren went off, startling the Icelander and making him walk right into the nurse's back when she slammed to a halt just before reaching the restaurant's doors.

"Björn, when was Sonya due back?"

"Today? Sometime either today or tomorrow." He admitted warily. It had been two weeks, and that was what she had claimed to need for a theft involving a mostly unoccupied manor/vacation home and several paintings.

"Ah… well, fuck." Tatiana spoke, her voice almost drowned out by what seemed to be an island wide proclamation in various languages, announcing 'free-violence' towards the 'American Genovese Crime Family'.

"Is this a bad thing?"

The redhead let him go to ruffle her loosened hair thoughtfully. "I don't know. Hey, you saw her after a fight, was she… Cloudy?"

Björn blinked at the woman's back, entirely baffled. "…what?"

"Do you remember anything odd about Sonya when she rescued you?"

"Other than she was very calm? No."

"Great… well, let's hope no one pushes her buttons." Tatiana informed him with a wry little smirk. "I don't particularly care to try cleaning up after a berserk Cloud's rampage."

"Is that…?" A real concern?

"I have no idea. Sonya's always been very self-controlled ever since I first met her." She admitted with a careless shrug. "I think she might be due for a complete breakdown of that self-control, if these idiots do managed to press her buttons in the worst way possible."

He still didn't understand very well, but knew they were talking about a very bad thing happening. "Maybe she's not here yet?"

"Well, we can hope." The nurse admitted as metal shielding suddenly slammed down from outside of the glass windows and the doors they had nearly gone through. "Come on, we're going to have to take the long way around."

…there was a long way?

(Monday the 24th of June, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"I thought you Flamers were supposed to make this shite easier!"

"Do shut up, your ignorance is showing." Renato drawled out nastily to the grunt lying prone to maybe present less of a target, pressing more bullets into his recently emptied clip at a steady rate. "And it's revolting."

It wasn't like he was the only Dying Will Flame user about, the other side had a couple too.

This was not a great time to be running out of ammo, but the hitman was down to the last handful he had on him. Expectations were everything in this line of work, but it had been a long time since he got caught out in a scuffle on the streets like any common thug and needed more than three full clips and at least three reloads of loose bullets. All he had on him usually was merely enough to mow down maybe a squad of idiots, and another handful of rounds to use in hunting down any that helped said possible hit team.

In other words, a very bad days’ worth.

A surprise attack, one that his admittedly badly gutted contacts on the island hadn't known at least a few hours beforehand of it occurring, meant he was a little less than impeccably armed for this.

Which wasn't doing all that much for his mood, truth be known.

If this kept up, he was going to have to resort to using his Sun Flames as ammunition instead of keeping it in reserve to heal himself of any inadvertent injuries.

Even worse was the position he was stuck in. This street was one of the few main straight ones that left little cover to be had down long stretches.

Ending up in a tight spot with two random grunts did not improve his outlook of this little situation. The second grunt didn't even had ammunition he could appropriate if needed.

It wasn't bad, but he'd likely take a few nasty hits just to get out of it before his luck ran out.

Slotting the last clip home, Renato twisted back around the storefront he had taken shelter behind and took careful aim at the damn Lightning that was giving them such trouble. The man was likely Italian by descent, if not by birth, which really was a pity.

The Sun's bullet hit but ricocheted off the Lightning's skin with a crackle of acidic green Flames and buried itself in the thigh of another standing just before the 'tank' of a man.

"Well… that's just perfect." He ducked back in a fast hurry, evading the spray of return fire that almost put a hole in his hat.

Shamal was pouty enough about his fifth birthday with no thief of Russian descent being present, putting a hole in his Christmas present from the two of them would make everything even worse the next time he went back home.

"Now what, genius?" Random grunt number one he had gotten stuck with snarled, yanking his head back behind cover as the others expressed their distaste for the recent injury on their side.
Since he was armed with knives and Renato had some damn guns, he really was a bit more than moronic to keep pressing the Sun user's buttons like this.

"Now? Plan B." He snapped back, hitting the release catch for the clip he had just loaded.

"What're you going to do with an empty gun?"

"This." Leaning out of the dubious shelter of a clothing store's corner, the Sun took careful aim as the moonstones under his hands heated up.

His Sun Flames were stronger than that Lightning's Hardened skin, the shot of pure yellow fire narrowed down by his iron pistol melted a hole through the man's will and forehead. The shot, in fact, burned through his head and the shoulder of the man behind him before impacting and melting a bit of steel shielding a window farther down the street.

Well… he really liked these moonstones. They made that easier to pull off, to say the least.

"Any questions?" The hitman asked sarcastically as he spun back around to reload his gun to conserve his Flames.

Moronic grunt number one wisely shut up, his buddy slightly less moronic grunt number two swallowed audibly but did make himself useful. He put down the opposing grunt with a thigh wound and the one with a hole in the shoulder in succession with a few shots from his own overly compensating hand-cannon of a handgun.

Unfortunately, Renato had proven himself a bit too well. The mafia men on the other side recognized the same thing and decided taking him down would be worth the deaths it would likely cost. His higher position suddenly gained the bulk of attention, bullets chipping away at the corner he had taken refuge behind with a vengeance in hopes one could penetrate concrete and steel to hit him.

The Sun using hitman could maybe take a hit or two and heal it while he keep going, but enough hot lead would still put him down for good if he wasn't careful.

Almost underneath the continuous spray of automatic gunfire came a markedly different sound, and Renato paused after slamming his clip home to clear a jam as he tried to place it.

Cracking bone?

"Fore!"

A ballistic missile of two hundred pounds of likely former human crashed into the idiots standing mid-street trying to gun down a couple loose mafia men blockading their way. Much like a bowling ball scattering a badly set up lane of pins.

Actually… ballistic missile man was still alive, somehow. Moaning in pain and trying not to clutch his badly deformed jaw, but alive. Probably was going to be drinking his food through a straw for the rest of his life, however.

Might have cracked or just broken a fair few bones on landing too, so he might not stay that way.

…was that Sonya?

She had never participated in this kind of thing before, what the hell had these idiots done to piss off the unusually even-tempered Russian Storm-Cloud?
He kept himself half hidden behind a storefront, knowing better than attracting a violence-lusting Cloud's attention by taking their targets. Even if those targets had been his before she showed up. Clouds weren't exactly understanding of such mix-ups. Intentional or otherwise.

He might have a good relationship with that woman, but that was no guarantee of safety. It was possible she would decide the idiots scrambling around mid-street were not enough of a challenge for her and come after him for a better one.

The hitman hadn't seen her being purely Cloud in nature yet, and he kind of wanted to see where this would go.

"Gentlemen," Sonya all but purred out, steadily advancing on the still armed but disorientated men in the street gawking at their former-missile fellow, "do put up a better fight than the last group. Please."

Stomping a heel down on moronic grunt number one's chest before he could do more than open his mouth, Renato gave the less idiotic grunt kneeling beside his buddy that he was stuck with a motion to keep quiet.

That grin she had looked a tiny bit disturbing.

Especially on the lips of a woman that had seemed to only have maybe three or four facial expressions at most. As a matter of fact, he could clearly recall that grin from the Christmas Ball when she scared two middle-aged mafia wives off his case.

Glowing Cloud Flame eyes and all.

Idiots one through seven realized they were armed with automatic weaponry around the same time, and that the steadily advancing Storm-Cloud only had a very wicked looking spike and slim hammer on one end of her polearm.

The thief had accounted for that, once they swung those weapons in her direction a bounding stride had her ten feet forward and to the other side of the street before they opened fire on her. Another that took her clear over their heads got her well within range to lay about with that warhammer of hers.

Renato had to wince, because Sonya wasn't being remotely nice or neat about it. Very, very messy… but then again, that might be why the woman was so considerate of her temper.

Everyone that had a gun pointed at her ended up with broken or simply torn off fingers when she smashed a couple pounds of queerly dark metal hammer into the automatic machine guns with unreal force. A twirl of the equally dark metal pole smashed the pike end through the chest of someone attempting to ambush her back with a knife.

Off-center, likely only puncturing a lung and breaking a few ribs. If he didn't bleed out, the idiot would live.

Yanking her weapon free, Sonya clocked another man trying to tackle her to the ground in the jaw with the butt-end. One last sweep of the hammer end around, and idiots one-through-four weren't likely to wake up any time soon as they impacted the armored storefront on the left-hand side of the street hard enough to dent metal.

Leaving a crime scene's worth of blood, parts of fingers, and at least two soon-to-be-corpses. As well as a small armory of shattered rifles and handguns, most too dented and warped to be used as anything other than scrap metal.

"Renato?" The Russian called over her shoulder, hefting that warhammer over the other as she turned to see him. "You owe me a pack of cigarettes."

"I… yes, I do." From when he visited her in that circus thing she had been doing, he had forgotten about that. "Don't have any on me right now, little lady Sonya. Very sorry."

"So, you steal from me but I cannot return the favor?" She asked with a touch of annoyance, allowing her weapon to slide off her shoulder to tap the end of it on the street. "That is very rude."

Paved streets should not show crater marks from a woman absentmindedly hitting it with a pole a few times. No matter what weird metal said pole was made out of, he made a mental note to ask about that… later.

Renato shot a demanding look to less moronic grunt number two, who shook his head. He did point to moronic grunt number one shakily, slowly. As if that would prevent the Russian from noticing him.

Grunt number one at least would prove somewhat useful rather than just irritating. Another stomp had him wheezing for breath, allowing the hitman to relieve him of his half-crushed pack of cigarettes without fuss to toss at Sonya.

She looked slightly amused as she caught them. "Why thank you, kind sirs."

Since the Cloud-woman didn't seem inclined to either continue with a spree of violence or try her luck against the hitman, he took a few steps to the side so it didn't look like he was hiding behind a store. She, still standing in the middle of the road, brazenly lit up the stolen cigarette with a flash of Storm Flames and tossed the pack back over to the two grunts.

"Sonya, do me a tiny favor? Since I did heal your hand?"

The thief gave him a disinterested glance, which he couldn't tell if he found insulting or relieving. One hand, no fight with a feral Cloud he didn't want to kill. The other?

Did she not view him as a threat too?

"Sometime today?" Sonya asked, pulling the lit cigarette from her lips.

The closer he got, the less pale her normally grey eyes became. Which answered that question, Miss Storm-Cloud didn't view him as a target but as an ally. Which was… strange.

Normally that would only happen between a Cloud Guardian and their Sky's other Guardians.

Did Sonya have a Sky?

Renato was pretty sure she would've mentioned having one before now if so. Then again, he was fairly certain the fact she could keep the existence of her foster family so well hidden after several years' worth of small-talk meant she could keep her mouth shut about whatever she wanted reliably.

He was admittedly rather nosy, he might be still a bit put out over how well she could do non-comments to him to the point he missed even the suspicion of it.
"Make me a couple handfuls more of these?" The hitman asked pleasantly, holding up one of his last few loose bullets and striding over to her as if he wasn't stepping on shattered automatic weapons, the odd bit of finger, as well as the gore he and grunts one and two had painted the streets with splattered over with her own contribution. "I'm rather uncomfortably low."

He didn't even have enough for another clip, but beggars couldn't be choosers.

"Sure." She took one from him once he got close enough, flicking the lone bullet around her fingers and ending up with a nice handful of more in a steady flicker of Cloud Flames when the original ended up between her middle and pointer finger. "How many do you want?"

"Enough to see me back to the weapons' district." Renato claimed, pocketing the first handful of Cloud Flame copied bullets. They'd work in a pinch, which this was, but they would also disappear the moment her Flames ran out. He had no idea how strong she really was, in Flame terms, so better to be careful with them. "Two more handfuls."

He'd keep one around, just to see how long it would hold in the end.

"It is over with, right?" Sonya questioned as she made the next handful. "The fighting? I did not run into very many pockets of it on my way out here."

"The fighting's probably shifted to a more central spot." Agreed the hitman with some distraction while sorting out what pocket he wanted these bullets to go in to, so he'd remember they were short-lived copies. "Maybe another hour or two before the mop-up begins."

"So…" Her head did turn in the direction he mentioned, but she turned back and flicked her cigarette instead of start wandering that way for a better fight. "…I should probably go pick up my stuff before I have to chase down some ass that decides abscond with it all."

Renato blinked at her as he un-holstered his other, empty pistol to load. Not a typical Cloud response to being pointed in a new fight's direction. Sonya actually looked unhappy about her own suggestion, too.

"Why not stay and pitch in a little bit more?" He suggested helpfully, which netted him a dubious look as the thief shifted her attention from him and the possibility of a new fight to the… rather gory results of this one.

"I did not actually intend to go very far in the first place." Admitted the Storm-Cloud, a touch sheepishly as she eyed the man clutching the hole in his chest scooting away from any weaponry to show he was giving up. "It was just… it has been a while since my last, actual fight. I got a little… distracted."

She was… embarrassed. Actually embarrassed, fiddling with the bullet she wasn't making more copies of, flicking it around her fingers and lit cigarette absently as she eyed the damage she had done with the warhammer in her other hand.

"I forgot how much fun it was." She continued, as if she wasn't acting like a shy schoolgirl.

…alright, that was a typical Cloud response, but the shy but bright grin she flashed him wasn't a typical Sonya response.

"I should go… I broke a couple people that I did not intend to. Tats should probably have a look at them."

"Why bother?" The idiots had known what they were facing, in attacking Mafia Land. The broken and dead that resulted were par for the course, but it wasn't as if it was any real deterrent to it happening again.

"I did not mean to break his spine." She clarified with a shrug. "I intended to take the other mook's hand off, though, so I am not going to bother myself about that one."

Sonya pushed his bullet in-between her breasts, placing her cigarette between her lips, and used her free hand to pry a glittering purple stone out of the head of her warhammer.

Speaking of which… warhammers, hmm?

"Erm… Sonya?"

"Hmm?"

"My bullet?"

"I have to keep this one, if you want the others to last." The thief informed him absently as the gem popped loose. Her weapon shrunk in a flash of bled off purple Flames, and she pocketed both it and the jewel. "I will give it back later."

She flicked a hand in farewell, strolling off without much care for what she was stepping on or whose body fluid she was trekking through.

Renato couldn't decide if he wanted that bullet back or not.

"So… if that yellow stuff was plan B, what is she?"

"Plan C." The hitman informed less moronic grunt number two blandly as he strolled in the other direction to get a few more of the attacking idiots. In return of the sheer affront of getting him stuck with said moronic grunts. "Plan B for Sun bullet, Plan C for intervention by Cloud."

That had been… strangely non-lethal for a Cloud's involvement.

He shot Mister hole-in-chest through the head before he could throw the grenade he picked up from one of his insensible buddies at his back.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 24th of June, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"Err… Sonya?"

"I broke him, fix it."

The nurse looked highly unimpressed with both her demand and the random guy she was holding up for her to see by the collar. The dim lighting around where they were probably wasn't helping much, but the guy looked pretty half-dead already when she went back to pick him up.

"He's part of the attacking group, isn't he? Who cares?"

"I do. I didn't intend to break his spine, Tats."

"You did more than just break his spine, little sis." Tatiana informed her bluntly, eyeing the bruised and distended part of the abdomen visible under the hem of the guy's wife beater tank-top. The thief's grip on his Yankee's jacket the only thing keeping him upright. "I think you might have burst his internal organs. Most if not all the digestive tract, maybe part of his stomach too. He's already dead, just not quite there yet."

…shit.

"Is this your first kill? Kind of messy of one, but it's not really a bad thing." The Sun user tried to reassure, which didn't work at all with the smirk on her face as she eyed the insensible mook likely about to die from a septic infection or organ failure from the damage her foster sister had done. "We can go get your tattoos touched up after this."

"Not my first kill, thank you very much." Sonya informed her sourly. "I just didn't want to kill him."

"So why haven't you gone to get your roses filled in?" She demanded, hands on her hips instead of healing the man her sister had brought her. "You… you really need to stop trying to shelter Cherep, you know. He's a big boy, he'll understand."

The thief crossed her arms and glared at her sister. "I was not sheltering Cherep. I just forgot, okay?"

Accidently letting go of the man made him crumble into a weird flopped half-backwards position with a scream.

"…whoops."

With a sigh, the nurse bent down to check him for anything else wrong. "You know, you probably did worst things to his damaged internal organs by dragging him around to try and find me. I'm recommending a mercy killing at this point."

Irritated, and really a bit sorry, the younger sister sighed herself. "Fine, whatever. Back up a bit."

"For?" Tatiana did give her room even as she questioned the reasoning for it.

She reached down and snapped the man's neck, wincing as he gave a jerk in response before going limp and unresponsive. Instead of weak coughing wheezes and the occasional twitch response.

It was an improvement… sort of. He was dead and out of pain's reach, at least.

"Well… I was also going to suggest overdose of painkillers, but that works too." Looking around the underground tunnels Sonya had located her within, the nurse snapped her fingers to gain the attention of a few jumpsuit wearing handymen. "Another body, boys."

Having long since lost her high from actually getting herself into a full-out fight, the thief now felt a little mopey and depressed. Which was also irritating her, because of one slip of control that killed someone she hadn't intended to kind of ruined the whole fight for her.

Now she had to figure out if not feeling all that bad for killing someone was something she could live comfortably with, or if she was thankful she at least felt sorry for it in even the most remote way.

…or irritated that she still had that hang-up over killing.

He had tried to shoot her, she wasn't wasting much pity on him when he likely wouldn't have held any for killing her. Same for mook with a clunky grenade launcher she smashed the jaw of in and launched backwards a couple yards.

Who the hell brings a grenade launcher to a floating island?

…did she kill that guy too?
She had been pretty sure she hadn't hit him hard enough to kill… just maybe shatter bones, but that had been his head… and there was that guy she slammed a few inches of pick into the chest of.

"Is this really that much of an issue? So he's dead, why do you care?"

"With my strength, Tats? Losing control isn't much of a good thing."

"Oh." Tatiana bit her lower lip as she considered that, and probably some of what Sonya had been like as a freakishly strong little girl who could occasionally splinter the furniture when she tripped and grabbed hold too hard. "Ooh… I get it now. Shit, sorry Sonya. But my healing him wouldn't do anything about your self-control, just hide the results for a few until you slip again."

Yeah, that was… the Storm-Cloud either needed to gain a grip somehow or get herself in a lot of fights and try not to go overboard at the same time. She could also resign herself to killing part of any group she fought, instead.

Which… what was better?

Leaving her opponents alive but broken, or removing any and all future attempts at revenge by killing everyone that tried to kill her?

"Hey, don't stress over it. You didn't kill anyone too important, and at least now you know. Right?"

"I suppose." Sonya's fingers itched for her cigarettes, but she abstained simply because she was trying to cut back. Giddy post-fight smoke break included.

"There's a tattooist on the island, we can get your roses painted red here. Or you can wait until we can see Boris about them." Her older sister suggested, edging herself so her little sister wouldn't get distracted by her latest dead body. "Or… when was your first kill? Do you qualify for pink?"

"I don't, actually. I just haven't really thought about my tattoos enough to recall I had to get them… adjusted." The thief would probably just go with red anyways even if she could get pink. Legally fifteen on her paperwork or not, she had really been fourteen when she killed those grunts in France. "We can do it here, if you want."

"They're your tattoos, Sonya." The nurse reminded her with a touch of exasperation. "What I want shouldn't matter."

(Wednesday the 3rd of July, 1968. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

Sonya's bad mood lasted all through her next Mafia Land contract.

A pirate's treasure hoard?

Those were still things?

Which made her not appreciate the uniqueness of her latest contract and merely complete it with minimum fuss involved.

She'd likely regret that later. Pirate treasure hoard. How often would she get a contract that involved stealing that outlandish before an actual archeological team managed to find it?

…hopefully those holes in the cavern system would be overlooked as natural damage from both time and the tides. Not a thief checking for false walls or getting fed up with half-rotted traps she might set off if she wasn't wary.

It wasn't really much of a hoard, more like a very heavy chest of gold, papers, and trinkets. The fact the chest broke was because it had been waterlogged for years and most of the wood had started rotting, the treasure spilling out had just been part of that.

When turning in the job, because she had to get the treasure smuggled in, she turned the slip from the Mafia Land agent in Haiti and her contract paperwork to the lobby receptionist of the Thieves' Hall.

"You were requested to retrieve it intact, not in pieces." The snooty receptionist informed her, not even looking up from the papers before her as she stamped, filed, and marked up a new set of post-heist paperwork for her files. "If there isn't a damn good reason for this, we're going to have to count this as a half-completed job."

"Yeah… about that," Sonya dumped a couple planks, a plank with a broken lock still lodged in it, and a pile of rusty metal on the woman's desk, "seventy to a hundred years of water damage, corrosion, and all sorts of things eating the wood kind of ruins the container. It. Broke. In-transit."

"That is not-" Miss snooty sneered at the mess and looked up, then blanched bone white as she shot to her feet. "Miss Bazanova! I didn't know it was you. No, of course you couldn't have met the requirements, they were very unrealistic."

…okay… what?

"I'll have a word with the agents, you won't be penalized for this." The receptionist tried for a smile, but it just looked painfully faked and mostly fear-inspired as she slowly back up to the wall behind her.

Sonya gave her a searching look, which strangely made her cringe.

"…don't kill me?"

"What?" This was… very different.

"Look, I'll mark it down complete. See?"

"Are you trying to set me up to be killed?"

Bribing, coercing, or just threatening the administrative workers of Mafia Land to fudge their work earned everyone involved an automatic hit. The Russian had no intention of ever getting Renato on her ass, because that would end up all sorts of awkward for them. However, she also had no idea whatsoever of what was going on.

"NO! I would never! I just don't want to die."

Much to the thief's alarm, Miss snooty now seemed on the verge of crying.

"Um…"

"Miss Dillard, take a break." Gentleman with some idea of what seemed to be going on suddenly ordered from behind Sonya, looking very reproving over the woman's behavior.

He gave her an equally disapproving look, which made the thief raise her hands in innocence as the receptionist hoofed it with respectable speed out of there. "Look, I have no idea what is going on.
She was fine until she looked up, then started practically hyperventilating."

"We did not know you were a Cloud, Miss Bazanova." He informed her as if that would make some kind of difference.

"…and?" What was with people making comments that had no obvious responses?

Sonya never quite got the hang of these kinds of conversations. Not even in her last life.

He gave her a level look. "Are you implying it will not impact your work?"

"I have been a Cloud Flame user since I was nine. If you checked my records, you would know I have worked for this island even since I was eleven." The Russian pointed out flatly, feeling confused over the entire situation and not appreciating the fact. "It has not impacted my work here yet, and I do not appreciate the accusation that I would let anything like that happen in the first place."

That had not, apparently, been what he had been expecting to hear.

"Could someone just please explain what changed from two weeks ago?"

Miss snooty had been… well, snooty and prissy then. Not tearful and in fear of her life. She didn't feel any different, maybe a bit tired and travel worn.

Certainly not nearly as bad to have someone afraid of her murdering them out of the blue. She wasn't even really all that mad, just a bit mopey and a bit introspective for the last couple weeks.

What the hell was going on?

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 3rd of July, 1968 continued. A Mafia Land Ferry.)

Renato about burst a rib laughing when he heard.

"It is not that funny." Sonya snapped sourly, glowering at her cigarette over just glaring around in general.

With her luck, the ferry operator will take a dive off the side of the boat if she did.

The hitman had, rather courteously, catered to her dislike of flying on airlines and was taking the ferry with her to Italy to see Shamal. Again.

They had done this last winter too, for the Vongola Ball.

It was warmer this time, at least.

He tried to stop laughing, and indeed managed it for all of a second. Rolling her eyes, the thief made a dismissive gesture to inform him he could carry on without risking reprisal.

That shit-eating grin on his face made any attempt to be serious kind of moot.

"Sonya… you are a very unusual little Cloud." The Italian informed her as if he didn't tend to call her that usually, trying desperately to regulate his breathing. "You aren't like all the little horror stories of Hard Flame Clouds and their terrifying behavior, and frankly you're doing these people a disservice by that."
"How so?" Wouldn't it be better?

Sonya wasn't really bothered by much, and to be honest she hadn't thought twice about how she behaved in respects to all those storybooks for mafia brats she once devoured whole said Clouds behaved.

"They meet you, and once they realize you are always this way, they think 'oh, not so bad'. Then they end up meeting a less even-tempered Cloud, and instantly get brutalized for trying something you'd ignore but they won't due to whatever." Renato explained with a dismissive flick of his hand. "Frankly, you behave yourself better than a Cloud does under their Sky's eye. Almost as well as Visconti does. I've been wondering about that, actually."

"I do not have a Sky." She had… actually, thinking about how she used to be compared to how she was now… Sonya had a Cherep.

Everything, her more social behavior to the relationships she had now with her foster family, all happened after she met a Czechoslovakian boy with bright purple hair and eyes and enough Inverted Cloud Flames to defy death itself indefinitely.

…huh. That sounded a lot cooler than just saying the purple dork she found with no sense of self-preservation or the inclination to get any.

"You really should have expected this."

The Soviet Storm-Cloud shot him a sideways look. "Really? I should have expected to terrify the secretaries and random pedestrians for something I have been for years and which had never made an impact on my work before?"

"Well… yes. You could not hide it for the rest of your life."

"I was not hiding it. I just did not go about announcing it to all and sundry."

"Call it what you will," the hitman waved off her tart reply, "fact of the matter is it would've gotten out eventually. If not this past idiotic invasion attempt, then in future ones to come. Take some advantage of it, Sonya. They're going to realize you're probably the most even-tempered Cloud in existence sometime."

"I am not." Cherep was, not her.

Renato blinked, then shot her a queer look. "Repeat that?"

"What? I am not the most even-tempered Cloud in existence."

"…and you know that for sure."

"Yes?"

"…huh." Shoving a hand up under his hat to scratch at his head, the Mafioso smoothed both his spiky hair and the fedora back down with a puzzled expression. "Odd. Sonya? Do you… normally speak whatever crosses your mind?"

"Usually. Most of the time yes, unless it is sensitive information I should not be sharing." The thief replied, a bit bemused at the sudden subject change. "What would be the point of not?"

"To not give offence, or to… right, forgot who I was speaking to."
…that was possible?

How?

She was standing right next to him. The only other people around were giving them a wide berth, and they were right next to the ship's railing in order to provide that berth everyone wanted to keep between the Storm-Cloud thief and themselves.

"It just is, alright?"

"Renato? I did not say that out loud." She was pretty sure of that, actually.

He opened his mouth, likely to snap something at her, but paused as he seemed to realize something else. "…oh."

That was inane, and not very helpful. The man looked alright, a bit dazed but well enough.

Sonya tentatively decided not to ask, unless he said something else about it.

Maybe he read the question off her face?

If so, that was new.

"…never mind." The hitman muttered, a frown now pulling his mouth down at the corners.

…okay. "So, what has Shamal been up to since this winter? Pouty Mist behavior since I missed his birthday and all?"

"Ah… that." Renato started smirking again, which she decided was an improvement. "Nono would like to request you don't give the brat any more turquoise to terrorize his staff with."

"Any more." Sonya repeated slowly. "So… just replacing what he shatters is still an option?"

"…yes, yes it is."

(Friday the 5th of July, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"I am so sorry I missed your birthday, brat. I was unavoidably working for it." Sonya informed Shamal honestly, trying not to wince at the baby Mist pout aimed at her.

That was scarily effective, even better than Cherep's wet kitten looks. He looked like a kicked puppy, instead of an offended cat. There might be Misty things at play to make him seem more pitiable but he was entirely entitled to pouting at her, so she ignored that.

"…you forgot-" Renato cut his mutter off when she glared at him over the brat's head, adopting an innocent look instead of the smirk.

It wasn't working too well for him.

The thief swept baby Mist up into her arms, turning her back on the hitman pointedly and gave her attention instead to the brat. "Renato only managed to get ahold of me this summer, like barely a month ago, so I didn't know you wanted me to show up to it. I finished up what I have to do, and the rest of the year is mine, so I can totally spend a week or two here if you really want me to. To make up for missing your birthday. We'll do whatever you want."

"You can't miss my birthday again, Miss Sonya." The kid in her arms insisted wetly, placing tiny hands on her collarbone to give her his most serious look possible through his puppy pout. "And you have to be here for Christmas too."

"…just this year for Christmas?" She would get bored of the Ball thing if she did it too many times. There was only so much snark one could amused themselves with before it got tedious, and she didn't really know that many Italians.

"All Christmases." He corrected, or more like demanded, those tiny hands now waving around wildly to emphasize his point. "All of them ever. I don't get to see you much, Miss Sonya. Mister Renato would probably like to see you more too."

"He sees more than enough of me as it is, kid." They both now lived in Mafia Land, not seeing one another almost every month was going to be hard to pull off. "And we'll see, but that's not really up to me in the end. This is Don Vongola's home, kiddo. He may not really want a Russian thief lingering in his halls so much."

Maybe she wouldn't have to do the Ball thing every year? Would Nono mind if she was here but just didn't go and amused Shamal instead for the night?

There was a weird funny little cough thing from Sonya's other side, and she turned her head to finally notice the doorman. Who was holding a tray and looking very amused. "Your weaponry, Miss Nikishina."

"…right." She had to set baby Mist down for it, because she had to remove both bracers and her necklace she finally got replaced back in Moscow. Seven Bec de Corbins, a handful of extra jewels in various shades from her pockets, and a red tourmaline skeleton key were placed on the tray. "Master Tyr will probably want to see the key, but I would like it back eventually."

The doorman suddenly gained a bug-eyed expression, flicking his eyes from her to the key pendant lying innocently on his tray. "…of course, ma'am."

"Why would Tyr be interested in your necklace?" Renato asked, frowning at both her and the doorman.

"He asked about it this last Christmas." Sonya informed him with a shrug, picking baby Mist back up.

He was at least bigger again and getting into the lankier part of childhood. While weight didn't really mean much to her when picking things up, he was bigger than he had been half a year ago and sustained strength was an iffy thing for her.

"It's a very… useless necklace. Now, Shamal. What would you like for your very late birthday present? I can probably get you just about anything, and if I can't I can likely steal it."

Baby Mist didn't even need time to think for what he wanted. "Can I have a baby brother?"

"…okay, I might be able to do that too. Hey, Renato, can-" The thief cut herself off when the doorman suddenly made some fast tracks out of the Iron Fort's entrance way, and the hitman seemed to look a bit pale under his natural tan. "…can I steal him for a week or two sometime?"

"For?" He managed to grate out, a wary look shot her way included.
"My foster mother gave birth? The baby's a boy, so Shamal can go and get his fascination with all babies out of the way in a relatively risk-free environment."

The answer might still be no, because it seemed as if Renato was being very careful about Shamal's security ever since the scare in Mafia Land. At least this way baby Mist would be upset with the hitman and not her.

Vory weren't... well, weren't what would call careful or caring around children, but at least they wouldn't normally do anything too violent to anyone under the age of thirteen. Arseniy would at least try not to upset tetchy Mist brat with his usual sour grumpy-ness until the kid was more used to him, and Lisa likely wouldn't mind meeting Shamal herself or showing off her baby.

Valera probably would not care at all.

She was also somewhat sure her foster father wanted to at least meet Renato, although she wasn't sure of why.

"Ah... maybe next year."

"Sorry kiddo, anything else?"

Baby Mist brat was pouting again, but since it wasn't aimed at her she didn't really mind the expression.

"You have to spend all week here, then. Every second of every minute of every day. With me," He blinked wetly up at her, then pointed to the hitman that was raising him, "with us, I mean."

"Well... as long as I'm not the only one suffering through a week of kiddy entertainment."

"Hey! I got you your damn present." Protested the brat's guardian, waving a hand at the five and a half feet tall blonde woman holding said baby Mist. "Leave me out of this."

"You were late with it, though." Sonya reminded him wickedly.

Shamal gave a couple nods. "Yeah, Mister Renato. No excuses, remember?"

The outraged look on the hitman's face when tetchy Mist brat used what was probably his words against him made up of any number of days the man had a good laugh at her expense.

"I'm going to remember this." The older Italian vowed darkly, jamming that hat further down to shade his eyes and nearly radiating outrage. "When you're all grown up, I'm going to recall this and make your life a living hell with that phrase."

"No, you're not." The thief disagreed with a smirk. "I bet you Shamal will always find a way to wiggle out of whatever it is you try, and you'll never actually manage to hold to that."

He shot her a seething look from under his brim. "You're on, woman."

Yeah, he was going to lose that.

Baby Mist was a damn Mist. Aggravating, annoying, and conniving was their entire business.

A new throat clearing in a grab for their attention had hitman, thief, and Mist look up the grand staircase. Timoteo Vongola gazed levelly back at the three of them. "As amusing as all this is, I must wonder if you have to do this right in front of the doorway."
There were other entrances, right?

It wasn't like they were blocking any possible entrance or emergency exit way. Sonya, in fact, opened her mouth to ask just that but Renato's hand was suddenly plastered over her lips before she could sound the first word.

"Forgive us, Timoteo. We'll start moving." The hitman actually lifted her off her feet with an arm around her waist and forcibly moved her aside when she dug her heels in to resist his maneuvering of her person. "Damn it Sonya, stop being difficult."

She dug her nails into the hand over her lips to utter one sentence. "Remove your hands or lose them."

He jerked away from her gratifyingly fast, with a sniff in his direction the Russian strode across the foyer and started scaling the stairs with Shamal still in her arms.

"Don Vongola, I think I must beg a bit of your forbearance. Shamal, since I have missed his birthday, would like me to stay the week with him. May I?" She even held out pouty Mist brat, who gave his best shot at a begging expression.

As a boss of an entire criminal enterprise, but probably more importantly the father of two or three young children around a similar age himself, Timoteo was entirely unmoved by another child's entreating expression. Instead, he looked expectantly at her more than Shamal.

"...I may or may not actually have a candidate for the Storm Ring stone with me. Or rather with the doorman that has my weaponry and extra jewels. I brought it with to see if your Storm Guardian wouldn't mind comparing it to his own ring."

"I think we can easily house you for the week, Miss Sonya."

"It's the reddish-brown stone, a Cinnamon Stone garnet. I brought extras, so he may keep one if he likes."

Suppressing a wry smile, the Don gave her a regal nod and continued on with whatever it was he was after before getting waylaid by their blockading of the main doors.

"If you had a bribe ready to go," Renato drawled as he followed her up the stairs, "why did you waste time trying to sway Timoteo with Shamal's pouty face?"

"Manners are never a waste of time." Sonya informed him dryly, then reconsidered her words. "So long as the one your manners are aimed at aren't being stupid, moronic, or just plain suicidal."

"So basically, ninety percent of everyone in existence?"

She had to give him that one. "It really does seem that way sometimes, doesn't it?"

(Saturday the 6th of July, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Why would it matter? He's five."

"He's not going to like it, that's why."

Sonya scoffed, already busy doctoring a cup. "If I make it right, he'll like it just fine and we won't Renato's flat expression could've been used to iron his immaculate suit. "I didn't even think of that. You're dealing with him for the next few hours, Sonya."

"Yeah, whatever." She gave Shamal a mug of coffee, or rather a mug of hot milk laced with some coffee creamer and a tiny splash of the Mafioso's espresso for the flavor. "There you go, kid."

She was pretty sure the older Italian's irritation was more for her stealing a little of his drink to do this, but eh.

Baby Mist looked entirely satisfied with life as he cradled the cup of 'adult drink' the hitman never let him have. The first sip earned her an adoring look. "It's really good, Miss Sonya. Thank you."

"See? I told you he'd like it just fine."

Vongola did a buffet-type breakfast for the entire household, at least when there wasn't a late-night party going on that made most if not all the guests and usual residents sleep in the day after. As 'guests', because Renato had finally managed to rid himself of an unwanted famiglia and didn't count as 'business guest' anymore, they were encouraged to eat within a certain time slot.

Guests weren't expected to know or figure out how to deal with the Guardians of Vongola's Sky in the early mornings, after all.

Given both the hitman and the thief were Flame users themselves downgraded that 'encouragement' to 'strongly recommend'. They still got the evil eye if they were late or lingered too long, however.

Tyr the Sword Emperor entering the ground-floor dining hall outside of the famiglia's usual times to feed their people attracted a whole lot of attention.

Since he had a familiar glitter of red between his fingers, and was headed straight for their little table, Sonya was pretty sure he was there to either return her necklace or ask a few more questions about it. "Master Tyr, good morning. Care to join us?"

The master assassin flicked his eyes from her, to the suddenly wide-eyed and gaping Shamal, and then to the slightly disgruntled looking Renato still nursing his 'wounded' coffee. "Another time, perhaps. Your necklace, Miss Sonya. While I do appreciate the look, it was unnecessary to give it up as well as your usual weapons."

Sonya didn't take her necklace back when the man held it out for her. "Are you sure about that, Master Tyr? I was told to leave all my weapons at the door."

"As you told Don Vongola, Miss Sonya, it really is next to impossible to disarm a user of Dying Will Flames. Even a moderately motivated person without them could be just as much as a threat. While I can imagine a few ways this could be used as a weapon, it isn't intended to be one is it?"

"Point." The Russian agreed wryly, allowing the thin chain and crystal key to drop into her upraised palm.

"Good day Miss Sonya, Sinclair," the man even gave the still gawking baby Mist a nod of his own, "young Shamal."

Pursing her lips, she gave the man a moderately hard look for the last acknowledgment. He merely smirked faintly before striding away again.
Tyr having his eye on Shamal was slightly alarming. In the 'she was certain baby Mist was supposed to be mostly freelance not Varia' way.

…right?

Well… what happened would happen, she could really only wait and see.

"So, brat. What do you want to do today?"

Shamal's reply was a bit delayed, given he was trying to decide between copying Renato and his zealous nursing of his espresso cup before eating and her and her actually eating food breakfast habits.

"Can we go to the park again, and go see a cinema?"

"We can go to the park and see a film at the cinema, yes." Sonya replied wryly, wondering if Mist brat actually meant to go and watch a building that showed movies or to go see the movies such buildings provided. "I think… a Disney animated film called 'The Jungle Book' was recently released and should be showing around now."

It was about an orphan, right?

Hopefully he wouldn't focus on that part.

"I'm abstaining, have fun." Drawled the hitman, smirking wickedly as he elaborated why he wasn't going to be forced outside for a few hours to just sit and watch Shamal run around a playground. "I have to register Shamal for school in the fall."

Baby Mist's betrayed expression was hilarious and trying not to snicker at it made the thief focus on him more than the kid between them. "Is that possible? I mean, he did go a bit wild from what you've said."

The brat apparently had terrorized that weak Mist nursemaid Sonya didn't like with a Mist construct of the Russian and various other only vaguely human-shaped images, catching a lot of other people in the crossfire from all reports she had heard. It had gotten him into some trouble, with both the head of the Vongola staff and Renato himself.

Nurse-whoever apparently had more than enough, she had gotten herself reassigned elsewhere where she didn't have to try to wrangle a baby Mist stronger than she was.

Why did Vongola stick a Mist on a Mist, when a Storm was a better Mist-wrangler?

Frankly, even a Classic Lightning would've been better than Mist lady of no imagination.

The hitman had confiscated the brat's turquoise for a full month, until he not only promised to stop terrifying the staff but also to get a grip on his spamming of Mist Constructs… and apologize to the head of the staff for the disturbances. Shamal still found the entire thing unfair and had told her his side of the story her very first day with him while she was unpacking.

"It's a homegrown type affair. Private, local, and very used to Vongola linked students pulling weird or just crazy stunts. Which he knows better than to do around those not prepared to deal with it."
Renato informed her blandly, eyeing the level of espresso he had left sourly. "It will, at least, give him something new to do instead of run wild."

Sonya merely shrugged when Shamal turned those big brown puppy eyes on her. "Sorry kid, I have to agree with him. You'll at least get to learn all sorts of things I don't know."

That possibility apparently did not jive with what tetchy Mist brat seemed to believe. Skeptical didn't quite cover the extent of his expression. "Really?"

"I was homeschooled. Finding and eliminating the gaps in my education is kind of tricky," especially since a lifetime worth of history she knew was not applicable in this life, "so this way? At least you'll start from a solid base to build off of."

Shamal did not look sold on the idea of attending formal education.

"Lucky him." The hitman commented neutrally, dropping his empty espresso cup to the tabletop between them and finally getting around to eating something.

(Friday the 12th of July, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

The Iron Fort saw a lot of traffic that wasn't originally Vongola in nature.

Other Dons, their various guards/grunts/enforcers, their wives on occasion, local people that wished to entreat the Famiglia for either protection or intervention, there were a lot of bodies wandering in and out on any given day.

That didn't include their own people, which might even reach far into a couple thousand in number.

The point was there were a lot of 'time wasting' rooms on the ground floor that didn't get Sonya a very firm but polite maid or footman wishing to relocate her. There was a library not too far from the guest suites, and the thief had wrangled tetchy Mist brat into starting to learn how to read with her most of the mornings of her week-long visit.

Even if Shamal's level of energy couldn't hope to equal Cherep's childhood levels, the Russian didn't really feel like trying to tire him out the same ways she had tried to tire her foster brother out on his more annoying days.

Her very last day of visiting, she had been trying to teach tetchy Mist brat how to read and write his name in one of the little reading nooks.

Slight problem, Shamal couldn't remember his last name.

Baby Mist who was also an orphan freaked out about forgetting his father, or any part of his life before the hitman, and she reluctantly allowed herself to be used as a handkerchief for said waterworks.

Renato actually looked a touch apologetic about asking for the kid's legal last name so late into his guardianship of him.

"Why the hell do you not know it?" It was lucky they were in a private library, in a public one they would've been hounded by the librarians for the noise and she would've gotten arrested for threatening them to back off with her weaponry.

"The brat's dad did his business with only a handle. I never bothered to remember it, only his location, why the hell he was selling information, and the usual threats that might go in his direction. He wasn't that interesting. It's somewhere, I just don't remember it." He all but snarled back, apparently not willing to actually glare in the direction of the bawling brat in her lap but at the paperwork that needed last names to be filed by. Shamal, it's not that important. I can look it up later, okay?

"Oh yes, that is going to help. Tell the orphaned boy the name he shared with his father does not matter." Sonya rubbed the hiccupping Shamal on the back awkwardly, including a few pats when it did seem to lessen the outpour of water making her wet. *Kid, think of it like going undercover. They're civilians, so you need to ensure they don't think anything too odd of you. A different last name will help. Like how everyone here calls me Nikishina, even if I had that changed a few years ago."

Teary brown eyes peered up at her wetly, the young boy sniffing and still leaking, but didn't comment.

"You can use mine, until Renato finds yours." The thief promised, a touch desperately. She didn't actually mind touching the brat very much anymore, so long as she was the one doing said touching, but this was a bit far out of her comfort level. I'll even sneak in to fix it for you if you want me to later."

It earned her another snotty sniff, and the kid did look like he was considering it instead of just being mopey and depressed over his sudden realization on the fallacy of human memory.

"You're not sneaking into a mafia affiliated school, Sonya. That's a stupid risk to run for something I can just file new paperwork on without a problem."

"Then I will sneakily file said paperwork in broad daylight, I never said I was going to break in."

Renato gave her the look he seemed to think it deserved, turning back to the paperwork he had been filling out for Shamal's future primary school attendance. Shamal, pick one. Use Sonya's name, or leave it blank.

He at least had the decency to wince when she threw him a dirty look for the borderline demand. She wasn't remotely comfortable with bawling baby Mist either, but the kid deserved at least some consideration.

Sonya might have no good opinion of her biological father, but she rather liked her foster one. If Shamal's father had been anywhere near as dear to him as Arseniy was to her now, then the kid was entirely entitled to his crying jag.

Slowly, the hitman skipped over the name section to fill out the rest of the forms while baby Mist deliberated over the choices he had.

Eventually, he tugged on her entirely too wet blouse to gain her attention. Can I use your name, Miss Sonya? For a little bit?

He didn't look happy with the asking, but he probably figured it was the better option than admitting he didn't know his own name to people.

Sure kid, want to learn how to spell it? They had a couple extra blank sheets, the Russian pulled one over to them and picked up her pen again. Here, N-I-K-I-S-H-I-N.

…I thought your name was Nikishina. Renato remarked quietly when Shamal got distracted investigating the shape of the letters making up the name, likely intending to not forget this one too.
"I'm female, he's male. The –a drops when my last name is used in reference to a male."

"Russians."

"At least my language doesn't assign gender to inanimate objects and forces one to learn three different definite articles to use with them."

"Barbarians." He returned with a slow growing smirk now that the stressful part was over with, quickly filling out that intimidating blank spot with the male version of her surname. He hesitated over the 'Middle Initial' blank, side-eyed the brat still sniffling in her lap and skipped it. "You're rather good with it, though."

Sonya couldn't decide if that was smart or cowardly of him.

"I cheat."

"Ho?"

She merely smirked, not intending to inform him exactly how she could cheat when it came to tricky bits of other languages.

The hitman eyed her suspiciously but got sidetracked on the basic medical history and vaccinations form. "…shit."

"…yeah, good luck with that one."

The look he gave her over Shamal's head would've curdled milk.

(Sunday the 21th of July, 1968. Lille, French Republic.)

_Coyote_ Nougat eventually got back to her, right before she left, that the garnet she had wanted him to take a look at would make a respectable B-grade Storm ring.

Sonya hadn't known those rings for Flame users came in various grades. She never made any mention of being interested in buying one, so all she really did know about them was that they were somehow color coded and scorched as well as shattered after enough use.

Quite frankly, it wasn't really good news.

Instead of just seven or fourteen or so rocks, she was looking at upwards of twenty-something or more depending on how high or low the grades went.

Aside news of undesirable sort mixed in with a bit of confirmation she and the others at least found something they wanted, and Shamal's very best attempts to waylay her from leaving, she left Italy the week after she arrived with little issue.

Heading north instead of straight back to Mafia Land.

It had been half a year, she wanted to see how Cherep was doing on his lonesome.

Oslo, Norway, was likely the midway point for the _Großes Volksfest_ this year. She took a random stab in the dark of where they'd likely went next and tracked them down quicker than it had taken her last year when Fong cornered her in Shanghai.
The thief also, unfortunately, located the traveling Russian Circus just in time to catch one of 'Skull de Mort's' stunt shows.

First off, while she did recognize the damn name, de Mort was French. 'Skull' was English.

What the ever-loving fuck had gone through her foster brother's head to think that was a good idea?

"This is France, is it not?" Skull reminded her unhelpfully, smirking like the ass he was and waving a hand to the back of the dressing room tent to take into account the country they were currently in.

Sonya managed to sneak her way into the prep tent, even if she had to give Jaq a bit of a bribe she intended for Crina to get past his guarding of the entrance since she was refraining from inhuman feats in broad daylight, and glared at the alter ego of her best friend. "Please at least tell me there is a better reason than that."

"To make anyone looking into 'Skull' head to the western parts of Europe instead of eastern. Or even the States, if I'm lucky." The stuntman offered with a dismissive shrug. "And it sounds a bit obnoxious, doesn't it?"

"Some days, you worry me."

That earned her a flash of sheepish Cherep instead of arrogant Skull, but the stuntman eventually batted a hand at her lazily and grinned. "Well... good. You worry me a lot too, you know. Especially now you're on your lonesome doing all sorts of nasty things to people."

"Usually, they are already nasty people before I get called in to perpetuate a feud or arrange and steal a comeuppance."

He snorted softly, gaining a wry, bitter edge to his smile that just made her uncomfortable. "And that makes it all better, I'm sure. What about the other half of that usually?"

She had no good answer for that one, so instead she changed the subject. "I am not on my lonesome, anyways. I am going to be living with Tats. We even have a phone number, which I wanted to give you."

"I was there this Christmas, I remember it."

"No, I mean we got a private line installed for both Lisa and Arseniy that you can use too. Instead of deal with Mafia Land operators that would otherwise give you a run around."

Skull accepted the slip of paper with a raised eyebrow, snorting at the complicated number sequence it took to get a civilian's land line to hook into the underworld's private network of radio towers. "That's... freaking awesome. Well, at least with Tats I don't have to worry about what you're eating."

"I am not that bad of a cook."

"I really beg to differ. I can't even die of food poisoning and I'm still scared of your cooking."

Sonya gifted him with a disgusted look. "I got better this spring, under Lisa's direction. Arseniy ate it just fine."

"I think he's got a cast iron stomach. You can't use our foster father as an example, anyways. You're his favorite."
"This from the man that will eat just about anything, especially if it grosses out his little sister?"

The alter ego of her fellow Cloud dismissed that with another of those limp wrist waves, smirking again. "You may have a point, but I'm not acknowledging it."

"You are an asshole."

"That's my point." He returned cheerfully, snatching up his slightly battered helmet when Jac gave a sharp rap to the pole holding up the flaps of the tent. "And that's my cue. You going to stick around for it?"

The thief had been about to say no, because she hated watching him risk his neck. She reconsidered before she said so, figuring that she had better see how popular of an act Skull's stunt work was becoming.

She may hate the show itself, but the crowd might just be reassuring in a way.

"Yes, fine. This once."

"Or twice? Because I'm pretty sure you've said that before. Once or twice. Possibly. Might be more than that, actually."

"Skull, unless you would like to make an attempt at the world's farthest human cannonball record without the cannon, get moving."

With a bark of a laugh, he did just that. Jamming the birthday gift from her on his head before running out of the prep tent into the big top.

Sonya followed him out more sedately, giving Jaq a friendly wave as she passed the ebony skinned strongman.

He saluted her back with the second bottle of rum she brought along to use as a bribe to get Crina to tell her of anything unusual or wrong with the circus.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 21th of July, 1968 continued. Lille, French Republic.)

"I don't particularly like your replacement." Crina informed her old apprentice sharply, who was cringing and trying not to watch her brother as he let go of his motorbike in mid-air.

"That's nice, Crina." Sonya muttered absently, putting a hand up to shield her view of the stunt ramps. "You didn't like me either in the beginning, so I don't see your point."

The old Romanian snorted in exasperation, as the girl had even paid to watch the show but practically refused to actually watch it.

Privately, she bet the Russian was keenly tracking the circus' stuntman even if she wasn't watching him. Her former apprentice, in her own strange little way, adored her big brother greatly. Even if she masked it with some bland sarcasm and a lesser version of that indifference she usually applied to everything else.

This was probably the only apprentice Crina was actually slightly sorry to see the last of.

She had gone through a lot of them, too.
Most of her apprentices ended up being criminals, and in the most baffling manner.

Rarely were they joining a circus to continue whatever life of crime they intended to do, but for a few months of relative safety and maybe to get in or out of a country or two. They would do exactly as much as they had to, and generally weren't the nicest of people, but as temp workers go they weren't actually that bad.

That, she would insist, artificially inflated the number of apprentices she had gone through over her lifetime. Those rumors she ran off her apprentices wasn't appreciated at all.

Maybe just one or two, but those were nasty pieces of work.

Crina couldn't get a good read on her latest one just yet. She was as baffling as Sonya had been, until the Romanian realized it was exactly as the two of them claimed.

In a skewed manner of speaking, anyways. Not just 'little sister following big brother out of worry', more like 'little sister might just be the bigger threat ensuring her big brother didn't have problems'.

She really did wonder if the two of them were really siblings, or if that had been as much of a cover as Sonya's claims to be trained to be a ballerina.

Which was true… but not the whole story.

Ballerinas did not wander about with impossibly hidden, full-sized polearms stored somewhere on her she could whip out to threaten people with. Nice dancers also did not know exactly how to carve into rocks with a tiny red crystal. Good, law-abiding girls from Soviet Russia also did not prove to be good help in smuggling people out of a country as well as being entirely nonchalant about the very act.

"Crina," speak of the devil, "your break is long over."

Sonya glanced over at the new voice, and for half a moment the old Romanian woman hoped the girl would get downright stubborn and refuse to allow her to leave.

Her newest apprentice was a damn slave driver, especially when money was involved.

What was slightly disturbing was she had been pretty damn sure the new girl hadn't known Romanian at first, but not a week into her working for the circus she could speak it as well as the native from the country could. Sonya had taken a few good months to learn.

A bottle of her favorite brand of rum was shoved up under Crina's nose, greatly distracting her. "Do as the nice lady says, Crina. I'll catch up to you later."

Bless this girl. "I really do miss you."

"Yeah, whatever. My price is information, though, so don't get too hammered."

"Drinking on the job?" Apprentice slave driver scoffed, which only earned her another of those dismissive glances from her predecessor.

"Strangely, Crina's more popular when she's slightly tipsy."

The old gypsy held her breath, but all that happened was Viper considering Sonya's comment seriously then giving the older girl an absent nod. "Mou… we'll see about that."

Damn it. Why couldn't the Russian girl get stubborn when Crina wanted her to be?
"Do those tattoos have a meaning?" The former apprentice asked idly, still trying to fruitlessly ignore the risk-taking her brother was doing in front of a few hundred people.

"Do yours?"

"Yes."

Viper rubbed a finger down one of the upside-down triangles on her cheeks. "…they do, actually."

The crowd gasped, which made Sonya flinch. "…ah. That's nice."

Tugging a lock of her vibrantly bluish-purple hair, the new apprentice slanted a demanding look at Crina.

She shrugged the whole messy situation off, not seeing anything she had to worry about from just introducing the two. "Viper, this is Sonya de Mort. My former apprentice and Skull's little sister."

"Cherep's, I am Cherep's little sister." Sonya corrected with a touch of exasperation. "And I have more than enough names, you old bat. Stop adding more."
(Monday the 22nd of July, 1968. Lille, French Republic.)

Skull de Mort was now a thing, and Sonya didn't quite know how she wanted to feel about it.

How long until that thousand-or-so-year old shopkeeper man gathered up the strongest Flame users of each type?

How much time did the thief have, to figure out if she wanted to try to prevent her dorky foster brother from becoming the Cloud Arcobaleno or at least try and warn him about the baby-looking curse of the damn things?

…or find a way to help him support himself without taking a nasty and sudden nosedive through the underworld's worse dregs?

Crina's new apprentice decided to linger with her during and after the stunt show, which made the Russian slightly suspicious.

…because first of all, she was very damn well used to the 'feel' of Mist Flames and had just come from visiting a baby Mist. Secondly, those tattoos were very… distinctive. Identifying.

At least this area was slightly abandoned, as most attention was at the front or the side where the prep tent was standing. In the twilight, well after a show, near the time another show was lined up to start for the slot after the stunt show. Perfectly deserted enough to have confrontation of the fiery sort without too much risk.

Cherep, still scrubbing the last of Skull's makeup off with a wet paper towel as he almost tripped his way around the back of the big top tent, flicked his purple eyes from the thief to the new girl but decided greeting his sister was more important.

"Little sister!" Sonya got glomped then pulled off her feet, and she twitched as he mashed their cheeks together. "Aww… you came to visit me. I feel so loved."

"You saw me not an hour before this and about to feel extreme blood-loss. Put. Me. Down."

He did so, grinning even with a threat of bodily harm aimed in his direction. "You still have an issue with touch? It's not a bad thing, Sonya. I will keep doing this as many times as it takes to help you get over that. Feel the love, sis. Feel it."

"You are being creepy, get away from me." Sniffing, and taking a couple steps backward to remove herself from touching-distance, the thief lightly smacked his hands away from her sides. "I do not have an issue with touch, I have issues with people touching me when not expecting it. As long as I do it, or I know it is coming, it is fine."

"Your double standards are appalling." Cherep informed her seriously, even if he still had that affable grin.

She puzzled over that comment, trying to figure out if he was being serious about that or just yanking on her chain.

Damn it all, she swore he was doing this on purpose.
"So… Viper, right?" The stuntman continued in another direction, looking at the Mist. "The old bat's new girl. I don't think we've met yet. Hi, Cherep Bazanov. Occasionally Skull de Mort. General mechanic and occasional stuntman."

"Charmed." Viper intoned in a completely blank tone of voice. "I have a question."

"That is nice, we have one for you as well." Sonya shoved her right hand laced with Storm Flames through the Construction of a massive spider before it could leap upon either of them, seizing her replacement by the front of her outfit with her left and hoisting the Mist off her feet. "So… question."

Viper's eyes were locked on the hand of Storm Flames about to touch her nose, her hood knocked off in the scuffle, a scowl on her fully visible face. "…fine. What?"

"Is whatever you are running from going to endanger the circus, Crina, or more importantly my brother?"

The Mist flicked her eyes to Sonya's own, and sneered with an insulted expression. "Of course not. I made certain of that before approaching such a civilian outfit. Can you put me down now?"

"Please. I don't want to have to figure out where to hide the body." Cherep chipped in dryly, entirely unconcerned with the sharp points aimed at his back but gripping hafts of the ones that almost impacted the thief's.

She scoffed, lowering the Mist to her feet even as she turned back to her foster brother. The Constructed spears behind his back faded into indigo Flames as the tension between the Cloud siblings and the unknown faded. "Enough Storm Flames and she would not leave a body. That is not a good protest."

"I don't want to know where you'd ever need that kind of information." He informed her, rubbing his temple tiredly.

"Excuse me, I believe it is my turn." Viper interrupted dryly, adjusting her bright and cheerfully patterned clothing to darker shades with less frills in a few distasteful flicks of indigo fire.

Strangely, she also got a whole lot less feminine looking but was still wearing a long sleeved and skirted dress. "Is there a reason a Storm Flame user's brother is hanging around a purely civilian outfit? From what I've been able to find out, one of you is a former performer and the other is still ongoing without any intents to change that."

"Not entirely a Storm." Sonya informed the girl blandly, suspicious of how she got that information given the stonewalling she received when she started. "Cloud."

"Cloud." Cherep agreed, or echoed, with a shrug. "And yes, there is a reason."

That finally got some surprise painted across Viper's tattooed face, and she flicked her eyes from one sibling to the other. "…the both of you are Clouds?"

The thief gave the woman a hard glare, to show she wasn't at all pleased with the direction she was trying to go in.

"Yep!" The stuntman confirmed cheerily, the idiot.

