There was a thief in that group, she recognized him after several years of passing through the Thieves' Hall. What he had going on with two of Renato's fellow hitmen, who recognized the man at her back and shifted near-absently in response to keep him in sight, was something to ponder.

The Italian didn't so much as twitch in return for their actions, but he did smoothly insert himself between Sonya and the group as they passed one another down a well-lit but pre-dawn Mafia Land street.

Ignoring the hitman stalking her steps, the thief mainly just concentrated on making her way to her clan's condo and keeping an eye out for anything too suspicious going on.

Which… pretty much described the streets of Mafia Land regularly.

In the dark however, there was an increase of shady types and a dearth of family groups. Most of which she ignored, as they were about other business than eyeing the others walking the semi-lit roads. The real threats were the loitering mafia men and women, eyeing those out and about speculatively. Hunting for either easy targets or keeping watch for or on their fellows.

That was why Sonya hated walking the main streets when it was fully dark. Aside the higher likelihood for violent confrontations and the risk of walking into one already in progress, getting eyeballed by some idiot that didn't realize she could literally take their heads off with a swing grated on her nerves.

They weren't the biggest baddies walking around, and she refused to act like they were. The biggest bad in her mind was her foster father, and she wasn't about to change that just for some prick who felt himself and whatever weapon of choice up then decided they were cool.

She was more distracted by keeping a wary eye out as they walked than on what her current strolling partner was up to, which enabled the Sun using Mafioso to herd her somewhat into a corner between two shops. When the thief pulled up short to avoid running into a brick wall, she had a living one to her immediate left that was equally unwilling to budge.
Relatively speaking, that was. She could make either move, but the damages…

"You… are pretty much the only female influence the brat has." Renato started off silkily as he slid forward a little to really put her in his shadow cast by the street lamps, a rather cold looking smirk twisting his features. "Which you agreed to, when he asked to call you 'mamma' and you allowed it."

Sonya blinked up at him blankly, because she yet again couldn't find the obvious return statement for that.

She supposed it was true enough, as it was stated. Shamal either had her or whatever woman the hitman was skirt chasing at the moment, and frankly she'd rather handle any feminine questions the brat had to pose than whatever flavor of the week or month.

"…we'll pick that one up later." He muttered sourly before continuing in a stronger tone. "My point is, as the brat's primary guardian I should be kept informed of anything that might impact his care."

"Sure?" Rather stupidly redundant statement, but she could agree with the line of thought.

"Since you are part of his life, I then merit being kept informed of what might affect you. Yes?"

…she had to think about that one. Shamal was one thing, the brat was too young yet to really use any information she gave against her nor did it look like he ever would.

Renato?

He was a different kettle of fish entirely.

The hitman was a whole lot more willing to use what he knew of her against her and had little to no impediment to lying to her. She had asked Nono Vongola much later than she probably should've, but the Don of Vongola informed her he was entirely willing to allow her to refrain from attending a Christmas Ball as long as she had some reason for being in the Iron Fort other than visiting Shamal.

A bribe was required, in other words.

Renato had claimed Nono would have an issue with her being there but abstaining, to her face.

The man in question had apparently been following her line of thought, he rolled his eyes. "That? Of course I was lying. Who wouldn't?"

The Russian huffed sourly, slightly nettled with that confirmation of what he would or wouldn't do to her. She made as if to push past him and continue on her way, but a quick movement and an arm barring later she found herself pulled up short again.

Cornered by two actual walls and the hitman.

There was an entirely blank moment when Sonya regarded Renato and the considered position he had maneuvered them both into. She had two corner forming walls to her back, one brick and the other wooden fencing, and an individual that likely outweighed her by more than half again her own weight. He was also crowding her backwards, which forced her to either crane her neck or press up against the bricks and wood behind her.

…she didn't like this but was unable to figure out a socially acceptable way to tell the man who was also her friend to back off.
Renato took advantage of her inability to decide what to do, fully planting his right hand on the fence slats behind her and leaning in closer. "I'm not asking for a complete accounting, Sonya. Just… major events. That might impact the time you have for the brat."

The thief was officially uncomfortable with this.

It sounded reasonable, and she could reason why and for what purpose he wanted to know.

However, the crowding and her lack of options was also making her slightly fidgety. This wasn't the time or place to get distracted from their surroundings and she was pretty sure he was intentionally causing it, so he'd get what he wanted with little fuss.

By the expression on the man's face, he hadn't been expecting for her to plant her own hand dead center on his chest and push backwards until he physically slid away from her. "…let me think about it."

"If I let you think about it, you'll find some way to weasel out of it since you just love dropping off the grid entirely now and again." The hitman sourly drawled out, a hand reaching up to adjust his fedora a bit lower, so the brim shaded his dark eyes. "A line now and again would work fine. Write the brat letters for all I care. Something."

Letter writing wasn't all that bad of an idea. Sonya had little to no idea what to put into a letter, but as a Cyrillic reading exercise she likely couldn't find a better one unless she had months of free time to teach Shamal herself. "Maybe."

"Is that all I'm getting?"

"For now, yes." She confirmed, edging to the side in order to free up her range of movement back to an acceptable level.

Later, she'd seriously ponder the suggestion/demand. When certain hitmen weren't trying to… intimidate?

Trying to intimidate her into anything she might not like given enough time.

Renato had been trying to intimidate her. What was so wrong with just asking?

Was that needed?

"…Sonya, I wasn't trying to intimidate you." He stated flatly, eying her speculatively.

The thief snorted, finally slithering out from the corner he had backed her into and looked in his direction to snap something about intentions versus results.

A dull glint of something small and long caught the very corner of her eye, so instead of the words she had intended to bite out she instead grabbed hold of Renato's lapel to yank the man into her personal space again. Probably by sheer virtue of being able to read her mind, the hitman didn't protest her actions but grabbed a handgun from the small of his back and fired off three shots in the approximate direction she spotted metal.

The lone shot they got in return whistled through the area he had been in only moments before.

Whoever it was, they were a terrible shot. That wouldn't have done anything but slightly inconvenienced the Italian Sun, at least until he healed it up. Mid-chest, and with the angle the hitman had been standing at probably only lung or shoulder would've been hit.
Renato snorted himself that time, if for her train of thought or if he agreed with it or for another reason was debatable. Cocking the gun in hand again, he stalked over to the shooter.

Probably to see if he or she was still alive, and if he could get a 'why' from whoever it was.

Slightly curious over the reasons herself, Sonya lingered instead of taking the distraction to continue on her way. She wanted to know if this was just an attack of opportunity or if there was yet another person Renato pissed off after him again.

Also, to keep an eye out for anyone else while the hitman poked their attacker.

Which let her spot asshole number two and three, sneaking out from an alleyway on the opposite side of the street than the first one.

A rather shoddy pincer maneuver, since attacker number one either started it early or didn't know he or she would be getting backup.

Two and three froze when they realized Sonya was watching them, exchanging a look then looking back at the highly unamused Russian Storm-Cloud. Three jabbed Two in the ribs, then again when that didn't seem to elicit the response the man wanted. Finally, asshole number Two straightened up a little nervously and quirked a rather sickly-looking grin at the thief then bolted as fast as he could away from the area.

Sonya blinked. Asshole number Three looked torn between being pissed off and envious.

When the man looked back at her, he paled and tried his own escape.

Renato hadn't really need all that much time to go kick a corpse, the man had come up on Sonya's right side while she was watching the other guy run for it. He also wasn't remotely amused himself, he shot the guy through the back of his left knee before he could even leave the street they were on.

"…continuing." The hitman drawled flatly, un-cocking his gun and strolling down the street to collect his likely unwilling new informant. "That wasn't intimidation. If I had been trying to intimidate you, little lady Sonya, you'd know it right off."

"Then whatever you had been doing, I do not appreciate." Shot back the thief, rather aimlessly wandering in his direction so they wouldn't have to raise their voices and attract even more attention.

Gunshots weren't exactly foreign sounds late at night in Mafia Land, but arguments were more attention getting.

With a much put-upon sigh, the hitman planted a shiny black leather shoe firmly on the spine of the whimpering attacker clutching at his knee. "How blind… never mind. Just go deal with the brat, I'll meet you there."

"It will be a day or so," Sonya informed him, continuing before the glare he gave her darkened even more, "I have to pick my brother up."

"…ho?" Renato's expression changed way too quickly for her peace of mind, a rather unsettling smirk curling up one side of his mouth. "Your brother. The purple one?"

"…yes?"

"Lovely." By the man on the ground's expression, the hitman was applying even more force to pin him down and didn't think so. "A day. If you're not there…?"
"You will be hunting me down?" Finished the Russian tightly. "I got that already."

"So long as you know." The Mafioso informed her, turning to regard the man he was nearly standing on. "If you would excuse us?"

"NO! Lady, please."

"Have fun." She tossed over her shoulder, leaving the hitman to it.

"Sonya." When she looked back, the Sun user gave her a measuredly even look. "The Mataraci Group has no major operations within Czechoslovakia. They do have connections to a syndicate called the Kolín Collation, a baffling minor player in that shark's pool I have yet to dig anything up on. They have numerous but clandestine connections to them, all of which I was unable to get more information on."

"...thanks."

Not something she could give her Lackey, but maybe Ziven wouldn't mind doing some poking for her.

---

(Wednesday the 26th of February, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Cherep knew Mists.

It wasn't like Viper was the only Mist he knew of, just the one he knew best.

Esper, whatever. The miser Mist had been pretty canny about introducing him around in his, at the time, social circles, but… mind readers, psychics, and Espers weren't the type of people that allowed secrets to be kept for long.

Seriously, why were all the other Flame types more interesting than his own?

Defying death wasn't really all that cool, merely painful. Aggravating was another good word.

Cherep rather absently sidestepped a Construction of boar-like creature so Sonya could pop it, considering the other words or terms he could apply to his Flame ability.

His little sister's bratty Mist was not happy, to say the least. Which had flummoxed his normally contained and aloof sister, she was looking distinctly harassed the longer the kid's temper tantrum went on.

It was also why the stuntman was politely ignoring the situation until Sonya finally hit upon a way to apologize.

She had a very nasty habit of never really apologizing, for anything. As far as he was aware, she had only apologized maybe once or twice in her life. Once was to him.

Mists were also very dramatic creatures, hence the display of very rowdy fantasy creatures keeping the Russian Storm-Cloud at bay until she somehow made up missing the brat's birthday. Again.

Cherep might be secretly rooting for the kid. Italian or not, and a ward of that Sun guy with the curly sideburns he never remembered the name of, Shamal was probably going to somehow wring an actual apology out of his little sister. Then, being a Mist, would probably twist and pull said apology until he got what he wanted but that was par for the course when dealing with that Flame type.

He ducked a flying anchor, which… what, before it clipped his head.

Sonya reached out and yanked hard on the surprisingly detailed looking barnacle encrusted chain connected to it, arresting the thing's forward momentum before it could crash through a rather expansive window. A flick of red Flames ran down the Construction, making the illusion pop under the Storm Flame's Disintegration feature.

A red-faced, teary eyed brat was mulishly glaring from under his wavy brown fringe at his still flustered sister. Bits and twists of indigo Flame sparked to life here and there around him, sometimes spewing out some creature or string to either lash out with or try containing a thief.

Sonya looked normal, but her purple edged grey eyes were a little too wide to be calm and she seemed to be torn between taking another step forward or backing up.

Slipping out of the little room the Storm-Cloud tracked the Mist brat down to wasn't hard, his fellow Cloud had long since stopped obsessively tracking his movements not long after he moved in with her when they were kids and the kid didn't yet care who he was or where he went.

There were a few maids hovering at the end of the hall, enough cleaning supplies between them to suggest they were waiting for an all-clear in order to fix whatever was broken after a Flame user's tantrum. They weren't going to have much to do, Sonya was a very quick Storm-Cloud thief and had prevented Shamal from doing more than scuffing up the furniture.

As Cherep was a guest, and a little unnerved still about Italian criminals and how they contrasted to Soviet Russian criminals, he didn't do more than glance over at them.

Seriously, they had a mansion. A very old, seemingly respectable and expensive manor house.

That had history. Lots of history given the things and portraits on display.

With a full complement of servants. Who seemed to know what to do when users of freaky soul fire got out of hand?

The stuntman was not at all sure about what that fully implied, nor what it meant when his sister was so embroiled up in it.

Mist brat of respectable temper, who she did more than just humor, was proof enough of that.

Instead of deal with his sister's inadvertent side-trip of being an adult figure in a kid's life and how to apologize like a human being or try chatting with maids who seemed a bit too interested in him for his peace of mind, Cherep looked squarely at the other two.

A very dark-skinned man with red and blond hair, and a very imposing lighter skinned Italian with completely blank features.

He was pretty sure one of the two was the 'Tyr' person Tatiana had chatted on about. The assassin.

Which, again… what.

There was seriously enough of a demand for killers aside hitmen or torpedo that yet another term was needed for paring down the job description?

This might not be Cherep's world, but it was Sonya's. He might have snubbed it in favor of a civilian's lot in life but given his foster family's ties meant that being ignorant of it would only harm them.

Viper was also very… not less stingy, but willing to be amiable about volunteering information when well-fed and bribed with bits of other information… and money. The stuntman had to be careful about that, because the Esper would and could drain his meager savings to nothing and call the whole thing a 'needed life lesson'.

However, he was probably the most well-informed civilian with only flimsy ties to the Mafia world at best. Well informed and prone to worry over his stubborn, taciturn, sometimes vicious little sister who was up to her neck in things she probably didn't spare a moment's thought about.

"So…" Cherep started in what was probably heavily accented Italian, looking between the two.

Everyone he had seen yet in this sprawling building that really was too large to just be a family home was in uniform. Either in what seemed to be the servants' version or a very understated suits worn like uniforms. Like that wasn't suspicious at all.

"Hello?" He got a slow blink out of one, and the darker one just flatly stared at him.

Fantastic. Not only did they all look like suspicious security guards, they had the personality of them.

Perfect. Well… Sonya kept saying he had no sense of self-preservation. "Okay… what are you doing lurking outside the room my sister and her brat are in?"

There was a faintly raised eyebrow from the guy who could actually blink, and the other guy remained as impassive as carved granite.

"Being creepy. Duly noted. Can you do it elsewhere?"

Nothing. Not even a twitch.

The Cloud stuntman clamped down on the temptation to run his mouth until he gained some kind of reaction from them, which was more of a Skull thing than a Cherep thing. Sonya wanted Cherep and not Skull, so he was trying to not be annoying.

The temptation though. He had probably been in show business too long, if a blank façade any vor would admire made him itch to break it just for a reaction.

…or he had been hanging out with Viper too long, but eh.

"This isn't because of Sonya, or you would've met us at the door." Cherep reasoned aloud instead of try jabbing at hot buttons he was only semi-sure would elect the response he'd probably not want. "Not about me, either. For one you didn't know I was coming and while some strange man in your territory is a cause for some concern, I'm here at her behest so by Mafia rules you can hold her accountable for me."

Again, nothing.

If the hallway wasn't so elaborately detailed, meaning statuary and pictures and a very nice green with gold accent rug with matching if only occasional lounge furniture, he'd get rapidly bored and try something probably ill-advised.

Glancing between the two statue-esque men and the pretty décor probably told them he wasn't used to being in places like this… but again, eh. "I think you're here because of Shamal. Or because the brat's busy throwing a tantrum at Sonya around a guy you have no idea about."

The stuntman did not get performance anxiety. He hadn't since the very first time he defied the laws of gravity and mortality in front of spectators and lost the gamble then woke up to a freaking out Sonya.

Getting stared at by two blank-faced men while he rambled wasn't new, it happened nearly any time Viper decided to be female and he ended up taking her out to dinner. No one really knew what to make of the miser Esper at first, especially if she was feeling unsociable.

He would, however, admit he might be rambling a bit too much. Nerves were still an issue for him.

"Miss Sonya has yet to actually deal with one of young Shamal's fits." The one he was semi-sort of sure was Tyr offered after another pause, looking… not interested, but also not as blank anymore.

"What? The kid's normally an angel for her and is a nasty terror otherwise?" Shamal was a Mist, it was possible.

Possibly-Tyr gave a tiny lift of his left shoulder.

"That's… awesome."

His baby sister had to be more than a bit out of her depth right now, if this wasn't usual behavior for her. She'd drop the stubbornly judgmental part of her in favor for the adaptive curiosity once it was less alarming, and weasel everything about what had tripped this tantrum out of the kid.

Uncle, huh?

Uncle Skull sounded a lot cooler, but Sonya would probably actually try to murder him for it.

Skull wasn't really a good influence for any kid, even criminally raised ones.

Cherep didn't think he'd mind 'Uncle Cherep' so much, as long as that hitman dude wasn't included in the package.

"Ah… Cherep, a word if you please?"

Speak of the devil. The stuntman gave the very subject of his thoughts a wary look as the man practically sauntered down the hallway. Not as if he owned the place, because he gave a tight nod to the two men still all statue-like that was more deferral than he had expected to come from someone like that, but more 'predator' than he was comfortable with.

That grin could mean nothing good. Then again, the man probably wouldn't want to risk pissing off his little sister again. From what Tatiana had to say, he had to do some rather fancy footwork and making up in order to get out of the dog house once already.

"…sure?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 26th of February, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Lisa sighed, using her free hand to pinch the bridge of her nose as she forcibly calmed her racing heart now that she knew her lover was going to be okay.
Tatiana didn't look any happier than her foster mother, stitching up a nasty gash on Arseniy's back.

"They're claiming foul-play?"

"Of course they are." The vor snapped shorty, pausing to take a deep breath even if it did make the redhead stab him harder than need be with her needle. "Their man went missing, Lisa. Between here and there. Ever so conveniently, it was only after we got paid and the information 'allegedly' changed hands the vor disappeared."

"I failed to hear anything about free-passage bartered into that mess." Muttered the nurse, tugging a bit sharply at the thread now seaming his back.

"That's not exactly helping us, Tats." The older of the two women informed the younger dryly, shifting the upset fourteen-month-old baby as he fussied into her short brown hair. "Don't you start too, this is already touchy enough with Sonya going off on her own around the same time."

"Oh please. We all know Sonya probably forgot the vor and what he looked like the moment he wasn't in front of her anymore." A sharp snip of a small pair of scissors and Tatiana was finished stitching up her foster father's back for him. "She probably passed him twice on her way out and never gave him another thought."

Biting her lip as the nurse repacked up her small first aid kit, Lisa shifted backwards to allow Arseniy to get up from the kitchen chair he had straddled backwards to allow the young woman the space to work in. "Can't you…?"

"I'm wiped, Lisa." She responded wearily. "Between that little scuffle and all the more inane shit I've been called up to heal, I've got nothing but dregs of my Flames left. Had someone actually said they were injured… I'll close it all up tomorrow, but I can't right now."

The vor grunted, not even dignifying that with a real response.

As her mother, Lisa was less than happy to hear it. Multi-colored fires of spontaneity and convenient abilities or not, that was her eldest daughter. Tatiana had better things to be doing than exhausting herself erasing every scratch and bruise the Zolotovs were testing out her healing ability on before they had to rely on her or any of the other Sun users.

As in conserving her Flames standing by for emergencies, like a full out firefight between her lover and his coworkers and the messengers of another syndicate.

Just like how Sonya had better things to be doing than trying to corral and guide a mess of kids into decent criminals.

To think, the little con artist girl who was expected to be the best of her generation ended up as an almost-legal nurse aiming to be a doctor when the tiny waif no one had expected became the best thief of her generation so far with no intent to stop anytime soon.

Why was the daredevil Cherep the good one with less issues to give her grey hairs?

Lisa handed over the finicky Valera over to his big sister, smiling wanly as Tatiana slowly coaxed the baby to give her a smile even if he was suffering teething pains. Arseniy had tucked the medical supplies that once laid on their kitchen table into the redhead's purse, gingerly flexing his injured back and considering the bloodstained and torn shirt he had been wearing before this.

She got started on dinner, even as she mulled the situation over with all the experience her two decades as a thief then a vor's lover gave her.
If the Zolotov Clan wasn't careful, they would end up embroiled in a large-scale turf-war they had been trying to avoid.

The Novgorod Brotherhood wasn't an insignificant syndicate. They had two cities fully encased in their territory and were more protection-racket orientated than thievery inclined. They might need that territory to generate enough cash for them, but that greater territory also gave them more people that considered themselves theirs.

Due to the vory present at the meeting and what all had been at stake, they could probably call up the Grekov Gang's allegiance if things really did get nasty.

One of the Novgorod Brotherhood's vor going missing between wherever he was going and Moscow, after a very tense meeting held in the Zolotov Clan's headquarters, did not shine a very good light on the thieves' clan. Aside the subject matter, it had been mediated by an outsider.

Mostly an insult, but partially a safeguard to ensure things went smoothly.

With these Flame things on the line, Lisa didn't exactly know how to measure the situation anymore. It really did seem as if Sonya was the one making it up as she went along even if it was supposedly some old arcane mafia skill making a comeback.

Which would be more confident inspiring if her youngest daughter hadn't been such a tragic little girl.

Tiny and icy seeming little Sonya, who really had no blessed clue in hell what to do when faced with a family at first. At five years of age.

Lisa took a little while to catch on, but the tiny blonde had really only been going through the motions at first. Tentatively following Tatiana's lead as if testing the waters, then once she found a reliable routine that took her mostly out of sight she locked herself down and tried not to stand out.

She had no idea what to do with that kind of reaction, needy orphans and tough-guy street rats were the usual fare for that recruitment drive. Not tiny ice cube girls that never needed help.

The only option she could think of was keeping to that schedule until Sonya relaxed a little.

Which worked. Eventually. Mostly due to Cherep.

Arseniy had noticed first, and drew Lisa's attention to it, but they both got to see exactly how Sonya became possessive over the few of 'her' things. Even when she had no clue how to deal with them.

Like Tatiana. Who was the tiny blonde's sister, who couldn't see the girl's tentative and mostly hidden overtures as what they were instead of more anti-social behavior she had long grown used to.

Lisa had set herself up to be an older female figure they could lean on, but not mom-like, by that point. Tatiana had been in the throes of pre-teen puberty, and like most young children a little bit cruel and blind if it wasn't in her face. Sonya had a very nasty habit of assuming if she wasn't included then she wasn't wanted and tended to disappear to visit a very purple friend of hers or find new marks more often.

That messy circle drove her, and by extension her lover, up a wall. The ridiculously young thief had been pulling away without ever really connecting to the little slap-dash family unit, only barred from really leaving because she had still been an age below double-digits. The older girl had been jealous, and a little bit hurt at the seeming rejection of her as a sister, deciding if the little girl didn't need her she didn't need her either.
It only ended when Cherep face-planted into their little home with all the childhood grace of an ugly duckling.

The one thing Sonya hadn't had the resources or knowledge to deal with completely on her own, but also hadn't fought them on helping her with it when Tatiana alerted them to something being wrong with the situation.

Lisa really did try hard not to have favorites. Arseniy had Sonya, because for all the stress and worry she caused them she made up for it with pure loyalty, finding a miracle cure so they could have their own baby, and a rather cute case of puppy love. Unfortunately, Cherep had always be her favorite no matter how hard she tried to keep her children on the same level.

Little purple Czechoslovakian runaway that he was, who tripped the tiny thief up enough she finally accepted her foster parents helping her and becoming more than 'just there' to her.

He had his own horror story baggage, which she never could decide if it was worse or better than what Sonya ended up dealing with. More of a cleanly cut beginning but also a shiftier ending. His own tricks and quirks, and completely civilian by choice.

Best of all, Cherep spoke Sonya-ese.

Rather, he could translate the stilted and barely-there responses as something more understandable to the rest of them so no more guessing was needed. Just in time too, their then youngest little trainee plus hormones equaled a very awkward girl that greatly preferred keeping her mouth shut.

Who had turned out to be a bit of a bemusing pyromaniac in the strangest ways.

Most women would be appalled that the girl in their charge was lighting herself on fire. Lisa had just wondered if that explained how Sonya had gone from self-contained and precocious as a child and turned into… a violent bibliophile with a stubborn streak as a young adult.

Cherep bridged the gap between the girls, kept Sonya in some nights instead of wandering the city with him, and was ever so innocent and optimistic enough to accept the mothering she did to him when she learned of his horrible experiences before their then-youngest found him.

It hadn't been all smooth sailing with the little boy included, Sonya had been getting progressively more territorially aggressive and snappish and hiding in her books with the onset of her bout of puberty and Tatiana finally started putting serious thought into how to live her life as a con artist and what she needed to do it. The boy also had not been… happy to learn of what kind of family they were, but some gentle coaxing paired with the lonely and lost looks the littlest thief shot him when he pulled away from her eventually settled him into his own niche.

Lisa was never going to be able to get the smell of motor oil out of the second-story third bedroom. She would probably never care to either, as it held the guest beds the middle children preferred to crash out on rather than the blonde thief's old room which was still packed with books. The eldest took that one when she spent the night, snubbing the motor oil smelling one as she claimed it gave her a headache.

However, given it was only shortly after Cherep joined them that Tatiana and Sonya put their heads together to do a heist Lisa was sure she'd botch if she tried to do, she had no complaints.

No major ones, anyways.

Although Sonya really should've trusted them with Cherep's Flame given undying skills instead of trying to hide it from everyone, Tatiana should've said something about any desire to formally learn to heal others instead of just use the Flames her little sister taught her, and as for the stuntman…

Lisa was aware Cherep couldn't die, had been killed but refused to give up his ghost. That his circus work was probably a lot safer even without his Cloud Flame trick than Arseniy's life was as a vor. That didn't mean she was confident in his life choices.

Sonya followed after him with the same look in her eyes that she did when she went after the few stubborn kids who failed to learn from their fellows' broken fingers. She was a very observant woman, she knew that meant the thief hadn't been sure it was safe and was following her best friend/brother to ensure it would be.

The blonde might have made out with a few more friends, and Cherep found one he would risk exposing to his not-very-nice criminal family, but Lisa still worried for the both of them. The stuntman more than Sonya, because the thief could and had proven she would defend herself with lethal force if need be.

Setting out a pot of stew she was only vaguely aware she had made up while wandering back down memory lane, Lisa clicked the gas burners down to simmer the soup without really seeing her stove.

Tatiana was allowing way too many of their fellow Zolotovs to abuse her abilities in return for building up their confidence in her skills and any other Sun users that became healers. Her way of lending Sonya some aid, because Lord forbid any of her foster children do anything straightforward nowadays.

She appreciated seeing more of her eldest, especially after two and a half years of cramming for her nurse licenses however borderline-illegal Mafia Land's hospital was. The being taken advantage of part she could do without happily.

Cherep was working hard and happy, if a bit lonely. Obviously, the reason why he had been hanging around the house more often this winter was because he missed his best friend/sister. The fact he had a trip planned with her in Italian mafia territory and he agreed almost thoughtlessly when it was proposed meant he was going to take whatever he could get.

He had asked her to brush up on his Italian and wondered if she had suggestions of what to get his 'honorary nephew'. Other than that, barely a twitch over more criminal connections.

Sonya was torn between a promise to her sister, her duties as a daughter, her loyalties to their clan, her career on a criminal-run island, and her few contacts/associates/friends. In over her head, and probably barely realized it.

Lisa sighed, palming her face in exasperation.

Yes, she had put Dmitriy in place as a sort of 'catch-all' when it came to their clan and what they wanted done about the Dying Will Flame business. However, it seemed as if Sonya had either expected him to have a backup plan in reserve or something to cover his position in case of interruptions like jail time.

The fact she really disliked his pick aside, there hadn't been a way to refuse Arseniy pulling her back to slap some kind of patch together over the tiny and still developing 'Flame' department.

Sonya adored her foster father, of course she'd do an exacting job of it since it was him who asked and end up miring herself in place until her handpicked replacement was available again. Which caught her the attention of old man Milos, who was no slouch or dullard.

Lisa would admit he was a bit ornery and stuck in his ways, but Gedeon was doing more than looking pretty and thuggish standing in a corner of his father's office. He was a slightly younger contemporary of Arseniy's actually, a friend as much as vor could be to each other with only a decade of difference between them. Being taught Sun Flames by his youngest foster daughter was a bit galling, but he was keeping an admirable open mind about it all.

He was as stubborn as his father was, however, and with her stubborn and intractable youngest daughter added to the mix?

She was a little impressed it was only a window that caught the edge of Sonya's ire so far in front of their Pahkan.

The girl made so few mistakes in her life so far, aside a little difficulty on a roof and social ones all over the place, it made Lisa terrified of what would result of any major misstep. She had only been a pillar, never a guiding light, for the girls growing up that she couldn't see a way to warn the young woman to be careful.

It made her wonder if she had been wrong, all those years ago, in how she handled the dual problem of being given a social butterfly and a tiny robot made of ice to raise.

If she had been more of a guiding hand instead of a permissive authority figure, would Sonya have pulled away even earlier than she had and abandoned them before she found Cherep?

Would Tatiana have resented the more talented and younger girl even worse than she had?

'What ifs' were very nasty things Lisa decided, aimlessly stirring her stew as it shimmered from the heat that wasn't quite boiling. It wasn't going to help, so she should probably put more effort into wondering how to help her youngest foster child when she inevitably messed up.

Sonya, however intelligent and self-possessed she might be, was only human. A very pyrotechnic human with an abundance of strength and little care to most others, but still human. Mistakes were only natural and given how rarely she ever had to deal with the results of any blunder as a child hers would probably be spectacularly messy and painful instead of merely embarrassing and personal.

Well… she'd probably have a few of those too. That girl did have to stalk her best friend for weeks if not months to decide they were friends.

Lisa was pretty sure Sonya failed to ask Cherep to be her friend properly, too.

"Mama? Someone's hungry."

Pulling out of her probably overly pessimistic thoughts, the older Russian looked sideways at the younger holding her biological son. "You know where everything is, Tats."

The nurse pouted prettily at her, shifting backwards when Valera became interested in what his mother was cooking and tried to grab the shimmery soup. "Whoops. Yeah Lisa… but I really have to be getting back. Lina's trying to keep order without Sonya's… you know, scariness to back her up, and although Zi's there Fadei is being a complete… butt."

Lisa raised an eyebrow at the substitution, getting a sheepish half-shrug in response.

"I'm trying not to swear around the substitution."

"How well do you think that's going to work?" She asked with audible and visible amusement, watching as Tatiana almost propped Valera on the table before remembering it had yet to be wiped down after being used as a medical tray to stitch up Arseniy's back. "In this household?"
"Approximately until Cherep does something mechanical in the drive and ends up swearing when he jams a joint, or when Sonya loses her spot in a book, or when Arseniy is feeling particularly vicious about the brats he's teaching." Waving that off, the redhead did some rather impressive baby wrangling to both hold onto her little brother and wipe the table off with a clean towel Lisa handed her. "Point being, it's not going to be me."

"Well... alright then." She dismissed it, probably some comment from either adult sibling sparked the idea in her head for whatever reason. "You're staying for dinner."

"Lisa-"

"And at least five or so hours of sleep."

"But-"

"I will include breakfast in that if you try to keep arguing."

Wisely, her eldest shut up.

Lisa was still mom, and her kids were still wary of her methods. She had to be doing something right still.
Chapter 34

(Wednesday the 26th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya was pretty damn sure if one was pissed off enough to throw what amounted to everything in one’s imagination at another, then that one person was very much not happy with said target.

It didn't explain why, after testing his Mist Flames against her Storm and failing to do more than ruffle most everything, Shamal had a messy sobbing fit into her thigh.

If he was mad at her, wouldn't he stay away?

After what amounted to ten years of self-inflicted anti-socialism, she had lost a great deal of Rachel's social skills to disuse. The first five years of which, ignoring anything for the sake of her sanity, had not helped much. What little she could recall about how to deal with other people from a lifetime before this was… fuzzy at best.

Now Sonya found she didn't quite understand people anymore, which… frankly she didn't care about. Cherep was good enough to help straighten out some of her issues, Tatiana ended up fanning the flames of her piss-poor interactions but that was par for the course for fucking them up in the first place in front of her sister.

She could deal, in other words.

On a general basis people were stupid and shallow. That didn't mean she couldn't be as stupid and shallow just as much as any other person, but if she had to deal with her own problems then she didn't really have the time or inclination to overlook or care about others that would have no great impact on her.

Cherep was better than her all over the place, Sonya had long since grown used to the fact. He was nice, she and Tats weren't.

Of course, that meant in situations like these she was completely stumped.

The thief liked Shamal. The kid could be very witty in a childish way, didn't seem to mind her apparently awkward way of viewing the world, practically inhaled what she could teach him, and wasn't as stupid as most grown Mists were reported to be. He also adored her for some reason, which she was fully willing to admit was a great draw.

…and she fucked up on one of the things he had asked of her. Again, she wasn't a nice person but she never really thought of herself as a bad one before this.

Shamal gave a hiccupping shudder-cough into her shirt, Sonya blinked and awkwardly patted his back a few more times. In response the brat rubbed his probably snotty nose all over her stomach and hip.

She couldn't really find it in her to be annoyed by that.

"You suck." Bratty Mist informed her gravely, muffled from both her leg and his stuffed-up nose.

"Yeah… I do." The thief absently agreed, wondering if she could maybe tip the couch laying on its back upright again so they would have a less physically uncomfortable time of him yelling at her.
What had knocked it over?

It wasn't any of the fishing-related Constructs, so maybe one of the fantasy creatures?

That had been one weird-ass looking unicorn that almost clocked her upside the head.

"So... the day before your birthday I ended up throwing a hammer through two walls. My current temporary office and the one on the opposite side of the hall." Sonya started, nudging the kid to shift a little so she could pull on the capsized couch. "The day of, I had to go meet with my Boss and a few very annoying vory. I ended up throwing another hammer through six panes of bullet-proof glass. After pinning another annoying person to a wall with one of my axes, but I don't really count him as much."

Her reward for telling him she basically had a tantrum herself was a very snotty sounding sniff.

He was probably smart enough to catch on to the fact she hadn't said it was because she was dealing with something else on his birthday.

She righted the heavy piece of furniture without more being declared sucky or anything else along those lines, so she didn't really mind his non-comment. "It's really up to you if you forgive me or not, Shamal. But I am sorry. I can't even promise it won't happen again, because I've found there is a constraint on my freedom I'm not entirely alright with."

The thief had made her future plans assuming the Zolotovs would mainly leave her alone. She paid her and her Lackey's dues, pretty much didn't mind they had next to no use for her, and that it was likely without any major change she would continue to do that for the rest of her life.

Up until Dmitriy allowed himself to get arrested.

Right now, it didn't look like her assumptions were going to bear out as she had thought.

The Four Rains probably got along a lot better with their fellow one. Although Galina said she would prefer something else to do, Sonya was pretty much taking her at her word instead of investigating if that was true or not. Gedeon would probably greatly prefer it if Dmitriy was the one he had to deal with than a woman even more years his junior. Ziven was... Ziven, he'd probably find something else to do for the next two years if she hadn't been there.

The Storm-Cloud was not a good fit, even for a short-term stint as the one in charge of the Zolotov Flame users. However, she was the only one left that didn't have prison time or medical lessons to get through or was so green and uninvolved it was painful.

It was up to her, even if anyone else probably could do it better.

"...you don't like it here."

Well... "...I don't."

It wasn't so much how she was treated, because after the whole 'is she or isn't she a Cloud' situation the staff of the Iron Fort got their act together. Mostly. Aside a few easily scared or startled few, the service personnel here were very bland and non-offensive.

It was the fact she was an obvious Russian in Italy. She stuck out as sorely as any Italian would in Soviet Russia.

Sonya was an outsider, she didn't know the people or their local customs and that translated to the locals as 'someone unsafe, must be watched'. Shamal was getting an in, he'd grow up in Vongola territory and would eventually be able to move in it without raising major red flags.

She was pretty sure that was half the reason Renato arranged this protection for him, a safe territory he could lose any tail within when he was grown and not shell out an arm and a leg for to the Don in charge.

Aside from the fact he needed the backup, and this was one of the major players in the Italian underworld.

Even the hitman encountered some opposition to his presence when touchy subjects were being discussed, and he was an Italian Mafioso. The issue was that he wasn't a Vongola Mafioso, his insistence on being left freelance made it that way. No matter the amount of hits he did for Nono while Shamal was growing up in the Iron Fort.

Said Mist brat grudgingly fell on top of her when she sat on the couch, wrapping boney arms around her waist and basically being as much of an obstruction as he could get away with.

"Mister Renato's not around when you're not." He informed her stomach mulishly.

"He was here for your birthday, right?" Because if he was giving her shit for something he did as well...

"Yeah..."

Okay, so she didn't have a leg to stand on in that.

It was somewhat understandable that the hitman ended up with as little time for the kid as she did, in a weird way.

There was a difference between putting aside time to deal with Shamal and putting time aside to deal with the issues that came with protecting, housing, and everything else the brat needed. All of which Renato had to do as well as keep up appearances in Mafia Land and Vongola territory to keep people from going after the kid, whatever else Don Vongola asked in return for this arrangement, and whatever interests he had on the side.

She was almost unsurprised the man had been acting a little strange lately.

"I can try to be early next year, even if I have to knock out the entire month of February to do it."

Shamal didn't comment, but she was unsurprised by that.

Sonya did break her word to him. All she was really hoping for was the patience to not fuck up even worse before the brat worked through the hurt she caused him.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 26th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"I'm only going to say one thing to that. Sonya was about ten when she realized she could snap a person in half by hugging them." The lack of thumps and clatters were probably a good thing.
Cherep wasn't entirely sure. Viper had never blown up at him before, so he had nothing to compare Mist brat's tantrum to. "Guess what she stopped doing from that moment on."

"That's it?"
"I'm not even sure why you think I would tell you more or answer in the first place." The stuntman informed his little sister's hitman friend, slightly irked and striving not to show it. "Think it's safe yet?"

Renato Sinclair eyed the closed door he had been considering, then shrugged and threw it open.

Cherep was torn between grudgingly impressed with the flourish he could put into the action and being annoyed at the man on general principle. He still did follow him into the Mist brat's little zone of destruction, if only to get away from the two very silent and imposing men still standing against the hallway wall.

His crooked best friend had corralled her kid, currently she was sitting rather stiffly upright on a heavy piece of furniture and listening intently to what seemed to be a litany of Shamal's grievances with life in general.

"…and Federico is stupid. He always wants to play cops and mobsters and thinks he can order me around."

"Who is Federico?"

"Nono's eldest." Renato volunteered after scoping out the extent of the damage done to the room. "A kid more than half a year younger than him."

The statement meant nothing to Cherep but seemed to mean more to his little sister by the sudden twitch in her cheek. Sonya gave a very controlled sigh, glancing down at her brat then up to her brother. "Some days… not worth it."

Snickering at her truly disgruntled complaint, the stuntman crouched down in front of her and poked her kid in the back of the head. The Mist whipped his head around, a rather cute expression on affront on his face as he tightened his grip on the thief's waist.

"Who are you?"

"Sonya's older brother." Cherep informed the grouchy kid cheerfully. "The maids probably want to clean up here, so while it's nice to meet you and all we should probably relocate."

"I need to see Don Vongola anyways." Sonya allowed, blinking down at Shamal when all he did in response was squeeze her more. "…brat? I'll be right back."

That didn't earn her much of a response.

Renato looked entirely unbothered and not remotely concerned when the siblings looked at him. "Little lady Sonya can deal with him this time, it's really only fair."

His incredibly touchy fellow Cloud let him call her by a pet-name? When the hell did that happen?

Cherep set his teeth, glanced between the two of them and then at the little Mist. "Whelp, plan B it is. Hope you have a good grip, kid."

"What is…? Oh, no. No." She even tried backing away as much as she could, planting her booted feet squarely in order to push the couch she and the kid were sitting on backwards.

Shamal blinked and looked at him weirdly, which changed to a wide-eyed gape when the stuntman plucked his baby sister up into his arms and rose to his full height. The hitman standing off to the side flinched, backing up a step and looking just as dumbfounded.
Trying really hard not to laugh, because then Sonya might actually attempt to murder him for this, Cherep hefted the two of them to a better position and ignored the blistering glare getting drilled into the underside of his jaw. "So... where are we going next?"

"I swear to hell, Cherep, if you do not PUT ME DOWN-"

"...woah." Shamal ended up rather awkwardly sprawled on the Storm-Cloud, a probably unwilling smirk inching across his face. He pushed on Sonya's ribcage and cut off the rest of what she had been about to say, righting himself to stare up at the only other Cloud in the room. "How...?"

"I know exactly how far I can press my luck with my own little sister." Cherep informed the Mist cheerfully with a grin. "If she's not stiff or wiggling, then I'm safe. And you know you love me, Sonya."

"It's genetics." Said thief snarled out irritably. "I'm forced to by nature."

"We're adopted, that doesn't count."

When she didn't immediately snap something else, Shamal sat on her stomach and peered up at the stuntman with a tiny bit of hero worship. "Could I do this?"

"You need to be taller-"

"NO."

"-but given she lets you hang off her without so much as a twitch, probably." He continued, still cheerful. "Now, where are we going?"

"Nowhere." Sonya snapped again. "Or I'll murder Betsy."

Considering it, and her expression, Cherep sighed. "Ah well, would've been funny."

He ignored the fact four people had peered into the room after he scooped the two up and would likely carry tales to others. He was probably hanging around with Viper too long if he found that amusing.

The look she shot him informed him she thought otherwise, but her kid was smirking still as he slid off her and onto the floor before the stuntman set his little sister down. Sonya shot him another blistering look, reaching into a pocket and withdrawing a little drawstring bag to pitch at the hitman's head.

"For my bribe of safe passage, and Cherep's too."

"Why give it to me?" Renato questioned slowly, eyeing the little pouch.

"Right now, I'd rather not see Nono." Sonya informed him flatly, then placed a hand on Shamal's messy hair. "And I don't think I'm going to get the space to sometime today."

Said kid had wrapped her left thigh up in his arms, and Cherep privately betted he would refuse to let go of her no matter what was going on at least for the rest of the day.

(Thursday the 27th of February, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)
"This place is a little… strange." Cherep informed the Russian thief over the breakfast table the very next morning.

"Kind of like a really fancy hotel rather than a Famigila’s criminal headquarters?" Sonya asked wryly, buttering up Shamal's toast for him.

The little Mist brat had decided that since she couldn't be held to any schedule, he should make the very most of any time she was present. Which meant he slept in her bed last night, would probably do so for every night for the rest of her stay, and was occupying her lap instead of sit in his own chair.

Renato was pretty damn sure the brat would also demand to be excused from schooling for the next week but intended to veto that before it could even start. The thief wasn't yet twitchy over the sheer amount of personal contact Shamal was insisting on, but there were better ways to test her tolerance for contact than using his ward's clinginess.

Like maybe the brother's inability to keep his hands to himself.

"Pretty much, yeah." The man agreed pleasantly, chewing on a bite of bacon as the brat in her lap accepted the bread and freed her up to eat something herself. "Not exactly what I was expecting, I thought it would be more like the Zolotov's place."

"That's more of an actual place of business than a repurposed family manor." Dismissed his little sister, flicking a wrist in his direction to motion to her words. "I… think? It's also used as a family manor too. But the feel of this place is very impersonal, yeah."

"Do you also belong to the Zolotovs of Moscow then?" Renato chipped in, slightly curious for the answer but more interested at the scuffle happening closer to the dining hall's main entrance.

"…I used to." The very purple man conceded after a long moment of suspicious peering.

"When we were younger. Message running, he was very good at it."

Cherep rolled his eyes at his little sister. "You didn't know I did it until I told you."

"Therefore, you were very good at keeping quiet, unnoticed and your work confidential." Sonya pointed out with a strange little smirk. "Considering I did keep an ear out for anyone talking about you, and still missed that news until you stopped in favor for something else?"

He took the high road in that little exchange, which was actually stuffing his mouth with the rest of his bacon and pointedly not looking at her.

The hitman observing them over his morning coffee pondered what Sonya's brother did now. Smuggling, maybe?

He could be maintaining a fallback point, or some link in an informant's chain of communication.

She was very pointedly keeping herself between her brother and her friend, a strong hint that she didn't want Renato picking up anything in Cherep's head. Considering she had blown up at him for stupidly treading on her siblings' privacy using her, he wasn't in any tearing rush to try even if he was curious.

Nono probably would not appreciate the landscaping costs of an irate Storm-Cloud's rampage.

He was trying to keep his mind to himself, and there was no time like the present to try. Not exactly a safe location for it, but at least a safe target to work with.

Shamal tugged on Sonya's dark red shirt with buttery fingers, ignoring her narrowed eyes on the grease mark he left behind. "Can we go to the park today, mamma?"

"After school, sure."

"...do I have to?" Bratty Mist inquired sulkily.

"Yes."

"But."

"Yes," Renato sternly interrupted the kid before he could continue, "if you want to go with Sonya this summer you have to. I'm expecting top grades, Shamal. No excuses."

"With everything you've been taught by now, it shouldn't be that hard." Sonya continued, not looking at the kicked-puppy look now aimed up at her. "And if you prove to your teachers that what lessons they're giving you are too easy, they'll give you harder ones that aren't."

"Do it consistently enough they'll bump you up a grade, too." Cherep added in, giving the kid an easygoing grin. "Then it'll all be over that much quicker."

Shamal gave the man the stink-eye, still undecided about his so-called 'zio'. To him, although his mamma's brother managed to pick them up and escaped with only threats aimed at him for the act, he was still pretty much an unknown the brat wasn't sure about.

Given the number of dead role-models in his childhood so far, he was also very leery of getting attached to more people. He was more liable to chase people off via Mist Constructs than allow them close.

"Excuse me, young ones." Ottavia Vongola interjected pleasantly, a toothy grin stretching her lips and her dark eyes locked onto skeptical grey. "Might I have a word?"

Renato inclined his head to the elderly Vongola lady as her Storm Guardian found her a chair, keenly interesting in this little confrontation. Timoteo had told him his mother was interested in meeting the Russian but, with Sonya's errant adherence to scheduled visits and the elderly lady's abhorrence to standing around politicking now she wasn't Donna Vongola, this was the first time the two had met.

The thief herself looked not at all pleased by the interruption, although her brother seemed warier than anything. "If you must. Shamal, are you done?"

Not sure if he should wince over the semi-obvious dismissal of Daniella's presence or laugh at Sonya's blunt mannerisms, the hitman instead eyed the kid in her lap as he sat back to observe this.

Mulishly, the brat of a Mist pulled the Russian's plate over to himself and started in on her cooling breakfast.

Obviously, a no.

"You know," Sonya started in a completely bland tone of voice, letting the kid chomp on her food without care, "we found that certain metals react to certain Flames very well. Copper is a very obvious Lightning metal but can work for Rains too, iron and steel work very well for Suns, but silver... well, it works for Storms. If you do not get your Cloud Guardian out from behind me, they will get their eyes gouged out by a silver spoon."

The retired Eighth head of Vongola smoothed her expression out to a politely inquiring one, flicking a glance over the Russian's shoulder. Cherep had turned to eye the rather grizzled and grey Cloud Guardian suspiciously, but the man heeded his Sky's unspoken order to move himself.

"Forgive Solothurn, Miss Nikishina." Daniella told the thief pleasantly, as her Guardian circled their little table back to her side. "He's a little protective."

"He's a Guardian." Sonya pointed out repressively.

"Hmm... he is." Agreed the older woman, lacing her fingers together and settling them in her lap. "I have been wondering about you, ever since dear Tyr brought you up in a conversation last year. Now that I have finally met you... I think I see why. It's been quite a few years since I've seen a pair like you two."

Blinking once, slowly, let Renato know the thief had no more an idea of what the Sky was talking about than he did even without his mind-reading trick.

Daniella gave that toothy grin again, the one her son hadn't quite managed to inherit in full, flicking her eyes from one Russian sibling to the other. "Dual Guardian prospects, I mean. Rather rare for a non-twin pair of Flame users."

Sonya froze for a moment, Cherep cocked his head at the older woman, and the hitman suddenly wanted another espresso.

No wonder Timoteo barely caused her to bat an eyelash, the effect of any Sky was probably halved for her unless her sibling was nearby.

Shamal just kept nibbling on his mamma's half-finished breakfast, keeping an eye on the new people.

"Which Flame do you two share, I wonder?"

"Well, that is a question isn't it?" Claimed the thief's brother, looking for all the world unlike any Flame user under a curious Sky's eye. "Little rude of you, but I suppose I can understand why you would want to know."

Renato eyed the self-claimed siblings, and their reactions, thoughtfully.

The Sky switched her gaze to the man, not missing the flick of violet in the Storm-Cloud's eyes when she did or the stiffening of her own two Guardians in response. "Not going to answer?"

"There's no real reason to. You don't need us. Your son doesn't need us." Cherep returned the grin, still easygoing and without any edge of his own. "This Tyr character might... but I've met and don't like him."

"And there's the rub." She admitted dryly, her rather blood-thirsty looking grin fading somewhat. "It's you your lovely little sister is conforming to. She won't accept any Sky you won't, will she?"

Renato realized that was probably why Tyr liked cutting in for a dance the last two years, and why he tended to at least acknowledge the thief's presence when she was around.

The Head of the Varia wanted her for a Guardian, for which Flame was debatable.
She had three, and one of them was one her foster brother held as well.

Tyr annoying him was probably just a bonus.

"Any way we could change your mind?" Daniella inquired, almost politely.

"Nope."

"Down, Carcano." She reassured her Storm, who looked half a tick away from snapping something probably insulting to the two siblings. "That's very… final. And stubborn. Most Flame users would kill for a chance for Harmony."

"And I intend to remain so. This will probably be my only visit." Cherep pointed out, settling back in his chair and giving the Sky a measured look. "So, I won't have any time to become accustomed to any Sky looking at my little sister for a Guardian and will not unless she asks me back here. Pity that."

"Yes, quite the pity." Ottavia Vongola answered thoughtfully, unlacing her hands to rub thoughtfully at the red flower tattoo under her left eye. She turned her attention back to the younger woman, who had been watching her Cloud Guardian more than her conversation with her brother, and the curious little Mist in her lap. "I was wondering, my dear, if you wouldn't mind meeting me and a few other women for coffee this afternoon."

"I'm here to visit Shamal." Sonya stated flatly, getting into a new staring contest with the Sky. "I have no other reason to do anything else while I'm here."

Daniella pursed her lips, crossing her arms under her chest after straightening the cuffs of her red suit jacket she still favored for daily wear since her own Donna days. "Nilda and Rosabella were expecting you earlier this month."

"…Miss Tweets and Miss Silvery-white?" The thief clarified to herself slowly, after a long moment trying to mentally place the names with the various Italians she didn't know well. "That's nice. And?"

"They would be most put out if you ignore them."

"I've met them once. It wasn't an entirely great meeting."

"That is likely the point, Miss Nikishina. They would like the opportunity to make a better impression."

"Which they can do at Christmas." Dismissed the Storm-Cloud swiftly. "I have no reason to go out of my way to see them."

Queerly, the elder Vongola looked amused at the stubbornness she was getting stonewalled by. Her Guardians weren't, but then Renato was pretty sure they were insulted on their Sky's behalf.

Carcano was Daniella's second Storm, and thus younger and more of a fussy hen over the retired Donna. Solothurn was the lady's original Cloud Guardian and held more faith in the Boss he followed through World War Two with.

"Nothing to add, Sinclair?"

"Since you had yet to direct your lovely attention to me, madam Vongola, I wasn't going to interrupt." The hitman professed smoothly, smirking at the level gaze the retired mob Boss pinned him with and the bristling her Storm did in response. "But… Shamal has school, and I don't think Sonya made many plans for the time he's otherwise occupied."

He ignored the less than amused look the thief tossed his way. She had asked for more people to talk to before, he was just helping her get what she wanted.

"A wonderful idea. Lunch instead then, Miss Nikishina?"

Sonya flicked her gaze from Renato to the Sky and then to her brother. "I should beg off, I have Cherep to entertain for the week."

"After this week?"

"I should get back to work." Bratty Mist in her lap puffed up in outrage, and the thief rolled her eyes at his slightly betrayed but mostly demanding look.

"Should is a very interesting term." Not remotely nonplussed just yet, Daniella glanced at said brother. "Can you spare her a day or two any sooner?"

"I could, but I don't see why I should risk her getting annoyed with me."

"Because I've asked nicely?"

"Will you ask rudely if I continue to say no?" Cherep countered with genuine amusement and a lopsided grin.

The Sky barked a laugh, which startled her Storm but caused her Cloud to roll his eyes. "You two are amusing, and quite the tag-team pair. It really is such a pity you both are so stubborn, I am very interested in how you would behave as Guardians to a Sky."

"We'll take that as a compliment."

"It was meant to be so." The retired Ottavia admitted to the brother with another but more amused toothy smirk. "But I really must insist on at least one meeting, or I will be forced to continually bother the both of you for as long as needed. I have only so few things to entertain me these days."

Sonya raised one sardonic eyebrow, nonverbally calling the Sky a liar by her look alone. At the entirely unapologetic expression she got back, the thief huffed sourly. "Once. The day after he leaves."

"That wasn't so hard, now was it?" Asked Daniella pleasantly, a slight smirk of triumph on her lips. "I look forward to it."

The woman at his side fully intended to bail if the Sky insisted on more than just one meeting, which was why she put off her agreed one until her brother had left.

Renato, very carefully, didn't snort. It would only let the thief know he had dipped into her thoughts again, and he was trying rather hard not to.

He was pretty damn sure Lady Vongola wasn't going to view that as anything more than a temporary obstacle to overcome in a long-term campaign, just as she seemed to view the siblings' stubbornness as a challenge more than a deterrent.

It would be interesting to see who was more obstinate, the Sky or the Storm-Cloud.

Renato drank the rest of his cold coffee as Daniella made her excuses to leave, dropping the cup when the three members of the Eight Generation of Vongola were well on their way out of the dining hall. "Shamal, I do believe you're late for getting to school on time."

"I'm late." The total brat confirmed smugly, then returned to nibbling on the last piece of toast Sonya hadn't gotten around to eating.

"I'm pretty sure Cherep wouldn't mind taking you to school, and claiming he got lost." The thief ruthlessly shot down the kid's hope for getting excused for the day.

"Aww…"

"Kid, I have a motorcycle."

Shamal suddenly didn't look so depressed about the prospects of going to school anymore.

Sonya sighed heavily as the brat abandoned her hurriedly to gather his school things. "Boys. Shoo then, and make sure he's got a helmet. Pretty sure there should be at least one in the garage if you ask nicely."

The hitman waited until after Cherep rolled his eyes at his sister and walked off to find what she asked for, then looked at the thief. "Suns and iron, huh?"

"How often do you melt your guns rather than just the grips?" She asked in return, inspecting her now empty plate but deciding not to bother with getting more to eat. "They're not nearly as stable as crystal formations, but metals can work in a pinch."

Renato actually didn't know the answer to that, just that he had to replace the grips on his favorite pistols more than a few times before then guns melted.

Something to watch for. "Huh."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 27th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Eyeing her foster brother's current favorite contraption, Sonya shifted so Cherep could pull whatever tool he wanted out of the borrowed tool chest she was leaning against. "Are you going to do this every day?"

"What else is there for us to do in Italy?"

"We could go into the town and explore a little, instead of whenever Shamal wants to." The thief answered blandly. "There's a few good library rooms in the Iron Fort. Pretty sure they have practice ranges for firearms and possibly a sparring ring or gym in there if we're really that desperate."

"We could, books are more your thing, and… no." The stuntman tossed back, checking over what his little sister was pretty sure was the intake valve or something.

Even after watching him pull engines apart and put them back together, she really only had a passing familiarity with mechanical things. Either way, she did like watching him mess with metal machines. It was slightly hypnotizing and a decent time waster.

Sonya had really little to do in Vongola territory, but like he had said books were more her thing. She was perfectly happy reading all day if she could get away with it.

Getting away with it this week seemed to be a challenge. Daniella of Vongola had all six Guardians still, even if she had comparatively very young Storm and Lightning ones, and each of them had no compulsions against asking the Storm-Cloud if she had the time yet to cater to their Sky's interests.

They were all very polite about it, but they were also all very insistent.

"You know, it's called self-defense for a reason. I don't care if you never use it, frankly I'd be happy to hear it, but knowing how to get out of a tight spot can't be that objectionable."

Cherep shot her an amused look over one shoulder. "I don't have a problem defending myself, I have a problem learning to hurt people."

Sonya shot him a glare in return. "People aren't always going to be as considerate as you are for their well-being."

"Well then, they suck at being decent human beings." The insufferable ass returned cheerfully. "It's fine, Sonya. I plan on running for it instead of stand my ground and letting myself get beat up."

…yeah, that was going to go over as well as a ton of bricks when it came time for the Arcobalenos to make a comeback. She sighed heavily, sinking a hand into her hair and raking it back away from her face. "There's this one art that… isn't so much as fighting back as it is redirecting an attack away from you. You can hurt others by doing it, but the basics was just avoiding everything."

Pausing before replacing the gasket on his engine, her fellow Cloud gave her a sideways look. "Do you remember what it's called? It sounds… interesting."

"Starts with the letter a, but I can't remember exactly what it was named. I'll find it again." Sonya promised him, trying to dredge what the ever-loving hell it had been out of her faulty memories of Rachel. "You could also go with blunt weapons? I could teach you what I know of the staff."

"I'll pass, thank you."

The thief rolled her eyes at the rather predictable answer, tentatively hoping this one martial art would at least pan out. She didn't worry about him all that much anymore, but she was also keenly aware that there was a clock ticking.

Which also reminded her, she had 'la tourmente's' rotten lockbox to investigate. When she got back to Mafia Land, it was going to be sent on to Moscow to Lisa to hold until she had the time again.

The Storm-Cloud watched her brother mess with his bike for a good fifteen minutes before anything else happened, and that else happened to be the Ninth's Lightning Guardian.

"Err… shit." Ganauche stated flatly when it became apparent the only two in the garage he had entered were the thief and stuntman. "Hey, either of you know where old Augusto is?"

"Yes, he's gone to the hospital to see his daughter give birth to his first grandkid." Cherep informed him slowly, straightening up slightly to look at the man curiously. "And before you ask, Costanzo volunteered to take him there. The old man's hands were shaking rather badly."

The head of Vongola's motor pool and his best mechanic, Sonya mentally pegged the two names. There were more mechanically inclined people, but not within the Iron Fort's main garage itself.

Stately manor home or not, there was only a small fleet of cars to worry about.

Every other car that belonged to the housekeeping staff seemed to never stay longer than an hour before being driven elsewhere to be parked.
"And they just left you two in here?" The Lightning demanded irritably.

"Well, one of the footmen pokes in every half hour." Amended the stuntman with a shrug. "Used to be every few minutes, but I suppose he has better things to do."

Ganauche still didn't look happy. "Well... shit. You any good as a mechanic?"

Blinking at that non sequitur, Cherep shot Sonya a glance then the Guardian one of his own. "Yes? I kind of do it for a living, with a bit of stunt driving on the side."

"Perfect. Look, something is going funny in the car I took out. Take a look of your own, only a look, and let me know if it was something I did or if it's just the damn car."

She didn't think she liked this, they were guests not hired help. Ganauche quailed only slightly under her glare.

"Nono's going to kill me if I ruin another car outside a mission. And I didn't even go far!"

Tossing the tool he had been fiddling with at his little sister, the stuntman gave the Lighting a small smirk. "Well... there's some motivation. What seems wrong with it, anyways?"

"It's making some weird ass clicking noises. Still, and I shut the engine off." The man claimed, shoulders slumping as he tried to put what he knew into words. "And I think the hood's half unlatched or something, it's jiggling."

"Probably the alternator, or maybe the timing belt is going. Those are more wear and tear than preventable damage." Mused Cherep aloud. "Something could've gotten loose, small enough and they might click instead of thump. Depending on the rate and strength of the clicking noise anyways. The hood's latch... where did you leave it?"

"In the-"

Ganauche was cut off by an only partially muffled explosion that rattled the garage, flinching from the noise just barely enough to save his life temporarily when what looked like two shattered car doors embedded themselves into the thin sheet metal that made up the garage doors and cut into his face.

Sonya, gritting her teeth against the rather painful ringing in her ears, pulled herself off the ground where she had fallen and mentally finished the Lightning's comment as 'in the drive'.

Cherep had tripped backwards over his bike when he flinched at the noise, which had neatly saved him from the other car door, and curiously abandoned it tipped over in favor for scrambling to the Guardian's side to ensure the man didn't bleed out.

She staggered a little drunkenly to the connecting doors between the garage and the Iron Fort's main kitchen area, beaten to opening the door by a very white-faced little maid.

Which wasn't fair, the maid was probably as tall as Sonya was when she stood straight.

The thief made a few awkward pantomimes, trying to convey the fact she couldn't hear anything and another needed something to staunch a head wound. She wasn't exactly sure how well she did, but it was enough for the girl to figure out she wasn't going to be much help in any conversation.

Tiny maid peeked around her form, said something the Storm-Cloud couldn't hear, then ducked back into the Vongola Headquarters.
At least someone knew they were alive and where they were, Sonya gave up on the maid and twisted in a wobbly path back to help her brother.

Ganauche might have kept from getting his head ripped off by large chunks of shrapnel but didn't avoid all the sharp metal edges. He probably had a concussion too, he was entirely unresponsive to whatever Cherep was trying to shout.

Rather frustrated looking, he glanced up at her. Shrugging, Sonya jerked her thumb to the still open door behind her. The look he gave her was a very familiar echo of his childhood when he regularly looked like a sopping wet kitten as he pointed to the unconscious Lightning.

Irritable, and not exactly in the mood to play charades to try getting any kind of communication across, she instead reached for Ganauche's left arm and bodily hauled the man up.

At least the sheepish smile she got soothed a bit of her ire.

Sonya just would really like her hearing back.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 27th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Odd."

"What is?" Cherep asked curiously, keeping half an eye on the guy called Brow Nie as he held yellow Flames to both sides of his little sister's head.

"You are perfectly alright." Revelli, apparently old lady Vongola's Sun Guardian and head of the Vongola's little personal medical wing, commented neutrally. "Aside a bit of bleeding from the ears of your own, nothing is so much as a rip in your ear drum."

"Mmm... yeah. I'm... sturdy." The stuntman explained awkwardly, rubbing the back of his head when it seemed the medic didn't really believe him fully. "So... that other guy, is he going to be okay?"

Half the reason he had insisted the older man in charge of the medical wing to focus on his fellow Italian was to give his own Flames time to finish fixing himself.

"Ganauche will be fine. A few scars, the metal was burning as it gouged his face, but nothing I can't smooth out with enough time. His eye on the other hand... nothing left alive to regrow, even if something so delicate wouldn't just end up a mass of scar tissue if I tried."

Cherep very nearly blurted out his Cloud Flame trick for instant-heal to the medic looking reprovingly at him, as if he knew the stuntman wasn't being fully honest with him. He held it in, knowing full well Sonya would not appreciate him doing any such thing no matter what was at stake.

Besides, the Lightning would probably get a Mist Construct or... maybe not another Cloud regrowing an eye for him, but there would likely be yet another fix he didn't know of.

Tatiana was the medic of their little foster family, she'd probably be better suited to suggesting alternatives to a lost eye.

Sonya suddenly hissed out a very nasty sounding chain of syllables, causing the Sun Activating her own cell growth and division to repair the broken parts of her ears to chuckle. "I'll be sure to let the men hunting for our bomber know exactly what you think of their mothers, and who could possibly be their fathers, Miss Nikishina."

Given the glare the thief shot him, Cherep figured she could hear again. He did wonder what language she was swearing in.

"He was very lucky the two of you waylaid him for a few minutes." Revelli of the Eighth Generation commented quietly. "I know the knucklehead pretty well. Had you two not been there and got to talking, Ganauche would've gone back to see if he could fix the problem on his own before owning up to Nono Vongola about the situation."

The salt-n-pepper Italian Sun threaded his fingers through his neat beard while Cherep absorbed the fact and pondered the other possible outcomes that might have happened.

He didn't get far beyond the poor guy maybe getting a face full of exploding car before someone threw open the medical wing's doors with a bang that made his little sister cringe.

Don Vongola was glanced at once, then everyone in the room pointed him in the direction of his injured Lightning Guardian.

Cherep, while interested in how the near-mythical Harmonized Sky-Guardian thing actually worked out in real life, didn't watch the man he had yet to meet. His friend... subordinate-person was injured, it would be rude.

The older Sun Guardian hummed to himself, redirecting the stuntman's attention. "You're fine, but I think your little sister will be asked to remain for the night at the very least."

Sonya had shattered three of the six tiny bones in her ears, as well as popped both ear drums.

Ganauche had it worse, but then the native Italian had been closer to the explosion than she had been. That was why his crooked best friend couldn't quite walk in a straight line afterwards and needed him to keep them all going in one direction.

Giving a man a nod to show he both heard and understood, Cherep slid off the medical cot he had been situated on upon arrival and slid over to his sister's spot across from him.

Her brat was going to pitch a fit.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 27th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Well?"

"Well what?"

"What's his Flame?"

"Are you sure you want to know?"

"That bad?"

"...depends. He's very good at keeping himself contained. A very skilled Mist has probably been teaching him how to do it. But he's nowhere near good enough to hide it from me."

"So...?"
"I've never seen a pair of Clouds before. Rather interesting, don't you think?"

"Wait, both of them?"

"Yes."

(Friday the 28th of February, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya wondered if she was going to really be absolutely petty about this or not.

Yeah, yeah she was.

"Do try not to crash, Cherep. I'll see you... this fall?"

"Might make time this summer, possibly." The stuntman cheerfully informed her, taking his cue from her and responding in Russian, patting Shamal on the head as he accepted his helmet from her.

"For... reasons."

The thief knew perfectly well he didn't quite understand. Her brother would play along anyways, because he didn't much like the underworld of crooks and killers. Vongola was as mafia as you could get and was pretty shameless about it.

That was fine, she didn't mind.

Cherep wasn't an inherently nasty person.

Unfortunately, or not depending, she was.

"Do you have to go?" Shamal hadn't quite gotten the hang of her native language, he only had a handful of phrases and a few numbers memorized so far.

His question was in Italian, and the brat was curiously accepting of the fact their conversation was going over his head.

While Sonya was held in the medical wing overnight, Cherep finally figured out how to bond with his little sort-of nephew once they were kicked out. She didn't know yet what they bonded over, other than her brother's dratted motorcycle, but could probably figure it out eventually.

The bratty Mist was nearly chomping at the bit to get up to something. She held the suspicion it was something Viper told Cherep who passed it to Shamal. Sonya didn't really mind at all, so long as she wasn't caught up in whatever it was.

She would be asking her brother if he knew anything to pass to the Zolotov Mists, because the moment someone other than the Four Rains were considered assets she might have less issues all over.

Could only be a good thing at this point.

"I don't have to," Her brother informed the kid easily in the only language he understood fully.

"Sonya would rather I did. And frankly she knows more about this place than I do, so it's only natural to follow her lead."

The fact the thief didn't know more about the latest incident of car-bombing in Vongola territory than he did was politely ignored.

"Nono's going to be pissed." Renato didn't exactly sound too upset, queerly.

He was at least going along with the siblings in speaking only Russian, for now.

"Nono can kiss my ass." Sonya informed him flatly. "I didn't bring my brother here to get caught up in any famigila's pissing match with him, and he has no control over me or Cherep's leaving."

Which, since she didn't know too much else about the circumstances of Ganauche's recent car troubles, was a fairly decent stab in the dark for the why. She was only intending to stay long enough to keep her word to the retired Vongola Sky, then she would be leaving as well.

The fact this was going to make Shamal very, very upset was only icing on the cake. He had only now gotten attached to his 'zio', the man leaving was probably going to be another thing he'd stew over for a while.

Unhappy Mists were… not fun things to deal with.

Timoteo probably was more occupied with the hemming in the idiots that dared to strike at his Lightning Guardian before they could repeat the attempt to realize there was a separate issue entirely linked to the situation.

The Russian was a Cloud, she didn't like it when her prerogatives were usurped.

Cherep had been pained by the incident, which meant Sonya was upset. No one was telling her which moron-flavored syndicate was responsible, for then she could work her ire off on the proper targets, so she was going to internalize it and take a leaf out of the stuntman's book.

Passive-aggressive behavior, at least until she felt better.

The first step was extracting her brother out of the mess, which was easy enough. His visit was only really getting cut by a day, hers on the other hand…

Shamal was either going to throw a titanic fit again or be an absolute snot of a brat, more than he was being lately anyways.

…but she could spend a whole week being as much a bitch as possible.

That dearly appealed to her, but there was the twin issues of the Mist brat's living situation and Renato's reputation.

She wasn't quite irritated enough with the hitman, even if he was acting weird, to damage his standing by being a rude guest again. Shamal lived here, at least until she could find something the older Italian wouldn't mind as an alternative.

If she hadn't been so disgusted at the 'but all _ Flame users act that way' bullshit, she'd find it amusing that the brat's Misty tantrums were merely regarded as a measure of how strong he was. As it was, she was wary of Timoteo trying to get his oldest to bond with the kid.

That would happen only over her cold, dead corpse.

Shamal was way too strong for a younger Sky to hold, and a possible Guardian's repeated Rejections of the same Sky was a phenomenon she had no information about. She'd rather not learn there were consequences from that after the point of no return, especially not from her brat.
It was possible she just disliked the pairing, or this Federico's reported behavior. However, she had disliked the news when she figured it out so throwing down any objections she could was something she was going to do.

Sonya did not like Timoteo of Vongola much. She hadn't really held much of an opinion on the man before this, but she was leaning to dislike after the events of the past two days.

Cherep ruffled Shamal's messy hair in farewell, shot a rather indescribable look to the hitman lounging against the Iron Fort's perimeter wall, and tipped the thief a nod before sliding his helmet over his features and starting up his rather noisy bike.

She only turned to the older Italian when her brother was well on his way out of Vongola territory. "Why have you been acting strange lately?"

"You didn't want me and my talents around your darling brother, little lady Sonya." Renato reminded her in a slightly insulted but mostly sardonic tone. "I was merely respecting that."

"Huh." The man could be charmingly well-mannered if he had a reason. He rarely did, unfortunately. "Thanks."

"Don't mention it. Ever, went the unspoken tail end of his comment.

She looked down at the mopey Mist brat. "I don't feel particularly inclined to wait around for someone to notice I've snuck my brother out of the manor. Shall we hit up a gelato store?"

"Will Mister Renato come with?"

Sonya shot the hitman a similarly curious look.

Shrugging, he pushed off the wall and walked over to them. "Why not?"

(ooo000oooo)

(Friday the 28th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"You're being silly." Shamal informed the man heatedly. "Mamma fights all the time, you just don't realize it."

"Oh?" The really weird old guy asked in amusement, shaping a tiny tower with tiny people walking in and out of it for him to try copying. "Funny. I hadn't noticed half the manor falling down around our ears yet."

Blowing out an exasperated breath, the younger Mist carefully Constructed a tree-fort tower of his own design. A big oak tree, with a chapel and a hospital 'branch' and… well, lots of rooms in the leafy part.

His tiny people ended up looking like tin soldier figurines more than people, and he tried to correct that before continuing. "She fights with her words, Mister Croquant."

Red hair and dark skin made for a very funny looking person, but Shamal ignored that. The raised eyebrow was rather annoying, as his mamma's Cloudy habits were understandable once you looked past the obvious lack of outward violence.

He had all sorts of suspicions of why the Mist Guardian had invited himself into the Mist Flame classroom and the weekend lessons he had to take since he was a young Mist, and specifically why the man was asking about Miss Sonya.

Giving up on tiny people, they never turned out right and Mister Renato was going to have him copy everyone exactly the moment he knew until his skill in that was better, he switched to a fort full of animals and flying fish.

He was pretty proud of the whale.

Croquant Bouche merely gave a tiny shrug, setting his tiny people up to wage war on Shamal's tiny animal-fish army.

The younger Mist liked this game better than chess, but Mister Renato wasn't a Mist so he couldn't play. Neither was mamma or her brother, but they had him make the armies for them instead and they had fun that way.

His guardian probably figured he'd cheat if he was in control of everything, and he did.

He was a Mist, of course he cheated.

"How, exactly, does your mamma fight then?"

"I already said, with words."

His mamma fought most with Mister Renato, mainly. Over everything and anything and until one or the other huffed but went along with whatever it was. She also fought with her brother, in a lighter way because they knew full well where they stood with one another and didn't need a full out fight to know it.

Both men fought back just as much which made her a happy Cloud, so she could feed her Storminess with books. It was why she had been undecided over Don Vongola until recently because he didn't fight with her at all, so she couldn't get his measure.

Then zio ended up injured with her, in Vongola territory, and she didn't like him at all. To a Cloud, one's home territory told her a lot about the kind of person in charge. It probably wasn't fair, but no one ever said Clouds were fair creatures.

Master Tyr was fighting a different fight with his mamma, a slower one of snips and digs with smirks in an 'I-know-something-you-don't' way when informing the other of whatever. Shamal didn't like it, but anything that got her attention here was a bonus.

Maybe she'd visit more if other slow people caught on and gave her more challenges. She always seemed bored when he couldn't find something for her to do with him and Mister Renato was off elsewhere.

"A fairly interesting opinion."

Shamal's whale swallowed a whole flank of the older Mist's infantrymen, an expression of the younger's irritation. He lost the flying tank-creature, the wing of army people had been a feint to allow the older Mist's archers within range of it enough to pop his Construction.

He knew his mamma perfectly well, thanks. It wasn't his fault if other people were slow and scaredy-cats.

If they didn't want to believe him, then he wasn't going to try to change their minds. They could figure out what he was trying to tell them on their own, and he'd get to say 'I told you so' afterwards.
Mister Renato always seemed to have fun saying that to other people.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 28th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya Nikishina irritably eyed the woman that asked if she was ill. "I am Russian, black tea was what my foster mother gave us to grow up with."

Nilda Guerra quickly inserted herself into the conversation before the other woman made another condescending assurance that they wouldn't judge her for whatever she was suffering from. "We Italians really only drink tea when feeling a little under the weather, Nikishina."

She gained a very flat grey stare for her troubles. "I'll have tea, thank you."

Something had ruffled the Cloud's feathers rather badly. The Soft Flame Rain was pretty sure she was being stubborn just because and not for any other reason. It was possible she was wrong in that, there was a tizzy of rumors floating around lately she had yet to gain full understanding of.

Lady Vongola had anticipated the woman's request, beckoning for one of the maids to come forward with a very specific teapot. "You know dear... may I call you Sonya? That rascal Sinclair specifically ordered this for you before your first attendance as his date."

"That's nice. And no, I'd rather you didn't."

Nilda inhaled sharply at that breathtaking amount of rudeness, but Daniella's lips only twitched in amusement.

"Miss Nikishina then. You are determined to be stubborn?"

The very bland eyebrow that was raised in response spoke volumes of unimpressed. "Since you were determined to cut into the time I have available for a certain brat and my friend, I feel no need to be polite. You wanted me here, Ottavia, I didn't want to be."

"Friend, hmmm? Is that all?"

The smile Sonya gave Daniella made more than a few of the mob ladies shudder. Which, Nilda mused, was impressive because they were not fainting socialites sheltered from their bloody reality.

A few unpracticed mob wives maybe, but there were also a few hitwomen and assassins in this crowd in the retired Vongola Donna's parlor.

"Friend." The Cloud affirmed strongly. "It is rather bewildering how many people seem to think we are more than just that."

The Rain turned her attention to the elderly Sky like the rest of the ladies in the room, to see what her rebuttal would be.

It was rather fascinating, in the same way one couldn't look away from a heated duel. No matter the weapon of choice was, everyone wanted to see who would come out on top.

Although, the Cloud's comment was rather lacking as a denouncement of anything more than friendly bonds between her and the hitman in question. Probably not her intent... but tasty as a rumor to spread.

Ottavia's expression was still as smooth as polished marble, but her eyes were locked with the Russian's own defiant ones. "I suppose… we'll just have to take your word for it."

"I can't decide if that means you are easily led via rumors or if you don't form an opinion of your own."

Nilda hid her gasp into her coffee, unlike a few others who spluttered.

Was Sonya trying to get herself killed?

Beretta and Glisenti were situated in the room, Rain and Mist Guardians respectively. Both females would not hesitate to try removing the woman's head for disrespect if even allowed one inch of leeway.

No, the woman decided after an intense moment of staring on both sides, the Russian was trying to get herself kicked out.

"I would've been a very poor Donna if I allowed myself to be easily led or never made up my own mind." Daniella informed the other woman pleasantly, a slight wrinkle forming at the corners of her eyes creasing through a tattooed petal. Nothing negative yet, merely a slight disapproval for how direct the other was being. "Although, I do wonder what your mother would think of your behavior."

"I'd rather not know. She was a nasty piece of work." The Cloud, thief by trade if the rumors were right, dismissed after a sip of her dark tea. "My foster mother, on the other hand, would tell me I shouldn't pull my punches anymore."

Neatly cornered, the Rain judged. Ottavia had few choices from that and they all were as murky as possible. Either ask about the original mother, the foster mother, or try a different attack but concede the initial parries in the Russian's favor.

"'Pull your punches'? Is this polite for you then?" She asked, a fourth path than what Nilda had figured she would take. "I would hate to see you angry."

"...you could ask Renato about that." A warning she had definable limits, or merely a comment? "Although you could also go to Mafia Land and see the mile-long swath I carved out of the headwind forest instead. The damage is still rather obvious, and that happened only last year."

She was pretty damn certain she wasn't the only one making plans to see if that was actually true or not the next time she went there.

"Isn't that odd for you?"

"You know me that well, do you?"

Daniella pursed her lips, to hide a smile if Nilda was a decent judge. She wasn't, which meant it was equally as possible it had been a frown. "There are so few strong female Mafiosi, the news of any… even Russian ones, is interesting. Do you blame me for following what little I can hear?"

That obstinate edge of challenge in the Cloud's eyes suddenly hid itself, and she sat back in the upholstered chair she had been guided to upon entering the parlor.

It was very different from the rapid-fire counters and parries it attracted attention and held it fast for a long moment.

"Actually? Yes, I do."
Lady Vongola's brows raised up sharply in surprise.

"If you were serious about that, it wouldn't have taken you two years to talk to me." Sonya blithely continued on, as if she was unaware of the sudden ringing silence. "Frankly, I'm not appreciative."

Daniella threw her head back and laughed.

"It's been ever so long since I had someone as forthright as you to argue with. You really must visit more often, Nikishina."

The Russian blinked, then blinked again. "Well… fuck."
Chapter 35

(Friday the 28th of February, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Where the hell are you people coming from, anyways?" Sonya snapped at the woman hastening along in her wake down one of the Iron Fort's halls.

"Problem?" Nilda Guerra asked wickedly and just a bit breathless, finally succeeding in coming up to walk next to the Russian Storm-Cloud.

"I've never been... sought out before." She admitted tartly, still trying to put even more space between herself and the retired Vongola Sky's parlor. "Most people avoid me. Rather sensible of them, I'm coming to find."

"Are you truly annoyed we appreciate a strong female Flame user?" The Rain asked in amusement, smirking at the deadpan expression aimed at her before they turned another corner. "You'll find more Italian women with enough steel in their spines to appreciate you fully than most other countries can boast of."

With a heavy sigh, the thief came to a sudden stop and glared full out at her tagalong. "That sounds rather elitist of you."

"You didn't answer my question."

"I have no reason to answer." She dismissed sharply, suspicious of all the unwanted attention suddenly aimed her way.

Sonya didn't appreciate the change, mostly due to the fact she didn't know what caused it. As it was entirely possible said change was actually rather sinister than benign, she had chosen to try and make herself enough of a pain to be avoided until she could find out more. Daniella... did not react as expected.

There was something entirely unfair about the fact she could barely make friends normally but ended up possibly doubling the number she had before when she decided to truly be a bitch for once.

Cherep was going to bust a rib.

"Since I did volunteer information for you, it's really only polite to give a little back." Nilda instructed amusedly.

The Russian shot the woman a disgusted look for treating her like some green newbie to mafia life. "I have no intention of getting pulled into a verbal trade-off. You have no real information I want or need, merely the obvious answers to a few wonders."

"Do I not?" The grin twisting her lips suggested she thought otherwise. "I have had a few general meetings with Daniella Vongola before, and could probably gain more if I wanted to get that deep. Is there really no reason to avoid courting my aid?"

"So, you're basing your use off of being an informant? Trite and not needed." It was entirely possible that wouldn't be the only way that exchange of information could go. "I can as easily get it by allowing Ottavia to pull me into whatever it was she wanted. Since I did not conform, does that not suggest I can do without such?"
"And how long do you expect that to last?" Nilda countered quickly, darting along in the Storm-Cloud's wake when she suddenly started moving again. "Daniella is a Sky-"

"And I am not one of those raised to believe a Sky can do no wrong or is always right."

"-that is exactly why she likes you and why her Guardians, all of them, will put an insane amount of effort to draw you back to her." Insisted the silver-haired Rain, scowling as a rather surprised servant cut her off.

Skirting past the man with his arms full of cleaning supplies, she actually flat out sprinted to catch up with the mildly annoyed Russian.

"You have basically two choices, either fight or play along with her whims. If you fight it, she'll get exactly what she wants. If you don't, just a few meetings not sniping at her will probably ensure she'll lose interest."

"There's a third option." Sonya informed her unwanted tag along sardonically as they descended the foyer stairs probably quicker than was recommended, nodding to the footman who yanked the front door open for her and the other woman. "Not being here and ignoring her."

"Little lady Sonya… did you specifically leave out your lingerie just for me or did you forget about it?" Renato Sinclair snapped irritably at the sound of her voice, blinking once at the extra she really rather wished had left her alone. "Miss… Guerra?"

He had fetched her luggage for her, especially since she promised him the next week to mainly help with his little mind-reading issue rather than fence with words against the Vongola Skies. There would be other things done during that time, but she really did need to get on with knocking out what she had left pending in favor for less interesting but more hazardous tasks.

"The maids probably left it there, since I did start packing my things this morning and removed the stuff I left in the drawers. Besides, it's not like you haven't seen that before."

The man scowled at her for that, flicking a glance to the Rain still gawking near the front steps of the manor. "I find this a very unscrupulous use of our friendship, just so you know."

"Thank you for collecting my things for me, Renato." The thief informed him brightly, ignoring his complaint. "Did you-

The card he flicked to her from a breast pocket was easily snatched out of the air.

"And thanks again."

"Wait, you're leaving?"

Sonya slotted the other woman a dry look. "I do believe that is what I meant."

Nilda's expression was… interesting.

"Sonya."

"I'll make it up to you." The thief informed her hitman friend swiftly, smirking slightly at the very irritated air about the man as her taxi made its ponderous way up the drive. "Rather soon, too."

Renato gave a very disgusted sounding scoff, twisting on his heels to stalk back inside the Iron Fort like a greatly offended panther.
"Miss Silver-White, it wasn't... entirely painful to see you again."

"That... probably was because Velia didn't faint this time."

"Was she there?" The only person the woman would assuredly know had fainted upon meeting the Storm-Cloud was that one weak Sun user from the last Christmas Ball. Sonya would admit she didn't really recall much, other than she was very pathetic and fainted again at Tyr's feet.

"Well... yes, but she was hyperventilating as you took your leave." She admitted slowly, with only a touch of something tart and wry lacing under her words.

(Saturday the 29th of February, 1969. A hotel, Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"They're going to know."

"Renato, stop trying to distract me and go back to learning how to shut off that annoying little trick of yours."

The hitman lasted all of another five minutes of silence before he rather irritably ripped the history text out of her hands and violently pitched it at the far wall. "That is disgustingly white-washed make-believe that has only a passing acquaintance with what really happened."

Sonya didn't immediately kick him in the shin for mistreating her book, because for one he had bought her it and two she was also pretty sure that text was a mass-produced sort which had little real value in a historic sense. Renato probably did know a lot better than any civilian published book did about Italy's involvement with the Mafia Wars during World War Two, and frankly she had been meaning to ask him about it.

However, she also wasn't going to let him get away with being an asshole to her since she was putting in the effort to help him. Crossing her arms, the thief gave the man seated across from her at her little hotel room table a flat look.

The older Italian native in the room looked pretty unrepentant for a long moment, then very slowly and reluctantly grimaced. "I have a migraine."

"That is the point."

They already knew her reading when he was close enough to mentally pick it up gave him such, it was the whole reason she was reading while the Mafioso was right next to her. There was no teacher quite like pain, and Sonya was perfectly okay with causing him it.

"You dented the wall." Shamal piped up from the thief's hotel bed, where he had sprawled out to do his homework for the start of his next week of schooling.

Sighing, she pinched the bridge of her nose as the hitman glowered at the brat irritably just for something to glare at that wouldn't take offense. "We may as well stop for the day, not that you managed to do much. Shamal? Are you done?"

"Yes!" The little Mist scrambled off her bed, bringing with him several sheets of lined paper for her perusal. "All finished!"

Renato probably did check over his homework when he had the time, the man was an irritating perfectionist. She'd seen him glower at his contract work at Mafia Land enough to know. The thief plucked the papers out of the brat's hand and glanced at it before the hitman with a headache could, but her attention got rooted to the fact it was written in perfect Cyrillic.

"Shamal? Remove the Mist Flames, kid."

There was no way in hell he was this fluent in written Russian.

Not with biyearly instructions and only occasional help with it. It had to be a Constructed illusion, one that makes whoever look at it think the work had been done... but since she had no idea what his homework was about it looked like the written explanation for lock picking she did around his age.

"Um..."

"You didn't do the work, you just have Mist Flames imbued in it making others think you did."

"...but mamma, it works!"

As long as Shamal could get away with it, Sonya really didn't care that much. Against a person, a teacher, that assigned a classroom full of kids the same work it would work as intended and had little risk to it other than a civilian's psychotic breakdown.

However, he probably still should at least attempt to do the work to prove he knew it. Even if what he did and what he turned in were different things.

"Works or not, try doing the work first before you turn in something so...

"Uninspired." Renato chipped in for her, leaving the chair next to her in favor for taking up her bed. "You had better not have given me something like that and passed it off as your homework, brat."

"I only figured it out recently." Shamal admitted, disgruntled and shooting his guardian a dirty look.

The hitman probably would appreciate the sneakiness more if he didn't have a headache the size of his home country, so she ignored him. Then again, if it had been used against him...

"What did you really do for the last hour and a half?"

"Wrote the questions out."

She arched an eyebrow at the homework when the brat lifted his Mist Flames from it, and all the doodles edging the neat list of problems assigned from his textbook. "How long does that last?"

"Until I get it back."

Which... anywhere from a few days to a week of time?

She had no clue how long a teacher would take to grade a full classes' worth of homework, and if Shamal was doing this for all of his assignments?

"Right... well..." Eyeing the hitman currently sprawled out on her bed, and all over the brat's books, the thief instead tossed the paper to the tabletop and looked back at the young Mist. "I think we should go find something for dinner. You can make a crack at answering the questions after."

Renato had snuck the brat out of the Iron Fort and would be ferrying the kid to and from his school for the next week. In exchange, Sonya would remain otherwise free this week to expressly help him with the mind-reading issue in the safety of her hotel room instead of somewhere else that might not be as easily secured.

Like Mafia Land, or one of the Iron Fort's various little parlors.

Right now, they were figuring out the limitations and the trick. How far he had to be for what kind of thoughts, helping the hitman figure out how to either turn it off or intentionally ignore another, and they would either sort out the basics so the Sun wouldn't tip anyone off figuring it out on his own or until he got a good grip on the skill.

She did not believe for a moment that Renato would ignore his trick, it was way too useful in a lifestyle where most lied to others as a matter of fact. Her helping him also helped her, in figuring out if there was anything she could do to stop it if she didn't want him reading her mind aside giving the ass a migraine or two if she caught him at it.

"There's a small restaurant down the street, if you take a left after going out the hotel's lobby."

Started the hitman, moving his fedora to shade his eyes and shifting a bit more. "Three doors from the next intersection, right-hand side, called Sotto Sotto. Get me the dinner special."

…worked for her.

---

(Sunday the 1st of March, 1969. A hotel, Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"They know."

Sonya snorted at him, trying to figure out what to pacify Shamal with so they could get on with the reason she was stalling yet another week in Italy instead of getting things done so she could return to Moscow. "I'm not doing this in some kind of protest of Vongola, Renato. I'm doing this so I'll be bothered less, and because it's cheaper than bribing Nono for a week's worth of safe passage."

Being ignored was something she could deal with. The thief wasn't a very influential person here, she really had little to no reason to interact with the Vongola Skies, and therefore being left alone to amuse herself was a pretty decent deal for all involved.

Little effort on her side, little effort on Don Timoteo's side, and still things got done at a respectable rate. Maybe he even got a laugh or something to think about as a bonus.

She didn't appreciate that status quo tipping.

Tyr was different, someone she wanted to forge a connection to because she wanted to, but Daniella's interest in her for much the same reason wasn't appreciated. The only reason she brought Cherep was because she was pretty much left alone, not because she wanted more attention.

Yet she was getting more attention, and even if her passage could be bought with the elder Sky's interests… it would also mean more effort on her end to keep that relationship up.

Cheaper did not always mean easier.

She also had little reason to get involved with the Eighth or Ninth Generations of Vongola. They were Italian, she was Russian, and their respective interests didn't mesh very much. Yes, they were all Flame users and criminals.
Beyond that…?

Thankfully today was Sunday, the little brat had school tomorrow. The Sun user could dump Shamal at school for most the day, they could put in more effort in his mind-reading trick, then the hitman could go recollect his ward and dump him off on her for the rest of the night while he did…

She was pretty sure the man was trying the riskier mental probing on people he had to kill anyways.

"I am, actually." Renato admitted willingly enough as if that didn't imply that he wanted to spare her the worst effects of his tricks, didn't think she could take it, or that he didn't want her irritated at him again. "Frankly, you're in enough of a contrary mood that anything I do will have negative motives behind it for you that I don't see the point in trying to avoid them."

Was she?

Sonya brought her thoughts up short, wondering if she was doing exactly what he was accusing her of.

"I'm not accusing anything. You are, and you're also probably entitled to it."

The man had the audacity to laugh at her for the probably skeptical look she gave him.

"Sonya, Nono isn't perfect. No one is." Renato informed her of airily as he moved to check what Shamal was really doing with his books and if he was done so they could get on with the plan for the day. "A reminder that non-Vongola assets need different handling than the rest of the Famiglia is probably an overdue prompt he needed for a while now. You're such a good guest, self-contained and not interested in prying for rumors or gossip. I'm willing to bet a lot of people forgot you are a Cloud and are perfectly capable of acting like it."

Which didn't excuse the fact her brother had gotten injured on Vongola grounds. Even if they didn't know that because Cherep's ability healed or bullshitted a fix, it was hard to tell sometimes, himself before medical aid could be given. It also didn't excuse the fact that she was not informed of anything regarding the people that managed the injuring.

Sonya would've accepted being informed that whoever did it were all dead, or just mostly dead, or the famiglia responsible were slotted to die the moment Tyr had a moment free. Hell, she would've settled for being informed of the name of whoever it was. She'd kill them then, or more likely hire Renato or the Sword Emperor to do it for her.

The hitman would get preference, but if he didn't want to be known for taking out whole famiglia she'd offer it next to the master assassin before taking the commission to Mafia Land or even to Ziven if he still was looking for something to do.

…probably not. The thief still had enough morals to know mass murder wasn't an answer. One or two hits then, for the idiots that carried out the attempted car-bombing of the Vongola Lightning Guardian and probably wouldn't see her brother as anything but collateral damage.

Sighing, the Russian rubbed the bridge of her nose and gave up worrying about it. Tyr probably would likely inform her of what she wanted to know if she asked politely, as long as it was termed in a query for 'who hurt my brother' than 'who hurt Vongola', so the issue would be dealt with then. For the current issue she really should be thinking of…

"Shamal… aside my presence for the rest of the week? What else would you like for your birthday?"

The brat then proved he had been spending way too much time with Renato by looking her in the eye and asking, "Besides you showing up on time next year?"

"...besides that, yes."

The young Mist left his work in his guardian's hands, ducking the man's arm to come around her temporary bed in order to face her fully. "I don't know, what can I get?"

"Again, brat, I am a thief. What can't I get?" Sonya held up a hand to stop him before the spark of something mischievous in his brown eyes translated into words. "Aside a baby sibling again, because I am way too young to actually get myself pregnant for no real reason other than that and you have yet to actually meet mine."

"Aww..." Shamal even let himself bat suspiciously overblown teary eyes at her but dropped the illusion of wounded innocence when she gave him an unimpressed stare back. "...can I get a dog?"

"No." Renato answered for her flatly, glancing over to pin the brat with a no-nonsense look before catching what was probably a questioning look on her face. "Vongola's child wing has a no large pet policy. A few of the other brats have allergies, as do the housekeeping staff. If it can't be caged and contained to one room, it's not allowed."

"So smaller pets like birds, rodents, and amphibians? A dog is a lot of work, Shamal. If you can take care of a smaller pet until your time in the Iron Fort is done, I'll consider getting a house in this country for the rest of your preteen and maybe teenage years, as long as Renato agrees you can handle yourself and your Flames, where you can have a dog."

Mist brat's excited 'really?' was echoed a bit more dubiously from the hitman.

Sonya shrugged. "Obviously I'm not living in Vongola territory, so it'll be a lot more north than here. Maybe near the border of France. But I am eventually going to need a house, Cherep even agreed to hold onto the deed for me as long as he gets to crash there now and again. I have little concerns for where said house will be, so long as it is secure."

Renato kept eyeing her strangely, but that was practically a given. Shamal was his ward, and she was still a mostly missing presence the brat knew of and could get along with.

She might want to do more than visit every now and again, but he had little to no idea of that or why she'd want to. The Vongola Guardians had probably spent more time with the brat than she could.

Nothing said she couldn't sell the house and move the very moment the Mist brat didn't need the location anymore.

(Wednesday the 5th of March, 1969. A pet shop, Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

A near full week of work, with a subject that was perfectly willing to be helpful, Renato had a fairly good grasp on his mind reading trick. How far he could pull on that before others could become aware of it, a method that might pan out to help him ignore the more useless aspects, and a working range.

Sonya was, mostly internally, torn between thinking it was a Sun Activation skill and wondering how much she would have to bribe someone named Viper for information about Espers and seeing if the trick matched up to that skill set. It was still mostly a thought she was playing with and not something she had brought up to him, so he wasn't sure if she would really do that for him or not.
She didn't seem to like the person very much.

As for the hitman himself, he was just happy the woman had finally put aside more time to help him.

Not so happy that the damn Storm-Cloud had actually gone through with the idea of getting his brat a pet, and they were both watching the kid flirt around a pet store looking at all of his possible animals he could get.

"I swear, if I end up with whatever it is..."

"That's more than likely, actually." Came the entirely unrepentant reply. Sonya looked, for her, highly amused as the tiny Mist got distracted pestering the poor clerk about the snake tanks. "Three, four at most, years then I can probably get him a dog. Which means you should probably put some effort into steering him to an animal you don't mind, or you'll end up stuck with something small, fuzzy, and cute."

Renato glared at her, the thief batted her lashes once then waltzed off to tempt Shamal with a hamster.

Oh hell no. Trailing them both down a line of fish aquariums, the hitman ignored everything fuzzy in hopes the brat would get the hint.

He didn't really have anything against rodents, so long as they weren't sharing his living space. It baffled him why some people considered them pets, his less than sanitary upbringing half on and half off the streets made him less than appreciative of the small furry menaces.

If Sonya really wanted the brat to live with her, and deal with inevitably caring for whatever mutt, that was on her. Ten might be a few years too early for Mafia School, but Shamal being eleven or twelve could be overlooked as long as he was good enough.

Since the only other option was bargaining with Nono for another few years more of sanctuary for Shamal until he was old enough or becoming a bit more stationary than recommended for someone like him, the thief stepping in instead would work fantastically for him. As Sonya's involvement was Shamal's effort of changing his living situation, the young Mist would probably greatly appreciate the change.

He wasn't blind to his ward's dissatisfaction with living in the Iron Fort without him, but Vongola territory was a lot more stable than just about anywhere else in Italy. The Russian Storm-Cloud seemed aware enough of that and being a Cloud would enable her to secure a small area for Shamal to finish growing up in a lot better than he could do until he got a slight more... murderous in reputation.

A week of days also let him know the woman was near utterly disinterested in being flirted with.

He held the suspicion for a while, which ended in Mafia Land when his attempts to figure it out ended with him being bodily removed from her personal space. Twice.

A week of merely observing her interact with a few petty Mafiosi and the housekeeping staff clued him into the rest.

If you were direct enough, Sonya could recognize it as actual attempts but regularly shot down anyone trying something with her. Anything else, flattery to suggestive quips, earned another of various responses from flat glares to bemused little snorts. Not even the brat could get away with it without skepticism.
Renato himself got an annoying little lift of her eyebrow when he tried flattery, before the damn woman overlooked his flirting for what they were really talking about. Anything further, mainly getting into her personal space, ended up with him being kicked out or her stalking off after she did a bit of forceful rearrangement.

In the end, the results were pretty much mostly the same thing.

Sonya was not interested in any kind of relationship beyond friendship. Either she was too much a Cloud to pay much attention just yet or, like her brother said, she had lingering issues with personal contact. She’d probably have to start anything, or someone would have to spend an obscene amount of effort to get her to pay attention to them.

Continuing to test her limits would only turn her wary, violent, or violently wary, so the hitman was going to stop pressing his luck.

Some other idiot could end up a bloody splat on the ground first from a highly embarrassed or frustrated Storm-Cloud.

That conclusion didn't quite mesh with the offer Tatiana gave on the sisters’ behalf, but it was entirely possible the bubbly Sun with a wicked streak had been playing with the more straightforward little sister in some way and he just happened to get caught up in it. The humor of that possibility did appeal to him, but since that little incident started his wondering over the younger Russian's outlook on sex he didn't fully appreciate it either.

Tapping a finger on a tank earned him the beady stare of some lizard, Renato glanced at the handwritten placard that declared the species as a Graceful Chameleon.

"That's pretty neat." Shamal gave his opinion, ducking under the Sun user's slightly bent form to gawp at the same lizard. "Don't chameleons also change colors?"

He glanced at the animal Sonya was carefully returning to its tank with aid of a young teen clerk, which was a tiny corn snake from the banding colors. "...yes. Much more interesting than any old snake, right?"

Being the kid was a Mist, he was entirely unsurprised by his next comment. "I thought girls didn't like snakes, frogs, and creepy crawlies? Mamma didn't even blink when I showed her a snake. She even helped me feed it a few crickets."

"Well... Sonya's not a normal lady." Frankly, he didn’t know if any Cloud would allow themselves to be frightened by things which would creep out anyone else. Not without a large amount of collateral damage at least. "What about one of these?"

Giving a considering look to the tank's occupants, the kid trailed down the aisle of tanks farther to see what kinds of four legged lizards were available.

"What, no snakes?" The thief asked with a smirk, finally divested of the small one she had helped Shamal see better.

"At least they're not fuzzy."

Bratty Mist suddenly trotted back to them, hands cupped around a rather small lizard. "What about this one?"

It was still a chameleon, but one rather reduced in size than the nearly arm-length versions Renato had been eyeing. The lizard was actually fit for the brat's hands than something that would take the hitman to move for him.

"Cute. Where did you find him?" Sonya asked before he could, following the kid back down the lane.

Following along, if only out of sheer curiosity, Renato eyed the sign taking up the lower left-hand corner of the tank.

Cape Dwarf Chameleons read the plaque.

"Well… at least he will stay small."

"I think it's a her, mamma."

The thief eyed the lizard in the Mist's hands, then the others stalking around their glass enclosure. "How can you tell?"

Shamal shrugged, petting the probably scared docile chameleon in his palms. "She's not as spiky."

"She's really small compared to a few of the others, though. Might get her spikes in a bit when she grows a little." She eyed him, the tank of little lizards, and the prospective pet in the kid's grasp. Finally, the thief smirked up at the hitman. "I think we found your pet."

"…is it a he or a she?" Asked the young Mist, looking up at his self-claimed mamma then at his guardian. When both shrugged at him, he peered around the hitman's form at the clerk who had been helping him investigate the animals.

"Um… male? There's no real easy way to tell until they're fully grown."

Renato was going to end up stuck with the dwarf chameleon of indeterminate gender. Fantastic.

Sonya did pay for the glass tank and bedding, as well as a few plastic fake-tree branches and the food to feed the brat's new pet for at least a month. Shamal looked entirely less enthusiastic when he learned the lizard ate mostly bugs, and that hand-feeding was one of the better ways to get a chameleon accustomed to being handled. Renato bought the warming light and water dish, and since he was going to be stuck paying for some poor maid or footman to keep buying bugs for the little lizard's natural lifespan only bought a bit of other creepy crawlies that were used as treats for the breed.

He took possession of the tank and the bulkier packages, leaving her with the bugs. The Mist brat ended up with a cardboard box holding his new pet.

Sonya still looked highly amused at the whole situation.

At least the damn thing was only going to live three to five years.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday 5th of March, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya was only mildly surprised Tyr melted out of nowhere while she waited for Renato and Shamal to finish installing the brat's new pet in his room.

The children's wing of the Vongola's Iron Fort was apparently located somewhere on the second floor. She didn't know exactly where. The hitman had gestured to the second landing's little seating area for her to wait in and she took the suggestion even if she was curious.
It made some sense. The ground floor would then be as 'public' as any criminal syndicate could get, and that was a bad location for any half-trained or too young brat to live on.

It was only half a possibility the young Vongolas didn't live on the floor too. The thief was pretty sure they didn't… but she had been surprisingly wrong a few times before about where things were located here and was disinclined to make a solid assumption about it.

Either way, she was going to remain exactly where she was in hopes of preventing any more Vongola interest in her direction.

"Did you really need to leave?"

"It was less bothersome. And I could keep my own weaponry on me."

She didn't bother trying to keep a wary eye on Tyr, the master assassin was a threat she was pretty sure she'd fail in trying to counter if he wanted to kill her. Depressing but true, the Russian had actually very little pure combat experience to date.

She cheated greatly through it anyways.

Most often, people were just afraid of her temper and tended to freeze up when she got irate. Not so much in Moscow, but she was pretty sure that was only a matter of time and when her temper did slip her control.

A particularly annoying Chinese Storm had been the only one that didn't flounder in any conflict with her, which helped counter the times when he was being irritating.

"Lady Vongola was most put out."

Giving the Head of the Varia a dirty look probably wasn't a great idea, but Sonya did it anyways. "Really? Why do I care?"

"She does have a large amount of influence still." Tyr's expression was bland as always, but if she didn't know better she would swear the Italian was teasing her for running from a retired old woman.

Sonya wrinkled her nose up in disgust. Even if the impression was wrong, that didn't mean the idea she found behind it was. "The current situation mostly worked for me. Complicating it, even in aims for a better one in the future, is not something I am prepared to deal with."

"If you were? You now do know Daniella is interested in you."

"Tyr, what ever happened to the idiots that tried blowing up Ganauche and almost got my brother?"

Yes, it was a painfully obvious subject change. No, she did not care it was so transparent.

A few lines around the assassin's mouth deepened, but he accepted the switch with grace. "I, and a few of my… subordinates, removed them from the gene pool."

Well, she probably would've loved to help out if anyone had told her which moron flavor of the month was a valid target. Even if anyone had just suggested the situation was going to be taken care of, she might not have left the Fort.

Might. Ottavia was still damn annoying.

The master assassin waited a beat, then prompted her with a very flat, "Well?"
"I will reconsider the situation, when I am less annoyed in general." Sonya promised him, as that seemed to be the exchange he wanted. "My brother is not trained for combat, and I had thought this place secure enough to not worry about it. The fact he came to harm anyways is not appreciated, nor was the fact I was told nothing about the situation being handled."

Tyr gave her a long stare, which seemed more contemplative than simply to unnerve. "Most seemed to think you had gone out to hunt for the individuals that did it."

"This isn't my territory, I am not Italian. I would have caused more harm than good for both Vongola and I." Not to say she hadn't been tempted, but Renato and Shamal still trumped hunting for idiots that only had a short while to live anyways. "I left it up to Visconti and you."

Of course, had they not finally given her a bit of news on this end... she might have just asked Renato about it then missed her flight for an hour or three in favor of something quick and violent. She could be patient, but not that much.

"...I see."

Sonya doubted it. She didn't understand her own Cloud instincts very much, where her own personality ended and where Flame induced impulses began. "Cherep is not combative."

That earned her a near-violently suppressed twitch, which just might be Tyr's reaction when surprised.

The Russian wondered why he was surprised at all, as it was the second time she had made that point. "He's a pacifist, which I support. Even if I do think he's being needlessly complicated about it. Since my brother will not be proactive in his own defense, I will be even if it is passive-aggressive."

The older man gave a short, tight nod to show he heard her.

"She did explain what we were?"

"I was sorry to hear it."

"Cherep would never be interested, even if I wanted to try and be stubborn about it." Mostly out of sheer curiosity.

Skies and their Harmony was something she still didn't understand, and it seemed as if that knowledge could only be gained through experience. A thief and an assassin might work together well, but not a stuntman.

Tyr gave a rolling motion of a shoulder that might have been a shrug. "I do not mind talking with you."

The Storm-Cloud wondered if that was a warning or a clarification.

(Thursday the 6th of March, 1969. Mafia Land.)

Given how wildly popular she had somehow become, the Russian was almost unsurprised when Fong managed to track her down after she had been on Mafia Land for a few short hours.

"I do not have the time right now. If it is that important, take it to Moscow and wait for me there at the end of the month."

Eerily like how events had played out in Shanghai, the martial artist dodged and weaved around the island's foot traffic easily enough to keep up with her. At least they weren't running flat out, nor was he dripping wet this time.

"Even for a possible personal commission?"

"Even then." The thief tossed his way, ignoring the possibility for a fat payoff and aiming for the general location of the arrival hall in order to not give Galina a coronary by how late she was becoming. Another month was going to be unavoidable as it was. "I do not have the extra time to go out of my way, and my current goals require short and sweet right now. As many as I can safely manage."

"That sounds… slightly alarming."

Spinning around to open the free-swinging doors with her back and face the Triad member at the same time, she gave him a wry smile. "It is more for a personal goal than anything, one I made with my sister. Besides, I do not wish to return to China."

"What if we were to go through the client services here? Would you consent to visit then?" Fong asked as he continued to dog her heels into the massive sea/airport complex. "It is highly unlikely you could avoid everything connected to China for the rest of your life, why not allow us to fix this misstep?"

"At the moment, it is not that I am unwilling." Corrected Sonya, only a touch exasperated with the man's stubbornness over sparing him more than a few words for the moment. "Although I will admit there is some of that. I do not have the time. I am, frankly, overdue as it is."

"Ah…?"

"Syndicate related."

Fong's braid tipped to the side with the motion of his head, then the man shrugged. "Moscow, then?"

"End of the month. I actually had something I wanted to ask of you as well, but again…"

The entirely too stubborn Storm actually started to consider her repeated protests finally, and Sonya was going to take that as a win. If her next contract didn't have such a damn tight deadline, she would've spared the time to fully hear the man out if only for the prospect of another spar.

Right now, she really should've been on a flight to Sierra Leone. It was another region she also really should've barred Björn from taking contracts from, but she hadn't thought of it until the teen brought her next contract to her.

Conflict diamonds. Much of the continent was embroiled in civil wars or armed conflicts, and while her Lightning Storm Lackey was doing very well keeping on top of some subjects he didn't have her understanding of mostly broad world events to come.

It was her fault for not thinking about it, not his, so she would suck it up and deal.

A very worrying start to a string of heists she greatly cared about not being identified doing, these were… a lot more dangerous. Given the situations she was heading into, at least knowingly, murder might not be something she could avoid again.
However, as she had told Fong, it was short and sweet. Fly in, maybe a day spent checking the information Mafia Land had on hand, steal something, get the hell out of the country. Her Lackey would meet her at the underworld friendly airport with both her next contract and to take charge of the old, which was how she intended to spend the rest of the month.

Three weeks, most of the travel handled by plane. It might not be possible to cram the next nineteen heists she needed to do in order to realize Tatiana's goal in so short of a time, but Sonya would damn well try.

"I will see you in Russia, then."

She heaved a sigh, finally coming to a stop in line for the ticket booth. Fong considerately ensured it was obvious he wasn't in the same line and was merely talking to her. "I am not certain if I should be worried or what."

"I would not be worried…but then again, I am not you." With that little pearl of wisdom, the Chinese man gave her a respectful incline of his head and a little wry smile. "I can at least ensure you will not be too upset by what I am to request."

"Aside the visiting China aspect."

"…aside that, yes."

(Saturday the 8th of March, 1969. Freetown, Republic of Sierra Leone)

The tricky thing about mafia life was that it existed as a confusing mass of layers.

There was the very most top, containing all the petty criminals that never truly realized they were being used as disposable pawns or easy distractions. The part law enforcement the world over knew and handled as a matter of fact, crimes of passion and those who allowed their greed to overcome their senses. The easiest part to get into, the less controlled and mostly ignored level.

Those petty crooks were handled, guided, nudged, maneuvered, and pushed around as need be by the next most visible layer. The old hands, the retired, the cowards that didn't dare go deeper or had no way to enable it, pawn shop brokers, money launderers, drug runners, smugglers, informants, petty thugs that worked small territories. They held the gateway through Omerità, only sometimes just this side of respectable and yet completely shameless criminals enabling the trade of violence.

It was possible they might be arrested if anything too bad happened, so they only held bits and pieces and generally preferred not to know.

Under that, was where things got… sticky and messy.

Free agents, the grunts of any syndicate, assassins working without direct oversight, loose thieves. It entirely depended on where in the world you were and what kind of situation you were looking at to tell what set of murderers and crooks were dominant, who was on top as 'less respectable' and therefore 'disposable' and who was at the bottom and 'priceless' to the local syndicate in charge.

The pillars shafted through that mired muck and held up the structure of everything were the mob families, the more ruthless gangs, and tight knit clans of criminals. Again, depending on where and who, they might be only shallow enough to barely dip into the heavier trades or deeply rooted enough to go so far down they were up. Vongola and the Zolotovs were part of that, her clan was still mostly shallow but starting to sink and the Italian Famiglia was in so deep it was almost legal.

Laced between them were the conglomerations, networked syndicates that banded together for whatever reason. The American Mob Families, Vongola's Allied Famiglias, Mafia Land, China's Triads. They gave the underworld even more structure to rely upon, but also turned large stretches of territory into even worse patchworks of which criminal type was favored.

At the very bottom was a slurry of near diamond hard mud, the Dons and Pahkan and the mafia legends. Chess masters and puppeteers, who you might or might not hear anything about, mixed with a sprinkle of crooks so damn good their exploits were still told to the green newbies. A tiny handful of people that kept pulling strings and orchestrating events to enable their existence.

Like the Vindice, who were fearsome enough no one broke Omertà unless they had a death wish. The First Generation of Vongola, pioneers of criminal Flame users still gossiped about to this very day. A man she only knew as Semion Mogilevich, the boss of bosses in Russia that she had heard tiny bits about, but it seemed to be all true.

Sonya's main issue with Africa was that in some places, there was next to no upper crust to the underworld. She wasn't sure what that said about her, if the thin veneer of civilized crime settled her when it was less transparent to armed thugs walking about any old civilian town like they had no reason not to.

However, it was probably the best look at what the hell happened to a country after their underworld boiled to the surface she'd find. It didn't mean the situation was pretty, or remotely civilized.

The thief seriously wondered if she was spoiled or something.

Two hours into her first ever visit to the Freetown of Sierra Leone, she already wanted out. The streets were cramped, pedestrians were either suicidal or blind and were fully willing to walk mere inches from fast moving traffic, and motorcycles could and did go off the roads and onto the pathetic excuse for a sidewalk. Most if not all the men wandering the streets were armed with rifles, giving the city a very nervous air even as it prepared for their very first elections as a free republic.

Thankfully, Freetown was merely the biggest port city and she got the hell out of there quickly.

Since she didn't speak a local dialect, she opted out of questioning anyone. English was a common language, but not a widespread one in the middle class or lower-class working districts. She did take the time to buy a very wide straw hat, to protect her pale skin from the sun this close to the equator.

There was little she could do about the insects, other than wait until she had the freedom to utilize her Storm Flames internally. It wasn't a half bad trick, for all that it made it impossible for her to get drunk anymore it also kept her clear of unwanted drugs or viruses. Beating that back the next time she needed vaccinations was going to be a pain.

Damn Fong for giving her the idea.

Sonya took the pain of buying several expensive bottles of water, having known coming into the country that their water sanitation wasn't the best. Then, with her traveling pack stocked with said water and a floppy hat on her head, found herself a way out of the city.

A very slow, careful way out of the city. She was being followed.

Not surprising really, Russians weren't wildly popular down here.

In fact, anyone with white skin were treated with a healthy amount of suspicion. The thief didn't really mind, Freetown was built by ex-slaves and some of that disgruntlement had to have carried over through the generations. It didn't exactly help her, but she could deal.

Mainly by heavily abusing Cloud Flame speed the moment she was visibly alone. It took an hour of walking down the busier streets to lose the less stubborn tails, another hour to round the small peninsula the capital city was built on, and a handful more minutes to find a mostly abandoned area free of civilians.

The reason she refrained from hitching a ride was because she was down here to steal diamonds. She wanted no links to this job to linger on her, and to do that she was actually going to use her Flames on this one.

For her, running wasn't a bad method to exercise by. There just wasn't any long enough stretch she could run down, not with her Cloud Flames lending her legs more strength than her muscles could. Even with her Flame trick they were still moving, which was a semi-decent alternative to a spar or three.

Rachel had hated it, strangely.

Sierra Leone's geography was at least south enough to not be pure desert, but from the grit and sand seeping into cleared sections they also weren't far enough to escape all of it. Equally it was north enough to not be rainforest but still enough, so it was more than a bit dangerous. Mostly scrubland with fringes of forested jungle creeping up here and there, and still hot enough that if she wasn't wary the thief would end up with several bad sunburns.

It was also a wet heat, which helped nothing.

At least her speed, when not reduced going through the little villages or in sight of the various farm fields, generated a bit of wind that kept her moderately comfortable. Stopping would be a bitch.

Sonya wasn't nearly as fast as an automobile, but in a less developed country that was good enough.

She wasn't really going very far, which let her risk getting lost in favor of keeping her presence mostly overlooked. Out of the peninsula Freetown was situated on, down the coast on the southernmost end of Yawri Bay. The forested areas were the worst parts, even crossing the few rivers weren't nearly as bad as the tangled mass of vegetation proved to be.

As interesting as the near-tropical assortment of wildlife was, she strove to avoid most of it. They returned the favor, aside a few monkeys eyeing her suspiciously and a lone roving hippo, the most she had to personally deal with were the thick swarms of insects.

They did not like her Storm Flames. Sonya felt the exchange was fair enough, she didn't like being bitten by a possible malaria carrier.

Taking great pains to avoid the little coastal town of Kata, by skirting the entire section of forest almost south enough to hit the outskirts of Shenge, cost her another hour. The Russian could also not go as fast as she could in emptier stretches of beach, and by the time she reached the jutting tip of the southern bay she felt disgustingly sticky and overheated.

Almost wishing for another river to cross, lukewarm though they might be it was still a mostly clean wet, she lingered at the edges of the southern forest line treating her blisters.

As she hadn't wanted to ruin her boots for this, she had bought herself a cheap pair of running shoes. The mass-produced things hadn't liked her feet, and from the looks of it would need to be discarded the moment she got back to Freetown.
Her position did include a stretch of beach, which made a pretty picture to stare at aimlessly as she waited for full dark. Stare at and not explore because it was pretty visible to the houses on this unnamed jut of land and she was trying for discrete.

Finding somewhere to sit or relax on that wasn't bug infested or serving for a bird perch was another.

Sonya had a, rather unpleasant, four hours to wait. By the time dark had truly fallen, evading three chances of discovery by the local children and two by old fishermen, she was disgustedly bored and rather irritated overall.

The flash of headlights as a convoy of jeeps passed her little copse of trees signaled that she hadn't missed the date or overshot where she had to be.

Slipping her feet back into the still wet and unraveling running shoes, the thief snuck off into the beach to swim for the next bit.

They were smuggling their diamonds off the one lone pier at the edge of the seaside village, the small motor boat that she would be stealing from would linger for half an hour after the jeeps left under local guard. She was sorry the locals would probably suffer for this, but they did enable the trade of blood diamonds by allowing the handoff to happen a stone's throw from them.

However, this was the point her contract demanded the stones go missing from. As sorry as she was, she also didn't feel like getting hunted down and murdered for refusing to do the job after accepting it by proxy.

Sonya slipped into the waves silently enough, the crash of the sea covered most of the sloshing about she had to do to keep moving in the right direction.

At least she won't have to smuggle the damn rocks herself. It was going to be a drop off in-country, her paperwork would get signed at the same time, so all Bjørn would have to do is turn it in.

Swimming in the ocean was different than a river or a pool, and the irritation she experienced over the day made corroding a few key wires with her Storm Flames easy enough. Hiding herself under the pier for said tampering at least helped her keep the flair of red light from being noticed, and once that was done she slipped underwater again to get on the other side of the boat.

It was a really, really good thing one's Flames of willpower were waterproof.

It took another two hours of treading water, mainly helped along by holding onto the side of the small boat, for her to finish silently Disintegrating a hole into the bottom of it. She was going completely off reported information, and it seemed true enough when she broke through the thin fiberglass to only come up against a wooden crate. A bit more Storm Flames, and she had broken through that as well.

From there, it was a simple matter of feeling out then taking the velvet pouch of high-quality diamonds and putting them into her pack. Everything else she also tried to take, the possibility the obvious quality pouch being a decoy was high.