"If that gets out from you, I will hunt you down and rip out your spine to beat you with it." She snapped at the Mist, turning the full force of her glare on her foster brother. "Why would you tell her that?"
"Why not? The first show I crash in she'll know full well, and this way we'll know which way she's going to jump on that information."

"She may not have been here for that. You do not have that many injuries from your work so far, and you had better not be purposely causing them. I swear to hell, Cherep, if you are I am going to murder any and all motorcycles you ever get."

"I'm not! I swear!" Cherep yelped in panic, grabbing hold of Sonya's hands and not letting go even when she dug her nails into his wrists. "It was only a thought, to see what Viper would do, I'm not going to do it. Ever. I swear to you on the grave of my first bike! Don't murder Betsy."

"...Betsy?" Questioned his fellow Cloud slowly, distracted enough she stopped trying to get him to release her hands.

Did he name his bike?

The embarrassed flush crawling up his face answered that question.

There was a snort from the Mist, and Viper smoothed a hand across her lips when the siblings glanced at her. "Mou… as amusing as all this is, do you have another question for me? I seem to have found a few more for the two of you."

"Please, your brain broke trying to process the fact you were looking at two Clouds."

"That's not the way to make friends, Sonya."

"I am not friends with Mists of no imagination." She snapped at him irritably, tugging at her still trapped hands. "They have to be at least somewhat intelligent for me to like."

"Your Mist friends are both under the age of fifteen." He countered dryly, and pointedly not releasing her. "And one is even younger than that. Doesn't he not count as a friend then? More like a kid you're mothering?"

"He's five, thank you. No, and," she corrected tartly, stomping a toe to get him to let go, "stop touching me."

"Why is my little sister so violent to me? All I want to do is help you make a new friend." Whined Cherep pitifully, actually contorting and clutching his steel toed boot as if that had done more than dent the very top of the metal toe-cap in warning.

"Because you have no sense of personal boundaries. Or self-preservation. And maybe I don't want to make a friend, ever think about that?"

Viper conjured herself a bag of popcorn and started munching.

"Friends are good things, maybe if you got one a normal way you might be less of a damn spaz. And I do too! It's just different, alright?" The stuntman defended himself, shoving a hand through his hair and frowning at her. "And leave my sense of personal boundaries out of this, you have just extreme ones so your sense of them are skewed all to hell."

"I am not a spaz!"

"I should charge admission for this." The Mist mused to herself idly, popping a few more kernels of popcorn into her mouth. "I'd make a killing."
"Can you even taste that?" Sonya asked curiously, derailed from her argument with her foster sibling.

It was Mist Flame food, basically food made up out of illusionary fire that did not really exist.

Wouldn't it just taste like fire?

Or did Viper's Flames also mimic the taste of food?

"Are you male or female?" Her brother asked in the next second, looking slightly frustrated. "Because you look female… but you also sort of look male sometimes. Like right now."

"She is dressed as female. Unless otherwise requested or informed differently, you would refer to someone like this as what gender they are conforming to at the time." The thief snapped yet again, backhanding him in the gut hard enough to make him wheeze. "And you call me socially incompetent."

"…how? Why? How do you even know that?"

Rachel's lifetime had a transgender community that decided on that as the best way to refer them as. Well… that or gender-neutral terms that would just confuse everyone if she used.

"Never you mind, Cherep. That was beyond rude, though."

"It's alright, I've heard it before… except the method of sorting out gender labels." Viper waved the rebuke from the younger sibling away idly, allowing her Construct of popcorn to fade from existence. "And I can, actually, taste the food I conjure. It has no nutritional value but saves me the hassle of actually buying whatever food I wish to eat as long as I have tried it once before."

"…huh."

"…sorry." The stuntman offered sheepishly, scratching at his messy and likely sweat-soaked hair then smoothing it somewhat straight… ish.

With another shrug, the Mist turned her attention on Sonya. "At least he asks instead of tries harassing the answer out of me."

"Well… true. I suppose."

"My question, then. Is this not your territory?"

"I do not have one."

"Yes, you do."

She sighed heavily, directing her gaze to the sky where the stars were starting to show under the encroachment of twilight. "Cherep is of the opinion my territory is actually the people I am closest to. Even if not, I do not have a physical territory. Before you ask, he does not have one either."

A line of stiffness in Viper's thin frame relaxed slightly, which the Russian belatedly noticed had been hovering over the edge of a 'flight or fight' response.

…wow, she really was a very strong Mist. Even her familiarity of Mists and their Constructs didn't help her notice this Mist's more gradual preparations for any further violence.

"…mou, I suppose that is relieving to know." She settled on after a long moment, flicking dark violet eyes between the two of them again. "Next question."

"I do not have any more." Sonya refused flatly, already more than fed up with what information the Mist was going to be walking away with.

Cherep cradled his chin in one palm, looking thoughtful. "...you know, I don't have any more either. I just really wanted to know what gender to call you by, so I didn't offend you or something."

Viper blinked, then blinked again. Finally, she frowned while looking slightly irritated. "Nothing? Then how am I to get answers of my own?"

"Guess. Or suffer. I do not care. As long as whatever you are doing will not harm my brother, you are not that interesting." Even if she was or was related to the future Mist Arcobaleno.

"And you were doing so well, too." The stuntman sighed, aiming a mournful look at his sister. "Really?"

Sonya shrugged it and the look off, not feeling remotely sorry for whatever it was he was now exasperated over. "I am going to go bribe Crina for information. Would you like to come to dinner with me while I do that?"

"Eh... sure. Why not? It will probably be better than the 'leftover' concession stand fair I'd eat otherwise. Even if Crina is going to be there."

"The old bat is not that bad."

"The old bat is a crotchety, sour old woman. I have no idea why you like her so much."

"Well... I somehow like you too, and now I wonder what that says about you."

Cherep gave her a deadpan look. "That you have some moments of pure sanity?"

"Or insanity, if you think about it."

"Ouch, really feeling the love here. Just... wow. So much love." He paused, looking back at the frustrated Mist. "Hey, you coming?"

Viper gave him an odd look.

"I'll pay, think of it as an apology for insulting you."

"...I suppose." She allowed after a moment of thought, following along after them as the thief lead the way out of the little alley and into the circus' main thoroughfare. "Your sister is very... straightforward."

"Yep."

"And you are not."

"That is still a line of enquiry, and if he answers I will gain my return answer in a manner you may not like." Sonya called out to the two behind her.

"There's a reason for that too." Her fellow Cloud answered in a way that wouldn't end up with the Mist owing the Cloud a favor of unnamed information. "Sorry though."

There was a smirk audible in Viper's voice for her next comment. "I have all night, I can probably find a way."

"You'll piss her off, and I would rather you didn't do that."

"…mou, fine. I demand an expensive dinner for my apology then."

She came to a sudden stop as a wonder occurred to her. She glanced behind her at the two of them. "Freebie, what does alcohol do to you? Or just a normal Mist in general?"

"Is there a reason why you are asking?" The Mist user countered with a quick frown, her features readjusting to appear more feminine as they approached the crowds.

"Firstly, because we will likely be drinking tonight. Secondly, he was correct about the ages of the Mists I know, and knowing what to warn them of before they try liquor the first time is something I am interested in."

"I can accept that." Viper mused aloud, cradling her chin in her left hand in a thoughtful manner. "More creativity, less substance when it comes to others. It is easier to disbelieve a Mist's Constructs if they are drunk, usually because they tend to be sloppier as well."

"Huh… right."

The Mist user likely turned a demanding look on the stuntman, because he huffed lightly with good humor in the next second. "We're Polarized differently. Like extreme opposite ends differently."

"…ah."

(Tuesday the 23rd of July, 1968. Lille, French Republic.)

Calling into Mafia Land just to check in with how her sister and Lackey was doing before she took a month or two off to try and find a long dead Arcobaleno proved to be a very good thing.

"What you do mean he picked up a contract for me?"

"I mean you have maybe half the usual time to complete this next job, is what I mean." Tatiana informed her over the phone, sounding stressed already and they had barely just gotten past the greeting part of the conversation. "I informed him not to do it again unless you were going to be expecting it or told him he may, but…"

Defaulting on contracts were not good things even in the civilian half of the world and in the underworld, it could get downright lethal.

"Give me the details." Then Sonya was going to have a very sharp conversation with her Lackey about when and where using his authority over her schedule was appropriate or not.

Rattling off both an address, city, country, and target in rapid succession, the nurse sighed heavily after the thief confirmed she had it written down. "I think… someone confused him into doing it. I'm not too clear on who, or why, because he's keeping his mouth shut about it. But Bjørn's not that great of a liar, nor does he have the personality to have done that intentionally to you."

"I'll figure it out when I get back." In… a week.

Sonya had to go and transfer the notes inked onto her hand to an actual piece of paper or something, then wash off the details of a criminal heist from her skin. Then she likely had to go catch a plane, even if she was still highly wary of flying in this day and age.

It was the only way to get from France to the US in time, and that was only if she used two or three days for said heist then flew back to Mafia Land.

Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Sonya was going back to Rachel's hometown.

She didn't know how she felt about that.

On the other hand, she could go surprise the hell out of people that some girl from Europe could pronounce the Native American names correctly. It might be worth a snicker or two to purposely mispronounce them.

She would not be looking for either her/Rachel's parents. It was still a few years early yet, there wasn't much of a point. They both were probably in high school still, or only just made it into college.

That was still something she had yet to figure out what she wanted to do with too.

(Thursday the 25th of July, 1968. Pabst Theater, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, United States of America.)

Sonya spent the flight mostly looking over the extra details she got just before getting on the plane, more notably more than just 'a chandelier' at 'a theater'. She also spent most of it either trying not to allow herself to worry or mentally cursing out Björn in her head.

The teen needed to do some serious detail work for future heists.

'A chandelier' in 'a theater' didn't quite cover the pertinent details.

Memories from another life told her that in Milwaukee's Pabst Theater, above the main auditorium, was a frankly massive chandelier of crystal. From what Sonya could dredge out of Rachel's memories, it wouldn't yet be the couple ton chandelier of Austria crystal... that was still a decade away, but even with her strength she wasn't even sure she could steal whatever was hanging before that.

That wasn't even counting the fact the bloody thing was suspended over a two-story auditorium... or was it three?

Either way, the thief was going to have to get creative in a fast hurry.

Milwaukee, thankfully, was a port city. The Russian Storm-Cloud loved these cities, especially since it also was a main train station in the US train lines.

Since she could use Mafia Land shipping/smuggling services to transport her illicit goods and buy a hell of a lot of beer while she was here to cover it, her attention went mainly to the damn mess of crystal and metal she had to steal.

While a show was going on.

The theater was almost sold out, doing a midsummer production of Fiddler on the Roof. There were both day-shows of different productions and night-shows of the main feature, meaning the auditorium was likely being cleaned for the few 'off-hours' between the last show of the night and the first show of the day.

Over the heads of about a thousand people. Thousand and a half if the actors putting on the play and the musicians were included.

This was probably the riskiest thing she was going to attempt yet.

Sonya, strangely, was excited the moment she laid eyes on her target.

It wasn't something she would've picked to do herself, not with the risks she knew would come with it. It was a massively ornate thing, it was going to be unwieldy and hard to move, likely possible she'd get caught doing it, but she still was mentally planning out exactly what she would need to do in order to remove and steal the damn thing silently while the room was full.

Two days' worth of traveling, and the one or two day return trip, left the Soviet Storm-Cloud with three days to work with.

"Miss…? The show is about to start." An usher helpfully reminded her, causing the thief to glance at him instead of stare at the massive chandelier three stories above her head.

"Ah… sorry." She took the last few steps fully into the theater and nodded her thanks when he pointed her down the aisle she needed to go to find her seat. "Thank you."

"Enjoy the show, miss."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 25th of July, 1968 continued. Pabst Theater, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, United States of America.)

The chandelier was actually connected to a hoist and pulley system, supported by the heavily reinforced theater ceiling. It was lowered for cleaning, which ruled out maintenance access as a possible way to it. While that would normally nix any attempts she could’ve made to get it from the top, the Pabst Theater also had an incredibly old-fashioned air conditioning system.

Old-fashioned in that massive blocks of ice were once imported and set in a room at the very top of the building, then two massive fans would blow cool air down ventilation shafts to the audience in summer.

Sonya loved ventilation shafts. They were so useful.

It didn't quite remove the issues a solid ceiling gave her, nor did anything about the weight and mass of what she was about to steal, but it provided a way it could be done. Given she had two days left to work within, the same night she visited a show to get a good recent era look around, she also slipped away from the crowd exiting the theater and did a bit of cautious poking around.

Finding a ventilation shaft took her barely two minutes, as they were rather ornate things and she knew what she was looking for but getting into one without raising suspicion took her nearly two hours.

With a method in mind and a general feel of the scope of the heist figured out, she called Tatiana back her second day from a phone booth downtown.
"Do I have to steal the entire thing, or would just the crystals do? The rest of it is metal, possibly even a ton of it."

"I don't think anyone expected you to steal the whole thing," the nurse replied wryly as a shuffling of papers sounded, "I'm not sure what the fact you assumed the whole thing of ton weight was what you were to steal says about your head. No, according to the paperwork, they want the... glass? Or crystal dangly stuff."

"Is that seriously the term used on that paperwork?"

"No, Björn got the paperwork in Icelandic and I'm working off a translated copy in his handwriting. It sucks, by the by. For two years of learning, his grammar can end up all over the place. Might want to work on that with him when you have the time."

Yeah, this was the last time she'd ever be doing a contract without actually reading the damn thing herself.

"Sonya?"

"Hmm?"

"...what are you thinking?"

"I kind of wonder if I should not steal the whole thing anyways."

"HOW? It's a ton or so of metal, you said that yourself."

"It would have to be done in pieces." Agreed the Cloud almost absently, thinking hard. "But the contract has no limitations on damages to the item, right? Since it was so large in volume?"

"Well... no. But, ton. Of. Metal."

"The production being performed is a good two hours and some long. Almost three, actually. I might just have time to not only get the crystals, but everything else including the pulley end as well."

"Oh my god." Tatiana whined into her end of the phone, making the thief yank it away from her ear and give it a strange look. The nurse's voice continued after a long pause. "My shy little sister is an exhibitionist. I never saw that one coming."

"...I... what?"

"You just want to steal it in order to giggle in your stilted silent way over the baffled head scratching as people wonder how you did it, don't you?"

Well... "...yes."

"Really?"

"It will also unnerve and possibly upset whoever it is you suspect has fooled Björn into accepting that contract on my behalf. As... well... as... allow me to stop being a jewel thief and actually start thieving other things."

"From jewels to crystals isn't much of a jump, little sis." Tatiana informed her bluntly, sounding slightly exasperated. "Are you sure you can do that?"

Honestly? "Yes. It will be tricky, but possible. I think I can do it, anyways."
"...I'll get the bail money ready."

"Very funny. I'll see you soon, alright?"

There was a snort from the other end. "One way or another."

Sonya wasn't intending to do anything like this again, but since she started thinking as 'whole thing' rather than 'little parts of it' she might as well keep on with that.

Admittedly, she'd only try for the full damn thing if she could get everything her contract stipulated first.

Best to be careful, at least.

---

(Saturday the 27th of July, 1968. Milwaukee, Wisconsin, United States of America.)

The night of day two in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Sonya spent on a dry practice run just to be sure she could do what she wanted to do.

Mainly, finding and locating not only the method of which she would be getting a ton of oversized lamp disassembled but snuck out of the theater without getting caught.

A ton was stretching it, even for her strength. If she didn't have to find out at the last minute that she couldn't support that kind of weight all at once, she would prefer it.

In her further investigations of the old ventilation system, she ran across the method used to transport ice blocks before the advent of electric air conditioning. It included a set of railroad tracks in the attic to move said ice of old, but also a freight elevator.

Investigating to see if that worked or not netted her a way to actually accomplish the heist as she wanted. For something almost seventy years old, it was in surprisingly good condition. It also needed an oiling in the worst way so as to not screech or clank in all sorts of disruptive manners, and she had to sneak out and back in again with a few bottles of machine grade oil to slather everything that moved with, but immediate transport was set.

While she was at it, she also started carving into the ceiling of the auditorium with a trowel she picked up from a hardware store. Getting the bulk of the work out of the way, like cutting the vent's metal open more than wide enough for her purpose and starting in on gouging away the concrete until she had a very thin amount left to prevent the façade from cracking or just falling apart on her.

The pulley system used to raise and lower the chandelier told her exactly where she had to stop, at least.

One wouldn't normally be able to cut metal with a small little hand spade, but Sonya cheated all over the place.

With that mostly set up, she then had to think of how she would get either the crystals she was contracted for or the entire damn chandelier from the theater to the dockside. In the end, she rented a heavy-duty van.

Legally. Then she stole it.
From herself.

Reporting it stolen did carry some risks, as in her current fake name and description would be linked to the theft if only in a 'victim' way. However, in it being stolen and her 'official' business was acquiring a lot of beer for an Octoberfest party arrangement wouldn't necessarily raise suspicion of its own, it was a risk she had to run.

Since Bjørn accepted the contract on her behalf, he might have to turn it in as well. It was possible she would not be leaving America on time.

After stashing her truck close by once a few 'adjustments' she learned from Dimitry were made, Sonya got some sleep.

Then bought an ungodly amount of beer that she would not be drinking, bright and early the next and last day she had before her contracted time limit ran out.

It took up most of the morning, because there were two main breweries she had to decide between. Pabst itself and Miller. The Russian eventually went with Miller Brewery Company just because she would be having a Pabst item in that shipment. Illegally, but the point remained.

While the shipment was being assembled, she took the legal paperwork she would be smuggling things through to the dockyards and found the local Mafia Land contact.

That would be her alibi for the night, the man here well used to handling shipment details to Mafia Land by himself and claiming otherwise.

She really had no idea how effective of a long-range thief she would be without this network of dockyard crooks.

(Sunday the 28th of July, 1968. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

"I cannot believe you did that." Tatiana moaned as if she were in pain, tossing the newspaper from Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on their dinner table.

Headlining news was the 'Mysterious Mid-Show Disappearance' of the Pabst Theater's massive chandelier. Sonya couldn't quite get the pulley system at the same time, but she was alright with that.

"I can't believe it actually wasn't that hard." The chandelier had to be taken to pieces with a screwdriver while the show was going on, and she had to improvise a way to prevent the cables that held it up from slacking under its lessening weight, but she not only stole the damn thing… she got away on time as well.

The van she reported stolen likely would never be found anytime soon… since she drove the thing off the less maintained dockside and into Lake Michigan. Thank the gods for automatic transmissions.

Stealing it whole instead of the crystals first had prevented any of the gawkers from noticing the glitter of the chandelier disappearing bit by bit before they got fully distracted by the show.

Which, while not the plan, actually cut off maybe an hour of time from the job.

In fact, the Russian thief actually managed to leave the scene of her crime a full half hour before the lights went back on and the outcry over the missing chandelier started. The police hadn't even interviewed her in any way connected to the heist, her only out of pocket cost was the insurance on the van she stole from herself.

Sonya pressed the landing ticket for the stolen chandelier into her packet of paperwork, holding the original contract as well as the relevant information Mafia Land's intel brokers had on the job location and subject, then turned to the guilty looking Icelandic teenager. "Now… take me to this person that recommended this job."

BJÖRN gave a few rapid nods, still looking a bit sickly pale under his recently acquired freckled tan. "Yes, Dama."

He had already bent her ear with apologies, until the thief snapped at him to save it for later.

She really just wanted to know who the hell had the gall to mess with a Lackey of hers.

Ignoring the, still ongoing, wary watching and avoidance of her person by most if not all the normal residents of Mafia Land, the thief stalked after her aid musing on what she wanted to do to whoever it was that tried screwing her and BJÖRN over.

By the closest thing Mafia Land had to laws, she could fully justify killing the asshole to everyone. Sonya didn't want to do that, but something had to be done before this was attempted again.

The thief might not be able to figure a way out of it next time.

At any other time, the silence that spread from her entrance to the Thieves' Hall would've either irritated or annoyed her. This time, it gave her the perfect range to overhear someone talking to Miss Snooty.

That asshole clerk that once set her on a home invasion job had his back to the doors and was a lot more focused on the secretary than wise. Said secretary looked just as uncomfortable with him as she was afraid of the Storm-Cloud's entrance, which got her dismissed from said Flame user's attention.

"I wouldn't worry too much, Beth. That uppity little bitch is either panicking or long dead."

"…uppity little bitch, am I?"

A tiny bit too late to save himself, or at least attempt to scramble for a cover story that wouldn't lead to his likely brutal and bloody death, the clerk whipped around.

Then probably suffered some brain-loss from how fast the blood drained from his face.

"BJÖRN?"

"Da, Dama." Her Lackey quickly agreed, clutching her paperwork to his chest as scooting away from her a little. "Dat is him."

"I don't like him anyways." Miss Snooty informed her hurriedly, ignoring the man's weak little start that might have been outrage if he had the blood to actually process anything. "He's sexist, and rude, and really can't take a hint. I'm about to get married, and he still tries to flirt with me."

"Why do you think I care?"

"Just saying!" She waved her hands in denial of any motivation for offering her personal information, while also keeping them as close to her body as possible. It made a rather awkward looking flailing gesture. "Can… c-an I go?"

Sonya gave the woman a flat stare but did glance at the paperwork in her Lackey's possession that was due today. "I believe there is some work my aide has that needs to be filed."

"I'd be happy to help." Indeed, she looked entirely too happy to seize any excuse to go elsewhere. Miss Snooty turned only just far enough to make it obvious she was addressing Bjørn, but also so she could keep an eye on the Storm-Cloud herself. "Files, right? Archive or completed contract?"

"Icelandic, Russian, or French. He doesn't understand a lot of English yet."

Miss Snooty gave a shaky nod, then babbled out a string of Germanic sounding syllables that made her want to twitch. It made no sense in German, but she apparently was more than fluent in the teenager's native language since he babbled back while opening that folder.

…she really did have to learn more than a couple phrases in that damn language.

"I don't believe you're a Cloud Flame user." Asshole clerk rallied himself finally, apparently regaining his marbles a touch too late to really help him much. "I think you're just doing it for the attention."

…how the hell did that make any sense whatsoever?

Flame users were known by their Flames, which were practically color coded for convenient identification.

Taking her silence as some kind of admission of guilt, he stuck his nose in the air and glared at her. "You are just some farm girl from Russia getting her kicks out of terrifying her betters and needs to be taken down a peg or three."

Sonya dug out her cigarettes, and his expression when she lit it with her Cloud Flames was… interesting. "Do go on, I am absolutely fascinated by this outpour of stupidity. And, actually, I am a city girl from Russia."

He stuttered, without actually making a sound so his mouth was moving but nothing was coming out, wildly glancing around the hall-filled lobby seeking some kind of aid.

It wasn't forthcoming.

As a matter of fact, their audience seem almost gleeful. Whether it was because he was unpopular or just the possibility that they were about to see some violence being committed was debatable.

"…w-well, you're not a very good Cloud. Are you? You are nothing like the old stories, which has to mean you're weak."

"Want to know how to tell how strong a Cloud is?" She asked idly, rolling her smoldering cigarette between her pointer finger and thumb.

Frowning, because he had to know there was bait in that question, the clerk gave a hesitant nod when she refused to say anything else.

The Russian backhanded him across the face, the force flinging him to the side a respectable distance and making him impact a wall face-first. "With one like me, it's how physically strong I am."

The far wall was a good twenty feet away from her. There was still a crack in said wall, spider webbing out from the point of impact and flaking the paint away from the heavy reinforced bricks that made up most of the buildings here. Since she didn't really want to murder him, just yet anyways, she stuck to a force that was non-lethal but still greater than her muscle mass suggested she could do.

If that enabled others to continue to underestimate her, then good.

Sonya stayed in place as she took a long drag from her smoke, merely watching him roll feebly around clutching his battered face. There was a set of footsteps approaching, and in a deathly silent room it was irritatingly loud.

The very same gentleman that confronted Miss Snooty about her lack of spine not barely a month ago approached her from a direction she could clearly see him from. She was only somewhat sure this was the man in charge of the people working to set up contracts for the Thieves' Hall, and who she was waiting for.

"This is the second death threat I have received from your people in a month. Is this how you treat all Flame users?" The Storm-Cloud asked with deceptive mildness, flicking a hand to include the now whimpering clerk in her count so he would know why she was getting violent. "If so I will gladly spread the news to the others, so they will avoid this place."

He froze for a full second, then carefully regarded her seriously. "That will not be necessary, Miss Bazanova. Also, I must ask you to put that out."

"If you want your people dead, then all you had to do was say so." The thief replied, still in that even tone of voice as she dropped her lit cigarette to crush with a booted heel. "I suppose I could just kill him instead."

It really only took a flick of her wrist to get one of her Bec de Corbins to fall into her palm, then it was literally child's play to enlarge it to full-size as it swung behind her for the room.

"Miss Bazanova, please. This is entirely unnecessary."

"Is it?" She finally snapped, turning to glare at him instead of advance on the man with the now broken face and pointedly not putting her weapon away. "So how many more times must I deal with before it becomes necessary? I am warning you now, one more death threat and I will eliminate you and put my damn Lackey in charge. At least with him I will no longer worry about threats trying to use everything they can with this service against me."

Björn looked entirely terrified of that possibility, once Miss Snooty translated the parts he didn't understand for him.

The older man inhaled deeply, then gave her a nod. "Understood. I will personally ensure these people understand and appreciate the cost of attempting such things. Now, may we calmly discuss this?"

He likely didn't know what had vexed her this time, but he did know full well she was oddly rational for a Cloud. Possibly, he was trying to bank on her strange non-typical Cloud behavior to get this situation smoothed over quickly.

Sonya snapped her fingers at her aide, and the Icelandic teen scrambled to put the contract file in her hands. "Fine. Calmly explain to me how it is my Lackey ended up accepting this contract in my name, when it is far outside not only my usual range but also a few grades higher than what I am currently qualified to do through this island."
It was his turn for the blood to drain out of his face, and he gave one dismissive glance at the man whose face she had ruined before obviously deciding to throw him to the wolves. "That will be a fascinating discussion. Elsewhere."

There was a stir through the on-looking thieves that hadn't decided to be somewhere else while a Cloud, however rumored to be even-tempered or not, rampaged through their Hall. They likely didn't want the show to end, not without seeing how it was going to end.

She had no pity for them or their desire to see how this played out. "Lead on, then."

Already, she had done a bit of a blow to the reputation of this service they were going to have to work hard to mitigate. If she didn't want it to backfire on her, as in make enemies with her kind-of boss, she had to let it be solved by that boss.

In the end, she might even be able to wring a few concessions out of him in return for not carrying through with her threat to warn off any and all Flame users she met. Not likely, but it was remotely possible.

(Monday the 29th of July, 1968. South Beach, Mafia Land.)

With that taken care of, and one man's life likely ruined for good anywhere there was a criminal who could visit Mafia Land, Sonya detailed to Bjørn exactly when to accept contracts for her.

It was still half his fault, the man with the now flat face couldn't have assigned her that contract without his help.

The only bright side was that she hadn't failed that contract, and she did get one concession out of the Thieves' Hall guild master.

Two contracts a year left no one with warm or fuzzy thoughts about her thief skills, but that last job? She got an upgrade to her already maxed-out business credit line and an array of more 'mid-risk' contracts opened up for her rather than mainly the 'minimal risk' ones she had been taking up to this point.

They would cost her in either more in time or targets than her usual and carried a greater risk for being arrested or killed, but it would at least be interesting.

With the added stipulation that she would be helping him select contracts for her until at least the New Year break, Sonya left Bjørn to only investigate how the Thieves' Hall worked and a reminder that details were important so he should probably get to know the Intel brokers as well.

"So, it was just stress… right?"

"Yes." The marginally healthier looking Tatiana informed her dryly, looking scores better than she had at the start of the year. "I'm actually putting on weight again, little sis. You don't have to look so pinched and worried when shooting me looks anymore."

"You were really unhealthy looking, Tats. I will not apologize about worrying for you."

"I'm not expecting you to. Frankly, I appreciated it." The nurse returned, licking melted ice cream off her fingers before continuing. "But the worst is over, mostly. I have another year or so of instruction, maybe however long of residency for the experience, then I'm a doctor."

"Hooray…" She muttered around her cone, nibbling on the soggy parts to get to the rest of her treat. The boardwalk of Mafia Land was sweltering hot, and it was melting everything it could with a vengeance. "Do you want me to stay with Doctor Kappel?"

"Since treating my own sister might get interesting in all the wrong ways, yeah. I wouldn't mind the occasional emergency you aim my way or maybe a consultation about whatever, but you probably should remain with him." Tatiana waved the offer off, relaxing back on the sun warmed bench they were watching the shoreline on. "We should get a tan. Since we're here and dressed for it."

They had gone swimming, just for something to do that day. The nurse didn't get much off-time, so this was her idea.

"Do you have vacation time?"

"Yes? Why?"

"The beaches in France, I kind of wanted to go back anyways. Some of them are nude beaches, others allow you to go topless. We could avoid tan lines there."

"Ooh, France it is."

"Um… ladies."

Sonya sighed, looking back over her shoulder at the slightly chagrined looking Chinese man clad in red. "Fong, did you need something?"

"Not need, no." He temporized, those red eyes flicking between the sisters until he decided to give his attention to her. "I was wondering if I could have a word with you."

Tatiana gave him a long look over, from the braid to his skin color and then down to his black canvas shoes, then turned to the thief with a deadpan expression and addressed her in Russian. "I hate your luck with hot men."

"You can have him, I think he's annoying." She glanced back at the martial artist. "Is it important, or can it wait?"

"You both realize I understand Russian, yes?"

"Yeah, and?"

The nurse hastily muffled her snickers, without a trace of guilt or sheepishness.

Fong's expression was an interesting one, torn between the chagrin from before and wry amusement. "I see. Sonya, can I have a word?"

"Again, is it important or can it wait?"

"Well…"

"Actually, will I think it is important or it could wait?"

He gifted her with an impressively flat look.

The thief shrugged it off. "I have no reason to be nice or helpful. Deal with it."
"Do you want her to have a reason to be?" Tatiana asked idly, tossing the empty and half-eaten cone into the trash can nearby. "Because if so, I might have a recommendation."

"Really?" Sonya asked of her sister flatly before Fong could say anything about the offer.

"If Mister eye-candy wants to hang around, I'm all for it. I get to ogle that ass, though."

There was an odd wheezing sound from the martial artist, who was eyeing the elder sister warily.

"You are selling me out for eye-candy." The thief stated blankly.

"Yep."

"This is the second time you have done this, Tats." She pointed out in exasperation. "First was Doctor crush, now Fong?"

"Doctor…? Oh, no. I don't have a crush on Doctor Kappel, he's not really much to look at. Like a gawky stickman. Might have a crush on his brain, though." Clarified the nurse thoughtfully, sticking a sticky finger into her mouth to clean it off then glancing backwards once most of the sugar was gone. "I just like Fong's muscles. As a matter of fact, I think that's what I'm going to call him. Hi, Muscles."

"Ah… hello?" He shifted away from her a bit more, putting himself right behind Sonya's back instead of standing a bit more between them.

The thief didn't appreciate the movement, but before she could snap at him to move further or just go away something ice cold dripped onto her bare thighs. "Shit."

Snickering, Tatiana accepted the remnants of her vanilla cone to toss as she tried to figure out what to do with the cream on her skin. "Lick it off."

"I am not that flexible… I think… I might be able to do that, actually." It would be incredibly uncomfortable, as well as a bit awkward, but maybe possible.

"I meant scoop it up with your fingers then lick it off, twit." The nurse actually laughed when the thief gifted her with a disgusted look. "Or you could go wash it off in the sea. Just trying to be helpful, sis."

"Yeah, some help you are."

Fong finally got out from behind her, standing now to Sonya's other side and looking a bit long-suffering. "Miss… ah…?"

"Primakova. Tatiana Primakova. Sonya's older sister. I already know who you are, and the fact you chased my little sister around Shanghai."

"I apologized for that." Defended the martial artist, as if that meant anything but the thief had the upper hand in that situation, slanting a gaze to the younger blonde then getting distracted by the mess she was dealing with before snapping his naturally wine-red eyes back to the redhead. "I… you have a suggestion?"

"Sonya needs some help with her self-control." The nurse declared wickedly, smirking when Sonya glanced at her in confusion for the tone as Fong blushed.

Was Tatiana flirting with him for a reason, or just to make him more uncomfortable?
Additionally, how the hell was that flirty?

The tone was a flirt one she had heard her sister use before, but the words did not make much sense as a flirt. Maybe she was just too used to hearing a male flirt and wasn't used to a female doing it?

"I need a new sparring partner." Clarified the Storm-Cloud slowly, solidly sure she missed something about this when that seemed to help him regain some control over himself. "But, Tats, Fong is a martial artist. I would probably break him too."

Her elder sister gave her a level look.

"I am not so fragile to break in a friendly spar."

Sonya gave him a dry look of her own as she managed to scoop up the greatest amount of the white mess on her thighs off. "I can bend and shatter steel with my bare hands."

"Well, you are a Cloud. I still will not break so easily." Fong returned stubbornly, glancing down at those hands and then yanking his gaze back up just as quickly. "You cannot break what you cannot hit."

"Mmm… we will see."

Tatiana snickered when he jerked his gaze away from her as she started sucking the melted ice cream from her fingers. "Ah… I'm going to hell. But oh, the price is fantastic."

She gave her a strange look for that comment, but she waved off explaining it to her.

"So…" The Chinese man stubbornly kept his eyes on the sky instead of actually look at either sister. "A spar in exchange for some information?"

"…sure. In a month." Sonya managed around her fingers.

"Don't talk with your mouth full." Tatiana quipped with a smirk.

"…why a month?"

She pulled her fingers from her mouth with a wet pop, glaring at her sister. "Because we are going to France, I believe you overheard why."

"I'm pretty sure you two could fit in a spar or several if he came with us. Maybe on the beach?"

"There are a lot of people on the beaches in France… maybe either really late or really early in the day…"

"That… will not be necessary. A month from now is fine." Fong hastened to say, still not looking at them. "I will see you then. Sonya, Tatiana."

"Aww… don't you want to help rub sun tan lotion on us, Fong?"

"I must abstain. My apologies." The Triad member gave them both a jerky little bow, then turned and walked away at a respectable clip.

She pursed her lips and pinned her foster sister with a flat look. "What did I miss?"

"He thought we were going to ask him to fuck you a couple times." Tatiana cheerfully informed her shamelessly. "Then that invitation to come to France with us? Pretty sure he was thinking you'd be either topless or naked for that spar on the beach."
"…pervert."
"Hey."

"Not you, him." The thief snapped irritably, rubbing her slightly wet fingers together absently in hopes they would dry faster. "Really? Who the hell spars either naked or nearly so?"

She snorted, a smirk twisting her lips up. "Oh god… Sonya, never change. I adore you this way."

"Now what?"

"Pretty sure that's called sex by another name, little sis."

"…oh." She scowled as she blearily recalled something like that from her last life, then sighed heavily. "I give up. So, did we accidentally proposition Fong a couple times or what?"

"Or what." The nurse confirmed brightly, a lingering smirk aimed in her direction. "We actually invited him along for what seemed to be a wild month of sex on the beach."

"…we did?"

"With the both of us, but mainly you."

Sonya gave her a sideways look. "Really? I'm not that dense, Tats. I'm pretty sure I would've caught that at least."

"Okay… maybe not really, but it sure seemed that way to him."

"…so, he really is a pervert. Huh."

She didn't quite understand why Tatiana burst out laughing at that comment.

She just really wondered if she really wanted to deal with a perverted sparring partner.

(Wednesday the 31st of July, 1968. Mafia Land.)

"Miss Sonya!"

"Shamal?" The thief questioned in bemusement, bending down to pick the brat up when he held his hands up in a silent demand. "What are you doing here?"

The dockyard of Mafia Land was an entirely unexpected place to meet the kid.

"Who's this?" Tatiana questioned in slightly clumsy Italian, putting the last piece of luggage they were taking to France with them down next to her feet. "Hi, kiddo."

Baby Mist blinked at her from the safety of Sonya's arms, then looked up to her with a silent question.

"Shamal, this is my sister Tatiana. Tats, this is Renato's little ward."

"Hi baby, I've heard so much about you. Nice to finally meet you." The nurse told the kid honestly, Frowning, Sonya actually turned to see if she couldn't spot the hitman himself. That was odd, and a bit out of character. "Renato!"

There was a sudden swath cut through the crowd, and the visibly peeved Italian himself stalked through the usual traffic nearly as well as the Storm-Cloud could when she walked around the island lately. "Shamal… what did I say about running off?"

"Not to? But it's Miss Sonya!" Baby Mist defended himself, pointing at her as if that was excuse enough. "She's safe, you said so yourself."

By the fact the man's eyes narrowed even more, Sonya was pretty sure that excuse wasn't going to fly.

"Kid, please." She tugged a hank of Shamal's dark brown hair to gain his attention, then gave him a level look. "You should've known better and just pointed me out instead of run off on your own. I might be safe, but this place isn't nearly so. Don't do it again."

It earned her a puppy pout, but she ignored it and turned to the hitman. "So, what brings you both here? I thought you weren't letting Shamal out of Italy?"

"Medical records." Renato admitted flatly. "Mostly vaccinations, but since I don't have anything he needs aside a reissued copy of his birth certificate? I figured going through Mafia Land for them instead of Nono would cost me less. Miss Primakova, would it be possible for you to recommend a doctor for him?"

"You're missing a lot of things for him, aren't you?"

"They burned the brat's house down and I picked him up after dealing with that, it was kind of unavoidable."

"You could probably use Sonya's physician. Tell Doctor Kappel the kid is what he is, and he'll make an exception." Tatiana chimed in before that conversation could go anywhere else. "He's trying to document any and all health risk Flame users are subjected to, so he'll take the kid on even if he's not a pediatrician."

She switched to English for her next question, out of respect to how much upset the topic had already caused the child in her arms. "Did you ever find out his last name? Or is he still using mine?"

"I found it. He promptly misspelled it with what little he recalled of your writing lessons trying to memorize it and now everyone thinks his last name was tridente and not Tringali. Trident is now his middle name, we're still using yours for his schooling." Sighing, the older Italian swept his fedora off and raked a hand through his spiky hair before pressing it back on firmly. "We will fix it later, when he's old enough to understand. Now… what is this about your physician's interest in Dying Will Flame users?"

"You are not allowed to harm or intimidate Doctor Kappel. We would like to keep him, thank you."

Renato attempted an innocent look.

It wasn't working any better than the last time he tried that on her. "Sonya did that intimidation thing already, breaking the poor Doctor's office walls with a kick."

Tatiana confided to the hitman in an overly loud voice, which made even Shamal look at the thief in surprise.

Scowling, Sonya stuck her nose in the air. "Reflexology tests are stupid, especially when you do it to a woman that has and can shatter concrete with a finger. I tried to tell him that."

"No, you didn't. You just refused to cooperate." The redhead countered wickedly, hand on her hip and flicking the other hand to dismiss that attempt to justify herself. "Don't be a difficult patient, kid. Sonya broke her foot doing that."

Shamal looked torn between maybe obeying the redhaired lady and copying his adored Miss Sonya.

"Listen to Tats, kid. She's a nurse."

"Going somewhere?" Renato asked, toeing then lightly kicking one of their suitcases.

"France, for topless and or nude sunbathing with a side order of swimming. I need the break." Tatiana informed him cheerfully, a smirk crawling up her face. "Hey, want to come with? The last guy we asked along to rub suntan lotion on us refused."

"...what?"

"I thought we invited him along for a month of sex?" The younger foster sister asked of the elder, a bit confused. "I mean, I know you also asked him to do that too... but he had refused to come with before that."

The nurse beamed at her. "Oh Sonya, I love you so much right now."

"...WHAT?"

"Stop shouting." Sonya snapped, irritated. "And what are you shouting 'what' for?"

Renato gaped at her, dropped his eyes to the very confused brat in her arms, looked back up at the irritated thief, and then shut his mouth.

Huffing at that unhelpful reaction, she looked down at the confused baby Mist herself. "We're leaving shortly kid, sorry. Behave for the doctor, though. And stop running off."

"Aww... do you have to, Miss Sonya?"

"I actually have something to do in France I've been meaning to get around to for a couple years now, yes." She confirmed bluntly, giving him a squeeze before setting him down. "I'll probably see you this winter, okay?"

"Ladies... I wouldn't happen to know this man, or could get his name... could I?"

"Nope!" Tatiana cheerfully denied, then gave her little sister a sideways look. "This isn't a heist for you, right? I was pretty sure this was just supposed to be a break."

"It is a break, but there's something I've been interested in that came from that country which I have never been able to find myself. So, I'm going to hire a private investigator while we spend the month on the beach to do all the running around instead of me."

"I like that plan." Bending to scoop up her luggage, the nurse shifted it to one hand in order to waggle her fingers at both Italians. "Gentlemen, if you will excuse us. Our ship leaves in only an hour."
Sonya pressed a kiss to Shamal's forehead herself before picking up her own suitcases. "Behave, brat. I will hear of it if you don't."

"Okay Miss Sonya."

"Sonya... are... is...?" Renato rubbed the back of his neck, looking slightly conflicted. "...have fun?"

"Thanks. Oh, before I forget." Dropping one of her cases, she dug the hitman's bullet out of her pocket. "I kept on forgetting to give this back to you."

He picked it up, then dug an exact copy out of his own pocket.

"Yeah, that should last a couple more days at least."

"...you can make indefinite copies?"

"Of course not. As long as I have a reminder of what they should be, they last a couple months. If I don't, a couple days will make them fade."

"...you sure I can't get the name of this man you invited along? I really only want to ask him a few questions."

"I do believe Tats said no, Renato." The thief reminded him bemusedly.

(Thursday the 1st of August, 1968. Antwerp, Kingdom of Belgium)

"Aww... leaving already?"

Viper gave a brisk nod, the rest of the stuff s/he had to his/her name packing itself in a use of Mist Flames Cherep nearly didn't believe.

Why were all the other Flame types so much more interesting than his?

At least he shared them with Sonya, which made him at least fond of his own Cloud Flames.

"This was only temporary, however interesting the diversion became." The users of those Mist Flames informed him blandly, scorning the one bright and cheerful outfit s/he had been given when s/he joined.

Cherep needed a better gender term for him/her. He couldn't really bring himself to call the Mist an 'it' even if only in his head. "I am sorry to see you go, you were pretty interesting yourself."

"Says the Cloud Flame stuntman wasting his immortality on show business?" The illusionist smirked over at him. "Mou, I can think of so many other ways to use that immunity to death if you would-"

"Nope. Pacifist. Besides, Sonya would hunt you down and commit heinous acts with your corpse if you tried anything with me and she found out. Which she would, the moment she checks in with the circus again."

"Hmm... well, even I would have to admit that is a respectable downside. She doesn't even need to disbelieve my Construction, she just tore through it." Admitted Viper sourly, Shouldering a pack of his/her things over his/her shoulder. "It was... unnerving."
"I'll convey your compliment to her." The stuntman promised in a deadpan tone.

"Do so, she does have interesting advice occasionally." The Mist informed him with a sharp nod, turning to the exit of the little tent Crina both lived and worked out of. "Mou… she was almost as interesting as you are."

"Yeah well, that's my little sister for you. A bit too interesting for her own good." Curious enough to kill a cat actually, as well as socially blind as a bat.

Not to mention entirely unapologetic about anything and everything.

"Will I at least see you around, Viper?"

"…anything is possible."
Chapter 26

(Friday the 2nd of August, 1968. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Renato waited for Doctor Kappel in a waiting room to get done with Shamal, fully aware he was scowling hard enough to disturb the nurses and other patients but not really caring too much.

Two hot, gorgeous Russian sisters asked him along to a month of near or fully nude beach time and possibly a very different sort of exercise one shouldn't do on a public beach… and he was stuck taking care of baby Mist brat instead. Shamal had no idea of the things he had to put up with in order to keep him safe and healthy.

Some days, he really hated his luck.

On the other hand, he knew one of those sisters since she was twelve. That can of worms was… wiggly.

Sonya should not have grown up to be that hot. It was not fair.

She was a thief, they were supposed to be nasty and backstabbing but mostly greedy creatures. Entirely willing to steal anything and everything not nailed down, just to make a bit more money.

It had only been the fact she had been a Cloud that made him interested in her at first, he really had expected her to go violent like all Clouds in the end and scorn the thief's life for a hitwoman's lot instead in a few mere years.

The worst she had stolen from him was a shirt… and it wasn't even off his back. More like out of his closet. All to keep his own damn ward safe and secured for him, so she had more than earned the right to that shirt she stole.

While he was entirely appreciative she wasn't much like her fellow thieves of Mafia Land, he also had no idea why she was sticking it out as a thief and not showing any interest or inclination to wander to something a bit more violent. The Russian Storm-Cloud could wreck some decent carnage if she wanted to, but oddly didn't seem too inclined at all.

One of these days he'd actually get around to trying to tempt her with something violent and possibly bloody. Maybe she just needed an excuse?

She didn't tend to be violent unless you touched her without permission or someone was specifically pissing her off, at least according to some brand-new rumors floating about.

Renato really did miss out on some of the best things when dealing with Shamal's needs.

Different hall or not, he would've paid to see that incident happen when Sonya bitch-slapped some no-named paper pusher hard enough to crack a wall on the far side of the room.

Now the hitman had to figure out if perving on the closest thing he had left to a childhood friend was something he could live with.

He had been what?

A handful of years younger than Sonya was now when they met?
...and what kind of useless excuse of a man turned that kind of invitation down?

He had to let that offer pass by. Even with his mixed feelings about one of those sisters, he probably would've taken them up on that offer had he been alone. Tatiana was beautiful redhead spitfire of a pin-up girl herself, if a little too bouncy and conniving for his taste with a genuine unholy glee in messing with a man's head.

Pale and a bit drawn looking lately, but she had selected for herself a very demanding job and had fully earned a month of rest and relaxation on France's beaches for having stuck it out. A decent credit to Sun Flame users in and of herself for that alone.

Aiding her in whatever she needed to destress was the least a gentleman could do, for her dedication to learning the healing arts if not because she was a lady in her own right. Since it was a joint offer ignoring one sister in favor of the other was just rude and not something a gentleman should do, but...

Sonya herself was... a near perfect cross between a leggy blonde and a dancer without a care to high-maintenance behavior that made her seem more real than just plastic. Entirely willing to scorn uncomfortable fashions for personal comfort but donning them if needed and possessing an endlessly amusing habit of weaponizing her jewelry.

Renato had also known her when she was a gawky pre-teen girl, mostly elbow and knees and very little else to her.

...and now he felt like a pervert again.

Damn it all, this should not be that hard of an issue. He appreciated beautiful women, they were certainly that and then some.

Active mafia women. Actually useful as well as pretty, and a side order of deadly when it was called for. One was a highly valuable contact he actually trusted, entirely willing to help him out if he needed a small favor or two or provide the womanly touch he didn't have when it came to his own damn ward. The other was a professional mafia nurse.

Why did Shamal have to be with him when they gave that invitation?

Seriously, who the hell did the sisters give that offer to before him?

There could not be that many candidates. Sonya was not sociable in the least, unless she already knew or someone she knew indicated they knew whoever she was dealing with. She was barely polite to Timoteo, and only because Renato actually respected the Don of Vongola.

Tatiana spent most of her time around battered and bleeding mafia men, with the occasional mafia wife and kids chipped in now and again.

If they had needed a man for anything, why hadn't he had been their first choice?

"Mister Sinclair, are you quite done glaring the walls into submission?"

He shot the entirely suspicious German doctor a nasty look, straightening up from his slouched sprawl into something a bit more attentive seeming. "For now."

Said doctor had some balls, he didn't even bat an eyelash over the surly Italian's behavior. "Your child."
"Ward."

"Whatever. Young Shamal is perfectly healthy, he just needs his vaccinations done then he will be set for public schooling. I'll have his records fabricated, birth certificate included, to be perfectly near-legal." Kappel sounded entirely disgusted with the very idea, or just scornful in general at the fact he would be doing so for a young child. The box in the man's hands was held out for the hitman. "They will be sent on to your current registered address when completed and hospital agents are able to insert Shamal's new records into the civilian system."

Renato accepted the box gingerly, curiously cracking it open carefully and eyeballing the vials of various liquids and the few needles provided suspiciously. "...aren't vaccinations done here?"

"Hospital policy is to allow the parents... or guardians, to do a child's vaccinations wherever they feel most comfortable." The doctor informed him flatly. "Cuts down on the damage panicky, overprotective parents cause when accusing the staff of trying to slip poisons or incurable viruses to their sprogs."

He gave the man a sceptical look from under the brim of his fedora.

"Of course it doesn't prevent it, we just won't have such parents smack dab in the middle of the hospital goring berserk. Now they try it at the reception desk, which has its own enforcers around to ensure no one does manage to harass the ones on duty."

Getting to his feet, the hitman nodded once to show he understood and tucked the box under one arm. "Is that all then?"

"My temporary nurse is getting him dressed now." Kappel agreed with a tiny sniff, using one long forefinger to press his half-moon spectacles higher up the bridge of his prominent nose. "I feel I should warn you not to use Sun Flames on him after administering your ward's vaccinations. At least until he's fully healthy again on his own."

"Ho?"

"Nurse Primakova found that Sun Flames have a slim chance to re-activate the almost dead viruses in any vaccination. Instead of merely enabling young Shamal's own immune system to recognize and fight off a severely weakened virus, you will chance actually infecting him with a fully viable one instead."

...well, he owed Tatiana a drink or something at the very least. "How?"

"Personally. Thankfully it was a booster shot and not a new vaccination."

A very damn good drink. "Understood."

The German gave him a long, level look. "And when was the last time you had a checkup of your own, Mister Sinclair?"

Never. "I, doctor, am a Sun Flame user. I do not require a medical check, ever."

There was another very long moment of silence, when the ballsy doctor gave him an entirely unimpressed stare over his spectacles. "For your young ward's sake, I dearly hope that is true and not just more of these 'rumors' that turn out to be not so true after all. Like how all Clouds are violent psychopaths or Lightnings having no sense of self-preservation."

Renato scowled at the man, irked that nothing he did intimidated the spindly looking physician. If he went any further than just glares or scowls, Sonya might just throw a damn fit at him. She had specifically told him not to scare or break her doctor.

"I treat the only Cloud that calls this island home. When you watch a woman kick a wall in with a bare foot and regard the broken bones she suffered as irritating as a papercut, then finish giving her a physical? Glares are not that intimidating anymore."

The doctor might have a point with that, but it didn't mean the hitman was happy with it.

"Mister Renato! Can we go see Miss Sonya now?"

"She already left, brat. Yesterday." He did not need a reminder of what kind of offer he had to let pass him in favor of taking care of said brat.

…and whoever it was that the sisters had offered it to first.

Shamal looked entirely unconcerned by that fact as he scurried over to the two men, a little ruffled but now with the medical records to allow public schooling. "Miss Sonya and her sister went by boat, didn't they? You said flying was faster. So, we can go fly and then see Miss Sonya."

…right, baby Mist had wanted to fly out here and pouted when the hitman decided to take it safer with the brat with him. This way, he would get both a chance to fly and get himself pampered by a Russian Storm-Cloud… likely her sister too. While the women were half or fully naked and on a beach.

Conniving little shit. He wasn't even old enough to fully appreciate that view yet.

Renato had yet to figure out if he wanted to see Sonya in any other way than the thief who sometimes spoiled his damn ward to hell and back and allowed him a few precious liberties with herself.

God damn it.

As a young woman who stole things and could pop weaponry out of the strangest places, who let Shamal use her as a comfort object with minimal flinching and cleaned up really nicely with mile-long legs…

….mother of fuck.

The hitman gave up, slamming a hand down on the top of his fedora to push his hat over his eyes as he took a deep breath. Then he tried not to think about it anymore. "We are going back to Italy, Shamal. The girls are on vacation and aren't expecting us."

"I happen to know which hotel they intend to stay at."

"Not. Helping. Doctor."

"I wasn't aware I was supposed to." Kappel informed him bluntly. "Frankly, I'd prefer it if you gave those vaccines to Nurse Primakova or even another nurse entirely to administer. I do hate the policy that forces me to give over such things to people that barely have any idea how to use them correctly."

He shot the man a seething look under the brim of his hat, already irritated and rapidly approaching ticked off. "…give me the damn address."
He'd figure it out later. When irritating doctors or tetchy brats weren't around to interrupt or confuse his thought process.

(Saturday the 3rd of August, 1968. A hotel, Marseille, French Republic.)

"So, I have a question."

"Hmm?"

"Why do you occasionally break your own bones sometimes, but not others?" Tatiana questioned idly, waving a forkful of pasta around in a little circle as she attempted to find a way to phrase her inquiry better. "Like with Doctor Kappel's wall, you broke your foot. Then again that one heist for Cartier, you broke your hand getting us out of there. But… only then? If you think about it, the force you exert should end up doing you a lot of internal damage when it impacts something and that force ricochet off back into you… but I've seen you shatter things without a mark on you afterwards when you really should've at least cracked a knuckle if this 'I can hurt myself' thing is true."

They had swept their hotel suite for bugs just after checking in, then ordered room service for dinner instead of wander outside Marseille proper to see if they could find a decent restaurant of if they wanted to just go with the kabab vendors near the beachside of the city.

Sonya was perched crossed-legged on her bed, since her sister had claimed her desk to eat on.

Now the thief put a piece of her grilled chicken breast into her mouth to chew while she thought.

"I think you expect to hurt yourself, so you do." The Sun user continued, pointing her now cleaned fork tines at her foster sister. "But if you don't think about it, you don't hurt yourself."

It made some sense, in a way. What was Dying Will Flame use other than an extreme exercise of one's will over reality?

If she wasn't willing herself to be uninjured after some of her riskier acts, then was that all that really stood between her and more broken or cracked bones?

"That needs experimentation… in a month."

"In a month." Agreed Tatiana brightly, deciding she was done with her seafood and white wine sauce covered pasta and abandoning it to bounce onto the thief's temporary bed gleefully.

Sonya picked up her plate almost too late to save the rest of her dinner, fork stuck in her mouth, so she would have the hands to do said saving of good food.

Her older sister was entirely unapologetic in the face of her glare. "Don't be such a stick in the mud, Sonya. We're in France, about to spend a whole month doing nothing more taxing than putting on suntan lotion or eating. Make a mess, sleep in for half a day, let loose woman."

"Don't you have your own bed to jump on?" She inquired blandly after taking her eating utensil from her mouth, setting her food down again. "Why must you mess up mine?"

"Because I want to."

"I fail to see why I should behave in any manner than the one I want to, even if I am on vacation."
Insisted the thief, sticking her own fork on the last of her chicken to give more of her attention to her sister. "I am going to raid bookstores for something to read on the beach, hire a private investigator tomorrow, and generally be lazy in not stealing or thinking about how to steal something for a month. Cherep will be so proud of us."

Snorting, the nurse stretched out on her bed and hooked her hands behind her head. "Yay for our dorky foster brother. What are you looking for here, anyways?"

"An Arcobaleno. Well... a dead one."

"A what?"

...that's really what worried Sonya. No one knew of them, or at least talked about them, anymore. "An Arcobaleno. A member of I Prescelti Sette about three hundred years ago."

"...again, a what?"

Sighing and giving up on her dinner the younger sister toed her elder to shift over, so she could lay down too. "One of the strongest seven of an era, strongest Flame user of each generation. They were... they used to exist. I have mentions of them in one of my books. But no one seems to know who or what they were anymore. I've been through France twice now, and even knowing the full name of this one Arcobaleno and that this was his country of origin...? I have never found mention of him."

Tatiana aimed a frown at her. "Strongest Flame user, huh? If he was so strong, why isn't this guy remembered for it? I mean, we all have heard of Primo of Vongola and his Guardians. They're like... the mafia's heroes of old, or what every Flame user wanted to be like themselves. Italy still churns out grunts in certain molds in hopes to recapture that generation."

She crossed her arms and set them and her chin on her sister's abs, frowning thoughtfully out the window with a damn good view of the darkened beachfront they would be frequenting soon. "I know, which worries me. I understand we're mafia, and Omertà would've covered just about anything about his life... but even birth records? No family survived him? He predates Mafia Land, actually I think the Arcobalenos stopped assembling shortly before the island's first concept came into existence, so I understand why I hear nothing there. But if France once had the strongest Storm Flame user of any generation, why isn't he held up like the original Vongola Sky and Guardians? What about the other six Arcobalenos of his generation? The ones before him? After?"

"...if they don't exist anymore, why wonder?"

...because they would exist again in only a few short years, and the strongest Cloud of their generation was that dorky foster brother of theirs. To defy death itself... indefinitely?

Cherep might not be able to do much else with his Cloud Flames, but he was also highly unwilling to incase it might hurt someone. He'd copy her strength, but only if he could apply it to practical things like frozen tent poles, a stubborn screw or bolt, or the lid of a jar of whatever preserves he was trying to eat. He'd make Cloud Flame copies of needed extra machine parts or tools, but those normally only lasted a few minutes for the tools to a few days until he could replace them for the parts.

Even so, he was still stronger than Sonya was.

She couldn't, or likely wouldn't be able to, take the Cloud Pacifier from him even if she could in the first place. Cherep, Skull, had been the weakest of the next Arcobalenos... and if she couldn't even touch on how strong he was...
Next plan, to find out as much information as she could to arm him with enough to make an informed decision about it.

Even if he was more Skull de Mort and less Cherep Bazanov, the stuntman was still a pacifist. Unwilling to harm another, even if in the name of his own survival.

He'd live through just about anything, anyways. Why hurt someone unnecessarily?

Sonya could understand that, if not like it very much, so she never had tried to press him into learning more than just ways how to escape a nasty situation if needed.

That pacifistic nature probably meant he would likely go along with the 'corner of the universe anchoring' the Pacifiers were supposed to be. Even if it killed him. Because he was nice like that, and if the consequences were really that dire he'd do his goody-two-shoes thing.

She might know it wouldn't, because Vongola Decimo would end the curse chain of Pacifier Bearers for good barring two or three Skies between now and then, but she still didn't want her brother to even contemplate needing to die.

Willpower over reality enabled him to live in spite of everything, and if she had it her way that would never be a wonder he'd have.

"No." Tatiana poked her little sister's forehead repeatedly, harshly. "No worrying. Next month you can worry. Hire the damn investigators if it's that important to you but put it aside. We're on vacation. My personal mission is to get you laid and get a line-free tan. Worry later."

"...really? Your personal mission for the month is that?"

"Objections?"

She seriously thought about the suggestion, and anything that might be relevant. "Actually? I'm not really sure what I'm attracted to."

"You're sexually active, we know that. That cute little childhood crush on our foster father proved it." Teased the nurse wickedly, snickering as her finger was finally batted away from the thief's face. "So, we just need to figure out what turns your motor on."

"I get veto rights." She insisted firmly. "No matter what."

"Well of course. I want you to be both comfortable and screwed silly for once. I think it will do wonders for you." Assured the older Russian cheerfully. "We'll find you something, don't worry."

…should she be scared of that promise?

(Wednesday the 7th of August, 1968. A hotel, Marseille, French Republic.)

Tatiana had a horrible taste in men.

Sonya was now fully dreading of what else the redhead would try dumping off on her. The man from last night had been a little too eager to see what a Russian girl was like in bed, and way too crass and upfront about it.

Maybe she was just too picky?
The thief's already hesitant motions preparing for a night out slowed even more as she considered it.

Their first day in France, while the blonde went to find and hire a semi-respectable private investigator who was only slightly curious why she wanted to find a dead man, her foster sister made a few arrangements she likely knew her little sister would've flatly refused had she known.

Not even as Rachel had she ever gotten a pedicure or a manicure, and while it wasn't bad… the touching made the Storm-Cloud uncomfortable all over the place.

The resulting nail color was pretty, she supposed. Easily chipped and cracked, so not something she'd do again.

On her minimally scarred up, slightly crooked fingers from once shattering her right hand.

Pretty, useless, and why did people shell out money for something they could do at home themselves?

After that afternoon on a beach they had planned on, the Sun had surprised her sister with the suggestion of a night out.

Sonya, at least willing to try something once if her siblings wanted to, went along innocently enough like sheep to the slaughter.

Nightclubs she could deal with, she preferred bars but she could deal. Dancing, as a casual social activity?

The thief preferred things with choreographed steps. Preferably. She had a sense of rhythm, but it didn't mesh with unstructured dancing. Tatiana pulling her out onto a club's dancefloor merely made her uncomfortable and awkward.

She couldn't dance like that.

Ironic, given she was trained in ballet.

However, she had promised her sister a week trial of the 'night-scene'. Three days into it, she was dearly regretting promising her foster sister that.

The men that the older Russian kept finding were alright. They were handsome men, for sure, but… Sonya didn't particularly care for them. Not enough to try and put aside her dislike for being touched to see if there was any chemistry or attraction on her end, and a few of them…?

Tatiana went for eye-candy first, manners second. A few of those men were outright sleazy but could hide it for all of five or ten minutes.

The phone ringing jostled the thief out of her sour musings on her sister's deplorable taste in men, and she went to answer it curiously.

It had been less than two days. Her PI couldn't have gotten results this fast and no one else should have a number to reach either sister.

"Bonjour?"

"Miss Sonya!"

"…Shamal? How did you… wait, let me guess. Renato gave you this number?"
"...erm... no?" Sheepish sounding Mist brat answered, then hastened to tack on what he thought was an acceptable answer. "He got an address from the doctor person, when we were at Mafia Land, and put it in his wallet. He wasn't going to call you though, which was stupid. Why get it and not do anything with it? So, I got it out of his wallet when he left it on the table and now I'm calling you!"

"I... see. Shamal, did you happen to talk to a nice operator lady before me?"

"Um... two nice ladies."

The operator and likely the person on duty at the front desk. Shamal likely didn't know what name they were registered under, even if it was her legal one, so he likely described them in order to get this extension.

Hopefully Nono wouldn't mind a long-distance call from Italy to France being made.

With a wry little laugh, Sonya pinched the bridge of her nose. "Alright brat, what did you want to say to me?"

"I'm sick!" Shamal informed her way too cheerfully for the subject matter. "I got shots, today. Mister Renato said it would make me sick, so now I'm sick."

Shots that would make one sick would be vaccinations. Poor kid, he probably wasn't feeling it yet. "Is that why Renato left you alone in a room with both a phone and his wallet?"

"...no? He's been really... mean, lately. And forgetful. And shooting a lot. And... very... glare-y."

She had no clue what that was supposed to mean. Renato was a bit of an asshole, glared a lot when he was irritated, but forgetful?

Was there something serious distracting him?

"Mean... and shooting a lot. Indoors?"

"No, there's a fiery-ing range outside. He goes there a lot. Which is where he went just now."

"A firing range, brat. And if he's already irritated, it's not going to help that you took something out of his wallet."

"I put it back!"

Yes, because that made it perfectly alright. If Sonya returned the Pabst Theater's chandelier surely she'd be forgiven for stealing it too, right?

There was another voice, one too far away from the phone for it to pick up with any audibility, and suddenly Shamal wasn't the one she was speaking to anymore.

"May I ask who this is?"

"Master Tyr, nice to hear you too." Baby Mist brat got busted. "Shamal made a long-distance call, unfortunately. He might have placed it collect, and if so I'll pay for it, but if he didn't then I'm sure Renato wouldn't mind picking up the tab."

"Miss Sonya, surprising."

"Renato apparently somehow has the address for my hotel. If said hitman would stop leaving his wallet in strange places, the brat wouldn't be able to fumble his way to me."

"…I'll be sure to inform him so."

She wished she could hear what Shamal would try to keep out of trouble for this stunt, but she had probably tied up the Iron Fort's lines too long as it was. "Can I say goodnight to the brat?"

"Of course. Good evening, Miss Sonya."

"Goodbye, Master Tyr."

A moment's pause, and baby Mist brat was babbling quickly in her ear.

"Kid, slow down."

"…sorry? I didn't mean to get in trouble, Miss Sonya."

"Mean to or not, you still probably should've asked before placing a call like this. Or not have gotten caught in the first place. I'll talk to you later, Shamal, but I really do need to go."

"Aww… but-"

"Goodnight, brat."

"…night, Miss Sonya." Sulky Mist brat echoed back to her, probably what was a nearly audible pout aimed down the phone line at her.

Sonya hung up, rolling her eyes at ridiculous Mists.

A vastly amused Tatiana was standing behind her. "So… now that the Italian side-feature is over with, who’s Tyr?"

"Tyr the Sword Emperor, an assassin of Vongola's." She answered absently, wondering how the hell she was going to dodge out of another night of matchmaking attempts. "Why?"

There was a slow nod. "I've heard of him… he's hot too, isn't he?"

Blindsided, the thief blankly blinked at her sister a few times. "…I suppose? If you're into older men. He's… distinguished looking?"

There was yet another pout aimed at her, but Tatiana's expression didn't have a patch on Shamal's kicked puppy looks or Cherep's offended cat-ness. "What is with you and hot guys? Hot, older guys?"

"…I'm sorry?" The sheer exasperation in the expression aimed her way made the thief feel a bit sheepish for whatever it was she had done wrong now.

"Sonya, you're not comfortable with going clubbing."

"Well, no." Not even remotely.

Tatiana sighed heavily, throwing her hands up in the air. "Alright, I give up. We won't have to go out for the rest of the week."

Thank GOD.
"Next week, though, we're going to try something else."

…damn it to hell. "Tats, I don't think I'm cut out for something as quick as a one-night stand. I don't do casual, at all."

"So, what? Are you waiting for 'Mister Right'?"

Snorting at that ridiculous thought, the thief shook her head. "No, that would be stupid. Just… I need something more than just 'he's cute' or... whatever."

Rachel had died without ever meeting her 'Mister Right', and Sonya wasn't holding her breath for it either. She wasn't a good person and in this life?

With mostly civilians around to pick from, that would mean she'd have to hide most if not all of her life from them to do anything within the month.

What would be the point of trying to establish a relationship if it had no longevity?

That would be a lot of effort for very little reward.

Tatiana sighed gustily, looking vaguely irritated. "Of course, you would. You barely let me or Cherep touch you as it is. It's mostly you touching us if it happens at all. Well… I'm not giving up. I'm going to get you laid, one way or another."

…that kind of sounded like a threat. She wasn't sure if she should be worried or not. More importantly… "Can I get out of this dress now?"

"Yes, fine. Ruin my hard work in making you sexy." Complained the redhead. "I suppose you also want to stay in and read a book or something."

"Yes. Actually." The thief informed her flatly, already unzipping the almost too tight black dress in order to wiggle out of it.

"…do you have no body shyness at all?" Tatiana questioned curiously, taking off her own jewelry since they wouldn't be going out tonight. "This is the second time you've undressed yourself in front of someone without even hesitating."

"You're my sister, you've seen me naked before. Like this afternoon before. Doctor Kappel has likely seen better, too."

"Not the point, little sis." She replied, following her into their hotel suite's bedroom. "Would you undress in front of… say, Cherep?"

"Sure? I mean, he's our brother. Pretty sure he wouldn't look, and if he did I'd expect him to feel awkward about it, but if I had to I would."

"What about your two hotties?"

"…my two what now?"

"Tall, dark, and snarky for one. And Muscles makes two." The redhead explained, smirking slyly over at her sister as she dug out something comfortable to wear for the night. "…and isn't that a man's shirt?"

Sonya glanced down, at Renato's old button up silk shirt, then pulled it on. "Yes."
Tatiana's eyebrows flew upward. "...and yet, somehow, you're still a virgin. Anyways. Yes to both questions, or just the one?"

"To both. I'm pretty sure Renato's seen better too, and there's no way I would be their first naked woman. Not entirely certain why I would want to, and it would have to be a damn good reason to get me to undress in front of Fong, but again if I had to I would." The thief shrugged and snagged her latest book. "Don't really see why I would ever want to, though."

"It should not be this hard to get someone like you laid." Declared her older sister irritably, hands on her hips and almost glaring as the thief happily curled up in bed. "Enjoy your reprieve, little sis. Next week though...?"

"I await with dread."

"Ha, ha, very funny."

(Thursday the 16th of August, 1968. Sartre Detective Agency, Marseille, French Republic.)

"De Mort? Any relation to-?"

"Skull de Mort? Yes." Sonya interrupted her PI shortly, wondering if using her brother's stage name for civilian things had been really as much of a good idea as it seemed at the time. She took a seat across his cluttered desk, carefully because it looked a bit grimy to begin with. "You said you had something?"

The man's office/study room was a bit messy, but as it had been neat when she hired him she supposed it was just a sign of how busy he was being on her behalf. A few phone books, a few notepads of scribbled upon paper, and a whole lot of coffee mug stains littered the cramped space.

A flick of something sheepish crossed the detective's face, and he dug out a manila folder from his desk drawer. "Yes, although I have no idea why this man was ever mentioned in your books. Pierre-Antoine Carpentier was born three hundred and twelve years ago in Bordeaux, to Marie and Joseph Carpentier. Was a mason by trade, journeyman level, never attained a mastery. Until about sixteen-eighty-one, when any reports or mentions of him vanish."

A Storm mason?

That was... interesting.

Dockyards and ports were havens for criminals, though that much she probably should've guessed on her own. "One of my books mentions him as a friend of my own country's Regnant Sophia Alekseyevna, in sixteen-eighty-five."

The man could only shrug. "Then he wasn't here for those years, or if he was I have yet to find anything about it. I can tell you he didn't remain in Bordeaux for those years."

Well, the vacation was only just barely half over with. Sonya was happy enough she had a beginning point at least, and she knew where her next heist would take place if at all possible. "I will continue to pay you to check into it, at least for another two weeks. Even if you find nothing else, I am well satisfied with what you've found for me already."

It wasn't likely there was more to find on the civilian side, but it was possible there might be "Looking for anything in particular? So I know what to focus on?"

Valid questions, she supposed. Sonya wouldn't be telling him anything really interesting, but…

"Foreign friends of his, preferably those he met or was noted for dealing with after this disappearing point. Carpentier was part of a highly secretive group of individuals I am interested in, but I only have his name to work from."

"I have to admit this is probably the strangest assignment I've ever taken, Mrs. de Mort." Rémy Sartre, the name of her private detective she probably should remember, admitted as he marked down her interests for later review. "Locating a long-dead man? Wouldn't this be more of a historian's field?"

"I could go hire one of those, if you prefer?"

Sartre gave a wry little chuckle. "Please no, I rather like the easy casework you want to pay for. Much easier than most of my usual."

"I'm on vacation, you can do the footwork for me while I am." Sonya admitted blandly with a shrug.

"Happy to do so."

---

(Tuesday the 20th of August, 1968. Marseille, French Republic.)

Sonya tiredly glanced up at the next visitor to her little café table, getting rapidly fed up with Tatiana's drive to find her a man, and was pleasantly surprised.

"I don't know if you knew about this or not but thank you for being male this time."

A remarkably manly appearing Viper looked highly amused as he slipped into the seat across from her, using French just as fluidly as she could. "Mou... you're welcome, I suppose. I didn't expect to see you around these parts."

"We're on vacation, don't worry about it." The thief sighed, flipping a page in her book. "Me and Tats, our elder foster sister."

"The redhead." The Mist asked, or more like commented, with a tilt of his head to where the woman in question was.

"Mmm."

No wonder Viper didn't have to scare or unnerve yet another guy in order to do whatever this was supposed to be, Tatiana had gotten distracted from trying to set her little sister up on a semi-decent date by the latest arrivals to the café.

She looked entirely too happy to flirt with the newest visitor to the little coffee shop, and he looked perfectly willing to flirt back.

Sonya wished her the joy of it, but she would just like a few minutes of uninterrupted reading time.

"I think I am going to continue to associate with your brother." Viper informed her bluntly, the liquid in his teacup making lazy circles without any obvious reason for it. "It's rare enough I find someone that isn't bothered by me switching between genders at will, and one that amuses me is even rarer."

She gave him a blank look.

"No objection?"

"You probably know full well he's a pacifist by now. With him you'll never have a 'monster' in your pocket to intimidate or cow others with."

"I am aware, thank you." Was the short reply, and the Mist inspected her for a long moment. "Is that it? No threats, warnings, attempts to intimidate?"

"He's his own person. If he wants you as a friend, then so be it." Sonya remarked idly, waving the semi-accusation off. "The only warning I am ever giving you was already given, there is no point to go back over old ground again."

It was actually good news for her, that Cherep might be getting another criminal as a friend. If he really had a serious problem with criminal types like or worse than her that he had been biting his tongue about for whatever reason, then he wouldn't be amenable to Viper's friendship.

Not a worry she had held for years, but reassurance was always nice.

Viper snorted, harsher than the thief could make the same sound as even with her slightly husky voice. "I think I like those of your type, so straightforward and unfussy. You and your brother are spoiling me for normal social conventions, mou."

"And to think, everything you've probably read or heard about us warned you to stay very far away."

"Very true. I will admit to a moment of anxiety when I realized you both were being honest about what you were."

It was the thief's turn to snort. "Your brain broke."

"It was surprising." The Mist defended himself pointedly, and with a touch of irritation. "I had never before met any of your type, and those old warnings are very specific about what would happen between those like you and those like me."

"I suppose that's reasonable." Sonya was forced to admit after a moment. "I feel I should warn you both my brother and I are unusual for our type. He's even rarer than I am, and I am enough of another to be less… violent, than the norm."

"Obviously." Viper intoned dryly with a wickedly sharp looking smirk. "I understood that not five seconds after you were finished 'bothering' with me."

Waving that off, because for one it was true and another she didn't really care if it had offended him or not, the thief silently turned back to her book.

With Viper in the seat across from her, Tatiana would likely assume either she had a really girly taste in men or finally met someone she didn't mind being near her. Either way, the nurse would leave her alone for however long the Mist decided to hang about.

"...nothing to say?"
"I fail to understand why people must insist on making conversation with statements that have no real answer or reply for them. So, no."

"Mou… having a full conversation with you must be annoying."

"Thankfully, you're not trying to be my friend. Just my brother's. Lucky you, hmm?"

Viper gave a prissy little sniff, raising his cooling tea to his touch too full looking lips. "Lucky me, indeed."

Sonya probably would never come to like him much, but as long as Cherep was happy with it she'd at least try for being non-hostile to the Mist user. If he could be useful, she might even go so far as to be mildly friendly.

Viper seemed to have as little interest in her in return, so it balanced out.

(Friday the 23rd of August, 1968. A hotel, Marseille, French Republic.)

"This should not be this hard."

"Tats… maybe I'm just happier this way?"

Tatiana glared over at her, visibly disgruntled. "But you never look very happy, little sis. I want to see you blissed out, or sappy sighing I can tease you over, or just even just willing to smile more often than… that."

"That' what?" Sonya asked in confusion, because all the redhead was waving at was her entire upper body.

"Your blank face. Or I suppose it could be called 'I can't care less' face. The expression you normally have on when doing whatever."

"Because I don't like people?" The thief suggested honestly. "Most of them are… eh."

"You have to go through some coal to find a diamond, Sonya."

"While that's nice and all, I'm seventeen Tats. I have time to look, in a broader pool than just whoever is close by at any one time." As long as she didn't die shortly after she turned twenty again.

She didn't intend to die anytime soon, but that hadn't really mattered much in that first ending.

Flouncing onto her bed, Tatiana took Sonya down with her into a pile of limbs and hair. "Le sigh, fine. Be the old spinster in a young body. If you get a whole houseful of cats, though, I'm going to bribe one of your hotties to screw you a couple times."

"I don't really like cats much. Maybe a dog." The thief suggested idly, picking strands of red hair out of her mouth and trying to shift away.

Cherep had been adorkable and all as a kid, but Shamal's puppy looks still beat him out by a bit.

The nurse wasn't letting go, however. "That's not reassuring, Sonya. I want you to be happy."
"I am happy. I get to spend time with you. The manhunt thing is irritating, but it's still time with you."

"...that's sappy. And awesome." Tatiana commented slowly, squeezing her squirming sister.

"You know, the more you try to foist a man off on me the less time we have together."

"It's amazing you think that way, but not getting you off this hook." She informed her cheerfully with another squeeze. "Now, what do you like to see in a man? Not just for kinky fun, I mean in someone you wouldn't mind maybe interacting with."

"...not a wimp." She decided on solidly, trying to make herself comfortable now that her sister wasn't in the mood to let her go without a fight. She could maybe put up with it for a little while. "Not someone who would be scared of me either, once they know about the Cloud thing or that I can crush bones with either hand. I've had more than enough of that as it is."

"Tough one..."

"Yeah... I know. Someone I can talk to, not just because of Omertà but if I want advice or to share something I don't need to think of different ways to sanitize my life in order to do so."

"...that nearly completely takes any and all civilians out of the question, you realize. Maybe a few rare ones on the edge, but..." Tatiana sighed gustily into Sonya's hair, pressing her face into the back of the thief's neck. "Yeah, okay. I can see that one too. Anything else?"

"Not really, no. I don't care much in the first place, Tats. And making myself get over it in order to actually bother caring takes too much effort for short flings with no-named men I'll never see again."

"Why do you have to be so logical about this? It's lust, it's not supposed to be logical."

"That's nice." She suddenly slipped out of her hold, ignoring her sister's yelp of surprise and bolted for her own room. "Not the point, though!"

She got halfway across their suite before the nurse recovered enough to give chase, and she did managed to close and lock her door before her elder sister crashed into her.

Sonya forgot her bathroom was connected to both her bedroom and the main living room though, and the redhead darted through before she could remember that. "Got ya!"

The thief huffed a wry laugh as they hit the floor, which wasn't nearly as comfortable as Tatiana's bed. "Ow... really?"

"But I love you, Sonya. I want to show that love, isn't it wonderful?"

"You know, Cherep tried nearly the same line a few months before this. Want to know what I told him?"

"I think I can guess." She admitted with a laugh, even so not letting her go. "But Cherep's a dork and you love me best, right?"

"...well, Cherep's not the one holding me hostage on my own bedroom floor."

"I see how it is. Fine then, we'll have to see if you're ticklish."

Sonya blinked up at her sister. "I actually don't know. I flinch too much from someone else touching me as it is to find out."
"...well, this just got depressing in a fast hurry."

"But it was fun, right? Why would we need a man for this kind of fun?"

Tatiana pursed her lips to try and hide a smile. "You really are adorably sappy sometimes, Sonya. Fine, we don't need a man for you. We're still finding out if you're ticklish or not."

"Um..."

"Not a good response. Let's start with the feet, shall we?"

"If I kick you, it's your own damn fault."

"...damn it."

(Saturday the 31st of August, 1968. A Mafia Land Ferry.)

Rémy Sartre, her PI, couldn't find much else as interesting or as helpful as what he had managed halfway through the month Sonya and Tatiana were spending in France.

Frankly, the thief didn't really care too much about the lack of things he was able to supply her with beyond the basics.

Birthplace and his parents were more than enough to start with. She even had Pierre-Antoine Carpentier's civilian occupation, his master in masonry, and some of the projects he had worked on officially. It was twice the amount she had figured he'd be able to give her.

She made a note about the detective to give to Björn, if they needed anything out of France a civilian could help with in the future.

Sartre did good work for so little available information. Too bad he was a former law enforcement officer.

"I owe you an apology, by the way."

Sonya blinked, and jerked her head up from the folder of scant few details Sartre had given over when she paid him. "What?"

Tatiana looked highly amused, and a touch regretful. "I... uh, forgot."

"Forgot what?"

"That you didn't share much of your preferred leisure activities with me. Like back when we were kids, Sonya. You didn't really like playing with me, because I always wanted to play dress up or tea party and you would've rather read quietly for a couple hours." The nurse admitted sheepishly, sinking onto the bench next to her on the ferry taking them back to Mafia Land. "It's been a couple years, and I had forgotten to remember you are a lot more self-contained than I am."

"It's fine, Tats. It was interesting, if slightly irritating occasionally. I got a few things done I've been meaning to for years, you got a healthy amount of weight finally, and we got our line-less tan, right? Goal reached."

Her elder sister smirked wryly. "And got to spend uninterrupted time together."
"…mostly." She snickered as the other woman playfully knocked their shoulders together, jostling what she was trying to read over. "Doing things that were weird, and strange, and I have no idea why you would pay someone to do your nails… still. Why do people do that?"

"To be fussed over, or pampered. You get your haircut at a salon, don't you? Same principle."

Running a hand through her now shoulder-length hair, the thief snorted softly. "That's different. A hair cut will last months, nails only last a night or two."

Slouching into her and ignoring the pinch to her side in retaliation, the nurse huffed back. "Then for the pampering aspect."

"Why pay someone else when I can do it better?"

"…really?"

Sonya took her sister's hand into her own, inspecting her nails. "Yeah. I'd charge you less, too."

Tatiana's flat look was confusing. "…if you do pedicures as well, I will declare you the best little sister ever."

The thief looked down at their feet. "…we wear boots. Mostly. Why…?"

"Don't worry about it. Well?"

"…I can learn, if it means that much to you."

Throwing her arms around her, the nurse smashed their cheeks together. "Bestest little sister ever. I'm so sorry I ever used your social incompetence for a laugh. Or three… or seven."

"…wait, you did what?"

"Yeah… about that offer I told you we gave to Fong, and you brought up in front of Renato…? Uh… I should probably tell you something about that…"

(Monday the 2nd of September, 1968. Mafia Land.)

"Do I need to formally invite you to Vongola's Christmas Ball this year, or what?"

Sonya blinked up at Renato in bemusement, lowering the history text she had been reading in order to give him more of her attention. "Do you think Nono Vongola would mind if I did not attend the party but was there anyways?"

The flat look the hitman aimed in her direction told her nothing about whatever he was thinking. "…yes. Yes, he would mind. Well?"

"…I suppose I will go with you this year too." At least until she could get that permission to skip the festivities somehow. If she could.

All Christmases ever, bratty Mist had demanded. Not likely going to happen, because all of them ever would be a lot of years to cover and physically impossible aside.

He'd probably forget about it in a few years, and she could maybe go back to sending him presents instead of attending social events she didn't want to attend.

"Thank you for not jumping for joy, or anything."

"You are welcome? Why thank me for that?"

He huffed at her, sulking in his chair.

She was utterly confused. What was eating at him now?

He had been weirdly irked the whole five minutes they had been here, either glaring at her or the direction of the café's kitchen. Shamal had said something about this… but it was very odd to witness for herself.

She made a mental note to tip their waitress very well, she was at least not cowering under the pissed off hitman's glare. That kind of dedication to her job deserved a reward.

Sudden movement made the thief return her attention to her tablemate, who had straighten up in his chair and was looking a touch apologetic until he noticed her stare. "What?"

"…nothing."

Ignoring the new hole being stared into her, she returned her attention to her book.

Miss Iron-guts delicately placed a cup of Spiced Black Russian Tea and a cup of espresso down before them, giving the two of them a timid smile before leaving them to it.

Maybe not iron guts, but a steel spine?

Some brass ones, for sure.

Renato snorted into his drink, putting it down quickly before he burned himself. "Sonya…"

"Yes?"

"…did you have fun?"

"With Tats? Sure. Even better when she stopped trying to set me up on dates for random one-night stands." She also got information for her research and something to replace her bracers with.

All in all, a good little mini-break for Bjørn to calm down within.

"She… you…? …I have to see this. Give me your arm."

The thief gave him a flat look. "I did not say that aloud either."

A queer expression crossed his face, half suspicion and half incredulous. "…I will deal with that in a moment. Give me your damn arm, woman."

Sighing, the thief held out her left arm.

Renato carefully pushed up her loose sleeve to see the thin steel chains linking from a bracelet to a clasp on her bicep, which had several mini weapons of war stuck on the strong magnets linked into the chains.

All in neat little rows, from a further reduced in size set of Bec de Corbins to a series of hammers and a couple axes and halberds.

The hitman burst out laughing.

With another sigh, she tugged one of her new Bec de Corbins off the magnet that kept them secured to the chain and nearly effortlessly enlarged it. It originally was about the size of the tip to the first joint of her thumb and making that into a six-foot long polearm was surprisingly easy.

She had thought the smaller they were, the harder it would be to make them full-sized. In actuality, since there was less mass to deal with it was just more of her Flames in nature instead of metal and more Flames imbuing that as well as the needed Flames. A third less difficult, in other words.

Tatiana challenged her to prove if it was harder or not, and so she had extra mini-weapons now.

As well as her original seven miniaturized Bec de Corbins she still had tucked into her pockets. Sonya wasn't sure where she would ever use the axes, other than intimidation or for cutting things in her way, but since she could throw a hammer with the force of a speeding car?

It wasn't like blades made her deadlier. It was actually just more useful.

The halberds were Tatiana's suggestion, since she had hammers on a pole already. Pointing out a Bec de Corbin was a pick, not a hammer, didn't gain her a lot of understanding.

She got the axes on a pole as well.

All she needed was a maul, and she'd have most everything that could be stuck on a pike.

…except for a spear, and a gun.

Again, she could throw a hammer with more force. As for the dagger on a pike… no.

There were sharp ends on her Bec de Corbins, more than enough for her.

Sonya really did wonder how Cloud Flame copies actually hit something. Her new weapons, once resized, were basically barely a fraction of metal. The rest was what?

Will-fire?

…if Tatiana's suggestion on her hurting/not hurting herself dilemma proved true, that was very… interesting.

"Sonya, stop admiring your arsenal of jewelry."

"Really? We are still calling it my arsenal?"

The hitman snorted dryly, a lingering stubborn smirk on his face. "You have more than enough weapons to wage a small-scale war, in close-quarters no less. What else could we call it?"

"But they're not jeweled." The thief protested, showing him the sides of her Bec de Corbin's head. "And I am not limited by the reach of my weapons, I throw some too."

"…and that's terrifying," Renato commented slowly, eyeing where he likely marked out her hammers were, "but beside the point. I bet you plan on bejeweling them."

Well… "…yes, and?"
"That's my point. It's an arsenal of jewelry."

She considered it for a long moment. "…I have more points than you do, and I do not wish to call it that."

"…touché, little lady Sonya." He admitted wickedly, unbothered by her claim. "But I can assure you it will still be called so even if you don't want it to be."

At this rate, everyone on Mafia Land will end up afraid of her damn jewelry box as much as the thief herself.

…there was irony in there she did not appreciate.

He almost choked on his air, slamming a fist into their table and almost upsetting their cooled drinks as he hacked out a rather painful sounding laugh.

Sonya was alarmed enough to let go of her weapon's Propagation and look around for Miss Brass Ones, for a glass of water or something.

Well, he had espresso still. It was likely cold now, it was edging into fall and Mafia Land itself was far enough south it was rather nippy outside.

That, unfortunately, made her remember the last week of sunbathing in France. When it had rained suddenly with a weird cold-snap that chilled the skin. Tatiana had not appreciated it and plastered her front to her sister's back for the warmth.

Which was stupid, because as a Sun she had a higher body-temp than the Storm-Cloud did.

The hitman almost choked on what little air he had again.

…what the ever-loving fuck was wrong with him now?

She hadn't even said anything... oh.

Renato went weirdly still, holding his breath to stop the jerking his diaphragm was trying to do.

"...huh."

He gave her a wary look.

"...you need more practice not reacting to what you lift out of someone else's head. I was not aware you could do that with memories just as much as random questions or thoughts that popped into my mind."

The hitman stared at her for another long moment. "...that's it?"

"Should there be more?"

"In my defense, you are a very blunt woman." He pointed out without a trace of sheepishness for getting caught picking up her thoughts. "Like most Clouds, really."

Did he have to keep comparing her to a pure Cloud Flame user?

She wasn't, she was pretty sure that was a solidly well-known fact by now.

"I didn't know it bothered you."
"I rather intensely dislike the 'all Flames of this type must be…' junk. It is not true, and yet it keeps being repeated to my face as if it is fact. Like I am deformed or a freak for not being a true Cloud."

He looked thoughtful at her protest.

"Like saying all Suns must be healers. It works for Tats, but I do not think you would like to be one yourself."

"Point." Renato admitted sourly. "I've heard that one a few times myself."

Sonya would just appreciate it if people would stop repeating propaganda to her face and actually consider why it was 'widely-known' that certain Flame types did certain things.

Almost everyone in Mafia Land avoided even brushing up against her now, and while she did appreciate the no longer being jostled thing… she hated the fact people flinched from her. If she hated that they did so, she was irritable and not happy if they had to interact with her.

An unhappy Cloud meant one unwilling to behave or compromise, meaning they were stubborn and rude back to the cowards flinching from them.

Thus 'all Clouds were violent and abrasive'.

How was she any different than a year ago?

Two?

Had she snapped and murdered someone for being rude to her then?

"I didn't quite catch all that… but what I did makes sense." He informed her with a thoughtful frown. "But you're going to be fighting against popular opinion to try and change that… and humans all hate being proven wrong."

"I am not going to." She was a Cloud, even if only partially. She couldn't get the motivation or energy to try and re-educate someone or lots of some ones without violence being added to the mix somehow. They were being ignorant and stupid, so she couldn't bother herself over them.

Vicious circle, that.

"Speaking of, try staying out of my head. Please." Sonya informed him tartly. "I do not mind the occasional answer or such, but that is a little rude."

"…I'm trying. But I need practice, and the only way to do so is reading a mind or two and figuring it out from there." Renato admitted with an absent kind of shrug. "Since you are so blunt, it's easier with you to try gauging how well I'm doing. Shamal works too, but he's… childish. And all over the place."

The thief flatly stared at him. "You could have just asked."

"And you would let me poke about your thoughts just like that?"

She raised an eyebrow, and he held up a finger.

"Point."

"Just do not try for any fishing expeditions about me or my family. Do so, and I do not care."
The Sun snorted at her. "Like asking how you ended up with Tatiana and purple boy…? Oh… fuck. Sonya, I'm-

"Shut. Up."

He did so, and she really was only half surprised by that.

She breathed in heavily through her nose, then pushed herself to her feet when that didn't help at all. "I need a moment. Excuse me."

"Sonya-"

The still sharp end of her very tiny Bec de Corbin punctured flesh when her fist clamped down on it in a rather desperate strive for control. "Excuse me, Renato."

"I… sure." The hitman settled on finally, pressing the fedora down further on his head as she walked away. "…shit."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"You are bleeding."

"I am aware of that, Fong."

The martial artist easily kept up with the strangely stilted behaving Russian Storm-Cloud, wondering what had set her off.

Not that he had much to go on about her 'normal' behavior, other than rumors he was certain barely had a glancing contact with truth.

What little he did know, using his own childhood behavior before he learned to control himself, was that she was likely heading away from the more populate parts of the island in order to reduce the likelihood of collateral damage.

Fong was a little impressed. It had taken him years to learn how to do it when enraged, and he only had one Flame type.

Sonya had Cloud as well, which should've made her uncaring of anyone that got in her way if angry enough.

…and yet she was still heading to a hopefully unpopulated area.

There was little of that on a manmade island, but there were the training fields and a whole stretch of island forest that would be suitably out of the way. He really did wonder if she would make it.

From the cracks that were starting to spider web out on the asphalt from her footfalls, he doubted it.

Thankfully this was at least much different than their last few meetings. He wasn't sure if not meeting her eyes was because he didn't want to suddenly be a target for her or if because of what he had not been able to avoid thinking about when…

"I believe I owe you a spar." He blurted out possibly a touch too quickly.

She came to a jerky halt and shifted grey eyes to him. "…now?"
"Why not?"

"…then I really hope you were not overly optimistic about your chances to dodge."

Fong blinked, then sharply dove out of the way when a couple pounds of metal whistled through the air where his head had been.

It, whatever it had been, hit a semi-dilapidated building a few meters down the lane and caused it to cave in on itself with an ear-splitting crash before he got a decent look at it.

…and that was new.

Maybe he should've gotten a better, fuller, estimation of what she could do before challenging a violently pissed off Storm-Cloud to a spar.

Well… this would be interesting.
A blur of red had an ax thrown at where the head should’ve been and in a way, Sonya was vaguely glad Fong really was hard to hit even as half the shattered palm tree crashed to the ground under the force of the impact.

Vaguely.

Really, all she wanted was to cave in his skull.

Knowing that was not really the best idea and separating out her desire to do it as bad was a touch hard right now.

The Triad member might be an expert in martial arts and all that, but he had a bad habit of not watching his surroundings just as much as his opponent. Fong managed to get himself clear of her next swing with a one-handed flip, skipping past the halberd's bladed side by a hair's breadth.

However, when the ax head buried itself into the ground it nicked a water main and the man ended up throwing himself backwards through the likely painful spray of dirty water to avoid the Bec de Corbin in her other hand about to impale his stomach.

Annoyingly fast apparently described him all over.

Her trick with the pipe almost let Sonya remove his head with another hammer. Almost. He dodged it the last second possible, letting it shoot off into the overgrown palm and bamboo forest instead of trying to catch it.

He had tried that only once, his own hands clad in red fire, and was keeping far away from any of her other 'leftover' weapons since.

Fong uttered a rather nasty swear word in Chinese under his breath, dashing the rusty water out of his eyes. "Where are you keeping all of that?"

Not in the mood to answer or even just stop, the thief Prorogated a new ax to replace the halberd in her left and tried an overhead swing with her pick on a pole aided by a little jump.

By 'little jump' she really meant one only a story or so in height.

Ducking under her, the Triad member finally closed into her guard but only managed to kick away her new ax before the staff part of her Bec de Corbin impacted his stomach and threw him away from her again.

His expression, a crossed between disgruntled and resigned, when he looked up only to see her hefting a new hammer made her crack a smirk.

"This… probably was not my best idea."

"Giving up?" It would be a pity… even if this wasn't making her feel any better the high from a good fight would at least help a bit.

"No… I think I can keep going." Fong reassured her evenly, slowly rising back up to his full height.
"And, since you are rational now, I will no longer hold back."

"Now?" Sonya echoed a bit hollowly. "Fong, I am always rational."

"Now," he reaffirmed strongly, "you are at least thinking instead of just trying to hit me with anything pointy or lethal. The trick with the water pipe, for example."

The thief huffed, wry amusement clashing rather painfully with a large dose of irritation and a tiny bit of hurt. "Bring it, then."

Fong's next kick broke through the haft of her latest Bec de Corbin. Sonya dropped the Cloud Flame leaking ruins and multiplied a new one once his leg was clear, only mildly annoyed she missed the man's shins with the hammer end.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"You… did… WHAT?"

"I may have pissed off your sister." Renato repeated himself irritably, rubbing at the back of his neck sheepishly under the redhead's surprised gape. "What would be a good 'I'm sorry' present she won't cram into someplace uncomfortable if I have?"

Tatiana stared at him flatly for another long moment, then glanced over to the far end of the island where a couple suspicious dust clouds were starting to rise.

There were the occasional shakes that made footing slightly unstable, like the tremors that usually only happened when the floating island hit rough patches of sea. Which made it rather pointedly clear someone was doing some unscheduled demolition work in the old sector of the island.

It had been intended to be leveled out and redeveloped anyways, as that was the original site of Mafia Land's port city before the new sea/air complex had been built half an island away.

Occasionally some weapon testing went on over there. There might even be a few corpses or body parts left to rot dotting the ground. Although it generally was mostly abandoned.

He wasn't really sure what that said about Sonya's temperament or self-control, but he wasn't going anywhere near there unless he had major backup or a really good excuse.

From the expression on the nurse's face right now, she wasn't supplying him with either. "My little sister, Sonya? You pissed off Sonya? …how? She barely cares most days!"

The hitman wasn't really sure how he did either.

Obviously, the main part would be that he went and did something she had asked him not to. The only thing she had ever asked him not to, but even what he could sort of lift out of her mind…

The rage hadn't kicked in on her own memories, which was where Renato was a little confused.

If not pissed he now knew her sordid little history as an abandoned little waif, and Tatiana's own history as an orphaned girl only sparked irritation?

Their foster brother's situation, which he only got a bit of a sickening type of horror out of Sonya's head, had to be what made the thief shut her mind down. It was also probably why she had asked him not to, which…
Yeah, just an 'I'm sorry' probably wasn't going to cut it.

All he knew of the thief's likes was she preferred spicy tea to coffee, ate mostly plain or buttered toast for breakfast if she couldn't have eggs and bacon, enjoyed spoiling a baby Mist with whatever he wanted to do, and reading and endless series of books. Most of that was of no help to him, and hiding behind Shamal was just... no.

The damn brat might just throw a fit at him for upsetting her as it was.

God only knew how many books she had, and what kind she preferred. Getting her the obvious also was rather... tawdry, and cheap, and might not mitigate some of the damage he had just done.

"Oh... God. Look, you're talking to the wrong sibling." Tatiana claimed desperately, putting a palm to her forehead to hide the slightly pained expression. "I've never dealt with Sonya in so much as a bad mood, it's like she doesn't have any. Or if she does, she internalizes it until you can't tell. Cherep-

"I know about your foster brother." Renato supplied when she cut herself off sharply and almost bit through her tongue. "Met him, even. Twice."

"...and she didn't kill you for that." The nurse commented with a measure of bemusement, her attention more inward than on him. "Huh... yeah, that's right. How the hell did you pull that one off?"

He stared at her blankly. Somehow, she was practically radiating a keen sense of curiosity.

"Sonya's always been weirdly and overly protective of him." She explained with a shrug, waving one hand when he didn't feed her curiosity. "Like ever since we were kids and the two of them met. At first Sonya didn't even like sharing her best friend with me and I'm her damn sister, just became his too. If the two of you met more than once, and she didn't threaten to disembowel you if you breathed a word of his existence to anyone, she must really like you even if you did manage to piss her off."

"That is of no help."

"That's the only help I'm giving you." She snapped in a rare fit of temper. "You ticked off my baby sister. No one has ever made it up to Sonya after they've pissed her off... but that might just be because she tends to break finger bones when irritated. And that was just with fellow thieves."

His own fingers twitched, but if it was the thought of a vexed thief breaking them or in wish for his gun to shoot something with was debatable. With a deep sigh, and settling his hat more firmly on his head, the Italian tried to think of anything Sonya might appreciate enough as an apology present that she wouldn't try physically harming him with it.

"I'm going to go see what the damage is." Tatiana claimed irritably, giving the hitman a narrow glare. "If you managed to make her cry... so help me I'll... I'll... I'll tell our foster father."

"That has to be the most pathetic threat I've been given yet."

"You don't know our foster father. Where do you think Sonya got her 'break their hands if they piss you off' tick from? Again, we're mostly thieves."

...and this was a man that managed to make a Cloud, however strangely behaving, respect him enough to emulate in her own way. Actually, that might be a better than average threat on second thought.
The nurse tossed him one last pithy glare, then all but bolted her way to the distant but still audible crashes and thumps going on halfway across the island.

That… had been of little use to him. Renato gritted his teeth and stalked off for the hospital, mentally calling himself three different kind of an idiot for finally managing to find one of Sonya's few hot buttons then slamming it hard.

He'd report Tatiana as dealing with an issue, family or syndicate or whatever would help the girls more. Whoever would want to get short with him about the whereabouts of one of their nurses could go try to deal with pissed off Russian Storm-Cloud with her.

What did she gift him with as an apology all those years ago?

…candy. Toffee filled with espresso liqueur.

He drew a hand down his face, thinking hard as he walked. He was mostly sure there wasn't any kind of candy in existence that used the Russian's preferred drink as a flavoring, and she didn't really like sweets that often anyways. At least, she turned down sampling Shamal's tooth-decay inviting concoctions rather easily.

Why did he have to tick off the most practical woman in existence?

Had it been anyone else flowers or a shiny bit of jewelry probably would've done the trick… but Sonya only viewed flowers as occasionally useful and she was a thief so if she didn't have everything she already wanted in jewelry she could just go steal more.

He blinked as an idea occurred to him. Which, frankly, would either go really badly or really well in his attempts to find something to bribe Sonya with into listening to an apology without trying for his head.

…but in hindsight, possibly irritating her sister and maybe insulting the scary-factor of her foster father probably wasn't going to win him any points either.

Good thing this would take a few days. Letting her cool off from a rare bout of rage sounded like a smart move all around.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

A less violently enraged Storm-Cloud meant Fong was no longer risking decapitation by Sonya's multitude of weaponry, but also that she was using the environment just as much as her steel to trip him up.

He really, really wanted to know where she kept all that.

At the current count fifty-three hammers, twenty-six gold-bladed axes, eleven halberds of , and nineteen of those pike-ended long hammers in various hues had made an appearance and he was able to note. He still couldn't tell which ones were real and which weren't.

Some had been shattered into wisps of Cloud Flames, some just broke on impact, most of the hammers had ended up being thrown, and the Russian was still pulling more out.

She took the brunt of another kick onto the flat edge of an ax. Letting it slip from her hands easily enough, but a flash of Cloud Flames replaced the ax with a hammer that Fong had to backflip in order to avoid getting clocked in the jaw by. He kicked that one out of her hand again, and instead of risk a broken wrist or hand she merely let him without a fuss, again.

Normally, one tended to try avoiding being disarmed in a fight. His latest opponent didn't bother trying to avoid it.

Especially since she could apparently make more on demand.

He really did wonder if she learned how to create specific types of weapons in an instant just to fight with, or if she had copies of those weapons on her. If she had copies, he couldn't spot them.

Back flipping to avoid another of those long and slim warhammers with the pikes as it crashed down hammer end first, he tried for a leg sweep.

The thief pole-vaunted back out of his reach before he made contact with her, and when he kicked in the shaft of her seemingly preferred weapon she just made a few twisting flips of her own to springboard off a palm tree's stout trunk and come back after him with a long-handled ax.

Fong jumped backwards to get clear, he had to. The ground had a nasty habit of conforming to her wish, and unstable footing tended to work more against him than her.

Unfortunately, that also meant he lost sight of the Russian as dust and dirt flew up in response to the force used. As a thief, Sonya could likely sneak up on just about anything. He was proving no real challenge to her sneaking skills as it was, once she started using them too.

Mildly vexing thing to learn mid-spar, but at least it was a spar and not a real fight. Additionally, he should be just happy she hadn't thought to try it when she was still mainly aiming for his head with those hammers.

He barely jerked out of the way of an overhead swing of her favored weapon that shot out of the cloud of dust concealing everything, a split second too late not to get nicked by the sharp pick on the face. She reversed her grip, yanking the metal downward with obscene force, and he only belatedly caught on to the different sheen of metal in this one compared to the rest of her arsenal before it impacted the ground.

Again, he got the hell out of the way. He lost sight of her again, but at least that new crater didn't have him at the bottom.

"I… recognize… that… one." Fong forced out evenly, using the next few seconds of grace to recover his breath as he tried picking her out of the dust cloud.

"You should… I used it against you in Shanghai." Sonya returned blandly from right in front of him, still barely breathing hard. "I have three… on me."

He slid backwards to duck under her swing at his upper body, coursing Storm Flames through his palm in order to catch the shaft of this weapon.

It was different, might mean trying to overpower her Flames with his own might not end up exploding the copy in his grip.

Weirdly, the metal actually rejected his Flames and refused to melt or dispel the newest Cloud copy. He actually expected it to explode again, but the non-reaction took him off-guard.

The Storm was left flat-footed and holding onto the pole of one of Sonya's weapons, and she was physically stronger than her frame suggested. She threw him away, heaving him up off his feet and over her head without so much as a grunt of effort.

He hit the ground hard, using his momentum to roll into a somersault and back up to his feet before the queer metal polearm impacted where he had hit. She darted in shortly after that, retaking possession of the weapon and just yanking it up out of the hard-packed dirt without issue.

After it had been sunk into about a good foot of solid earth.

There was something entirely unfair of a woman that slim being able to do that.

At least his opponent was a bit awkward with the weighted ends of her staffs still, he only made the mistake of breaking the head off one once. Once was more than enough as far as his ribs were concerned, but he was curious enough to want to see her actually use a staff instead of the polearms she favored now.

Ducking under her next swing, Fong tried disarming her again. The heel of his palm hit the shaft of this weapon, but Sonya didn't let go as easily as she had for the rest of her weaponry. A jolt of pain went up his arm as she held her ground, and the force behind the blow forced him backwards instead.

Then he had to fumble a rather graceless stumble backwards when the thief recovered her balance before he could and swung it at him again.

Was he actually getting somewhere in trying to tire her out?

He had no idea, but the appearance of a 'real' weapon and her unwillingness to part from it might be suggesting she was finally reaching her limits.

It could also be that was a favorite weapon, and she didn't want to go hunting for it later.

Before the martial artist could get back on both feet she slammed a booted heel into the dirt underfoot, breaking it up and causing him another graceless tumble in response.

"SONYA!"

The thief paused, a puzzled expression appearing on her dirt-streaked face. "…Tats. Sorry, Fong. I think we… are going to have to… call it good for now."

"I am… alright with that." He claimed lightly, since now that there was a much longer pause his injuries were starting to complain.

Like the probably cracked ribs, and the burns on his left hand and side.

He hadn't managed to dodge everything she had thrown at him in a fit of pique. He had originally tried using his Storm Flames to melt anything that got too close, but that had only made them explode in his face. His Storm and her Cloud apparently did not like to mix well.

"Like holy f-ing crap, woman! What the hell? Did you decide to make your way to the other side of the island or something? I could've waited for you back at the hospital at this rate!"

The woman in question peered back the way they had come curiously through the settling dust, wincing at the wide swath of broken trees and crater impacts that now dotted the landscape slowly becoming apparent. "Err… shit."

An entirely too painful to be worth it snort escaped Fong, and he tried breathing in deeply to keep himself from continuing.

Sonya was a very destructive fighter, especially when it came to her surroundings. Her sister was likely just following the trail of destruction right to them.

Tatiana's fiery red hair did finally stumble into the newly made clearing with the rest of the nurse, and she planted her hands on her hips and inspected the two of them. "Hello, Muscles. Tell me where it hurts you two."

"I think I might have done something wrong to my knee." Started his opponent blandly, still standing exactly where she had stopped when she heard the older Russian's voice but now leaning on the haft of her weapon for support. "And… my foot, but that wasn't my fault."

He had stomped on it to prevent a decapitation by ax earlier on, and with her wearing boots he might have done it a bit too hard to ensure she felt it enough to jerk away.

"I… have broken ribs. And burns." It was the worst of his, besides a litter of tiny cuts and bruises from shrapnel back in the abandoned urban part of the island.

Broken dirt rarely had anything more than a handful of pebbles, which had been why he lured the Storm-Cloud out into the undeveloped part of the island instead of deal with collapsing buildings as their arena.

"Ooh… ribs, I have bruised ones… I think." The thief continued, breathing in deeply to check the feel of hers. "Yeah… bruised at least."

"I… may have broken something in my hand." Fong chipped in, inspecting the palm he had tried knocking the last weapon out of her hands with.

That was going to be an ugly bruise in itself, and since Sonya refused to budge under the hit he may have cracked something.

"Okay, the mutual injury admiration society will need to adjourn for a bit." The nurse snapped only really half as irritable as she sounded, since the martial artist was sure most of that was worry given the glances she shot her sister. "Take a seat, Sonya. I'll get to you in a moment."

She blinked at her, looked around at their slightly unstable surroundings, and simply sprawled out on the dirt instead of risk leaning up against an unstable palm tree or jut of crumbly dirt. Her weapon flashed a purple tinted fire before something fell into her palm with sparkles of glitter.

Feeling a lot less embarrassed over his own tiredness, he stopped trying to sit himself up as Tatiana picked a way across the three craters that made this clearing up to him.

"I have no idea what the hell you were thinking, but thanks." She informed him quietly as bright yellow fire of her own flickered up her hands, and the nurse applied it to smoothing away the aches and pain he had acquired in distracting her sister from whatever had enraged her. "Sonya's always felt better after a semi-decent fight."

"I am not sure if I should be flattered or a little insulted." Spoke the martial artist wryly, mostly to the sky.

That was not something he was in a fast hurry to do again, be a ticked-off Cloud's target. Sonya was entirely deceptive in appearance, stronger and faster than she should be, and had a sort of ruthless intelligence and creative applications for it that made her an entirely respectable opponent.
He was just simply happy he survived right now. Although the Chinese man was not sure if he started on a more even footing against her, or at least had some idea of what she could do with her Flames in the first place, if he would have won a spar or not.

A tie against an enraged Cloud didn't sound too bad in the end.

"I think this is ruined, by the way." Tatiana spoke up after a moment, plucking at his formerly red changshan. It was now tattered, mud and dirt encrusted, and rather brownish-grey looking in spots.

"I have more." Fong shrugged that off, regretting the motion when his ribs protested.

"Take it off, I need to get at that too."

He shot her a suspicious look, but since it seemed as if Sun Flame users needed to actually see what they were doing he did as asked.

"Look you have very tasty muscles, but right now those muscles are in pain." Snapped the nurse irritably, smoothing her Flames down his side to burn away the ache there. "There are limits to where I'll go, thank you very much. And right now I want you healed so I can go take care of my sister."

The Triad member accepted that rebuke silently, merely watching closely as she pressed more Sun Flames into various cuts and bruises. Mostly out of curiosity, but slightly because he really didn't know her that well even if he understood this was out of gratitude for distracting the thief from her rage.

"There. Doctor's orders, eat something high in iron and protein then go to bed. You'll end up feeling the tiredness from healing after a few hours, be somewhere secure before that." She gave him an absent nod, then shot to her feet and over to where her sister had refused to move from.

He flexed his newly healed hand, just to see if it would twinge or even protest the movement when moments before it had been in the process of swelling up. Glancing over at the sisters, he decided to give them some privacy and remain where he was.

He would like to learn of what had twanged the Storm-Cloud's last nerve, just so he wouldn't make the same mistake in the future.

(Monday the 2nd of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"You okay?"

Sonya hummed absently, staring aimlessly at the sky and idly flicking her de-jeweled mini Bec de Corbin around her non-broken fingers.

Another shattered gem, but since she was replacing them anyways it wasn't too irritating.

Good news no one was dead, and Tatiana might be able to straighten out some of her fingers.

Bad news… how did you thank someone for not dying when you really were trying to bash his head in?

Also, the thief was pretty sure this wasn't going to help that whole 'being treated as a leper' thing going on.

Finally, ow.
Fong hit hard.

She was pretty sure she had a sprained if not broken wrist, and a few other rather irking injuries from getting kicked around that bled off the little enjoyment she had gotten from not holding back.

She was pretty much back to normal, now. A little more irritated than the norm maybe, especially at a particular Italian Mafioso of her acquaintance.

Jackass… she had specifically asked him not to do that. If he had to know of her history, she would've told him. It wasn't that shocking or horrible, she was both alive and mostly free after all, so other than really kind of a sore topic she didn't mind if others knew.

Tatiana and Cherep, on the other hand, we part of no deal she would ever make. What she knew of their family history before getting fostered with her was something she fully intended to hold Renato responsible for.

The thief did not appreciate being used to endanger her siblings. Even unintentionally.

The asshole was still a hitman, she did not ever intend to give him more help than necessary if he was ever going to go after her or her family.

"Sonya? Honey, please. Are you okay?"

"...'m fine. Tired."

"Fong managed to tire you out? You're a Cloud, shouldn't it be the other way around?"

A lack of reliance on her own muscles meant someone who actually regularly used his had more stamina in the long term than she did even after years of cheating with Cloud Flames. Sonya didn't have the energy to tell her that, so she merely limply waved the question away with her mostly shattered hand.

She still had a martial artist to deal with. At least he was being polite, in waiting for the nurse to declare it was safe and everything.

She still had a martial artist to deal with. At least he was being polite, in waiting for the nurse to declare it was safe and everything.

Slowly pushing herself upright, gingerly because her aches had aches and battered was a polite term for how she felt, the thief eventually reached a sitting position and quirked a small smile for her sister. "I'm fine. I swear. Now, anyways."

"Uh huh, that's why you're keeping to short sentences and are so limp, right?" Tatiana snorted harshly, reaching out with yellow fire licking her hands to straighten out Sonya's right fingers before they healed crooked again. "I want an explanation, sister dear. You've never been one to have a hair-trigger and we just came back from vacation, so I know you weren't bottling anything up."

"Renato is an asshole sometimes and no, not even I'm exempt from that." The thief informed her slowly, taking a deep breath after spitting the whole thing out at once.

Her ribs were bruised, for sure.

The nurse placed her hands there next, after yanking up her shirt to see her abs, and she had to breathe through the warm and itchy feeling of Sun Flames knitting bone back together.

Nope, broken ribs.

"Dearly beloved fuck, the two of you made a mess out of each other." She muttered, mostly to Sonya's kneecap as she focused on her Flames to provide her with some medical aid. "Tall, dark, and snarky said he might have managed to piss you off, but this…? Next time I see him, I'm going to slap that ass."

"…do you mean you are going to slap the ass who is named Renato, or slap Renato's ass?" Questioned the younger Russian in bemusement, trying to sort that through her head.

With a dry little laugh, the nurse flashed her little sister a wan grin. "Both, if I feel like it."

There was an awkward cough from behind Tatiana, and Sonya gave her older sister a mildly reproving look. "You should probably stop doing that to Fong, Tats."

"But he reacts, and it's funny."

"But right now, we are very grateful he let me try to take his head off with sharp and pointy thing. Especially since he did not die doing it."

"Technically, they were mainly flat and mostly hammer-shaped. Not so much pointy and sharp. And you are welcome." Fong chipped in as he made a slow meandering path to the sisters around the craters, taking more than enough time to be waved off or stopped if need be. "Speaking of which, will you need some assistance re-collecting all of those?"

"No."

Best thing about Cloud Flame copies, she would never have to pick through a battlefield to find them. They'd disappear on their own.

Sonya realized that might have sounded short and possibly irritable after a beat of awkward silence, so she tacked on a slightly sheepish, "but thank you."

He accepted that with a slight nod. "So, as to my questions?"

"Tomorrow." Tatiana interrupted firmly, shooting him a pointed look. "Shower, nap, eat something. Not necessarily in that order. Then you two can do whatever it is."

"Noon," she added idly, inspecting her rather ruined blouse and wondering if she should try to save it or not, "meet me at the hospital. We'll go get lunch or tea or whatever."

Not, she had more than enough of sewing things for the next decade. She'd rather buy a new one. Besides, the stains alone would be a bitch and a half… adding sewing or patching up the holes would make it three bitches.

Fong pulled a slight face as he considered it. "Tea, please."

The thief blinked at him curiously but accepted that easily enough. She really did owe him something for… well, not dying.

That would've sucked majorly.

She felt a bit sheepish and a little irritated with herself now. Sonya had known violence wasn't going to help anything, but after Renato got something on her siblings out of her head?

She had needed a distraction, Fong had provided.

Probably out of a desire to get his answers to whatever question, or to get her to owe him something, or…
Nope, she didn't care.

Reasoning weren't quite as needed as the results, and frankly the thief was just appreciative the martial artist had decided to make himself her target instead of wait to see what kind of one she might find.

…and that he really was annoyingly hard to hit.

She pushed herself up to her feet, ignoring Tatiana's huff for stressing out her knee before she could get to it. "Later and for tea it is."

She wasn't meeting his eyes because she was really tired. Really.

The nurse snagged hold of the thief’s pants before she could take a step to where she had appeared from. "Other way."

"What?"

"You two pretty much worked your way around the island, little sis. Other way, it'll be faster."

Oh… oops.

---

(Tuesday the 3rd of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

Sonya eased herself down in a seated position with a wince, ignoring Fong's wry little laugh at her expense.

Cheating with Cloud Flames bit back in the worst ways sometimes, and this was just one of them.

She wasn't used to using that much of her muscles all at once, so she was as sore as hell.

Tatiana was unsympathetic, especially since the issue was one the thief not only knew of but hadn't been keeping on top of.

"I take it that is another reason why you wanted a sparring partner?"