The thief did managed most of it, before shouts started up as the slowly rising water level was noted. Before anyone took attention off trying to find and plug the leak, Sonya slunk backwards under the pier again. The dark and murky mud would conceal her from sight, so long as she didn't flail about and cause plumes of the silt to float around.

A check to ensure everything she had was secured, a moment to be sure no one was looking in her direction, and then she pushed off underwater. Swimming as fast as she could.
Getting out of the area before they noticed the hole in the bottom of the crate was a necessity, checking to ensure she had her target before leaving entirely was just as much.

Luck was with her, when she reached the tip of the jutting land she had the space to double check. The velvet pouch had been a decoy full of simple limestone rocks, as were two of the four other packets of lumps she also took. Of the other two, one held a jumble of rough-cut stones clear enough she guessed they were uncut diamonds and the other had color tinted ones just as rough.

Sonya did not need more diamonds, especially not these ones, so all of it was going for the drop off. The real point of the contract was something had to be stolen, the amount or how left up to the thief contracted.

Repacking away her find, she slipped back into the ocean to make it across Yawri Bay without risking being seen by the Kata villagers. She had to get up to Tumbu on the north side of the bay before dawn, but at least she had no smuggling to do on this contract.

There was no way in hell she'd make it by purely swimming, so skirting shore until the first major river it was going to be.

She had to leave her straw hat behind, since this part of her heist was aquatic, but she could buy a new one if she really wanted. Swimming in salt-water had her blisters burning, and the walk back to the airport was going to be excruciating.

With just a bit more luck, she'd be out of Sierra Leone by dawn's break and able to put her feet up for a few days.

(Sunday the 9th of March, 1969. Freetown, Republic of Sierra Leone)

"Wait, what?"

"You are under arrest."

Oh... goodie.

"I just wanted a hat." Sonya even helpfully pointed at the rack of them she had been perusing while she waited for her Lackey to find her. It was still before dawn's break, so she supposed it was kind of suspicious she was wandering the flea market browsing.

The uniformed man looked unimpressed with her defense, gesturing again with the rifle. "Hands up, white girl."

Dutifully doing so slowly, the Storm-Cloud really did wonder why she was getting arrested while also being thankful she had no conflict rocks stored in her possessions.

Frankly, she didn't have time to be arrested. Not in some third-world country. It was appealing in a lazy way if one took out the location she was being arrested in, frankly no one in Moscow would really blame her. Be annoyed, yes.

Sonya, personally, also couldn't afford it. Shamal would throw a goddamned bitch fit if she missed yet another visit for any reason, and Galina did not deserve to be stuck with all that work on her lonesome.
Near instant jailbreak it was.

Her personal effects were confiscated, annoyingly. The tungsten Bec de Corbin keeping her hair up in a knot, the Thor's Hammer pendant and red tourmaline skeleton key chains around her neck, and her chain of mini-weapons irked her more than her fake passport and paperwork she came into the country for.

She actually didn't need anything but the paperwork, which had the signature of the man stationed to accept the stolen diamonds, but her weapons were something she wasn't going to leave without.

The thief was forced to change clothing, which wasn't too much of a loss. Having known she'd be in the water for a bit she had worn things she wouldn't mind losing, and given the blisters she had on her feet sandals weren't a bad idea. The rags, on the other hand, she intended to ditch as soon as possible.

Since it was so early, Sonya got stuffed in a holding cell for processing later when someone more important came around.

She didn't intend to be here for that.

It took her a second to realize that yes, she did just get thrown into a communal cell with a mixed group of what appeared to be thugs and civilians.

Entirely unimpressed was probably her expression.

Ignoring the chatter that started up behind her, Sonya took two steps back to the cell door in order to wrench it open. To her surprise, someone else was already fiddling with it. "Move."

Scruffy blond and near skeletal shot her a wide eye look, then scrambled out of her way before she could grab him. Reaching through the bars and around to the locking mechanism, the thief pressed a finger to the keyhole mostly to cover up her Storm Flames eating through it.

"How?" Scruffy spluttered, wide eyed and dumbfounded as she wrenched the cell door open with little resistance.

The Mafia Land agent ignored him even if he did speak English, already turning to examine the gate separating the holding cells from the rest of the provincial jail. It was rusty enough she wouldn't have to risk a second Disintegration, her Propagation was a lot less showy anyways.

Digging around the bolts holding the door in place was the work of a few moments and prying them out of the concrete walls was simple. She pocketed the bolts, so no one would notice they were more screws than just large nails.

Removing the entire door and doorway proved harder, as she didn't know how many guards would be left behind to ensure no one escaped nor where they might be. She worked the entire frame back and forth slowly, to prevent any screeching groans from giving her away.

By the time she had finished that, Scruffy had stupidly managed to open the rest of the holding cell doors.

After thinking about it, the Russian figured they could work as a distraction well enough and didn't say anything as several of the bigger prisoners bolted past her like bats out of hell.

Waiting a few more moments, when that was all that decided to risk encountering armed police, the thief checked the rest of her fellow prisoners and became curious. Scruffy was doing something at the far back wall, and from the flickers of light… it was something Sun Flame related.

…even civilians now?

The man had a ragged air about him, a long-term prisoner if she had to guess. Entirely possible that was more than enough to ignite his Dying Will, and Suns were one of the hardier types that would let him live through what others wouldn't.

Scruffy also seemed to know what he was doing, quite possibly not his first jailbreak.

If Sonya didn't need her stuff, she would've gone through the back too.

What was the proper procedure for this kind of situation?

A civilian Sun Flame user, using his Flames in front of even more civilians?

She really hoped Dying Will Flame use wasn't covered by Omertà, or at least civilian Flame use wasn't.

From the fitful sputters of his Flames he was trying to channel through a clear but rough rock, she had some time before he successfully cut through the concrete. Stalking their less patient cellmates and ignoring the dead guard who seemed to have had his head bashed in before he could react, she followed the semi-obvious path to where her things had been tossed.

It was all still there, midway through being inspected. There was a very nervous girl still picking through her things, who blanched a pasty ash color under her dark skin at the sight of the highly unamused thief.

Obviously, no one else had brought anything too important in with them but her.

The girl scrambled to her feet and lunged for a pistol on the counter, which just put her head in range for Sonya to smash her forehead into the wooden counter she had been working on.

Picking up her stuff was fairly simple from there, except the girl was wearing her hammer pendant. Said girl also got stripped to her underwear, to replace the rags the Russian was wearing.

Donning the colorful skirt and sleeveless blouse then repacking her stuff sans the water bottles she had left over, Sonya retraced her steps. Every now and again dropping a handful of Storm Flames to set the place on fire.

The girl would maybe live, if she woke up quick enough. Dead guard number one, and any others she failed to check for, would just end up fuel for her Flames.

Scruffy had barely managed to make a decent dent into the wall, and while Sonya's Storm Flames would prevent anyone coming down the hallway to try re-securing the prisoners he was a bit too slow for her taste.

Nothing really could be done without exposing her own use of it. Her Storm would eventually turn into pure fire, and she intended to drop a bit on the wooden flooring here to aid muddying the trails.

"Shit…"

"What?"

Scruffy twitched violently, whirling around then flattening himself to the wall when he realized how many people were crowded around him. His wide eyes flicked from person to person until he reached her, then while nervously fingering the stone in his hand gave her a grim twitch of his face.

It might have been a try for a smile, but it failed horribly.

"There's... uh, rebar. In the way, I mean." Still fiddling, the man cast around desperately until it reached the smoke curling in lazily from the other hall. Flinching, his eyes skipped to the cells then whipped around to the one she had opened. "Can! Um... can you do...?"

...someone save her from stupid civilians. "Does that not work on metal?"

"Not... not well, no."

Risk Vindice attention and finish breaking them all out, or leave them all to die even if she wanted to know what Scruffy Sun was doing with that stone?

Sonya twitched, swore viciously under her breath, and stalked forward as the remainder of the prisoners scattered out of her way. As irritable and impatient as she was, her Storm gouged deep into the concrete and made a sticky mess of the steel rods reinforcing the walls. With an ear splitting crack, she managed to wrench the hole the Sun had painstakingly carved out in near enough one piece.

With how she angled things, their fellows managed to dart on through before Scruffy could since she had to put down the slab of torn wall somewhere and passed it in front of him first.

Which really only meant the two of them weren't the ones the guards outside opened fire on.

Sonya had expected it, given the amount of time that had passed, Scruffy hadn't. His horrified forward lunge ended up short when the Russian gripped his greasy beard and yanked him around gently. "Enough of them will escape to make it worth it. Ignore it."

"But! But they weren't-! They didn't do anything!"

"In a country like this, they existed. Sometimes, that is all it takes." Pushing the stick of a man forward, away from the hole they had made, she bodily blocked him from following after the rest. "Now shut up. I need to concentrate."

Another toss of Storm Flames blocked the hole to both prevent Scruffy from trying to get by her again as well as anyone from trying to enter to ensure everything was cleared out. Then Sonya turned her speculation to the flooring.

Sierra Leone had an underground rail system and if she had any luck at all, that would be what she'd break into. If bad luck was all she had, the sewers. If she had none at all, she'd be stuck carving a hole through dirt all the way to the coast.

Depending on which direction she went in, at least.

Her Storm might be controlled, after years upon years of trying, but she really never did figure out how much of it she could use before exhausting herself. Burning through the ground for any amount of distance would be hard, especially as smoke continued to creep into the cell block they were in. When she broke through to whatever she might hit, it would even make the fire behind them worse.

"Right... stay behind me and for fuck's sake, do not be stupid."

Scruffy didn't have time to question her, or even do more than blink as she regained his attention. Sonya planted a hand on the floor and willed.
With the volume of dirt in the way, this was going to take a while. She lost her sandals, and a large chunk of fabric from her skirt, but eventually ended up with a six-foot-deep hole.

Hoisting herself out, she probably rudely pushed Scruffy into it and snagged hold of the plug of concrete and rebar she ripped out of the wall.

Slipping back into the hole she made was a tight fit with another body however scrawny he was, and in the sudden dark he seemed to have a panic attack. When she lit up her hands with Storm Flames, the Sun snagged a desperate hold on her.

Sonya did not appreciate that. "Let go."

The close quarters were just something she had to deal with, but she heartily disliked people touching her.

"You… you could've done this before." All she was really concerned with was him releasing her, which he did with suitable speed.

"I could have." There was no sound to Disintegration, not here.

When she cut into the bottom of a boat the water would hiss the longer she was at it, but dirt gave away without even a whisper.

The heat, on the other hand, made her wish she hadn't discarded her last two bottles of water. Uncomfortably warm seemed to be the theme of her entire visit here.

Scruffy shuffled slightly behind her, now that she was working on opening up more room for them. "Why didn't you?"

Sonya pressed further after checking to ensure she wasn't angled downward, even if that was hard to check in the red light her Flames gave off. "Because there are things that scare even me, and had I done so I would be in a massive violation of certain things and bring me to the attention of those I would rather be ignored by."

She might still be in violation. The Vindice might just be waiting for more room to arrest her, meaning the moment they got out of the underground she would end up arrested again. This time without the possibility of breaking herself out.

Pleasant thoughts.

How far did she have to go?

The holding cells had been part of a corner affair jail/police station, and while the part they had been held within had be at the back of the ugly building it was still close to a street.

Gritting her teeth against the strain calling up so much Storm was giving her, she paused for a break after a musty chunk of time she was assuming amounted to fifteen minutes and punched the dirt a few times. A faint and muffled tinkle of pottery and brick informed her it was likely there was a sewer closer than she thought.

Fantastic.

Sonya hauled back and punched the wall of dirt in front of her again, busting out a masonry wall of brickwork into the nasty sewage system. Scruffy choked on the loose dirt that flew backwards, then gagged as the smell hit him.
She didn't really see why he was so offended, he smelt worse.

A pause was in order, because she had popped blisters on her feet and she really wanted nothing to do with this next part. There was at least lighter than the murky dark lit by Storm Flames, from the grates dotted here and there.

It seemed to also serve as a storm drain.

"So now what?" Asked Scruffy nasally, pinching his nose against the reek of sewer water. "Are you going to kill me?"

"For?" It would be way too much work for her, dragging him along. If she had wanted him dead she would've let him run off like an idiot into a firing line. "I am going to get you to a doctor, then you are on your own."

Ripping off strips of her ruined skirt and removing the remains of the sandals, Sonya wrapped them around the worst of her blisters in hopes of keeping them clean. It was a faint hope, especially since they had to go a ways in order to not be obviously escapees.

"Why?"

"I would like to know what kind of stone that is." Doctor Kappel had also wanted more Flame users to study, so she was pretty sure the man wouldn't mind fixing the Sun's health in the process.

Sonya ended up in a mini-skirt. She needed new clothes, some halfway decent shoes, and a bath. Hopefully the next contract her Lackey was to give her had a bit of time free between to enable that, or she was going to irritate the hell out of an entire plane's worth of people.

"It's a diamond."

She froze, then swore viciously. "No, no I do not believe that. We never got a diamond to work for any Flame user."

"…Flame what?"

Dmitriy had burned himself on one, though. Was it just effort needed, or was there something wrong with the stones they had tried?

The thief swiped the rock in question from his fist easily enough, examining it closely even as the Sun swore himself and tried grabbing it back. It was a raw gem, vaguely pyramid in shape. The long tip was broken, leaving a jagged edge she was pretty sure the man had used in his attempts to cut into a concrete wall.

Did rough work better than cut stones?

Galina would know now, after another month of work there should be enough data to make or discard more theories. Sonya absently gave the rock back, scowling as she considered the implications.

Were they wrong yet again?

"Well… I suppose it's safe to say you were arrested for stealing." Scruffy snapped at her irritably.

No, she wasn't. "I was arrested for buying a hat."

There was a long pause. "Really?"
"As far as I am aware, yes."

"...you do know someone murdered the usurped Prime Minister before he could retake office, right?" At her blank blink, the man scuffed his own rag wrapped feet against the dirt they were loitering within. "That's why they're rounding up the people out early enough to be possible suspects."

Well... that made more sense. She wondered who did it, it couldn't be someone else from Mafia Land because they did ensure these kinds of crossovers didn't happen. "How do you know that?"

"I speak Krio."

The local language, Sonya assumed. He probably got the details from the few of their more informed cellmates before they got themselves killed. "Good for you. We should... probably go."
Scruffy cleaned up pretty nicely, for someone that looked like a skeleton with paper thin skin stretched over his bones.

"-which is odd, when you think about it. They're an independent state, have been since sixty-five. But this is the second time the elections have been ever held, and the last time around the Prime Minister was only in office for minutes before he got… uh, ousted. Then the military ran the country, up until they tried giving the man a chance again. And now he's dead… huh. Wonder why they deposed him only to try giving it back before killing him? They'll probably go back to being a military state, for now."

Sonya pretty much ignored the man and his ramblings, pouring an expensive as hell bottle of rubbing alcohol into a tin pie pan. Shoving her blistered and only newly cleaned feet into said tin burned, but at least informed the Russian that this was probably direly needed.

She had Propagated herself a copy of Scruffy's shoes before she could bring herself to take one step into the Freetown sewers, and much to her relief her Cloud Flame copies were immune to her Storm Flames.

Some wandering down rancid tunnels, a bit of stashing her new Dying Will Flame foundling in a trash strewn side street, did a bit of pickpocketing practice to net her some more petty cash, and finished off her morning with a mugging of a cop to reacquire the rest of her luggage. She then had herself sorted out enough to find and rent them a hotel room and direct her foundling to it through a backdoor in order to keep him mostly inconspicuous.

Björn had found her by that point, trading off their contracts and appointing himself her gopher for cleaning supplies and food after suspiciously glaring at Scruffy Sun man.

The place wasn't anything too impressive, it was at least somewhat clean and neat. Bare walls painted a rather garish pale blue-green, brown comforters on the beds, and a similarly colored carpet she was almost as suspicious of as the sewers under Freetown.

The selling point was the bathroom, which held an actual tub and not just the sink and toilet combo.

The man she had rescued was probably in some kind of shock as he went about like a robot in her wake to clean himself, but he did trail off his verbal diarrhea after a while.

"You… could have done this for anyone."

"Possibly." Since that was actually directed to her rather than at the thief admitted to it blandly, watching the streams of little bubbles rising from the liquid she had her feet in. "I probably would not have bothered, personally."

Not that she didn't appreciate the info dump on what had gone on in-country, but it was about to be a moot point. This was a country she didn't want to do semi-regular heists within, but she had quite a list of those at this point.

Scruffy had shaved off his scraggily beard and clean shaven suited him better than the chin hair had. It didn't magically make him less gaunt or soften the sharp jut of bone under his skin, but he did now look less like any decent crazy person would appear.
Small wonder, really.

His current preoccupation was trying to cut his own hair, long and thin fingers plucking a clump of knotted dirty blond strands as he hacked off the greater lengths into something more manageable. Pausing in what likely was the first grooming session of however many years, Scruffy peered over at her suspiciously. "Why not?"

"Why should I?"

"It's the right thing to do!"

"For who?" Sonya snapped back, lifting one foot to inspect how bad the popped blisters were now. A few had cracked through her skin, meaning they were technically blood blisters. Thank the gods for Storm Flames, they had probably prevented her from getting some kind of blood borne pathogens seeping into her bloodstream. "Nothing ever gets done in countries without a large amount of people dying. For whatever cause or not."

Paranoid was going to be her watchword for the next month. She wondered what kind of tests Tatiana could do for her, and if it would help anything at all to try being tested.

"What? But… those people, they would be alive."

Slipping her right foot back into the pan of alcohol, the Russian gave him a flat stare. He had given up on cutting his hair, but half of the top layer was sticking up from how he cut it and that left him with a kind of cross between an afro and a mullet. It was… rather stupid looking.

"…those are people that took the opening we made and ran for it without so much as looking backwards." She started off slowly, wondering if the man was mentally deficient or what.

Scruffy ran a hand through the ragged hair her still had, only for his fingers to get tangled up in the unholy mass of curled knots he had yet to get to. "You can't blame them for that. They were only doing what was best for them."

"And their best was apparently running out into a firing line."

"You could have stopped them! You stopped me!"

"I could have." Sonya admitted again flatly. "Did not, though."

The man's thin chest heaved as he took in a silent breath. He seemed to count to some arbitrary number, then blew out the held breath. "Why."

"Why did I not stop them, or why did I stop you?"

"Both… please."

The Russian pulled her left foot out of the disinfecting bath, examining the rate of bubbling the remaining liquid was doing even as she reached for her medical supplies and the towel destined to be turned into rags to dry the limb off. "Various reasons. They were only concerned with their own survival, so I left them to it. If they failed or not matters little to me, besides the fact their death might motivate the locals into doing something about this situation. You, on the other hand, had something I was interested in."

"…my diamond?"
"No, but I will admit that is interesting." She also kind of wondered how he managed to keep the damn thing on him, her strip search had been irritatingly through. That, probably, was an answer she could go her whole life without knowing. "The yellow stuff. Your Flame."

Scruffy flat out glowered at her for a long moment. "That's the second time you've said that. Flame, what flame?"

"You are a user of Dying Will Flames of the Sun. Defy death a few times, and it tends to pop out." She informed him blandly, wrapping her heel up in sterile medical bandages before pulling on a sock to ensure nothing would slip on her. "If you are anything else besides Sun, it's too soon for me to tell."

A hand was held up between them the moment she was done with that, lighting up with a flair of violet and red as her willpower burned. Both at the same time had been something she had spent long hours combining, if only in hopes of reacquiring her tri-colored flame start.

"I am a user of Dying Will Flames of Cloud and Storm." Locking eyes with the gaunt man over a palm full of her own Flames, the thief's lips twisted as she took in his wide eyes.

Alas, she still had no Sun.

"You're… I thought… it can be red and purple?"

"As well as blue, green, orange, and violet." Sonya clarified with a shrug, carefully pulling on her left boot from her luggage she nearly lost to Freetown's police. Leaving her things in beachside lockers didn't help when she got arrested and an officer was sent to pick up the rest of her few traveling possessions. "Rain, Lightning, Sky, and Mist."

"…you can make copies of things with that light and burn other things until they're gone." Scruffy stated slowly as he tried to understand what she was telling him. "I… can… make a laser with an uncut diamond?"

"I have done that with Storm Flames before. The ability of Cloud is Propagation, Storm is Disintegration. Suns are Activation." Pulling her right foot out of her makeshift disinfection tub, she started cleaning and bandaging that as well so she could finally get a move on. "If you are really that interested, Björn can direct you to a book and another Sun user."

The man blinked, examining her closely. "You're not going to…?"

"To what? This is a parting of the ways. You are going somewhere for medical aid, as well as an educational brief you likely would die without getting regarding those pretty yellow Flames of yours. I have other things to do."

Sonya pulled her other sock on just as carefully as she had done to her other foot, then stamped her boot on.

She was never ever going around in anything other than these boots ever again. Even if that would mean she'd have to have a new pair every damn year. At least not without actually breaking in a pair of whatever other shoes she wanted to wear.

"My Lackey will ensure you reach a hospital and set you up for anything you would need to return home."

"What? No--! Lady, you saved me. Take responsibility." Scruffy didn't even flinch when her eyes narrowed, he just glared back. "I have no home. You just pulled me out of… well, no. Actually, I got my own ass mostly out of the worst… but you \textit{did} save me in the end."

"I saved you out of pure curiosity. It is sated now, you are useless to me."

Skeletal Sun user man scrambled around his discarded prison rags on the floor of the bathroom hurriedly as she started packing her own stuff back up in order to enable her leaving.

"THIS!" Scruffy whirled around before she got to dealing with her pan of rubbing alcohol, shoving the rough bit of jewel in her face. "You said I did something that 'we' never managed. Which means there are more of you. Like you and me. I can… I can study that, help you figure it out. I have a degree in engineering."

…how the hell had he ended up in Sierra Leone's Freetown then?

Looking like some kind of prisoner of war?

Sonya stared at the man. "Geology would be more useful."

"I can learn that too. I actually-" He glanced down at 'his diamond', looking entirely disgusted and a bit insane as he glowered hatefully at the lump of compressed carbon. "I… actually spent about five years, learning a bit of the diamond trade. Before."

There was a twitchy gesture, aimed at the dinky little window of the rather dumpy hotel she had wrangled a room with a bathroom from a very suspicious proprietor.

"I have no use for diamonds, but \textit{IF} I take you on," the thief started slowly, suspiciously, "you will be expected to catch up. Quickly. And find yourself something to do, because I do not tolerate lazy people leeching off me."

She had no time to learn herself, Tatiana had too much on her plate as it was, and Galina was more a secretary than a scholar. Gedeon might have the smarts but would probably not have the drive for years. Ziven probably wasn't sticking around for long, Dmitriy was in prison and not useful. Bjørn could, if she asked him too, but she was planning on dumping finance and investment training on him first.

Scruffy gave her a hard look, dropping the hand gripping his bit of uncut diamond to his side. "Lady, I think you're possibly psychotic and a little too cold to be human. Frankly, given what I think you are, not surprised. But you know what's going on, with this 'flame' business. And seem to know what to do, even when arrested and stripped of just about anything useful. I'd rather be on your side."

"I have been called worse than just 'cold' before." Sonya informed him flatly, stooping to snatch her pie tins to dump the liquid down the drain. "And to be completely honest, the only reason you are still standing is because you currently have \textit{inhuman} stamina."

"…what?"

She gave him a look over her shoulder, the gaping expression made her feel better about the whole damn thing. "Your Sun Flames are the only thing keeping you upright, anyone else would have collapsed long ago. How else do you explain why you look like a skeleton with skin and yet still be able to stay awake for more than five hours without eating?"

By the time she had dealt with her medical disinfectant and the tin, Bjørn had returned with the variety of fruit juices and the easy breakfast food she had asked of him.

Her Lightning Storm Lackey was also instructing Scruffy not to scarf down the liquid like a dying man. "If you keep guzzling it all down, your belly will pop."

The Icelandic teen helpfully mimed his own stomach exploding to help the Sun figure out that he should slow down before he killed himself.

"Lackey, take him to Doctor Kappel. Tell him he's a baby Sun, and if he gets him to a healthy state I'll pay the medical fees. Set him up with one of the copies of my book while he's there until I can get to him." Snagging a few of the Cassava bread loaves from his shopping, the Russian also grabbed her complete luggage set and her next heist contract. "Tell Galina I am sorry but got slightly arrested."

Björn looked slightly wide-eyed at he stared at her. "Dama, how does one become 'slightly arrested'?

"By not staying arrested. My parents are going to be so disappointed in me for not hanging around a little." She took one last look as Skeletal and Scruffy and Sunny, then gave the teen a hard look. "He so much as twitches wrong towards you, have him killed."

(Thursday the 13th of March, 1969. São Paulo, Federative Republic of Brazil.)

Côte d'Ivoire, the Ivory Coast, wasn't much better than Sierra Leone.

Just a tiny bit more south.

It was at least a hell of a lot less headache inducing of a country, the local government had been in power for a long while now and wasn't at risk of instant destabilization if another enterprising assassin managed to kill another political leader on her.

This particular contract was more civilian-oriented, she was stealing a thesis from one of the professors of the University of Abidjan-Cocody. One of the boring contracts, mostly.

Sonya barely stopped for a full day, merely waited around the large campus until the professor of whatever got tired and turned in for the night before stealing her mark, calling Björn in the early hours of morning for the details of her next contract, and taking the next flight out.

Brazil was newer of a situation for her.

The government, which was another military one but one she expected, was splintering up under what she was pretty sure was sabotage. Outside or inside was the question, but the Russian merely made note of it and decided this was another country she wasn't sticking around in for long.

She didn't speak Portuguese anyways.

Interestingly enough, she would be contributing to the on-going sabotage according to the paperwork her Lightning Storm Lackey brought to her as she ate breakfast. The beachside café was cute in a picturesque way, but the creeps and coffee weren't exactly filling.

Sonya liked the palm trees though, they were suitably different enough from the African versions to be worth a stare or two.

"Dama? The Sunny man? He is not... exactly healthy. The doctor isn't happy with you."

"He didn't die between now and then, did he?"
"...no?"

She glanced up at the teen over the paperwork she was reading. "Then what's the issue?"

"He is... too skinny." Insisted the Icelandic Lightning Storm, playing with his food instead of eating it. At her dirty look he shoveled a bite into his mouth and tried looking innocent. "Doctor said he would need weeks of careful watching before he can be... let go."

"Released." The thief corrected his French absently, turning her attention back to figuring out where she had to go. "Doctor has until the end of the month to get him to a state my sister can take over from."

Sonya really had only one doctor she would conform for. 'Doctor' was a decently vague way to reference Kappel when not in Mafia Land. She didn't know what if anything the German was avoiding or would rather hide from, and frankly she didn't care.

"You can stay in my hotel room for a bit or go back to the island but bring me back another contract tomorrow. I don't want you wandering around this country just yet. Too hot."

Björn accepted that with a shrug.

Since she was vaguely sure this country was also heavily into torture, even if she couldn't recall against what or for why but could guess pretty damn well, and she didn't want to do another jailbreak the thief would rather her more vulnerable asset got out as quick as he could. His movements were his own though, so warning him would do for now.

...she was going to need a camera for this next bit. Taking pictures of the documents in question would be less risky than trying to take the papers themselves or make copies on-site.

Especially from within a military base that had close ties to both the US and Britain.

"I will be very annoyed if Scruffy Sun has to become my next Lackey, especially if it's due to some civilian reason. He would probably be terrible at it, and I'm used to you."

It earned her a smirk from the teen. "I will be careful, Dama."

---

(Friday the 21st of March, 1969. Mexico City, United Mexican States.)

After Brazil, two contracts one of which was industrial sabotage picture taking and the other a robbery of a politician's home for some suitably shiny trinket, her next target was Bogotá in Columbia.

Aside feeling rather thankful she was no longer in sub-Saharan regions, the temperature was still as bad for a girl from the frozen north. She made a mental note to inform her Lackey that contracts in near equator countries during the swing into summer were not ones she liked very much.

She found it a bit bemusing it was just as vegetated as the Ivory Coast, if only a lot higher in elevation. Which did nothing for the humidity, not quite as miserable and salty but still sticky and pervasive.

Other side of the Amazon in terms of an actual mountain plateau and not borderline scrublands, and the first time Sonya dipped back into the local underworld since leaving Italy.

There was a bit of relief in the fact she only had to deal with the urban jungle and not the actual jungle again. Less shelter from the sun, but less insects and less wildlife she had to maneuver around as well.

This government didn't seemed any more stable than the rest of Africa or South America, but because the mafia hangouts were pretty much the only place to get halfway decent information it was still not somewhere she wanted to linger about. She had to go through two pawn shops before finding a rather rickety underground bar affair that seemed less like a criminal watering hole and more of an army one before the initial hostility to her mere presence tapered off.

Asking around there carried less risk than chancing asking an unknown member of whatever anti-political guerrilla faction about some detail and getting violently or quietly removed for the mere act. Within the underworld, at least whichever faction would admit to it before you asked possibly life-threatening questions.

Sonya found it all rather tedious if possibly murderous, a terrible combination. She made liberal and heavy use of her inability to become drunk anymore to drink several heavily armed members of the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia—Ejército del Pueblo under the badly made makeshift table for her needed information.

The FARC–EP at least didn't give her dirty looks for having the bone structure of a Russian.

This was another semi-boring but at least interesting because it was bizarre kind of contract, she was stealing a soccer trophy. Football in this corner of the world… but she kept thinking of it as soccer anyways.

The trophy she was after was the División Mayor del Fútbol Profesional Colombiano original, and ambivalent to sports as a whole or not she didn't even breath a word of that to the guerrilla soldiers she pumped for 'where not to step unless you wanted to be pumped full of hot lead' information.

Sport fans were nuts, in the worst ways.

To take up the empty hours before she could go to work, she shopped around a small bit in the tourist traps to replace some of her more ragged clothing and a few odds and ends. More medical supplies mainly, because if she didn't have that fully stocked Tatiana would bitch at her until she was blue in the face.

There was an interesting little crafts section, within which she picked Shamal up a little retro and tribal looking bobble headed lizard/turtle thing made out of wood and string.

The weird bulbous trophy she was actually after had actually semi-decent security on it, which took her two tries to break into without tripping. She hid the thing into a massive shipment of Colombian coffee beans, wondering if Renato liked soccer/football at all.

Skipping several countries Bjorn couldn't line up quick and dirty contract for left Sonya in Guadalajara, Mexico. Siemens Mesoamerica held an industrial complex on the outer reaches of the city, not nearly as big as the one in Mexico City by all reports but a decently large one nonetheless.

This contract was on behalf of the Mafia Land hospital, which made her take due care in what she was acquiring if only to not hear about it from her sister for years. Buying medical equipment from the very place she intended to rob a backup generator from probably wasn't a very smart plan, as a matter of fact it was a very bad one according to all the lectures Arseniy and Lisa had given her over the years.

However, the place was large enough to require internal maps for their own workers. A lone thief with little to no familiarity of how the inside layout worked meant Sonya had little to no idea and little time to acquire it.

As Bogotá was a very high city compared to seaside port towns and Guadalajara wasn't much better in that respect, the Storm-Cloud had to take an entirely unexpected full day just to counter altitude sickness. At least, she dearly hoped it was altitude sickness and not something else.

Another three days were needed to arrange the purchase of medical lab equipment and paraphernalia, and two for customs to look it over her legal shipment before giving her their stamp of approval.

During that time, she learned that 'generator' was a very broad term. They came in sizes from tabletop affairs useful only for a handful of lights to two-story monsters that could create enough electricity to run New York's Times Square. Her paperwork called for nothing but 'a backup generator for the hospital for use during times of conflict'.

Meaning either the docs wanted the hospital's power to be on its own grid when idiots invaded the island, or the internal affairs people wanted to ensure if they ever had to treat someone really important the power couldn't be cut and take someone on life support off it on demand.

Sonya, since she used that hospital, fully agreed with the idea. The issue was she didn't know how much space the hospital had for a backup generator.

As she was trying to get through as many contracts as she could in a month, she also didn't have the time to ask and get the answer back through whatever agency was in charge of Mafia Land's hospital or just the island's acquisitions department or related sections in general.

She was going to steal three. A two-story affair, a room sized one, and one that fell in-between the two. Then she was going to write a nasty note to whoever would take possession of them about being specific and saving her time and effort.

Given the sizes of the objects in question, disassembled or not, she placed a bogus order for pickup in order to have it pre-assembled for shipping for her. A few pesos to a beggar prevented her voice from being recognized, and a few more got him drunk enough he likely wouldn't recall what she had asked of him in return for the liquor.

Then she had to skip back to Mexico City because Siemens Mesoamerica had the order available there and not in Guadalajara. If she had wanted it assembled where she was, it would take another week.

Sonya then did the nasty thing, as in the night before the beggar man was supposed to pick up his shipment she went in and stole not only the damn parts but a few extras and a bloody truck to get it all back to Guadalajara. Mexico City wasn't quite as foreign underworld friendly, and she had started the arrangements for a completely illegal airlift for the shipment already before learning about the location issues.

Systematically taking out the guards on an industrial complex's loading bay was easier than it should be, spaced too far apart and with too few check-in points, but since they were civilians she wasn't really going to complain that much. Altering documents that would get her pulled over by the Mexican highway patrol took her longer, as well as fudging the paperwork on her acquired shipment to muddy the trail. Hopefully enough she could get out of the country before the discrepancy was noticed.

On her way out of the security office she only belatedly realized they had a close circuit security recording going on and did a bit of on-the-spot arson in the recording room.
The thief also found out, very quickly, that driving a full diesel big rig with an attached trailer was a lot different than a van or any commercial car. She also wasn't very good at it, unless the streets were more or less straight. The only bright spot was that it was an automatic transmission, and she had started out on mostly deserted roads.

Resigned to the fact she was probably going to end up pulled over, as she didn't know anything about driving the damn thing, she aimed the lumbering beast of a truck in the direction of Guadalajara and hoped she could at least get an hour or two of the possibly three-hour trip done before anything nasty happened.

Before she got out of the capital city of Mexico, she spotted the train yards and tried very hard not to Disintegrate the steering wheel she was clutching. If she couldn't get the truck out of the city without massive amounts of luck, she could probably have it shipped for her instead.

With a dubious amount of legality, but it was less risky all around.

She had dealt with ports more than train lines and airlines, but the basics were the same. She was going to have to rely on bribery more than prior shady connections, and if she was really unlucky a murder or two.

Maybe she could trade the big rig?

It was hot, and a little damaged from a sideswipe or two plus a dent in the grill from where she ran over a sign, but still a very large truck.

(Saturday the 22nd of March, 1969. Agua Caliente Touristic Complex, Tijuana, Free and Sovereign State of Baja California, United Mexican States.)

Her last heist for the month, having lost a good week in Mexico already and unwilling to overshoot that badly, was in Tijuana.

It was also where something she only fuzzily recalled from Rachel's time horribly clashing with her reality now.

The Agua Caliente Touristic Complex was something she knew had been shut down long before the 1960s, and yet it was still in operation in front of Sonya now. In a past-life-future-dream it had been notorious for a lot of things, more notably Hollywood movie stars and just as much for American mob involvement if for worse reasons. There had been a crackdown on gambling due to some government official, and the high profiled guests dried up in response until the place shut down.

Yet… it was the end of April in 1969 and the complex was still open. It was a lot of things; hotel, spa, dog-track, racetrack, private airport, golf course, and gambling casino. Apparently popular as a retreat and a vacation still, crawling with people she could peg as both security guards and mobsters mixing freely with the high-society slumming it.

The Russian checked her paperwork again, even if she had the moment she landed here, and pressed her lips into a flat line. She was required to go in there for her last contract.

Turning on her heel, she left the area to prepare.

To start with, she picked herself out a long-sleeved cocktail dress in red from the local shopping mall with all the accessories she would need. Since she had expected a working-class month and not a high society one, she didn't have anything like that on her at the moment.
A room at a hotel across the city was another must, rather pricey for the better security but she could change there and fall back to it later if things turned sour.

The thief wasn't sure if she expected things to go sour, but as it was a possibility she was preparing for it anyways.

Her blisters from Freetown had healed up well enough, but she still put on stockings against current fashions to prevent the newer skin from tearing open or getting more blisters and covered it mostly up with her usual boots. Taking out the bulk of her weaponry she secreted more than enough to actually be a 'walking arsenal of jewelry weapons' without the obvious chains of them wrapped around her bicep.

Last time she did one of these 'present yourself to acquire the details' contracts the Chinese Triads had tried to acquire her later. She didn't really hold high hopes of avoiding that again.

A magnetic bracelet she had found in the city allowed her at least one of each type of weapon for one wrist, the charm bracelet of axes she had repaired by a local jeweler went on another. Her blond hair was put up into a bun with a Bec de Corbin, a few more were set in a purse with a couple hair ties and the bare minimum of makeup she could get away with wearing.

Leaving behind her luggage, she had paid for a week but better not really need that, the Russian retraced her steps back to the Agua Caliente.

Since she didn't know the place, nor did she particularly wish to be shot either now or at the end of this contract, she went right up to the white stucco bell tower that seemed to work as a gatehouse and handed her Mafia Land paperwork and ID to the nearest guard. The skeptical look she got was ignored, as was the hushed conversation via radio, and she only stepped forward when the same guard waved a car going down the drive to stop and gestured her forward.

A short stint in the backseat, and the driver took her right up to the racetrack clubhouse. After he opened her door, she followed him into the building.

He had taken her paperwork from the guard, and she didn't intend to lose sight of her ID or the contract.

Three stories up lead to the roof of the clubhouse, and what she supposed was a fantastic view of the track. The gentleman her loosely termed 'guide' was bringing her to barely so much as twitched as the sheaf of paper and the laminated card were placed on his café table.

"Do you like the races, señorita?" Asked the likely Spanish descendant with the typical tanned skin, black hair, and equally dark eyes.

"Not particularly."

The man, somewhere in his thirties and dressed to the nines in a light tan suit, glanced over at her distractedly. "No? Pity. Do you mind if I keep this? For… validation, I assure you."

"I do mind." Sonya informed him flatly, since he was fingering her Mafia Land ID. "We are… heavily encouraged to keep track of such things. Personally."

Looking neither surprised nor irritated, he drew a pen out of his breast pocket and noted down her ID number on the ticket stubs she was somewhat sure he received when placing bets of his own. "I am Emmanuel Rodrigo Vásquez, señorita. May I have your name?"

"…Salina Buhari." Her fake passport was still set for a French woman to visit Africa, she had yet to switch it out for a new fake. The ID Mafia Land issued held no names, merely a number and a picture, so the skeptical look he shot the thing netted him no conflicting information.

"Vásquez!" Someone behind Sonya called out as she snatched her ID out of the air as the man lazily flicked it in her direction. "You rogue, keeping all the pretty ladies to yourself."

The new man was easily over fifty and rather portly with a similar ancestry of something Latino, yet again in a well-tailored suit but he had his greying hair slicked back and had a very puffy mustache that was only salt and pepper in coloring. He and her possibly temporary boss looked nothing alike, except for the shape of their eyes.

Cousins, the thief hesitantly assumed. Possibly a great uncle.

"My dear," she had to suppress the desire to rip her arm out of the new man's hands when he grabbed her elbow, "if you're looking for some entertainment I would be glad to help you out. If racing isn't what you fancy, there is a simply delightful spa on the other side-"

"Hermano, ella es agente de la Agencia."

"Si, si. I am-"

Old and pushy was suddenly yanked to a halt by his grip on her arm when Sonya planted her feet and refused to move under his direction. She gave him a flat glare in return for his handling of her person. "Let. Go."

"Señorita, it would be churlish-" He cut himself off that time, as she allowed her eyes to flash red. Better to appear to be only a Storm than a Cloud, given the reactions she had experienced to date for each.

It did get the man to let her go with all due haste, if seemingly alarmed his possible relation still seated.

"A change in venue, I think." Vásquez abruptly declared, pocketing one of the tickets he had in his hands and tossing the rest to the table he was seated at.

Standing he wasn't much taller than old and grabby, and she privately admitted he cut a poor figure against someone like Renato.

Also, she could smell his cologne from where she stood not three feet away. Combined with his possible family relation's own eye-watering amount, it made her eyes itch and her nose sting.

At least the hitman's cologne never made her want to sneeze, even if that was still too strong for her when in his personal space.

Having rounded the little café table and placed himself between the thief and his… whatever, her possibly likely temporary boss flicked a wary look down her form. "…just… follow me, por favor."

Sonya gave a short nod, that bit of Spanish she did know.

After this, she was going to restrict her movements to countries where she spoke a local language. The two of them could have an entire conversation she wouldn't be able to understand over her head, and that did concern her a little.
Long winded story short, the owner and manager of Agua Caliente wanted an auction house added to the Tijuana resort. Vásquez had been in talks with one from San Diego, but the owner of that establishment got tempted away over to Mexicali.

It was mostly farms and food production over there, but also located below the border between Phoenix and San Diego. Said owner apparently decided that the revenue could be improved by weekly antique auctions for those more local and monthly weekend ones for their high-end clientele.

As to why a Mafia Land thief was brought in, Sonya was to steal one of the once a month auction items before it was actually auctioned off but after it had been displayed and verified as genuine. Vásquez promised a bonus if she got something bigger than a pocket-sized item, but also wouldn't pay anything if she got caught.

The objective of her contract was to scare the target into seeking protection from a well-established complex, not prove that their security was more than enough.

The thief was also encouraged to make use of the resort while she was there, with heavy emphasis on the gambling hall and the two racetracks. She wasn't much of a gambler, so all she did do was make use of the spa's salon to have her hair cut back to a mid-neck length.

Vásquez did not know what display procedures the auction house she was targeting had, did know what was up for auction, didn't know what kind of security they would have in place, but did have some knowledge of where and when.

She was... less than impressed with him.

Of course, the last time she did something like this it had been for the Triads so that might have been why she had more resources to work with then.

Leigh’s Auction House wasn't an overly classy affair during the week, but the invite her temporary boss had gotten for the ritzier night did have a dress code to attend. Sonya had to buy another dress, this time with matching heels, just to get in the door the night of the auction.

A few mostly superficial checks for their seemingly standard operating procedures during the less hyped week, and then the Russian used Vásquez's invitation to gain her entrance in order to scope out what was up to be sold.

"Señor Vásquez did not wish to leave you with an empty seat at your first auction of this caliber, as that would have been greatly rude of him." The petite blond assured the man who had fussed over the invitation she had handed over. "However, he is also unfortunately committed to a business meeting he could not get out of. As my company handles acquisitions for various entities all across the world, he gave the invitation over to me to see if we would be interested in frequenting your establishment when the more... tricky to acquire items are found."

"That is greatly generous of Señor Vásquez." The man who had yet to introduce himself commented quietly as he showed her to a seat. "Considering we did not accept his invitation to set up in his resort."

"There is time, you may want to expand in future years and so he intends for your relations with him to stay good." Sonya gave him a small smile, the most she could manage without it coming off as fake or plastic. "I will not be staying the whole night, merely long enough to understand what kind of history and value the lots tend to be. If something is interesting enough, or I know of someone who would like an item or two, I might bid myself."

She actually had more than enough money to buy something legally, cash given by her temporary boss even. Depressingly, it looked to be jewelry at most out of the first few lots. At least if she bought it she wouldn't have to steal it later.

The usher, she guessed, raised an eyebrow at her probably dirty look to the items on display for the beginning of the auction. "…our more valuable items will not be displayed until much later in the night, señorita."

Vásquez did have some useful information for her, and in particular was a crash course on how auctions worked and were normally laid out. Sonya gave the man a very purposely fake smile. "The gap between what you and I consider less valuable will tell me much about what difference there is between what we think is more. I will stay at least until midnight, but not much longer if I do not need to."

She would be stealing something from the very last lots, after all. Best to leave hours before anything happens.

It wasn't perfect, even if her temp boss promised her an alibi for the hours after the agreed leaving time, but she had little information to work with in the planning and this was the first auction house she would be robbing.

Digging out a rather battered notepad out of her very shiny purse, and letting the man hovering at her elbow catch sight of the various denominations of money she kept on her, the Russian flipped through the mess of shorthand notes she kept track of her legal shipping details and attached receipts in.

The fact that most of those 'legal' shipments held a few illegal bits in them wasn't the point.

Establishing that she seemed to be what she claimed to the man was the point. A lot of money, foreign receipts for large numbers, the fact the pocket-sized booklet was almost full of rambling letters and numbers, all of it was just props to establish her 'credibility'.

Similar to the way she could go from a pair of trousers and a blouse to a snug dress and heels and imply she wasn't a working-class girl but a high society one slumming a bit. She had the 'air' of one trained into her over her second go at being a child, and Lisa's directions for implying or suggesting without the crass action of drawing attention to such details was still something she remembered.

Sonya had little idea what separated 'classy' from 'trashy', it all seemed to be behavior oriented and she wasn't naturally inclined to that sort of thing anyways. She also didn't have to know, as long as someone else did and could instruct her.

Her foster mother had declared she could do 'icy snob' very well, anyways. It seemed to work the best for her.

Noting down the maxed out line of business credit she had with Mafia Land's bank as her max limit for the evening and the island's 'wish list' items she had only updated almost a month ago on a clean sheet of notepaper took her only a few more moments. Enough time for the man that ushered her to her seat to make up his mind if he believed her or not.

If the glass of champagne he pressed on her was any measure, he bought the whole line.

Ironically, it was true if you looked at it from a less than legal perspective.
He was civilian, he could be excused for thinking her a small wildcat and not a full-fledged tiger.

Sonya settled in to be bored out of her skull for the most part.

At the end of the night, when she came back to ensure they panicked over their security arrangements, the thief no longer felt bored. She felt rather cheap, especially since she ended up stealing a Ming dynasty vase out of everything she could have grabbed.

It was the more 'obviously' expensive piece, and decently sized enough to make her bonus.

What she was going to do with said vessel of near-ancient clay was a good question. She couldn't leave it behind, nor did she really want to hawk something so damn pricey on her own.

…maybe Lisa could do with a new flower vase.

(Monday the 24th of March, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

"I cannot believe you some days." Tatiana informed her little sister exasperatedly.

"It's a piece of pottery. What else would I do with it?" Sonya even helpfully gestured to the 'it' in question, sitting oh so innocently on the table between the sisters.

A genuine Ming Dynasty vase. A tall white one with blue patterns of birds, bamboo leaves, and two Chinese dragons circling the base. She had seen some of those bulbous vases for sale before, so she knew what it was and how much they were generally priced as.

Something the redhead Sun using nurse believed to be almost priceless, and yet the other woman was planning on gifting it to their foster mother for her birthday. To display cut flowers in.

It fit right into their current setting, the condo was a rather bland affair with really pricey junk left all over it.

Tatiana couldn't wait until they got their own apartment and could not only decorate as they wanted but paint the walls.

"Not just that, Nya." She ignored the weird look for hacking the blond thief's name up in a not-obviously Russian way, plastering a hand over her face to try and hide the smirk. "I mean this entire month. The sheer insanity of what you get up to…"

"…what?"

"There's the gaunt skeletal Sun in the hospital Doctor Kappel is having a blast poking and prodding that you sent him, the three generators you sent the hospital when they really only commissioned you for one? I know you did that, that note was in your handwriting and it's your sense of ill-humor all over the situation. Now… I love you, I really do. But little sister, you are a few sheets shy of a full stack if the only thing of note you think happened is a few hours of being arrested and a new flower vase."

The look that said little sister sent her way informed the elder Russian that she believed herself still rather sane. "Tats, I love you too and all, but you're weird."

She wasn't the one intending to use a vase easily worth more than half a million rubles as a flower vase.
Tatiana could not get over that.

"The hospital would like the thief that did the contract to know they only wanted the room-sized generator. The other two were a bit over the top."

"The hospital should then be more specific." Sonya groused irritably, arms crossed defensively before her unlike how she would hold herself if anyone else said something about it to her. "Since the only thing they gave me was 'an emergency generator', they should be happy I guessed right and sell the other two."

"I'll pass it on." The elder Russian promised the younger, flouncing over to sit on the couch with her. "Now, my turn. A couple things happened back home you should be aware of before walking into it."

"Oh?"

"Mmm... something a bit important happened, and it will affect you." If at all possible, Tatiana didn't want to be the one to tell Sonya what was going on back home.

Yes, her baby sis was a very well controlled Cloud. That really only meant that her breaking point had yet to be found, and from her fits of temper before escaping the situation for two full months...

"Arseniy got attacked."

There was a very long moment of silence, as something violent and purple flashed in the younger thief's normally grey eyes. "...what."

"You remember the visit from the Novgorod Brotherhood?" Only when the blonde nodded sharply did the redhead continue. "The vor they sent to talk to you didn't return to his territory after he talked to you. It was kind of bad that first month you were out, until some wise ass finally decided to double check the prisons between our headquarters and theirs. That wretch got his ass arrested but hadn't been able to get word to his fellows."

"Tats, that's nice and all... but Arseniy deals with training. He's normally in secured territory or running little would-be-hopefuls through a milk run or two. He rarely gets more than that."

"I healed him." It earned her absolutely nothing. "It was pretty damn minor, all things considered."

"All what things?"

Nope, not going there. "Point being, Nya, things are a little... tense. Lisa's not happy someone almost got her man and baby's daddy, Arseniy's not happy something failed and got through to where he was running the baby vor through their paces, heck even Lina's not happy."

"...so, not that I don't appreciate a heads up, why tell me this now?"

Tatiana probably shouldn't have finished that statement in her head with 'and not when I can throw a hammer at the assholes'. Frankly, the nurse would be entirely too happy to hear Sonya had murdered the entirety of the Novgorod Brotherhood with a hammer. "Gedeon managed a... cease-fire."

"Will wonders never cease."

"Oh hush. He's not incompetent." The truly skeptical look that earned her made the Sun smile, but it really shouldn't have. Their Pakhan's son wasn't stupid, just less practiced and maybe a bit too rigid still. "What I wanted to warn you of, is that you are kind of a large part of that."
The completely blank look on the Storm-Cloud's face was probably not a good sign. "I was what now? How?"

"There are fifty Dying Will Flame users that we know of now in the Soviet Union. Technically forty-eight, but not the point. One of them was a Cloud."

"…was."

"Was." Tatiana confirmed slowly. "He... went out with a bang, to say the least. The kid, Dorokhov was his name, took out the Khimki Ring by his lonesome. Do you remember them?"

Sonya blinked at her a few times as she tried to place the syndicate in question. They shared a border territory with the Zolotovs, so there was more than enough interaction for the younger thief to at least recall who they were.

"The smugglers? The ones north of us?"

"Yeah, the entire building they used as a warehouse slash base ended up collapsed on top of all of them. Killing everyone there including the Cloud kid. Then a pair of twins ended up burning themselves alive using what's reported to be Storm Flames out in Yekaterinburg. Did you know that was possible?"

"I heard rumors but didn't really know if it was or not."

"Well," the nurse continued in a markedly less depressing tone, "the point is that they know fully understand what it means to have a Cloud and some of what it means to be a Storm. That kid was untrained, what you called feral, and completely new to his Flames. And took out a syndicate trying to box him in to recruit. Then there's you, fully trained with that burn alive ability and ghosting about the Zolotov clan."

"...so, they know what I am now?" Sonya tried to clarify.

"They did before, in an entirely abstract kind of way. You carved up a bit of the forest here, Nya, and bitch smacked that one clerk. Rumors got back to the other vory, but they probably discounted a lot of it since it's outside information and kind of inhuman even for Flame users. Rumors and folktales. Then they got a report of that one kid from their own people who can go see it easily enough and recalled what rumor reported you did in a fit of temper. Both here and back home."

She still didn't really understand either, Tatiana could just tell. As far as her little sister was concerned, she hadn't changed a bit so the reactions to her shouldn't either.

One of those kinds of situations where her social incompetence was more frustrating than amusing.

"Gedeon used that uncertainty and fear to arrest any more violence to our clan. Which is a good temporary fix, but the 'threat' of you isn't going to stay static. If you don't somehow prove to all and sundry that you are a murderously violent bitch, we're going to lose a lot of face and probably a lot of clout against the other vory."

Sonya's features went an icy blank. "But I'm not."

"I know you're not. So do our foster parents, Cherep, Lina, Ziven, and everyone else important. However, they might ask you to."

The Sun had a very bad feeling about the ice she could still see in her little sister's expression.
"I got eight heists done out of the twenty plus I need." The abrupt change in topic jarred the nurse a little, and the younger thief kept going before she could redirect the conversation back to where it had been. "One or two more two-month stints, and we can get that apartment for us all. If my Lackey and I can keep up the same rate. I got a bit tripped up twice and he had issues lining them up, but another goes or so and we'll have worked out the kinks."

Well... way make your older sister feel like a bitch, Sonya.

Tatiana rubbed her forehead tiredly, yanking one of the couches' pillows out from behind her to clutch and kneed in worry. "As soon as I get my probably illegal medical practitioner license you can scale back Nya, but that's not for a few more years yet."

"I don't mind the work, Tats."

Of course she wouldn't, because she could be nauseatingly sweet sometimes.

"...why are you calling me Nya?"

"I had a little Japanese girl for a patient a week ago. Who shared with me her manga about a cat."

Sonya gave her a blank look, one thankfully without the ice. "And?"

"You kind of act like a ditzy cat. I'm calling it like I see it."

"...thanks ever so much for that."

"Welcome!" Tatiana chirruped back to her gleefully. "Now, what do you want done about Peter?"

"Who?"

"The Sun man your Lackey brought into the hospital for Doctor Kappel? The guy's mostly set, he could leave at any time. He just needs his supplements as we try to counteract his brittle bones and some of the other health risks he flirted with when he got skinny enough to do substitution duty for a skeleton model."

The younger thief huffed softly. "He's calling himself Peter?"

"It's not his name, terrible liar. But it's something."

"I call him Scruffy."

Snorting, because she could totally see her little sister doing that for the rest of the man's natural life, the nurse gave her couch mate a smile. "Scruffy then. He's good to go, but Doctor Kappel will want quarterly checkups as he progresses as a Sun. More if possible."

"Keep him for another week or two, then send him to me with Bjørn." Sonya instructed slightly absently as she nibbled on her lower lip. "Actually Tats... wait until the worst blows over, I'll call you when it does, then send him on with my Lackey. I'll send you a white sapphire for Scruffy to start on with, so Kappel can have the first control exercises to inspect. If the good Doctor wants more visits, then he needs to make more appointments. I'll still pay."

"The Doctor will be ever so delighted to hear it." Announced the Sun user.

"Speaking of," the younger sibling announced as she got to her feet, "I need you to test my blood for any tropical diseases. I know I was inoculated against a lot of them, but given the places I went through..."
"You want me to check to be sure?"

"Please."

(Wednesday the 26th of March, 1969. Moscow School #3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...you'd think I would learn about leaving you in charge."

"Then maybe you should stop leaving me behind." Galina announced wickedly, shuffling some of the paperwork on her clipboard.

"Galina?"

"Yes, Sonya?"

"It's a school."

"Yes, yes it is."

The Lightning had purchased the entire property using the leftover funds she had after selling the higher quality gems in order to buy the lesser semi-precious ones. Getting it refurbished required the aid of a few other Flame users pooling their powers together to generate the cash… and a few other things she was still genuinely surprised about.

The yet to be opened Moscow School #3054 was a nice four-story brickwork affair on the outskirts of the Zolotov's territory, close enough to encompass the neighborhood they grew up in and yet still far enough away that they could provide their own security without drawing attention to the kids' homes. At least, that had been her intent until the nastiness of the Khimki situation blew up in everyone's face.

A lot of things changed priority after that, some of which had yet to be fully dealt with.

She slotted a glance to another of those Cloud Flame users and wondered the sheer amount of destruction the tiny blonde could cause if given enough reason to.

"Did you have a childhood dream of becoming a school matron or something?" The thief in question wondered aloud as she finally let them into the building.

Ziven tried really hard not to snort at the question, but the smirk on his face had been there ever since he had been sent to pick up the Storm-Cloud and betrayed his feelings on the situation. The vor leaned his frame up against the school's gates, content to wait until the two of them were done at the building.

Galina sniffed in mock offense even as she followed her fellow Flame user, her heels making a rather nice clicking noise on the polished tile flooring. "No. Lisa has agreed to teach a home EC class and history, I will be doing mathematics, Irinei agreed to teach grammar and literature. I was hoping you would consent to do art and the girl's side of physical education, Ziven the boys. Tatiana will be the school nurse when she has the time. And Gedeon will overlook it all with Arseniy and do criminal lectures jointly until Dmitriy is back. A few more here and there, and we will shift things around when one or more of us leave to do other things, but for now...?"

"I might have a science teacher for you. Not too sure about him just yet." Sonya admitted slowly, peering into a classroom on alternating sides of the hallway they were going down. "Why though,
"Why keep it all apart? Our Flame users can then rub elbows with their contemporaries instead of being segregated, make the connections and earn favors while the non-Flame users learn what not to do around them or how useful one or two might be for their own aims." Taking the lead, the Lightning lead her superior down a different hallway to where the basement of the building was. "Also, it takes the place of the homeschooling efforts that is becoming harder for your parents to handle without civilian scrutiny. Aleksandr also donated the weaponry he no longer teaches others to use for our own training hall, which is now mixed with the Flame practice hall."

The Storm-Cloud easily followed her down a flight of stairs, wandering into the mostly barren but well-lit sub-basement level arranged to be a few different things all at once. One wall was covered in mirrors and held a barre for ballet classes, the mid-east wall had the mats and equipment for gymnastics. Opposite of that held a row of the donated training weapons set under the bank of windows, and the far end held seven different stations for Flame lessons spaced equally apart from one another.

Wandering to the middle of the cavernous room, Sonya glanced at each wall in turn. "So... what am I not seeing yet?"

"There's a hidden room behind the Flame stations," Galina admitted readily enough, "in there we'll test Flame users and possible stones. But everything really expensive is back there with the sharp weapons and the lock is very... tricky."

The thief probably would've found it in time if they had the opportunity to let her loose to poke around on her own. They would do that later, because as much as they stripped the place to the bare bones and built it back up to what they needed there was nothing like a professional picking everything over to get to any possible hiding place.

"Galina, would you please just tell me why."

"It has to do with the Flame related deaths news that made the rounds and I'm sure Tatiana told you about."

She didn't look remotely surprised, merely expectant.

"I actually started it from your plans to provide a place for Flame users and also ease the work your foster parents do." The Lightning was pretty sure the Storm-Cloud hadn't intended for her to find the idly made plans for a legal criminal school she doodled up out of boredom one day in between stacks of paperwork. Purely a mental exercise of hers to try figuring out if it was possible or not. "Then things happened, and we got a lot of ill-trained Flame users tossed our way. Just shy of twenty from that, nearly ten on our own end, plus the thirty we already had. You said it would get worse, and so I wanted to be on top of that before it became so."

The expectant look didn't falter, but the younger woman looked more contemplative. "No one is going to trust us with their Flame users for any decent amount of time. We could train them to be hostile to their 'sponsoring' syndicate or other such similar things."

"Exactly." Galina admitted shortly. "Which means, in the long run, the teachers we end up with will be cut loose from their syndicates. A few of those 'other' teachers and the staff we need are coming in from the outside of our clan, until we have a nice even mix of various syndicates represented. If you are one of those teachers...?"

"...can I be the librarian instead?" Sonya asked a little tiredly, rubbing the back of her neck."I'll teach Flame use and applications, which I suppose is an elective kind of thing."

Noting that down, and highly aware what she just said could constitute as betrayal of their syndicate, the Lightning moved on with her end of this affair. "I do not wish to see you go like the Khimki kid. I don't think anyone really does. When it happened, this was the best way I could ensure you wouldn't."

"They will not let me go, Galina."

Possibly not, especially since the Soviet Union was waking up to what Flame users were capable of. Especially her type.

"This will keep you out of the Zolotov headquarters most days."

With a sigh, the thief retraced her steps back to the other Russian. "Good enough, I suppose. I'll still have to check in twice a week or so."

Galina intended to ensure this would work no matter the pessimistic outlook of her ticket out of here. This Cloud self-destructing like those others would be a sight she wanted to be spared from and would do their clan some serious harm.

"…what kind of books do we have now, anyways?"

She was also pretty sure having said Storm-Cloud as the school's librarian might be its own anchor. The thief was obsessed with her books. "I'll draw up an inventory list of what we have so far."

"Did Fong ever swing by? I was kind of expecting him to show up enough for you to say something by now."

Almost missing a step of the stairs, the Lightning shot her boss' back a strange look. "Who?"

"Chinese Triad member, expert martial artist. Storm, one stronger than me. The man's irritatingly stubborn, but I did tell him to come here if what he wanted to talk to me about was that damn important."

"Not that I am aware of." Galina admitted slowly. "Is he the one Tatiana refers to as 'Tasty Muscles'?"

"Yes. I suppose he might have been waiting for me to leave Mafia Land first. So, he might show up in the next week or so."
Galina peered over her shoulder as she dumped the box holding a dead Arcobaleno's things out on Dmitriy's desk.

"What is that?"

"Something I've been meaning to get to for a while now." Sonya replied absently, shifting the Cellophane wrapping off various parts of a likely three-hundred-year-old keepsake box and its contents.

Lisa must have gotten suspicious of the possible mold or mildew contamination to wrap it all in the plastic film.

"Do you have nothing else to do but hover at my elbow?"

"No, not really." Was the utterly unapologetic answer from the brunette lurking at her back. "The stone testing is in the final phases. The bulk of the information has been sorted. Awaiting the very last entries then a comprehensive look over. Gedeon is off doing his father's bidding, your Lackey is elsewhere, Ziven's at the school overseeing the finishing touches, and Dmitriy's prison has a visiting hour almost ready for you."

The thief's classical or middle French was nowhere near as good as her spoken modern, because even with a language as refined or widely used as French there were linguistic shifts to account for. Furthermore… she was trying to read a run-on sentence. Probably.

…maybe the long-dead Storm just had atrocious handwriting.

The tinier ink spots might have faded too much for her to read with the naked eye. It was possible the written French rules had changed in a century or two and it would've been correct in another time.

She also needed to brush up on her French, given she couldn't really figure that one out.

Discarding the heavily rusted plate with the engraved 'la tourmente' back into the box it spilled out of and sweeping of the moldering flakes of various pages after checking to see if she could read any of it, the petite Russian eyed what was left.

A few pages with water damage, a few more without but that held very faded ink, a picture she might or might not be able to have recovered depending on what kind of paper it was on, and…

…a carving of a naked lady in some kind of hard green tinged yellow-white material that wasn't cool, dense, or heavy enough to be soapstone or marble. Curious.

There was a hastily muffled snicker, and Galina pulled away slightly. Biting her upper lip so her smirk wasn't as obvious.

She failed massively.

"Sonya, I respect you. I do. But… why is there a statuette of a half-naked woman on the desk?"
"Because it was in the box I just emptied out on said desk." The Lightning had even watched her do so, the inane question was less than appreciated. "Galina, I'm going to need a few sheets of blank paper, two pieces of transparent glass big enough to hold a single sheet between, and a clean journal. Please."

Possibly even a French to Russian dictionary, but Sonya would fetch one later if need be.

Getting a clean copy of the mess would be more important first. Finding a Middle French to modern Cyrillic dictionary would be the trick.

"Right... I'll just leave you alone with the... little lady, then." The brunette flashed the only other woman in the room a wicked smirk, stalking off to acquire the items asked for.

Placing the so called 'little lady' back into the box she fell out of, the thief poked the remaining pages with the capped end of a fountain pen. Judging them to be impressively sturdy for paper nearly three hundred years old, she then considered her hands.

She knew in a vague fuzzy way that the oil from her fingertips would ruin the pages if she just ran them all over the sheets at will. How she knew that was probably a Rachel thing, but the question was what to do about it.

Lisa had probably used gloves or pinched the very edges to wrap it all up, the papers had been all together in their little plastic pocket.

Discarding the capped pen, she wouldn't need it until the Lightning got back with the glass and tracing paper she needed to make a clean copy to try translating, Sonya dug around Dimity's desk a little to see what else there was to poke while she waited.

Not necessarily for her self-appointed assistant, a few members of their clan might suddenly recall they were also criminals of various skills too. One or two of them might even have the balls to try talking to her sometime today.

Sonya wasn't going to hold her breath for that.

Having been warned made it slightly less jarring. Slightly. Since it had been the exact shit she had been trying to avoid by being the world's least violent prone Classic Cloud user, it was all still depressing.

Before they could care less about her or what she may or may not be, and now...

It was very easy to see who all believed her to be similar to the dead Cloud and Storm kids and who were still skeptical yet, there was an increase of those that would stare at her and those that would back away at her passing.

Sonya herself had a passing curiosity about the mechanics of the rumors, did the young Cloud employ a bullshtited inhuman strength like her or did he Propagate whatever he could reach and end up expanding the warehouses' supports only to suddenly cut it off and cause it to collapse?

If she couldn't get more than two words out to her fellow clansmen for any reason, she'd never really know unless she sent Galina out for it.

That was a nasty habit she was trying not to rely on. Bjorn and his fellow Lightning made it all too easy to fall into the rut of leaning on them to do her busy work. She was getting rather partial to Lightnings, sans the weird defective one Nono Vongola had as a Guardian. Lady Vongola's she didn't think she met yet, and Tyr hadn't seemed to have any Guardians, so Sonya didn't know if she was partial to just Inverted or mixed Lightnings or what.

"So… you are back."

"Do not sound so excited, Gedeon. Someone might think improper thoughts about the enthusiasm you show me." Coming up with nothing interesting in the desk's drawers, she opted to inspect the newly arrived Sun instead. "Did you need something? Or did you just want to tell me why you used me like a threat to other syndicates?"

Her Pahkan's son regarded her for a long moment, then either with extreme arrogance or just from knowing she wasn't going to suddenly flip her shit and murder him messily the man took a seat across from her. "I didn't sell out any of your Flame shit."

"No, instead you just sold out a Flame user." Honestly, she really couldn't decide if that was better or worse. "So, before I hear about it from anyone else… how the hell did my father get injured two months ago?"

"There's no guarantee they knew who he was, or what he was to you." Gedeon countered easily, still inspecting her closely. "That being said… he is pretty well known around our slice of Moscow. Might have just been because he was Zolotov, and not for anything else."

Sonya gave the Sun a supremely unconvinced look across the desk separating them.

Apparently well aware how flimsy that disavowal of intent was, the still mostly newish Flame user but still experienced vor changed the topic but not the subject. "It was just to the Novgorod Brotherhood, who we could say you have legitimate issues with."

"They are the ones that got close to Arseniy?"

Instead of snap something else off just as quick, which he had opened his mouth to do, he gave her another of those considering stares and obviously amended what he was going to say. "…I don't think I'm going to answer that just yet."

"…you grew a spine at the worst possible moment." Sonya ignored the faintly insulted look on the man, contemplating her options for finding out what she wanted to know.

Lisa might tell her or might not. Her foster father may or may not take her interest in the subject the wrong way, or the really right way. She didn't know what they would risk telling her, nor what she might just end up doing with that information.

The thief didn't know, and perversely it made her want to know if only to have a good idea of what she was fully willing to do to such a group.

Tapping an entirely random pattern out on the desktop, she glanced back up at the Sun. "How far have you gotten with your Flames so far?"

"Not very," Gedeon extended a hand, which flickered momentarily with yellow fire, "best I can do."

"Compared to what?" Sonya went the long way around her Flames, focusing on the combat ability to the exclusion of all else, and it took her near a year to get a concentrated Flame going. "You're doing surprisingly well, although we do finally know the better methods for others. Or rather we went the wrong way and you got a shortcut."

Tatiana method, maybe?
She didn't really know what he got up to outside her realm of 'expertise'. He probably still did his father's bidding more often than not, so she also had no idea how much time the vor could put into learning.

"Do you have a stone?"

At her question he placed a pitch-black gem on the desk, and at first the Storm-Cloud thought it was a piece of jet. Obsidian maybe.

Until she picked it up and it sparked under her own Flames in a very familiar way.

"Spinel?"

"Not as fancy as the ones you use. But yes." Replied the Sun, flicking a glance to one of the heavily edited notebooks she had yet to actually crack open. "We found that spinel works pretty well for most anyone. The colorless types are synthetic, so until we can produce or grow them ourselves... topaz has the next highest 'all' compatibility. A certain kind of jade, one of the garnet types, feldspar works like shit but is workable even if it's not 'pretty'. The best for a clear picture of what kind of Flames one has is still white sapphire."

Sonya found that one out on a whim, thinking more of her tri-colored start and the subsequent inability to pull it out again at the time rather than a foolproof way to find the exact Flame type of new users. "Topaz, huh?"

She wasn't really that surprised to know one of her old 'Cloud' stones wasn't really a Cloud-only stone but a very easy to use one. It was possible she'd never notice it could work for another until they started cracking more than working as intended and she discarded them for a more stable type. Subsequent testing for others would have highlighted the same thing eventually.

"Depends on the coloring, but yes." Gedeon confirmed slowly, still apparently more focused on whatever in his head than her. "There are a few more, again rubies and sapphires work for most everyone but are way too temperamental to just fork over. A few others have very odd reactions to one or two types of Flames but will work for others with minimal issues."

"And we still have no idea why?"

The vor gave her question a dismissive shrug. "Empirical testing has its benefits, but also drawbacks."

Giving the same pile of paperwork waiting for her a dirty look, the thief curled her legs up under her in Dmitriy's office chair. She wondered if the Rain would notice if she stole it from him if she replaced it with something else.

Probably not, it was another year at most before the man got himself sprung from jail even with good behavior. Since it was a Soviet Union prison, and a Mafiya member in question, it was likely the sentence wasn't even half done yet.

"I'll look it over with my geology books later. Did anyone get a diamond to work for them?"

"...no? We didn't even test diamonds, the work the three of you did two years ago said they were non-responsive."

Sonya pursed her lips, giving the Sun across from her a long look of her own. "I found a Sun in Sierra Leone's Freetown. He used a diamond as a makeshift laser focus."
Blinking at her, the Sun scowled. "Galina sold the bulk of the diamonds you sent in. They didn't even fetch very much."

"Of course they didn't. Diamonds aren't actually all that rare, it's just a cartel of diamond mine owners restrict how many they sell to artificially inflate prices." With a shrug, the thief left the desk to see where in the Rain's office bookcase were her gemology and geology books. "There are a few left, right?"

"Yes?"

"Good, I want that Sun to see what he makes of it." She tossed him the piece of black gemstone she had almost forgotten about, reading the titles of the books on display. If more than half of them were actual books and not fake blanks with fancy titles, she'd eat her own Flame research journal.

"...you are less of a bitch right now."

Snorting, the thief pulled down the books Tatiana had stolen and then gifted to her after their second joint jewelry store heist. "I am less stressed out and have been promised more books. The break... was also rather appreciated. I don't actually do very well lingering in the same place for very long or talking to people. I get restless."

Gedeon merely watched her as she dumped the heavy tomes on top of the processed results for the Zolotov Flame testing experiment. "Less stressed?"

"I am not a social person. When I have to be, and be on my best behavior? Teach someone that doesn't wish to learn? As well as guard the brats we're still teaching from outside attention they might or might not be able to deal with? Forced to help some idiotic asshole who had no idea what he was playing with attempt to 'catch' another like me?"

His expression was flat, she almost found that impressive.

"Then of course I was used as a figurehead to publish a book behind, which held at least three or four years' worth of research into the Dying Will Flame phenomena and how it might be utilized. Without my say so, and only an afterthought given for what I would think of it."

"Not quite done bitching about that, then."

Sonya gave the vor an entirely unimpressed stare. "No, I'm not."

"I still don't believe it's all that important. Three 'users' just got themselves killed on their own Flames. If that won't cull your supposed 'hundred' down to a manageable size-"

"Four, but you're entitled to your own opinion." She interrupted him shortly. "I'm still entitled to think you're a moron. Speaking of, we're going to have some international visitors soon. All of them, and I do mean all my guests, are Flame users."

"Wait, WHAT?"

"Sit down." Sonya only continued when he did so, not remotely in the mood to be yelled at even if he technically was a superior to her. "Fong, a Chinese Triad Storm. Who is better than me, and that idiotic Storm male here isn't strong enough to hold a candle to me either so he will not aid you if you insult him. Renato's a freelance hitman from Italy, a Sun stronger than all of the Sun users here put together. Both of them are associates of mine, and while I would normally do this in Mafia Land... I cannot do so if I am here."
"This is because father brushed you off about taking me there, isn't it?" Gedeon questioned rather roughly, appearing highly suspicious for a moment.

Right on up until she snorted. "The world does not revolve around you. They are coming here for other reasons than for you to embarrass yourself to. Fong has an offer he was rather insistent I listen to, but I did not have time to then so he's coming here to get heard. Renato's coming for a different reason."

"And the third?" The older Sun had his mouth still open to continue with whatever it was he was going to say, but very abruptly cut himself off and eyed her suspiciously.

"The third one you do not need to concern yourself with. I will have that handled separately."

"…right." Shifting backwards in the chair he claimed for himself, her Pahkan's son all but fidgeted in place.

Sonya took the opportunity to ignore him, examining by look alone the sheets of cracked and water damaged papers she wanted to read.

If she couldn't translate them by herself, she wasn't sure how to go about getting herself a professionally translated copy. It potentially held some information on the mafia, on the Arcobalenos, or possibly just international criminal activities of the early 1700s.

Which, unless she wanted to murder the people she might hire for such a thing, ruled any civilian institution out.

She might possibly be able to find a student or professor somewhere that studied Middle French to help her translate the trickier bits, but that would be only rarely relied upon if needed. No reason to give them more than enough to understand what the papers were about if it was that sensitive.

Galina swept back into the office as efficiently as she had left it, two panes of glass in her arms and a sheaf of blank paper resting on top of it. "Oh good, you're here. Sonya, the things you asked for. Is there anything else?"

She was kind of certain the Lightning was getting her kicks by needling Gedeon somehow but wasn't exactly sure why or how.

As long as she stayed busy and useful, Sonya also didn't really give a damn.

"I would like to visit the Khimki location." The thief made an absent gesture to the north facing wall, behind the Sun. "Where yet another of my fellow Clouds bit the dust."

"Why?" From the confused expression on Galina's face, she couldn't see a reason for her to want to visit a collapsed warehouse.

"I have... a few questions about the incident."

Cherep defied death itself and ended up with an inhuman recovery time for any and all injuries. Even lethal ones.

Sonya… likely defied the possibility of being unable to fight back and allow their continued survival, so she ended up with an inhuman strength far beyond her frame suggested. Then bent it to continue being armed even when most were not.

What the hell did this other kid defy, that enabled him to bring down a structure on top of himself and his attackers?

(Friday the 28th of March, 1969. Khimki, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Ziven didn't actually mind being Galina's busy-man, since he opted out of orders being dictated to like any other undirected Zolotov vor in favor of keeping the remains of their gang mostly in one place until their leader got out of jail.

Seeing Tatiana again was always a bonus, and her little sister was unused to having others enough to not take advantage of it.

He also wasn't entirely certain of the 'Lightning' jumping ship so quick, but again she hadn't been arrested for a few years and things did and could change during that kind of time.

Sonya's entirely bemused expression when he arrived to either drive her around Moscow or handle the trickier bits she asked for was pretty amusing as well.

"I tend to forget about you, mostly." The lone thief commented in a completely bland tone of voice when he said so to her face. "You're just... there. Sometimes I'll try to think of something for you to do and end up doing it myself."

Snickering at the irked expression on Galina's face for that blunt comment, the hand-to-hand combat specialist shut the door he had opened for her once Sonya had cleared the car. "I'll just hang about here, alright?"

It was probably prudent to keep someone with the vehicle, this wasn't a good part of town.

Docksides of any major port weren't without significant effort by security or law enforcement, and although the city of Khimki wasn't quite on the same part of the Moskva river system the Zolotov territory within Moscow was... it was similar enough to make someone that stayed in their territory or left it frequently forget that.

The clan's only Cloud was in and out of the country so much he was pretty sure she'd be just as cautious in their home territory as out of it, which made the absent nod to show she heard him entirely expected.

Galina waffled a bit, torn between following their fellow thief as she wandered closer to the destroyed warehouse or hanging back with him. She eventually settled on remaining where she was, when some of the rubble beneath Sonya's sturdy boots slid out from under her.

The brunette could keep her balance well enough, just like the other woman out there with them who easily compensated for the shift, but he also understood why she stayed where she was.

The Lightning wore heels most days.

Ziven turned his attention to their temporary underboss, wondering what she expected this to answer for her.

It wasn't quite snowing just yet, but it was still as cold as fuck and everything had a generous layer of fresh powder snow from the night before. What little that remained of the smuggler's warehouse had been first cleaned up by their few surviving members, then picked over by the local petty criminals, and then the KGB took what was left.

Sonya suddenly kicked over an entire massive slab of concrete with as much effort as he would use to bat away a pesky insect. Ziven ended up staring at the several hundred pounds of artificial stone as he tried to mesh that act and the lithe blonde woman who didn't remotely look like a physically powerful individual.

He still didn't understand the Cloud-thing, and not from a lack of trying. The entirety of the Dying Will Flames thing confused him still, and he had more experience than most seemed to have with the users of it.

The Lightning had even tried to help him learn, but as of yet he had no sparks of his own. Not even using the sapphires the entire group seemed highly wary of.

Sonya herself would probably have to take a look at him and try to help.

However, Ziven had the suspicion he just wasn't able to use the skill.

There wasn't really much left to see at the warehouse, Sonya eventually wandered back after shifting a few more pieces of building around. Looking slightly contemplative, the thief looked at her taller brunette. "Galina, who has the kid?"

She blinked at the woman. "You mean his body?"

"The KGB might have it." Was his offer.

By Sonya's expression, they might not have understood her comment as well as they thought.

She hummed slightly, turning back to look at the collapsed building for a moment before looking at Ziven. "I would hope not, otherwise someone's going to have to break into their offices and see about springing that and whatever notes they might have on the…"

He didn't even have to ask, he heard the same thing she did that made her trail off.

Someone rattled some chain.

Queerly, the thief's expression had blanched with more alarm than the vor thought the possibility of being overheard warranted, which made him suspicious that this was another Flame thing he didn't quite understand. One Galina also shared his incomprehension with by her expression of bewilderment.

Whipping around, Sonya scanned their surroundings intently. One hand slid behind her back, and in full view of her fellow Zolotovs a full sized Bec de Corbin shimmered into existence in licks of lavender Flame.

That weapon she brought out in front of her in a movement Ziven almost couldn't keep up with, and the shaft of the polearm was brought up between the Storm-Cloud's person and a length of sharpened rebar that nearly impaled her.

"Stay. There." She barked at him before he could fully raise the small pistol he never went anywhere without.

Galina laid a hand on the car itself, making it spark and shimmer with her own green Flames even as she shifted around it to put the origin point of the makeshift lance between the car and her. Ziven belatedly recalled Lightning equated 'Harden' and rounded the bonnet to join her.
Sonya didn’t wait to see if they followed her directions or not, the most she lingered for was another attack. She smacked it out of the air, yet another repurposed length of steel sharpened at one end, then practically launched herself to where whoever was throwing them was likely at.

Ziven glanced at the two makeshift projectiles, which had embedded themselves into the asphalt of the road, then to the woman he was taking shelter with. "Did you know she could do that?"

Galina only glanced to the place Sonya had been before, which was suspiciously devoid of any snow unlike the rest of the paved area, before going back to watching where their leader headed to with due speed. "I don't think Sonya even knows everything she's capable of, it's part of why she's so annoyed with the Four Rains."

"Did you tell her-"

"I don't think she'll be interested until it resolves itself either way."

She would know better than he would, and if not the crazily over-powered thief would be annoyed at her secretary more than him. Ziven was surprisingly okay with that thought.

They had only a few more moments of being unable to see or tell what was going on, one kid scrambled out of the far warehouse Sonya had made for being pursued by said thief.

Teenager, Ziven corrected himself as he mostly left the dubious shelter of the half a ton hunk of metal in order to see better. The teen was decent, from what the vor could see, but not remotely a match for the thief.

Much to his benefit, Sonya wasn't looking to take his head off for attacking her anymore. As a matter of fact, she looked pretty satisfied even as she used that unreal polearm she favored so since childhood to pin the brat to the street.

"So… I take it you are the Khimki Cloud." She wrenched the club swung at her head out of the boy's hand, still inspecting her find.

"I thought he was dead?" Galina wondered aloud, still keeping the car between herself and the two 'Clouds'.

"That's the problem with relying on second or third hand information." Sonya absently tossed the makeshift weapon she had confiscated behind her, pressing down on her Bec de Corbin in order to prevent the scuffed up and bruised teen from being able to pry himself loose. Not without removing a leg, at least. "I'm not really surprised he survived whatever it was he did."

There was a beat of silence, where the vor figured that the Zolotov Storm-Cloud would probably know a lot better than they did what a Cloud could survive or not.

"It's a pity we can't take him back with us." The thief continued, attracting the rapt attention of the others.

Ziven blinked, looked between the confused women. "Why can't we?"

Galina looked as stumped as he did, which told him waiting to ask wouldn't help him any.

"He and I would end up trying to kill each other. Holding back so I didn't grievously injure him was hard enough." She flicked a glance to him, mostly to see if that answered his question or not and if she could go back to studying the teenager. "Kid, I am the Cloud whose territory borders yours on the southern end. As far as the greater Mafiya knows, you're dead."
The scrappy bit of a teen hesitated, still glaring and near spitting mad but at least he had the brains to listen even as irate as he was.

"You can keep it that way as long as you like. I certainly won't tell anyone otherwise." Sonya continued in the same matter-of-fact tone of voice. "I'll send Galina back here tomorrow, the brunette, with a book you might need to understand why it is you heartily loathe me even if we don't know each other."

Until their fellow thief pointed it out, it seemed the teen hadn't cottoned on to why he had attacked her and only her. Especially since there was three of them, and frankly Ziven looked more of a threat at first glance than the shortest woman there.

That confusion replaced the hostility, mostly at least.

Yanking her weapon out of the ground, and the teen's ratty clothing, the elder Cloud pointedly let her weapon go and kept her empty hands in full view. Seeing it clatter to the ground then immolate itself in techno colored fire seemed to buy Sonya more goodwill than telling the kid that those who had hunted after him thought he was dead.

The vor didn't buy that suggestion of unarmed peacefulness she was trying to project. She hadn't been obviously armed before when she got into the car, he was pretty sure she could still summon a sledgehammer out of nothing again.

"However, Galina is mine. You harm her, and I will come back and kill you." That also bought her more attention, although why that threat would work when the woman practically knocked him out of his cover and pinned him to the ground didn't Ziven wasn't sure of.

"Fine." The teen with lurid bruises spat at the blonde, warily picking himself up out of the snow. "What else."

"Only a few things. There will be another syndicate that will come here, to take advantage of the 'empty' territory or to make use of the waterway. Either get on top of that, and make it your syndicate, or avoid it entirely. I will expect you to find the other Clouds bordering your territory and sort them out as I am doing for you." Sonya considered the spiky haired brat in tattered rags for a long moment. "Lastly, avoid the KGB. I do not want to try stealing or destroying information they might have, and if you make me I will either kill you or ensure that anything you ever touched is erased."

Said teen, a bluish-green haired brat with black eyes and a thin frame which suggested he wasn't from a middle-class or higher family situation, sneered again. "Get out."

"You are a decade too late to try ordering me about." She snapped back, then visibly arrested her forward movement to smack the ungrateful little snot. "They know your name. I am going to forget this ever happened, and if we meet again I will be the last thing you ever see."

With a huff, the teen barely gave her a nod and stalked off. Sonya similarly ignored him, striding back over to where Ziven had parked with a forcibly blank expression. "Let's go."

Still confused, mostly over why the thief was letting another of her Dying Will Flame users go without dragging him back to be fully educated, the vor opened the door for the girls. "Why-?"

"Not now."

Galina only waited for as long as it took for Ziven to get them back on the highway to return to their headquarters. "Now?"
Sighing heavily, Sonya glanced at her rather than the warehouses they were passing. "Clouds do not coexist very well. Arseniy, Cherep, Valera and I are different. We're heavily socialized with each other and two of us aren't active users. That kid was as feral a Cloud as you can get and mostly high off his activation still. Had we been forced to closer quarters, I would have murdered him. I'd rather not, really."

"Really?"

Ziven's startled question netted him a glance from the thief through the rearview mirror.

"...it's one of the few things those stories got right actually. I wanted to kill the kid, for making me think of the Vindice then attacking me and putting Galina at risk. At first, I was even going to murder him first and figure out what the hell second until I realized what was going on." She did not sound very happy about it. "I had thought... no, I'm just odd, Cherep's the opposite of a Classical Cloud as can be, and the Guardian Clouds I've met had mitigating influences. Damn."

Screw sound like, Sonya was both visibly and obviously unhappy over the thoughts in her head.

He didn't know the woman could pout at anything.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 28th of March, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya was entirely unsurprised Fong was waiting for her the very moment she got back.

Feeling slightly frustrated and sickened as she finally got a good grasp on instincts that nearly made her kill some scrawny brat of a Cloud sight-unseen, she merely offered the Chinese Storm a nod of recognition. "Is it really all that important?"

"Not for a few more months yet, no. I had a thought that you might like a warning, before I put in for the actual contract." His red eyes flicked over the bemused vor eyeing him and her in turn. "Should we not speak in Russian?"

Grimacing as she realized she didn't know if Ziven or Galina spoke English, she risked a look at the two following her into the Zolotov headquarters. "Probably, but it is kind of a habit. Ziven, Galina, this is Fong of the Wo Hop To Triad."

Good thing she double-checked which Triad he belonged to before being needed to introduce him and get corrected.

Ziven, who had been tailing her around probably out of a lack for anything else to do, merely blinked. Galina, who had actually known the man was going to be visiting, gave a tight smile in return for the bow of greeting the Storm gave as he was introduced. "I think I'll get us some tea."

Sonya sighed at that, she wasn't upset. More disappointed and disgruntled than anything. If there ever was another Cloud, so long as said Cloud was Classic she wouldn't be able to personally do anything with them.

As well as mildly horrified she nearly killed some brat of a kid, but that was pretty much it. The space between herself and that kid's territory helped massively to try putting the incident behind her.

There hadn't been any real indication she had walked into another Cloud's claimed territory, she had just gotten antsy and a little suspicious the moment she left their borrowed car. No instant recognition of another active Cloud user, nothing but a prickling up her spine that informed her she was being watched.

That was so generic it was going to be damn near impossible to separate out what was a 'Flame' sense and what was just her own damn nerves.

For fuck's sake, neither of them had given a moment's thought to watchers. Ziven even made a mention of the KGB to her, and yet Sonya still smacked the brat around in full view without bothering to double check to ensure they were in the clear. Hopefully the little scrappy Cloud teen can and would be able to ensure their scuffle remained between them.

She wasn't going to count on it, though.

"I wasn't aware you knew that." Fong commented quietly as she led them to her borrowed office. "Which Triad I hailed from, I mean."

"I'm not blind, Fong. I hadn't intended to do anything with said information, but then you and yours decided to chase me down in Shanghai."

"And then you dunked me and Liqin into the harbor, yes." Oddly, he seemed more amused over the entire affair than irked.

Which was her summarization of the whole farce, the entire situation could have been avoided rather easily had they tried not getting around Mafia Land's rules. Fong even had the gall to smile pleasantly at her in return for the dirty look she shot him for the dismissal of the event.

"And you tried shaming me about the man's hand that I shattered." She shot back, checking to ensure the worst of what was left out was her geology books and a few pages of near illegible notes from a three-hundred-year-old Arcobaleno. "What was his name again?"

"Gen. He's doing surprisingly well with a hook instead of a hand."

There came a sound of a choked off swear word behind her, which made the thief blink then scowl. She had locked the office when they left, not that a lock held much more than a pause in a syndicate of thieves. It should have ensured that the others understood she wanted things left where they were, and that she was out for the moment.

Gedeon and Irinei were in the office, both looking a bit spooked. Sonya wasn't sure why, obviously she would return to the office eventually if only to collect the paperwork she had to go through and finish with what she had been doing.

She stared back at them for a moment, until she decided a prodding was needed to get past the silence. "Whatever is wrong won't blow up in the next few hours, right?"

Their Pahkan's son looked to the lone member of the Four Rains, and the pole-like Rain fidgeted with his fingers. "...no?"

"Good." Then she didn't care what they were doing. Whatever it was could be dealt with tomorrow. "What do you want, Fong?"

"A great many things, but I suppose you mean 'what do I want right now'." Returned the Chinese man, un-phased by her shortness with him.

It was generally how she was when he was around, so she supposed he had considered it her default personality. He might even have a point in assuming such, if he did.
Ziven slunk into the office after him, taking up a position next to the bookcase and keeping an eye on the foreigner. Irinei gave up his seat for the visiting Storm, a bit more hastily than strictly polite, and Gedeon looked pretty unwilling to remain in his own as her guest seated himself.

Sonya flatly ignored all the twitching and shuffling after cataloguing who ended up where, she snatched Dmitriy's ugly ass office lamp off the desk and placed it on the floor before her.

Switching it on after she had it and its shade adjusted to make a makeshift backlight then pulling a sheet of glass resting the top part on the desk's edge and the bottom on her thighs gave her the base of what she wanted. Placing the top sheet of nearly illegible French writing carefully pulled straight on top of that, then sandwiched between another sheet of glass, and she had herself a functioning backlit tracing table.

She had forgotten to ask for one thing, though. "Ziven, tape."

Something to secure the paper she would be using to make a clean copy she didn't need to risk eye strain to read over the slanted glass.

Fong eyed her poor-man's tracing table curiously but kept his distance out of either prudence or politeness.

Irinei was the one to move, when the newer of the two just gave her a silent look that questioned what sanity she had. "I will fetch it."

"What do you know of the ongoing situation in China, Sonya?"

"I've kind of stopped looking into it, honestly." She admitted blandly, studying the new faint lines she could only now read in Pierre-Antoine's handwriting. "I kind of had to, otherwise I would've gotten a little more than irritable at your countrymen for the desecration of your country's heritage. I've... got a soft spot for books and things and did not appreciate the news a lot of old books ended up torched not too long ago."

Frankly, she didn't really like reading a whole lot of world news on a general basis anyways. Obviously, some researching was needed for the places her heists took place in but there was a lot of nasty shit that went on in the world even within a day-to-day basis. Keeping up with situations in places she didn't want to work in for those very reasons was... less important than ensuring she was abreast of things going wrong in the Soviet Union or just Italy.

She had a bigger investment in those two locations, and frankly she had little empathy for the rest of the world. Besides, more often than not hearing about vaguely familiar situations tended to give her an aching headache.

"Ah... yes. It's... now highly discouraged to practice traditional martial arts in China."

Jerking her head up, she gave the Chinese martial artist a long look. While that did explain what the hell he had been up to in Mafia Land aside learning more styles, that didn't exactly answer her question of what the hell any of it had to do with her.

Although she wondered if Fong had volunteered to be relocated elsewhere for a few years while that got sorted out or if his Triad group wanted him to learn as many styles as he had to teach later when the worst was over with.

"Fong, what does any of that have to do with me?"

"We are not going to let this go quietly." He continued, a nod to show he was getting to that. "Since that is so, an underground martial arts tournament is being worked on. To take place this fall in Hong Kong, actually."

"And?"

He laced his fingers together for a quiet moment. Sonya already knew she wasn't going to like this.

"We are being… encouraged to bring along a… guest."

"I am not an escort." She shot back, a terrible suspicion already niggling at the back of her mind.

"I am aware of that, but as I am fairly well known and the only other option I have is… not someone I want to risk in such a situation." Her expression didn't change, and the Storm sighed exasperatedly. "I cannot just pick someone at random, as that possibility has been ruled out and will be enforced. There aren't any others of our kind I am aware of and interact with enough to count."

"Why need a plus one at all?" Sonya snapped, seriously contemplating throwing the man out before he could possibly convince her to go along with such a weird ass situation.

"Hostages against anyone informing certain, likely highly interested, parties. Had that not been the reason, I would have taken my other option along. Since it is and said option is not quite able to defend herself as well as you can, and you both are the only ones I qualify to take along, I would rather a greater threat to take with until things are more settled. You will be able to extract yourself if anything goes wrong."

She was slightly distracted by Galina returning with the lone Rain, the Lighting with a tea tray and Irinei with the tape she had requested. Snatching said tape when it was lobbed at her, the thief tore off a strip and affixed the top of her clean paper to the glass sandwich on her thighs.

"…when?"

"I only know sometime this fall."

Placing the roll of tape on the desk and picking up her pen, Sonya glanced up at the Storm in her office. "Then I can't give you an answer. I have things to do, Fong, and they aren't wait around in convenient places."

"I am going to request you by number." He warned her, accepting the teacup Galina offered to pour for him silently.

"Which is all well and good, but since it's not a contracted heist I do have the option of declining."

"You can do that?" Gedeon interjected, which forced her to introduce the man to the Storm.

She hadn't intended to, that was the whole point she had left off introducing the Sun and Rain even if it was polite to do so. As their 'Pahkan's son Gedeon was a bit more important than she was, and his security was probably supposed to be more than two other vory and a thief when meeting agents of other syndicates.

"Fong, this is Gedeon. He's a Sun." The fact she didn't make any mention of his surname should be a big enough hint that she wanted him to keep his mouth shut. "Gedeon, Fong is a Storm from the Wo Hop To Triad."

The two of them, seated in the only other chairs of the room, gave each other a considering look but exchanged a nod of greeting as Galina started pouring the thief a cup of tea.
"I can, so long as it's personal contracts and not for the agency I am contracted to." Sonya replied to the actual question posed, ignoring the steaming teacup sitting on the corner of the desk. "The clan can also pull me off the island without me forfeiting more than just money or time in return, even if I am in the middle of something. It just doesn't happen often, and you do it too much and they'll consider it abandonment anyways and still have me hunted down."

Fong decided to muse on his own thoughts for a little while after tasting his tea, which enabled her to get through an entire line of tracing once Gedeon's curiosity had been sated, before he spoke again.

"I would consider it a personal favor."

She blinked up at him blankly for a full second, wondering where in hell she would ever use a favor from a Triad member. Then again, it was also an opportunity to ask for a full spar on her own terms. …not a bad bribe, all things considered. He had also asked with plenty of time to consider.

"Maybe. If you give me exactly when and what I might or might not have to do." She supposed there wasn't any reason not to at least consider the request, other than the fact she had more than enough to do this year as it was.

As long as it was possible, didn't take up more than a week of time, and was a contract that would count to her total for the year?

China was a very big country she might not be able to avoid entirely for the rest of her life. She could try, but frankly from memories as Rachel the Triads would end up entrenched even in America given enough time. Additionally, from how networked the underworld was in her life?

A group might even eventually end up in control of part of Mafia Land like Vongola had.

Unless the Yakuza in Japan pulled off some kind of upset, but they had a lesser area to gain influence within and frankly she wasn't going to hold her breath.

"You will know when I do." Fong promised, then glanced at the three vory and two women in the borrowed office in turn. "Ah… one last thing…?"

Sonya paused, right before starting in on the second line of nearly-incomprehensible French. "Now what?"

He gave her a pleasant little smile, tinged only slightly with a wry edge, as he regarded her over his teacup. "I had figured it would take more to convince you to even listen to me, much less actually consider the suggestion."

"…you have nothing to do until your ride out, don't you?"

If possible, the Storm's smile gained even more of an edge. "Not a bit. Any recommendations?"

Sighing heavily, the thief glanced at her Lightning to see if the woman had any suggestions. It had been nearly a decade since she had the time to simply wander about, and without her brother taking a walk with her it had lost a lot of its charm as a distraction.

"Everyone should see the Russian Ballet at least once," Galina suggested slowly, looking more than a bit sidetracked, "otherwise there's the circus on Tsvetnoy Boulevard, or the Red Square and the Saint Basil's Cathedral. It's almost May, which has more festivals than April."

Fong gave an absent nod. "Sounds interesting."
Sonya rubbed the bridge of her nose tiredly. "You're going to want a tour guide, right?"

"If it is possible. Although I speak your native language, I have yet to learn to read it's written form."

She gave him a long flat stare, then turned to the only non-Flame active in the room. "Ziven, will you do me a quick favor?"

The vor gave her a similarly judging look as the first one he gave her earlier. "I'm not going with him, we've got way too much to do as it is Sonya."

"Obviously not. But he's my guest and I did tell him to come here." Sonya gave the, highly suspicious, blond a sweet smile. "Go fetch my father, please."

Arseniy had seemed interested in the men she knew. Two birds, meet one stone.

The momentary alarm that flashed across Fong's face was totally worth whatever price her foster father would ask in return for dogging the Chinese Storm around the city.

Especially since she, Galina, and Ziven had some serious work to do before their school could open in the fall.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 28th of March, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Fong was mostly certain Sonya's father wasn't hers in the biological sense.

Bazanov Arseniy was a massive man put next to his petite daughter, who wasn't really all that short unless… well, set next to those that rather towered over most with average height. Dark coloring where the thief was light, his tattoos reached up both arms to encircle his neck while hers remained contained under her clothing.

It didn't really seem to affect their relationship a whole lot, by the hug the woman gave him as he followed the younger vor into the office.

…and the older man was entirely unamused with what Sonya wanted from him.

He had the suspicion it was more to do with him than what she was getting up to here.

Well, Fong had asked for this. Even had the suspicion that she couldn't spare more time than she had, and so getting stuck with her father as a guide was something he could deal with.

Folding his hands into the sleeves of his changshan, he gave the older vor a more respectful bow than the other men Sonya had mostly absently or not introduced him to.

"-and this is Fong, Arseniy. He's the one Tats calls Tasty Muscles."

He immediately hid the wince, as far as introductions went that probably wasn't the best he could have gotten. Sonya either ignored the highly amused, the other woman she had named Galina to him, or highly dubious looks that earned him, which came from the rest of the men in the office with them.

"How long are you staying, Fong?"

If she was leaving him to the mercy of her father, not nearly as long as possible. "Only another two "days."

The thief's lips were twisted up in a smirk, but she also seemed genuinely amused more than irritated now. "I have a couple martial arts questions, and if you can answer them I might see about getting you to test a few stones we know are Storm compatible."

"I can try." It was entirely possible he would know what she wanted, and as for a return favor that wasn't something to dismiss out of hand.

He had only been after it or something like that for an entire year.

Which would be more impressive if he had actually seen the woman more than a handful of times.

"There's a form of martial arts that is more evasive than either defensive or offensive. I can't remember much about it, but it did have an emphasis on redirecting attacks away from oneself. Do you know what it's called?"

Surprisingly enough, he did. "Aikido. Sonya… it's becoming rather popular as a style."

"Do you know it?" She asked, even as she returned to her desk to jot down the name on a corner of a folder.

"I've seen it used, and know some of its moves, but I have not studied it." Fong studied the thoughtful expression on the Storm-Cloud's face. "Should I?"

"Not necessarily. Any of your fellow martial artist that do know it enough to teach?" Carefully shifting the sheets of glass on the desk off her sheets of paperwork, Sonya shifted yet another piece of blank paper before her.

"Possibly. I could ask around for you."

"If you find someone that wouldn't mind teaching it to a few others, anywhere from one to five or so more, I will arrange for a safe place for that one to wait out your country's current… intolerance."

Somethings Sonya seriously wanted then, either for herself or another. The Storm doubted it was for herself, she did more than well enough against him even if her attacks were more rough than polished, and if she was looking for something to augment her own skills then she would be after bō lessons.

He hadn't learned aikido himself yet, it was technically a Japanese martial art and he was more focused on retaining what Chinese styles he could unearth before the users of them were… lethally inconvenienced.

However, Fong did know others that knew the style. "Would it matter if the individual is civilian or not?"

"…not, but if civilian then I would assume it would be for a longer-term arrangement."

That was a safe bet. As a matter of fact, he knew one of his old masters knew the style and wasn't doing too well under China's internal crackdown on traditional arts. The strict elderly man would not move himself out of the country regardless of any concern over his wellbeing, but the temptation of more students to teach would. "I may have someone in mind."

Sonya was a Cloud, and in giving one of the few people he still respected to her to guard?
It was a safe bet that Master Yaozu would be well protected for the rest of his natural lifetime.

This was an unexpected benefit from visiting the woman.

"Would I need to go visit this individual myself?"

Fong very carefully did not cringe as he thought what the two headstrong individuals might do when they met. "It would be better to send a letter inviting him to set up a school here first."

Master Yaozu wasn't exactly for gender-equality in battle. He was pretty certain he could arrange things in order for his old master an up-close view of a Storm-Cloud's lethality, well before the old man insulted the thief to her face and got a different demonstration. A personal one.

After the elder had been tempted and committed to moving his school to Russia would be a better moment to introduce him to his patron. As a matter of fact, if Sonya did consent to helping him keep his little sister out of the greater Triads' view that would be the perfect time to introduce the two of them.

Possibly to get in the spars he was pretty sure he was going to owe the thief for this. There were less visible dojos he could appropriate for such a meeting, and a few that might need to be destroyed in the end anyways.

"I'll give you the letter before you leave then." Sonya glanced to the woman still positioned behind her desk. "Galina, can you assemble a kit of Storm Flame rocks for me? I'll see about clearing it with old man Zolotov."

The brunette slipped a well-worn notebook from the thief's desk drawers and nodded, paging through neat rows of their language's script. "I should have it done by tomorrow. One of each?"

"Might as well use it as a test to see how well targeted sorting works out. As far as I am aware, Fong's pure Storm."

"I am." He confirmed for her when the woman he came to see glanced back up at him questioningly. "Should I be prepared to pay for what I break?"

"Probably. Not to spring it on you, but some of these are damnably expensive." Sonya tapped her left fingers on the desk's top for a moment, slitting a glance at the two older vory in the room and the younger apparently less respectable male listening to her explain all this to him. "And, if you can pay, I can sell this as an actual service instead of a favor in exchange for another. Might end up that way anyways, in order to give a good thorough test of what we have or compile more information for it."

Fong had to smile wryly at her suggestion. "I know of quite a few people who would gladly pay you a small fortune to match them to natural gemstones, even if the price tag is greater than the Flame rings sold in Mafia Land."

"Especially those you work with?"

"They would be the first ones I would inform of this, if you can." He had to admit to it, as denying would only make him a bad liar and do nothing for his reputation in Sonya's syndicate. "...although, if you can, I can say with some certainty that my Triad would be highly interested in an arrangement of mutual benefit."

Gedeon, one introduced to him as a Sun, jerked sharply upright and stared at the Chinese native. The martial artist raised an eyebrow back at him for the unusual reaction, giving the thief a confused look next.
Sonya merely smirked tiredly and waved a hand. "Don't worry about it, old argument. So, leave tomorrow morning free. I'll get back to you with what I can or can't do, or if my Pahkan wants anything other than money in return for using clan assets like this."

"I will see you tomorrow, then." Fong agreed, then blinked as he realized that left him to the direction of her father.

Vor Arseniy crooked a finger for him to follow and lead the Chinese man out of the Zolotov Thieves' Clan headquarters. More specifically, he immediately removed the Triad member from his daughter's office with an overabundance of haste and a minimum of politeness.

Which was a rather nice set up the Cloud woman had, an entire office for herself in a sprawling complex owned outright by her syndicate. The building seemed to be half an apartment and half a business office, even if he hadn't seen more than a fraction of the inside.

It did make him wonder what she was doing taking the odd contract for someplace like Mafia Land if she had the experience and pull her to rate such a part-time accommodation.

At least the older man did ensure there were no eavesdroppers to be worried about when he suddenly turned and demanded, "What the fuck do you want with my daughter?"

"A sparring partner." Fong answered as honestly as he could, out of respect to how highly Sonya seemed to hold her father in her esteem. "Which we are occasionally, but I would like to be friends as well. Your daughter has an impressive control over her Flames, which she has been helping me with this past year."

In truth she really only gave him a direction to go in, but the results spoke for themselves.

He no longer obliterated everything in his way when he called up his own Storm Flames, but just Disintegrated whatever was in the way he directed them. He had even had a limited amount of success in trying to stop the Flames from eating through what he hadn't intended to burn, or at least moderating the extent of the damages.

A small step up from anything even brushed with Storm Flames spontaneously igniting and anything touched with the smallest amount eventually being eaten away entirely under red Flames, but it was a difference.

He could avoid accidentally Disintegrating entire dojos now, and eventually might stop putting holes in a few walls eventually.

Not quite in time for Fong to return to learning from civilian institutions instead of criminally inclined ones that would hold their silence about his Flames, but he only had himself to blame for not finding his own way. That wasn't the thief's fault.

Vor Arseniy didn't seem to buy his explanation, but the man had two full grown daughters. Tatiana alone was probably the one to put a lot of the grey starting to pepper the man's hair there, and Fong didn't have a good grasp on whatever flaws Sonya had that might have contributed.

…on the other hand, if the sisters were anything as children like they were last summer…

Coughing, and hastily casting around for a subject that wouldn't get him into a messy confrontation with a fellow Storm's father, the Triad member dug his nails into his left wrist for something else to think about. "Would you mind recommending a hotel I may stay at?"
"Not that I'm complaining or anything," Cherep started off after he swallowed, "but you've been visiting more."

"You better not be complaining." Viper glared over at the Inverted Cloud stuntman, then wrinkled his nose at the contents of his plate. "And I can't believe you can eat that."

"You know, Sonya never really liked my habit of sampling the local dishes either." Actually, to be completely honest, he didn't exactly know what he was eating.

It was a very strong flavor, very sour. Since he had been recommended to order either beer or milk with this dish, he had opted for the milk just in case. It seemed like a good idea, and it did cut the sourness a bit.

"Cherep, mou… surströmmingsklämma is a sandwich made of fermented herring and potatoes. Possibly onions if you're lucky."

Checking between the two thin pieces of crisp bread, he had to give him that point. The meat in it did look like fish.

The Mist gave him a flat glare from under the ever-present hood for trying another bite.

"It's not bad." Not exactly good either, probably an acquired taste. Cherep had eaten worse in his life, and there was potato in it too. "Besides, it's bad manners to waste food."

Not entirely surprised when his visitor didn't immediately respond, given how often Viper weaseled a meal out of him was a good indication this was another person that knew what it was like to starve, the Cloud continued to eat his fishy sandwich.

"It's been very quiet recently." The Mist offered after a moment of dubious staring at his meal. "Lulls like this aren't good for my business, since I rely on those that want to know what others are doing in their own little sections of the world without risking their own necks for it."

"Crina would dearly appreciate it if you would come back and rescue her from her newest apprentice." The stuntman gamely contributed around his next mouthful.

In fact, the old bat had near begged Cherep to contact her sister for subbing in for a month or the rest of the year. Whichever might be possible.

Peizhi was wishy-washy, which irked the old gypsy woman something fierce.

She couldn't decide if she should run him off or keep putting up with him. It didn't help that her ex-apprentice had actively avoided the man pointedly. If one of her old apprentices needed a place to fall back to, she could then give the Chinese man the boot guilt free.

The Cloud wasn't going to drag his little sister back. Sonya had put up with circus life pretty well, but she also had left for a reason. Viper was more feasible, especially if the Esper was having money troubles.

"If… I… pay… will you stop eating that?"

Cherep could not stop his eyebrow from raising up, but he did pause before his next bite.
"Mou, Cherep, it reeks."

Well yes, he supposed that had been why he was directed to wait for his food outside of the restaurant. They had some very nice sheltered tables, not quite picnic-like ones but also not as spindly as the café tables his little sister had favored.

However, the entirely rare and unexpected suggestion for Viper to pay for a meal had the stuntman seriously considering the offer. "…no fish?"

"No fish." The Mist confirmed with a sharp nod, already rising from his seat nearly a full table away. "They have some decent British restaurants down the street."
Chapter 38

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya got a curious lack of resistance in getting approved to sort Fong out with a Flame compatible stone. Gedeon sold it to his old man, emphasizing the money that would be paid in return instead of mentioning the whole exchange of favors that prompted it. A nice twist that prevented him from giving her any further credit when it came to knowing what she was doing…

While not needing to argue or try negotiating with her ultimate Boss was nice and all, she was pretty damn sure that still meant both her Pakhan and his son had little to no faith in it being a sellable service. They also probably thought that the rather young-looking Chinese Storm didn’t have a decent reach in his Triad, so it would end up something minor in the long run.

If she didn’t know full well that the two of them almost never had anything to do with syndicates outside of the Soviet Union, the thief would actually begin to suspect they were being obstinate just because. That was entirely within Gedeon’s personality to do, and it was highly likely he got it from his father.

Knowing it was out of ignorance for what was out there wasn’t much better, but the only thing she could do with that was arrange more non-Soviet business and hope it got corrected in a fast hurry.

The clan had loose thieves like her just this very thing, to handle or warn of outside influences that might impact them before it did. The Storm-Cloud might currently be the youngest and one of the farthest ranging, and a young woman aside that, but the lack of weight her suggestions carried within their syndicate was starting to irk her.

Yes, she was young, female, and not a well-established figure within their syndicate. That didn’t mean she had little to no idea of what she was doing, or what those outside the Soviet Union thought about some specific mafia issues.

On her lone walk back to her office she had to remind herself she wasn’t yet twenty, seemed entirely too green and young to a vor of either Gedeon’s or Milo’s age, and working with a subject that old man Zolotov had admitted he didn’t understand. It would take time, effort, and probably a fuck-up or two before her advice got more than just passing interest.

Pyotr, the Sovintnik, did at least seem to be aware that if Sonya was setting this up to be a service they could charge rather disproportionate prices for then she also knew where the market for it would be. At least he had faith in her ability to earn money for the clan.

Mostly due to the fact the grey haired older vor was the one to check up on the end of year finances the clan had, and exactly how much Sonya usually brought in when the stones the Flame users were messing around with needed ‘restocking’.

The Sovintnik was also a better financier than she was, where the Storm-Cloud was just going to charge Fong for everything he destroyed and leave it at that Pyotr instead worked out a by-the-hour fee and what cost any half-cracked stone should be worth compared to a shattered one.

Sonya did appreciate the Triad member knowing a master Cherep might be willing to learn aikido from, but that didn’t mean she wouldn’t charge him through the nose. She was going to go with the elderly vor’s pricing suggestion, simply adjusted slightly.
Fong was going to do her a favor, and if she wanted a relatively painless education for her clan about the true reach of Flame users they would need repeat business.

With that sorted out, she turned her attention to her fellow if feral Cloud.

The Khimki Cloud wasn't exactly doing well. It had been a week or so since the incident that made the collective Mafiya assume he had killed himself, and the teenager still had livid bruises and scabbed over cuts from it. Probably living on the streets out of concern for others hunting him down again.

As the young man was a Cloud, Sonya had little to nothing to offer him that he would accept.

It was already a struggle to keep her thoughts about him neutral as it was. The thief continually had to remind herself the teen was young and likely entirely civilian before his Flames came to the fore with a vengeance, because she still resented the scrappy bit of kid for picking a fight where and how he had.

Said teenager would have little to no reason to think fondly of her either, if their shared nature made them highly predisposed to hate each other's guts for little reason. He also had less reason to try ignoring his Cloud-instincts, because in a way it was correct.

Sonya had nearly killed him, for attacking her at an angle that would've harmed or outright killed the two others out there with her. As far as said baby Cloud was concerned, that was validation that his instincts were correct in picking her out as the most lethal even when placed against a full vor like Ziven.

She couldn't get to grips with the little snot to convince him otherwise either. Going herself would likely just aggravate the issue already inherent and make them even more hostile to one another.

What little she could do had to be done through others, or at least until the Khimki Cloud came to her.

Until then…

"Galina, about that kid." The Lightning had been picking through the master list of gemstone/metal/rock results to pick the Storm positive ones, and when Sonya called to her from the doorway she looked up. "Take Ziven with you. You just drop off the book then leave."

"What am I doing then?"

"Making sure he won't freeze to death." It was nearly April, but in Moscow Russia?

It wasn't entirely uncommon for it to keep on snowing until more than halfway through the month.

"Since I keep overlooking you, I am hoping the Khimki Cloud will do the same. If he does great, if not just get him fed and patched up then leave. I'll recompense you for whatever you spend on him, just don't tell him that."

Ziven looked rather thoughtful as Galina pulled certain pamphlets out of the bottom left desk drawer. "Speaking of said kid... should we tell...?"

"We do, he dies. If news gets out, someone else will eventually try again to 'catch' him. I will not tell anyone as I gave the jerk my word I would not, but what you and Galina do are up to you." Sonya didn't really want the kid to die, he could be useful if they found a work around for the hostile-Cloud nature thing.
"He was still pretty young. Even discounting the fact we're not much older, he couldn't be more than fourteen or so. Fifteen at most." The Lightning mused aloud, double checking the list she had made up to assemble a kit of gems, jewels, and crystals for Fong to try out. "A year or two of grace, I think."

The vor raised an eyebrow but shrugged that issue off.

"Sonya? Which set am I to give a book from…?"

"...the civilian one. But make sure to mention you hid the information within the hippy-love bull."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Valera learned to talk while she had been gone. Short comments only, and his vocabulary was rather restricted, but actually understandable instead of the toddler babble he had been limited to the last time she saw him.

Sonya might be overreacting a little to the scare with the Khimki Cloud, but there wasn't any reason to avoid visiting Lisa and Valera. Getting the baby Cloud familiarized to her presence and getting him to understand she was their father's second and not a threat to him was just... something to do.

Her youngest brother quizzically stared at her for a while. It had been nearly two months. "Ma?"

"Your sister, Valera." Lisa didn't even need to turn around, and the thief still had no idea how she did it. "Sonya. You remember her? The one that let you play 'stack on me'?"

...wait, she did. The kettle that was almost always on the back range was an expensive-looking silver affair none of the children ever got the story behind out of either of their foster parents, with a high mirror-bright polish.

Damn.

Tatiana was going to bitch over her catching onto their foster mother's tricks before she did. Maybe she could just not tell the redheaded Sun…?

Lisa's lips twitched, and that looked odd in the bent reflection, but the older Russian turned the heat down on her porridge and gave the youngest of her foster children a warm smile. "Good morning, Sonya. Business or pleasure today?"

"Half and half." Admitted the younger thief willingly enough, obligingly moving into the hug she gestured for. "Not that it's entirely terrible to see you two again."

"Why thank you Sonya, you always know just what to say." Pulling back slightly, her mother also seemed to forget to let her go. "Now, what's this about a Chinese Triad member visiting you? One all your other siblings seem to know but you never thought to introduce to me?"

...Arseniy likely told her.

"Fong's... Fong. He's a pervert." Shrugging that off, Sonya fidgeted but didn't remove herself from Lisa's hold. "He wants a favor, so we're... exchanging a set of them. Two actually. I get one of his old martial arts friends to guard and teach a few of my to-be students and possibly Cherep until the unpleasantness in his home country is over, he gets a run through of the Storm Flame stones we know of. He needs someone semi-capable for some tournament token hostage, and I get a few spars out of it."

If anything else came of the arrangement, it was just a bonus.

It wasn't guaranteed Cherep would go along with learning aikido, or that the tournament the Storm wanted her to attend with him would even be held given the pressure the event was likely under.

The thief was taking more of a risk on Fong's martial arts fellow, but she was pretty sure if whoever it was associated with a Triad member then he wouldn't mind teaching to-be thieves or vory.

"Hmmm… you don't say."

Did she say anything wrong?

"A pervert?" Inquired the older woman, letting the Storm-Cloud she raised go in favor of checking up on what she was making for breakfast. "That doesn't sound like something you would label another as."

Sonya slunk to a chair, knowing full well she wasn't going to be able to leave until her mother fed her something. "It's Tats' fault."

"That sounds like a very interesting story." Arseniy gave his own opinion as he lumbered sleepily into the kitchen, seemingly half-blind and the scowl only lifting from his face when Lisa put a mug of coffee in front of him.

"You know Tats, she might have been just messing with Sonya's and this Fong's head." His lover reminded him, pausing only for a moment to smooth the sticky crumbs off Valera's chubby cheeks.

The toddler made a few grasping motions in her direction, which made her rolled her eyes and pull out a few more of her homemade crackers to give him.

Sonya remembered those, it was more like toasted bread slices with dried fruit bits baked inside. They were very good, especially since the older Russian woman tended to not make sweeter things very often.

"She was, but I didn't really catch on until a while later. But it's stuck in my head, and now I keep thinking of him as a pervert."

The vor grunted as he set his now only half-full mug down. "Good."

She blinked, but her foster father paid her confusion no mind. He was eyeing his son's progress in learning to eat solid/crispy things. Valera seemed to not like the crunchy texture, instead he was sucking on the cracker and using his few baby teeth to scrape off the soggy outside.

"Lisa, do we have any milk left?"

"Of course we do. Cherep's not here to drink it all as soon as we buy it."

Sonya snickered, only slightly guiltily. Her brother wasn't the only one that tended to drink a lot of milk as a child, and from the look her foster mother was giving her through her kettle Lisa knew that full well too.

Given that even Arseniy flicked her a glance, she had not been as sneaky as she thought she had been about that either. Whoops.
At least it was some mischief that neither seemed to really mind, after the fact. It was entirely likely the two of them had let her ‘get away’ with stealing extra cups of milk since it had been a rather innocent thing in the end.

Pouring half a mug full of milk, one of the heavier and clunky ones that stood up well to possible toddler abuse, the older woman placed that and a small plate of her crackers on the table between her lover and their children.

Sonya got a mug of coffee, the ban on the stuff had lifted for her after she and Cherep had finally moved out. Likely Valera would be forbidden to drink it until he was old enough to make his own decisions, but that wasn't the thief's problem.

The toddler watched suspiciously as his father snatched a cracker and dunked it half into the mug of milk, then just as narrowly watched his foster sister do the same with her coffee and a cracker. He considered his half-masticated one, his father, sister, and the innocent mug of white cow's milk in turn.

Clumsily lunging forward, the kid managed to hook a few soggy bread crumb covered fingers into the thick mug and drag the milk over to his highchair. Surprisingly without spilling it all over himself or the table.

Abstaining from making her cracker soggier than it already was now that the toddler had the idea, as she didn't really like the texture of soggy things if she liked how they were normally, Sonya caught Arseniy's eye. "Where is Fong, anyways?"

"Same hotel you tend to live out of. He's to meet me there at ten, then I'll take him wherever you want him to go."

She had an hour to find someplace to test Fong with Flame crystals.

While wondering how old Aleksandr was doing, and how badly his underground hall was damaged after the clan's testing, she finished off the cracker just in time for Lisa to set a full breakfast before all of them.

"You are eating, Sonya."

…right, half an hour to find someplace Fong could pepper with crystal shards without consequence.

(ooo0000oo)

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969 continued. Aleksander's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"What, exactly, do you want from a Flame focus?" Sonya asked of him idly as she paged through a few sheets of paper covered in Cyrillic script.

"...I do not need more power, but a limiter that can stand up to the strength of my Storm would be nice." Like with how she found her own control, the so called 'bad match' in the red tourmaline.

Fong was really rather curious over the box of small packaged stones at her feet, but the thief was still perusing the information she held in her hands. As she knew what to do and he did not, he was rather content to allow her to set the pace for this.

She was even missing her people. The Sun, Lightning, and the other vor he didn't know the Flame type of were elsewhere. Even her father left them alone, and the Storm was actually rather surprised by that.

He wasn't sure if that meant they had their own duties to attend to or if there was another reason for it.

Given the pockmarks in the ceiling of the generously spacious underground room, he had the suspicion this might be a bit more than volatile until they did find him a match.

There were the marks that a lot of testing had gone on here, char marks spider webbing out of certain spots on the walls and the debris of various desks and chairs likely sacrificed to the pursuit of knowledge still lay strewn about where they had been abandoned.

The whole hall seemed to have an energy about it that starkly contrasted the dearth of those within. Fong could almost say it was like the rare times he and a few other Flame users of China had the time to gather and show off what they had learned to the rare few elders who retained their Flames from years ago.

Just… lacking the people.

Possibly those shards of crystal embedded into the ceiling retained a tiny amount of Flames still, which is how the room seemed to be fuller than it was even near empty.

"Anything beyond that? Or are we just looking for indicator stones for various levels of control?"

Considering the question as he turned back to the woman that lead him down here, the Storm had to admit he didn't know. "What can I do with a Flame focus gem?"

The question distracted the Storm-Cloud from her reading, and she gave him a measuring look. "…we'll find you a few matches, then. You can figure it out on your own time, but I expect at least some mention of what you end up doing."

"Very well."

Sonya put aside the sheets of paper, glancing at the topmost entry and pulling a small plastic bag holding a lone stone. "Might as well start from the top. Diamond."

Catching the package as it was tossed at him, the martial artist pulled the tiny diamond free and held a lick of his Storm Flames to it curiously.

For a moment nothing happened, but the jewel did suddenly heat up under his fingers. It went from cool to burning hot quickly enough he had to drop the diamond or risk burns on the pads of his fingers. It rolled on the flooring, making the wood smoke where it came to a stop.

Luckily, nothing burst into flame… or Flames. Curious that it had burned him… with his own Flames supplying the heat.

"…yeah. I've only seen one Sun that can make use of a diamond. That's not really an uncommon reaction." Marking down a few Cyrillic letters in the space left after the first entry on her lists, the thief checked the next entry for what gemstone to try next. "…ruby. I'd advise you to be more careful with these. Explosions aren't an uncommon reaction either."

Fong supposed that would be why the ceiling of this underground hall had pockmarks in it.

Catching the new package, he slid the red jewel out of the plastic and tried to generate the smallest Flame possible.
Fascinatingly, he could see the gem actually wick a tiny amount of his Storm into it before it shattered. A few of the nicks his fingers suffered burned momentarily.

"Sapphire. Expect a similar result but with a minor variation."

As Sonya claimed, the blue gem went the same as the red one. Fong suffered a deeper nick to his left thumb, though. Slightly more forceful, then. "Are all the reactions going to be that violent?"

"No, those are just the more volatile ones." Pausing in marking down the result he got with sapphires, she then looked up at him curiously. "Do you want a red variation of whatever stones, or one that doesn't have to be red?"

"That's possible?"

"...Fong, you just used a sapphire. Admittedly it blew up on you, but that should at least suggest that color has little to do with these stones."

The Triad member blinked at her, then blinked again. With his eye coloring and Flame type, he had been given mostly red things for most of his life. It had been an unspoken tradition he had not honestly expected to be broken at all.

He liked his Flame's color, but that didn't mean he always wanted to dress in the same shades. "I do not know?"

Sonya shrugged. *"We'll see what we end up with. Next...? Moonstone."

This stone was a rough one, meaning it didn't have the edges or polish of the other three. Still wary over explosive gems, Fong only introduced his Flames to this jewel slowly.

Again, there was a moment when the Storm Flames seemed to almost wick into the chalky white crystal but when he cautiously increased the amount of Flames he was using it crumbled into his hands as a fine white powder. It wasn't an unusual reaction for something held to Storm Flames, dissolving into powdered nothing, but...

"...apparently not."

Fong grimaced, the crystal powder had gotten into the nicks left in his fingers from the explosive jewels.

*"Here, one of my positive reaction stones. Ajoite."

A polished pebble of blue-green was tossed to him next. *"How many of these do you think I need to test?"

He went even slower with this one, which proved to be a good idea. Although it didn't explode as violently as either the ruby or sapphire, it also didn't behave nearly as sedately as the moonstone. Resisting the temptation to sneeze once it shattered into tiny particles, he waved the powdered teal stone grit floating in the air away.

"...at last count, there are a hundred and sixteen stones we know will work with Storm Flames."

Sonya absently answered him, scribbling down a notation and rummaging around for the next packet with another stone. *"Unless we find one which has a reaction you greatly like, all of them. You're stronger than I am and seeing what kind of upper limit some of these rocks have might help me the next time I need a new Storm stone.""
The next was a blackened brown chunk of what he was pretty certain was a mineral. "...Sonya?"

"Allanite." She ran a finger down the line of Cyrillic script. "From what little we know, another likely to end up powdered when an overly strong Storm puts their Flame to it. At least, it happened to me too."

Fong eyed the already fragile looking bit of mineral in his hands but did light up his left with Storm Flames and brought it close to his right hand holding the next crystal to test.

This was going to be a long morning.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969 continued. Aleksander's basement, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Fong's best match ended up a tie between a bewilderingly fragile crystal called amblygonite and red imperial topaz. That wasn't to say those were his only matches, but as for what could stand up to his Flames they ended up as the best.

Which was odd, given she had tried red imperial topazes years ago and found them less than responsive. That held true even today, even with the news Gedeon gave her about topazes working for most any Flame.

She gingerly guessed it had to do with Fong being a more powerful Storm than she was, or because he was purely a Storm and not a mix. She made note to get Coyote Nougat to try that one out over Christmas to see what he thought it would be good for.

The amblygonite, a tiny radiant cut gem in pale green which was barely three carats if Sonya had to guess, actually could stand up to the Chinese Storm's absent playing with it. She was pretty damn certain it would shatter before long, no Flame focus gem she ever used tended to be long-lived either.

She let the Triad member slip those two into his pocket, as he was going to be paying for all the rocks they wouldn't be able to reuse anyways. His attempts to steal from a thief was noted, but generally ineffectual and so ignored.

Next best for him were cavansite and celestite, a violently blue chunk of mineral and a cloudy light blue mineral shaped into a worry stone. The Storm seemed more bewildered they could stand up to his Flames more than fascinated with them, but again wasn't what he was looking for. They could stand up to his Flames in small doses, but eventually had the same powdering issue moonstones did.

Eudialyte, a marbled red, white, and black kind of semi-precious gemstone, proved to be more in line of what Fong had been looking for. It crumbled easily, but only when the Storm specifically tried to overwhelm it.

As in tried to expend more Storm Flames than generally needed to melt or Disintegrate anything.

As eudialyte was common in Russia, Galina had purchased nearly a hundred tiny examples of the sphere-shaped stones. Given how many ended up cracked or crumbled between her, Mikhail the younger Storm user, and the five newest the clan picked up over the last year, she figured Fong could very well get away with taking a few extra.

A few Suns had been able to use the stone as well, but a few notes Galina included with the Storm gem list told the Storm-Cloud they had agreed on the thought it was like pouring Flames into a bucket. A lot of effort for little visible results.
Sonya scribbled down the last results they had gotten, watermelon tourmaline which ended up scorching then flaking away under the full Storm's Flames and zoisite which imploded, then slung the paperwork back into the folder she had received from her Lightning. "Right, thankfully we're finished."

"Have we gotten through them all already?"

"I can't exactly time it, as you went through only a little under half of the stones we have, but I think you would've tied with my brother for how fast you managed to get through it all." If they doubled the four hours and took out the time Cherep had to spend on other things than something his foster family's syndicate wanted his help with, then it was comparable. "That doesn't mean this list of rocks isn't subject to change, but if I find more Storm stones I will inform you if you promise to tell me how they responded to you."

"Agreeable. My thanks."

Sonya was still the strongest Zolotov Storm, at least until the younger ones finally became settled with their Flames and could be judged, but Fong had her beat easily. Of course, she probably could do more than he could even with her limited strength with their shared Flame type since her minor Sun talent lent itself to 'efficiency' from all signs.

A very annoying talent, especially since it inhibited her from draining her Cloud Flames in order to actually exercise. What took Cherep a decent amount of Flames to accomplish took her half of his effort, and from watching the Triad member all morning playing with stones she could safely say she did have a tighter control over her Flames than he did.

"Have you eaten?"

"I… no. Not as of yet." Fong finally allowed himself to be distracted from one-handed juggling of two spheres of eudialyte, catching them in sequence absently. "I was going to just wander about for a little while and see what the vendors around here have."

"If you do, I recommend the pelmeni." Grabbing the Storm focus notes and tossing them into the box of rejected or shattered jewels, the thief swept it up and headed for the staircase. "But since I owe Aleksandr breakfast for loaning us the hall, you could stay here and eat."

Also, the elderly vor who still lived here had a first aid kit. The Chinese man should probably get his fingers wrapped up before he left bloody handprints everywhere.

Sonya glanced pointedly at the hands in question, which had him following the path of her eyes and inspecting his own nicked and slightly burned hands as well. "…is there something I may use as a bandage here?"

"Upstairs, and yes. Actual bandages."

At least it was going to be a brunch type of breakfast. She wouldn't end up possibly killing either the Aleksandr or her guest via poorly made food.

A cross between a pancake and a crepe, and maybe some sweet rye bread with sausage. Maybe with some black spiced tea.

Rachel had been a college student, who only just managed to gain her degree in foreign affairs before her death. She had eaten as little as she could get away with to help save money to pay off her student loans. Sonya traveled for work, meaning she rarely had the time or energy to practice cooking much less an actual kitchen to try in. When she did, she looked for what was easy and quick rather than what she would have to spend effort to make.

Was it any surprise she could barely manage the simple parts of a typical Russian breakfast?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Half a page into tracing the first page of a three-hundred-year-old Arcobaleno's handwritten note, Sonya belatedly realized that Pierre-Antoine Carpentier had written on both sides of the sheet.

What little she had done so far was a mixed jumble of forward and backwards letters, not something that would be translatable.

Taking a deep breath, the thief placed the fountain pen she had been using down before she threw it in a fit of temper and possibly punctured a few walls. "Galina, I'm going to go check up on my Lackey and visit my sister for the weekend. Call me when Ziven drags himself back."

"...um, alright?"

Since Ziven wasn't back yet, he was either dead or also slipping under the other Cloud's instincts. She highly doubted the scrappy almost-civilian could kill the vor. More likely he was at least arranging for a better living situation for the snot nosed little brat and would be getting back sometime today or tomorrow.

At the very least her first attempts at tracing a legible copy of an ancient Storm's letter hadn't been a complete bust, Sonya had another name. Yang XiaoJing.

Of course, finding the owner of that name about three hundred years ago without a country or town of origin was going to be rather hard. Especially since China was busy destroying its history. That country alone represented a large chunk of the Far East, meaning if Yang XiaoJing was Chinese it was possible that any records of her mere existence had been long since burned.

Given how… dicey she had found the region, that could certainly wait for confirmation and a better handle on what kind of criminals operated in that mess.

When she got back, she would pay more attention to what she was tracing and try again. For right now, Sonya needed out of that office.

"Sonya," Galina called out before the Storm-Cloud could exit the imprisoned Rain's office, "Tuesday you have a meeting with the two-eighty-one School District Intendent."

Pausing, she gave the other woman a confused look. "Why me?"

"Because for all that you look like a tiny Russian doll, you're scarier than I am and don't have the criminal record of our vory." Admitted the brunette bluntly, slipping the book she had been reading before she gave up on her self-imposed quest for the time being shut and placing it on her lap. "It's just to get the bulk of the paperwork done with, mostly just signing things and agreeing to terms."

Well, Sonya wasn't going to be looking forward to that. If it helped Lisa, however… "Fine. Are we going to be a boarding school or a day one?"

"Bit of both." Galina shrugged that off. "We're going to be a private school anyways, even if those are kind of rare these days. For... get this, 'the advancement of Soviet technology and sciences'."
"...I thought the private schools were shut down?"

"A few years ago, yes. A few of them are coming back, and this way some of the prospective kids won't have to spend most of their lives on trains or planes. Our kids will be the day students, the outsiders will be the ones living on the fourth and third floor dorms."

The thief puzzled over it a bit, but eventually decided the Lightning likely had checked all the options available for the school and likely picked the best one. "Fine. I'll be back Monday evening at the latest."

"Say hello to Tatiana for me."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 29th of March, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

"So, what? Are you going to visit every few weeks or something?"

"Every weekend, maybe." Sonya informed Tatiana absently, following the redhead to the dojo she had mentioned gave classes in Fut Gar and had a variation in staff-styles. "At least until Bjørn has another series of heists set up for me."

It was a mark of either how busy or how lazy she had gotten, exactly how long it had taken her to follow through with her sister's idea of learning a specific martial art together.

The Storm-Cloud hadn't had a reason to travel down these roads in Mafia Land yet, although she was aware Fong nearly lived within them. The farthest she had gotten was the rent-a-barre room establishments closer to the island's center, again with Tatiana nearly two years ago.

Dance studios, an actual gym kind of thing for 'real' men, and maybe a couple smatterings of international martial arts from around the world littered this section of the island. Most of what was out here was the rent-a-room kind of things, dojos and studios that allowed someone that needed the space or setups for their training regime or exercise routine.

Sonya highly suspected that when kung-fu movies actually became popular this sector would become as wildly popular and wondered if she should purchase a bit of real estate here or not.

It would be prohibitively expensive but would be a way to generate 'clean' cash for herself, at least.

She should really get on having her Lackey pick up some skills or contacts within the finance section of the island, if only to have him make investments on her behalf or make some 'clean' money she could spend off the island or away from criminal establishments. Bjørn was still young enough he should pick up the skills rather easily, but she wasn't sure if she wanted to kick her little Icelandic teen fishy to swim in a tank of sharks or not.

There was a civilian way around that, right?

"Hello? Earth to Sonya. You in there, baby sis?"

Narrowing her eyes at the hand waved in her face, the thief turned to the nurse irritably. "What?"

"We're here, Nya." Tatiana gave an expansive hand wave to the establishment in question.

It wasn't anything fancy, not for a school teaching a martial art style the management of Mafia Land actually encouraged its day workers to learn or at least attend a few classes of a month. A two-story building, which was actually the norm for non-main street buildings here, of which the ground floor held an open training hall and the upper floor likely housed the main teacher and possibly his family. If not, then a few other students/assistant teachers.

However, the location didn't instill nearly as much trepidation in her as the students and teachers were. Three older men, an elderly lady, and a smattering of young to old students mirroring them mid-pose who all seemed entirely too surprised at what should be a fellow student and a guest.

"Tats... you didn't tell them I was coming, did you?"

"Um... nope." With a shrug the nurse strutted into the establishment as bold as brass, the Storm-Cloud very reluctantly trailing behind her. "People get weird when they know I know you. Like at the hospital, during the mid-month meetings? I told them what you told me about the heist you did for them. Pretty sure one of the docs crapped himself."

Tatiana tapped her lips with one nail, setting her purse down in a cubby hole provided for the students to use if they came a bit overdressed.

"Also, pretty sure he was the one in charge of arranging for that contract, so... yeah. Doctor Kappel laughed afterwards, though."

Sonya honestly couldn't see the dour German doctor laughing at anything, he didn't really seem to have a sense of humor around her. However, her sister did see him more than she did. It was possible said 'laugh' was more of a quiet chuckle or a snooty snort-laugh. That seemed to fit the man more than just laughed.

"While that's nice and all Tats, they're... staring."

She was a thief, however much playing Crina the gypsy fortune teller's draw girl had given her a bit of tolerance to it she still didn't like being the center of attention.

It didn't bother her so much normally, but these were people her sister likely knew of well enough to care about. She couldn't pretend they meant nothing to her, because they did as long as they mattered to Tatiana.

Her elder sister scanned the small dojo, locking eyes with a few of her fellow student and even two of the assistant teachers. "I kinda find it fascinating how many people like poking at your temper, then acting as if it's your fault when you avoid them instead of smack them through a wall or two."

Sonya sighed silently through her nose.

"I will not lose my student by pitting them against you, Cloud." The elderly woman interjected before Tatiana could say or accuse them all of anything else.

"If I wanted a fight, I would find Fong. I believe he is back on the island already. He's survived me being pissed off before, and thus I already have a sparring partner."

The grey-haired old bat, only an inch shorter than the younger Russian sister, considered her words very carefully. "Why are you here?"

She might want to take offense but really, she could see why the old bitch might be wary of her.

Sonya's mere presence would likely cost her some business, from those ill-informed idiots that tended to treat the Storm-Cloud like some kind of monster. To be frank, she could act like one when her temper got away from her. "To learn. Is that not why students come here? I was only informally instructed in wielding a staff and was looking to get formal instruction."

Tatiana stamped a foot, looking rather pissed off now. Not that she wasn't when her little sister pointed out people were staring at them, but now she was showing it more. "This is getting beyond stupid. Nya's been here for a damn near decade, and no one ended up meeting a messy end via her unless they were invading idiots. Now all of a sudden you want to treat her like a leper? There's an entire generation of us back home that will tell you the worst you will end up suffering from her in a spar are bruises and maybe broken fingers if you pissed her off."

The old bitch had as big of brass ones as the redhead, and merely raised a cool brow. "The last Cloud that came through Mafia Land did the damage to the old sector that made it become abandoned in the end, since it was decided it had to be completely leveled instead of repaired due to the cost."

Having not heard that before, the Russian sisters exchanged a look.

As far as Sonya knew, the old sector of the island had been abandoned long before she started working here but happened after Lisa stopped. Apparently even Tatiana hadn't known what had caused the island's infrastructure to shift by the look on her face.

Sighing, the thief rubbed her neck. "Well, that does explain a little of the reception I got when the news broke."

"It's still stupid." Denied the nurse in the next second. "What was he? An invader or did he pull the Cloud-suicide trick?"

"Neither, as far as I am aware. The Cloud was supposedly just visiting, and then went rampant."

"…possibly got the news of a death in or of his territory. Or he got into a fight that got out of hand and he didn't stop until someone killed him." She hazarded after a moment of thought. "So… is that why I'm avoided? Because no one ever managed to figure out what triggered that rampage, they're even more scared I might snap in the same way?"

"It's a possibility." Having settled at least the bulk of the hostility going her way for being probably just prudent, the older woman eyed the Storm-Cloud again. "As long as you can find your own sparring partners, I will teach you."

The thief shrugged that off. "Fong owes me a favor. Tats can sub, if you feel waiting for him will take too long."

Although the news the old bitch had given them made a disturbing amount of sense. There had been a lot of fear from the more permanent residents of the island to her outing of being a Cloud. Way too much not to merely be unfounded hysteria from old stories or rumors that might or might not have been true.

The people who visited always showed less personal wariness to her, until one of those residents managed to have a word with them. If the last Cloud that claimed anything about Mafia Land as territory blew a gasket and actually destabilized part of the island, of course none of the people that lived here full-time would want yet another Cloud to lose her temper.

However, Sonya had lost it once. She even had to pony up the money and her services to pay off what she broke. Pavement and a stretch of forest.

The news of which, she supposed, might actually have coincided with the tapering off of the 'personal bubble' thing she used to have.
She hadn't even realized her treatment was due to the actions of a predecessor. While it made it less personal... it was even worse news in a way than just unreasonable fear.

The thief might not be personally responsible, but it was a validated fear regardless. It had happened once and could happen again. Continuing as she had been, ignoring those that were afraid of her for little reason, would not help her at all in the end.

Very few were interested in interacting with her in spite of the rumors and fear surrounding her, and those that were content to wallow in their ignorance would never bother to learn they had actually little to fear from her.

"Very well." The old bat, who was going to be the first one Sonya made to see her behavior had been not only stupid but wrong, finally gave a short bow of greeting. "Although Primakova knows this already, I am Han-yue. I will be teaching you."

(Sunday the 30th of March, 1969. Bjørn's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Mafia Land's television channels were mainly news feeds from around the world, two or three national stations in the bigger countries each, and one internal news network. Well-padded of a selection, but ultimately not very useful since they were civilian channels that only really delivered civilian news.

She supposed that might help a little if you had the time to watch the news of wherever an agent might be going or wanted to keep up with the current events back home.

However, there were Mafia Land news anchors. Sonya almost wouldn't have believed it had she not caught sight of the feed on Bjørn's TV. The one mafia news network was bewildering, since it detailed mostly the rising police attentions on certain aspects of criminal life and warnings about the various ongoing wars and how they might affect travel in the areas more than the obvious.

At least the teen had decorated Tatiana's issued Mafia Land apartment more than the last time she had seen it, and from what she knew of his spending of her dirty money he had been rather frugal in buying mostly second-hand and putting in the elbow grease to fix what he needed up instead of buy new. Not quite how Renato had furnished his, but the younger man had a more limited freedom with the funds available to him.

It was more patch-worked than the hitman's, and kind of seemed more lived in.

"Dama?" Her Lackey inquired, placing the pot of tea he was probably going to insist she take a cup or two of during her visit, down on a scratched-up coffee table sitting between the couch she was on and his own personal purchase of a television. "Was there something you needed from me?"

"Mostly to catch up with you about..." She informed him, still rather distracted by the on-going news report. It was from a CBS station from the States, detailing the life of the former President Dwight D. Eisenhower and coving a bit of how he died at the end of last month.

She had completely forgotten about which American President was in office. Richard Nixon was the current one, he had just taken office, and that just reminded her of the Watergate scandal to yet happen.

How would that work out in this world of crooks and criminals?
John Kennedy had still been assassinated, a professional assassination from everything she had seen of the situation. Not a hitman's mark, the murdered President was a civilian and therefore the greater bulk of Renato's associated mafia coworkers would've snubbed the contract.

One or two might have actually agreed, for enough money.

"…err, Dama? That's not much of an answer." The Icelandic teen commented slowly.

Sonya tore her attention away from the damnable glowing box rather sharply, by the jump the poor teen made at her head snapping around. "...about how hard you might have found arranging heists for me earlier this year. And if there was anything you needed done, or if it could wait."

"Aside missing my mother's jewelry, Dama, I am rather content with my life." Björn gave a slight wave of a hand, a grimace painting itself across his face. "I went back to Finland myself earlier this week, to try tracking it down. I know where most of it is, just... a few pieces had been sold."

"How shady of a pawn shop?" The thief questioned idly, thinking of all the risks that came with robbing a mafia hotspot like that. If it was heavily into the local syndicate, it might just be a better option all around to try bribing the information out of the owner instead of steal from him or her.

The smile that sparked across her Lightning-Storm Lackey's face made her smirk in return.

"They were not good people, Dama. They ripped me off, and we all knew it. But I had needed the money, rather desperately." He shrugged his shoulders, which she was pleased to note weren't as boney as they had once been. Björn had put on enough weight to have actual muscles now, and his build was still filling out. "But because they were not good people willing to swindle others, they are actually rather unpopular of a shop for the local mafia to frequent. They all prefer another, which denied me service only because I wasn't a native."

Good, not the local fence who can call up an entire syndicate to hunt her down. That let her get him some retroactive revenge in robbing them blind. Any extra money could make up for the suffering her poor Lackey suffered when they shorted him on the pawning of his dead mother's jewelry.

"Get me an address, Björn, and the next round of contracts had better start there." Sonya smirked wickedly at him. "As long as I have a bit of extra time, say a week or so, collecting the last few pieces will be no true hardship."

"Ah... speaking of," the teenager, and she was pretty sure he wasn't actually that much younger than her, idly scratched a cheek, "will we continue to go as slow as we did this last time? I think I could slot you a new contract every three days, as long as you can get me word when you need to slow down."

"We probably could, but I'd rather not overcommit myself." Agreed the thief thoughtfully. "Other than a starting spot in...?"

"Rovaniemi, Dama."

"And make it a trip into the Iron Curtain this next time. If I don't trip up for a week or two again, we'll see about the three-day thing." She blinked, then frowned as something told her they weren't alone anymore.

She knew this feeling, since the last time she had needed it had been…

A Mist was around, or more specifically looking in on them. Sonya might know more Mists than Storms or Clouds but given the experience she had with Shamal and the scare from the Khimki
Cloud, she had become very in-tuned with that hackle-rising sense of hers.

The only Mist she knew of and would possibly seek her out here was Cherep's friend. "Viper... that had best be you."

"If it wasn't?" Asked the gender-fluid Mist in rather accent less Russian as they pretty much ignored the Icelandic teenager's front door and walked through it as if it wasn't a solid object.

"I'd be guilty of killing my first Flame user." Admitted the thief bluntly. "Bjorno, Viper the Mist. Cherep's friend. Viper, this is my Lightning-Storm Lackey."

Viper merely tilted his head at the greeting. "I have a question, Sonya."

"I really have little to ask of you." She responded, still only somewhat sure the pronoun for the day was male and not female.

He wasn't wearing a skirt this time, at least. Heavy cloak still, and a tunic length long shirt under that made it hard to tell for sure.

The Storm-Cloud was sure he'd correct her if he didn't want to be male this time around.

Bjorno flicked his blue eyes up and down the Mist's form, then glanced at her skeptically for a long moment. "I will... get Viper a cup, then. And make more tea. Excuse me, Dama."

"I need some non-Mist information. Something isn't... right." The entirely uninvited visitor continued when the teenager left them for his kitchen.

"What do you mean non-Mist information?"

"...I think one of us is concealing something from any other Mist that might get suspicious. If I'm wrong, I can deal with that. But as it occurred to me when talking to your brother... ever been to Switzerland?"

"Once, with the Großes Volksfest. Do you want me to check in on that?" Sonya was a little confused on why the current man would want to know, but entirely willing to humor her brother's friend.

She couldn't visit Cherep on the road herself, not with the situation back home being as tense as it was. His doing it was rather appreciated, and as such made her more amiable to helping with whatever was going on. The Russian knew he was doing it, since she got sporadic postcards from her brother that occasionally mentioned the Mist.

Once in a while, she even sent the stuntman one back from the countries she was stealing things from. Hearing him spaz out about it when they met up again was usually funny.

Viper stalked over to the armchair that looked rather beaten up and slightly mismatched with the rest of her Lackey's furniture. It was at least green, which kept it from being entirely out of place from the floral-patterned couch. "I will pay ten euros for every topic you can give me, and fifty for anything I did not know myself."

"...thin on syndicates, mostly unaffiliated claim the country as territory. They all pretty much know one another, outsiders tended to stick out like I did." Started the thief slowly, as she tried to dredge her memory for the not entirely interesting country. "Pretty neutral, almost like a parody of the civilian views of the country. Mostly money laundering, the crime of choice seemed to be petty or tax evasion. No human trafficking, some drug trade, a few fences have properties there that occasionally substitute as storehouses. There was... a rumor, though..."
What had it been about?

She had thought it had been important, but almost promptly forgot about it. Not something she was going to make use of, but she had intended to remember it and the inability was starting to irritate her.

Something about the kind of bullshtitted mysticism that some Mists were known to spout off in their evasive ways, and something else…

Sonya clicked her tongue, now getting frustrated. She had made a point to remember, and she couldn't recall why.

"Bjorn!"

Her Lackey had made it through the country on his own, because that was still part of the time he had been trying to prove himself through sheer bullheaded stubbornness about how far he was willing to follow her.

A heavy if muffled clank, likely a kettle of water being hastily put down, and the blond teen darted back through to where they were seated. "Dama?"

"Switzerland. There was a rumor about something that heavily suggested Mist involvement. I can't remember what it was about."

He blinked at her clipped tone, blinked again, and then for a third time as his brow furrowed. "I... do know what you are talking about, Dama... but..."

"You don't remember either." As it was, it wasn't that suspicious.

Sonya hadn't been to the country in a few years, and neither had he.

Except for the fact she had wanted to remember whatever it was... and didn't. That might be just human memory failing but given Viper's highly suspicious expression, she wasn't putting money on that. Even if it was his money and not hers.

"Viper... I have a trade I'd like you to consider." It earned her a sideways look from the Mist counting out a stack of euros since they had contributed to whatever it was he was hunting for. "I want my Lackey to get a bit of experience in finances a criminal needs, but don't want him to go and get his nose bitten off. Play with my money but teach him how to manage it."

It was also a very convenient excuse to linger and make contacts or gather rumor in the business sector of Mafia Land. Which would have ties to Switzerland, especially since Swiss Bank accounts were just as popular as Sonya had figured they might be. She even had one, which was just simply sitting there getting stuffed with the extra money she had little use for if Bjorn didn't need it to live on.

Before she bought a house, she needed her mostly dirty money cleaned. It would be nice not to have to deal with Mafia Land's inflated prices or run a few thousand of whatever denomination through the laundering services here before going on a spree.

Viper likely caught on to some of the undertone she had, given the short nod the thief received and a hand-over of a hundred and sixty euros. Possibly the opportunity to not spend his own money to gain the information he wanted was as much of a temptation as she had figured on from Crina's griping about his miser-ness.
The Storm-Cloud handed it back over her head to her Lackey. "Also... I don't mind if you make him a contact point for whatever, as long as I get first dibs on his time. He's mine."

That earned her a bit of hesitation from the Mist. Until she finished her thought.

"I don't mind helping you out as muscle, as long as I get at least a heads up a week of time beforehand. This year is a little rocky, but next I will have even more leeway and possibly the year after very little restrictions."

He was Cherep's friend, and she was pretty sure her brother would mope something fierce if he up and died on the stuntman.

"Mou... that's rather generous of you." Viper commented rather neutrally, which she assumed was his overly cautious version of being highly suspicious but non-committal at the same time.

"Cherep's planning on asking you to come home with us for Christmas, if he hasn't asked you already." Sonya countered blandly. "Which means you're rather important to him, to drag you into a den of Clouds."

"... a den?"

"Four. Me, Cherep, our foster father who isn't active and his biological son who is too young to be active." She quirked a smirk for his jerk at the news, rather amused at his sedate reaction compared to what she was used to getting here about the so scary topic of Cloud Flame users. "You'll be safe with us, and it's really only for a night. We, or I am at least, are going to rent a hotel suite for the week."

"... I'll think about it." Viper's attention, or at least his hooded visage, turned to Björn. "Ensure you are prepared, tomorrow I'll start... instructing you. Mou, you better not cost me anything or prove to be foolish either."

"Ah... thank you?" Her Lackey called out in bewilderment as the Mist left the same way he came in. "... Dama? What was that?"

"I'm going to buy a house soon. But I need money that civilians or police can't trace back to any dirty dealings. Either you or Cherep are going to hold the title." Sonya got up from her spot on the couch, still ignoring the teapot of Russian Black Spiced Tea he nearly compulsively gave her whenever he had to interact with her. "Viper is very good with money and is going to teach you for a mostly innocent cover for any poking around he does here. Don't ask, merely learn. Speaking of... he's only sometimes male."

Apparently very little of whatever happened in his living room had made sense to the teenager, because the look he gave her was likely classified as 'scared to know'. "How is someone only sometimes male?"

"By appearing as female half the time. Although, I will admit that he seems to be male around me more than female." Shrugging that off, the thief curiously considered her Lackey as he absorbed that information. "Depending on how that Mist presents him or herself is how you know what pronoun or gender article to use. If in doubt, ask."

The Lightning-Storm didn't seem too squicked out at the thought of a gender-fluid Mist. It had probably yet to sink in, and if he screwed up and insulted Viper she would probably hear about it eventually.

"I think the next set of months we can spare is around August and September. Might be before that, even, depending on a few things. We're aiming for twelve on that go through, and I'll make up what we can't hit in November and the beginning of December."

"Sure… ah, Dama? Your tea?"

"I'll pass this time." Sonya glanced at his television, still blaring the life and times of one former President Eisenhower, which she had actually forgotten had been on.

Maybe, possibly, the teenager would stop trying to drown her in the stuff if she left him to handle the entire pot by himself. He hadn't liked her tea very much, and she knew he only stocked it for her rare visits.

At least the other pot he had going wasn't likely to be brewed. She wasn't that mean.

(ooo000000)

(Sunday the 30th of March, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Peter, huh?"

The self-proclaimed Peter flinched slightly, jerking around to face the doorway where Sonya stood.

Doctor Kappel pushed the half-moon spectacles up his beak of a nose with a long forefinger, then shrugged. "Nurse Primakova has scheduled his flights in and out for his checkups, and as long as he takes the supplements I've prescribed young Peter over there is free to go."

Since the thief had stopped at the greeting desk to get the paperwork finished for the Sun she found in Sierra Leone's Freetown, she had already known that. She even had the series of vitamins the doctor had dictated in her backpack already.

Which, frankly, added in with the cost of housing the man for a near month in a private hospital room with personal attendance by a Mafia Land doctor… had been damn expensive. "I am aware, and Tats has the schedule he needs to follow. Anything else?"

"He'll be easily tired for the short term, slightly more irritable and prone to depressive behavior." The German doctor gave a limp-wrist wave to dismiss the subject. "Long term effects are mostly just brittle bones, possible diet complications, and a susceptibility to diseases a bit more than any healthy individual."

"You know, it's rude to talk in front of others in a language one can't understand."

"Well, you are going to learn very quickly. We are leaving, Peter. For Moscow, Russia."

Scruffy opened his mouth, hesitated, then shut it with a tight nod. "Alright."

Sonya inspected her new Flame foundling closely. "Is that it? I expected more of a reaction."

"I did ask for this." Peter McScruffy, dubbed so by Tatiana, admitted wryly. "Of course, I wasn't expecting anything quite like this."

'This', by his expansive arm gesture, was the either the hospital or the entirety of Mafia Land.

Which she supposed she understood somewhat. She hadn't believed her ears either when Lisa first informed her of the island's existence.

Kappel sniffed, gave the thief that paid him to poke at the Sun for a few weeks a short nod, and wandered off. She ignored him after returning the nod, gesturing for the no longer skeletal looking man to follow her out of his previous temporary residence.

"The worst you will be expected to do is mess with a few more rocks and such like your diamond, and possibly end up teaching science to a bunch of secondary school students." Sonya admitted to the man, not entirely unsympathetic to the once civilian's situation. "I am a criminal, a thief, but so long as you remain useful I will ensure you are adequately protected and somewhat employed. Legally if you would rather, but I can work more with non-legal routes."

Scruffy gave her a sideways look as they made for the hospital's elevator. He really shouldn't be moving around so much, which is why she was scorning the stairs this time.

"Frankly," the man admitted blandly as they got into the empty elevator car, "I had thought you were a spy or something. Not a…"

"Member of the mafia?" Sonya finished for him. "Mafiya, where we are going, but the distinction is minor. You could think of me in such a way, it is true in a fashion. I am hired to do a lot of things, stealing is just one of them."

"There is an argument about morality and legal vs illegal acts in there I am not touching." Scruffy gripped mostly to himself, then he took a deep breath and actually looked at her fully. "I refuse to kill anyone."

"Fine."

His surprised expression should probably be funny, the thief wasn't in any kind of mood to appreciate it.

"Again, you can spend the rest of your life teaching a bunch of snot-nosed brats science if you would rather. As long as you keep your mouth shut and obey the vory and others I point out to you, I will consider it more than good enough after some years."

"In… and I take it doing more dubious things will get me a lighter sentence?"

"Helping me with categorizing Flame reactions to certain stones or crystals will help." Admitted the Storm-Cloud as the elevator doors opened up to the semi-harried looking lobby of Mafia Land's hospital. "Figuring out what else you can do with them is another. Teach a Sun or another Flame user how to do what you do with diamonds will work. Working as a labor and paying me back the three thousand in euros I just paid for you to get a clean bill of health is the very least of what you can do for me in return for dragging you along. On your insistence, might I add."

Scruffy might have frozen up the very moment they left the hospital's front doors had Sonya not gripped him by the elbow and kept him moving through sheer force.

"Do not freeze. Act as if you belong and you know what you are doing. We are leaving, you might never have to return here."

Of course, even with her propelling the man along his neck still craned about to gape at the criminals walking about boldly armed to the teeth. Next to family units who didn't so much as bat an eyelash at the same scene, from every walk of life, Mafia Land's streets were very… eye catching.

The thief didn't really want to learn why someone decided walking around with a grenade launcher was a good idea, and at least kept them moving fast enough that few would take umbrage to being stared at.

"I can walk, woman."
"Then stop making it so obvious you do not belong." Sonya snapped back, finally letting him go before she gave him a bruise. "And my name is Sonya Bazanova."

"I'm Peter, obviously." The so-claimed man muttered a little rebelliously, deciding that focusing on her was better than rubbernecking about.

"You are a terrible liar." Corrected the thief with a scoff. "My sister has named you Peter McScruffy. I'm calling you just Scruffy."

(Monday the 31st of March, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Renato Sinclair?"

The hitman shifted his head far enough back he could clearly see the lady that had come up to him from under the brim of his hat, even if he was trying to scare off anyone interested enough to try chatting his ear off.

While boring, hanging around Vongola's Iron Fort while Timoteo Vongola had meetings with various other Dons at least kept the other Guardian Flame users focused on him instead of picking petty fights with each other.

Of course, Vongola's Guardian Elements knew full well he wasn't a threat to their Sky and the allied Dons. The few other Guardian groups or bodyguards wouldn't want the hosting Don's security or Guardians to show them up by being hostile to a hitman lingering about.

There were still a lot of shiftly looks being thrown his way still.

Which was why it was boring, nothing more lethal would go his way beyond dirty glares. Anyone that tried would not only be shot but would likely be ripped apart by the Guardians in the expansive room.

Said lady that ignored the intimidating aura he was projecting to help keep the peace was a near typical Italian beauty, with curiously straight black hair, blue eyes, and a tattoo of... a seldom seen famiglia emblem under her left eye.

"Luce of the Giglio Nero, I presume?" This was odd, shouldn't she be in with the other Dons?

Renato knew full well women could be just as powerful or as nasty as men, he had lived on the streets for a time himself and seen Sonya grow into herself after all. A few interactions with Tatiana would've cured him of any illusions otherwise long before this if he had not.

He didn't really care she was both the Boss of a mafia Famiglia and female, unlike what he was pretty sure a lot of other Mafiosi seemed to think.

"We've taken a recess for the moment, while the heads of the Cavallone and Calcassa Famiglia come to an... understanding." Luce smiled serenely, lacing her fingers together and nodding to the few other Dons walking into the waiting lounge on her heels. "I've been meaning to talk to you, actually."

"Ho? Really."

"I was hoping for a better situation, or at least an introduction. But... well, needs must and all."
Ignoring his less than enthusiastic response, the woman gave him a few bats of her blue eyes. "I need a bit of security help, you see, and Timoteo suggested you might be interested. You are freelance, and without ties that would make hiring you a little tricky to smooth past my own Famiglia."

Renato cocked a skeptical eyebrow.

He had assumed, at first, she was approaching him because he was probably the strongest unattached Sun in the room. It wouldn't have been the first time a Sky had tried to hide a forceful Harmonizing attempt by chatting him up, a first for a female Sky but not an unknown situation.

Speaking of, the hitman glanced around the room using his fedora to shade his interest. No one was paying overt attention to him or her, except for the brunette bodyguard on the opposite side of the room. He was also looking rather disgruntled what was likely his charge chatting to a freelance hitman.

…she only had the one?

Most of the Dons invited to the Vongola Alliance meeting had shown up with as few as three or as many as six. Admittedly the Giglio Nero weren't a large famiglia, but they were an old and respected one.

Now a bit confused and probably more curious than it was warranted, he returned his attention to the pretty female Sky that had asked for his help. "What, exactly, seems to be the issue?"

She couldn't be that much older than him, why did she have no Guardians with her?

Luce's smile dimmed slightly. "One of my own tried to kill me. I need an unbiased set of eyes to help ensure the situation has been dealt with."

…and ah. That answered quite a few of the questions Renato had about the whole situation. The one guard was probably the one she knew without a doubt she could trust, and approaching a freelance hitman was likely her attempt to ensure her response had been enough without overlooking something due to her attachments to her Mafiosi.

Except for the no Guardian thing. If she had any, they weren't here. Having any would also mean she had pretty bad Guardians, for what Elements let their Sky wander about in territory not their own without so much as a Sun or a Cloud guard for the worst that might happen?

He probably wouldn't have given it another thought but… even Sonya was looking for Skies.

Mostly hidden as that interest was in finding one to help her with her already impressive research efforts, but she was. The Russian thief would likely never bond with a Sky, as her brother seemed to be her complete opposite and Dual Guardian Prospects both needed to accept the same Sky before they could bond. Hard Clouds were never the understanding or accepting sort, and Soft Clouds were rare enough very few had even heard of a live one to know what they were or were not in person.

Renato might not be looking for a Sky of his own, but he seemed rather odd in that respect. He only seemed to like Skies that already had Sun Guardians, because Skies without a Sun Guardian bond just irritated him.

Tyr was a bastard that could go jump off a bridge, otherwise the hitman would've been rather glad to say he liked Vongola Skies just fine and just disliked everyone else.

"I take it you'd like this dealt with as soon as possible?" He had a month and a couple weeks until Shamal got out of school, and he had to arrange a visit to Moscow Russia for the both of them.
"If possible." Luce confirmed, having waited patiently as he thought about her request. "The details… well, are you free this evening?"

"I'm not." If the damn bratty Mist heard he'd been in range but didn't stick around to visit him he'd whine to Sonya, and being the more responsible adult in their little bastardized situation was surprisingly rather fun.

Especially listening to the kid teasing the thief about her inability to be on time for personal things.

It wasn't like it had been unexpected, she had tended to disappear often from Mafia Land without word as a young teenager. Renato might know now she was dealing with her syndicate most of that time, but then he had no clue.

Besides, if the hitman didn't call in every week to remind the brat to feed his chameleon the Storm-Cloud would probably not follow through with buying Shamal a dog in a few years. He could just do it in person this week.

"Ah… here…?" Glancing around, most of the Dons had retreated to their personal grunts for the break and even Renato had to admit it was a terribly exposed venue to have a sensitive situation aired out for him. "Well…"

"You're a guest of Don Vongola, right? There's no reason you can't linger a bit after most the others leave or get interested in other subjects." The Sun offered idly, absently examining the relief that appeared on the Sky's face at his suggestion. "I'll see if I can't bother some of the staff to secure a meeting room for you."
(Tuesday the 1st of April, 1969. Mafia Land.)

If his lady knew of and wanted Viper the Mist to teach him how to manage the money she earned for her, Bjőrn was pretty sure that meant Sonya probably knew of and accepted the varied risks of giving the details on her accounts and earnings over to Mist Flame user.

At least, he was sort of sure of that as he handed the information the man had asked for. More like demanded from him after pounding on his front door at an obscene hour of dawn before informing him shortly of where to go once he had it gathered together.

Her Lackey just… wasn’t sure about the mechanics of what his patron wanted the other to be allowed. He had a surprising amount of free range with her personal affairs, but he had been very cautious exercising those rights since the Storm-Cloud could very well take offense if he did something wrong.

Nor was he really all that confident in being instructed in anything by Viper, but since Sonya had arranged it for him that was the lesser concern.

Handing over the details of his patron's accounts seemed a little… unwise to him. He did so anyways, bringing it with him to the meeting point set at a little corner bistro, because the Mist had a point in demanding to know just how much was available to teach him from.

Viper seemed rather… focused on those details once he had them in hand. More than the accounts of someone else's really required.

Admittedly, Bjőrn might be a little predisposed to take umbrage with the other. Mornings weren't his best hours. Demanding some of the personal information about his patron pretty much killed whatever little goodwill the Lackey had for the whole situation.

Sonya rose before the sun just as much as Viper seemed to, but at least she was well aware that most others didn't like being up at the same hours as her. She would let him sleep in if he wasn't needed.

"Stop pouting." The Mist shot at him irritably, making notations with a Mist-pen all over the account statements Bjőrn received more than his employer did. "You are a nearly full-grown man, pouting shouldn't be something you still do."

"I am not pouting." He denied practically on reflex, before he really thought about it and realized he might have a point with that. "I'm glowering."

He didn't have to admit it.

There was an impression of the other rolling his eyes, and how that was possible when half of his face was shaded by a cowl the Lightning-Storm was chalking up to Mist Flames. Viper seemed highly disinclined to remove the fabric, from what little he had seen so far. "I have a quick question, then we'll get on with it. This one… the safety deposit box. Anything I should know about that?"

No, the Icelander thought rather stubbornly. It contained the gold bars his patron hoarded and mainly used to pay off their Zolotov clan dues, and if he touched that she would likely come back and slap him into a wall or three.

Sonya really preferred to have that kind of thing almost at hand instead of try scrambling to secure it
As far as Bjørn was aware, his 'instruction' was only limited to cash finances, not tradable goods. Obviously, something of import was held in the Mafia Land bank's safety deposit boxes but then again that's why the island had a bank in the first place. Not necessarily something valuable, but important to his patron.

Claiming there wasn't anything the Esper needed to know in there was just good sense.

Viper seemed disinclined to believe him, but shrug that off. "Fine… mou. First thing first, you need new clothes."

"I… what?"

"You look like someone picked you up off the street." Clarified the Mist shortly, gathering the information Bjørn had brought with up into a neat pile. "No one, and I do mean no one, where we are going will take you seriously if you dress like a punk and try to engage their services. This is white collar crime, idiot. Mou… you won't be able to afford it, so…"

Shuffling, he picked one sheet out of the stack and laid it out before the Lackey.

"…your Dama will just have to pay the bill."

Bjørn tried really hard not to blanch. The euro account held most of Sonya's ready cash and was where the money she earned on her contracts eventually ended up, merely because it was a wide-ranging currency that had decent rates when switched over to others once he knew what was needed.

While he knew he could spend it, and his patron would probably understand the reason why, justifying his expenditures to her was still rather a nerve-wracking ordeal.

He had only recently taken her up on the permission to go where he willed, and even doing that small offer she gave him a while ago made him nervous. If he was gone when she needed something…

Viper clicked his tongue after a moment. "You also need acting lessons… so transparent for a thief's assistant. Well, mou… I can ensure I am well compensated for this…"

That was the only warning the Lackey got before something heavy, cold, and conversely burning hot at the same time bypassed his skull and slammed into his brain.

His only thought was that brain freeze had nothing on the sensation.

Blinking rapidly as the impression of frostbite in his mind faded, Bjørn suddenly realized he knew things he knew he hadn't known. Said things also had a very pointed emphasis on keeping a straight face.

"Shut your mouth." The Mist that had just assaulted him ordered shortly, rising from his chair fluidly as if overwhelming the Lightning-Storm's Flames with his own Mist ones had been no challenge to him. "It's unseemly."

Taking a moment to shake off the frosty feeling on his brain, he scrambled after his 'teacher'. "What… what the hell was that?"

"Mist Flames. Obviously." Viper shot over one shoulder, making decent progress against the foot traffic of Mafia Land. Bjørn had less luck against the same tide of human movement but then again,
"You'll eventually learn the muscle memory yourself, but I did give you a compulsion to obey the impulses and I suppose that must feel weird." Clarified the Mist rather thoughtfully, until he kept on going. "Your Flame will eventually burn it out, so it'll need to be done a few more times until you actually learn the skill. Something else that might just cost your patron a bit more, mou. Unless, of course, you prove to be a most attentive pupil."

Bjørn did not swallow hard. He wanted to.

"Now then, go buy yourself two suites. Tailored, allow the clerk to coordinate the color until you learn how to do it yourself."

When he merely stared at the other instead of entering the store waved at, the Esper aimed a very evil looking grin at him.

"Mou… I suppose I could make a Construct of you to do it… if you're that scared. Another thing—"

The Lightning-Storm didn't need to hear how that would end. He also didn't want to know how much Viper's tastes would cost his patron. All but running, he darted into the store before the Mist decided more of his services were needed.

Which left him in the lobby of a tailor's shop, being narrowly glared at by the impeccably dressed proprietor for the doors banging against some of the displays near the storefront.

The only reason he didn't flinch was due to Mist Flame compelled self-control.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 1st of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Ziven isn't back yet."

Sonya paused momentarily at Galina's greeting, almost causing Peter McScruffy to run into her back.

While she wasn't exactly surprised the vor wasn't back just yet, it was also becoming a little alarming. The Lightning would've said if he had called or contacted her in any way, and the thief had thought their fellow criminal would've at least sent word he was still among the living somehow by now.

She'd have to venture into the other Cloud's territory for a bit, if only to ensure Ziven was perfectly fine. Risky, because she fully intended to hold herself to that 'see me again and it will be the last thing you see' threat.

Lying to another Cloud, even if by accident or omission, would do her no favors nor would it allow the baby-Cloud to respect her or take heed of her advice. Especially not when they had issues even seeing each other.

She only gave a distracted dismissive glance to the Sun nervously hovering behind her before continuing on her way.
"Sonya?"

"I'll go fetch him." Glancing again at the man over her shoulder, then back to the other woman, the thief resigned herself to not taking a rest day before going back to work. "Put him somewhere contained, in fact get him a room at the hotel I stay at and charge it to my account. He's got to learn Russian before we can make more use of him other than as another pair of hands."

Galina blinked, pulling herself upright enough it almost looked as if she was taken aback momentarily. "...now? You just got back."

Shrugging, the Storm-Cloud motioned for her newfound Sun to follow. "I didn't give him a time to return by, checking up on him is merely due."

Actually making to leave Domodedovo International Airport made Scruffy become even more nervous than he had been already. Apparently flying by foreign airlines was not quite as intimidating as walking into a city you didn't speak a language of.

Sonya might actually be wrong in that or could be entirely off in her assumption, but frankly she also didn't really care much. He had asked for this, so he could damn well put up with the feelings it caused him.

Galina led the two of them out the street access doors, unlike the Storm-Cloud's normal habits which was to take the train to the other side of south Moscow. Given Ziven was not available, the Lightning snagging another vor to drive her about was expected.

The identity of the two she had acquired to do said driving, on the other hand…

Half of the Four Rains were waiting by a car she could dimly recognize from being driven around. Irinei and Kazimir, the sea colored vor looked rather compacted next to his fellow beanpole looking Rain.

Glancing to the woman who was looking back at her to gauge her reaction, the thief sighed even as they continued to move away from the crush of people either entering or leaving the airport. "Now I want to know."

"I'll tell you in the car." Came the firm, but entirely toneless, promise.

Shooting both men a look of her own, the Lightning rounded the vehicle and Kazimir quickly jumped to open the car door for her.

Sonya paused only long enough for Scruffy to get the idea that he would be sitting in the middle of the backseat's bench, slinging the greater bulk of her luggage at Irinei once the Sun finally started moving forward again.

"So... the Four Rains have decided to be somewhat useful. Finally." Galina started off absently in an entirely sarcastic tone, inspecting the painfully thin man sitting between the two women curiously and ignoring his fidgeting. "Fadei sent us Irinei first, obviously. Kazimir only the third to pass over to us actually, Zarya is doing secretary things for Gedeon and has been for... almost two days now."

"...what?" Demanded the thief irritably, wondering what kind of bullshit the lone female Rain could be up to.

They had enough trouble with the painfully new Sun, both of them, they didn't need anymore.

With how easily led the Rains had proven to be, Sonya was not happy to hear one of them had gotten attached to someone perfectly capable of protecting them from any damage they might end up doing. Especially not someone that was genuinely higher placed than she was.

"Rya's not making trouble... Bazanova." Kazimir started lowly, not particularly pleasant sounding but not hostile yet either. "She just wanted something to do but refused to consider you."

Given the Storm-Cloud had probably badly intimidated the woman, as well as stripping whatever illusion of protection she might have had with her fellow Rains, she wasn't surprised to hear it. If that was it, she could sort of respect the younger woman for trying to attach herself to Gedeon.

She'd still look hard at that situation. Regardless of any excuse, it was still an alarming event.

Even if Zarya wanted to avoid Sonya, she wouldn't be able to. She wouldn't allow that kind of bullshit maneuvering under her nose.

"No. I will not allow anyone to screw up that particular situation." She snarled out, ticked off and rapidly approaching angry. "Galina, I want to see her. Even if it takes a damn week, I want to hear from her what the hell she thinks she's doing."

"Miss Bazanova-"

Sonya cut their driver off. "You are adults. ACT like it. This pissing match has gone a touch too far, and frankly killing you all is looking like the more attractive option to deal with."

Irinei was tall enough she could fully see his shoulders over the driver's seat, and how they tensed up at her tone. She had no pity for him.

"She's trying to go over my head, but what she and your insipid leader doesn't know is that for the time being Gedeon is one of mine right now. Tough shit."

Kazimir, who didn't need to pay attention to the road or fellow drivers, glanced from his fellow Rain to Galina and then back to the thief. "I don't think you understand what it's like, Bazanova, to work with others of your Flame type. What-"

She hadn't actually intended to cut him off, but the bitter sounding laugh did it for her anyways when she couldn't keep it in.

Sonya knew perfectly well what it was like, and then had to let her fellow Cloud go or risk entrapping him in the same chains she was burdened by. Cherep was happier as a stuntman, which made it almost worth it.

"She knows better than you think." Galina offered lowly, occupying herself by sorting through the messenger bag that passed as her purse.

"So... the tense part is over with, yes?"

The thief gave her new... minion a sideways glace. "That had nothing at all to do with you."

"Lovely." Scruffy's thin shoulders drooped, and with a sigh glanced at the Russians surrounding him. "Not knowing the language is going to be harder than I thought, isn't it?"

"You will learn, eventually. Immersion is a very hard way to learn another language, but it is effective." Sonya crossed her arms under her chest, looking out her window for the lack of anything else neutral to stare at.
This was going to be a very awkward car ride, especially since she likely pissed off the driver and his friend then possibly reminded Galina of her memories of working with another Flame user.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 1st of April, 1969 continued. Khimki, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"So, now what's your plan?" Ziven asked the young brat cheerfully when one of his little runners brought the news a painfully familiar sounding tiny blond woman was standing smack dab in the middle of his territory.

Dorokhov Timur, otherwise known as the Khimki Cloud, glanced at him skeptically.

"She's not going to just go away. One thing you can call Sonya is stubborn." The vor continued pleasantly, going through the motions of sharpening a knife that was already sharp.

He apparently hadn't quite understood what 'Cloud' meant, before this anyways.

He got a crash course in how possessive and argumentative they could be, that the only other Cloud he had met had long since learned to swallow in favor of being a follower rather than a leader.

Sonya leading actually held its own bumps, but nowhere near how much trouble this brat of a kid caused him after offering a bit of help. She had expected him to slide under any territorial-ness her fellow Cloud held, but that hadn't happened.

Ziven offering the kid some help cemented that to him, rather than his lack of Flames preventing such a thing.

He must not have had whatever Sonya looked for in her few followers. It really was the only thing he could think of on why one Cloud didn't regard him that much and why another would.

Frankly, Ziven hadn't really minded. He knew himself well enough to understand he was a follower and not a leader, whose lead mattered only a little in ensuring he wasn't betrayed easily. Tatiana had been a fine leader, Nikolai had been a stricter but just as good as the safe-cracker turned Sun nurse.

Sonya might be a different breed of beast than her sister, but Galina had made up for her disinterest in him.

Little depressing, in how much damage a Cloud Flame user could shrug off or deal out depending on their temper, but frankly he had gotten the time to seriously consider that before this.

The Khimki Cloud was pretty young, newly installed as the leader of a hastily made street gang. He was still learning the ropes, working out how to keep his gang members going in the same direction instead of being all over the place.

During his time here, he had figured out the young Cloud's ability was more of an explosive expansion within a small area. He didn't need the Zolotov Storm-Cloud's inhuman strength to break things, his Flames just caused things to 'boil over' on demand where he touched. Timur could also expand air, in pressurized waves, if desperate enough.

It packed one hell of a punch to be hit by, the vor could say with unfortunate experience. More than enough force behind it to take out a wall or two, or load bearing walls if the Cloud was desperate enough.
Timur did not want his 'windfall' to go. Someone who could identify non-Moscow vor and instruct his little gang members in how to defend themselves without needing to rely on purple Flames he could not teach them. The kid was short of word and expressive in strength, meaning Ziven had to do some fancy footwork to keep his head attached at first.

However, the vor had prior commitments to handle.

"She did threaten to kill you if you saw her again." Ziven tacked on thoughtfully. "You could either lose your entire operation here, face her and get killed, or give in for the time being until I can come back."

His wave to their 'base', the underground of an abandoned warehouse recently repurchased and fitted more as a tiny safe house, and the few gutter brats that were taking advantage of the free warmth.

Hopefully Sonya would make good on her promise to pay him back, otherwise Ziven was out a pretty kopeck for offering the money to buy it outright. Just having someplace secure had done a minor wonder on the teenage Cloud, making him less edgy and jumpy but also making him reluctant to wander too far.

He had gotten a very pointed demonstration that several people would and could go after him, for both obvious and not reasons.

"You know perfectly well your boys will not stand up to her for long."

Timur scowled at that reminder, all but sulking as he nursed his grudge against the Zolotov Storm-Cloud.

The vor tried not to smirk, because the kid really was pouting more than scowling. "You have my word I will come back, but I do have things I have to handle back home. If you force Sonya to come out to fetch me every time…?"

"Fine." Bit out the Khimki Cloud, giving him a seething glare. "Hurry up."

Ziven uncoiled himself hurriedly, sheathing the knife back in a boot and giving the tetchy boss-in-training a backwards wave. "I wouldn't expect it to be more than a day at most."

Picking his way out of the cozy little nook took less time than winding his way in, the various brats lingering around knew full well only their leader could prevent the vor from going where he would. Two doors, a staircase between, then a bit of hallway and passing one more lookout got the man out of the 'den' the young Cloud had made himself.

Sonya was waiting not too far away, looking supremely bored as she stared up at the lightly falling snow. Probably the last they'd see until fall came around again. "Galina was not pleased to lack even a phone call."

"She set you up to come out here?"

"No, I came myself." Corrected the Storm-Cloud absently, still not entirely willing to move just yet. "Is there a reason it took so long?"

"Not done yet." It earned him a sideways look from her.

Sonya wasn't Ziven's ideal leader, but she was her own type of one that seemed decent enough. She was standing there, at least.
"Interesting." She decided on after a moment. "Try to check in at least once a week, if you could."

"I'll try." Actually, that sounded like blanket permission to skip out on anything else they had going on. "What about my part of the school? Or even Gedeon?"

"...pretty sure we can find someone else to cover it." She dismissed absently, finally moving to leave her fellow Cloud's territory now that he had shown up. "Physical education for the boys is easy enough, it was just something you could do. As for Gedeon... I'll think of something."

Ouch. Well... at least she had been honest enough over not having much for him to do for her.

"You can get back to it today, even, as long as you spend some time reassuring Galina you're not about to drop dead."

Ziven smirked a little lopsidedly as he followed her down the streets. "I'll just do that, then."

---

(Wednesday the 2nd of April, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya just wanted to sigh, really.

Usov looked entirely unrepentant as he stood before her and her borrowed desk, rocking back and forth a little on his heels as he spoke. "They've gone after the younger ones, trying to make it out to seem as if you are some kind of cruel monster using those rumors we hear about what you've gotten up to. We Mists saw through them pretty easily, but they did get Mikhail of the Storms solidly in their corner. The younger Rains are confused but will go with the older ones if it comes down to it."

"What do I care?" She questioned tiredly, trying again to transfer the writing of a three-hundred-year-old letter to another piece of paper so she could try translating it.

The only other one left in the borrowed office aside the two of them was Scruffy, seated on the couch pushed up against a wall and pretending his fascinated interest in a Russian to English dictionary she once chucked at her brother's head. Everyone else who had been in there, Galina and Gedeon with a suspiciously lurking Kazimir, had suddenly either recalled something they had to do right away or something important they had to check up on right now.

The sharp exodus had made the thief suspicious, so when the normally well-prepared Lightning had run off in her impractical heels Sonya had quietly armed herself. It hadn't been needed, frankly.

The tetchy young Mist Usov wasn't anywhere near annoying or as dangerous as Cherep's friend Viper and was surprisingly loyal to her for a kid she rarely interacted with the last couple years. He had grown up little, possessing the thin edge of recent rapid maturity to his features that hadn't had the time to fill out yet most children approaching their teenage years had. Still shorter than her, but from the looks of it not for long.

Almost twelve years in age, and in a position even more awkward than Sonya's. The oldest of the Zolotov Mists, but the youngest of the Flame users she had specifically taught something to. Second 'generation' so to say, after her, Tatiana, and Dmitriy.

If the Storm-Cloud's rank as the most senior clan Flame user when she was only seventeen seemed strange to someone like Fadei or Gedeon, Usov's was entirely mind-boggling. He taught the Mists that came to the clan to learn about controlling their Dying Will and how a Mist's Construction might work for them, despite not being much younger than she had been when she finally managed to summon her own Flames on purpose.

He shrugged rather more expansively than humanly possible to her question. "Very little, I can guess. Perhaps you should though, if they succeed…"

"They would have to kill me." Sonya countered shortly, eyeing fragile paper in hopes of being able to magically pull the lost words from it somehow. "And that is something I am highly skeptical they can pull off."

"They might not be able to, but they can interrupt and damage some of the work you're putting into the clan." Promised Usov airily, waving one Mist-coated hand in the air. "Possibly setting a few things back by years if you don’t do something."

Likely he was trying to keep their conversation from another witness or trying to influence her somehow. Since she didn't find within her a sudden urge to rally the various Flame trainees, and her Storm Flames were pulling internal 'immunity' duty but there was no flare up, she guessed the former option.

Scruffy didn't fully understand, from the cautious looks he was shooting them. The Sun's presence was being somewhat ignored, which he seemed perfectly fine with. Had been that way for the last few days, but she really should work on him with learning the language sometime soon.

Finally giving in to the impulse to sigh, Sonya replaced her work on her desk and regarded her latest visitor fully. "I still don't really care too much, but you are right in that point."

"So! What are my marching orders then?"

"…I believe I told Fadei that if he didn't behave I would bribe the Mists to give him nightmares and migraines." Drumming the fingers of one hand on her desk, she thoughtfully stared at her ceiling for several moments before glancing down again. "Usov… could you do me a little favor?"

The preteen smirked at her wryly. "Of course, Sonya! I would be delighted to."

"Then my bribe goes to you."

The faint smirk took on a strong wicked edge to it. "Wonderful."

"I need Galina back." Sonya continued after nodding to show she accepted that. "Did Gedeon get involved with this?"

"He's trying to play neutral." Usov explained with a disgusted sniff. "Badly, may I add. You really didn’t win yourself very many friends lately… or that might just be because you were gone for a few days and he had no access to you."

With a sigh, she waved one hand lazily. "Kid, I have trouble dealing with a lot of people without trying to either murder or maim them. I have few friends, and I actually like it that way."

That admission made him huff wryly. "I remember how you stiffened up whenever I gave you a hug years ago, Sonya. I understand, even if I will poke fun at you for it. I take it that was why you absconded for Mafia Land as fast as you could the moment you could?"

"That was why Dmitriy was in charge, yes." She corrected tartly, slightly miffed.

He planted his feet on the floorboards before her borrowed desk, even as the office door banged open to allow a highly suspicious Galina back into the office, and he peered over the desk to see what she was so distracted by. "Who are you going to start with?"

"Me? No one yet. I'm just going to be here. Galina is going to go sound out the baby Lightnings under the excuse of running a few errands for me, and I need you to get out of here without being seen and talk to Andrei and his Suns about meeting me in a little while. I am going to sit here, being watched by a few Rains that shall be unnamed. Eventually I might have to go myself to talk to the Storms in secret, but that can wait a little bit."

Grinning, the still rather young Flame user bounced on the balls of his feet with more glee than he started this whole conversation with. "You're going to usurp the bulk of their attempt to overthrow you, without lifting a finger? How... wicked."

The Storm-Cloud gave him a bland smirk of her own. "I have no idea what you mean."

"I'm sure." Scoffed Usov, his sarcastic tone not doing a damn thing to his smirk. "Last item, how much will I have to do to change that bribe into a favor? I have my own graduation heist coming up, and a safety net would be most appreciated."

"It's done alone for a reason, kid. Unless... you want to go for a very big target."

"How big would you consider the KGB?" The Mist asked lightly, rocking back on his heels.

"I'd consider that suicidal, not big." Sonya admitted frankly. "What the hell, Usov? You're not even in your teens yet."

"One, that's a little hypocritical coming from you. And two, I want to meet a member of the Vindice. Without, you know, being arrested for it." He announced cheerfully. As if that wasn't alarming. "A little birdy also told me you made mention of checking to ensure the KGB had no information on our little parlor tricks."

"Who are the Vindlece?" Galina demanded shortly, looking slightly harried and a little more than disgruntled with the Mist in Sonya's presence as she recovered her mental balance from whatever he had done to her to chase her out with the rest of her temporary guest.

"Haven't you wondered who policed Omertà?" Asked the Storm-Cloud instead of allowing Usov to explain what he knew of the Mafia Enforcers, looking at her with a measure of curiosity.

"We do... don't we?"

"The small things, yes. The bigger incidents? No. The Vindice do that." She glanced from the very first Mist she ever aided to her Lightning assistant. "No one wants the attention of Vindice to fall on them, Galina. Except, apparently, very mental Mists."

"I resemble that remark." Said Mist sniffed in mock hurt. "Besides, didn't you have questions for them? I was rather sure of that."

"...Usov, have you been spying on me?"

"You're more interesting than untangling new Mists from their own Constructions." Claimed the likely no longer mentally stable preteen Flame user, his hands making an expansive wave in the air as he pulled a comparison out of it. "Like a radio drama, or one of those televised cartoons. It's interesting."

"You're repeating yourself." Sonya pointed out blandly, settling back in her borrowed office chair. "I will agree to aid you, on the condition you start small and work your way to something that... risky."

"If we do, they might catch on and try to arm themselves against me."

"Usov, you're not going to be waltzing into the offices of the KGB tomorrow. Spread it out, learn how to make your changes overlooked, how to hide the information, and trace agents back to their various bolt-holes. But take the time to do it right, on the first and likely only opportunity you're going to have."

"That's... depressingly sensible, I suppose." Usov frowned as he puzzled that over, glancing from the Storm-Cloud to the Lightning and then to the still very bewildered Sun. "Fine. I will take baby steps."

The Mist glanced at all three of them again, then stepped forward and tapped the glass she had been working on once before taking one step back and allowing himself to be immolated by his own Flames.

The thief scowled slightly, irked by his gall in cheating an answer for her on what she had been trying to do herself. Now as Mist Flame imbued glass, it was showing her a glimmering dark blue tracing where the words were once written on an ancient piece of paper.

The door Galina had shut behind her banged open again, spilling Kazimir into the office.

Sonya sniffed, decided to take the offered assistance Usov had left her with, and pulled a new clean sheet of paper. She had screwed up the latest attempt from what the Mist Flames were telling her. "Was there something you needed, Kazimir?"

The man glared at her, shooting glances at the irked Lightning he had almost ran smack into and the uncomprehending Sun shooting a strange look of his own at him, and straightened up hastily. "No."

"Is there a reason, then, for you wasting time in this office?"

Obviously there was, frankly she had been getting suspicious ever since Irinei got cozy with Gedeon last week.

Rains were supposed to be patient, right?

They weren't toeing that line, even remotely. Not quite purely Classic in nature then.

"Fadei needs me somewhere accessible just in case. Why? Am I not welcome here?"

"Not really. Do something useful for a change instead of waste time." The thief admitted frankly, glancing at Galina. "How long until I can arrange a meeting with Dmitriy?"

"You're on the waiting list already, Sonya." Promised the Lightning pleasantly, giving the paperwork which she had somehow decided was more important than awaiting an opportunity to talk to her without eavesdroppers an odd look. "Although, speaking of appointments, did you remember the one with the superintendent of the school district yesterday?"

"Yes, and I think I might have scared him. He was very relieved to learn I was only the librarian."

She offered the papers to her, and it was mostly out of sheer curiosity that the Storm-Cloud took them to see what had become so important to her under the influence of Mist Flames.

Galina had made up a list of the sixty plus Flame users currently looking to the Zolotov Clan for guidance, with various little tick marks next to their names in several colors.

She could understand what the blue and purple were for, obviously Fadei's reach compared to her own. Their names were even helpfully written in those colors. There were a few green and yellow marks, a tiny handful of reds, and a fair number of dark blues.

The older woman was trying to warn her without being too obvious about it or being overheard. Three days of having one of the Four Rains somewhere within hearing range was obviously starting to irk her.

Making a mental correction and giving herself at least half the Mists due to Usov’s influences alone, the Storm-Cloud still wasn't too worried about the Rains' planned 'mutiny'.

The Suns were more loyal to Tatiana than Gedeon, if only by sheer effort she had spent helping them out over the years during her rare visits. The nurse was still more popular than the son of their Pahkan, and if the vor didn't expressly order them to follow the Rains' lead they would at worst abstain from any internal conflicts. Since he was trying to pull off 'neutral', that wasn't likely to happen.

As for the loose Storms… Sonya wasn't the only one that didn't like Mikhail.

The rather arrogant Storm user had burnt a lot of bridges behind him, mostly the ones he found unimportant in his fixated quest to become vor. If he went along with Fadei's plans, half the rest of the Storms would flock to Sonya's 'side' out of sheer spite and drag the undecided to her from numbers alone.

Since Galina was the only one that seemed to bother with the Lightnings, they would follow the brunette unless one of the Four Rains was trying hard to recruit them from under her. It didn't seem like it, since her aide had checked off all the Lightnings with purple tick marks.

Which just left the Rains. Depressing if they lost a large number of them but… not exactly a formidable array of Flame users against a Storm-Cloud.

She needed to talk to the young Storms and Rains, before Fadei tried something suicidal.

…who was watching the possible Sky and his family, with Dmitriy in prison?

That, and the Khimki Cloud, were two issues she would have to wait on checking up for. Not with things so… unstable right now.

Hopefully Ziven could keep a lid on things on his own for a while, but the moment someone realized there was still a mostly grown Cloud in that territory… some very nasty shit might very well hit a massive fan.

If she moved fast enough, she might be able to settle all of the mess just before summer. Maybe Shamal could visit this year…

"If I can ask…?"

"How much did you understand?"

"Only a little." Scruffy admitted sourly, giving an ugly look to the book settled in his lap. "What is going on?"

"Internal conflict, I suppose. Not much of a conflict when the odds are so skewed, but it could be seen as an admirable effort... maybe." Sonya shrugged it off, placing the paperwork on her discarded pile of failed attempts at translating a long dead Frenchman's last words. "I am going to place you with our younger Suns until you can reliably speak Russian, hope you do not mind."

"Err… alright?" His tone was somewhat alarmed, given he probably didn't understand how bloodthirsty criminal infighting could become.

Possibly he did. She had yet to get the man's full story. It was entirely possible he had seen more than most civilians did about how criminal syndicates could pit against itself than she figured.

"Galina, we're also going to need a list of names from Lisa about how many students they've got right now." Continued the thief in their ‘native’ language, finally tracing a clean copy of the Middle French written long ago to translate later. She was a little skeptical that Mist Flames would make a faithful tracing of the dead Arcobaleno of the Storm's letter, but that could be checked against this later on. "And some kind of estimation of where everyone is in their education compared to the civilian institutions."

She vaguely noted Kazimir trying to inch to her desk to do… something. Which she was in no mood to tolerate.

A look pinned him in place, and she decided to be prudent about the information she was handling. Taking back the list Galina had offered to her, she wrote her foster mother a short note on another clean sheet and handed both it and the list back to the Lightning.

"Ask Lisa to finish filling out our roster of students, if she could."

"Of course." She shot Kazimir an ugly look as she folded the papers under her arm, then turned on her heel to stalk back out of the office.

Thwarted, the Rain decided to silently harass Sonya's latest foundling. The Sun, who had probably dealt with more threatening things in the last year than a want-to-be-vor with illusions of grandeur, ignored him in favor of looking up more vocabulary for his language studies.

Rubbing at her faintly tense temple, she vaguely wondered what Dmitriy would say if she ended up killing his protégé or his little irritating minions.

Since leaving things as they were wasn't an option, and since she really didn't want to hand the Flame user section of the clan back to the Inverted Rain when it was starting to break down, she had to put even more effort into fixing things up.

She did not appreciate it and intended for the ones being difficult to become painfully aware of that fact.

Apparently, she needed to start with correcting how others saw her here first before tackling how those in Mafia Land saw her. Maybe if she considered it a dry practice run, she would be less irritated at having to do something like this at all?

---

(Thursday the 3rd of April, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

As there were no Skies or additional Clouds in the Zolotov Clan, not yet as Valera was too young to be added and finding another Inverted Cloud would be near-impossible from the look of things, the only Storm-Cloud started with the Suns.
Usov the Mist more than likely had gone straight from her office to them, so she didn't particularly feel as if she was rushing anything.

Andrei the Sun was the next most senior Flame user of the group, discounting Tatiana and Gedeon. Since Sonya's sister was still a mostly full-time resident of Mafia Land in the process of getting her nurse's residency out of the way before tackling trying to get her doctor's license, the son of their Pahkan was actually 'in charge' of the Sun Flame users when it came to day-to-day things.

However, because Gedeon was so painfully new to his Dying Will Flames and has his own responsibilities as a vor and son of a syndicate boss to handle on top of everything else, it was the barely fifteen-year-old Sun conducting and overseeing their day-to-day training.

Giving her Scruffy over to Andrei was relatively painless. "I need you to teach him to speak in Russian, and possibly learn how to use a diamond as he can."

Gedeon was lurking in the back of the warehouse-turned-practice building the bare two score of Suns had taken over, as they needed the space to bleed off any excess energy without irritating other Flame users, either trying to keep an eye on her or give a more solid impression of neutrality in the rather laughable 'struggle' between the Four Rains and Sonya. If he was ticked off or even miffed she was handing the foreign Sun to Andrei instead of him, she didn't care much.

Peter McScruffy went sort-of willingly enough. They were all painfully young looking to be unassuming at first glance, and if you overlooked most of them were raised or trained by criminals they didn't seem all that intimidating. He seemed slightly awkward under the sudden scrutiny, but that could be attributed to a lot of other things like being the center of attention by people he probably wouldn't understand any if they tried talking to him.

The brunette teenager, the one with a slightly baffling ability to Activate machinery from a distance and was the first ‘found’ and not taught Flame user of the clan, gave a short nod. "Anything else?"

"Since I'm here, yes. Any questions, concerns, or just warnings you would like noted down for future Suns?" Sonya dug a new blank journal Galina had sourced for her out of her bag of a purse, snagging a couple pencils as well. "I've also got the notes Galina had on you all from last year. I'd like it if you could compare them to how you all are now for general Flame growth patterns."

Andrei chewed on his lower lip for a moment as he studied her but shrugged and accepted the paperwork she handed him to peruse for a moment. The thief's Lightning assistant was doing the same thing with her fellows, and once he heard of any such rumors Usov would likely do his own section in short order.

She had two hopes for this 'annual check-up'.

First, while she didn't greatly care about her own reputation she was well aware it wasn't a nice one. Supposedly, she was a scary beast of a Cloud and ruthless bitch with a temper that went off at a drop of a pin. Which was actually and honestly true, mainly a reputation based from a lingering legacy from her childhood hunting those that inconvenienced her siblings now labeling her rather short-tempered and completely unreasonable.

Galina would laugh if any of her Lightnings asked if it was true, and maybe would fan the flames a little but would correct the gross exaggerations. Usov's Mists would verify the information themselves at least, or that was the impression she had gotten from talking to their 'leader'.

Which left the Suns, Rains, and Storms hanging when sorting out truth from old and new rumors about her.
Tatiana was another that might poke the situation for laughs before correcting it, but since she wasn't here Sonya had to do it herself. The blonde was technically the most senior Storm, and as for the Rains…

…she was going to handle that last.

Her second hope was possibly getting the young Flame users to talk and exchange tips with each other. She didn't know if they did on their own or not, Tatiana was again missing too often to tell her and Gedeon missed about as many Sun gatherings as she did for various other reasons.

The only other person that could tell her was Andrei, and he probably didn't know her well enough to walk up to her borrowed office and offer that kind of information on his own.

"Klava figured out how to do that 'Activate nerves' thing." The third eldest Sun user of the Zolotov clan started surprisingly steadily as he made a few marks on the paperwork with a borrowed pencil. "Klavdia I mean. Without needing to ask your sister for tips."

He waved behind himself to the girl in question, who seemed pretty stoic for a Sun user. A rose haired girl with green eyes, standing slight apart from her fellow Suns. Those she knew for a fact were Classic, but if the girl wasn't 'with' them then…

Solidly Inverted Sonya decided, after considering the preteen in question for a moment and getting a surprisingly level stare back for her trouble. Not quite Renato levels of arrogance or anything like snobbishness to someone not a Sun, but a healthy amount of challenge in her gaze to the 'outsider'.

Thankfully not nearly enough to trip off any 'Cloudy-ness' impulses she had to her leadership.

Girl was playing with fire, there.

She did wonder if that meant they would have a torture specializing Sun in a few years. Would she need medic lessons, and if so would she get them from Tatiana?

"Aside that, it's mostly more of the same of what we've already figured out. In… interesting applications, sometimes." Andrei continued leadingly, which made their audience of Suns stir a little and exchange a few pointed looks as he put the year-old records aside likely to fill out the rest later. "We are having a little trouble bleeding off the excess energy, honesty. Any advice for that?"

"…exercise, more in the lines of a full out spar. Possibly a marathon? Tatiana somewhat recently found martial arts helped her out greatly, might be the same for you all." Decided the thief after a moment. She was not going to mention her elder sister's other preferred method of blowing off her extra energy. Way too young of an audience for that. "Frankly, it sounds a little like a Cloud's inability to get a workout might be somewhat similar to your own exuberance. I can't help you yet, it's entirely possible I might go overboard since I have yet to decide if my self-control will outlast a full fight."

The only one she knew of that might outlast her in a full fight was Fong, and they had yet to really test that. Renato was another possibility but pitting a ranged fighter against a close-quarters one was an iffy thing.

"All I can say is… try running. It's a common enough activity that will gain you less attention than seeking out fights to pitch in with and will allow you to avoid cooping yourselves up in here too much."

Andrei considered that, looking around the rather empty building he and his fellow Suns had likely cleared out by hand trying to drain their Sun Flames with.
One of the younger Suns, a kid she didn't recognize at all, hesitatingly piped up. "I... figured out how to Activate animals."

"You mean animal corpses." Snarked the brat right next to him, making the slightly younger looking kid cringe.

"...that's actually awesome." Sonya spoke absently before anyone else chipped in their two kopecks. They had a freaking necromancer. How was that not awesome?

Kind of creepy, sure, but still.

"What can you do with that?"

The Necromantic Sun blinked at her a few times, shot an uncertain look at Andrei's back, but did volunteer a little bit more. "Not a lot. They're... well, dead. I can make them move around a little, and they'll follow their normal patterns for a bit. A cat just curls up, but I got a few mice to run around once."

...why had she put this off?

If the other types had anything as interesting, she would try to do this sort of thing more often. "I wonder... if we get you a Mist partner, if you could turn them into a kind of spy? Even if you can't, it's a ready-made distraction if you need it."

Sonya rather happily made a note for Usov, to see if they could get that Sun and a Mist to work together on it. Partially because she really did think it was just that cool, and mainly because if that developed into being able to Activate dead humans... a Mist could cover tracks better than a lone Sun might.

"Anything else?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 3rd of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

It took Sonya three hours before the entire gaggle of Suns ran out of things to chat about. It started rather slow, even after the necromancy admission, and she probably hadn't helped much by keeping to short responses once the young Flame users started talking.

Once the awkwardness of having two people they really didn't know that well in their midst wore off, and the thief started hearing more personal details of how or why they did this or that, Andrei turned his attention to filling out the paperwork instead of just stand there between the Storm-Cloud and his Sun while looking confident.

When she stopped hearing about the early day fiascos, the last that spoke of it being the baby Sun Feliks Ilyich and exactly how he figured out Activation could be used to overload a transistor if he threw enough Sun Flames at it, she slowly eased herself out of the building.

The chatting of incidents and accidents was in the middle of turning into 'I can do more of this than you can'.

She had no interest in getting caught up in a marathon of Sun users trying to outdo each other.
With her Flame mix, it was entirely possible she could keep up… but there was no telling if that would be a good thing or a bad one.

Gedeon, with a rather interesting expression on his face, and Andrei followed her out with varying levels of stealth or sheer confidence. The younger Sun trying to finish scribbling out the last of the information on the newer users his group had picked up, and the elder one seemingly intent on talking to her.

"Why are you encouraging Edik and his creepy corpse experiments? That will not end well."

To her, not with her. Sonya sighed, accepting the sheets of paper Andrei handed her with a wry smile as they both ignored him.

She did make note of the kid's name, so she could give it to the Mist group and they could hopefully find one of them to work with the budding necromancer. Since Mists were so strange, it was possible one would be highly interested enough to at least cover the Sun's tracks if not actually pitch in to help with figuring what else can be done with that.

There were a few more tidbits in what the teenage Sun had given her that she heard in the warehouse, but the Storm-Cloud wasn't quite surprised by that. A little sorry they hadn't spoken up, but if they had not wanted to speak to her she wouldn't force them. She had more than enough Suns that had talked to her to counter any rumor mongering that she was always a vicious and violent bitch without reason.

Nothing quite as interesting as Edik and his Activation ability, however.

"Are you even listening to me?"

Well, Sonya thought a little wryly, "I am now. Keep it down, we're in public."

She folded the papers into her newly written in journal, giving the younger brunette a small smile in thanks.

Andrei was kind of in the same position as Fadei, if she thought about it.

He should've been the next one in charge of his Flame type group once Tatiana left to do her medical studies… but got transplanted by Gedeon out of the blue. The differences being the elder Sun hadn't be established before Tatiana left them, and Andrei was a lot more easygoing than the Rain was being.

Probably because he was still on the young side and hadn't quite had his training wheels taken off yet to do his first heist/job for the clan. He was well used to being second to a vor, and Gedeon was at least that.

"You know, there have been some odd rumors about you floating about." Andrei spoke up before the older Sun’s blood pressure could settle. "Very odd, given Tatiana likes to spread stories of you two growing up together… and your continued misadventures."

Sonya sniffed, half because she knew what he was driving at and didn't really see it as much of a threat to her and half because it was still rather cold out. "Interesting, given I've rarely interacted with other Suns."

"Interesting isn't quite the word I would chose."

"Just rumors? Or... complaints?"
"Few of those, too." Confirmed the younger teenager brightly. "Strange, isn't it?"

"I've never been able to use my minor Sun Flames intentionally, so I've left it up to you Suns to handle yourselves." She admitted blandly as she tucked her papers into her purse. "Should I not have?"

"Which is why I say it's odd, and strange. We're doing just fine, really. But you already knew of this, didn't you?"

Sonya didn't bother trying to look innocent, even if Gedeon was likely collaborating with the Four Rains. She wouldn't be able to pull it off, anyways. "What's strange is a Rain's ability to ignore how far a Mist can reach, actually. Or how foreboding a Storm-Cloud can get."

Andrei smirked lopsidedly, glancing sideways at the older man before giving his goodbye in a twist of his wrist. "It's a wonder how the world works, isn't it?"

She considered the younger Sun's back as he retreated into the warehouse the Zolotov Clan owned and the Suns repurposed to fit them. Glancing at the thoughtful vor once, the thief turned on her heel to continue on her way.

The warehouse wasn't too far from the middle of the clan's territory but placed decently far enough it would be a long and cold walk back to their headquarters.

"So... you do know. I didn't think Fadei would be able to keep it from you."

"Again, Fadei forgets I was here before him and have my own sources." Although, honestly enough, she was a little surprised Usov had informed her of the situation before Galina could.

It wasn't really a surprise in the end, Fadei was full of himself enough to overlook what her father would do if he managed to kill her. Much less her sister and mother, for that matter.

Mikhail of the Storms was an interesting mix to add to his Four Rains, but she was frankly a little skeptical of his intelligence if he thought that would actually stop her.

Fight fire with fire might be a valid combat tactic, but with Flames... there was no way that would work. Pitting two pure Storms against each other might, but she was not a pure Storm.

If, in the last two years, Mikhail had managed to outstrip her in power as one Sonya would be surprised. There was little to no way he could outstrip her in control, however.

With her Cloud Flames added to the mix?

The thief was pretty sure that would be a non-contest.

"I'd rather not kill fellow clan members." She informed the Sun pacing alongside her blandly. "It's starting to look like I may have to."

"It's a squabble." Gedeon protested, both surprised and a little wary.

Sonya's smile was probably ice cold. "Think, if you would, of what Mikhail can do. Then put that with me and the headquarters' walls if we miss, since it's likely that's where they might pick a fight. Think of what Fadei can accomplish, and then wonder how far he might go to get his ability to affect me when we already know the 'usual' amounts for one person do nothing."

A decent Storm could likely burn the entire building they worked out of down in as little as an hour.
Four Rains working together could possibly put the whole building asleep, in comas, or Tranquilize them all to death if they weren't careful about it. Combined, and with her ability of Propagating her own strength, they'd all make short work of a merely physical location much less pure humans that might be caught in the crossfire.

Sonya had already broken a few walls and windows, and she hadn't even been really pissed off then.

"Did you even seriously consider this before you allowed it to go on?"

"I didn't 'allow' anything. I can't get between the two of you-"

"Bullshit. You are the old man's son, if you say so Fadei would have dropped it." She snapped at him, brushing off his excuse with a wave of her hand. "As it stands, they need to be removed one way or another. I can't have them poisoning the younger ones, against me or the other groups, or things will start to rip apart and will never be mended in this lifetime. Even if they managed to remove me, did you even consider what my father would do? What my sister might end up doing?"

It was horribly short-sighted if you looked at it from that end. Arseniy was not a vor to cross, and Tatiana…?

The nurse could probably do some scary things now that she had formal medical training.

The expression that painted itself across Gedeon's face said he knew full well what she was getting at. However, it was also queerly stubborn. "I cannot get between you two, Bazanova."

…their Pahkan wanted this to go on?

Milos was the only one that could tell this vor what he could or could not do. That held nasty implications for both her and the situation.

Her last hope to stop the terribly one-sided conflict was now Dmitriy, who had been out of touch for nearly a full year and some months now.

What was the point behind enabling the Rains' behavior?

Either they managed to kill Sonya, which would alienate Arseniy and the rest of her family with the possibility of losing her connections outside the clan, or she kills them…?

What, exactly, was the punishment for murdering one's clan members?

Even if it was out of self-defense?

Sonya didn't actually know, since it was never something she had seriously considered she might have to do.

…and that estimation of the situation depended on if old man Zolotov was fully aware of what kind of damage any decently motivated Flame user could do to each other. He might not be aware of that and was banking on Fadei somehow gaining control of her.

Somehow.

It was even possible he was angling for the Cloud habit of self-destructing to take herself out, or for her to bend even more in aims of avoiding that fate. The opposite of that would be he wanted her taking out the Rains, which might be for whatever reason a Boss might have to encourage conflict between his people.
speculating was giving her a headache. "This clan… seems to be rather bad for my health all of a sudden."

Gedeon sputtered, but the Storm-Cloud was distracted by yet another possibility.

Old man Zolotov might be using this 'squabble' to measure his heir in some way. Seeing if his son could pull the situation together somehow, or how he would manage two opposing factions that were not working together even if they belonged to the same syndicate.

Which would he sacrifice, and which would he salvage?

Too many possibilities, and some were out of her pay grade. Sonya fixated on what she could do instead.

"I might be able to do this bloodlessly." She cut off whatever he was about to say, seriously pondering the few options left to her. "Might. If you can stall it."

What were the Four Rains doing for the past year?

Additionally, why were they still hanging about the training cadre?

They weren't needed, really.

As the group of Suns she just finished checking up on proved, Flame users really needed minimal oversight and mainly a direction or two pointed out to develop. Applying that outside of their safe little niche in the Zolotov Clan territories might be tricky, but doable.

Sonya had four, possibly five with a six almost ready to join that group, of full-grown Flame users just stagnating. One was rather intently after her job… but the rest seemed to be perfectly content to do nothing. Irritating to consider, honestly.

"Gedeon… you can't get between us… but can you go around us?"

(Friday the 4th of April, 1969. Gang Jiao, Longgang District, Kwangtung, People's Republic of China.)

Fong was not remotely surprised the martial arts master he had come to see had not left his dojo.

It was closed, obviously bending to the recent sway of popular support away from traditional martial art forms. That did not mean Master Yaozu was alone, or that his students had all fled.

A few eyed him severely from their spots, two manning the rickshaws just down the street and a third in plain view hauling a bale of something down the dirt path. One was just too graceful of movement to be untrained, the other two had shifted into open ready stances he recognized full well.

Bowing slightly to the expansive and once full hall, mostly due to habit and mainly due to the respect he still held for the teachings he had received here, the Storm left his shoes in the entranceway and sought out the elderly master of the dojo.

The action would tell his seen and unseen watchers he was not here to cause trouble, but Fong also knew better than to assume that would allay any fears of his possible mischief causing. He gave it less than ten minutes until one of the neighbors barged in to ensure their Master was still among the living.

Even if various branches of martial arts had been heavily 'discouraged' by many, the dojo was still clean and well maintained. Empty, and half in shadow, but the floors still without a speck of dust and the mirrored wall polished to a high gleam.

Gloom or no, he was fully aware this level was abandoned for the time being and made his way to the staircase left in the open on the east wall.

The elderly man, who had once been a towering and well-respected figure for a remote Chinese village, did not allow a stooped back or his advancing age to corrupt his posture by much if anything. Master Yaozu had been old before Fong had ever stepped into his halls, his hair still silver and thick just as it had been more than a decade ago.

The Triad member hadn't expected otherwise, honestly. When he came upon the man, Master Yaozu was meditating on the landing before the door of his home. Having little other to do here but talk to his old master, Fong folded himself down to wait out the elder's mental pondering of the skyline he could see out of a large window.

It did not take very long. If the master hadn't been fully aware of him entering the dojo, the Storm would honestly be surprised.

"So... the wheel turns anew, and you finally return." The weight of years might be lending a stoop to the martial arts master's back, but it had not cut the sharpness of his pitch-black eyes. One cracked open to study the man that replaced the child's image. "Are you here as Fēng my once student, or as Fong the criminal?"

"Both actually, Sifu." Retrieving Sonya's letter, he held it out to Master Yaozu with a bow. "It is from my... less than morally correct contacts but is for one of my previous masters that know the way of Aikido."

"What would thieves and murders need with a pacifist's art?" The elderly man still took the letter, but merely held it up between them instead of crack the seal to read what it said.

Fong had fully expected that, there was little to no reason why he would take anything a Triad member said at face value. He had his reasons for choosing this life, as did his master for heavily disapproving. "I only know it is not for the writer's self. One to five students await, with the possibility of more in time."

Bait it might be, but Master Yaozu had picked his path with the intent of teaching students for the rest of his life. The lack of which in their homeland did affect the elderly martial arts master, and even transparent bait had him inspecting the letter.

"I would have to leave to answer this request."

There was no real answer to that statement, so the Storm held his silence.

Obviously, the arrangement would not happen in China. Sonya's offer of shelter from the political situation would only happen in Soviet Russia or another location she chose herself in another land. Either Master Yaozu would need to sell his home and dojo, to a student or someone else in hopes of it continuing after the restrictions on marital arts relaxed or even retrieving it once the situation calmed, or put it in legal limbo for the same reasons.

Any way also carried the risk the government might snap the property up for reasons of their own.
Regardless of which option the elder chose, the chance he would not live to see it opened again was very much a real possibility.

Equally unlikely was the prospect Master Yaozu could weather the current political situation alone, or even with his students' amassed aid. He had devoted his life to teaching, not teaching for the years this situation may take to wane could drain his savings and his previous students' goodwill until he starved to death or lost the dojo anyways.

It might be rather low for him to capitalize on the situation to safeguard one of the few highly respected teachers he still had, but Fong had found he was fully willing to bend several tenets he once swore by if the results were worth it.

If he achieved moving the stubborn old man, settling him under the eye of a very vicious Storm-Cloud he had drawn even with the one time they fought was well worth the hassle. Death was still a possibility, but if not natural then the thief would hunt down the perpetrators without even asking if she should.

"And what do you gain from this?"

"Your survival."

Both of Master Yaozu's eyes were open now, and he glanced out the window before him at the roofs and sky outside.

It took another moment, and by this point Fong could hear the almost silent steps of the elder's former students come to check on their master ghosting through the empty dojo below, before the old man cracked the letter open.
Chapter 40

(Saturday the 5th of April, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Arseniy eyed his youngest foster daughter warily.

Sonya tried for a smile, as she was angling for him to do her a favor. "I don't really care to know... but it's getting stupid. They've been hanging around, getting in my way, for an entire year now. I have my dues prepaid, but from what I got out of Pyotr that first time was that's not usual for most of our thieves. So, aren't they due to pay up sometime soon? What have they been doing?"

Lisa was busying herself with breakfast/brunch/lunch. It would be lunch to the rest of the family but the vor's breakfast, and then brunch if hungry enough. The younger Russian woman was fully aware her foster mother was still listening in and would probably have a chat about the situation of her own a bit later on, but since she had been meaning to talk to her anyways that wasn't too daunting.

"Are you stalling?"

"A little, yes. I need a few more days, at the very least, to arrange things so I can kick them out with minimal fuss." Not remotely surprised at how easily Arseniy saw through her, the Storm-Cloud crossed her arms on the kitchen table and set her chin on top of them. "Gedeon already bought in, after I gave him a wake-up call for what issues the collateral damage a 'squabble' between Flame users could cause the clan. If you think about it, Fadei taking over for me is actually just going back to the status-quo under Dmitriy. Actually, more of a step back. No matter how he tries it."

For all he was a known killer and criminal, the eldest of the Four Rains wasn't yet a vor. Again, prison time was needed to cement that kind of respect. Since Fadei wasn't a vor, having him in charge as a kind of internal clan specialist without the rank to be really heeded to would boil down to them just going in circles.

Worse than it had been even in her pseudo-childhood, when she had to report on the existence of Flames to several higher-ranking vor at the ever so towering age of ten.

Sonya was never going to be a vor, male-only title after all. She also wasn't the best fit for collaborating various Flame type users to work together and getting them trained up, had known that long before there ever was a need for someone to be officially in charge. She was proving it true now, she just didn’t have the energy to keep up with all the baby Flame users pouring in.

However, she was more than sure she was the least bad fit while Dmitriy was catching up on being that 'respectable' to be listened to.

Whatever the older Rains' issues with her, fact of the matter was they would do worse in her position. Aside pride or vanity or whatever, superiority maybe but she really needed to take a hard look at that later, even four more Rains trying to fill the empty boots of an older one would not work for very long.

Fadei did not embody the ideal character of a 'Classic Rain'. Probably stuck somewhere between Inverted and Classic, with an emphasis on Classical if he was identified as such by someone Inverted. He wasn't easy to get along with, or very interested in keeping conflict to a minimum. Managing three other Rains to work together with him, which was probably the basic of basic Flame team builds, wasn't all that impressive.
As it was, the thief actually thought he was Inverted. Maybe he had been more Classical before puberty?

Did or could that property of one's Flame flux a little to a lot while still in the middle of growing up?

If she wanted to be petty and shallow, she could use that book Galina published under her name as an example of how bad she was sure Fadei would be in her place. Nearly half of it came from the work the Storm-Cloud poured into it clarifying and clearing up fact from fiction, so she at least had a direction to go in without any provided by others, and all Four Rains barely had contributed to a damn paragraph in their 'Blue Soulfire' section.

It was entirely possible that was wrong at this moment. A year was a lot of time to do nothing with, but Sonya also was sure they hadn't studied either the bait-book or her actual research journals.

She had beaten Fadei to a pulp, as well as almost-effortlessly knocked out Kazimir and Irinei.

Their response in adding a Storm to their ranks was a pitiful attempt to address that imbalance when it came time to actually physically oppose her. All five on one might be tricky from the mere number side, but she did believe in skill over quantity.

Valera stumbled into the kitchen during her mental wanderings, rubbing at sleep swollen eyes from his recently finished mid-morning nap. Upon seeing his sister in the room, he made a staggered turn and pulled incessantly on her pants leg to be picked up.

Sonya merely straightened up and gave in, as the brat had issues with being stuffed in his highchair if there wasn't food to be had yet. If she did, Valera would start throwing things. Mostly at her, since she'd be the closest.

Lisa snickered, not bothering to hide her amusement. Which clued the Storm-Cloud into her expression not being as neutral as she'd like. Probably disgruntled, if it amused their mother so much.

Wrapping her arms around her little brother instead, she looked back at her father. "I have random school-related things to be doing today, and I'd rather not have them get even more underfoot than they already are."

"You're meeting with some of the other syndicates." Arseniy stated rather than asked for clarification, seeing as it might be something he'd have to deal with if Sonya was not available due to emergency reasons later on. "The ones we have a smattering of your combustible brats from."

"That'll be… fun."

Snorting, the vor accepted a plate of food from the mother of his son. "Might be interesting how you're going to establish yourself in that."

"I'm bringing my hammers." His daughter admitted to blandly, Valera's forehead impacting her collarbone softly as he dozed lightly in her arms. "And possibly an ax or two."

The smirk that curled Arseniy's mouth wasn't a friendly one, his lover's snicker turned into an actual laugh.

"And then I have to deal with the Storms. I already touched base with the Suns, but that one is going to be a bit… harder."
Lisa finished cutting up Valera's lunch, so she put her grumpy little brother in his highchair and confiscated his fork until mom was ready to hand the food over.

"They took over an abandoned industrial park."

"They'd have to, a Storm is pretty much sheer destruction by another term." No physical building would stand up to massed baby Storms trying to learn how to Disintegrate things on command.

Someplace with a lot of things to destroy no one would miss was practically required, bonus if it had walls or fences to conceal what was going on and could be more or less guarded while other Storms figured out how much was too much Flame for what they wanted.

She should probably check to ensure no one else had Fong's problem, of having too much Flame and being unable to regulate it. Pure destruction was all well and good, but she had never required more than a sliver of her own Storm Flames on any job. Any more would've been overkill, and she knew firsthand how hard it was to think up of non-Omertà violating uses for the ruby-red Flames.

Maybe she should just hand over her method of learning control as a matter of fact, Storms going overboard every time they pulled on their Flames would mean they'd be restricted to sheer brute force instead of delicate operations.

They were a clan of thieves, not enforcers. While there might be a number of said enforcers in the clan, not all of them would be Storms or willing to work with one or two.

"I'll distract them. Only for today."

Likely because today was a day she had to be elsewhere for clan business.

Sonya was perfectly content with that, to be honest. Arseniy didn't have to help her, and since he did do so much training it had been entirely possible he'd see the situation as a learning experience for her.

Vor were very much 'sink or swim' method teachers. They could do lectures, and indeed she had listened to those her father gave through most of her second attempt at a childhood, but Arseniy swore by the maxim 'practice makes perfect'.

Speaking of teachers, she wondered if Scruffy had found himself in over his head yet. A gaggle of Suns intent on teaching him to speak fluently in Russian would be a headache to anyone.

Said gaggle without much restraint one usually found only after being fully grown?

Sucked to be him.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 5th of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Waiting only long enough to hear the first stirrings of rumor over Arseniy detaining the Four Rains, Sonya gathered Galina and some additional paperwork to her then left the Zolotov headquarters.

Their driver this day was one of the more unfortunate Shestyorka in range when the thief realized she didn't want to drive Moscow's streets and the Lightning was similarly disinclined.

On the way to the meeting spot pre-arranged for this little… occasion, she had time to review a few bits of data she had not really concerned herself over from Dmitriy's time in his office.

From her records, which the slightly older brunette had almost compulsively kept updated as much as she could after the Rain got himself arrested, there were a bare handful of Flame users from outside their clan. They rarely showed up to their Flame sections, normally with escorts of their own, and spent as little as a few hours with others of their type before being hustled back to their home territories to 'put the lessons into practice in more comfortable environments’.

Out of all the syndicates operating in or around Moscow, six were currently outsourcing the training of their Flame users. More than likely in hopes those few would be able to at least pick out and teach the basics to any others they came across.

Mainly Mists, but one Rain and two Storms were included in that count.

Which would be more worrying if that could ever become an issue at all.

All the groups of Flames taught by the Zolotovs were a little scattered away from one another, partly by necessity and partly out of sheer practicality. A large group of Suns together would irritate even the mildest of Storms, and while there was a good number of Rains so far there was no telling what kind of 'humors' a similarly large number of Mists might bring to bear on anyone unlucky enough to irk them. Lightnings, depending, might either become unwitting pawns in that mess or egg it all on.

Without Skies to buffer anything harshly jarring, or Clouds to terrify them into passiveness, Sonya didn't even want to know how bad unsupervised interactions might get if allowed to go on long enough.

The Suns needed the repurposed warehouse to contain their blindly bright yellow Flames, and to shelter the 'miraculous' healing from civilian eyes. All the Storms needed the privacy and convenient targets of a long-abandoned construction zone, one that was never finished and left to rot until something else was planned for the lot. Hopefully both locations would do for the short-term, while she could outright buy both if needed she'd rather not dip that far into her personal funds just yet.

Sonya only had reports to go by for the others, but it seemed as if Fadei had been somewhat intelligent when he commandeered the basement of a local sympathetic bar for the Rains. It might have been Dmitriy, but given the numbers only really exploded after he got himself arrested she doubted it had been his idea. Anyone falling asleep unexpectedly at a bar would be thought of as drunk, which nicely contained any rumors errantly leaking Tranquility might cause.

Galina's Lightnings were easier in a way, they met up in one of two locations. Either in Aleksandr's mostly abandoned hall if they were practicing Hardening other things or in the clan's old dancehall's extra rooms when trying it to Harden themselves to ensure they could see what they were doing.

As for the Mists, Usov had neither requested somewhere the clan held influence in nor made explicit where he met up with his fellows.

She was taking that to mean the kid either shifted the location around as needed or Mists required less operational security than the other Flame types. Since 'Construction' somehow equated to 'bend reality', Sonya was just going to nod and accept it as long as it remained under wraps.

On second thought… teaching all the different Flame types in the same building would be interesting. Not the good kind of interesting either.

Sonya and Galina were not the last ones to arrive to the meeting place, from the look of things.

Criminal groups really did prefer to remain with their fellows, so even a mixed meeting of several syndicates still had invisible boundary lines between factions.

A meeting room in the ground level of the Leningradskaya hotel had been set aside for them. Which, she wryly mused, was the reason her Lightning assistant all but demanded she dress up for this. Ornate, but stopping just short of ostentatious, this wasn't the kind of place her usual pants and blouse combination would work with.

Instead, she had to dip into the clothing and dresses she had bought over the years to attend the Vongola Christmas Ball or very recent high society heists. Which wasn't cheating, she hadn't worn any of her dresses in Moscow yet.

Besides, she bought them with the intent of reusing them if need be. Might as well get as much mileage out of them as she could.

Galina, being taller and bustier than she was, had arranged her own outfit from some of the other women in the clan. While not penniless, the Lightning really did have better things to spend her money on than a dress that would see minimal use for however many years. She did, however, ensure she was a bit more professionally dressed than Sonya.

Meaning the brunette got away with a dark charcoal suit jacket and matching pencil skirt with a green undershirt while the blonde had to suffer high heels and her purple jersey dress from last Christmas.

Sonya found that entirely unfair. Especially since, not two seconds after walking into the meeting room rented for the occasion, one of the vor made a possibly raunchy to him remark that caused Galina's spine to stiffen in outrage.

She didn't know what was said, she had better things to think on and didn't really care for some asshole she didn't know at all to bother listening to what came out of his mouth.

However, since whatever it had been upset her assistant, the thief took offense anyways. "Do you think the hotel staff will charge us for cleaning up any messy bloodstains we might happen to leave behind?"

Galina only blinked at her, unwilling to say anything that might be misconstrued in this setting.

The vor in question, likely from the Zapadny Administrative Okrug from his grouping which meant the syndicate due south of the Zolotov's territory, gave her a smirk that was all teeth. "Feisty, I like that in women."

"Everyone keeps calling me that, and I have no idea why." Sonya informed him in an even tone, an ax made of her Cloud Flames appearing in her hand with a flash of lavender only for the head to be buried into the chair the man was near-lounging in.

In the gap available between his legs.

It didn't quite make the vor physically uncomfortable until she pressed down on the handle and it bit more into the wood as she leaned forward over him. In consequence, it also closed the very minor gap between her bladed edge and the man's… slightly cheap looking pants. Since she swung it only hard enough to lodge in the fabric, the force she added caused him a very uncomfortable little problem.

"Most people call me cold." The thief added as she let go of her weapon, but not her Flames.

Galina sniffed haughtily for effect, eyeing the now very pale vor gapping at the plated gold ax head pressed against something he probably valued a lot higher than his reputation, then stalked after Sonya's more sedate meander to a free section of the meeting table. "I think we're only missing the Khovrino Association, Sonya."

"They are farther from here than everyone else." She reasoned dismissively as she seated herself.

She knew, from office records alone, the Khovrinos had two of the Mists in Usov's care. The Association was actually white-collar crime focused than most of the syndicates that surrounded her clan, dealing more with political and business-related work than the thieves' clan.

They were lucky they had two Mists instead of the Storms or lone Rain, although a Rain might just be a boon of their own when it came to negotiations. She wondered what Usov was instructing them in, or what he wasn't.

Aside from the obvious two Flame users from the Zolotov clan the two lone women in the room represented, she also recognized the Filat syndicate's representatives. From the Khoroshevo-Mnevniki District, located due south of the Zolotov held territory. One of the Storms came from this one, but as they were involved with information brokering she didn't quite know what they wanted their lone Flame user trained up for.

Hopefully Mikhail did. Sonya wouldn't hold her breath, though.

The other four weren't well known to her but were to Galina from how she noted them in order without so much as blinking. One was a rival syndicate of thieves, another a brotherhood of enforcers just rising to some prominence in their own little corner of the city, and the last two the thief didn't bother to even guess.

Either so newly fresh they were only just getting into the shark tank or handling a larger syndicate's interests for them and trying to pull off being 'new'. Either way, not Sonya's problem.

One of the representatives from those unknown syndicates yanked his eyes away from the vor with the very large ax problem to visibly measure the Zolotov women. "That was a very… interesting introduction. Might we have a name and reason for a… for your inclusion here?"

"I am Sonya Bazanova, from the Zolotov Clan. And the one in charge of the service you all have opted to take advantage of." Giving him a bland and utterly insincere smile, with more teeth than probably ladylike, she laced her fingers together and set them on her right knee which was hooked over her left. "This will probably be only one of two occasions I will bother to attend, so make the most of it."

A tiny sigh from her left informed her that Galina thought very little of her introduction.

"You are that Bazanova?"

"I wasn't aware there was another. Unless you are referring to my father, but while he shares my… main archetype, he is not actively one."

The man she was speaking to, seated two groups down from where she picked to sit, glanced back to the vor trying to pry her battle ax out of his lap. It was taking a lot of elbow grease from one of his fellows to even make it budge, seeing as moving the ax in one direction would cause… complications.

"A little hint, please? Were they not color-coded as well?"

"I am the purple one, with a side of red." Offered the thief, willing to answer as long as things stayed civilized.

There wasn’t much they could do with the confirmed knowledge that she was a Cloud or a Storm, other than be aware of what she might be able to do.

Giving a slow nod, which since none of his features didn't tighten in distress or narrowed in comprehension meant he was still testing her to see what might be true or not, he flicked his gaze to her assistant.

Possibly he had a really good poker-face?

Galina answered for herself. "Green."

"The men, mostly blues with a red and one yellow, are all unfortunately otherwise occupied. You would have gotten my father or the yellow if possible, but again they had more pressing things to handle which could not be passed off."

Gedeon might actually show up if he finished his errand for his father soon, and her own father probably wouldn't as he really couldn't answer any semi-complicated Flame-related questions, but the inexperienced Sun was more likely to meet with her in the hotel's lobby instead of crashing the meeting.

"I thought we’d get young Gedeon Zolotov, not… lovely young ladies like yourselves." Another of the men, not quite as shoddily dressed as the boldest that struck up a conversation with her but also not too far removed from him, interjected.

The pause was either a quick correction of what word-choice he wanted to use, or a sign of insincere flattery.

"Galina, ensure we're not being spied upon." Sonya ordered instead of reply to that non-question. "If I have to talk in riddles the entire time, I'll be charged for the destruction of more than just one seat."

Setting the paperwork she had taken charge of in front of the Storm-Cloud, she gave a nod and turned around from the position she had taken standing a little behind the more experienced Flame user. A sparkling crackle of emerald green Flames spat from the Lightning's similarly green nails, which she rapped against the nearest wall.

The crème colored paint on the walls cracked themselves as the Lightning Flames shot through the long-dried paint, either from the heat or the stress of conducting the Flames closest to being electrical in nature, and six small pops came from various points of the walls.

Unfortunately, the overhead lights also burned out when the electrical Flames overloaded the fine filaments.

"Hmm… again, a touch too much." Observed the responsible Lightning clinically, eyeing the cracks she had done to the walls rather than the blown-out lights. The lightbulbs were always going to be broken if she was speed-clearing a room, that had been entirely expected.

Was that lead paint?

She hoped not. They had expected the expense of repainting an entire room so had the money to cover it and then some in her purse.

"One would think that since you conduct the Lightnings in their training, you would have a finer control over that." Sonya commented rather blandly as their fellows for this meeting either recovered their composure at the blatant display of Flames or at least mustered the nerve to stop looking a breath away from grabbing their closest weapon.

"No one has your fine control, Sonya. You are a terrible example to strive for. Cheater."

The thief checked the watch secured to her left wrist in lieu of her chain of weaponry around her arm, and then pulled the files she had brought with closer. "Gentlemen, since it is five past the hour, we are starting now."

A vor from the Filat syndicate she vaguely recalled from somewhere cleared his throat to gain attention. "Dear… Bazanova, we are still missing a few people and we have not agreed to allow a little girl to lead this discussion."

Her first impulse was to tell him to leave then. Since it was, she figured it was probably undiplomatic. Biting her tongue against the desire to go with it anyways, she temporized with her second impulse. "You don't have a choice."

"E-excuse me?"

"There is no one else." Sonya waved a hand at the ornate double-doors that led into the meeting room, which conveniently also was the direction the Zolotov claimed territory was in. "Unfortunately, there are not a lot of Flame users of age to be at least semi-respectable and male. The only Zolotov vor user of Dying Will Flames is both ill-trained and still beholden to other commitments. The only other vor who knows the information but isn't a user is tied up in his own duties. Therefore you all are left with me, a Classically natured Cloud with Inverted Storm tendencies who could otherwise care less about any of you."

"A very… bold statement, given some of us have amicable relations with your own syndicate." The older man with a semi-respectable spine, or appalling ignorance, who had prodded her for basic information spoke up.

He didn't look nearly as outraged as some of the older members or as stony-faced as some of the more in-the-know vory.

"It's awkward, unusual, and odd. We, the Zolotovs, know that. Galina, behind me, does have some seniority if not the oversight position and is as female as I am. My sister, Sun user and currently a nurse learning in Mafia Land, has similar issues to her inclusion. Dmitriy, the Rain I am covering for, is in prison for refusing to give up clan details to the police. Gedeon is in the middle of being trained to be a Sun user and will likely take over once he is. If not me, there is a twelve-year-old male Mist who has next greatest seniority. A fifteen-year-old male Sun after him. Deal with it."

"You should have started with that." The only one in the room she remotely liked aside her own Lightning commented neutrally. "I wasn't aware the situation was so dire."

"It's not dire, just still young." Sonya rolled her eyes, sorting out the paperwork in sections of which outside Flame user getting trained were in which group represented here. "I started it a little under a decade ago. I was the first Zolotov Dying Will Flame user. My hand-picked successor to conform to your oh-so-delicate male sensibilities is in prison, so I came back to 'hold down the fort' for him. Thus, for the next two years, you will have to deal with me."

"And if we still don't want to? What are you going to do, little girl?"

She was fully aware she was a little shorter than the average male, but it being repeatedly pointed out to her was starting to irritate her. "The door is there."
Galina sighed heavily, looking more than a little exasperated.

In response, the Storm-Cloud could only shrug a shoulder as she glanced at her. "It's not worth the effort to care about. I do not involve myself in much Moscow business, and when the time is up I'll go back to the international stage and remain there. What do I care if they dislike me?"

"Other than the fact they are our clients?" The Lightning questioned a touch more than dryly.

"Where else could they go? I suppose they could hope one of their little morons might discover a fraction of what I put together on my own at age nine," Sonya glanced down at her paperwork to see if the names of the other two groups were mentioned or if she'd have to be rude enough to ask, "or let them go feral and hope. Frankly, I'd rather they did that given how much of a headache this is becoming. But since the clan has other ideas..."

Sighing again, her assistant rolled her eyes and returned to her original position before the group in the meeting room had an up-close and personal demonstration of a Lightning's capabilities.

"So... since the Khovrino Association seems not polite enough to even send a representative, we'll skip reporting to them."

They were located... north-west?

She was somewhat sure they were located within the Severny Administrative Okrug. Entirely possible, what with the two Mists they had reporting back, that they had known Sonya herself would be sent to this little meeting.

She didn't rightfully care if it was a snub, if they really had opted to not show up, it just meant she had less work to do.

"If any of you know what you want your Flame users specifically trained for, tell me later. Or send a note along with them the next time you send them in. I'd actually rather if you did that."

The few reports they had, already sorted and paired or not if need be, were taken by Galina to be passed out. Since she did know whose report went to whom, the Lightning merely slipped all but two reports on two Mists from the thief's hands in order for them to be passed out to the right people.

Her secretary/personal assistant had paper in her hands, it was the only reason Sonya didn't end up with a bullet hole somewhere uncomfortable or ill-advised. The brunette merely held them out, straight into the path one of the friends of the vor she pinned to his seat shot in.

It dented the papers and ripped them out of her hands, but her Lightning Flames made them hard enough it worked as well as any bullet-proof shield.

Her first instinct was to Propagate a hammer in her hand and throw it at the man.

Sonya's action turned out to be the wrong one. She had no warning besides a split-second of hackle raising sense of complete wrongness.

There was a very long moment of sheer collective surprise, that didn't result from the report of a gunshot in an enclosed room.

That silence turned into a kind of mutual shared horror as everyone present got a very good look at what stopped a hammer thrown with the force of a speeding train, and what knocked a small caliber pistol out of another's hands.
Said gun clattered to the ground in the eerily still room.

"Ah... I was unaware this meeting would be overseen by the Vindice. Forgive my reaction, the Soft Lightning is one of mine and I am a Hard Flame Cloud."

There wasn't any sudden rattling of chains, her ears were ringing too much to tell if there had been, but the dully gleaming links of metal were merely just there one moment before the unheard fluttering paperwork had the chance to settle on the floor. Black as pitch, spider webbing out from a point behind both the thief and her suddenly nervous assistant, holding her hammer suspended in mid-air even with the force she had thrown it with.

They were also wrapped around the possible vor that tried to shoot her for whatever reason he had, pinning the arms against his chest in a painful looking contortion as well as effortlessly supporting the man a good half a foot off the floor.

Her Propagated hammer was imploded by the black Flames as they overpowered her own Cloud ones, that same force that shattered her weapon dragging the now weakly struggling shooter back to the far wall behind her.

"Officer," Sonya stiffly turned in her seat to fully see the figure even if she really didn't want to, "we are missing the Vindice laws for Flame users. I do not know where to go in order to obtain a copy to pass on to those being instructed."

She was trying really hard to ignore the pulse hammering in her ear, but that wasn't going away or calming any.

Every possible inch of flesh that might be otherwise exposed were wrapped in white bandages, the bulk of the body covered with a ratty seeming but still serviceable long black trench coat under a more... insubstantial seeming cloak. Fur collar, piercingly white cravat, top hat, white gloves, and an air of something horrible and unholy lingered around the Vindice Officer now suspending the unfortunate shooter in midair.

There was a feeling of being dispassionately inspected, like she was a common bug under a microscope of a bored collector of rare insects, before she got a response. "Ignorance is no excuse."

"No, it's not." Agreed the thief as levelly as she could, trying to ignore how her skin crawled with something half-sensed and half-imagined just from hearing the... thing's dead and raspy tone.

Not nails on a chalkboard bad, but rough and dry with a crackle of something she really didn't want to think about. That was a dead Arcobaleno.