"Unless I work on it specifically for hours, I can't get a decent workout in. Spars, or just a flat-out fight, are actually a more efficient use of my energy for the same benefit." She admitted flatly with a heavy sigh, getting as comfortable as she could on a little cushion seat the teahouse provided their customers. "Everyone is so afraid of Clouds, but frankly they also don't realize how much a pain in the ass it is to be one."

Mafia Land had various little 'towns' from various regions in it, and there was an entire 'Chinatown' sector for the Triads. She was pretty damn sure his Triad group either outright owned or at least provided security for this little shop. It hadn't been a place she visited much, and it was kind of interesting to walk down the streets here to say the least.

"I think, if we ever do that again, I must insist on a limit for how many weapons you can bring." The martial artist informed her with a small smirk, shaking his head slightly. "Preferably less than twenty, if you could."

Sonya blinked, rapidly counted how many miniature weapons she had on her and wondered why he thought limiting how many she had to make copies from would limit how many she could use. "…
Fong wasn't slow, he gave her a suspicious look.

"Cloud Flame copies. As long as I have one...?"

"They were all copies?"

"Mostly, yeah. Except that last one. That one was... real... ish." The thief touched her right hand to her left bicep, making a new hammer to show him. "As long as I hold it, it will remain this size, but if I let go..."

She set it down gently, since this was a teahouse and their hardwood floors might be expensive to replace, but a few seconds after she let go of the handle it started to waver until it dissipated into a shimmer of Cloud Flames.

His expression turned a touch disgruntled as he eyed the place her hammer once occupied. "I take it trying to disarm you is an exercise in futility, then."

"You could try, I suppose. I've never actually run out of Cloud Flames before."

He shook his head again with a short laugh, another wry smirk on his face. "Then I should also assume that was why you refused aid in recollecting your weaponry again, instead of any attempt to keep the design or technique you used for them secret."

"Well... they're not finished yet. But you're right, that's why I said not to. Tell me you sent Liqin out to try finding one."

He gifted her with a skeptical look.

She rolled her eyes at him. "Please, of course you would. I would've done the same thing in your shoes. I also might have a tiny little grudge against Liqin."

"...I must admit some truth to your words, but your grudge is unfortunate. Liqin rather highly respected the work you did on our behalf."

"If I was going to hold someone responsible for trying to waylay me in Shanghai, and it wasn't going to be the Triad group you belong to, then it would have to be the one that should have stopped it. He knew better and did it anyways."

"I see." Fong considered either or both her and her comment, then shrugged the issue on behalf of his fellow off. "I will not try to change your mind, as I am rather thankful you didn't attempt to report that."

"Attempt? Fong, please." Sonya waggled a finger at him, slightly amused. "Like there would have been anything you could have done in return."

"A year's ban would have been irritating, but you know they would have ordered me and the others to hunt you down for the embarrassment."

"Which had been why I decided the slap on the wrist would not be worth it." She admitted with a shrug, waving it away. "Especially since it might just have taken you to kill me, and the bounty you would've gotten...?"

Now looking highly amused, the martial artist leaned backward as their tea was served. "Do you really think your work would amount enough to threaten me?"

"Given my last heist netted me a cool two million in US dollars for three days of work? Yes. This would've been around the time you were free to come back here, too."

Mafia Land would've matched another two million to it since it would've been their fault she came to the Triad's attention, and the Triad member before her would've had a bounty of four to try outrunning. She was at least somewhat sure Renato would've snatched it up, if only because of Shamal, and frankly she would probably bet on the hitman to survive that confrontation even if she was still pissed off with him.

Fong froze mid-reach for his tea mug, and the serving girl gave a weird little hiccup.

Sonya tipped the spout of the teapot back up before her mug overflowed and flashed her a small smile. "Thank you, but I think we are good."

"Y-yes, big sister..." She stuttered out, blinking wildly first at her then at her table mate, then shuffling off at a high clip with the teapot.

The Storm across from her gave her a considering look over the rim of his tea.

The thief smirked back. "Assumptions are bad for you, Fong."

"I am beginning to realize that." He admitted dryly, saluting her with his Oolong tea.

She took a careful sip of her own tea which wasn't her favored type, too herbal for her, but they had some good Spiced Orange tea she might come back for. Then she set the cup down to cool. "You said you have questions."

"How am I to use less Flames? All I have been able to do is a mass of Storm Flames all at once, never less than that."

"You recall my terrible habit of smoking?" Sonya asked idly, pulling her current pack out of her pockets. "I'm trying to quit, because Tats can be very annoying when she puts her mind to it, but I used to light them with Storm Flames. Do the same with a match, if it flares up higher than simply striking it would cause you're doing it wrong."

He took them in favor of his tea with a dubious expression, flicking one into his hands. "How long?"

"It took me about a year to do it without an obvious ball of Flames in my palm, until I could light one with a flick of my finger." She shrugged the terrible beginnings of her Storm Flame use off. "At first, I had the same problem as you. I kept Disintegrating everything I applied Storm Flames to no matter what it was. Until I realized that Storm, and Cloud if I must be honest, work in the general same way. They overwhelm what they are applied to. For different purposes yes, destruction for Storm and multiplication for Cloud, but what we do is pour our Flames into whatever because that's how they work."

"Counter intuitive, then?" Fong sighed heavily, re-sloting the cigarette back into her pack and tossing them back. "I begin to understand how you stumbled upon this."

"I had a little more help, actually." Claimed the thief without chagrin as she pocketed it. "But to start with, it's a good exercise."

"The necklace?"
"Sort of. It's really a bad match for a Storm, or at least a Storm like me. But since it won't channel my Flames very well it works as a sort of limiter."

Picking his tea mug back up he glanced to the new one hanging around her neck, and a wry expression passed over his face. "And what, exactly, would it cost me to get you to find me a similarly bad match?"

"More than just letting me try to smash you into pieces, and thankfully not dying during the attempts." She informed him blandly, tapping her nails on the low table between them. "Although I really do appreciate the fact you didn't die, I hate it when I kill people unintentionally."

"You are welcome." The martial artist informed her with a weird little smirk, including a slight nod of his head after his next sip. "However, exactly how much would it take."

"I would have to go back to my clan, somehow convince those in charge of it that testing an Inverted Storm other than me is something of a good idea. Then take a pair of every Storm-possible gem in a method that wouldn't let them get mixed up and bring them back here. Lastly, we'd have to spend a few good hours seeing which ones you shatter and which you can use. More goodwill than what you have now, to say the least."

Fong gave her an incredulous look.

Sonya was entirely unmoved as she picked up her now only warm mug of tea. "I am the one that has to replace all those. I'm also more than a bit tired of looting jewelry stores."

"…understood."

Unfortunately, she was pretty sure she was going to be seeing him with some regularity now until he got what he wanted. The thief wondered why it was everyone was either afraid of her or thought irritating her was somehow a great idea.

She could not win at all, and it was annoying.

Although, she did have to find some way to thank him for not dying on her. It was just… she wasn't sure what level of appreciation that should earn him.

It wasn't 'he was grievously injured and survived'… right?

She might have nicked him up badly, but it wasn't anything life threatening. He had returned the favor, to say the least. Nor was it 'risking himself on her behalf'… because she had been the threat he risked. Frankly, unnecessarily too.

However, she did appreciate the spar even so. Breaking inanimate objects weren't nearly as satisfying as going after a moving target, even if she missed.

"Penny for your thoughts?"

"They're not very good," She admitted flatly, peering into the bottom of her mug but there were only fragments of tea leaves to read and not enough for a full reading, "I keep going in circles."

"Sharing might help." He informed her cheerfully, setting his cup down since it was empty.

…how the hell could he do that?

Without burning his mouth?
This was the second time he had done it, and she was pretty sure that a burned mouth for her would still equal a scorched tongue or something on him. Unless he was used to that kind of abuse… but she didn't really think so.

The thief narrowed her eyes on that mug.

"Sonya?"

"You bloody cheater. You're using Storm Flames to counter the temperature, aren't you?"

He blinked at the sudden subject change but ended up smirking slightly as he realized what had distracted her. "Well… yes. We are immune to our own Flames, and I bet my Storm is hotter than anything I could try eating."

…so he what, coated his mouth with his Flames?

Wouldn't that just make what he was eating even hotter?

Or… did it eventually turn into 'own' heat instead of heat from a disassociated hot object?

That was really creative, in an application of Dying Will Flames. Not useful for more than a party trick, but then again lighting her own cigarettes started that way too. "Alright… I might not mind talking with you more, Fong. I must admit, I never thought of that."

"Thank you. I must admit I will continue to bother you until I am satisfied with my control, so knowing you aren't as likely to become irritated with me as whoever it was yesterday is relieving to know."

Sonya pursed her lips to hide a wry smile, giving the still cheerful martial artist a flat look. "Somehow… I'm not surprised. For future reference, I don't care if you want to bother me. My siblings on the other hand, I will brutally murder you for going after."

Fong gave her a nod significantly more serious nod. "Understandable. I will attempt not to."

'Attempt' had to be good enough, because the future was a very chary thing.

"You've been warned."

"I will not expect another."

(Saturday the 21st of September, 1968. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

The next two heists Sonya did for Mafia Land were pro-bono, but she didn't really mind.

The swath of palm forest she destroyed at the 'prow' of Mafia Land actually acted as kind of a wind-breaker for the rest of the island on the other side of the fake volcano, especially when said island was moving. It's other use, other than as something to keep the island's breezes as breezes rather than gales, was to provide a ecology for the man made landmass.

Even Mafia Land had mosquitos, beetles, centipedes, and spiders. There were also all the tropical birds, lizards, various small mammals, and other such creatures that needed insects or fruit trees to survive.
Having destroyed about a mile long stretch of palm/bamboo forest meant some emergency landscaping needed to be done to prevent the critters from unbalancing the ecology in response to becoming homeless all of a sudden.

She paid for it with the contracts she ran almost back to back, but since it was her temper that caused the damage she didn't mind at all. Fong was more of a 'bystander' and 'emergency Flame expert' on the scene, even if she had half-used him as a target to do most of that breaking.

Those two heists Bjørn picked out for her ended up being a lot more interesting than just lifting one or two items, because she was now getting directions of where and when to lift them. It made things trickier, and also more interesting to try and figure out.

A last possible minute heists of a business mogul's prized solid gold office chair, which baffled Sonya by merely existing, and a theft of a Korean mafia group's own freshly stolen shipment of computer parts relocated to a different group later, and the thief had paid off what she broke.

Seriously?

A solid gold office chair.

She raked a hand through her short blonde hair in exasperation as she wandered down the hallway in their half of the condo for where she and her sister lived for now.

People were confusing. It wasn't even very comfortable, why the hell would someone want that enough to order one much less commission someone to steal it?

She stopped dead on the threshold of the suite she and Tatiana shared once she opened the door.

A suit jacket-less Renato was sitting on the couch, rubbing the left side of his face and glaring a hole in her foster sister's back as she made herself dinner.

Well… this was new.

"You are a jackass."

"Occasionally, yes." The hitman agreed sourly, looking all sorts of disgruntled as he dropped his hand. "It's a character flaw of mine."

"Okay, I even knew that and am willing to overlook the occasional. That was more than just the usual." Sonya pointed out bitterly, feeling strangely hurt and irritated all over again. "I do not appreciate you using me to get at information about my siblings. At all."

Tatiana dropped the wooden spoon in her hands, and it landed back in her pot of stew with a wet plop. "Wait… what?"

"I didn't intend to." He snapped as he shot to his feet, then paused and shot her a queer look. "Wait… that's it? Not that-"

"I do not care if you know of my past. I would have told you had you asked." She snapped back just as sharply, frowning as she checked to ensure she wasn't severely tempted to throw a hammer at his head. She had enough temper control issues this year to last her a decade as it was. "Tats and Cherep, on the other hand, that… just no. You ever do it again…"

"You'll break my fingers?" Renato suggested sardonically. "Kill me?"
"…Shamal needs you alive. So no, until the brat is at least fifteen or so I will make your life a living hell." She considered it for a long moment, weighing the suggested actions against her irritation with him. "Then I will probably try to kill you. Maybe. Depends on if I am still pissed off or not."

The Classical Sun in the room gave a low whistle, then busied herself with tasting her stew when the thief shot her a questioning look.

With a heavy sigh, the hitman took off his fedora and tossed it to the coffee table just so he could run his fingers through his spiky black hair. "Fine. Am I forgiven?"

"No."

"The… fuck, woman?"

"Try starting with an apology." Sonya tossed over her shoulder, trying really hard not to stomp on her way to her bedroom. If she could crack asphalt in a fit of temper, then wooden and even concrete floors wouldn't hold up anywhere near as well. "Might help a tiny bit!"

"You-!" Renato made a growling noise, then apparently whirled on her sister.

Who interrupted whatever he had been about to say before he could say it as the thief got further down the hallway. "You better fix that. I let you in here because you said you were going to make it up to her, and this isn't making it up to her. In fact, I think she's even more pissed off now."

She ignored whatever it was he replied with, shouldering open her bedroom door and tossing her luggage to her bedside then taking a seat on it to unlace her boots.

Frankly, Renato could go screw himself somewhere else until she felt less hurt every time she even thought of him.

Cherep was civilian, completely by choice even knowing the world she was part of. Sonya, as the mafia member closest to him and the one that pulled him into the world slightly, was actually sort of responsible for his safety from her world. Anything that happened to him because of her…?

Like back when they were kids, except on a broader scale. He was her weakness, and anyone that had issue with her would go after him.

Viper was his own risk. Additionally, given how they met, the Mist never would've been responsible for his security. Again, Cherep's choice to have them as a friend. However, he and/or she was responsible for the risks any association with him/her would cause the stuntman.

The thief was his little sister, and best friend before that. Cherep was hers, and she didn't quite know how to deal with this kind of threat to him.

Renato was a friend… sort of. Maybe?

"Yes, we're friends. Now stop walking off on me."

"It is either walk away or try making you a head-less hitman." She refuted hotly, toeing off her other boot before shooting the man a glare. "And it is not quite Halloween just yet."

"Cute." Renato snorted dryly, then curiously looked around her room for a second.

Since she hadn't been back in about a month, it was a bit dusty and rather neater than normal. Done up in shades of blues, purples, and greens rather than just purple and red.
He really couldn't tell much from it other than she was neat, but he was also giving the stack of books against the far wall a wary eye too.

Sonya really had to buy a bookshelf or something, but those would be put in storage the next time she remembered so it never really got done.

"Ho? Really."

"What did I say about staying out of my head?"

He shot her a wary glance for the aggravation in her tone. "You also said you wouldn't mind helping me with it."

"At the moment, I mind very much."

He gave her ceiling a beseeching look, for why she had no clue, then shoved his hands through his hair again. Which made it even more spiky and wild than it was normally even after a few hours under a hat. "Look, Sonya. I'm sorry, okay? I didn't mean to… hurt…?"

"Surprise, I have feelings." Sonya shot back bitterly, irritated that he couldn't seem to keep out of her head when she asked.

"It's harder with you. You think loudly." He muttered sourly, rubbing at the back of his neck. "You, young children, and mostly animals."

She snorted at him, vaguely wondering if it was an Activation skill or just something he could do.

"My Sun Flame ability is actually bullets." Refuted the Mafioso, deciding he had enough of standing over her and gingerly seating himself on the far end of her bed. Other side of her luggage and out of reach, just in case. "Using empty casings or just the leftover gunpowder in a gun, I have at least one extra shot of pure Flames. More depending on if I had used my guns recently or haven't had the chance to clean them."

That was… unusually specific of an ability.

"I was seven, and it was my first kill."

…ah. Sort of like how she got a knock-off type of super strength, then.

"Super-strength?"

"I Propagate force near unconsciously. Sustaining it for long periods is harder. Broke a couple vory so my brother and I could get away and report them as drunk off their asses and messing around in the wrong territory."

"…I thought your 'initial' skill was the weapons?"

"I learned how to do that specifically. I favored poles and staffs in our combat classes… but hiding one is a pain."

"Our?" The hitman echoed absently, frowning slightly. "Sonya? Do you… belong to a syndicate?"

"Yes. The Zolotovs of Moscow. Thieves' clan."

"…why am I only now learning of this?"
"You never asked… and we do not like to advertise the clan's existence if we are out and about away from them." Sonya explained blandly with a shrug. "Why do you think Tats and I live here for the time being?"

"I figured they owed you a favor." Renato informed her absently, visibly measuring the space she had in her bedroom alone. "It's nicer than my apartment."

Well… yes, it was a condo.

"Am I forgiven yet?"

"No."

He knocked his head back against her headboard, then gave her a mildly irritated look.

"…really?"

"You are the one that pissed me off, deal with it." She also didn't know how long until the hurt wore off, so it would be a learning experience for the both of them.

She didn't normally care enough to get hurt when other people did asshole-ish things. Not appreciated in the least.

"…you know, on second thought? This mind-reading trick of mine is kind of irritating." He informed her irritably, rubbing at his temple. "It was useful enough when it was just feelings I could pick up, and I think I would prefer just that again."

…Renato was empathetic?

Well… in a world populated with things like Mists, Skies, Flame users conforming to certain mental patterns, and other such mental bull-shitters, Sonya wasn't sure why she was surprised.

"Not a Mist. Or Sky."

"You sure about that?" Maybe he was that much of a Sun Flame beast he could Activate something far away from his person?

There was that Classic Sun back in her old neighborhood who could turn on electronics from a distance. He was stronger than Tatiana, they knew that much.

Was he comparable to the hitman then?

"Pure Sun, through and through." Renato boasted with a sly little smirk.

How would they test to see what it was?

If it was just a natural ability…

The thief lightly kicked him in the thigh. "No, damn it. Stop distracting me with things to poke."

He seized her by the ankle, yanking her down the bedspread. "Little lady Sonya, I have a much better idea to poke at if you'd like."

She planted her other foot in his abs, lifting the asshole off her bed and setting him on the floor with one leg. "I am still pissed off with you, so no. And stop touching me."
Looking rather disgruntled with either her flat refusal of whatever it was or from the abrupt removal of his person from her, the Sun rolled his eyes at her as he fussily straightened his dress shirt and tie. "Are you at least less angry with me?"

"You are still an asshole, but that is just you naturally." Sonya clarified, rolling up off her bed too. "And you ever do something like that again I will ensure you regret it."

"Creatively, I can assume."

"Stating the obvious, Renato."

He huffed at her, dropping his hands to shove in his pockets. "I got you something, as part of my apology."

Tossing the box he pulled out of a pocket at her, the man stalked to the door.

She was slightly distracted by opening said little box and smirked at what she found. "Mauls? Heh… cute."

Fong’s expression when she pulled these out next would be something to see.

"Wait… who? Cute? They're weapons, woman. They shouldn't be cute."

"They are miniature. Therefore, they can be." She corrected, wondering where on her chains to put them. Next to the hammers?

No, other side of the axes. She'd confuse them until she got used to it, but it would be better than needing a short-handled hammer and getting the longer one instead.

"…hey, Sonya?"

"Hmm?" The thief put the box on her nightstand to add in a moment, giving the hitman a mildly curious look.

"If you weren't pissed off with me… then would you-"

"Goodnight, Renato." She even helpfully pushed him out of her room, maybe a touch hard because she was still irritated with him.

Slamming the door in his face was just making her feel better, even if he had tried to bribe his way out of her bad side.

Asshole. She'd seen him enough to last her a month or two, maybe when the Vongola Christmas Ball rolled around again she'd be less irritated with him.

Shit, she still had to find a new dress for that. Jewelry too, since she was pretty sure they'd be inspecting hers closely now.

Sonya sat herself back on her bed, already reaching for the upper-arm clasp that held the chains close to her skin. After unhooking her attached bracelet, she spread them out to pick and choose where the new mauls were going to be.

Tatiana flounced into her room a bit later, when she was almost done, with a very irritated expression on her face. "What do I have to do? Tie you up in ribbons with a big bow over your ass? Slather you in honey?"
"…what?"

"That was the perfect opportunity for make-up sex! With a friend you already didn't mind being around! And you turned it down!"

"I did?" Did Renato really think of her in that way?

She absently finished attaching the last few axes back onto the magnetic links as she puzzled over that.

"…I don't think so, Tats. I think you're pulling my leg again."

"NO! No, no, no, and finally no. I swear on… what's sacred between us?" The nurse puzzled over that for a moment, then continued. "I swear on Lisa's health, her and baby Lera, that he really does think you're hot. And entirely screw-able."

"I've also known him since I was eleven, Tats." The thief informed her slowly, trying to fit that into any interactions she ever had with Renato. "That's kind of… weird. And Lisa settled on Valera, by the way."

"It's called being jail-bait for a reason, little sis. And you are. Well… not anymore, but you were. And I know, but I'm keeping with Lera."

"Lisa's going to smack you for using it." She warned her, coiling up the chains to set them aside for tomorrow.

"Mmm… I know. But until the bitter end, I'm using Lera." Tatiana shook her head, then bounced on Sonya's bed now that it was clear of pointed or sharp things with a wicked smirk. "But still, progress! One of your hotties, well both really, are interested! Well?"

"Well what?"

"Which one do you like better?" The Sun user pressed, composing herself to both appear and look highly interested in the answer.

"Right now? I'm pissed with Renato and Fong's a pervert. Neither."

However, the Triad member was also surprisingly interesting to talk to and as a bonus was hard to kill. The Italian hitman she had known longer, was likely equally hard to kill, and… had Shamal.

…baby Mist still won.

"Shamal." Sonya settled on decisively. "I like Shamal better than either right now."

Even if she was still pissed off with the kid's guardian, she was still going to attend a boring-ass party just to see the brat for a few days.

"…wait, that kid Shamal's like what, five? Almost six? That doesn't count!" Tatiana protested, flinging her arms out and nearly smacking the thief in the mouth. "Fine. Tell me who's hotter, then."

"I'm not playing this game with you, Tats. I still think you're pulling my leg, and frankly it doesn't need to be any more awkward between me and the both of them." Refuted the Storm-Cloud flatly, tugging her sister up and over to her bedroom door to push the second unwanted visitor out of it that same night. "Goodnight, Tats."

"Aw… but-!"
"Goodnight, Tats."

The thief shoved her sister out of her room but didn't slam the door in her face too.

(Thursday the 26th of September, 1968. Vilnius, Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

Cherep blinked blankly at the sight before him, then blinked again when it didn't change.

…that… was…?

"…excuse me, ah… Libby." The stuntman gave the girl he had been chatting up a slightly insincere smile, too distracted by his thoughts to make it honest, disentangling himself from her hands easily enough. "Just remembered something, sorry."

"But Skull! Where are you going!"

He vaulted a railing, which thankfully the floor below got cleared of bodies at Libby's voice, and dodged through the crowd to reach the bar doors. He flashed the bouncer a smirk but didn't stop as he bolted out of them.

Skidding a bit, he almost tripped making a hard left to the nearest dark alleyway.

Normally he wouldn't do this, but right now he was pretty sure of what was lurking about in here.

"Really? Viper, come on. That wasn't nice."

"Mou… you asked me to. Suffer. Or pay up." The Mist informed him sourly, tugging on the cowl of his/her cloak as she walked towards him. "Either would be good about now."

The movement revealed a skirt though, which gave the immortal Cloud the gender of the day. "I'm already paying you in dinner whenever you want, Vipes. What else would you want to never do… that again?"

He honestly didn't need an image of his little sister as a Siberian husky puppy ripping up fully grown palm trees in chase of a red-clad monkey man or her growling at a lizard-man who smelled of burning sun. He'd get the whole story later, if he could get it out of Sonya without admitting he got Viper to keep an ear out for any news of her.

"Speaking of which, that was weird. How does an illusion smell of Sun?"

"You'd be surprised at what I can do with a mind." Viper informed him prissily, a tiny little sniff punctuating her statement. "...and I have no idea how you took Sun Flame user and turned it into 'smells of sun'. Maybe you just have a very weird mind, mou."

He pointed a finger in her tattooed face but paused for a long moment trying to think of something to counter that with and eventually came up with nothing. "...not the point. What do you want to eat?"

"...I'm feeling a need for… Italian."

"Vipes, we're in the Lithuanian SSR."

"And?" The Mist demanded testily.
Cherep rolled his eyes at her, knowing full well she probably knew exactly where an Italian restaurant was around here. "Was there nothing else but news of my little sister's ongoing struggles to fake normal relationships?"

"Not about you or the circus, no." Viper explained irritably, rolling her shoulders. "Mou… if anything, I'd say you hid yourself well. No one has become suspicious of you or how infrequently you have 'major' injuries."

The stuntman glanced about, but even with it still just twilight out they were pretty much left alone on the streets. "Are you…?"

"No one will hear of anything from me."

"Are you alright, Viper?" He finished his statement stubbornly, eyeing his latest criminal friend and how twitchy she was. "If you want to bitch at me, feel free. I've done it enough to Sonya to know it helps a bit."

"…mou. I got into a bit of a scrape earlier. It's nothing, really. I am just not made for physical confrontations."

"Assholes." Cherep chimed in, tucking his amusement away so the Mist hopefully wouldn't notice.

No such luck, Viper gave him a pithy glare from under her hood. "Muscle bound morons who can't tell a gun's barrel from the grip."

"Complete and utter idiots." He tacked on cheerfully, grinning as she visibly stewed in irritation.

"…I am going to demand dessert at this rate."

"You always do, I don't see why you think that's much of a threat."

Viper went ramrod straight and fully glared at him as wisps of indigo fire shimmered into existence around her sensibly booted feet. "Mou, are you calling me fat?"

"I'm saying you don't eat enough, and I let you weasel your way into dessert anyways because I worry how thin you are."

"…oh."

Cherep waited a bit as she absorbed that, then provided bait to get her moving again. "Something with strawberries? They're in season."

"…that sounds nice."
"I'm just saying it's getting a bit... irritating," Sonya informed her sister over lunch, playing with her fork more than eating. They both had to get back to work soon, so this would be their last lunch together for a few months at least. "I don't understand your fascination with my sex life, nor why you keep on harping on about its non-existence."

"There is something entirely unfair about this conversation." Tatiana mused aloud dryly, taking another bite of her salad and munching it for a moment before continuing. "Can't decide what it is."

"Did you hit a dry spell or something? Is that why you're so interested in mine?"

The nurse coughed awkwardly around her next mouthful, blinking hard until she managed a swallow partially in thanks to the glass of water next to her wine glass. "Ow... err, Sonya? Do you even know what that means?"

"That you have been getting no sex." The thief rolled her eyes, then handed off her little water glass when she gave a weird snicker-cough and choked again. "Frankly, I don't understand your fascination with the act. Nor why I must have some now."

She pushed aside her plate with a wry expression, then gave her little sister her full attention. "Mainly? For stress relief. You're always so bottled up, and repressed, finding you options to let loose without carving up another mile-long stretch of palm trees might just be a very damn good idea."

"I can get a spar with Fong that would do the same thing, and if I'm not pissed off this next time it might even be better." Sonya waved that away irritably. "Also, this thing started back when we were on vacation, so you can't use my momentary lapse in control over my temper as a reasoning."

"Momentary...? Wasn't that fight like... an hour long? Okay, then because I want you to get out more. If we let you, I'm pretty sure you'd be content to be an old granny wielding books for the entirety of your life."

She scowled at her sister, about to ask what the hell was wrong with that plan, but eventually sighed instead and let that pass without a scathing comment.

…1968 was not anywhere near the 2000s.

Current prevailing school of thought while the foster siblings were growing up in Moscow was that a woman could have a career and everything… they should give it up the moment they had a man or a kid and be happy with that.

Sonya would probably murder someone trying to do that, so no.

It grated her sensibilities, inherited from Rachel's time and era, enough to be flatly ignored by the thief… but Tatiana might actually fully subscribe to that school of thought. It had been near about everywhere in what they read, heard on the streets, even in what little homegrown entertainment the Soviet Union produced.

Like propaganda.
She was also probably being a little unfair of that mental outlook, but she also didn't really care.

Lisa was a woman that would have scandalized the Soviet Union had her life ever been widely known. To wait until her late thirties to have her kid, aside whatever difficulty in actually having or that baby eventually caused, and be happy with only the one?

The foster siblings evened it out to what was more popular to have, but as far as the greater parts of Soviet Russian would've been concerned… Lisa wasn't a very good woman or role-model mother.

Sonya was also pretty damn sure her mother would laugh herself sick if anyone tried to shame her on that… or murder them. Possibly get them to have a little 'chat' with Arseniy, who got downright disgruntled when someone tried upsetting his lover and baby's momma.

The last idiot that tried groping Lisa ended up losing their hands a la ticked off vor, so she was pretty sure of what that outcome would end up being.

"Look, Tats, I can understand why you might think it'd be good for me… but I'm rather happy taking it very slow. I still have issues figuring out when you and Cherep are kidding around or being serious, and if I try adding yet another person to that I will just end up more confused. Let me figure it out at my own speed, please."

"You know, the fact you're so rational is sometimes very irritating." The redhead informed her tartly, pouting a bit at her wine glass.

"I... actually think you're going too fast." She suggested a touch hesitantly. "I also think your taste in men sucks. Why not take a break from men and find what makes you happiest, then try to find a man who shares it or wouldn't mind helping you with it?"

They were in-between that 'older teen' and 'young adult' period of life, again for the thief, and getting caught up in all the things adults are allowed to do without censure was entirely possible. Rachel had managed it with a couple stumbles before her death, so while Sonya was sure she could avoid the worst… Tatiana didn't have that kind of experience with it.

The Sun Flame nurse crossed her arms a little defensively and gave her a rare scowl. "I don't think I like the way this conversation is going."

"As your little sister, and someone who put up with you trying to find me a guy I didn't want for weeks on end, I'm asking you to take a break."

"...seriously?"

"I want you to be happy, Tats." Sonya quoted her own words back at her smugly. "Try finding out what that is without these men you rarely see more than once, for me. Please."

"Really, really don't like the way this conversation went." Quipped the other Russian flatly, glaring at her little sister. "Entirely unfair."

"So was dragging me out a week at a time into places I normally like just fine to make me uncomfortable with sleazy men." Countered the thief blandly, picking her fork back up. "Quid pro quo, sis."

"You are an entirely ungrateful little sister."

"I'm pretty sure I told you this before. Little sisters are either sweet and loving or conniving and evil. No way in hell am I sweet, so evil it is."
"You can be sweet occasionally, I refuse to accept you're evil. Conniving, maybe."

"We're criminals." Sonya reminded her dryly.

" Doesn't mean we're not human."

Well… true enough. "Your word, sister dearest, that you'll cool it for a month or so."

"Why a month? I only had those few weeks…"

"And then tried it again the very moment we got back here." She tacked on tartly, with a huff of amusement at the face Tatiana was pulling at her. "Come on, if I can put up with you trying to set me up with random men and even my own friends…?"

"Yeah, fuck, fine." She grudgingly agreed moodily, drumming her fingers on the restaurant table between them. " I still say Renato wants to do you."

"And you're perfectly entitled to that opinion." The thief retorted dryly. "However, I don't."

She was pretty sure Renato was just being himself, if that had been flirting he was doing. He flirted with everything in a skirt, and occasionally Sonya wore skirts. Therefore, the hitman was just flirting because the thief was there and female.

It hadn't sounded like him flirting with all those waitresses and passing women she had listened to for the past few years, which was why she was pretty sure he wasn't flirting with her.

If so it was flattering, but she was still pretty sure her Mafioso friend wasn't being serious about it if it was happening at all. Not if it was nothing like how the hitman normally flirted.

(ooo000oo)

(Friday the 27th of September, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

"Sonya!"

Curiously, the thief came to a sudden halt in the middle of the port's wharf, peering back over her shoulder.

He probably knew full well she didn't really want to see him… but he also sounded a tiny bit stressed out.

Renato rather rudely shouldered his way through the crowd to reach the little pocket of no one around the Russian Storm-Cloud, already looking irritated and shoving a folder into her hands. "Take care of this."

"Why the hell are you shoving…”

…a parent-teacher conference notice?

"Brat's school requires them, but I'm swamped." The hitman snapped at her, taking a deep breath and trying again with a marginally less irritated tone of voice. "I can't exactly turn these hits down without a damn good excuse, and I'd rather not bring him up as such if I can help it. Even if it takes that last favor, I need you to handle it."

"Renato… I am not sure I can handle this."
Sonya dug out her own set of contracts to check the dates and where she would be around the night of this school thing of Shamal's.

The real contracts were in Bjørn's possession, but since it was a string of heists the thief had gotten coded and mostly faked 'order invoices' to remind her of what had to be lifted when and how. Best thing about these was not only a paper trail the police could follow back to the shell company Mafia Land did its civilian business through, but also could occasionally work as an alibi or distraction of their own.

Also, they were order forms for things the island really did need. This way she wouldn't be sending in things that had to be sold off under-marked if at all right away.

"October… nineteenth… is…" She would be in the SFR Yugoslavia, which was a sea away. It was a rest day, though, the heist would be done the night before. "I might, might damn you, be able to make it. Do not count on it."

If she skipped the country without issue, and without raising suspicion. The thief wasn't sure of being able to do that, though.

"One of us has to be there."

"Why me?" Sonya snapped irritably, looking over the details of the conference thing. She was homeschooled in Soviet Russia, what did she know of school subjects taught in Italy?

Or for that matter, classroom etiquette?

Renato rolled his eyes at her as he shifted to take better advantage of her little 'no-touch' zone. "And I never went to school as a child, so you're still better off than me. I put you down as the brat's other emergency contact. Anything happens to me to the point I can't take care of him, he'll go to you."

…oh. Aw, how sweet.

"Sweet?"

"If you do not like what is in my head, stay out." She snapped absently more than irritably, inspecting the posted date for the flyer.

It had gone through not only the Iron Fort but Mafia Land's mail system and had started as a piece of civilian correspondence. The thief had all and everything she ever got rerouted through Lisa for repackaging before ended up in the mafia's version of public mail services. No telling how many people had read this on its way through the system if this was how he got it.

The flyer had also been posted barely two weeks ago from the stamps and mail marks, and he probably just got the damn thing.

"I did. Damn school posted this shit at the last possible minute, I suppose." He informed her flatly, shoving the brim of his hat down over to shade his eyes just to scratch at the back of his head. "I accepted my next set of contracts yesterday, then got this thing bright and early."

Which was why the hitman couldn't back out to take care of this, his number were on the hits already and Mafia Land wasn't the most understanding of employers.

There was no way to account for family emergencies, maternity leave, or anything else in that general category. It wasn't like there was a union of criminals in existence, the closest they got were the Guild Halls. That was more of a temp-agency than anything.
The two of them were also getting into the part of their careers where getting requested by name or ID number was possible and turning down those requests were dicey propositions.

"Fine. I will try, but if I am doing this so are you. Be there."

"...if at all possible." Renato reluctantly agreed slowly. "I have a hit that date, so I'll be late if I even get to it."

"Then be there in time to pick me up afterwards. I do not care, just do not leave me to try floundering my way through your country's school system requirements by myself."

"I'll look up the details for you."

"Send it to Bjorn at least by the week before."

"Fine. Am I losing that last favor or what?"

"Yes. Even if it is for the brat, I am still pissed with you." Also, jumping countries without a hitch was going to be damn near impossible given she had a heist there.

Delays were something she had to account for in getting out of places she stole from, but even that might not help her here. Sonya likely wasn't going to be crossing the border legally, just to make it to Shamal's school in time.

That alone would put a whole lot of kinks in her plans, so she was entirely justified in canceling out that last favor she owed him.

"I can accept that, I suppose." He informed her grumpily.

The thief rolled her eyes. "Oh, shut up, we are friends. After this, I do not think we will owe each other favors ever again no matter what we need."

"...really?"

"Unless it is business related, I think so."

Renato gave her a strange look she had to shrug in the face of.

"We do not have much use for each other's main skill set anyways. Even if we continue trading favors, it will be rare when we ever use them."

"...you may have a point with that."

It had taken him half a decade to use two from her as it was. She wasn't sure how or if ever she'd get around to using a favor from the hitman herself.

He walked off with a tip of his fedora, and the thief continued to her own awaiting ship thoughtfully.

He hadn't commented on her musings of how many people could've seen he had a minor dependent by that flyer, so either it had come in an envelope or he hadn't picked up on it.

Still... probably not safe to think about Rachel's lifetime when the man was around.
Sonya's first heist out of a set of five she had helped her Lackey put together was in the Moldavian SSR, another of the satellite states of the Soviet Union.

One she wouldn't mind, again, to visit more leisurely if she ever could. Pretty country, a non-oppressive feel to it, frankly it matched up better to some of the other satellite Soviet Republics she had visited.

It's somewhat decent rate of recovery from rather heavy-handed Soviet Union governance policies aside, it was a second-world country edging into first-world state due to it heavier than the norm insistence on developing its industry beyond agricultural or basic processing.

Which… didn't mean it exactly had first-world kind of security.

She had ducked in and out of countries in a traveling Russian circus, crossing borders on her own was proving just as easy. She was pretty sure that wasn't a mark of how good she was getting at being a 'globe-trotting' thief, more of a sign of how tepid this so-called 'Cold War' was going, but it was something.

If her passport wasn't Russian she was pretty sure it would've been a touch harder, at least.

Her target was a mostly newish kind of thing, she never had to break into a hospital before. Actually, the Noul Neamţ Hospital was a Monastery before the Soviet Union repurposed it.

Sonya never had to break into a church either and wasn't sure which she preferred.

The thief was at least somewhat sure whoever ordered the heist either once worked here or was a descendant of someone who had lived here before, because the cache of religious artifacts she was there to steal had a hand-drawn map straight to it.

Other than slipping around the orderlies and various late-night doctors, it wasn't really that difficult of a heist. What she stole wasn't going to be missed, at all if ever, so she took the leisurely way out of the country again.

She took a quick detour to Ukraine for a new pair of boots, and to get her 'classy' ones adjusted for her year's growth, then backtracked back across Soviet Moldavian to the Socialist Republic of Romania.

Which, as a country, was nearly entirely opposite from the Moldavian SSR as could be that it nearly gave her whiplash.

She was pretty damn certain she didn't like Nicolae Ceaușescu at all, the current General Secretary of the Romanian Communist Party. She didn't want to pass judgement on some head of state she didn't actually know all that well… but he was turning into something… not good.

Ceaușescu was actually a maverick of a head of state, for a part of the Soviet Union. He kept his country out of the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw forces earlier this year, was rather moderate in his governance of the people, but some of his policies were a bit off.

Speaking of which, she had to talk to Cherep about what the Großes Volksfest did this year. Did they risk going through that or did they go around?

On the surface Romania looked good, almost liberal actually.
In reality there were a lot of kids on the streets, a lot of sick kids. More like what you would see after a war or local uprising got most of the adults killed, not when those adults were perfectly alive and going about their business on those same streets.

She really only needed a few discreet pokes around to realize most if not all of them were still orphans, and even so most actually slept on the streets themselves due to overcrowded orphanages.

Sonya didn't particularly like people, but she did stop for a day and teach a couple of the healthier brats how to pick a pocket. If the government wasn't going to do anything for them, then they were going to have to do it themselves. She could at least teach them a moderately fail-proof way, as long as they didn't get caught, how.

She stopped when the brats tried picking her pocket, figuring if they were bold enough to attempt that they would be fine.

That same night she robbed a bank.

The National Bank of Romania, for their old bullion coins, then the dies and molds to make more with. She also helped herself to a generous amount of gold and silver bullion bars, to pre-pay for her and Björn's clan dues for the year after this next one and the year after that one too.

The faster she could amass that before scraping the bottom of her savings again, the more flexibility she'd have in the future.

Around the legs and militaristic sweeps of the guards, around three canine guards outside, over or under the noses of the few clerks and managers counting the cash, and against the blindingly bright ass white marble.

She pole-vaulted over a main street to the building, nearly sticking the landing but having to roll to prevent broken ankles in the end, and ended up partially dismantling a skylight around the security wiring with a bit of Storm Flames to get in. A bit of abuse of circus-level acrobatics got her down to the main floor without anyone the wiser, and without a rope. Going back up to get out again was going to be a massive pain in her ass.

Bank robberies were irritating. A lot better guarded than museums, required creative packing methods to prevent metal clinks from being audible as she wound herself around patrols, and ended up with no less than three awkward situations where she had to take cover behind non-human shaped objects or get caught.

Once she had to balance upside down halfway up a pillar and carefully skirt her way around it as a guard investigated a possible sighting of her, hoping he didn't notice a few of her lock picks lying on the floor from when she abandoned her work hastily to avoid him. She also had to hope the bars of heavy metal in her backpack weren't going to fall out and clonk the guard in the head, since she would have no hope of hiding her heist for a few hours in that case.

Not something she'd like to do again.

If she had to, preferably a branch bank instead.

Getting out of Romania, when the breaking news of the bank robbery was getting blared from every radio and newspaper headline, proved vexing. Since the thief had her shipment already on the Dâmbovița River before even returning to her hotel, she didn't protest or raise a fuss over her things getting searched as part of a city-wide hunt for the looted money.

The sheer weight of what she stole again forced officials to conclude there had been more than one thief, meaning while she was slightly suspicious there was no 'obvious' accomplice to bring more unwanted attention down on her. The week she had been asked to wait to get cleared of suspicion she met with no-one, made no calls, and generally spent the time reading in cafés.

Still… likely the beginning of a rap sheet for her since this was the second time she had been 'delayed' in connection however remote to a theft, even if there was no way the Romanian or Spanish police could connect her to the heists. Either the next few times she visited either would have to be completely legit, or she should avoid the countries for a few good years.

A week behind schedule was not really damning for her, but still rather concerning. She had hoped to have a day or two more to work with in order to be absolutely sure she could make it to the southernmost end of Italy's main landmass, but it didn't look like she'd have any luxury of time to work with.

Sonya had ensured her heists would at least be a few weeks apart, more towards two than one if she could help it, when plotting it out with her Lackey. That week of grace-time had been eaten up already, and she was only a bare few days from the date of October nineteenth.

The last thing she had to steal before attending Shamal's parent-teacher thing was a large volume of random things from the Nikola Tesla Museum in Belgrade, Yugoslavia.

Which… huh.

Tesla was a name she knew of, Nicolai Tesla did energy and electrical things back with Thomas Edison at the turn of the century. Back in the States, and yet the museum was in Yugoslavia?

Curious, the thief actually paid to peek into it the very day she arrived.

For a museum, it was badly guarded. Badly preserved, too. Respectably big building, it had to be to contain the inventor's rambled mass of notes, journals, blueprints, and other such records.

Sonya was pretty damn sure the roof would start leaking or something eventually, and without glass display cases for the bulk of the paper-based pieces there was going to be some water damage in a nasty enough storm.

Which gave her an idea.

She had to get out of the country on time, better than on time actually. Already she was cutting it close, and she had given her word she'd be there to Renato. It was also for Shamal… which made her stubborn about attending the damn thing.

Instead of just steal what she was there for then hightail it out of the country like a bat out of hell, the thief sabotaged the museum.

First, she bought a lot of paper. Using some of the tricks Lisa and Tatiana used in forgery to age and scribble various lines and doodles into them, then ensuring they were illegible with water-damage.

She might have gone a bit overboard with 'fakes', but… books.

She was running out of things to read. Again.

Slipping into the museum once it closed for the day proved to be no harder than merely waiting for the building to empty once night fell and prying open a window. The thief spent three hours picking through the dark building, snagging the patent records and designs for the Mafia Land contract and picking out various other books, treatise, and designs at random from spreading patterns from what she had to take.

The likelihood she'd keep most of it was high, so long as it was somewhere that wasn't likely to be searched by law enforcement. Say her rooms or storage unit in Mafia Land.

Replacing it all with her 'damaged' fakes until she ran out, the Russian then carefully applied some of her Storm Flames in small increments to flake away not only the ceiling but the walls in thin spots very carefully. Cracking a water pipe near the ceiling just before she left out the same window she got in by.

Detouring from her projected route, the thief immediately left the city with no-one the wiser anything had been stolen. A lot of castration going the museum's way for the water damage done to their displays, but no suspicion in her direction.

She had maybe thirty-six hours to get to Shamal's school, and at least eight of that would be spent sleeping while another three-four would be finding something to eat and actually eating it.

It was a little over a hundred miles to the coast from Belgrade going east, maybe half that going south.

A train south, a ship going even farther south, and then maybe another twenty to thirty miles of Italy to get through in as little as a day's time.

Sometime in there, she should probably call up Bjorn to see what the hell Italy's private schools taught to their brats.

(Friday the 19th of October, 1968. Convitto Nazionale Tommaso Campanella, Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"Hold the damn elevator!"

Renato's hand shot out, preventing the doors from closing and wrenching them back open for a thief to slide in under his arm and huff exasperatedly once she was safely within the contraption with him.

"Cutting it a bit short, Sonya?" He asked of her dryly as the doors slowly shut again.

"Shut up, I said I didn't know if I could do this or not." She sourly bitched at him, prying open her rather worn-looking massive purse-bag in her hand.

Fair enough, the hitman had been surprised he could actually make this little meeting too.

He was about to ask what the hell she was doing when she shoved the bag on him just before she stripped out of both her jacket and the rather high-necked light sweater she had been wearing.

"The... HELL, woman?"

"Turn around if you don't want to watch." Dropping her sweater and jacket, she also wiggled out of her knee-length skirt and pulled a red sundress out of that bag before the hitman recollected his wits and spun around to give her a bit of privacy. "But I've been on a damn boat all last night and this morning and a freaking taxi cab all afternoon. I am tired of smelling sea-salt."

Renato had really nothing to comment on that with. He did appreciate knowing Sonya preferred dark purple lace for her lingerie, had the mauls he gifted her with on that brace of weapons wrapped around her left arm, and still wore garter belts to hold up her stockings. "Stay on my right, if you could."

"You can turn around now. And why?"

He glanced over first, just to check to see if it was clear or not. She had reversed her jacket for a paler grey and was in the process of pulling it back on, to cover up her weapons and her tattoos, before taking back her purse. "Got stabbed in the thigh. It's healed, but if you can keep that rip or the bloodstain from being noticed I'd appreciate it."

The thief stuffed the sweater and skirt combo into that bag and digging out a… sewing kit in exchange. "Let me see it."

She was on her knees and peering at the two-inch cut in his slacks when the elevator dinged and slid open the doors for the second floor.

He shot the entirely disgustingly civilian family of four a sardonic look for their gaping. "Do you mind?"

Sonya jabbed the 'door close' button rather hard, then threaded a needle as the doors slid shut again. She didn't even jab him with it as the elevator lurched up to take them to the third floor, where they were supposed to go to meet with Shamal's teacher after-hours. A few neat stitches, and it would pass a casual inspection if not anything more.

"There, can't do anything about the blood other than cover it up."

He gave the thief a hand up, tugging lightly on his pocket to see how much give the stitching gave him. "Thanks. Suppose I can't say you've never done anything for me now."

The look she shot him would've curdled milk.

The hitman supposed that answered the question if she was still mad at him or not. "How many times do I have to say I'm sorry?"

Internalize it until you couldn't tell, Tatiana had claimed. He fully believed that but wondered how far the Russian Storm-Cloud's self-restraint actually reached if she could keep a lid on her irritation even from his sketchy 'people-sense'.

"I know you're sorry," Sonya snapped at him as she tucked away her little thread and needle kit, "that's not the problem. Can I trust you not to do it again? Should I even bother?"

…because if I have to try controlling all my thoughts around him… ever? Might not be worth it.

Renato rather irritably pressed his fedora down to shade his eyes, letting that sense of his go.

He had to give the woman that point even if he didn't really like the thought. Part of the reason why Sonya was the only one to know of his mind reading thing so far, right on up until he tickled her off she hadn't minded the thought of actually helping him try to control it.

The Russian woman repeated 'do not care' like it was a personal mantra. It really did seem as if she didn't mind anything, so long as it didn't affect her siblings. Which wasn't strange for Clouds, they were hard to involve on any level without a deep personal connection to something about it or if whatever subject was dear to them… or there was a Sky behind them.

She might not like being compared to other Hard Flame Clouds, but she could damn well act like one when she wanted.

Who knew how anyone else would take the news, likely he'd end up in some deep shit if it got out he could sort of read minds. He hadn't breathed a word to it to anyone else and was a bit stuck trying to come up with some way to hide it.

"What else do you have in that bag?" He asked instead of actually address that issue as they reached their floor.

The hitman allowed her to proceed him out of the little box-room courteously, after reflexively checking to ensure no one was lying in wait for them. They weren't anywhere near someplace secured enough for that kind of chat, nor did he want to poke harder at Sonya's nursed feelings of hurt yet again.

She pulled out the flyer for this little appointment from the seemingly bottomless thing, giving him a dismissive one-shoulder shrug. "Everything I might need over a day that I didn't want to pack into actual luggage and leave at a train station's security lockers for a few hours. Useful things, purses. Except I hate that they're so steal-able."

"A book?" Renato inquired sardonically, shooting a glance down the hallway turn offs they were passing.

He was paying a near fortune for Shamal to attend this little civilian hell-hole, and at least it looked like the school was fully aware they had better give visitors or even the tetchy brats themselves something classy in return.

High polished tile floors likely cleaned the moment the students were turned loose for the day, golden-oak paneling on the walls, neat as a pin now with the lack of said grubby children messing around. Half opened doors gave glimpses of dark classrooms set for the next day's lessons, an entirely depressing feel about the near-empty building.

"One out of the Tesla museum, just before water damage rendered a lot of things there unreadable. Pity that, my book is rather... fascinating."

…it sounded as if that book had been purchased at the museum before their stock had been ruined, but Renato was pretty damn sure Sonya stole it. Probably also 'arranged' for the misfortune that was only just hitting the news. He only saw an article about it because he checked the obituaries to be sure he killed who he needed to last week.

Mostly, he was sure she stole it because she was radiating a kind of smug pleasure over the sequence of events that earned her that book.

The thief knocked on the door that corresponded to the much creased but surprisingly preserved flyer in her hands. Opening it when a call for 'come in' in an emasculated voice echoed out to them.

"Ah... Mr. and Mrs.... Nikishin?"

"I am Sonya Nikishina. It's Russian." The woman stressed her female-version of the name to what was likely Shamal's teacher, jerking her thumb over one shoulder to where the hitman was lurking over it. "This is Renato Sinclair, the brat's guardian."

The mousy-looking teacher blinked at them owlishly behind coke-bottle glasses. "So... mother and...?"

"Godparents." She corrected him shortly, a sour type of resignation emanating from her.
Renato mentally stalled out for a moment, the word 'guardian' still on the tip of his tongue.

When the hell did they adopt the bratty Mist?

Shamal's teacher, now that he was close enough to pick things up as the man rose up behind his desk to shake their hands, made a mental connection between the brat's unwillingness to talk about his home life with a recent upset in who was caring for him. Which was true enough, in a way.

The brat had lost his father, even if there had never been word made mention of about Shamal's mother ever from him.

…and now the teacher was rather bitterly wondering why it was all the mothers, or godmothers, of his students were not only hotter than the women he could date but also solidly off the market. Even as he finally got around to greeting them and explaining why the invitation to talk to him had been issued as if they couldn't figure that out themselves.

The Mafioso suddenly didn't mind the entirely vexing automatic assumption most people held upon seeing them together, that he and Sonya were either involved or secretly married and were just pretending they weren't. Sitting there as Mister Mouse tried to incompetently flirt with a Russian Storm-Cloud far outside his class would've been irritating.

He had yet to find who started that series of rumors in Vongola's housekeeping staff or find a way to stop it. It made it rather hard to chat up the maids for anything, they kept thinking they were 'helping' him keep his secret relationship under wraps and only 'played along'.

Entirely irritating situation, that.

Renato had yet to figure out if he wanted to be involved with the thief, which was a moot point until he figured out if she even wanted anything more than just someone to occasionally talk to from him.

Sonya had been completely unconcerned when Tatiana gave that offer earlier this summer, merely correcting a fact of what kind of invitation it was. Either she did find him attractive but was used to him enough not to dwell on it often, didn't remotely care about it one way or the other, or thought of him as a 'friend' only.

At least, before he pissed her off.

…or was she more interested in her sister?

Tatiana was a bouncy Sun user, very hands on. She actually accepted a bit of fussing directed at her before moving out of the way of her sister.

This was probably not something to think about when dealing with Shamal's teacher.

The dumpy little man that taught children for a living was blathering on about something to do with future school productions, so the hitman toed Sonya's left boot to get her to glance at him then shot her a blank stare. She blinked at him just as blankly, until the wonder if he had been paying attention crossed her mind and he gave a small negative shake of his head.

With a small huff for his inattention and a quick frown, the thief interrupted the teacher. "Excuse me, Mister Grillini. I was homeschooled, so this is a bit over my head. Can you take this a tiny bit slower, please?"

"Of course! But... ah, may I ask why you didn't homeschool...?"
Renato was about to snap a no, but she beat him to it.

"We are both very busy people, and at least a school with other children will prevent Shamal from having nothing much to do while we are busy. Furthermore... can I ask that we be warned of any events or other such school sponsored things more than a month ahead of time? Our schedules can get locked down a few weeks to months on end, we almost didn't make this. I actually have to hit the road right after this again."

Grillini scribbled down a jot of notes on his own paperwork, nodding a few times at the thief. "I can certainly do that. Schedules don't really change much from year to year, I can have the office send on a general plan for any events your young... godson might be involved with."

"Thank you. Now... I'm hopelessly lost, so can you start from the beginning again?" She asked, sounding genuinely contrite but from what Renato could pick up was feeling anything but.

The heel she stomped into the top of his foot made it clear she did not like playing a dumb blonde... or that she was still irritated with him just because.

Damn good acting skills though. If he hadn't known her, he would've thought she was really sorry... even if the amount of times he ever heard her actually apologizing could be counted on one hand.

...how often did she use those?

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 19th of October, 1968 continued. Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

Sonya wasn't exactly sure what had crawled up Renato's ass.

From the hole the man had spent the whole parent-teacher conference into the teacher's head... she might not want to know.

Mr. Grillini hadn't seemed too bad to her, and at least somewhat competent in his job at least. He had a lot of things to say about Shamal, which were phrased politely as 'highly imaginative' and 'keenly curious'.

Which probably meant the brat hadn't calmed down much with this whole school thing going on.

The hitman had been fine right on up until actually meeting the teacher... was there some kind of problem with him?

Was it his next few hits that distracted him so much?

They never did managed a mid-spree meeting before, maybe he was that spacy when plotting how to kill people?

Poor teacher, the Mafioso guardian of one of his students had unnerved him something fierce.

Sonya was pretty sure her attempt to explain his silence and her lack of knowledge over Shamal's recent doings as they traveled a lot for work wasn't really bought too well.

Renato could have at least helped her with that, instead of aping a gargoyle in a particularly foul mood.

"...sorry." The Italian Mafioso himself spoke up suddenly, twitching fingers straightening his tie as they exited the school building. "Are you sticking around long enough to at least see Shamal?"
She scowled slightly and came to a stop at the edge of the parking lot, highly tempted but knowing full well that she was supposed to be well on her way to the Republic of Austria or already in it scouting out her next heist.

"It's not that late," he continued in an only slightly forced tone, "we could steal him for dinner or something."

"Isn't it almost the brat's bedtime?"

"Well yes, but who cares? We're not likely to be forced to deal with him tomorrow, or if we do we can just call the brat in sick."

Biting her lower lip, the thief weighed that against a day or two of being behind schedule. "...fine. Dinner, I'm starving. I do have to get moving after that."

"Give me a moment." Renato claimed, digging a set of car keys out of his pocket. "Borrowed a car from Vongola to make this damn thing."

She wondered why she needed to know that as he walked off for wherever he parked his temporary set of wheels, reflecting on how awkward it might become between them when he got a fair distance away from her.

It was partially her fault, but she really couldn't control what she felt. She never had really fully trusted his word and manners before, because when you boiled it down they were still criminals after all. The newer split-second of hesitation before actually considering wasting a bit of time with the hitman was starting to make things a bit stilted.

The thief didn't really like that, as she rather liked her friend when he wasn't being an asshole.

How to fix it was stumping her, however.

…maybe Cherep would have a suggestion?

That would be something for later then, when she met up with him after this Ball thing she was attending again.

She was no expert on Italian made cars, or any of them really unless her foster brother bent her ear in new and twisted shapes about them beforehand, but… that was a little low to the ground for even a sports car.

Heavily armored, maybe?

The car was, as she expected, very noisy.

"Where do you want to eat?"

"A diner will work for me, I need something that will actually stick to my ribs for a few hours."

Renato tipped his fedora to her as she buckled herself in and shut the passenger door. "As you wish, little lady Sonya."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 19th of October, 1968 continued. Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

Shamal waited until Miss Sonya left them at the booth to go 'powder her nose or whatever it was women spent so long in bathrooms for. Which... he didn't really understand why she didn't know what it was she was supposed to be doing in a bathroom.

After she was gone he gave his guardian his best impression of his serious look.

From the amusedly mocking eyebrow raise he got in return, the kid figured he had probably better work on it.

"What did you do to Miss Sonya? She's not very happy."

"Sonya is rarely if ever happy, brat." The older Italian wryly reminded him, drumming his fingers on the table between them. "The best she gets is 'not irritated'."

He scoffed at him, sulking in place a bit at how dense the man could be even when the kid knew he was actually really smart. "That's only if you don't pay attention. She likes to hold me and argue with you, it makes her happy. But she's not arguing."

Miss Sonya actually got a bit mean when someone or something interrupted what she liked to do, which was how you figured out if she liked something or not. No one was allowed to take Shamal from her, touch whatever big book she was reading, or interrupted her arguments with Mister Renato.

He knew from that alone she liked him, reading, and Mister Renato... but she wasn't arguing with him now.

"Eh... I may have pissed her off a few months ago." The man informed him absently with a lazy roll of his shoulder. "She'll... probably get over it."

Shamal blinked a few times as he absorbed that news. 'Pissed off' meant 'made her mad', right?

Why would Mister Renato make his lady friend Miss Sonya mad?

He didn't want her mad, because then she might not spend time with them anymore.

"Brat."

Shamal tried really hard not to tear up, because boys didn't cry, but... he didn't get to see Miss Sonya very often already. If she was mad at Mister Renato, then she wouldn't want to spend time with them. Then she'd stop coming to visit him, and he'd never get to see her anymore.