"I would merely like a copy to either read or disseminate to the other Flame users and their syndicates, in order to prevent the lesser infractions before they happen from it."

A dead Arcobaleno, possibly either Pierre-Antoine Carpentier or one of his fellows in his generation. Possibly one that had taken over for his generation or succeeded them.

Why did the mere thought make her feel guilty she had a letter from one of them locked in Dmitriy's office desk?

Oh... because it might possibly be addressed to this Officer. Which... she dearly hoped not.

Worse than merely hoped, she'd give up her Cloud Flames in order to keep that not true.

Its appearance was... a very pointed reminder Sonya didn't need about the possible fate of her own damn brother… or her friend, with the strongest Flames of their generation. The others were still unknowns to her, but Cherep and Renato alone were more than enough to make her afraid of all the things that could go wrong.

She wasn't really sure why, but the wrapped up empty face turned in her direction was more than just a little terrifying. It was bandages, covering an unseen face. How could that be scarier than anything else she couldn't think of at the moment?

Her breathing was trying to speed up without her permission, which distracted a lot of her attention she would have normally kept on the rest of the room.

"A copy will be made available for you, Sonya Bazanova of the Zolotov Thieves Clan." The figure settled on after a horribly long moment of consideration. It's attention seemingly turned to the man it had wrapped in black chains, or at least it's blank face did. The shade of its top hat made the blank visage even more sinister, and a slow tilt to the featureless head creeped her the fuck out. "You are under arrest for attempting to instigate a war between syndicates. If, in the course of our investigation, it is found you were ordered to do so… your syndicate will be penalized."

…it had been lurking around for a while, then. If it knew her name and syndicate.

She dearly hoped not, but the other explanation would be that she was a known quantity to the Vindice and that seemed to be an even worse option to 'any gathering that had to do with Flames being monitored by the mafia police equivalent'.

Without so much as glancing or turning its face to the possible vor's fellows gaping at it, the Vindice Officer slunk backwards into the wall with his prisoner. A large part of said wall was as black as the chains the horror wielded, mostly oval in shape with weird almost mind-bending flickers of dark black wavering here and there that made it look like whatever energy that was made of was eating the wall, and said chains finally gave off a sound Sonya was sure would haunt her for a long while.

They seemed to only rattle once the culprit was in hand. Two longer chains wrapped around both the gun which had fallen to the floor when the shooter was wrapped up in his own and the spent bullet Galina saved her from suffering from, sucking them into the disk of pure flat darkness the Vindice Officer and his victim disappeared into without a ripple.

It was very quiet for a long moment after the thing had left. Since her Lightning looked frozen stiff, and possibly terrified out of her mind, Sonya bent to gather the scattered papers off the floor.

"Bazanova, kindly explain what just happened."

The first man that talked to her in an understandable and reasonable fashion had gone a sickly pale color, but his voice was evenly measured and controlled.

She really respected the hell out of him for that self-control, and mentally pinned him as not a tiny syndicate member but one moon-lightning as one for whatever reason.

"You all should remember that the Vindice police Omertà. Infractions that might expose the mafia world to the civilians are dealt with by them. I… have suspicions they deal more with infractions by Dying Will Flame users than other criminals." She gave a limp wave to the blank wall behind her. "That was an Officer of the Vindice. I only have suspicions for what reasoning… he had to take the gentleman from the…"

Frowning, the thief eyed the remainders of that particular group.
Galina seemed to have settled at least somewhat by then, because the Lightning took the paperwork back with a shaky hand and took the opportunity to whisper, "Kozlov Brotherhood."

"...Kozlov Brotherhood." Really?

Were they?

Sonya kind of wondered what they did.

"...I think I need a drink." Came a mutter from the far corner she hadn't been looking in.

The Storm-Cloud readily agreed with that voice, whoever the hell it was. She almost couldn't believe she had managed to ask the thing a question, much less had gotten an answer.

A positive one.

...she really hoped the answer was a book or something written. Having to actually ask another member of the Vindice would be... nerve wracking.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 5th of April, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...are we expected to do anything?"

"Can't." Sonya really mourned her inability to get drunk right now.

She never had before gotten to the point of being blackout drunk, and the loss of the option was strangely irking at the moment when she had never cared to try when her Storm was still unpracticed enough to remain mostly benign in side-effects.

"The Vindice took the man, they'd deal out the retribution needed if at all. Crossing them... Arseniy, there's a reason they're that terrifying. We try to force the issue, and it's possible they'll wipe us out. I'd be... less than useless against them. Until I know more..."

"I thought they were just part of some old fairytale." Gedeon marveled aloud, which irritated her.

Swallowing that down with a generous gulp of vodka, the Storm-Cloud shuddered as her mind drifted back to how fast everything had happened. The circles of tight panic her thoughts ran down hadn't helped jack shit.

"We've... for the last fifty plus years we've been more occupied with avoiding the KGB and just surviving the crackdowns under Stalin, Flames and their usage became almost extinct out here for nearly twice the amount of time. I think that might have reduced the number of incidents any Vindice Officer might be spotted in dealing with. So, they were regulated to rumor and hearsay. Until now."

"Anything they would have involved themselves with would have been those breaking Omertà, and by rumor alone I'd assume witnesses from that would be... thin on the ground." Tacked on her foster father with a tone as dry as the bottle she polished off first after that disaster of a criminal gathering she had to attend. "Makes sense for why we haven't seen them in a long time."

Directly after the meeting broke up Sonya had dismissed Galina for the day, so the Lightning could recover instead of trip after her in a half-blind half-panicked daze. The brunette had been more than just rattled by the visit, heaped on top of as assault on the thief's person and she would not be good for much else.

Paying off the damage done to the meeting room in a five-star hotel had been annoying, but after what had happened the thief had been desperately pleased they had done the Lightning Flame sweep for bugs. The Vindice probably had their own methods for avoiding surveillance measures, but she didn't think they were ever shared with mere criminals the mafia enforcers dealt with.

Visiting her father was just… reporting an unusual incident to a superior in the clan. Not a badly hidden attempt to get some kind of comfort after a very unwanted look at the possible fate in store for one of the next group of Arcobalenos.

Which might be the intended fate of Cherep or Renato, as Skull de Mort the Immortal Stuntman and Reborn the World's Greatest Hitman.

The to-be Cloud and Sun Arcobalenos of this Era.

Sonya… had not appreciated the reminder smacked in her face of the stakes involved around her brother's and, likely as close as one she'd ever get aside her foster brother, best friend's futures.

Arseniy's idea of comfort was a bottle of alcohol, of which she was on her third-soon-to-be-fourth.

Frankly put, that Vindice Officer probably saved her from doing something extremely stupid. She knew she could throw a hammer harder than humanly possible and whipped one out of sheer anger someone had shot at her around Galina. Forcing her Lightning to possibly save her life at the risk of personal injury.

She had Hardened both her hand and the papers, which saved Galina from a broken wrist when she interposed paper turned bullet-proof shield between a gun and Sonya. Her muscles were wrenched around pretty bad, as she had favored the right wrist after blocking that shot until being dismissed for the day.

Said hammer had a very good chance to not only remove the top half of the shooter, but likely removing a couple walls between that meeting room rented to criminals and a large number of civilians.

Possibly the police too.

Sonya seemed to have terrible self-control when attacked out of the blue, possibly when surprised, or when someone she was familiar with were in danger. She had no idea how to work on that.

That scared her, more than just a little.

Making a bit of mental rearranging, the thief decided she needed a Rain. Somewhat desperately.

As fast as possible.

Hopefully one that could keep her from repeating that stupid mistake when the Vindice weren't conveniently around to catch her weapons.

Not one of the Four Rains, she didn't think she'd be able to stand having one nearby or allowing herself to be influenced by their Flames. Hopefully one of the younger Rains they had would be suitable, because she didn't think another Bjørn or Scruffy would just end up in her lap.

Speaking of, she needed to check up on Scruffy. She hadn't heard anything from him since she dumped him on the Suns and Andrei. Which, given the Classical Suns and their entirely too helpful natures contrasted with very demanding Inverted Suns and their expectations, might not be a good thing.

A semi-decent distraction in the form of work yet to be done, Sonya eyed the fourth bottle of vodka she had absently cracked open during her mental review.

"How many of those is this going to take?" Asked the older vor as his eyes flicked down to the empty bottles half the Zolotovs lingering in their basement cantina were considering with an air of almost comical disbelief.

The thief guiltily lowered the opened bottle to the table. "I can't get drunk."

Arseniy blinked at her slowly, Gedeon's jaw dropped open, and the few she could see out of the corner of her eyes seemed to be disbelieving… until they really considered the three large empty bottles she had drained over the course of an hour.

"Storms, when they use their Flames internally, end up with stupidly powerful resistance to poisons and viruses. I haven't been sick, unless you count altitude sickness, for almost five years now... and getting tipsy became impossible for me for nearly three."

A last glance to the empty bottles, and the older vor snagged the last full one before addressing Gedeon. "You're paying for two of them."

"Why me? You... urg." With a grunt, the Sun glared at her and her probably highly bemused expression. "I blame you."

"Fair enough, I did drink three bottles myself." Two and a half, really. Arseniy had been halfway through the first one before she showed up. "What were you two doing, anyways?"

"I'll tell you in your office."

"It's Dmitriy's office. I'm merely borrowing it."

"Whatever." The remaining vor dismissed disgustedly, either over getting into a petty verbal fight with her or for forgetting that fact. "Are you coming, or do you want yet another?"

Thinking about it seriously, the Storm-Cloud decided he should at least get something for spending an hour with his eyebrows glued to his hairline as she downed more liquor in one sitting than most civilians could handle in a week. She dug out the ruble for a fifth bottle and slapped it gently on the chest of the Shestyorka on bar cleanup duty.

The kid had been nervously hovering around, not sure if he should grab the empty bottles she had gotten through or if she had wanted to keep them.

Gedeon blinked bemusedly at the bottle handed to him the moment she got it. "...thanks?"

"Hmm..." Sonya's steady as a rock stride earned her more incredulous looks on her way out of the half-full cantina.

Apparently not a lot of her once-watchers had believed her about the inability to get drunk issue she had. Which would have been better to keep under wraps until the next drinking competition she came across, actually.

Damn it, she hated hindsight.
...so... the Vindice are real.

"You'd hear more about them outside the Soviet Union." The thief admitted quietly, glancing over each of the individuals they were passing down the halls once before moving on. "I knew they did exist, but that was the first time I've ever been in the same room as one."

The relatively newish Sun user but older vor eyed the vodka she had given him. "Are you saying we're cut off from news like that?"

"Like it or not, we are out here. The Iron Curtain did more than give the civilians a boundary line, it caused a backlash in criminal organizations that worked more closely with their governments to adopt the superiority or hate they had for the other side."

Not quite as bad as it would have been otherwise, with a more hostile Cold War, but... bad enough as it was.

Honestly speaking, other than the actually physical barrier bisecting Berlin and Germany, Sonya now had her doubts about if the Soviet Union would fall. It was both more stable and more flexible from what she had seen so far than what little she recalled hearing about it once upon a dream-life.

She disliked how hard it made getting information here, unless it came from the civilian gathered news about occurrences around the world the Storm-Cloud was pretty much blind to what was happening in other countries when dealing with her clan.

It was very isolationist out here, which the criminal ranks had adopted by sheer virtue of some of their ranks coming from the civilians that supported and spread the behavior. There were the borderline syndicates, but obviously they would have reasons of their own to control the flow of information through them.

"Idle question," Sonya spoke before Gedeon could fully process that fact, "where is Dmitriy right now?"

"...for some reason, I don't believe it's an idle question for a moment." Muttered the Sun plodding along in her wake. "He was moved from Kresty Prison to Matrosskaya Tishina earlier this year."

Humming thoughtfully, the thief turned her attention to the short preteen eyeing her borrowed office's door speculatively.

Usov gave the vor a friendly wave, not bothered in the least by the suspicious look he got in return. Mostly due to the fact he flat out ignored it in favor of giving her a more worried seeming look. "Sonya... there's something on your desk."

"Dmitriy's desk."

"Yes, that desk." The Mist confirmed with a lazy throwing away gesture to show how little he thought about that correction. "I was... loitering, because I have something I wish to sound out to you... but something... happened."

"A sense of something just wrong? A feeling like someone dug up your grave and did the tango with your corpse?"

"...disgustingly detailed image, and yes actually. I could not stay with that feeling, but it went away the moment I shut the door behind me."

Gedeon sighed through his slightly crooked nose. "And now an explanation for those of us left out of "The Vindice knows where the Flame office of the Zolotovs are. And that I am working out of there for now." Sonya grimly informed him, eyeing her door as skeptically as the preteen had been before her. "Not sure if I should be delighted or disturbed by that."

Both Sun and Mist joined her in dubiously regarding her office door.

"I'm going with disturbed." Gedeon decided after a long moment.

Usov brightened a little under her elbow. "Then I shall go with delighted. They do exist!"

With a sigh, and pinching the bridge of her nose with her left hand, the thief shoved the offensive slab of wood open so she could see what her possibly impertinent questioning of the Vindice Officer netted her.

There was nothing obviously wrong with the office. It was still mostly blue with bits of green; blue rug on the floor, heavy dark blue curtains pinned neatly on either side of the one window, a suede blue couch with green and blue throw pillows, a single green armchair and a blue on in a matching style if not color sat before the desk, and an ugly green lamp she had yet to break sat on it with part of her paperwork.

Most of what was left out were deceptive. What was even remotely sensitive was secured in the locking bottom left drawer, carefully coded by Galina to seem as mere budget calculations for keeping tabs on the Flame user trainees and code names with various fake descriptions for their budget.

The bookcase that matched the heavy dark wood of the desk had mostly blank but ornate covered books shelved within it.

The only new item of note was the dusty scroll left on the desk.

Sonya didn't hesitate, even torn as she was over what she felt about the Vindice's knowledge base and what that might mean. That held the answers of what her brother could get away with, and she needed to know in order to protect him.

She crossed the office in three not-quite-human strides, snatched up the oddly stiff paper, tore off the glittering black seal, and ran her eyes over what the undead enforcers of the mafia ruled must happen when it came to users of Dying Will Flames.

…Cherep was still in the clear from the looks of it.

Apparently, by Vindice law, no Flame user was to hold a government office if they knew of and utilized their Flames. She could agree with that, letting it happen was either a recipe for an Inverted Sky to run roughshod over everything or for some Mist to puppet half the world for kicks.

Flame users were also expected to keep any rumors or knowledge of what they could do contained from civilian or governmental scrutiny if unable to abstain from using their abilities, which was common sense in the way of 'clean up after oneself' and 'don't draw attention'. Her brother might be skating that one, but as he would never outright admit to why he was undying it wasn't that alarming.

She would have to tell him that Master Liam was not to be told of anything else a Cloud could do. Even if the circus master was very considerate with the whole 'keeping it under his hat' thing.

If a new or not-in-the-know Flame user was found within government office or employed by such, the discovering Flame user was obligated to contain the errant individual or report it to someone who could.

…slightly more than just alarming, because wasn't one of the next Arcobalenos a soldier?

Not just a soldier… a sniper, right?

Either or, Cherep didn't have a lot to do with the governments of the places he passed through with the Großes Volksfest. That one was… she'd think about it later.

The only other thing a user of Dying Will Flames was obligated to do was pass on what was and wasn't allowed to any foundling user.

Sonya made mental note to get Gedeon to pass it all to the Suns. Usov could inform his Mists, Galina her Lightnings, and she could do the Storms and Rains when checking up on them.

Problem solved.

Aside those few, the rest of the laws were more in lines of 'what to do if such and such Flame user did stupid things' and procedures for containing problem Flame users. Slightly interesting in an abstract way, she supposed it was more in line of a warning section for those that would abuse their Flames.

What equated as 'neutral territory' or what should be expected to be overseen by a Vindice Officer, which included 'meetings or gatherings with the intent to trade Flame-related information to non-aligned syndicates'.

…that Vindice Officer's comment about ignorance might have also have been aimed at her as well.

The thief stiffened her spine when it wanted to shiver as that occurred to her, and she dropped her gaze to the last item in hopes it would ease the hard knot of ice sitting in her stomach.

The last item on her Vindice supplied list was a regulation of Flame user to non-users for any small- or large-scale turf wars.

Which was eyebrow raising, until she really considered it.

If one's opponent had no Flame users, the other syndicate was allowed three in any altercation. If they had anywhere from one to ten, you could only exceed it by a factor of two. Ten to twenty, a factor of three. So on and so forth.

At first glance, it was pretty strange of a stipulation. Her second glance made her wonder how many syndicates would hunt down any Flame users young enough to be ineffectual if another syndicate was training them as an enforcer army.

Then she wondered how many times some scuffle exceeded that recommendation with bad result had happened before this if that was a law. Additionally, what exactly happened to result in a century long decline of Flame users around the world?

Russian Flame users had apparently become all but extinct somehow. Italy, France, and Greece got embroiled in the Mafia Wars during that time.

Something to look into when she had the time.

Sonya handed the scroll of Vindice related laws and guidelines to Gedeon, looking over one shoulder at Usov.

"Is whatever you wanted safe to ignore for a day or two?"

A slow rise of an eyebrow was her first answer. "Dare I ask why?"

"...I have an idea, and you can think of it as a dry-run."

Blinking once quickly, the Mist made a show of mulling her words over. "Curious."

The Storm-Cloud huffed slightly. That wasn't an answer, but she also knew what he was angling for... surprisingly. She had been hanging out with Mists way too much. "I am going to break someone out of prison, you can use it to see how to confuse or slide us by normal guards."

Gedeon almost dropped the stiffly curled paper as he spluttered in a protest. "I wear it in? Dmitriy has to serve out his term!"

"Of course he does. I never said I wouldn't return him."

Usov grinned widely at that tidbit. "I'm game if you are, then. Let's give the poor man a taste of freedom, shall we?"

(Sunday the 6th of April, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Dmitriy had been rather enjoying his vacation.

Two meals a day, time to work out or air himself out in a cramped courtyard, a thin but not bad bed to sleep in... and at least two semi-serious fights a week, made the Inverted Rain fully appreciate why some vor opted to not resist arrest with all they had. The lack of stress for one was a damn good draw to taking a prison break from duties.

The prison guards in this fine establishment were a little more on the ball than the last prison he had the privilege to be contained by, but Dmitriy didn't see that as a bad thing. It was less crowded here, for one.

It meant he hadn't had to sleep with one eye open like he had to in a cell with around fourteen other men shoved within it.

Had been, up until Sonya arranged for him to be sprung for a few hours.

That little tetchy brat Usov took on his form and appearance, unceremoniously booting him from his little cell cot, and the Storm-Cloud made off with him bodily as if the Rain couldn't handle his own damn self.

Admittedly, Dmitriy had been expecting this. Sort of.

Not quite in the manner of a temporary jail bust, but the opportunity to find a bar and get shitfaced was easing the disappointment.

In himself, not in Sonya. He wasn't remotely surprised by what was going on.

"...I highly suspect Fadei is Discordant."
The thief sitting across from him blinked once, then glared over the grungy booth table between them. "…what."

"He's obsessed with that possible Sky family, the inactive older one I identified and his two sons. He wants your position to reassign himself to the watch roster, which I pulled him from when he tried forcing that Guardian bond thing with one of the kids. None of whom showed even the so called 'charisma' of a Sky up to that point. Freaked them out good until one of his non-Flame fellow watchers tackled him to drag back."

"…fuck. I should've brought Gedeon."

Dmitriy huffed lowly, pulling a large gulp from the bottle of beer which was her silent apology for needing to pull him into this at all to help settle his utter disappointment in his first 'student'. "He's not going to stop, or see reason, or anything. His goal is your job, and he's unhinged enough to risk everything for it."

The bar she had dragged him to wasn't that far from his prison, actually. Not in the same neighborhood, as the off-duty guards then might spot him and wonder, but at least an hour away. Ussov was still rather young for a stint in prison, even a few hours' worth, so the Rain had been assured he would be going back the moment this conversation was over.

A muscle ticked in Sonya's cheek.

"You might just have to kill him by this point. It's been almost two years, if it's not getting better it probably won't."

He had been hoping that time away from the Sky Watch would settle the Rain, and his old childhood friend was enough of an unmoving wall when she wanted to be that Fadei would at least dimly realize his obsession would not happen.

Dmitriy had been damn proud of the results from his first attempt to teach another his Flame tricks. Proud enough to be more than a little permissive in what his first student got up to.

However, when the Rain scared the shit out of a six-year-old… probably shutting down whatever possible Sky behavior that drew him in the first place?

There was no way Fadei was the only one who could tell if the brat was actively a Sky or not. Dmitriy had gone to check himself after that incident, felt and saw nothing of the sort the other claimed. The father did give a kind of hypnotizing air for Flame users, more than the ones that had no Flames, but his kids were just brats.

He had reshuffled a fair bit of people around, stripping the Sky Watch of every possible Flame user out of concern what happened to the Rain happened to another.

They had strict orders not to tell anyone they were part of it, to stymy Fadei's attempts to weasel into it again. Sonya seemed to have respected that if she still didn't know, even Galina hadn't known who Dmitriy had stuck with that job.

Which meant at least that part of his scrambled attempt to fix the shit that went wrong had at least gone as planned.

"Dmitriy… if I kill Fadei right this moment, none of the Rains will ever listen to me." Hissed out the Storm-Cloud across from him as quietly as she could. There was an interesting pattern of spider web cracks spreading in the varnish from her one-handed grip on the table, the only other sign she was upset. "Why the fuck did you not mention this to anyone?"
"…yeah, by the way, I unknowingly fucked over my own protégé." Snarled back the Rain, a bitter self-hating twist to his tone. Darkly pleased by the minuet flinch in her gaze, he belatedly reminded himself she was stuck cleaning that mess up and dropped his face into one hand. "The hell was I supposed to do about it? Rumors, half-assed information, and a grand total of zero confirmed information about the phenomena were all I had to work with. I had hoped… doesn't matter anymore. There's a report I made up, stuck in the pages of the world atlas blank book on the bookcase. Give that to the old man."

Sonya remained quiet for a long moment as they nursed their respective poisons. "How many other reports are stuck in those books, and are any of them paperwork Galina is going to cheerfully maim you for hiding from her?"

The snort that question drew from him was more of a disgusted one than an amused sound.

"Dmitriy… do you want me to buy you a bottle of something before we go?"

"…please."

(Monday the 7th of April, 1969. COMSUBIN Headquarters, Italian Republic.)

"-all COMSUBIN trainees, report to loading bay three. This is not a drill. I repeat, all-

Lalia Murgia tuned out the blaring announcement as she passed scrambling soldiers, even as a corner of her mind noted that her idiotic student would likely be mustering out with the rest of the noodle-armed rookies.

She normally thrived in handling her military duties, but lately… it was starting to chafe.

What else was there?

Lalia had gleefully trounced every macho male that took one glance at her figure and sneered, everyone who said she couldn't do it. Broke a staggering number of records on the firing range and off, made her childhood dream come true, now stood at the top of a military organization as a widely respected if not just feared commander of soldiers.

'Then hit a damn ceiling', she sourly concluded, leaning out of the way of some stupid scut with a duffle bag perched on a shoulder running down the halls. Probably trying to answer the alert after being startled repacking his kit, kid would be lucky to have more supplies on hand than his unfortunate fellows when the war games kicked off.

It had taken her five goddamn years to kick and claw her way up the ranks, and now she had what she worked her ass off for… she was surprisingly dissatisfied with it.

Lalia had loved the challenge, it seemed. Pitting herself against older and tougher opponents either in her way or trying to make her stumble, getting out and ensuring things were getting done at a decent pace, the competition of proving herself better than another male officer.

Being on the top was not quite as she had counted on.

Few field duties that didn't involve some spineless newbie scrambling to try upholding a military bearing, no more solo missions since she was 'too high-ranking to lose'. There were a few trainees she could probably whip into a semblance of shape for a new unit, a handful of others that might be worth the time put into them to pound a spine through their backbones… but nothing really inspiring.

She was bored, and irritated that she was.

"LAL~!"

The overly sappy voice caused an itch in her trigger finger. Could only be the idiot student who hit on his instructor the first day of instruction.

Tilting her head so her short blue hair swung out of her line of sight, the so nicknamed 'Lal' glared at the blond rookie scrambling to reach her. "IDIOT! What the hell are you thinking?"

"We're… evacuating?"

"We are not evacuating, you grunts have a mission. Why do you think they ONLY CALLED FOR THE TRAINEES?"

Said member of the trainees, whom she really did have to remember a damn name other than 'idiot student' for him, yelped. Then he tried to cover the childish reaction to her yelling at him with a painfully faked cough and attempted a smile he probably thought was suave.

It wasn't.

"Lovely Lal, would you do me the honor of-

Lalia didn't bother to let him finish his words, she knew how it would go. Her idiotic student had been trying to get a date with her near daily ever since he hit on her his first day of training.

Un-holstering her side-arm, she tried her damnedest to put a bullet hole or two in the jerk's hide.

The only reason she had yet to chase off this particularly annoying rookie and his normally insulting invites to violate a few regulations against dating among the lower ranks was his very respectable skills in saving his hide.

He ducked the first shot by a hair, scrambling momentarily to mesh with the higher than usual foot traffic down this hall of the COMSUBIN Headquarters.

"Maybe another time! See you later, Lal!"

Trying her hardest to suppress the twitch in her left eye, she lowered her service piece and breathed out hard.

Now that the daily sideshow was over with, she should probably get on with attending the meeting she had been called for.

"Lieutenant Commander Murgia," an equally unwelcome voice belted out from further down the hall, "would you please refrain from firing a weapon casually in HQ."

Lalia suppressed her irritation, holstering her gun and turning on a heel to look the Commander of COMSUBIN in the eye. "Of course, sir."

The Commander was one of the really set in his way old school soldiers, who didn't like having a female officer but ignored it with a professionalism she could respect. He didn't add to the harassment she ripped through during her time as a trainee, nor did he favor her because she was one of the so-called 'weaker-sex'.
Indeed, Lalia was sure that was why she rather liked the old war horse. Getting caught doing something a bit 'not allowed' by him aside.

"Your next assignment. Try not to bring them back with more bullet holes than wise." Holding out the neatly contained folder, the old soldier merely returned her salute before walking on.

She glanced down at it, then a smirk drew up her lips.

'Rules and Regulations for the International War Games, Defiant Seed' read the neatly typed folder's tab, under it was scrawled '1969, Italia COMSUBIN forces against Croatia HOS forces'.

Might be interesting. She wondered how long she would be responsible for this.
As the Ottavia of a longstanding Italian Famiglia, Luce of the Giglio Nero was not a stupid woman. When you added in the entirely frustrating ability to foresee some of the future inherited from her ancestors, she couldn't afford to be.

Yet even with her prophetic abilities, she could still be surprised.

Working to avoid future pitfalls she knew would matter in a few short years made her look too far in the future, sometimes overlooking what was in the present. Sometimes her actions seemed incomprehensible to her own Famiglia, such as her not taking Guardians or passing certain people over when it came time to replace an individual who was retiring or dead, which was where her current difficulty had risen from. Even then, sometimes the motivations and reasons behind some actions others had for their to-be actions escaped her.

She was not all-knowing, but she knew enough.

Luce knew what was going to happen. There wasn't any way she knew of to avoid it and still give her future descendants enough time in this world to actually live. The Tri-Ni-Sette had to be continued, Checker Face couldn't continue holding onto the Arcobalenos' third as well as his Mare Ring for much longer.

Once upon a time, that inevitability had made her incredibly bitter. She had not been a happy child when her linage's Sky gift came to the fore and she realized she would barely live to see her own daughter reach her teenage years.

If she warned her future co-workers and fellow Cursed Arcobalenos of what was to come, Checker Face would run out of time. He had put off finding the next set of I Prescelti Sette for too long already, if she did not help things along he wouldn't be able to find the next strongest set.

Given what the individuals he would select this time around were like, they would actively hamper his work knowing the full situation or not. It was in their natures, such a 'betrayal' of their contracts or honor code would turn them against the near-ancient being and what he worked for as a matter of course.

That would also mean her daughter would only see the age of seven before the world started cracking apart and everything started 'mysteriously' dying off.

Luce could abstain from being the next Arcobaleno Boss, their Sky to buffer the worst edges of themselves before they found their own ways to do it, but the individual Checker Face would be forced to turn to in order to both hold the Sky Pacifier and keep the to-be Arcobalenos together would fail miserably. Not in holding a supernatural piece of rock syphoning off his life force, but in keeping the very different personalities in his Arcobaleno Elements from… explosively clashing.

The quiet green one would be the first to leave, well before the Curse was set. A bit of scrambling would patch that loss over, but the damage would have been done. They'd lose the purple stuntman and the blue soldier candidates in short order. Without the strongest Lightning, Rain, and Cloud in the world to help support the Tri-Ni-Sette, it would cut the life expectancy of the others just too short of her end-goal and make that path of the future defunct. That would mean her daughter would get to have her own child, but then her granddaughter would have mere months to be alive before things turned… unacceptable.

Aria would be the next Sky Arcobaleno after him, but be an unknown instead of the daughter of their previous if unscrupulous Sky. However, things did not have good endings down that path. Nothing would change, they wouldn't survive long enough to accomplish anything or spark any changes, and I Prescelti Sette would continue on far into the future.

Eventually, if Luce did exactly as she knew she had to, while her daughter would have a painfully short life… her daughter's daughter would have the chance to live and see the end of the Arcobaleno Curse as well as actually grow up and live her own life.

She was doomed and so was her daughter, in more ways than one. A quietly tragic pair of mother and daughter, which she just as quietly loathed. She wanted her daughter to be given the time to grow up, to live her own life and take over the Giglio Nero as Nona in time instead of in a mad scramble to secure things before it all fell apart.

Two out of three was as close as Luce could get from the options she had. Even then, a shorter lifespan than her own was what she was cursing Aria's fate with. She would only have enough time to keep things on track and conceive then birth Luce's granddaughter before her own end as the Arcobaleno Sky would come, after Yuni turned five. If there was eight, it would be shortly thereafter. If nine, Aria might be able to hold off until her daughter was six or seven.

Well before, when she didn't quite know the full situation, she secretly hated the individuals she would eventually come to know and omit the details from. They would come to hate her, so she figured fair was fair. She even spent a small period of time hating Checker Face, who she also knew as Kawahira from her ancestor's journals.

Renato Sinclair was the only one she had the range to actually see before she came to accept her fate in full. She only managed it once, and that was actually not too long ago.

The Giglio Nero Famiglia kept to themselves a lot, more so than most mafia families. Her line, and especially her ancestors, had no desire to pit themselves against other famiglie when they knew the outcome and which of their subordinates would end up dead from it. They were mostly intelligence brokers, useful to hide future knowledge behind with enough muscle to back up those spies when needed. That didn't require face-to-face meetings very much, and Vongola was enough of an old alliance they were exempt from the newer one as long as they kept supplying information.

Luce was not particularly willing to admit the fact the to-be Sun Arcobaleno was as handsome as she had 'seen' or the strength of his Sun Flames in person put a dent into her long-held bitterness to her fellow pre-Cursed Arcobalenos. What had caught her attention and made her somewhat ashamed of her unprovoked bitter feelings against the hitman and the others, was the tiny Mist child he had been herding into Vongola's territory with as much haste and security as he could muster up on demand.

That day she had been forced to accept that she wasn't the only one who would be losing important things in the quest to preserve the world they lived on. Reborn's godson, Lal Mirch's future fiancée or Colonello her in one way or another, Fon's last remaining blood relative, Skull's foster parents with the side possibility of his sisters if Sonya proved more than just stubborn, Viper's fellow Espers, Verde's… well, maybe not him. However, most of them had people they would be forced to give up for 'the sake of the world'.

Some of them would not regain those important connections if everything worked out for the so-called 'best', and Luce would still be stealing years from all of them to give to her granddaughter in the future. In hopes of ending the Arcobalenos' involvement in the Tri-Ni-Sette for good. In order to prevent anyone from being stuck in the same position as she was, choosing between family and duty and the end of all things.

The Ottavia of the Giglio Nero did not come to hold the position she had at a young age without the ruthlessness to toss someone else under the bus if it came down to it. To lie and cheat her way in and out of dealing with other criminals just so her Famiglia had the upper hand. One could not see the future without seeing all the futures, good or bad.

She had picked this path for herself. The damages and hurt she would deal with full knowledge weighed on her heavily. She was a Sky, it would hurt even more before the end when she not only knew them but had come to like them for themselves.

However, it was also the best of horrible and worst options.

Even if they would end up hating her for it, Luce would still do everything she foresaw twice over if only just for one extra year for her daughter or two for her granddaughter. She might regret her actions, hate herself as much as the Arcobaleno would, but she had few alternatives to pick from.

Her network eventually spat out the name of the Mist boy, Shamal, in the process of ensuring what rumors were escaping Vongola's Iron Fort. In her visions he would become the doctor-assassin Trident Shamal, Reborn's best contact, in the hopes of keeping an eye on his godfather and when he'd break the mental blocks if the hitman went that way. The Mosquito Hitman if his godfather could come to terms with himself as a 'man out of time'.

It had been merely confirmation that she needed to start on her own end to build a better future. Aria's father was something she could and would pick for herself, at least. Pity about the hitman, but that way lay a can of worms even worse than what she was dabbling in now.

However, it was Shamal's surname that eventually found its way to her which was actually jarring enough it had jolted her out of her pessimistic loathing of her situation.

Nikishin. If her visions of the future that involved that name any were right, a variation of the Cloud stuntman's little sister's original name.

That had narrowed down which of the futures possible she was going to be dealing with. Free-will was very much a headache for those of her line but kept things from being too predictable and opening a path to be arrogant with their abilities.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

Skull de Mort didn't always have his family in her visions. When he didn't, things were a bit rough for him in the beginnings and never did smooth out all the way. When he did, which settled his personality nicely to somewhat helpful if still pacifistic than just brash and sometimes hysterical passive-aggressive protest, things were both harder and easier on her.

How would Colonello get by her, anyways? That part of the future wasn't hers to see, but she could've sworn he went to the thief in order to gain the same brief on Dying Will Flames Lal Mirch would. Something had happened, she knew that much from future mentions of the incident.

There were other things she couldn't quite confirm yet, there were three other inclusions in that knot of previous connections possible. Fon was almost a given, but there was another… She'd know for sure the closer it came time for Kawahira to gather them up and saw their reactions to each other if mentioned before that.

Right now, what she needed to do in order to secure her daughter's survival as long as possible was getting to know the man who would become Reborn, the World's Greatest Hitman.

He scared her a little. She knew full well what she was doing would make the man hate her eventually. However, if she did it right, he would be attached to her daughter as a kind of uncle figure. Renato valued family connections above even his duty, and while he wasn't yet to the point he'd discard his pride for someone that saw him as part of theirs it also wasn't too far off that point.

Reborn wouldn't quite so much, but he'd respect prior ties to any famiglia of note even if he couldn't quite recall how people were attached to him.

Either way the hitman was skilled enough to ensure Aria would survive her rocky early years when she became too frail to aid her daughter. Even if he couldn't deal with Luce's future betrayal or the reduction of his person and what it meant for him both personally and professionally.

She took in a shaky breath as she sat her brush down on her armoire. Today was the day.

Luce would either be flattened by a boulder the last rebellious faction of her Famiglia would set in order to remove her as Giglio Nero's Ottavia and install someone else 'more sensible' of their own pick… or Renato would shatter the boulder and cement his tentative allegiance to her as a Sky. Then probably brutally murder a faction of her own Famiglia.

Some days, she abhorred getting out of bed.

---

(Tuesday the 8th of April, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The bookcase in Dimitry's office held only three actual books. There had been more, but the gemology and geology ones Tatiana gifted to Sonya over the years of their childhood had been taken down and moved to wherever Galina had put them.

Which left a copy of the bait-book, a dictionary, and the master research journal Dimitry had been left in command of. The rest were fancy blanks interposed with a few knickknacks from here and there.

The blank world atlas was on the same shelf as the various fake travel books, second shelf from the top. Sonya kept glancing at it even if she really should be more concerned with yelling at Fadei.

If she hadn't already had a good idea of how crazy or irrational a Sky's Rejection of a Flame user could turn them, this would certainly take the cake.

The so-called leader of the Four Rains had done exactly nothing for the past year. Plotting to take over her position maybe, but in terms of extending the reputation of Zolotov Flame users or even just making himself useful as a possible vor absolutely nothing. He had shown not even an inclination of realizing he had to get on with paying his own dues, when his fellow Rains had already secured their own.

She was privately bewildered that some six-year-old brat had twisted the Rain's head enough he was this thickheaded. They likely wouldn't even be able to get a Sky out of it either, because Fadei had scared the brat off whatever it was he had done.

"if you would get off your ass and do something, I'd be able to LEAVE by now!" Sonya bit out at the man, irked and pissed off she might just have to kill him if nothing would jolt him out of his mental rut. "But because of your inactions, I wouldn't leave you in charge of a damn DOG much less this office IF I DIED TOMORROW!"

She was pretty sure the literary reference of 'a glimmer of madness' wasn't actually a thing. There was nothing obviously wrong with Fadei, other than his behavior. According to Gedeon, he was still an intelligent individual with a perchance for dark gallows humor when Sonya or Dimitry weren't brought up in conversation. Of course, since he flat out detested her as the personification of everything in his way, she had very little other than pure loathing aimed her way since she had met him.

Galina caught a little of that, since she was aiding and abetting her instead of helping Fadei along to 'his' Sky. She didn't seem greatly bothered by it at least.

In fact, her aid was as distracted by the bookcase as Sonya was. Between the Storm-Cloud and Sun, they had a bet for how long it would be until the Lightning would rip it apart for anything else the Rain had hidden there.

She looked to be losing that bet, alas.

"Fadei, since you seem to require a boot to the ass, GET OUT AND SOLVE THIS NOW." Hissed out the thief instead of addressing her assistant’s latest preoccupation. "Prove you have a brain for once, so we can at least get on with things."

The look in his eye that she did recognize was just sheer hatred. She could live with that, he was enough of a pain in the ass she hated him too. He didn't bother giving her anything more than a barely there nod, twisting on his heels and leaving the borrowed office as quick as humanly possible.

She sighed heavily as the office door slammed shut. "Galina, leave it. We have a different meeting to go to."

Slotting the book she had almost pulled out back into its place by the broken geode, the Lightning huffed. "Now what? I thought that was it for things we had to do. And don't you have to go see the Storms today?"

"Yes, but… something came up last night that you might want to hear about from me."

Curious, the brunette followed her out of the Rain's office. She got a lot less curious and more hesitant when she realized where the thief was going. "The Pahkan's office? Sonya?"

"They are expecting us." She had been getting called in way too much, if the guard outside of it knew her by sight and didn't need a prompting to pull the office doors open for her.

Gedeon had tackled informing his old man, as well as Arseniy, Pyotr, and the three remaining of the Four Rains what Dimitry had hid in his office before his arrest. That was what Sonya and Galina walked into.

The report itself, in the Inverted Rain's cramped messy scrawl, was being owlishly peered at by Milos through gold-rimmed reading glasses. Her foster father looked as blank as Pyotr was, which meant it was probably up to the younger generation to handle the problem. Gedeon's expression was a bit harried, but that was more likely to do with the badgering Zarya was subjecting him to on what 'Discordant' and 'Sky Rejection' really meant.

As if the Sun had been lying for whatever reason. She did not have the pull over their Pahkan’s son to get that kind of a favor on something that would become a semi-known problem in enough time.

"At the surface, it means he's no longer Classical but Inverted." Sonya bit out, saving Gedeon from the nth repetition of however many times what little they knew of the Flame-born issue. "Deeper than that, it means something in his personality has changed, most likely for the worst. Was he ever one to put things off? Pick a fight where there wasn’t one? Ignore his responsibilities? Yet that is exactly what he's doing, and for what? Do you even really know what he's after?"

The redhead and red eyed Rain whirled on her with a semi-impressive sneer. "So what, is this your bid to remove our leader? Slandering his name, his character, however you may?"

"It is not his fault." Mainly, the thief tacked on in her head. She wasn't generous to absolve him of everything. Fadei was still rational on occasion, he had the opportunity and option to realize there might be something wrong and seek help. That he didn't was his own fault, the pieces were there to be found. "It is a phenomenon we still do not fully understand, which Dimitry had hopes he would overcome in time."

"Which he hasn't." Gedeon offered a bit more gently than she bothered, re-drawing the Rains' attention to him. "Even you all cannot reason away this last incident. Aside Sonya's supposed… vendetta against him, what would you name as his reasoning to forgo even meeting the minimal requirements for his dues? Ignoring that he had to pay them at all?"

…Sonya had a vendetta?

News to her, frankly.

"Explain why Fadei was passed over, when Dimitry was arrested!" Kazimir near-shouted a touch desperately. "Tell me that makes no sense. Where did she even come from?"

"Me." Arseniy spoke up and startled the hell out of the three Rains. "Sonya is my daughter, who taught your boy Dimitry how to even use his Rain Flames. I put her in charge, since I knew she knew how to run things."

"I told Fadei that almost a year ago." She tacked on quietly. "As well as why I would greatly prefer it if he could boot my, and I quote, 'tiny ass out'. I am a thief, not a politician, and would have agreed to hand over my duties if he showed he could handle them."

Milos let the papers he was squinting at fall to his desk, which worked better than any loud noise to get everyone to shut up and pay attention. The old man glanced from his son to his Sovintnik, to Arseniy and then her. "Is he dead weight?"

"…not as of yet." Sonya hedged a little, if only to get the remaining Three Rains from staring at her fearfully. "He has to be prompted but is still functioning as a thief."

"Will he become so?"

"I do not have that information."

"You do not have a lot of information, Bazanova." Old man Zolotov observed evenly.

"It's because I do not. Pahkan, there is little in any information on Skies and what their Flames can do outside of their tight knit circles. Part of the reason we were watching the tiny family of one was to gain that knowledge. Now we know Discord is a fate anyone that suffers Sky Rejection might face. I could ask foreign Skies about it, but the cost…"

"No, I think you will not do that." Milos threaded his knobby fingers together and set them before him on his desk. "Is it fixable?"

"According to what little I know… there is nothing to fix, Pahkan."

"Could you be wrong?"

"Yes, which is why I am more inclined to say I do not know than answer."

"Intelligent of you." Dismissing the Storm-Cloud for a moment, the old man eyed each of the Rains left then his son. "Gedeon, how would you fix this?"

"Easiest way to do so would be removing Fadei entirely." He reluctantly concluded, ignoring the various betrayed looks shot at him. "The damage that would do will eventually heal in time. Next best solution would be to task Sonya with figuring out if there is anything to do using her connections, but that would free Fadei to continue sowing trouble in the meantime regardless of the answer she arrives at."

Oh look, they were admitting she did have connections. Fong's Triad had probably requested a few people be tested for Flame focuses pretty quickly.

"Which I have already ruled out."

Gedeon bowed his head to show he accepted that mandate from his father. "Lastly, we could put Fadei in charge temporarily to see if gaining his obsession would settle him. Unfortunately, that would mean it is highly likely he would go after the young possible-Sky that rejected him and started this mess."

"No… we're not doing that either." Decided Milos, then he turned his attention back to the most senior member of the office handling his clan’s interests in Dying Will Flame users. "Bazanova, are you responsible for him?"

Sonya really had nothing else to answer that with. "Since I did take Dimitry on, and he is not in the position to do it himself, yes."

Galina was watching the Rains' reactions, so she didn't have to do it.

"Good. Kill him. We cannot afford internal strife, not even now you have found us a loophole to stave off any more attempts to spark a war."

"I request a stay of execution."

That had everyone in the office looking at her strangely.

"Oh?" Milos did not particularly look amused. "Why? I would have thought you would delight in removing a thorn in your side."

Sonya didn't actually know what she felt about this specific order. Disgusted, maybe? "I have a visiting slot with Dimitry coming up next week, I would like for the Rains to gain a bit of closure before I remove the option entirely."

Zarya looked desperately at Kazimir, who merely pressed his mouth into a thin line. It was Irinei who sighed and answered the obvious question. "We... would appreciate it, Pahkan."

Obviously, none of the three were very happy about how this had gone. It would be more accurate to say they were as angry as possible even if they were Rains. The Storm-Cloud wasn't even sure why she was doing this, other than the fact they had a bond of a type that she had with Cherep.

"I would expect you all to keep your mouths shut." Observed old man Zolotov in a very reasonable tone that made her hate him a little. "Otherwise... by the end of the month, Bazanova."

"Of course, Pahkan." Sonya agreed blankly, giving the man a nod and walking out of the office with Galina close on her heels. They waited for the other Flame users of the Zolotov clan, even if she really did want to wander off with her father after the man gave her a quick squeeze to one shoulder when he passed the two of them on his way out.

Zarya looked a fit to be tied when she spotted the Storm-Cloud waiting for them. "Are you happy now?"

"I am rarely if ever happy." She still didn't quite know what she felt about her orders. Instead of getting into a cat fight with the female Rain Sonya addressed the other two. "You can safely hate me, you already do."

Kazimir seemed to entirely agree with that estimation of the situation. "Easy enough, come on Zarya."

Irinei loitered until they were a decent amount of space away. "But we can't hate Gedeon, is that it?"

The vor sighed and answered for himself. "Likely father would've ordered Sonya to do it anyways. No, I think her point is that you shouldn't hate Dimitry."

"He did give Fadei every opportunity to salvage himself." Agreed the thief blandly as she could. "I was merely the last option in that attempt."

"Come on, Irinei!"

Absently shrugging a bit more than listlessly, the Rain moved past them to follow his two fellows.

"I thought you said you could do this without blood."

"I was operating under the assumption my opponent was sane." Sonya defended herself probably a touch harshly. "Not possibly crazy or practically insane."

Gedeon looked at her skeptically. "So now what?"

"...Fadei is about to have an unfortunate accident on his way back." A week or so was a decent amount of time for a heist, of which he might come back early if he was that obsessed. Usov was keeping track of the man for her and would warn her when he was about to return. If he fucked up... she'd think of something.

"If you use your weapons, or your Flames, everyone will know."

"And why would that be such a bad thing?"

Her initial answer was a huff, a very sarcastic one. "With what the Rains have been spreading about you?"

"Oh, that's right. I forgot they were hypocritical enough to accuse me of what they had been doing "all along."

"To be fair," Gedeon pointed out blandly, moving off to leave the floor, "Fadei might have really believed what he said."

Sonya was pretty sure her expression could be called 'highly unimpressed' as the vor left them.

"...Sonya?"

"I'm not going to ask you to do it." She reassured her Lightning tiredly. "Just because I don't use them doesn't mean I can't use a gun."

Tatiana had taught her to shoot, actually.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 8th of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

She had forgotten about Mikhail.

Too bad she couldn't go back to forgetting about him.

Sixteen and arrogant enough it made her want to punch him just as a matter of fact, Mikhail was the one in charge of the Storms and how they developed. He had 'taken over' the abandoned construction site by force, kicking the small gang of kids that had been using it a a play fort of a type. Which, while it was decently protected and expendable enough for Storms to practice their Flames within, made her not quite impressed with him as what Fadei managed when he was still sane enough.

The moment she was spotted, a cry quickly went up and was silenced from the fenced off area.

She did not need Galina's under-her-breath sarcastic commentary to figure out what was going on.

Mikhail had met her near the entrance to his 'domain', had attempted to bar her way at first but when she bodily moved him out of her path settled for lecturing what she was and was not allowed to do. She could ask how they were progressing, but couldn't ask how they liked it, his methods, or what they wanted to learn.

Sonya lasted until they were in sight of the gaggle of Storm then her temper snapped, and she punched him. A quick haymaker to the jaw laid out the second eldest Storm in the dirt and out of her hair.

He would live… but probably not live it down.

She left it at that, while the Four Rains and their thorniness in her side would be solved in a bit of time making a solid enemy out of Mikhail before it was over was just stupid. What Galina did or did not do to show her own displeasure was ignored.

The thief might claim the Lightning, but she was a grown woman and was responsible for her own actions.

The kids, while torn on if they were impressed with her knocking out their nominal leader or not, were obviously apprehensive about the Storm-Cloud's presence. It didn't take a genius to realize the slander the elder Rains had been spreading had reached and taken root here as well.
Opting to ignore it, there was little she could do but provide the evidence she wasn't some power-hungry bitch and let them make their own assumptions, Sonya Disintegrated herself a seat in a half-removed concrete wall. There weren't really any other options for seating, the kids had made a decent dent in Disintegrating the abandoned concrete and steel pylons left out to rot.

Settling herself, and her paperwork, on the chalky fake-rock took a few minutes. Which mostly let her pull the roster of Storms to the top so she could mark it.

The next eldest Storm's name was Yegor, but she didn't know the Storms well enough to pick out the kid. "Are we missing anyone?"

There were a few quick shakes of various heads, which told her they didn't know who was supposed to be in charge if Mikhail was out for whatever reason and she was still intimidating.

"Mmm... alright then. Anything you know now you wish you were told when you started?"

Sonya listed down the few timid suggestions that encouraged the bolder ones to volunteer information of their own as Galina delicately picked her way across gravel impregnated soil over to where she was sitting. It was thankfully warm enough out she didn't have to repeatedly warm her fingers up between items, but the air was still a little brisk.

Why 'do not wear something valuable when using Storm Flames' wasn't a common-sense thing she had no idea. It would explain why some of the brats were a little raggedly dressed, if they were wearing things they would not mind losing if something went wrong.

"I did that too," she admitted when things stalled on that point, "I lost a coat, in the middle of winter."

"Will they be replaced?" One of the girls, a fellow blonde, asked curiously. "I rather liked my skirt, but the hole I put through it..."

"Did Mikhail not keep records?"

"Only for the boys." She replied disgustedly, flicking her long hair behind her in one smooth gesture. "Dunya... err, Avdotya? She kept records when he refused to."

Sonya figured she should've expected that, regardless of what Dimitry told the pure Storm. "Give them to Galina, we'll replace them."

"Aren't you a Storm?" A kid she tentatively identified as Rasim asked from the 'male' side of the gathering. Slightly of the older few Storms, with pitch black hair and green eyes. "Why aren't you training us?"

"Storm-Cloud, actually. Unfortunately, I don't have the time. I have been pulled to handle the office work while here." Deciding that telling the kid that she likely wouldn't have visited otherwise wasn't a good idea, or at least she thought so. "Speaking of, if... Mikhail's methods are objectionable, or another issue comes up where he refuses to do something for the girls that he's doing for the boys, you may send someone in to talk to me. I'll... talk to him."

Almost under the sudden spate of mutters there was a scoff and a slightly louder utterance of 'why bother' from one of the brats in the far back. He apparently didn't mean to be overheard, by the red flush that went up his neck under Sonya's eyes.

"Because we do not have the numbers to support sexism. There will be just as many girls as boys until things finally get settled and even then you may find a girl is simply better at something than..."
you or your friends until things are." She blinked, which finally let the little brat tear his gaze away from her, and looked over the knot of Storms. "Any other non-topic related questions?"

A hand was raised, which earned the poor kid a few snickers and a couple catcalls of being a teacher's pet. Said kid, giving his fellows a dirty look for their behavior, pressed a set of rather scuffed glasses higher up his nose. "If you are two Flame types, aren't you weaker than Mikhail?"

Galina snorted, looking back at the still insensible Storm in question.

The thief gave her a quelling look when that caused the kid to flinch. "It's a fair question, how else would he learn but by asking? To answer your question, yes and no. Frankly, I am three types and it seems my will is split between them if I use two. Two I can use, one I can't. But that last one, my Sun Flames, gives me more efficiency than most. So I am more efficient and have tighter control, because I needed less Storm than Mikhail ever had at once. Now, knowing that, who's stronger?"

"Wouldn't he be, then?" Glasses asked aloud, only to be punched in the shoulder by one of the girls she didn't know enough about to guess a name for.

"You add destruction to destruction and you still only get destruction, Senya." Sniffed the punch-happy girl. "He's the one laid out while she's not."

"That means she's just smarter, or sneakier."

"Evidence still proves my point!"

"Enough." Sonya cut off the next brat before a brawl could take place. "Back to the point, please. Anything else you all wish you were told before starting?"

Storms were argumentative little sots, herself included. If she didn't watch it, there would be a full out war between the male and female Storm users right in the middle of this dusty and abandoned construction lot.

Maybe she should cut Mikhail a bit of slack. Then again they didn't really get along very well themselves, so he should've known that going in. She might just dislike him because he was a sexist little asshole, and he might dislike her because she was higher ranking and a girl, but they might just be excuses to loathe each other.

She got a varying amount of 'no's, some confident and some not. Recognizing the pattern for what it was, the Suns did that too, the Storm-Cloud moved to the next point. "In the process of sorting out what else can be done with Storm Flames, I've found that if you utilize them internally you eventually become immune to most everything."

"What does that even mean?" One of the brasher girls, who had looked perfectly willing to throw a punch for her little friend insisting Sonya was stronger than their male instructor, asked in a bewildered tone.

"I use my Storm Flames to prevent getting sick when working in other countries. It also now means I'm immune to medical anesthesia, alcohol, and probably poisons."

"I'll take that in exchange for never getting sick again." She insisted brightly once she had a moment to process that. "Who wants that yucky beer anyways?"

"I'm not sure if I can never get sick, just that I don't if I have my Storm Flames." Sonya amended a bit quickly. She hated not being able to get drunk anymore. "If you want to learn, you need to justify why to me before I teach anyone."
…if she drained her Storm Flames, could she get drunk like she once had to do to her Cloud in order to get a work out? Did using either drain both her Flames?

The thief made a note to investigate that. Even if the Rains ended up being a headache and a half, she was already more than pleased with the things she had learned with this.

"Moving on, anything in particular you all would like to say about Mikhail's methods? Since," she glanced back at the individual in question who was only just coming around from her punch, "he specifically tried to tell me I couldn't ask?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 8th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I'll do the Rains when I get back."

Especially since this weekend was the slot she had gotten to visit Dimitry within, and the three salvageable Rains would be using that to independently confirm the necessity of her actions.

Sonya had to buy a gun, too.

"…alright." Was Galina's distracted reply from her borrowed spot behind the desk, still paging through the few pieces of long misfiled paperwork that would probably see her attempting to brutalize the Rain when he got back. "Usov and I have finished passing on what the Vindice have on Flame users."

In other news, Sonya did win that bet. She put money on her getting her hands on any paperwork left in random books within twenty-four hours. Entirely depressing and disgusting meetings with their ultimate boss aside, she had ripped into the bookcase the very moment she could last night.

Of course, that meant she only now was able to read what paperwork she had found.

Gedeon winced slightly. "Erm, I've passed it on to the Suns too."

Eyeing him strangely, the thief waited for either an explanation for the flinch or if he would tell her to ignore it. That he flushed slightly and fidgeted when her stare attracted even a highly distracted Lightning's attention.

"I didn't know…"

"Know what?"

"…had we let the situation with the Grekov Gang and the Novgorod Brotherhood go on, the Vindice would've-"

"None of us knew that." Sonya cut him off a bit exasperatedly. "Furthermore, all our Flame users would've been mostly trainees. There was me, Tats, Galina, and maybe Dimitry would've still counted but that's not really something I can say with certainty. Maybe the Four Rains. My sister and I weren't here, so we might not have counted. You want to play a 'what if' game? What if the kids hadn't counted either?"

Gedeon didn't quite subside at that. "What if they had? I thought-"

"You did what you had to do." She cut him off again before he could articulate his second guessing aloud. "You had limited information and a very real threat. I was not very appreciative, I am still not to be honest. But my job is to find valuable things and horde it to be sold to the highest bidder, and you gave that away. Your job is... what? Learn of anything new or interesting that might help your father? Be a sounding board?"

"Something like that."

The thief decided to try a different track. "Why, exactly, is this coming up now?"

The expression that passed over the vor's face was an interesting mix of chagrin and disgust.

"The Wo Hop To Triad paid us a visit yesterday." Galina chipped in for him, sorting her pile of papers one last time then pulling the letter in Middle French to try translating for her. "Three guesses for what they either directly or indirectly confirmed, Sonya."

...Fong had visited two weeks ago. Not a bad turnaround, if the negotiations were already started. "And?"

"From what I heard? They gushed over a syndicate that held a Cloud's loyalty. Especially since their attempts to gain your attention took so long for one of their best to accomplish."

Sonya couldn't help the face she pulled at her assistant's words. Perfect.

She hated it when she ran into the dregs or remains of some other Cloud's actions.

"What's the damage?"

Galina laughed, wickedly smirking at the disgruntled Sun. "Oh... it's nothing bad, just... a little awkward for poor Gedeon. There was a lot of 'and she hasn't killed you all yet?' being tossed around."

Even better, she was left with the reputation a very touchy Cloud had left behind.

"It wasn't that bad." Gedeon interjected a bit more than huffily. "Just... eye opening."

Giving the sulking Sun a patronizing smile, the Lightning turned to the still mostly wary thief with the air of someone conveying a tasty bit of gossip. "They mostly wanted to know whose brilliant idea it was to conceal you behind a thief's façade, since everyone knows Clouds are more soldier-types than support. Apparently, the way you pulled off being a small fish in a pond when you were really a shark is very... awe inspiring."

Nodding at Sonya's skeptical look, she bent over the papers she had to start in on translating it as she continued.

"The fact you are a good thief practically blew the poor man's mind. There were a few too many to be subtle inquiries if you were single, and how content you were here. Additionally, your foster father was very angry at the end of the meeting."

"And?" Repeated the thief with even more exasperation. While kind of creepy to know, and a little weird someone would ask that without so much as seeing her in person first, that still answered exactly zero of her questions.

With a huff, of what sounded like laughter, the Lightning paused in her work and pulled herself upright a bit. "How often would you say Gedeon and his father irritate you?"
"A lot." Sonya answered impatiently. "Why?"

"They just had someone, who didn't even bother keeping his aims to himself, trying to sound them out for how easily it might be to get you to jump ship." Galina pointed out bluntly, ignoring the face Gedeon was pulling at her. "Who then reminded them you are one of those Clouds that can go off the deep end messily, and they haven't been particularly nice about managing you here."

"So… what? Are they worried I'd defect or something?" Sonya's head hurt. Why the hell couldn't anyone just say what was going on?

Details were nice and all, but right now it was just confusing her.

"Summed up, yes."

"Not… well, yes but…" Gedeon's expression said he shared at least a little of her pain at the moment. "Just, maybe we haven't been considering some of what you've said as hard as we should have."

"…are you saying I was lying?"

"No, just that you might not have had the experience or range to understand how what happens outside the Soviet Union would translate to within."

Under her entirely unimpressed eye, the vor made a throwing away gesture and slumped back into the couch he had mostly taken over when he visited.

"Not like that… I mean…"

"Gedeon… I've been working for Mafia Land for almost a decade. What does my age have to do with anything, especially when paired against my long-standing experience?"

He kept his mouth shut.

Sonya glanced at Galina, who gave an unhelpful shrug.

"Right… I'm going to go visit my parents then my sister. You… figure out how to phrase whatever that was in a coherent manner."

Hopefully, when she got back, things would make more sense.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 8th of April, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Lisa eyed her strangely. "You were intimidated?"

"No, it was the best I could come up with at the moment. I was… weirded out? It was strange." Sonya probably should've had this conversation with her mother months ago, but she kept forgetting. "But what other reason is there to get into someone else's personal space like that?"

"Like what, sweetie? You need to be a bit more descriptive."

Huffing, she abandoned her teacup and gestured to the older woman. "Stand up, I'll show you."

It took a bit of shuffling, and an awkward use of one of the living room's corners, for her to pose them both in a mockup of how Renato had used two walls and himself to corner her.
"This?"

"Yes. He said it wasn't intimidation, but what else could it be?" Sonya was pretty damn sure the situation was still greatly off, she wasn't taller than Lisa nor could she pull off Renato's almost effortless airs. It was the closest she could get, however.

Her foster mother had a strangely amused look on her face. "What did you do in return?"

"Planted a hand on his chest and pushed." When she pressed gently against Sonya's sternum, the younger woman obligingly backed up. "Lisa?"

"Mmhmm… he wasn't trying to intimidate you." She shook her head before the Storm-Cloud could then ask what it was. "I think you have to figure that out yourself, sweetie. Although I am pleased to hear you got yourself out of that situation when it disturbed you and he respected that rejection."

With a sigh, she accepted that and slunk back over to their cooling tea set out on the coffee table. Wondering if Tatiana would give a different opinion or if she had to really muddle through it all on her own.

"Now… although I am aware this is more than a little late, Sonya? What do you want out of life?"

She paused, cup halfway to her lips as she shot her mother a sideways look. "What brought this up? And now?"

"I didn't like where I was when I was your age." Lisa admitted candidly as she refreshed the tea in their cups. "It occurred to me a little while ago that you might be having similar issues with where you are."

"...I don't hate it, but I also don't really like it." Sonya admitted slowly, opting to stare at the steaming dark liquid in her hands than the other woman. "Which is fine, it's temporary. I do kind of like taking contracts for Mafia Land… did I ever thank you for taking us there?"

She smiled softly at her. "You don't have to, but you are welcome. Even if Cherep didn't like it much."

"Cherep's a dork." Dismissed the thief absently. "And at least he tried it, so the next few visits didn't paint him as painfully green or out of place."

"Well… yes. But we're not talking about your brother right now, sweetie."

With a sigh, she turned her attention to the question posed to her. "To be blunt, I don't know."

She was alive, wasn't that enough? Sonya could live and see things. Travel, learn interesting facts or skills, and meet people even if she didn't really like very many. When she had memories of being murdered, and yet woke up?

As for what she would like… she'd like it if Cherep didn't have to worry about someone going after him for his undying skills. If Tatiana didn't have to deal with sexist assholes when trying to develop her nurse and doctor skills. Maybe to spend a little time with Shamal without having to wonder if the reverse of Sky Rejection might be possible and could drive the poor brat a bit around the bend too.

He was a Mist, from the look of Usov he wouldn't need the help.

The Storm-Cloud looked at the woman that raised her. "Would 'I want people to be less stupid' be a good option?"
"No, nice answer though." Lisa cheerfully shot her down with a broader and fond smile. "Think hard, Sonya. I really would like to know if I can help you or not. Your siblings, well... all of them that are grown anyways, are well on their way to achieving their own goals. Yet here you are, sulking about at the whims of others to afford them that leeway."

"...I want a challenge." Sonya settled on after a few moments of deliberation. "I mean... I did a heist for Mafia Land that was outside of my usual. It was last second, hard, unwieldy, and totally off the wall. But I did it. Flawlessly. I want a challenge like that again."

A nod was her first answer, then her foster mother leaned back in her armchair to ponder her request for the time it took them to empty the pot. "...Sonya, why don't you steal things when you're here?"

"Do we need anything?"

"Sweetie, I mean steal things from highly guarded or very secure locations just to see if you can." Lisa elaborated with a laugh. "You don't need a contract to steal things. You can do your own heists even if you're stuck behind a desk some days of the week."

...right, she could do that.

"You could even change it up a little and steal information instead of jewelry. Books for your own reading habits, anything really."

"Wouldn't that clutter up whatever storage options we have?"

"Not entirely. You could just practice breaking in and out of different locations as well. Scout it out, find something to steal that will either be not or greatly missed, and steal it one night. As long as we have some idea of what is going to be taken, we can always absorb more things to sell."

The thief pondered on why she hadn't thought of that herself. Too used to being told what to do, probably.

"It's a decent short-term goal, I suppose." Her foster mother decided, straightening up the tea service they were using. "I would like to hear a long-term one out of you sometime soon. Figure out if you really like teaching, or if you want to become the best thief in the world or have the largest library in the Soviet Union. Something."

"...can I take the last option anyways? Even if it's not a life goal?"

Laughing wryly, Lisa flicked one fine-boned hand to convey her permission. "Oh... excuse me. What I'm worried about, sweetie, is that our training you to be a thief made you think that was all you could be."

"But... I'm a good thief."

"Of course you are." She agreed immediately with a nod. "But that's not all you are."

"...I am also a Storm-Cloud?"

A sigh informed her she was a little off from whatever her mother was searching for. "You are that Shamal child's mamma, are you not? You are Tatiana's, Cherep's, and Valera's sister. You are my daughter. See what I mean? Outside of being a thief, outside of being family to a few people, what are you?"

How did Renato put it?
A 'Dying Will Flames expert'. An author, even if that was more on a technicality than by design. Björn's patron and Crina's ex-apprentice. Those were more obligations than things she liked to do, so probably not what her foster mother was driving at.

What did Sonya like to do most days?

She read or stole things. Books were more of an addiction than something she defined herself by, and stealing was out as a life-goal apparently. Took tea/coffee with Renato, but that was a rare thing nowadays. She had one spar with Fong but was looking forward to another.

Recently, she had been… "...I want to be a mafia historian."

Lisa blinked at her. To be fair, the younger woman was just as surprised as she was by what came out of her own mouth.

While interesting to poke at the places where the mafia world and civilian worlds crossed, getting the history of such interactions out of either highly suspicious or wary individuals who may or may not even be alive anymore might be a headache. She had enough as it was, why would she add to that?

Talk about near-impossible goals. Why did she do this to herself?

"That's... a tall order. Not... entirely impossible, but very tricky." The older woman offered delicately, a faint crease showing up between her brows. "Is that all?"

"The World's Greatest Thief?"

"...your childhood goal? Okay, why not?" Lisa stood up, picking up the tray with the pot and cups stacked on it with a distracted air. "I forgot I was talking to the difficult one."

"Hey..." That wasn't very nice, Sonya almost felt insulted.

She wasn't difficult, that was Cherep. At least she could defend herself in a pinch.

Just because she had a lot of things she had to do and a few things she wanted to do didn't make her difficult. Boring, maybe. Duty-bound?

She got distracted by that point, absently noting Arseniy was back with Valera from wherever they had gone.

What did she want in this second shot at life?

Covering for Dimitry wasn't it, so it likely wasn't the job she arranged the Inverted Rain to have. Heists were interesting rarely, and she wasn't at the point Mafia Land would toss more her way just yet. Reading was more of a time waster now, even if she was highly protective of her books. While history was kind of interesting, a mafia historian would be... tricky.

Then again, she had wanted a challenge. Like keeping Skull de Mort safe from the mafia wouldn't be challenging enough in the coming years.

---

(Wednesday the 9th of April, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Are you sure about this? "
"Nope!" Tatiana brought around the tray of various liquids, parking it next to the medical bed Sonya had obligingly laid herself out on. "The problem with you being oh-so-Stormy is that we have next to no way to tell if anything will work without clinical trials. So just sit back and relax as we poke you full of holes and try to find something that can knock you out."

Her little sister eyed the line of needles already full with different solutions. "...I think you're enjoying this way too much."

"Miss Bazanova, Nurse Primakova? English please, if you've forgotten." Doctor Kappel informed them both without even bothering to turn around from his desk. "We are recording this."

The younger thief sighed, which made her older sister smother a smirk.

In all actuality, Tatiana was a little worried. Sonya's possible immunity to poisons like alcohol and maybe even viruses was all well and good, but that was probably only when she had the Storm Flames to spare for it. If they couldn't find some way around the unexpected development of internal applications of Storm Flames, she was screwed if she ever got sick after a nasty fight.

Especially if they couldn't give her booster shots or vaccinations anymore.

The Sun nurse was ignoring the odds of the Storm-Cloud ever getting in over her head and draining herself dry in risky situations. Her little sister might be a careful sort most of the time, but she did still have a temper that could and would explode when tweaked just right.

It could happen, best have a few options prepared before that.

"Sorry doctor, testing general anesthesia first." Plucking the mask off the tank to Sonya's left, Tatiana grinned brightly at her sister's deadpan expression as she fitted it on her. "Entonox. Dosage should be in effect in thirty seconds after my mark. Mark."

As she cracked open the tank, the utter brat that was her sister cracked open a book.

Counting down the thirty seconds, she was almost unsurprised when her hand didn't even waver under the slight weight by even a tiny bit.

Once she hit zero, Tatiana sealed the tank of Entonox and pulled the breathing mask off Sonya's face. "Patient is still conscious."

"Unfortunately." Said patient agreed for herself absently as she marked her place.

Well... they had known she would have some kind of immunity going in. Confirmation was just... depressing, decided the Sun. A good thing Sonya questioned everything and wondered about the effects, because learning that mid-life saving surgery would've been bad.

Kappel paused in listing down the procedure and written transcript they had decided upon making for this test, turning around on his swivel chair to run the willing Storm-Cloud through another reflex test. After being poked and prodded, and a light shone in her eyes, he sighed himself. "No visible decrease in response times. Nurse, start the next test in five minutes if nothing changes."

"A whole day of trying to drug my little sister to the gills. I love my life." Tatiana marveled as she seated herself on Sonya's bedside.

"Hooray for you." A flick of a finger had a page turning without her needing to bother raising her other hand. "Speaking of, while home I had an idea. Couldn't I just drain my Storm Flames before getting shots?"
"Can you?" She countered curiously. "I mean, I know you have difficulties getting your Cloud Flames low enough you can get some exercise. Wouldn't it be just as hard to drain off your Storm?"

"I'm not as… practiced? With my Storm as my Cloud." Answered her baby sister thoughtfully. "It might be easier. It is entirely possible I could drain or shift my Flames to be purely Cloud in time, so my Storm would not be affecting everything I take."

"A decent second or third trial possibility." Interjected Kappel, having returned to scribbling away on his desk. "If no results are found this time around, that may be an avenue of investigation."

"…how many more of these are there?"

Tatiana hummed as she checked on the next general anesthesia they were going to be testing her immunity with. "Well… there are several options, and several combinations of those options, and a few additives to certain options. You didn't have anything else planned for today, did you?"

Sonya eyed the IV she was preparing worriedly. "…um… Tats?"

Uncapping the needle, the nurse gave her little sister a smirk. "Yes?"

"…have I told you I love you lately? You love me, right? You would not take advantage of my current… uh, difficulties, would you?"

"Nya, sweetie, shut up and take it like a woman."

Kappel coughed delicately. "Ladies, the recording?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 9th of April, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Romanov Pyotr did not put his face in his hands, sigh, or roll his eyes. Even if he was the Sovintnik to Zolotov Milos' Pahkan, the fact that restraint felt like some kind of accomplishment probably meant he was getting too old for his position.

Way, way back in the day he should have told Milos to stuff it. A clan of thieves stealing and hoarding their goods in one place?

More like a den of drama queens. They weren't particularly any more violent than other vory, which was a blessing in a way. However, the gossip that got around…

"Primakova…" the vor sighed at the woman giving him a sweet smile, standing as bold as brass in the middle of his office, "Elisaveta, you know as well as I do-

"That my youngest daughter is an asset where she is." Interrupted the mother of the girl in question, crossing her arms under her chest. "And that I would know her better than most about her. Couldn't you at least consider it?"

Pyotr gave her a slight frown. He had known her and her lover since they were children, with scuffed knees, elbows, and the barest amounts of the skill or grace either had grown up to possess. He still remembered how devastated Lisa had been to learn of her inability to have children, her 'running away' to Mafia Land and what Arseniy had to do to drag her back.

The fact she even had a child at all?
Using her foster children's investigations into Dying Will Flames, no less. Practically a miracle, and still wasn't just happy with that. Here she was demanding one from him now.

With a harrumph, the elderly man leaned back in his office chair.

Pyotr wasn't as financially minded as Milos was, ironically. Keeping the books for even a criminal enterprise was no light duty and being cooped up in an office all day did take a physical toll on him all these years later. He didn't get out of his office much, but he also didn't particularly care to much anymore.

That also meant he had a better idea than most of the state of funds within the clan.

Lisa's younger foster daughter had practically financed half of the living situations of the newest crop of orphans and foundlings unknowingly. The gross excess from her jewel finding had still spilled over even with young Galina's attempts to reroute some of it to finance their own projects. A lot of gems and precious metals still sold no matter where they were acquired.

The damn girl had even dumped eight bars of high purity gold and silver on him at the same time. Not just the little troy ounce bars, the full-sized bullion bars. How in the nine hells the girl got a hold on something like that still befuddled him. She overpaid, but never bothered to check to see if she was good or not on her dues and take back the remainder.

With young Sonya stuck behind a desk as much as he was, she wasn't contributing anything to the clan's coffers. Oh... they had her dues, for both herself and that foreigner boy she took on, but that was really little more than a fraction of what she could pull in.

"What exactly are you suggesting?" Pyotr settled on as he straightened up to run his eyes over the figures he was supposed to be checking, deciding hearing her out wouldn't harm anything.

"Sonya's used to being contracted, or even at least told, what is needed. She also wants a challenge." She smiled even more sweetly, as if she had already won. "So considerate, isn't she? But she won't steal anything if she's not sure we can absorb whatever. Tell her what the clan may need."

Lisa probably had won, the elderly vor mused sourly.

Even if her youngest daughter decided to drown him in excess as she had young Dimitry when something was asked of her, Pyotr could still use just about anything.

They were getting more attention, which was both good and bad. More business, in that dratted Flame thing her foster daughters were caught up in, and more scrutiny.

He might be putting more and more away into the Obshchak funds just in case, but they also needed more and more ruble to handle the influx of those joining the clan and outfitting them appropriately. Land wasn't cheap, nor was proper housing for their members. Clothing, food, and weapons made their own dents in the funds. More was needed to afford the lawyers for those that got arrested to ensure things were done properly, even more to appropriately decorate their headquarters so any visitors would not assume they were worse off than they were.

"My daughter is bored, restless, and aimless." Lisa informed him as if that had not been apparent to almost everyone. "Since she is stuck here for the time being give her something to do, before she finds something you would not like."

"And why does she not find her own work?"

"I just told you, she's too considerate. The clan and her father told her she was needed, she'll remain..."
close until that is no longer true. You tell her you need something, she'd take it with both hands if only for a small break."

Milos would not be happy if he learned of this when he needed something from the girl… but wasn't she also training that young boy of his to do it?

Young Gedeon was probably a bit spoiled, but he had a decent head on his shoulders more often than not.

Pyotr sighed heavily again, slumping back into his chair and giving up on his figures for the moment. "Elisaveta, you are a pain."

She had the gall to keep on smiling at him. "You know you love me, father."

"Not your father, girl."

"You raised me." Lisa shrugged that off. "Speaking of, grandpa, the children might be interested to at least meet you outside of this office."

"I'll think about it."

"You've said that at least fifty times now. I didn't mind when it was just the girls and Cherep, they're in the same situation as we were and it might have been a bit more than awkward when they were still settling in, but Valera?"

"How, exactly, did his foster daughter end up such a manipulative little beast of a woman? "…I'll think about it."

"This Christmas, or I'll have Arseniy abduct you out of this office."

Snorting, Pyotr bent to his daily tasks again. "Still using him to do your dirty work?"

"Of course, we've been trading off things like that for years." Lisa's smile twisted into a smirk. "Of course, the dirty work I do for him tends to be a lot more interesting."

"Girl, I do not want to know."
"So... what are you going to do about it?" Her sister asked the moment she finished prying the last of what she knew of the clan's state of affairs out of her.

Sonya nibbled on the lunch Tatiana had made them while she did said prying. "...mmm, not really sure. Obviously, I have to..."

"But?"

"...I do not really want to." She wasn't a murderer... well, she had killed a couple goons in France.

That was self-defense, as they pretty much were more than likely going to kill her if they spotted her first. The little family that had gotten tangled up in that made it all the murkier of a moral definition.

The point was she had never intentionally gone after anyone with the intent to kill them.

...except that one invasion goon she ended up breaking the spine of. That hadn't been intentional. Accidental, up until the nurse informed her it would be probably kinder just to kill him.

Alright, the thief wasn't quite as non-lethal as she had thought.

Stabbing more of the whatever-spicy-chicken and ignoring how both the meat and pasta were starting to fall apart off her fork, she gave serious consideration to if she could kill Fadei or not.

Not in a 'was ordered' way but in a 'do I want to' one.

She didn't really.

Killing Fadei might solve a few problems, but it had its own attached that made her regard her expressed order to kill him dispassionately. Aside her personal reservations over him, the Rain could have and might possibly still be the best example of a user of Dying Will Flames for the Zolotov Clan.

Just... not around her, anywhere near some Sky-possible brat, or Dmitriy. By anywhere near, of course she really meant 'not in the same postal code'.

What he arranged for the Rains was proof enough of that, hiding their gatherings under the umbrella of bar patrons and possible drug users to conceal leaking Tranquility. He had hammered three other Rains of various outlooks or personalities together to the point they could be referenced collectively instead of individually.

No, she might not particularly like him very much but her own feelings on the matter were near enough inconsequential to what he had been.

Digging deep to figure out if she did have serious problems with what was going on or not, Sonya actually felt a little frustrated. Not just with Fadei's latest behavior, although a lot of it was that, but with the situation in general.

Out of all the Flame users the Zolotovs had ready to be tapped, the Four Rains were pretty much the only ones able to move freely and establish something of themselves without limits.
The sisters were mainly Mafia Land employees, they were international examples of the Soviet Union's underworld presented as a measuring stick to the rest of the world's criminal ranks.

Maybe not intentionally in the beginning, but with Tatiana in the hospital and Sonya's latest notoriety making the rounds it made even the more casual of visitors to the island associate Soviet Flame users as strong or strong-willed creatures if that was what the women were like. Even possibly terrifying or deadly, if she was pressed to be honest, given one of them was half a Cloud.

Dimity was in prison for at least another year yet, but even before that he was practically chained to a desk much like she was now. He had other duties, but his main one was training up the next set and shoving them out the door as quick as possible. Galina wasn't much of an independent operation, she seemed to be more about finesse than brute force, and it was likely if the Storm-Cloud hadn't come along the Lightning would've eventually attached herself to a knot of the younger users to manage once they became something.

Mikhail got caught up in that a little, he was about the age where their clan members left to branch off in whatever direction they went in until arrested. Instead of preparing or planning that out, he was instead stuck instructing a gaggle of Storms how not to atomize everything in range with their pretty red Flames.

Much as she loathed to credit the sexist asshole with anything, it still showed a decent amount of clan loyalty to stick it out instead of reach for excuses to hurry his acquisition of the 'vor' title.

Might be his Storm obsession showing in being the best vor to be, but at the very least it was convenient enough she'd overlook any benefits he might get out of the action to just grudgingly appreciate his taking on that headache.

After them it was Andrei and Usov. Which… one was a Sun without a serious dedication to murder or theft and the other a fucking twelve-year-old Mist.

Andrei actually seemed keenly curious to contribute to the on-going orphan/foundling training rather than get starry-eyed over the vory interacting with them, so it was likely he'd remain where he was running various Suns through their paces for decades.

Usov was just… a whole lot of no right now. The Mist might have the skills and willingness, but he was still a preteen and young enough Sonya just didn't want him to do anything really serious yet.

Information networking, sure. Teaching his fellow mind-breakers what they knew of Mists, why not?

Even stealing, which she had done before his age… kind of.

However, the men in the Russian Mafiya were expected to be more than just thieves. Which made her baulk when thinking of the Mist going off on his own finally.

Fadei, Kazimir, Irinei, and Zarya were supposed to have been the Flame users' exposition in being useful and valuable criminals. Flame users that weren't chained to a desk or out of the country for upwards of half a year or more, who could spend the dedicated amount of time needed to pull off what a non-Flame user would've said was impossible.

More Rains, but then again Dmitriy had probably wanted to start with something familiar to him before branching out.

Their initial job was prime example of that. An entire five-story business complex picked clean at their leisure without a kopeck spent on bribes. Sonya might view that as rather plain, as there was four Rains pooling their Flames to accomplish it so she saw it as a bit of overkill and cheap, but to a non-Flame user?

With her orders to murder Fadei taken into consideration, it left the three remaining Rains in a bit of a tight spot. Kazimir might rise to the occasion, and indeed he seemed rather on top of things if his herding of his fellows away from a known threat like her was any indication.

However, that still left them on the back step as the secondary or beta tried to fill in the alpha’s shoes for him.

Maybe they would acquire someone new?

They could take Mikhail with her blessing, even if then they would be three Rains and a Storm.

"Sonya? Are you going to eat that or just keep murdering it?"

"...I am finding the murdering option is very therapeutic." Sonya absently replied, sticking a forkful of her shredded lunch in her mouth instead of actually acknowledge Tatiana's smirk verbally or otherwise.

Hopefully, hopefully either Kazimir or Irinei would take command of their little clique with minimal fuss. The best option would be if either decided to put a lot of distance between themselves and her and go on to do that establishing of a Rain's reputation in the Soviet Union. The worst would be if they decided to continue the little grudge their soon to be dead leader held to her.

Could she somehow nudge that along?

Maybe even get rid of Mikhail at the same time?

The thief was no great shake at talking or persuading people, but she'd bet good money that Gedeon was. Galina was probably even better than she was. Besides, it wasn't like any of the remaining Rains would take her word for anything even if she told them the sky was blue.

…which, actually, given their Flame thing… Skies were orange, not blue.

Huh.

Sonya puzzled that over for only a moment longer, giving up and accepting there was both no right answer to that riddle and her feelings from the past week. She'd live with it decently enough, that would have to be it. "Tats, I need a gun."

"I thought we were talking in English to ensure the next time we didn't slip back to Russian in the middle of Doctor Kappel's recording?" Asked the nurse thoughtfully around the tines of her own fork. She then waved it in the blonde's direction in return for a disgruntled look. "Oh... sure I'll help, but... why?"

"Because I do not need or normally use a gun and I was told to kill someone, and another suggested keeping reasonable doubt about me doing it intact was probably a good option."

"I don't want you going off on your own just yet." Tatiana severely eyed her little sister for a long moment. "Some of the things we tested yesterday should've knocked you out until halfway through next week, and I would like to be on hand if they finally kick in."

Sonya blinked once. "I feel fine."
"No lightheadedness? Numbness? Headache, nausea, tiredness? A cottony feeling in the mouth or brain? Anything at all?" With each negative shake of the head she got more disgruntled. "...I really hate this newest upset you've got going on. Wasn't the 'not using your own muscles' one bad enough?"

"Did you ever find the end of your own abilities when it came to Sun Flames?" Asked the younger sister in hopes of shifting her elder's attention.

It sort of worked, but the redhead Sun still looked rather irritable. "Besides the fact I have more energy in a day than is entirely humane? If I wasn't a nurse by this point... I probably would've gotten into something either ill-advised or dangerous to try bleeding off the excess instead of fast-healing a couple cases a day."

Sonya quickly took a bite of lunch instead of pondering where her sister had been the year before and what 'ill-advised or dangerous' might have meant.

"So... you need a gun. Would one of mine work?"

"...I fully intend to destroy whichever weapon I use for this after one or two shots, so unless you have one you don't mind losing..."

Pursing her lips thoughtfully, Tatiana stared hard at the younger thief. "I don't have so many that I'm willing to lose one just like that... but do you have any other criteria other than 'a gun'? A Soviet manufactured one? Small caliber or large? Anything?"

"Soviet, and maybe something accurate?"

It had been more than a few years since Arseniy had taken them to a small firing range at Tatiana's request and she had taught her to shoot, admittedly. Sonya actually wasn't that sure if her aim was any good since she scorned handguns for her various bladed or spiked staffs. She might need practice too... or get close enough that the risk of missing would be minimal.

Which... wouldn't do much for her aims of at least keeping plausible deniability intact about her involvement in the whole issue.

The thief finally decided she had an issue with her orders. Killing Fadei without so much as an attempt made to see if he was salvageable or not was kind of... wasteful, and the short notice made anything she could do rather sloppy.

However, on the issue of actually murdering someone in cold blood because someone else said so...

Sonya liked stealing things a lot better.

"Tats... since the anesthesia testing proved I'm probably immune to all of it... can I go back to smoking?"

"What? Why?" Head snapping up in order to give the blonde a pithy glare, Tatiana abandoned her empty plate and utensils in order to plant both hands on her hips. "It's a nasty habit, Nya. Why in the world would you want to pick it up again? It'll probably do absolutely nothing for you."

"As an alternative to Bjørn or Galina drowning me in tea?" Posed the Storm-Cloud wryly, stacking her own half shredded meal on top of her sister's plate. "It's just something to occupy my hands with. Something else, anyways."

Aside actually punching people. Maybe laying Mikhail out hadn't been her best idea. Doing it once means she'd probably do it again, and soon as well.

"But, it's… urg. Fine. Just nowhere around me, alright?"

"Alright. I am going gun shopping, are you coming with or not?"

The nurse thought about it. "Are you paying?"

"…sure, why not?"

(ooo0000oo)

(Thursday the 10th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I think it's a love letter."

"Seriously?" Sonya eyed the translation in progress set out before Galina skeptically. "I found it in a box. Why wasn't it posted if it was?"

"Which is why I only think it might be, it might also be a transcript of this guy's last words or some kind of bastardized memoir." The Lightning continued thoughtfully, placing a finger in a French-Russian dictionary she might have gotten from the school books they were slowly amassing and glancing up to her. "Some of it is disjointed, kind of like it was written over years of time. Other parts of it are referencing a… Yang XiaoJing. Or XiaoJing Yang, I haven't quite pieced that together yet. A Lady of oriental features, olive skin, dark hair, and apparently a very Rainy countenance."

Confirmation on the name, plus. That the Arcobaleno of the Rain some three hundred years ago might have hailed from the Far East?

The thief frowned thoughtfully. That wasn't exactly good news.

China, Korea, Vietnam, and a fair bit of their surrounding countries, were a little… implosive right now. The odds were against her digging up anything about an Asian Rain that far back, and that was only if the partially translate letter from Pierre-Antoine Carpentier held a possible address for Miss Yang. She could hope some eventual digging might turn something up… but…

"Anything else?"

"I think some parts of this is in German, which I don't know." Continued the brunette regretfully. "It's accented differently, which is the first clue. If there's any more I wouldn't know, since my own linguistic skills only reach as far as French and Chinese."

"I can muddle through the German myself, and hopefully anything else that comes up. Thank you for starting it at least." Sonya finished tossing her coat over the backs of one of the chairs set up before Dmitriy's desk, leaning over the surface to get a good look at where her assistant was unable to translate. "Do you want to learn more languages? I have a fair few more, and I'm pretty sure Scruffy would be thrilled to have a less Sunny teacher for whatever Russian he still needs after a week of immersion."

"I'm fine with what I have so far, but I might not be opposed to learning English." The Lightning's lips twitched as she rose from her borrowed seat and set the book she had been referencing on the desk besides the partial translation. "That Sun you brought back? That you tossed into that mess head first? I'm sure he would be very willing to deal with me instead of more young and eager Suns. Rather mean of you, Sonya, to sentence the poor man to deal with that."
"Do me a favor, go fetch him so I can see where he's at."

(ooo000000)

(Thursday the 10th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

'Peter McScruffy' and yes, he was fully aware by now he was never getting rid of that moniker because Sonya called him that without fail every time she saw him, tried to severely eye his once-rescuer. "I don't care what it is you're after, or what it'll cost me, just do not send me back there."

'Tried', because the little icy little blonde woman didn't even bat an eyelash over his begging. "I need you to learn Russian quickly. Immersion is one of the fast and dirty methods I rather like."

Running a hand through his neatly shorn curly hair, and casting about the blue-green office desperately in hopes something brilliant would occur to him, the man tried a different tact than just pleading. "I learned five words. Алло, Прощай, да, нет, and Что."

A greeting, goodbye, yes, no, and what. In that order. 'Что' had gotten the most use so far, sadly.

He had more luck with learning his 'Dying Will Flames' than learning the local language, depressingly. He could more easily mimic the kids' actions than repeat and understand their words, although some of what those same kids were getting up to with their bright yellow Flames was kind of... beyond strange.

The best he had gotten, now he had examples to pull from aside his rough diamond's laser trick, was summoning up a double palm-full of 'Flames'.

Now he just had to figure out what was next that they were trying to gesture across a language barrier, which also had to do with that dead cat one of the younger ones had brought in a few days ago. Teaching them to use his diamond had gone exactly nowhere so far.

"Pretty good for only a week of experience in it." Sonya didn't even sound amused or scornful or anything, not even glancing up from the paperwork on her desk at all. He figured she might really think that honestly, from what little he did know of her. "You will learn more as time goes on."

The woman named to him as 'Galina' was at least human enough to snicker even as she pretended to busy herself with another section of paperwork that seemed to be waiting to be dealt with, but if it was his expression or the tone of the conversation 'Peter' didn't quite know.

Even if he had fully known what the impassive 'Storm-Cloud' had really been involved with and what it would mean for him back in Freetown?

The depressing thing was that he'd probably would've gone with her anyways.

…or rather beg/demanded for her to care a scrap over what would happen to him after she saved his hide but had coldly let the others run into a firing line.

Surprisingly unexpected health benefits aside, 'Peter' hadn't figured her to be a criminal at first. Even if they had met in jail.

His first thought, when she picked the lock of their jail cell near-instantaneously between reaching it and dismissing him from doing it, had been that the terrifyingly competent but tiny blonde was some kind of government agent.
Neither being surprised nor very concerned over being arrested after the assassination of a government official hadn't screamed 'less than legal employment' to him. More likely that she had some kind of hand in it, or knew it would happen, which suggested she had likely been part of the KGB somehow.

It was possible, even if Sierra Leone had been pretty far from the Soviet Union. Peter hadn't had the opportunity to pick up world news between escaping his forced 'employment' and reaching Freetown before his own arrest, so it had seemed like it could be.

Boy was he wrong.

A criminal who worked by contract was very, very far removed from any government agency. If that wasn't the complete and utter opposite, Peter didn't want to know what was. Sure she might claim to be a thief, either because she identified or took contracts for it more, but that didn't mean she couldn't be deadly.

Also, he existed in a permanent state of not even touching on the mere existence of a 'Mafia Land'. He wasn't that suicidal, for all that he had very little left to his… borrowed name.

Questions were only a good thing when you were in school or working with people that encouraged them, when you weren't such things could become lethal when asked at the wrong time or of the wrong people.

He didn't know for sure, he wasn't indispensable, and discretion right now might be more than prudent. Compared to his last 'internship' with criminals, this was greatly preferable than being the unpaid and underappreciated gem cutter for a diamond cartel.

Whatever this was, that is. Besides getting actual food to eat and a place to sleep, and some new things to learn, it was still head and shoulders above what he had before.

Without even the risk of a beating or starvation if he performed poorly.

Sonya had plans, probably, and had seemed perfectly willing to abide by the few limitations he had set before common sense reasserted itself to him.

"Is there any other way for me to learn? Can't you teach me?"

"I could, but I am occupied with little office tasks for the next year and some." There was finally an inflection in her voice, a tinge of disgusted resignation. "You could try teaching Galina English as she teaches you Russian, but that might not be a very good option until you both have more vocabulary. Or you could find some way to structure what the Suns are ever so enthusiastically trying to cram into your brain instead of drown under it."

Another of her… 'co-workers' entered the office as she was listing things out for him. The man she had nicknamed 'Scruffy' side-eyed the even older criminal warily.

Peter was almost thirty, or thereabouts from what he had managed to extrapolate from the dates he could puzzle out from the not-quite-old newspapers around here. That man was either a bit older or not that much younger than him yet seemed a lot more dangerous than the very bland woman he was dealing with.

No, he didn't quite know everything about his new situation, he wasn't going to be asking much for a while either. Sonya had shoved some tools on him and then had left him to sink or swim on his own merit, but that didn't mean he was terminally unobservant.
This man was as much of a 'Sun' as he was, more powerful even, and more highly placed than even his more or less unwilling 'patron'.

At least, she didn't quite have as much control or automatic adherence over him as the other younger Suns.

Since the blonde woman had an office in the middle of a criminal headquarters, that had to mean 'Gedeon' was either in line for an even better office or somehow connected to the even higher upper echelon of this… organization.

Either way, not someone Peter wished to get in the way of.

Even if he did know English and could talk to him.

The spill of Russian he produced was too quick for him to get more than the blonde woman's name from. He didn't understand a lick of the rest.

Sonya sighed, glanced to her brunette aid and spoke off her own orders in the same language.

It was rather isolating to be the only one who didn't understand. Rather musical language to listen to, but still completely foreign to him. Probably the motivation the thief was relying on to spur him into understanding the language in a few short months.

"Scruffy, Galina will take you back to your hotel room for the day." The youngest in the room informed him with the air of one that expected to be obeyed quickly as she set her work aside. "I seem to have… other appointments to tend to."

He'd take the break happily, and hopefully match some of the sounds he had been hearing to a few written words in the dictionary she tossed at his head. Maybe he could add a sixth word before the end of the week.

Galina clicked her green painted nails in his direction, clicking off in her heels the moment Peter looked at her. Scrambling after, because Russians did not seem to be the patient type of people or at least these ones weren't, he glanced back in time to see a split-second snarl of frustration pass across Sonya's normally bland or blank face as Gedeon kept talking to her.

Nope, he didn't want to know what had put that expression on the impassive woman's face.

Considering the 'Lightning's' back, Peter wondered how he would enlist her aid in freeing him from over excited, over-enthusiastic preteens with little understanding of how to teach someone else a language.

(Friday the 11th of April, 1969. The Rain Bar, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"-when she gets here tomorrow. And do not-"

"Kazimir, shut up." Sonya snapped as she descended alone into the den of Rains, uncaring she had probably interrupted a lecture on how to handle her visit.

As far as a basement of a bar went, this was pretty typical. Barrels of beer and stout occupied the far wall, crates of liquor bottles were stacked everywhere and a few looked to be missing a couple of their contents, a lot of dust and rust streaked the walls, and a hollow had been made for both probably illegal gambling and criminal gatherings. The seating arrangements and pillows set aside in one corner were a bit odd, but understandable additions with the primary property of Dying Will Flame users of Rain being Tranquility.

Unexpected naptime was probably a hazard of these Flame users being around in any concentration.

There were more young Rains than there were Suns or Storms, and from her paperwork Sonya knew only the Mists outstripped them in numbers so far. Oddly, Rains had the oldest age bracket for newer users.

An interesting trend, and one she hoped meant they had at least a working brain between them from.

As the Storm-Cloud reached the bottom of the rickety staircase the remaining three Rains had maneuvered themselves between their knot of brats and the interloper.

"We weren't scheduled until tomorrow." Kazimir all but snarled in her face. "What's wrong, Bazanova? Don't trust us?"

She gave him the disgusted look that accusation deserved. Of course she didn't, but she also wasn't being that petty. "The Wo Hop To Triad have demanded that I be the one to handle their damn request for matched gemstones. Which, if you failed to pay attention to anything but yourself, will happen tomorrow and continue until finished with. Which might last the entire month or more. So, guess what I no longer have the time to do then and need done now so I can plan for this fall before it gets here?"

Easily shoving the obstinate Rain out of her way, the thief picked her way further into the basement's rearranged area. Having opted to leave her Lightning out of this, she had to resort and shuffle around her paperwork in order to get to the parts she needed and handed Irinei off the roster for more markings.

"Do you really hate Rains?"

"No, I've trained a Rain before. I hate a Storm of my same Polarization, and stupid Mists." Finally pulling free her 'suggestion' sheets, Sonya dug into her trousers' pockets for her pen. "Other than that, it seems to be more hit or miss for what... oh wait, I intensely dislike a Cloud of my same Polarization. That's it."

The boy, about the same age as Usov or maybe a bit older, hummed a bit. "Stupid Mists?"

"...Kirill, Kirill Yevtukh."

She didn't have the roster in front of her, which meant she had little beyond his appearance and accent to judge by, but she was pretty sure he wasn't actually Russian. "Yevtukh, how did you get here?"

A gapped-tooth smirk was her first answer. "I walked. And before that? Well, see... there was this book with ever so interesting descriptions of 'soulfire' in it-"

"Never mind." The bait-book had hooked a Rain?

Well... hooray. It probably had caught a few Mists as well, she should check with Usov if she really wanted to feel that cheap and used. Sonya uncapped her pen, and actually took a look around at the faces staring back at her.

"So… anything you wish you were told in the beginning that you only now know?"

Much to her mingled disgust and exasperation, the only answer was a lot of wary looks being tossed around.

"Anything at all?"

Since even Yevtukh was silent, maybe the path she picked for Dmitriy had been the best one?

A stab in the dark, and this was assuming that was what he had passed on to Fadei and his Rains, that she was honestly surprised might have been on the mark.

"Huh… interesting."

"What is?" Asked the only Rain so far with a spine.

"I taught Dmitriy how to use his Flames, he taught Fadei. Fadei probably taught you the same way he was taught, which meant the method I shoved on Dmitriy actually worked decently enough." Sonya wasn't even a Rain herself, and yet a half-guessed method only possibly modified by an actual Rain proved true enough in this volume?

"I thought Dmitriy was the one to start all of this?"

Pursing her lips, because she did catch onto the slightly cautious edge in the brat's tone, the thief merely shrugged after a moment of mentally arranging her thoughts. "I only started Dmitriy and my sister Tatiana on their own Flames personally. What you all are taking advantage of is what Dmitriy developed when I left. Which is why I'm here doing this at all, your opinion on how well or how badly it did will let us convert the process to a more… sociable setting for larger groups."

Yevtukh blinked flat black eyes at her innocently. "Why?"

"Because there will be more, and it's best to have the tools to handle that before the flood hits."

There were in fact five more that had to be added to the rosters, two new unaffiliated Mists and three ragged Suns, since last Friday. Even as Sonya was here handling sounding out the Rains for any immediate issues that needed addressing, Galina was off collecting two new Lightings and a Storm from other syndicates that had arranged training.

"We, obviously from how packed in this place is, are running out of room already."

About twenty bodies, even if most were preteens, crammed into the basement cellar of a bar made for some claustrophobic elbow-room. Part of the reason why Sonya had merely gone in far enough to make use of a barrel as a table and opted to stand.

"Can I ask a question?" One of the teenaged girls in the back asked a bit impertinently, ignoring her barrel-mate's hissed 'Raisa!' "Why haven't you keeled over yet? The bartender does every damn time he comes down for something, then we have to stop for an entire hour while we try and wake him while Irinei goes and holds down the fort upstairs."

"…I'm partially a Storm. Internalized Storm Flames means your Flames have to at least amount to or overpower my own before you can even make me yawn." Glancing between the semi-guilty looks being traded around and the highly wary elder Rains in the room, the Storm-Cloud gave the girl a very toothy smirk. "Still not there, girl. Massed Flame use is more of an overlap than a mingled
"Well... that's unfair." The girl, with violently purple-blue hair paired with bright green eyes, announced as if Sonya had done her some kind of insult.

Shrugging, the thief checked over her as of yet unmarked notes and waved to their 'elders'. "These morons should've passed on that tidbit when they tried and failed to Tranquilize me before, you may blame them for the oversight. Continuing."

"Wait just one damn moment. You may n-"

"May?" Sonya echoed Zarya icily, turning only far enough to pin the twit with a glare that might or might not be red herself. "I may do whatever the hell I want to. If I bad-mouth the lot of you for finding one trick each then crawling into a hole with your developed Flame usage, then I will. You are all unimaginative, conceited examples of a Rain. Yes, what you do works against civilians and possibly uninformed vory. You already had ample proof it would not work against another Flame user when I beat the shit out of your boys. Which, may I point out, I just had to tell the brats you three are in charge of how to get around. A. Year. Later."

Bless whoever the fuck was the patron saint of Dying Will, because that tidbit of news had the collective young Rains actually looking semi-thoughtful.

Irinei sighed heavily as his shorter fellow male Rain spluttered in outrage over how she addressed the now pale red headed Rain, marking off a last few items before handing the paperwork back to the Storm-Cloud. "May we please keep previous disagreements between just us?"

"If you would do your damn job, it wouldn't have been brought up. Either teach them properly, or hand it off to the next experienced Rain and go. Either or, I don't care." Sonya blinked as something occurred to her. "No wait, just hand it off already. I'll deal with a teenager teaching, I already have Usov and he's twelve."

Said twelve-year-old was even doing a much better job than these three, and she didn't even have to go check on the Mists herself. Admittedly, the sky very nearly seemed to be the limit for Mist Flame Constructs so a lack of imagination wasn't really a problem for them.

Again, the thief was just going to nod and go along with it as long as the Mists had no great issues needing to be heard.

"So..." The same outspoken Rain girl interjected into the very tense silence she was somewhat sure was named 'Raisa' from both her barrel-mate and the newly returned Rain roster. "How would we overpower your Flames of Storm?"

"...I know a Sun nurse that will be highly interested in any answer for that." Sonya started off thoughtfully, forcibly putting the behavior of the elder Rains out of her mind if only for the moment. "It might be something you need to know eventually, so... I'll schedule some time for a few of you to try Tranquilizing the Storms. Both when they know you're there and when they don't. I'm still one of the strongest in the clan, but that might change in as little as a month. You may find out for yourself and inform your fellows once you know."

Raisa beamed at that answer. "Stella and I will totally volunteer for that."

'Stella' seemed to be her ebony haired barrel-mate, and she gave a more hesitant nod to confirm her friend's words.

Noting that down, as well as jotting a reminder to pose that possible option to Tatiana so Rain Flames of sufficient strength could be found for her anesthesia testing, the Storm-Cloud glanced to the slightly more than a baker's dozen of Rains she had yet to hear a word out of.

"Anything else? Thoughts, suggestions, disgruntled bitching?" Queerly, her semi-sarcastic question actually earned her a few snickers. Unwilling to snub a gift horse even if she didn't understand how she got it, she tentatively suggested something else. "Anything one of you think you might need in the near or distant future?"

Yevtukh took the bait, jabbing an elbow in a green-haired fellow's ribs at the same time. "Are only Storms sort of or possibly entirely immune to Rains?"

Sonya eyed him as she thought about that. "...pick a Flame but not Rain, Cloud, or Sky."

"...Lightning?"

"You, and greenie over there, have just been volunteered for testing Lightning reactions to a Rain's Tranquility." That would leave Mists and Suns, since she was the only Cloud she would accept being a test subject but her Storm would interfere and they still had no Skies. "...I need four more Rains."

Were there any possible difficulties a Mist might have trying to work their own Flames against other users?

Tatiana had already mentioned healing using her Sun Flames was harder on Dying Will Flame users, but Storms and Clouds were more physically destructive with their own.

While she was at it, she made additional notes for Galina to test her Lightnings against the other types they had access to.

"When you're done with that, make sure you inform these three exactly what you find. Maybe they'll get a clue or something."

"We do not need to be taught by children." Kazimir sneered bitterly at her back.

Sonya paused in writing down the next timid volunteer's name, slitting a sideways glance at the man. No, wait… he was still a teenager. Right?

Still younger than her, so she was mentally labeling the asshole a brat.

"So that's the problem."

Irinei glanced from his blue haired and green eyed fellow to her and back again warily but kept his mouth shut. Zarya had similar restraint, so Kazimir had to be the one to ask, "What?"

"...I don't think I actually have words." Marveled the thief as she finished her note, more tiredly amused than actually pissed off. "Get out, you and Zarya. Find something else to do."

"...wait, WHAT?"

"Why?" Was the question the eldest female Rain cried out nearly at the same time as the teenager's splutter. "What gives you-

"I... have... had... it, with both your insubordination and slander. Now I just learned the reason there have been absolutely no developments from the Rains is because you're molding them into copies of yourselves? We do not need more Fadeis, Kazimirs, Zaryas, or Irineis. We don't even need..."
another Dmitriy, although that would be nice to dig up out of nowhere. We need Rains who will find their own damn way."

Sonya gestured expansively behind her, to both her own paperwork and the few Rain brats that had the spine to actually talk to her so far.

"We need them to find out what else they can do with those pretty blue Flames, so we can keep on top of training more Rains to do other things. Nurse Rains, possibly weather Rains, mass crowd control Rains, Rains that can cut or affect radio transmissions, different Rains. Why, the fuck, wasn't this question of which Flames were Tranquilize-able and which weren't raised last year? When you knew there was an imbalance you didn't know much about? Did you think you had the best and only way? If so, I don't need you. I have some of these kids actually asking questions, and I need more of them and those questions more than I need you."

"You-"

"Leave." Lighting up one hand with her Storm Flames, the thief held it up between her and Kazimir. In the not-quite-dim lighting, the palm-full of will fire threw off a whole lot more bloody light than she was used to. "Before I Disintegrate you and rid myself and these kids of your bad influence that way."

Even if it had been some time since he last felt the touch of her Storm, the blue haired Rain scrambled to put room between himself and her red Flames. With him moving, it didn't take more than a narrow look to get Zarya to head out after him.

A glance at Irinei netted her a highly wary look. "Am I next?"

"Who is the next experienced after you?"

"...not the eldest?" The last of the Four Rains asked, inching away from her slightly since the Storm Flames were still in her cupped palm.

"Irinei, I have a twelve-year-old Mist in charge of his Flame section. Usov didn't get that by being the oldest, he got it by being the most experienced and multi-faceted Mist we have. There is actually a twenty-seven-year-old Mist that he's teaching, and one as young as seven teaching him new things."

Irinei silently pointed out one of the teens, and Sonya blinked at the brunette with darker grey eyes than her own.

"Chernyshyova Tereza Yanovna," the girl grimaced even as she introduced herself. "I don't want it, Bazanova. I don't think I will deal with you very well."

"The worst you have to do is report in every week and gather up the new Rains that reach us." Snapped the thief, wanting the whole issue dealt with now rather than later. It had, apparently, gone on long enough for one of their oldest Flame type groups. "You'll maybe see me once a damn month, and I can get Galina, who heads up the Lightnings most days, to handle anything you need reported instead."

Yanovna considered her skeptically, then glanced at the older Rain still lingering around even if she did have a hand full of Storm Flames. "...I'm keeping Irinei. We need him for the bartender's unexpected naps."

"Fine. Undo the damage he and his idiotic fellows did to you all, actually progress in your own ways, and you may keep him."
Finally shrugging after a long moment of contemplation, the teenager nodded a sharp acceptance.

Sonya let her Storm Flames go and made another note to find out if there was a limit to Usov's ability to stalk her, and if he or another Mist could apply that to these Rains without issue. Like hell she would let Irinei remain without someone looking over his shoulder to be sure he didn't continue suppressing the other Rains.

"Now... may we finally continue? I still need another Rain to help test Sun reactions to Tranquility."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 11th of April, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

Severely eyeing the borrowed Lackey, Viper sighed heavily and tugged the hem of her cowl. "Wrong."

Björn cringed slightly, still slightly uncomfortable in his suit and tie as well as looking uncertain enough the Esper wasn't willing to incur his patron's wrath by leaving him on his own here.

"Go get us something to eat." Aside a trade of favors going on that would end up with her paid anyways, Viper rather liked being able to use the Lightning-Storm as a minion while she had him. "We'll try again after lunch... and you had better get it right next time."

Aside the situation allowing her to conserve her own Flames for her independent investigation, as well as the opportunity to be this heavily into the business sector of Mafia Land with a convenient obvious excuse, being able to take slight advantage of Sonya's reputation was proving just as much of a help to the Mist's aims.

She was only gingerly taking advantage of that. If uninformed idiots volunteered information on their own without needing her to threaten or pay them, all the better.

With a gesture, Constructed wind gathered up the economic reports the Mist had been instructing Björn how to read together in a neat pile in front of the Mist.

Viper abhorred owing someone anything, money or favors. Curiously, the arrangement she and Sonya had over her Lackey had a lot of leeway. Depending on how much of the thief's capital the Esper used, and what she found out under the cover of instructing Björn, would dictate how well informed and trained her Lackey would end up.

She couldn't decide if that was unintentional on the Storm-Cloud's end, or if it was a side-benefit she earned by associating with her brother as a friend.

If it was unintentional, she could safely ignore that and just take the advantage without Sonya becoming irked with her. If it wasn't, then keeping her end of the semi-unspoken arrangement was probably the wisest idea.

Getting up and leaving a Constructed façade of herself behind in her chair, to both retain use of the room and to await Björn's return for her, the Mist ventured out herself to maybe acquire a few more pieces to her puzzle.

Actaeon Tantalo didn't even glance up when Viper took a shortcut through his office's wall. "I take it you want an answer now?"

Coming to a stop in front of the information broker's desk, she merely waited silently.
"No, not even if you sic that Cloud you flaunt your connection to on me." Tantalo's lips curled in a passable facile of a sneer.

"Mou... it surprises me how many are afraid of her mere shadow... and ignore the other more present threats." Mist made Constructs of chains suddenly snaked up the man's body, smashing him none to gently face down on his desk before snapping to convenient protrusions on the walls to pull him violently upright again. If that was way too tight to be safely comfortable, Viper didn't rightly care. "I don't need you willing to tell me, you know."

Queerly, the man's bloody sneer hadn't been knocked off. Even after getting a way too personal introduction to his own workstation. Even more irritatingly, he had some instruction on how to block out a Mist that she might end up shattering him in order to get around. "But you don't know if I have what you want, or if it's still with someone else. Threaten me all you want, Mist, but you're still not getting anything out of me."

Eyeing the man, and his utterly confident expression even as more blood leaked from his smashed nose, Viper wondered what to do now.

Obviously, she couldn't straight out kill him. The island’s masters held a dim view of such a thing happening even if their agents were being less than cooperative. Tantalo was also partially correct that she didn't know if he had want she wanted or not, no matter how much it irritated her to admit, but she still needed him to serve a warning to his little friends somehow.

Maybe one of the others would crack if she could.

Viper let a trickle of Mist Flames to run over the fingers of her right hand as an idea occurred to her.

She didn't know for sure if he had what she was after, but he was the type to think his immunities translated to the rules as well. She wouldn't quite lay money on the possibility, but she would bet his life.

"Let's see what kind of a naughty little boy you've been, then." The slip of his irritating smirk made the Esper grin, her Mist Flames spreading out from her fingers to envelope the tiny office room. "I'm pretty sure I can find something of which to use in your petty little mind, mou. Doesn't even need to be what I'm after as long as it will still get you killed."

Actually stating it to his face when he was of an uncertain enough mind not to be obsessively blank let her Flames latch onto his thoughts, to create a sympathetic mirage for her own viewing pleasure, and that chink would let her unravel the rest of his mind.

This would break him, just a little no matter how careful she was. Viper again didn't really care much so long as she got both something to incriminate him by and a new thread to pull on.

Information was almost as good as money, and if she got enough she might be in a good enough mood to able to take Bjørn through predicting the flow and ebbs of international stock trading yet again.

Hopefully, the third time would be the charm.

"...mou? Well... I do believe that is technically drug trafficking, Tantalo. Selling to your own coworkers, even." Vindicated in her gamble, the Mist grinned broadly at her now terrified prisoner and peered at him from under her hood. "Perfect. Care to change your tune? Or should I just rip it out of you?"
Sonya was not going to be the only one personally helping a few Triad members find a compatible stone-mineral to use as a Flame focus.

No matter how much they wanted her to be.

For one, she had her own things to handle and couldn't set aside or dedicate all her time to this no matter how much they were shelling out for it. For another, she really didn't want to leave the kiddy Flame users alone after a closer look showed so many promising avenues of investigation.

Drudging up a few Shestyorka, that already knew the drill from being terrorized by Galina when they were processing all the Zolotov Flame users together, to help her get through five or so people a day was smoothed past one of Fong's co-workers with an impatient purple-eyed stare.

Especially since the man knew for a fact her eye coloring was actually grey and was forced to think he was irritating her to near-unreasonable levels.

In truth, being able to control the colors of her eyes was kind of cheating to the highest degree. The thief was utterly unconcerned with that but made note to rarely fuck with her eye color before someone caught on.

The Shestyorka weren't immediately available, but they would be for tomorrow which was good enough. A demonstration for how and why things will go should be done first.

Gedeon was lurking in the background, having been rendered quite useless since the thief knew enough Mandarin Chinese to handle her own translator needs and the still irritating automatic fear a Cloud user generated prevented any kind of diplomatic exchanges from happening right away. Instead the Sun lingered at her back like an entirely unneeded bodyguard.

Arseniy was here somewhere, as well as several other Zolotov vory, but they weren't the ones she had to concern herself with.

The very first Triad member she would match herself, if only to keep things more or less smooth. It was both a demonstration and instruction of how to behave while things were being tested, and an opportunity to give his fellows some idea of what they needed to think on.

Like… for what did they want a focus stone for?

Control, the ease of using their Flames through it, or as a measuring tool?

Fong had at least passed on that just simply picking out a Flame focus that could be used as an alternative to the Flame Rings there were other possibilities, but why she had to be the one to explain it to them was something she'd like to quibble about.

The first Chinese man, who was introduced to her as just Xiasheng the Storm, ended up with a pretty green jewel named diopside. It would end up as sharp grains of stone under Sonya's fingers, but for Xiasheng it worked perfectly as something to measure a limit by.

She wasn't naming all of them for him, especially not now they were charging for testing. Merely letting him try one or two and jotting down notes on what worked and what didn't, as well as how. A lot of the Storm-possible stones were very confusing jumbles of jewel-quality gemstones and semi-precious rocks.
Opting out of describing the likely reaction after the first few she knew wouldn't work for him also meant it was less likely his Will was merely matching the expectations she pressed on him.

"Is that it?"

"For something to learn control on, sure." Answered the thief being questioned absently, noting down that match for future attempts to make sense of what they had in hopes of not going through a few thousand ruble of rocks a person per match. "Do you want a focus as well?"

There was an aborted twitch to glance at one of his fellows that she didn't rightly care for wondering about. Interestingly, the three thin and vertical scars slashed into his left cheek twitched instead as he leveled hawkish yellowish-brown eyes on her. "Yes."

Sighing softly through her nose, she then resigned herself to spending another hour or so helping him find something that he could use for it.

Eventually, at the grand total of nearly three hours for one person, she decided the strange lighter green andradite garnets were the best from what reactions he had.

Xiasheng's first comment when he had both his matches in hand made her itch to punch him. "They are not red."

"...diopsides can also be blue, brown, or clear. That variation of garnet can come in brownish reds, if you must have one be so." Occupying her hands with digging out a cigarette, now that Tatiana had let up on her personal crusade to keep her from them, merely meant the man went without an impressive shiner of his own for a little while longer. "Anything else?"

Even a few hours of being stared at by several unknowns had her tense and uncomfortable, especially seeing as she and Xiasheng were the only things to stare at for the last four hours.

She didn't think one of the visiting Triad members were another Cloud, but it was entirely possible there was another Inverted Storm or a few Mists in the room.

The mere thought made her itch, but whether or not to find them and ensure she was just imagining her antsy paranoia or confirm there was something to that old wives' tale of which Flame user hated another's on general principle was debatable.

Sonya had opted to take advantage of the Suns' normal repurposed warehouse, kicking the kids out to go mingle with the other Flame types for the day. Galina had split them up in little sections, sending them off earlier that same day and by the time she got to the warehouse they had ideas for the next round. This was the only day she'd get away with that, but by tomorrow Usov and his Mists would have checked over and reinforced old Aleksandr's basement to handle even more Flame users exploding random gemstones.

These all were well trained individuals, which could very well mean the reactions would be even more explosive than a bunch of trainees.

After this, the Mists would come here and ensure nothing was tampered with.

It was the best temporary job she could manage at last minute, especially since old man Zolotov hadn't paid enough attention to the reports she and Galina made up for Gedeon to take him that said how much damage something like this could cause any room they tested others within.

The Storm-Cloud hated scrambling as much as she did being forced to be sloppy.
That new twenty-seven-year-old Mist of Usov's was actually a Misty Lightning, which suggested very interesting things for his Constructions or what he could end up Hardening. Once the man figured out how to mesh his Mist and Lightning Flames together.

Sonya still couldn't do that, the best she could was to make her Storm work around her Cloud's Propagation but not through.

Alas, Storm Flame imploding Cloud copies of her weapons were still a bit out of her reach.

Taking a drag from her newly lit cigarette and ignoring the very real possibility it did nothing for her, the thief removed the filter from her lips and looked Xiasheng in his very interesting eye color. "You have the rest of the day and night to ensure those two will work for what you want, just be aware that since they are common stones they are more fragile. But replacing them is so much easier. Tomorrow we will start testing your fellows, so at least be sure they know what they are looking for."

She hadn't seen very many with yellow for an eye coloring. It seemed rarer than Cherep's purple coloring. Made for a striking kind of stare, especially with the scars he had acquired sometime in his life.

"This is your last chance to back out." Continued the Storm-Cloud disinterestedly. "If you all chose to turn up tomorrow, we'll see this through the end even if you decide it's not what you're looking for."

"Given you have no competition, or no reasonable one, I find that highly unlikely." Xiasheng rolled his two jewels around his fingers, glancing from them to her and then to his fellow Chinese Flame users visiting a Russian thieves' syndicate. "You will see us on the morrow, Bazanova… and, I wonder if I might be able to speak with you then?"

The sudden rustling of a large number of people suddenly all moving at once preventing anyone from overhearing his question made her narrow her eyes suspiciously. "About what?"

"This and that." The Chinese Storm merely shrugged absently, not moving with his various fellows to leave the warehouse. "Mere curiosity on my own end. Fong had some things to say about you that I will admit aroused my interest."

Sonya scowled, but the man had moved off before she could snap that she would very much rather he didn't try to talk to her about whatever Fong had said about her.

What the hell did the Chinese martial artist tell his fellows?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 12th of April, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Sinclair," Nilda Guerra observed the hitman being greeted by one of the other mob wives she was tailing with some amusement as he wandered back into Vongola's Iron Fort's front lawn and the other woman's sights, "you've been missing a while."

"And since when was I special enough to receive particular note from such a lovely lady as yourself?"

Oh, this might actually be interesting.

Nilda played idly with her coffee cup and hid a smirk as Renato practically sauntered towards one Marisa Venturino. For a man that flirted as easily as breathing as that one, any pretty woman giving him attention would at least merit her some tidbits of information.

At least, that was what Marisa seemed to believe.

"You always have been, ever since you made such a… splash into this little corner of Italia."