That wasn't fair, he didn't even do anything to make her mad.

"Shamal."

He didn't remember his mom, Miss Sonya was probably the closest thing he'd get now that his dad was gone. Shamal didn't want to lose her too.

A hand gripping the back of his jacket and bodily pulling him up out of his seat made him startle, and he blinked wetly at Mister Renato's slightly irritated expression. "I'm fixing it, she's not going to disappear. If anything, even if I managed to make her unwilling to actually talk to me... I'm sure Sonya would be stubborn enough to keep visiting you even so."

"...oh." Shamal managed dumbly, which made him scowl because Miss Sonya did not as-so-ci-ate with stupid Mists so he couldn't be stupid since he was a Mist.

"I think she might forgive you that one." The older Italian commented neutrally, considering him a long moment then hauling him across the table and whipping out a handkerchief from somewhere to give him. "Wipe your face, if Sonya thinks I made you cry…"

He didn't even have to finish, the kid grabbed the fabric and scrubbed as ordered in a hurry.

Just in time too, Miss Sonya came back from the bathroom in different clothes than her pretty red dress and grey jacket. She looked a little bemused at the seating change. "Something wrong, Shamal?"

The Mist thought up an excuse in a fast hurry. "My nose is itchy."

Mister Renato snorted quietly, but then shot Miss Sonya an acidic look. "If you even think the word cute…"

"You'll what?" She shot back archly, settling back in her spot across from them. "It's my head, my thoughts, and if you don't like them…?"

Shamal blinked and sniffed hard. That was a new argument, but at least she was arguing again.

They both shot him a stern order to 'blow your nose' before making more digs at each other about his lack of impulse control and her unreasonable grudges. It ended with Mister Renato scoffing and Miss Sonya rolling her eyes, but that was normal.

"Shamal." The Russian woman asked after a moment. "Want to tell me what 'highly imaginative' and 'keenly curious' means when your teacher says it?"

…oops. He fiddled with the cloth in his hands nervously. "…no? Not really."

She gave him a flat stare with her pretty grey eyes. "Don't get caught, then."

"Okay."

"I think we might be doing this wrong." Mister Renato suggested wryly as he plucked up a glass of water to sip. "Isn't it supposed to be 'don't do it'?"

"…and what are we, again?" Miss Sonya asked of him just as dryly, waving one hand in a slow circle. "He might just need that extra bit of practice working around those kinds of people sometime soon, so best he knows how to do it instead of fumble it when it's important."

The older Italian rolled his eyes at her, but also didn't make another objection.

Shamal got to plotting how to keep Mr. Grillini from catching on to anything else a non-stupid Mist might like to do when school got boring.

"If I get called in for another of these asinine meetings…" Mister Renato informed him shortly with a stern look as he set the glass down sharply. "…you will not like it."

Wide-eyed, the young Mist shot a pleading look to Miss Sonya.

She looked entirely unsympathetic. "Don't look at me. If they try calling me in…?"

Eep.

"Are you all ready to order?" A waiter asked hesitantly, hovering nervously behind the blonde Flame user's shoulder.
She shot him a glare, which had him flinching back slightly and making her eyes narrow at him even more. "Come back in five minutes."

Mister Renato snorted softly as the waiter scurried away. "Coward."

"I hate it when they do that." Miss Sonya agreed sourly.

Shamal narrowed his eyes on that waiter as he ducked into the kitchens.

He should get some practice in before going back to school, right?

Maybe he could even impress them, though they were kind of hard to please people.

---

(Tuesday the 5th of November, 1968. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Tatiana gave her little sister a flat glare in the early morning, watery mid-fall light of their Mafia Land condo kitchen.

Sonya blinked at her a few times, then spooned up another mouthful of her oatmeal with a curious expression. "...yes?"

"You. Are. A. Brat."

With a spoon sticking out of her mouth, a bewildered expression on her face, owlish grey eyes, and still sleep rumpled from crashing out after getting back from running about the world stealing things, the younger thief was adorable.

Unfortunately, her older sister had a bone to pick with her adorable little sister.

"You know I'm a Sun, right? Well, blowing off excess energy is kind of a required thing for Suns if I don't use it up at the hospital." She informed her blindsided flat mate shortly. "I blew off mine through sex, but then you asked me to not for a month. You want to know what I had to do in order to sleep at night?"

"...I bet you're going to tell me anyways." Sonya hesitantly offered over her breakfast, warily eyeing her.

"Damn straight I am." The nurse proclaimed loudly, slumping to the dinner chair opposite of the thief to pull her boots on. "I had to take a walk that first night, which did nothing for me may I add. I ended up running into Muscles."

"Fong?" She blurted out, honestly surprised.

"He's chewing through the dojos on the far side of the island, learning the styles like you read books." Waving to said part of the island where all of those were located, Tatiana shrugged that off as she slipped her right heel into her footwear. "I got to flirt with him a bit, but eventually he turned it around to what I was doing out so late at night when he knew I had shifts to pull at the hospital the next day."

"...okay."

"I told him about what you asked of me, and that even though he had tasty muscles I couldn't do anything with him by order of my little sister. When he stopped looking at me funny, he suggested maybe working out to tire myself out instead."

Sonya blinked at her, looked down at her cooling oatmeal, then spooned up another bite and returned her attention to her big sister.

Tatiana glared back at her. "Stop eating."

"I'm hungry, tell me while I eat."

She rolled her eyes at her and grabbed the left boot. "Fine. It wasn't a bad suggestion, but since I usually dance to keep myself in shape and that's more like a light work-out I asked him to recommend something for me. What to know what he did?"

"...suggested something?"

"No, he took me to the dojo he's working out of for the time being, had me demonstrate what little I remember from combat classes back in Moscow, then suggested something."

"Okay. And?"

"...and I think this might work better than sex." Tatiana concluded grumpily, stamping her left foot fully into her boot before messing with the laces, fully aware she was sulking but not caring. "I'm learning Fut Gar, have been for the last month and a half. Didn't even go back to picking up men after that one month you asked of me."

"Learning what?"

"A form of Shaolin Kung-Fu some of the other day workers here take for basic self-defense." She supplied irritably, then gave a sniff. "They teach a staff-version of it too."

Sonya blinked at her blankly.

"If you'd like to get more formal training in staff-weapons, because I know you asked Aleksandr for more but he didn't know much else but the basics."

"That's... not a bad idea, actually. As long as they don't mind that I work for months on end sometimes."

"Wait. You mean I actually found something we can do together that isn't a day to week long lounge on sand?" The nurse asked out of sheer surprise, since that had been a personal goal of hers since she realized the younger Russian didn't actually mind having her as a sister.

"Sure. Sounds fun." The thief supplied around her spoon. "I could actually get more spars in myself too."

A bit bewildered herself now, Tatiana stared at her little sister as she kept eating with a thoughtful expression.

"I think that earns Fong a bit more goodwill. Damn it, at this rate I'm going to have to help him out."

"I think that might have been the point, but aside Tasty Muscles and his points hoarding... what does he want?"

"Control. Well, more control." Sonya informed her slowly as she thought. "Storms are... really just about destruction in nature. Shit... well, if my bad match didn't work at all for him... maybe my "match now would be a bad one for him?"

"Should we be worried about Fong's intentions?" She interrupted with a bit of concern, because using her to get to the thief was all well and good until actual outside motivation entered into it.

How did the two of them meet up anyways?

She knew Cherep knew the Chinese man after the thief encountered him, but not really anything about how Sonya and Fong met except for a chase happened in Shanghai.

"Unless he tries to talk or convince you to go to China, no. If he tries, then yes."

"That's weirdly specific."

"The Triads are still hoarding Flame users. I figured that out personally when Fong tried to keep me in Shanghai against my will."

"And that's alarming."

"He didn't know I belonged to the Zolotovs, just that I was a random Storm of surprising control." Sonya supplied without much of the concern that had been in her elder sister's tone. "I was also with Cherep and the circus for that. A civilian outfit, with a full-blown Flame user?"

Tatiana narrowed her eyes at her baby sister, wondering if Fong was another man that needed a pointed suggestion that anything bad happening to Sonya would be met by the ire of a large number of vor. However many she could bribe, beg, or seduce into helping her and their foster father out a bit.

Sonya pointed a finger at the redhead. "You're in just as much danger as I am of it, you're a full Sun."

…did the thief think any and all interest Fong had in her was due to that Flame thing only?

Oh, dear lord. If it was, her sister was dense. The man had issues keeping his eyes off her, even without the Sun's help, and the most Sonya thought of him in return was that he was a pervert who wanted to get her for her Flames?

Tatiana would be giving herself brain surgery via a wall at this rate.

"Aside Tasty Muscle's questionable motives, I'm still mad at you."

"What? Why?" The thief's attention snapped back to her older sister, a frown on her face. "Is this another of those girl-talk things you like to try confusing me with?"

The nurse held up a hand and waggled it from side to side after she finally finished tying her laces. "Kind of, sort of. I hate that you might have had a point. It's very annoying of you."

"…okay, I understand know-it-alls are very irritating but that makes no sense." Sonya pointed out after a long pause. "I didn't get mad at you for the whole 'find a man' motive behind our vacation. Why get mad at me for making you do the opposite?"

She might have been wrong about trying to encourage that, even discounting the Storm-Cloud's dislike for casual contact. Frankly the Sun couldn't figure out which she liked better, a few hours put in with her martial arts practice either alone or at the dojo… or sex.

…hmm, maybe both?
Point was it was very de-stressing and the thief's normal go-to for physical conditioning Tatiana had and kept scorning in favor for dance back when they were kids, up till now.

Sonya had a very irritating habit of showing her up, that's why the older sister wasn't very happy. Of course, she was never going to bring it up in a smug manner or rub it in. Which made it hard to actually sustain that irritation with her.

The thief didn't see a point in intentionally irritating her family members, since more than enough irritated her as it was anyways.

"Just accept that you're a brat."

"...fine, I'm a brat." Sonya echoed in bemusement, slowly going back to eating after giving her elder sister a strange look.

"Oh... you're no help." Tatiana huffed in wry amusement, stretching a bit as she got up from the chair. "You going to be okay today? No injuries I should look at while I'm here?"

She'd heard the thief get in last night, late. If she stuck to her usual habits, today was a day for lazing and double checking that everything on her contracts were accounted for before turning them in and taking a week or two long break.

"Mmm... I'm fine. I got a new book, so I'm going to finish reading that."

"Say no more, I'll know where to find you for lunch." The nurse quipped lightly, rounding the table to give her sister a brief hug now she was finished with her food. "I'll see you later, okay?"

She actually didn't flinch from the hug this time, progress.

"Have fun at the hospital, Tats."

"Oh yeah, fun."

(Wednesday the 6th of November, 1968. Mafia Land.)

1968 fashions were rather… erg.

Pantsuits or box-dresses with wide belts were all the rage now. While Sonya appreciated the fact that fashions were starting to ease away from making a girl wear a shapeless bag, it was rare if at all anything had a waist if it wasn't skin tight or caused by belts. Some even had an empire waist, which the thief just thought made someone look like they were trying to hide a pregnancy.

Evening gowns and cocktail dresses were starting to evolve into more of what Rachel had known, so there was that at least. Starting, as in would need another decade to be she would prefer.

Why did Shamal have to demand for her to visit over Christmas?

At least she wouldn't be too out of date when it came to fashion this year, especially since she could now actually have more than a scrap of fabric for a skirt.

She stuck with a Mafia Land tailor again, getting her fittings done while Björn put a few months of work into actually picking out a contract for her. Only the one, and it would only be accepted when she went to go approve of his choice, but it was kind of a test to see if this little arrangement would Sleeves were now apparently optional things, and the fashions were still pretty much summed up as long-and-shapeless or short-and-boxy. There were things referred to as drapes, which were pretty much like someone took a heavy drape that existed on a window and threw it over their shoulders then wore what was left like a toga.

It was progress, at least.

She pinched the bridge of her nose and flatly refused the tailoring woman's suggestions of a more tent-like dress.

Progress. Just not very fast progress.

She refused the suggestion of a tent-like evening coat too.

She had the tailor eventually worked out a design for an actual dress, not a toga or bag. In a dark purple, without migraine-inducing pattern including both electric green or fluorescent orange in geometric or floral designs. She also turned down the suggestions for sequins, beads, lace, fur, and feathers in equally eye-gouging patterns or for covering large sections of the dress but stalled out on the offer of laced sides or a hem to mid-thigh skirt slit up one side.

Thank gods that came back finally.

The only problem with a halter-top, fitted, ankle-length dress with a slit up one side to mid-thigh was that her boots weren't really going to work well with it. She needed actual high heels, as well as a clutch/purse, jewelry, and everything else.

Well… she had a dress and could probably raid Tatiana's almost-alive closet for other bits before actually buying something she'd not likely use very often.

…and buy actual jewelry, not weaponized ones.

Deciding she had spent more than enough time trying to find a dress she'd actually wear, Sonya wandered over to the Thieves' Hall to see where her Lackey was.

Björn had been skittish and entirely too eager to please for the last few months, part of the reason why she had skipped out for the last month and a half even if she really didn't actually need to do anything but help him familiarize himself to Mafia Land's inner workings. He Lackey knew perfectly well that he nearly got them killed and she didn't appreciate it, but the startled deer looks at her arrival and the hesitant fawning were getting on her last nerve.

It was at least better than the flinching and the fear she got from random clerks, so the thief might just be leaving contract finding up to her Lackey if he could avoid trying to get them killed again.

She sort of caused that, with her very public show of distaste for that asshole clerk that tried killing her. She'd put up with it only as long as it took for a better arrangement to be figure out.

Sonya also had to sit the teen down and talk to him about his Lightning-Storm Flames. Sometime soon, so she could figure out if she wanted to tap him for the gemstone experiments that would happen after the start of the year again.

Galina had a collection of two hundred different rocks that needed testing now, an array of precious, semi-precious, and/or industrial crystals and just plain minerals or metals. A lot more than the mere fifty the Storm-Cloud had already done. The Inverted Lighting had also made some noise about work or not.
expectations and color being entirely arbitrary and how she found a way around that, but it would all have to be done again.

Frankly, the thief wasn't looking forward to it. At least Cherep and Tatiana would also be tapped so she wouldn't be the only one scorching her finger tips.

She didn't quite understand why metals were being included, but assumed Galina knew what she was doing and would try them too if only for a more complete result.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 6th of November, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)

Björn fumbled his pencil when he realized Sonya was watching what he was doing over one shoulder, having not heard her enter the little study/working room Lackeys were allowed to utilize.

The thief gave him a completely bland look as he scrambled to catch his writing utensil, but at least she didn't narrow her eyes at him for the less than graceful reaction to her presence.

"Dama, I didn't hear you come in."

She gave a slow blink, then huffed at him and returned her attention to the contract he had been perusing.

He was... somewhat sure a non-reaction was a good sign. For him, that was.

It wasn't the 'avoid looking', a semi-hostile glare, or a narrow look levels of vexation she had held with him the last few months. Björn was pretty sure that was basically a descending list of how irritated she had been with him ever since that near-lethal contract taking mistake of his happened.

He never wanted to see her that ticked off again. It didn't really look much different than how she was normally, but something in the pit of his stomach insisted he had been pretty much 'prey' around a starving predator when she had been stalking him back to the Thieves' Hall to confront the man that insisted he take the contract for her.

The Icelandic teenager was half surprised she hadn't just kicked him to the curb for that mess.

Those mafia men he had started out under would have, or worse, even Björn himself probably wouldn't have forgiven someone for a mistake of that magnitude.

Honestly, even if his first 'employers' had survived his screw up with as much grace as Sonya had he probably would've still ended up dead anyways.

They weren't forgiving people.

He wasn't even sure if the Russian had forgiven him for it.

"Björn, stop daydreaming." A slim hand forced his head down, to the point the contract he had been looking over was the only thing he could see and held it there with iron control. "I said no Italian targets."

"It's a French owned company, Dama."

"...and?"

"Upper Italy, outside Vongola claimed territory."
Sonya released his hair to get a better look at the contract again herself. "Outside any Vongola-aligned territory?"

"That I am not sure of, Dama, so I was checking it."

"Hmph." Was the only comment she gave before giving him a demanding look.

Bjørn dug out a different contract out from under the paperwork he had bargained from out of the Intel brokers in exchange for information about something that might be used to bribe off the only Mafia Land Cloud resident to date. He wasn't sure why that had become a bargaining chip, nor why everyone seemed to think she was always irritated or angry, but he took advantage of it anyways.

This other contract was in Bordeaux, like the thief had asked him to find for her but hadn't been a destination for any heist until recently. It was a contract that asked for a thief to steal the recipe for Absinthe from one of the various liquors making companies that used to produce it.

"Absinthe is a drug, Bjørn." Sonya informed him in a flat tone.

"...it is?"

"Technically classified as one, even if the rumors about it being a hallucinogenic is greatly exaggerated." She explained in the same tone, still perusing the contract even so. "Since it's not really, that might be how this got through the other clerks, but still possible to get me in trouble for dealing with a drug's recipe."

That didn't really solve the issue he suddenly had. "How do I make sure?"

"Try researching what a contract asks for me to steal. This needs to be double checked by one of the other clerks before I will take it. Otherwise, not a bad choice."

The Icelandic teenager wrote that down hastily on a pad of paper he was using as a notebook, a reminder to change his checklist to hopefully catch mistakes like that one he just made. He had checked it, but a recipe for alcohol hadn't particularly struck him as dangerous.

"Check it, then if it's not going to get me killed why not. Find another two, at least, on any possible route there or back again I'd have to take to get there." Sonya demanded blandly, tossing him the contract back. "Not Italy for now. England, Spain, well... maybe not Spain, Norway, Greenland... Iceland."

Bjørn hesitated.

"If you have something you'd like me to pick up or relocate for you there, find me a contract in the region and I will try. Or come along with me and pick it up yourself."

"Not Iceland, Dama, Finland. My mother's jewelry."

She pulled a slight face but shrugged. "Then find me something in Finland, and the address of the place you pawned it off at."

Sonya gave him a moment to process that, then continued.

"Finland is for next year, however. Pack up for now. What do you know of Dying Will Flames?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 6th of November, 1968 continued. Mafia Land.)
Bjørn knew nothing beyond what the Zolotovs had told him about Dying Will Flames of the Sky, Sonya wasn't surprised by it.

From what she knew of her own Storm and Fong's behavior as well as Guanche's and of Galina's Lightning tics, the Icelandic teenager was Classically a Storm and an Inverted Lightning. Which one was stronger was a coin toss, as he wasn't exhibiting any real personality traits of constant users.

…and didn't that make it sound like some kind of drug usage.

She also ran him through the natural drawbacks, the fixation/attention problem he would develop beyond or inclusive to something about his lifestyle. With both Storm fixation and a Lightning's super-focused attention span that could develop in equal measures he could turn into even more of a freaking fan-boy-like Lackey of hers.

Which was, frankly, rather disturbing as a mental image.

She had introduced him to Dmitriy's method of learning about his own Flames for two reasons. Her childhood friend was still the most level-minded Flame user she knew of aside his Flame being Rain, and the slow exploration of the teen's own Flames would allow a talent or trick to develop naturally instead of his initial skill be something combat orientated.

Renato's Sun Flame bullets, her knock-off super-strength, Cherep's un-death, weren't all things that could be typically useful from day to day… or rather shouldn't be. Learning another trick or innate ability was also like pulling teeth to figure out, or at least that second one was.

The hitman had a bitch of a time learning to heal himself up, she had issues actually sustaining a Propagation of her Bec de Corbins at first, and the stuntman fumbled her strength ability for years on his own until he revealed he could copy it to her.

She could have also given her Lackey a piece of paper to Disintegrate or Harden in a Tatiana method, but she was also pretty sure that method was really only going to be useful for Mists or Suns, maybe a Sky, at best. They had the stubbornness and the Flame flexibility to work with that, more so than any other type she could think of.

That didn't mean she thought it was impossible, just maybe not fit for generalized lessons.

Bjørn might not have known about the bulk of the information before she told him it in his tiny apartment that actually belonged to the nurse, but he did reveal he had been trying to draw his Flames out on his own.

Half a year of trying, he claimed he still wasn't much good.

"No, actually, that's not bad." It took her a year to consciously do it, herself. Slow, steady work on it did seem to be the faster method to gain control rather than an instant use/no control route. "That's more than enough for right now. After the first of the year, head back to Moscow."

"Dama?" The teen asked in a startled tone, the weak flickers of red sparks in one hand and the fitful flairs of green in the other winking out at the distraction.

"There's a… testing kind of thing going on. More Flame users means more results to work with, so go pitch in there when the time comes. I'll be there, so will Tats, my brother, and a few others you might remember from your year working for Dmitriy and Galina."

Sonya tapped a nail against the back of one hand.
"Work on that. It'll be draining, and exhausting, and there's over two hundred things to test so far. The stronger you are the more you can do in a day, and the faster it will be over with."

"So... you're not sending me back?" Bjorn asked of her hesitantly.

The thief blinked at him blankly. "Technically I sort of am, but send you back for what?"

"...because I screwed up?"

"Everyone screws up, eventually." She snapped irritably, weirdly nettled by his lack of faith in her. "It's a part of life, kid. You screw up like that again and I'll drop you, so just don't do it again."

"Yes, Dama."
Chapter 29

(Thursday the 7th of November, 1968. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Sonya had sort of gotten to know Galina a little better over the past year than she had the entire time the Inverted Lightning was one of Tatiana's gang members. It wasn't a really warm relationship, more like the casual camaraderie between two people that shared a gender who worked together.

Getting a call from her wasn't exactly usual, but it wasn't exactly odd either. The subject matter this time, however…

"...are you sure that's a good idea?"

"No." The woman informed her bluntly over the phone, sounding sarcastic. "But it's what we're doing anyways. The information will be encoded, and do you know how much of a bitch it will be to do that?"

The thief's right wrist and fingers tingled in sympathy, and all she had to do was nothing. "Yes, I wrote it all down for you in the beginning. Several copies worth, and all the rest of you did was add in bits and bobs on the end."

The Zolotovs would be publishing Sonya's work in Dying Will Flames.

She didn't really know how she felt about that. It wasn't entirely her work anymore, so if the others were alright with it Sonya wouldn't be the one protesting. She didn't remotely think it was finished, or at any decent point of putting out a 'first edition' of. The thief was also pretty sure that a month or so after her clan did put the book out however it was they were doing it… a 'second edition' would be needed to cover the latest fallacy correction someone tripped over.

"Oh, that's right. And you did it all by hand. It was very quaint. I'm getting a typewriter to do up the master copy, myself."

"...you are a colossal bitch some days."

"Yes, I know. You adore and put up with me if only for my filing system. Dmitriy does, anyways. If that man could even find his own damn ass with both hands but without a map I'd be surprised."

Sonya made a deductive stab in the dark, especially since Galina didn't normally sound like this. "He's abandoned you to do it all yourself, didn't he?"

"The fucking jackass." The Lightning hissed out sourly in agreement from the Rain's office in Moscow. "I don't mind taking all the notes, his handwriting sucks ass all over the place. I do mind when I get lumped with all the damn paperwork."

"Then make him regret it, using it." Sighed out the thief, running a hand through her short blonde hair. "About this publishing thing… how the hell are we getting that around Omertà?"

"Hippy love shit. It'll obviously be one of these 'spiritual self-healing guides to inner peace and free love'. I'm getting hives just thinking about it."

"Um... is that going to work?"

"It should. Whoever reads it will either get a head full of free-love rainbow bull or will understand..."
the colors represent Flame colors and can work it out from there.”

"…okay."

"…is that it? I expected you to refuse on the basis 'it's not complete'."

"It isn't complete." Insisted the younger Russian shortly, because she was sure they were maybe a week to a month away from running into yet another brick wall and having to backtrack on something yet again. "But obviously someone, or some ones, don't care about that. If you and Dmitry don't mind, and I don't think Tats will either, then I'm what? One out of four of the main researchers and or test subjects. Think I might be outvoted anyways."

"Your mind is a fascinating place. One day, I kind of want to live there. It sounds so simple, yet… not that simple." Galina huffed a prissy little snort down the line, giving a sigh of her own in the next second, "Sonya, you started it. We might have built off it, but it's your initial effort. Therefore, it's your intellectual property. Communists we may mainly be, but it's going under your name."

"Why my name?"

"Because I would not have had the patience to sit and read through children’s stories to glean the basics stripped of the bull. Nor to be an impressionable child and look at the bulk of it then decide 'screw that 'have to be' shit, I'm going this way'. Dmitry might be a decent teacher for Flame use, but he never would have bothered had you not dangled a bit of sapphire under his nose. He'd probably still be a mechanic right now instead. I followed your sister and would still do so happily if she wanted me even now, but Tatiana is not what one would call an intellectual that challenges the status quo of what everyone thinks. Also, if we didn't give you the credit for your work I think your mother will have us all messily murdered in our sleep."

Sonya blinked, took the phone away from her ear to give it a strange look she couldn't give the Lightning, and replaced it. "Galina?"

"You are entirely confused what point that had, aren't you?"

"…yes."

"Like I said, I want to live in your brain." She claimed seriously enough the thief wondered if she should be concerned about the woman actually trying to figure a way to do so. "Do you have any further corrections or additions I should know of before actually tackling encrypting this über mess of epic proportions?"

"I'll send you mine and Tats' master copies for Sun and Cloud and get her to write down anything she might be thinking of adding." The Storm-Cloud informed her slowly.

The Storm copy was already back in Moscow, since reaching the 'not entirely totally destructive anymore' point with her own Flames she was a little stumped on what else to do with it.

…well, there was Fong's little temperature trick, and she should probably detail out how to use less Storm Flames than what one instinctively did naturally.

"I need the Sun, to do after the bare minimum we have for Sky, fairly soon. The point of that was had you not started it, it wouldn't have been done at all." Galina pointed out in a flat tone, papers rustling on her end of the line. "The best I would have expected was a few people thinking about doing it, but never getting around to fleshing it all out and actually opening up new things to investigate."
"...okay."

"You still don't see my point, do you?"

"No. It's not done, I'm not the only one working on it anymore, and frankly I don't appreciate being given the credit for another's work." Sonya clarified shortly. "Your name had better be on the damn thing, even if only as 'edited by'."

"Sure." The now highly amused sounding Lightening promised.

"And on the Lightning category. Tat on the Sun, and Dmitriy on the Rain." She tacked on after getting over her slight surprise at the easy agreement. "As a matter of fact, there had better be a list of damn names in that book. Everyone we pulled information from."

"You realize to any civilians who might pick it up will think we're all hippies if I do, right? I'll ask if they want to be, but if they say no..." Galina suggested in a wry tone of voice, then got a bit more serious. "Even your brother?"

"...I'll ask him if he minds or not, but probably not." Cherep was a big boy, he could decide for himself. As a matter of fact, she should probably go ask Renato if he minded his name being put in too. "Or you can ask him, the circus he's with should be back by now. I might have another name, I'll figure it out before I send off the Cloud and Sun journals if so and tell you then."

"Fine."

"...Galina? Are you putting in the rock tests too?"

"No, it won't be done in time. Besides, anyone that wants the results can do their own damn work in figuring it out."

Fair enough. "Is that it then?"

The thief had expected maybe questions about Storm things when she picked up the phone and heard the Lighting on the other end, or maybe even news they finally had a new Cloud in. Even more rock related news, not 'you're getting published'.

She still didn't know how she felt about it. That was... pretty much par for the course with her and new things.

"How many copies do you want sent to you?"

"Erm... two for both me and Tats for sure." Sonya had to think about it for a moment, but eventually shrugged even if the other woman wasn't going to be able to see it. "Two more on top of that. You might not even have to send it, we'll be there at least this spring if not by mid-winter."

Renato did deserve something for pitching in with Tatiana, even if he seemed to rather loath actually spending time with his fellow Sun. He wrote things down and gave it to the nurse instead of actually talking with her, but since that seemed to work for the two Suns the thief hadn't exactly asked about why they did it that way.

She wasn't sure what she'd do with that last copy, but it would be helpful to have on hand if she needed another bribe for Nono Vongola or maybe even Fong if the man kept making himself useful. ...speaking of which...
"It's not going to take me that long, I have a format to encode with and most of the information in front of me right this moment. When I get your two journals for you and your sister's Flames I'll take less than half a month to write it all up with a sprinkle of hippy-love liberally smeared within. December, maybe."

"...I'll be in Italy at the end of December."

"I'll have one sent, just so you can see for yourself." Galina promised wickedly. "I'll talk to you later, Sonya. Congratulations, by the way."

"Erm… thanks?" For what was she being congratulated for?

The Lightning in Moscow hung up before the bewildered Storm-Cloud could ask.

Feeling confused and a little bit cheap, Sonya hung up her own end.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 7th of November, 1968 continued. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Fong snatched a glittering thing pitched at his head out of the air, slowly allowing himself to recover his stance to the 'ready position' for Tongbeiquan katas he was ingraining into his muscle memory. Then he looked at what he had in his palm.

"Cinnamon Stone garnet." Sonya informed him flatly as she approached him. "My current match. See if it works for you."

"I thought you said."

"I'm not going to sit around so you can test upwards of two hundred rocks for what you want." She snapped irritably, shooting the dojo's attendant that showed her in a suspicious glare for his hovering near them. "I have way too much to do as it is. I can toss a couple your way until you either find a bad match or you stop."

"Stop what?" He asked, rolling the little gem around his fingers.

"Stop trying to be helpful. I appreciate you found Tats something to do." The prickly Russian Storm-Cloud gifted him with a flat look. "However, I also understand that for her to have met you late one night on an island of this size means it is either a very convenient coincidence or a coincidence made to happen."

It really had been by chance, but he was mostly certain she wasn't going to believe him if he said so. Instead of try defending himself, he turned his attention to the dark reddish-brown jewel.

The martial artist had little luck with her last one, the red tourmaline. He had been moderately surprised the jewel hadn't just crumbled into dust under the force of his own Flames like everything else had, but aside a rapid lightening of color where he prodded it the gem had proved to be mostly useless for him.

This one proved to be only slightly different, although with his new experience in holding back the full force of his Storm allowed him to actually see this jewel almost wick the bright red Flames into it.

It glowed momentarily with an inner fire borrowed from the Triad member, then a crack suddenly split the garnet into three pieces.

"...a really bad match then. Not quite." Sonya didn't sound surprised as Fong allowed the gem pieces to fall into his palm. "Ever try those Storm Flame rings?"

"Once." Actually... the garnet behaved just like that ring had, glowing for a split second before it too shattered. Not quite as cleanly as this one had. "Is this...?"

"Possibly. I don't know." The thief also didn't sound remotely interested either, but if she had asked in the first place that had to mean it was something she'd want to know. "Pity about that."

Fong ran the pad of his thumb along the new sharp edges and thoughtfully regarded her as she considered the jewel fragments he now had.

A nominally minimal range of physical expression meant he was generally guessing in the dark as to what she felt or really thought, and the woman was blunt enough to need some mental adjustment to get used to. A handful of meetings did not a good rapport make, nor did it give him enough experience to try figuring out what it was she was thinking about.

Two hostile, two semi-belligerent, and only one other occasion she had refrained from glaring at him meant this was still new ground for him when it came to her.

"Tatiana isn't defenseless." The Russian informed him after the long pause with a narrow look. "As a Sun, they have this thing called 'self-healing'. Trying to knock out or drug her will only irritate her, and I swear to high hell if you try... I don't care if I have to go through your entire Triad, I will kill you."

"Are you sure you can?" He asked after a pause, because female and a thief aside... she was still a Cloud.

Threats from one were entirely respectable things to take in consideration.

"I only have to kill if I fuck up a heist, Fong. And I've never had to kill to cover my tracks."

Sonya had also used that stealth against him once before when her temper snapped, and she ended up carving a furrow into the island almost using Fong himself as a shovel. He hadn't exactly fared too well against it, although they both had been tired by the time she thought to make use of her career given stealth.

She plucked the broken bits of her jewel out of his palm, a slightly wry cast to her lips that showed she was aware he let her do it without much trouble. "You're somewhat fascinating, if rather annoying. I'd be disappointed if I had to try my hand at assassin's work."

"I will try not to disappoint." At least, not until he was sure if she ever had a reason to try killing him he'd at least stand a chance of catching her before she knifed him in the ribs.

He was pretty sure learning to fight blind would help in that respect. If the woman was a little less stubbornly standoffish, he might have rather banked on the idea of befriending her to the point she wouldn't try murdering him for any offense.

He was just as stubborn, however. While he wouldn't rely on any overtures of comradeship to net him results, he was still going to try if only to see which of them was worse in that respect.
"...de Mort?"

The thief blinked in surprise, since she had only used that name in conjunction with the Großes Volksfest or her private investigator. It was France, Bjørn hadn't managed to find her another one or two contracts in the general area in time so she had a decent amount of time to kill and had been wasting it by looking around a port city built on the Garonne River.

...what the hell was his name again?

"Detective." Sonya temporized instead of admitting she didn't recall the man's name, glancing to the side instead of the shop window display she had been considering. "Hello."

The Frenchman gave her a wry grin, scratching a bit at the stubble on his chin. "Didn't expect to see you here. In Bordeaux, I mean. It wasn't too long ago I talked to you last."

"Well... kind of here for work, but mainly to follow up on the information you gave me." She admitted, her attention returning to the display.

High heels just looked like a bad idea. Who the hell put stilts on their heels and wandered around in them?

She couldn't decide if she wanted to actually try a pair out and see if it snapped her ankle or not.

"And doing a bit of shopping on the side?" The man asked with audible amusement as he got close enough to see what she was pondering.

"I have a company party to attend in a month, so unfortunately."

"Ah... so... where is your husband?"

Sonya jerked slightly, then peered over at the PI in bewilderment. "My what?"

"Skull de Mort?"

"...is my brother."

Sartre, she finally recalled the name, suddenly looked a little surprised himself. "Oh! Oh well... that, I see."

From the look he gave her, she doubted it.

"We're foster siblings. We were raised as such, not biologically." The Russian informed him dryly when his glances to her hair became a bit more than obvious. "Bit of a fan?"

"I've caught a few of his shows, when he was just starting out." Admitted the detective without an ounce of shame, a rather charmingly boyish grin on his face as he stuffed his hands in his pockets. "He's really good."

"I'll have to take your word for it, I worry too much to actually watch one all the way through."

"Well, little sister. I can understand that."

She gave the man a sideways look. "Did you just stop to say hello, and for a possible chance to meet my brother?"
"Slightly." Sartre shrugged with another wry grin, not ashamed at getting caught out by her. "I will admit to possible ulterior motives behind talking to you, but now that I know… would you like to get some coffee?"

"Aren't you in the middle of something?" She asked with a touch of confusion, because she knew his office was based in a different city.

"Ah! …shit." The man swore, looking around and more intently down the street. Almost taking a step away from her but pausing and turning back quickly. "About that coffee?"

"Maybe, if you find me again before I leave the city." Sonya agreed in bemusement, wondering what the hell he wanted from her if he now knew her brother wasn't around.

"I can do that, de Mort." Sartre agreed quickly, sticking a hand out but kissing the back of hers instead of shaking it. "Until later."

The thief stared after him, then looked at her hand. She didn't know people still did things like that. She hadn't thought she was that far back, honestly.

With a sigh, she gave one final glance at the store display then entered the damn shoe store.

The worst that would happen is twisting her ankle, and she was not only a slightly rusty ballerina but also a circus trained acrobat. Stilts shouldn't be that hard, right?

…right?

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 11th of November, 1968 continued. Bordeaux, French Republic.)

Apparently, the trick was not to walk on your heels when wearing high heels but more on the ball of the foot and rest on the heels when needed. Sonya still couldn't decide if she liked them or not.

Strappy little black heels aside…

Bordeaux was, again, a river-side port city on the western side of France. Wine country, old-style architecture reaching as far back as the eighth century, lots of bridges, and oddly planned out streets that didn't so much as intersect as cross over one another at angles.

She got lost in Bordeaux very easily. When a city block wasn't a square but more triangle in shape following a curve of a river, she confused her counts of what side of the block she was on and her orientation of what direction she was going in a lot.

She could deal with curving roads, dead ends, and roundabouts. Those were all easily accommodated or navigated around. Angled streets just screwed with her, and she had started to suspect it was a very insidious kind of tourist trap mechanic.

Still a very pretty city to get lost in, but when your intent was to find where you were going and not sightsee… it got irritating fast.

When she ended up on the Pont-de-Pierre Bridge for the third time in as little as an hour, the thief was about ready to give up and ask around for directions.

"Lost, de Mort?"

"I do not have the greatest sense of direction, but I suspect this city was made this way to entrap those used to more solidly square-shaped urban areas." Sonya admitted to the private investigator with full honesty, folding up her map and giving the Frenchman a considering look. "Help?"

Sartre had found time for a shave and a change of coat at least, before he tracked her down again. "Of course, where to?"

"Rue Fondaudège. I can find my way from there."

"...that's up near Notre-Dame." He informed her wryly, jerking his thumb down the street that led straight away from the bridge she was standing next to. "Down until the street comes to an end, a right on up until you see the cathedral."

"I know that much." Admitted the thief sourly, glaring down the main road she was coming to hate. "It's just the kinks in that road throw me off, and I end up going in circles or doubling back along the wrong angle-road because I think I missed it."

Nominally because she was concentrating more on not tripping in heels than counting streets or watching what angled street she was wandering down.

"Why not hire a taxi to get you there correctly?"

…because if Cherep ever heard she had to resort to that he'd never let her forget it. She sighed, packing away her map and giving up on making her own damn way. "I suppose that would be the best idea."

"Can you do coffee today, or must I take a rain check?"

"I am running behind, this was only supposed to be a quick stop for familiarization and a large order for French wine." She admitted sourly. "Another time, Rèmy."

She had to dig through her wallet for his business card in order to recall what his first name was.

"I will hold you to that, Sonya." The man gave her a grin, another kiss to the back of the hand, then walked off.

…that was flirting, right?

It was more like what Renato did when he wanted to charm such-and-such out of their pants.

Sonya considered it but shrugged the whole thing off when she felt no desire to escalate that into anything, even if it would cause her elder sister to facepalm.

He was still prior law enforcement. It wasn't like that could go anywhere.

The thief still had to order Mafia Land a shipment of wine, steal a recipe, and do a little breaking-and-entering of a private residence left to do. Right now, her main concern should be figuring out where the hell a recipe for Absinthe was.

…and not breaking an ankle on her two-inch heels.

Impulse buying was a nasty, horrible thing.

---

(Tuesday the 12th of November, 1968. Bordeaux, French Republic.)
Wine ordered, and a likely location figured out, Sonya turned her attention to the ancestral home of a three-century dead Arcobaleno.

Private residence security hadn't gotten any better over the years and unfortunately the Carpentier family had sold and moved from the childhood home of Pierre-Antoine, former Arcobaleno of the Storm. The original house had also been condemned, torn down, and a new house built over the ruins of the old over three hundred years.

The Russian thief's intent wasn't to steal anything from the family that lived in the house built on top of the location of Pierre-Antoine's former residence, but to poke around to see if the Arcobaleno had left anything behind on the lot.

It was the basement that netted her something, the ancient stone mason had either made or repurposed a small cache behind a corner brick that lined the walls. Five hours of poking around the back garden and four of actually searching the house's ancient foundations later.

She knew it had to be Pierre-Antoine, not very many would identify themselves with ‘la tourmente’.

It was embellished into a plate on the box of lacquered wood she withdrew from the niche behind the basement wall.

Unfortunately, it also wasn't well preserved.

Part of the box crumbled to dusty wood fragments in her hand, the half-corroded metal plate that held the French word for tempest falling out and hitting the brickwork under her knees. The papers inside had weathered the centuries about as well as the rest of the container. That was to say… badly. Some of it was fragmented, others damaged by water, and a few just had blotchy patches of faded ink instead of words.

Scoping it all up and packing it away carefully in one of the resident family's freshly washed sheets, the thief put it into her backpack and snuck her way out of the slowly waking house.

She'd take a look at it all later and figure out how much was useless to her and what might help. All she needed were more names. However, she also had a recipe to steal and no real good excuse for remaining in Bordeaux after her 'business' was finished and her wine shipped.

…instead of stealing the damn recipe, she was going to take a picture and a handwritten copy of it.

A break-in was much less suspicious than a theft.

(Saturday the 21st of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Less than a month of working on it, and Sonya still didn't really like her high-heels much.

They weren't bad, but they could hurt if you wore them long enough. She decided heels were only for special occasions, because she was sure as hell not going to wear them into a fight or anyplace she might be doing a lot of walking again.

Getting lost might have been the cause, but blisters on one's feet were still not fun regardless of reasons.

One more night, then she could kick them off and ignore she had them… for most of a year until and or if she attended Vongola's next Christmas Ball.
Tatiana bemoaned the fact the thief's feet were so small, it meant the nurse couldn't steal her little sister's shoes. Her fashionable, French shoes.

Sonya was still bemused by the entire thing when the sisters split up, one heading for Soviet Russia and the other to Italy.

They were little torture devices attached to the heel, why did the Sun want to wear them so badly?

Sonya was a little surprised to get a personal greeting from a bouncy baby Mist brat at the Iron Fort's door again. Given she had rather recently seen the kid, she hadn't expected a personal reception.

"Miss Sonya! You came!"

"I said I would, brat." The thief informed him blandly, eying the kid beaming up at her.

Shamal was now up to her upper abs in height, which she could've sworn the brat had been waist high to her only two months ago. He also wasn't tugging on her to get picked up, which she supposed was a good thing. While she could pick him up, it would look a bit odd to do so with a kid more than half her size.

Taking off her brace of weaponry proved easier with the left arm chains, the doorman's twitch when he realized there had been a reason she was taking off her bracelet was mildly amusing.

"But that was before Mister Renato made you mad." Shamal informed her like she hadn't known that, fisting a hand into her calf-length skirt. "I... was a little worried."

"Don't be. Yeah, Renato's an asshole sometimes but that's not your fault. And you were the one to ask me to attend this thing first." She dug her slightly crooked right fingers into Shamal's wavy brown hair, ruffling it lightly. "Technically... I suppose I'm your date."

"Ho? Am I being stood up?"

She shot the hitman descending the staircase a dry look and a smirk. "Tiny bit, I don't think Shamal's going to be able to stay up that late."

"I can too!" The baby... well, she supposed he wasn't a baby anymore, bratty Mist insisted loudly in excitement.

"Let's not and say we did, I don't want you stunting your growth." The thief informed him with another ruffle to already messy hair.

"Aww..."

"Sonya, do you need the doorman for anything else or are you remaining there to make a point?" Renato asked archly as he practically sauntered down the last few steps.

"Oh, right." She looked to the man, who was still eyeing her collection of sharp/pointed/blunt weapons in disbelief. "I'm expecting a package from Moscow. They really should have gotten it to me before now, but I suppose something delayed them a bit. It will likely be transported by a vor, which I would not recommend you answer the door for. They might just decide to break a bone to see if you flinch or not. I'd suggest you send a Mafioso to deal with them instead."

"...very good, Miss Nikishina." The man managed, after a moment of paling at what was probably the idea of random Russians breaking his bones out of banal curiosity. "Would you like to be informed when or if such an individual arrives?"
"They probably won’t relinquish the package without me there to take it, so yes."

"Of… course…" He glanced to the tray that held her weapons, to the door he finally shut behind her, and then at the thief herself. "Excuse me, I will have the maids take your luggage to your suite in a moment."

"What package?" Renato inquired shortly, giving her a semi-suspicious look.

"Why am I not sur-" He cut himself off to yank his shin away from bratty Mist's kick. "The hell, Shamal?"

"Be nice until she's not mad anymore." The kid demanded quickly, grumpily scowling up at his guardian and fisting his other hand into the thief's skirt so he had a two-handed grip on her. "I want her to stay."

"I can't exactly live here, brat." The thief quipped blandly, knuckling his head a little just because it was within her reach. "Speaking of book package, I never did manage to ask if you wanted your name included before the deadline the editor demanded. They temporized and put in your initials instead."

"My…?" Repeated the hitman blankly, then suddenly blinked and looked at her thoughtfully as he probably lifted the details out of her head. "…really."

She arched an eyebrow at him in silent demand.

"…thank you for not putting my name in a hippy book, aside whatever other things it may be." He drawled after a moment, placing his right hand on the crown of his hat and concealing any facial expression behind the brim that might have told her what he really thought about it.

"You're welcome." She informed him flatly, slightly irritated that he was going to be of no help in sorting out what she thought of having her name on a hippy book.

Again, aside whatever else it might really be.

Shamal glanced between them suspiciously but didn't see a reason to try assaulting Renato again in the end.

Sonya huffed at them both, disentangling his hands from her skirt. "Now, where the hell am I staying for the next two nights?"

(Monday the 23rd of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Renato very carefully arranged the situation the moment he heard a Russian male of likely criminal origins reached and passed the port of Catanzaro and was headed rather determinedly south.

The stage, a library room Sonya was known to frequent when a resident of the Iron Fort. The cast was himself, the woman in question, a bratty Mist, and various other maids as well as Visconti looking up some tidbit of recent history.

He had maybe less than half an hour to draw a certain thief into a leading conversation where someone of Nono's could overhear and understand the relevant information.

"...published, though?"

The thief gave him a considering look over Shamal's head, who was rather intently powering through a few Cyrillic alphabet exercises she had given him. "Yeah, it surprised me too. I didn't actually think about it myself."

"You did all that work for nothing?" Renato prompted, maybe a touch half-heartedly.

If she didn't go into detail, or ended up unwilling to talk about it, he'd stop pressing.

He liked Timoteo, and he'd try to help the Don in return for stepping in when the hitman's troubles got over his head. Sonya was equally as valuable if on a more personal level, however.

…and he was on thin ice with her already.

"Not for nothing. If it helped my foster family, then I did something." She sunk her fingers into Shamal's hair again, that was turning into a habit, which earned her a beaming smile before bratty Mist returned to puzzling out her native language's written system. "I made what I had available to my clan since we had several Flame users popping up like daisies, and I guess it all snowballed from there to… this. Remember, I helped another Mist before this brat with his own Flames. That was kind of part of it."

The hitman got the mental impression of another Mist child that liked to touch the thief a bit too much out of her head, a half-recalled impression rather than actually formed thought. "So, did they jump over your head with publishing your work on Flames or what?"

"Not quite. I'm no longer the only one contributing to that anymore." She batted that thought away absently, stretching her legs out under the table Shamal was still hard at work on. "There's four main… um, test subjects? We're not really researchers, but more like… the ones that deal with it more, who add in more information as we expand the pool of Flame users we know of. I wouldn't have published it myself, it's not even remotely near complete since we have yet to find a Sky we can use for it, but… I wasn't the one in charge of that."

"It still sounds as if they went over your head."

"...do you think so?" She questioned curiously, her attention more inward than out which enabled Visconti to discreetly slip out of the library without her knowing.

…and possibly she didn't care what her fellow Cloud was up to. Renato wasn't betting on it though, he had already tripped one of her hot buttons and this was as far as he'd go to warn or tip off Timoteo about what his thief associate was up to.

Don Vongola was a Don and powerful in his own right. Sonya was practically Shamal's mother-figure just because Renato asked for a bit of help from her.

"How much of this book is going to be pulled purely from your own effort?"

"I think… Galina said the forward is about word-for-word my views on the basics of Flame user personalities, and the fallacies inherent in that. Why it is everyone seems to assume Clouds are violent and aggressive normally when they're really just a bit judgmental, Mists being entirely deceptive in Flame user terms and really just as powerful as their imagination can stretch, those sorts of things. Bits from other Flame users on their personalities are going into that, so not entirely me." The Russian Storm-Cloud puzzled over it a bit more, either too distracted or ignoring she had not only Shamal's attention but several other of the lesser Mafiosi that had been hanging about as well. "The seven chapters on each Flame has the beginning pulled from what I sifted through about thirty children's story plots to condense, but that's about a quarter of the whole thing. Most of the Sky chapter, though."

"So... almost half of it is still purely your own work with a couple add-ins from others." Renato summed up for her, earning a blank blink for his trouble.

When the hell did she start that thing?

She was only eighteen, about to be nineteen, according to the records Mafia Land kept on her. She had been what, sixteen when she admitted she knew how another Flame's beginners behaved and could help Shamal for him?

A Flame type that, historically, she was supposed to dislike on sight?

The thief had known of her own Flames before the age of twelve and could use them at will. Possibly half a decade of effort at least, upwards to a full decade at most if she had a very early start like the hitman himself.

He wasn't really surprised to hear she had finally gotten her work published but was a little bemused that she seemed to not think much of it. Then again, he was only hearing about the tail-end of that little situation, the details were a bit more than murky from where he sat.

"It's not really all my work, though." Sonya protested, both weakly and irritated that her defense was so weak. "There are others and, since I only have two usable Flame types and one last one I never got the hang of pulling on, the rest of that information is something I would never have gotten on my own."

That sounded like someone else already had this argument with her already. She didn't think of that last Flame type, which was a bit of a pity.

"First come first serve." Renato tried instead.

Whatever it was she would have responded with was interrupted by a maid hesitantly poking her head into the library and almost tripping over herself when she spotted the thief. "Miss Nikishina, a vor is here to see you."

Sonya hauled herself upright in a smooth movement, using the couch the hitman was sprawled out on while she taught Shamal how to read and write basic Cyrillic words. "Did he give a name?"

"He said his name was Arseniy-"

"Oh!" The Russian suddenly bolted, from standing still to flat out running in less than a second. Twisting deftly around the surprised maid in the doorway on her way out without another word to anyone else, even the brat.

Keenly curious, Renato unfolded himself as well and stalked after her. Shamal scrambled to follow, clutching his little worksheet and just as curious. Maybe a touch jealous of whoever it was that stole the thief's attention from him so thoroughly.

The hitman had to hide a smirk at the pout on the brat's face he caught sight of in one of the various look-around corner mirrors on the way to the Iron Fort's foyer.

He came to a stop at the top of the staircase Sonya flat out ignored and simply leapt over. Just in time to see her all but throw herself into the arms of an unknown man coming through the doors after shooting Tyr a suspicious look.

…who the fuck was that?

"Arseniy! I didn't know you were coming!" The thief chattered in rapid fire Russian, still not letting the man go and seemingly perfectly happy when he hugged her back.

Completely unaware or uncaring of the fact the very act of doing so seemed to have crashed the mental processing power of everyone that had become curious over yet another Russian criminal's impending arrival.

Mostly to see if Sonya was just that unusual or not.

Seriously, who was that?

The thief barely put up with her own sister touching her, and yet this…?

"I volunteered." The much older Russian rumbled back in the same language in a voice barely loud enough to carry, casting a grim look over her blonde head at everyone gaping at the Storm-Cloud's behavior as his arms dropped from around her. "Wanted to see what you were blowing us off to do."

"I'm not blowing you all off, it's just…” Sonya frowned slightly, finally letting the man go and switching back to Italian. "Hey, Shamal! Come down here."

His first impulse was to say no, but tetchy Mist brat was already past him and tripping his own more moderate pace down the stairs to the thief. Reluctantly, the hitman followed. If only to figure out what kind of relationship the two Russians had.

Sonya wouldn't risk Shamal anyways, if the man was a threat she wouldn't have called for him.

He wasn't particularly happy with that thought, but he knew it was true.

She could probably break the 'vor' in half if he tried anything she didn't like. If she didn't like it.

That also wasn't a thought he was very content with.

"Shamal, this is Arseniy Pavlovich Bazanov." Renato almost missed a step as he recalled that was the name she had been going by in Mafia Land. "My foster father."

…not quite what he expected.

The hitman recovered his balance before anyone could notice he lost it for a second, strolling up to the tiny group lingering in the doorway in his brat's wake.

Apparently blocking the door was a Russian habit, because the vor didn't look too bothered to budge. The poor doorman was torn between asking the heavily muscled and tattooed Russian and his Storm-Cloud daughter to move or keeping his mouth firmly shut to not draw possibly hostile attention.

Shamal was a bit too occupied himself to notice anything strange going on, staring up at the man his adored Miss Sonya claimed as father. The older Russian male was peering back down at him in a scrutinizing manner.

As for the thief herself, she glanced between the two of them looking mildly expectant.
"You're really big. How do I get that big?" Tetchy Mist brat blurted out without an ounce of shame, still gaping.

Arseni gave a slow blink, then huffed and answered in a voice that sounded like he gargled gravel, gasoline, and a few rusty chainsaws for the hell of it every morning. "By drinking your damn milk."

Shamal apparently interpreted any Russian's bland stare or tepid response as either an invitation to cuddle or a promise of guaranteed safety, because the brat fearlessly went up to give the Russian bear of a man's thigh a hug. "Hi, can I call you grandpa?"

"No." He gave his daughter a semi-irritated, slightly narrow look, but the most she did was all but beam back at him expectantly.

"Please?"

"You're no long my favorite." Arseniy grunted out at her in their native language, patting Shamal on the head once and switching back to his heavily accented Italian. "Hello brat, and no."

"I will always be your favorite, until Valera actually has a personality and can do more than mess his diaper and toddle about." Sonya claimed pleasantly to him in Russian with a shrug. "After that he'll be your favorite, so I should milk my current position for everything I can while I can."

The expression that crossed the vor's face was a mix of exasperation and grudging agreement of that opinion.

Bratty Mist slyly peered around the trunk of a leg he was hugging to his chest like a treasured stuffed animal. "Can I call you mamma then, Miss Sonya?"

"...here, I suppose you can. Just not anywhere else." Sonya agreed flatly, after a moment of staring at the kid's mainly hopeful and slightly devious face.

Renato was a little disappointed he had picked a spot far enough away he couldn't get what she really thought of that request out of her head, but he also didn't want to attract her father's attention before he was damn well ready to.

...the man almost about Tyr's height, and the master assassin was taller than the hitman by a few inches. The vor was also about a few inches wider than either Italian was, more than most of that was pure muscle.

Little Russian Storm-Cloud also seemed perfectly willing to heed to him regardless of what orders he might just give.

That might just be the more disturbing fact about the little scene going on.

Sonya missed the memo of his desire to remain at least somewhat unnoticed for a time, she gestured straight to him to attract the vor's attention. "Arseniy that is Renato Sinclair. Shamal's... godfather, and my hitman friend."

The Russian vor shot the Italian Mafioso a considering look, then grinned darkly.

Renato played off his lingering a bit far away as giving the little family unit some privacy even if he was still part of the traffic pile of people that had either been there from the start or heard and came running to gape. Arseniy stuck out a hand, and he took it with only a slight hesitation.

The reason the older man was happy to meet him was because he now had what he looked like and a name. If the creepy stalker of his youngest daughter ever did anything to hurt her, he would have less trouble hunting him down to skin alive… like how the vor had hunted down Sonya's biological father to castrate for hurting and abandoning her as a little girl.

…he was torn between being insulted, admiring that kind of dedication to his family, highly amused the man was only slightly against letting Shamal call him grandfather, and… being slightly wary of this Russian.

As well as a little disgruntled her brother Cherep happily sold him out as the creepy stalker of his sister to their foster father.

Renato would dearly love to have words with the stuntman, but the thief wasn't exactly happy with him at the moment so that would have to be delayed a bit.

"Nice to meet you." He drawled out wryly instead of anything else he might have wanted to say. Like the fact he wasn't a creepy stalker of women.

"Likewise." Grunted Arseniy, then looked at his daughter. "Have a moment?"

"As long as I get my..." Sonya snatched the book-shaped package the vor produced from his inner coat pocket. "Yes."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 23rd of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Even if it was masquerading as hippy spirit mumbo-jumbo, Sonya was always adequately distracted with her nose in a book. It gave Arseniy a bit of time to take a few impressions in while she was mostly ignoring everything else.

Lisa had offered the opinion that little Italian Shamal their youngest foster child was so hung up on might be a child either in a situation similar or relatable to her earlier years before them. That was why their notoriously prickly and standoffish youngest foster daughter would go out of her way for the little brat.

The vor couldn't see it, now that he finally met everyone involved.

The kid did end up transplanted into a criminal lifestyle due to losing his real father, and Mafioso Sinclair actually showed some honor in taking him in. That was about it for any parallels.

Shamal was perfectly happy with his life and how it was going, not nearly scared out of his wits and repressing anything remotely vulnerable hard enough to ice over, especially with Sonya and the Italian hitman ensuring he had a life to be happy about.

He was also perfectly happy sitting in the thief's lap as she read, occasionally interrupting her reading with a question of how to read such-and-such Cyrillic word. Shamal also got away with doing it.

Arseniy, who had literally watched her raise hell for Tatiana even dislodging her bookmark from its place once, was entirely fascinated by the sight.

Not exactly happy with it himself, though.

Why was she saddling herself with a kid this early?

Furthermore, if she had to have a kid why pick one that came attached with an Italian Mafioso?
He would've preferred it if she got herself involved with one of her generation's upcoming vor if she had to, rather than some foreigner he didn't know and couldn't reach easily.

Since the vor was sure Sonya attaching herself to the Shamal kid wasn't pity or sympathy related, he figured it was probably Flame related and not something he'd be able to understand without a bit of help.

One of the best sources for any Flame related issues they had also probably wouldn't be able to see herself clearly enough to figure out why she was so attached to a kid totally different than her in both situation and personality. His younger foster daughter also had a strange little blind spot when it came to herself, like she wasn't or couldn't be affected by whatever was going on unless she was aware or chose to let it.

Which, to be fair, she rarely was wrong in that. Digging past that little coat of ice around her had taken him and Lisa three years to get through so she could at least understand they were not going to hurt or discard her as easily as her biological parents had. Tatiana had taken five to reach her little sister on a level they both understood was sisterly then several more years so they were both comfortable in it.

The only exception had been Cherep, and now this little Shamal brat. Both she had met when they were young Flame users, and both somehow gained one vicious champion/fussy guardian angel in her.

Again, Arseniy didn't like it. However, he knew his entirely stubborn daughter wouldn't give up something she liked easily or without a massive fight. Sonya liked Shamal, so she would not be giving him up either.