"If you even knew who I was before I took over the De Campo famiglia, I'll eat my hat." Was his suddenly and jarringly flat answer.

Tilting his head and said fedora in order to stare at her one eyed from under the brim, their so far unseen watcher was treated to a surprisingly level stare from someone that had as much of a reputation of a ladies man as him before he switched targets to the lady talking to him.

"Now… what exactly does one of Ottavia's agents want with me?"

Apparently, she wasn't as unobserved as she thought. She might need to ask her Donna's Rain Beretta for a bit of a brush up on her skills if some freelance hitman could pick her out when stalking another.

It wasn't widely known young Mrs. Venturino was part of the retired Donna's information network, as there were scores of women allowed to the Sky's parlor to cover exactly who reported to her. The fact he even knew that made her mark him as more intelligent than his reputation suggested.

Taking over a territory and waltzing away afterwards free and clear proved that much, at least to those paying attention.

"Rumor had it you've been dabbling in something over with the Giglio Nero Famiglia, with their Ottavia's own permission."

Renato readjusted his hat to set the brim lower, which mostly concealed his sudden suspicious frown from Marisa. "Why the sudden interest?"

Nilda discarded her coffee cup in a nearby hedge, and her spot on a rather comfortable bench she had perched on just around the corner of the Iron Fort's west wing's walls, in order to catch the red headed woman's words more clearly.

This was an interesting development.

"Because Lady Daniella has been trying to reach her fellow female Sky for a long while now, but the Giglio Nero Ottavia has not been replying. She would like to know if it is because her letters had not reached Lady Luce or because she is being snubbed."

"And why would I tell you anything if I knew?" The Soft Flame Sun user drawled out sardonically, going very still.

Someone was now more than suspicious, which might mean Nilda had a possibility of some unexpected aid.

"Surely you don't think you will walk away empty handed from this exchange?"

"…so what, a bribe of some boost to my reputation? Is the former Donna going to meddle with her son's reputation to ease my remaining a freelance hitman? Interfere with Shamal's situation and take him under her Mist's wing?"
Nilda didn't take a step back or swear out loud, but it was a near thing. Ottavia would do no such thing, as her lady boss didn't believe in such permissive free-reign for any one person.

Especially not someone without firm ties to Vongola as a whole and who might just wander off as easily as he had come in.

Obviously Sinclair was well aware of that, or at least didn't believe in such an ill-balanced trade was anywhere near legit.

With near-silent huff to herself, part exasperation and part chagrin, the silver haired Rain switched mental tracks. From merely ensuring Marisa wasn't under suspicion from her work for Daniella to contemplating how to figure out what the wife of the Venturino Don was after and if it was a betrayal or not.

She'd probably have to enlist Rosabella's aid, if this actually went all the way back to the woman's famiglia and not just through her.

"Is there anything that would tempt you?"

"No." The entirely impassive Sun informed her shortly. "I didn't survive as long as I have by being unreliable and have no reason to start now. Find another pasty to use."

"Very well. The Donna will be most disappointed in this refusal."

"I'm sure." Was Renato's very dry drawl as the young woman minced away in delicately insulted dignity. He merely kept standing on the walk leading up to the Iron Fort's main doors, sliding a glance her way once the other woman was behind the heavy reinforced slabs of wood. "Do I want to know?"

"Probably not. If she's doing what I think she's doing, Marisa won't be a problem for you for long." Nilda observed lightly as she ducked the low branches of the oak that hid her from view. Traversing the lawn in heels was a little tricky, but it did amuse her how many never checked to see if she was out of sight if the lawn was under her feet. "Daniella will also be more than appreciative you didn't buy any supposed 'favors' for information she could get on her own."

"Going to curse me out for not dragging more information from her?"

"Sinclair, you're not the only professional here." The silver-haired woman observed with genuine amusement. "I don't need you to find that out."

"Lovely and competent, much better than the last woman that laid in wait for me." The hitman mused wickedly with a smirk. "Miss Guerra, what do I owe the privilege of your presence to?"

"Careful there, I'd rather rumor not get back to your lovely lady Storm-Cloud and invoke her wrath on my head."

Renato rolled his eyes exasperatedly as a footman opened the main doors for the both of them. "Sonya and I are not dating, lovers, or secretly married and Shamal is our real child and not just a godson. No, I don't know how or who started those rumors. You may rest easy on that aspect."

"No? …how interesting." The tiny bit of disgruntlement edging his features said he rather wished it was otherwise. "Because Solothurn had some interesting things to say on the mindset of female Clouds I had thought to share with you because of those rumors. But if you'd rather not hear it…"

The Soft Flame Sun user quirked an eyebrow at her. "Well now, don't be so hasty. I never said that."
"A spar?"

"Fong expressed an interest in the possibility that your skills with something a bit more... balanced, would be even better than the one fight he managed to have with you." Xiasheng offered up easily enough as his reasoning for suggesting one, examining the typically dark teas Russian tastes leaned to instead of risk a sip of the bitterly spicy brew. "He suggested taking the opportunity, if only for the possibility of claiming I've lived through a fight with a Cloud."

They weren't exactly within her clan's territory but taking a lunch break in a bistro on the outskirts. That no-man's land of street-gangs and kiddy cliques that buffered all structured syndicates from one another and that they all heavily recruited from when their own territories didn't offer enough bodies for them.

As a guest, but more importantly a mess of a dignitary and an ambassador from another syndicate, the Zolotovs had no control over Xiasheng's or his fellows' movements. They could suggest that digging where they were told not to would be a bad idea, and had as far as Sonya knew, but they couldn't bar the visiting Triad members from anything.

Well... they could. It wouldn't be very diplomatic.

The Storm-Cloud had little sympathies for anyone who got stuck on that edge, she had been stabbed with that more times lately than she really cared to experience ever.

While taking an escort was kind of a thing even for simple day-to-day errands, especially since vory were never really against picking fights just simply for the hell of it or out of boredom, the Chinese Storm had opted only for her as a translator and guide for shopping around Moscow.

Moscow wasn't a safe city to wander within, not in the parts of it the Zolotovs occupied. There was also the risk someone outside the clan noticed the international flavoring to the movements of the primarily thieves' clan and wanted to stop anything from developing, or just wanted to sabotage a rival syndicate, ect... The thief actually hadn't minded too much being diverted into being an overly glorified bodyguard that worked better as a tourist's guide.

The gem testing was over for the day, three more Triad Dying Will Flame users had their matches and another four had partials. Usov had yet to inform her to hunt down Fadei before he could return to the clan, so she had little other duties to do herself.

Additionally, he bought her tea while he tried a bit of local flavors. It earned him enough of her goodwill to not mind dallying about instead of him handling whatever the hell it was he needed and returning in good time.

The Russian Zolotov Thieves Clan were now in a committed alliance/trade with the Chinese Wo hop To Triad, as of that same very morning she helped this Storm find his matches. Her thieves' clan would supply the gemstones and matching services, in return his Triad would be giving a number of things from repeat business to trade connections in China and maybe a bit of muscle if needed in
As well as money, a lot of it. They were thieves, greed was a vice that was understandable the moment you started dealing with them.

More specifically for Sonya’s office and efforts, they would be getting a decently of-age Rainy muscle first and possibly a Mist in a few more weeks.

One of Xiasheng's fellows, who introduced himself as Kau Yanlin that morning, would remain behind even after the mass stone testing for the Chinese contingent was over with. Yanlin the Rain would be folded into the cadre for the slightly criminal school effort, to handle both teaching his native language to students as well as take over the role Aleksandr had once held to her for the newer students. Basic dirty combat training.

A detail that was depressing or hilarious depending on how it was brought up, Soviet schools actually taught how to handle and fire small arms to their students, as well as basic hand-to-hand defense.

As the temporary vice-principal, Sonya was legally required to ensure any students they got could clean, load, and fire a handgun accurately. Which made the freshly built gun range a government subsidized expense, according to Galina’s notes for tax reasons.

More importantly, this allowed Fong’s Triad to have an out of the way place to send Flame users to be trained up for them outside the greater eye of the Triads entirely. Someplace exotic that most of China’s underworld probably had little to no connections to, and with the only one stupid enough to get herself saddled with the dubious honor of being a ‘Flame Expert’ heaped on her head.

Since Sonya couldn't actually assign her way-too-young Flame users to positions of authority in the yet to be opened school, on paper at least, that tetchy Rain in charge now she kicked out the last of the bad influences wouldn't have to hold onto her position for long.

As long as Yanlin ended up somewhat decent for a Triad member. An introduction and some hours spent matching him and his blue Flames to a set of Rain-possible focuses aside, she really knew little about the man.

At this point, the thief would settle for him being a decently-inventive Rain even if he made her want to punch him on principle by his personality alone.

She still needed an of-age and competently skilled Sun, Storm, and Mist for the rest. While technically she counted as a Storm, she also really didn't want to be pinned in place all school year for the next few years on top of what she was doing now.

A year more would be doable but beyond that and she would start seriously considering ways to dismantle her clan from the inside, so she wouldn't be pinned in place anymore.

The Storm-Cloud was playing at ‘officially’ assigning Andrei as a teacher’s aide rather than make him part of the yet-to-be-finalized student body. Probably as Yanlin’s translator/aide, to be shared with Scruffy if things worked out for the better.

There was that Filat syndicate Storm that was almost fully trained as much as possible who was also not-a-preteen, she was playing with asking him to remain for the teaching effort in order to free Mikhail before problems on that end arose. It would also possibly cut down the number of accusations that the Zolotovs were not relenting control over Flame Training at all, although she was still aware accusations would happen anyways.
Not that they had to or anything but keeping this somewhat neutral would at least broaden the pool of users she could then study or get reports about. Without the expected Mafiya scuffled over who controlled all it and got the bulk of the rewards for doing so.

"Would you mind an exhibition bout?" Sonya asked delicately, halfway through nursing her cup of tea and still thinking of her entirely too annoying Flame brats and possibly educating them as to why she was the top dog.

Especially while the borrowed brats were still in attendance.

That Storm, one of Usov's Mists, and a Rain were due to leave the Zolotovs to return to their own syndicates as fully trained so no longer dangers to themselves or others unless they wanted to be. An example why a Cloud was so feared and whispered about would likely put a few more things in perspective for the greater Soviet underworld.

It would also draw more scrutiny to any possible Cloud Flame user as well, but Sonya didn't think there was much she could do there just yet.

Getting the Khimki Cloud to spread a policy of 'find a Cloud on his border, train up/warn, pass on to their bordering Cloud fellows, leave alone' was probably the little she could do. Especially with how she reacted to him, and his own reaction to her.

If it was any less hostile instantly on any meeting, or if she could actually put faith in a random Cloud's restraint, she'd really try harder with the brat.

As it was, she could only hope once things settled for him they would have fewer instant hostilities between them.

Xiasheng's expression tinged in a decidedly green kind of way across the booth table from her. "I was hoping my humiliation would be private."

"I haven't fought with mere poles and staffs for a few years." Sonya confided willingly enough, if the prospect of another actual fight was on the horizon she'd probably even promise no overt use of Flames too. Not without prompting, but if he'd ask specifically for that she'd seriously think about it. "All my training was also informal, I've only recently taken steps to get formal instruction."

Which Tatiana hadn't let her do this past weekend, especially with the chemicals and compounds they tested her Storm immunity with possibly in her veins.

"That does not make me feel better. Fong can beat me easily, and you two fought to a standstill from his report of it. Ill-trained or not."

"I was also extremely pissed off."

The Chinese man's expression didn't lighten any, in fact he now looked more convinced he would lose badly. "Which means this time you will be in full control of your faculties, and more of a threat."

Pursing her lips, the Storm-Cloud pinned her tea-mate with a narrow look. "Please tell me you're not backing out of this, after dangling bait in front of me."

"Against my better judgement, I am not." Xiasheng admitted wryly, hawkish yellow eyes flicking back to the dark tea in hand. "If an exhibition match is my only option, I will take that."

"Only the once." She reassured the man absently, making plans for someplace she could destroy and not feel bad about it to be found. "If you want anything beyond that, I will accept less watchers after
"...I have just volunteered to be an example, haven't I?"

Sonya merely smiled thinly at her 'guest' in confirmation.

If he wanted to build a rapport with her that badly, and she had the suspicion he had been ordered to, she would get some use out of him first.

No, she didn't really care what Fong's Triad was trying with her. There were suspicions, but someone like her would be damn near impossible to actually threaten or coerce in any way if she really wanted out.

The thief didn't have very good options if anything was tried, but there were still options.

Actions versus intentions. She rather valued the actions more than the intents behind it, however dubious.

That didn't mean she wasn't going to be as suspicious as hell over any hooks the Wo Hop To Triad tried sinking into any bait they left for her, but until they actually pissed her off she'd play nicely.

At least she'd get a semi-decent estimation of how well her fighting skills stacked up against someone actually trained to fight, and not have to subside with assumptions made on spats with ill-trained or scared-stiff grunts.

Fong and his damn point hoarding.

Sonya did kind of wonder if he was stabbing her or his fellow in the back with this 'suggestion'.

She might get a fight, an actual bout with someone that wouldn't be petrified to even look her in the eye she hadn't had since she left her childhood home, but it would require her to be nice and polite to the Chinese Triad members she normally wouldn't have really bothered with.

Especially if she wanted more than just one, or if she might want rematches. Playing nice with Fong's Triad was kind of an iffy thing, given they had already tried to acquire her once before.

Xiasheng was either being set up to have the tar beaten out of him, or to cement her interests if he could at least match her without her inhuman strength. He might have the experience to outwit her too, which... just made the thief even keener on at least one spar to see if he was or not.

"When?" Sonya asked lightly, and probably a touch too eagerly from his expression.

"This weekend?"

Damn, she didn't really want to give up her family time. It soothed the part of her that wanted to hunt Cherep down and ensure he was still in one piece after doing stupid and suicidal things for a paycheck. "I generally go visit my sister then... early next week?"

"...I have changed from being an example to being a test subject, haven't I?"

The thief offered a sharp little smile and a shrug. "Very few people seem to have the balls to fight me, knowing full well what I am."

Xiasheng acquired a very wry and slightly self-deprecating smirk. "Am I stress relief, as well?"

"You are proving to be very talented at being possibly useful, I'll admit."
(Saturday the 12th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Usov, looking entirely too damn serious for her tastes, appeared in her borrowed office late at night when she was finishing up orders for replacement stones with Galina.

Sonya wouldn't have to go steal them, a few would be kicked over to some of their fellow thieves to manage as it was less urgent, and she was only half-thankful for it. Which made her admittedly grumpy because while she didn't have to steal it herself it didn't mean she was alright with passing on the responsibilities.

It was for her work, her office however temporary, and not doing it seemed like shirking duties somehow. However, she didn't have the time to go flitch things if she was also matching others.

The Triad members weren't nice exactly, but they did behave themselves better when it was her in the room and not just some random vory. Said vory also weren't exactly accommodating when questions over her location were asked by keenly curious Triad members.

For interests of keeping everything moving in the right direction, and not having to stop for whatever little tiff to be resolved, it was better if she was there.

Her Lightning had bought her an ashtray when she brought up the fact they would likely need to replace a few of the focus-possible stones before their allied Triad's Flame users were all matched. It wasn't as aggravating as being drowned in her own weight of tea, but since it was half full already after only three hours the thief felt it was close enough.

"Usov, are you really here or is this just a Constructed image of you?" She knew what he was here for, she didn't need to hear it.

This question had been bothering her since the last time he had visited her office, as she might as well ask since they had the opportunity.

The Mist gained a half-smirk, drifting over to the desk where Galina was hurriedly checking to see if everything was done. "Just an image, our little mirror lady stumbled onto this astral-projection trick and taught the rest of us."

Sonya cast her mind back to the roster lists of Mists, all of whom she had really never met but got reports about from Usov. Anna, she was pretty sure the girl's name was, the next Mist that arrived at the Zolotov clan after him.

Mirror Lady Anna, who somehow came to them from the Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic, was what she got nicknamed among her Flame type. For an entirely nightmare inducing ability to utilize mirrors as a kind of portal-focus to the point she carried a hand mirror with her.

Some of the nasty Constructs she could conjure through those also spoke of a girl that liked horror and grotesque things, which starkly contrasted with her well-bred mannerisms the Zolotovs had no hand in giving her.

Another reason why she greatly preferred staying out of the Mist users' way. She had enough headaches from dealing with the others, Usov was at least somewhat immune to his fellow's developing strangeness.

…or had more than enough of his own developed to counter any outside influences.
"Where are you?" Entirely disconcerting to be asking someone that face-to-sort-of-face or not, if Usov wasn't actually here…

"The edges of the Voykovsky District, Fadei is making his slow way up the Leningradskoye highway. South of us and the harbor. Walking, not… much of anything else."

The frown was mostly reflexive simply on principle, Sonya would admit. No matter how idiotic she found the Rain, she also knew it hadn't always been the case.

Why the hell was he walking, when she knew for a fact he signed out a car from the clan's motor pool?

Especially likely carrying with him the funds he'd need to pay his dues for a year at least?

Maybe he broke it, doing whatever it was he did, or ditched it because he got chased. If that was the case, he had better be carrying more than enough to either purchase a new car or to pay off one of the carjackers in the clan to do their thing.

Whatever, she didn't really care all that much. "…come back."

"Sonya."

"I don't want you there when I get there." The thief continued over him, pulling the Nagant M1895 revolver Tatiana had suggested to her from her purse to check to see if she had loaded it or not. There were only seven bullets in the chambers, and if she missed more than once at close range she'd resort to breaking his neck or something. "In fact, I don't want you physically anywhere near him at all."

She was pretty certain the Discordant Flame syndrome shit they fell into with Fadei wasn't infectious, unless you were dealing with a Sky suffering from it. She also didn't really care to risk Usov like that, even on remote chances, nor did she want the preteen there when she killed someone in cold blood.

Replacing the young Mist would be a nightmare aside any help he needed to deal with difficulties or trauma he developed on his own, and not just from dealing with his fellows and their personalities.

"I'm not anywhere near him." Usov pointed out, still weirdly serious sounding compared to the slightly manically happy edge she had grown used to hearing from him over the last year. "I would much rather keep ensuring others don't pay attention to him, and you when you get there, than leave both to chance."

Sonya glared at the young brat… but he did have a point.

Mists were damn near invaluable because of their attention directing abilities, which greatly offset their seemingly strange-ness or insanity when dealing with one. Her work would be so much smoother if she allowed it, and it would mean she'd have more time to be not-sloppy following their Pahkan's orders.

"I know," Usov cut her off before she could say anything to that effect, "what you were ordered. I also know you're not happy with that. Because you're not happy, and my assistance would allow you that much more room for error in it, is why I want to. Let me pay you back for screwing my head on straight as a child, if only this little bit."

Sighing heavily and digging out yet another of the probably-not-doing anything cigarettes from her greatly diminished pack of them, she only put off agreeing long enough to lite it and take a drag.
"Fine. Two blocks of space, and not directly behind the ass. You so much as step inside that..."

"Thank you." The preteen Mist's strange seriousness faded as if it was never there, which left the kid giving her a bright grin as if she just promised him something highly expensive and tricky to acquire... or promised him to be a willing test subject for whatever mind-fuckery his Mists had dreamed up lately. "Now then, should I... ah, misdirect and manage our oh-so fractured Rain around a little to keep him just on the edge of the clan's territory?"

"...just keep him still."

(Sunday the 13th of April, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Do you really see nothing wrong with your behavior?"

Fadei jerked and twitched just far enough to give the little bitch that snuck up on him from the front a blistering glare. She really didn't seem to care for his expression, merely gave him an unimpressed flat stare back for his troubles.

"If I promise you whatever it is you are so rabid for, would you at least talk to me?"

Pity she chose to do this in the middle of a sidewalk, for all that they were strangely not attracting much attention. Might be because it was the middle of the night, or because she arranged it that way.

The Rain really wanted to bloody that bland face of hers, especially since Sonya never saw him as much of a threat to her.

"Lying, Bazanova? To my face?" Impossibly well-connected or not, there was no way the little girl had the reach to convince the random pedestrians passing them to pay them no mind. There was something else going on... "Full of yourself, aren't you?"

"I rather respect who you seemed to once be, because that Fadei at least had a head filled with more than just Sky obsession." Continued the mere thief as if she hadn't heard him at all, blandly as if she wasn't baiting him with the Sky he was being kept from and standing in his way yet again. "It's a pity how far you've fallen."

"Fallen?" Fadei echoed incredulously.

Why was she confronting him here, of all places?

There was no one around for her to show off to, was giving him time to prepare for whatever she could do instead of letting her taken him by surprise. The fact she kept on looking at him as if he wasn't going to amount to anything made him itch to-

"Your standards are a little skewed, aren't they bitch?"

"Skewed? I suppose, in a way, my expectations for you were more than a little unfair."

...what?

What was she trying now?

"Expecting you to behave in a manner other than an addict looking for a fix seems to have been... unwise."
He would never admit to anyone, much less himself, that the rim of red outside her normally grey eyes acquired when violence was possible freaked him out a little. It was different from Zarya's, much different. There was a tiny gleam of yellow somewhere in that ashy-blood color which…

That bloody look was back in her gaze, just as it had been when she got a drop on his group and dismantled them with insulting ease.

"You are about to serve as an object lesson, so pay attention." After saying that, she ignored him in order to dig out a pack of Marlboro cigarettes out of her pocket. "Not that it will do you much good after tonight."

Belatedly realizing he was just giving her time to play with his head, as well as the lack of witnesses meant she could do anything she wanted and it would only be her word against his for what happened, he reached for the calming blue fire Dmitriy – traitor! – had taught him to grasp.

Sonya's eyes flicked to his hands, absently examining the Flames of Rain he held. "I am so lucky Usov convinced me to allow him to come."

That Mist fan-boy of hers was here?

Well, Fadei thought nastily while glaring at the icy bitch, that explained who she was posturing for. Not that he was going to let-

A barked report of a handgun was almost insulting more than shocking. The pain was startling enough he lost grip on his will, his blue Flames flickered out without his say so.

The pedestrians had all fallen asleep around them, under the influence of wildly leaking Tranquility. Probably the only reason why there were no car crashes even in the split second he had full control over his Flames was due to that little annoying brat of hers.

End of spring or not, it was still slightly chilly out enough to require thick coats. Fadei grasped the new tear in his, which almost scalded his own fingers with the blood pouring out a sudden hole in his left lung.

Sonya re-cocked the revolver she had just shot him with. "Forgive my bad aim, it's been a few years."

"…you… shot-?"

"Dying Will Flame users or not, we're all still human enough to die by very simple means." She leveled the still smoking barrel straight at his head, and even the people now coming up on them and the sleeping pedestrians seemed to find nothing wrong with the situation.

Which didn't quite mesh with him, somehow.

They were all civilians, why didn't they start screaming or something?

She had shot him.

Why wasn't he doing something?

She had no Rain Flames to do this with.

"For what it's worth, I'm sorry."

Fadei coughed, splattering both his mouth and the sidewalk with his own blood. Internal bleeding dimly occurred to him between that hazy non-reaction and a sense of unreality.

A gun?

She had once pinned him in place for hours with a gold ax.

Why a gun?

Fadei had expected her to try a fight again, but he had little intention of letting her get the first lick in. She wasn’t the smoothest fighter, jerky and more reactive than anyone that brawled regularly were. The fact she opted to scorn even admitting she got lucky that first time to just shoot him seemed… bewildering.

He also couldn’t quite figure out when he fell to his knees, or how he could feel so cold when something fucking hot was spilling down his front.

"Kazimir seems to be taking up control of your little morons rather well, and I’m content to allow that to continue. Hopefully they’ll at least develop more, and somehow evade this end themselves." Sonya continued evenly, as if she hadn’t just perforated his lung with a revolver or was still holding him at gunpoint. "Either way, I’ll have little to do with them anymore. So they’ll likely be out of my reach after this."

No, wait… that cold feeling was his Flames. Rain Flames, Tranquilizing his body to slow the bleeding. Fadei could literally feel his heart slow, the bleeding escaping his fingers fall to a trickle.

He was going to survive this, then he'd find that little Sky of his and somehow murder this bitch.

Maybe Dmitriy too, since he was the one to start this from jealousy. Since the baby Sky found him unworthy but let Fadei get a sense for his Flames.

His… fellows, who all lost their nerve after she destroyed them in fight she got the drop on them, could go to hell for all he cared.

"Sonya, the militsiya have been called about the gunshot." Even if there was no body, Fadei dimly recognized the voice of the Mist boy that all but fawned over the Storm-Cloud thief. "Outside of my reach, sorry. They are on their way already, two have passed by only to be redirected. Or the same one doubled back. Either way, we need to leave."

Usov simply appeared as if he always stood there and didn't have the balls to actually look at him, at what his precious leader did to him. His eyes, glowing with more than a bit of his darker blue Flames, were locked on the profile of Sonya's face.

She narrowed her bloody-ash eyes slightly in response, but the revolver didn’t twitch. "End of the line, Fadei. You have our Pahkan to thank for it."

Wimp out, he tried to will her. If she would only show the base craven nature he knew she had, he'd survive. Sonya was a thief, a girl-child playing at being a leader. Like hell she had the guts-

Fadei didn't hear the second bark of the revolver, his brain matter that would have processed the sound ended up sprayed out over the sidewalk behind his dead body.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 13th of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
"Can I have it?"

Sonya paused, the trickle of Storm Flames she was going to pour over the gun in her hand clung to her other as she considered his request. "Why?"

"Because." Usov grinned brightly at her as they walked back to the car she had taken out there, which earned him a dubious look in return. "I want it."

No one would believe she shot someone with it, she was known for throwing medieval weapons around when irritated. Why would she use a revolver when she had an endless supply of axes to use?

The fact Fadei had been killed by a gunshot to the head would just prevent most from realizing she had done it.

"You're a little disturbing, Usov." The thief that had been so patient with him, even if she didn't like how he clung to her in revenge for being so bluntly spoken way back when, remarked idly.

However, she did pass the weapon over instead of Disintegrate it, and then ignored the fact he had a loaded gun in hand.

Taking the strangely heavy pistol, grip first which meant she did have some small arms training like most of them did, Usov broke open the barrel curiously.

Two still warm to the touch casings steamed a little in the cool spring evening, but there were five rounds still chambered.

He wasn't sure what he should feel in respects to the fact Sonya just murdered someone. They both knew him too, and he knew she killed him. Had watched her kill him, dragging it out because she really hadn't wanted to but would do it anyways since Fadei was a possible risk to the rest of them. Mostly to the young Rains.

Being perfectly happy with just the fact she let him tag along and help her probably wasn't what someone should feel in the aftermath of watching a murder take place. Fadei wasn't his first body, nor the first one he'd ever seen killed in front of him. That dubious distinction belonged to one of the vor her father had on hand when some kind of talk had gone south, when he was following them out of pure boredom one day.

Snapping the barrel of his new gun closed, Usov let it nestle in a Constructed holster he pinned to the inside of his leather jacket his mom gave him on his eleventh birthday. "Can we stop for ice cream?"

"It's almost midnight." Sonya informed him bemusedly with a touch of tiredness, digging the keys she had silently borrowed from the clan out of her pocket to unlock the doors of their equally borrowed ride. "You shouldn't be eating sugar this late. Eating before bed causes weird dreams anyways."

"I'm a Mist, I dream lucidly. I'm still not convinced if that's a Usov thing or a Mist one." Which was fun, actually. Making such dreams make sense in the light of day was kind of a past time for him and a few other Mists that did share the trait. "Please?"

Regarding him levelly, the thief gestured to the open car door for him to get in as she pulled one last time on her cigarette and crushed the remains under the tip of her boot. "Maybe. If I spot somewhere still open. Get in, brat, so we can go home."

They were far enough away Usov's Mist Flames were starting to fade from his grip, which means those sirens blaring in the background were actually finally getting close to Fadei's body. However, the two of them were streets away from the scene and more than enough kilometers from headquarters to nearly guarantee she'd stop for his request.

"Are we going to get his dues somehow? You didn't take it before shooting him."

"He didn't have it on him. I suspect it's either with the car he's signed out with or stashed somewhere safe." Sonya gave a shrug as she slipped into the driver's seat and turned the engine over. "Someone's going to have to hunt it down or retrace his steps to find it. Once the clan is informed."

The Mist blinked innocently at her pointed look, but when she merely stared at him flatly did finally pull the clunky seat belt over his lap with a pout and click it in place. "So... ice cream?"

"Aren't your parents waiting up for you?"

"Nope. I sometimes stay overnight, they're used to me 'sleeping over' with a few of the other Mists." His parents were merely happy Usov had 'friends' who were alright with his abilities after worrying he'd have trouble fitting in, and as long as no one told them he actually had minions he was pretty happy with the arrangement.

Besides, it wasn't a lie when a few of the older Mists did live in the Zolotov headquarters.

The thief found something about his words shifty, from the side-eye he got as she pulled the car rather smoothly into the sparse traffic on the streets for someone that rarely drove herself around.

However, she didn't comment on it and instead the Storm-Cloud changed the subject. "In about two months, another Mist I know will be here."

"Oh?" Usov couldn't quite keep the frown out of his tone, or off his face. Another Mist he had to share her with?

He had kept the others away from her handily so far, rumors of Cloud-Mist interactions had helped a lot but some of it was her own rather touchy reputation working for him. He didn't really want to share her attention whenever he got it.

"He's half your age."

Ah... baby Mist. She was probably helping said baby Mist like she had him, which... fair enough.

He couldn't quite be disgruntled about that, as it was her nature to help if only for the information she could extract out of said helping. Said information would also go to helping others understand or develop their own Flame skills further, which he also couldn't really begrudge whoever this was since he'd likely benefit from it.

"What do you want me to do?"

"...I'm halfway positive the people he's been with have filled his head with fluff and stupid things. Shamal is also slightly impressionable, for all his is a Mist since around the age of three and orphaned. Ensure he's not thinking stupid things, and just help him develop a bit more in ways he's suited for."

Mentoring another out-of-town Mist, then. He could do that. "Alright. Ice cream?"

Sonya sighed heavily, twitching her left hand away from the pocket that held her smokes. "Yes, fine.
Valera did not like being cuddled unless it was his idea.

It was such an Arseniy thing for his son to do it made Sonya smirk every damn time. Even if he did kick the underside of her jaw getting free of her loose grip.

His father didn’t really like being piled upon unless he somehow made it clear it was allowed, which usually was whenever Lisa decided she needed pampering and nudged or pushed him to the living room’s couch.

She had a very vague, likely hormone-induced daydream of once curling up to him way back when. The Storm-Cloud didn't believe it really happened, it was probably a fragment of a dream she was trying to suppress for likely good reason.

She was normally fine with that non-touching thing. Sonya wasn't a touchy-feely person often, and the number of people she felt comfortable with getting that close to could be counted on one hand.

She just felt bad enough to want it now, but Tatiana was somewhere in the middle of an ocean out of day-trip reach unless she went by air and Cherep was who-knows-where. Shamal was… in the middle of Vongola territory and a short visit would irritate her even more than she already was.

There were tickets for her to catch a plane later that night, so inevitably she’d get time to spend time with the nurse anyways but that was for then.

The thief hadn't been sleeping well, not since she and Usov went to get ice cream and sort out Mist-problems… as far as the rest of their clan knew. She had expected that, given her sleeping issues back after France that first time out with Cherep, but that still didn’t mean she appreciated the restlessness.

Cold-blooded murder was very much different than rescuing a civilian family from the consequences of Renato's misstep, or a self-control accident which ended in death. That meant she had no idea how or when these nightmares of bloody rains or smoking guns would end.

However, Sonya didn't seem to care much that she added another life stolen to her tally of them. Not caring much also made her slightly concerned, because she could still understand murder wasn't really the best option even if she apparently wasn’t morally opposed to it.

That could be anything from the consequences of hanging around a vory for long periods of time, or even dealing her own contacts who used murder as a job description, or her very vexing Cloud nature rearing its ugly head again.

Possibly even knowing full well that a lot of the people she interacted with could and possibly had done something to another like what happened to Rachel. Accidents happened, except with their lifestyle civilian accidents tended to be lethal for them.

The least she could do was firmly remind herself Fadei would've ended up a threat to some possible-Sky brat, and there were Vindice laws against allowing their fellow Flame users act out and catch obvious attention like that. It wasn't the best option, was a rather wasteful one, but apparently correct as far as the underworld was concerned.
It also sounded like excuses, which was where the main amount of her disgruntlement was stemming from.

Being tired and admittedly grumpy over the whole semi-disturbing mess made her want to snuggle with her baby brother on the couch instead of anything else, she would even compromise and read him one of his picture-with-caption books instead of one of her own… but the brat had other ideas of what to do with his sister's undivided attention.

That disinclination for touch she was running into was also a very Cloudy thing for a toddler to do. Especially since she was mostly sure he wasn't actively a Flame user himself still.

Her idle wonderings on that and if the remaining three Rains had put her visitor's slot with Dmitriy to any use was interrupted by a stuffed dog almost impacting her face. Snatching it out of the air, a bit belatedly due to her fatigue, left her holding one of Tatiana's old stuffed animals by an ear.

Then Sonya and Valera got into a staring contest.

These were becoming more frequent. The thief really did wonder if it was due to the nature they likely shared, even if his wasn't active, or if it was something else like inherited nature vs nurture.

If she won, and she usually did, they'd do whatever she wanted to do. If she lost, which meant if their mother or father somehow interrupted and gained her attention instead, they did what he wanted to do.

The Storm-Cloud didn't want to spend a morning being the guardian of whatever plushies her baby brother shoved on her, so she didn't intend to lose today. She straightened up and dropped the dog to her lap, causing the kid to have to crane his neck up in order to keep eye contact with her.

"Sonya, do you know where the dried peach slices got to?"

A spark of triumph entered Valera's stare as Lisa's voice reached them, which made Sonya narrow her eyes at him. She was not going to lose.

The toddler cocked his head to the side, then blinked deliberately.

…the little brat threw their contest?

Feeling weirdly insulted, the thief sniffed then belatedly realized Lisa had been speaking to her. "Sorry, what was that?"

"Never mind, I know where they went." Lisa remarked with a smirk, glancing down to her son's chubby fist. Which was knotted in a ripped open bag of the dried fruits she had apparently been looking for. "Something wrong?"

"No." She would admit to sulking, but to nothing else.

Sonya was tired, she was entitled to be upset her toddler-aged baby brother was patronizing her.

The ending of this week had turned out rather bad, which she was going to blame her bad mood on. The thief ignored Valera pulling on her skirts, he wasn't quite coordinated enough to clamber up onto the couch without aid just yet.

"Well?" Lisa asked aloud, apparently to her son and not the foster daughter. "You did it, fix it."

There was a rustle of something she was decidedly not paying attention to.
"And not with the fruit you stole out of the kitchen on me, scamp."

If he could steal something from Lisa's domain while she was in there, he was rather entitled to his little snack. More likely, if he got Arseniy to fetch it for him somehow she'd be impressed.

The vor wasn't a mushy kind of person that was easily manipulated.

Their mother apparently didn't agree with her, she rescued the remains of her dried peaches rather handily. Valera was more than suitably distracted, trying to regain Sonya's attention.

Which she wasn't giving him, if he was going to try suckering her like that. She'd rather win on her own merits.

"Up."

Not even blinking, because she knew full well he could talk he just didn't often, Sonya sniffed in offense again. "No."

"Your sister is a very proud kind of person, she hates to be patronized." Lisa offered on her way back to the kitchen, leaving them alone in the living room.

Obviously a few of those words were outside a year-and-a-half old child's grasp, but the general gist seemed to have carried over decently well. Not that it seemed Valera knew what to do with that kind of information when paired with what he did.

Seating himself before the couch, still in reach of the hem of her skirt, the brat scowled at the fabric as if it had done him some kind of wrong.

Sonya realized that being offended on behalf of her clothing was ridiculous and figured she might be being petty or something.

With a sigh, she leaned forward until Valera looked up again. "Don't do that again."

She received a very serious nod in return for her effort. Then a gesture demanding she pick him up, after a stubborn moment on both their ends.

Giving in, because cutting off her nose to spite her face was something she found stupid and silly, the thief pulled him up on the couch with her.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 13th of April, 1969 continued. South Beach, Mafia Land.)

"What a brat."

"Mmph."

"Not him, you." Tatiana clarified happily, ignoring the elbow her little sister planted in her ribs. "You really threw a little snit because Valera decided to let you win once?"

"...I realized it? Sort of." Sonya offered in an absent way, staring out over the sea as they sat on a bench on Mafia Land's beach. She sipped the melting ice cream dripping on her fingers before continuing. "It wasn't very nice of him, though."

Most people would take it as a favor or something done out of concern, but not her socially awkward little sister. A belated realization that their youngest brother was probably going to end up as awkward as her made the nurse huff a laugh around her own ice cream cone.

With Sonya as the only sibling that had long stretches of time to visit him within?

Tatiana dearly hoped Lisa had realized it herself and was taking steps to ensure Valerian wasn't going to grow up with a copy of the thief's social competence.

"Why do you only order vanilla?" A change of subject, or her little sister would sulk more at her if the nurse's line of thought was brought up. "They have very good combinations you could try."

"I like vanilla." She cast a skeptical look at her own cone. "...and I think what you have counts as at least half frozen fruit rather than ice cream."

What she had was a double berry swirl. "It's healthier."

In response to her claim she snorted. "With the amount of additional sugar they poured into that as well? I doubt it."

"It's ice cream, Nya."

"...point."

Sonya's grey eyes drifted back out across the artificial surf created from the island's wake as it moved through the ocean, giving Tatiana an opportunity.

She was pretty sure the thief hadn't noticed or was purposely ignoring it.

Same difference, really.

Some stealthy application of her Sun Flames to the bottom of her little sister's ice cream cone ensured a very sticky problem recurred. However, Sonya didn't react the same was as last time. Neither did Tasty Muscles.

She eyed the sticky white and cold mess splattered over her bare thighs. "This only happens when the two of you are near me. One of you is doing it."

"Not me." Fong, the traitor, answered swiftly.

He, probably catching onto her movements and not wanting an exact repeat of last time, had decided the sky was a lot more interesting than the second take of this situation. Red eyes were very firmly locked on the distant horizon as the man evaded looking at the results of her efforts again.

Tatiana blinked innocently in the face of Sonya's less-than-amused expression. "You're going to believe some guy you only recently met over you beloved older sister?"

Those grey eyes narrowed suspiciously.

"I'm... going to go now. Be sure to be at the hospital around nine island time, little sis. Have fun!"

No, she wasn't running. It was a tactical retreat. Nya would get her revenge eventually, so it was best to limit what she had to get revenge upon.

(ooo0000oo)

(Sunday the 13th of April, 1969 continued. South Beach, Mafia Land.)
Since her sister decided to bolt, likely to the condo to monopolize the shower first to scrub the salt from their swim off her skin, Sonya considered what limited options she had to clean herself off without giving the pervert next to her a free show.

"Do you have a moment?"

A glance showed her that the martial artist was focused on the water and holding out a few serviettes for her.

…napkins, holding napkins for her.

She plucked them out of his grasp, using the first to wrap the remains of her cone in while she dealt with her little issue. "Sure. What?"

"Well… I am mainly interested in how things are going."

The thief pushed the bulk of the white mess off her skin easily enough, but that left her with a thin film of rapidly warming sugary stickiness to deal with. "What is Xiasheng's agenda, anyways?"

Fong hummed a moment, folding his hand back into his sleeves. "I have no idea what you mean."

"Of course you do not." Licking the fragile paper helped a little, but she was still uncomfortably sticky. Under the island's heat, since they were pretty close to the equator right now, it was making her wonder how to hijack the shower from her sister instead of continuing to talk to Fong. "I meant what do you think he wants?"

"Good relations?"

"If I am to be the one overseeing all the efforts going on, I do not also have the time to establish good relations."

Fong risked a quick glance at her, which she only caught by the swinging flick of the tail of his braid out of the corner of her eye. "While that may be true, surely a friendly spar isn't too much to ask?"

Sonya now had sticky and kind of papery fingers. Giving up on doing it a normal way, her right hand ended up bathed in her Storm Flames for a moment to remove the sugar giving her problems before applying the ultimate cleaner to her thighs. "So, you do have something to do with him."

"Of course I do. I assume he said as much himself."

"He did, but independent confirmation is always nice." Now sugar-less, if not entirely salt-less, the thief tossed her abandoned cone and the rest of the paper napkins and re-crossed her legs. "There is no way you could have known what the outcome of the talks would be, although I will give you it was entirely more than possible they would go well since it was mutually beneficial."

"I… did suggest it as a way to acquire your attention and gain us a bit more advantage if things didn't go smoothly." Admitted the martial artist calmly, another whipping motion of his braid informed her he was checking to ensure she was done cleaning herself up. "However, that is the extent of what I did."

"And the fact Xiasheng compared his skills to yours and then to the things you told him about our own little tussle means…?"

Now fully facing her, Fong quirked a serene little smile at her. Then seemed to realize exactly what she was wearing and found issue with it, by how quickly his gaze wandered south then was firmly yanked back up to fix just over her head. "That they were very impressed when I held my own against you, and Clouds are not completely common where I am from."

Yeah, she likely wouldn't be getting anything from this angle. Leaning back against the sun-warmed bench, Sonya crossed her arms and huffed. "Aside from checking to ensure your machinations are going well? What else did you want?"

"Machinations is a very strong word, Sonya. I was only curious. However, Yaozu-sifu has agreed to travel to the Soviet Union in order to teach. Although… he is being a bit more stubborn than I anticipated."

The first impulse should not be to copy Renato's favored way of prompting more information out of another. Sonya frowned, but had to admit she had been spending a lot of time with the hitman this year and would likely do more in a few months. "Oh?"

"Sifu has… reservations about teaching criminals." Admitted the Chinese Storm pleasantly, taking Tatiana's abandoned seat instead of risk another eyeful of her attire. As if what he said and what he was held no conflict at all. "Severe ones."

"…only one of the students that might be interested that I have in mind could be called a criminal, the other two only have connections. There is a great pool of baby-criminal want-to-be brats, as well as the civilians that might have their own wherever he sets up, but the degree of criminal accusation will vary. How severe are we talking?"

Fong, even perched on a bench with peeling paint in the middle of Mafia Land's boardwalk, gave off the impression of complete innocence and serenity. "Ah well… I mean he will likely refuse your one possible criminal student."

Sonya blinked over at him, because that really didn't tell her much.

He took her silence as an invitation to continue. "He's a very stubborn old man but will hold up his end of the bargain… as long as his limitations are heeded. I will introduce the two of you when you come to China this fall."

"Very sure of that, are we?"

"I am fairly confident you will find it more engaging than a ball could possibly be."

"…where did you hear about that?" Given gossip was a widely shared human vice, the thief wasn't exactly surprised he'd heard she attended a few of Vongola's Christmas Balls.

Regardless of how much she might not like their Skies the Italian Famiglia was very newsworthy, even on a drifting island in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. Those that attended such events did seem to be as equally newsworthy, much to her ire.

"Here and there." Fong temporalized, unfolding his left arm only to flick the wrist in a dismissing gesture. "…I've met Sinclair."

Exactly when did an Italian Mafioso and a member of the Chinese Triads meet?

Well… it was Mafia Land, she supposed that explained the how if not the why. Fong usually stuck to the eastern side of the island, and Renato pretty much lived in the western side when he had the time to come back.
"I have known him for years." Sonya settled on responding, fully aware the hitman was one of those people normally labeled as 'a bad influence'.

At least, when the man wasn't hunting hits down, since she didn't know what Renato was like when he was working.

It wasn't like she had cared way back when, and from all appearances neither had he.

The expression that crossed Fong's face, which she really only got half of because he was squarely keeping his eyes on the far horizon rather than face her again, seemed to be a bit wry. "An old friend, then?"

"...something like that."

"Ah." He apparently decided not to go down that path. "Sonya... do you have anything else to wear?"

Looking down in response, the thief wondered what was wrong with the purple and red bikini Tatiana bought for her. It wasn't quite the same Rachel had been used to, but close enough. "Not here. Why?"

He breathed out what was almost an aggravated sigh if it had be a small measure more forceful. "Just humor me. Not even a towel?"

"...Tats and I do not bring them, since we tend to dry... well, here." Casting a glance outward, to where the bolder mafia vacationers were exploring the carefully maintained swimming bay sandwiched between the rocky jutted end of the boardwalk and the harbor, Sonya mentally compared what she was wearing to what the other mafia women were.

There wasn't anything like string bikinis around, but frankly there were others showing a lot more skin than she was. A few had gone sans-tops, which Sonya hadn't before realized was allowed here.

Admittedly, it was a mafia owned and maintained beach. Depending on their confidence in themselves or their partners, they'd do whatever it was they were comfortable with and screw other people's' sensibilities.

Maybe a newer development?

What was wrong with what she was wearing, anyways?

"...one last thing?" Asked the Storm, moving to get up himself with a tone that implied he was well aware of her fraying temper but really wanted whatever it was.

"What?"

Fong winced at her half-bitten off question, folding his arms into his sleeves in what likely was habit from how often he did it. "Why did your sister want you to visit the hospital tomorrow? You're not injured, are you?"

"No... Storms can become immune to immunization shots and medical anesthesia." Sonya reluctantly informed him, since he was a Storm and likely either knew of or was aware of the problem and possibly shared it. "I found I cannot get drunk anymore, which made me wonder if anesthesia was possible. Or if I should bother getting immunization shots anymore. From what Tats found, I really should not since it does nothing for me."
A pensive frown formed on his tanned face. "...I do not recall the last time I have gotten sick."

"You might want to swing by as well, if only for a solid answer if you have the same issue." Sonya shrugged, fetching the shoes her sister had abandoned when running from her and her own smaller pair. "You could even offer Tats some assistance, since I only have the weekends to pitch in."

"Is that a greatly serious concern? Although I realize several will be most upset at an inability to become intoxicated, an immunity to anesthesia would also mean toxins and poisons... correct?"

"What happens if we ever run out of the Storm Flames that gives us the immunity?" She posed dryly, slipping her heels into the flimsy sandals Tatiana had insisted they wear. "Viruses eventually replicate themselves with our own cells, which would mean they would become part of us. And with that 'do no self-harm' thing of Flame use..."

"...I see."

Sonya waited a beat, but he didn't seem too inclined to keep asking questions. "Anything else?"

"Would you like to get some tea later?" Fong posed, risking one last eyeful of her apparel.

"Not today." Moscow's time zone and Mafia Land's current one was about five hours apart, which meant she really did feel like going to bed even if it was only about suppertime here.

"Another time then? I would like to hear how well Xiasheng performs against you."

---

(Monday the 14th of April, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Why is he here?"

Galina only blinked as she picked her way delicately through the underbrush, but Gedeon's tone failed to make her hesitate. "Sonya wanted all of us here. He's part of us, therefore she wanted him here."

'He' in question seemed rather resigned to the fact he likely understood almost nothing of yet another conversation. 'Peter McScruffy' eyed the forest with more interest than he held for either the bigger Sun or the Lightning guiding him through the forest.

Dying Will Flame user of Sun or not, the vor was more than a little skeptical of his emaciated fellow. He didn't know much more than the basics of Scruffy's situation, Sonya would only say she picked him up in Sierra Leone's Freetown on her way out because of his diamond laser trick.

Maybe with a mutter about jail-time not served if you caught her in a good mood.

Catching her in a good mood was near-impossible, at least for him.

Gedeon would consider that he might have been a little heavy handed with her in the beginning, mostly due to several misunderstandings and what seemed to be her complete apathy to the prospect of networking even with her fellow thieves.

Since all he had known of Sonya before actually meeting her was that she stepped aside in Dmitriy's favor years ago when the Dying Will thing was still new, and that she had been fostered under Arseniy and Lisa for her childhood, assuming that he was being attached to 'her' office as someone to mitigate whatever damage she'd do to the 'Rain's' work wasn't really that inconvincible.

Sonya didn't have the temperament for the position she was forced to hold. The thief had apparently known that years ago well before she could possibly be asked to do something she wasn't fit for.

A bad habit of stomping those getting unruly under her thumb, a disinclination to actually communicate what her aims were to others, and a heavy preference for the more bookwork side of the office than the interpersonal part made her a less than ideal secondary if the Inverted Rain was still unavailable.

Most senior Dying Will Flame user they had or not.

However, she had the skills to do it even if it went against her grain. There wasn't much really required, and she did fail the managing personnel side of the work, but in developing more useful applications for the skill the Storm-Cloud was proving to be better than Dmitriy.

Gedeon had expected her to be more of a purist in regard to the information in her precious books, but Sonya was actually more of a radical in how it could be used and ignored the bulk of her sources. Dmitriy looked like a conservative Flame user next to her, more of a plodding old man than the student to her he apparently had been.

Dmitriy was steady in his approach to the Flames of Rain he held, Sonya was actually flightier and poked more into everything. In a 'twist your head to the side and squint' kind of way.

Said flightiness when it came to information meant Scruffy was pretty much here to stay, for as long as she was forced to be. He held a skill she wasn't aware was possible, and a trick with a stone they all had thought was more unresponsive than anything. Until she was satisfied with how and why it wasn't likely the Storm-Cloud would seriously consider sticking him somewhere else.

"Tell him to stay out of the way, then." They were going to watch Sonya attempt to oppose one of the Chinese Flame users, and Gedeon was more than a bit interested in how that would go down. "I mean this in a most respectful way but tell him yourself." Galina sniffed as she drew even with him, pulling her coat more firmly around herself as a fresh breeze whipped through the trees.

The best part of having territory bisected by a waterway was the numerous warehouses dotting the banks and large expanses of parks available for clandestine reasons. The Zolotovs covered a great stretch of both sides of the Moscow Canal, reaching a bit farther west than they did east. An outlying piece of Moscow proper, but the smuggling routes and the still fairly dense urban areas made up for the lack of entrenched businesses around them.

The forest park in the Pokrovskoye-Streshnevo District wasn't actually part of their territory, but it at least had the cover for anything too destructive now that the leaves were coming in on the trees. Sonya had actually wanted something more urban, but Gedeon had seen her toss a hammer one-handed through six panes of reinforced bullet proof glass before.

How well she could fight was immaterial, with that kind of damage dealt out in the blink of an eye. He'd pay for damages to the woodland if need be, as he really didn't want to get caught within a collapsing building if she got a bit too carried away.

"He doesn't speak Russian."

"Ah… I feel I must interject something here." Scruffy spoke up for himself in Russian, an expression torn between pained and aggravated on his too-thin features. "Young Usov managed to reverse engineer a Mist trick from something Sonya heard from her Lackey this last weekend, to give me a general understanding of your language. Depending on how well it sticks, or when it fades away, translation duties will likely fall to any Mist instead of requiring foreign language studies."

Gedeon had to blink in the face of that calm if resigned spiel, then glanced at the Lightning still shivering in her coat. "...that's fucking lazy."

"Obviously we're not going to hammer languages into everyone's head that way." Galina scoffed, sniffing again but this time more for her reddening nose than to show off her momentary snit. "But as emergency translation? Scruffy's merely the test subject to see how well it works and how long it lasts."

"I would not suggest trying it yourself if there's another way." The thin Sun continued, now looking more than pained. "While I am used to unpleasant sensations, this was oddly sideways enough I still have a headache. Talking or listening to conversations in this language isn't helping."

The Lightning gave a shrug, likely not really caring too much for his discomfort. "If enough sticks, I'll work with you on expanding your vocabulary if you help me learn English."

"I would greatly appreciate that."

Probably an understatement. Gedeon had seen the gaggle of young Classic Suns trying to broaden Scruffy's grasp on their language, and the three Inverted that took a crack of their own at it.

Great entertainment to watch, but probably not very helpful to someone that barely understood the basics of spoken Slavic languages.

"How is that even possible? Mist Flames do Construction, illusions, not..." He couldn't really come up with a word for how he wanted to phrase 'mental hijacking'.

Given where they were and what was going on, he'd put money on at least two Mists specifically listening in on them while they waited for things to get started.

"Usov believed it would work, giving Scruffy a Constructed understanding of our native tongue. Sonya accepted his argument easily enough, and the proof is before us." Shrugging again, she gestured to the more than likely Classical Sun user who still had a fairly pinched expression. "So, apparently they can."

"Belief seems to be their only limitation, which would also suggest belief is the limitation they work with when it comes to affecting others." Peter continued for her absently, a hand rubbing the back of his head as his attention wandered. "Also, I had to undergo the experiment twice when I disbelieved it would work the first time. Of course it failed, but enough of Usov's Mist Flames lingered that I was able to catch a few more words I had not known before and found I really could believe that was a viable way to learn a language in a short amount of time."

Gedeon arched an eyebrow as the man rambled on.

"Possibly, it might not be that Storms and other Mists are the best defense to a hostile Mist. It could entirely be just a frame of mind which Storms are certain they can do because Sonya proved able to Disintegrate Constructions at will and other Mists have a more personal understanding of the mechanics involved. It would be interesting to see if someone without Flames can be trained to resist Mist Flame 'suggestions', or what would be needed to train another Flame user not Storm or Mist to resist as well as Sonya could."

"...so that's why she wants you."
"He does have a more analytical and trained mind, which could be bent for very specific skills if we direct him. A mature Sun user as well, Classical, which would mean he should be more teacher-material than any number of the young ones."

"I… am…" Scruffy paused, then continued in a more deliberate tone as he refocused on the both of them. "Collage was almost ten years ago for me. Surely there's someone else better suited."

"We have what equates to homeschooled, and very specifically targeted, educations." Dismissed Galina with a sharp little smirk. "You are still the most educated person in this clearing. I don't think any of us will even bother with attempting higher education, and if we do they would be similarly targeted in scope."

"They're getting ready to start." Gedeon huffed at the two of them, jerking a head at the far clearing they were well away from but still able to see. "I want to see how this goes."

The other Sun's expression turned wry even as he turned in that direction. "I've seen her melt her way through concrete and stone, then punch her way through four feet of packed dirt and brick. I don't think he's going to last."

"That's utility, not a battle use." Insisted the Lightning, checking to see if her position would be good enough to see herself. "I've seen her fight three of the Four Rains, punch out a Storm, and yet years ago she utterly failed fighting a hand-to-hand specialist even with her strength. Oh… and all but trounce a little brat that shares her Cloud Flame type, but that was more recent."

"When was this?" He was pretty sure he would've heard about it if Sonya had finally run across another of her ridiculously tricky Flame type.

"…few weeks ago? Last month, for sure." Galina continued thoughtfully, as both her boss lady and the Triad member finalized the last-minute details of what they were allowing each other but seemingly yet another issue was brought up that needed addressing. "That's right, you still don't know. The Khimki Cloud is alive. We're just not drawing attention to him, so he might survive being one."

Gedeon stared at her hard. "Why is this the first time I'm hearing about it?"

"You weren't there, and Sonya is trying to enable his continued survival by keeping her mouth shut about it." The woman shrugged that off, waving one hand to dismiss the topic he brought up. "Since we were trying to keep things contained, it wasn't like we could walk up to you and inform you of what had happened in headquarters. It's where Ziven got to, he's slowly prepping both the baby Cloud and his 'gang's' territory to become at least provincially added to the clan."

"Provincially?" Repeated the gaunt Sun as the other frowned and tried to find a fault with that reasoning for keeping him in the dark.

"Sonya said they'd murder the other if forced in close quarters. Since she's already proven he's not a match for her? Watching her go after him for attempting to murder her first was… an experience. Enough of one I don't actually think she'll get off injury free from this herself, but not enough to lose." Galina glanced down the incline to where said Storm-Cloud was discussing something with her erstwhile opponent. "I think it might actually be that they're not used to another, or that she was 'trespassing' in his territory. There isn't really a lot done on Cloud natures, not compared to the others, which means she's as blind to the long-term as everyone else."

Being highly skeptical of Sonya actually pulling a win out against a man actually trained and with honed skills for combat, Gedeon frowned. Scruffy still looked as if he expected the Storm-Cloud to trump her competition from his skeptical glances, and since Galina was in the middle of their expectations the vor suggested something that might actually mend some of the fences he had torched with the Lightning.

"How about a bet?"
Sonya figured out Xiasheng was one of those very overly modest Asians pretty damn quick.

Politely spoken, as reserved as most that lived in the Far East, and utterly willing to take advantage of that since he had been the one to charge her once the match was started in an attempt to take her off guard.

He was the type that would downplay their own abilities and accomplishment as just a matter of fact, rather than display even a drop of arrogance or overblown pride in his skills. Would in fact dismiss his abilities as not remarkable at all in the hopes of avoiding anything smacking of arrogance.

No, he might not be at Fong's level. Wasn't quick enough, mostly, from what she could see.

Not if she could hook his ankle with a wickedly fast sweep of her staff at all while also getting herself out of his way.

However, she had the sneaking suspicion she had only done so much damage to the other Chinese martial artist herself because she hadn't exactly been clearly thinking at the time and Fong had stuck to mostly dodging at first.

Ducking to avoid a punch that would probably at least rattle her teeth, those gloves he showed up with were strangely stiff around the wrists which made her suspect Xiasheng was using a pair of cestus, meant she also had to bring her borrowed staff up instead of continue her sweep to prevent getting kicked in the head.

The bō staff was his, or at least something he produced for her. Somehow gaining an understanding that she would have to resort to less specifically designed lengths of materials to use as her weapons without being specially told so by her.

Someone had been talking, apparently.

Dissatisfied with being pushed on the defensive, especially since she was trying not to use her absurd strength to cut this short, Sonya used the planted end of her staff to vault over the Storm's head. He went the obvious route of punching the weapon from out underneath her, but that just meant she came down on his shoulders hard and just had to backflip to finish getting herself some space.

The push not only staggered but forced him forward, and she used the time to correct her grip and dig one end of her pole into the soft, mostly-decayed forest litter underfoot. Flinging it backwards and into his face when he spun, trying to get her within his field of view again.

Bare fingers, if gloved palms, meant when he used his own Storm Flames to eat through the dirt and half-moldered leaves he also didn't lose the protection of what was either ridged leather or metal plates. It still didn't prevent her from spinning back around and lightly jamming the length of her staff into the back of one knee, taking Xiasheng to the ground in a half-kneeling position before he could clear his vision fully.

While anyone else might have seriously inconvenienced by being forced down, fully trained fighters seemed less so. Xiasheng snagged the end of the staff lodged in the back of his right knee with both hands, attempting to yank the weapon out of hers.

Sonya dug her boot heels into the ground and tugged back, willing to cut back on her strength when she hit for someone she might be able to fight again but also equally unwilling to let herself be disarmed. She was just barely keeping ahead of his attempts to land a serious hit, heavily abusing rusty if serviceable circus-level acrobatics and Cloud Propagated speed to do so.

He had either until he managed to land one solid hit, or five minutes, before she'd really try to retaliate instead of play-fight. It was really only polite, and he did request it just before they got started.

Xiasheng shifted so both hands were on her staff, levering down on his end just enough for the thief to lose contact with the ground. Surprised, she didn't let go of the borrowed weapon before the man had tipped her far enough up for any landing to be awkward.

Dangling from the end of her own weapon was a new sensation for Sonya. One she didn't much like, to be honest.

Her opponent capitalized on her bewilderment and slammed a soft-soled shoe into her stomach and kicked her off the staff hard enough she landed awkwardly on the soft, half-rotted leaves underfoot.

Entirely disgusted by her hesitation, and irritated from being more than a little winded, the thief snatched up a rather brittle looking twig and Propagated it large enough to take a solid whack from her borrowed weapon now in the Chinese man's hands. Her makeshift pole snapped easily, but not until she managed to hammer Xiasheng's stiff grip hard enough he ended up dropping the firmer length of wood.

A side benefit of her makeshift if entirely unsuited weapon, it rained a light cloud of gritty dry soil down on the man when it broke, making him flinch back as it got into his eyes and nose.

Hooking the temporarily borrowed staff up with a foot, Sonya reequipped herself and managed a two-handed swing mid-chest level. Her mid-chest, which ended up being a bit lower on him.

Instead of dodge, which she expected him to, Xiasheng actually caught the blow. Which made her try to draw back the power she had behind her swing, but even her hastily checked force wasn't enough to prevent her sparring partner from sliding back himself a few good feet.

Curiously, the furrows his shoes left had some leaves that were smoldering. His shoes were slightly charred, now that she noticed what he had done.

That was enough of an odd occurrence the Storm-Cloud was instantly riveted, so her counter to Xiasheng's kick was more of a hold than a dodge using her bullshitted strength to match forces in order to keep hold. Curious grey eyes flicked from the burning forest loam to her opponent, then she abused her strength for science before his slightly awkwardly thrown punch could connect.

In all actuality, she would admit to a bit of petty revenge in bodily slamming the Chinese man into the ground by her grip on his leg. However, the strange fire-starting thing happened again so she considered it perfectly acceptable action for the results she had intended.

Xiasheng's very long over-shirt thing was also a bit scorched in a similar broken ring pattern as the ground when he picked himself up delicately, or perhaps gingerly given there was a faint impression of his back in the ground. He also looked highly wary, since any sudden change in behavior for any Cloud was probably something to be wary about.

"…your first application for Storm Flames?" Sonya asked, half hoping to get a more-or-less straight answer out of the Chinese Storm about his ability before she had to cut back on her strength again.

He might have gotten a solid kick on her, but she was pretty sure both the bō staff swing and her slamming him into the ground counted on her end. Entirely possible he'd ask for another 'five minutes or until I hit you' grace period if she kept talking long enough, but this might be worth the risk.

His expression was a bit… wry. "Yes. I can… blend outside forces into my Flames if I need to."

The thief considered him and his expression. His tone had also been a bit chagrined, which she didn't really know how to respond to. "Hard to hold onto that kind of force?"

It was… sort of similar to Fong's blend heat until it was his trick, in a sideways kind of way.

Possibly why he was still wearing those short-soft soled shoes in a Russian early summer late spring, which left his ankles rather bare. His shirt didn't have the same benefits, it was looking distinctly charred now.

"No, it is just… forceful. I merely have to do something with it immediately. To prevent any… unfortunate reactions." Xiasheng rolled his still smoking shoulders uncomfortably, settling himself into a wider stance.

Sonya's lips twitched, she really couldn't help it with how gingerly he was holding himself as he said it. She might have done him a bit of damage slamming him into the ground as she had, that she hadn't intended to deal out.

"Alright then." She had probably sprained a rib again… or broken it, from where he kicked her.

Her breathing was kind of hitching funny.

A more defensive fighting style wasn't something she knew very well, but she knew the basics enough to try. It might be more interesting to figure out how to get him to break himself if she didn't want to do it for him.

Either way, it would probably draw this out a little bit longer. She hadn't had so much fun since the last time Tatiana let her go to their Fut Gar classes.

Also, her not trying to hit someone more trained than her might actually let her do better. Pure evading might actually be interesting as well. She could dust off all those ill-used skills from the circus, more so than trying to hit the better trained Chinese man had yet so far.

Sonya spun her borrowed weapon a few times, absently catching sight of the damages it already had suffered in a short few minutes as he set himself up again.

Xiasheng's expression when she opted to merely avoid him entirely on his next attack might have been funny, had she had the time to appreciate it. Sonya dropped into a split to avoid his next punch and rolled under his kick only to arch a leg backwards to impact his ankle with her heel before he got his leg out of range again.

Since the force had been supplied by him, she figured he couldn't… or wouldn't, complain that she hadn't stopped using her bizarre strength after the agreed upon time.

Getting back up to her feet via aid from the staff was easy enough, interposing it between them at just the right angle for him to drive it a few solid inches into the ground took a few tries.
Especially since he was now refraining from putting his full weight on one leg, and a lot more cautious about how he struck out at her the longer their spar went on.

It took a bit of creative dodging, which Sonya seemed better suited for than pitting her meager skills against a fully trained opponent, to... encourage her opponent to drive the staff home.

Sonya actually figured Xiasheng did the final blow in order to deprive her of a weapon entirely after she pulled his second attempt out of the ground, which had cost him a possible cracked metacarpal, only to interpose it between herself and yet another punch by those oddly stiff gloves.

His attempt aided him very little when she ended up back flipping and pulling herself up to balance on the lone free end on her hand. A high-kick could probably reach her, but that would also open him up further than he seemed willing to go now.

Xiasheng's expression was entirely flat as he experimentally kicked at her support, which he had driven into the ground himself with a fairly powerful double-handed overhead strike.

It didn't make Sonya do much more than wobble, and she had the skills necessary to keep her precarious balance intact through his exploratory strikes. Even mostly through his harder palm thrust attempt to knock her off, and she only needed her other hand to firm up her hold on the staff.

He wasn't expecting her to flip her lower body backwards enough to lightly kick at his temple when he cautiously approached far enough, but his care when trying to figure out what to do paid off and he dodged the tap.

Another moment, while he confirmed she wasn't giving up her high ground for just anything, and the Chinese Storm's expression firmed up as he took a step backwards.

Sonya utterly cheated by abusing trapeze moves when he kicked out at her, with what Jiayi would've been called a 'gazelle' on a trapeze bar, by hooking his knee with her own and forcibly tugging until he lost his balance and had his forehead introduced to her staff violently.

She wobbled precariously but managed to keep hold of her perch even if the end of the staff ended up in splinters due to her grip.

Xiasheng made a pained grunt when she dropped him, no longer able to support his weight hanging off her leg once he had impacted. "...are you done with the posturing?"

Letting herself fall off the elevated end of the bō staff, the thief considered both him and their mostly silent audience then her palm to check for splinters. "I suppose so. If you would like another fight, it wouldn't have to be a public bout."

Next time she was going to use her own damn weapons, just so he couldn't use them against her.

"I begin to see what Fong meant when he called you an entirely unconventional opponent."
Xiasheng offered as he sat up, gingerly touching what would probably be a spectacular black eye in a few moments.

"I will thank you to not discourage him from trying again, I had fun trying to bash his head in."
Sonya returned a little tartly, with a shrug for his strange look.

He did at least accept her hand to haul him back to his feet. "I don't think anything I would say would discourage Fong. Thank you for the spar, Miss Bazanova."
(Tuesday the 15th of April, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana practically barreled into the house and slammed into her still slightly sore little sister in a rather sudden surprise hug. "I have had the most awesome idea ever. Nya-

"Tatiana, let your little sister breathe." Lisa interrupted her from the kitchen's doorway, quirking a small and wry smile for the eldest foster daughter as she ventured out to see who had barged into the house so suddenly. "And it's lovely to actually see you off the island for once. But shouldn't you be working now?"

"I took a few days off. Lisa. They were ever so excited to give me them when I mentioned what for. Hello to you too! And you, little Lera." Pretending the still recovering blonde in her arms was suddenly more important that acknowledging the elder woman's unamused look for the 'feminine' nickname she kept applying to their toddler-aged little brother, the energetic Sun lightly squeezed the bewildered and slightly achy Storm-Cloud. "So... Nya, you eat."

"Well... yes?" Sonya answered slowly, mostly out of respect for her twinging ribs, confused as to why that basic fact of human existence mattered.

Valera looked highly unamused that his sisters were mostly ignoring him, rather unsteadily tottering his way to his mother since his playmate's attention had been forcibly redirected by someone he really didn't know that well.

"No, you eat." Insisted the nurse forcefully, as if repetition would convey whatever idea she had come up with. "You eat things, which didn't originate from yourself. That's not automatically burned up by your Storm Flames. Since you're not starving yourself... you're not, right?"

Sonya blinked a few times as she finally found what point her sister had. "...as far as I am aware, I have no issues eating or maintaining my weight where it should be."

"So, you take in something that didn't originate from you. There's a loophole in your Storms-are-immune-to-all theory, I'm guessing it's because you expected your Storm Flames to act up somehow from how you were using them that made you able to apply them internally as you have." A thoughtful frown crossed the Sun's face, and Tatiana squeezed Sonya once more before finally releasing her. "Which would mean you're only immune to the things added you're aware of, not to anything foreign in what you eat. Because what you eat is foreign, so if you expect something to work on you it would then mean...?"

"That I can be affected." The thief concluded on her own, a more irritated expression on her own face. "And that this immunity thing would only work if I was aware or suspicious in the first place. Damn."

"What? Why damn? I mean, besides a bit of a setback in an otherwise rather useful ability for Storms this is good news." There was a pause as the elder sister shifted gears from nurse to shady-character and dubious uses that information could be put to. "...well, okay. Good news as in if you can somehow accept anything I give you, or Doctor Kappel might give you, will affect you in the way we would normally require medical anesthesia or shots of various usages to."

Sonya huffed at her absently, still turning over the issues and complications she now realized in her mind. The bad news was as in she didn't have an immunity that was undefeatable.
Although… she might be able to go back to getting drunk, once things on her Storm end settled down a bit.

Possibly they could work out a way for her to get, or re-apply, the vaccines and booster shots she missed the past year. Which was, along with the point Tatiana had made, the only good sides to the loophole the redhead had spotted.

That was one hell of a pitfall an unknowing Storm could fall into. The Storm-Cloud herself had brushed that edge unknowingly, had she truly believed that she couldn't eat or take in anything…?

Dehydration and starvation had only been side-effects mostly ignored and not thought of because Sonya had almost twenty years of life in this… world, ten of which with active Storm Flames. If she hadn't starved herself by then, or deprived herself of water before then, she hadn't thought or expected even her own Dying Will Flames would affect it.

Was it possible to Disintegrate water?

If so, could she boil water in her own mouth before swallowing it if need be?

Possible and interesting applications aside…

Might tie in with how some Flame users could burn themselves alive using their own Flames, if they didn't believe they were immune to their own multi-colored inner fire. She had only refrained from killing herself through a skewed belief in her own Flames due to absent-more-than-intentional ignorance.

"…well fuck. I nearly died." Sonya marveled out loud, feeling more than a bit shaken as she realized how close she had come to unintentional suicide.

Only because it hadn't occurred to her at the time had she avoided killing herself. Alcohol was a poison, she hadn't wanted to be drunk when scoping out bars in-between Sierra Leone and Colombia when she realized she couldn't get tipsy anymore, just like how she hadn't wanted to become sick with some tropical disease in a Freetown sewer.

Tatiana hadn't exactly gone very far after releasing the slighter Russian, and the younger thief found her nose mashed into her elder sister's collarsbone as she seized her into another crushing hug. "No. You're not allowed. That would be a stupid ass way to die, anyways."

"Do you want to explain that comment, Sonya?" Lisa inquired evenly from the hallway, a suspiciously alert but still mostly just confused Valera in her arms.

By inflection alone in the words, the woman implied that her query was actually more of a demand and that answers had better be given up soon.

"…I nearly starved to death? Or died from dehydration. Although I'm not yet sure if I can Disintegrate water, so that one is possibly less likely until I can test it." The still slightly muffled comment, made as it was through the nurse's shoulder, didn't seem to buy the Storm-Cloud any leeway with her mother. "We just found another way Storm Flame users could possible commit suicide via their Flames?"

Tatiana scowled into Sonya's hair, which was more felt than seen by the younger sister. "One step forward, another three fucking steps back. Damn it all to hell, Nya. I thought I had a possible way to help you, not yet another pitfall."

"We already knew it was possible to injure or outright kill ourselves with these abilities, Tats." She replied with a few awkward pats to the back. It didn't seem to be helping much, but it wasn't like she knew what to do with her upset sister. "It's just... now we know there's a possible faction of Storm Flame users out there that might have starved or otherwise deprived themselves to death instead of just immolated themselves."

"A slow death versus a fast one? Not helping, Nya."

Lisa didn't look to be any happier with the subject matter as her eldest foster child, but frankly even Valera didn't look very pleased with the tone and weight the conversation had carried with it and it was suspect if he followed along with everything. "That's not going to happen. Right, Sonya?"

"...no? I avoided it at the time, and if I keep on even like this it's possible I won't. But... I need to think more before I continue playing about with the possible side-effects of my own Flame usage." Finally prying herself free, the thief patted down the blouse she was wearing to ensure Tatiana hadn't twisted it up. "I should... probably also list down every possible way we've figured out how a Flame user can kill themselves and post it somewhere with rebuttals for why that shouldn't be possible. Might head off a bit more of the possibly lethal happenings somewhat."

"We'll plan for it, Lisa." Tatiana confirmed stridently, apparently still not at all happy with Sonya's realization. "Or she will, and I'll see about spreading that kind of information out."

"What's wrong with my network?"

"It's mostly Russian. I can get it out to the few Flame users that do use the Mafia Land hospital."

"...oh."

(ooo0000oo)

(Tuesday the 15th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You sure you're okay?" Tatiana asked more seriously, eyeing some of the piles of paper on her little sister's borrowed desktop. "Lina got me word, through Ziven, about what's been happening here lately."

"Did she also tell you about the other?"

The other what?

Puzzled, the nurse inspected Sonya's form. Slightly battered, but it was possible she found someone in a non-hostile-to-Clouds Moscow to whack about rather than wait until Tatiana cleared her for attending their martial arts lessons.

Other than the fading bruises, which the younger woman hadn't asked to be healed so it was possible she had entirely forgotten about them, she merely looked... like she normally did.

"What Ziven is on for me."

Oh... that other. "In the most roundabout way possible, yes. It took me a few good minutes guessing with vague word choice for him to lead me to the probably right conclusion. I'm a nurse, damn it all, not a cryptologist."

Sonya blinked a few times, then snorted. "A Trek fan, are we?"
"You ever see it? It's pretty good, for an American produced television show that ended production a few years ago." Tatiana suddenly frowned, because the only reason she ever saw the first rerun herself was because some of the patients in the hospital watched it when she was checking up on them. "Wait… when the hell did you ever have time to catch an episode or two of Star Trek? I'm pretty damn sure it's not showing on the channels here."

"BJørn." The thief claimed absently after a moment of silence, waving a hand as she paged through some of her papery mess. "The very first thing he bought with his own money was a television set."

Like Sonya ever really visited her Lackey at his apartment long enough to watch an entire episode to catch Doctor McCoy's catchphrase. Dismissing that, because it was possible her little sister was talking about an incident a year or two ago and the subject was pretty off-topic for why she was back in Soviet Russia anyways, the nurse monopolized one of the free chairs.

"So… you may have little nurse Rains for me, right? The hospital is pretty keen on somehow appropriating them from you."

The thief scowled as she looked up sharply, probably because all she had sounded the Sun out for was what it would cost to have them understudy her a little. Not the entire Mafia Land hospital staff, just the lone Russian Sun nurse.

"Yeah, I know." She waved a hand, half to keep Sonya from biting out something cutting and half to greet Galina as the Lightning let herself into the office with more paperwork in hand. "But apparently the phone lines in the hospital are tapped. A little after you explained to me what you thought any other Flame using nurse aside a Sun might be good for, I got called into the… um, it's kind of like a board of directors, but it's really just the longest serving doctors of the hospital calling the shots. So, I got called into a meeting with them and they would like to suggest they'd train both your prospective Rains up as long as they can keep one until they train a replacement. More would be nice, too."

That whole meeting had been completely out of the blue, and without Doctor Kappel involved.

Tatiana would never admit to being so nervous about the whole thing she had gone in armed, which she didn't tend to do while in the hospital. Her own Sun Flames did the little threatening she needed to keep her patients more or less in line, and the fact she was still one of a few Dying Will Flame using nurses in the hospital meant her co-workers were less likely to brush off any harassment her way.

That didn't mean they were devoid of jealousy or envy, but that Tatiana and her few fellow Dying Will Flame users there were considered a set apart. In a mafia ran hospital that meant it was worth more than most of the other's jobs to ignore such goings on.

The Russian Sun using nurse would admit the idea of an anesthesia specialist Rain nurse was a damn good idea. Hopefully a semi-competent one, so Storms with silly ideas like Sonya's latest one could be worked around for the short term until the long could be addressed fully.

A Mist nurse was more likely easily obtained without going through her little sister, but even that might just aid her and Kappel's research into a Flame user's baseline all the more. A Lightning surgeon was even more tantalizing but was probably going to be as rare as hell given the popular assumption about any Lightning user's behavior or use.

More likely was a Storm surgeon, but she'd take that if she had to.

She would probably cheerfully murder for a Sky nurse. All those grabby assholes, those difficult patients… they wouldn't do that shit in the face of a Sky, even if they already had an entire array of Guardian Elements.

Alas, that seemed as if it would never happen with how rare that Flame type was.

Much like how it was probably going to be damn near impossible to source a Cloud nurse, one that could probably Propagate blood if need be until any patient was stabilized. Not that any Cloud was very welcome on Mafia Land, given her own sister's reception when that came out to public criminal knowledge.

However, if she found the whole promise interesting, her bosses were damn near committed to murdering themselves for different Flame using medical personnel.

"…so, call you when you're at the condo. Noted." Sonya muttered sourly as she picked the newer three sheets out of her little mess of them to look over.

The rest of her comment pretty much devolved to snide comments of the nasty kind about assholes that eavesdropped on a conversation between sisters, so Tatiana beamed at the woman she once ran with in her gang. "Hello, Lina. Lovely to see you again."

"You could see me more often if you'd just visit." The snarky brunette shot back pleasantly, arranging herself neatly in the other chair situated before Sonya's borrowed desk. "How much longer are you going to be? The Pahkan's not getting any younger."

"Actually, he's doing marvelously for his age range." However, the point was well made. Milos Zolotov was pretty much at the end of his life expectancy. She was slightly surprised he had yet to retire in favor of his successor yet. "…it's not likely that I'll finish before the old man is done in by old age, actually. I've got the residency requirements yet, which is another few years of proving I know my shit after it and more has been crammed into my head. And if I'm coming back for a short while to be the nurse on call for this school thing, it means it's going to be pushed back at least another year or two."

A blonde head had snapped up, a skeptical frown on her little sister's face.

Tatiana smiled wryly at both of her fellow females. "Look, take it from me. It's impressive he's lasted as long as he has, where he has, but… Milos isn't immortal."

Her baby sister's eyes narrowed as she considered that.

Galina sighed as she ruined her posture a little to lean back fully against her chair's backrest. "I can understand that, at least in my mind, boss. The problem is actually believing it. He's always been there."

"He started all this, and that was before Arseniy or Lisa's time." The younger thief tacked on thoughtfully. "Why hasn't he retired if he's really that far along, then?"

The nurse raised one eyebrow at the blonde. "Probably because what you started, Nya. It's entirely possible old man Milos didn't want to hand things over when an entire new upset was just coming to be. This Dying Will Flame stuff still isn't well known, and this is the only time he can spare his son from his office just long enough to figure it out himself."

Thus, why she was only slightly surprised the old vor had yet to retire. Tatiana could see it, had seen it when she drifted back after her gang broke up do to legal jail time issues. Sonya getting stuck helping Gedeon learn the ropes had probably been entirely unexpected when Milos had decided what was needed, and from the look of things…
"Nya, you did know that was why Gedeon ended up sorted out with us, right?"

From Sonya's expression alone, she hadn't.

No offence to the guy intended, but Gedeon was a little… too rigid for what they were getting up to. He didn't have the needed mindset, even if he had the Flames, which wasn't his fault but the fault of how long it had taken for him to start using his own Dying Will Flames.

He had acquired, not a front-row seat, but a very good spot to see what the up-and-coming sections of his clan were struggling against through his father's actions… but how to convey that he needed more experience in a short amount of time to the ill-fit that was Sonya?

Her little sister was entirely the type to have enjoyed the ivory tower thing, a place where she was mostly left alone except for a few responsibilities that she could set up and knock out at a steady rate. In an imperfect world, she was left with a few ill-fitting jobs and one she was good at but wasn't a passion to her.

One of those ill-fits was this same office that she had escaped once before but hadn't been able to dodge again.

How could a vor like Gedeon inform a blunt woman like Sonya about what he needed from this office without losing face?

It wasn't like there was the urgency to make up for his late start available, no Dying Will needed to spark his Flames.

Giving him his Flames was a decent start, but a reason to reach for them?

Slightly unexpected that Sonya hadn't seen it herself, but the thief hadn't yet had to deal with people dying from old age on her.

Death was a very real part of their world, but death that wasn't ordered or mandated for whatever reason?

Tatiana heaved a heavy sigh when the vor in question walked into the office, only to get pinned in place with a highly unamused Storm-Cloud's glare. "I'll do the negotiations on the kids' end, little sis, and sound out a few others that might be interested. I think you might have a few things to discuss that are pending that you don't need me for. I'll… uh, check out this school thing you want me to be the nurse of. Coming, Lina?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 15th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya had not appreciated the reality check.

She probably would in a few weeks or even a month or two, but not right now.

"Gedeon… what do you think of Dying Will Flames? Now that," she continued dubiously, "you're considered one of us."

The vor, who might be a little on the young side for taking over a criminal syndicate, inspected her strangely. "Only considered? You don't think so?"
"You're not much of a Flame user." Sonya offered honestly enough. Might be best not to mention she held him on a level with Fadei's old group, just over the ex-Sky crazed idiot himself. "It's not seconded nature to you to reach for that ability, nor have you really interacted with very many that we haven't practically indoctrinated to be somewhat loyal to us."

The two newer Suns that didn't originate internally weren't trained with the other Suns, they were trained by them in other locations. Gedeon might have a measure of Zolotov Flame users, but not of anyone else's.

The man himself looked fairly dissatisfied with her comments. "You were supposed--"

"I? Can only do so much. I can teach you to use it, but to think like a Flame user first and a vor second?" He was also rather irritatingly stubborn in the whole 'neutral' aspect. Which, in hindsight, should've at least suggested to her there was a reason for him sitting on the sidelines instead of getting into the thick of things. Other than just pure irrelevance, that was. "Forgive me for letting you have your own way, I had thought you wouldn't appreciate being ordered around much by a girl a decade younger than you."

Now what was she supposed to do?

Tatiana was right, old man Zolotov wasn't getting any younger. In this day and age, which was different than Rachel's in that whole 'medical advancements' thing extending life expectancies alone, seventy was a respectable age to reach.

Milos was just over that and was edging into the middle of his seventh decade of life.

If Gedeon had been kicked over to her, or more to the point this office in spite of her presence, to learn what he needed to about the Dying Will Flame phenomena then he had wasted a fair amount of time.

Sonya refused to be held accountable for this, the man was fully grown for fuck's sake. Gedeon should've been able to figure out what he needed to do without her leading him around by the hand. She might apply a few more kicks to the ass, but only because he probably should be well informed before he took over for his father.

The vor in question studied her for a long moment. "What do you suggest then?"

"I need to know what you think you know." It would at least suggest the level of immersion she had to put him through before she, and the rest of the Flame users of the Zolotovs, could be shot of him. "And where you foresee this going."

'This' was elaborated by the Storm-Cloud's vague hand wave around the borrowed office.

"...frankly? I think it's still a party-trick." Gedeon started irritably. "Parts of it might become worth any headaches, the Sun healers alone probably would be by themselves. A Cloud that isn't female and entirely disinterested in Moscow would be nice, or one that isn't fixated on the wrong part. I can see use for a few more, but it seems like you're conforming for the ill-trained young too much."

Sonya blinked, but kept silent. She did wonder how blind the vor had made himself in his little special niche above all day-to-day headaches caused by instructing a large number of young Flame users.

"Storms only seem useful when everything can be destroyed, otherwise they're about as useful as anyone else trained to the same level." He continued, either ignoring her carefully blanked face or not caring much. "Lightnings seem to be only useful in support capacities. Mists are probably the "...prove it, then." The thief offered idly when it seemed he wouldn't be continuing. "Take one or two of each type, either separately or all together, and make them better than the brats I'm... conforming too much for. If you can, and I'm signing off on who so you're not starting from a half-trained one, I'll say whatever it is you want me to say to your father."

It wasn't going to happen.

Sonya might have managed to train herself up, but Lisa was very damn permissive about how she had gone about it. Arseniy had be just as considerate for what he hadn't known of, leaving it mostly up to her to muddle through. Her picking the best possible course for Dmitriy had been sheer luck, not skill or prior knowledge.

To be honest, it was only recently that Sonya realized she was actually rather ill-trained. A decent Storm, and her Cloud nature made everything rather hard to judge, but as an individual outside of being a Flame user?

A good thief, but only a passable fighter when pitted against actually trained opponents.

She had nearly killed herself recently.

The brats Gedeon 'trained' would probably end up rather useless as Flame users, but they should make semi-decent clan members in the end. If they didn't end up imploded or something similar. Probably Gedeon's personal guard when he finally took over, at least.

However, he couldn't continue as he was if that was what he had pulled from it. Sonya also didn't really want to create yet another enemy for herself, so actually whacking his thick head against a wall or two wasn't an option she could go with.

If, even though she highly doubted it, he managed to pull something together... then she really would just be shot of him.

Additionally, if he did, then she'd finally have a team of Flame users to establish how useful any group of them could be to a criminal syndicate and she'd still be shot of him.

Being a vor, and one that had seen a bit more life experience in this life than her, Gedeon seemed just suspicious of her offer. It didn't mean he abstained from taking it, if his reach for her much amended roster list of students said anything. "What do I have to do with them?"

"Something like what Dmitriy made up, just hopefully not as moronic." Sonya instructed absently, running her mind over the same list that she had poured over way too often. Excluding the non-clan trainees, and the ones Tatiana probably wanted to make off with, there was still just under a hundred young Flame users Gedeon could pick from. "I will also ask that they not be more than two of the same Flame type, but other than that you have almost free reign with them."

"That's it?"

"They're going to end up looking to you, instead of me." She tacked on after a long moment. "Be sure they're at least competent in what duties you'd need a team of bodyguards to handle."

The Sun eyed her suspiciously again, but then stole one of her pens to start marking out who he wanted.
"This is actually pretty awesome." Tatiana informed her cheerfully, pitching in with moving in another delivery of furniture with a large number of her fellow Suns as Sonya stocked books on the library’s shelves. "I don’t think I’ve ever heard of something like this before."

Picking up another stack to sort through, and shelf by the Dewey Decimal system, the younger Russian shrugged. "There is actually an Italian school like this, and I’m assuming at least one or two more somewhere else in the world. So, it’s not entirely my own idea."

"Meh, what’s plagiarism to a bunch of criminals?" Asked the nurse brightly, shoving her hip to nudge a chair more firmly under the table it would go with. "I still think this is a really cool idea."

"You have Galina to thank, then."

"Oh?"

Sonya shrugged with one shoulder this time, so she wouldn’t lose her grip on the books in her arms. "I wasn’t actually going to put this into operation, but she found my plans for how it would work out and implemented them."

Tatiana glanced around to the half-finished library, then back at the book-obsessed Storm-Cloud. "So… you need more teachers, right? To formally open up, I mean."

"Teachers, more students, just mostly personnel right now. I’ve about got everything else covered."

As a matter of fact, someone had to do the actual interviews. Sonya was pretty sure she was the wrong woman to do them and had been leaning to leaving it up to the Lightning whose fault the entire mess was.

She paused in mechanically shelving books to look out to the hallway through the opened double doors that lead out, as a team of four Suns muscled a series of filing cabinets destined for the main office down the tiled hallway without scraping said tiles.

Even if she had inspected the entire building before, twice even in between fitting various Chinese Triad members for their personal stone matches, it still looked significantly different with furniture.

Almost like an actual school instead of just a building. It was pretty weird to wander the hallways now.

"Any idea how you’re going to handle hiring outsiders for something like this?" Tatiana actually sounded slightly skeptical, seating herself on the desktop she had just straightened out.

"…for the first year or two, until our own picks have finished their legal teaching requirements, we’re going to have to hire an entire pack of teachers. Replacing them as our own teachers become certified will be… irritating."

"Not a lot of people appreciate being fired just to make way for others."

Sonya pressed her lips together in sheer annoyance but had to give her sister the point.

Lisa did have the certification to teach, having got it so she could do the whole 'homeschooling' thing legally enough, and would probably be the one to interact the most with the other teachers they would have to bring on in the beginning. She was practically the only one as Scruffy didn't even have legal paperwork just yet, Andrei and Usov were too young to apply, the Triad member Yanlin wasn't even Russian but was applying for a visa to teach, Irinei was in the middle of applying for his own certifications, and that wasn't even counting the non-Zolotov originating or allied teachers.

The Filat syndicate was offering up one of their own vor, which Sonya was probably going to use to cover the male physical education with Yanlin for the time being. More than likely that vor was just offered to keep an eye on what the Zolotovs were up to, but the Storm-Cloud would take what she could get.

As for herself and Galina, they had already finished their own certifications for teaching and the exam needed to qualify. Sonya for literature and the Lightning for geography and social studies. Arseniy also had his, apparently earned around the same time as his lover, but her foster father wasn't going to be doing more than security on the odd day.

They still needed math, science, history, and technology teachers to finish padding out their curriculum and finally open up to take in students. Science and math would be the first ones to be replaced, with Scruffy and Irinei respectively when they finally qualified. Andrei might take on history, if she could nudge him into it.

Usov with technology?

Sonya hastily amended her thought, Usov could take history and Andrei would get technology. Yanlin… would probably pick something for himself and handle his own responsibilities.

"…speaking of students." Tatiana spoke up after the gaggle of Suns pulled the bulky metal cabinets pass the opened doors. "I would like to steal three Rains, one of the Suns, and a Storm from you."

"Who's going to pay for that?" Asked the thief, returning her attention to her sister and her sheepish expression.

"The hospital. They're really keen on acquiring more Flame users for themselves." With a shrug, the nurse hopped off the oaken table and made her way down the aisle of bookshelves to where the thief was sorting things. "One of the three Rains they want to keep, and either the Sun or Storm, for themselves. In return for letting them poach from you, they're suggesting that any Zolotovs that need medical attention from them gets a discount as long as one of us is still with the hospital."

Sonya frowned, but really didn't see much of a problem with that for now. Lucky brats, for getting an out if they want it, but… "Am I talking to the Pahkan, or are you?"

"Can you? I've got to return soon." The redhead's expression was entirely unapologetic as she beamed at her little sister. "Fantastic, thanks so much Nya. Knew there was a reason you are my favorite sibling."

"I didn't agree." She pointed out, only to be ignored.

"Let me know when you want to open, or if you can't this year." Tatiana continued pleasantly, slowly backing up to the doorway. "I'll put in for a temporary leave of absence at the hospital once things are somewhat settled there. Especially if there's going to be an influx of Russian speaking Flame users."

"Tatiana…"

"Love you, sis! Have fun with this!" Before she even finished her words, the nurse darted out of the half-furbished library.

Almost bowling over the next group of Suns muscling more desks in for the various classrooms.

The thief scowled in the direction her sister had run off in. "...well fuck. Again."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 16th of April, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Did Tatiana leave you alone already?"

"She ran off on me." Sonya informed her foster mother rather irritably, picking through the results they had from matching near about thirty Triad members with their own focuses. "She might be at the house, with Arseniy and Valera right now."

It was technically still on-going, but the thief finally managed to gain some time for herself to handle her other responsibilities. There were really only four or five left that needed matches yet, and Sonya expected to be informed it was finished by the end of the night at the very least.

A few more days before the visiting Triad members would finally leave the Zolotov clan, and hopefully she wouldn't have to personally do it herself ever again unless she wanted to. A few of those Shestryorka had become rather professional in matching up Flame users to their stones, which means there wouldn't be a need for Sonya specifically to do it unless something really dire happened.

...or if someone specifically asked for her to do it again and she got forced.

"Sonya?"

"I'm sorry, Lisa, did you need something?" Asked the thief, pressing a finger to her temple in hopes of warding off a headache.

"I have a little something for you, to get you out of this office for a moment or two." She waved a piece of paper with several pictures clipped to it in the air, distracting her youngest daughter from her own thoughts. "See, we were in the middle of a negotiation with another syndicate about stealing something... but they suddenly broke it off without giving a solid reason. Can you steal it for us anyways?"

"Do you think someone's trying to undercut us?"

"It's possible." Lisa claimed, handing over the paper and taking a seat in the blue armchair before Sonya's borrowed desk. "But even if it's just the item isn't what they want anymore, I think you might have fun getting it."

She blinked at the itemized list in her hands, complete with actual photos of the items in question. Religious artefacts were a new one for her, and one she was only slightly skeptical of.

An, of course, bejeweled bible topped the list.

"...the hell?" A solid gold cross, a set of rosary beads made of jade and silver, and a bronze goblet were also listed. As well as an address she was pretty sure was for one of the city's museums.

"Lisa?"

"We're not selling them, even if the syndicate that broke negotiations with us don't want them"
Now that she thought about it, Sonya fairly itched to get on something. Nothing was close to being done, except the Wo Hop To Triad matching job, that something short and sweet was rather tempting.

"...I'll do it." She could even visit today, get a feel for the security tonight, and steal it either later on in the night or the next day if possible. It would be nice to get out of the office and stretch her legs, so to speak. "I won't be in tonight. Say hello to Arseniy and goodnight to Tats and Valera for me."

"Alright sweetie. Have fun with it." Lisa left her to her own devices shortly afterwards, not that the thief was paying much attention.

Museums were better guarded than most stores, so this would require a bit of careful planning. Possibly just careful doing as well, but she'd see later tonight.

Setting the list of targets aside, Sonya glanced through the paperwork on the desk to be sure she had nothing too urgent to handle right away. There were the resumes for possible teachers, but those were pending background checks by a few of the clan's vory. A three-hundred-year-old letter from a previous Storm Arcobaleno, but she needed to source a middle Germanic dictionary and translation guide to finish.

Sorting out the results they had so far from the Chinese contingent was something Galina could do for her, as well as the rest of the paperwork she had from the various branches of Flame training going on. Gedeon was recruiting for his little team, so he was safely busy and out.

Confident nothing would implode on her if she left early, the Storm-Cloud snatched the list up again and headed out herself.

Museums were tricky, and that was her excuse for calling it a day barely past noon.

(Thursday the 17th of April, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

'It's possible' her left foot.

Sonya tailed after the pair of thieves who seemed to be after exactly what she was. Way too much of a coincidence for them to be after separate items.

Since she had picked a less obvious route into the museum, a second story window was missing a pane of glass to a bit of duct tape and had been opened only for a few seconds for her to get inside, she had a higher ground than the pair who seemed to have snuck in via one of the back entrances.

Thankfully this was an older museum, the wiring was old enough that with a bit of flexibility Sonya had a range of available options open to her. The guards were mostly the lazy type, holed up in a security office with closed circuit cameras watching wide swaths of area for them and only emerging out for bathroom breaks or the odd coffee run.

She just... didn't know how to deal with the two sneaking a bit slower than her into the building.

Keeping pace with them wasn't hard, nor was keeping well out of their range of sight. They were halfway decent, in most respects. The pair of boys, they really couldn't be much older than Usov was, were carefully and slowly picking their way forward. Checking periodically to ensure their way... was clear, that the guards weren't becoming curious over any odd shadows, checking a few of the displays to be sure the security on them weren't changing.

Figuring out what she wanted to do about the whole thing was another issue entirely.

Since it had been her foster mother who gave her the job, Sonya didn't intend to fail. However, that meant the two young teenagers would have to.

Thankfully, she didn't want to kill them. The sheer lack of reaction she had to Fadei's death apparently didn't mean she was perfectly alright with causing death to anyone, probably just the really annoying people. This disinclination to kill the two encroaching thieves at least meant her morals hadn't degraded that much.

Sonya could steal the items out from under the pair, but… that would leave them open to retribution from whomever hired or set them on this job. She could set off the alarms, then come back some other day when the brats were safely jailed and out of her way… but that also left them open to possible harassment from their client.

Stealing both the items and them, only to dump the whole mess on Lisa's feet probably wasn't the best idea either. Possible… but way too much of a headache.

Slinking low to the ground as one guard made a meandering path straight down the gallery the pair of teenaged thieves were stalking down let the Zolotov thief watch the two scramble for hiding places.

She was situated on a second-floor walkway, which gave her an impressive view of the entire display of sixteenth century Christian tools of worship that were once used by the Tsars. It also gave her the height to be not immediately spotted from someone on the ground level, and the position to best spot the security cameras.

Still undecided about what she was going to do, the Storm-Cloud calculated the probable angle the next camera had and where it covered before deciding that staying on the second-floor walkway wasn't going to work for her anymore.

As an old, repurposed building turned museum, the walkway she was on was a later but very ornate addition to what had once been a ballroom. In turning it into a gallery, some architect had built the supports to resemble sweeping archways. Mostly to prevent blocking all the natural light from the two-story spanning windows, partially just to make it look fancier and less out of place compared to the original style.

Tipping over the railing, while one guard made a lazy sweep of the entire gallery and two other thieves jockeyed for better hiding spots, Sonya twisted herself around a pillar and used the fancy arches to support her weight well off the floor. Still high enough to be out of general view, but now with the added complication of impaired vision and the possibility of losing her grip and falling.

The slightly overweight guard hadn't gone very far, he was on the opposite side of the room inspecting a stained-glass window display. Her ‘rival’ thieves, and she used that term lightly, were finally getting their act together in progressing at a decent clip while also keeping themselves hidden.

Abusing circus-level acrobatics again, she really should go crash one of the Großes Volksfest winter practices at this rate, Sonya picked up her own pace if only to keep herself in the running. Swinging down to check on the progress of the others in the room, then crab walking forward using the appropriate arches, stone, and the occasional windowpane.
She reached the end of the hall slightly before the other two, dropping down in a suitably shadowy corner to finally put herself on the same level as the others. The three thieves then had to pause, to let the guard wander his way back in the direction of the security room.

Then the overhead lights flickered on.

Sonya ducked, mostly instinctively, and pressed herself in between two display cases.

"Yolkov, there was something-"

"Of course there was. I was in here!" Yolkov the guard cut off his apparently junior partner waspishly, blinking in the sudden brightness. From what parts of his face Sonya could see from her corner, he also had a very impressive scowl working up his face as well. "What did you expect? That I wouldn't show up on the screens?"

Slowly creeping up to the base of another display to hide herself better within, the Storm-Cloud missed what the other guard mumbled in his defense.

A rather loud scoff echoed out as she curled up in a hopefully decent blind spot. "Very well, let us see this 'something' of yours."

Not good. Sonya glanced around, but there really was very little to hide behind where she was.

Most of the cases this far back were glass on all four sides, to give the maximum viewing possible out of the stupid overly ornate apparel and gaudy jewelry. Straining her ears let her know the pair of guards were at least starting on the other side of the gallery, so she stopped looking for hiding places and started inspecting things for a route she could take out.

…wait, there was a display upstairs that-

Ducking out of cover for a split second, the thief made a few semi-improbable jumps to get back up to the overhead walkway as fast as she could. A breathless moment of listening, just to be sure she hadn't been spotted by the guards, and she slunk her way over to the corner display.

She might be able to use this to hide, as long as she was both quick and silent enough.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 17th of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Siyangulov Kirill Innokentievich triumphantly snagged hold of a ragged jacket and pulled the struggling little brat out of his hiding place. "See, Yolkov? I told you-"

"Yes, yes. Fine. You told me." His ill-humored superior muttered, hastening over with his own flashlight and checking the nearby displays for any tampering. "He's young, might not be alone. Keep hold of him, I will do another sweep."

The scrawny teenager attempted to kick out Krill's knee to help him escape, but the guard knocked the young boy down and planted a knee in the middle of his back. None too gently, either.

Roughing up one kid soon drew out another, this one a little ragged brat without a jacket that tried tackling a grown man outweighing him by at least a factor of two.

Unperturbed by the assault, Kirill managed to grab the fist heading for his head and slam that brat
"Got another, Yolkov!"

"Good, keep them there." Puffed the older guard, stomping his way up to the second story walkway. "I have to… finish checking the room out before we are to call the militsiya on the little thieves."

Kirill frowned pensively, but since Yolkov had been employed by the museum longer than he had he gave him the benefit of doubt. He would've called the militsiya after he found the first one, or maybe back when he spotted shadows that didn't come from his partner ghosting across the camera feeds.

Adjusting his grip on the second brat, the first one had started wiggling the very moment the other came in sight but he had a worse grip on the newer one, took up a few minutes of time. By then Kirill assumed his partner had at least managed one side of the gallery and spent a few sour thoughts about the older and overweight man's sluggish speed.

If he dropped even one of the kids, he'd be in for a reaming out when they finally reported the probable break in.

"…what in the…"

"Yolkov?" Prompted the guard when his partner failed to finish his sentence.

An ear-splitting crash of glass, one thump of a body hitting the ground rather hard, and an armored figure dropped to the gallery's ground floor after vaulting the railing on the walkway.

Whoever it was rose to their feet smoothly, as if nearly seventy pounds of sixteenth century ceremonial plate armor and chainmail was nothing more than a light cotton jumpsuit. Wide eyed, Kirill didn't even notice when one of the teenagers he had been pinning to the ground got free from him and ran for it as the armored figure made its thumping way to him at a near-run.

The blow of an armored kneecap to his temple knocked the guard for a doozy of a loop, but he scrambled to remain conscious enough to hopefully learn something.

Neither he nor Yolkov had a gun, why didn't they have guns?

Having rather completely rendered Kirill completely useless for most anything, the armored figure ignored the second little teenager as he also bolted the first chance he got. A few more thumping steps, another crash of glass, and the newer impossibly strong thief picked out a few more pieces of the display to steal.

Kirill let himself slump boneless to the ground, knowing full well he wasn't going to be able to out muscle whoever that was.

Hopefully the clatter of the ceremonial armor walking about would let the militsiya track down this thief, they had to already be on their way since that was the second display destroyed in as many minutes.

There was no way someone could outrun a few cars in full plate armor, right?

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 17th of April, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Sonya," Arseniy blinked slowly at his youngest daughter as she looked up, a slightly guilty cast to her features, "what the hell are you doing?"
She looked back down to the very shiny metal she was having some trouble wiggling out of. "Um... help?"

From the look of things, she had mostly managed to pry herself out of a suit of armor herself. The greaves were off her bare feet and calves, both of them poking up out of a backpack left next to her desk. Only one of the gauntlets joined them on the floor, the other seemed to be jammed on around her fist from how few of the fingers were wiggling.

That still left the plates on her thighs, a metal skirt thing with a bit of chainmail mesh peeking out underneath, the breastplate, the back plate, a chainmail shirt, and a rather uncomfortable looking steel gorget with the chainmail hood that restricted her from turning her neck fully.

Arseniy had been aware Lisa sent their youngest daughter off to lift a few things from a museum, but he was pretty sure an entire suit of armor hadn't been listed.

"How did you even get into that?"

"It wasn't that hard." Sonya mulishly informed him, glaring down at her mostly useless left hand. "I disintegrated the stuffing manikin they had in here while getting in, and I think it did some nasty things to my clothing. But it kept everything more or less upright, so I just... wiggled in. Might have actually had to tack weld the back plate on, to be honest, but it worked."

Now that the vor could take a closer look, it seemed as if she had done a bit of damage to the leather straps that would've held the armor together as well as a few of the clasps and buckles. Some of it was melted into slaggy bits of gilded metal, but even with the heat of metal pressed on her form the young thief looked totally unconcerned by her charred outfit.

He wouldn't be able to help, or even touch it, until it stopped glowing cherry red in spots.

He eyed the mess, then her slightly hopeful expression. "I don't think I can get you out of that. Not any time soon. We'd have to wait for it to cool down a little, then use either metal cutters or a chisel and hammer to break you out."

"If I wanted it destroyed I'd do it myself." Sonya dismissed after a moment's thought, wrenching her left elbow free of the metal with a few impatient tugs. "Damn though."

"Why damn?" It wasn't like she could keep the suit of armor, even aside the damage she did to it the whole thing was stolen property that couldn't be hidden quickly.

"...I kind of like the idea and wanted a working prototype to fiddle with." She took a deep breath, then pried apart the chest and back plates with only a wince to suggest any pinching that might have gone on. "At least the gloves and boots, I don't think I want to use chest plates again."

Arseniy blinked at her show of force, then shrugged out of his jacket and dumped it on her head when he realized she hadn't been underestimating the possible cost to her clothing when she moved to remove the chainmail shirt. Large parts of her clothing were simply gone, a faint charcoal film to her skin suggesting they just simply burned away either from her own Flames or the heat of the metal pressing in on them.

"You might want to think about Flame-proofing clothing, or some way to protect what you're wearing when you do things like this."

"Or at least my underwear, this is rather uncomfortable actually." Sonya ripped off the last few bits when they started charring his leather jacket, mostly the chainmail undershirt and the cowl she had mostly forgotten about. The gorget was similarly ripped in two with a metallic screech of protest, which seemed to be the fate of anything she found rather annoying in her metal outfit.

With most of her upper body free, the young woman wrapped his jacket around herself and simply pried the metal encasing her lower body apart.

Arseniy sighed, eyes fixed on the ceiling. "I'll call Lisa and have her stop by your hotel for a change of clothes. Do I even want to see the news reports in the morning?"

There was a fresh blush to her face, and the thief sank to her office chair with a guilty sort of shrug. "Erm... maybe not? Can you tell Lisa I was right, though? There were another two heading for the same thing I was, who nearly got us all caught. Or it might have been me. I can't tell until we see what tipped the guards off on the news."

He glanced down, but Sonya had at least tiredly planted herself behind her desk and was merely toeing the still overheated metal armor she had been wearing. "The stone matching for your Triad fellows is done, so you've got the rest of the day to recover. Tomorrow you'll need to see them off, for politeness' sake."

"Lovely, then I think I'm just going to head to bed then. Can you take Lisa the backpack instead? It has what she wanted in it." As she spoke the young thief got up, giving Arseniy the confirmation that not even her pants survived being encased in hot metal and bits of spiritual fire.

"Sonya. Stay in this room until Lisa gets here."

He did not need even more foreigners after his daughter and walking around headquarters like that would just earn her a reputation she didn't need.

Sonya blinked at him, puzzled. "Why? I'm covered, it's early enough yet that it's likely no one will see me."

"...just stay here until your mother gets here. Please." Arseniy tacked on when she looked to want to argue more. "You'll get sick walking around outside like that."

There was also the little problem that since the hotel she stayed at was more or less Mafiya run that even skimpier dressed women had passed through it, so it was entirely possible Sonya would see nothing wrong with waltzing through the lobby like that if it was empty enough.

At least if she could find herself a pair of shoes.

This was a slight problem Tatiana had hinted at, but he hadn't quite believed before now.

Arseniy didn't plan to touch it, he had to think of a way to inform Lisa of Sonya's utter lack of any body modesty so she'd try tackling the problem.

Sitting back down, a little bewildered at both his usage of 'please' and the utterly out of character comment on getting sick if she went out, his younger daughter eyed him warily. "Arseniy? Are you feeling alright?"

"I'm feeling old."

How long ago would he have been perfectly fine with a blonde woman walking around headquarters like Sonya had been intending to?

He wouldn't have gone after anyone like that, Lisa would've done some bloody double homicide had he tried, but appreciating the view offered had never been something he had been shy of.
Her proposing to do it just made him feel unhappy, and very damn old.
Chapter 45

(Friday the 18th of April, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I am never letting you forget this."

"Tats, do shut up." Sonya tiredly grouched at her sister, pulling at Renato's old dress shirt so her shoulder wouldn't slip through the neck any further then sinking backwards into her picked spot. "And I was limited on options, it wasn't actually the worst I had."

Tatiana snickered, attention glued to the television set in the younger woman's hotel suite as the news feed playing the results of the thief's late-night spree. There was a tiny if grainy black and white image of Sonya in a suit of sixteenth century armor vaulting a second story railing over the news anchor's shoulder. Probably the feed from one of the close circuit cameras on the other side of the gallery, judging from the angle.

The screen of the newsroom cut out, then on came one baffled sounding guard who had an utterly magnificent bruise from the Storm-Cloud's armored knee spreading out from one temple.

Apparently, it was a pre-recorded bit of him being interviewed. Explaining how someone got the drop on him and his partner while wearing the museum's donated plate mail.

Current speculation the sisters could hear was that someone had snuck into the armor sometime before that night, since nothing else had been disturbed and the two guards had only started searching the same gallery due to two additional teens breaking in as well.

"An entire suit of armor. Almost for no particular reason at all." The redhead marveled out loud, leaning back to monopolize more of her younger sister's rented couch. "And you just ran off with it. While wearing it."

With a frown, the Storm-Cloud looked over to the Sun sharing the couch with her. "...I may actually have parts of it still. The... greaves, Arseniy called them, and the gauntlets. Well... one of them."

"You going to keep using them?" She asked, still highly amused as she poked her in the thigh a few times.

Sonya gave her sister an ugly look... but had to shrug after a moment. "...maybe. For the more risky assignments I get from Mafia Land. Some armor is better than none, and I think we might be able to make better armor in this day and age than they could back in the sixteenth century."

"You have an entirely strange fondness for history. You suck at it, but... your little collection of weaponry? Now plate mail? Really, Nya."

Scowling, the thief stretched out one leg to nudge her in the hip in return for the poking. "Did we ever figure out a Storm compatible metal? Silver works... but it's more like a wick than a resistant or conductive metal for it."

"No, not yet. The closest you'll get is ivory." Tatiana shrugged at Sonya highly skeptical look, flapping the hand that had been rudely pushed into the younger thief's side from side to side. "I'm not even joking. Storm Flames eat everything else at a steady rate, unless a certain selection of stones resists it for a short while. Sometimes old bone resists for a whole second more."
"What about tungsten? I have a few weapons made out of the stuff."

Shrugging again, the nurse picked up her little sister's feet and inspected them. Ignoring the twitches and flinches Sonya made as she pressed on certain sensitive parts. "That's a better question to pose to Galina. I don't think so, but I was only involved for half of the metal and element testing. We had a good idea for what metals might mean Sun Flame conduction, after all."

She got distracted by the news report, which was now on speculating who had been in the stolen suit of armor.

Sonya sighed at her snickering as a rather bulky if shorter than average male was suggested. "That actually happens to me a lot."

"What, you often get mistaken for a slightly undersized, male, muscle builder?" Tatiana asked gleefully, now pointing at the television set and allowing her younger sister the leverage to pull her feet back.

Glaring at the same feature of her rented rooms, the younger thief got up to finally head to bed instead of entertain the hyper Sun. "Either a male of considerable stature more than me, or any number of thieves working in concert. I'll see you later tonight, or tomorrow, Tats."

"Night sis!" The nurse did turn down the volume but didn't seem to be in any hurry to miss even part of the newscast covering Sonya's spectacular break in of a museum.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 18th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Sonya, can I have-"

"Can it wait a moment, Lisa?" Interrupted the blonde apologetically, sorting out a folder of paperwork with Galina's aid. "I've had a late morning and apparently I have to talk to the Pahkan in a few. After I'm more or less free... I think."

"I'll come with you, I think I he might have a few questions I can answer." The older Russian decided, pulling open the door she had almost shut after her once she had a moment to absorb the fact her foster daughter interrupted her at all. "Then we really do need to talk, sweetie."

"...alright?" Sonya inspected her wryly amused expression, while blindly accepting the finally assembled packet of information she needed from Galina.

"You two might as well do lunch." The Lightning suggested, still nose deep into the mess and snagging a couple more folders full of different papers for herself. "Afterwards, you need to talk to the Wo Hop To Triad members, to get their feedback on the stone-matching process and preempt any complaints about the quality or number we're sending them off with. Finally, since I'm doing the interviews with the teachers, I'll need you to overlook my notes before we actually hire someone sometime in the next few days. Oh... and Gedeon has his selection ready for you to check off when you have a free moment."

The thief grimaced at the things starting to stack up on her in spite of the effort she was putting in to try and stay on top of it all but nodded as she accepted the suggestion. "Lunch then, Lisa?"

"Sounds lovely. Let's go, sweetie." She gave her fellow brunette a thankful smile. "Good luck, Galina."
The older woman earned herself a bland little smirk as Galina straightened up her own significantly larger stack of papers and folders she apparently needed to review. "Thank you… ma'am."

Sonya let her mother lead them out of the borrowed office and off through the hallways, looking over the proposal Tatiana had written up for the Mafia Land hospital as she absently followed along.

The proposal wasn't all that bad, even discounting they would lose about five young Flame users from it in the short term and two or more in a more final sense in the long. Her sister might be a decent nurse in her own right, even discounting her Sun Flames, but there were things she couldn't handle yet.

Major surgeries, creating vaccines, giving physical therapy if needed, and to top it off she was only one person. Even Suns had to sleep sometime.

Mafia Land's hospital wasn't exactly exorbitant in their prices, but the cost was still punishingly high compared to any average middle-class family's income. To any criminal, even one not in a syndicate to help absorb such costs, it was merely a price close to a middling lucrative contract or two.

Sonya got her own medical bills discounted already, for being actually a part of the island's pool of manpower and for her agreement to let Doctor Kappel study her baseline health and how her Flames impacted it. Partially why Scruffy's own bills had been rather reasonable rather than expensive as hell, after she volunteered him as a baseline extremely stressed Sun example they reduced the costs for him by a decent margin.

Bjørn had opted not to be involved, skittish about anything she didn't expressly control even still. Since she had practically upset his entire life for her own aims, she let it go on without complaining about the cost. He was saving her some time and possibly sorting out her money now. It at least somewhat equaled out.

Glancing up when the vory guard outside old man Zolotov's office opened the door for Lisa, Sonya let her folder containing the proposed offer Tatiana wanted given fall closed as she followed her foster mother.

"Good afternoon, Pahkan." Announced the older Russian woman brightly, stepping aside so the thief following her wasn't concealed by her form. "I have an appointment with Sonya after you, forgive my imposition."

"Elisaveta," the Zolotov Pahkan greeted blandly as he discarded whatever it was he had been looking over in favor for the women in his office, "mayhap you could give me some additional insight to your girls' plans."

He snapped his fingers, holding out the same hand to Sonya. She offered the folder of the proposal to the old man to pour over at his leisure obediently, if a little queerly disgruntled that anyone would snap their fingers at her for any reason.

"Tatiana might not be the best one to ask, since she is mostly keen on applying these young ones and their different skills to her chosen profession. However, if we can trade ill-trained youngsters for a fewer numbered but well-trained medics later? It would free up our so far only Sun Flame medic for more serious incidents. Such as the knife wound my Arseniy suffered through a… incident last year."

The younger woman blinked, eyeing her mother's back in only slightly surprised appreciation.

For someone who only recently heard the proposal, that was a fairly comprehensive summary of the offer and what the clan could have from it.
"And your opinion over why this should be accepted, Bazanova?"

"Aside the more specialized training a few of the Flame users we'll get back will possess, who can teach others that would like to know, there is the fact the hospital is offering a discount for anything we need actual doctors for rather than just a medic or two. So, surgery and those kinds of things in a place safer than even the hospitals here." As that was the actual worth of the offer, because there was no way to know how well the young Flame users would do as medical student until they actually tried to learn. "We might be losing a few young ones for it, but the ones we will get back will be trained for a specialty that is almost universally useful in any situation."

Old man Milos made a hawking cough sound he tried to muffle with one hand when turning the pages she had offered him, which Sonya only really took notice of due to the comments Tatiana had given on the age of their clan's Pahkan.

He didn't look any more frail or aged as he normally did to her, he was an old man after all, but he was still a silver-haired old criminal mostly desk bound these days that she'd rather not see dead just yet.

Should he sound that bad, or was that normal for him at this age?

Why had she not paid attention to that before?

"So, the trade favors us in the short term. What about the long?"

"...they will likely expect a more favorable trade later on, using the ones they trained and sent back to recruit more for them from us in time." The younger Russian continued slowly, pulling her mind back on the subject being discussed. "That is something we would need to keep track of, and occasionally discourage or encourage as need be."

He gave her a skeptical look. "That's it?"

"Well..." Sonya glanced at her mother, who wasn't looking at her, and then back to the expectant old man, "...in the short term, it might also wordlessly suggest to foreign mafia syndicates that we either have an excess of Flame users available for various specialized training or are more selective for what we send them out for. Assuming if they do well. Which isn't actually done outside of certain major underworld powers, from what I've seen. In long, it would mean we might be able to take over the Mafia Land hospital if enough of our sympathetic Flame users make up a stronger presence there."

Milos blinked at her rather long comment, and even Lisa gave her a strange sideways look. "...and the downside opposite to that?" Asked the Pahkan after a moment of contemplation only broken by the tick of his office's wall clock.

"We might come to be known as a criminal clan of healers and researchers, instead of thieves, abroad." Admitted the Storm-Cloud warily, and only a slight bit wryly. "If the number of medical students outweigh the number of thieves and vory we have in Mafia Land. Here at home? The negative impact will be lesser overall, Flame users will never outnumber the number of criminals that don't have Flames. So even if we come to specialize in both thievery and medical aid if this does wildly well, the balance will still lean more to thieves than medics."

The old man leaned back in his office chair, probably musing over both the thief and her words. Before deciding how to continue. "You sound sure of that, but I've had a look at your intake numbers. They don't bear out your belief Flame users won't outnumber regular criminals."
Sonya sighed through her nose, well aware how bloated that number had been by outside influences. At least she knew how to answer this non-question for once, if only by treating it as a question rather than a statement by tacking on a 'why?''

"It will inevitably level off. That number is likely to grow in the next few years but things will start to slow, probably when we've doubled or even tripled the number of us. Currently, we know of one Sky and his possibly Sky Flame bearing offspring that are encouraging the emergence of more Flame users."

Even if that Sky and his possibly Sky bearing offspring were never going to become an active user of Dying Will Flames, the presence of even one alone was still an encouraging influence on the Flame users around them.

"However, only a slight fraction of the population ever awaken their Dying Will Flames, half of that who would ever gain a hold on them, and then there's the fraction of that who will never seek out a criminal syndicate for answers. Even by only the numbers... it wouldn't support more than one or two syndicates of pure Flame users and getting them all to behave in that kind of number is more of a headache than anyone not a Sky could tackle."

Vongola beat the odds in that respect, but that was likely because they seemed to have always had an active Sky as their Don. Even then, Flame users in Italy's Iron Fort were always the Mafioso and not the hired help.

They were all trained and mostly in combat roles for their respective famiglia. It would be possibly interesting to see if she could find any syndicates that didn't immediately weaponized their Flame users, if at all possible. Just for the comparison.

Would the Zolotovs count for that?

Not all of the trainees that could use Flames were lining up for combat roles later on.

"You've done surprisingly good work keeping ahead of that number," Milos acknowledged musingly, much to her surprise, "and since you were the only one to guess it would burst as it did I'll believe you about it leveling off."

"How did you know it would explode? The number of Flame users, I mean." Lisa asked before Sonya could sort out how to answer the Pahkan's next non-question comment she couldn't answer.

That comment she couldn't answer with a why tangent, it didn't seem to sound right even in her head.

"...you gave me the first hint, Lisa. When you told me the number of Flame users shrank for the last century. Back when I first started." She admitted blandly, because it was true enough. "It's similar to epidemic numbers, when diseases crop up. After both Tatiana and Dmitriy, helping Usov and running into a Sun on Mafia Land and he brought along another Mist, then Galina and Björn? I had the suspicion that was born out when I got ahold of the actual numbers back here."

Snickering, the older Russian woman looked back to their clan's leader.

Milos' expression was equally as dryly amused. "Interesting comparison, Bazanova."

"Gedeon's opinion of Skies is... off, even if it is applicable when things turn wrong. No Sky would intentionally seek out to turn their prospective Guardian Elements into obsessed stalkers, but the child Fadei scared the reaction out of likely didn't know any more than just 'strange man wants me for whatever, do not want'." Sonya gave the both of them a shrug. "The kid's rejection of Fadei was understandable, even if it was… undesirable for his sanity."

He harrumphed, then a noise she thought meant he had painfully cleared his throat sounded. "Will that ever change? My son's opinion, I mean."

"Unless he actually meets a compatible Sky, hopefully who already has a Sun Guardian… no."

Giving her a raised eyebrow, the Pahkan returned to the folder she had given him. "So… your opinion on this… trade, Bazanova?"

"It's a good one, even if it will take some careful managing to prevent the trade from being taken advantage of."

"We just must out-sneak a bunch of criminal doctors, then?" Milos set the folder aside, on his desk instead of pitching it entirely. "I'll think about it and give you an answer in a few days."

That was… a good sign then, right?

Sonya glanced at Lisa's profile, but gained nothing as the older Russian woman made their farewells.

She didn't know what she should tell Tatiana about how the offer was being considered, but maybe her mother could handle that.

"Come along, Sonya." Flashing her youngest daughter a smile, Lisa took her arm and led them both out of the Pahkan's office. "Now for something equally as important. What would you like-"

"Erm…?"

With a sigh the brunette released the blonde and turned to pleasantly smile at the apologetic looking Xiasheng, who seemed to have been waiting for them in the hallway. "Please tell me it can wait."

"Ah… we are to leave tomorrow, and this is the only time I will have free for something more or less personal in nature." The unfortunate Triad member informed her regretfully with a little wince. "We have been gone for far too long already and cannot delay more for anything but an emergency."

Lisa gained a slightly strained looking tilt to her smile. "I understand. Sonya? Tomorrow, breakfast. No excuses."

The thief winced slightly as she walked off, well aware her foster mother was not pleased at all.

She had started it, since she did have a meeting with their boss, but Xiasheng probably didn't help at all.

"As far as I am aware, we are hosting a farewell dinner for you and your fellows later tonight."

Sonya started, once her mother had left them mostly alone in the hallway of the Zolotov headquarters. The only ones who could overhear were the vory guarding the Pahkan's office and the guide that brought the Triad member to the third floor of the building. "Is this something you can't tell me then? How personal are we talking?"

"I have something for you, from Fong." Admitted the Chinese Storm sheepishly. "It requires some… ah, explanation."

She gave him a skeptical look, wondering what the martial artist had sent along for her and why he would do so at all.

"Your own reputation benefited from this trade, as well as his for opening it up to us." Xiasheng swept an arm down the hallway, inviting her to walk with him away from the office she emerged from. "He is aware you put in much more effort into this to ensure it would go through, even if you would gain the most information in return, as well as conforming to our request for your time that your mother is so upset by."

"...I would apologize, but it was unnecessary to demand my presence. Even I was exasperated by that."

"Proof is in the action. We didn't know the same non-Flame using younger members did similar things for your own Flame users, only that you could and have matched Fong to his." He gave a mostly dismissive shrug, not remotely apologetic seeming about that part. "However, as you have delivered exactly what you offered and gave in to our demands, we would like to express our appreciation."

Sonya paused just before the second-floor landing, which Xiasheng didn't so he ended up on the second floor before turning back to her. Now that they were off the highly sensitive floor of the thieves' clan headquarters, the vor escort wandered off back up the stairs. "Express it how?"

"Fong was... very amused at my loss to your unconventional methods with a staff. The bō was supposed to be a gift, but as you ended up destroying it in the process of... ah... knocking me around."

"Oh..." Sonya wasn't sure if she should apologize or not for that.

"It is no problem. I brought an extra just in case you did break it before we could gift it." Xiasheng continued with a wry smirk as she finally took the last steps off the staircase to rejoin him on what seemed to be a walk out of the Zolotov Headquarters. "However, after Fong heard my report of our spar, he wanted something else sent along for humoring my request."

She regarded him warily. "...Fong used you to get a better report about what I can do, didn't he?"

"Possibly." He temporized, attempting a bland smile for her.

"He can do his own research. I have no objections to fighting him again if he would like."

"I will pass that on, and... about that." The Chinese Storm offered Sonya another smile, this one a bit strained. "Getting to the reason why I've interrupted your mother, and apologize to her for me if you can, but Fong was very interested in hearing how well you used a bō staff."

"I believe you said that once before." Sonya informed him, slightly tartly.

"Enough so that he found an excuse to send along more staff-based weaponry to see what you make of them." Xiasheng continued on, touching the likely still tender side of one black eye. "There's a... few of them he had shipped express."

"And this is the part that requires explanation?" Questioned the thief, still confused as to why Fong was sending her things.

She had gotten things from Renato, but he had pissed her off and that had been part of an apology. As far as she was aware, Fong hadn't pissed her off.

She should've at least noticed that if he had, right?

Maybe it was for the harassment he had to do before Tatiana suggested a spar and she finally got one after blowing up at Renato?
The martial artist hadn't seemed at all sorry about it, not even when he finally got what he had been after.

More like smugly pleased with himself, the asshole.

A few of Xiasheng's fellows, included the Rain Yanlin who would be staying behind for her own reasons, were waiting for them on the ground floor of the complex that served the Zolotov clan as a base. They were each holding a staff or two, some of which had very interestingly shaped cloths draped over the heads.

"...Xiasheng? I would like an answer now."

"Ah... well..." The Chinese Storm shuffled slightly in place, almost looking sheepish. His fellows mostly looked amused as they planted various ends of different staffs on the floor, so she could get a good long look at the oversized arsenal. "Fong sent these for you, mostly in gratitude but also... in the hopes you would learn them and then give him a fight... using them. He seemed... very interested in what you would make of them all."

The first, or rather the closest to her, was a naginata. The man holding it also had a staff with a fork looking thing on its head, which she could not for the life of her recall what they were called. The next man had a freaking oar, and next to him was a man holding the monk staff with four rings threaded through the rather ornate head.

The next to last man, standing near the back of the group, had a plain wooden bō staff and a slightly shorter one in his arms.

Lastly, there was a spiked mace looking thing with a big ass ring on one end. He had planted it on the glossy floor of the reception room rather than put the spiked end against his shoulders like his fellows.

Sonya blinked at the collection of brightly colored Chinese men and their various staff-based weaponry she was apparently being gifted with standing around the very generic looking room used to deter anyone not in the know walking into the criminal syndicate's home base by looking like a super busy business office. Then blinked again when her right eye tried to twitch in an attempt to keep hold of her temper and not put holes through either people or walls.

She was going to shove the most uncomfortable one up Fong's ass for this. Probably the big spiked mace one, the naginata looked rather pretty for something she hadn't wanted in the first place.

Her collection already had axes and picks on a stick, why not add a freaking sword on a stick?

How about a pitchfork of all things?

What's more, they were full-sized.

Sonya pinched the bridge of her nose as she cursed the missing Chinese Storm out in her mind.

He knew she had a miniature collection she used for any day-to-day fights, sending full-sized versions probably meant he intended them only to be used when training to use them... or trying to maim him using them.

Xiasheng coughed awkwardly, from the sounds of it shuffling again on the carpeted bit of floor they were standing on. "I tried to tell him he was probably going overboard, Miss Bazanova, but-"

"Oh, don't worry, Xiasheng. It's not your fault." Drawing the hand pinching the bridge of her nose down her face in exasperation, the thief braced her jawline with the same hand and considered the entire collection. "I know exactly who to blame for this."

Her plans to maim Fong with the entire 'gift' he had sent to her was probably the point of him even getting her anything like this collection in the first place. She wasn't sure if she was ornery enough to go against that reaction just because, or if she should go along with it because it promised to be somewhat fun to try.

The asshole. The smug, perverted, fight-obsessed irritant.

What kind of gift was this all, anyways?

He'd eventually get a benefit from all of it, if Sonya stuck to what she really, really wanted to do with each weapon.

Xiasheng was probably being rather smart in ensuring she had only a small audience around when handing over the collection. Even if she was only half a Cloud, it seemed as if her reactions and a typical Classical Cloud's reactions did coincide sometimes.

Sonya huffed an almost unwilling laugh, morbidly amused by the entire spectacle. "I'm going to have to ask you all take these up to my office, please. I'll find… something to do with it all."

If she tried to do it, and she could even if the combined weight might be stretching it for her bizarre strength, she'd end up smacking one of the rubbernecking gawkers that were coming to sneak a peek at what their visiting Chinese contingent were giving her. Some of those spikes and points looked rather painful.

---

(Saturday the 19th of April, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Lisa took a seat across from Sonya, in range far enough to feed her son at the same time. "Do you know what I wanted to talk to you about?"

"No?" The young blonde blinked up at her, distracted from playing with her food.

Probably already missing her sister, decided the older Mafiya woman with a bit of exasperation.

Her youngest foster daughter could pretend to be as prickly as she wanted, but it was fairly obvious she really only got engaged with something if one of her siblings or her few specially picked underlings were also involved.

Tatiana, with the hospital she worked for proposal already given to their leader and her prospective fellow to-be-medics picked out, had no real reason to linger back in Moscow anymore. The red headed nurse had left last night, after one last day of re-meeting her little brother and… well, teasing her little sister.

Lisa wondered if Sonya could do anything without at least verbally fighting someone about it, even spending time with Tatiana was marred with petty little fights the both of them seemed to enjoy more than actually mean.

"Is there anything wrong?" Sonya prompted when she seemed to be wool gathering a little more than normal.
"Everything is fine." The older woman hastened to state firmly, giving Valera more omelet to try stabbing with a child-friendly fork. "I didn't mean it like that."

She lowered her fork to her plate, apparently not that interested in eating as much as she was confused. "Lisa? What's going on?"

"You know you can talk to me about anything, right?" At the continued blank look but accepting nod to her question, Lisa wondered yet again how to go about this particular topic.

Damn Arseniy for have no clue in hell how to have this conversation with Sonya, just that it might be needed. Might be, Lisa wanted to huff out a sarcastic laugh at that.

When their youngest daughter could literally rip people apart if they tried anything funny with her...?

She wasn't entirely sure this chat was even needed, but her lover hadn't let up until she agreed to do it.

Sonya's little fight with a much better trained but foreign fighter had put down a lot of the nasty kinds of rumors about her off-putting behavior, but that probably wouldn't last very long.

Even after those nasty Rains stopped spreading vicious rumors, popular opinion around the clan wasn't entirely in the Storm-Cloud's favor outside her small niche. Now that it had been stopped, and the thief in question had put in a little face time with the various young her Flame section of the clan dealt with, it was slowly getting better.

Galina was a lovely assistant with multiple uses, but even she could only do so much in rumor control.

Given her younger foster child had absolutely no interest in socializing, and rarely credited that it would affect her at all, even one or two rumors of the wrong sort getting to someone with ill intentions might end up all sorts of bad.

Within the Zolotov clan, Sonya was admired in an 'ice bitch' kind of way. Pretty to look at, but not someone to get close to unless you wanted frostbite in awkward places. She was known to be rather rude, curt, or possibly verbally sharp, but she didn't go out of her way to make trouble for others so it was tolerated as long as she kept it to her small circle of influence.

Her sheer lack of any romantic foolishness of the type Tatiana was fond of did her a service, they didn't feel threatened because Sonya was utterly disinterested in stealing their men and had no problem showing it. It was pretty damn obvious when the thief barely twitched at the raunchier comments thrown her way and ignored it whenever someone tried to chat her up.

Lisa was fully aware of what her eldest was up to but, as she had yet to mess around with someone she shouldn't and could manage her own damage control when those things flared up, she wasn't yet worried for her.

Any change to that sheer disinterest the Storm-Cloud extruded would get the women's backs up and probably destabilize Sonya's reputation. Such as wandering around the clan's headquarters half-naked, or extravagant presents from foreign suitors.

That didn't include any men who got it in their heads to try for the foster daughter of a particularly well respected vor in hopes of gaining his favor, or what they would do when Sonya broke them in half for trying that with her.
"I know I gave you and Tats a talk about maturing and the facts of life, and that Arseniy did the same for Cherep…"

Sonya hesitated a moment before speaking up, probably highly wary of another smack to the head. "…actually, Arseniy took Cherep to a whorehouse."

Lisa pressed her lips together but had to admit her lover wasn't the most verbose of men. Not exactly stoic, but also not a chatterbox.

That had probably been for the best, even if wondering how that conversation had gone had been a favorite pastime for her. "I'm not going to ask how you know that, as your brother likely told you right afterwards and I can guess his thoughts on the matter. But you realize those loose women have bad reputations, right?"

The still mostly blank expression on the younger woman's face didn't even twitch. "Yes…?"

"And for a woman of your… status, you can't afford that kind of reputation?"

As she had been afraid of, nothing seemed to be clicking on her daughter's end.

"I'm not… exactly interested in sleeping around causally, Lisa." Sonya started off with her usual brutal frankness. "If you've heard anything… I didn't do it."

"I know." Slightly concerning, even Lisa had explored around a little at her age. However, she would admit her youngest daughter was a bit more than strange. Not a typical girl, they wouldn't even need this conversation if that were the case. "I haven't, sweetie. But… before you end up doing anything you might not think is important but ends up being so, I'd like to sound this out with you. Some of the things you can do outside of the Soviet Union isn't the same as what you can do within it."

"…okay?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 19th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya was still utterly confused two hours later, when Lisa deemed they had spent more than enough time talking and she should probably go into work.

She got something out of that conversation, but probably not what her foster mother had meant to convey.

Obviously, she was doing something wrong. Or if not wrong then not entirely correct.

However, Rachel had very much been a modern woman before her death. Sonya… might still be thinking of the world much like how it had once been, even if the history was slightly different and the people involved a bit more murderous. That the culture wasn't much different, which to be fair it wasn't in-your-face like the two-thousands' sex sells thing but a more reserved kind of thing building up to that.

Sort of similar to the situation with Tatiana and her future all over again. Like the rest of the Russian Mafiya the Storm-Cloud didn't intend to ever get married, the only name she'd take on were her father's and her brother's.
That didn't mean she was going to never get a boyfriend, it just wasn't... a need for her.

In the sixties, it was apparently still a thing for a woman to be to be defined by her man. Probably not until the Sexual Revolution would Sonya stop hearing about this and things like her 'reputation'.

That was baffling. What could she do to control how others perceived her?

It wasn't like Sonya really gave a damn who didn't like her, those who did would know better and that was that. She might give a damn for being feared unnecessarily, but that was more a comfort-thing than a reputation. She hadn't earned that honestly, so it did bother her somewhat.

Maybe that had been the point?

Still mystified by the morning's conversation, the thief came to a stop in the middle of her borrowed office. Derailed by the errant thought, and respecting Lisa's opinion enough to give the talk some serious thought.

'A woman of your... status' Lisa had said. What about it?

Her 'status' was a temporary thing, the moment Dmitriy was out of prison she was going to try and bail out of the clan entirely. During changeovers of power in a criminal syndicate any number of things got mixed up in the shuffle, and if old man Zolotov was really going to be retiring...

Hopefully that would kick up enough fuss so that her bowing out in favor of Valera's development as the Zolotov's resident Cloud could be more or less set in stone before anyone thought to ask her what she was doing.

Since there seemed to only be one dominant, active Cloud in any one territory... Sonya had to leave for Gedeon to get his 'Cloud that isn't female or entirely disinterested in Moscow'. Visit might be one thing but living in any kind of close proximity would turn little Valera into something much like her.

A, as Cherep put it, beta Cloud 'entirely disinterested in Moscow'.

She wasn't going to let her littlest brother suffer through the headache she was, of biting her tongue and not bucking the system for reasons even if that grated against her sensibilities, even if that would gain him range to do whatever he wanted in life.

She wasn't ruthless enough to turn the situation to her favor as another Cloud might be, because while irritating it wasn't actually all that bad to her in her day-to-day work. Depressing, confining, and a little stifling, but not bad.

The fact it would probably wind up to mean little Valera would take over the Zolotovs somehow eventually wasn't really all that important to her. More power to the brat, but Sonya wouldn't be staying.

Well aware that even if she pulled that distance getting off that she would be stuck paying her and Bjørn's dues for the rest of their lives, or until her baby brother did his probably-hostile takeover, Sonya absentely glanced around the office once more before finally moving to see if there was anything new for her to look at in her piles of work to be done.

Even if she had been working out of here, she hadn't touched much. There was a collection of various staff weapons in one corner, but she'd get those shipped to Mafia Land this weekend.

The upholstery was still mainly blue with green highlights, without even a red or purple throw pillow. That ugly lamp of Dmitriy's had survived this long, it would probably make it to when the Rain was released.

One wall was patched, but well… she wasn’t sorry about that. Galina had torn apart the built-in bookshelf on the far wall, but it was more-or-less back together now.

Sonya had wondered if she even wanted to be part of a criminal syndicate while her foster mother was trying to inform her of ways to manage one's reputation. It wasn't much use to her, for some pricy benefits she could probably get elsewhere. She'd think fondly of the Zolotovs… eventually, for her foster family and the security she got as a not-quite-a-child.

However, she was utterly, uncomfortably irritable with someone holding her leash.

Metaphorical or not.

Trying to leave a syndicate without their say so might be mostly lethal to the individual trying, but frankly Sonya was at the point she didn't much care. She’d pay her dues for the rest of her life if she had to, give them discounts for hiring her, but she was tired of being confined here and unable to check up on her brother or sister when she wanted.

Again, probably not what Lisa had intended with her little talk.

"Sonya?" Galina prompted, which made the Storm-Cloud blink in surprise. She hadn't heard the other woman come in. "What's... going on?"

She glanced up to the Lightning, inspecting the rather dependable aide she had gotten rather used to while here. "You absolutely sure you want to leave this place? Tats will be coming back, eventually."

"I'll thank you to not question my intents." Sniffed the brunette in mock offense, planting a hand on a generous hip and glaring back. "I don't want to go back to being Dmitriy's office girl. Whatever you've got planned is fine with me."

Tapping the fingers of one hand on the desk, the thief thought about that. "Even if... I don't particularly want to come back?"

Startled, the slightly older woman quickly crossed to the office door and shut it. "You are so lucky that after the rock testing we did in here no one wants the office underneath us. Any conversation we have at normal tones in here is entirely audible downstairs in that one room. Now, what the hell is this about?"

"I'm a little fed up. Have been for a while, I just hadn't realized that was what it was." Sonya marveled aloud, not greatly bothered by the prospect of being overheard. "You're probably going to have to go out with your school plan, but I've got another."

"Oh?"

"...Gedeon gave it to me surprisingly," the thief dredged up a smile from somewhere, but it wasn't a particularly nice one, "with a little help from Tats. I'm going to name you vice principal for the school, once we have it up and running. You'll probably do better at it than I could ever do. In a few years, once things are more or less stable and running right and the agreements for those teaching need to be unaffiliated gets put in by whichever greedy asshole that wants to take charge of it, bow out to Lisa."

Galina blinked, then peered at her suspiciously. "What are you going to do?"

"I? I'm going to give Gedeon exactly what he thinks he wants."
An unholy terror of a Cloud, who will probably not respect him either but would consider Zolotov territory his and not the to-be Pahkan’s.

(Sunday the 20th of April, 1969. Giglio Nero Headquarters, Lecce, Apulia Region, Italian Republic.)

Renato ran his eyes over the gathering from under his ever-present fedora, slightly bored and already planning on what to do when he got to go bother a particular Russian thief of his acquaintance.

Donna Luce had a traitor-free famiglia finally, this little midday lunch party was partly to reopen lines communications to other famiglias and partly to show any of the traitors’ surviving associates that they completely failed in their bids to remove the Ottavia of the Giglio Nero as Donna.

Not very risky at all to hold, anyone with a lick of sense that had been involved would be wise to keep their damn heads down for at least another week or two.

That didn't mean there wasn't the few idiots that tried all-or-nothing attempts to finish the jobs they started, but such desperate elements were laughably easy to counter.

It would've been even easier if Luce had Guardians.

Suppressing the sudden scowl, the hitman cast another glance through the crowd to see if there was anyone he could take his sudden ill-humor out on.

He had yet to get a straight answer out of the Sky on the reasons for not having any Guardians.

Renato would've accepted that she just hadn't found anyone strong enough, Luce was a very powerful Sky so obviously just anyone off the street wouldn't do for her.

Hell, he would've taken an excuse that she didn't want to impose on anyone like that. She was bewilderingly nice about things, a little reserved maybe but in her position a woman had to be, even if she was a mafia Donna.

The Sun was suspicious, and not very happy about the fact.

Every Sky had Guardians, or at least that was the driving point behind a Sky's Harmony. To collect and gather together compatible Flame types to protect themselves.

Any one Sky's territory ended up having outstanding Flame users of each type, it was natural since they were encouraging influences to any budding Dying Will Flame user. No Sky ever really had to venture far for their entire array of Guardians, or at least for the first set.

It wasn't the lack of options that prevented the Giglio Nero Sky from finding her own, it had to be a personal choice of her own. One that went against her nature as a Hard Flame Sky, or even against her own normal outlook from what he had seen of her.

Why didn't Luce want that protection?

Even when actively seeking out a strong, un-bonded Element for aid?

The hitman wouldn't have bonded as a Guardian with her, even if she had reached for him like that. He had… personal reasons why he would've refused. Gently, for she was a lady and a respectable one at that.

However, expecting something that never came had made him tense and merely stroked both his curiosity and suspicions.

He wouldn't ask such personal questions to someone he had only known for a month and some, and not knowing or being able to get the answer was a new sensation he didn't much like.

Luce kept herself at arm's length from him. Wisely, since he wasn't a very moral or respectable person, but it also prevented him from just dipping into her mind to find the answers for himself.

It didn't help his suspicions or irritation much at all.

Not seeing an acceptable target for his ire, Renato unbent his lanky frame from where he had been leaning against a stone railing to see if Don Vongola would offer him any distractions.

Timoteo gave the hitman a sly smile when he got close enough neither man had to raise their voices over the quiet courtyard's babble to talk. "You do fine work, Renato. It's been what, a month? It seems you have a gift for straightening out various... ah, problems."

"It wasn't really much of a challenge." He brushed aside the praise absently, straightening his cuffs as he came to a stop near the other man. It was likely the Don was planning something, but as long as it might be interesting the Sun Flame user didn't really mind all that much. "How have you been, Timoteo?"

"Neck deep in negotiations with the Cervello Organization." Admitted the Sky rather wryly, giving a heavy sigh and turning his face to the sun overhead.

"I haven't heard of them." Renato prodded, curious now.

If he hadn't, how did they come to be so important a Don of Vongola's station was talking to them directly?

His verbal poke merely earned him one raised brow, and the older man looked back at him with a polite smile. "I didn't think you would, they're fairly new. Formed up over the empty territory the Giannotti famiglia emptied last year when they were wiped out."

Which would mean they were uncomfortably close, for a newly established syndicate within throwing distance to Vongola's allies. The closest to the specified area would've been... "Don Cavallone didn't want to handle the issue?"

"He was a little busy on another situation." Timoteo deflected without really saying much. Most Dons were very busy people. "As I have some time free, it isn't a problem."

Renato sensed he wasn't going to get much more out of that line of communication, Visconti was also drifting back to his Sky's side with suspiciously narrowed eyes.

Brown Nie didn't seem too alarmed from where he was near the buffet table, but the two Suns had quickly sorted out their individual aims to one another back when Renato had only just met the Ninth head of Vongola, that wasn't surprising.

Renato hadn't seen a need to murder the other Sun and take over a Guardian position, Brown Nie didn't want to tangle with the other stronger Italian Sun much at all ever. It worked out.

"I should probably get back to 'pulling security duties'." The hitman informed Timoteo, very regretfully.

Just talking to someone that wasn't watching him suspiciously for any weapon pulling was very nice, after a few weeks of having people flinch from his very shadow. That kind of behavior became wearing very fast.

"I think Donna Giglio Nero would appreciate that." Observed the other man with clear amusement. "She's glanced over here twice since you wandered in."

"Ho? Probably worried I'm about to shoot someone." Depressing that would make a pretty lady flinch from him, but Renato was a murderer. He wasn't going to pretend he wasn't.

Luce had been sheltered from that side of their lives so far until the hitman had become involved, and while he did regret killing in front of the lady… her safety was a bit more important to him than her nerves.

"I wouldn't have guess that myself." The Sky noted slyly. "I wouldn't be unhappy if you decided to become a Don again, Renato."

"That will NEVER happen. I don't particularly like the responsibility… but mostly the paperwork." He was going to ignore the implication Luce was watching him for any other reason, his love life was more than complicated enough as it was. "I'm afraid this will be as close as I will ever go to the position of Don from now on."

"That's… not a bad thing." Timoteo mused, reaching up to smooth down his rather thick mustache.

"Timoteo, you can be a very irritating person." Especially if the Sky was plotting something.

Renato wasn't quite fed up with the antics of Skies, but after being suspicious of one for damn near no reason all month he had been looking forward to going back to taking hits for a good few years.

By that point Visconti had wound his way through the party-goers enough to be within earshot, and the Cloud Guardian glowered at the unaffiliated Sun for insulting his Sky.

Said Sky merely laughed, waving a hand to dismiss the unaligned hitman's rather sour comment. "I believe that is the first time someone has had the gumption to accuse me of that. Always refreshing to speak to you, Renato."

"Timoteo." Touching the brim of his fedora in an absent salute of the dismissal, the hitman stalked off before Visconti could make a fool of himself puffing up any more than he had already.

Renato still thought Sonya on a Cloud Flame fueled rampage was more terrifying than the Vongola Cloud Guardian. Especially when she was furious with him.

The thought made him remember the advice Nilda Guerra gave him late last month, which was at least something to think about when posturing himself for security reasons.

He wasn't sure what he was going to do with most of it, as some was just sound advice for having a Cloud friend at all and how to work around their prickly natures he could fully use to avoid the Russian's sharp edges.

A quick glance to the guard positions on either side of his balustrade informed him that at least the morons he had drilled all week for this little event had put his instructions to some use. His leaving of a post had gotten the guards on either side of him to draw closer to cover the gap, and now that he was back they were drifting apart again.
Not quite as smoothly as they should, the fact they were moving at all drew some attention from the guest in attendance.

Field drills tomorrow then. The poor saps would probably be horrified to know Renato did just as much and then more than what he had put them through when they screwed up on a normal weekly basis, but he was also a pent-up Sun and they weren't.

Sucked to be them.

He could not wait to drop Shamal off on Sonya and spend at least a month and a half running hits until he stopped feeling so restless. Exploring a bit of Moscow's criminal underworld might draw enough of it off to be relaxing, but only if it wouldn't harm the thief's reputation any.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 20th of April, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Someone is very, very annoyed with you."

"Someone needs to be more specific." Sonya snapped back absently, writing out yet another list of things in her master research journal.

Ziven popped up on his toes just long enough to read the upside-down title she gave it, Ways of Committing Suicide via Flame Usage, and sank back to his heels with a bewildered expression.

"Dorokhov." Only the very reason the vor was away from the clan so damn much. "The leader of the little gang up in Khimki? The one I'm mentoring, and you beat the snot out of once before?"

The thief paused, glanced to her apparent rough draft and compared it to the list she was making in her heavily altered research journal, then finally looked up only to pin him with an annoyed expression. "I'm probably going to regret this, but why?"

"Some little birdy informed him of the spar you got with some Chinese man." Ziven started slowly, electing to sprawl out on the free arm chair in front of her desk instead of continuing to stand. "So now my little birdy is very irked you fought some no-name foreigner instead of coming to him for another smack-around. It's disturbing to watch him mope about it, and kind of hilarious."

Rather disturbing to think about, as well. Timur was depressed Sonya hadn't somehow arranged a beating for him. There was no way in hell the little teenaged Cloud had improved enough to go toe to toe with Sonya on an equal level just yet, he could barely nick Ziven in an odd scuffle or two.

Disturbing, hilarious, and strange. A Cloud Flame user in a nutshell.

Probably more terrifying than hilarious to someone that didn't know a Cloud user's quirks, but... Ziven somehow ended up half-raising a gutter brat Cloud and knew his one rather well. He had also grown up with the Zolotov Cloud, and knew how her head worked somewhat well too.

Sonya merely looked annoyed at the news he brought in. "...please tell me you're joking."

"Nope!"

She wasn't irritable anymore, so in fact Ziven would put good money on it possibly happening. As his fellow thief hadn't dismissed the whole thing out of hand, it did mean she was at least thinking it over.
"Has he gotten any better?"

Seriously thinking it over, apparently. "Err... it's been only a month and a half. He's learned to dodge?"

The expression aimed at him was now 'unimpressed'. He was also losing her attention to the work she was in the middle of, so he quickly suggested something else.

"Maybe when he can reliably score a hit on me?" Ziven offered sheepishly.

He hadn't exactly thought of what Sonya would do past hearing the issue, the vor had been more interested in stopping Timur from creeping out his little gang any more than he had already.

They were strangely fanatical about their leader's moods. With some of them he could understand, the Khimki Cloud had beaten half of them up before they joined him so they were probably terrified they were going to be beaten again if the issue wasn't fixed to the picky Cloud's liking. Some of them were duly impressed Dorokhov had a full-fledged vor advising him and were loyal because it seemed as if he would be going places that weren't more gutters and slums.

Some of them were just... probably as crazy as possible. Ziven wasn't going to be guessing any on his end until Sonya could see their ridiculous reactions for herself.

"Find a place outside our respective territories. It might be possible to do such a thing inside Zolotov territory, but don't risk it." The woman instructed firmly, returning to her work and flicking a wrist at him absently. "When he can tag you at least once a day for a full week, I'll visit."

"Right then, I'm just going to go... bug Lina for a bit." Taking that as a dismissal, the vor hopped up.

"Ziven. It's possible that in the course of such visits, the things we don't want found out early will be." Sonya glanced up, more than serious enough to make him pause. "Be sure everything you need is in place before such a thing happens."

"Yeah, but exactly how long can we stretch things out?" He asked back without expecting a real answer.

Some syndicates had already scouted the Khimki territory out a few times, which Timur had ousted with full vindictive glee and a minimum of mercy. The fact there was some kind of player in the old smuggler's den was probably common knowledge already, which would just mean eventually someone was going to send in more than just runners or a few of their Shestyorka to see what.

Ziven was not looking forward to it, for then all he'd have at hand to keep control of the Khimki Cloud and his territory was the teen himself and his passel of almost-fanatics. Maybe they'd number a good fifty in another month or two, but even fifty badly trained kids against even one someone armed with a gun or a rifle and enough bullets?

He did not like those odds.

"...anything you want? Even if it's just because, I wouldn't mind sourcing something to help." Sonya offered after a long moment of studying his expression.

Arming the brats with guns did not seem to be a wise idea to him. Ziven gave it more thought anyways, because even if he wasn't going to ask for firearms from the thief that didn't mean he had to turn down the offer.

Timur might be a stubborn little shit, so nothing in the way of luxury items his 'boys' can do without for a short while until they sourced it some other way, but… maybe…

The vor's gaze landed on a stack of polearms Sonya somehow had acquired, fetched up against a corner. "Think you can get me some serviceable weapons? Maybe a gun or two, but more like what you've got over there."

Her eyes flicked over to see what he was pointing at. ". . . I'll see what I can do."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 20th of April, 1969 continued. Karachi, Sindh, Islamic Republic of Pakistan)

Cherep cautiously looked around, then kicked the engine giving one of the ride operators massive trouble with his steel toed boots as hard as its steel could stand.

The clunky thing choked on its own intake, but finally spluttered to life again.

He made note it needed to be pulled apart and really cleaned as he hauled himself out of the service hatch and spoke German to the man waiting on him. "There you go, Safak. I'll check it again once you're done for the night, but I at least know the gasket isn't going. Something in there is clumping together that shouldn't. I'll know more tomorrow."

The swarthy man sighed thankfully, moping at his receding hairline with his ever present if stained handkerchief. "I was worried you might not be able to do it this time."

"She might be old, but not out yet." Quipped the part-time mechanic good naturedly, kicking his toolbox lightly to edge it away from the opening he had just crawled out of. "But... if it's what I think it is, it's going to be expensive to fix."

If a kick did the job, when caulking the casing hadn't helped, then it was an internal problem. Might be something with the pistons, the crankshaft, or even the case itself.

Worst possible option?

Metal shavings from one or another fouling up the oil.

If an hour or two of running idly didn't choke it up again, then probably nothing that dire. Might impact the operator's intake a fair bit but was safer than it breaking down mid-ride.

Safak lowered the heavy metal grate that kept curious fairgoers from getting into the dangerous insides of his portable carnival ride, padlocking the thing so no mischief was possible. "I think we will probably miss you the most, if you insist on continuing with your plans for next year."

"Hell yeah I'm still going." Cherep was going to do a world tour as Skull de Mort, he was almost impatient for next year to come around already.

Master Liam had already signed off on it, and he'll even still have a spot with the Großes Volksfest the year after when he got back.

He did feel slightly sorry for leaving the circus in a bit of a bind with having to hire a temporary mechanic they probably wouldn't like as much for a year, but not enough to decline a talent scout that wanted to see where Cherep could take his stunt driving solo.

Sonya might bitch at him when she heard, but he had put in the effort to be sure it was entirely legal and upstanding before agreeing. Not quite as well as he could when Viper poked their nose into things for him, but well enough.

He had even popped into the underworld in England’s Cambridge to check things out, and in there no news was good news so it wasn’t likely it was criminally motivated.

Of course, it didn’t mean there was no motivation behind some Englishman’s sponsoring of a ‘Russian’ stuntman’s act but that was probably purely money motivated.

Cherep didn’t rightly care much, he’d get to do what he loved to do for an entire year and possibly get paid on top of that. The reputation was what was important, and with that he could stop worrying about his shady past coming back to haunt him.

"I’ll be right back." Said stuntman told the other man, ducking out of the operator’s booth and vaulting the railing. "I need to get some of this oil off before I smear it over something. Like my lunch."

Safak huffed a laugh, sinking down on his stool gratefully for while he watched his tilt-a-whirl’s engine gauges. "Take your time, I shall remain here."

Dropping to the ground, he took off for the performer’s tents where he had abandoned his lunch when the service call had reached him.

Before Cherep could start thinking of next year, there was a few things he really had to get around to this year. One was head back to Moscow for the summer break, if only to see his adorably grumpy nephew hopefully in a better mood and do his uncle-ly duties in riling the brat up for Sonya. The other was… well…

How, exactly, did one invite a gender-ambiguous friend over for Christmas with your… less than legal foster family?

Of course, in order for him to do the asking said friend had to actually show up.

A month or two wasn’t entirely odd for Viper to take between visits, the Mist had once taken three months to show back up utterly unrepentant for the worry it caused him. Fully aware that his friend was aware of the risks on their life or not, he worried damn it.

A lot, really. Cherep had only shallowly dipped into that life as a teenager, and both Sonya and Arseniy had kept him from the really nasty things. That didn’t mean he avoided hearing all about it.

He could tell himself that Viper was an adult and had Mist Flames powerful enough to really fuck someone over if they wanted… but it didn’t really help much.

The time he spent waiting at least let the stuntman plan out how to ask Viper to attend a family gathering for a holiday, but that just made him come back to his original thought.

How?

Viper wasn’t really someone that liked a lot of fuss, and Lisa would fuss. Gleefully. Probably roping Tatiana in on it somehow, through those bewildering female communication lines that were indecipherable for any male. Sonya would probably blink a few times, equally as baffled.

Arseni would… probably get very drunk instead of deal with it.

Ooh, what would Valera do?
Probably throw a fit at attention getting pulled from him, he was a very demanding little toddler.

Cherep realized he was going absolutely nowhere with his original thought, so tried to pull his wandering attention back to the problem at hand.

"Oh, Cherep!"

Damn, BAIL!

The problem with dating within a close knitted group like a wandering circus was that your ex could find you just about everywhere. Ivanna was one of the trapeze girls, one who had been rather cold and snippy to his little sister at first that he had only recalled after the first time they got into a petty fight.

Jaq maybe had to remind him, but at least the ebony skinned strong-man hadn't seemed too amused at the oversight. Faris had laughed his ass off enough for all of them, anyways.

Cherep would maybe admit to breaking things off with her because of that behavior she had to his sister, but frankly if the two ever met outside the circus he was pretty sure Ivanna wouldn't survive with her dignity intact. Then he'd hear about it, from both women.

"Ivanna, lovely to see you again." His smile probably looked a bit strained, but at least in the middle of the lanes between the various tents she couldn't do anything too bad.

"I'm pretty sure these are yours." The woman claimed, holding up a pair of-

"Ooh, I was wondering where those got to." Purple, black, and white drawstring pants. Part of his Christmas gift from Sonya a few years ago. "Err… thanks."

She merely looked highly amused as she pitched the cloth at him, tossing her rather pretty gold curls over her shoulder with a smooth movement. "I'm sure. You don't have to run, Cherep. I don't bite… hard."

Right… that was the other reason he broke things off rather quickly. Ivanna was rather petty when things didn't go her way. His favorite pair of lounge pants now had oil streaks on them.

Probably still mad at him, then. "Yes… thank you. I'm going to go… finish my lunch."

Cherep edged out of there as fast as he could, mostly so he could try to salvage the cotton before any stains set in.

"You could have interrupted. I wouldn't have minded."

"You might not have… mou, but I think she may have." Viper observed idly as she swept out from a nearby tent to join him, a wicked looking smirk on the Esper's visible lower face. "No 'Hi Viper, it's good to see you'?

"Hi, Viper. It's good to see you." Cherep deadpanned back, trying and probably failing to keep the amusement out of his voice. "You've been gone a while."

"I was doing a little something, then your sister had a favor she wanted." The Mist informed him blandly, tugging off her cowl because while it wasn't hot it was rather muggy. "Frankly, I'm still dealing with her little favor, but I needed a break."

"Which sister? I have two."
"The oh-so touchy one."

Kind of odd, Viper didn't tend to discuss her business with him normally. Maybe because it was Sonya this time? "Oh really?"

"She has me instructing her little Lackey in how to manage money, in return for some non-specific aid."

Oh, poor Bjørn. The stuntman blinked a few times as he ducked into his tent, shared with the other mechanics, as his eyes adjusted to the darker interior. "I wonder if I should get a bank account somewhere."

"Yes, you should." Viper snapped, hovering near the entrance because she didn't like staying in any of the tents very much when she was around. "Mou, what the hell have you been doing with all your money?"

"I keep it in a box."

"...please tell me you're joking."

Nope, it was in a strong box Liam kept for him. However, he wasn't that stupid to tell the money-grubbing Mist where his funds were kept. He needed that if Betsy ever broke down or ended up in pieces due to his stunt work. "Entirely possible. I don't get off for a couple hours yet, Vips. So, do you want to fetch lunch for us? Someone ate mine."

Probably one of the other mechanics who had to bolt for another engine breaking down somewhere. Cherep would likely find out tonight, when whoever it was apologized and paid him probably twice what it was worth.

Viper would be proud, not that he was going to tell her because then she'd demand a cut.

Somehow, he'd end up agreeing to it too.

Said Esper held out a demanding hand, making a 'gimme' motion when he merely grinned at her while slumping to his cot and digging out something to remove grease and oil from cloth he kept on hand.

"No, not doing this again. I'll pay you back, but you're going to have to show the receipt for how much is my share first."

"...I think I liked it better when you were gullible, mou."

"You want to come over for Christmas?" He wasn't ever going to figure it out by worrying about it, even if just blurted it out made him want to smack himself. "We do it the first week of the New Year, and there's a hotel nearby if you don't want to sleep over."

Viper stared at him for a long moment. "...I'll think about it."

"That's what you said about taking a spin on my bike." Cherep all but cheered, because he had gotten the Mist on his bike for a mile. She'd demanded to get off pretty quick, but that was more of an 'I'll try' from his friend than a 'no'.

She hunched her shoulders a little, scowling at him. "We're eating something expensive, and you're paying the entire bill."
Eh, worth it.
"Get into a damn line and stay close. If you get lost here, I'm not coming back to fetch any of you."

Sonya snapped over one shoulder, to the pack of various Flame users bobbing along in her wake.

She had felt like a damn mother duck herding them along, with all her little ducklings in a row and following her. She didn't really appreciate the feeling.

Old man Zolotov eventually agreed to the proposed trade between their thieves' clan and the Mafia Land hospital, and since the next one heading that way was the Storm-Cloud herself she got stuck with babysitting the entire collection until she could hand them over to Tatiana or some other representative of the hospital.

Well… most of the collection, they had no Lightnings in the group.

Finding a semi-decent place to set up while they waited for the next leg of their journey to start, with just enough seats open so she wouldn't hear any bitching, the thief gestured for the gaggle of teens to seat themselves.

Behind her came Avdotya the Inverted Storm, Raisa and Stella the Classical Rains with their Inverted fellow Traiko, and Edik the Classical Necromantic Sun.

The two that weren't on her list to be taken with her were Klavdia the Inverted Sun and Sergej the Mist. The thief was pretty sure the Mist was along just because Usov had paired him with the Sun intending on becoming a mortician to hide his undead Activations. Klavdia was along for… Sonya didn't really know and didn't rightly care much.

She only thanked whatever deity was in existence here that Galina's Lightnings hadn't decided if one or more of them wanted to join in on the medical training being offered.

If she had to do this she might as well take all the damn brats at once, so she didn't have to do it again. Tatiana could come back and fetch any more.

She hadn't quite appreciated how much of a headache guiding seven teenaged Dying Will Flame users to a criminally run island currently in the middle of the middle of the Pacific Ocean.

There wasn't a land-water path she wanted to take this time, which did cut down the time she spent herding brats, but airport security kept asking her if she was on a school trip or some such bullshit.

Thankfully Mafia Land flights were billed publicly as intraregional flights, so at least her various brats didn't need to go through customs as well as domestic security. Since they had to go east instead of west, it also was less remarkable overall than taking a western flight to the Atlantic Ocean.

Each of the seven teens had their own little trail of luggage, and their carry-ons that held a day or two worth of necessities. The Storm-Cloud had seven little claim tickets for each of them, so they could get their stuff once they arrived.

While that might have cut down the amount of stuff Sonya had to keep track of, because since she was the adult they collectively decided she was the one to complain to even if she didn't want to hear it, that didn't mean they were getting along well.
Raisa and Stella were both fine with each other, but they didn't get along with Klavdia. While Raisa got along with Sergej Stella didn't, she preferred talking to Avdotya who only got along with the female Sun but was stiff with anyone else. Edik was apparently too hyper for Traiko, who also disliked each of the girls and refused to be even polite to any of the four. Klavdia got along with exactly no one but Sonya herself, not that she tried all that hard. Sergej would get along with almost all of them but one of the Rains, but he found poking them was more fun.

The thief had a migraine, and they hadn't boarded their plane yet.

Sonya carefully adjusted the light summer weight coat she had worn to stay dry in the early summer storm over the Sheremetyevo International Airport. Once her entire left arm was fully concealed, the thief summoned one of her axes to her hand and carefully placed the bladed edge on Traiko's thigh heavily enough that he could feel it sharply but not hard enough to actually cut him.

"I'm sure you could be a lab tech easily enough without these. Or even something a bit higher than this, if you really want to be a little bitch."

Paling rather sharply, the Inverted Rain spat a quick if insincere apology to Klavdia. The rose hair girl looked contemplative for a long moment, but eventually the Sun shrugged instead of making more of an issue over his behavior.

"I believe we've come to the end of her patience." Sergej mused aloud faux-seriously, tapping his fingers against his baby smooth chin. "And it's only been two hours so far."

"I wonder how we're ever going to survive another ten or more hours, trapped together in a tin can suspended in midair." Edik snuck a quick look at the Storm-Cloud's stubbornly blank face, then shared a grin with his assigned Mist support. Apparently, they had become decent friends in the last few weeks. "Or any more delays to our flight."

"In pieces if you all do not find something else to do than bicker."

Stella suddenly pulled a thick paperback out of her backpack, snagging a glossy magazine to toss in Raisa's face before she could say anything. The lone Mist observed her actions clinically for a moment, then copied her actions but with Constructed journals Sonya was pretty sure would allow both Sergej and Edik to write messages to each other. Klavdia pretended to watch the board listing which flights were delayed was the most fascinating thing ever, even if Avdotya was charged with keeping an eye out for any changes.

Traiko gulped slightly, shifting and getting even paler when the ax posed over his thigh moved with him. "Bazanova? Can... you move your...?"

"Shut. The. Hell. Up."

"...yes ma'am."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 21st of April, 1969 continued. South beach, Mafia Land.)

"I'm kind of surprised they're all alive, actually."

Sonya snorted tiredly, stretching out a bit more on the towels Tatiana brought out so she could get some sun and fix her fading tan. She might need to touch up her tattoos this winter, if she kept getting enough sun. "Traiko was one more bitchy comment from becoming a paraplegic mid-flight. Or a eunuch."
Moving her mass of sopping wet red hair off her back, the nurse hummed absently. "Which one was he?"

"Rain, Inverted. The hospital can keep him, I don't want him back."

Not that she intended to stick around in the clan for the gaggle of bratty Flame users to finish their training. However, she was pretty sure the sullen teenager was probably one of the more damaged Rains. Bitchy, sexist, and probably entirely a typical example of a young Russian male.

With a sigh, the thief looked over at her sister. "What's the plan for the rest of the weekend?"

"Mainly? Testing if you can alter your immunity to be drugged and if it is easy or hard, then… well, if you can do it I'll sign off on you returning to our Fut Gar classes."

That held promise, but it also reminded the Storm-Cloud that she had to go pick up her own shipment. Where the hell was she going to store Fong's gift anyways?

…also, could Han-yue teach her anything about the various weapons that made it up?

The old bitch that ran the dojo Tatiana learned out of was a strict old woman, but the thief knew for a fact the naginata was considered an ancient Japanese noblewoman's weapon.

Sonya scowled slightly at the sky overhead. She was pretty sure Han-yue was actually Korean and not Japanese or Chinese. She could be wrong, she hadn't asked yet, but asking either question might end up being racist or something.

"…we could probably get a head-start, by trying to get me drunk." She was in fact looking forward to being able to get drunk again.

Although the immunity to alcohol trick was going to be kept for the odd drinking game or pumping individuals for information… and the possible suspicious drink or two.

Tatiana's head popped up, flashing a grin over at her. "Ooh, that's a lovely idea. You want to go out drinking or just buy a few bottles and stay in?"

Since she had discovered her hopefully temporary immunity to liquor, Sonya had abstained from visiting bars simply to drink. Wasn't much of a point if she couldn't get drunk, but the possibility to go back to that would prove to be some motivation to get the willpower to reign in her Storm Flames.

…did she ever pour the money she set aside for drinking into something else?

She didn't think so.

That was what?

Two-three years of interest on top of whatever she had in there since the circus?

Maybe Bjørn could tell her now.

"A bar, it's been a while."

Tatiana pushed herself upright, to a kneeling position in order to scan the boardwalk behind the sisters. "I know of a few around here…"

"Now?" Sonya had kind of intended to get in a shower and maybe find some pants before she went bar hopping again, not for them to go right this minute. Going drinking in bikinis kind of sounded
Also, she had no money on her. While pickpocketing was still an option, she would have to rely on her sister to pay unless she found a decently stupid criminal to rob.

"They're positioned around here expressly for those criminals escorting their families that don't particularly want to go swimming as well." The nurse informed her as she got up, kicking up the towel she had been sunbathing on to wrap around her hips. "And for those that would rather do something else than try the roller coasters."

The thief followed suit, absentmindedly wondering what kind of bar she was talking about. Sonya might actually like tavern-style ones, but Tatiana had a certain fondness for cocktail bars with the occasional lounge/dancing halls for variety.

Instead of taking the time to put on her sandals the Sun merely scooped them up and walked barefooted across the beach. Following her example with her own footwear, if only to not be left behind, the younger Russian elected to just carry her own towel than wear it.

There was, in fact, a tiki-style bar near one end of the boardwalk that Tatiana was headed to.

Sonya stopped before reaching the wooden walkway it had connecting it to the main beachside, using one of the torches as a support to at least slip on her sandals. Using the time to scope out the entire thatched-hut looking building, and the kind of people lingering either at the semi-crowded bar.

One of which the Sun neatly pickpocketed before placing an order of her own.

The thief smirked as she stepped up onto the walkway offered for bar patrons, since apparently the two of them had the same idea about how to pay for things when they had no pockets for money or purses with them. Apparently, her elder sister hadn't let her thieving skills fall much even if she was more focused on medical skills now.

"Here." Tatiana handed an entire green skinned coconut over, only one end sliced open enough to allow for a straw, a spoon, and a little umbrella to poke out. "Try this, and we'll work our way through their menu until either I'm tipsy or you are."

Dubiously, the thief took the offered drink as she followed the redhead into the bar for the shade from the late afternoon sun. She didn't think she liked coconut, or at least Rachel hadn't liked it much.

Maybe it was different now?

Given the slight height difference and the slighter bone structure she had now, she couldn't have the exact same body as in her last life.

The thief knew she still disliked mushrooms, but that was more of a texture thing than taste. Rachel hadn't liked the times she could get some coconut, but… also that had been dried and shredded stuff.

"Sonya?"

"Sorry, thinking." Testing how to turn off her Storm immunity was going to be more or less hit or miss until she understood what she was doing, but for right now… weren't coconuts brown?

Whatever it was, and Sonya could taste rum in the concoction with enough of a bite she was sure there was more, it was very different than the memories Rachel had of the nut. Sort of milky aftertaste dulled the burn of the liquor, and with rum that made for an interesting taste overall, but not as bad as she had been expecting.

Maybe fresh coconut was different than the dried stuff?

That was an interesting thought.

Had her tastes changed any from one life to the other?

While pondering that over, and how to allow herself to take in what was functionally a poison willfully while taking a few more sips of whatever it was her sister had given her, the thief turned her attention back to the others frequenting the bar.

Tatiana had to resupply her three separate times before Sonya hit on a way to do more than appreciate how her liquor tasted, a browner nutshell drink that had more alcohol than coconut milk that told Sonya she didn't like the older and firmer coconut flesh as was served in a sweeter drink that came in a mason jar.

The two of them traded off who was pickpocketing the money each round, meaning for some very contrived reasons to wander the length of the bar.

She was pretty sure willing herself to get drunk would be the easier than letting herself get sick from a vaccination or succumbing to sedation. Having only half-recalled sensations of getting tipsy to go by, and of slamming beer down just to avoid tasting it for long, it took a while for her to start thinking it was working.

By then, the sisters had wandered up to the actual highly polished teak bar and picked seats near one end for the privacy and the space to scope out further targets for drinking money. It also had a rather impressive view of the waterfront and was tucked neatly away out of sight from the two entrances to the bungalow inspired bar.

Sonya finally found the lit lamps used for interior lighting rather annoying with how much they flickered as the sun started setting, around the point she was firmly sure she might possibly be slightly tipsy, giving an absent nod to Tatiana when she announced a food run.

They had skipped dinner to start in on drinking.

Unfortunately, that left the tiny blonde woman drinking at a bar alone in a skimpy swimsuit.

The thief found out what was wrong with that quickly after her usual people-buffer had waltzed off to find them something better than bar snacks to eat.

The bars of Mafia Land sold cigarettes both in packs and individual ones, and since the nurse was off elsewhere Sonya had bought a single one to have while she had the time. The lack of a lighter was no issue for her, but before she could even light up a blue silk clad arm offered her a lit zippo.

Said man in blue silk dress shirt leaned up against the bar and gave the bemused Storm-Cloud a smirk, still holding his lighter. "A lovely lady like you shouldn't be drinking alone. Why don't I join you?"

"My sister will be back shortly, then I will no longer be alone." She dismissed, using her own Storm Flames for her cigarette instead of taking his offer. "So, no, thank you."

"Aww, little lady. Don't be like that." The man looked over to the two wide open entrances in the bar then back at her. "Sisters, huh? Perfect."
"Can you get lost?" The thief snapped, not sure what he was after and not happy he was so interested in the missing Sun. She really only had so much time with her sister and didn't want any interruption to what she would get. "Or at least go somewhere else?"

"Am I bothering you? Very sorry." He pushed off the bar, flicking the unwanted lighter closed and slipping it into a pocket. "How about I buy you a drink as an apology?"

Sonya examined her drink through the smoke, which was getting a little low. While she might trust Tatiana's taste in liquor, she wasn't sure about accepting a drink from some random guy she didn't know.

Something fruity and peach colored was set down next to her almost empty mason jar of milky coconut rum. Whatever it was looked more tooth-rotting than what she had.

"Here, on me."

The bartender looked highly nervous, hovering nearby only to be flatly ignored by her rather persistent irritant.

"You are new here, right?" Sonya asked blandly, pushing the unwanted fruity thing away from her with one finger and hooking an ashtray to replace it. "It is not generally accepted to harass people you do not know, especially not here. Occasionally, they turn out to be rather dangerous."

"What, you got a boyfriend?" Apparently, her continued dismissal had at least irritated him back in return as his question was just on the side of snide. "Going to threaten me with him?"

A click of a gun's hammer cocking wasn't a rare sound around here, but then the asshole's head was forced forward a little as Renato pressed the barrel of his favored pistol against the side of his head. "Actually, she has a hitman for a friend she can threaten you with."

"Not that I need to." Poking one last time at the fruity cocktail she was pretty sure she didn't want got the bartender to take it back. "But I appreciate the offer of your services, Renato."

"Look, man. I'm sorry. I didn't know she was your girl." The man in the blue shirt protested, looking both pale and queasy. "But maybe you shouldn't let her wander around alone like that."

"What kind of backwards-assed country did you just crawl out of?" Sonya asked sardonically around the filter of her cigarette, more than fed up with the jackass and his behavior.

'Let' her?

She had known that kind of thing was more common in this day and age, but she rarely if ever had it shoved under her nose like this.

Behind him, Renato didn't even look amused at the chauvinistic pig. "Nowhere of note, if that's how he thinks to behave in front of a lady. Maybe you should think about apologizing to her, before I blow out that sorry excuse of a brain from your head."

"The bartender does not deserve to have his bar painted in gore because he's an idiot," the Storm-Cloud informed the Sun drolly, "equally as much as he does not deserve to lose it to mass property damage due to the same reasons."

The look he shot her was strangely blank, slightly considering around the edges from what little she could read.
"Look, I apologized to you already." Baby mafia asshole informed the both of them sullenly. "I won't bother your little whore-"

Sonya winced when a compact Beretta hand-cannon fired not two feet from her right ear and swore colorfully in six different languages when his shot speckled her with flicks of hot gore as it splashed off the top of the bar she was seated at. "GOD DAMN it, Renato! If you were going to kill him, you could have taken him out of here first."

Her ears were ringing and wiping off her cheek showed she had gotten blood splatter on her face. That was disgusting and all over her.

What the hell was wrong with him?

Worse yet, there was blood in her liquor. Even as she watched, her milky rum something was turning a delicate shade of pink. The splatter had gotten on her cigarette too unfortunately, a nice fat droplet had hit the filter. The thief spent a moment mourning her lost chance for possibly seeing if nicotine could work for her under the nurse's nose, then stubbed out her only just started smoke.

"Well, I feel better." The asshole she called a friend drawled out after a moment of contemplation, the tininess to his voice probably just her hearing recovering, huffing out a breath hard to blow off the smoke creeping out of the barrel. He kicked the fresh corpse as he holstered his weapon, which made the dead body slumped off the bar with a wet smack in response. "Good evening Sonya, I had hoped to get a minute to talk to you."

"Fuck… well, you can wait then. You also owe me and Tats new drinks and I'm still waiting for that pack of cigarettes you owe me." Sloughing off the worst of the mess now dripping on her thighs before it could clot and make her skin sticky, Sonya also checked to ensure there weren't any skull fragments on her before she could get stuck by one. She didn't know where the dead asshole had been, and she didn't want to risk anything. "Stay here in case my sister comes back, I am going to take a fast dip to wash this off."

"Two seconds. I need you in Italia come June sixth, or even earlier if you could." Renato spoke up as she got off her barstool, flicking the empty containers the Russian sisters had gone through then flashed the still apprehensive bartender two fingers in order to get himself something different. "For the ah… well, graduation."

For what?

…Shamal's graduation?

Elementary schools had graduations?

Whatever, probably a good idea to be early for his summer vacation visit to Moscow. She supposed he wanted her to coordinate the trip, since it wasn't really likely he had done more than surface things in the Soviet Union since he would've stuck out a bit to the underworld there.

Odd… did he know already how well the bratty Mist did in his classes?

"Fine." Easy enough she thought as she turned to leave the bar, two months then head to the Iron Fort.

Picking a mostly blood-free way around the corpse on the floor, the Storm-Cloud only got another foot away from him.
"I'll inform your sister and your Lackey, just so you can remember to show up on time." He shot at her over one shoulder with a smug little smirk as the bartender poured him some whisky.

She stole it before he could reach for the tumbler, emptying it like a shot and slamming the glass down again. It needed to be pried out of a little depression before the bartender could get a new tumbler for the hitman.

"...deal with the corpse for the man behind the bar, my sister and I intend to eat here." She was going to hear about that for years, but she probably deserved it.

Rolling his eyes at her, the hitman stole the wallet off his kill and pulled out more than enough euro bills to both pay for his tumbler and refill of straight whisky and the bullet hole he put in the bar's rather handsome wood, snagging the leg from his fresh kill to do as she asked as he headed for the opposite exit than where she was heading. "You fight with melee weapons, like you've never covered yourself in blood before."

"Given how rarely I have to kill?" Sonya shot back as she left him to it, still disgruntled with the entirely unwanted and literal bloodbath. "Less than you think. I have polearms for this exact reason."

Noting that absolutely no one was particularly concerned by the fact the Italian Mafioso had just shot someone in the head and was dragging his corpse through the bar, the thief descended the few steps to get back on the beach. Rather unmolested for a change by uninformed people brushing past her, but that might have to do with the gore she was flecked with.

A good thing her bikini was red, otherwise it would've ended up irreparably stained from this.

It probably wasn't the first death on the island that night, nor would it even be the first or last in the bar either. Killing happened often enough for the bar-goers and the people out late that they didn't care that it had happened again.

She might be a little concerned that the hitman had shot someone right next to her, but mostly because Renato had habit of keeping violence away from her normally. Even when he had an excuse, he normally waited until she was gone. The time she had been with him when some idiots tried ambushing him for example.

Disturbingly, despite her disgust with how it happened so close to her, she also felt better now that the asshole that had been bothering her was dead.

Renato's issues could hold for a minute, what the hell was wrong with her?

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 21st of April, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

Apparently, Viper's lessons for Bjørn had included how to launder money before the Mist decided to take a week-long break. 'For his nerves' according to the hapless student.

Sonya didn't begrudge the other for taking time off, two weeks of constant instruction to the same student was something she was pretty sure she couldn't do without attempting or committing homicide.

As she had mostly wanted at the least, her Lackey was very nicely caught up with her accounts and how much was in each for what reasons. She even had a supply of more-or-less-legal money now, cleaned of the transaction history any bank or enforcement agency could track it through.
Not a whole lot, because without Viper there to okay whichever venture or investment her Lightning-Storm Lackey was being super careful of what he poured her money into or how he cycled investments so she would at least get back half or more of what he put into them.

Considering the price hike for using dirty money on the island compared to clean funds used to buy things elsewhere, it wasn't a bad transaction for her. The Storm-Cloud might be getting less back, but she could use it in more places without worry.

She caught up with him about it, apparently in the time he was spending keeping track of various investment opportunities for his miser of an instructor to prevent 'stupidity fees', in a business block of an office that made her feel out of place once she stepped inside. It was a very hyper-modern looking bank office, or stock trader's office, that screamed posh-ness to her thief-sensibilities.

She caught herself thinking of how to break in and steal shit on her short walk through the building several times. From the look the little secretary girl kept giving her from the far side of the meeting room she met her Lackey in, she was apparently already known to be a thief and they were watching her.

White collar crime was something she didn't have good skills in, so while she could probably fake belonging she didn't see much of a point if they already knew she didn't. Björn seemed to belong with his new clothes and absent acceptance of what was around him, so at least her more casually dressed presence was going on unremarked.

Since this was also a Mafia Land service, breaking and entering the building just because probably wouldn't be looked upon kindly. Even if the stares made her want to steal something and make away clean just to stick it to them.

The thief was rather idly pouring through various manila folders with investment prospects as her nervous Icelandic minion laid out what he had done under Viper's tutorship for her and why he did this or that.

She was more than a little distracted, because this was the first time she had seen him in a suit and tie. A rather understated and dark grey, with red tie and a light green dress shirt.

Ever since the kid, teen really but she would probably forever call him 'the kid that followed me home' in her mind, had finally gotten himself attached to her he had favored well-worn but comfortable clothing. Casual like sweaters and pullovers on jeans or trousers, or a tee shirt with shorts if it was uncomfortably warm for his northern blood.

Björn had forgotten to shave for about two weeks, he had a scraggily ass beard growing in. It was neat for all it was a patchy growth yet, and the sixteen-year-old blond didn't seem too bothered by the bush growing on his face.

The she tuned back into what he was saying and started a little in surprise.

"…wait, what?"

"Erm… it turned into the Woodstock Ventures, Incorporated." Her Lackey scrambled to assemble the information he had available, handing it over to her instead of what he had in hand already to show her. "One of the more risky things, a new business that started up earlier in the year. They're… err, not accepting any more investors Dama. I passed it up at the time since it seemed a little… the word is sketchy, yeah?"

Yeah… Sonya didn't much care if they were or not. That wasn't the point of her asking for clarification in the first place.

Woodstock?

The music festival?

The damn near legendary music festival that exceeded all expectations and would never be held again?

Huh… she totally forgot about that was to happen.

Tatiana would probably murder her if she knew it was going to happen but passed up the event for whatever reason. Especially if she might be able to take the nurse there. Frankly, since some of her current favorite performers were supposed to be playing, the thief wouldn't mind going just to say she had been there too.

Cherep might like it as well, but that was more questionable if he could attend.

Fall, right?

Possibly three or more days in a row, she couldn't really remember too well. Fall started early in Russia, so it was possible he might have the time.

Maybe they could all go if Sonya got them warning to clear some vacation time early enough?

She had the school… fuck. Galina could take it for a weekend early in, right?

Better to halve the work for it then, so the Lightning would be better fit to take care of anything that cropped up.

…wasn't the event a really down-to-earth type?

The town of wherever it was held, someplace in New York, hadn't had the supplies or services to keep up with a massive pack of hippies that converged on the… field?

Hadn't it been held in a field?

There had been a lake and a lot of mud from Rachel's memories of hearing about the event. That really didn't help a lot, but maybe she could plan for it happening anyways.

Getting two or three Russians into the US of A might be a headache but hiding them in a crowd as large as this might become would be easy as long as they could get rid of Russian accents and adopt another. Actually attending a music festival that lasted longer than a day would be another stress all its own… but Sonya really wanted to try to attend with her siblings.

It had been a while since all three of them could spend time together. Not since Tatiana had left home, excluding Christmas time, had they managed it.

Point being, she really wanted to try at least.

First thing first, was scoping it out to ensure it was what she thought it was. Mostly to get the details if it was the music festival she thought it was for. "Continue, Bjørn."

The Storm-Cloud let his slightly less nervous rambling wash over her as she leafed through what information had made it to Mafia Land. She puzzled over the location the information held, 'Wallkill' wasn't a city she had ever heard of before and wondered if it really was what she thought it would be.

However, it was nineteen-sixty-nine, and the venture was billed as a 'Woodstock Festival'. It was possible the venue had changed and this hadn't been updated, she thought wherever it had been held started with a 'B', especially if the people running this were no longer accepting investors. Even more likely, what she remembered was a last-minute change and it would happen where she thought it would anyways.

...if that bit of history was unchanged.

Was it likely any mafia presence in America would change anything about a hippy music festival? It shouldn't be like the Vongola-euro issue, right?

"-ama? Dama Sonya?"

"Yes?" Pulling her attention from fragments of half-forgotten memory and trying to make them make sense, the thief focused back on her Lackey. "What?"

"Err... Viper's bill. It is... steep. Already." He pulled an itemized list out for her from his stacks of paperwork, hesitantly giving it over like he expected her to be angry over it.

Sonya barely gave it a glance, and certainly didn't take it. "That is nice, be sure to pay the Mist quickly so he keeps teaching you."

"...Dama?"

"I do not care how much this will cost. If we start to run out, tell me so I can supply Viper with more money. You will eventually make up for what you are costing me," she gave him a pointed glare over the top of her folder, to ensure he knew that was what he should be doing with his free time, "later. For now, your job is to learn and learn quickly so you can put it to use."

Additionally, so he could also go back to picking out her contracts for her. Sonya would do it herself this next go-around, but that had better be the last time. He had at least kept up with possible good ones to give her a list of, even if none really appealed to her to skip out to do.

A negative balance still, but the prospect of her Lightning-Storm Lackey earning enough to pay his own way was still tempting to try for. She could deal with a dip for right now, she wasn't exactly spending a whole lot outside of her own hotel bill and food expenses.

"I'll... keep... this for my own records then." Bjørn retracted the scorned list, shuffling it into his papery pile with a mixed expression of relief and exasperation.

Sonya was more interested in wondering how to manufacture an excuse to visit the United States, so she could scope out this tidbit, than what he was doing.

Maybe she should look for another lucrative contract real quick near New York?

Somewhere in the area, so she could at least understand if this was a false alarm or what. A heist or two shouldn't take her more than a few days, planning and actual stealing of random shit aside, so a week break sometime in the next month would be needed.

She could also start in the States, then fly over to Europe to handle Bjørn's mother's jewelry, and then finish off her second attempt at cramming ten or so heists in a month's time.
Also… where was Cherep in acquiring his 'Skull de Mort, the Immoral Stuntman' fame?

Did a few acts cancel their Woodstock appearances?

Could her brother make up an act or show to put on with limited time and supplies?

Hmm… way too many questions, not enough answers.

Luckily, the folder of information on 'Woodstock Ventures, Inc.' also had a clipping for the ad taken from some newspaper from the feel of it. Sonya would advise her siblings to free up the dates included in a clipping from the magazine and send for tickets for all three of them for all three days, but she had some major scouting to do before telling either what it was about.

Mafia Land information brokers were apparently not the type to do things halfway.

The proposed dates where there, August fifteenth through the seventeenth, where it might not be held was listed, and the slogan '3 Days of Peace & Music' were all fitted in a black and white glossy ad page. It also gave the address to send money for tickets, even if Sonya thought the damn thing had been free when it was hosted in Rachel's memories.

The part that sold her was the little bird perched on a guitar's neck, an image she vaguely recalled from Rachel's memories ended up the iconic image of Woodstock. It had its place next to the tag line calling for peace and music, in sharp black and white.

"…Björn, I need an American post box."

"A-ah? …alright?" Her Lackey looked entirely bewildered at her behavior.

She gave him an entirely bland smirk, which was probably of no help whatsoever. "I want tickets to this thing. Three of them for all three days."

Sonya tapped the folder before handing it back.

"And keep an ear out for what is going on with it. Please."

---

(Tuesday the 22nd of April, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Lose seven Dying Will Flame trainees, gain thirty-five more. In just a few days.

A range of ages, so not entirely all children or preteens wandering in. Small mercies.

Sonya scowled at the pages of information Galina had handed her the moment she got back into the office.

There had to be another Sky somewhere, some of the newcomers didn't originate from within the Moscow oblast anymore. If it was radiating influences from the one known Sky and his Sky possible offspring or the influence of a new Sky in the country was debatable, but the fact was that emergence of Flame users had sharply spiked for some reason.

Probably in reaction so she wouldn't likely find the reason until another such spike happens again and she can compare what was going on.
Whoever it was, if it was a new Sky, he or she was unknowing and probably not actively using their Flames. Probably had their near-death experience to awaken it but didn't have a reason to keep on pulling.

The only other explanation was one of the kids of their known Sky popped with Flames, but she should've gotten at least a report on that.

Right?

"Erm… Bazanova?" Irinei flinched when she flicked her gaze to him but gathered his courage to clear his throat and continue on with what he wanted. "Yanovna wanted to know what she should do with the Rain from the Khovrino Association. Apparently, they've been… err, bad-mouthing you. A lot."

"Like you and your little fellows did to her already?" Galina snipped at him bitchily. "How galling, someone else doing what you did, just better. I've heard the same rumors, Sonya, about an 'uppy little bitch running things' here."

The thief seated behind a desk pinched the bridge of her nose.

Scruffy gave a little uncomfortable cough behind Andrei, his fellow Sun looked as exasperated as he looked uncomfortable.

Usov merely snickered, which echoed Mikhail's smirk but with less of a sneer. The Mist teen made a Construct of a thunderbolt somehow chasing rain float over the Lightning's and Rain's heads. Purely for his own amusement, apparently.

Sonya tried to breathe normally and told herself that beheading her 'command team' was a bad idea. Repeatedly. In nine different languages.

It didn't help much.

"So." Andrei clapped his hands together and turned to her with a rather fixed smile on his face. "Five new Suns, three of which are very interested in medical courses rather than criminal training. One is well over the age of consent, and he… ah, took off the moment a non-criminal path was suggested. He's likely already on his way to your sister."

…fuck. The asshole could've at least taken the Lightnings with him. Please let another 'adult' be ready to go so she wouldn't have to escort the brats herself.

"Somehow, hopefully, he'll get there on his own. I don't think the fact of where such training was taking place was made clear to him."

Staring at him flatly, the Storm-Cloud barely resisted the urge to palm her face. Really?

Andrei's expression remained in his plastic smile, which was becoming rather strained as Mikhail's snickering became more audible. "Otherwise, the four remaining new Suns are getting caught up to the rest of us at a respectable pace."

What, exactly, was a 'respectable pace' for a Sun?

The speed of light?

"I have thirteen new Lightnings." Galina picked up after a beat of silence, side eyeing their so-called 'boss' strangely. "Two of which would like to join up with the other three that expressed interest in the medic's courses now available. Finally."

Mikhail finally decided to grace her with his report. "Seven new Storms, to replace that one you took off me. One of which comes from the Kozlov Brotherhood. He at least seems somewhat competent, unlike the little girl that left."

Sonya should not behead her current lead for the Storms. She didn't have the time, nor the inclination, to teach a pack of brats herself. And with Avdotya's leaving, she had no other Storms in a teenager's age range to take over for any asshole and sexist Storm she was not going to name.

"Six new Mists." Usov, blessedly useful and helpful Usov piped in. "I lost one to your sister yes, but only one of the new Mists have prior connections to any syndicate. A minor one, but she seems intent on returning to them once she stops conjuring rainbows everywhere."

"…and the last four are?"

The lone Rain in her borrowed office coughed sheepishly. "Three are more Rains, I… err… didn't say that."

Sonya gave him another flat stare. Yanovna could not get her spine fast enough for her. "Then the last one?"

…okay that wasn't too terrible, and it was more likely to see wolves at all near the edges of Moscow so she supposed she could see why they had that name, but that was half the city away.

South and a little… maybe west of her?

Between her, the Khimki Cloud, and now this new one, they had the entire western side of Moscow. That was what?

About forty kilometers between the edge of Dorokhov's and this new one's probable territory. Twenty-five miles, in other words, in diameter for any one Cloud.

Probably not entirely made up from one of three different Cloud's picked land, but given the range?

Hopefully there was a buffer zone of sorts between them, otherwise having more than five Clouds in any one spot would be damn impressive.

Which made her think of the Varia, and of Vongola's previous record of six Clouds in one Christmas party. Was that supposed to have been an impressive feat she didn't pay attention to?

"This new Cloud isn't coming here, right?" If there was a new one, attention would fall less harshly on her Khimki Cloud when his continued survival was discovered.

She just… had to handle this delicately. If she could show that getting a Cloud some instruction paid off better than idiots trying to collar one…

"No, we were passed along a request for… a visit from you."

The Lightning sounded hesitant, and rightly so.

Sonya sighed heavily. "Unless they want us to kill each other, bad idea. Tell them to locate an empty field outside of their Cloud's normal patrolling range for me to teach him whatever I can."

She nodded thoughtfully, making a note of it on a notebook she stole off the thief's desk. "I'll see that it's passed along."

Mikhail snorted again.

Giving the asshole Storm a fixed smile of her own, the thief wondered how to contain whatever sexist behavior he might be spreading through the Storms. "Mikhail, I need you to start thinking of who can replace you. Your help has been exceptional, but you really are past the point to get started on the rest of your career. Use the next year or two to train someone up so you can become an example of a competent Flame using vor for the rest of them."

'Better than the Rains' went unsaid, but probably not unheard from how red Irinei went.

Someone had been insulted in the process of being complimented, so the Storm she was addressing puffed up as his vanity was stroked. "Will do."

Usov made some very convincing motions as if he was getting up to leave, which had the irritating Storm walking out of the office before anyone else could. The Mist waited a beat, but then sat back down. "Looking to replace him?"

"Preferably quickly." Which wasn't possible, not with someone at least half-trained given the status of things. "I'll settle with knowing who to work on to get someone less irritating. You have my apology, Irinei. But it was either that or throwing an ax at him."

The Rain blinked, probably shocked he got anything out of her about it.

"I still have a point." Galina informed him archly, clicking her pen before turning on one two-inch heels to follow Mikhail out so things would seem less suspicious. "I'll be right back, Sonya. I need to place a call."

"Are we done for the week?" Andrei asked in the silence the Lightning's bitchy comment earned on her exit. "I have a few dozen Suns going unsupervised right now."

"I have nothing for you right now if you have no outstanding issues. Scruffy, stay a moment." Ignoring the slight face the man pulled at the nickname, Sonya looked at both Usov and Irinei. "Usov, thank you. But if you need nothing for your own efforts I have nothing else for you either. Irinei... when will Yanovna start taking over to free you up for the school effort?"

By the grimace that painted itself across his face, apparently not any time soon.

"Allow me to rephrase that. Yanovna has two more weeks to grow a spine, then I need you on the teaching crew more than you help her. Keep going to help replace the bartender all you want, but that shouldn't be your entire day."

The Mist teen's snort was audible as he walked out of the office.

With a sigh of his own, the beanpole like Rain nodded as he smoothed a hand over his stubble. "I'll... figure something out."

The teenaged Sun gestured for him to leave before him, leaving only Sonya and Scruffy alone in the office.

"How well can you understand me now?"
"The... Mist Flames have worn off." Peter McScruffy admitted slowly in clumsy but passable Russian. "I have... need... of practice still."

"Fair enough. You will get it in enough time here." The thief managed a slightly more real smirk for the man. "Two, three more years here. What do you want to do after that?"

"...is this a trick question?"

"No, I would really like to know. If I can make use of your aims in my goals, I will fund whatever it is." It had been something she had thought of between seeing Galina make more serious plans for the future and where Bjørn was in learning money laundering. "Preferably while you finish what I need warm bodies for."

She'd have the money to fund almost anything on her next spree, and if it really got down to it she could go on another jewel hunt.

Scruffy gave her a skeptical look for a long moment, then glanced out her borrowed office's window. "...where's the catch?"

"Catch?"

"You pulled me from hell. Got me to a hospital. Admittedly I demanded you to do it, but I figured you would make use of me however you wanted." The man turned back to her, suspicion plain on his face. "You don't want the jewel cutting skills I have? The cartel that had me before kept me for them."

"Are you offering?" Sonya hadn't known that, actually.

Gem cutting?

Was cutting diamonds different than other gems?

"If you do not want to, I will not force you. There are ways around needing you do it."

Still wary, the Sun fidgeted in place before getting up to pace off his nervous energy. "I hadn't thought of it."

"Understandable." Sonya wasn't the chattiest Cloud, but maybe she really should've had this discussion before.

She had little objections to using Bjørn as she needed, but the Icelander had pushed himself forward to the point she would. Using Scruffy like that did the man a disservice, he wasn't her Lackey but his own man.

"Think on it, please. I can make better use of you if you enjoy what you do and keep you out of what you would not like to do easier if you have specific limits."

His movements swung back around until he was facing her again. "...can I see the information you're compiling?"

"Why?" Sonya wasn't against the man reading through it, a new perspective might actually help them make new sense of it all.

Scruffy was also hip deep in the mafia life since he came with her, so it wasn't likely the information would fall into the wrong hands if he had a glance or two over it.
Peter was going to snap something off quickly, reconsidered his words for a moment, and then went back to pacing. "I would guess no one, or very few people, have access to the information you've got. Which means what can be done with it isn't well understood. You made your weapons into portable versions, Galina has those… nails. You're selling matching people to certain types into a business. I think… I would like… to see what else can be done with it."

"…fair enough." It really took a fair amount of her time up, so if he wanted to take that and free her up around five or so hours a night he could. She would be keeping an eye on him while he did so, but… "Fine. So long as you stay in this office, and pitch in with sorting the information correctly, you may see what you make of it."

Scruffy came to a sudden halt and whipped around.

"…I would like it if you can teach someone to keep track and help sort the newer information, so we might have more help in that as numbers rise." Really, why did she do it alone?

Galina made off in various ways when it came time to compile but given Dimitry probably left it to her in the early years when she hadn't been around it was understandable.

"And you may only speak Russian while you do so, for the practice."

"Right. Yes." Clearing his throat a few times, the Sun switched languages. "I, ah… understand more than speak."

"Noted." That wasn't much of an issue and forcing him to speak might help more than merely letting him hover over Andrei's shoulder. "As long as your reading is faster than your speech, it won't be a problem."

Waiting a beat just to be sure the man understood all that, the thief gestured him over.

"The information is hidden in several different locations. While the separate leaders of each training groups have their own sets of their respective information," Sonya fetched her much amended master research journal from the bottom drawer of her desk mostly so Peter had enough time to process her words, "I have a master copy. Actually, I have two. This one is this office's, mine is actually in Mafia Land."

She wasn't sure how much of that he understood, but apparently the bulk of it got across the fading language barrier well enough. Scruffy accepted the bound papers and cracked it open immediately.

"I will not demand anything from you about it, but if you can make anything from it I can use… I will either get you something that you want but isn't a necessity or help fund you to do whatever you might want to do."

Giving her an unreadable glance, the Sun retreated to the office couch in order to peruse the information she had so far.

The last thing Sonya had to do that day was Gedeon's pick list, now that the Flame leader meeting was over. Which, with a quick glance over, didn't seem too bad on paper.

Cross-referencing it with Galina's more detailed lists of who was which Flame user and how long they had been in training, she had to admit it looked promising on paper.

Obviously, a Sun lead in Gedeon himself. Two Storms, both male, as slotted to be trained as heavy hitters. A pair of… twinned Rains?
Interesting, she hadn't realized they had a pair of those. The twin Rains as something more surgical and clandestine, but both were male yet again.

A female Lightning, probably someone intended to end up like her own Lightning, and a female Sun tentatively listed as a healer. One last Mist, male again, probably just to round out the whole selection.

…it was going to implode.

Two Storms, and if he was really unlucky, of opposite Polarization?

If Gedeon wanted that one Lightning to end up like Sonya's bitchy Inverted… this was just all bad all over the place. A pair of Rains wouldn't always smooth things over, and they could get annoyed with others just fine.

Slap a hyper Sun somewhere in the middle and finishing it off with a contrary Mist?

Sonya bemusedly signed off on it. All of the names were newer, and the while the ages were on the high side for how young most Zolotov trainees tended to be, she could deal with this.

She needed to place some bets. Galina should know who was the bookie this year, right?

That team build was going to rip itself apart in a fast hurry. If she was lucky, in such a spectacular manner that Gedeon's second attempt would be less… grandiose.

If she was insanely lucky, he might admit he knew little about Flame users yet and seek more information.

She didn't think she would be, though. Pity.

Galina would have to keep watch for her… or Usov, someone to catch the teens and kids before they did something lethal to themselves out of frustration.

It was really the only part she didn't like about this plan, but ironically it held the lesser risks to it. Gedeon becoming Pahkan without understanding anything beyond the raw basics would mean some serious drawbacks to what Tatiana was doing and Valera's future as the Zolotov Cloud.

This wasn't ideal, but workable in the long-run than just letting things go on as it had.

---

(Wednesday the 23rd of April, 1969. San Francisco State College, San Francisco, California, United States of America.)

The bespectacled green colored man hunched over a bewildering collection of printouts and mechanical parts was very familiar to Adrik, so the other man was ignored while the vacationing Russian Mafiya member poked at the coffee maker plugged in a corner in hopes of acquiring free if terrible tasting caffeine.

The San Francisco State College computer lab was a beast of a thing, banks of ticking machinery up against two of the walls surrounding a few tables to work on. Blandly painted white only where metal broke up the beige eyesore, it looked even worse under fluorescent lightings to the point of eye searing.
Only one and a half of them were occupied, by the other man, so Adrik appropriated one on the opposite side of the room.

He knew that much, at least, about his lab partner. Incredibly picky about his work was one, which most ended up learning the first and only time they tried to interrupt him. Incredibly brilliant was another, but the Russian pickpocket only learned that after three months of sharing workspace with the other.

"Verde." Adrik didn't know what his real name was, he highly doubted anyone but his academic advisor knew. "Coffee?"

He got a wordless grunt in return, which he was taking as 'yes'. It normally was.

Clean mugs were a luxury, but there was always at least one favored expressly by certain students that traveled everywhere with them. The checkerboard one was his, but the acid green one was Verde's. Black for his lab mate, and cream with no sugar for him.

Adrik also got himself a dismissive green glance when he brought the scalding hot liquid over to the man. Quickly gaining some space, he didn't feel like getting verbally ripped into today, he went back to the technical issues Professor Kleinrock had assigned his class to hammer at.

ARPANET, in the Russian's opinion, was fantastic. He had so many ideas for how it could be built upon but working out the kinks in getting it working was a challenge of its own. Kleinrock was handling what was actually being used to transmit information to the other side of the country, but he was allowing his senior class of 'computer technicians and operators' to take their own crack at solving the issues he was coming up against.

Real world experience, without the issues of crushing expectations or time restraints. Which, in Adrik’s opinion, was a load of bull since they still had project deadlines but since the American was the one grading all the projects he could demand all he wanted as long as the Russian got what he wanted out of the course.

Thankfully it was easier to actually attend classes, now that the nearly yearlong student strikes and sit-ins had ended. Protests of the Vietnam War and some of the Ethnic Classes offered, not that Adrik paid much attention since he was illegally in the country and didn't intend to stay much longer.

It was resolved, either last month or the one before, and that was all he really cared about.

Nicolai would be getting out of jail in only a year and a half more, and the whole gang knew the plan of meeting back up in Moscow once their leader was free once more. He did wonder if Galina or Tatiana would return, but those two were more unlikely if he had to be honest.

"Adrik."

It took him a long moment to realize his normally silent lab-mate was addressing him, and looked up with a start when he really understood who was talking.

Verde had his coffee in hand, the rather haggard looking scientist dully eyeing the printout sheets draped over the Russian's workstation. "What are you doing?"

"You know the ARPANET collaboration? I've got one of the problems here, it crashed after two transmissions of a letter each. So, what they had worked, but... not well." Adrik had both the telephone calls and the timestamps when the transmissions were sent and when they were received, on top of a copy of the circuitry being used and a printout of the program doing the transmissions. "Want to take a crack at bettering the results? I don't think my professor will mind all that much."
Verde was about as brilliant as he was fickle, as he found out after the man's academic advisor bitched the unmoved green colored scientist out for changing his major yet again.

Apparently, the man had switched fields of scientific study as most men changed clothes. He kept studying and kept up with the newer findings in each sphere, but it was only whatever caught his attention that the man dedicated the most of his brilliance to furthering.

Probably why the other was almost midway through his twenties and still studying in college.

While that jumping around kept Verde in college without a degree to show for it yet, it also meant that the various professors wouldn't object to the green scientist poking his nose into their respective projects.

Everything went faster when Verde was involved.

Flicking his round glasses back up his nose, the man accepted what Adrik passed over.

It let the Russian see what he was working on, something in geology... or chemistry, related.

Both?

Blinking, he peered over the chemical lists for earthly elements. "Quartz has a chemical structure?"

"Everything does." Verde informed him blandly, pouring over the binary codes Adrik had supplied him with. "Atoms are the building blocks of everything, I can break down almost anything to a chemical formula with enough time."

"...including gems? Glassy rock formations?" There was that one thing still pending the Russian owed another.

Way back when Sonya had that thing with her jewels, which she taught to Tatiana and got passed to Galina. Did the jewel thief know her stones had chemical compositions?

Would that buy him some leniency for skipping out on her before replaying that favor he owed her for his Programma 101?

It was unfortunately outdated now, but actually having some experience with one had got him past some iffy situations at the start of his academic career in the States.

Erg, he still had to repay it but with the most modern example. Sonya had weaseled herself out of stealing him new computers for it too.

Adrik belatedly realized Verde was giving him a bug-eyed skeptical look through his glasses.

"For a... old childhood friend of a friend. She had a thing for jewels, but not because they were sparkly, what she could use them for." He wondered why he bothered caring what the scientist thought of his question, but... he was the longest lab partner the other man had so far. "I owe her something, and if so...

"...I'll give you a list, as long as you introduce me to your professor."

Ah, he was going to switch majors yet again. The man's advisor was going to scream at the Russian this time, but Kleinrock was going to be thrilled. "Sure. His office hours aren't for another three, so just familiarize yourself with that until he's in and we can go."

Score, his professor was probably going to let him co-op his project with Verde until the administrative paperwork was processed. Between him and the brilliant scientist, they should find something spectacular to hand in. Maybe even something that would end up used.

A faint ringing sound drew Adrik's attention outside their shared lab space, but Verde was already well distracted with the new information. Curious, and without anything to work on until the scientist had his own copies, the Russian wandered to the computer lab's door.

Adrik was, first and foremost, a criminal. Just past dawn, few witnesses around, he was always highly suspicious in the early mornings. He really couldn't help it, and the thoughts of how hard or easy it would be to rob his fellow students of what little they had to their names.

A wire-thin fellow now that he was fully grown, he did have enough muscle to prevent the normal hazing most geeks experienced from jocks in the States, but there was always the overachievers that tried something stupid.

This wasn't a college prank. Might be a college prank gone wrong, since there was the scent of burning things in the air of the hallway, but whatever it was Adrik didn't want to deal with it.

"Shit… Verde! Fire!" Not the wing where the computer lab was set up, there was only a hazy look to the air in the hall and a faint scent. Problem was, the chem-lab was next door. If the chemistry lab was on fire… "What? What the hell are you doing?"

The green haired, green eyed scientist was calmly packing his station. As if there wasn't the possibility of being blown up on them looming. "I do not have copies of this information and would rather not have to repeat my experiments for the technical details. Some aid, Adrik?"

Slightly incredulous, that kind of composure was up there with Sonya's when the pigs ended up two seconds behind them, the Russian scrambled to hurry his possible project partner's actions.

Adrik was surprised over the weight of Verde's book collection, but with him snagging the book bags at least his fellow student only had to bother with the loose paperwork. Arms full of printouts, loose sheets, and the odd packet of chemistry formulas, Verde might be more unburdened but he also seemed to be more fatigued than him.

The effects of an all-nighter to get in what he could before his interest waned, probably.

Uncomfortable with how long they were taking to get out, the Russian set the pace and their direction. Unfortunately they were on the second floor of a newly built wing to house the massive if reduced in size computers, and they didn't quite make it to the ground floor before flames started spilling into the stairwell seeking more fuel.

Tiles and painted concrete weren't burnable, but the fake foam ceiling tiles and the odd bits of rubber and carpet were. What wouldn't help were all the paper printing supplies, cleaning fluids, and posters that littered the first floor. Adrik wasn't exactly sure where the fire had started, or how it had spread in the few minutes he needed to realize there was a fire, but obviously one side of the building was engulfed.

"Back the other way, Verde. Quickly, we're getting cut off."

The scientist merely looked highly irritated, trying not to crease the information in his arms, as he wordlessly turned on a heel to head back down the hallway.

Getting more and more nervous the longer this went on the Russian swore softly in his native language when the other stairwell proved less smoke choked and hot. Breathing easier once they were on the ground floor, even if the fire alarms in this building were wailing hard enough to be earsplitting.

Verde made his shuffling way out the doors, which brought them into the sight of the billowing flames pouring out of the chemistry lab.

Adrik swore again, audibly this time.

Again in Russian, which got the green scientist to glance back with wide eyes.

Then the other building blew up, spitting burning hot fragments everywhere.
Chapter 47

(Wednesday the 23rd of April, 1969 continued. San Francisco State College, San Francisco, California, United States of America.)

Verde had half a second to register a large piece of flaming debris was on a trajectory that would doubtless impact right on top of him, even if he threw himself to the ground.

Frustratingly, even as he watched as his likely murder weapon streak through the early morning air, he could do nothing but stare.

Not… how he had expected to die. That wasn't even his own experiment.

Finally, he managed to flinch and shut his eyes just before impact.

Verde paused, mentally and physically, as something hard and hot bounced off him.

There was a beat of absolutely nothing happening, in which the scientist stood there and seriously wondered if he was dead without first experiencing the pain of being crushed into the ground. Then something impacted the back of his left knee sharply, and unlike the prior impact he both felt pain from that and fell backwards onto Adrik.

Wiry strong arms seized him and wrenched him around before he could get his feet under him again, pushing him in a staggering course to where the flickering emergency vehicle lights flashed. His ears were ringing from the initial explosion and obscured any other sounds Verde might have heard, beyond seeing someone's mouth move he wouldn't have known anyone was speaking.

His lab-partner, who he was starting to doubt was really from West Germany, kept one hand on his back. Pushing him forward and past the police line and a few other early-bird students and professors.

Verde only became marginally concerned when Adrik didn't stop near the parked ambulances.

The tinnitus resulting from being at ground zero of a chemistry laboratory exploding ensured no conversation would be less than at maximum volume, preventing the scientist from discreetly inquiring what the other was thinking. Also about what exactly had happened, as that was both dubious and possibly not something he would know.

He did manage a look backwards, but the wiry man of dubious nationality wasn't even looking at him. Adrik's attention was more on the milling students and staff of the college with the odd skeptical glance for the emergency personnel.

Allowing himself to be pushed on, he wondered if continuing to follow his lab-partner's directions was a wise idea. The scientist wasn't nearly as fit as the other man, and Adrik had been the one to identify the fire starting before the fire alarms triggered, but…

A sharp jabbing push to his back had Verde stumbling into a causeway bridging two of the campuses' buildings, twisting around to protect the information in his arms only earned him a far view of the ongoing battle against the flames eating the chemistry lab building.

Adrik sharply ramming a head into a brick wall that attracted the scientist to where his lab-partner had gone.
The probable 'attacker' scrambled to pry the wiry man's grip on his skull off, two sharp heel-strikes to the inner wrist had Adrik's fingers losing their grip enough for the slightly more muscular male to twist free.

A fisted handful of his lab-partner's tee-shirt had the shorter man heaved into the wall next to Verde's rather dumbfounded person.

"Fuck…” Was Adrik's opinion of his unceremonious introduction to a vertical surface. "Hey, the fuck did you blow up the chem-lab for? Jerk move, asshole."

The heavily tanned male with visibly greasy hair shrugged his shoulders in a rolling motion. "Not my problem, boy. Someone just wanted an interruption, but… indulge me a bit. Did I see what I think I saw?"

"The hell am I supposed to know, dumbass?"

Unfortunately, that brought the man's attention to the scientist's person as he slowly reached for the small of his back. "Maybe you can explain then, nerd-boy."

An entirely confusing pause occurred.

"Oh yeah." Adrik put in from his position on the ground. "I stole your gun."

The aforementioned firearm was pulled from the farther side faced away from both of the other men and waved in the air before being cocked and aimed at their assaulter.

"Fuck off, jackass."

"The pigs are right behind me, you don't have the guts."

Adrik visibly thought about it for a long moment. "Pretty sure I can get a shot off and still run for it in time. Well? You like those odds?"

When the man glanced back to where the emergency personnel were located, Verde's lab-partner rolled up to his feet and fixed his aim with the stolen gun in a steadier position.

"Hey man, keep walking." Glancing at the scientist only briefly, the man tipped his head back to indicate the causeway they were on. "I'll catch up, but right now you need to get some space or more assholes like this will come after you."

Verde almost moved a hand to push his glasses back up the bridge of his nose, only to belatedly realize his arms were still full of their homework. Their spotlessly unburned homework. "…right."

His lab partner did know what was going on.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 23rd of April, 1969 continued. San Francisco, California, United States of America.)

"I wasn't aware Soviet Union exchange students were a thing." Verde commented neutrally as Adrik dropped to the bus seat next to him, shifting his slightly charred lab coat so the burn marks would not visible by casual inspection.

They were skipping out of San Francisco, if only for a day or two. Adrik had to go back and steal any suspiciously spiky green energy caught on tape, but right now he just really wanted to get some space from the site of a Dying Will Flame activation.

People got weird around Flame users, which… frankly the Russian couldn't really see why.

Some of them figured out awesome things to do with their supernatural abilities… but the few others he had seen since leaving the Soviet Union were one-trick ponies that didn't innovate with it.

"I could have sworn it was mentioned that you were an exchange student from West Germany. Just so you know, when you are stressed you have a Russian accent. And tend to swear in the language."

"I may or may not be in the country illegally." Quipped the thief sourly under his breath, shifting to get his weight off the stolen pistol he had acquired and continuing in a normal volume. "If you tell that to anyone, I'll deny it."

"I'm from France." The newly found Lightning continued as he inspected the crack through his left lens as the bus pulled out of the station. "Legally, in my case. You may tell whomever you wish."

"Yeah, yeah. Rub it in why don't you." It really was rather sad that his involvement in school of all things was illegal.

There was the whole concern of learning American secrets and then heading back to the Soviet Union with them, but frankly the former pickpocket didn't much care. It wasn't like he was involved with the motherland's government.

"So… where is my homework?"

Verde replaced his glasses and gave him a deadpan stare. "I have no knowledge of what you speak of."

"Not funny, man. I really want to figure my assignment out."

"...I purchased a new rucksack to contain them, they are in the storage space under this cabin. Is there not more important things to discuss?"

Preferably not something to do in a public space like this, but there was little reason for the scientist to be aware that was a bad idea.

He also really, really hoped that the brief flare of green Lightning Flames he recognized from Galina's own attempts to harness her ability would be excused by the chemicals that had been in that fire. Grainy, live televised newscasts were also kind of sketchy evidence for Dying Will Flame usage.

Hopefully there were more black-and-white showings of the incident that might have caught the scientist awaking his Dying Will than there were colored ones, but Adrik wasn't in the habit of relying on miracles.

That, of course, didn't mean the local criminal mafia syndicates had glossed over what they had seen. They had another reasonable explanation for what they saw, and a man who remained standing without visible injury after a slab of flaming wood from half a desk slammed into his back obviously meant something.

Equally hopefully not that much detail made it on camera… but he hadn't weaseled out of jail time in West Germany himself by being careless. One had been one too many already.
Adrik wasn't sure if him kicking the back of the shocked to stillness Verde's knee to get him to at least fall over had helped or not, but he did know if the man he killed had managed to pass word to an associate then Verde would probably be unable to step back into San Francisco without being near-assaulted by every criminal syndicate in range.

A new Dying Will Flame user, pressure from local mafia syndicates to 'recruit' his lab-partner, and highly possible the man had no idea what to do about it all. He'd have to reach out to his connections back in the Soviet Union to keep the scientist intact at this rate.

"What do you think about the mob?"

The other man's expression switched from something suspiciously contemplative to a study in 'dismal skepticism'. "Any particular reason you ask?"

"It's either join up with one or get some high placed patrons to keep them away from you. Right now, those are your options. Until you get enough of a rep that no one will fuck with you because it's too costly." The former pickpocket might not have been back in Moscow for years, but Galina sometimes called to let him known the major things going on. Adrik lowered his voice for this next bit, even if the general noise level should guarantee their conversation remained just between them.

"That stuff you can do? The green stuff, the why you were unharmed after getting bashed in the back with a slab of burning wood. It's rare, enough to have you on the watch lists of everyone that caught sight that even so much as suggested you doing it."

Tatiana was still in Mafia Land, right?

It wasn't like he could place a long-distance call to Moscow to ask Galina about her Lightning Flames personally as he didn't have the Flame office's phone number. She would know where the other Lightning was and how to get a fast message to her. Tatiana's sister Sonya might be more help, but she was… he already owed her a favor, and more would mean she'd own his ass for the rest of his miserable life.

"You know what it was." The scientist observed clinically, green eyes narrowing suspiciously under an equally green fringe of hair. "I had wondered why you hustled the both of us out of the police cordon so quickly, and how you knew we would come under attack by shady individuals trying to recruit me."

"…basic rules about it are those that have it can't hold office, can't enlist, and if you have it you have to teach the basics to anyone else you find with it. Which is… basically what I've just informed you of. They'll murder you, or make you disappear, if you try to go against all that." Adrik gave a dismissive, helpless shrug as their bus made its ponderous way through mid-morning traffic. "I can't do it. Teach you about it or use the ability either. I can get you some help, and what information there is about it, but…"

"Criminals." Verde finished for him dryly. "I will be required to bow to the whims of ill-educated thugs and sell my skills for preferential consideration if not just survival."

The Russian hesitated, taking a long look at other the man sitting pensively next to him. "Well… half the time, yes. Some of us don't have good educations, but others do have a decent or better than the normal. There's me, for example."

"So why are you helping me?"

"…that's… actually a very good question. Probably because I really want you to take a crack at the ARPANET issues." Adrik scrubbed a hand up one side of his jawline, noting he probably should've shaved when he got up today. "I don't think I can go back to school. Whoever caused that explosion probably triggered a closer look at which students were present, and it's possible my… erm, paperwork won't stand up to that kind of thing."

"Where does that leave me?" Asked the scientist, gesturing first to his charred lab coat to the very streets the Russian had been gazing out at. "Not to sound ungrateful, but there seems to be some high level of unwanted interest in my person. Some of which have proven to be hazardous to refuse, as we saw earlier."

The man might have a point, but there was a limit to what the Russian could and would do.

"Frankly, there's little one person could do to change that for you. Best scenario would be to get back to France and lie low for a year or two, after clearing your name here and making an orderly withdrawal from the States entirely. I'm going to… cover your tracks a little over the next few days, wiping out the evidence that might have caught your initial ability spiking, but then I've got to go."

Verde remained silent as their bus pulled onto a highway, but once they had crossed from the inner city to the suburbs he had seemed to gather his thoughts together again.

"If I wish to seek further information, how would I do so?"

The question had Adrik hesitating before admitting those same criminal syndicates he didn't seem that enthused with were probably his best bet.

Frankly, the quickest route he knew of was directly through the Zolotov clan from how rarely Adrik had ever heard about Dying Will Flame users after his former gang leader guided a Lightning through developing the ability. Even here in the melting pot of numerous different races and cultures, and no few numbers of criminals that had sought new pastures after becoming too well known in their native lands, there weren't any more than a handful of local users stumbling their ways into being better through sheer accident.

"There's a book…" Adrik started slowly, trying to dredge his memory for the entire fiasco he hadn't been remotely involved with. He had caught a bit of the irritation Galina had suffered when writing it, but he really didn't know what it was called or if it was available in any other language than his native one. "…this would be so much easier if you were part of a structured group."

"Why?" Verde questioned, now with an edge of exasperation. "Adrik, you are making little sense."

The wiry Russian scratched his scruffy jawline again, basically buying time to think.

He didn't want the Vindice after him, and all he knew of those Flame rules was 'tell them what they can/can't do'. There might be more, which he should be either giving the scientist or enabling a way for him to find out himself.

Then there was the whole fact the only way he knew to get certainty or for the Frenchman to get his 'further information' was through… the first Zolotov Dying Will Flame user, Sonya.

Maybe it could be done through Tatiana and Galina, but Adrik was a little wary of involving his former gang members. The Sun user was super busy with her medical career, what few times he had managed to talk to her she was either tired and cranky or harried and caught between shifts. It didn't help she was on a free-floating island in the middle of international waters, so guesses had to be made for when the woman wasn't busy or otherwise occupied.

He wasn't sure if taking someone as painfully new as Verde to Mafia Land was a stupid idea or a horrible one.
You weren't really supposed to get in after the very moment you learned there was such a thing as a networked criminal underground, as the entire place was more for the veterans and the established to rub elbows or find something interesting to do with their time or for criminal families to have some non-police involved vacations. It was different if you had a syndicate behind you, mainly just so someone would stop idiots from reporting the island's very existence to the wrong person.

Taking the scientist Lightning to Galina was pretty much the same as taking the man to Sonya, for now at least. Both women were back in Moscow, had the most information Verde could possibly want or could be gathered, but it was the same as tossing the scientist straight into the Zolotov's collective feet.

"Let me make some calls, man. There's a few things I think might be possible for you, and a few things I'm not entirely sure would be a good thing." If there was any hope that there was a possibly non-tapped phone line where he could make a few long-distance calls, it was probably in a Mafia Land servicing port. Sea or air didn't really matter much. "We've just got to get the hell out of San Francisco for now, you to obscure the trail anyone might be able to follow and me because lingering around when people are looking for either of us isn't really a smart move. Make an orderly withdrawal from college, and I'll… find you when I have concrete answers."

Verde raised his left eyebrow. "That is not an answer. Do you have the information or not?"

"Not me, no."

However, the man probably did have a point. A few scuffles with the local syndicates and an explosive building weren't the kinds of things most people found fun, and a man who had been a civilian just hours ago probably was very damn confused.

"It'll take me a bit, but I can get you what you want eventually… hopefully. But… it's not up to me."

(Thursday the 24th of April, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Do we do house-calls?" Galina asked of Sonya when the blonde woman was parsing through yet another stack of reports on the Flame using trainees with Scruffy.

Blinking a few times at the sudden subject shift, the Storm-Cloud eyed her assistant. "...I guess so? I'm kind of forced to for any Clouds, so I don't suppose it would be too odd to have one or more of us sent out if there's enough of a reason for it."

"In France? Or America? Because… Adrik would really like to know."

Handing off the Storm's notations to the Sun, Mikhail really need to stop sending her little comments that boiled down to 'yes, Storm Flames can eat through…' because she got that much from her own Flames, the thief studied her Lightning. "Those are two very different locations, Galina. Why the hell would we go that far for anyone, much less some new Flame user we're not connected to?"

"The Vindice Laws?" Tried the brunette, sounding skeptical of her own words even as she said it. "It's a… friend? Of Adrik's. A new Lightning. He said the man's a scientist, if that helps any."

Yeah?

Sonya had Scruffy for anything scientific she needed. Well… eventually.
Case in point, the man was perfectly happy to dive through reams of information on how or why certain teenagers and a handful of adults developed their abilities. He seemed to think the rock testing held more promise but was gamely pitching in with the documentation they had on damn near a hundred and fifty Flame users.

"While I'm sure it would be fascinating to know how Adrik met a scientist that popped with Lightning Flames... you should know what to pass on for the laws and send this man a copy of the damn book for anything else to call it good."

Actually… now that she thought about it, Sonya could probably put a visit to France to good use outside any 'obvious' reason.

Pierre-Antoine Carpentier might have made enough of an impact in French criminal circles enough that a few mentions could have survived the years between then and now. If she really was going to take a crack at this 'mafia historian' thing, that might not be a bad place to start.

She could always get the Zolotov history, and the bare basics of Vongola's was easy enough to get. She'd have to suck it up and play nice with Daniella of Vongola for the rest of it, but aside a headache or two it would be tolerable enough.

"This man of Adrik's apparently does not speak Russian or read Cyrillic." Galina continued cautiously, looking a moment away from slamming the receiver down on the cradle if the Storm-Cloud did anything more than twitch negatively. "And apparently he can't answer the kinds of questions Verde keeps asking him."

…Verde? Weird ass nickname. Rather fitting for a Lightning user, and a little ironic he might have had that before discovering his Flames.

Sonya heaved a sigh, and really thought about it.

She had two months, well a month and a few weeks, until she had to be in Italy for Shamal. Frankly, being gone from the office before anyone could decide to fuck up and prevent any vacation she was due to take from the place might possibly be a good plan.

If she spent a week on whatever it was Adrik needed some help with… she could probably use a month to try another spree counting ten or so contracts for Mafia Land. The remaining weeks she could spend in Mafia Land or just out of the Soviet Union for a little personal break of her own.

"...doesn't Adrik still owe me a favor?" For the stupid computer shit that made her decide against taking 'cutting-edge technology' contracts.

Galina wasn't listening to her anymore. "What the hell do you mean 'oops', Adrik?"

The Lightning's expression switched between several emotions, from irritation to frustration tinged with a bit of fear and finally to pure anger.

"...Sonya, you owe me a favor."

Sighing, the thief rubbed her temple. "Yes, I do. What do you need?"

"San Jose, can you get Adrik and his little boy-toy out of there?" Galina flinched away from the receiver next to her ear, paused to listen a little longer, then hung up the phone with more frustration than an inanimate object deserved. "I have no fucking idea why the hell he didn't just ditch the dead weight, but he's being… stubborn."
Sonya considered her assistant, and her now mainly worried pinch look. "It will take me near ten or so hours to get to the States from here. And that's not including customs or changing planes in order to get from the Soviet Union to the United States."

"I know. Still, please. Tatiana would be supremely upset if one of us died through stupidity, and especially if you could stop it."

"Blackmail? Really?" Rolling her eyes, the thief got up and started to head for the door. "Get me a plane ticket then, Galina. You've got to handle the office until I get back. It might take a month or so to finish off whatever it is Adrik is up to, I'll call to keep you updated. Who the hell am I going after, anyways?"

Galina threw a dirty look at the phone as Sonya passed her. "I don't know, whoever they were they had accents. Not ones I know of."

Accents her Russian Lightning didn't recognize in California?

Great, that covered just about everyone. Tatiana's gang had been mostly active in the Soviet Union and some of Europe, mainly the northern parts. California had once been part of Mexico, and… didn't a large part of the American crime families ended up being imports from their European brethren?

Well that at least cut out any Russian, French, or German syndicates. Left the Spanish, Italians, and any native homegrown gangs.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 24th of April, 1969 continued. San Jose, California, United States of America.)

"So now what?" Verde asked irritably, as the two of them were shut in a very bare little cell with minimal furnishings.

Rather, there was one bare light bulb high overhead with two chairs and exactly nothing else in the little basement they were now stuck in. Not exactly classy, but also without anything he could use to engineer an escape for the two of them unless something changed.

Adrik scrubbed his non-broken hand through his developing beard thoughtfully, trying to get the dried blood loose so it would stop pulling on strands. "Well… now we can start in on a conversation that isn't wise to be held in public."

"Adrik… we are at the mercy of others who likely wish us further harm, we both likely require medical attention, and we have little if no privacy for discourse." Observed the slightly battered scientist sarcastically, checking his much abused spectacles for durability. The left lens, which had a crack from the explosion earlier, finally gave up the ghost and fell out of the frame much to the ire of the man holding them. "Forgive me for pointing this out, but should you not be more concerned with our imminent troubles?"

Galina knew what was up, and the girl was ruthless when she was perturbed. The Russian blinked a few times in the dim lighting, deciding he had spent way too much time with the other man if his speech habits was starting to infect his thought process. "Give it a few hours."

Slumping to one of the rickety chairs, because he hadn't suffered through a beating like this since he left Moscow, Adrik pensively inspected his likely broken left hand before he wrenched some of it around to set the bones.
Rumors were rumors, and the Cerrito Crime Family couldn't exactly know who the Lightning was between the two of them.

The one with some criminal background, in the country illegally?

The one without even a parking ticket to his name, here on a legal student's visa?

The fact the scientist had cottoned on and went along with the Russian's refusal to say which was which probably saved his life, if meant the man would get a few licks his way for his troubles.

Then the fact the man was a scientist held off the worse for him, as eggheads could be put to so much use in various ways. Adrik wasn't that lucky, but he had also been better trained to take that kind of abuse than the other man.

At least they were more or less safe until the syndicate they were ever-so-unwilling guests of got some outside verification or one of them used the ability unique to that version of Dying Will Flame users, then it would be patently obvious who was who. That outside help was thankfully highly unlikely, from how stupid some people got about the whole thing.

As long as any syndicate had less than ten, they were still vulnerable to any old criminal syndicate that hated them. At least according to those weird rules that apparently came from the Vindice themselves.

No, Adrik did not want to know how someone from their clan managed to speak with one of the Vindice Officers. The fact they had been involved at all with those rules gave him the creeps anyways.

The point was, that until that mythical line was crossed criminal syndicates could murder each other as they pleased without serious research into who hailed to them. Which made for anyone finding a Flame user a big deal until you got to the more Flame-common areas, where the syndicates had a number of them then used that numbering system to help clarify how badass they were then and who they could deal with safely.

America, with it's basically transplanted criminal underbelly breeding even more local crime gangs, had a truly atrocious patchwork of old boys from the old country running structured crime rings and the new upstarts picking at them for honing in on their turf and being so racists or selective on who they took on. No matter where you stepped, it was a toss-up if who you were dealing with were mafia men exiled from their home country or mafia brats just breaking into that world.

Worse yet, the only Flame users in America were those that were either too dangerous to attempt recruiting or were temporarily loaned out to whichever syndicate from their parent one. No one apparently let their Flame using lines be exiled, instead opting to just bribe or pay off who they needed to keep them in their home countries.

That gave the two of them at least a day or two of time. Maybe more, if this was to be an interrogation and impressment for the Lightning into whichever role the San Jose Crime Family wanted.

First step, no matter what situation it was, was to wait for the hubbub to die down. If the Cerrito Crime Family was smart, they'd still have people out looking even if they already had the two of them. If not, then someone would catch on and try to wipe them out before they could build up to that mystical number ten. Points if that other syndicate could recruit a Flame user or two from the ruins of the other before anyone else could catch on.
Once things had died down, then he and Verde would have to worry about coercion and torture. Maybe an invading turf war for the new Lightning, but that was really something that would take time to happen.

Adrik had more faith in Galina. She'd get them some backup, hopefully a vory or two who would not be pleased one of their clansmen had been basically kidnapped.

…or sent Sonya.

He really, really hoped the Lightning hadn't sent the other woman. No offense to the thief, but she was really more the loner type who could barely work with others when needed. Mystical, magical ability of fire aside… he still wouldn't bet on her facing a gun.

There were a lot of guns here.

Finally satisfied with the set of his broken bones, the Russian clumsily pulled off his shirt to use as a bandage until a better solution could be found. "Frankly… I've got nothing. Even if I could escape with you or alone, we're not exactly in the condition to do more than lay low until we look less like someone worked us over. My syndicate is now aware I'm not where I want to be, and that another is attempting to poach from their people. Basically, all we can do is sit tight and wait for an opportunity."

Verde impatiently took over for him, roughly tearing the garment to strips and bandaging the abused digits tightly. "I do not find that encouraging."

"Yeah… I don't like it much either."

There was no reason for a Cosa Nostra syndicate to treat with a Soviet Union Mafiya syndicate, so Adrik didn't hold much faith in any negotiations could get him out of here. It would basically devolve to a 'yes you do' 'no I don't' argument if any was tried, and long enough spent at the mercy of any decent interrogator would probably end badly for him.

Besides, if it turned out there was enough of a cause to get one old world syndicate pissed at a new world one Adrik could really only look forward to a bullet through the head.

Much easier to kill an interloper then dump his body so anyone could say 'there he is, you liar' to any accusation of kidnapping rather than try to work around prior loyalties.

(Friday the 25th of April, 1969. San Jose, California, United States of America.)

Sonya had little idea for what the hell she was looking for.

Knowing where helped little, San Jose had two major syndicates and a number of home-grown ones. There was the Cerrito Crime Family and the Bonanno Crime Family, two of which she really didn't want to touch at all, and about a handful of small gangs and rackets on the outskirts.

However, since it was coming up on the twelfth or thirteenth hour since Adrik had last talked to Galina, the Storm-Cloud was about as unequally willing to procrastinate on the whole issue.

The thief was basically reduced to stalking and eavesdropping on various grunts scurrying around, at least until well past moonrise when breaking into the established headquarters of both major families was possible if really not recommended.
Using the time until the early morning hours to rule out the lesser gangs and see if there had been any major movements from any not of the two main syndicates of San Jose was probably the best use of her time. She got not only a general layout of the city but also where and who moved in what territory.

No one was saying much of anything important, which will good in the whole 'Omertà' thing was bad for her aims.

About two or three in the morning Sonya gave up on the streets, turning her attentions to the mansions and various hideouts she had assembled over the course of the night.

One of the two major syndicates actually ruled themselves out after an hour of digging further into their smaller holdings and general amounts of eavesdropping. The Bonanno Crime Family's holdings were mostly just that, holds on property and smuggling routes for one of the American Dons. The positions their men were in was apparently either a route to retirement or punishment, as most of their attention was directed to the happenings in New York rather than California.

That left Sonya with the Cerrito Crime Family as the likely culprits. If she was wrong, then she'd have to come back and try her luck with a bunch of old hands and plucky upstarts here. If not them, she'd try the next major gang which seemed to be the drug dealers dabbling in cocaine running a racket on the north side of the city.

Now almost fifteen hours after Adrik had called for help, the thief snuck into the other criminal syndicate's major holding for a day of eavesdropping. She couldn't move quickly with daylight out, and she really needed some rest herself but stalking after a number of mafia men in their own home didn't sounds very restful.

Sonya settled into a very nicely shaded veranda thing when the man stationed to guard the roof was being exchanged out for a fresher one at dawn, crawling forward at a painfully slow pace to position herself better over the kitchen's open windows. Moving only when the leafy vines and potted plants she was hidden in moved with the wind kept her from notice.

The scent of baking bread would drive her nuts, but in her experience the kitchen was always the best place to gather gossip. Especially outside it, if any particular criminal wanted to keep things from the staff but not from his buddy so he could complain about boring things.

The man watching the roofs was more interested in the outside of the building, enabling the thief to steal a little of the food being prepared as she waited. Nibbling on a cluster of rather good grapes, Sonya's waning attention was snagged by an order of two loaves of bread and some plastic bottles for water interrupting the gossip of who might be sleeping with who going on.

The dead silence that happened as this order was filled told the thief it wasn't a usual request. Sonya still hesitated, as much as that might be something given to someone being held against their will it was also possible someone was in major trouble for something. She didn't have the local news, aside a lot of chatter about the situation that happened up in San Francisco that might have resulted in a Dying Will Flame user being discovered.

The man that collected the food and water left the kitchen, headed out of the sprawling Italian villa with enough intent the thief realized she wasn't where she probably needed to be.

Moving to figure it out was going to be an issue, though.

The watchman near her position might not be looking in her direction much, but if she moved too quickly all bets would be off. She also didn't want to kill him, as that would only tip these people off if they had the man she was looking for. All she could do was memorize the man gathering food for possible prisoners, his face, body build, and what he was wearing for now.

Sonya was going to finish her food first, then figure out how to extract herself from her position so she could move around.

She'd have to catch him on his next run, hopefully it would be the same man again. Either way, she was going to follow whoever was sent for the food back to whatever it was they were hiding.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 25th of April, 1969 continued. San Jose, California, United States of America.)

Verde was now past the point of being worried.

Adrik wasn't an ideal companion for what amounted to a kidnapping, but he seemed to know more than he did about what was going on. Unfortunately, his one best lead for what was happening had major injuries that hadn't been looked at by a medical professional and was now sick with something Verde had no knowledge of.

It probably wasn't shock, as the man had been fine for hours after his hand had been broken.

However, as the hours drew on even Adrik himself had realized there was something seriously wrong in between discussing various criminal syndicates and how they normally operated.

Aside the broken hand, a possible fracture of the jaw, and a sundry of lesser bruises and cuts, it seemed as if something was now infected or he had contracted an illness.

The symptoms were generic, chills, fever, and pallor. His breathing was off, no longer the steady rate he had maintained all throughout a rather brutal beating and the first few hours afterwards.

At a loss, for there was little someone unfamiliar with the medical side of science as he could do, Verde really could do little more than ensure the other man drank something and kept on sleeping to help boost his recovery.

The dawn of the second day of their captivity resulted in a change of pace. The Frenchman had noted they received a measure of food and water on a six to seven-hour basis, if that would hold true for this day and others was subjective. As he required more water to pour down the Russian's throat, he had been expecting the next delivery shortly.

It didn't happen.

Even as the sun rose to a position no longer visible from their cellar prison, no one came to so much as ensure they both were still breathing.

Which was shortly to become a real concern. Adrik had gone from slightly pale to nearly bloodless, and his breathing was coming in gasps. In the rare moments he was coherent, he spoke in a babble of Russian and some German words.