However, maybe he could get her more interested in the vor back home before she brought home some foreign man. Like the hitman lurking in the corner keeping most of his eye on his ward and the other half on his damn foster daughter. "Dmitriy got arrested."

Humming absently, she placed a finger on the text and looked up at him. "I was wondering how he managed to duck Galina for a month or two long project. How long has he been putting that off?"

He snorted at her dry observation, smirking at the familiar wit he hadn't heard in nearly a year. "You should've heard her bitch about it. Three year sentence, battery and attempted murder. Which was bullshit because there was no intent to murder, he was merely shaking up one of our debtors and allowed himself to get caught an hour later. He should've gone in a few years ago, but he was needed where he was."

"Who's in charge now he's out for prison time? Galina?"

"I am, because it is technically a training course." The vor corrected her with a shrug. "I'm leaving it up to her, because I still don't understand this fucking fire shit you do. You might want to go pitch in a little bit when you make it home next year."

"I will-"

Sonya cut herself off when Shamal placed his hands flat on the pages he had been puzzling at and nearly clocked her in the jaw with the top of his head when it shot up in alarm. "But you have to make it back for my birthday, mamma!"

"I will do that too, brat, calm down." Shifting her book so the kid's hands fell off, the thief huffed at him as he sank back down on her lap with a rather impressive pout. "It shouldn't take me that long.
Dmitriy's not stupid. He would've left his plans for the Flame users he was teaching Galina and I can follow somewhere obvious."

"She found them." Arseniy informed her, eyeing the kid in her lap and the mulish expression there. "Why don't you bring the brat up to meet the rest of the family?"

Lisa would be endlessly amused at her bringing yet another stray home with her, so long as it wasn't her own blood kid before she hit twenty. 'Grandmother' wasn't a title his lover was going to accept, however. Maybe he could get out of being considered as 'grandpa' at the same time.

Fuck, he wasn't that old just yet.

"I would, if someone wasn't so god damn paranoid over his safety." She claimed, shooting the so far silent Italian Mafioso a look.

Sinclair simply shrugged that off, tilting his head to the side to peer at the younger Russian from under the brim of his hat. "Other than you, I have no good contacts in Soviet Russia. I don't even understand how the Soviet underworld works. If something happens to you when Shamal's there, the brat would be more than a little exposed."

"Your faith in me is astounding." She huffed dryly, returning to her reading.

"I have plenty of faith in your fighting skills, I've seen a bit of it." The hitman drawled out sardonically. "Cloud you may be, but even you would have some difficulty against enough numbers."

"I've not pissed anyone off to earn a great number of people trying to kill me." Refuted the thief, allowing something to distract her from her reading yet again. "Frankly, outside of our clan, I'm not exactly well known."

"You are now." Arseniy interrupted the two, nodding to the book in his foster daughter's hands. "A thief is all well and good, we're a clan of them. No matter how good you are, you're just one more in a sea of them. An expert on Dying Will Flames of the Sky? Different as night is to day. There's been some noise back home of a few people wanting to meet the Cloud of the Zolotov Thieves Clan."

"You have got to be fucking kidding me. I am no expert." Sonya practically spat the word, an affronted look on her face.

"Try telling them that." He offered idly, mildly amused.

"...maybe I will."

"So..." Shamal twisted himself to actually be able to see Sonya's face instead of just sulk in her lap. "...can I go see where you grew up, mamma?"

"Still up to Renato."

The kid peered over at the Mafioso.

Sinclair huffed, glanced between the thief and the vor, and heaved a sigh. "Maybe. Depends. This summer at the earliest, but it might not happen at all. Don't get your hopes up."

The child looked back up to Sonya, who rolled her eyes at him. "Brat, there was an invasion up north in Czechoslovakia. We'd have to pass near that to get to Russia, and if Renato doesn't want to risk you anywhere close to that mess then that's his right."
"Aww…"

Snorting, Arseniy got to his feet now his curiosity was satisfied and she had her delivery. "Your siblings are home, hurry it up girl."

"I'm going to be the last one in for the next couple years, from brat's demand for me to be here for Christmas." She informed him without an ounce of shame, giving a wry little smirk instead. "May as well get used to it."

(Monday the 23rd of December, 1968 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"So… say I'd want to bring a friend home for Christmas. Not this one, next one."

"A girl friend?"

Cherep paused in his repetitive and mind-numbing motions, wondering how to phrase 'nope, a gender-ambiguous friend that likes to switch a lot' in a way that wouldn't cause Lisa to smack him for being crass, rude, or just for the crime of attempting to confuse her. "Err… something like that. A friend of mine, who I'm not even sure has family of their own."

"And you care enough about this friend to want to drag them all the way out here?" Tatiana asked from his right side, hands submerged in soapy dishwater to scrub clean the dishes he was rinsing.

It was a bit odd to not have Sonya on his other side collecting the plates and such to put away, but the stuntman had unfortunately become rather accustomed to not having his baby sister around. Lisa had taken the empty spot and was just as deft as the youngest girl sibling in catching what he might have dropped in his absent-minded wool gathering moments.

…and right then. Damn it, tools were so much more durable.

Their foster mother heaved a sigh, setting the glass he nearly dropped on the counter to give him a stern look with her hands planted on her hips. "If it's that important to you, bring them around so we can meet this person you're being very vague about the gender of. I make no promises, because unless this person is someone you are really interested in? We will not play nice for them."

"I'm pretty certain my friend wouldn't care at all, think Sonya-level of irrelevance paired with a very inventive sense of humor."

"...please for the love of everything holy, tell me this person isn't as dense as our baby sis." Begged his older sister, staring up over the rooftop visible from the window over Lisa's kitchen sink. "I don't think I can take another romantically thick person."

Hello opportunity. "That bad?"

"Sonya finally blew up," the nurse informed them as if that wasn't at all concerning, "like completely lost it to the point there were footprints in the roads she took to get away from people. Carved a great stretch of the island's headway forest up and everything. In other news, as long as Sonya likes someone she won't hold a bitter grudge against them."

Lisa and Cherep exchanged a look, then turned back to the Sun Flame user.
"Sonya did? What happened?" The older Russian woman asked, enough concern in her tone Valera's attention was snagged and he babbled out near-toddler-but-still-baby-talk noises at her either in demand for more food or for reassurance she freely gave him.

"I still haven't gotten the whole story. From what I do know tall, dark, and snarky got a bit of information on either me or Cherep using Sonya herself somehow. Our ever so vicious little sister snapped, did previously mentioned emergency landscaping anger management, and Sinclair practically had to beg for her forgiveness." Tatiana paused, handing off the last plate to the stuntman to rinse and dry then flicking the soapy water from her hands in an absent manner. "On her way to bust up some trees, she ran into Tasty Muscles. You'd know him as Fong, Cherep."

Yeah, he remembered him. The Chinese man with the impossible name that cause his fellow Cloud user a month and a half long disappearance after trying to delay her in Shanghai. "And that's relevant why?"

"She arranged to spar against him, for her conditioning since pure workouts don't exactly benefit her very much anymore, in return for a bit of Flame related help. Muscles volunteered to be a Storm-Cloud's punching-bag. From what injuries they had afterwards, he gave as good as he got but was still flagging a bit behind Sonya when I caught up to them. I'm not exactly sure who would've won if they fought it out to the end, and I don't think they know either."

Cherep wasn't surprised when Lisa whisked the last bit of pottery out of his hands before he fumbled another bit, merely handing over the hand towel before she snagged that too.

…he wasn't quite the same as Sonya was, but he was still a Cloud. The stuntman also had never been truly angry before either. Would he have temper issues when pressed too hard as well?

How the hell was he going to figure that one out before he did something violent and Classically Cloud-like?

The closest he ever got was mildly irritated, and that had been with Sonya herself way back in the day when he had still been living out of that nasty flophouse.

"So that's hottie number two, and I'm pretty sure she's got yet another Italian stud hidden away somewhere else."

"...wait, what?"

Lisa leaned around his bewildered form, giving the Sun a mildly reproving look. "Really, Tatiana?"

"Lisa, you haven't met them yet. I kid you not, they are hot." She defended herself, actually sounding slightly exasperated over it. "And I am pretty damn sure they both want her, but she does not realize it. Or if she does, she explains it away as something else. She only thinks of Sinclair as a friend who might just flirt because she's female and flirt is what he does, or that Fong just wants her Flames for his own reasons."

Actually… from what little the stuntman knew of both… "...isn't that true, though?"

"Well... yes. But they both check her out and everything."

Cherep tapped his chin, tentatively deciding he didn't really need to be too alarmed over either just yet. His little sister might just require a thick two-by-four to the head to realize anything was going on, well before anything concerning happened with them. "So, who's this last Italian you think Sonya knows?"
"I don’t think, I know. Tyr the Sword Emperor. She talked to him on the phone in France, and she sounded downright friendly." She pulled a slight face, half disbelief and half bemused. "Might have been because she was talking to the baby Italian brat as well, though."

"The Sword Emperor? …Vongola's head assassin?"

The stuntman twitched violently at that bit of news and gifted their foster mother with a wide-eyed look. "Please tell me you’re joking, Lisa."

"Sorry Cherep. I have heard of him, and Tyr is an assassin."

An Italian Mafioso hitman, or an equally Italian assassin, or a member of the Chinese Triads?

Cherep really hoped he wouldn’t get anyone like them for a brother-in-law. It probably wasn’t really likely Sonya would settle for a civilian man, because she rarely if at all interacted with any for very long, but he could hope.

…brothers-in-law.

Turning to the redheaded sister in question, the stuntman gave her a semi-joking hard look. "You know, I can’t help but feel suspicious all this talk of Sonya’s non-existent love life is meant to distract us from yours. Bite the bullet, big sis."

"We already heard Cherep may or may not be gay, and Sonya’s not even here to defend herself against your accusations she’s amassing a harem.” Lisa agreed pleasantly, ignoring the Cloud’s squawk of offended dignity and the Sun’s suddenly wary look. "Spill."

"...I’m taking a break from men, actually." She claimed, sourly enough he was actually tempted to believe her at her word.

"...I am not gay." He defended himself to their foster mother in the next second.

"Of course you’re not." Lisa agreed pleasantly again, slapping his cheek a bit harder than what could be called gentle. "Next year, write home more often or I will do worse than embarrass you in front of your siblings where they can carry tall-tales to others."

"...yes ma’am."
Chapter 30

(Tuesday the 24th of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya skimmed through her book just to get a decent understanding of what it covered, intending to do a fully in-depth read later once she had her more burning questions answered.

Finishing it gave her no real help in if she appreciated it being published or not, other than a deep understanding for Galina's claims of even thinking of writing it giving her hives. "Okay, so… whose idea was this?"

Renato, who had been scrutinizing Shamal's progress in multilingual reading exercises far enough away to not pick up her internal read of a book at the same time, gave her a more neutral than normal look and an arched eyebrow. He picked his farther than normal seat specifically, because apparently her reading gave him a headache if he listened in on it.

"It wasn't mine, Tats', Dmitriy's, or Galina's, because we're not really the type to care." As awesome as it was seeing 'Bazanova Sonya' on the author's line of a book, right over Galina's 'edited by' line and easily twice the size of that, it was still… an entirely bemusing prospect.

Aside the fact she could truthfully claim to be an author now if ever asked for what she did aside acquire unspecified items for a mostly imaginary company that only really existed on paper.

Spiritual Fires of the Inner Soul wasn't exactly an imaginative name, but the thief was pretty damn certain she wouldn't have done any better trying to pick something a new Flame user would attempt to pick up in desperation.

It also wasn't as… conclusive as she had expected.

The Inverted Lightning apparently took her comment of 'not done' to heart and ensured they wouldn't have to backtrack on what they put out. Which would have been tricky to do, given these kinds of books never did things like that and actually doing so might attract the wrong kind of attention to it.

Galina had stripped everything back down to the bare basics and built up the whimsical hippie free-love first before adding in different bits and hints to finish padding the book's page-count and chapter thickness. Frankly, if Sonya hadn't known full well it was about Dying Will Flames of the Sky while overlooking both the rainbow of colors 'one's spiritual fires can attain' and their very specific characteristic identifications… she would've ignored it.

Bare to the bone descriptions every one of her research journals started with. A bit of sprinkled tidbits they found out later you'd have to excavate from the bull in order to use. Lots of hippy nonsense waxing on almost lyrically about the benefits and drawbacks of different colored Flames and their effects on lifestyles.

It was basically as much as they gave most of the beginning users and very little else of substance.

…sans a sparkly rock.

No mention of how said Flames tended to interact outside of her forward paraphrased refuting of certain 'widely known traits' in suitable hippy-esque language. While certain Flames were identified as either being fixation, territorial, obsessive, deceptive, diplomatic, energetic, acceptance orientated and so on… very little time was spent in explaining why in their individual chapters, favoring suggestions for coping mechanisms or utilizing them instead.

For fuck's sake, she gave Shamal more details when she tried to help him before that scuffle with the old Mafia Land group happened and made them split up.

It at least wasn't a children's story book, so there was that at least.

Galina didn't have to butcher the characteristics of her and the other's Flame types to make two-dimensional characters that were easily understood to be a Flame user which likely would've ended up either flat or non-relatable. Then think of some kind of plot to have any story be about, which normally reads as clichéd and incredibly stereotypical in what there were of those kinds of books.

A small step up from pro-mafia children's propaganda, and at least not restrictive in how expressive each type could be.

Sonya supposed it was progress… but…

"I am the wrong person to be asking." The hitman sidestepped neatly, giving her slim book the bulk of his attention rather than Mist brat's work.

She didn't think it was any Zolotov Flame user's idea, because they were a bunch of god-damn thieves and this was just… giving something of value away for nothing in return. Which left just others in their clan, and that meant it was either political or something the Inverted Lightning didn't think she could refuse doing without more trouble than it was worth.

Given Dmitriy flat out bailed for a few years of prison time instead of be involved even for a month, maybe even both.

The thief was now pretty damn certain she didn't really like this much.

It was bait, pure and simple.

Anyone who stumbled upon it on their own, with little to no connection to the mafia, would look between children stories written decades to centuries ago they may or may not be able to find and a hippy book on soul fire that rather closely identified and clarified each Flame. Even if it didn't go into much additional detail of what the hell it was, enough of the painfully obvious points were hit to ensure anyone with a slight Flame problem would recognize something that pertained to them.

Then they would likely figure that the best way to get a bit more clarification on their random personal surprise immolation habits would be to contact the author.

There were a handful of other names included, but mainly everyone seemed to prefer initials if at all. Even Cherep had been disinclined to have his real name in it, and his initials under the 'Violet Soulfire, free-spirit against territorial natures' section had been 'СдМ' for Skull de Mort instead of 'ЦБ' for Cherep Bazanov. While she appreciated him keeping his fingers out of things that could come back to bite him, that didn't exactly give anyone more options to go to if they really needed help.

Sonya's legally registered address was the Zolotov's main headquarters building, like most of her fellow non-vor members of the thieves' clan. Which only technically qualified as an apartment building because a couple people did live there.

If anyone went looking for her, that was where they would end up.

In the lobby of the Zolotov Thieves' Clan Headquarters.
Again, bait.

For all the Usovs out there, there were also a handful of others that weren't so lucky to find an adequately informed mafia connection to get help. There were also all those in situations similar to Cherep's childhood one to think about as well. Her own spotty Flame awakening, even.

The book was in Cyrillic, so mainly a Soviet Union kind of thing at most. She barely expected much if any sales, and that all would probably go to the clan instead of her since they were the ones putting it out.

"Well... I suppose it's interesting and all, but... not really all that enthused with it." She informed him slowly, trying to fully sort out her feelings.

Sonya really just felt kind of used, mostly. Again. She had barely given an okay for it using her name, and that had been mostly a last second kind of thing when Galina called her up to get the last two bits she needed to reference from before starting it.

"Is it really that bad?" Renato asked curiously, reaching for her book but jerking away his fingers before she swatted them with said bundle of papers.

"I am not done reading this yet."

"Little lady Sonya, I just watched you finish the damn thing."

Shamal snorted, peeking over at them both mischievously. "But Mister Renato, mamma never lets go of her books."

"Besides," she interjected before he could comment, "we've got to get ready for this party thing now."

"It's three hours from starting." Snapped the Mafioso in protest, glaring at her. "You don't take that long to get ready."

"It's my excuse and I'm sticking to it. I have to wear heels this time, so I do need a bit more time."

She was all but begging for a broken ankle with them. She hadn't suffered anything worse than blisters so far trying them out, but that just meant when it happened she'd be already suitably convinced she wouldn't have problems walking in two- or three-inch heels.

"I feel flattered you're going outside your comfort zone just for little 'ol me." Drawled Renato sardonically, looking more than a little miffed. "I promise to catch you if you take a tumble down some stairs. Or you could just jump them entirely again."

"I'd really break an ankle doing that in heels. I rather not suffer a broken leg for Christmas." She scoffed dryly, ruffling Shamal's hair as she got up. "I'll see you two in a bit, I have to go make myself pretty."

Bratty Mist gave her a semi-exasperated look over his Cyrillic writing exercises. "But you are pretty, mamma."

"That still sounds like a line, brat, but thank you."

He gave the hitman a fully disgruntled little pout. "Maybe if you say it she'll believe me?"

"I'm not getting into this." He refused flatly, stubbornly slouching down in his spot for what looked like a good old-fashioned sulk. "Now, if Sonya could be a little less OCD about her damn books... I might talk."

"Nice try." She tossed over a shoulder with a backwards wave, tucking said book under one arm and turning around to walk backwards in order to give him a superior look. "But I'm not insecure enough to need constant flattery every day to bend under that kind of bribe."

Shamal suddenly launched himself at his guardian, trying to plant both hands over the man's mouth. "Mister Renato! I said don't make her madder!"

Bratty Mist strength against a full-grown Italian Mafioso's was so unbalanced it was unfair, he caught the kid before he fully landed on him. "Damn it, brat. We argue, it's a fact of life. Get over it."

The pout the brat pulled really should have warned him, because a rather swamp-monster like Mist Construct finished the muffling Shamal suddenly couldn't do.

Someone had been watching either terrible horror flicks or very strange cartoons.

"I'm going to murder Ganauche for letting you watch those movies." Renato swore viciously as he ducked the monster-thing, a handful of Sun Flames proving to be not as good as Storm for unraveling Mist illusions.

The man practically had to overload the Construct with his own Flames before it bubbled apart, unlike the tidbit of Storm she needed for a more sedate unraveling effect.

"It was fun, and silly." Shamal enthusiastically informed him as if that excused everything else about the incident. Entirely unconcerned that he had just tried assaulting the hitman and was currently dangling in the air by the man's grip on the back of his shirt. "There was chocolate sauce and ketchup everywhere."

"Try not to break anything, boys." Sonya interjected before bratty Mist's flailing arms could knock over a probably priceless vase sitting on a stand. "I'll see you both in a few hours."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 24th of December, 1968 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"So... did you see it?"

Renato shot the ceiling a beseeching look, hoping that Sonya would hurry the hell up and he could ignore Nono's Lightning Guardian for the rest of the night. "Since I was there when her foster father handed the damn thing over, yes Ganauche. Yes, I did see Sonya's book."

She knew where to go this year, so had informed him he didn't need to pick her up from her rooms again. Shamal had taken the flowers he got her to the thief, and she'd likely deal with instructing the brat not to try waiting up for them this year.

Coyote Nougat obligingly reached over and smacked his fellow Guardian upside the head. He was closer than Brow Nie or Schnitten Brabanters were, and more inclined to physical chastisement than either Sun or Rain.

"Hey!" Ganauche snapped, jerking away from the contact and scowling at the Storm. "All I was trying to say is that it's weird, alright? Since when did the Russians care a wit for Dying Will Flames?"
"When their children started bursting into Flames." A Russian thief informed the Lightning flatly from the hallway behind him, a bit preoccupied with attaching some dangling mess of little metal rods to her ears. "Arseniy alone was a slight bit alarmed when I did it."

Checking her feet as she got closer, just because Sonya tended to favor knee-high boots and he was curious of the change, the hitman got a bit distracted by the split up one side of her skirt. Mostly due to Shamal pulling on it, absently fascinated by how much of her long legs he could reveal depending on how hard he tugged.

"Shamal, stop it."

"He's not hurting anything," the Storm-Cloud finished attaching her earrings and gave the bratty Mist a considering look, "and if he ruins this dress I can blow off the rest of the night and spend it with him instead."

Shamal's face lit up, taking a two-handed grip on the skirt in his hands before Renato snatched it away from him.

Which left him holding the hem of Sonya's dress, who looked highly amused at his action. "Really Renato. If you wanted me in a shorter dress... you only had to say something."

He knew, since he was kind of in her head this close to her, that she was talking about the quality of eye-candy he got to fend off middle-aged mafia wives with. Not that she was willing to allow him to dress her up, or that she cared anything for what he thought of how she dressed herself.

Unfortunately, it didn't exactly sound that straightforward.

The only real reason he never did mind helping a lady shop for clothes was to see them partially undressed or help them find new lingerie, and that just reminded him the color she was wearing rather closely matched that one set he had seen her in when she stripped in an elevator in front of him.

"It's fine." He let go of the dark purple fabric, straightening his cuffs and tugging his jacket down.

Also trying not to remember exactly how short the thief didn't mind her skirt getting, or the flashes of her garters he got when she so much as moved slightly too quickly last year.

"...lucky asshole." Ganauche muttered, mostly to himself but loud enough for them all to hear it.

Sonya shot him a look, actually wondering if the Lightning Guardian was defective or not since he really was nothing like any other Lightning she knew of. She even was going to ask, but the hitman changed the subject quick to stave off that particular conversation from happening.

Lord only knew what the dandy-boy Lightning Guardian of Nono's would do if flat out asked if he was defective. He'd rather it stay unknown.

"How is the Russian mafia structured?"

Renato was fairly curious over the subject anyways and knowing a bit of how a vor became one or what they did would only just help him in cultivating Soviet Union contacts. It wasn't an area he ever had any before her, and the thought she may be perfectly typical for Russians was a fairly jarring thought.

Arseniy had been... interesting, summed up in a word.
Obviously, someone she adored. If she even conformed her way of expressing displeasure to match his… according to Tatiana.

"Um… it's kind of a mess, actually." She answered him honestly enough, a thoughtful frown now on her painted lips. "Frankly, it depends on where you are and who you're dealing with. A vor, from… say, St Petersburg's Grekov Gang is somewhat different than a Moscow Zolotov vor, who are all slightly different from a typical Kazan criminal. All you really need to keep in mind is that if referred to as vor, they spent time in prison and likely won't see a reason not to either brutalize or murder you for any perceived slights."

"That's… interesting." Schnitten interjected with a wry little grin, stretching out his long legs while they waited for the Don of Vongola, his wife, and the last two Guardians to arrive. "So what makes a vor a vor?"

"Prison time." She informed him flatly, giving the Rain Guardian a considering look before elaborating. "All vory serve time, it's kind of required before anyone considers you one. Normally, with us at least, you start out stealing or working for the clan until you finally get arrested for it before gaining that title."

"Your… friend? Dmitriy? You said he had been putting it off."

The thief shrugged a bit absently, checking to ensure she hadn't damaged her dress and that Shamal wasn't up to anything too bad. "He… had been a bit stuck. Needed where he was, but not quite respectable enough to hold his position. Finally letting himself get arrested was kind of overdue, really."

"Let himself?"

This time Brown Nie earned himself an actual frown touched with a bit of suspicion. "…Dmitriy is a Rain, had he not wanted to be arrested it would have been child's play to Tranquilize the militsiya and get away. Either it was finally a bit too much for him to bother, or he wanted to finally get that next step in his career over with on his own terms. Either way, he's in prison now and when he gets out will likely attain that vor classification."

Given the Storm-Cloud was becoming a bit belligerent, and well as possibly unwilling to talk further, the Hard Flame Sun started a conversation with the Rain Guardian instead of press further. Renato wasn't sure if he was surprised or not. She had issues with him at first, and from the sounds of it even with Tatiana as well.

His date for the night was incredibly tolerant for a Cloud in some ways, incredibly backwards in others.

Besides, Shamal had become a bit more interested now that his 'mamma' wasn't sounding very much like what she did usually. He had seen more than enough cut-rate horror film monsters for the week, much less for the day.

Sonya blatantly changed the subject, with enough of a hard look to inform him she wasn't going to be speaking anymore on the subject of her native land's criminal ranks. "I have a personal goal tonight."

"Ho?"

"I would like to meet at least one or two other Italians I wouldn't mind talking to." She paused, looked at each of the Vongola Guardians lingering in the hallway with them, then gave him a slight
"Other than you, Shamal, and Tyr, I mean."

"What? Hey lady, what about us?" Ganauche demanded loudly, a little affronted.

He was promptly kicked in the shins by tetchy Mist brat. "Don't yell at my mamma!"

"I've talked to you exactly how many times?" She asked, uncaring of the assault going on or the now hopping Italian Mafioso's current difficulty. "You're all not exactly my kind of people, and I highly doubt I'm yours."

Coyote sighed heavily, reaching over and plucking Shamal up by the back of his shirt before he could make a few more bruises on the Lightning's legs and they had to keep listening to the man swear under his breath as he tried avoiding assault by brat. "Why don't you keep your mouth shut, for once? If…"

The Storm trailed off, distracted by suddenly having Sonya's completely undivided attention on how he was treating the hitman's ward. When she narrowed her thankfully still grey eyes, he very slowly lowered Shamal back to the floor and released him.

Bratty Mist sniffed in offense, giving Ganauche and Coyote a dirty look each but scampering back to his self-claimed 'mamma'. "Meanies."

Suddenly no longer interested in the Storm Guardian, the thief neated up the preening kid's hair as much as she could with only her fingers and looked back to the mildly surprised Renato. "Well?"

"...I don't think I like this prospective change to our evening. What's wrong with what we did last year?" He asked instead of anything else he wanted to say.

Which was summed up as… what the fu was that?

She had both looked and had been fully willing to rip Coyote's arm off and clock him a good one with the soggy end if he had kept on holding Shamal up a good three feet off the floor. She never was bothered when Renato did the same thing, so he wasn't sure what that was.

She apparently didn't think there had been anything strange to her behavior, she was now musing more on the people they had seen last year than the Vongola Storm Guardian. "If I can find someone I don't mind talking to, you won't have to play attendant to me all night and can do a bit of networking of your own."

"Again, what was wrong with what we did last year?"

"We can then make suitably sarcastic comments about how well their personalities match their atrocious fashion sense once done with them."

"...sold."

Ganauche, who ended up hopping slightly behind the Storm-Cloud after getting assaulted by a half-pint Mist, and Brown Nie both looked a bit more than just envious of Renato's freedom to be less than the perfect hosts. Possibly even the fact he had a date that didn't mind him making new contacts rather than spending all of his attention on her.

Coyote and Schnitten were warily eyeing said date, trying to figure out what it was the Storm Guardian had tripped off. She was fine now, from what the hitman knew it really had only been a spike of pure irritation.
He also wasn't sure if he should be smug over netting Sonya as a date or be a little insulted she didn't seem to think he'd keep her attention all night. They had done just fine last year, hadn't they?

…this actually would be the longest they had interacted since he ticked her off, barring interacting with Shamal's civilian teacher. Pressing his luck with her temper didn't really sound like much of a good idea if she didn't want to.

(Wednesday the 25th of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Stop introducing me as a Flame expert."

"Like it or not, little lady Sonya, you are. Published and everything." Renato informed her in an insufferable tone, following her rather aimless wander very far away from the last group. "You should probably get used to it."

Don such-and-such and his insipid wife, who had an actually marginally intelligent son but little else of note. Unfortunately, said son pretty much kept his trap shut while his father waxed on in what he probably thought fondly as lyrically on the subject of prostitution rings and how they worked. While eyeing her like a slab of beef.

She had not been amused, but at least the hitman she was with had been equally disgusted with the subject matter and got them out of there neatly.

Sonya was starting to wonder if she had already met any Italians of note.

Her date for the evening suddenly stopped, looking to a group that had just walked into the Iron Fort's ballroom. "Can you entertain yourself for a few? I've been meaning to talk to that Mafioso."

She didn't bother to try and see who he was talking about, she'd never be able to pick an unknown individual out of the crowded room without a description and a direction. "Sure. I'll be by the buffet tables when you're done."

He touched the brim of his fedora in salute, strolling off with enviable skill in weaving between the aimless traffic currently packed into one room.

Sonya picked the buffet tables not because she was hungry, she was but they would be eating in as little as another half-hour, but because they were rather firmly situated on the east side of the ballroom. Just as they had been last year. As something to wander her way to, and possibly find something alcoholic to dull her headache with, it was a decent landmark.

Picking her way through the crowd wasn't too difficult, although unlike Mafia Land it seemed as if no one believed her dress color represented her Flame type. Some fancy footwork in two-inch heels were needed to keep herself unmolested, and from getting smacked when venturing too close to various knots of people.

Strangely, it was kind of nostalgic. For the point in time before every criminal on a free-moving island knew exactly what her main Flame type was and avoided the hell out of her.

Irritating, but nostalgic.

She ended up musing on which was worse, the irritation she got when people flat out avoided her or her irritation when people crowded her.
It distracted her well enough on her ponderous way through the press of criminals and corrupt government officials rubbing elbows with likeminded people, until she reached the fringe groups that surrounded the buffet tables.

…and walked right into someone else's conversation.

"would not work. While a Hard Flame Lightning and a Soft Storm might get along, we would need either or. No Hard Cloud would tolerate a Mist for very long, regardless of what kind of Mist was involved. That alone would mean we can't get a whole range of users."

Trying really hard not to roll her eyes, the thief sidestepped the platinum blonde woman in blue that nearly smacked her to continue on her way.

"Have a different opinion then, miss… ah…?" Regardless of her lack of knowledge over who she was, one of the women in the knot in a dark indigo pantsuit reached out to try grabbing Sonya's arm. She put up with it, if only because she was pretty sure Nono would be very vexed at her if she resorted to snapping finger bones. Even if it would be very satisfying, she'd rather not have to bribe her way out of the Don's bad side.

The woman who tucked the smaller thief's fingers into the crook of her arm patted said fingers and tugged the disgruntled Storm-Cloud over to the group she had tried to bypass.

Miss Silver-white blonde, the one that nearly smacked her, eyed the Russian thoughtfully. "Um… Bella…?"

"Hush, Nilda." Miss Way-Too-Forward-For-Her-Own-Good quipped at her. "Now, where are you from? You're not Italian."

"Moscow."

"Soviet Russia? How exotic." She tweeted with visible amusement, which she hadn't been aware was actually something human vocal cords could do before this. "Do Soviet Flame users do things differently that made you dismissive over our chat?"

"…to say the least." The Storm-Cloud allowed slowly with nearly visible reluctance, wondering how much of her hand being in the possession of another she could stand before physically prying the woman off.

Sonya's blatant unwillingness to talk, the color of her dress, and her tattoos made the other three women standing around rather wary of her.

Way-Too-Forward-For-Her-Own-Good proved undeterred by the Russian being taciturn and affecting her fellows. She squeezed her fingers and addressed one of the others as the thief eyed her as one would a particularly irritating bug. "Nilda, where were we?"

"…trying to decide if a joint gift from all of us would be possible or not." The platinum blonde answered absently, apparently deciding if the thief wasn't overtly objecting she didn't have to worry too much and returning to the subject they had been on. "It is just a question of the mechanics right now, since we are a bit… eclectic of a group."

"For Ottavia's Fifty-fifth birthday, dear." The lady who had possession of her fingers informed her in an aside. "We're going to put on a little show, but the suggestion was to have one girl of every Flame type participate. I figured the danger inherent in such a thing would give us a bit of a step up."
"Do Russian Flame users gather together in one spot, or do they still prefer their own groups?"

She eyed the speaker in a dress of eye-watering yellow shades warily, who batted big eyes at her probably in an attempt to integrate herself or beg for the information.

It wasn't endearing, nor did it make her magically willing to talk.

"Bella, I really do think-"

Miss Way-Too-Forward-For-Her-Own-Good which was really a mouthful, so the thief mentally renamed her casual touch-assaulter as Miss Tweets, huffed once sharply to get Miss Silver-white to shut up. She then looked squarely at the slim Storm-Cloud whose hand she had possession of.

"Please? We're not asking where this may or may not happen. Only if it is."

"...yes, not very often."

The one she was pretty certain was a Sun user from the yellow trying to give her a migraine pulled a face. "All at the same time? Any Rains scattered through that group?"

She gestured to Miss Silver-white, who rolled her eyes back at the Sun.

"...only one older one, and four younger."

"And that would be why you're unwilling to talk about it. Young ones, delightful." Sonya's temporary keeper announced as if that was surprising news, again patting the fingers she held trapped against her arm. "Don't you worry, we will not press where, how, or why."

"Um...?"

"Will, NOT, press." Miss Tweets repeated stridently to the last girl, who the Russian was mentally labeling as Miss Timid.

She certainly quailed under the stern look aimed at her, even if by the color of her dress she should be a Storm. She and Fong had more spine than that.

"We're getting a rather rare glimpse into another cultures' underworld, we are not going to botch it. My last question, dear. How many Clouds, and do they behave themselves? I do not need to know the age or identity of them."

"Two." One of which she was clinging to stubbornly, and she had behaved herself well so far. The lady didn't have a bloody nose from touching the thief. "They rarely have anything to do with the others, so far."

"See? Not even in Russia do Clouds tolerate Mists at all. We're not going to be able to do it." The Sun who wasn't quite as perky or bouncy as Tatiana dismissed the whole thing with a huff of her own.

She silently held up her free left hand, letting her fingertips light up with her Cloud Flames for a full second.

The four women stared at the steady Flame of lavender licking up her fingers, then they all looked to Miss Tweets who was looking at the Russian speculatively. Which neatly confirmed her suspicion she was a Mist.

"...Miss Rosabella..."
"I tried to tell you." Miss Silver-white cut Miss Timid off, dismissively batting an impatient hand. "I didn't think she wore that color by mistake."

The Sun who was nowhere near Tatiana's level, or Renato's for that matter, seemed to be hyperventilating a bit too hard to muster any words to add.

"Are you going to be available on the ninth?" The Misty Miss Tweets asked suddenly, looking for all the world like a cat sighting a particularly plump pigeon.

"No."

"Oh, come now. It's just a small favor."

"I will be in Moscow by January ninth." Sonya flatly refused again.

She pursed her lips, eyes narrowing on the Russian Storm-Cloud. "...will anything I try change that fact?"

"My family celebrates Christmas the first week of the new year. I will be in Moscow for the ninth."

"...I think I might just hold this against you."

She gifted her with a pointed stare. "Then I get to hold this assault of my person against you."

Reminded of how she had gained the Russian's attention and was still keeping her in place by, Misty Miss Tweets looked down at the fingers she had tucked into the crook of her arm. "Well... I must concede the point, I think."

Miss Silver-white snickered, sharp white teeth biting her red painted lower lip to muffle it.

That proved to be Miss Weak Sun's undoing, she fainted into a pile of boneless lump at their feet.

Sonya sighed out through her nose, wondering if that was from lack of air or from an overload of terror. Seriously, she had done nothing to deserve that reaction.

"Well... that was... fascinating." Misty Miss Tweets spoke after a silent moment. "Does that normally happen around you?"

"Unfortunately." The thief admitted blankly.

Miss Silver-white shot her a skeptical look. "All the time?"

"She's not the first to scare herself into a faint around me. I don't even have to do anything for it, either."

"That's depressing." Her captor announced stoutly, looking fairly irritated at her admission.

As for the Russian herself, she had been trying not to feed the common assumption that all Cloud were violently aggressive creatures without due cause and yet... she was starting to wonder if holding herself to different standards would net her anything at all. Certainly, her restraint was really doing little else than terrifying those who held different views on what a Cloud should be.

"Well... no, still depressive." Misty Miss Tweets sniffed after a moment, glancing to Miss Silver-white. "Nilda, would you please go fetch Gisella a glass of water?"

"And pour it on her?" The Rain, more than likely a Soft/Inverted one, tacked on dryly as she moved to fulfill the Mist's request anyways.

That left Miss Timid, Miss Weak Sun still laid out on the floor, and Misty Miss Tweets still holding Sonya captive.

"Miss Sonya."

"I didn't do it." The Russian informed Tyr without so much as twitching, which her clingy Mist hanger-on did rather noticeably. "If I was going to knock anyone out, it'd be Miss Tweets here simply by virtue of her touching and being closest to me."

"...Tweets?" The Mist repeated faintly, finally letting her fingers go if only from sheer surprise.

The master assassin gave her a measured look, then glance to the returning Miss Silver-white holding a wine glass of water. The Rain gave him a bland smirk, unceremoniously tipping the contents of the glass out on the fainted woman's face.

Miss Weak Sun came to with a splutter, gaping rather unattractively at the shiny Italian leather shoes now in her field of vision. Slowly, she looked up Tyr's long form until she could fully see the man staring back down at her... then passed out again with a little whimper.

"...I see your point, Miss Sonya." Concluded the Sword Emperor after a long moment, twitching his fingers for a pair of subdued dressed Mafiosi to collect the Sun and escort her somewhere she could recover without passing out again. "May I ask you to save me a turn on the floor later?"

"Of course. Although, Renato would like me to remind you returning another man's date after stealing her is considered polite."

Tyr's mouth twitched into what she was pretty damn sure had been the barest hint of a smirk. "Surely he does not think I require a reminder."

"He can be an asshole sometimes, so... not too sure about that."

"I'll be sure to mind my manners, then." He informed her, and she could not tell if that was said sarcastically or amusedly.

Sonya considered it but decided she didn't want to know what bone of contention lay between the hitman and assassin if they were resorting to petty fights like this... although, she was only semi-sure that was what was going on. It could just be an 'I'm better than you' contest that somehow got her snared up in it.

The Sword Emperor gave her a slight bow, a nod to the other ladies, and left them sans one Miss Weak Sun.

"Alright, I think you might just be the most interesting creature in this room right now." Miss Tweets announced into the slight awkward silence left in the master assassin's wake. "But, since I was horrendously rude in not doing this before now, my name is Rosabella. Not Tweets. The Rain to my right is Nilda, and the dear wringing her hands together is Debora."

"I was aware of everyone but Miss Timid's name, thank you."

Rosabella gave the thief a long look when she refrained from adding anything on to that. "You just spoke more to Master Tyr than I heard from you in an entire conversation. But you will not elaborate on these little petty nicknames?"
"...your first impression with a Cloud counts for more than most assume. If you make a bad one, they will forever recall you as 'such and such' instead of by name when reminded."

"...I take it we made some bad ones?"

She gave it an additional moment of thought but had to shake her head in the end. "Actually... compared to what I think of my own family members, you made fairly neutral impressions. Except for Miss Weak Sun and Miss Timid over there."

Given what she generally tended to think of her own damn brother?

Misty Miss Tweets was actually a rather... benign nickname. Miss Silver-white was more out of respect for Nilda's hair coloring than her personality or some trait that irritated the Russian, but that was a true neutral designation.

The thief was fully aware she was a judgmental person, she didn't need Miss Timid's sour mutterings on the subject to know it. However, she was also perfectly alright with that fact. A difficulty socializing meant any and all methods of sorting out who to even bother with or not was fine with her.

"I don't think I like it." Misty Miss Tweets announced, as if her expression hadn't told her that.

"You originally were Miss Way-Too-Forward-For-Her-Own-Good."

"...you're determined to be obstinate about this, aren't you?"

Sonya gave the woman a measured look, cocking an eyebrow.

Misty Miss Tweets looked entirely unperturbed, until Miss Silver-white heaved a sigh. "Bella, you not only assaulted a Cloud but also got a tiny bit of information from her. Why not count your blessings and give it a pass? While you still have your head attached?"

"That is annoying." She suddenly snapped, giving the Rain a rather dirty look. "Exactly what have I done that would make you assume I rip heads off? The worst I tend to do is break fingers, thank you very much."

Nilda was entirely taken aback at the sudden irate turn she took, but actually held her ground and gave the Storm-Cloud a thoughtful look. "I was referring to a saying. To 'rip one's head off' is to verbally assault someone. I did not mean to imply you beheaded those that irritated you. Did it translate badly, or did you not know that?"

...she knew that.

Huffing, then glancing from the Rain to the Mist and then to the rather spineless Storm who squeaked at suddenly getting a Storm-Clouds attention directed at her, she gave the other woman a pointed look. "Frankly, if everyone would stop flinching near me I'd stop assuming the worst right off."

"I can see how that may prove irritating." Miss Silver-white admitted, glancing out the corner of her eye to their red clad fellow. "You have my sympathies."

With a sigh, she decided this was a bust and she desperately needed something alcoholic. As interesting as it was meeting another Mist she'd rather not deal with but could stand if need be, having one person pass out mid-conversation and the other spineless and hostile made it rather... not so great of a conversation.
"I think I will leave you all here," she informed them all flatly, shooting the Storm and Mist ladies separate looks of either wariness or disgust, "I need something… fortifying, if I am to get through the rest of the night."

Nilda gave her a bland smile, reaching over and putting the Mist in a headlock before she could protest the Russian's plans. "Have a good evening then, Miss Nikishina."

She paused, giving the Rain a skeptical look.

Tyr hadn't used the more widely Italian-known surname for her, merely calling her by her first name. Nilda had to have known exactly who she was, and at least some of what she was, before this conversation to not only know that name without being told but also to not even let a flicker of surprise cross her face when she realized she was the same Russian Storm-Cloud rumor might have bandied about.

Miss Silvery-white either had some brass ones, was fully confident in her own skills for Tranquility or Misty Miss Tweet's Constructions, or had gotten ahold of someone that would've told them Sonya was strangely not as hostile as most Clouds were or were rumored to be.

She was pretty sure if there was something contrived about the conversation, the other two hadn't been in on it. Depending on how much of an actor the Mist was, she could or could not be in on it as well.

Either way, very bold of the women. The thief was slightly amused.

Renato waited until she was at least decently far from the group to side up next to her, handing her a wine glass with suspiciously clear liquid in it. "Well?"

"...the Sun was way too painful in both vision and personality to think much of. Miss Timid needs a new spine even if she is dressed in bold colors. Misty Miss Tweets has a curious lack of self-preservation paired with a boldness I'm not sure I like being on the other end of, and Miss Silvery-white… might actually wear the pants in that relationship."

The asshole that left her to muddle her way through a conversation alone snickered. "I had two grunts that barely had enough brain cells to rub together to keep their heads warm, a Mafioso with an appalling fashion sense and no taste in women and said woman who decided trying to flirt with me was a great idea. In front of her current man."

Sonya sighed, wondering what it was about parties like this that made some people a bit too bold for their own good. She knocked back whatever it was in her glass, pleasantly surprised it was actually a semi-decent vodka.

Swallowing hard to get the burning sensation of her throat getting scoured with what was comparable to industrial strength disinfectant, she huffed a sigh and wondered who the hell she had to rob blind in order to get another glass of it.

"Right, well..."

"Another go? Or are you done for the night?"

"I think my quota of socializing with unknowns has been reached and is teetering the edge already."

Admitted the thief sourly, even if she had found someone interesting. Maybe even two.

"Dinner is about to be served anyways." Renato offered idly, with an absent shrug. "We'd only have time for one last quick chat, unless you want to count it as a lightning round."
She cracked an only slightly unwilling smirk. "Can you see a Lightning? First to nail his or her personality outside their Flame type wins?"

"You're on."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 25th of December, 1968. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Shamal waited until eleven in the morning, then grabbed the thief and dragged her to the hitman's room.

Sonya had barely enough time to snag his present as she stumbled after him, trying to remember the bratty Mist was someone she liked and that tying him up so she can get a bit more sleep wasn't a great idea.

…she really couldn't see the downside, however.

She slinked to the couch in Renato's guest suite as Shamal went to wake the man up, curling up there and bitterly wishing the brat had waited long enough for her to pull on some kind of leg covering. Near the Mediterranean the Iron Fort may be, but freshly out of bed bare skin was chilly in air-conditioned places.

Apparently, from the sounds of the swearing coming from behind her, the older Italian didn't appreciate the little brat's wake-up call either.

Shamal bounced happily to her side, followed by a heavily scowling hitman still blinking the sleep from his eyes. "Wait… Sonya?"

"We're doing it here this year. Apparently." She informed him blandly, curling up a bit tighter to try keeping as much body heat in as possible.

She was Russian, damn it. Highly humid cool air or not, she should not be this cold.

Somehow divining why she was so unhappy, the little brat sprawled out on top of said legs for her.

As far as useful lap heaters went, Shamal wasn't a bad one. He was just a bit too tiny and thin yet to be of much good for more than just her lap. Brat was getting a little boney, too.

Her toes were still freezing.

With a sigh, the thief nudged the kid off and handed him her present. Which had gotten stored on the little end table near her head while she tried to warm up. Shamal slid to the floor in order to savage the wrappings, which left her even colder.

Could she not win at all today?

Admittedly it was less than five minutes into it, but still.

Sonya's rather bitter thoughts were interrupted by Renato dumping what was likely the blanket off his bed on top of her head. The ass didn't even bother to check to see if she was appreciative of his actions or not, he strode to the door connecting the main hall to his rooms.

Likely to snag a footman to fetch his present for Shamal before he got done with her offering of pacification to irritating and wide-awake Mist brat.
Snorting, she rearranged herself and the not-so-much-offered-as-chucked-at-her-head blanket. Re-curling herself up under it to wait out the kid's enthusiasm of all things Christmas.

"You know," Sonya informed Renato a bit tiredly after a footman delivered the other present, not quite as cold anymore but unable to nod off as she would've preferred, "giving him ways to give us headaches probably wasn't our best idea ever."

She had given the brat a cassette player and a couple personal favorite tapes, the hitman had somehow found a 'build your own radio' kit to give. Since he had specifically asked her what she was getting the brat so they didn't end up gifting the same thing she wasn't surprised by the related nature, but in hindsight one of them should've given Shamal something quiet to do.

Like a coloring book, or art supplies.

Maybe the next time the thief gave the brat something noisy, she should 'forget' the batteries.

Normally she really liked the bands Queen, The Doors, and The Animals… but she also didn't appreciate losing her hearing or when someone messed with the tracks she was trying to listen to.

The only other adult in the room sighed, sprawling out on the other end of the couch and sourly eyeing the young Mist experimenting with the buttons on his new cassette player. "I said we should've gotten him the little toy car sets."

"I'd rather not step on those too, thank you." The thief snarked, folding her legs a bit defensively under her. "Those would give me worse than just a bruise. Besides, then we'd have to sit here and listen to him make car and crashing noises. Even worse, maybe Mist Constructs of car and crashing noises."

"If you would watch where you're going, that wouldn't be a problem." He shot back, a dirty look added for emphasis. "...and share some of the blanket, you hog."

The insufferable ass's expression didn't even change when she shot him a dirty glare of her own. Irked, she curled up tighter. "Mine now, sucks to be you."

Shamal had only been keeping a fraction of his attention on them, but he got fully distracted from his Christmas presents and peered up from the floor at Sonya's higher position on the couch. "Shouldn't you share, mamma? They keep telling me to at school."

"I, brat, am a thief. I do not share my things with just anyone." She yanked him up to her lap, then scooped the brat in under the blanket with her. "Renato should not be surprised if I steal all the fun things and leave him in the cold."

"HEY!"

Snickering, the bratty Mist popped his head out from under the fabrics just to give the hitman a smug little smirk. "It's really warm in here, Mister Renato!"

The absolutely outraged look on the man's face made Sonya have to smother her own snickers into Shamal's messy bed-hair, which didn't help because the scathing glare he pinned her with would've burned anyone else.

"Shamal?"

"Yes, mamma?"
"Hold on to me really tightly, okay?"

Bratty Mist didn't have time to question why, she bolted with both him and the blanket.

Running to the door before Renato fully realized what she was about to do even with his mind-reading trick. "STEAL!"

Shamal's surprised bark of laughter coincided with her wrenching the doors open, startling the two maids who held offering of caffeine to placate grumpy Flame users in the mornings. The thief ignored them, merely ensuring neither would tip over as the two of the them passed the ladies.

"DAMN IT, WOMAN! Get back here!"

Sonya ignored that too, using her rather long legs to eat up the ground between the hitman's suite of rooms and her own. Skidding a bit on the one, and only, turn between them she very nearly crashed into a very surprised Schnitten Brabanters.

"Excuse us, you didn't see anything!"

The Ninth Generation Rain Guardian didn't have any time to question what the hell she was talking about, with a lack of good hiding spots around the Russian opted to go up instead and make her own.

The Iron Fort did have very nice vaulted ceilings in places, and luckily for her the guest suite wing was one of them. It was almost too wide for her to reach but on her tiptoes, it worked.

Shamal had to stuff a fist into his mouth to muffle his breathless laughter into her collarbone, to a level that would only certainly get them caught.

Renato hadn't been that far behind her and was the Rain's second near hit-and-run of the day. "...Schnitten. You wouldn't happen to know where a very irritating thief got to, would you?"

Blinking at the man, who was as half-dressed as Sonya was if only wearing the opposite garment, the Rain Guardian silently pointed a finger upwards.

"Damn it. I'm going to remember this." She informed the man flatly, pushing off one wall with a foot and bracing herself with a hand instead. In order to ready herself to leap to either side depending on how the hitman moved. Then she tried for a completely innocent look. "Hi, Renato. Fancy seeing you here."

"Little lady Sonya, you suck at playing innocent." He drawled out flatly, eyeing both her and the brat sourly. "Give me back my blanket. You can keep Shamal."

"Hey!" Bratty Mist interjected, looking wounded. "You don't really mean that… right?"

Flat footed at the sudden change in tone, the Sun user blinked once. "…of course not."

"Good. GO MAMMA!"

Obediently, the Russian leapt down and hit the floor running. Abandoning the straighter route to her rooms, since that had been likely and indeed was the direction Renato had assumed she'd go in.

Instead, she bolted for the more central parts of the Iron Fort the guest suite wing opened up into.

"Hi Tyr, bye Tyr!" Sonya called out to the master assassin as they passed him, who could show surprise.
It was a tiny raise of the left brow, but it was a reaction.

Renato was a little less well mannered, he very nearly barreled into the older man. Only a truly impressive reaction time kept him from getting Tyr's sword through the throat, enabling the hitman to just dodge the knee-jerk reaction.

"Oooh, close one." Shamal offered from the thief's shoulder, where she moved him to have her hands less encumbered for wall-bracing.

If she could trust him to hold both her and the blanket of contention, she'd give him that too but didn't want to really drop the brat if she had to do something surprising.

"He's gaining, mamma!"

"Brat," the thief snorted out as she took one of the few other paths she knew led somewhere close to her rooms, "no one catches me when I don't want to be caught."

A few more twisted paths cut short by either really surprised people or the hitman somehow getting ahead of her later, as well as one Propagated jump over the man's head that had him cursing up a storm, Sonya eventually got to slam her suite's doors in Renato's face.

Very nearly causing him to run into it face first.

Shamal ended up in a breathless goo pile on top of their ill-gotten loot, not even flinching when the hitman hammered a fist on the door between them all. "Damn it, Sonya! Open this door!"

"Nope!"

"...you realize you just ran through the halls without pants, right?"

The thief braced her back to the doors, because there was no way in hell the man's strength could match her Cloud Flame derived super-strength. "You did the same without a shirt."

"I'm pretty sure Schnitten saw up your shirt."

"Well... lucky him."

She had to bite her lip against a snicker when the man hammered another heavy fist on her door, the brat was a lost cause and was currently rolling on the blanket at her feet... laughing his little head off.

"Breath kid, you choke... and I'm going to just laugh at you."

"Sonya, would you please give me back my bedding." He sounded exasperated and a bit chagrined, likely someone had come out to see what the hell the fuss was about or followed them back from their little chase.

"I apparently steal something from you every year. Guess what you lost this year."

"Nono's maids aren't going to appreciate it." Renato tried instead, not desperately but with enough chagrin in his tone to kill the mood a little.

"Mmm... fine." It was someone else's place, she probably should apologize or something.

Maybe.

Really, the only other one she remotely cared about the opinion of here was Tyr, and the man had not looked bothered at all to see her bolt past carrying both Shamal and a blanket.

The absolutely disgusted and offended look on Renato's face had bratty Mist falling over himself in laughter again when she opened the door finally.

The thief slipped the blanket out from under the brat easily enough, tossing it into his face. "You're now forgiven for being a complete and utter jackass."

"Well... good." The hitman shot her a heated glare. "It only took me half a year and a chunk of my dignity."

"You really do suck at apologizing." Sonya agreed pleasantly, opening her door wider to see who it was that had him moderate his attempts to talk her into giving up on his own. Schnitten gave a friendly wave, not perturbed in the least to get a pointedly irritated look back. "Is there any reason why the two of you are half dressed?"

"I forgot my pants." She admitted freely enough, looking back to Renato's rather disgruntled form. "Give me fifteen to get dressed, and we'll meet you downstairs for brunch. Lunch. Whatever."

He only nodded absently. Looking from the blanket now in his possession finally, to her and Shamal, to Schnitten, then back to her. The expression that crossed his face ended up a mixed between irritated and resigned. "...this probably isn't going to help anything."

"Help with what?" Asked the Russian, really confused because she wasn't aware of what was in need of help. A rather out of the blue comment, which had nothing to it to suggest what he was talking about.

"Never mind." He dismissed after a moment with a sharp shake of his head pointing a finger in her face. "I'll get you back for this."

"Sure you will. Just like if you do, I'll wait until I know you have to deal with the brat to hop him up on an ungodly amount of sugar and monster flicks."

"Can we?" Said brat asked near-breathlessly, rolling up to clutch at Sonya's leg. "Please? It sounds really fun."

"Maybe for your birthday."

"You do that, you're dealing with the brat." Renato threw back, irritated.

Sonya scoffed, smirking wickedly. "Then I'll just take him with me to Moscow. I still win, Renato."

"Yes! Please?" Shamal upgraded to clutching at her thigh, a bit too high to be really comfortable. "I want to do that."

"You... are incredibly childish sometimes." Announced the hitman as if that had been news, irked and fully willing to show it. "Fine. I want to know where the hell he's going first."

"Then just come with us." The thief rolled her eyes, leaning up against the door jamb to keep aware of how close the Vongola Rain was to them. "This summer, I've got a bit to do back home this spring... but... you might want to get in on this next round of testing too..."

"What testing?"

"Stone testing. Over two hundred of the bloody things... and you are the only Inverted Sun I know of. Speaking of, I had a copy of my book reserved for you. Since you did help with it and all."

To his credit, the bait didn't get more than a quirked eyebrow of interest. Sonya was a bit torn between being exasperated and being appreciative of his caution where Shamal was concerned.

"Maybe." Was all the man would say with a shrug to the offer. "Let's see how this spring goes for you first."

…that was a good point, actually.

———

(Friday the 3rd of January, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep did appreciate a good book on occasion, growing up with Sonya ensured that there was an entire array of things to read. As long as you were willing to risk the budding criminal librarian in the making’s temper and her hoarding of all things papery and written on.

Book of bait, which was emblazoned with his little sister's name, did not qualify for a good book.

"Alright, spill Galina." Demanded said blonde sister shortly when they were all finally assembled in the missing Rain’s office, pinning the Lightning with an irritated look. "This is… more than a little suspicious."

The woman sighed in response.

The stuntman might not have known her very well, but for the last couple weeks he had been trying to work with her on the Cloud Flame focus stone groups until Sonya herself got back from some mafia-shindig in Italy. He knew perfectly well that prim-if-not-proper Galina would've cheerfully gutted someone for sighing over her questions.

In order to make her do it to someone else, in front of Tatiana no less, required something rather serious.

"It was Gedeon's idea, supposedly."

Cherep blinked a few times, then leaned over to Arseniy. "Who?"

"Our Pahkan’s son." The vor informed him flatly.

Tatiana gifted him with an amused look, which he pulled a face at in return.

The next guy in charge, then. He would fully admit to staying away from a lot of the Zolotov things growing up, judiciously aided by his fellow Cloud user's attempts to keep him as far under the underworld's radar as she possibly could. Even from the rest of the family.

A lack of familiarity didn't mean he couldn't grasp the basics of what was going on, however.

"From what little I know of things before Dmitriy's sudden interest in the more local business side of our clan, the idea originally came from one of the groups out in St. Petersburg. Since they didn't have the information but wanted it but didn't really want to go through the hassle of actually forging a connection to some Moscow thieves ring, they sent someone to specifically court someone high up enough to make it happen."
"Grekovs, then. Dmitriy didn't buy in, I take it?"

Galina sniffed in disgust at the Storm-Cloud's question, thinking it was inane and making sure everyone in the Inverted Rain's office knew it. "Of course not. Dmitriy flatly refused, up until Gedeon started suggesting that maybe it wasn't such a bad idea. He knows you a lot better than either the slimy snake we were sent or our Pahkan's son do, and flat out bailed when it became apparent someone was going to try to order him to do it anyways."

"That kind of left you holding the hot end of the stick, didn't it?" The stuntman interjected with a bit of confusion.

Again, the Lightning scoffed. At him that time. "No, Sonya knows better than to go after the tools. I might have had to do it, but she's not mad at me."

"I'm not entirely certain I am mad." The thief interjected flatly, drumming her fingers on the heavy built desk. "Irritated my name got slapped on this, yes. A little annoyed my permission was only sought after the fact, sure. But I did give the clan the information I no longer needed, to do with as they will. Gedeon is going to have to explain exactly how we benefit from being the collection point of all the more civilian Flame users seeking clarification when we also lose a bit of leverage with the other syndicates now that this is public, and why it is he decided to drag me into it."

"Be careful with that, girl." Arseniy suddenly spoke up, giving the youngest of his foster children a mildly reproving look. "We are Zolotovs, and I don't think old man Zolotov will be happy to lose his only son."