As concerned as he was by his cellmate's condition, Verde supposed it was expected he jumped when the door barring them in was wrenched open.

Not in a 'slammed against a wall' wrench either, a ripped off the hinges wrench.
As he watched, a strip which he assumed was half of a hinge finally lost the battle against gravity and clinked to the wooden staircase leading up out of the cellar.

Whoever it was delicately placed the slab of wood down so it wouldn't make noise, as if the screech of tearing metal hadn't alerted everyone in range that it had happened.

…that should not be possible.

Verde blinked blearily at the tiny blonde woman, who likely gave him an equally puzzled look back before her attention landed on Adrik and what he could make out of her form was no longer aimed in his direction.

"Oh… well fuck." Unceremoniously announced their… 'rescuer'? Ignoring him for the most part, the woman strode across the cell to check on the Russian. "…Galina's going to murder me if he dies."

"I… take it you are also a criminal, associated with him?" He was no match for a woman who could rip metal apart, so he didn't try protesting her movements.

He hadn't been much of a match for anyone, really. Verde had been perfectly aware he wasn't the most physically imposing of men, but this was the first time in his life that lack of muscle strength had bothered him.

"…I suppose you can say that. His former gang leader is my sister." Her dubious credentials so offered, the woman bent and easily lifted Adrik up in a fireman's carry. "Look, can you get the door? Or doors."

As it was likely he could regain his own freedom through the acts, it wasn't an imposition.

However, the scientist still hesitated. "Where are you taking him?"

"That conversation should wait until a better time. As in when there is no risk the people I knocked out might wake up again and become more hurdles to navigate while carrying a burden."

As she did have a point, and was the one doing the rescuing, Verde turned on one heel to lead the way out.

The hotel had been very accommodating to the men that had apprehended himself and the Russian, ignoring the fact that the both of them were being held in its lower levels. He might have been a bit viciously pleased to see the woman had exercised her impossible strength to impact the walls using the various people now unconscious next to them.

That work didn't last probably as long as the woman behind him had counted on, one of the men near the service entrance doors was awake and shakily holding a gun to Verde's position when he opened the door.

He shot, which might have been either in hopes of getting his attacker when they came back through or just because he had been startled. Verde wheezed out a breath painfully as something impacted him in the chest, driving him back a forceful amount.

He fell backwards, and the woman that had been behind him leapt forward over him.

He was pretty sure he imagined the flair of painfully bright purple, but there was no way he could have missed spotting the existence of a polearm that reached about five or six feet in length. Whipping it around, the woman embedded the few inches of spike on one end into the man's head.
Dropping the weapon, which dissolved into similarly bright purple fire that informed him he wasn't seeing things, she carefully laid Adrik down and skipped up the service stairs in one jump for him. "Shit, you okay? I did not expect…"

Cutting herself off, the blonde poked at the hole in his lab coat. Verde winced, still winded and now likely suffering from a broken rib but curiously not bleeding or experiencing the pain of a hot bit of lead ripping through his chest.

"…Lightning, huh?" She poked the hole a few more times, which had a painfully hot bit of something falling out of the folds of his shirt. The flattened bullet bounced and clattered to the concrete under him, until she poured a bit of red fire on it and it melted away to an ashy smear. "Come on, up. You are lucky I am fond of Lightnings. You can come with me and Adrik."

Had he been uninvited beforehand?

Painfully levering himself up to a sitting position, Verde only hesitated a moment before taking her hand and allowing her to pull him up to his feet. She might have ripped metal apart, but she had also come back to check on him instead of leaving him as dead as most might have.

"You make a good bullet catcher, by the way."

Any goodwill he might have felt to his rescuer gone, the scientist dearly wished he had a suitable pair of glasses as he blurrily followed Adrik's mass over her shoulder.

She only took them as far as the parking lot, leaning her presumably fellow Russian against a car and breaking into it through a window with little trouble. Verde couldn't be sure what she was doing, as he was regretfully nearsighted without his glasses, but in short order the car's engine spluttered to life and she unlocked the doors to allow both his and Adrik's inclusion.

"My name is Sonya Bazanova." She offered to him as he slid into the passenger's seat, ensuring the other man's feet wouldn't get caught in the driver's rear door if she closed it. "How much do you know of what is going on with you?"

"Very little." Adrik had been focused on mainly explaining his limited experience with Flame users and the syndicates that were built around them rather than risk informing their captors of more about the people able to use it than they had already known. "If you are 'fond' of Lightnings, then I take it you can instruct me better?"

"I know a Lightning that might not mind instructing you for staying with Adrik." Bazanova countered easily, shutting the rear door but not moving to get in the driver's seat. "I have to go deal with that dead body. Try and find a local map, will you? I get lost easily trying to go by roads."

…fantastic. Verde regarded the blurry dashboard dubiously, reaching under to search for any catches that might lead to someplace a person would place maps.

From captivity against his will to being guided about by a thief with limited directional skills and an appalling lack of care for his well-being. While definitely a step up from this morning, it was possible she was riskier than staying in one place and conforming to whatever was demanded of him.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 25th of April, 1969 continued. San Jose, California, United States of America.)

Sonya was pretty sure the Lightning Adrik had found was painfully nearsighted, he had to squint something fierce at a map she bought from a convenience store in order to supply her with directions to the local airport.

Thankfully, it was a Mafia Land servicing terminal. Even if the business of choice in America seemed to be drugs and that was outlawed by the island's ruling groups.

There would be a hop from San Jose International Airport to Los Angeles, but while that was perfectly acceptable for her and the Lightning… Adrik required a more direct option.

"There." The man who had still not introduced himself but was probably 'Verde' pointed to a highway exit, which did indeed have signs saying how to pull into the airport.

"…the fuck did they send you for, Sonya?" Adrik slurred from the back seat, not bothering to straighten himself up or move at all from where she had put him when she glanced back.

"I was closest."

"To the States?"

"No, to Galina."

There was a painfully sucking chuckle before the man fell silent.

'Verde' worriedly looked back at him for a moment, before turning back to attempting to read street signs and match them to his map. "Why are we heading for an airport when he requires a hospital?"

"There is a hospital for those like us." Sonya was also unsure of how Adrik got into the country, whether illegally or legally, so it was safest to default to criminals and those that could be bribed. She didn't know the country, depressing given she had once lived here in another life, so Mafia Land's hospital was their best bet to get him help. "Unfortunately, it moves."

"…I beg your pardon?"

"Given, but you will see what I mean when we get there." Ignoring the 'passenger on/off loading only' signs, the thief pulled her stolen car into a tunnel intended for airport personnel only.

It took only about fifty feet for a security guard to stop them, a dour looking man with a dead eye and the facial scars to suggest a knife wound. Flashing her Mafia Land ID got them waved on through.

Obviously realizing something was not quite right even if she doubted he could have seen what, the Lightning opted to remain warily silent until she pulled into an underground bay area.

Here there was the fleet of shuttle cars and baggage loading trains going about their business without caring much of an additional vehicle, in fact Sonya got attention only after she had put the car in park and opened the driver's door.

"Adrik? We need to move now. I'll try to get you a straight shot through to Mafia Land and to St. Julian's, and warn Tatiana, but if I can't..."

"I'll live." The wiry man dismissed with a floppy wave of one hand. "Seriously, nice to see you. Even if... I was hoping for actual vory… wait, that place has an actual name?"

"I won't take that as an insult." Sonya promised bemusedly to his rather rambling comments, beckoning a more well-dressed man over to the car. "I need a straight flight to Mafia Land, one passenger needing immediate medical attention. Two more, but we can wait. Do what you want with the car, it is hot."
"May I have… ah," the man inspected her ID carefully, checking for the flaws or misalignments of a fake, "…very good, miss. Should we bill you directly or your accounts?"

"My accounts." Like she had the cash on her right now to pay for an emergency extraction. Crooking a finger at the now very puzzled Verde got the man out of the car. "Is this a standard set up?"

His lips twitched upward at the question, no two Mafia Land ports were ever the same and asking was something of a security question but maintained a straight face. "Of course not. Lounge is the third door on the left-hand side, it connects to the main terminal via a staircase. I will alert you when the young man is on his way and when your own flight is boarding."

There should at least be a shop that sold generic brand prescription eyeglasses somewhere, so the poor man wouldn't have to squint anymore. Once she knew Adrik was on his way, and put in a call to Tatiana, then they'd see about the Lightning's rather battered clothing.

Verde was highly unwilling to actually abandon the car and the Russian still laid out inside, which Sonya tolerated because they had been imprisoned together for however long. He did take a few steps back once a medical team had wrangled a stretcher out for Adrik and started to transfer him onto it, and finally wandered to her once the stretcher and man was wheeled out of the underground.

(Saturday the 26th of April, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Kappel eyed the test results thoughtfully. "Sepsis. Or to use a layman's term; blood poisoning."

"That's… antibiotics, and basic drip regimen while monitoring heart-rate and pressure." Nurse Primakova translated the cause to a cure under her breath, then turned to her understudy to spout off an explanation and a few orders in their native Russian.

"Your young friend should be fine, your sister sent him in before it could worsen to the point of no return."

Better for the young man to be languishing in a hospital with a bacterial infection in his blood than running about who knows where. The former Nazi doctor was well aware his recommendations for said young man to take it easy would be ignored the moment he woke up, but maybe his usual nurse could keep this one in bed for his recovery.

Criminals were such impatient beasts.

Point in case, his nurse's understudy who barely looked fifteen. Nurse Avdotya, the Storm had only given one name instead of the usual three most Russians would, was a very unassuming looking girl with a disturbing ability to melt things into dust.

No, he didn't care it was correctly called 'Disintegration'. It looked as if things melted away, and so he was calling it like he saw it.

Interesting ability, but a lot of kinks had to be worked out before she could use it in the hospital.

Then rigorous testing had to be done to ensure no debilitating side effects for any patients occurred before a Storm using nurse would be a desirable thing. If a Storm-resistant metal could be found… the sterilization of medical tools would be so much faster.
Why the hospital was in such a tizzy over them all Kappel could barely see.

While the girl Sun teenager they were sent had some skill healing with her ability, the others didn't. The only other Sun the hospital received from the Russians was more fascinated with dead bodies and human anatomy, so he and his little Mist friend were mostly haunting the morgue.

The Rain girls were proving… interesting. He had yet to find a baseline for any Dying Will Flame users of Rain, but their ability to knock out troublesome patients had made them a favorite of the surgical teams and kept them away from his baseline study.

Unfortunately, both girls didn't have the stomach for surgery. Which left their fellow if more abrasive Rain boy to stand in as an anesthesia specialist. He stopped being a little shit the first surgery he had attended and was now just surly.

They were not used against any users of Dying Will Flames, since none of them could even make Primakova sleepy, but for normal criminals they were fine.

Some interesting abilities, some of which were useful but ultimately only usable in certain situations, and the possibility they wouldn't continue any medical career made him honestly think it would have been better to wait for them to leave behind the troubled teenage years and learn a proper amount of English first.

True, most couldn't be like his usual nurse. For all the Primakovas out there, there were a few like Klavdia girl who was more interested in breaking people with her healing ability and a couple more like Avdotya who was honestly interested but didn't have the unique Flame skill to match.

Kappel would deal, as this wasn't his hospital and he couldn't make the rules.

He really didn't have the patience to teach more than he had right now, the Sun and Storm nurses were at least mostly self-sufficient. What Primakova knew was translated to Avdotya and she handled questions until she was stumped, as she took on teaching her understudy most of the basics she had learned so the younger nurse was catching up fast.

It was nice to not have to repeat lessons, actually.

"Piperacillin and tazobactam, doctor?"

"Start with ampicillin first, see if there are any changes before we start combinations." The Lord only knew what kind of bacterial infection his nurse's little friend had picked up was, and until the lab identified which strain it was they were limited to general use antibiotics. "The moment it looks as if the infection is dying we may set his broken bones, not a moment before."

The grimace that painted itself across his usual nurse's face was her only protest. Likely she knew just as well as he did that they would have to amputate if any infection set into her young friend's bone marrow and cutting the antibiotic off from reaching any infection there would make it their fault.

Especially if she used her abilities to encourage bone knitting.

"I really should have sent you away, or to another part of the hospital." Kappel sighed heavily as he admitted that, but the rules here weren't the same as the rules in other hospitals.

Primakova tossed her fiery red braid of hair over one shoulder, giving him an irritated look of her own. "Prying Sergej out of the morgue to translate for you would've taken too long, Avdotya wouldn't be able to confirm or ask you questions in an accent anyone else could understand until she has had more practice."

They should have at least waited until all those Russians could speak the common language of the hospital. It might have been why the Mist teen had been sent along, he was apparently continuing some kind of Mist Flame therapy that gave a certain mastery of a language to the recipients started by a more experienced Mist in their country of origin.

It didn't help much when the teens could only speak in such a heavy accent it was near unrecognizable as English.

That wasn't so much a problem with the three Rain teens or the other girl Sun nurse, as mostly all they had to do was obey with their abilities as they learned to enunciate the language. Being able to ask questions could wait for them. Sergej, who had some kind of ability to make himself understood in English anyways despite his accent, translated for Edik.

As the only other Russian native in the hospital, Primakova translated for Avdotya when required.

Kappel intended to raise that complaint with Bazanova the next time she was in for a checkup, even if the board of directors wouldn't until they felt they had enough decently competent Flame users from the trade. Ensuring they spoke English before sending them on would solve several difficulties they had right now with communication, which wasn't a problem anyone wanted in a hospital.

"Either way, you should not have to spend time hovering over a friend's bedside while on the clock." The exiled German observed dryly, neatly gathering the x-rays and lab reports together in a neat pile to be added to the hospital's store of them. "I can do just as well, if you would like to find your sister and get the whole story."

"She's not going to be here for another few hours." Primakova shot down quickly, accepting the bag of saline solution from her understudy to hook up on the stand next to her friend's still form. "I'm staying at least until an improvement is noted."

She still had remarkably steady hands even when tending to the young man laid out on a cot before them, inserting a cannula into a vein in his forearm regrettably easy to locate do to his pallor. Avdotya might still pull faces at the mere thought of inserting something foreign into the veins, but she had become adjusted enough to no longer hesitate with the bandaging that would be placed over the site of insertion.

Kappel wondered if he should suggest to his main nurse to try a stint in surgery herself.

General overview of the different fields was required to ensure one was aware of what or who to recommend for certain afflictions, but those steady hands could do wonders as a surgeon rather than as just a general physician.

Entirely, ironically backwards that those same steady hands made her an apparently decent pickpocket and an even better safecracker.

Before ending up here, he had never wondered what traits would be valued by any criminal community. Now he thought about it way too much.

"Primakova, I can stare at the same heart rate monitor just as well as you can." There really was little more they could do than just wait it out now, at least until the hospital's lab got back to them with what bacterial infection the young man was suffering from. "Send the younger girl for some dextrose solution, take a personal hour to go eat, tidy away anything you were in the middle of, come back in a few hours."
By then they would know if he would pull through or wouldn't, and his nurse really shouldn't be forced to wait and worry over every minute change in her friend that could mean anything. From the man waking up to his fever breaking to slipping into a coma or finally just dying.

"Please, Tatiana." Kappel continued before she could snap whatever it was she was about to spit at him. "You shouldn't have to, let me do it."

"That's not very fair." Insisted his nurse, but even so still rattling off another order and explanation to Avdotya. The young Storm flashed him a look before scurrying off to fetch the latest demand. "You still haven't told me your first name."

"I've decided it is going to die with me." The doctor informed her without much humor. "Easier that way."

"Is Kappel even your name?"

"...no."

The Sun blinked at him in surprise. "Huh… I wouldn't have figured that. You're much better at taking a fake name than some people I could mention."

"Years of experience from using that name." He dismissed that as the young Storm came back with the IV solution he had requested. "Did you explain-"

"...that dextrose was for the energy Adrik hasn't replenished since it's apparently been more than a day since he last ate? Yes."
Chapter 48

(Saturday the 26th of April, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

A green-eyed, green haired scientist type with Lightning Flames.

Sonya didn't really start wondering until she purchased Verde a set of generic prescription reading glasses somewhat close to what he actually required. Not exactly what he needed, but at least he could now see and not be forced to squint at everything.

He picked out some round frames, and his entire general look tickled a vague memory about others Rachel once knew about who had odd coloring that matched their Flame types.

It was basically how she recognized Cherep as who he would become later on after some dubious doubting on her own end. Admittedly she had required Shamal's inclusion to recognize Renato as what he would become, but in hindsight she really should've put the Sun flames together with his curly sideburns and job title.

From what little she was sure of about the next set of Arcobaleno was that the Storm guy wore red exclusively, the Sky was an Italian Donna, the Mist was… a Mist, the Rains were soldier types, and the Lightning was a scientist that matched his natural coloring with his Flames.

It really didn't help her much that most Far East Flame users tended to match their clothing to their Flame types, something she learned from both Fong and his fellow Triad members, and Skies were such insular creatures that they rarely interacted with their own non-affiliate Flame using countrymen much less lone Flame users from other countries. The military Rains were probably two she would never be able to meet herself, at least until after Skull met them.

However….

While green eyes weren't that rare, paired with equally green hair and Lightning Flames was kind of a unique combination.

Then, of course, how many scientifically trained Lightnings in their age range could there be?

Vongola had pretty much pounded the idea that they were best used as bullet catchers and shock troopers into most of Europe's underground criminal minds. Which… with the Hardening ability it was true they had a decent defensive-oriented skill that let them absorb a lot of damage before being taken down, that couldn't mean all Lightnings were suited for that.

Kind of like the assumption prevalent about how all Suns should be healers. For some like her sister that worked, but… then there were Suns like Renato.

Verde seemed to be of the same Polarized cut, at least from what little she knew of the man over a day's acquaintance.

Lightnings were basically the people you wanted to take a stray bullet for you, because they were rather unaffected after the fact once you pulled them back to their feet. Galina had done it for her once and now the scientist had done it again.

Useful people to have around for sure, but they could be handy for more than just that alone.

Sonya puzzled over if Verde would be the Lightning Arcobaleno or not their entire flight to Mafia Land. The man in question took the opportunity to fall asleep on the second leg of their trip, if only because he had apparently spent an entire night tending to Adrik before she reached them and was pretty much badly exhausted from the events of the past two days.

If Verde really was going to be an Arcobaleno, then… that was what, three?

Four of the Arcobalenos she had met so far?

Cherep, Renato, maybe Viper, now Verde.

She still wasn't sure about the Mist, to be honest. Viper had the tattoos, the Flames, and the whole 'Esper' thing going on… but hadn't the Varia Mist been male?

…right?

Sonya had seen the other as male more than female, but Cherep had nearly defaulted to calling the Mist a 'she' in his letters home.

…so that one was still a maybe.

Verde had the window seat, because he was probably the only unarmed man on the plane and her next to him prevented anything from being started with him. The jostling of the plane landing didn't wake the man, the thief only woke him up once passengers started debarking.

She wasn't really sure if bringing the man into Mafia Land was a good idea, but it beat out just leaving him in California with criminals hunting after him. She also wasn't entirely sure if Adrik was done with the man either, but she also didn't really want to babysit a civilian with brand new criminal ties at a place like this.

Unfortunately, there didn't seem to be another option she liked.

Babysitting the scientist it was.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 26th of April, 1969 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Verde could have gone years rather decently without so much as knowing a place called 'Mafia Land' existed.

His first glimpse of the island, after the suspicious and surly seeming passengers that had been on the same flight as him, was of several so-called 'mafia men and women' reloading various firearms after debarking.

Just… loitering outside of their plane, loading bullets into everything from handheld pistols to a semi-automatic rifle.

The second view he had of the place wasn't much better.

Still sore and disorientated from sleeping in an upright position with a possibly broken rib, not to mention a headache from dealing with a pair of spectacles that were only close to what he needed, he had followed the blonde Russian Bazanova into a reception area. Actually well-appointed in white marble and vaulted ceilings with the occasional two story window, professional looking staff and with quickly moving lines processing traveling records and what seemed to be IDs.

He had sort of appreciated the visage laid out right on up until Bazanova outright bribed the clerk she had been dealing with to ignore the fact he had little to nothing on him that would work as identification in this place. That bribe was split, the greater amount staying with the clerk and some of it being passed on to the guard doing a double check near what seemed to be an exit.

Nothing was said of it, the whole act merely passed along as if it was usual to bribe the officials here in plain view.

By then, he was sufficiently prepared enough to ignore the riot of different pedestrians occupying the same space in the concrete main and paved side streets here. Probably hitmen, conmen, thieves, family units, couples out on what seems to be dates, most of whom were all visibly armed.

Verde had only walked down two main streets and three side streets, and had witnessed two muggings, a possible murder, someone beating up another for unknown reasons, and yet… no one seemed to care.

It wasn't quite right to say he was greatly bothered by the violence. ‘Uncaring asshole’ was the nicest way anyone referred to his non-existent human empathy. He instead was alarmed that kind of thing was being done in broad daylight, which likely meant the only law in this place was up to the individuals involved.

At least he was decently equipped in that area.

Bazanova could rip iron apart, summon her own preferred weapons in a blink of an eye, probably had a reputation here, and was more or less ensuring that he was following her. As long as he remained in her presence he doubted she would allow anything too uncomfortable to happen to him, his disgruntlement over being called a ‘bullet catcher’ aside.

St. Julian's General Hospital turned out to be a six-story affair built in a Victorian Gothic style, built with light grey bricks with off-white stone edging. It basically looked as if it had been transplanted as a whole out of some metropolis area, as the buildings around it ran the gamut for various services from cafés to retail to even a horticulture shop in wildly different architectural styles.

More foreboding than the people on the streets was that a mortuary office and funeral parlor, built out of a tan shaded brick in a Romanesque style, was right next door.

As a matter of fact, it seemed to have its own express entrance to the hospital's basement, which was likely where the morgue was.

Verde was at least more prepared to deal with a criminal-serving hospital now that he was fully awake and had a few glances at what else this island had to offer. The fact the staff seemed to only conform to a uniform of scrubs and white coats half the time and three-piece suits on occasion was… not entirely unexpected.

While Bazanova was conversing with a woman in an impractical sundress manning what seemed to be the reception desk, he spent a moment cataloguing the various visible reasons these people had to seek medical attention.

There were the more usual suspects, as a man with a vivid rash spreading across his face or the woman that seemed to have broken her wrist, there was also an older man with a steak knife stuck clear through his forearm who had someone actually seated next to him plucking glass shards out of his own badly bleeding hand.

"One, it is not only impolite to stare… it can also be lethal here." A hand placed at his back might have been made of the iron she could tear through for all the leeway it gave the scientist before she propelled him forward. "And secondly, pay attention. Adrik's awake, but they are not sure for how long. Room one-oh-seven."

Hastening his pace to prevent more 'guidance', Verde made for the hallway indicated by his roughly maneuvered person.

Adrik was a more familiar person to him than Bazanova could possibly be after a bare full day.

Something familiar in this twisted amoral mirror of a tropical tourist trap would be welcome.

The man in question in a lavishly appointed recovery room was awake, speaking to a young teen girl dressed in red scrubs while a bespectacled older man dressed in a vest over starched shirt and trousers ensemble under a lab coat overlooked what she was writing down.

"Miss Bazanova, I've a bone to pick with you." Spoke the probable doctor as he entered with the named woman just behind him, sliding those half-moon glasses up his sharply bladed nose. "A word, please?"

The Russian merely glanced at him, then spoke a spiel of her native language to Adrik. She waited until he stumbled over something in return before given the supposed doctor a nod.

"Doctor Kappel, Verde here requires some blood tests to be sure he didn't pick up what Adrik got."

"And a possibly broken rib." He tacked on himself, wondering how he was to pay for medical aid.

He had the money, just in a bank account. Which, sans his wallet, left him rather divorced from his inheritance and any identification to prove he was the owner of said account.

Kappel spoke something sharpish himself to the young nurse, then followed the woman out of the hospital room.

Adrik coughed a little painfully-sounding, then cleared his throat a little awkwardly. "Shit… well, welcome to Mafia Land?"

"Are you addled?" Verde was honestly interested, because in this place he was so out of his depth it wasn't remotely amusing.

"Erm… low grade fever." The Russian he was only faintly acquainted with defended himself weakly, flopping a hand listlessly to the bed he was reclining upon. "There's an infection in my blood, apparently. And to make it worse they're using an experimental set of drugs on me. It's working… but I'm kind of fuzzy right now. Best part about this hospital, cutting edge medical advancements. Bad, well… we're the ones used as guinea pigs for human testing."

"While fascinating," and it was in a way, "I must inquire as to why I was brought here."

A tug on Verde's possibly-stolen but definitely not his shirt sleeve redirected his attention to the young red-clad nurse, who held medical implements to do the testing Bazanova had ordered.

Said nurse spoke in a trill of what he was coming to recognize as likely Russian, which Adrik helpfully translated for him.

"Avdotya want you to remove your shirt. And, as to your question, it's possible Sonya thinks I still have business with you. Which I do," pressing himself upright into a sitting position that earned him an alarmed yelp from the young nurse, "dude… where is our homework?"
"Quite possibly still in a San Jose's alleyway… and likely placed in the trash, not returned to the campus, if it had been picked up in the first place."

"…well, fuck."

---

(Sunday the 27th of April, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Verde… wasn't quite how Sonya had expected him to probably be.

"No, no, no. It is willpower, you can will it to spark."

He was quite obviously a civilian, or at least painfully green to the whole criminal thing if no longer qualifying for the label 'civilian', but at least that much had been expected when Galina sent her out after him and Adrik.

A gawky nerd kind of guy, more interested in his studies than earthly concerns. Very reserved, very dry wit, and an inclination to wait to judge until he had all the facts when you got his attention.

"That makes little sense."

She knew that much pretty well now, given the man was using her room while she bunked with Tatiana until Adrik was more available to help him figure out what to do now. Nudging the man out of her book collection in order to eat usually fell to her, given the Sun nurse's electing working hours.

"Not want, not demand, not desire, it is will. Dying Will Flames." Björn picked up his own tiny cut gem of white sapphire to give another demonstration. "Watch. I will it to spark."

Aside that mostly just ignorant fumbling that would wear off after he knew more and was more comfortable, the scientist took the opportunity to pick Björn's brain about being a Lightning while she was in the process of translating a French version of her Lightning notes.

"What is the difference? Exactly?" Verde gave his own larger chip of white sapphire a frustrated look. "I require more information."

Sonya had also took the opportunity to update her copy of the master research journal if she was copying out a section anyways, which had attracted said new Lightning's attention like a lodestone. Not even the few stories she had on Dying Will Flames in French or English had distracted the man.

"Think of… what you will do. You will be… what? It is kind of personal, but I sparked when I vowed to be useful to my Dama. She saved me from a beating, and I wished to return that assistance to the only person to interfere with my life in a positive way."

Sitting at the kitchen table of their condo suite, with a highly curious Lightning hovering over her shoulder even if he couldn't read the parts she hadn't translated for him, was a little annoying.

"...resolve?"

Verde did have the self-awareness enough to keep his mouth shut while she was working, but when she wasn't translating things for him he tended to pose a volume of questions to her in rapid progression. It was worse than initial instruction of Shamal, when the little brat had rambled his questions about anything and everything she said and how she said it.
"Um… yeah, maybe? Try, all that will happen at worst is that it will not work."

Sonya found the man kind of reckless, in his search and consumption of her research efforts. Otherwise, when he was occupied with something else once Bjørn chased him off her case, Verde was at most disinterested in anything that wasn't written down.

Aside the other Flame users he could get to.

She wasn't the only one subjected to a massive list of questions, each of the Russian Flame using nurses that he came across when visiting Adrik we exposed to the same if at a lesser rate. Sonya was tasked with translating for them if they couldn't speak English themselves.

She didn't so much mind that, the conversations were at least interesting and helped her adjust the pre-nurse course for the other Zolotov Flame users due to join their few fellows… including Kappel's complaint over the language mastery of the new nurses.

Adrik cringed every time he saw her, since he owed her for taking care of the man that saved his life until he could do it himself to repay the favor. Anything on top of that… including handling the Dying Will Flame beginning instruction, translating on demand, sending her Lackey out for clothing and necessities the scientist needed, were things he had to pay her back for.

She might owe Verde something like consideration for the whole bullet catching thing, but she was reduced to pretty much acting as the scientist's bodyguard for the time being and that canceled part of that out.

Tatiana was just highly amused at the whole situation, helping very little to curb their temporary flat-mate's attentions. Not even for an old gang mate would she take Verde on temporarily, for one she didn't have the free time to escort the Lightning around a criminal city like Mafia Land and another her job sometimes had her running off at odd times.

It was pretty much what Viper walked into, coming to fetch her Lackey to continue his financial education.

"Mist?" Verde echoed after Bjørn obeyed the Esper's curt demand to know what he was bothering with instead of the tasks he set him. "May I ask-

"No. I'm being paid to teach that moron, not answer questions." Adjusting his cowl, the miserly Mist snapped his fingers to get Sonya's Lackey to jump to it. "Hurry it up so I can finish and move on."

Scrambling for the discarded parts of his now-usual suit, the Icelander gave the scientist a hasty shrug. "Viper's… ah, Viper's not interested if you can't pay. Cash."

"I will be unavailable come June and July," Sonya informed the other absently as her Lackey scrambled around and Verde pondered something, "and I must ask you to stop using me as a threat."

"I've never directly used you as such." Viper responded with audible amusement, a wicked looking smirk crawling up the visible part of his face. "Those assumptions occurred on their own."

The thief snorted. "I suppose then it would be a bit much to ask you to stop… encouraging the assumption?"

A shrug was her answer. "I'll refute the rumors. After I have what I'm after."

Probably the best she could hope for.
Bjørn scrambled back into the main living room of the sister's condo suite, a freshly ironed suit jacket in hand and his tie loosely draped around his neck. Only to be jerked to a halt by a lacy Construct of something around his legs as Viper advanced on his hapless student to yank harshly on his beard.
"This… is not professional. Remove it."

Verde eyed the Lackey's bound legs curiously.

Sonya kind of wondered what he was thinking, ignoring the look her Icelandic aid shot to her. "Viper would know, Bjørn. And given how much I'm paying out, I highly doubt he's giving bad advice."

Besides, she had yet to get used to his beard. It was not something she saw often, massive facial hair.

While Bjørn's person was his own, she had no standards for how he looked or dressed while carrying out tasks in her name, she was currently sharing him with the Mist and it was possible he did.

Before she could return her attention to her book or put it away and pick up Verde's lesson from where her Lackey had abandoned it, the man in question turned to her curiously. "What are you costing me?"

A disgusted scoff came from Viper, either from the scientist's inquiry or from whatever defense Bjørn managed to muster for his beard. It was kind of hard to tell. The only-sometimes male Mist gave another sharp yank to the Icelandic teen's beard then turned on a heel to stalk out of the condo. "Catch up once you removed that face-rug. Sonya, another two weeks or so and I might call it good."

"Noted." She spoke to the Esper's back, waving off her Lackey when he looked to her for either dismissal or support. "Hurry it up, Bjørn."

Returning her attention to the scientist, the thief kind of wondered herself about his question.

"Adrik will pay me back for most of it. Except this teaching thing to get access to your Flames, that you do owe me something for." She started honestly enough. "Bringing you here was on someone else, so that much is not something you need to worry about. You did save me the hassle of a gunshot wound, so I do not mind putting up with you until you have other options. As Adrik claims you saved his life during one of your confrontations with the Cerrito Crime Family, Tatiana does not mind either."

"…and getting access to your book on these Dying Will Flames?" Verde questioned a bit more intently, as he had been after all of it since the moment he knew it existed. "What if I dislike the idea of relying on Adrik's aid to get out of your debt?"

"Explain." Sonya demanded sharply, abandoning her book on the coffee table set out before the sofa she was sprawled on.

She had enough people so far, frankly.

She had almost all of Tatiana's former gang, temporarily but they were still 'under her'. Adrik she wouldn't greatly impose on out of respect to her older sister's relations to the guy, so by the time Ziven would likely seek out Nikolai she'd dissolve whatever else the man owed her by then.

Galina would do whatever she'd like when that time came.

Scruffy and Bjørn were more than one thief needed, really. She had things they could aid her with, but only one of them was useful as her Lackey. Peter McScruffy was more of a personal thing, if he stuck it out with her long enough instead of wandering off or getting into trouble she might start tasking him with more important things to do with the research than just pitching in as a warm body.

"I want access to the rest of your information. The parts you have not made available to me."

"I know."

However, that was a risk she couldn't justify. Especially not if she was going to abstain from putting the scientist under her thumb.

Yeah, the man was possibly the greatest Lightning of their generation… but being owed a favor from Adrik wasn't enough to make her more comfortable in blindly handing over the entire compilation of data she had on a possible maybe that he might end up working with Cherep.

Sonya was even starting to limit what information made it into the clan's copy of her research journal, to prevent all of it getting out through inter-clan political mishandling. Galina did wonderfully in limiting the scope that was basically given away, but the Storm-Cloud was still holding a kind of grudge against that situation.

She might not mind handing the relevant parts to the people that could make use of that information, they would normally give back a bit or more for that favor. However, even the thought of handing the bulk of that kind of information to those that wouldn't or couldn't make use of it made her thief-self baulk, much less allowing someone she had no control or connections to pursue the entire thing.

The more that was added, the more the research was worth. Which… well, she was a thief. If someone else was getting their hands on the work she did or contributed to, then she had better be getting paid the worth of it.

Speaking of, she was running out of loose cash to cover yet another dependent. Bjørn and Viper were taking up the funds she had from contract running, and Peter McScruffy was living off the funds she had tried to set aside for her and the people that looked to her dues with the Zolotovs.

Verde's evenly toned voice drew her out of her thoughts. "Is that a refusal?"

"…I highly doubt you can afford that." Sonya insisted, pushing herself upright to stand and distract the man with finishing his lessons on managing to spark Lightning Flames through a piece of white sapphire.

As he had a combat-awakening, the most common way most came into their Dying Will, he had to put a lot of effort into duplicating his initial use of Flames or managing even a bit of control over voluntary usage.

"Furthermore," she continued as she took Bjørn's abandoned spot across the dining table from him, "you should first ensure you are not getting in over your head."

"Far too late for that." Observed the man tartly, picking up the stone that showed only a tiny fracture on one facet after three days of straight work on it. "My presence here alone should suggest that I am already out of my depth."

"It can get worse."

About to snap something back, probably a facetious 'how', the Lightning actually paused and looked around the condo he was currently living out of free-of-cost. Which was a far cry from a bare basement cellar he and Adrik had been imprisoned within when she found them.
"...I will give you that point."

Sonya picked up the stone Bjørn had been using as an example, but before she could start in on helping Verde figure out a reliable way to pull on his nearly unresponsive Lightning Flames Tatiana's bedroom door slammed open.

The nurse, who had finished a third-shift stint not a few hours ago, her pager clutched in one fist as she staggered into the open room. "Adrik relapsed."

"What?" Verde twisted around to fully see the rumpled Sun searching for her shoes. "I thought-"

"I don't know yet." Tatiana snapped at him irritably, straightening up with a tennis shoe in hand to rub at her left eye tiredly. "It could be anything from the medication not finishing off the infection completely or him getting sick from something major while his immune system was compromised or something we haven't even thought of. The lab should almost be done with the cultures, so we should know more in a few hours at most. Don't bother visiting today."

Having said her piece, the nurse hopped a little to pull on the shoe she didn't have on and left without so much as greeting her little sister.

"Verde." Sonya spoke up after a moment, glancing down to the stone in his hand when he shot her an irritable glance. "Anger or frustration is not the best way to reach this level."

The man instinctively released the green sparking stone, which cracked straight through the middle after it hit the tabletop. Eying his left hand, and the impression the rock had made on his fingers when he clenched it, the scientist poked the broken stone curiously.

"It took Bjørn a damn near month of steady work on it to accomplish that, with an invasion on top of everything. Congrats, you're apparently stronger than my Lackey."

Verde shot her a wary look. "...I will probably regret this, but... invasion?"

"This is Mafia Land." Sonya reminded him. "Every now and again, someone thinks about taking over the island and ruling themselves or changing one of the long-standing policies."

"How often does that happen?"

"Invasion attempts? Anywhere from once or twice every few months, if a coalition of groups get together might get up to bi-weekly or even more. How often has someone been successful in actually taking over?" Digging out a new white sapphire for him, the thief slid it across the table with a shrug. "It has happened. Last time the Italian criminal superpower Vongola took over for two weeks and banned the drug trade from being allowed to pass through here. That was... almost thirty years ago."

Han-yue, the sisters' Fut Gar instructor, would talk more to Tatiana than Sonya. However, she had lived on the island for almost forty years since it was officially opened up as a vacation destination.

The Korean woman had been initially brought in as an enforcer for one of the long-gone hostess establishments and managed to secure a job teaching the island's residents self-defense after it fell.

It provided the Storm-Cloud more motivation and patience in getting the old bitch to regard her less as a threat and more as just any other student. She wanted those stories.

"Now, try that again. Without getting frustrated or shocked or getting irritated." Lightly flicking the stone placed on the table so it would hit him in the chest, the thief prepared herself for a few solid hours of likely answering a spread of yet more questions. "Do not be surprised if it takes you even longer than this last attempt. It is generally how this part goes."

(Sunday the 27th of April, 1969 continued. Socialist Republic of Croatia.)

"No."

"Lal."

"Stop calling me that." Lieutenant Commander Lalia Murgia snapped over one shoulder near-reflexively, at the blond man who was proving to be both infuriatingly persistent and gallingly competent at his job. "We're not conceding. There is a way to win this, without losing half or more of the troops."

The Socialist Republic of Croatia's military had the better position and the advantage of home ground, as they had the lesser numbers and were more inexperienced than COMSUBIN. As Defiant Seed's operating procedures stated, her mission was leading a mix of trainees and a speckle of seasoned soldiers through a Croatian defended front to a designated field outside of the city of Šibenik.

Lalia did not intend to let some near-brand new upstart Soviet state beat her even ill-trained selection of COMSUBIN forces. They were good, yes… but she and COMSUBIN was better.

She had to use the better trained soldiers to get their lesser competent fellows through the defended zone, that much she couldn't change. If she left the rookies in charge they'd likely go harrying off to do something stupid like storm a fully defended base out of misguided heroism.

For the same reason she couldn't task the more competent enlisted with other duties, they were needed to provide the better example to follow and supply needed situational support if things went wrong.

Then there was her squad, which was peppered with a generous helping of both rookies and leaders… and one very annoying blond sniper.

Looking around the command tent they had been issued, one of three tents allotted for COMSUBIN force's use during the war games, Lalia contemplated the assets she had to work with.

Two Sergeants who were decent cavalry scouts, a Lieutenant communications officer, a Chief Marshal pulling duty as her field commander, three Chief Corporal-Majors, six fresh-faced soldiers… and that sniper that irritated the hell out of her.

"This is what we're going to do. The men will go up the west bank of the Krka River, well past the city of Šibenik, then cross the river and double back to reach our end-goal. Chief Marshal, your job is to keep them together and keep their heads down. Take the scouts with you to help navigate, duck into the river if you need the cover, but get the men up there before dawn tomorrow." Turning to the lone Lieutenant, she eyed the short-wave radios one of the other rookies and the blond recruit had somehow acquired for him. "Your job is to keep pace and call in anyone threatening either flank or any barricades to my group. Take two of the rookies to help you cover the needed space."

That left her with four more wet-behind-the-ears soldiers and that one she was pretty sure was suicidal.

Lalia was good with a semi-automatic rifle, but she had to admit Cornello Grillo was better with a long-range rifle than her. If he somehow survived this without her putting a bullet through his head, then she'd maybe recommend him for a fast-track officer's commission.

It might be what the annoyingly cheerful sniper was after, but she intended to personally ensure he regretted ever entertaining ambitions in COMSUBIN. Especially for flirting with her the first time they met and keeping up with it after being brushed off.

…although she had to admit throwing things at his head when he hit on her was a wonderful stress-relieving, but she could spend time on a firing range for about the same effect. Except for times like now, when there wasn't a range around.

"You five… we're going to provide a distraction." Even if Lalia got captured, as long as the bulk of her forces reached the target point she would still win.

She didn't intend to get captured, but the possibility was there.

Hopefully hit-and-run tactics would pull scrutiny off the main host of her forces, letting them slip by without too much action.

As it was the last stretch of this war game, she didn't find joining the field at this late date was that risky. Her forces had managed to get themselves off the island they had been airlifted to without alerting the opposition quickly, managed getting up the coast and all but the last twenty-five kilometers as a cohesive unit, until they ran into the 'defiant' part of the game.

"What do we have to spare, Chief Marshal?"

"Two Beretta Modellos, enough Mannlicher M-one-eight-nine-fives to give at least one to each of you, and Private Grillo's non-standard Fucile Armaguerra Model thirty-nine." The older man actually sounded amused as he tacked on the blond rookie's preferred rifle he lugged around everywhere with him. "Five smoke grenades are left, an entire box of flares, and two binoculars. The rest I require to give the men field experience."

"That's fine." Lalia could just about make off with that one crate of flares and manage on her own…but this was to give the lesser trained soldiers more useable experience in a mostly-friendly military operation. "As soon as the sun sets, set the men on the march. Get things started, people."

Planting the butt of his ever-present rifle on the floor, the blond annoying the ever-loving hell out of her joined her uninvited in watching the controlled chaos kicked into gear at her dismissal. "You know, Lal…. if you wanted to take a moonlight walk with me, you only had to ask."

…she would not shoot the asshole until she was given the green light to torture the idiot to turn him into a COMSUBIN-grade officer. He would regret every damn time he had the gall to hit on her.

Pressing her lips together, the Lieutenant Commander gave the irritant a pleasant smirk instead of using the butt of her service piece to smack that sly look off his face.

"I would highly suggest you invest in some good body armor." She informed the man, looking for something to pitch in with and getting even more frustrated when she found nothing that needed an extra pair of hands.

---

(Monday the 28th of April, 1969. Socialist Republic of Croatia.)

Lalia crept through the sparse ground cover with two of her squad, picking their way through past two patrolling squads of Croatians.

One of her soldiers was carrying a good two dozen of the spare flares, and Grillo was using his scope instead of needing one of their binoculars to scan the ground up ahead.

Her other four men were set up to ambush a patrol once oh-one-thirty rolled around, meaning they had less than fifteen minutes to get into a position to create a distraction that would hopefully let them disengage and head for the spot she had picked for a rendezvous.

"...two, on the far side." Grillo reported as she scaled a lone tree for the height. "Gap looks like... three minutes at best."

Checking his estimation herself, the Lieutenant Commander had to admit he had a good sense for timing the speed of patrols. Given their collective speed, or what should be their speed to stealthily cross a field, they should be able to make it. "Right, leapfrog across the field in sequence. Run fifteen seconds, wait for the other two to hit, wait thirty before running your next stretch, until we hit the closer corner. If they look this way field crawl instead on your own judgement. Go."

The sniper dashed off first, and the soldier holding their flares counted down the seconds under his breath nervously. Making a mental note he was a little fast, Lalia put her boots on the ground as he darted off himself.

Taking a moment to be sure if she moved she wouldn't be spotted, the COMSUBIN officer followed her soldiers on. She hit the ground a little hard the first time, misjudging how much give it would have this far away from the Krka River.

The sniper purposely held his position a bit longer than she appreciated but ducked the last sweep the pair gave before leaving the side of the base they were assaulting. As the soldier behind him went too quickly, it evened out enough so that Lalia was the one that had to duck the next patrol.

Crawling forward on her stomach and dragging her lower body across dirt and grass was just as uncomfortable as she remembered it, but she reached the wall just after the patrol passed her. Hauling herself to a crouched position revealed Grillo was closer than his fellow, and it only took them seconds to reassemble themselves to actually sneak into the selected base.

"Now what?"

Lalia double-checked to be sure she had the rubber rounds loaded in her service pistol. "Now? We storm the base and plant those flares in a... tank. Or something else large and attention getting."

"Can we steal the tank instead?" Grillo had copied her in double checking his rifle, even if it was still probably lethal at close enough range and flashed her a cheeky grin as he crept past the two of them to take the forward position.

Leveling a glare at the back of the sniper's head, the Lieutenant Commander held in her temper because shooting now would just give their position away.

If he tried that... she was going to run him over with the tank.

Her now weirdly calm flare carrying soldier looked between her and the sniper, then quietly snuck off after the other man.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 28th of April, 1969 continued. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)
"Adrik is very lucky we get a discount these days." Tatiana informed both Sonya and Verde tiredly over the dinner table, picking over the ribollita soup the thief had picked up instead of try cooking that night. "Appendicitis on top of the blood poisoning and, since we only treated the infection and not the appendix issues, it worsened to acute appendicitis until Kappel ordered more x-rays and caught it."

The scientist, who had not been happy to be dragged out of the book he had selected that day for after his Flame lessons for something as trite as dinner, looked up from his own listless poking of their food. "…so, did that occur when we were being assaulted?"

"It's possible. It wasn't on the first set of x-rays, but we weren't inspecting his guts just his bones then." Pausing to swallow a spoonful of the thick vegetable soup, the nurse gave him a shrug. "Entirely subjective if it happened before or after being admitted."

"He requires surgery then?" Sonya asked, really not that interested in Adrik's medical worries. Not because she didn't really care about the guy, she did as long as Tatiana did, but because if anyone could make the man healthy again it was Kappel and her sister.

"Had it." The Sun informed her between her next bites of the soup. "On antibiotics again, he should get better now and stay that way. Hopefully. Unless something else happens to set him back."

The Storm-Cloud might care, but she didn't care that much. Now completely disinterested in the conversation involving her sister's old gang member, she ignored the questions Tatiana posed to Verde in hopes of narrowing down exactly when the Russian's appendix gave out.

"Nya? Hello?"

Pausing with a spoon in her mouth, the thief looked back up from her portion of dinner.

Tatiana gave her a wan smile. "Can you scrape up the money for Adrik's hospital bills as well? I know you picked up Verde's and Adrik owes you that as well, but I can't cover the entirety of it myself. We'll pay you back… just later."

…mother fucker.

Sonya stabbed the vegetables left in the bottom of her bowl a few times, trying to remember how much she had free for random things and how much of that her Lackey had gone through under Viper. Good thing she planned on another spree, with the rate she was going through her funds she would need it to not end up broke again.

"…I think I can. If anything, I can take some of the money I have set aside for my dues and Bjørn's and replace it later."

"Thanks, Nya. I'll ensure he pays you back quickly."

"What happens if you are unable to pay?" Verde inquired to the nurse curiously.

Tatiana laughed weakly, spoon paused halfway to her lips. "Trust me, you don't want to know. We can piece you back together, but… doctors can be surprisingly bloodthirsty too. Especially when they feel they aren't appreciated very well."

"I don't think that happens very often." It was the first time she had heard of it, and the thief couldn't recall if anyone she had ever saw on the island had been rumored to have tried to stiff the hospital on a bill.
"Mostly during invasions, when the bill collectors get a bit overworked." Confided the nurse as a matter of fact, waving her spoon about as she talked. "Most of the people here have the kinds of funds saved to pay even a towering hospital bill, or their syndicates will pick up the tab. But those just visiting, and those sent in to try taking over the island, are different stories."

The scientist glanced to the doorway that connected to the rest of the floor the Zolotov Clan owned. "Would your syndicate not pay for Adrik?"

"Erm… maybe? Adrik's not done much but pay the minimum dues for the last couple years. And… he got injured and sick while on his own time. It would be different if it was me or Nya, so… possibly not. I'd rather not risk it."

"Wait… why am I different?" Sonya interrupted, confused.

She knew why Tatiana was, the healer closest to getting her doctor's license was something any organization would shell out the cash to keep in good health.

"Nya, sweetie. Really?" Flashing a smirk at her younger sister the nurse dropped her spoon to her empty bowl, so she could serve herself seconds. "With the work you do, and the importance of your Dying Will Flame research, the clan would likely pay any of the reasonable bills you might rack up. Especially if it would cement their hold on your ass."

Verde suddenly dropped his own spoon into the half-full bowl of his own. "So that is your own work? The journal you transcribed me a passage on Lightning Flames from?"

"…mine and a few others." Sonya confirmed warily, shoot her sister an annoyed look for spilling that apple cart. "I can only use Storm and Cloud, so I had to find others to write in the others."

"Whoops." Was Tatiana's entirely unapologetic comment, getting up with her second bowl of soup to escape the likely conversation that would happen now. "You know someone would mention it eventually, Nya."

Beating a hasty retreat, the nurse ducked out of the room to likely finish her food and go back to sleep now that the emergency that called her out was over.

The thief decided to go back to eating instead of pay attention to the increasingly pointed glare being aimed at her from the scientist.

"Why will you not supply the rest of it to me?"

"…mainly? I want to see where you go without it." Sonya admitted flatly, shooting the man an irritated look of her own. "We, and I mean the Zolotov Clan, are not going to hold onto you. For one, only I have any kind of hold on you and I do not feel like dragging you into that. For another, I think you can do more on your own than get into the work already done."

Verde looked suddenly less ticked off at least, but annoyance was still painted across his features. "And how do you postulate I can do so? I only hold these Lightning Flames, according to the exercises you have tasked me to accomplish."

Abandoning her own only half-finished dinner, the thief pushed her food away and crossed her arms under her chest. "By finding other French Flame users. I have contacts in Italy that would likely have good intelligence on the syndicates of France. Once Adrik is back on his feet, I have a month of contracts to run then I am due in Italy for personal reasons. I can ask for well-known syndicates and what they're involved in, you and Adrik can pick through them for one you can join for the protection."
"You sound sure Adrik would do so. We have only known each other for a few months."

"You saved his life, Verde. Or at least Adrik thinks so. To balance that out, him helping you find someplace you can thrive not just survive is not that much of a stretch." She had no information but the children's stories on Dying Will Flames from France, and since he was a native son Verde would be a lot less suspicious when asking around.

"If you wish to see where I go with the information, then I still require the basics of all the types." Verde concluded shrewdly, pressing the finally correct prescription glasses up the bridge of his nose. "You would also require frequent checks on my progress."

"You are not exactly in any position to negotiate here." Sonya pointed out shortly, even if the asshole had a point. "But I will give you that I will need to supply the barest basics of the other types and keep in contact. Eventually."

"Your proposed experiment is already contaminated," pointed out the scientist blandly, "you allowed me to converse with the Russian trained users of Dying Will, from your sister to the other nurses in the hospital. Some of whatever I would eventually conclude would be based somewhat on the information I gained through speaking with them."

"You will also have to make it through the Italians' views on Dying Will Flame users that will likely try to influence your own findings." She countered, getting steadily more irritated with both the man and the whole topic. "There are reams of misinformation you will have to work through in order to find the true facts, validate or discard old superstitions, attempt to replicate legends, and the widespread misconceptions that are only partially true because certain users believe they are. I am not interested in anything but confirmation for the basics I have, I am more interested in the direction you go in to make use of it all."

"…you know, most scientist are given grants to research into various topics."

"Oh, for fuck's sake."

"In light of the services rendered already, I can agree to both the aims and directions you have posed." Verde concluded with a very irritating self-satisfied smirk, pushing away from the kitchen table to likely wander back to her books given for scientist distraction while he was waiting for Adrik to get out of the hospital. "I will await a basic copy of the universal facts about each type of Dying Will Flames, as well as a list of suggestions for French criminal syndicates."

"I am pretty sure I am supposed to be the thief here. And I did not agree to that." Leaving the table herself, she'd put away the leftovers in a bit or take it to the vory also on this floor for them to finish off, Sonya hurried after the man. "What each Flame is known for, physical descriptions, possible personality types that are known to show certain Flames when they pop, and the few ways each we have found that one may kill themselves via them."

Stopping short just before her room, which was technically his for the time being, the Lightning turned around to face her again. "I will also need to know what the views of Italy’s criminal syndicates are, as well as your own Soviet Union’s views, in order to test both. All of it."

"You have adapted to this whole criminal cut-throat business rather quick." Sonya observed dryly. "You can probably gain Italy's view on the subject easily, and if you continue in the vein you already have you will likely acquire my motherland's. Only after you have decided you have the basics will I supply the version we have discovered for comparison."

"I learn quickly." Was Verde's dry observation, before the man shrugged. "I can agree to those terms. Now, how much will you pay me for this?"

"You are really pushing your luck. If I was not the one responsible for your continued good health…"

"Indeed, I am aware of that. But as this will provide me and possibly Adrik leeway for choosing my next move as carefully as dealing with criminal groups require, I feel I must be reckless to obtain the best position possible."

Thinking about it critically, the thief had to admit he might have a point. Not that she quite appreciated it but having a commission under his belt would make him a bit more desirable over even his Lightning Flames.

It would be a real waste if Verde got tasked to soaking up bullets in high-risk situations. He’d be good for it, once he got voluntary control over his Flames, but again it wasn't what he was probably best for.

She had to check, but she was pretty sure Renato introducing her around Vongola's top echelon as a Soviet Flame Expert might actually help the Frenchman in getting a more science-orientated role instead of a combat one.

"Twenty-five thousand, francs."

"Eighty thousand, euros. I've seen the prices around here."

Sonya paused, because yet again he had a point. Everything was more expensive in tourist traps, and Mafia Land wasn't quite that different. "Forty. I will not have the money until the end of the month, but you may remain on my tab until you leave."

Verde weighted that for a long moment himself. "Sixty, as it is I will be heading right into another criminal commune with inflated prices until I establish myself."

"Fifty, and I expect priority if I ever pose an inquiry to you."

"That should go without saying." After another moment of consideration, the man gave her a sharp nod and held out a hand. "Agreed. I look forward to working with you, mademoiselle Bazanova."

Giving him a rather sharp smile of her own, the thief gripped his hand hard enough he winced. "Charmed and call me Sonya."

Extracting his likely smarting hand from her grip, the scientist gave a rather strained looking smile back. "Gilles Verninac."

"I do not care." She tossed over her shoulder, intending to have words with her elder sister before the nurse could pretend to sleep on her. "But I will advise you to remain with 'Verde' for security reasons. Those like me can hunt your family and hometown through full names."

"…understood."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 28th of April, 1969 continued. Istanbul, Republic of Turkey.)

Cherep coughed painfully, feeling a few of his ribs snap back into place at the harsh jarring movement.
Fifteen or twenty more seconds before he could move his upper body without too much pain.

That was a sensation he had not missed in the years between getting kidnapped and being taken in by Lisa and Arseniy. Kind of made him wonder why he kept risking himself by doing stunts that might end up hurting like this but knew full well the next time he succeeded the high and cheers would make it worth the aches.

Thankfully, it seemed as if his shoulder was only dislocated now, not completely broken in a few places.

Of course, it would be the weekend show after Viper left when he messed up again and the Mist couldn't help distract from the admittedly terrible crash that ruined another motorcycle on him. At least he wouldn't have to pay the Esper as well as replace Betsy.

The stuntman had thought he could regain control of a ballistic bike after the rear wheel had clipped the hoop he had been jumping through, so he hadn't released his grip and dropped to the safety net Master Liam had insisted to supply for his shows. Turned out to be a very bad idea, and he could now confidently say shoulder checking the ground at nearly fifty kilometers per hour hurt like hell.

He'd need another meter of ramp at least before trying that one again.

Another deep breath didn't make his diaphragm twinge in agony again, so the undying Cloud got up to deal with his dislocated shoulder. Belatedly recalling the last time he had to reset his own shoulder socket, he probed his collar bone to ensure that wasn't broken as well.

"Ah... Skull. You have... visitors." Claimed the circus master from outside the performers' tent where the stuntman had been set to recover from his latest crash. "These gentlemen are... ah..."

Knowing criminal types and how they postured themselves when they had something to prove, Cherep was totally unsurprised two rather muscular men forced their way into the tent without Liam ever giving them permission to. Eyeing each of them in turn, the Cloud slowly reached up to clutch his right shoulder and suddenly wrenched it back into place with a sickening sounding pop.

"How can the Great Skull help you two?" He drawled in his best 'Skull' voice, which Viper had helped him make as arrogant and shallow sounding as his vocal cords allowed. "I'm afraid autographs are at least two euros each, gentlemen."

The beefier of the two merely eyed him severely, but his rat-faced companion gave a greasy-looking smile. "Oh, while we might be fans of your shows... we're not here for autographs.

"The after-party isn't until later morning then, if you wanted to go drinking with a great stuntman like I." Sniffing, half pompously and half to prevent a likely nosebleed from having his head rattled hard spring up and make him even more suspiciously healthy after a bad crash, Cherep flicked his wrist and placed his other hand on his hip. "Other than that, I couldn't begin to guess what two people like you would want with the Great Skull de Mort."

"That was a really nasty crash, de Mort." The rat-faced of the pair, which to be honest wasn't really rodent looking but it made the stuntman feel better even if it was petty, insisted ambling a few steps forward deeper into the tent. "It's surprising you're standing there looking perfectly fine."

Deny or distract?

"Death hates me." Skull decided on in a split second, taking any longer would just stroke their suspicions and he was a showman. "Aside that little bone of contention, I will admit the Great Skull is a lucky bastard when it comes to stunts going wrong."
Thank the Lord bruises weren't covered by his abilities, he had more than enough to show in order to throw off these two. Holding his right arm low and stiff, the Cloud stuntman awkwardly peeled off his leather jacket to finish checking himself over for anything too out of the place so his Flames could finish knitting himself back together.

Broken bones were harder to spot through skin than bruises, so it was the lesser risk.

"Nasty." Observed the bigger man blandly, in a voice that was hilariously a few octaves higher than Skull had assumed such a big guy would speak in.

"You! Are awesome. The Great Skull has changed his mind. We're going drinking, now."

Abandoning his riding leathers, the stuntman snatched up the tee-shirt he had been wearing before gearing up for his show and ignored his face was still caked with purple makeup. "How do you feel about stunts and circus acts?"

"Skull… a word before you go harrying off?" Liam posed from the tent's flaps in a perfectly pitched tone halfway between disproving and concern, not a hit of the worry that had to be running through the circus master's mind. "And what would your doctor say?"

"Not to mix my medicine." Tatiana would cut out the middleman and murder him herself once or twice if he tried something so stupid. "Besides, alcohol works just as much as these pills to dull pain."

It was true, just not something Skull required very often. The lingering pain was dulling down to a manageable and ignorable level and getting these two drunker than skunks would make anything they said seem exaggerated and possibly not true when they reported back to wherever.

"But sure. Gentlemen? Give me a moment, then we'll hit up whichever bar is the closest."

He got a suspicious eyeball from the rat-faced of the pair, but big beefy was mollified by Skull's enthusiasm over his admittedly jarring natural voice to shoo the man on to hopefully get that drink with someone that appreciated that feature.

Entirely likely he had been harassed for that before, especially by his slimy partner. He seemed the type to tear down even his 'backup' just because.

Liam switched from the circus' official language of his native German to Cherep's Czech. "Cherep, should you…?"

"Running is worse and trying to hide anything will just provoke them to dig deeper." Reassured the Cloud in the same language, rolling his sore shoulders to get his shirt on now that he wasn't being eyeballed for supernatural immunity to pain or damage. "You know this is the best option of the bad ones, Master Liam. I'll be fine, I know how they work."

"By possibly getting drunk with two men suspicious of you?" Liam questioned in a desert-dry dubious tone of voice. "Yes, wonderful plan my young friend. If your younger sister asks, I protested this course of action."

"I'll be sure to mention your vigorous protests to her if the subject ever comes up." Clapping the man on the shoulder, the stuntman gave him a backward wave. "Besides, Jaq taught me a few tricks to make it look like I'm drinking more than I should while only really downing half or less of it."
"It's kind of hard, you know. With a voice like this." The muscular George, probably wasn't his name but Skull was going to call him George anyways, mused in his jarringly high natural tenor. "I look like a tough guy, I can intimidate just about anyone by standing a little too close… but the moment I open my mouth…"

"I can imagine man… but the Great Skull still maintains that you sound completely awesome."

Skull had to mouth the few fingers of straight whisky, but as it wasn't Skull his Flames still boiled most the alcohol off before he swallowed under the suspicious eye of George's rat-faced fellow.

Tatiana had so many ideas to use from their younger sister's continuing discoveries, especially working around the fact that five or six out of seven types didn't have Storm Flames for different possibilities. Swallowing burning hot whisky-flavored liquid was a little hard, but then generally swallowing fifty proof or more liquor was anyways for him.

His Flame-induced heat can't harm himself, indeed. Unexpectedly awesome Chinese Triad skill to boil suspicious water and cooking off alcohol before swallowing for the win.

Woo, criminals. Sarcasm fully intended.

"Or," Skull continued, after setting down the tumbler he was drinking out of for another refill, "you could go into show business yourself. I mean, I know you seem to not like your voice, but it is pretty awesomely jarring. Make it your own, instead of a thing to be ashamed of. Radio personas aren't seen. Or, if you can do it, you'd have a decently good career in comedies playing a role as an unexpectedly competent but awesomely voiced thug-typed muscle man. But you'd be making money for it, making it work for you."

George was a depressive drunk, so he was pretty sure no decision would be reached right now. The point of the conversation was that the little niggling ideas he had just planted in the man's head would be highly distracting for him until he decided on what to do with it.

That just left him with George's pointy sharp featured partner.

Risky to go drinking with two possible criminal types?

Undoubtedly. Especially on his lonesome, without even asking some of Sonya's old circus friends like Jaq or even Crina to join them.

However, 'Skull' was supposed to be reckless and overconfident to a jarring degree. More so than most criminals would want to deal with for longer than a few hours or so, and especially not someone they would want to scout out for long or contemplating recruiting.

It made him uncomfortable to be here more or less alone and put himself out like this in a situation he knew wasn't safe, but he had always intended to use this method to throw off any unwanted criminal attention he ended up with.

Having foster parents like his and two criminal sisters that worried after him on top of a good friend who was a bit more than crooked their-self meant the Cloud was very damn well prepared with his 'persona' for the inevitable attention his undying skills earned him.

Mr. Rat-face wasn't going to be the one to upset his picked lifestyle or career, or his name wasn't Cherep Bazanov.

"So... you've been kind of quiet." Also kind of charry about his own drinking, merely matching the stuntman for every other glass. "Anything you'd like to ask the Great Skull?"

Squinting at him, and a not so stealthy side glance at the bottle of whisky they were sharing, the man gave a crooked smirk as he set his own tumbler down for a refill. "I was wondering how you survived that spill earlier. It looked nasty."

Equally crooked teeth. Not that it had any bearings on the conversation, but the Cloud gave it a moment of attention anyways.

"Erm... heh, so long as it remains between us... I think I could tell you." Slinging an arm over both George's and his less awesome partner, Skull brought them both in close. "It's... stage illusions. The ramp looks to be higher than the stands because the stands are built low. So, while it was painful... not really life threatening."

"...seriously?"

"I know... I want to do it all without the stage tricks, but my circus master is way too cautious about it all." Putting a mournful tone in his voice even if he wasn't really feeling that was too easy, just thinking about having to replace poor Betsy did the job. "Maybe he has a point about it."

Putting his right arm over George's shoulder had made it twinge really painfully, so the wince was completely natural as he let the twosome go.

"...meh, still think I could do it." Skull picked up the half-empty bottle and poured three times for each of the empty tumblers on the table they were seated at. "Do me a favor and keep that under your hats... not that we're wearing any."

Reckless, a bit stupidly overconfident, and arrogant comments right there. He was pretty proud of also mismatching it to his slightly exaggerated painful movements.

George absently clicked his filled glass against the stuntman's, his rat-faced partner sourly following suite in the next second.

"And on that note, I probably need to start heading back. I've got to salvage what I can of my bike and probably a visit to the hospital tomorrow to look forward to." Actually swallowing his next mouthful of liquor without altering it, the Cloud slammed his tumbler upside down on the table. "George, I'll leave you the bottle just because you are that awesome."

George blinked at him blearily a few times. "George? ...my name is Mikko."

"Even better." Slapping the man on the shoulder on his way out, the stuntman left the bar and spent a tense few minutes waiting for someone to jump him on his way back to the circus.

When nothing like that happened, Skull breathed out a relieved sigh.
Close, but no cigar he thought as he wandered only slightly unstably on his way out of the township.

Might not be a great idea to immediately contact either of his sisters or his foster parents. He kind of wanted to in order to reassure them his plans for his life, not to mention his backup plans, were working as intended.

Maybe Master Liam would agree to give him a bit longer on the mid-summer break, in order to replace his bike or just for the 'recovery' illusion he now had to put up.

...damn it, what was he going to replace Betsy with?

(Tuesday the 29th of April, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"You either have the biggest set of balls I've ever seen or have no idea what you just risked." Adrik informed Verde in a deadpan tone of voice. "I can't quite figure which one applies."

Verde flicked his glasses up absently, turning a page in the report he was reading. "I have no idea what you are going on about."

"...you realize those red rose tattoos the girls have mean they've murdered before, right?" The Russian continued in a bemused tone. "I know Sonya's being very... accommodating, but she's kind of forced to be so since you took a bullet for her. If she was even a touch less duty-bound, I think she might have killed you for that arrogance. Or at least break your hand for it."

The scientist looked up sharply. "Who has she killed?"

"We don't ask those kinds of questions, man."

"I still don't see how you think I have either erred or overstepped myself." Verde picked up the topic a few moments later, after a moment to mentally adjust his views of the women he was living with to include the description of 'murderesses' instead of just 'criminals'. "Negotiations for future services is a generally accepted feature of discussing future business transactions."

Adrik shifted a little painfully on his medical bed, sliding down a little likely to take more pressure off the healing incisions in his abs. "Negotiations? Is that what they're calling it today..."

"If you have nothing constructive to offer with that criticism-"

"Okay. Let me try to put this into perspective for you. Criminals tend to negotiate with the number of bones they're going to be breaking and causing blunt force trauma, a bit more often with how many of your teeth they'd like to pull or break." His tone was completely flat, which didn't help the newfound Lightning much. "I'd highly advise you to avoid Sonya the very moment she's no longer responsible for your continued health."

"She does not seem-"

"...the type to hold a grudge? You're entirely wrong in that, she's turned getting her revenge into a skill set. Utterly disinterested right up until she has the perfect moment to get back at whoever. Until then, she'll remember. When we were kids, she had this thing about those talking shit about her siblings." The Russian's tone was very certain, and given Verde now knew how long this group of Russians had known another it was more than likely he knew what he was talking about. "We had mandatory combat-classes, and each week at least one or two of us had broken fingers from her. It was fucking creepy, because her expression never changed from her usual blandly bored one even when breaking someone."

There was a pause.

"Like seriously creepy. Serial killer grade creepy. As bored as she normally is, breaking a bunch of snot-nosed brats' finger bones without so much as a smirk or flinch."

"At least you will admit it."

Adrik barked out a laugh, groaned as the action pulled on his stitching and the drain put into the incision to drain away the remains of his infection, and pretty much folded over from the pain. "Yeah… no, we were a bunch of fucking pricks way back when. Her, me, just about everyone else from our neighborhood I could name. Of course, you don't stay that way for long when those you wrong can get even the next time we had combat classes. We learned to respect each other real damn fast."

"You are in an oddly reminiscent mood." Considering he had never heard such a thing out of the man before in their months of acquaintance, it did deserve comment.

"They got me on the good drugs… and seeing the sisters together again? Reminds me of a lot of things."

Putting a finger into the loose papers in his hands, the scientist took a moment to study the other man's slightly feverish complexion. "And having your finger bones broken is one of such things?"

"Not mine, precisely." Carefully positioning himself, the Russian equally as judiciously shrugged the shoulder furthest away from his healing surgery wounds. "I never said they were good memories. Some of them are, but… well. We didn't exactly have pleasant childhoods."

Verde set aside the report he was no longer reading, as it was his own copy of Sonya's Lightning Flame research he had already read through a few times before.

Since young Bjørn had returned to his usual tasks under the reticent Mist Viper, he had been receiving instructions directly from the Russian Storm-Cloud. However, the woman in question had a finite amount of patience and some work of her own to complete on her plans for the coming month and so he often got exiled to the recovering Adrik's bedside.

Besides, a rambling drug-fueled discourse over a way the criminals raised their next generations might be more interesting that recovering information he already knew. "How so?"

The Russian might've been drugged up, but he wasn't delirious. His question earned a suspicious side-eye, not an in-depth answer. "Did you really expect us to have good ones?"

"I am not unaware of the statistical probability of what type of early years most criminal—"

"See, that's bullshit." Adrik interrupted sardonically. "You think that abuse or living off the streets was why we turned to crime to support ourselves? What of those Ivy League lawyers and politicians that turn to in-trading and blackmail? What excuse do they have?"

When he remained silent pondering that point, the man continued.

"Tatiana, Sonya, and I were raised for this life like some people raise kids to become athletes or artists or to take over the family farm. It wasn't fuzzy Hallmark shit, but probably better than most orphans and a portion of the lower-class brats in even first world countries have it."
Verde blinked that sharp rebuke. "That is not what the under-

"Most civilians like to think criminals are ill-educated thugs who just continue some habit of violence acts from childhood to our adult lives. And frankly, it's convenient to let those who would never need our services to look down on us. Makes them underestimate the conmen and overlook those of us that need to operate under their radar." Holding up a finger before he could speak the rest of this thought after being interrupted so rudely, the Russian posed a few more questions. "Did you ever suspect that Dying Will Flames exist before you popped? That your lab partner was a thief before this? You didn't expect a college student to be a full-fledged criminal, did you?"

"Well… no."

"We are about as diverse as any other multinational group or world-wide organization you could name. Just… a little more vicious than most."

"I have everything but the paper diploma for a master's degree in Foreign Affairs." Sonya interjected blandly from the doorway, leaning against the jam and crossing her arms under her chest. "Tatiana legally qualifies as a nurse in about thirty countries, and in two years will be a fully qualified doctor."

"Not quite ill-educated thugs, are we?" Adrik gave a careful shrug, beckoning his fellow Russian thief further into his recovery room. "What's going on, boss lady?"

"Are you really going to call me that? I thought it was Galina's title for Tats."

"It is, but since you pretty much outright own my ass right for now?"

Sonya huffed dismissively at him, then glanced at Verde. "I need to steal your Lightning. If I am to leave this weekend, he must be able to protect himself while you are still shaky."

"…how are you going to do that?"

"I would be interested in that as well." The scientist spoke up for himself, not sure what to do with the information just dumped on him as well as the Russians talking over his head when he was present.

The lithe blond woman gave him an utterly pleasant little smile. "I am going to punch you through a few walls."

Adrik mouthed 'I told you so' while she wasn't looking at him, switching to a likely faked mien of concern when she turned back to the bedridden Russian. "Won't that kill him? I thought you wanted him alive?"

"He is a Lightning. As long as he can Harden even a fraction of himself as he did when you saw his Flames pop for the first time, then he will be fine." Turning back to the man being discussed, Sonya lost the pleasant smile for a more serious look. "While the method we have been teaching you will result in a similar end result eventually… you are annoying enough I feel you might require some control of your ability sooner rather than later."

"…you'll forgive me if I am still dubious over the prospect of surviving an assault you make upon my person."

She merely shrugged. "We will work up to it. Adrik, I am leaving Sunday."

"Erm…" Adrik looked down at himself, and the drain that was lodged in the incision made during his surgery. Due to the need for the drain, the surgery wound would not be healed in time for the end of the weekend. "…Sonya?"

"Tats has the day off after I go. If worse comes to worse, I am leaving her with enough money to bribe Viper into helping out." She glanced at him, then back to the other Russian. "Not enough for questions, however."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 29th of April, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

Sonya lit her cigarette with a curious new trick she had wondered about.

…because why know how to breath fire if she wasn't going to use it?

She could use her knife juggling skills to whip around her axes and hammers, and her acrobatic skills in both her spars and set-up for her heists. Hadn't had a chance to try bullshitting someone as she had led others into Crina's grips, but she tended to avoid talking to people unless she couldn't anyways.

Blowing a concentrated stream of burning hot air over the tip of her cigarette still lit it, tiny flecks of red Flame licking the sharp exhale showing how she conjuring the heat. It wasn't quite the same as lighting one with a swipe of a fingertip, but the trick wasn't that different in execution.

Merely a bit of added air to extend her range.

Now she knew how to breathe fire using her Storm Flames and just about anything as an accelerant. Maybe even just water…

That was a curious thought, what did her Storm Flames do to pure H2O?

"This is not a place that seems conducive to the experimentation you have suggested." Verde observed dryly, gingerly seating himself in the chair across the café table across from her. "Expressly not the initial proposition you started with."

It was a little strange to have the French Lightning scientist in the spot an Italian Sun hitman normally occupied. Sonya took a second to ponder over the weird vibe she was getting from this slightly different situation than normal. "That is for another time. As I said, we will work up to that. Give me your hand."

"Why?"

She just stared until the man with a hand stretched out to take his left.

"…I may have heard that you used to break fingers some time ago."

"Years ago, yes." She admitted to it blandly, suspecting that Adrik had been the one to tell him about that once-habit of hers. "I have upgraded to amputations or merely crushing all the bones in the hand if truly irritated."

Verde's expression was completely deadpan as he firmly kept his hands to himself. "That is not reassuring."

"It was not supposed to be. Now give me your damn hand."

Visibly steeling himself for a moment, the scientist slowly complied.

Sonya gripped his left by the wrist as soon as it was far enough, then jabbed the lit end of her cigarette into his middle finger knuckle joint. Tightening her grip and placing her thumb over the corresponding finger to hold everything in place when the man swore viciously and tried to jerk his hand back.

It took another two seconds before Verde recalled his Flames were an option and desperately summoned his flickering green energy to where she was burning him. Letting go before she could find out what happened when unfocused Lightning Flames hit another not the user, the thief leaned back in her chair while the man cradled his injured digits close to his chest.

If she was that curious, she'd ask Galina what happened when that occurred.

"Mon Dieu," the man muttered under his breath, examining the ash-flecked blister now rising on his knuckle before looking back at her, "what was that for?"

"You have until I finish my cigarette then we will try that again." Flicking the squashed end of her smoke to knock the rest of the ash off, Sonya replaced it back between her lips. "Tats has volunteered to heal you tonight and tomorrow. Today you risk only burns and maybe a few superficial cuts. Tomorrow, broken bones and amputation. The day after, we will head out to the abandoned sector to do a bit of demolition work using my fist and your body."

Verde's left hand twitched, and he firmly shoved the injured limb under the café table. "In what aim?"

"I refined my initial combat-skill, my strength, through repeating the same actions that resulted in me cracking a fully-grown man's arm and a brick wall at the same time at eight." She admitted blandly, taking a moment to blow smoke and wondering if the nicotine would affect her this time. "Your combat-woken ability was to withstand damage completely as far as Adrik was able to witness. You had no bruises, cuts, or broken bones directly after the incident with an exploding chemistry laboratory throwing a large chunk of flaming debris at you. Some superficial burns on your clothing, but not your skin. Withstanding a cigarette burn should be trivial to you."

"Practical applications… now? I've barely managed to light your gemstones with green lights."

"Verde, take a moment to appreciate what is going to happen." Crooking a finger to get the slightly wary waitress to finally come over to take the man's order for a drink, the thief took another long drag then flicked off the accumulated ash. "I am a known entity here. I have a reputation, mostly unearned but still one that will cause most residents here to ensure they do not cross me. Adrik does not. You do not. When I leave, the only thing that will protect you from unwanted attention is my lingering connection to you and the other Russians. Unless you hole up in the condo, any number of criminals will try to either con or mug you for anything of worth."

Sonya paused for another long pull on her cigarette.

"If they do not just outright murder you for looking at them strange."

Verde glanced at the waitress bringing him a glass of ice water and a lager of beer from his home country, then back at her as her usual tea order was placed before the Russian thief. "Then why leave at all?"

"I have things to be doing. Actually, I am already delinquent in some of my duties just remaining here as it is."

"More important than instructing me in these Dying Will Flames or ensuring your fellow Russians are unbothered?"
"Yes." More specifically, a promise to her sister and being able to take Shamal for a few weeks was more important to her than he was. Taking a moment to sip at her tea, she idly watched the man press a chip of ice to the burn mark she gave him. "Tats has her own way of discouraging unwanted attention, Adrik knows how to manage himself in a place like this. I am sparing an entire week for your care and instruction, which is out of my usual habits already. The last one I taught personally was a Mist in de-Construction several years ago. Usually, I hand those I find a selection of tips and facts and allow them to find their own ways."

Sonya held up her half-finished cigarette between them.

"Pain is a very good motivator. I will stop burning you when you can resist it." She gave him a slightly smoky smirk. "Then we will move on to Hardening yourself from knife wounds, hopefully near the end of the day. If you can get good enough fast enough, maybe we will see if you can resist my Storm Flames."

Ironically, it seemed as if the bait of letting him actually try something with one of her Flame types seemed more motivating than the prospect of her giving him cigarette burns or knife stabs.

Go figure.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 29th of April, 1969 continued. A cargo plane.)

"You ever notice something odd happening when you get mad?"

"I swear to God, if this is another pick-up line... I don't care if we're in a plane, I will shoot you."

"No need for that, I'm still sore from the tank treads." Grillo sheepishly laughed and coughed awkwardly, almost knocking one of the larger parts of his stripped sniper rifle into the middle of the cargo plane the COMSUBIN forces were taking to return to Italy.

Lalia ran her own gun oil-soaked rag over the inner parts of her pistol's trigger mechanisms, trying to ignore the sniper that somehow got the seat next to her.

"Seriously though." The blond man tried again, policing the leftover rubber rounds he had left after the war game. He had more than she did, but then again with a sniper's rifle power they were more likely lethal than her own weapon. "It's like if you get mad, you soak up all the stress around yourself."

No, she had never notice something like that. Why the hell would she?

"...erm, Lal?"

She ignored him and the twitch of irritation at the unwanted nickname as she reassembled the finicky parts back into the grip. A bit of a feat to do so in the back of a plane, shoulder to shoulder with either slumbering soldiers or others maintaining their own weaponry.

"Lieutenant Commander?"

After damn near three months of only being addressed as 'Lal', hearing her rank out of his mouth was jarring. "What?"

"Has that always happened around you?"
"How would I know it was odd if it always happens around me?" Not that she was taking this conversation seriously, but he seemed to be honestly interested in her answer. "But no, can't say I've ever noticed anything like that."

Leaning in a little, like they weren't the only two awake in a circle ten men deep so any conversation they had would be mostly unheard anyways, Grillo lowered his voice in an even more unneeded security measure she didn't appreciate. "Everyone around us is asleep."

Of course, they were. "It's the middle of the night, moron."

"Yeah, but didn't the Chief Marshal want to consult the rookies about how well they did and what they wanted to improve on while we flew back to base?"

Lalia jerked her head up as she realized the sniper had a point. The man in question was knocked out two soldiers down from her, and she personally had spoken to the man about what he intended to do just before they boarded.

…but again, it was the middle of the night and the man had been working hard to keep the three hundred plus troops all aimed in the same general direction. A debrief could be done the moment everyone returning from the exercise had enough rest and had stowed their issued equipment.

Also… if any of that was true, then why the hell was he unaffected?

"They all fell like dominos the moment after I flirted with you. It's been happening like clockwork, I rile you up and everyone around either gets sleepy or calm."

"Coincidence. We just finished a field excursion and very few of us got any real rest last night. They're entitled to some sleep." Dismissed the commissioned officer, re-holstering her service piece and finally stretching out her legs. "Besides, we're COMSUBIN, we are at least competent if not numerous. Everyone should at least know what they're to do when setting out for a march."

The sniper heaved a sigh, coralling the parts to his rifle so her movements didn't knock them away from him. "I take it you don't believe me."

Settling in for a nap of her own for the last hour they had in the air, she gave him a sardonic glare. "You will need more than just flukes to convince me."

"Well… I certainly don't mind keeping it up. You're a beautiful woman, Lal. It's no hardship to flirt with you any day."

After a three-week long excursion in a coastal region with a rough sea voyage, weeks of hard marching, and a night raid to top it all off Lalia did not feel especially pretty or feminine. She did feel pretty grimy, actually.

Not able to control the flush turning her face beat red at the shameless flattery, she pulled one of the spare rubber bullets out of her cargo pants pocket and loaded it into the breach of her newly serviced gun.

"…um."

"Run, asshole." Lalia pulled back the hammer, aiming for the man's ass as he scrambled to gather up his rifle's parts and put some space between them without stepping on anyone. "And DON'T SAY THAT TO MY FACE, IDIOT!"

She got slightly distracted when she noticed no one had woken up from her yelling.
"I heard from Tatiana." Galina informed Adrik rather tartly over the phone. "You could have called from the hospital, not wait until you were released."

"Yeah, sorry Lina." He didn't sound very sorry, which just made the Lightning even more upset with him. "But why the hell did you send Sonya after me?"

"She owed me a favor."

"...so, I don't owe her for that? Thank God."

"From what I've heard, you still owe her a load of money. But no, you owe me that favor." She ruthlessly shot down any kind of relief he was feeling. "Do you realize what I've taken on to free her up to fetch your ass?"

"...she has an actual job back there?"

"Adrik, did you read any of the letters the boss lady and I have sent you?" If he hadn't, she was going to find out if electrocuting someone without Flames was possible with hers.

"Half of it is in code! Like I can decipher it in a reasonable amount of time without the in-jokes and code words you had to be there for in order for them to make sense. Then I had to burn them, so... they went mostly unread at that part. I'm generally working off the bits I learned from the boss lady and the information Sonya's taught Verde so far." After that flimsy excuse was interrupted with a warning beep for the thirty second warning on his pay phone connection, the man sighed. "Look, Lina. I'll pay you back after Sonya's gotten her pound of flesh out of me. She's headed off for parts unknown and... I'm kind of stuck with the French Lightning I was involved with before everything went to hell."

"You deserve it." New Flame users were either spastic paranoid idiots or way too enthusiastic, let the asshole feel her pain. "Call me again from the boss lady's apartment, so I can chew you out properly."

"Yes ma'am."

"Try not to spend so long away again."

"Should I be calling you boss lady?"

"Adrik, fuck off." Galina hung up on him before he could be a smart-ass again, looking up to Gedeon's form standing smack dab in the middle of the office. "Sonya went to go pick up one of our clansmen that got into a bit of trouble, for your information."

"She had to?"

"There was a Lightning involved. She is the most experience we have with dealing with foreign Flame users." Picking her way through the reams of new information sent in by the various Flame training leaders was a bit of busy work she could do while bullshitting her possibly not soon-to-be Pahkan.
As long as Sonya had it her way, anyways.

The Sun wasn't fucking off himself, she was finally appreciating how annoying the Storm-Cloud must have found the man. "When will she be back?"

Galina looked up with a tight smile. "When she's finished. I think there was something about another syndicate from Italy she had to deal with, then she would be heading back for at least the rest of the summer before anything else is scheduled."

Sonya intended to not be around for the opening of their Flame users' criminal school so that next scheduled item would be the concert she made some noise of the last time she risked checking in with her.

"These new Triad people are asking for our Expert, not for some random clansmen." Raking a hand through his hair, the man glanced from her to the Mist Usov flatly ignoring him to Scruffy trying not to pay him much mind. "If she's not here, then what the hell are we going to do?"

"Tell them she's busy." Sonya would likely murder him if she was dragged back into another nightmare of a headache like a matching job. "We do have other Flame users that could be called 'experts'."

"Mikhail is a possibility." Piped up the Mist mischievously. His smirk growing at her ill-concealed wince at the mention of the Storm. "Irinei is another. He's been a Rain almost as long as Galina's been a Lightning."

Which really didn't say much, Galina was of the opinion she and Tatiana had managed more with their Flames that either even put together.

"Both of them have contributed a fair bit to this." She offered evenly to the Sun.

Frankly both Usov and Andrei had as well, but both of them were under the age of fifteen and did not cut very imposing figures for dealing with other criminal groups. Ditto for herself, she couldn’t carry off the Storm-Cloud's air of dangerous irritation herself and women were generally less respected starting off than men were.

Actually, since it was Sonya they wanted, maybe their oriental fellows were more progressive when it came to female criminals?

Was it only because of the Storm-Cloud's connections she was sought after, in spite of her gender?

"Fuck, I might as well do it."

Galina's head snapped up and she pinned the vor with a pointed glare. "You do that, and I will call as many countries and hotels as I must to track Sonya down so she can yell at you. You rarely interact with the rest of us."

That had the Sun snapping his head down to glare back at her. "Excuse you?"

"You're like a little rich boy dabbling in a trade he only knows the basics of." This was probably going to get her in trouble, but no one else would say this to his face. "You wouldn't let a two-bit crook claim to be a vor get away with it, why the hell would you claim to be an expert on Dying Will Flames of the Sky?"

"Because I am at least one, and the only vor."
“Sonya would trust Scruffy to be an expert over you, he's actually been over all the information at least once.” Snapped back the Lightning sardonically, planting her hands on the desk as she stood up and ignoring the other Sun as he slowly rounded the couch to hide himself. "You're a terrible example of a Flame using vor, even if you are the only one we have. At best, you're a part-time Sun. Dig out Mikhail to bullshit an expert, or break out Dmitriy, if you can't negotiate your way out of it. Which I doubt."

Usov whistled lowly, not even bothering to pretend an intent interest in his half of the office work she had bribed him to handle when the Sun shot him a glare.

"Sonya's not here, stop kissing her ass."

“No, she's not. But, you could stop fucking up her work for once.” Galina's head snapped to the side, but as she had half-expected to be hit the slap it didn't hurt thanks to her Flames. "Beating women, now?"

"Hey!" Scruffy snapped, standing ramrod straight and almost vaulting the couch he had been hiding behind. "Hands to yourself, asshole."

"Shut up." Gedeon snarled back without turning from the Lightning who was neither cowed or in pain. "And you, watch your mouth."

"Or you'll what? Hit me again? I'm a Lightning." Not to mention Usov looked decidedly less amused at what was going on, if he tried it again he likely wouldn't connect with her. "Just because I'm being honest about why you're not tasked with helping out here you feel the need to shut me up however you can? Real brave of you."

"Or you won't be here when Sonya gets back." The Sun vor corrected heatedly. "If you have nothing to-"

"Why have this office if you won't bother to listen or take our advice? Or even learn what you were tasked to do?" Galina interrupted, being validated in her belief in the Mist's probable actions when the next backhand missed by a good foot. "You keep this shit up, don't be surprise if Sonya gives up on you entirely."

"Miss Galina…"

"Shut up, Scruffy."

Gedeon was more focused on her previous comment than his fellow Sun. "The hell do you mean by that."

"Kazimir, Zaryna? Either name ring a bell? Fadei? Flame users that were cut loose, even if we really could use older experience Flame users. You're about that level for us, just above Irinei, a Flame user but not a useful one." She gestured to the teenaged boy who led a good sixth of their efforts sitting in the office. "Sonya makes use of anything she can get her hands on as long as they can be useful, why do you think she doesn't make use of you?"

"Maybe that's because I have other shit to do."

"Keep telling yourself that." Galina seated herself as the Sun stormed out of the office, a sinking feeling in her guts that no matter what she did now would derail this next disaster.

The other Triad group's Flame users were frighteningly competent with their Flames, especially paired next to the still raw bulk of the trainees the Zolotovs had. More along Sonya's and Tatiana's levels than even Galina's.

If these other groups seeking gem matching services were anything like the Wo Hop To Triad, then they'd figure out Gedeon was only a middling amateur quickly. She had the feeling the clan was about to get a little embarrassed on the international stage.

The Storm-Cloud would not be amused when she returned. Especially not if she learned through her contacts in China about this.

Likely part of the reason she was getting fed up with lingering within the clan. The Lightning was getting fed up dealing with the impending second fuck-up, and while the blonde probably could solve this in a few short hours… constantly keeping things on track wasn't easy on her.

Especially not for a woman in a thieves' clan.

A light touch on her face had her snapping back to reality to pin Scruffy with a glare, but the Sun merely huffed and kept prodding her cheek with his Flames to try healing any damage her Flames didn't shield her from. "You should be more careful, Miss Galina."

"At least I can tell Sonya honestly I tried."

"You should probably avoid him for a while." Usov chimed in blandly.

Reminded of the teenager in the room and having satisfied himself that her Flames had worked as rumored and she was actually fine, the older man turned and shook a finger in the Mist's face. "Do not hit a women. If you can't deal with one without violence, avoid them."

Galina huffed sharply at his back. "I did ask for it."

"I don't care if you begged for it on bended knee, a man shouldn't hit a woman."

She gave him a flat look, which turned into a glare when his irritated expression didn't change. "He would've hit anyone that talked back to him in such a way, male or female. Only, if I had been a man, he would've done more than just slap me."

"And that makes it better, I'm sure." Coughing a little sheepishly after that snarky little quip with a quick glance at the closed office door, the Sun shuffled back to his project abandoned on the floor. "Definitely not in Kansas anymore."

Frowning in a puzzled manner, Galina rummaged around the bottom desk drawer for her master list on which semi or precious stones did what for which Flame. "...Kansas?"

"An American state? You know, what Dorothy said to Toto after the tornado and touching down on the other side of the rainbow?" At her continued blank look, the thin as a rail Sun huffed a completely disgusted sigh. "The Wizard of Oz? It's a book they turned into a movie, one of the first colored ones. Haven't you ever seen it?"

"Did they translate it into Russian?" She would count the grimace as her point. "Then no."

"...I'm going to find a copy, somewhere." Scruffy promised stridently, picking up his own collection of notes made from her amended lists. "Then I'll make you watch it."

"I am unsure if this is a conversation I want in on or not." Usov interjected idly, sprawling out again on the opposite end of the couch from the Sun user. "It sounds interesting... but I have little idea what it is about."
"It's a book, people." Peter protested, sounding equal parts exasperated and annoyed. "Reading will not kill you."

"Or so you think." Chipped in Galina absently, paging through her notes for a Lightning mineral that was preferably colorless. "We're in Soviet Russia."

"...oh."

"It might have escaped the censors here, it might not have. But even still, finding a copy of any movie translated to Russian might be a bit more difficult than you expect. Although there is the Thaw to think about." Privately, she still rather doubted any film made outside of the Union would be translated and released within it even now. "You should ask Bjørn instead, he will likely have more luck."

There was… barite, monazite, spessarite, rhodochrosite, and rhodonite. Galina considered the results of those five Lightning minerals, and their colors.

If she wanted a powdered blush she could also use to help reinforce her face if someone else ever wanted to try smacking her, she needed a reddish mineral.

…rhodochrosite it was. It was cheaper.

Marking down a clean sheet of paper with her choice, the Lightning locked her notes back up. "Peter, I have an errand to run."

Since he wasn't allowed unrestricted access to the Flame-stone research efforts, her comment meant his studies this evening was over with. To his credit, the man didn't sulk or sigh over her announcement.

Then again, the man was a lot older than those she was used to dealing with. One would hope he was equally more mature.

She accepted his notes, which were a confusing mass jumble of chemical notations and random Cyrillic words interspersing his English.

Learning another language via Mist Flames tended to jumble the target's grasp on their native one. At least in small ways here or there. Galina figured that was enough of a drawback as it was, doing more than just one might end up having a person babble in a horrible mishmash of tongues.

More motivation to limit whoever got the Mist-therapy languages crammed into their heads.

"I have to go pick a few things up from the inner city. Is there anything you need?"

Without Sonya, he was kind of limited in who he could turn to for aid. Especially since he was only here on her say so, and only knew some of the other Suns well enough to ask them for help.

"...um..."

"Either write a list or grab your things and come along."

(ooo000000)

(Wednesday the 30th of April, 1969. continued Cerrito Crime Family Headquarters, San Jose, California, United States of America.)
Stalking up the neo-Romanesque steps, Renato tried not to roll his shoulders to get his shirt to stop sticking to his back.

The movement would ruin the line of his suit and look entirely unprofessional, so he merely stuck to reaching up and adjusting his fedora providing him some shade instead.

This was a recommendation Timoteo Vongola had sent him on, for one of the split-off branches of a minor player in the Vongola Alliance. They’d been embarrassed somehow and entreated their parent syndicate for aid with it. However, with a lack of any evidence for who did whatever it was they were so pissed off with… eventually Nono was asked for some help.

Hence why the Italian native was paying a south California American mob syndicate a little visit. A little far outside Vongola's nominal reach, and in decidedly hostile territory, Nono decided to rely on the more… 'dangerous' of solo troubleshooters he knew of.

His orders were to find out whoever it was that had the skills to do something like this, then report back to Timoteo about it. Depending on what was found, either that person would be invited to join Tyr's still budding Varia Assassination Squad or… if whoever it was proved stubborn, kill them.

Looking and acting like the hitman he was wasn't normally an issue for him, Renato prided himself on his professionalism after all. Very few things could make him regret dressing as the Mafioso he was, but extreme heat was pretty much it… and suffering through Shamal's messy attempts at 'art'.

While Italia was hot and humid, it wasn't as scorching as California was. This close to the Pacific Ocean at least put enough salt in the air that made him slightly more comfortable. The Sun just wasn't used to heat this dry when the wind blew in from the east.

"Sigñor… Sinclair?" Asked a straw-blond maid waiting on the top of the steps, fidgeting a little with her apron as she continued in slightly clumsy Italian. "*Don Cerrito is ready for you."

Not entirely surprising that he was expected, Timoteo would've passed on he was sending someone, but by name… interesting. "*Lead on then, señorita."

Pretty little thing, for all she was highly unnerved to be the one to greet him. She hadn't wanted to be, but none of the other servants in the manor spoke Italian.

From what little else Renato could get out of her mind about it, that was part security and just part local preference. Most around spoke Spanish if they spoke another language than America's version of English, and since Italian and Spanish had a few differences it just made any 'business' talk that much more secure if ever overheard.

The hitman still found that rather lazy, but supposed if it worked for them…

One entrance hall, a courtyard, two more hallways, a staircase, and yet another hallway later Renato was a bit cooled off if more annoyed at the obvious security he had been just led through.

Waste of time, considering someone had evaded their security once before if the reason he was there at all was considered.

Pointless posturing is stupid, the Mafioso mused bitterly to himself as his guide knocked on a door.

Oh, there was a reason. The obvious one was to impress on him that they did have some, and that obviously it was working as intended with how many side-eyed by visibly armed men he got following the timid blonde maid through the manor. Another to show the outsider that this incident he was being contracted to look into was a one-off, and that they weren't some haphazard collection of criminals that could barely work in the same direction.

However, given Renato was there at all, obviously their security wasn't quite up to par. At the moment all the excessive showmanship was doing was wasting time.

He'd probably appreciate the spectacle more if he wasn't in a sour mood not even a pretty door-greeter could get him out of. As his ill-humor wasn't her fault, he did dredge up a small smile for the now no longer unnerved girl as she bowed herself out once someone more well-appointed than the grunts downstairs answered the door.

That man waited only long enough for the pretty maid to get decently far down the corridor before addressing the Italian Sun. "You are the expert?"

"Renato Sinclair," he drawled out blandly, while a pretty face would get some of his dwindling consideration some exiled fop or native boy was exempt, "Sun Flame user, hitman, and current outside troubleshooter for the Vongola Famiglia. Oh, and the Giglio Nero."

There was a long moment of silence, within which he tried really hard not to roll his eyes. He didn't need a mind-reading trick to tell the other man was skeptical and wary, and the internal monologue as he attempted to stare down the hitman was only enlightening in respects to how much familiarity this mob syndicate had with Dying Will Flame users.

As in, not much. Nearly had a Lighting, but the real reason they were so upset at whoever embarrassed them in front of their fellow mobsters was due to someone stealing their 'found' Lightning.

Quaint.

Renato really was in the outskirts of civilized crime now, wasn't he?

The things he did for Nono… and for Shamal.

"…Boss Cerrito would like it if you gave up your weapon for the meeting, Mister Sinclair." Insisted the young man stubbornly, with a look to match.

Did they really think he wasn't as dangerous without a gun?

Sun Flames didn't always mean healer, as a matter of fact he excelled in using Sun Flames to kill with untraceably. However, the hitman merely pulled his favored M1911 pistol and his reserved moonstone inlaid backup Beretta M1934 to hand over.

He supposed being allowed to keep them up to this point was a mark of respectful consideration, not even Timoteo had let the hitman keep his guns on him within the Iron Fort in their initial meetings.

Might have been more his Guardians, but even so things had been a lot more intimidating on that first audience with the Sky than these people could ever hope to match.

"I do expect them back in the same condition."

"Of course."

Renato idly wondered about how things had changed for him since he had entreated to Vongola's Ninth Sky for a breach of conduct on Mafia Land as his weapons were first inspected and then handed off to someone further in.
A lone freelance hitman might not ever get into the famiglias he now dealt with, but he was acquiring a rather decent reputation overall he rather liked.

"Follow me." The short order regained the hitman's wandering attention as yet more posturing had been going on, and he followed the thoroughly ineffectual 'threat' that was his newest guide to his temporary employer.

This office was smaller than Don Vongola's, actually smaller than any number of the rooms the Iron Fort could boast of. Understandable in a way since they were relatively 'new', even if they had ties back in their home country. Dark brown and tan tones told him the man that owned it probably had little to no taste, or it wasn't him that decorated.

Joseph Cerrito was a man in his late fifties, had wavy brown hair that was greying at the temples, and enough of a presence to suggest why he was the Don and not any of the younger men arrayed in his office to provide security for this meeting.

Renato was… not impressed.

He had did a little background research on the man before ever stepping on American soil, and the American was uncomfortably close to violating Omertà. Through no initial fault of his own but trying to sue a magazine for daring to suggest he was the boss of a syndicate hadn't exactly caused it all to blow over.

Why he didn't just have whoever was that foolish killed instead of trying a legal route was beyond the Sun. It would've distracted attention from his crimes, instead of involving an entire FBI task force investigating into his prior and current actions.

Too much attention now for a clean murder, and it would just work as confirmation that everything he was accused of was correct.

Having spent the time they were using to try impressing on him the importance of the man in the office and what he was called in for to woolgather instead, the hitman decided enough was enough. "Don Cerrito, I presume?"

"I take it you know why you were sent to us." Cerrito started smoothly, ignoring or at least overlooking the Sun's disinclination to be intimidated. "I want whoever it was found and buried six feet under."

"I understand that." Not that it would happen if things worked out in a certain way. Really depending on who and what kind of person had done it all. Tyr was very keen on someone that could bypass the security even a moderately minor syndicate had to make them complain so much. "What do I have to work with?"

Renato would like to get this over within a month, he had a standing date with a particular Russian of his acquaintance and a Mist brat they both looked after. He didn't intend to be late for it, teasing Sonya about her time-keeping habits was too amusing to pass up.

The Don gestured to a set of files sitting on his desk, which one of his mooks swept up to do the actual handing over.

He didn't get anything else too interesting out of the man's head, other than some bitter thoughts his way for needing outside expertise. Flame users were not what this syndicate was used to dealing with, and with the sheer lack of any trail to follow they suspected someone with Flames was involved.
However, a stray thought had Renato immediately cracking open the file to see the pictures for himself.

…there was no detail on where the pictures were taken, but the craters in the walls and floor captured on the Polaroid images of some sparse hallway were very indicative of a Cloud user's rampage.

"I can tell you right away it was a Flame user." Not Mist, interestingly.

It had been the prevalent assumption about the situation back in Italia, since Mists were generally thought of being the stealthier of the available types. That didn't mean none of the others were, but that they had more to work with when it came to clandestine actions.

"A Cloud… which makes this more interesting."

A little more surprised beyond his ability to hide it, the head of the Cerrito Crime Family leaned back in his office chair and raised an eyebrow at the hitman. "Oh? You can tell that just by glancing through a few pages?"

"I know a Cloud. The last time she was pissed off she left behind craters much like these."

Storm Flames caused less obvious craters, but the damage Disintegration left behind was distinctively both soft and charred in its own way. A Lightning with sufficient leverage could've mimicked the same residue of their passing, but the hallway in the image was cramped and indicative of utilitarian use normally kept clear of any obstructions. No blown light bulbs or transistors, either.

A Rain wouldn't even have to leave behind any damage if they didn't want to, as well as Mists, which meant that unless the circumstances were even more unusual than he thought they were ruled out as well.

With a tight timeframe, and limited things to work with, the only one that would've left behind such craters were either Clouds or Suns. No scorching, or necrosis, or weirdly hyper behavior indicative of leaking Sun Flames reported on those knocked out disqualified his own Flame type.

Broken bones, though. One dead body, with a curiously deep wound to the temple that was the cause of death. Which just lent more credence to the Cloud theory.

Nothing else would put craters into concrete walls without the noise of a gun of a sufficient caliber to account for the damages, and to do enough damage to penetrate the thick skull of a human required more than a bit of elbow grease.

"I'm going to need more than this." Before anyone could protest or complain, or worse yet question him, Renato carried on. "Clouds are very much creatures of habit. So either one took exception to whatever you were doing, was somehow linked to it and objected, or just decided this is their territory and hasn't accounted for your syndicate yet. But since young Clouds starting to establish themselves are rather noticeable… odds are it's a foreign one that objected to something."

A stealthy Cloud… Renato wondered how unusual or normal Sonya was compared to her fellow native Russians. She couldn't be the only Cloud that could keep their cool if need be, Visconti was equally as self-possessed if he could manage it.

One was and one wasn't linked to a Sky, which meant it had to be within the range of behaviors a Cloud user could exhibit.

However, it was very likely they were now looking at Soviet Russia and her criminal syndicates for the culprit. Most others treated their Clouds like the tanks and natural-born fighters their Flames encouraged them to be, and right on up until he had met a thief Cloud from the Soviet Union the Soft Flame Sun user had pretty much figured the same thing.

The hitman wondered what Sonya would do if asked to check into anything. He really had no other Soviet Union contacts, but the thief might not want to rat out someone she knew. While he didn't know every Italian criminal of his home country and didn't expect her to know every Russian criminal from her motherland, she was his best bet in somehow completing this contract.

The thief had been sticking to a semi-predictable schedule lately. If he was quick about it, he might end up getting the opportunity to talk to her about any other far-ranging Russian Clouds. It possibly would only be useful to get her side of what it was like being a Hard Flame Cloud user that traveled any distance from her 'home' territory, but it would be progress nonetheless.

More than likely, they were looking for a middle-to-late aged local Cloud. An import, rather than someone established here for any length of time. One that had evaded any local scrutiny, so borderline civilian more likely. Either once was part of the mafia and retired or left for their own reasons.

America wasn't a bad place to retire to, he supposed. Lots of wide-open space to get lost within, and with only sketchy nets thrown by disjointed syndicates to avoid.

Not his preference, but a decent one.

The older Clouds seemed to be able to keep their heads down if it suited them, more so than the younger types Renato had the unlucky fortune to witness the behavior of in Vongola territory.

Worst case scenario, it was another free-ranging Cloud like Sonya he was looking for that had already skipped town a long while ago. He had never expressly looked for a Cloud that was as territory-less as her, but he also never had much of a reason to either.

Now a lot more interested in this job, since it was looking like it would take some real skill to do instead of being completely routine and obvious, the Sun user tucked the files under one arm and looked squarely at the Don he was temporarily working for. "This will take some time. Finding a Cloud that doesn't want to be found will be tricky. Especially if you want to survive the encounter. I'll reach back to a few of my own contacts, see if they can't chase down the target on their own ends."

"I had my doubts about needing an outside set of eyes, but I can see why you came recommended by Don Bergamaschi. A few seconds, and you can already narrow down the type of person we are looking for?"

"Flame users can be very distinctive, if they feel they have no reason to be circumspect." Renato offered idly, his mood restored at the tricky and probably frustrating task set out before him. He didn't get interesting hits often, and even with the bare amount of information he had to go on now meant this would be very satisfying to close out. "This one seemed to not care and given how little other evidence was left behind they had a good reason to be that dismissive."

"Oh?" The question was soft, reminding the hitman this wasn't a man he knew well and probably took his words the wrong way. Admittedly, that did sound rather condescending on second thought.

"They probably already left town. Whoever it was, I'd lay good odds that it wasn't a local." Unless they were incredibly stupid about it, but the complete lack of anything else noted right away counteracted that assumption. "But... I love a good chase. If there's anything to find, I'll find it."
Renato had a month to do it all in, or a month to get the footwork covered and the locals ruled out. Rather tight deadline, but he didn't intend to miss a trip into the Soviet Union and a good look at what environment produced a woman like his favorite Russian.

"Now… what, exactly, were you doing that a Cloud objected to happening?"
Chapter 50

(Thursday the 1st of May, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Renato had missed Sonya by a few days, and from the sounds of it for the rest of the month.

"Sorry," Tatiana informed him without a touch of regret, "but she left Sunday afternoon. She really only intended to do this last week, when a few clan things came up and finally freed her up a little. Nya does intend to take the rest of the summer and some of the fall off for various reasons, honestly."

The hitman heaved a nearly silent sigh, but since they had never really urgently needed each other's aid before there wasn't a way to get into contact with the woman quickly. He could try leaving a message that he wanted to talk to her with her Lackey, but as it was not that time sensitive he would merely leave it at that.

He could afford to wait a few weeks to get a solid answer from her, but until then…

"You're Russian, know any Clouds like your sister?"

"I haven't been back home for any longer than a week or so for the last few years. The most I could say anything about all either already pass through here or are not Clouds." The nurse informed him wryly, sliding shut the folder in her hands to hand off to a little brunette girl shadowing at her elbow. "I know there are other Clouds, one of which my sister has semi-regular dealings with and another she's about to have some with… maybe one or two more I haven't heard of yet, but not much more than that."

Of course not, he didn't tend to have that kind of luck. Then again, the rarity of the Flame type he was asking after would help narrow down the suspect list… as soon as he got one.

He slanted a look at the younger Russian hovering just behind the redhead Sun, but all she did was pointedly stick her nose in the air and wander off determinedly with the file clutched to her chest.

"Avdotya might know, but I don't think she's going to talk to you." With a gesture tossed her aid's way to let him know who she was talking about, Tatiana tapped her lips with her other hand as she considered him thoughtfully.

"What?" He had refrained from getting close enough to pick up some of her thoughts, so he actually had to ask.

If Sonya had blown up at him for just getting details out of her head on her siblings, he really didn't want to know what she would do if she ever suspected he was violating their privacy even accidentally.

Those mauls hadn't been expensive per say, just… highly unnerving to gift to a woman still pissed off with him. He'd still rather not feel like what it would be to have one crush his ribs if at all possible.

"I'm not entirely certain she would even tell you about it, honestly." Offered the nurse a bit more hesitantly than she was normally talking to him. "Some of those Clouds she knows of are rather young, still. Nya's actually surprisingly protective of those within a certain age range."

As she was with Shamal, he had noticed that.
Adjusting his hat to sit lower on his brow, Renato merely shrugged that warning off. "I'm not looking for a younger Cloud, more one around our own ages or older."

"From Russia? I think the eldest in our area we have active is Nya herself. You can't quote me on that, because we really only deal with most of the eastern side of the Soviet Union and there might be more a lot west of us, but as for one that goes outside of the Iron Curtain…"

A niggling little suspicion was planted in his brain, but the hitman shoved it aside forcefully. Sonya was a professional thief yes, but she had never stolen people before… or at least he had never heard her getting into kidnapping. Ransoms took a while to be completed anyways, and the AWOL Lightning had yet to be ransomed back to the mob syndicate that lost him. It had been nearly a week, anyone looking for money would've already contacted the Cerrito Crime Family by now.

Why the hell would the Russian woman deal with or inconvenience an American mobster syndicate anyways?

Sonya wasn't normally vindictive unless there was a damn good reason for it… but he couldn't say with any certainty if she even had contacts there.

He eyed the Storm-Cloud's bouncy Sun sister warily, wondering if he should ask if the woman in question had gone on any recent trips to America or not.

Tatiana either missed or ignored his look, pulling her hand away from her lips and giving him a slight smirk. "Now, unless you're going to finally give in to Doctor Kappel's insistence that you at least get semi-regular checkups… I should probably go back to doing what they pay me for."

"You can tell your doctor that I am fine." Renato ordered shortly, a bit less irritable than he would like to.

It wasn't her fault the medical practitioner of Sonya's liked to bug him about it, especially after taking Shamal in for his next set of immune shots and a physical to record the brat's rate of growth.

"And that's sure to put him off your case, if the last few times were any measure." Rolling her eyes, the nurse turned to follow her little protégé's path deeper into Mafia Land's hospital. "I'll let Nya know you were looking for her when she next checks in with me and Bjørn, tall, dark, and snarky."

"Thanks." Renato drawled sardonically at her back, turning on his heel to stalk his way out of the building.

Not quite a bust, but also not something he could work on for now. He might as well hit up the information brokers while he was here, see if they had any information on Soviet Flame users either around his age or older.

He kind of doubted it though. After first meeting a tiny Russian thief that could use Cloud Flames, he had specifically checked to see if she was following in anyone's footsteps. If Sonya was, it wasn't one known of outside their icy corner of the world.

Fuck… that would mean any information on older Soviet Flame users would be expensive no matter how slight or circumstantial.

Perfect. Price wouldn't be a decent judge if the information is worth shelling out for.
(Saturday the 3rd of May, 1969. Kingissepa, Estonian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

Sonya's first heist of the month was a minor milk-run contract, but excusable in that it was really only to get her in range of the favor her Lackey had been patiently waiting for.

Rovaniemi, Finland, was surprisingly farther inland than she had been expecting. Björn must have been at least exhibiting the faintest signs of his Lightning-Storm nature to be stubborn enough to illegally cross the North Sea, the Baltic Sea, the Gulf of Bothnia, and half of Finland before finally selling off his mother's jewelry for the funds.

Two decades after the Second World War, the city was back on its feet after apparently being nearly demolished entirely by invading German soldiers. Almost all of the buildings were built in the last twenty years, but there was still a hodgepodge of city planning where temporary infrastructure important services had once been before being relocated to newer more suitable buildings.

Leaving gaping holes in some of the main street thoroughfares, which had yet to be plugged up by another shop or business.

Subarctic terrain, which at least meant that since she was visiting in the summer it was nice and balmy out on the streets instead of sweltering hot. A few mid-summer rain storms, but she could deal with the wet if it wasn't icy cold out.

Both the temperature and the frequent rains helped her out a lot, since she didn't have to resort to questionable Flame skills to keep herself warm or hidden while scoping out her target and spending a few nights delicately picking through a certain pawn shop's books before robbing it.

Some of Björn's mother's jewelry had been sold, so she wouldn't be able to get back the late woman's wedding ring or her locket in the same condition her Lackey had sold them in. Sonya regretted that slightly, but as it seemed they were sold years ago that wouldn't have changed even if she had come for them right after the Lightning-Storm mentioned the pieces.

She did get back the dead woman's pearl necklace and an heirloom silver bracelet, as it was likely they had never been sold... as well as a fair number of other jewelry and trinkets the pawnshop contained after double-checking their mafia connections.

Little to none, so the thief had no compulsions against looting them to the bedrock for anything else she might ever want to use. Some of it she put to use right away, when she exchanged out the slim gold wedding ring with the Celtic knot pattern for a fancier version holding a sapphire chip that didn't have a connection to her Lackey.

The locket she just stole off the old biddy with it, pissed off that any pictures it might have held were long gone now.

After carefully packaging her Lackey's keepsake jewelry so the Mafia Land sorters wouldn't put it up to be hawked with the rest of the pricy stuff she robbed the pawnshop of, she tucked it into a bulk shipment of caviar and added in the diamond tiara she had been actually contracted to steal off some little debutante twit's head.

That done, Sonya left Finland behind and crossed the Baltic Sea herself for the more immediately hostile lands of Estonian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Which was part of the Baltic States that, technically according to three world powers, was part of the Soviet Union... but to most other countries the three countries that made it up were illegally occupied. Careful wording and legal loopholes were taken advantage of to argue the issue either way, but it was the Soviet Union in charge of the land in the end.

There was also still an anti-Soviet guerrilla force active in the Baltic States, which she hadn't actually known about until Arseniy pointed it out to her.

It was more immediately obvious now that she was looking, but the Soviet censorship was still strong here and the newspapers and radio only said what the government wanted. The murders, and the skirmishes with the Red Army, rarely if ever reached past the local to the national news services. You had to come in range to even hear anything about it, which made her wonder how her father had known.

No wonder Master Liam and the Großes Volksfest had avoided the country. Unless they went out of their way, the circus would have to cut across Võru County to even skim the lower half of the country.

A Russian traveling circus in expressly anti-Russian territory?

Liam might risk China's ever tightening insular policies, but there hadn't been any wide scale hostilities to Soviet civilians when she was with them. With the armed forces, maybe, but not the little people.

Yet, anyways.

The thief wasn't going anywhere near Võrumaa where the local chapter of metsavennad , or 'Forest Brothers', seemed to operate out of. She did mentally kick herself for not giving the term to Björn to research a little for her before coming out here. She didn't remember them from her time as Rachel but then again, she was starting to not remember a lot of things.

Thankfully, her heist was to take place on the opposite side of the country. Kingissepa was a port city on the island of Saaremaa, which had been restricted to only Russian nationals allowed.

In… Estonia. Which was a Soviet Social Republic state, but still.

Confusing, and a little disturbing in some way, but she didn't really have the time to investigate.

Sonya's nationality hadn't greatly affected her work before this point, and as a first she supposed she didn't mind this. However, it did bring to mind the fact she didn't even really consider herself American anymore.

Not surprising, given she almost now had just as many years of being a Soviet girl as Rachel had been an American one. It was just she hadn't intended to change that part of her identity, and now that she belatedly realized it had changed some time ago she was a little bothered by the fact.

Not her now being a Soviet girl, she was curiously unbothered about the fact even knowing full well the Soviet Union wasn't the best government in existence.

Not the worst, but what government didn't have drawbacks?

The thief supposed this was what it was to 'go native'. Interesting, slightly bemusing to only now realize, and something that occupied her for hours puzzling over.

Her contract here in the island port town of Kingissepa was to steal a defunct noble's crest from the walls of the local fortress/castle. She had a couple speculations for why, but without more information it was probably wrong.
The actual target she had only glimpsed of that very afternoon was set into a stone plate in the walls of the cloister, and probably weighed a good half ton. That was part of the reason the contract was more of a middling-difficult one… well, for most people.

She was going to bullshit her Cloud derived strength to both pry the stone loose and carry it to the ferry specifically re-routed for her contract that night. It would be the heaviest thing she ever tried to lift and sustain the weight of herself, if she couldn't there was all the heavy-duty carts left dotted around from the refurbishing efforts on-going she could appropriate. Would be stupidly easy to track her path with the marks those would leave behind, but an option.

It just was… well, until the castle emptied enough and she got a measure of the guard patrols Sonya was stuck in the rafters with little to do but think in the dim lighting.

What was she?

An American girl that lived in Soviet Russia, or a Soviet girl that once lived in the United States?

She was leaning more to the latter than the former, if only because she really didn't have much of an urge to return to America's shores just yet. There was little there for her, most of her family lived or returned to Russia so that was where she considered 'home' was.

Frankly, the thief hadn't even intended to stick it out in Moscow as long as she had.

Did the fact she was still intending on heading back for at least another year or more mean anything in that dilemma?

…why hadn't she intended to linger in the Soviet Union?

She had a reason for that, right?

Sonya couldn't remember what it was now, which was highly concerning for her. She did recall that it was a fairly important one…

Blinking a little owlishly in the sudden gloom that enveloped her, she peered over the edge of her perch in the support struts holding the vaulted ceiling of the refectory up. What she was taking to be the local equivalent of a janitor was making his ponderous way through the halls, flicking off a few of the lights as he passed the switches.

Well… to work. She'd have more than enough time to kick the problem around in her head over the next month, so she shelved the issue and set about getting down from her perch.

…there was a pickaxe somewhere around here, right?

If not, she'd have to use her Bec de Corbin and that would leave behind some distinctive marks. Not that she was too concerned by that at this point, but best to be safe about it.

She was pretty sure the criminal remnants of a noble house either wanted their crest either back or removed from easy civilian access before the refurbishing of Kingissepa Castle was finished. If not, the next likely reason behind her contract was that someone wanted any marks of their rivals erased.

Sonya was betting the latter.
"This is not going to end well." Galina confided to Lisa in an aside, neatening her copy of the latest trade agreement between the Zolotov Clan and another Chinese Triad group called the Luen Kung Lok.

Apparently, a syndicate that had good ties to the first Triad group they ever matched who also worked in Hong Kong near them.

The older woman gave her a measuring look, tinged with a bit of sympathy, as she ordered her lover's copy of it all for easier transport as soon as they left. "Oh? You know that for a fact?"

"With your daughter gone, Gedeon intends to take the lead."

"It's his right." Lisa lingered with her as most the other vory that would be involved with security filed out of the meeting room, the only exception was her lover who didn't look particularly pleased at the hold up. "Look Galina, I realize Sonya's more their level… but if she is elsewhere then he is the next one in charge of your group. He might surprise you, as Gedeon does have some diplomatic skills. Maybe just not the best luck with them."

"And I'd feel better about that if he actually spent more than the odd afternoon just hanging around. It's not about his ability to deal with others, I'll reserve judgement on that, it what he's going to try to pass himself off as while he does so." Stated the Lightning sourly, as she finally got to air her grievances to someone that would listen and might be able to do something about it. "I do know Sonya has business in China coming up, so while I'm sure she wouldn't care much at any other time…. now is not a good one for Gedeon to test his leadership skills of us."

"No? Why do you believe that?" Asked Arseniy instead of his lover, who merely now looked a bit concerned.

"Gedeon doesn't do more than visit the Suns when he has to spend time with any Flame users. Sonya never minded, because he is one and that is where he might get more ideas for his own use." Galina held back the sigh, it wasn't the place or time. "But since that's so, he's not really that well known beyond more than ten of us and half that is the Suns he's deemed worthy to bother with. Any other Flame users tapped for helping out might inadvertently make that obvious. A lot of us are still rather young."