"I'm not going to harm anyone that belongs to our clan, Arseniy." Sonya promised, fully honestly if Cherep had to guess. "Anyone else...? Where and when I might like, in return for this utter bullshit? In FRONT of someone not being very careful with the assets he's due to inherit?"

He gave her a flat look.

"Everyone screws up, if I murdered everyone that irritated or angered me I'd probably be the world's most notorious mass murderer." She explained to him patiently. "No, I'm thinking more... indirect expressions of displeasure. Especially since now Galina and I have to somehow shoulder Dmitriy's work when not only is my career in Mafia Land picking up, but she has her own life to live."

"Dmitriy bailing as he did, and it was kind of obvious that he did, actually got old Milos interested in what was going on." Tatiana offered neutrally. More to just give details than make a comment or give an opinion on the book of bait. "He's not too happy, I think. I see him more than most here except for dad, especially now that it's been arranged that I'm his nurse when he needs something medical in nature."

Sonya gave their older sister a confused look.

"He comes to Mafia Land for it." She explained without needing the question vocalized. "He's paying for me to learn, as well as to support me while I do my residency. In return I am not only his medic, but anyone else in the clan who may need a bit of patching up."

Slouching a bit in Dmitriy's office chair, the thief folded her hands together and considered the desk in front of her for a long moment before looking back up at the people in the missing Rain's office. "Right, well... that's for later then. Cherep, are you done with your own... err, work?"

"For the most part." Shrugging, the stuntman sidestepped their older sister's playful punch to the shoulder.

"Beast of a damn Cloud. He knocked it all out over the course of a few weeks." The nurse complained, so fake that even Sonya’s little fanboy was fully aware it wasn’t honest. "I think he might be stronger than you, if fifty took you a whole month."

"He is stronger than me." She answered with full faith in their brother, as if the concept of him not being bigger than her was a foreign thought. "Aside that, though?"

"I have two new possibilities to what you’re looking for, for us at least." Cherep admitted, weirdly touched with that faith she held in him. "Charoite and Lepidolite."

She had always seemed rather irritated when he out did her in some Cloud Flame thing, he didn’t know she valued that about him enough to boast of it in her weird little way. At least to their sister and a few other people fully interested in not dragging him into anything he didn’t want to do.

"…I have no idea what those are."

"Sometimes very purple semi-precious stones. Since amethyst never really worked well for me, I think I’m sticking with Lepidolite. It looks like a bit of purple granite, but it also comes in different colors."

"You’ll get there." Galina informed Sonya brightly. "Eventually. To start with, however…? Blind testing."

She wrinkled her nose at her. "How the hell are we doing this blind?"

"You’ll see."
Chapter 31

(Monday the 6th of January, 1969. Aleksandr's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Apparently, Sonya had been only partially correct.

Not just the Grekov Gang, but also several more visible and only slightly affiliated with the St. Petersburg syndicate had been lobbying rather hard to have the basics of Dying Will Flames of the Sky become publicly sourced somehow. The Grekovs had just been more upfront about their efforts.

The demand was for the basic information on Flames, the only supply had been one mid-sized Moscow thieves' clan.

There had been a lot of pressure put to her affiliated syndicate to give over their information before someone took it by force, and probably unknowing of the combat ability of Flame users… her Pahkan had agreed in the end.

Nothing major happened in the clan without old man Zolotov's expressed permission. Even Sonya had to get it in order to range freely with Dmitriy holding down the fort on the subject of Flames behind her.

He apparently wasn't so happy with his son for being the one chink in the clan's armor someone else took advantage of in order for things to get so rushed before the thief could admit she could level a city block on her lonesome and solve the problem that way.

The Storm-Cloud didn't appreciate being used like that or getting volunteered-told after the fact to deal with the inevitable headache that would follow. She could only use Mafia Land's anonymous travel and business services when she was anonymous. If she got too famous, or infamous, she'd have to start doing it on her own time and effort.

Which she had yet to actually try for more than just crossing a border or two.

While 'Sonya Bazanova, hippy author' wasn't actually a bad persona to develop for moving around in the civilian sector, she already had 'Sonya de Mort, the stuntman Skull de Mort's little sister' for that. Both were things that she couldn't use if she intended to steal something nearby, either getting busted for theft would damage a few things she would rather not be hurt. They were both personal use only.

Mafia Land's maintained persona for her was a throw away one, one with an ever-changing name and actual paper trails however forged for legitimacy. Any investigator, law enforcement personnel, or anyone that was suspicious of her would get stonewalled trying to actually look up the company she worked for… but they would get there.

Sonya wasn't a great forger. She had actually intended to ask Tatiana if she thought she could do the same thing for her, because her older sister was a lot better than she was in it.

Crafting an actual business-related identity was her next great project… but it seemed as if she was going to have to use Nikishina as her name for that. Primakova was a possibility, but since Tatiana used it and baby Valera would probably as well the thief didn't want to inconvenience her siblings if she ever ran into legal trouble.
Spring, at least. Maybe even fall.

Half of the next three years were spoken for, given she had to somehow manage Dmitriy's teaching job with Galina as well as pull of twenty to thirty heists for Mafia Land in order to get the shared apartment Tatiana wanted. A good thing she had Bjørn, otherwise she didn't know how she'd pull it off.

Probably why although greatly annoyed, Milos wasn't actually letting his son sink or swim in this situation. He could still see how to make use of it.

It would still tie Sonya down somewhat, which since she was a free-ranging thief the old man probably didn't see a downside to. A high grossing thief near at hand if something needed stealing was probably better to him than a free-range one racking up a reputation they'd have to wonder about managing the backlash from.

Thankfully, Galina was as efficient as she was ruthless in bureaucratic realms. Dmitriy had also been training up his pack of brats, which now numbered in the low thirties, to teach each other the basics of their shared Flame types instead of requiring him to guide them through personally.

The most the Storm-Cloud would have to deal with were the older Storms, the Mists, and the Clouds if a new one ever appeared. The brunette Lightning already had the Lightnings and Suns, with Tatiana's help on the side, well in hand.

If a Sky popped up, they'd have to see about who would take on that one until he or she found Guardians of their own and could handle most anything alone.

The Rains were another matter.

The four Classical Rains of Dmitriy's actually concerned Sonya somewhat. Three males and a female, and each of who preferred working with another to the point she really did wonder if they Tranquilized each other for there to be so little friction. Other than that, she had no real opinion on what to do with them.

The fair haired and blue eyed Fadei was oldest, at nearly eighteen in age. He was already working with his Rain Flames for the clan's benefit, and likely the reason why the situation exploded as it had. Unlike with Dmitriy, who used his Flames mostly on inanimate objects or softly to calm others down in tense situations, Fadei had absolutely no problem Tranquilizing another to death.

In fact, from what notes Dmitriy had left her and Galina, he already had.

Irinei, a sixteen-year-old with brown hair and eyes who looked much like a telephone pole turned human, was less direct about his Flame use. He had taken Dmitriy's sapphire shard trick and figured out how to make it into an actual tool to be used, bending his Flames to his will to only activate when he decided they should instead of leak all over the place constantly like Rain Flame shattered sapphires did.

His age-mate Kazimir, a blue-haired and green-eyed teen who originally wandered in from the Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic, had decided to see how Rain Flames could be applied outside the obvious. Using Dmitriy's ability to stop machinery as a jumping off point, he was fast at work figuring out how to stop cars cold and disrupt perception of both humans and cameras.

The second giving him more problems than the first, in relation to recording devices at least.

Zarya was actually seventeen herself, a red headed young woman with freckles and equally red eyes. Apparently deciding if her cohorts were focusing on killing or enabling said kills she should focus on the more indirect applications of Rain Flames in social interactions. The reports on her gave Sonya a headache trying to understand, but what she did know was Zarya was becoming quite the little diplomat.

They were past the point of needing instruction or guidance, and also perfectly suited to handle the other newer Rains still trickling in, but still not… quite to the point of being ‘old hands' like the rest of Sonya's Flame using cohort. Worse, the thief was the youngest of that group therefore the first one that should accept them as just fellow Flame users and not just rookies.

However, she was also the most senior Flame user of the Zolotovs'. Discounting Cherep, who was only loosely affiliated.

It left them in an awkward place with one another, so to speak. She didn't particularly want to order them around, and they weren't exactly sure what to make of her.

Gem and rock testing had transferred to Aleksandr's basement training hall, the old grizzled vor had retired from training up tetchy Mafiya brats and merely stayed as 'resident' of the house to enable the Flame users to have someplace secure and covered for their experimenting.

Aleksandr hadn't exactly been a young man when Sonya met him, and now the vor was pushing sixty. His shoulders were now hunched, and his formerly straight spine had acquired a stoop, but the vor could still give the impression that obeying him was merely the smart thing to do. He waved them through his home, apparently not interested in overseeing anything but what Tatiana had going on with him.

The underground room was nearly packed, from all Zolotov Flame users taking up spots to work their way through Galina's mass of testing material.

Currently, Sonya was eyeing a collection of seven rocks laid out on a table. They weren't even all red rocks. "These are all garnets?"

"Yes," Galina sniffed as if insulted the Storm-Cloud had to ask, "a few we got reactions from by the Suns. One seems to work with everyone."

The thief poked a supposed garnet, which was a solidly green colored jewel. "…well, I suppose this is why I left this part to you. I never would have figured there were more than just wine-red ones and focused too hard on the jewel-quality versions."

"This is to show expectations might screw up honest results. By your logic, all of them would work for you and you might have your Will overpower the natural results." The Inverted Lightning informed her tartly, picking the gems carefully to return them to their proper separate piles. "So, this is how it will work. You put your hand into one of these boxes, and one of the Shestyorka will give you one of these at a time. They will record the results, you just give the Flames for testing."

Which would neatly circumvent the issue they had last year, where they scorched and nicked their fingers to the point the recorded results had become illegible after enough tests. Sonya wasn't exactly fond of the idea of shoving her hand into a box and trusting some unknown to not mess with her hands, and she'd need both to get through Cloud and Storm testing about the same time.

Cherep, who had been hanging about still even if he was finished with helping record his half of the Cloud Flame tests, shooed the Shestyorka who would've been recording his little sister's results for her. He took up the position with a charmingly professional haughty look, mock neatening up the notebooks her future test results were to be listed within.
Galina's expression could only be called flat. "You know how it's supposed to go, right?"

"I ensured I was fully instructed by one of your little minions, yes." The stuntman returned dryly, gesturing over to where Sonya's Lackey was warily eyeing his own boxes. "Until Björn is done and can keep Sonya from punching some overly chatty or forward type out of irritation, I'll do this part."

Moderately disgruntled at his assumption over how violent she could be, even as she was appreciative she wouldn't have to deal with want-to-be vory, Sonya took the seat waiting for her and decided she was unamused.

Sniffing, the Lightning refocused on the Storm-Cloud. "A couple stones you'll be testing multiple times, in order to see if cut really does affect the results. Most of them are raw, I got them cheaper than actually cut gemstones would've been. Since it took your brother less than a month, and Tatiana is almost done with her own set, I expect you will have little problem getting it all done quickly."

"I have two types to test." Sonya reminded the woman blandly. "So does Björn."

"So it'll be time consuming, but I also think you can do more in a day than most of the others." Galina dismissed that point with a flick of one hand.

Her nails were painted green. The thief wondered…

Her smirk when she noticed where the slightly younger woman was looking seemed to confirm Sonya's suspicions that the Lightning had found a way to weaponize her nail polish.

Interesting.

Apparently, there were additional benefits to finding oneself a mineral type.

"Furthermore, there's also this to consider." Galina plucked a different rock up out of the 'to-be-tested' boxes Sonya was about to start going through, a dark green one speckled with reddish brown.

Bloodstone… possibly?

The Storm-Cloud was only an amateur geologist at best, but she was mostly sure that's what that was.

Beckoning to one of the younger teens hanging about, one that had been talking to Usov in a far corner while they took a break, Galina handed him the stone and gestured to the Storm-Cloud. "Show her."

The kid, the younger Classic Sun apparently from the Flames that bent to his will, poured the yellow fire into the rock. The piece of bloodstone spat out a slightly brighter lick of yellow fire… stronger where there were the spots of red color.

"…iron?"

"Is apparently a Sun Flame metal." Galina finished with a sharp nod. "Tatiana tried it out, since she has more fine control. Still currently in the process of trying it out, that's where she's at right now. It looks promising, anyways."

Sonya blinked at the bit of bloodstone, then at the young Sun. "Thank you, you may go back to what you were doing."
Taking back the bit of rock, the Lightning tossed it to the barrel of 'Flame tainted' rocks being amassed in the middle of the hall. "I'll get you a new one that's not tainted with Sun Flames. The point of that was we're not only looking for your sparkly jewels, but metals, minerals, and elements. It's entirely possible to grow your own crystals, so...?"

"...the Flame rings are possibly synthetic and not natural." The thief finished with a sigh. "I was afraid of that."

Galina shrugged the issue off. "Someone had to start somewhere and while you might not have been correct, but you did get us in the ballpark. Try not to dwell on how far off the mark you may have been."

With an almost breathless snort, Sonya turned to her foster brother instead of answering the older Russian.

Cherep gave her a slight smirk, already fiddling with one of the boxes apparently no one else needed just yet. "We'll go until you are either too tired or too bloody to continue."

He snickered at her rolled eyes, setting something cool in both palms stuck out for him and fussing with the start of her recorded result.

The thief kind of wished she didn't have three types to her, even if only two were usable. If she only had one, then maybe she could've brought along a book to read. Channeling her Flames into separate palms for however long Cherep needed wasn't exactly stimulating work.

Kazimir slid into the seat next to her once the Lightning had left them to it, giving the Storm-Cloud a bland looking smile. "So, rumor around the clan is that you're the boss lady of this little project."

Sonya gifted the blue-haired young man with a similarly blank look. "Did you wait until Galina was distracted for a reason?"

"She might have informed us to only bother you at our peril." Admitted the Rain easily, sticking his hand through a free box for the rather harried looking young Shestyorka who was apparently recording his results for him. "We had a question, though."

"Obviously, or you wouldn't be bothering me." The thief twitched as whatever it was in her left palm with her Storm Flames cracked on her. Cherep made a tisking sound, brushing the broken bits of whatever off her palm when she cut her Flames in order to give her a new bit of something.

Kazimir blinked at her, glanced over to where his other three fellow Rains were keenly interested in looking on, then back at the tiny blonde woman he was bothering. "Well... with Dmitriy out, what are you going to do with us?"

"Should I do anything with you?" She countered, still blank and giving the man a sideways look. "Dmitriy left us no real notes of where he wanted your four to go, so I was just going to leave you to it for now. You are decently inventive, if not as flexible as I would like."

"Not as...?" Nonplussed, the blue haired Rain spluttered for a moment.

Likely in protest.

Sonya rolled her eyes again, giving the man a bit more of her attention as her brother tapped her right wrist to get her to stop pooling Cloud Flames there. "It's been three years. You all have one or two tricks each. By the time three years had passed with me, I could not only hit as hard as I wished but also resize and copy anything I liked. Lift and jump anything as high as I wanted. I also hunted down the beginnings of what information we have on all types, started in on this rock stuff, could melt anything I wished with my Storm Flames, and noted the physical drawbacks for two Flame types."

"…you may have a point with that." Kazimir admitted slowly, a bit more serious now than he had started out as. "But… we only have one Flame."

"That you all share between the four of you and you should be able to teach one another the tricks you invented for it. I can work with non-inventive people, non-flexible will be an issue." She gifted him with a hard look, ignoring the shattering of whatever had been in her right palm. "Think outside your box, please."

It really did seem if these four Rains were content to be fed the information they needed instead of search out new bits to play with.

Sonya supposed they might be past the age where the sky was the limit and was just thankful there were three newer Rains that were less interwoven with each other. Hopefully the reliance wouldn't get passed along, but they had no other good teachers for Rains.

Maybe it was a Rain thing?

Dmitriy had been equally content to be fed information to work off of but had actually been inventive after his starting point. Mostly because Sonya could not do more than point him in a direction, and there was nothing else known.

What other Rains did she know?

There was Schnitten Brabanters, but she didn't really want to ask a Vongola Guardian about his nature.

…Miss Silver-white?

It was possible, but the thief only knew the woman's first name. Renato could probably help her with that.

"You know, I think making her irritated is messing with the results." Cherep interjected idly, inspecting a crystal shard of something violently acidic green then giving the Rain a pointed look. "Stop it."

The Rain gave him a blank, dismissive stare. Turning back to the Storm-Cloud he blinked at suddenly being glared at.

"Also, Sonya has broken fingers of the people that try targeting or harassing me." The stuntman continued as if Kazimir hadn't tried dismissing him as unimportant. "So… you might want to watch out for that."

Flicking his eyes between the foster siblings, the blue haired young man nodded slowly. "…sure."

Sonya scoffed, trying and apparently failing to control her annoyance if the pointed look Cherep was giving her was any measure. "Is there anything else?"

"Ah… the younger three. What do you want done with them?"

"Teach them the same way Dmitriy did you four. You know how it went, what worked and what didn't, so start them off until they're at a decent jumping off point then let them loose from there."
The blue haired Rain gave a hesitant nod, eyeing her speculatively as he got up to go fill in his fellow Rains of her orders.

Sonya gave her foster brother a small frown. "It's getting harder to care."

"Stop trying to force it." Cherep informed her flatly, messing around with another rock to plop into her Cloud Flame hand and jot down the name of. "If you like someone, great. If you don't, don't try to keep on talking to them."

"But they won't shut up."

"You can't have it both ways, little sister. Either set the example to be a polite Cloud or continue the trend of a vicious one." He grinned, with some surprisingly good-natured humor, at her continued flat expression. "Yes, I cheat all over in being an Inverted Cloud and actually like socializing myself. Poor, poor little Sonya."

She sighed, wincing a little as whatever had been in her left hand shattered this time instead of cracked. "I'm beginning to wonder if it will amass me anything, or if I should just bow to the inevitable and start bitch-slapping those I dislike."

"I rather like you being willing to talk to new people, myself. Even if you don't like them right away." Admitted her fellow Cloud as he changed out what was in her left. "Then again, it's been a year since we got to spend more than a day or two together."

"I'm going to try to be here before the circus returns for the winter from now on." She hadn't really liked the lack of him in her life either, to be honest. "So, we'll at least see each other more often."

"Our foster parents would adore seeing more of you too. I know I got my years in before Tats', but that didn't mean you had to drop the rest of us in order to spend time with her as well."

Huffing, Sonya gave him a dry look. "There are only so many days in a year, and things are still settling down. Still have yet to settle down, given this new upset."

Cherep rolled his purple eyes at her this time. "Life will never settle down, it's the whole reason it's called living and not just existing. Make some time, Sonya. I really have missed you."

"Fine." She had no clue when she'd be able to manage that, but maybe this Flame teaching gig could help. "Was there a reason you wanted to handle this part yourself?"

"I kind of have to get back to the circus, but I wanted to see if you got the same results with the Cloud-possible stones as I did." Admitted the stuntman rather easily, changing out both of the rocks she was blind-testing. "I'll stick around until Tats is done with a few iron rods, then she can save one of these nervous little runners from actually having to deal with an irate Storm-Cloud."

"I am not that bad."

"You can be." Cherep insisted cheerfully, a wry edge creeping up his face as she glared at him. "I'm teasing you, by the way."

"...I knew that."

"Sure you did."
With the testing going on, even if she was one of the last people to start it and making better progress than anyone bar Cherep, Sonya's first month home followed a pattern.

Since she got herself and Björn a hotel penthouse for at least the winter-spring months, one of the hotels the Zolotovs extracted protection money from so she got a bit of a discount, she left their rooms about nine. After ensuring the Icelandic teen was awake and on his way to the old training hall since as new as he was to Flames it would inevitably take him longer.

She spent an hour at least visiting Lisa, and little baby Valera who wasn't so much a baby anymore as he was a toddler. Who had long since forgotten Sonya and was a wary little brat about the thief at first until he got used to her again. Arseniy was normally still asleep or just getting home by that point, meaning although she got to at least greet her foster father they rarely exchanged more than that.

Since she normally made breakfast for Lisa instead of having her foster mother cook, the Storm-Cloud ate there before joining Björn for a few hours of testing different rocks.

Depending on how many violently shattered on her, she either ate lunch with Tatiana or if she was injury free went to visit Cherep and Crina and the rest of her acquaintances in the circus.

The old bat was doing just fine, terrorizing yet another new apprentice.

This new one, a male by the name of Peizhi who suspiciously hailed from China, looked by turns either terrified or hesitant about his role as Crina's golfer-man. Keeping out of his sight even if she spent some time getting Crina drunker than a skunk was a decent way to spend a good hour or two here or there.

Another stint of cracking stone with Flames, then Sonya spent more than half of the night with Galina managing paperwork and brainstorming new things for the next generation of Flame users to try.

Halfway through January of 1969, one night long after Björn exhausted his tiny store of Flames and had retreated to Dmitriy's office with the Russian women, the Storm-Cloud finally got a visit.

Gedeon and one other vor, who she was pretty damn certain wasn't a Zolotov.

"Miss Sonya Bazanova." The unknown announced as if she and the rest in the office didn't know her name. "You're a hard woman to track down."

The thief blinked a few times, taking in not only her Pahkan's son's forcefully neutral expression but also the overly familiar body language of this new person. "...who the hell are you?"

Gedeon slid farther to the side, leaving the unknown standing boldly across from the missing Inverted Rain's desk. Apparently, he knew this was a bad idea but somehow went along with it anyways.

"You don't remember me? I'm hurt." He actually sounded genuinely honest about that, which made the Storm-Cloud feel guilty for all of a split-second until she recalled she didn't give a damn. "Valera, from St. Petersburg?"

Nope, didn't ring a bell for her.
Sonya leaned back in Dmitriy's office chair, vowing yet again to get rid of that ugly eyesore of a lamp one of these days. "I've only been to St. Petersburg once."

"Yes, you were with some civilian outfit."

"...I still don't care. What the fuck do you want?"

There was a tiny lift of his left brow, then the man gave a sigh. She was only partially sure that was honestly given. "There are... a few people that are interested in getting to know you."

"And this qualifies for a personal visit... how?" She asked archly, drumming the fingers of her left hand on the desk she had been working on before this little interruption. "You could have just sent a message."

"Would you have responded?" Slick-not-baby-Valera asked archly, sounding truly amused.

She didn't even need to think about it. "No."

Frankly, she had already had her fill of social interactions for the season. For the year if she could get away with it, but she was pretty sure she'd still have to socialize with people she didn't care about sometime this year too.

"And that's why they sent me." He concluded as if it was reasonable enough of an excuse, not a rather flimsy one that was irritating her. "I am charged with inviting you-"

"Get out."

Flat footed, Valera blinked once at her. "I beg-"

"Get." Sonya rose to her feet, planting her left hand over the work she had been doing with Galina before the man could inch close enough to get a good read of it. "Out."

The insufferably stubborn asshole acquired and affronted look for all of a second.

A second was as long as he had until the Storm-Cloud summoned a copy of a battle hammer to her hand and threw it at him. Nearly twenty pounds of harden steel crashed through the stone wall of the office and embedded into the hallway beyond it, shattering a good fifteen feet of old stonework and leaving an impact crater in seven feet of wall behind it.

"Get. OUT. NOW."

Valera got the hell out of dodge while he could. She had tossed that only a few degrees away from his right side.

The thief pinned Gedeon with a similarly irritated glare. "A word, please?"

Galina gave a small cough, walking with a remarkably steady clip to the office phone. "I'll just call someone to fix the walls, shall I?"

Björn, wide-eyed from the damage she had just wrought, slowly inched to the far wall well outside her range of view.

Gedeon glanced from the holes in the walls, because before her Cloud Flame hammer winked out of existence it finally fell through to the office across the hall, to the both of them and then back at her.

Sonya was pretty sure some of her desire to rend the little bastard into bloody pieces and beat him to gooey mush with his dismembered limbs was showing on her face, because the man winced. "Somewhere a little… less damaged?"

"Here is fine with me." The thief all but purred lowly, sinking back to her temporary office chair. "Next time you bring anyone outside the clan in here, I will remove a square inch of flesh from you. If you must do so, ensure we're not working on something sensitive."

"You're not, though." He protested, almost sulkily. "I checked that before bringing him in."

"You didn't check with me or either of these two, because they would've said something. Who, exactly, did you speak with about what we may have been doing?"

"Fadei."

Sonya blinked, then blinked again when she placed the name with the eldest of the Four Rains. "You… checked with someone that doesn't work in this office."

The man, he was a vor right? She didn't actually know if he was or not, but this…?

"You wouldn't happen to know where he is at right this moment, would you?"

It would explain why Fadei sent Kazimir to talk to her instead of do it himself, he thought he was better than her. Higher up, even if technically she was in charge with Arseniy adopting a mostly 'hands off' policy with them.

Oldest male in the group, oldest senior male even if Sonya had been doing this shit for almost a decade compared to his three or four years.

Galina visibly brightened, turning to Bjorn with a sharp grin he was obviously wary of. "Come along, little Lackey. Sonya gets to beat the shit out of someone and we get to watch."

"…um?"

"Can you?" Gedeon all but blurted out, eyeing the slight frame of the blonde thief dubiously. "He's half again your size."

Snorting, the thief gestured to the door, and coincidentally the hole in the office wall. "Well, you're about to find out. Aren't you?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 23rd of January, 1969. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana had been mildly curious over the changes and new people that had happened while she was pouring her time and effort into Mafia Land's nurse courses with an eye on becoming a full-fledged doctor.

With that in mind, and while her presence was needed for Sonya's jewel search was going on even if she was perfectly happy with her bits of heliodor, she had been spending a lot of time in the Zolotov cantina.

Basically, a bar built into the basement of the manor slash office building her clan had claimed as a base.
Mostly for the little runners and lower ranked vory, it was still a gathering place where most if not all of the clan gossip got aired out and the occasional bar fight happened when she'd get called down anyways.

They were getting pretty used to having a Sun Flame nurse near at hand, when she left to finish her residency and start in on her internship to become a doctor they were going to be feeling it.

Probably might be less dismissive about my skills too, the Sun thought wryly. Just because she didn't do alcohol didn't mean she was a lightweight. Sun Flames and liquor didn't exactly mix well, and in weird ways too.

If she was to be healing, Tatiana couldn't be drinking.

As far as she could see, the Zolotov clan had a moderate pick-up in recruitment. There were more Shestyorka running about than there used to be, none of which Cherep had known from his time being Arseniy's runner. Her little brother, while he had stuck around, pointed out the ones he had known either on their way to becoming vory or slowly on their way out of active Mafiya life.

Now that the purple stuntman was back to his circus work, it left the nurse feeling a bit lonely even if she was within the heart of her clan.

Right up until Gedeon entered from the hallway leading to the staircase, walking a bit stiffly before Sonya herself.

Tatiana perked up, because her little sister looked to be the bad blank. Not the 'I don't want to be here' one, the 'I really want to murder you' one.

Entertainment, score.

Their Pahkan's son gestured to the bar, then warily backed up.

The Sun idly watched, giving her old subordinate Galina a fond wave when the Lightning notice her, as the Storm-Cloud walked right up to one of their fellow Flame users.

Then Sonya buried her fist into the man's gut hard enough he threw up all over the floor.

Before anyone else could react, the tiny thief grabbed his head with both hands and drilled her right knee into the bridge of his nose while slamming his head down to meet it. With the oldest of the Four Rains staggered, Sonya reached out with red Flames coating her hands and gripped the wrists of the two younger male Rains before they could apply their Rain Flames to her, causing them to scream before yanking with inhuman force to knock them out using the other's head.

Sonya pinned the last one, the girl, with a narrow look.

Zarya, the only one Tatiana actually knew somewhat from their childhood ballerina and gymnastic classes, held up her hands and backed away slightly.

Dismissing the girl with a huff, the Storm-Cloud bodily hauled the eldest of the Rains up by the front of his button-down shirt. "The next time you feel like challenging me, cut out the middleman and do it face to face. You ever endanger your fellows like that again, and your group will forever be known as the THREE Rains."

With that warning given, and likely uncaring if he fully heard her or not, Sonya dropped him like so much baggage and turned on her heel to stalk over to where Arseniy had been observing the confrontation with interest.
Their foster father pushed his bottle of vodka over to her, seeming highly amused at the little satisfied huff Sonya gave.

The conversation noise level rose again now that the fun was over, meaning Tatiana had to move in order to hear why that had just happened.

Her swallowing a gulp of the nearly one hundred proof alcohol gave the nurse time to work her way over and hear her first truly neutral comment. "I didn't know you came down here, Arseniy."

"Only occasionally. I'd rather be home, but I only got a bit to wait until I'm needed again." Arseniy dismissed that with a shrug, then jerked his thumb over to where Zarya was trying to peel Fadei off the floor. "What did he do?"

"Decided he had the right to make calls in my place. He might've been the one Dmitriy wanted to take over for him while he's out, but if he is he hasn't been acting like it." Sonya dismissed in return, nodding to both Tatiana and Galina before looking at her little hanger-on. "Bjørn, we're done for the night. You're free to do whatever."

"…I think I need a drink." The still relatively young teen muttered, bobbing a kind of bow at his patron then at her father. "Dama, vor Arseniy."

With an additional nod to both Galina and Tatiana, the Icelander skirted the still woozy Rains with respectable distance to give his own request to the bartender.

"…didn't I put you in charge since Dmitriy's out?" Arseniy asked idly, which was only a bit terrifying.

At least to his foster daughters, both of who knew the vor's habits and how he sounded like when they got into trouble.

Or rather, just before the Sun got in trouble with him.

"I don't think he knows that, which was why I was content to just beat him bloody and not rip his head off." Sonya admitted slowly. "If it happens again…? I'll either kick him to you or deal with it more finally."

Narrowing his eyes over at the three more conscious Rains, the vor merely hummed.

"You know, since you do walk around with an entire arsenal of weaponry? I think beating them with your bare hands was maybe a touch much." Galina offered pleasantly, looking entirely satisfied with things even so. "Aren't Rains supposed to be able to stop people in their tracks, though? Are they really that weak?"

"When it comes to other Flame users, in order to use your Flames on another you have to either have their cooperation, sneak it past their own senses, or overpower their own. Which I don't think they realized." Tatiana corrected with a bit of amusement of her own. "They, combined, still don't have enough power to trump my little sister."

"Storm, also." The young woman in question chipped in blandly. "As long as I'm aware of it, I can almost unconsciously Disintegrate anything trying to affect me. Makes it a little hard to get drunk now."

That was a new bit of news. The nurse gave her little sister a semi-concerned look when she poured another shot of the bottle their father was sharing with her. "Even drugs? What if you need medical sedation?"
"I've actually been meaning to talk to you about that." Sonya admitted wryly with a sigh right before slamming the vodka back. "I don't know, and since you're the nurse...?"

"...I'll work on it next with Doctor Kappel. We should have a few suggestions to try the next time you get a checkup." Tatiana grinned faintly at Arseniy's faintly suspicious look. "Sonya's personal physician, not part of her little collection."

"What little collection?" The thief herself questioned curiously, a little hoarse before clearing her throat.

"Don't worry about it."

The younger woman hummed, eyeing her warily, but eventually accepted her elder sister's advice. Smirking, the nurse gave the surrounding crowd more of her attention as Galina struck up a conversation with Sonya about internal applications of Flames.

Frankly, Arseniy's youngest daughter wasn't exactly a known quantity in the clan. None of the Flame users were to the rest of the Zolotovs, the best they had was Dmitriy… and Fadei, who was currently getting scraped up off the floor.

No one else had the time put in to be respectable, except for Sonya who had decided to concentrate her efforts well outside the Iron Curtain and Tatiana who decided on becoming an illegal doctor. Maybe Cherep as well, but he was also stubbornly civilian for all that he didn't mind his foster family's preoccupation with criminal and illegal acts.

Most of these younger people likely forgot the young blonde girl that would break finger bones in retaliation for her mostly civilian brother getting targeted. As a reminder, and as a second introduction to who the hell Sonya Bazanova was, the thief beating the shit out of the eldest of the Four Rains wasn't a bad one.

It wasn't a good one, either.

Sonya likely didn't care too much as long as Bjørn was trying to keep on top of it, but Tatiana did keep a personal ear out for rumor and gossip.

Mafia Land's gossip fodder was a twisted mess of rumors from around the world, an exercise in linguistic mastery if there ever was one. Tatiana was more than sure she missed a good chunk more than just half of it due to her language limitations, and then there was all the in-jokes and national happenings that separated out casual gossip from important regional variations.

The Zolotov rumor mill was almost paltry in comparison, easily kept up with because only a fraction of the people was involved in it. Bonus, they all spoke the same damn language.

Fadei wasn't exactly popular, no vory really ever was universally popular in their lives, but there were those that did respect him. His little ring of Rain Flame users was partially the reason why Dying Will Flames came to the attention to other syndicates outside the clan, but they were also the very first sign to the rest of the Zolotovs that Flame users would be good for more than party tricks.

Sonya, who had an entirely different set of expectations that came from dealing with people that were already fully aware of that, was going to be a bit of a shock to most of these people.

Tatiana healed, Galina was more of a 'sharp tongue' person than really violent. Bjørn was entirely too new to Flames to be of much use. The Zolotovs were more used to thinking of Flame users as Rains, and how difficult it was to really piss one off.
Storm-Clouds?

The nurse loved her little sister but was fully aware of how difficult it was to get her to care.

This was either going to blow up in a spectacular way or in a horrible messy one.

She wondered if she'd be here to see it.

(Friday the 24th of January, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Gedeon needs a minder." Sonya flatly informed Galina early the next day.

"He had one, but Dmitriy's in prison." The Lightning informed the only slightly younger girl, which was hard to keep in mind some days.

The thief was probably the most mature person Galina had ever worked with. Nikolai and Ziven hadn't been that focused even by the end of the gang and their crime spree, after Tatiana left and when the older two teenagers ended up arrested and extradited back to Soviet Russia. Adrik was taking a bit of a vacation in America for the time being, someplace called Santa Clara Valley in the state of California, and was so much a follower it wasn't funny.

Galina was pretty sure that even once Nikolai and Ziven got out of prison themselves and recalled their last member, Tatiana still wouldn't want to return to doing what they had been doing before the law enforcement in West Germany got involved. Which was a great pity, because it had been more interesting than what the Lightning was doing now.

Speaking of, Ziven was due for release in a few weeks. She should arrange a pickup for the man.

"...I take it you're not too keen on giving up Bjørn while we're here?" The Lightning asked idly, a couple plans working their way through her mind.

Sonya wasn't Tatiana but, in some ways, she was better and worse than her elder sister. Galina wouldn't be able to go back to working with the fire-haired safecracker turned nurse… but she also didn't want to spend more years being Dmitriy's minder. The man did half the shit he did just to piss her off, and it would serve him right to have to deal with all the damn paperwork on his own when he got back.

While something to do, working with the Inverted Rain wasn't a great occupation. Sonya had given her more to do, more interesting things to do, and it had only been a month.

Ziven had liked the girl when they were kids, he wouldn't mind following her for a couple years until Nikolai was released. Their old gang leader and her second had a few personal things to work out, once he was out of prison too, so as a temporary to possibly permanent arrangement their working for Sonya wasn't a bad idea.

The flat stare the thief was aiming at her informed Galina that the Storm-Cloud thought that was a stupid suggestion.

Smiling prettily at her, she ran a number of names and personalities through her head. "Gedeon is only screwing up with us because he doesn't understand. We need another Flame user for him to become accustomed to, not a Rain."
Not Mikhail, Sonya actively disliked her fellow Storm and likely wouldn't work well with him. The Four Rains were out, that had to resolve itself before Galina would trust any with a paperclip. Tatiana was only back temporarily, she had to return to her nurse residency and her studies to become a doctor.

Out of the 'older' generation of Flame users, that left Andrei the other Classic Sun and… "Usov?"

"…possibly. A bit young, but we don't exactly have a great number of us, do we?" Allowed the blonde after pondering the suggestion for a bit. "I don't really want to put him into that kind of situation just yet, though."

Odd… from what Galina knew, the thief wasn't exactly protective of a lot of things. Her siblings, obviously. Her freedom to come and go as she liked, which was why she was so irritable lately. Bjørn, but only because the teen had specifically made himself something of 'hers'. Any and all books she came into possession of, according to Tatiana.

How did Usov fit into that?

"Well then, there's me and you." Suggested the Lightning next, fully aware the thief was way too busy to be able to do it herself.

By the frown on Sonya's lips, she was aware of that too.

Galina sighed, thinking of the headache inserting herself into Gedeon's social circle was going to cause her. "I can do it, but…?"

"I'm sorry to ask you to, but the next time we might not be able to salvage the situation. You did perfectly with this book bullshit, nothing anyone couldn't have gotten elsewhere with a bit of effort was published in that."

Flattered by a rare compliment from the younger woman, the Lightning merely shrugged it off. "If I'm cleaning up after Dmitriy, yet again, I want something."

She didn't look remotely surprised, but she also didn't look entirely unwilling to listen. "What?"

"A favor, a personal one. After."

There was a long moment of silence, in which Galina very specifically did not hold her breath or fidget. The thief was entirely stingy about what favors she owed and given how much difficulty Bjørn had in inserting himself into the young woman's life, a favor would likely only really be the way she'd get out of her current position and into something a bit more interesting.

With Sonya's own help, even.

A very small, almost inaudible sigh was her first indication the thief was actually pondering it and not just flatly glaring for the hell of it. "What for?"

Galina also did not allow herself to smirk. "It'll be in a few years, but I want out of here."

The Storm-Cloud eyed her warily.

"If when the time comes, and I don't want to leave, we'll call it good since I'd benefit from this anyways."

"…I can probably help out with that." Allowed the thief, still wary.
The Lightning allowed herself a small smile. "Perfect."

Ziven would need to arrange his own in, but that would only be if he wanted to. Prison time might have changed him a little, and there was the whole point of getting arrested to consider as well. He might rather stay in Moscow to be a \textit{vor} instead of following a female thief outside of the Soviet Union.

Galina glanced from Sonya's slightly disgruntled face to the slowly approaching Fadei, who looked a bit battered that morning. Tatiana must have refused to heal him.

Deciding her aid would be better spent on ordering the intake of information today rather than assisting the Storm-Cloud in inter-clan politics, the Lightning seized on the first excuse she could find to leave the thief to it.

She wanted no part of two Flame users establishing who was top dog.

(ooo000ooo)

\textit{\textit{\textbf{Friday the 24th of January, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.}}}

"You're a violent little bitch, aren't you?"

Was he really Classical?

This was more something she could easily see Dmitriy pulling off.

"And?" Sonya returned sharply, crossing her arms under her chest and glaring at the Rain. "\textit{Is there a point to that comment?}"

She really had more than enough things to be getting on with, like the testing she should be doing. A more streamlined process ensured she got through a good number every day, but multiple tests of the same rocks ensured she wouldn't be beating Cherep's record to get through them all.

Fadei made an aborted move to touch the still freshly broken nose she had given him but dropped his hand and merely gave her a mulish glare of his own. "You'll never find a man like that."

"I'm heartbroken to hear it, truly."

The Rain grit his teeth but kept silent.

Sonya remained as she was, expectantly staring at him.

"\textit{If you're expecting an apology-}"

"\textit{Please.}" She cut him off flatly. "\textit{Don't waste my time. We're not going to like each other. Fine, I likely couldn't care less about that. Somehow you expected to be in charge and this little pissing contest over not getting the lead is irritating. Stop it.}"

"\textit{Pissing contest? Dmitriy trained me up to take over for him if need be.}" All but snarled out Fadei, looking like he wished for nothing less than to reach out and wring her neck. "\textit{Who the hell are you to suddenly step in like this?}"

"\textit{The one that trained Dmitriy.}" Considering it, the sequence of events that led up to the Inverted Rain being the one stuck behind, and Sonya had to amend that somewhat. "\textit{Well, to be honest, the} one that showed him how to use Flames and gave him a way to control it. None of us were what could be called trained that far back."

"I've never heard of you before last year, or that." He informed her, as if that changed anything.

"Do I care? Arseniy is the vor in charge, he handed it off to me and Galina. If you knew what Dmitriy wanted done, why the hell am I only now hearing about this?"

Fadei kept his mouth stubbornly shut, still glaring at her.

"Because you went and had a hissy fit." Rolling her eyes at the man, the thief rubbed her temple in sheer exasperation. "Had you said something, you wouldn't have suffered through a broken nose."

"Really?"

The word practically dripped with venom, which really only made Sonya feel disgruntled and tired. "I'm not staying, dumbass. Galina only might, depending on what she wants to do once Dmitriy's back. We have our own lives to deal with, and extra set of hands to enable that would be nice. But as of right now? I don't trust you."

"...so, you're temporary?" Fadei questioned slowly, narrowly inspecting her. "Why the hell would any vor put you in charge if you're just going to leave in a few years?"

"Arseniy is my father."

"Nepotism? Quaint."

"Pretty much, but at least I am a known quantity to him." She inspected the Rain from head to toe. "So, who the hell are you?"

With a sniff, and a slightly bloody wad of spit spat on the floor, he gave her a very sharp grin. "The one looking to boot your tiny ass out."

Frankly, Sonya would adore it if he succeeded. "Are you going to behave yourself? Or do I need to go bribe one of the Mists to give you migraines and nightmares until you do?"

Fadei refrained from answering, merely making a 'tisk' sound before sharply turning on his heel to stride back to where his three fellow Rains were warily watching the conversation.

With a huff of her own, the blonde took one of the available seats and merely flatly looked at one of the runners interning as a clerk when he informed her he was going to fetch her notebooks full of results.

Shamal likely wasn't going to be able to visit this year. It had only been one month, and already she couldn't see a quick end to the shit she had to do.

Speaking of, she also needed a talk with old man Zolotov. Which she needed help with, because if there was one person in existence it would be a bad idea for her to piss off it was him.

How long did Tatiana have left to go here?

(Sunday the 9th of February, 1969. The Pahkan's Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
Milos Zolotov was a very busy man, even if he really was starting to look every one of his years.

The man was seated behind his desk in his rather plushy adorned office, out of respect for old and likely repeatedly broken bones, regarding the Storm-Cloud standing across the desk from him. Gedeon was lurking behind his father, the elderly man's Sovietnik behind him on the other side near the great windows. Sonya wasn't exactly sure what this was supposed to tell her, if her request for a meeting held no enforcers other than the ones outside the door and the equally senior advisor to their Pahkan. Not that she was ignoring Gedeon, but the almost thirty-year-old vor had made it a point to stay out of her way since she threw a hammer at his invited guest and broke two walls. …was she finally going to get in trouble for that?

She'd paid for it, actually shelling out the ruble to have Dmitriy's office wall patched up as well as the office wall across the hall from it.

"To be honest, Bazanova, I have no idea what to do with you." Milos started off, his steady brown eyes almost boring a hole into Sonya's own. The thief kept silent, not exactly sure where this was going.

"Or your people."

Sonya blinked, because the only people she knew she had was Björn. She was also pretty sure old man Zolotov wasn't talking about her Icelandic teenager Lackey.

"I've kept up with your little ring's findings, you know. A boy who can make one's nightmares come to life, a young woman that can turn a piece of paper into bullet-proof shielding," Milos was ancient in Mafiya terms, and his voice carried that weight almost like a physical thing without sounding wavering or weak, "another young woman that can not only light an unquenchable fire where she wills but also throw a trick hammer with the force of a speeding train."

Usov, Galina, and herself.

"There is also a young woman who can heal almost any physical injury, a group of four that will likely become untouchable when they finally work the kinks out, and various others with an array of skills developing within those examples." Cautiously offered the Storm-Cloud, still lost as to where this was going.

Her Pahkan gave a little smile at that reminder. It wasn't a nice one, nor did it instill warm and fuzzy thoughts in anyone in that office. "I don't think I understand it, Bazanova. I am also much too old of a dog to learn new tricks. This Flame business obviously isn't going away, and we ended up at the head of any developments due mostly to your initial efforts. We also just experienced a bit of unpleasantness due to your efforts, an unintended side effect I'm sure."

Sonya was pretty sure shrugging to a comment from what was her Boss was a bad idea, so instead she nodded once to show she hadn't intended for things to happen as they did.

"So, answer me a few questions if you would, dear girl." Milos' smile got a bit more shark-like, informing her she wasn't anything dear to him despite what he said. "How old does one have to be in order to learn?"

"…we have not found an upper age limit, although it looks as if the younger one is the more flexible they are with it. There are rumors and unconfirmed reports of users becoming 'active' anywhere between the ages of four to thirty-eight that I know of so far."

"The drawbacks to using this Flame ability?"

"It's a bit like opening Pandora's Box, dependent on how you go about it and what type you end up being." She answered honestly, wondering what it was old man Zolotov was thinking about.

Surely, he wasn't going to ask her to teach someone… right?

"We are still identifying all of the issues inherent."

The silvering old Russian vor nodded once, gesturing to her to expand on that.

"I do not know enough of Sky Flame users to report on them." Started the thief, slightly encouraged when the older man only nodded again to show he understood that. "Suns, depending on Polarization, end up being highly active to the point of restlessness. Rains, again depending on how they go, end up either unable or unwilling to recognize when they are being insulted or become insulted at the slightest insult. Lightnings are either easily distracted or focused to the point of tunnel-vision. Storms become obsessed with something or how something is done. Clouds are either highly aggressive territorial creatures or passive-aggressive wanderers. A Mist… so far seems to be willing to mess with the perceptions of others or how others perceive them."

Milos rapped the fingers of his right hand on his desk, not taking his attention off the thief standing stock still in the middle of his office.

Sonya, weirdly, was reminded of Don Vongola trying this same tactic with her once before. The bookcase was behind her now, there were Russians and not Italians in the room, and it hadn't been nearly as nerve-wracking then.

"What do you think of my son, Bazanova?"

…not good things, actually. Unsure how the hell to politely phrase the fact she found Gedeon slightly wanting as their next Pahkan, the Storm-Cloud kept her mouth shut as per her older sister's advice.

Do not insult our Boss, Tatiana had informed her shortly.

"Well?"

"Gedeon and I have yet to really get to know one another." Sonya side-stepped rather desperately. "I cannot form an opinion of him with so little to go on."

Her gambit was easily seen through, if the looks she was getting from all three of them was any measure.

"And yet you felt strongly enough to throw a hammer at him." Milos commented neutrally.

"Not him, Pahkan. His guest, who was trying to sneak a peek at the paperwork that would move Flame testing out of vor Aleksandr's hall and into another building. Since our younger members would be making use of that…?"

Old man Zolotov gifted his son with a sideways look. "Why is this the first I am hearing about this part of that incident?"

"I… did not know who else to inform but you of the situation we… had." It wasn't exactly a smooth recovery, and frankly Sonya hadn't thought to tell anyone why it was she threw a hammer at someone.

Probably something to keep in mind the next time she broke a wall or two.

Damn it all, this was why she'd rather be a freelance thief than a kept one. A silver tongue Sonya did not have. Thinking about more than three or so people in terms of what her actions affected was also rather new for her.

"Well now, let's give the two of you a reason to get to know each other. And give Gedeon a crash course in this Flame situation so he can figure it out for me. What Flame do you think he has, Bazanova?"

"...Sun, or Lightning." He might have a minor talent in Rain, he was good at ghosting around without being noted.

Not Storm, he wasn't nearly as irritable or obstinate to show those traits. He could even possibly be an Inverted Cloud, but Sonya rather doubted it.

Her latest theory was to have more than one type of Flame, one had to defy death with them more than once was still pending confirmation or a rebuttal. Cherep possibly was still defying that first death, and most Flame users tended to stick with their first and develop that to defy death with from then on.

If one didn't know, and kept on escaping lethal situations, then what happened to their Flame type?

Might be why she could barely use that minor talent in Sun Flames, it hadn't been her death she had been defying her third time around.

Old man Zolotov made a few mental connections between type of Flame and personality type, gave his sour-faced son a scrutinizing look, then turned back to the Storm-Cloud. "Teach him."

…fuck. "Of course. For my Mafia Land contracts, may I set him with another?"

"You are committed to that, aren't you?" Milos mused aloud, a calculating look to him. "When is that contract up?"

Sonya didn't narrow her eyes, clench her teeth, or grate out the answer even if she really wanted to. "I recently renegotiated my contract, it will not expire for four more years."

The first one Lisa helped her get had been a one-year type deal the thief could've let go after it expired, at twelve she got it redone for three years. At fifteen and right before she left with Cherep for the circus, she had it renewed. Her latest renegotiation was actually just an upping of the so-called 'life insurance' policy in return for adding another year to how long they had her services contracted for.

If she died due to Mafia Land's mistakes or mishandling not only would her last contract's gross payout be matched by the island to place a hit on her killer, but her assets would be sold and split between Bjørn, Cherep, and Lisa's baby Valera.

"You are going to be a busy little girl, aren't you?" Old man Zolotov commented neutrally, which just made her suspicious that he had other plans for her.

If she survived the next three years, the 'World's Greatest Thief' title might not be so ridiculously high up there as a goal.
(Sunday the 9th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Renato irritably eyed his watch, then sighed. "I don't think she's coming, brat."

"But she promised." Shamal insisted sadly, moping a little at the lack of Russian thief they currently had going on.

What, exactly, would it take for Sonya to break her word to the tetchy Mist brat?

She adored him and did go out of her way to get him what he wanted if it was reasonable enough. The hitman rubbed the back of his neck as he wracked his brain, for as far as he knew the woman had intended to be present for the kid's birthday even if she had to murder everyone in her way.

"She could be in trouble," he offered uncertainly, "or in the middle of something and unable to break away. We don't live hazard free lives."

Sonya did belong to a Soviet Union syndicate. Renato had no idea how those were structured or organized, or how high or low on the totem pole the thief really was. Did she have responsibilities she had to take care of, or a quota to meet, in order to spend so much of her time in Mafia Land?

All he could do was guess until she showed back up, but if the damn woman forgot again?

He'd hunt her down every bloody year and drag her to Italy over his shoulder if he had to, even if Sonya would likely rip out his spine for doing so.

At least she thought ahead this year, giving her present for Shamal's birthday to one of the footmen to ensure it was here and ready to go even if she wasn't. It smacked of planning for last minute traveling requirements, not a 'for the worst' kind of thing. The card read as if she really had planned on being here, at least.

"Then don't you have to go rescue her?" Shamal asked way too innocently, but the hitman got distracted by the mere thought.

Sonya?

In need of rescuing?

That… he couldn't even imagine it.

Bratty Mist apparently could, because now he actually looked faintly worried as he clutched the thief's baffling gift of a massive black teddy bear almost the kid's size to his chest. "What if she's hurt? Or sick? I hate being sick. Or abducted by a really mean, nasty dragon and stuck in a tower?"

"…I think you need to stop reading fairytales before bed." Renato drawled out, trying not to let the brat actually provoke him into seeking out the missing Russian.

Sonya would show up when she did, they just had to wait to get some answers.

"Maybe some knight mistook her for his princess and is trying to marry her?" Shamal continued, ignoring the implied threat of his newfound love of fantasy stories being taken away.

The hitman's left eye twitched, but he stubbornly stayed seated next to the brat's bed. He was not going to let the kid needle him into doing what he wanted, even if the situation was a little Sonya had been irritated enough last year at being the one to forget Shamal's birthday, she would've made specific note of it in order to not do that again.

…the fact the day passed without so much as a phone call from her?

"What if a big wolf is trying to eat her this very second?" Tetchy Mist brat wondered aloud, big brown doe eyes widening in horror at the mere thought.

She might be a slim woman, but she had more than enough strength in her little finger to snap any wolf's neck. If not, she had an entire array of jewelry weapons to use against anything happening she didn't like.

Renato was unmoved.

Then again, the thief was a lot more touch-friendly with the Russians she knew of than anyone else he had ever seen her interact with. Maybe not so much a wolf as one of her home country's vory were…?

He pushed down the brim of his fedora irritably, just so Shamal wouldn't see how well he was affecting him. Renato was not going to go looking for the woman just because she was late a few hours. A month or so, maybe.

"Please?" Bratty Mist begged shamelessly, then used the one guaranteed weapon in his arsenal. "For my birthday?"

"It is your birthday, brat."

"Exactly!" Shamal cheered, grinning brightly up at him.

Renato glowered at him, ignoring the trap the brat had tried catching him up in. "I'll ask around. That's all I'm doing."

The kid merely nodded as if the hitman had agreed to his terms fully. "Bring her back quickly, okay? And she has to stay, for a whole week again because she's late. More, even."

…he couldn't decide if the brat was being a bit presumptuous about what he was really going to be doing or if he was being specifically blind and deaf to the fact Renato only agreed to inquire around about the situation.

Either way, the hitman was mildly amused Shamal was trying some of his own tricks against him.
Chapter 32

(Thursday the 13th of February, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Warily, Gedeon took the clear if blue tinted jewel from Galina. "What is this?"

"White sapphire." Sonya informed him shortly, not happy and not caring who knew that fact.

They were in Dmitriy's still being repaired office, the thief behind the desk, Björn making tea, Galina now fussing with the already collected results from the rock testing, and the son of their Pakhan seated in the chair the Storm-Cloud would rather be in.

"…what am I supposed to do with it?" The older man questioned, letting the little gem fall through his fingers only to flick it up again.

"Björn."

"Da, Dama." Her Lackey abandoned the kettle to the Lightning in favor of approaching the two seated across the desk from one another. "I learned the same way. Hold it and think of your life, where it is going and what you want from it."

"Close your eyes, or you'll end up thinking you see something before you do." Galina instructed, lifting the boiling kettle off the little heating unit in order to pour the Storm-Cloud a cup of tea.

Sonya was entirely aware Björn was of the opinion that whenever she got irritated or upset she needed a cup of tea and had shared that with the Inverted Lightning. The fact it worked, even if it only reminded her of various and more amusing times sharing a drink with an Italian Mafioso, was secondary to the insult of needing something to 'calm her nerves'.

It was better than going for a cigarette break, and she had promised Tatiana to stop or at least cut back on her smoking. Thus, the only reason she put up with it even if a smoke would work faster to get her out of the locations she got irritable in and occupy her hands more quickly.

She wasn't sure what was grating more, the fact she was 'teaching' something as instinctive and innate as Dying Will Flames to someone that likely wasn't going to be a good user or the implied assumption that her clan was trying to hem her in.

It wasn't exactly surprising, in that not a lot of Zolotovs truly left the clan for other things for very long. Everyone eventually returned sometime, even if it was only a short break after a prison sentence or after a more ranged job ended.

Sonya had… not.

A two-year stint with Cherep in the Großes Volksfest after leaving home, then she had immediately gone to Mafia Land to set up a more permanent residency with Tatiana. The nurse wasn't even going to be away long, she was returning more and would likely continue with that up until she finally qualified to start in on becoming a doctor.

Frankly put, the Storm-Cloud was only a high grossing thief because she didn't care if the generated cash results of her jewel heists went to the general Obshchak funds, a pool of cash for the clan's interests and uses. She lived off her Mafia Land generated funds, dirty though that money might be.
Dirty money either needed 'laundering' or had to be spent with other criminals. If Sonya didn't want to invest or pay someone else to clean her money earned doing criminal activities, then she had to only spend that money with other criminals.

...she really should probably start investing in things, just in case. Most of her funds were illegally acquired, a supply of clean money could only help.

Her eye was caught by a tiny spark of something... which she was pretty damn sure had been yellow. Sonya looked to Galina, who nodded once to show she saw it too.

That was the weakest result she had ever seen, though. Did Bjørn start out that weak too?

"Alright, you're a Sun."

"A healer?"

She pinned the man with a flat look until he seemed to finally realize he insulted her elder sister with that dismissal. "A Sun Flame user's ability is called Activation. Tatiana Activates the cellular regeneration and division of a patient, which results in fast-pace 'healing'. Otherwise Tats can also Activate cell growth to the point of causing tumors, Activate the nervous system to cause extreme pain in an instant, and Activate the immune system to the point your own blood will target and destroy your body from the inside out. So on and so forth."

Gedeon had paled at 'tumors', winced at the suggestion of instant pain, and swallowed heavily at the thought of one's blood turning on themselves.

"Tatiana obviously doesn't advertise that fact," Galina chimed in cheerfully, setting a cup of Spiced Black Russian tea in front of the Storm-Cloud, "as no one would go to a healer who can also kill in the same manner just as easily."

"Understandable." The older Russian allowed slowly, although it was still likely his father was going to be told the same information the moment he had a free second. "So... a Sun is... restless?"

"If you do not have a physical exercise regime already, get one." Sonya ordered him flatly, narrowing her eyes back at him when he threw her a glare. "I am already having problems, dealing with a restless Sun on top of that? I was ordered to teach you, so I will even if you require the information beaten into you."

The fact she'd prefer a more violent method of teaching was probably blatantly obvious to everyone in that office.

"There is a second side to Sun users," the thief offered slowly when he didn't bluster or protest after a long moment, "I know an Italian Mafioso who is also a Sun. Instead of being bubbly and a healer like my sister, he is sardonic and very much a killer. His Flames are also more weaponized than hers, and merely heals when he feels like it. I think you are more his type than Tatiana's."

He obviously still wasn't sold on being a Sun at all, but Gedeon had settled down somewhat from offended irritability to grudging silence.

"With the method we are using for you, you will be able to tailor the first results as you like." Pulling the master copy of her research journal Dmitriy had in his office, Sonya cracked open the worn hand-written book to show the Sun research. "It will take you time to reach a usable level, so until you can crack that jewel merely start thinking of how you want your Flames to manifest. One's initial ability is always the strongest and the most easily used."
"I've read it." He informed her, actually not backing down when she pinned him with another glare. "I wanted to know what is was we were pressured into forking over under the threat of a turf war."

"How, exactly, did that happen anyways?" The thief inquired silkily.

Gedeon apparently didn't like being questioned, if the expression on his face was any indication. "If you'd been around more, Bazanova, you'd know we're not exactly a syndicate with a lot of men available to waste on large-scale scuffles. When it became apparent some of the other gangs were either going to take the information by force, so they didn't have to go through us to get their people trained, we had to either commit or find a way around. It wasn't that important to lose so much blood over. It was my suggestion, yes. It came from outside the clan, yes. I still don't regret it."

"Keep telling yourself that." Sonya informed him dryly. "But also consider this. It started with me, I taught Tatiana and Dmitriy. In the next five years Tats taught Galina, I helped Usov and taught Bjørn, Dmitriy taught seven more. Now, nearly a decade later? There's thirty of us. If trends continue, there will be nearly a hundred in Moscow in a few more years. Not all will be Zolotovs, and they won't even have to come through us to get good at it. Which means we lost our ability to accurately judge what kind of Flame users other syndicates have now, and our first pick of new blood."

"The information could have been gotten another way." He tried to dismiss it by next, which just irritated her more.

"Of course, but that book you had us publish is about a three-year jumping off point." The thief told him dryly, flicking a few more pages in her journal to get to the Inverted Sun section. "The rest of them are no longer so far behind us we're still the better option no matter what. And now we actually have to go scout them out in order to know what kind of trouble we can or cannot afford, which is riskier than letting them come to us."

No way in hell he was Classic with an attitude like that. He was at least showing more of the personality type a Sun should have, stubbornly blind asshole that he was.

"Even if there will be, not all of these supposed hundred Flame users will be criminals." Gedeon all but bit out, looking and sounding rather disgruntled. "You're making assumptions on what? Possibility? I do not believe it will become so damn important having every one of these fires."

Sonya paused, giving the man a highly skeptical look. "...there is an Italian famiglia, several actually, in Italy who all structured themselves based off what kind of Flame type they have and how strong they are. The biggest is the strongest mafia syndicate in Europe. I've been chased after because I am a Flame user and the Triads wanted my Flames, to the point I had to damage a bit of Shanghai in order to get away. That? All happened when I was working for Mafia Land."

"Tatiana is continually approached there by other syndicates that wish to poach her." Galina chimed in cheerfully. "Just on the off-chance she might not be perfectly happy with where she is."

"I picked Bjørn up off the streets of Finland." The thief continued evenly, gesturing to her Lightning-Storm Lackey who didn't look very happy to be pointed out. "And then I taught him this esoteric Flame thing on a whim to test that rock you're about to break."

Jerking, Gedeon almost dropped the white sapphire that was throwing out fitful spurts of yellow Flame.

Sonya eyed the still not broken rock, then looked at the Inverted Lightning standing to the side of the desk. "Apparently, pissing him off will help."
"Yes, well… this is going to be interesting."

…how did Tatiana finally spark her Flames?

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 13th of February, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Baby Valera had a game where he piled his toys on Sonya's lap, getting frustrated when the thief so much as twitched something off herself.

She didn't exactly appreciate this game, because it required her to do nothing but pay attention to the toddler. If she didn't, she'd forget about whatever it was she was supposed to be holding according to Valera. Then he got frustrated and grumpy with her.

Sonya apparently could not win at all.

Accepting the little stuffed rabbit, she was vaguely sure once had been Tatiana's which was a bit chewed up and grungy at the moment, she reluctantly allowed it to sit in her lap as Valera wanted.

"Sonya, sweetie?" Lisa asked from over her shoulder, leaning over the couch to fully see her youngest foster daughter. "Are... you alright?"

"Fine." The Storm-Cloud answered a bit listlessly, readjusting the building blocks teetering on her left ankle so they wouldn't fall and require the toddler to restack each and every one of them. "Did you need something?"

"Ah... no, just checking up on you two." Giving the much younger Russian a look to inform her she knew perfectly well Sonya was anything but 'fine', her foster mother rounded the couch to stand fully in front of her. "So, try that one again."

"...I don't like people, Lisa. The last few days...? Way too many of them I'm supposed to be polite to, nice, or not offend. It'll pass, soon." Sonya got neatly distracted by Valera forcefully shoving the rattle she had been supposed to be holding back into her left hand, mustering a half-assed apologetic expression for the boy.

The toddler gave and indignant huff, something she was pretty damn sure he learned from stumbling after Cherep the past few weeks. However, he did accept her meager apology and crawled-staggered back to his toy chest to find something else to pile on her.

Snickering at the put-upon expression on her face, Lisa smoothed her hands down her thighs and took a seat on the living room couch to watch the continued decoration of the Storm-Cloud. "I'm holding you to that 'it will pass' comment. If it doesn't? We're revisiting this little talk."

"Yes Lisa."

The older Russian clicked her tongue, giving her son an encouraging smile when Valera peered up at her curiously with his father's dark brown eyes. Valera apparently decided he had kept the thief's attention long enough for the moment, scrambling over and using Lisa's left leg to pull himself up high enough to wiggle up on the couch with her.

Extracting herself carefully, because if alerted to her moving around he would pitch a fit and demand to reset everything on her again, Sonya ghosted around in order to be out of Valera's sight and still be able to talk to their mother. "Are you sure you don't need anything? Now that you're weighed down
"Well... I did have a question about your Flame thing." Lisa admitted frankly, carding her fingers through tawny brown toddler hair. "You said Arseniy is a Cloud, right? You were so worried about that a few years ago. Why?"

"Clouds... un-related Clouds, do not tend to co-exist well." The Storm-Cloud admitted slowly, softly because Valera looked ready for a nap. "According to unsubstantiated reports, anyways. Cherep and I aren't part of that, because we're not the same type of Cloud. Classical, which Arseniy and I are, are highly territorial creatures that do not like sharing anything they deem important. I do not know how he managed to raise me with so few problems, or if that has more to do with the fact he's not actively a user."

Giving her a level stare, her foster mother rubbed the toddler's back to encourage his sleepiness. "Will that be a concern with Valera?"

At the sound of his name, the kid rather unsteadily pulled himself closer to mom and started gumming the front hem of her shirt.

"...I do not believe so. If he had no problems with me, then there's no reason to assume he would have some with his own son."

"And this territorial thing?" Lisa questioned a bit more sharply, eyeing her with a measure of concern. "Have you found what it is you are territorial about, or is that still 'unconfirmed'?"

"I think Cherep may have been right... again." Sonya suggested after a pause.

It had been a realization of why the hell she was bothering with anything in the Zolotov clan, when she didn't really care too much of her standing within it or for staying a couple years at all.

Had it not been for her foster family... the thief likely would've abandoned the Soviet Union rather happily when the stuntman left.

There had to be a point of which what she paid back equaled the amount of money it took to train her up. If her first few jewelry stores hadn't done it, the string of heists she did more recently had to have surpassed the cost of training and housing her for about a decade.

Except Arseniy and Lisa were also Zolotovs, as was Tatiana. Valera was likely to end up one in the fullness of time. The clan had easy access to the Großes Volksfest and their wintering base, which also meant they had easy access to Cherep.

Sonya did not appreciate the realization she was a threat to her own siblings, when puzzling over exactly how old man Zolotov might try to nail her in place. Maybe not the nurse, but the stuntman?

The civilian sibling, who had such a lethal job?

Everyone knew she was protective of Cherep and Tatiana. She had made a very specific point of it through their childhoods and it was easy enough to provoke a hostile reaction from her if you slighted either. Likely it would spread to cover Valera as well.

Trying to think up a way to preemptively deal with it was causing her to either run in mental circles or draw a completely frustrating blank.

Sonya couldn't just leave, abandon anything to do with her home country. Not only would the Zolotovs likely send someone to kill her for it, but Arseniy and Lisa lived here. She'd never be able... to visit or have anything to do with her own damn family if she did. Even Tatiana and the vory who tended to deal more with international things in Mafia Land would have standing orders to kill her if she showed up there.

She also couldn't refuse orders from Milos Zolotov without a damn good reason. He was Boss, their Pakhan, and the man she really worked for. Gedeon was easier to deal with for the time being. She was 'teaching' him, actually more like guide but still.

No, the Storm-Cloud was going to stick it out. She had figured it was the best option out of what she had and figuring out the reasoning for it hadn't changed anything. It was going to be as hard as pulling teeth, especially if old man Zolotov really was trying to chain her down somehow.

She would not be cornered or nailed down, and somehow through it all she'd have to find some way to repeatedly get a couple months free here and there for her sanity if not just for her Mafia Land work.

Slight problem, Sonya wasn't exactly a smooth talker.

She only had some weight behind her, mostly on the strength she bullshitted with Cloud Flames and the fact she was the one to open up the lucrative Flame thing for her clan. The former more than the latter, if only because right now was a little rocky for them.

The Zolotov Flame users were currently stuck between being useful and still too green yet. The Four Rains, Sonya herself, Tatiana, and Dmitriy did edge them more to 'useful', but the bulk of the users were all only just around a decade and a half in age. Gedeon would be the oldest once he got good at it, and she had a suspicion old man Zolotov wanted his son to take over for them if anything else ever happened to Dmitriy again.

Poor Fadei, he'd forever be third or fourth best in the ranks.

Lisa's slightly cool fingers drew the thief out of her thoughts, enough to realize the older Russian had taken hold of her face and was now keenly inspecting her eyes. "They turned purple. Does that happen often? You really do look like Cherep's little sister when it happens."

"Not often, just when things get a bit..." Sonya trailed off, wondering how to phrase it in a different way than 'when I really want to murder people'. She was trying to not be a violent Cloud. "When something infringes on our natures, or our resolve matches our will."

"And you're... Storm-Cloud. What does your little book say? Obsessive perfectionist and territorially aggressive?"

"More Cloud than Storm, so I am aggressively territorial more than I am an obsessive perfectionist." She answered with a slight measure of amusement. "A stiff-necked, incredibly prideful, OCD kind of thief."

"...yeah, I can easily see that." Lisa returned with more humor, a smirk on her lips. "You are so picky sometimes."

"Picky?"

"You either do something like it's imperative to get done, or scorn putting in the effort if it will net you nothing. You don't do anything in-between those two extremes unless you're curious or someone else asks you to." The older Russian explained, shifting the nodding Valera so he was laying on the couch instead of half on her lap. "So, you don't do anything ever half-assed. Which I like, because it also means you won't half-ass teaching Valera this Flame thing when it's his turn."
"When...?" Sonya blinked, then gave her napping baby brother a considering look.

Lisa had a point, because she knew full well there were families of Flame users. Vongola, for the most extreme example, bred the rare Sky Flames into their line. Little Valera would also grow up with visits from three active users and would either pop his own Flames in time or want to be like his big siblings and learn to do it himself if he ever caught them doing it.

Genetically speaking, Valera was just as much a possible Cloud as Arseniy was. Which... might be another reason why Sonya didn't like the toddler's game with her.

Kind of a similar issue to what Cherep had with her at first.

...she'd get over it, eventually.

"Of course, Lisa." Sonya informed their mother, completely honestly. "I'll do my best."

She patted her on her cheeks once with both hands, then slid out of her son's sleepy grip to return to what she had been doing before walking in the room. "I'll hold you to it."

---

(Friday the 14th of February, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...the usual rules apply." His patron informed him blandly, shuffling a few of the 'result' journals over to another stack as she and Galina rewrote the information into a master list. "Five to ten this time, depending on how well you do we'll adjust that for the next round either this summer or fall."

Bjørn nodded sharply, checking his own notes to be sure what he had down matched what she wanted. Even the unspoken ones he had been instructed of last year.

Gedeon made a loud scoffing sound, glancing over from the far couch he had moved into Dmitriy's office. "Why bother with so many? You only need a few, right?"

Sonya took a deep breath, staring off into the middle distance for a moment before letting the air go and returning her attention to the newfound Sun. "Because I have other goals, ones I made with my sister, that I intend to see fulfilled on time. How many contracts I take is part of that. I also have other obligations, of which are long-standing, and I do not intend to drop them if I do not need to."

It wasn't anything physical, or anything verbal that his lady did, but Bjørn was keenly aware the thief's temper was fraying at an alarming pace.

He had made it a point to get to know his patron's tics and habits, especially in light of what she could do with her Cloud Flames. It was his intent to never irk her to that level, the point of which she was fully willing to use violence to make her point or remove someone from her path.

Normally it was easy enough. Sonya had a firm grip on her temper and aggression, so while you could tell that she wanted to smack you she wouldn't.

Lately?

Bjørn's nerves were practically shot from the events of the last month and a half. He had made enough tea to drown a fully grown human several times over, and although his lady humored his habit of making her tea it wasn't helping as much as he would've liked.
"For the time being, you need to focus on that rock." Sonya continued in a painfully forced patient tone, flicking one hand to the Inverted Lightning steadily working across from her on the desk between them. "Galina is the one that will handle Suns and can take over for me until I get back."

Gedeon didn't seem to appreciate the tone, but also was at least fully aware he was a bit out of bounds with his questions of his 'teacher'.

Bjørn might actually be wrong in that, but he wasn't raised in this Mafiya syndicate nor did he appreciate they were irritating his lady so much recently.

What had been so wrong with what they'd done for the last year?

His slim blonde patron had paid their dues in advance not only last and this but also the next two years, one would think that kind of dedication would've earned her some leeway when it came to other things.

Possibly not here, criminals could be backwards sometimes. Did they want more from her, or something?

By the time another month or two of this situation was over, he was pretty sure she'd agree to most anything just to get away from it again.

"Bjørn, go." Sonya interrupted his thoughts with a sideways look. "Once done, give me a call for the details and meet me in the first target location with the rest."

"Da, Dama." The best he could do to help her, and himself in a more cynical way, out of this was to handle her orders with the best of his ability. Hopefully not screwing up again while doing so.

Galina flicked her green eyes from her work, glancing first at him then at their currently shared 'boss' and finally to her unwilling 'student'.

The Lightning-Storm Lackey was fully aware of her plans. The Inverted Lightning had taken him aside and filled him in on a few of her fluid ideas for her future as well as getting across the fact she didn't want his job but a different one. That also meant he was fully aware another vor was on his way, one that might possibly be able to better distract Gedeon from bothering his patron so much.

At this point, any little bit of help was appreciated. Even if he had to get used to the idea Galina was intending to wiggle her way into Sonya's frosty guard and might possibly bring another or two with her.

(Sunday the 16th of February, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya actually hadn't known Ziven had been in prison, so when he showed up bright and early one morning sporting prison tats she really was surprised to see him chatting avidly with Galina.

Well… flirting?

Maybe?

Hesitating just outside Dmitriy's office, the thief really did wonder what they were doing. Heads together, whispering, and about shoulder to shoulder. Either plotting or trying to keep a conversation between them regardless of who might walk in.
…or possibly flirting. Sonya didn't know and was reluctant to interrupt in case it was.

"Bazanova."

Instantly slightly irritated, she turned away from the office door to look at Fadei walking down the hall towards her.

He hadn't exactly avoided her recently, but his other three Rains sure did. It made the Storm-Cloud not impressed with the Four Rains at all, mostly due to them being afraid of her and because the eldest still had yet to actually pitch in with any of the work needing to be done.

It had been almost a month since she all but smashed his face in.

She didn't like this group at all. "What."

"…our Pakhan wants to see you." Fadei informed her sourly, apparently not happy with either being the messenger or being required to talk to her.

Perfect. Now what?

Instead of asking that, because she wasn't stupid thank you very much, Sonya nodded once sharply and passed the man.

She would've gotten more than three feet beyond him, had Zarya not flinched away from her.

A flat stare aimed in her direction had her edging behind Irinei, which just irritated the Storm-Cloud even more.

"The hell is your problem?"

"My-?" The female Rain spluttered, looking half bewildered and half offended. "You beat up Fadei, for no reason."

"…how stupid can you be?" Sonya asked, actually interested in the answer.

"What?"

"I 'beat up' Fadei because he put our fellow Flame users, most of whom are younger than us, at risk with his bullshit. Did he not explain that, or did he lie?"

"We only have your word for that." The tall and beanpole like Irinei informed her blandly.

The Storm-Cloud stared at him flatly for a second, then turn to see if Galina had been attracted by the noise or not. Seeing the Inverted Lightning had come to see what the situation was, Sonya addressed her. "Galina, make note that Rains seem to have a small problem with being easily led. We'll have to think up some way to stop that."

"Of course." She replied cheerfully, whipping a pen and a pad of paper out of somewhere to jot it down. "Anything else you want looked into yet?"

"…not as of yet. Let me go see what our Pakhan wanted first."

Galina stuck her pen behind her ear, smirking wickedly. "I'll see you in a bit, then?"

"Excuse me, but what the fuck is your damage?" Kazimir all but barked, stepping up to be shoulder-to-shoulder with his fellow if taller Rain and to hide Zarya better behind them.
"...you are not only rather pathetically helpless against another Flame user, you also show absolutely no initiative to fix that since I took all three of your combat-able members out nearly at the same time." Sonya informed him flatly, glaring. "You seem to accept the word of someone you trust as is, not even bothering to check it against easily accessed sources. That's pathetic, and if trends continue all four of you will likely be dead in as little as three years from other Flame users. Therefore, not worth my time and effort to fix you. We'll do it right with the younger Rains instead."

"I knew all that, and I only just got in." Ziven snickered as he leaned his frame up against the door jamb of Dmitriy's office. "Well... you've not changed at all, Sonya. Nice to see you again."

"Are their fingers broken?"

"Well... no, but they also haven't tried harassing your siblings either." The probably just freshly titled vor admitted easily enough with a shrug. "Lina, you want to fill these morons in with what details their missing? I'll escort little Sonya to our Pahkan's office, I wanted to talk to her anyways."

Fadei made an abortive move forward.

For what Sonya wasn't interested in knowing, she aborted his movement forcibly by pinning the asshole against the wall with one of her golden battle axes. Collaring his throat through the space between the two arched blades and using her strength to shove the weapon into an inch of stonework to do said pinning.

He would not have the air to talk, much less bitch or try to spin whatever was said in a better light for him.

She was mildly interested to see what internal conflict would do to this little group.

Galina's smirk grew as she admired the thief's handiwork, Ziven even gave a delighted if rusty laugh out of surprise at what she could do now.

Sonya dismissed the rest of the Rains, turning on her heel to continue her way.

One fresh from prison hand-to-hand combat specialist easily caught up to her. "So... Lina had a suggestion."

"Oh?"

"Instead of her, I should maybe attach myself to Gedeon. Likely to be less tricky, and she could instead redirect some of his attention on you to herself." Ziven admitted lowly, shoving his tattooed hands into his ill-fitting slack's pockets as they walked down the hall. "If you wouldn't mind sharing the favor she asked for with me too."

Confused, Sonya gave him a sideways glance. "You want...? Ziven, you're a vor now. Right? Shouldn't you have an easier time finding different things to do?"

"Your dad came out to fetch me, and he did title me a vor once I was free." With another shrug, her fellow blond gave her a small smirk. "Which is nice and all... but it's another two years until Nikolai is free. More, if he keeps on making trouble as he's been. If I want to be free at the same time he is to get the gang back together or even see what he wants us to do after that, I need something... less likely to get me arrested again."

The Storm-Cloud was well aware there had to be something more. No shiny new vor would want to spend two or so years playing enforcer for her, even if or especially because she didn't need anyone to handle her dirty work.
However, Ziven was a childhood friend and was one of her elder sister's subordinates once upon a time. She might not know what he was really after, but she would allow him the benefit of doubt up until she knew what that was.

She'd be looking specifically for what it was he was after, but until then…?

"Fine. If you want."

"Sonya, you won't regret this."

"Touch me, and you will." The thief informed him flatly, sidestepping his attempt to hug her.

Ziven's sheepish grin was wiped off when they reached their Pakhan's office doors, and her fellow blond graciously opened them for her.

Sonya and her new temporary enforcer, as well as old man Zolotov and his son, weren't the only ones now in the third-floor room that doubled as both their Pakhan's office and the clan's treasury.
There was a few more random vory this time around as well as Pyotr, their Boss' Sovintnik.

Standing in the middle of the office was also Valera, the slick-not-baby one, and an older man the Storm-Cloud assumed was either his next higher leader or possibly his Pakhan.

She rather doubted the last one, so just someone more senior than he was.

"Forgive us for being tardy." Ziven started off, almost politely as if the assembled group hadn't taken him off guard as well. "Your messengers attempted to start something after giving the message, Pakhan."

Old man Zolotov didn't look amused, but he also wasn't grumpy or glaring. Sonya supposed that was enough to count it as being forgiven.

Gedeon looked a bit irritated, but that was a default expression the new Sun had around her so she couldn't tell if it was irritation at just her presence or if he had something to do with who exactly took a message to her.

"Bazanova." Pyotr called her attention to himself, gesturing to the two non-Zolotovs in the office.
"This vor is from the Novgorod Brotherhood and has asked for you to clarify something for him."

Absolutely no mention of what was traded or discussed about actually letting the man have a word with her was made, nor why the hell she should care. However, since Sonya actually did most of her clan-related business with the Sovintnik she knew the next few steps in this exchange.

"And?" The thief replied, obediently to expectations.

Pyotr gave her a sharp looking grin. "And they have agreed to not only leave you alone if you do so, but a few other… forfeits for the information."

Great. She was a bargaining chip. Getting rid of slick-not-baby-Valera was good enough for her though, so she sighed but did give the vor her attention. "…well?"

The man had some extensive artwork covering both hands, and from under his collar she could see he had a few more on his chest and neck. More than her foster father, so either he was completely shameless in what he advertised on his tattoos or tended to get jail time frequently.

"We found a Cloud. He's dead."
…Novgorod Brotherhood. Either Velikiy or Nizhny Novgorod. They might operate in one city at a time or even have brother factions in both. If she got information on where exactly this syndicate hails from in the last couple months, or any sharp changes in so basing, she'd finally have a range for a Cloud's 'territory' reach and how far to look for the next one.

Unless a closer Cloud user of Dying Will Flames was found.

While Sonya was sorry to hear about the demise of her fellow Cloud, she also didn't know what she was supposed to do with that information. "...and?"

The vor gave her a very yellow baring to teeth. "Why is he dead, bitch?"

"Because you killed him, more than likely." Replied the thief flatly.

Ziven snorted with little humor, reminding her that he was there. "Mind your fucking manners, if you could."

The Novgorod vor twitched slightly, then gave the younger man a leer of a smirk. "Oh? And why should I? This little slut's refusing to answer my damn question."

"I've answered the only question you've posed to me so far." Sonya interjected blandly, rolling her left wrist and pulling one of her mauls out of a flair of Cloud Flames. "If you are too stupid to actually pose an intelligent question, that's not my fault."

The maul was one Renato bought for her, one of the less ornate ones. While she had been amused to get a pure silver great maul that looked like some fantasy warhammer a dwarf might have held, the one in her hand now was the plain version that wouldn't have been out of place driving spikes into railroad tracks.

The fact she had no physical mass to hide the damn thing, as well as pulling it out of lavender tinted fire, re-centered attention back on her.

"I do not have to move from this spot to throw this hard enough to remove your fucking head."

Smiling prettily at the vor eyeing her now, she gave a glance at the even paler Valera. "Your little friend over there knows that full well. You probably should've asked him about that before this."

The Petersburg vor looked highly unwilling to be brought into the conversation, but he did nod once sharply at the Novgorod one when the older man glanced at him.

The vor tisked, turning back to eye her lithe form. "A toss from a stick of a girl like you? Wouldn't hurt a fly."

Sonya glanced over to her Pakhan, because this was his office and his guest. Old man Zolotov made a dismissive shrug.

Handing off the maul to Ziven, the thief pulled out one of her battle hammers instead. "Next time, Valera, bring someone not stupid."

Not giving anyone the time to so much as twitch, she threw her hammer… straight at the Petersburg vor.

It had only been an instinctive flinch that kept him from losing an ear or half his head, and her hammer yet again impacted the far wall. This time blowing the bullet-proof glass, all six panes of it thick, out of the window with an ear-splitting crash.
A regular bullet would've only cratered a pane in it, and apparently that fact wasn't missed by anyone watching.

The ringing silence was punctuated only by the few shards still falling to the ground below, and Sonya re-Propagating a new battle hammer to her right hand. "Now... try that again. Although, I'm aiming for your head next time."

Valera yanked himself upright again, the only one that moved for a very long moment.

"Feisty little thing, aren't you?" The vor all but barked out with a laugh, grinning wickedly.

"I have axes, too."

"Alright, wildcat." The man huffed, still grinning. "Sheath those claws. This kid, fourteen, decided that trying to take on three vor was a wise idea."

"He suicided." Sonya summarized shortly. "Whatever you were trying with him, he decided he'd rather be dead then bend. It appears to be a common problem with feral Clouds, from the scarcity of how many actually reach adulthood and are revealed as found. You either weren't strong enough, or not what he respected."

A huff was her first answer, so they probably had known that was the issue before ever arranging this little meeting. "How long until we can catch another?"

…she didn't really like the idea of answering that one, but from her Pakhan's expectant expression she had better keep on being helpful. "With the more dominant Cloud in your region now dead, either the less strong Clouds will start acting out and might get into it with each other to find the next dominant one or a new one will eventually be born into that vacuum. Either is possible."

Of course, there was also the possibility a new Cloud could move in or one had just moved like she had way back when. Sonya didn't feel like offering that up though.

She really didn't like this vor, or his plans to 'catch' another.

How many Clouds died young before their time because some group in the mafia wanted one of those 'rare' types to terrify others with?

Something about what she said seemed to give the Novgorod vor an idea, because he gave old man Zolotov a sharp nod and turned on his heel to stride out of the office. Valera scrambled after him, throwing one last look to the broken window and at her before Ziven crossed the office to shut the door behind them.

Milos gave her a considering look, then glanced around at the vor of his own who were considering the broken window and discussing how to best fix it. "Gedeon, Bazanova. Come."

"Go make sure Galina isn't eviscerating the Four Rains for me, Ziven." Sonya asked before following her Pakhan and his son to the far door she hadn't ever gone through.

"Will do. Ah... do you want this...?" He blinked when the weight of the maul disappeared from his hands. "...never mind then. I'll just go catch up more with Lina."

One of the rooms connected with old man Zolotov's office was apparently a mid-sized bedroom.

Sonya highly doubted the elder Zolotov actually slept here, so probably more for his Sovinntik than him.
Poor Pyotr, no wonder he was always in the office when she came to pay off her and, more recently, for Björn's dues.

"What is that young puppy doing with you, Bazanova?" Her Pakhan asked, seating himself a tiny bit shakily on the couch set up against the far wall.

"Waiting two years for his ring leader to also get out of jail." Sonya answered old man Zolotov honestly, or as honestly as she could without straight out asking for the real reason from the new vor. "He's fully aware I have next to nothing for him to do, so I suppose he's going to be handling what I had intended Fadei to do if he ever pulled his head from his ass."

Gedeon twitched, but subsided whatever that reaction had been for under his father's grim stare.

"...my son tells me you have him as a healer." Milos told her, once he was satisfied the younger Zolotov vor wasn't about to interrupt.

Which... wasn't really anything but a statement. Sonya had to take a stab in the dark to figure out the issue. "He's a Sun, Inverted. While Suns are better known to be the best healers... it's called Dying Will Flames for a reason. Instead of healing, he can also summon a palm-full of fire to burn someone's face off."

Old man Zolotov blinked once, then smiled in his shark-way. "I like that much better."

"Pakhan, forgive me but... I cannot teach someone who is unwilling." Sonya started hesitantly, fully aware this was maybe over the line. "If he's not willing... and this ability depends on willpower...?"

Milos inspected his now stone-faced son, then looked back to her. "I'll handle that part. You have some business in Mafia Land, don't you? By the time you return, he'll be a most attentive student."

...and that was likely not to help her at all. Especially not if Gedeon blamed her for getting him in trouble with his own father. "Actually... I was about to ask if I could take him with me. Not this time, the next round."

Old man Zolotov's features went stone-still, even as Gedeon glanced at her out of confusion. "And why should I do that, Bazanova?"

"I think the real issue is one of viewpoint, Pakhan. We have different ones on the rise of Flame users and what they will impact in time. He merely sees the Soviet Union. I can show him two international examples of Flame users being more than just very talented members of any syndicate from Mafia Land, the Vongola Famiglia from Italy and the Luen Group Triad from China. I have contacts in each."

Renato and Fong, both of who she would owe something rather dire to for the aid. As this wasn't personal, her friendship with the Italian Mafioso wasn't going to cover it. The Chinese man was going to be insufferable about it, but if it got her free from the undertones that were starting to disturb her any faster?

She'd put up with it.

...she should check to ensure Fong was from the Luen Group. He hung around that Triad's Mafia Land territory a lot, but that didn't necessarily mean a whole lot.

"Hmm... possibly." Milos answered neutrally, stroking one hand across a neatly shaven jawline. "I'll think about it."
Sonya had to go ask if the men would be willing at all, or if she had to figure out a different bit of culture shock to give the new Inverted Sun, so the delay was fine with her. "...did you need anything else from me, Pakhan?"

Old man Zolotov gave her a carefully blank look. "...Clouds and suicide, Bazanova?"

"It happens, more often when we're younger from all reports."

"Are you past that point?"

Honestly speaking, no. The thief was fully aware if it got bad enough she might be driven into doing the same thing, even if only through the act of being a little destructive towards this old man or his son and getting herself killed that way. "...I do not have that information."

Again, her social skills were not up to the task of fooling either vor.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 16th of February, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Ziven watched the goings on rather interestedly. It was a hell of a lot more interesting than anything he had gotten to see in prison, so he supposed he might be currently easily amused right now.

He hadn't really thought much of Tatiana's younger sister when they left Moscow, not even the first time, and seeing her again was fascinating.

The Dying Will Flame trick had evolved from resizing a physical Bec de Corbin into creating her own copies of them, one of which he had held and seen used but were as unsubstantial as the weather formation their type was named after.

It had also spread from a trick Sonya had taught Tatiana and another of her few friends into something that required clan staff to keep on top of.

That was the slim blonde woman's excuse to duck both Ziven and Galina from accompanying her on her next series of heists. Sonya claimed she needed the 'Lightning' where she was, which seemed to be true enough, but also that Ziven would be required to help her while the thief was globetrotting.

In the place for a boy by the name of 'Bjørn' he was pretty sure his old gang member had called her Lackey a few times.

Which the new vor figured was well enough. He was still trying to catch up, aided by a research journal that not only his old gang leader had contributed to but some other Zolotovs he knew of.

Listening to Sonya give Galina marching orders for however many months she'd be gone was instructional too.

"-and what parts of Omertà that covers Flame use. We vowed to keep our world hidden, our methods to ourselves, and to keep our mouths shut if ever caught. If the Vindice also oversee Dying Will Flame use, there would have to be mention of it somewhere."

"...I'll start looking, but I can't make a promise on that one." Galina answered honestly enough, still making extensive notes anyways.

Ziven was pretty sure she was ecstatic to have something to chew on in-between other projects.
He was a little bemused on the amount of information the thief seemed to want, but supposed the girls were hardwired a little differently from him and needed all sorts of details that might not be remotely applicable ever.

"Bjørn will know where I'm going and how to reach me if anything serious happens." Sonya continued, hands on her hips and gnawing thoughtfully on her lower lip. "Gedeon shouldn't be up to testing efforts for another month or two at earliest. If Fadei and his lot get up to their inane shite again-"

"That's what Ziven's here for." Galina finished for the slim thief, clicking her pen rather sinisterly. He had seen what she could do with that pen, Ziven wasn't fooled by the innocent looking writing utensil.

"I have my own ways to puncture over inflated egos... but you do realize they're rather young yet, right?"

The blonde thief was only a bare few inches shorter than Galina was, and the brunette was a respectable five feet and eight inches. Being five and a half feet tall meant Sonya was still looking up at most everyone, and she was on the slender side of skinny. More than enough meat on her bones to tell someone she was healthy, but not slightly built enough to pass as the classical idea of a ballerina.

Slightly prominent nose, high cheekbones, big grey eyes, pointed chin, and full lips framed with shoulder-length blonde hair. Nearly classic Russian beauty.

Too bad she seemed to be completely asexual.

The leers, jeers, and catcalls that she got from the vory that walked the same halls were all flatly ignored. Others checking her out were similarly overlooked, and the one idiot that tried a pickup line on her that he saw had been stared at blankly until he slunk away.

There was no indication she was aware of what they had wanted, or how she appeared to others. It wasn't even in that classy 'ignoring anything too crude' kind of way, it was nearly complete incomprehension to anything like flirting that Sonya had. Well, from what he had seen so far at least.

Ziven dimly recalled her doing a similar thing way back when they had been kids, the gossip and rumors that circled about her had also been bluntly dismissed by the then tiny blonde thief. Apparently it was a bad habit she never unlearned, and he could understand why she would bother allowing anyone to attach themselves to her.

Unless something got shoved under her nose, it was ignored if not violently lethal. Someone keeping a more practiced ear out for the things she missed probably was worth their weight in gold or would be once they caught something she couldn't probably learn through another manner.

"What does being young have to do with anything?"

"They're still riding the high of being useful." The apparent 'Lightning' informed the 'Storm-Cloud', smirking a bit wryly at the uncomprehending expression aimed her way. "They only recently did their end of training traditional job, and cleanly swept a whole business complex in broad daylight."

"While... grand and a bit over the top," Ziven allowed, paging a bit through the well-thumbed handwritten journal that had most everything their clan knew about Flames and their types, "that's not nearly impressive as a branch of an international jewelry store. At twelve. Botched but with a clean getaway."
Sonya flexed her right hand at that reminder, the hand she broke getting them free and clear just moments before law enforcement could corner the gang.

"They're a little behind, but that was mostly due to the Flame business." Galina rotated her own wrist, gesturing to the office they were within. "So, they're both feeling their way into being truly Zolotov clan members and catching up with the rest of us."

"…didn't Sonya start all this Flame business herself and her career rather early?" Ziven asked, mostly just to see Galina glare in her huffy way at him again. "These guys are still not impressive."

It had been nearly three years since he had last seen her do that, excuse him for provoking reactions out of her that reminded him of their gang's old times.

"The point is that they are green and prone to making mistakes anyone with a bit more experience wouldn't." Spoke the brunette rather forcefully, glaring at him exactly as he remembered her doing. "A few more months of actual work without the training wheels, and they might be less idiotic seeming to us."

"…are you sure about that?" Sonya asked skeptically, seemingly highly dubious over that possibility. "I mean I can sort of understand your point, but they should have something redeemable about them already if they would ever get anything we'd want to see in Rains."

"Just give it a bit of time." The Lightning promised, grimacing at the younger thief's point. "If when you get back and they have yet to really wise up at all, then we might have to write them off as a loss."

She seemed to consider it seriously for a long moment, then she sighed through her nose. "Alright. See if you can't get me a visit to Dmitriy when I get back as well. I'm aware it will be overseen and all but knowing what the ever-loving hell he had wanted them to do can only help at this point."

"The clan's lawyers said sometime this summer would be when his final sentencing comes about." Galina informed her but made another note of it. "So possibly a few months after you do."

"Galina… I have anywhere from five to ten heists to do. It might take me until summer to get it all done."

"It better not. I don't mind pitching in to cover a bit of time, so you don't have Torpedo coming after you, but there's no way I can keep on top of everything myself."

Contract killers?

What the hell did Sonya get herself into that she was risking hitmen coming after her if she abstained too long?

"…get Gedeon's help."

"What? Sonya?"

"He's going to need the experience, I think." The thief affirmed slowly, obviously still thinking this idea through. "Get him familiar with the information we already went over, and the extent of how much data we already accumulated and where it fits. Ziven can learn it at the same time. They both can pitch in with condensing the raw testing data into a comprehensive list of results."

Damn, and here he had been hoping for a cushy job while he adjusted to being out of jail.
Well… he had been tasked with keeping an eye on what kind of trouble the son of the Pakhan might get up to. He found the whole premise a little ridiculous but supposed the guy might be having transition issues the girls kept running into or something along those lines.

Best to keep his opinions to himself until he had a better grasp on what was really going on, because he was pretty damn sure Sonya wasn't trying to hide or conceal anything.

The thief herself checked the office wall clock, making a face at the time. "Galina, I have to run to make my flight. Is there anything else you might need?"

"Not that I can think of, if anything does come up I'll call Björn to get some clarification." The slightly older Russian woman made a shooing gesture. "Get on out of here, we'll hold down the fort until you get back."

Sonya hesitated, but gave her a nod and one more to Ziven before finally walking out of the office.

Galina huffed, waited a few beats until she was sure the blonde woman was truly on her way out, and then gave him a sideways look. "Well?"

"This is some weird ass shit you all have been up to." Ziven informed her honestly.

Tatiana could heal just about anything now, using a bright yellow Flame. He'd seen her do it before, but it had been mostly bruises and the occasional broken bone not a nearly severed artery he watched her repair when he went to see her. Sonya developed her trick weapons into something that allowed her to be a walking arsenal of medieval weaponry and toss them around with an effect like a grenade went off.

He was almost hesitant to learn what Galina had done with that jagged green fire of hers the past few years.

"I meant about Sonya, and this office."

"Aren't they the same thing?" He questioned, a bit confused.

Sonya started it, hadn't she?

"She put… ah, do you remember Dmitriy? The mechanic friend of Sonya's way back when? He's an Inverted Rain, he normally sits behind that desk. He's in prison, so she was recalled to shore up things until either someone else can take over or he gets back." Galina tapped her wickedly bright green painted nails on the desk in question. "She's not exactly happy with this all but is trying to tackle it all admirably. It's just…"

"Her temper isn't letting her?" Ziven finished for her, darkly amused by the very thought.

No one with sense would have Sonya do anything diplomatic or social intensive… or at least no one that knew her. She was a blunt, sometimes rude, very straightforward type of girl that grew into a similarly tempered woman.

The likelihood she'd piss someone off was higher than the possibility her normal behavior would win her a lot of friends.

"You realize this is Sonya, right? The little girl that once broke your fingers because you tried beating up her brother? The one who grew up to be a woman that can toss ten to fifteen pounds of steel hard enough to break through six sheets of bulletproof glass? If that one guy hadn't ducked, I'm pretty sure he would've been without a head."
Sniffing in offense, Galina crossed her arms under her chest and gave him a deadpan stare. "Do you have a point, Ziven?"

"...nope, just checking to see if you understood all that."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 16th of February, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Hey." Cherep blinked, then looked over his shoulder at his little sister. "Have a moment?"

"Sure?" It wasn't like he was doing much, so he tossed the tools in his hands into his toolbox and gave Sonya his attention. "Is something wrong?"

"Well… no. I wanted to know if you would like to meet Shamal for his birthday. Tats already met him, in passing but she has."

"…the brat you're letting call you mamma?" The stuntman questioned, a smirk crawling it's way up his face. "Sure, I'd love to meet my cute little nephew."

His fellow Cloud sighed, running a hand through her shoulder-length hair and setting the luggage in her other hand down by her heels. "It will be in mafia territory, Cherep. Italian mafia territory. The brat lives there for the time being."

"Why?" Cherep was pretty sure if she was bringing it up it had to be somewhat different than their childhood of living in Zolotov territory.

Not that mafia business would keep him from meeting whatever little Mist brat Sonya had gotten attached to. The kid had to be something for his notoriously picky sister to go out of her way for.

"Because that's where his godfather has him living. It's safer for Shamal there." The thief informed him hesitantly.

"Then I don't mind going in there to meet him."

Sonya nodded a bit absently, still looking a little torn.

"You're going to tell me to not use my Flames while there, aren't you?"

"It is not that I do not trust you, or Renato. Or Shamal. It is that I am not sure what Vongola's people will do if they realize you are an Inverted Cloud. Some of them are already jumpy around me, so to be safe…"

Safe, huh?

Cherep smirked a little more, actually laughing as something else occurred to him. "I take it you also want me, and not Skull, to meet this kid?"

"I am well aware there is little difference… but I prefer you." Sonya answered him tartly.

That was still freaking awesome to hear. "Can I bring my bike?"

"…must you?"

"I love my bike. And, you know, stuntman." He replied overly cheerfully. "The kid might even want to go for a spin with me. It could be my present to this shiny new nephew you've got us."

Sonya stared at him flatly for a long moment. "Only if you get the brat a helmet. I am not kidding, Cherep. Helmet, or no. And you have to get that past Renato first."

"Alright, alright. When?"

"Last week of the month." She answered, a bit more easily than the rest of the conversation. "Meet me in Reggio Calabria, which is part of the southernmost tip of Italy's main landmass. I will come fetch you, if you call in when you get there to Bjørn and find something as a landmark for me to find you at."

"I can swing that. A whole week?"

"Possibly. I will get you a hotel room if I cannot get you a place with where Shamal's staying for the next few years." His little sister puzzled something over in her head. "I do not expect to have too much difficulty with that, at least."

"Awesome. I'll see you there, sis. In… a week and a half." Cherep grinned at her, still more than a little amused at the brat's ingenuity in how he got her to allow him to call her 'momma'.

"Thanks, Cherep." She looked entirely pleased with his agreement to meet her brat, even giving him a quick hug in thanks before snatching up her bags and running off for more of her likely criminal activities.

The stuntman was somewhat sure Sonya's increasing tolerance for being touched was due to this little Shamal brat. Which now made him his favorite nephew, even if he was still the only one he had.

…damn it. He forgot to ask her what she wanted to do about that Chinese man who was playing old Crina's new apprentice.

Well… he'd ask her later then.

---

(Monday the 17th of February, 1969. Mafia Land.)

"Where is she?"

Sonya's little Lackey boy gave him a scrutinizing look, even if Renato was holding the young man up off his feet and against a wall by his shirt collar. "Dama is not here."

"Obviously." The hitman drawled out, dropping the kid to his feet now that he had his attention. "But neither is her sister, both haven't been here since the end of last year. What the hell is going on?"

At worst, he had expected to be able to ask Tatiana about the whereabouts of her little sister.

However, the nurse was also missing. Listed as being off on 'syndicate related business'.

"Clan things." Bjørn stated flatly, checking the pile of paperwork he had in his hands to ensure they were not ruffled. "Dama has a two week break in another week, you will likely find her then. If you miss it, she will not be free again for another few months."

Like that wasn't concerning. Renato hadn't heard her breath a word about her syndicate for years, and now they apparently needed her and the Sun using nurse close at hand?

It explained somewhat of why she missed Shamal's birthday earlier in the month, if not why the woman hadn't called or sent word.

He wondered if this happened last year too, or if it was a new development.

With a sharp huff, the hitman almost dismissed the thief's little aid… but a sharp flick of green Flames caught his eyes.

Bjørn had Lightning Flames and had used them to keep the paperwork he was clutching from being damaged when Renato grabbed him.

Well… no wonder Sonya thought Ganauche was defective. Her Lackey was a Lightning, she knew another woman with Soft Lightning Flames, and they seemed a lot more competent than Nono's Lightning Guardian from what little she had seen of him.

How and where did the thief pick this boy up?

He thought in a language mix Renato couldn't pick apart, a Germanic variant language with peppers of French and Russian sprinkled in. European, obviously, but not one he dealt with often.

Interesting.

"Excuse me, is there a reason you are assaulting him?"

"Why do you care?" Renato snapped at the new arrival, a Chinese man dressed in eye catching red speaking Russian.

"Well…"

"Dama is not here." Bjørn interjected rather exasperatedly, tucking his files under one arm and glaring at the both of them. "She will be at the end of the month at best. I can take a message, but that is it."

The Chinese man knew Sonya too?

Well, concerned bystanders were as rare as hen's teeth in Mafia Land. It was reasonable he knew the boy the Mafioso was sort of assaulting.

Did this man know what happened to the thief in Shanghai to the point her brother was wary of such a situation happening again?

Renato turned to get a good look at the newcomer, inspecting him suspiciously. Part of a Triad, more than likely. The other man was eyeing him back just as suspiciously.

"My name is Fong." The Chinese man started pleasantly, with a tiny incline which was apparently to pass as a bow of greeting.

"…Renato Sinclair." Returned the hitman slowly. He could pick up Fong's thoughts a lot easier… but he didn't know Mandarin Chinese.

New goal, once he found and dragged a missing thief back to Shamal he was learning Chinese.

Bjørn sighed exasperatedly at them both. "May I go?"
Chapter 33

(Wednesday the 19th of February, 1969. Tripoli, Kingdom of Libya.)

"Qaddafi, the thief is a woman!" One man snapped at another in Arabic, making Sonya rather happy she had bothered the fire juggler Faris to learn his native language while she was with the circus. "A woman will not be able to aid us!"

"You requested a thief, not a male thief." The Russian flatly interjected in the same language, making the naysayer startle and the other whisper-conversations come to a screeching halt. "Either get to the point or stop wasting my time."

Finding a random ass tent in the middle of freaking nowhere outside Tripoli, capital of the Kingdom of Libya, had not put her in a good mood. Finding her contact point was a rebel faction aiming to overthrow their monarchy was equally irritating.

The fact half or more of them seemed to be apparently sexist Muslims?

Sonya had known this world's various governments had all sorts of shadowy ties, yokes, and puppet masters in the mafia. She hadn't known she'd be in line to have a whole lot of blackmail if this coup ever succeeded, or even if some of these men survived their attempt.

This was the Middle East, the kingdom of Libya a very far western part of it in upper Africa, but still one country she knew would have some or a lot of instability come the turn of the next century.

Bjørn really needed to do a tiny bit more fact checking for the work he lined up for her. Religious Police might not be such a thing here, but she still wasn't happy with this job.

"Prove to us that you are a thief of any skill." Blowhard number one demanded nastily, sneering at her. "Before we trust you with anything that would risk us all."

"No. That is not how this works." Sonya informed him sharply, an equal amount of distaste in her tone. "How this works is thus. You put in a request. A thief picks up the contract. The job is done and certain people who shall not be named are paid. End of story."

She was fully aware of the two guard-types that were at the tent's flaps, so grabbing their wrists before they could so much as touch her shoulders was straightforward enough given the lamps were affixed to the tent posts and had cast some easily tracked shadows. Flipping them near-effortlessly to smash the 'war planning table' mockup was just an expression of how unamused she had become.

Twisting said wrists she had hold of to dislocate shoulder sockets with inhuman ease was just her being petty.

The other guards and men around the little broken card table rose to their feet in protests but paused as they tried to figure out if they even had a chance against something like her.

"Now either get to the point or I will return to my agency to inform them of your unreasonable refusal to pay for services due to trivial reasons." The smile that inched across her lips was a humorless one. "And they will bring their grievances to you to deal with."

No one got away with bullshitting Mafia Land's various branches, refusing to pay, or backing out of an already accepted contract. Aside all the killers they contracted in a day and could put to other uses, hitmen and assassins alike, there were also all those blackmailers and corrupt politicians that also worked with or around the island.

Besides being just deadly, it could also be intensely uncomfortable as well as life ruining.

Either someone knew that before sending off a person to arrange the hiring of a thief and told the man across from her that seemed to be in charge what would happen, or they could divine exactly how bad an idea it was from her expression alone.

'Qaddafi' gave a short, almost angry nod. Almost, because he appeared to be more calculating than emasculated by her very presence. "Acquire a copy of any and all information you can find that might even help us convince others to overthrow the monarchy."

She had been hired to steal information?

Well, that was a new one.

Rather loose of a target goal, but she could work with that. Bjørn had at least ensured it had an expiration date. Now she just had to ghost past all sorts of soldiers, politicians, and government lackeys that might or might not be perfectly aware of Mafia Land agents exist.

It was only going to be a couple days. They hadn't had the funds to secure her or any other thief's services for longer than that. Which was odd, because she was pretty sure there were oil fields that had just been tapped and the country should've been richer than that.

Maybe that was part of the reason why these people were plotting treason?

Sonya wasn't really interested in learning why or how, she'd probably figure it out sometime in the next week.

"Fine." She informed the apparent spokesperson shortly, turning on her heel to escape the musty and cramp tent.

(Sunday the 23rd of February, 1969. Tripoli, Kingdom of Libya.)

Slight issue with this job, no one stood around convenient corners discussing how they were in fact screwing over their population and leading her straight to what she had to nab in order to call the job good.

Sonya actually had to hunt around a little, and by a 'little' she really meant to get anything at all. Around guards, government aids, and all sorts of other random people who all knew each other by sight if not well and what their surroundings should look like.

She got very, very familiar with awkward hiding spots and how to check to see if a room is occupied in a fast hurry.

Aside her unfortunate and frequent association with the cramped and dusty side of an African palace, she had a few other issues with this job.

King Idris I of Libya wasn't a bad ruler, all told. He wasn't Sonya's king, or ruler, so her passing judgement on him made her hesitate. However, she was currently aiding a faction of his own government in their plot to overthrow him so ignoring the situation wasn't something she could realistically do.
While she greatly preferred jobs and contracts where what she stole would only make history in the 'where did it go?' kind of way, jobs like 'help us to change history' were also things she would inevitably get involved with if she kept working for Mafia Land.

More to the current point, King Idris the First was… conservative. It might be Rachel's lifetime of hearing about the war that went on in the Middle East coloring Sonya's perspective, but he really was rather temperate in how he ruled.

There was no mass, large-scale atrocities. No suppressed, unhappy populace. There weren't uncountable orphans slipping through the streets or widows bawling about missing husbands due to some conflict or another.

It was just the King's policies were not popular, and a large portion of his population wanted someone more forward and progressive. More Arab nationalist rather than what they had.

…and a more efficient government with less taxes, but all people everywhere had wanted that since the dawn of the Roman empire.

The Mafia Land agent spent three days and two nights carefully pawing her way through countless offices, following oil-field money to where the ever-loving hell it was going. Money made the world turn around and was one of the better incentives she could likely gain more from for her 'target'.

She eventually traced the bulk of it back into the agriculture development plans currently being implemented.

Almost three-quarters of what the government was earning through selling crude and refined petroleum products was being poured back into the country, but the results were things that would take years to be noticeable. Water reservoirs for irrigation, farmland development, things like that.

Not exactly a mark of a bad ruler.

The third night, she broke into a prison.

Of course King Idris I imprisoned political dissidents, who didn't in this world?

Mahmud Sulayman al-Maghribi, who had been pretty damn surprised to see a woman breaking into a prison just to ask around about the Libyan King, gave her a bit of a lead in return for a couple newspapers. Since she had no idea when he had been first imprisoned or how long it would be until he got out again, she complied for a brief lecture on liberal Libyan views and the unrest he had gotten imprisoned for fanning.

By the time she could escape that, she was firmly of the opinion the older Muslim had greatly missed hearing himself talk and was a little full of himself.

….or he was a condescending asshole that viewed her as an abnormality in the 'weaker sex'.

Probably not, but she was detecting a general theme to most interactions she had with Muslims lately.

Day four, she returned to the royal palace in Tripoli to search out the kingdom's foreign policy plans. King Idris the First's greatest failing, in a liberal Libyan's view, was his over-reliance and conformity to Western influences. Which did have some basis in real life facts, Libya currently got financial aid in exchange for allowing both the United Kingdom and the United States to maintain a military presence in their country.

Running out of time, and with the flimsiest of things to go on, Sonya compiled what she had learned over the last few days into a shorthand kind of report. Palace rumor, about Queen Fatima's conversation with the royal couple's adopted daughter Suleima about exactly how many children the King had fathered and which didn't survive their infancy, what she had dug up, and the short version of what she had gotten out of Maghribi.

Then she stole into Gaddafi's tiny office in the Libyan Army's Signal Corps and dropped what she had on his desk.

After getting over his shock at her surprise appearance, of which she probably didn't help any by taking up possession of one of his office chairs and blandly staring back until he got with the program, the army officer carefully poured over her information while also trying to keep an ear out for anyone that might discover her presence.

Which was slightly insulting, but Sonya bit her tongue and just sat there. Repeating 'two more days' over and over in her head.

"There is little here of use, thief."

"King Idris the First is an unpopular king, not a bad one." The Russian informed him flatly, irritated with both him and her own lack of solid findings. "Besides the corruption in government offices, which is so evident you probably already knew it, and the foreign affairs policies which may prove equally unpopular? There is little else to find."

"Foreign…?" Gaddafi apparently hadn't gotten that far in his perusal of her findings, he skipped a few pages of labor-intensive hand-written notes to see what she was talking about.

"The British are using your country as a logistical pin for covert intelligence operations in the Nigerian Civil War. They will not be pulling out of your country for another full year." Even if they should've been gone five years ago, when they were first asked to leave.

Cue under-the-table negotiations and payoffs, which King Idris I might or might not have been aware of. Regardless, it was his government and therefore his responsibility as the head of it for their actions.

It was, apparently, more than enough from the expression of pure distaste on Gaddafi's face as he read her notes on it.

When the Muslim man looked back up at her, the Russian gave him a level look. "You have paid for my services for another two days."

"Are you able to get a message to Maghribi?" He asked, tapping a finger on the name in question in her report.

"Obviously." She had gotten in to talk to the man in the first place, the question was a bit superfluous.

Gaddafi scribbled a short note in Arabic, which she hadn't learned to read so was unaware of what exactly it was even if his attempts to conceal the contents failed miserably. "Take this to him and bring back his reply."

"Do you want a written one or a verbal one?" Sonya didn't care to know what it was that this man wanted to say to the other, and she wasn't interested in the least in what the reply was.

The entire situation was bothering her, but she couldn't solidly decide on what was plucking on her nerves. If it was the country, the current on-going treason being plotted, or the people involved.
Two days of playing messenger girl might be it, too.

"Written." The Signal Corps officer snapped, eyeing her suspiciously before handing over the note.

The thief didn't bother informing him she couldn't read the language even if she could speak it. He wouldn't believe her anyways and letting him have a way to possibly lead her into a trap was just stupid.

(Tuesday the 25th of February, 1969. Mafia Land.)

Sonya got into Mafia Land in the early hours, which meant she had a few hours to kill before she risked the island's streets.

Not that she expected to have any problems, but the dark and copious amounts of alcohol tended to make lesser criminals bold enough to risk their luck against more dangerous ones. The Russian thief didn't just avoid Mafia Land's streets for her own well-being, but also for her sanity.

She hadn't had to kill very many people to date, but she also knew that bit of luck wasn't going to last her long.

Instead of court the possibility of increasing her kill count, or risk someone getting lucky against her because that really only took once to be lethal, she instead browsed a bit of the shopping complex attached to the air/sea port complex and the Arrival Hall.

It was mostly just tacky tourist shop crap the closest to the actual airport and dockyard. There was also a random flower shop, a laundromat and a more expensive dry cleaners, three pawn shops of various sizes, and a convenience store. Which didn't include the various kiosks, the Mafia Land bank branch, and the large number of newspaper hawkers.

Sonya didn't buy anything in this part of the island but didn't mind browsing around a little.

Since it was last minute shops, most of it was way overpriced even considering the fact most of the money used on the island was either dirty or blood money. Money that couldn't be used in any large amount in any civilian outfit or for any great legal reason, and which generally either got banked to be laundered or only spent on the island.

Black hole of Calcutta, the thief mused to herself. Wondering only a slight bit idly exactly how much of any government's finances were tied up in the island, and where the hell she picked that saying up from.

Later she wouldn't clearly recall what tripped her off, but whatever it was had her whipping around and pooling some of her Cloud Flames into her right palm.

Renato was stalking over to her, face blank and all but glaring. "Little lady Sonya… where the hell have you been?"

"…Libya?" The Russian Storm-Cloud replied blankly, wondering what she had done. Didn't do, apparently by what little context she had so far. "Why?"

"You missed Shamal's birthday."

"No, I did not." She refuted instantly, then paused and considered the implications. The hitman would know better than anyone if she had. "…right? It is not until the end of the month."

"Sonya, it was the ninth." He drawled out darkly, at least now looking fairly irritated rather than just blank.

Sonya blinked a few times. "I thought that was Ottavia's."

With an exasperated sigh, the Italian plucked his fedora off and ran a hand through his short and spiky hair. "January ninth was Daniella Vongola's fifty-fifth birthday. February ninth was Shamal's sixth."

"…oh. Oh fuck."

"I'm starting to think you need a keeper." Renato snarked at her disgustedly. "Your Lackey isn't a very good one."

"Leave Bjorn out of this." Sonya snapped back, mostly reflexively and without much heat.

Mostly because her brain was blank. The only thought she had in her head was the fact she promised Shamal she'd be there this year, and a sinking-type of guilty feeling settling in her gut was distracting her from anything else.

"I… fuck, give me a day."

"You have three hours. Then I'm throwing you on some kind of transport, even if it's just a damn rowboat."

"Fine." The thief was a breath away from snarling something nasty back, but the simple fact she was in the wrong on the subject kept her mouth shut.

Instead of say anything else, Sonya turned on her heel and stalked to the great double doors of bulletproof glass. It was still before dawn, but she suddenly didn't mind the thought too much anymore.

She'd try her luck with the drunks and risk-takers. Maybe someone would be stupid, and she'd get to smash someone's hands while pretending they were Renato's.

…even if this was totally her fault.

"Well… at least you can admit that." The hitman himself chipped in his two bits on her mental train of thought.

Sonya very slowly blew out a measured breath, giving him a similarly level look over one shoulder as she tried to tamp down her irritation. "I thought you were attempting to control that?"

"I haven't been given much help in trying." Renato continued almost pleasantly, which made her suspicious. "But, given the brat is demanding the same forfeit as last year, we should have more than enough to make a decent start."

Pondering it, if only because it was something other than the guilty feeling she was struggling under, the thief had to admit that while it sounded like something she was willing to do… it probably wasn't going to be possible.

"Why not?"

"…because a few things back home have gotten a little…" "tight, was how she wanted to finish that.

Constraining was another good word.

"…Sonya?"

"This is the earliest I would have gotten free anyways." She admitted slowly, not as an excuse but a fact nonetheless. "…and this year, probably also the next, I will be very busy just trying to survive."

Sonya was also technically playing hooky on her own clan by not immediately going to her second Mafia Land contract and returning to Moscow take some of the pressure off Galina. A week in-between would've been doable, two was stretching it, but any longer than that and it would be more than just obvious the Storm-Cloud was reluctant to go back.

"Ho?" It wasn't really a question, even if it was pitched that way.

To her, it sounded more like a demand.

Which Sonya wasn't going to bother with answering. It wasn't his business.

"Sonya, I'm not asking again."

"Perfect." She tossed over a shoulder, skirting a rowdy group of somehow connected individuals.