Lisa sighed instead, drumming her fingers on the conference table they hadn't gotten up from yet. "Is there something else we should know about this?"

"…err, ma'am?"

"You are asking us for help, aren't you? That's why you're bringing this up at all… right?" Not being foolish or slow on the uptake, as well as having a hand in shaping most of the girls in how they grew up by being the woman most went to for when they needed help, her elder arched an eyebrow when it took her more than a second to respond. "Galina? Speak."

"Sonya… doesn't intend-"

"-to stay with the clan?" Lisa's smile was a touch wry, but just mostly unsurprised despite her fellow brunette's surprised look.

"We've been expecting that." Arseniy informed her blandly, relocating himself closer to the both of them to keep the conversation as clandestine as possible without Flame users nearby.

"For a while now, actually. We almost lost her around her tenth birthday, to be honest. I highly doubt we'd've heard a word about her after she finally left home if it wasn't for… oh, one specific thing she needed our help with." Continued the older woman lightly, another sigh given before she started picking up her things. "Can I at least hope Sonya is going to be careful about it all?"

"…the only thing I know about her plans is that she is going to 'give Gedeon exactly what he thinks he wants'."

Snorting back a still obvious laugh, the vor helped his lover collect herself and moved off to open the door for her.

"We'll see what we can do on our own end, Galina. Just try to keep things smooth on your own. That does mean getting your little trainees to play along." Lisa gave a smile to him, looking back at her briefly. "I don't think Sonya will mind much that you told us her plans, but…"

The Lightning winced. "Thankfully I'm not that wary of pissing off anyone else in the clan, Lisa."

"Smart woman."

(Wednesday the 7th of May, 1969. Kursk, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Next for the Russian thief was a very disappointing visit to the Polish People's Republic, where she got a pointed reminder that the further away one got from the inner blocs of the Soviet Union the worse it was.

This heist was a rather risky theft from a government office, information for a local crime syndicate that needed it to avoid crackdowns in the future, then Sonya moved on to Soviet Ukraine.

A brief detour to get her boots adjusted and to commission a few more pairs now that she had pretty much reached her final adult height of five foot four, then Sonya moved onto a new contract much closer to her heart.

She was contracted to steal books again.

Alupka Palace-Park Complex held the Vorontsov Palace, which held a truly phenomenally large library. Everything about the castle was large actually, surprisingly enough given it was over a hundred years old and had somehow survived the recent world war and Nazi occupation intact.

Excluding the manuscripts she was contracted for, she also stole a number of history texts and a few journals from previous owners as well as a random selection of other books she could add to her collection.

Out of storage, because of course the Soviet censors wouldn't want information that could or might contradict them about history to be used by anyone. Even if they were only on display to pad out a library shelf. Easier in that she didn't have to steal out of a room with large windows and more than a few KGB officers wandering the halls, harder in that there were a lot of boxes to clandestinely get through to locate what she was there for.

It just meant she had a good look at what else was available to add to her own collection.
It also reminded her she was running out of storage space on Mafia Land. Her storage unit was nearly crammed full of paper already, so much so that Fong’s gift had been regulated to a lonely corner of her room in the condo her clan owed until she could address that.

Oddly, when she called in to her Lackey to get her next contract and trade off the information of which shipment her last contracted target was on, Sonya retraced her steps that same night and made away with the large lion statues in the palace's front yard as well.

Weird, but… books. She didn’t care what use someone could put the lion statues to, she had new things to read.

It was a good mood that lasted until she entered the USSR and reached her next contract.

Grave robbing was a new one.

Stupidly easy, and minimal security meant minimal contract fees, but it was in the direction she wanted.

However, she found it distasteful.

Sonya did realize she had a few more morals left and stealing from the long dead crossed one. Admittedly she was there to steal a body not something off one, but still.

She was merely digging up an old World War Two soldier to be sent elsewhere, curiously with exact directions to where the man was buried. Not in a graveyard, but a park on the outskirts of Kursk.

She kind of understood why no one had tipped off the local government that there were dead bodies under the local park, Soviet Russia probably would not be gentle or circumspect about the whole find, but it was still rather creepy in a way.

That strange job over with, and one dead body on its way to being redirected through Mafia Land's ports sent on its way, Sonya took a very long shower and then called her Lackey for her next contract.

She got Tatiana instead. "Tall, dark, and snarky wanted to talk to you."

"Oh?" She thickly mouthed around her fork. If it was a reminder to be in Italy in a few weeks she would somehow convince her sister to slap the man again. Swallowing the bite of her dinner and scrubbing her hair with a towel with the hand not holding a phone, Sonya tossed the cloth to the side and pulled the fork out of her mouth to speak more clearly. "What did he want?"

"Not sure if it was the same thing he wanted to talk to you about, but he did ask me about older Soviet citizens that have the same skills as you." There was a pause and a rustling of some papers, and then the Sun rattled off her next coded contract details Bjørn had likely handed her.

Sonya jolted the whole thing down on a scrap piece of paper her hotel was providing for later translating, abandoning the rest of her mostly uneaten dinner in favor of speaking with her sister. "So, were you just hanging around my Lackey's apartment just waiting for me to call in or something?"

"Something like that. It's still my apartment, thank you very much."

Smirking wryly, the thief tapped her pen against the pad of paper a few times as she wondered what the hell an 'Altai' was. It sounded familiar, in a something she read recently kind of way. "Yes, sorry big sister. My mistake. Was that all Renato wanted?"
"Like I said, not sure if that was exactly what he wanted to talk to you about. Tall, dark, and snarky did look slightly frustrated that you weren't available."

Sonya rolled her eyes at the semi-teasing tone her sister had adopted, then frowned as she realized there was still graveyard dirt under her fingernails. "Ever so sorry about that. Kind of busy here."

"Mmm… speaking of, you might want to call Lina."

…fuck. She knew something like this would happen the moment she stepped out of the office.

"Is it going to blow up?"

"It might? I don't have all the details, but I do know she's fairly frustrated."

Sonya's Lightning assistants didn't normally get frustrated. As a whole, the entire Flame type seemed to view frustration and aggravation as kind of useless to them which was a trait she highly appreciated. At least the Russian versions did.

The French versions too, she tacked on as she recalled Verde's one-man crusade in getting access to her research. He hadn't gotten frustrated, every time she stymied him he just went about it in another way to get the results he wanted.

Staving him off via a semi-bullshitted excuse until she knew his character better was all she could do in the end. It was either that or kill the man, and she was pretty sure someone would be pissed off if she did that.

There was the wonder if they even really had the patience to feel frustration, but that was actually kind of stereotyping on her end.

Lightnings could feel frustration and aggravation, it was just with their attention spans it didn't last long for them. Either it passed too quickly, or they basically ignored it as they thought a way around whatever was frustrating them.

That wonder didn't help her much with trying to figure out if she should leave it to Galina or call in and see for herself what was going on. She was technically close enough to the clan she might be able to do a quick fix and go back to what she was doing… but it held the risk of getting mired again.

Of course, if it wasn't something she could quickly fix that would mean she'd probably get stuck behind a desk with extra attention on her ass so she wouldn't hightail it off for her own purposes.

"Tell Galina," how to word it so she wouldn't get passive-aggressive paperwork revenge dumped on her the moment she got back in the office… "that… I trust her to manage things. If it all looks to be going to hell in a handbasket I'll cut my work short and go back, but someone fairly important had better be dead or dying in that case."

"When the hell did I become a messaging service?" Tatiana bitched rather good-naturedly, a rustle of paper echoing down the phone line they were tying up.

"When you decided to remain in a predictable location for a few years."

"Real funny, little sis."

Sonya very quietly lit herself a cigarette. "Anything else I should know?"
"Put that out when you're talking to me, little sister."

How the hell did she always know?

"And yes," the faraway nurse continued only after she stubbed it out, "Cherep called in. He crashed, so expect a very bored stuntman to show up when you want him this summer and fall until he replaces his bike."

Sonya froze, and tried to convince herself that no she didn't need to check up on her brother.

Obviously, if he called Tatiana then Cherep was fine. Could talk and supposedly walk and made it through a conversation with their eldest sister who was quite a health nut in her own way.

…it didn't help much. "Where is he now?"

"Apparently the outfit he's with made it all the way to Denmark this year." After a pause that was a nearly audible shrug, the nurse continued in a markedly more business-like tone. "Should I inform Björn to aim you in that direction?"

"Please."

Tatiana didn't bother taking a note of that, she merely repeated it verbally to her Lackey. The Icelandic young man made some noise she couldn't understand on the other end before her sister continued. "That should be it, I think."

"Well, I've got nothing for you myself." Aside a request that Björn never pick up another grave robbing contract ever again, but she could give that anytime in the next few days. Preferably on a phone she would have to be less circumspect on in order for her to be able to sleep securely after said call.

"Alright then. Have fun shopping for phones."

Sonya blinked a few times as the dial-tone informed her she had been hung up on, wondering if that was what an 'Altai' was.

Time to find out, anyways.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 7th of May, 1969 continued. Björn's apartment, Mafia Land.)

Shuffling the deck of cards and letting Tatiana cut them, Adrik doled out another round of hands. "Are you sure she's not going to mind too much?"

"Nya won't care. I'll give you good odds she won't even ask what happened to the money she left for just in case." Replied the nurse, seating herself neatly next to the Lightning-Storm and the Mist in the room. "She's got a really weird sense of value for things. I ever tell you she gave a Ming Dynasty vase to our mother, to be used as a flower vase, for her birthday?"

Viper pinched the bridge of her nose. "Mou, I do not want to hear this."

Adrik warily eyed the interloping gender-fluid person warily as he traded three cards from the deck for the discarded with his 'partner' for the night. "Maybe this was a bad idea…"

"It's not like you have been instrumental in preventing us losing the money." Verde observed dryly from his other side, shuffling his new hand thoughtfully before tossing the bills for a raise on the card
"Either somehow gain more skill or be silent."

"Our mother was so amused, she actually uses it to hold sunflowers when they're in season." Tatiana continued her little story wickedly over the two of them, folding her own hand and forsaking her initial buy-in for the pot with only a glance.

Given the Lightning was the only reason their little tag-team pairing had yet to be ruthlessly cleaned out, Adrik reluctantly shut his mouth and gave the Lackey his two new cards to make up for the discarded ones.

Either both it and her folding or just the story irked the Mist user something fierce, earning the nurse a flat glare over Bjorn's head. "Silence."

"Aww… what's the matter, Viper?" Cooed the Sun Flame user, leaning over enough to nearly shove her ample chest into the suddenly beet-red face of the fortunate young man sitting between the two. "Tiny bit vexing?"

"…a genuine Ming Dynasty vase goes for half a million in euros, easily, in any auction house." Groused the money-grubbing Mist sourly as she picked up two new cards after discarding a few of her own, indigo Flames floating a raise to top Verde's bid into the middle of the table. "Who the hell uses such a thing for a flower vase, mou?"

Anything that upset the damn card shark was good to him. Maybe Verde could get back half of what he'd lost unknowingly to the Esper's damn good poker face if the nurse kept it up.

'Teach Bjorn a few tricks of ingraining himself in high stakes circles' Adrik's ass. The Mist just wanted all the money she could make off the Russians as possible, which was blatantly obvious from how little coaching the young Lightning-Storm had gotten at all through the rather cutthroat game taking place in his living room.

Viper had made impressive work on trouncing them all too, right on up until Verde started getting the hang of poker with criminals and stymied the miserly individual with some underhanded aid from Tatiana.

The young Icelandic man hadn't done too badly, and he called Verde's raise with an impressively straight face, but he was barely hanging on even so.

Before Sonya's call, and a disqualification Verde had successfully argued for on his behalf, he had almost lost the small amount of cash he had managed to hang onto throughout two hours of learning the ropes.

Admittedly, Adrik had gone into the 'friendly game' a bit arrogantly, gambling was a pretty minor vice considering the job descriptions the people here normally had and one he thought he could keep up with… but as the Lightning said he had nearly been cleared out in short order as well.

His old gang leader was of no help whatsoever. All she was interested in was finding a way to get under Viper's skin and was making good inroads if the semi-belligerent expression the other was wearing was any indication. The money she was throwing down the drain in both pursuit of that goal and to keep the Mist's interests in the game enough to ignore the times she hit too far under the belt barely made her flinch.

Adrik finally stopped putting it off, glancing at his pair of cards. Letting the truly dismal pair of threes, a seven, an ace, and a jack go as he wordlessly folded. He would've played it any other time… except he was getting disturbingly low on funds.
"…if the card table is made out of Mist Flames, does that mean Viper can see the cards dealt out onto it?"

The Mist user in question eyed him suspiciously. "Of course I can."

"Da, it's why we asked you to hand them to us." Bjorn tacked on miserably, having to go all in to match his tutor's and Verde's counter-raises.

Tatiana flashed her former gang member a tight little grin. "Aww… poor Adrik. Are you only now realizing that?"

…well, they were all cheating.

Adrik was pretty sure Verde had long since resorted to counting cards, the Sun nurse had made a few suspicious burn marks on a few of them, fuck… even the Lackey was fiddling around bending certain corners. With a Mist in play, there were probably numerous ways she could cheat that he would never think of.

"Call." Verde decided to cut his probable risks that round, matching the limits of what the Icelander could afford and not dipping into the rest of what they had.

Viper made a moue of disgust, but also matched the funds with the other two. "…fine then."

The Mist had been holding onto a set of three Aces, which were beaten out by Verde's Full House, but both hands lost to the Lackey's Straight Flush.

Tatiana burst out laughing as Bjorn tripled his funds all in one instant. The kid very pointedly did not look his current teacher in the eyes as he raked in the pot.

Viper's expression was livid. "Trying to surpass the master there, Bjorn?"

"No!" Yelped the youngest in the room, cringing under the highly unimpressed look leveled at him from that corner. "It was just luck, I swear!"

"I think it's time to stop playing nice, then…"

Verde turned and looked Adrik in the eye. "I suggest we withdraw anything you do not wish to lose."

"At this point, I think Viper might engineer a messy murder for us all if we tried."

Thoughtfully considering what they had left, the scientist slanted a look at the very irked Mist user in the room and then at the Russian he had been more or less stuck with since Sonya took off. "How about a compromise, then?"

Viper shot him a seething look as Tatiana took possession of the deck to dole out the next round. "What?"

"Now that Bjorn has the full amount Sonya left behind to pay you secured, I will forfeit the rest of what we have left if you will submit a few answers I would like to pose."

Adrik spluttered as he was unceremoniously sold out shamelessly by his so-called 'partner', dropping the newest and still dismal hand he had been dealt in shock. Viper abandoned her own to pounce on the money the twosome had left, fanned through it with a thumb, then gave a short nod. "Two."

For a very long moment, it seemed Verde would argue to try and raise the number of questions he was allowed. In the end, after another side glance to him then back to the miser, the scientist just gave a tight nod. "Very well. Two in-depth answers on the subject of your Flame type."

"This is some bullshite."

"Next time, don't lose too badly. Most of it was Verde's to handle anyways." Tatiana put in her two cents from the other side of the table, folding her own new hand and handing the much-abused deck to the youngest player. "I think I'm going to call it a night, before I have to dip into my savings."

Adrik made an admittedly rude sound in her direction, getting to his own feet. "Come on, Verde. Or you'll have to walk back yourself."

By his expression alone, the scientist was none too pleased the night was being called in early. Especially not after finally getting the Mist to finally agree to answer a few of his burning Flame questions.

"You've paid, mou," Viper intoned blandly from where she was stubbornly sitting on Bjørn's couch, "I'll find you later."

Dismissing the Lightning for the time being, the miser then pinned the younger Lightning-Storm with a hard look.

Hunching his shoulders, the Lackey merely secured the larger chunk of money that was the funds Sonya had left behind for bribing the Mist if more aid was needed. His expression when they shut his front door behind them was torn between highly wary and resigned.

"That's why Nya's never going to ask." Tatiana confided to both Adrik and Verde as the three of them left the Icelander's apartment behind. "She knew full well that if Viper heard a word of any money left behind explicitly for him, he'd do anything to get a hold of it. A poker game is pretty tame compared to what she was sure he'd try."

The Russian man idly scratched at his still healing surgery scars absently, only for his hand to be batted away irritably by the nurse who fussed after it for a moment until she was sure they were fine. "Was male the gender of the day for him?"

"If I can't tell, I just go with male."

"Does-"

"Viper never seems to mind when I see him. Even the day we were introduced through Bjørn and I accidentally called him a 'he' when she was wearing full skirts and somehow had a bust a girl her size would be proud of." Shrugging, the Sun waved the interrupted scientist's irritated look for interrupting him off. "I think it's his preferred standby if you can't tell. Because if he didn't get tetchy then… when she was obviously female…"

"Eh… still kind of squicky." Adrik dismissed after a moment of contemplation. "Can we change the subject?"

Tatiana clicked her tongue at him as they made it to the streets. "So sheltered, aren't we?"

"Sheltered?" Verde asked curiously, plodding along in their wake. It was the safest method to travel for him, given the nurse's medical badge ensured only the very foolish messed with her and Adrik could at least flash a stolen pistol to clear his own way.

"Homosexuality and transgender people are persecuted in pretty much all corners of the world.
Which means…?

"They go underground with it." Verde concluded obediently to the expectation to finish her thought. "So, they often end up here?"

The nurse shrugged absently, sternly eyeing some of the people they were passing who were speculatively eyeing the Lightning in turn. "Not here, exactly. But they're pretty common if you know where to go. There's always a district or two you can dig up with enough effort. Very sympathetic about hiding you if you word it right too. There were these girls, and I used the term girls lightly here, back in Germany…"

"Ugh. Viper's bad enough, can we not bring that up?" Adrik bitterly asked, pulling a face at her.

Tatiana flashed Verde a smirk over a shoulder. "They really liked him when we were there."

(Thursday the 8th of May, 1969. Voronezh, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

As it turned out, Altai was actually an incredibly clunky looking precursor to mobile phones.

The Soviet Union's version of them, maybe, but they were still multi-channeled portable car phones.

Sonya realized why the contract was paying so much out for a few hundred units of brick-like technology and the control tower for them that had been produced for a couple years already pretty damn quick, she had to steal them from the KGB.

The reason why the thief hadn't realized the cellular age was creeping up was because only Soviet government officials and apparently some emergency services had access to them. If she didn't want to steal them from hospitals or risking the police to get theirs, one would invite Tatiana to bitch for years if she ever found out and the other was just bad news all over, it meant she had to go after either the production factories or the politicians and government spies about it.

Heading a good distance east, the Storm-Cloud ended up in the city of Voronezh. Having ruled out actually uninstalling the target bricks of technology from places they were already installed, since they were likely highly guarded and it was entirely impossible to do nearly two hundred units all in one night before security got sicced on her ass, her target was the Voronezhskiy Scientific Research Institute of Communication headquarters and it's attached factory/lab/production buildings.

…and more importantly, the factory that produced the all-in-one 'mobile' communication units.

Sonya flatly refused to call them cell phones even in her own head, they really were more like bricks you'd install into a car's dashboard or which needed it's own suitcase if you carried it around with you. Regardless of what they were the forerunners of, she was calling them phone bricks.

Sticking above the weird, fake-foam ceiling that seemed to be a staple of business offices and public buildings for the most part, the thief managed two relatively quiet nights of scoping out the factory and the offices than handled production. She ended up pretty dusty and had a few tight moments when the fragile ceiling didn't want to support her weight over people she never wanted to come to the attention of.

However, the easy time she had staying out of the way rapidly lead her to the conclusion something serious was needed to interrupt the normal security before she could even set a toe into the factory for what she needed.
The KGB were not slouches in any respect and were of a caliber higher than private security firms she had tangled with before.

Security patrols were way too tight for her to take advantage of any holes, and while she could rewire some of the alarms and security feeds she couldn't do all of them before someone checked up on them and plugged the holes she might be able to make.

All in all, not something she could ghost through like she preferred.

Taking one extra day, which she could afford in terms of the contract she was on if not happy about the delay personally, Sonya carefully inspected each of the females that even remotely could enter specific offices. Picking someone at least generally her size, she made careful note of the hair color and her behavioral ticks.

Sonya had no expectations about somehow avoiding the KGB’s attention on this one, all she really could do was muddy the trail as much as she could. When they traced her movements back, they would likely realize there was a blonde woman involved then run into the fake passport and ID she had been carrying around and using in favor of her legal ones since she left Mafia Land.

Thank fuck she had, even if she had wondered if she should bother getting fake papers this time since she was just going back into the Iron Curtain.

Hopefully she could make a case that there might be more than one thief involved like usual when her acts came to the attention of anyone.

(ooo0000oo)

(Thursday the 8th of May, 1969 continued. Voronezh, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Excuse me!"

Rapidly clicking her way towards a pair of KGB security men, a harried looking secretary wordlessly handed over her identification to the elder of the two and used the moment when they checked it to regain her breath.

"I left my house keys in my desk. Please tell me the office is not locked down yet, my husband will be very unamused if I do not have dinner waiting for him when he gets off shift." When all her babbled excuse earned her two highly unamused blank looks but one grudging nod, the young woman straightened herself up and returned the nod sharply an attempt to hide her obvious nerves. "I have no objections if the two of you followed me in, I just need to unlock the bottom drawer of my desk for a moment."

They both smoothly stepped aside, ensuring she felt every inch of their suspicious glares.

Still nervous but determined, the secretary led the way into the VNIIS headquarters building and down the correct halls to the office she worked in front of without so much a twitch in the wrong directions. The key was removed from around her neck, and it took only a moment before the lock turned and the drawer in question opened up.

Retrieving a set of keys from inside, the young woman closed the drawer and twisted the key in the opposite direction to re-lock it. "Thank you, gentlemen, I'll get out of your way now… oh!"

With a wince, a part of her left earring that had caught on her suit jacket popped off and clattered away further into the dim semi-lit hallway.
She held a hand to her smarting earlobe but glanced at the two security officers instead of go after the broken end of her earing. "...I'll just find that tomorrow."

"Smart idea, miss. Now, please exit the building."

"Of course." With a nervous little smile, the young woman turned on her wobbly heels and clicked her way out of office as asked.

They stalked her completely out of the building, and down one street, until she was definitely on her way home and less nervous overall.

The moment they turned back Sonya did not deviate from her path, making three turns down the street she knew the secretary she was impersonating actually lived down. Once past the apartment building's front doors, the thief took an immediate left as the girl she was impersonating always did to avoid the elevator.

Once in the staircase, she slipped off the impractically high heels she was still wobbly on and peeled off the suit and skirt ensemble in favor of the other change of clothes she wouldn't mind losing at the end of this just in case. Stamping the generic boots on her feet, promising herself she would only destroy the damn things even if then she'd have to go barefoot, the Storm-Cloud darted up the stairs to the apartment she had been heading towards.

Sonya carefully broke into the home of the married office girl she had impersonated, carefully sneaking around the young woman in the kitchen and replacing the ID she had pickpocketed out of a purse for her own use. She also stealthy slipped into the girl's room, leaving the earrings she had borrowed and slightly modified to break so easily.

Exiting via the bedroom window, the thief scaled the brickwork using only the tips of her fingers and her Cloud Flame given strength. Once she reached the roof, she spent a moment to Disintegrate the clothing she had purchased in the city so they hopefully couldn't be traced back to her.

Then she looked out in the direction of the office building she had just visited and willed the small kernel of Storm Flames in the gemstone she 'lost' in the offices to burn.

If this didn't work to start a fire she'd have to risk sneaking in, without the cover of civilians wandering around to cover any inadvertent issues she came across, to light one. She did not want to risk that, in fact she would greatly prefer the cover of an industrial accident for her first interaction with the KGB…

Narrowing her eyes at the silhouette of the Voronezhskiy Scientific Research Institute of Communication building, Sonya's night-adjusted eyes picked up the faint glow of something fiery going on through a window.

…did it really work?

Staying put for five more minutes confirmed the fact there was a fire going on where she wanted it. The mechanically grinding siren that belted out a warning of a fire belted out in the rapidly fading evening was her signal to move as well.

Re-covering the ground she clicked her way down in heels took less time via rooftops, at least until she reached the industrial sector of Voronezh. By the time she returned to street-level, the fire she started had consumed a fair bit of the office she had impersonated her way into.

A fire was a very disorientating thing to manage security patrols around, especially since it could spread. Storm Flame started fires had a bad habit of melting its way through things plain fire really shouldn't be able to get through, adding even more confusion and disorientation for the KGB agents on the scene.

Using the distraction the disaster provided as cover for her more risky actions, Sonya leapt over an electrified two story tall chain link fence and hit the ground a little more heavily than she liked. Gritting her teeth, she slunk her way past a guard shack with only one man currently glancing through the feeds of nearly thirty monitors on his lonesome.

Summoning a palm full of red fire to her hand, the thief carefully and slowly brushed it to the bundle of cables right at the juncture they entered the shack. Mimicking the burn pattern for phosphorous to prevent immediate replacement of the severed cables for as long as possible.

It blew the assumption this was just an accident or electrical fire that started somehow out of the realm of possibility, and they'd connect this to the office building's sudden fiery issues, but if she didn't want to be caught on security cameras there were literally no other way to take the recording devices at least temporarily down before they could catch her image.

She had tried to plan for that, only to give up when the redundant camera angles kept tripping up anything she could think of.

Immediately ducking out of range around the corner of the tiny building, the thief only just barely missed being spotted as the guard bolted out of his assigned shack with a semi-automatic rifle in one hand and his radio in the other.

He barked out the report of what little he could see, which was basically that his security monitor bank's cables had been somehow melted instantly. No fire, possibly chemicals used.

Another siren cranked to life a few beats after, this one wasn't ever going to be mistaken for a fire alarm but she was already making good time towards the warehouses supposedly holding the production of the factory and labs. Supposedly, because this was the part she had been unable to actually get personal confirmation it was as blueprints and office memos suggested it was.

The riskier part.

Sonya could afford a bit of time to locate where exactly her targets were with everything going on but couldn't afford to somehow spark off another night of distractions. After this, she was pretty damn sure they'd call in even more KGB agents to beef up security to the point she would either have to murder her way in or give up.

As she didn't intend to murder her way through her contracts if she could just steal things instead, tonight was her only window.

Assuming there was security within the warehouses themselves paid off, abusing her inhuman jumping and her circus-trained acrobatic skills to enter the great building after prying up a bit of a roof, from what she could see right away just by looking down.

Five. More than enough to split off a team to investigate any noise she made without seriously compromising their guarding or leaving someone as the odd man out.

Perfect.

Sonya moved painfully slowly, aware that the fire she started had long since run out of Storm Flames and was likely already being controlled but unwilling to rush and make any mistakes now that she was within reach of pulling this off.
but this was the wrong warehouse. She only had to slowly and carefully pry open three crates to realize that, and she had no use for airplane parts.

Even expecting a few misdirection problems going into the night, it still was aggravating to run into. Nearly half an hour of precious time wasted on a red herring, and now she had to exit and try a random other warehouse in hopes she might get lucky before security finally tightened up.

They only had another large one and a few smaller, but this part was the one that could easily trip her up. Her assumption was that the larger warehouses were for shipments waiting to be shipped out, and the smaller ones were just storage for completed parts until assembled on orders. If one was shipment, and the other wasn't…

She stopped that mental train of thought before she could convince herself to doubt her plans.

Retracing her steps back up a stack of crated machinery parts and up to a position that would hopefully let her jump to the rafters without any horrible clanging noises that would give her presence away, Sonya accidently kicked a loose nail she couldn't see in the gloomy unlit interior. The background sirens and muffled noise of the ongoing fire concealed it striking wood until it fell into the partially opened crate she had started with and it rattled around more noticeably, which she had left open because even pressing the nails back into the wood might end up creating a screeching noise she couldn't afford.

She also could barely afford that noise.

Swearing in every language she could in the privacy of her mind, the thief leapt for the roof's supporting braces to get herself the fuck out of there quickly. Barely escaping ahead of the flashlight sweeps, she did spend the time carefully and slowly bending the sheet of corrugated metal roofing back down to make her entrance point less obvious.

There was only one other large warehouse where assembled bundles were kept before shipment, and while it wasn't too far from the first one she tried it was far enough away from anything she could use as cover to reach it.

Sonya spent two minutes, all she could convince herself to spare given she knew her time was running out quickly, to inspect the area and ensure she knew where the patrols were running.

Flat out bolting once she could convince herself the coast was clear, the thief ran nearly bent in half to keep her profile low and hopefully out of any unfortunately timed glance by any of the farther patrols.

Since she couldn't be sure she was unspotted anymore, she abandoned the slow and silent method for a distraction-heavy one.

A two-handed strike of one of her Cloud Flame mauls on the sliding of the next warehouse almost rattled her teeth, and possibly half deafened the guards within. Going with another inhuman jump got her out of the way when the great bay doors were slid open, a long pause happened before one guard who got the short straw poked his head out to see what had hit the building.

The fact there was nothing around that could've created the very obvious dent in the metal walls drew out another two, but Sonya only knew that because she had peeled away another part of the sliding far above their heads and on the opposite side of the building that was taking up so much attention. Slipping inside from an angle that was not under so much scrutiny gave her the few moments to be sure this was the correct building.
Thankfully, because she was pretty sure those guards on the warehouse's floor were being chewed out for opening the bay doors for any reason from the flinching going on and the muffled sounds she could hear so far up so the maul trick wouldn't work again, it was. The shipment she was after was sitting neatly near the ground, almost ready for loading onto a truck.

Now she had to get nearly a ton of circuitry and packaging out of here, without getting caught or doing anything stupid.

Sonya crawled back up the towering stacks of boxes and crates to take a moment to catch her breath and settle her nerves, considering the open doors that gave a very nice view of the scrambling KGB agents both swarming over the smoldering building in the distance and crawling all over the wide-open wasteland of concrete that was the shipping and receiving area of the complex.

Unfortunately, the memos she had spied upon had been either intentionally wrong or just lying to the people they were sent to. The shipment might be all together, labeled and packaged correctly… but it wasn't on a shipping truck.

She couldn't get out again the way she planned on. Not with her fire-distraction already dying down and even more security pouring into the industrial part of the factory in response to her cutting the security feeds. She also couldn't stay here until she or someone else could move it all in some other way, the security cameras would only be down for however long until patches could be made to the wiring she had destroyed.

There was no residue normal phosphorus would leave behind on the burns she made on the wiring, and she had no doubts that this place didn't had the lab to test for that, so barely a few hours of no security cameras was all that earned her.

Pursing her lips after a long moment of thought, the thief glanced first at the shipment and then at the far away trucks.

…maybe she could still use her original idea.

It would be tricky, and risky especially since she was pretty sure a very thorough sweep would be done in response to her break-in… but she might be able to actually get away with this if she did it right.

It was just a matter of guessing correctly.

(Friday the 9th of May, 1969. Voronezh, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Someone broke in?"

"That's what the rumors say." Grumped the driver that had been called in hours ago and was still expected to work his regular shift to his enviously more rested younger counterpart. "Nothing was taken, they only know it was a break-in and not an accident because the fire 'mysteriously' spread to a part of the building not connected to offices."

"So what... was it? Someone breaking in?" The fresher man lowered his voice and leaned closer to the other. "Sabotage? Some kind of protest?"

Shrugging, the wearer of the two picked up the clipboard of which truck he would be driving and where he had to take it. "Don't know. No one's talking. Supposedly, one of the girls from the office was taken in for questioning… but if anything comes from that…"

With an uneasy expression, the man he had been talking to picked up his own orders and wandered off to his truck.

Running an eye over the destinations he would be driving to, and exactly who and where he would require signatures on delivery, he made sure he looked properly put together as a delivery man was supposed to according to his employers before heading off to the truck he was assigned. Apparently already loaded, he merely had to wait for the guards to finish inspecting almost every inch of the truck cab and the shipments he was responsible for.

Once he was waved over, he experienced another few moments of getting eyeballed by all corners as his IDs were meticulously examined and compared to his own face before being dismissed to actually do his job. Grumbling under his breath, the tired truck driver hauled himself up to the driver's seat.

Almost buckling himself in before he realized some asshole had failed to close the passenger door all the way and it was swinging open again.

Once everything was firmly shut and he had pulled out of the shipping and receiving area… he was already an hour and a half behind his schedule.

While bitching under his breath about unnecessary searches and assholes that would never accept security as a valid excuse for being behind and keeping an eye on early morning traffic, he never saw the hand that suddenly snapped out to gripped him by the hair and smash his head into a window only just hard enough to shatter it.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 9th of May, 1969 continued. Voronezh, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya rather roughly hauled the insensible body out of the driver's seat, barely stifling a wide yawn that still made her eyes water as she rolled the window down to conceal the damage.

A long night playing peek-a-boo with several search parties all around this damn truck's underside and interior cab as well as the rest of the fleet of vehicles had done nothing for her nerves, and the high-strung Storm-Cloud would maybe admit she hit the man a little too hard… but she really didn't care right now.

Grumpy was going to be even later than he thought, and she'd let him wake up without blunt force trauma sending him back to dreamland… once she reached a secluded enough stretch of road to hide a stack of crates nearly half a story tall.

Then she was going to take a goddamned nap before arranging alternative transportation for the shipment and clearing out of Soviet Russia for a while.
That wasn't the end of it.

Of course not, Sonya didn't have that kind of luck.

An hour into driving down a highway, which was a hell of a lot easier than somehow navigating urban streets with the Russian version of a big rig truck plus trailer, there was a bang on the cab. From within the trailer.

"Pull over, the rookie needs to piss."

…charming.

Her shipment of Altai communication bricks was infested with what was probably a few KGB members, likely along for the ride to ensure everything reached where it should be going.

Not exactly part of her plan, there.

The thief obediently started slowing the stolen rig, running a few ideas of how to deal with this little upset through her head.

The easiest way to deal with it was to kill them, obviously. However…

Slitting a sideways glance to her insensible co-pilot as the stolen truck came to a fairly gentle halt on the side of the highway connecting Voronezh and her second birth city of Saratov, she pulled the brakes and turned off the engine before slipping out of the cab.

She didn't want to be forced to kill people on the job, not even KGB operatives that would likely throw one hell of a monkey wrench in her future plans if they ever ID her as a criminal of an international flavor.

Likely they knew she had the connections already, from even being related to Arseniy alone if not the Zolotovs as a whole, best not to add to their suspicions.

Also, killing them would throw even more suspicion and possibly kill the secretary girl and her insensible co-pilot. They were really just in the wrong place at the wrong time, she didn't really feel like inconveniencing them even more than she already had.

…even if getting fingered by the KGB would mean she'd have a legitimate excuse to avoid the Soviet Union entirely for a good few years. She was pretty certain Usov would have the skill to really mess around them as he wanted, he had become a damn fine Mist, but that wouldn't be for another few years yet.

With a fairly powerful knock of her own to the back-trailer doors, she unlocked them with the truck's key ring and pulled a door open in a way so she wouldn't immediately be seen.

Sonya then darted back to the cab, hanging out of it only long enough to pick up the sound of two pairs of boots hitting the gravel on the side of the highway.

"Hey, Palyulin! Come here."
How about… sure.

Getting a good grip on 'Palyulin' unformed shirt and ducking down a little in the driver's seat, the Soviet Storm-Cloud waited until the cab door moved under force not her own or the wind's.

Then she dumped the still out-cold driver on top of the KGB agent before he could catch a glimpse of her and cranked the engine.

A startled shout from the 'rookie', the grinding crunch of gravel being churned and sprayed by heavy duty rubber, and the entire rig lurched forward again. The wide-opened trailer doors banged against their hinges before slamming closed… hopefully.

She would pull over and check that in a few more miles.

Sitting back up straight as she got the entire vehicle back up to speed, Sonya double checked the map she found in the glove box. The whole ensemble had passed a small city back a little while, about fifteen minutes. Which… might just get her a few hours of a head-start before the stolen rig and shipments was reported.

She had to ditch the rig somewhere or swap the trailers with another that would be less searched for.

Musical trucks… lovely.

The next city was Rogachevka, which sat in the fork of M4 and A114. Hopefully she could find both what passed as a rural truck shop and a few pay phones.

She had to tell Bjørn to never pick up another grave robbing contract and tell her where the closest Mafia Land servicing airport was. She'd go all the way to Saratov if she had to, but if she didn't have to with a hot rig then she'd ship it all off early.

Besides, if she took a few days off… she could see what the hell Renato had wanted and go see Cherep for a few days before getting back to it.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 9th of May, 1969 continued. Saratov, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Sonya? Is… is that you?"

The named thief twitched violently when she recognized the voice, a lacework of spider webbing cracks spreading up the water glass she had been in the process of taking a sip from. Putting the compromised glass down on her table gingerly, she turned slightly in her chair to behold her male genetic contributor. "…Mikhail."

This was why she hadn't visited Saratov in years, not any order he gave her or just plain disinterest. She had frankly never wanted to see her so-called biological father ever again.

Mikhail looked better than he had a few years ago, if she was forced to be honest. Less gnarled with age and more… distinguished with it instead. Obviously, something in his life had improved since the last time they met and from the look of tall, blonde, and shapely hanging off his arm… his quality of life wasn't the only change in the last few years.

Sonya still didn't like him. On top of a truly tiring long night, the fact she hadn't slept in nearly twenty hours, and the complications of managing a trailer truck that might just so happen to be illegally acquired… that probably was not going to change any time soon.

"Do you two know each other?" Inquired the woman clinging to his arm hesitantly.

No, they merely knew each other's name magically.

Apparently, his type included the brainless variation of blondes. Which… after her bitch of a mother, was probably predictable.

Dismissing the girl who was probably only a few more years older than her, Sonya glanced one more time at Mikhail before returning to her interrupted lunch. Either say what you want and leave, or just get lost.

"Misha?"

"…Ilik, this is my… daughter."

Said 'daughter' sighed heavily, aggravated and more than a little pissed off he wasn't leaving like she told him to. She did not have the patience or desire to deal with him today.

The woman who flounced excitedly to the seat across the little table across the Soviet version of a deli she had stopped to eat at was treated to a glare that bounced off her bright grin.

"I didn't know Misha had a daughter! Oh, but you're lovely…"

"You seem to be laboring under the mistaken impression I give a damn about him at all. I don't." She informed the older woman bluntly, avoiding the grab she made for her hands sharply. I was fostered out for a damn good reason and have no desire to have anything to do with him.

"Sonya."

"Shut the hell up." Giving the man a sharp glare over one shoulder, turning back to the surprised looking and only now slightly uncertain looking girl who was probably her father's girlfriend or fiancée. If you will excuse me.

If they weren't leaving, she would.

Wrapping up the last of her pirozhki for later, she had already polished off the bowl of soup that came with the stuffed buns so the dishes were stacked together and the tray picked up to be handed back across the service counter.

Bubbly blonde and brainless darted around to plant herself in the thief's way, making a frankly ridiculous and overblown expression of pleading. Lovely, won't you please just spare a few minutes? Misha met my sons, I really do just only want to get to know you a little.

"No."

"Can I at least ask what you do these days?" She pressed on rather recklessly, but then again she was quite obviously civilian and had no idea what she was harassing. Before you go, and I'll stop bothering you…

Mikhail obviously thought she had nothing prepared for answering that question when just anyone off the street asked her. He took a step forward, gripping 'Ilik's' arm gently. *I don't think-

"…I'm an author and amateur historian." Sonya spoke over her genetic contributor again nearly gleefully. When not researching for my next book, I work for an international trading company acquiring the things on our clients' request."

The older man's mouth shut with a snap, and his lady friend folded her hands under her chin and beamed at her. "We'll get out of your way, you're probably busy. Are you staying around here for long?"

"No. I'm currently on the clock."

"Oh... maybe we can see you again some time?"

Sonya huffed silently, cutting an irritated look at Mikhail. "Preferably not."

On her way out, she caught brainless blonde's voice over the mummer of other midday diners looking for a cheap lunch.

"Why does she hate you so?"

The thief in her had her immediately ducking down the way for the restrooms, mostly to see if she could hear what her biological father was saying out of sheer morbid curiosity. It would also be something of a good idea to see what he was explaining her absence with.

"Sonya's a headstrong girl, much like her mother." The voices were getting louder, so she effortlessly broke into the cleaning cupboard to remove herself from view if they happened to glance her way. "She's decided I was at fault for an incident in her childhood and hasn't given up her grudge ever since."

Copout. It also didn't address anything about why she was missing from his life or anything about how he contributed to it.

Feeling slightly more disgusted with the man, she left the tiny space and followed them out at a distance.

The young teen that had been about to open the door she hid behind gaped at her as she brushed past him without a backwards glance.

---

(Saturday the 10th of May, 1969. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Her hand raised to knock, Sonya blinked when the door she was standing in front of was opened before she could rap her knuckles on the reinforced wood.

The ruffled looking but still pretty brunette woman that had done said opening looked just as surprised as she felt to see her standing there behind this particular door.

She was maybe around her age?

Not much older, if at all. She was really pretty even after a recent shower and what was likely yesterday's clothes, more so than Sonya was without at least an hour put into dressing up.

"Who the hell are you supposed to be?"

Lowering her hand in bemusement, the thief merely blinked at her blankly.

Why, exactly, was this woman opening Renato's apartment door?
...beyond the obvious 'because she was leaving'. As far as the Russian was aware of via a small island's rumor mill, the hitman wasn't the type to bring home his girls for the evening. He was a more 'their place' kind of guy.

Did she follow him back or something?

"Oh... wait. I recognize you now." Giving her a once over, that somehow managed to be both sarcastically judging and dismissive at the same time, the other woman pursed her lips for a long moment. "You're Sinclair's Russian bitch the rumor mill twitters about."

Sonya cocked an eyebrow at her. "Am I supposed to know who you are?"

The ugly look she got for expressing her truthful ignorance of whoever the hell she was didn't improve her looks any. Might be a pretty lady when not being bitchy, but good lord could she sneer.

"Camilla, leaving so soon?" Drawled a shirtless, and hat-less, hitman as he sauntered into his living room. Obviously not expecting the Russian to be in his doorway, but the man adjusted to it pretty damn fast. "Little lady Sonya, I thought you were busy this month?"

"Tats said it looked sort of important. I could totally go back to what I was doing if you are..." What was a diplomatic word for 'in the middle of screwing somebody?' "Busy."

Renato glanced at his current fling, including her incredibly embarrassed expression at getting caught sneaking out, then gave the shorter blonde a wicked smirk. "I think I'm free. Unless you wanted something else, Camilla?"

"No." The girl stuck her nose in the air and swept past Sonya stiffly.

Nearly marching down the bland hallway, as if she wasn't the most interesting thing in it.

She just waited until the other woman was barely far enough down the hall to make eavesdropping an only somewhat lower risk. "Very pretty."

"I do have good taste in women." Insisted the hitman lazily, buffing his nails on his pants for lack of any other cloth.

"Not very smart. Or unforgivably green." She hadn't heard of the Russian's Flame type, otherwise she would've been markedly less bold in trying to insult her to her face.

Either that or she had little to no experience with Flame users of the Sky as a whole. Amusing in a way, but her little 'walk of shame' was more than enough comeuppance for Sonya.

"She's new here and tried for my head. Got a very different one, in the end."

Fantastic, Sonya was a bro.

The downsides of being friends with a womanizing pervert like Renato... she wasn't sure if she liked this development or not. Before she had been too young for him to be really raunchy towards unless someone he was flirting with was nearby, now apparently she was old enough to hear all about it.

"Yes, very... interesting. Look, was it really that important or can I go without feeling too bad?"

"Did you break off?" Asked the still half-naked Sun in a markedly more serious tone.

The thief shook her head, finally walking fully into the man's apartment if only for the sound-proofing Mafia Land apartments were known for and shutting the door behind her. "Between contracts. Though I probably could have with this latest one. I just… didn't feel like it. Something else came up however, so I figured if I was going to delay my next one for a few days I might as well see what you needed on the way."

Renato gave an absent nod as he smoothed a hand along the underside of his jawline, turning on one heel for his bedroom while giving her an absent wave. "Let's grab lunch. I need to pry into older Soviet Flame users."

Well… she did need to eat. At least the company for this next lunch would be scores above the company she had at her last one.

"I heard that from Tats." Sonya called out, idly inspecting the room she was lingering in.

A few things had changed since she helped Shamal here.

There were the obviously the more fragile things he had probably put away so baby Mist brat wouldn't break them. What looked to be an antique glass and brass oil lamp and a little crystal figurine of some sun god holding his bronze sun icon collecting more than its fair share of dust on shelving for example. There was a crucifix hanging on the wall that had a little more care put into the upkeep of, laid out on his coffee table was the likely interrupted leftovers of him cleaning his pistols, and there still were no dishes left in the sink.

He was a very neat bachelor type. Whereas her brother's things just tended to explode in slow motion all over the area he lived in, sometimes even the places they were only temporarily occupying.

Sonya supposed with her hoarding habit of all things papery she really couldn't point fingers, but there it was.

The few standing lamps in the corners had a few more bullet holes behind them than she recalled, likely meaning he still had that habit of taking his frustrations out on innocent housewares. Renato had acquired a bullet press sometime in the last few years, which now occupied an entire corner, the boxes of casings and some tins of gunpowder sorted neatly around it. It and a rather expensive looking coffee maker that now dominated his kitchenette's counter where the only things she could see dust free… and there was a rather nice rug on the living room floor now.

No personal picture frames even still, but he was a hitman. Probably didn't want to risk anyone hunting down the people he had pictures of.

A few nice landscape paintings he apparently didn't care too much about, but those were still impersonal forest clearings and one mountain profile.

Actually, it was rather dusty in here. Maybe he just got back, or did he mostly live on the road as she did when working?

"Unfortunately, I am not going to be of much help right away."

"Why not?"

Toeing the rug with a boot tip curiosity, she wondered if he got it to cover bloodstains or damage, the Russian glanced back to the door of his room really quick and pulled up one end to peek underneath it. "I do not deal with older Soviet Flame users at all. Mostly the younger ones. I can find out, I have the position and leverage for them to be more or less truthful to me about it, but off the top of my head I only know of younger or inactive Soviet Clouds."

Renato had apparently come back into the room to talk to her as he got dressed. With shoes and socks on his feet but a shirt in hand. "Sonya."

Dropping the rug, the thief gave him a small smirk. "I was curious."

"You could just ask."

"Would you tell me?" He hesitated a moment too long, one arm thrust into the sleeve tie gripped between his teeth as he looked at her funny. "I thought not. So, back to topic, I am actually somewhat interested in finding out myself."

He frowned thoughtfully as he puzzled over that, keeping a wary eye on her likely so she wouldn't get into anything else under his nose as he pulled the length of fabric from his mouth. "How difficult do you think getting the answer would be?"

"I still have not the vaguest idea why you would like to know." Sonya reminded him a bit pointedly.

"A bit of a thing for Nono." The hitman informed her easily enough, looping the tie around his neck and nimble fingers doing up his buttons in short order so he could tie it. "One of the Vongola Alliance Famiglias have this splinter branch that was wronged by someone I'm fairly certain was a Cloud that had some skills in stealth."

"Is it that greatly odd? Stealth Clouds?" She was a stealthy Cloud, and Cherep could sneak if he wanted.

On the rare occurrences when he wanted to.

Surely it wasn't that unusual…

"Yes." Renato shot down that hope in short order, not even looking at her as he snatched up his keys and wallet from a table near his bedroom door and went in search of his suit jacket and hat.

"Whoever it was, they weren't European. Our Clouds tend to be bruisers or overwhelming fighters in type, great for taking on a veritable army of men or knocking down a few walls. Stealth is seen more as a Mist skill, and with that rivalry between the two? I would've heard of another Cloud that behaved like you, if only from sheer coincidence."

"So… you're thinking Soviet instead?"

That… was really flimsy. There was more to the world than just Europe and the Soviet Union. Africa and the Orient maybe. Hell, even North and South America.

If they were taking all the active Soviet Cloud Flame users she personally knew into it, there were two to one for stealth. Well… excluding Cherep, because he was Polarized… that was still… half…

If the Khimki Cloud was going to be typical for those allowed to run feral at first, then Sonya's supposed beta Cloud nature really was the odd one out. Frankly, with how many Clouds there seemed to be all in Vongola Territory alone, the fact her nature wasn't copied even to the vaguest degree in them meant there was another thing she was missing, or her strange nature either had to do with bullheaded obstinacy or her Storm aspect.

Okay, fine. She was weird. Renato didn't have to rub it in.

"Is that it? That's a rather broad search parameter." Besides which, asking for what level of stealth any Clouds she heard about might have had would be a little… questionable.

"Preferably still alive or rumored to be alive. Retired or just gone missing. If they're in the Soviet Union, then those that left in the last couple of months. I've got other methods to try, you're just one I think is the correct one." This time the hitman came out of his room entirely put together. Noticing her looking, the fop bushed down his lapels and gestured to himself. "Well?"

"I am kind of interested in why you put your shoes on before pulling on a shirt."

Renato glanced down distractedly, straightening the lay of his tie. "Long, really not that interesting, and stupid story."

Sonya crossed her arms under her chest and cocked an eyebrow at the man. "Now I really want to hear this."

"Your curiosity is going to be the death of you one of these days."

"Not today."

He apparently had nothing to argue against that ready, from the entirely disdainful glare he shot her as he shooed her out of his apartment. "Ever had to run down an alleyway barefoot before? In a big city?"

Sonya pursed her lips and thought of what issues that might incur as he locked his door. "Broken glass?"

"A fucking rusty nail. Right through the sole of my left foot."

Yes, but why would he be barefoot in such a situation in the first place?

Unless he was somewhere he shouldn't, and mostly or completely… buck… naked…

"Stop smirking." However, even his mouth twitched in what was probably a stillborn smirk of his own.

She pressed her lips together, but still couldn't completely remove the tilt to her lips. "Mm… no. Not happening. That is… ah, I should have guessed."

Renato rolled his eyes at her. "A long time ago, learned my lesson, and all that horseshit. Now, what do you feel like eating?"

"How old are you, exactly?" Ignoring his attempt to change the subject, the Russian tapped her lips with a finger. "Also, that was not a very long story. What are you not telling me?"

He gave her a stern look, shot a glance at the ceiling, and shook his head as he stalked off down the hall. "We're eating Italian if you've got no opinion on it."

"I do not, really. However, I have a story about my first attempt to jump higher than humanly possible?"

Pausing mid-stride, the Italian Sun deliberated a moment before finally shrugging and heaving an exasperated sigh at her. "I may or may not have shagged some gang leader's girl and was found in bed with her. Escaping the city when every two-bit thug that answered to him was after me and limping rather badly was an experience I don't particularly want to have again."

Hmm… that was probably the end of it. Obviously, Renato escaped his situation. He was standing in front of her after all. Might have been his first incident realizing that no, Sun Flames couldn't quite heal everything and there were some wounds you didn't want healed instantly.
"I got stuck on our roof."

Renato looked about as surprised as his blurted bark of laughter sounded. Whipping his head around, one hand holding his ever-present fedora safely secure in the motion, he eyed her expectantly. "Really?"

Sonya nodded regretfully. "It took about half an hour for my foster mother to realize my brother was laughing at me and that I was positioned oddly from where he was looking before she came out to help me get down. I figured out I could jump higher than a story or two, but at the time I hadn't given a thought to the landing…"

The hitman snickered, glanced at her again, and laughed some more as they descended a staircase. She didn't help him when she added, "…it was very cold half hour wait while being laughed at."

He knew her when she was around that age, he could probably picture the incident pretty well even if he didn't know what her childhood home looked like yet. He did stop snickering, about the time they reached street level and were about to leave his apartment building.

"I once ended up under the bed of an adulterer and her lover while waiting to kill her husband." Renato offered next, a little hesitantly. He was fiddling more with his hat than looking at her.

Sonya considered it. "I once ended up dodging around an old married couple in the middle of an argument trying to rob their study, while we were all in it."

The hitman shot her a smirk. "Oh… we're going to have fun with this."

(Sunday the 11th of May, 1969. Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

Although perfectly aware crashing in the middle of a stunt show and totaling his bike meant he wouldn't be doing anymore shows for a while, Cherep was nonetheless a bit depressed when Master Liam filled in his usual slot with Faris' fire-breathing act.

The undying stuntman wasn't entirely done with this circus, the Großes Volksfest held a lot of fond memories for him and his place here was very comfortable, but he was pretty sure after another few years he would be breaking away. Either going solo or just finding a bigger operation to join that covered more ground than this one.

He wouldn't be leaving until Master Liam had the extra hands to afford it, not like how his sister ditched the moment it became both too hard for her to continue and after she had gotten more than thoroughly bored with how 'slow' they were.

That all being the case, then he really had to make sure this coming up world tour of stunt acts would be enough to see him on his way. Cherep could afford to replace Betsy as it was, not quite with something of the make and model she had been but then he also had his little sister chipping more than a bit in on that one.

Something second-hand?

Probably would be something in desperate need of a tune up, and maybe some elbow grease, but it would save him a bit of money depending on what repairs would be needed.
He didn't mind that. Not even if his next bike, he was contemplating naming his next one Cleo, needed significant rebuilding before he felt confident enough to do something reckless with it. It would just mean he would know it's limits and capabilities very well.

The entirely civilian Cloud Flame user just could, and would, use his unexpectedly free time to devise more stunts. He couldn't get away with testing them out just yet, any number of people both in the know about his undying skills and not would yell at him.

The stuntman tapped an open notebook full of mathematical equations on vectors, speed and weight calculations, ramp measurements, and the formulas for lift with a heavy non-aerodynamic object with a pencil. It was already half full of stuff he had both tried out and only dreamed were possible, but the thing about show business was that any act had to evolve and develop more and more as time went on.

His thoughts were wandering again.

With a heavy sigh, the former Czech runaway banged his forehead on the wooden shipping crate doubling duty as a writing desk.

Great, he was drawing a blank.

Cherep mournfully stared at the blank page opened for him to write on, maybe possibly pouting at the damn thing as it mocked him with its clean and unmarred paper.

Glancing around at the empty tent, which really should be housing his fellow other mechanics but a fairly nauseating repeated malfunction with the tilt-a-whirl had called the other two 'day' mechanics out, the stuntman ripped the mockingly blank page out of his notebook and set it a-Flame.

Watching it burn under his purple Flames gleefully, he totally did not jump when someone cleared their throat.

"I came all the way out here because I was worried." Sonya remarked blandly from a tent corner, eyeing the paper crumbling into ash in his hands after what was probably a third or fourth glance over of his entire self to see if there were any lingering injuries. She could be a worrywart like that. "I see that I should not have bothered if you are fine enough to be messing around."

He tossed the ball of Cloud Flamed paper over his shoulder. "Sonya! Just lovely to see you, little sister! I have no idea what you mean."

Looking off in the direction he had thrown his incriminating evidence in, his little sister gave him a fairly odd look. "Would that not burn this down?"

"It's still my Flames. And I say it won't." Of course, just after claiming that he realized that pretty much blew his attempts at playing innocent out of the water. Not that it was really any good of an act, but he had appearances to maintain. "So! You came to visit me… fantastic. Let's go."

"Go where?" Demanded the newly arrived thief, planting her hands on her hips and not missing his wince when he straightened up too quickly. "I just got here."

He had to keep that in mind, both sore ribs and shoulder that weren't technically injured and her state of mind. Travel-worn Sonya was not as much fun as rested-Sonya, also she was a lot more snappish right after being forced to deal with other travelers in enclosed spaces, but he just really appreciated that she had shown up at all.

It had been a while, he wasn't going to waste this opportunity letting her sneak off to get Crina drunker than a skunk or chatting up Jaq for general news instead of spend time with him.

"Anywhere, really. I'm stuck, so a break to let my creative process mature on their own sounds like a plan."

The Storm-Cloud looked at him dubiously, and there may or may not have been a mutter of 'creative process festering, maybe', but after she stuck her hands in her pockets and hunched her shoulders she did nod. "I am going to regret this later… but there's a lot of parks in this city. And theaters. We could find something to do in one of them. But…"

"Well… don't leave me on tether hooks." Cherep complained good-naturedly as she drew out the pause for longer than anything really deserved.

All semi-decent options, but ones they've done before. It would just be in a new place, and that just made it less interesting after the first few times they could rubberneck around.

"…also, being a port city and all… I need to learn how to officially drive a big rig." Continued his fellow Cloud slowly. "May or may not have done it a couple times, but the license and actual training course would be nice."

It was on the tip of his tongue to ask 'why', 'when', and 'how many things did you run over', but the stuntman reigned in the impulse. While it was entirely Sonya to do something practical and technical in her free time… he had to admit it was a good idea.

Even a useful one. Not only for while he was still with the Großes Volksfest and helping with the getting of things from point A to point B, but also after when he was on his own.

A trailer of decent size could even be used as a sort of mobile garage shop, one big enough and he might be able to live out of one after he left established wandering setups like the Russian Traveling Circuses for his own thing.

Transportable living… in a box. Self-contained, would move where he wanted…

He could then go where he wanted to and live how he liked, without needing to deal with landlords or flat mates, or the paperwork or even the fact that most homes would require him to return to one set place in order to unwind.

Cherep was weirdly in love with the whole idea for it only have been mentioned as a thing to do in some spare time. "Sure. Sounds fun."

"Are you not working?" She peered at him in a puzzled manner, then pointedly glanced around the empty tent.

"I'm on 'light duty'." Claimed the Cloud Flame stuntman absently, slapping his notebook closed and tossing the pencil on the crate so one of the other mechanics could use it to make note of anything they needed picked up from a city's industrial sector. It mostly got use writing dirty jokes to trade off in-between service calls honestly. "Pretty sure that A, we're going to need new parts for a total overhaul of a ride that keeps breaking down and B, Master Liam would not mind me learning to drive a truck during operating hours if that means I can also sub in for the drivers on long hauls between more remote cities."

"Well, at least someone has sense."

"I do too have sense." Sniffing at her with faux-insulted dignity, he waved his notebook at his little sister. "Let me go get permission from him so someone knows where I am and drop this off."
"What is that?" She spared another look to where he had tossed a ball of Flaming paper, then back at him skeptically. "Aside a convenient target for your frustrations."

"I'm trying to think up new things to do with my act." It wouldn't hurt to be honest, and she could be very creative when she felt like it.

Likely wouldn't feel like it when it came to creative ways to potentially hurt himself, but he could dream.

"What, like jumping through hoops of fire?"

"That's…" Cherep couldn't help it, he laughed at her. Then some more at her faintly insulted expression. "…that's pretty tame. Is that the best you can come up with?"

Nettled, she scowled as she followed him out of the tent. "Well… hoops that you have to light mid-jump then?"

Much better. "Not bad, is that it?"

"Can you be upside down while doing so?"

"…possibly." Actually… could he?

Hmm…

Sonya carried on, since she was behind him she couldn't tell if he was thinking or not and when to stop giving him 'ideas'. "Make the hoops move would add in a matter of timing. If you could figure out to set them off at different speeds and times to align up only once perfectly…"

Coming to a sudden halt, the stuntman patted down his pockets and muttered something not entirely nice as he realized he had nothing to write with. Spinning on a heel, which made his sister take a step back and regard him suspiciously, he lunged for her pockets. He was not entirely happy when she easily dodged him with a quick side-step.

"Come on, I know you have something to write with."

She obediently dug out a fountain pen out of a pocket, a questionably fancy one engraved with initials not her own but he didn't really care if she stole it or not from somewhere and snatched it when she pitched it at his head. "Really?"

Taking a moment to jot down the suggestion that he was totally going to use, while inching closer to her by tiny increments, Cherep stole her pen by tucking it behind an ear instead of returning it. Then wrapped his arms around her own, mostly so she couldn't steal it back.

Also, partially because he was that happy to see her again.

"You love me, Sonya." Wrenching her bodily around was just for fun, honestly. "I loove you…"

The mutter that resulted from the very disgruntled thief was probably something any normal mother would've rinsed her mouth out with soap for, but also probably something she learned from listening to Lisa.

Sonya wasn't pushing him away, prying his arms off her, or just being an unmanageable armful by trying to wiggle free. Which meant that careful distance she had held herself away from him until he sprung this on her was deliberate.

"I'm fine. I swear. Some lingering pulled muscles, and since it's not damaged or missing just tender they twinge a bit, but I am fine." Cherep muttered into her hair, only loud enough for her to hear and any of the passing by circus workers would dismiss as nonsense.

If there was nothing missing, or in need of replacement, his Cloud Flames tended to ignore it. Same with bruises or any unnatural additions like his molar fillings. Dentists still sucked major ass when they couldn't be convinced to leave certain cavities alone.

She snorted against his forearm, which… was she running a temperature or something?

Her body temperature was noticeably higher than usual now that he was paying more attention.

"We still do not entirely understand what you are doing. I just would… like… to be careful until we do."

Yeah… but until he found a doctor or scientist slash research person he liked, which after his childhood misadventures was just a whole lot of no to him, that wasn't going to happen.

At least that got her to twist out of his hold, indefinitely more gently that she would've had he not recently hurt himself.

Her utterly flat expression when he plastered the back of one hand against her forehead was just hilarious, even if he had already known she was running a little hot. "Are you sick or something?"

"I hope not. There was a man seated next to me on the plane I am certain had something nasty. He was coughing a lot." Batting his hand away, finally none to gently which at least meant he was reassuring her somewhat, Sonya checked the underside of her throat instead of copying his actions. "My… red side, should have taken care of it."

Cherep's mental processes paused, which made him blink, as tried to adjust to that idea.

Storm Flame users could prevent themselves from getting sick?

Totally unfair. He could hope Tatiana would find some way to copy or adapt that for other Flame types, but until the nurse green-lighted a method he was a little charry of actually attempting to intentionally screw around with his own internal workings.

The stuntman had enough going on there as it was, knocking something askew would be all sorts of bad.

Although, he had never been sick for very long himself. Maybe his Flames did do something in response to him being ill. He had to pay more attention the next time he got a cough or the flu.

If he didn't have to figure out how to do some emergency ill-thief corralling, because Sonya was a weird sick person, then they should hurry up. He didn't know how long she would be sticking around, at least a day if she kept to her usual wandering habits but maybe more depending, and he wanted to get in his time with her before she headed back to whatever she was up to.

Rolling up his notebook, one with the spiraled bit of wire holding it all together so it took to being rolled up fairly well, Cherep pointed it like a sword in the direction of the visitors' entrance to the fairgrounds. "Let's go then."

"You still need to inquire with Master Liam if you can, and I would like to at least see Crina first."
Sonya popped his enthusiastic bubble ruthlessly with her pointed logic and general all-around practicality. "Also, the training course I found for this will not start for another day."

Err... shit. "How long are you sticking around for?"

"...if I can get us both in the class, however long it will take." She paused and glanced at her left wrist where there pointedly wasn't a watch. "Or at least until the end of the month. I have somewhere to be then. If I cannot, then two or three days."

More than just a surprise visit. Awesome. "You're not... putting anything off, are you?"

Cherep was her favorite distraction when it came to things she disliked contemplating. Maybe he shared some of that attention with his nephew now, but he was still first.

His little sister had no immediate tells, or at least she could keep a straight face even when anyone normal would've cracked some kind of expression. However, in public places like this where she would actually try to be non-expressive her hands would show what she kept off her face.

Smoothing the palms of both hands down her thighs was pretty much her equivalent to a normal person's nervous cough.

"You are, aren't you?"

"I should really call Galina." Sonya admitted sourly. "I have been putting it off, because I really do not want to know. And, if I do not know, I cannot stress over it. Or get as frustrated as her or mad at the situation in general."

Cherep eyed her flat expression.

Seems he wasn't the only one feeling like they were finished someplace. Now, was that a 'Cloud' thing or just a 'them' kind of thing?

They were rather wandering individuals at heart, never really happy with being bound to someone else's march instead of their own. "Met back up here in an hour or two?"

Tilting her head back to eye the sky, his little sister sighed softly. "Fine. I should go call Tats to warn Galina I will call her."

"If you're not here, I'll find the nearest phone box." Cherep promised cheerfully, grinning widely at her entirely disgusted look for that comment.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 11th of May, 1969 continued. Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

Galina trailed off when she realized Sonya had been completely silent for maybe a touch too long. As a Lightning, she didn't tend to miss much at all and had probably picked up on the thief's dangerously waning patience. Probably through some divine bureaucrat skill she inherited to go along with her ninja office skills.

"...Galina." The Storm-Cloud found herself all but purring lowly. "Would the moron in question be available at this moment?"

There was a lengthy pause, more so than her aide really required to process some of her stranger requests. "He's... not here. I could fetch him?"
"Put Usov on the phone while you do so." Waiting a moment for the shuffling of happenings to take place in the far-off Moscow office, Sonya started talking before the Mist could even greet her. "I will personally guide you through a break-in of both a KGB headquarters and another law enforcement agency of your choice. Give that asshole more than enough nightmares to make him ineffectual for the duration of the Triads visiting while I am not there. Regardless of what he tries to do or not."

"You still owe me from breaking Dmitriy out of jail." The ever-diligent Mist remarked happily from the other end, from the sounds of creaking leather and dull thumps of something hitting wood probably sprawling out on the Rain's chair and desk. It wasn't like she cared if he did, it wasn't her office. "But, I supposed, I will agree to those terms. I have a rather long list of things I would like to know you could help with."

"Delighted to hear it." She really had to do something nice for the kid.

He, along with Galina and Andrei, had been the saving graces of her being forced to cover Dmitriy's work while the ass dealt with his prison term. They were interesting, and competent, enough for her not to mind being required to interact with them more than she would want to on a normal basis.

Sonya would clue the kid into Renato's request. Hunting down former or prior Soviet Flame users might sound challenging enough for him to both cover the leg work she may or may not be able to do from an office and make independent inquires she wouldn't think of.

Usov could maybe then embellish on his network of Misty contacts he was spinning from within his corner of the Zolotov Flame training regime through other syndicates that wouldn't have to go through the thieves' clan for their unmanageably fresh users pouring in.

The brat already pretty much now controlled the information that got out about the Zolotov Flame users and was working on hiding their real numbers to those Sonya didn't want to know about them. Andrei was pitching in with him, the Sun was making markedly steady progress getting all the other types used to looking at him for orders now that the branches were co-opting each other's Flames for their own investigations and experiments.

Galina took on the things the both of them were either too young or too green to handle yet, making the three of them very nice stand-ins for when Sonya left them to it. She'd be stealing the Lightning when she left Dmitriy his office again, but then the Rain should fill in her cracks even better than the brunette could now.

Hence why Gedeon's idea of putting himself forward as both the leader and expert wasn't going to work.

Out of seven types of Dying Will Flames of the Sky, five of which were the only ones being trained up, Andrei's Suns and Usov's Mists paired with Galina's Lightnings represented the vast majority that had a pretty good idea of what went on at Sonya's level.

That… Rain girl might make an upset before things finalized again from recent shifts, but her section was the Suns' main focus at the current date. The Storms, who had finally lost Mikhail as their lead shortly before the start of the month, would be the only neutral block that might be swayed to either side.

Mikhail's hand-picked successor was another misogynist like he was, but Sonya was privately betting Galina was going to ruthlessly stamp that out of the brat before long. Probably before Dmitriy even got to his first parole hearing.

Also, the thief technically counted as a Storm. She wasn't the one giving orders, because she was temporary and Dmitriy would have to do it when he got out so to save on confusion when the time came she kept out of the way. However, she was female and a Storm and the girl half of that section might just flock to her side if pressed for that alone.

The Flame trainees at least understood that Andrei was the one giving day-to-day marching orders for whichever reason they chose to believe. Gedeon, as that guy that hung around and talked to only the eldest if he had to at all, would be still regarded as a kind of outsider.

Bunch of green ass kids, wary of one loudmouth Sun strutting about?

Fong would have no trouble seeing through that, hell… Shamal wouldn't be fooled.

Either she helped the charade along somehow, which she wasn't going to do for various reasons which boiled down to 'didn't care to', or foiled it so Galina would have to be the one to do it.

Sonya was not feeling generous right about now. She also wasn't feeling like chit chat, which the Mist on the other end seemed to know somehow, so she was understandably slightly confused when a brief mummer of talking happened and Usov cheerfully agreed to something.

"…erm Bazanova?"

"Scruffy."

"Do you know how weird it is to hear English after months and weeks of just Russian?" The man responded in the same language, sounding half exasperated and half concerned. "Galina left something out of her report."

"Ho?" …damn it, she was really spending way too much time with Renato. "Do tell."

"Gedeon hit her." Peter announced with all the subtlety of a freight train for the force the words hit her. "I mean backhanded her across the face. Miss Galina insists she asked for it, and her Lightning Flames kept her from being bruised or harmed, but that's not something I thought you would let slide by as easily. Also, I don't like him."

"...really." She was going to kill him. By increments, maybe, but fuck that asshole if he thought hitting her Lightning was something he could get away with. No one abused her people and got away with it.

Could she get away with that?

…maybe not. However, that didn't mean she couldn't make his life hell while she waited for Valera to grow up.

She knew just the way to do it, too.

However, Scruffy wasn't going on with any grievances he had with the vor. It was, in fact, suspiciously silent on the other end of the line. "Peter. Give Gedeon the phone. Please."

There was another beat of total silence, and the she caught the faint sounds of the Sun's 'It's for you' and a spate of childish laughter she was fairly certain was Usov's.

"What?"

"Listen and listen well." Biting back the 'you inbred shit stain' that probably wasn't diplomatic right now. "You ever hit another of my people, I will break every bone in your body and let you heal, then break them all over again until you end up a pile of human mush. As a matter of fact, that's what we're going to do the very moment I get back."

"You can't-

"Oh, I can. You are a Sun, and Suns heal. We will just be figuring out exactly how much damage you can sustain and still keep going. Something any vor should know about themselves." Sonya was frankly tired of him. Of him, his attitude, and his general all around unhelpful behavior. If only to keep him away, he was going to learn to fear her very shadow. "As far as I am aware, you are to be in the middle of assembling a Flame using team from the trainees. Exactly how do you figure you will have the time for hobnobbing with the Triad groups?"

Gedeon was getting rather annoyed, from the sounds of things. "I told-"

"No, let me stop you there. You. Were. Told. To do this by yourself." She really should've foreseen that.

The Sun was high enough he was probably well used to pawning off the less interesting duties and jobs to others, and all the Flame trainees were too young and still unsure of themselves to buck anything he told them.

"The next words out of your mouth had better be 'to meet me' somewhere."

There was a suspicious amount of silence going on.

"Gedeon. For the last fucking time. BUILD THE TEAM YOURSELF. That means training them, actually dealing with them, and ensuring they can work together. That also means with YOU as well. You shouldn't have the time to be fucking up anything else, why you thought so is beyond me."

Why the hell was she doing all this anyways?

He probably wasn't going to be in power for long, Valera would likely not even wait until he came of age to do some forceful rearrangements of local criminal powers.

Poor Arseniy, really. Lisa would probably just help her son. Fuck, she'd help at this rate honestly. A decade was just long enough for Shamal to grow up, so she was entirely intent on not spending that much time in Moscow for as much time.

Screw him, screw his father, and screw the Zolotovs. If it hadn't been Arseniy that asked her…

"When I get back," Sonya continued in a markedly even tone, "I will be bringing another Inverted Sun along. I had thought you would like to get his opinion on how his Flames help and hinder his lifestyle as a hitman, but at this current point in time I think he might just put a bullet through your head instead of actually talk to you."

That was a real worry, too. Renato was enough of a gentleman he could be reliably counted on to interfere in any harassment a girl got when he was nearby. Part of the reason why, although he was a known womanizer of the highest degree, the women on Mafia Land didn't actually mind his shameless flirting habits and him sleeping around with them so much.

What would the hitman do if he heard the other Sun had backhanded someone like Galina, or even if it happened in front of him?

The Lightning was his type, frankly. Curvy, frightfully competent, and pretty. Bonus, Soviet Flame user.
Sonya distractedly glanced down at her small bust line and stifled the sigh that wanted to escape. Kind of depressing in a way when she kept getting overlooked in the middle of conversations with him for someone with a bigger rack but then again, she had known she would have a ‘willowier’ body type since she was five.

Having known exactly what his type was since she was about thirteen, she held no expectations that she would fit them ever.

…actually, thinking back to that lunch they just had, he hadn't gotten waylaid by the barista's coy attempts to flirt with him. She had ignored the girl, as per usual when someone decided to try to get the Italian's attention, but Renato had kept talking to her about similar misadventures in their separate fields instead of flirt back with the serving girl.

Maybe she just caught him at a good time?

"Furthermore, you can't tell me what to do." Gedeon continued on in her ear.

…whoops. She had missed everything he said while thinking on her friend. "You are mistaking me for someone that gives a fuck what you think. Since you have decided to squander both your own and my time, I am going to end this all one way or another. Either you shape up, get off your ass, and actually become something of an expert without talking out of your ass… or I give up on anything that has to do with you for the rest of your pitiable existence."

"…do you really think you can get away with talking to me like that?"

"Do you really think you can stop me?"

Sonya then hung up, more than finished with his entire situation in multiple ways.

God fucking damn it all, but she hated the mind-set the larger bulk of the world was stuck in.

What was so hard with refraining from being dicks to others for being slightly different?

People were assholes all the damn time, herself included, there really wasn't any reason for there to be more labels and traits to hate each other with.

Cherep, who had fulfilled his promise to come looking for her if she took too long, had one look at her face and opened his mouth. "What do you think I would look like with piercings?"

"More girly than you usually are." Sonya answered automatically, then gave him a strange look. He was missing his 'Skull' makeup, so his features weren't quite as delicate seeming as they could be under the purple tinted face paint.

"…you would make a prettier woman than I do. This is entirely unfair."

What. The. Fuck. Was wrong with her?

That had never bothered her before. He had made a better-looking girl than she had back when they first met and she hadn't cared a whit then.

"Well… not quite what I was going for, but okay." Giving her another once over, the stuntman casually slung an arm around her shoulders and gave her a one-armed hug. "Wanna talk about it?"

"I do not even know what 'this' is." Sonya bitterly admitted to his chest, feeling in general just frustrated and unhappy all over the place and the non-stifling hug was actually rather nice for once.
This wasn't usual for her, actually. Maybe it was just everything all together?

Getting back momentarily to what she had been missing while stuck in a Moscow office dealing with vory that thought they knew better than she did about the whole Flame phenomena, visiting her brother for once, and yet being forced to deal with more issues back in Russia even still?

"I do not feel particularly feminine." She started with what little she did know on her current feelings. "I am fine with that, I am who I am and that is nothing I will ever feel ashamed of. But then my gender is held against me with things back in Moscow, and then I get treated differently because I am female. I can ignore it, even if I dislike it, but sometimes..."

"Fair enough." Offered the Inverted Cloud as they started wandering somewhere. "Then… do you want to feel more girly than you are, or is that just a thing to hate on today?"

The Storm-Cloud sighed, and finally pulled away from him slightly. "I will get back to you on that if it lasts."

Shrugging, the stuntman pointed a way to their left as the next direction to wander in. Well used to following his lead in unfamiliar places, she obediently turned. "Anything else?"

"…I do not want to go back to Moscow." Seriously, she didn't. Not even with Shamal, which was a much-appreciated bonus when she had to in a few weeks.

Less than that, actually. Thirteen days until the first of July, and she was to be in Italy then.

"I really do not see the point."

"Erm… not even for Arseniy and Lisa? And Valera?"

"He is another one of us. My side, even." The thief had snuck him a largish chunk of un-faceted white sapphire when Lisa's back was turned, and it did spark with violet lights when she took away his toy for a moment. "And raised smack dab in the middle of their territory? Arseniy takes him on patrols, I do not even think he consciously realizes what they are, to calm him down for nap time or for the night."

Cherep came to a sudden halt, and with his arm across her shoulders that pulled her to a stop as well. "Oh… well… huh."

"So… eventually, in a decade or so, there likely won't be a clan anymore."

If the school was set up and established in time, the Flame training section she was shaping would head there and rally around it instead. Which made her at least willing to continue to slog through the problems and issues getting it outfitted and equipped correctly to last that long, because it would last.

The clan, on the other hand… she was starting to doubt Gedeon would keep it all together for Valera to take over whole. He wasn't lazy, no Sun could physically be lazy, but ineffectual was a good term. There, but not particularly involved much. Sidelined, ill-trained, arrogant.

"Also, eventually, you will not need to fear your prior dealings with them will come back to haunt you. He will likely take care of it."

"Well… that's a… thing." Managed the stuntman, violet eyes glancing up at the sky as a smirk pulled at his lips. "Damn though. Are you catnip for those like us or something?"

Sonya elbowed him in the ribs, wincing as she realized she had forgotten he had recently cheated death and they seemed to be still sore.

Cherep didn't actually seem to mind, other than the wheezing laugh she made him choke on. Another squeeze, and he let her go to rub his abused side. "O…okay. Fine. Not catnip."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 11th of May, 1969 continued. Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

While waiting for Cherep to get his things together for their class on how to drive big trucks, Sonya wandered to Crina's tent to at least say hi or something.

She came to a sudden halt right in front of the old gypsy woman the moment she got a good look at her, ignoring the Chinese apprentice she had been religiously avoiding for some time.

There was something seriously wrong with her old master of mysticism. Aside the fact she was old, and creaky, the Romanian native had lost some weight she couldn't afford and was almost slumped on her tarot card table.

"Crina?"

"You better have a bottle of booze with you, girl." Again flat out ignoring the hesitant motions of the young man hovering at her elbow, the old woman pried the cork out of the bottle of rum and downed a good swig. "Fuck, but I've missed you."

"Me or the alcohol?"

"Your alcohol, obviously." Sniffing, the old bat waved off the now highly conflicted looking man and made a shooing motion for him to leave the tent. "Girl talk. Go stalk her brother or whatever else you were sent here to do."

Nothing was wrong with her mind, at least… but the Russian was sure they were not about to talk about men and sex like Tatiana had her assume 'girl talk' covered.

"Liver cancer." Crina announced unceremoniously once they were left alone. "Drinking like I do, hell like you do, takes a toll. One I'm paying now, but I got myself into this so…"

'Should you be drinking then' was probably the obvious question, but it didn't seem as if the older woman cared much if she should or not. She was hitting the bottle pretty hard.

"Are you going to stay with the circus until-" Sonya couldn't even say it.

She was still jarred by the realization the old bat was going to die. Not just eventually either, it was a more 'sooner than later' from the looks of things. Even just talking to her was taking a visible toll on the gypsy woman's strength.

"Yes. I have nothing else." Eyeing her once-apprentice, that was only favored for illicit booze apparently, she took another swig of the rum. "I never had a daughter, you're sure as fuck not the one I never had. But you stuck around, and I appreciate that."

She kept her mouth shut, staring at the older woman blankly.

"First experience with death?" Asked Crina after a long moment of contemplation.

"No, but…"
"First one you gave a damn about."

"…pretty much."

The other woman nodded sagely, a rather morbid picture of a wise woman with the bottle in hand and her rail thin appearance. "I take it most of the death you've seen is the way your type likes to go, the same way you all came in. Bloody and screaming. Be happy you don't have to be here and watch me die by inches, then."

"…what if I got you some help? A doctor? I-"

"Sonya. I'm old. Let me die with what dignity I have left." Crina cracked a truly bitterly amused smile at her. "I might even go in my sleep as I want. Would really put it to the assholes that tried to kill me through two wars and the upheavals that came afterwards."

"I am probably not going to visit again." The thief wasn't into torturing herself, and frankly she would rather keep the old woman in mind as she had been.

Not a wasted away version as morbid as this.

"I figured that."

She was going to punch Cherep for not telling her.

"I asked your brother not to tell you." Crina informed her shortly, digging around in a box set neatly at her elbow, when her glare at the tent flaps became apparently noticeable. "I wanted to do that myself."

She still didn't appreciate being blindsided like this.

"Here." Sliding a pack of cards too big to be normal playing cards but too small to be the pack of tarot cards she used in her business across the table, the frail gypsy sagged against her chair. "I want you to have that. My first deck, I got it from my mother and so on so forth. I don't want to know when you'll ever use it, or for what."

Sonya picked them up absently. "I… am going. Then."

"Don't join me too quickly, girl."
(Sunday the 11th of May, 1969. Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

Peizhi was lying in wait for Sonya to leave Crina's side for the last time, looking impressively blanked-faced as he stood with Cherep a polite enough distance away.

"I've already talked and have dealt with the Wo Hop To Triad group, and the Luen Kung Lok is in the process of getting what they want." Sonya started impassively in Chinese, even if that earned her an exasperated look for speaking in a language the stuntman didn't yet know.

"Ah… I am from neither. I belong to the Long Triad, miss Sonya."

The thief studied him for a long moment while tucking a pack of ancient painted cards into a pocket, and his mildly expectant expression. "The ones that originally hired me first, I take it."

It had to be them or the Luen Group. The Triad she originally thought Fong had belonged to, before she double checked that and learned differently.

"The same." The man claimed with a small nod. "I would like a word."

"Of course you do." She glanced back at Crina's tent, then back at the man. "I will hear you out. If you stay with Crina and keep her as comfortable as possible until she dies."

Peizhi frowned at her in disapproval that she didn't remotely care about. "I have already been waiting to speak with you for a few months now."

"And if you do not agree, you will wait longer. I had no reason to speak with you, I still don't… unless you agree."

Folding his arms together tightly, which was probably the limit of all the disapproval the man would show towards her, the Chinese man drew out the pause before giving her a tight little smile. "I will ask in return that you instead speak with my superiors."

"Fine, whatever. Just ensure she's not greatly bothered for her last few days, however long that takes." The old woman didn't look all that good, Sonya bitterly regretted not visiting more but that wasn't something she could've changed even if she had known this was going to happen. "Then I will speak with whomever you wish."

Peizhi gave her a half-bow, stalking past the Cloud siblings to return to the dying gypsy woman.

"Finally bit the bullet?" Asked her brother in a tone that was both part amusedly and part somber, stuffing his hands into his pockets as she fell in step with him. "We weren't able to finesse out what he was here for, other than the fact it was you he was after."

"He will be sticking around at least for a little while longer, sorry." Sonya took the opportunity to stop and punch her brother hard in the left arm. "Asshole."

Cherep flinched, rubbing at the bruise she probably left behind. She'd feel guilty about that… later. "She asked me not to. I may not like the old bat, but…"
"I know." He was an inherently nice person, respecting someone's dying wish was a given. It was something she didn't know if she could say about herself. "I… will stick with passing Jaq my gifts to her until…"

Sonya still couldn't say it.

She wanted to say Crina was a fucking bitch for dying now, but it was her right to refuse medical aid for a meager few more days… or a truly painful year or two. It didn't magically make her any happier someone she knew was dying, especially not in a painful way such as cancer, but… if this was how the old woman wanted to go the thief would respect that.

Not like it but respect it.

Throwing an arm over her shoulder, apparently just for the excuse to give her another of his weirdly non-stifling hugs, the stuntman gestured to where the visitors' entrance to the fairgrounds was. "Not to make light of the situation or anything, but she's not dead yet and we've things to do. Besides, you know Crina would just snark at you for dwelling on morbid shit when you've things to get done."

Then kick Sonya's ass out of the tent with a demand to go pick her up some more booze, which really had been the old woman's favorite way to get the thief out and about when she wanted the limited space they had to herself.

Snorting softly, she shrugged off the arm that was really too warm to be under in the middle of a summer day and started walking again. "I suppose so."

"So…" Jogging lightly until he was even with her again, her brother poked her in the arm. "You've been weirdly accepting of hugs lately. Is there a story behind that?"

"You have been weirdly non-crushing with hugs lately." Slapping the finger away, Sonya gifted him with a flat look. "Is there something I should know?"

Cherep shrugged unhelpfully. "It just seems as if you've had a couple really bad days and needed a hug."

"Then I just needed a hug because I had a couple really bad days." She paused, then lightly tapped his ribs with her elbow. "Thanks, Cherep."

"Anytime, little sister." His smirk was something she itched to wipe off somehow. "I'm always up for hugs."

(Thursday the 22nd of May, 1969. Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

Since the Grobes Volksfest was leaving the stuntman behind for a few weeks, Cherep ended up bunking with Sonya in her hotel room for the duration of their driving classes. Neither sibling seemed to mind overly much, Sonya just because she had bitterly missed her brother and him for whichever reason he had.

Maybe because she had upgraded the suite she rented to one with separate bedrooms and a full bath. She remembered full well what the usual living conditions the circus could normally scrounge up for the workers, and had no problem splurging a bit of her earnings this month on a few weeks of better than decent living for him.
Her fellow Cloud took the opportunity to, as per usual, sprawl out in more way than one. Which, oddly, didn't annoy her as much as she thought it might from previous times they shared a living space.

Even when she ended up having to step over crated parts he was taking advantage of a longer stay to order special for the circus left near the hallway door. Not repeatedly skirting around a lonely toolbox which he apparently outright owned set next to the bedroom door he claimed, which apparently held his plans for various ramps or implements for his stunt work so it ended up moved, opened, and rummaged through a few times.

Even when she had to step over himself, especially when he decided to take a nap or fell asleep in strange places.

Sonya supposed it was because she still had her space that wasn't so cluttered, and her brother had learned to corral his stuff to specific side instead of all over the place, was why she wasn't as bothered.

She used to be bothered by it if ever so slightly, and it was interesting to think how the both of them had changed slightly since they had split up. The thief hadn't thought she gained more patience, and something had to have happened to make him more considerate for those sharing his space.

A weirdly cozy summer night, about halfway through their driving classes, Cherep absently repeated a question to her. "…do you really think I would look more girly with piercings?"

"I think," she started cautiously, since this seemed to be something he was debating on doing rather heavily, "that Skull will look more… punk rock with piercings, but Cherep would just look more effeminate. That is just earrings, mind you."

He gave her a weird eyeing, upside down from where he had half sprawled on a couch and half on the coffee table. "…huh."

"I have a question." Sonya offered delicately after a beat, turning from the little crappy table provided that she had taken to study a German version of a trucker's handbook. "Why do you not get some tattoos?"

Her brother pulled an unhappy face at her, finally lifting his upper back off the wood he claimed was 'cooler' in order to sit up and face her. "…eh. It's a criminal thing, isn't it?"

"While yes, it is more associated with certain underworlds and the tattooists you will find probably have their own connections… not necessarily. Tats and I have… adjusted our ink schemes to also represent our Flame types. And… well, I know they're not the greatest of role models, but some biker gangs and various military branches get them as well."

Blinking, the stuntman got up and wandered over to her to get a better look at ink he had apparently not paid that much attention to before.

"I am not suggesting you get anything related to the designs we have, just something else." She paused as another idea occurred to her, and the thief gave her brother a small smirk. "You would confuse anyone that might think you are or related to one of us."

"…I'll think about it." He had a smirk, so she figured it had good odds he would maybe get matching tats if not completely related ones. "But, I think I'll stick with the piercings for now."

Tossing a bookmark into the handbook, Sonya got up and snagged a lightweight sweater to cover her art while they were out and about. "Alright. Let us go then."
"Now?"

"Why not? We also need something to eat, and I am slightly interested in what kind of place you can find to do your own piercings." She may or may not be interested in getting a few more herself, maybe up around the shell of her ears. It wasn't like she had any standards of dress to conform to in this life.

'Not professional looking' her tiny Russian ass. If she was to be a professional and had piercings, then it was professional looking.

She would not be trying out the whole nose ring thing. She knew Skull would eventually have one, it was just she wasn't sure she wanted one. "Come on, let us go make you even prettier."

Cherep snorted, straightening up to let her get up without colliding with him. "Are you still on that?"

The girly thing? "I am not frustrated or angry about it… but it is still… something."

"We can go get you some girly things." He suggested idly, bouncing on his toes as he followed her to pull on his own work boots. "If you think that might help a little bit."

"I was never into retail-therapy." Sonya informed him dryly. "So unless this is a bid to be able to shop for cosmetics for Skull without looking foolish or attracting the wrong sort of attention…"

The entirely sheepish cough the stuntman gave confirmed that suspicion.

Smirking in amusement, she laced up her left boot and let him pull her up. "Okay, fine. Retail-shopping therapy it is. I want makeup tips in return."

"Deal."

She waited until they were decently far from their hotel, in a nicely balmy twilight instead of the semi-heat wave of East Germany's summer days, to continue. "…but you know this is just going to give Lisa more ammunition about the whole-"

"Shush."

"-and also, Viper visiting this-"

Cherep plastered a hand across her lips, badly fighting off an amused smile of his own. "I said shush."

---

(Monday the 26th of May, 1969. Dresden-Klotzsche Airport, Dresden, German Democratic Republic.)

After nearly two weeks of just slumming with Cherep to get her large truck certifications, Sonya didn't finish the class but took the provided book and a copy of the regulations European big rig drivers were required to obey and had some fun on their driving course, she packed up to leave.

The stuntman had another week to go in East Germany to actually finish and test for his certification, which made the thief rather antsy about leaving him behind.

They had gone shopping for cosmetics and Cherep, who actually had a sense for fashion, had talked her into a few boutiques when they could find a decent one. Which meant that if he went without her... there was still that stigma against those of a different sexual bent than hetero that he might get captured in.

It really was very questionable at first glance what orientation he had, because for all he claimed to like women he still looked feminine enough he got checked out by equally questionable people.
Also, her brother had known a hell of a lot more than she had about applying cosmetics and the current 'in' fashions of Europe.

It was something Rachel had once known as 'metrosexual', but that wasn't a thing in this day and age. Cherep, for all that he kind of lived like a clean slob and had perpetually messy bed-head, took very good care of himself. His lifestyle was actively demanding, which also meant he filled out with a decent amount of muscle in a lighter way than most of the men she tended to see.

The fact he didn't look as muscular as the other 'old-hands' of the circus was possibly due to his Cloud nature alone. It really did make it hard to keep up decent amounts of muscle, even if their strength related to their size was entirely deceptive.

With his strikingly uniquely matched eye and hair color, which was one of those 'rare' things she had seen maybe seven people with in her lifetime here, she found it easy to see why he had phenomenal success flirting with the service girls in the stores they had frequented. He was at least better about flirting around her than Renato, he left picking them up for after they were done.

"I'll be fine." The man in question repeated firmly, juggling a few of the new traveling cases she had bought to go along with her updated wardrobe. "It's not the first time I've ended up on my own, and I promise to keep calling Tats while I'm here... Nya."

Not even upset he was picking up the stupid nickname of their sister's to use for her, she set the pieces of luggage she had taken on the trolley left out for airport passengers to use for large loads.
Maybe she had gone a bit overboard in letting him dress her up, but she had needed an update to her clothing.

She couldn't even be upset at the expense, because her business account with Mafia Land had been still maxed out from her work the last three weeks and she was able to use that here. Frankly, even with Viper draining her various accounts, Bjørn had gotten the hang of things enough that the six accounts she had for various uses were starting to generate more than just interest.

Which was promising but given her spending habits it wasn't going to last for long.

"I just..." Sonya didn't want to leave, but she also wanted to go pick up Shamal. Having spent half of a year looking forward to having the brat all summer long the thief wanted to head straight to Italy in order to do so as soon as possible. However, it was pretty rare nowadays for them to spend uninterrupted time together. "...don't want to leave."

Crina's old tarot card deck was also burning a hole in her pocket. She hadn't glanced at it again until she found the damn thing when packing up her side of the hotel room, which just reminded her the old bat was dying. She should at least look at it before deciding on what she was going to do with it all, or at least until the reminder stopped making her want to dent her surroundings.

"It was nice to see you again." Cherep offered in pure amusement, dumping the shopping he was mostly responsible for her buying on top of her usual luggage. "And once you get things finished off back home, you can come visit more often."
He had a weird superpower in making her talk. Sonya hadn't noticed it until she was in the middle of telling him all about Gedeon's latest stupid idea and why she was bothering with a criminal school of all things.

If there was one person she wasn't at all upset knew more about her life than even their mother, it was him. Even still, that was still jarring to realize halfway into an explanation on why she was sure the Zolotovs wouldn't be hanging onto the Flame user's training regime.

"Stop tugging at it." Batting his hand away from his left ear, where a shiny new silver hoop sat, Sonya glared at him until he very pointedly shoved his hands into his pockets. "Do not even, I know the moment my back is turned you will continue."

"But… it's itchy." He eyed her own ear in return. "I have no idea how you can stand to have metal pierced through cartilage."

"I have had worse." Sonya delicately touched the still stinging three studs punctured through the shell of her ear, then forcibly lowered her hand.

Cherep blinked his purple eyes at her in a weirdly seriously way, then he cocked a crooked smirk. "Self-inflicted, I hope."

Well… breaking her foot in Doctor Kappel's office had hurt worse. "Pretty much. Promise me you will be careful, Cherep. Jaq's not around the corner if you need help now."

Instead of answer right away, the stuntman gave her a rib-cracking hug that lifted her off her feet. "I'll miss you too, Sonya. And yes, I promise to be a good little boy."

With her nose mashed into his shoulder it made snorting a bit of a trick, but she managed it. "When was the last time you were a 'good little boy'?"

"Err…" Delicately placing her back on her feet, he straightened up and scratched at the back of his unruly hair while glancing around. Suddenly pointing to the large clock embedded into a wall, Cherep made shooing motions with his other hand. "Oh, look at that! You need to hurry to catch your plane, sis. I'll see you later?"

When she looked back at him, he had already made decent progress on bolting out of the airport entirely.

---

(Tuesday the 27th of May, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Well, color me surprised. You're actually on time for once." Renato looked up at her from under the brim of his fedora, smirking at her likely disgruntled expression.

"…did you just buy the pocket watch to annoy me with?" Sonya was honestly curious about that, too.

Letting the heavier clock end go, he pulled down on the chain to get it back into his left hand to snap shut the little door and slide the thing into a pocket. "Merely a convenient side benefit, I assure you little lady Sonya."

"Right."
It wasn't that surprising the hitman was lying in wait for her in the Iron Fort's entranceway, he likely had contact here that would report her arrival in town to him with little to no bribe required.

She was a little disappointed not to get bratty Mist ambushed as well, but it was a school day. "How long until I can abscond with Shamal?"

Renato waited a beat, in which she dumped her arm chain and assorted mini-weapons attached on the plate the doorman was holding out expectantly. "Really, any time this week. It's not as if brat's school is doing anything of note with the students. However, there is a graduation ceremony on the thirty first..."

"...it is a milestone thing we are expected to attend, isn't it?" At his tight nod, apparently equally as unhappy as she was to hear about it, the thief cursed in three different languages."Is Shamal at all interested? Can we skip it?"

"Unfortunately, he's been looking forward to showing off his work at school to you." Having shot that remote hope down, the hitman stalked forward and absently frowned at her. "Where's your luggage?"

Since that seemed to be what the doorman seemed to be wondering, Sonya answered honestly. "In a hotel room."

"Don't want to bribe Nono for another week or so again?"

"...something like that."

He eyed her sternly, but she merely raised an eyebrow in return.

"Nono would like to speak to you." Renato said instead of continuing that line of conversation, more than close enough now to pick up her reasoning for doubting the security of Vongola's territory out of her head instead of needing to ask. "And Ganauche would like a word as well if you could."

He flashed the doorman a smirk, which was apparently the sign the man was waiting for to dismiss himself. Then a hand was placed on her upper back, instead of her lower, and without the pressure normally associated with people trying to steer her about.

"I don't think either will mind if you decide to postpone for the day, and instead just make arrangements for a meeting some other time this week. But I do know Nono was fairly insistent about it."

Sonya was exactly a fan of Vongola as a whole at the moment, much less of their current Sky heading them. Why the hell did she care that Timoteo Vongola or his Lightning Guardian wanted a word with her?

"Because Shamal lives here." Renato leaned in enough to keep his words just between them.

"...is there any reason why you're touching me?"

"So, I don't do something stupid like try to move you again." He removed the offending appendage, which irritatingly left a chilled spot between her shoulder blades in the excessively over air-conditioned foyer. "If you don't feel like waiting around here and making yourself available, we could always continue trading stories."

"We need to turn that into a drinking game." Sonya stated, starting off down a hallway picked at random.
She'd find a mostly empty room to wait until Shamal was released from school, and she had packed a book just in case.

"Ho? That's... not a bad idea." When she glanced back at him in the pause, he was eyeing her frame thoughtfully. "Are you sure you could keep up with me, though?"

The thief smirked at him.

"What am I missing?"

"Figure it out yourself." She then stuck her nose in the book she pulled out of her purse, so he couldn't get the reason why out of her head for once.

"Sonya."

Of course the nosy man wouldn't be able to leave that alone, the thief couldn't help the small laugh as she sped up a little so he couldn't take away her book and try asking again.

Not put off by her refusal to answer in the least, Renato stalked after her and tried to snatch the bound paper out of her hands more than a few times before she found a decent room.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 27th of May, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"What are you doing?" Shamal asked the hitman curiously from the doorway.

Renato instantly straightened up, trying to look as if he hadn't been chasing the thief around the blandly decorated waiting room in hopes of getting his hands on her book and an answer to a question she was refusing to answer. "Nothing, brat. Someone's here to see you."

Sonya slid off the window frame she had taken refuge on top of, one of the arched types that required her to brace a foot on the frame of another or plant a hand on the ceiling in order to remain in place. It was two stories high, hence why the man had been having issues cornering her again, which she took the landing a little off but without putting cracks on the floor boards.

"Hey kid. Miss me?"

"Mamma!" Roughly fifty pounds of child impacted the Russian's stomach at full tilt, and with her wrong footing from the fall it just meant Shamal knocked them both over. She didn't even see the brat move. "You're on time!"

"Well... you don't have to sound so surprised." Sonya muttered sourly from under him, not even able to sit up before Renato grabbed the back of the kid's shirt and hauled him off her. "I'm here for the week, then we'll all take off for parts unknown."

Shamal squirmed delightedly in the hitman's hold, wiggling out of what seemed to be a uniformed sweater vest just to jump on her stomach again. This time with his boney as fuck knees. "For how long?"

That was actually a good question.

Sonya looked to Renato to answer that, who was instead eyeing the sweater he had been left holding skeptically. "Why are you wearing an oversized sweater, Shamal?"

"Um... reasons?"
"Mist reason or just mischief reasons?" Asked the Storm-Cloud as she picked herself up off the ground, shifting him to her arms instead of allowing his knees to continue to dig into her stomach.

"Both." He cheerfully informed her, wiggling to sit on her hip so he would have the reach to try and grab his vest-thing from the older Italian with a hand. "My teacher had a nervous breakdown."

"Today?" Renato demanded, easily keeping what was apparently a piece of incriminating evidence out of his grasp.

"Apparently last week." Shamal crossed his thin arms over his equally child-sized chest, forcing her to compensate for him shifting around without him holding on as well. "Or at least according to the teacher's gossip."

He studied the brat hanging off her for a long moment before passing back the garment. "Good work."

Sonya shot him a searching look for praising him for something a bit out there, but he was pointedly ignoring her now.

"So," continued the hitman while the brat shrugged on the sweater causing her no small amount of difficulty keeping her hold on him, "your mamma has taken a hotel room in town. You can either stay with her or just-

"I'm staying with mamma." Shamal informed him pointedly, as if he found any other suggestion silly and the older man equally so for even thinking he would go with anything else.

Renato huffed at him back with some amusement, glancing up at her next. "Please remember Nono is going to want to talk to you."

"Nono can kiss-"

"Sonya."

She shot him a heated look in return for the tone he was taking with her. No one talked to her like that, not even her own mother.

"…Wednesday. While the brat's finishing up his last day. If he cannot fit me in, oh well."

"You didn't used to mine the Sky." Renato commented in a tone deliberately neutral as Shamal was set on the floor again and instructed to go pack what he would need for a week with her elsewhere. "What changed?"

"My brother visited the brat and ended up involved with something almost lethal, within Vongola's home turf." The thief reminded him pointedly, waving absently when the brat double-checked that she was still standing there as he dashed away to pack a few things and presumably his lizard.

Good thing she had ensured her hotel would accept small pets, even if the 'pet fee' was annoying to have to pay as well.

"I still have not heard a word through normal channels of anything that was done or any reparations to be given for his injuries."

"I thought…" He stated completely blandly, giving her a more or less wary look she was slightly surprised to see him aim at her again, "…that Cherep encountered no significant damage from that… event. Which was what Octavia's Revelli reported in his medical amendments to the situation."
Really?

Was that why the stuntman had spent so long hanging back while in Vongola's medical wing?

Might've been a really good idea, to hide his Cloud Flame ability from the more active members of the mafia.

Sonya shrugged that off, for his lack of permanent injury wasn't really the issue. "He bled."

"…fair enough for a Cloud, I guess." The hitman still gave her a skeptical look, but eventually seemingly accepting that and changing the subject. "Will you now tell me what I'm missing?"

With a soft snort, she bent to recover her slightly abused book from off the floor. "I said to figure that one out yourself, I am giving you no hints."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 27th of May, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Shamal came across Crina's tarot cards in what seemed to be three seconds flat after being let into her hotel room.

Sonya knew it really wasn't that fast, there was the situating of 'Luigi the Chameleon' on the rented table that had to be done first and then the brat jumped on the bed for a few seconds until she told him to stop. Then the Mist found the cards that had been slipped into her luggage and asked her what they were.

"They don't look like playing cards." The kid informed her dubiously, surprisingly enough carefully going through the admittedly detailed hand-painted cards that were already showing heavy wear with distressed and faded edges.

"…actually, modern-day playing cards are based off of tarot card sets like the ones you hold in your hands. Slightly altered in a few ways, but more or less similar in the uncounted Fool or Jokers, four suites, and face cards… except for the twenty-one Major Arcana cards." Picking up the few he had already gone through, Sonya critically eyed the pieces of heavy paper.

Once she got to Mafia Land they were going into storage, but maybe she should invest in something to keep them preserved. Eventually, she might actually like to display them… once they stopped causing her a pang every time she remembered Crina's health situation.

"A… friend of mine gave them to me."

Shamal inspected the fancy, gothic looking design on one side all of them shared then at the rather intricate rendition of 'The Lovers' on the opposite side. "What are they used for?"

"Telling the future. Honest." She added when he shot her a bewildered look, grinning slightly as she took all the cards and shuffled them together again. "Want to see?"

"Can you use them to tell the future?" Scrambling up from his spot on the floor the kid joined her on her bedspread a bit impatiently, causing her to bounce a bit and nearly lose control of the cards she was trying to be careful of. Glancing at the cards she was truly mixing up and her face. "Where did you learn something like this?"

"Some people believe so, and I used to work in a circus like your zio. That's where I learned." Sonya admitted dryly, presenting the deck to him to cut. "Both Cherep and the friend that gave me these are still with the same one we all worked for."

Shamal made four neat little piles of cards, then messed them all up into a heap. "Why did your friend give them to you?"

"Ah... she's not doing too well. My friend, her name is Crina, she was old when I met her. And she's even older now." Gathering them together and laying ten cards out in a Celtic cross pattern for just general predictions, she set the rest of the deck to the side for if he had more questions. The thief figured it was a safe bet, he was a Mist. "Now then, ready?"

He blinked at her curiously a few times. "Sure, mamma."

Sonya flipped the first card and stared. "...huh."

"Mamma?"

"Page of Wands." She identified in bemusement, continuing the description Crina had drilled into her head about what it meant. "This represents your present, a young if steadfast man. Generally known to bring strange tidings, if good ones, he sometimes is considered to be in search of a young woman."

Shamal had just given Renato some news he found important but had confused the fuck out of her, and the brat had probably been looking forward to her visiting.

...strange, but probably just luck. Tarot card readings weren't supposed to be that accurate.

"That was your present," she slid the card under the Page of Wands out and laid it back down face up on top of it as she had when placing all of the cards facedown to begin with, "this one is the immediate challenge to you."

Sonya looked down and twitched as she recognized the next card.

"...the King of Swords."

He seemed more interested in the artwork depicting the royal with a naked blade than her reaction, at least. "What does this one mean then?"

"...he sits in judgement. What he judges is up to the self, either life and death or justice and crime. Generally, this means you have a turning point coming up where a decision can go either way. Can also mean you may have issues with a lawyer, a senator... or a doctor."

"Neat." Was all the Mist brat thought about that.

She had a different opinion. Like the reading might be mentioning a meeting with her mother. If she wanted to be even more paranoid, there was also the decision to become a doctor she was still waiting to see if it would happen again. Even more generally, it was the decision to follow in her and Renato's footsteps to be a criminal as well looming before him.

Warily eying the deck laying innocently to the side of her knee, the Russian reached for the next card. "This is your distant past. Inverted... Five of Pentacles."

Okay, this was getting ridiculous. She wanted a cigarette, but with the kid sharing her space that was probably along the 'bad idea' part of being an authority figure.

"Come on, mamma. What does this one mean?"
"Mist things." Sonya deadpanned in exasperation. "Disorder, chaos, ruin, discord. Sometimes it represents trouble in love when reversed like this."

Distant past, meaning how he came to be the ward of Renato in the first place and how that affected a certain hitman's plans and lifestyle. Probably. Could also mean his Mist behavior in general as well.

Shamal blinked at his barely started reading. "...wow. This is awesome. Next one!"

"Recent Past." Sonya flipped that one over, not even surprised anymore by the card revealed. "The Three of Cups. A conclusion, generally a good one. Can also represent happiness, healing, perfection, plenty, and victory."

This was getting creepy.

Without bothering to wait for him to cajole her on, the Storm-Cloud reached for the next one. "Best Outcome is... Nine of Cups, Inverted."

Well, if she really wanted to read into this at all, that was a decent kind of outlook for the future.

"Good business, truth, loyalty, and liberty."

Shamal made a face at her. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"When flipped, it's a material card indicating good fortune. Inverted like this, it's not quite as materialistic and can sometimes come with imperfections or mistakes. While this is a good card, it just foretells a good bettering instead of a great one."

Hopefully, this means he and Usov would come to terms in a decent way. Maybe he would strike a bargain with Lisa about calling Arseniy nonno?

That would be kind of funny.

"Next is your immediate future. The... Six of Pentagrams, Inverted again." Well fuck. "Representing desire, envy, jealousy, and illusion. A check on ambitions, not generally a good card but also not a bad one either like this."

An obstacle in other words. Something Shamal would have to contend with that might not be expected at the time he runs into it.

"I can do illusions. So maybe I learn something about them?" Puzzled out loud the Mist brat, looking tiny and serious as he struck a thinking pose while still sitting on his knees across the bedspread from her. "A challenge, I like the sound of that."

...eh, it was his reading. If that was how he wanted to interpret it, then he could.

Sonya picked up the next card and tried to put that out of her mind. "This one is supposed to represent anything that might affect you. Either positively or negatively. It's... the Card of Judgement."

Self-explanatory, mostly.

"Something is to be judged, and this will affect you in nearly all ways." Again, meeting Lisa. Which Sonya was a little nervous about too, really. It was her mother, and the brat was... well, her brat.

"Next is external influences, the things you will not be able to change or affect."

The brat snorted. "Let's see about that."
"The World Card. Representing assured success, voyage, flight, and changes of place. We do have a trip coming up, brat." She teased the kid mildly, smirking at his gob smacked expression. "I'd like to see you change that."

Shamal pouted at her, then shot a nasty look to the card in question. "Hmph."

"Hopes and fears, the Queen of Wands." Sonya paused, eyeing the card then glancing up at him. "You're not nervous about meeting my mother, are you kid?"

"...a little?" Flushing a bit, he squirmed in place sheepishly. "It's your mamma, mamma."

Point. "She represents a woman, friendly, chase, loving, and honorable. Generally reprehensive of a good harvest, love of money, or certain success in business."

Not quite how anyone she knew would describe Lisa, except that business success part... unless she was being motherly.

"Last card, the final outcome. Ace of Wands." That was... actually a fantastic card to draw. "Creation, invention, and enterprise. A good sign for a beginning or industry, meaning to be busy in this brat, it's a card of good fortune."

"This is really neat, mamma." Shamal informed her as she gathered them all up again and slid them into the carved wooden case they had been gifted in. "Can we do this again sometime?"

"Not all readings are good ones, brat. You just got lucky this time." Unfolding herself from the bed Sonya replaced them back into her luggage, so she wouldn't forget them when she left. "Come on, there's still daylight out. We can find something to do in the town other than sit here and play with old things."

"Can we get gelato?" Scrambling to follow, he skidded and made an about face to snatch up his shoes from where they ended up underneath the massive dresser provided.

She rolled her eyes, beckoning him out of their temporary room for the next week.

Why did both the Mists she knew best have a sweet tooth for icy things?

Maybe it was the fact they both were pretty much kids still. "Sure, whatever. But we're also taking a walk so you can get the sugar out of your system."

...thinking about it a little more, that reading could've also applied to her just as much as Shamal.

She had no real question when laying out the cards, just wanting a general spread to serve as an example. However, she couldn't think of any 'young man' looking for her... nor could she think of who the 'Queen of Wands' would then represent as 'hope and fears'.

Also, who the fuck would try to judge her?

(Wednesday the 28th of May, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"You wished to see me, Don Vongola?"

The Ninth Sky of the Vongola Famiglia glanced up from his ever-multiplying paperwork on his desk to the Russian woman being led into his office. "Miss Nikishina, good morning. Allow me to start by apologizing for the harm your brother came to while within our territory."

The thief remained impressively blank-faced as she came to a stop in front of his desk, but she did nod in acceptance.

No return of the greeting, not a word on how her brother was getting on, just non-verbal acknowledgement of his person and possibly not his words.

Timoteo barely withheld a grimace.

She hadn't seemed overly 'Cloudy' to him before because apparently, she had still been making up her mind if she liked him or not. Meaning she had come off more as a Storm in personality. Impressively quick-witted and sharp as a tack, if oddly obstinate in a roundabout manner and immune to any kind of polite intimidation.

Now that she had squarely decided she didn't like him, he was getting the same feel of most Clouds he met from her.

Not the best situation, especially not when she was assisting Sinclair in the little favor he had asked of the hitman in her own corner of the world. Not entirely a bad one either, as apparently even if she disliked someone or something she could still deal with it instead of trying to destroy it or whomever raised her ire.

Just… maybe put it off for as long as possible.

Even with his Harmony, he had the sinking suspicion he wouldn't be able to get the same things from the Storm-Cloud as he had before. Truly a pity, but then again she seemed to have an even better relation with Tyr than he ever had with her so it wasn't an entire loss.

Additionally, it was partially his fault.

Even after being told the pair of Russian siblings were Dual Cloud Guardian prospects, he hadn't thought of any of the other people affected by the attempt on his Lightning Guardian's life until well after she started her little protest and removed her brother and herself from the Iron Fort entirely.

Timoteo had thought it was his mother that sparked that, but apparently Daniella's actions were merely a convenient excuse from what Renato reported earlier this week.

"I wanted to speak with you about a few rumors we have only just heard from our fellows in the Far East." Continued the Sky when she flatly refused to verbalize anything. "Am I correct in guessing it is your famiglia that is providing Flame-stone matching services?"

Sonya slitted a glance to the side, to where Sinclair had taken up a slouched position against his far office wall. After a long moment, the Russian thief looked back at him. "My clan, and you are."

…if trying to get information out of her wasn't like pulling dragon's teeth in the first place even when neutral to someone, Timoteo didn't really want to go through the headache of getting her to tell him something when she didn't like him.

He glanced to his own Cloud Guardian, who took up the questioning again for him.

"Is it worth it?" Visconti started with their Flame type's typically favored blunt mannerisms.

"Not really." Stated the Storm-Cloud even more flatly than she had spoken to the Sky. "If you are asking for monetary value, no. In a research manner, only possibly."
Timoteo suppressed a wry smirk as he realized the thief wasn't actually giving anything but her personal thoughts about it away. Not reporting what her clients in the Triads thought, or if it would be to Vongola's benefit to pursue the topic, or even if she thought what personal benefits the ones matched would find.

This was Sonya Nikishina being deliberately obstinate, and he settled in for a verbal duel between two Clouds.

"Then why sell it?"

"We are thieves. Hoarding money and selling sparkling rocks is something we do on a regular basis." The woman replied boredly. "If it is what our clients wanted, then good. If not, oh well."

"Isn't that a bad position for any customer-oriented service?" Tried his Cloud Guardian on another tack.

"I've found that people rarely know what the hell they want. And, unless I am interested, I don't care to find out on general principle."

Timoteo was thankful for his thick mustache, as it concealed his frown if he held his head low enough… like as if he was contemplating his paperwork.

They might actually be forced to go through the Sword Emperor or rely on what the free-lance hitman felt up to giving out about the whole situation if he knew anything. Since the Soft Flame Sun and the Russian Storm-Cloud seemed to be practically paired off whenever they were together, he wasn't entirely sure if Renato would carry tales on his little lady if she didn't want him to.

While fully willing to be associated with Vongola for the moment, the hitman had also made it clear it would only be a temporary thing. In reality if not reputation, but he was a competent enough Mafioso to be put to use on various things that inevitably cropped up in criminal groups and more than thankful of the aid he was given to prevent his actions from harming the Famiglia.

Hopefully his misstep with Nikishina wouldn't translate over to Tyr by mere association alone.

Otherwise he would have to see what he could do to help about his mother's crusade to try ensnaring the Storm-Cloud into her circle.

Timoteo wasn't even sure how a Cloud from Soviet Russia managed to travel so far from her originating territory and yet was still a model guest without a mitigating influence of another Sky, much less how far the Soviet branch of the underworld had approached and made use of Dying Will Flames.

The Iron Curtain did more than just cut the civilian news and traffic off, which made the woman standing as bold as brass in his office a unique link into that corner of the world.

Really, the only reason why he was humoring the woman's behavior was due to her providing assistance to the Mafioso working on a favor for him and because she was a Soviet Flame Expert. Above that, the possible natural crystal-gemstone Flame focuses she might be able to provide in time.

The few pieces of spinal, which was the bribe she had handed over the last time she stayed within the Iron Fort, had worked as she had claimed as a general basic focus for any type. Not well for those with more Flames, but for those with only slight amounts to pull on.

More promising, when a few emerald cut stones of spinal were sourced from a local jeweler's store they still worked as described.
The coloring was a bit oddly mismatched, and a few shades worked better for certain Flame types, but it was a decent generalist stone for those new to Dying Will Flames if usually a one-use kind of thing.

"to inquire about it?"

"You have a few pieces." Was Nikishina's non-helpful answer to Visconti's latest track of inquiry as the Sky started paying attention again.

If only to see exactly how much she was going to be a brick wall to any Vongola inquiry.

Renato was staring a hole into the side of her head, was this a bone of contention between the two?

Her decision to dislike Vongola, while the hitman was still working for them?

He was more than certain Sinclair would try something if only because he had a good working relationship with the man, but he was also uncertain as to who would be the target of him trying to mitigate the Storm-Cloud's behavior.

Timoteo decided to cut this short, glancing at his Cloud Guardian to have him take a step back. Croquant Bouche was motoring the conversation from another room and would give the entire transcript of the thief being stubbornly short to Visconti if he asked, but the Sky was certain anything given unwillingly would be more or less useless.

"Miss Nikishina," by the look that earned him, she had apparently caught on to the polite interrogation this time and wouldn't be letting it slide again, "thank you for answering a few questions."

She merely nodded to him in answer.

"Have a good day, then."

Utterly unsurprised when the woman just turned to stalk out of the office without so much as a backward glance, Timoteo turned a wry smile to the hitman that had followed her in. "Well… interesting."

"Nono, I'm sorry."

"It's not your fault she has decided to be difficult." Interrupted the Sky with some amusement. "Then again, we really should've guessed she would be after the situation. Your little lady wasn't shy about reminding people she was a Cloud, however strangely she behaves."

"…if it makes it any better, she was as equally stubborn with me at first." Offered the Soft Flame Sun a bit sardonically. "She didn't like me when we met."

Timoteo laughed, trying to think of anyone who would actually believe that if they saw how the pair acted now. "I will try to keep that in mind."

Might mean his mother had a shot in ensnaring the little Russian thief, or that it was possible to recover her more 'neutral' behavior with enough work.

"I don't think she would be so stiff if she didn't really care, so at least I can assume she does care at least a bit about Vongola as a whole." Renato continued after a beat, a sideways glance to the door the woman in question had left through. "Not a whole lot, but at least enough to not try to brush you off entirely."
Silver lining. The Sky nodded to show he heard but gestured to the same office door the hitman kept glancing at. "You might wish to ensure she doesn't cause any trouble, Sinclair."

"She won't." The younger man visibly paused as he considered it. "...unless it's one of Ottavia's people. Excuse me, Timoteo."

---

(Saturday the 31st of May, 1969. Convitto Nazionale Tommaso Campanella, Reggio Calabria, Italian Republic.)

Shamal's graduation from his first year of schooling was mainly held in an auditorium.

With four classes worth of parents and other interested parties, the school officials, and multiple displays in the scuola elementare wing of the building showcasing what the students did all year.

Given the sheer amount of money the school was charging him for Shamal's education at a private and elitist facility such as this, Renato expected and was satisfied with the basic principles the brat was now drilled in.

He could now read and write in a shaky hand, do basic addition and subtraction, and could read both a calendar and a clock face. He also had an introduction to geography, basic literature staples, and had a general introduction to some fields of science.

You had to start somewhere, and while he found the information beyond dull the young Mist was at least thrilled to show the work he did off to Sonya.

The little Russian thief was just bemused all over, if he was reading her right.

She occasionally drifted out of his range, usually when Shamal pointed out the results of some class project for her to inspect. At least she did return in time for the speeches, which spared him a headache the size of Sicily with the press of people crammed into tiny school rooms all damn near broadcasting their thoughts in yells with how close they were.

He almost didn't even need his mind-reading trick, what most the people around him thought was plastered across their faces and only ill-concealed by what they took to be polite expressions. The sheer amount of overblown pride in one classroom alone made him itch to wipe it away, and he would too if it wasn't pride in their various sprogs.

Sonya's running mental commentary on the likely hazards within the room, which he half suspected she started up just for him to focus on instead of accidentally catch the thoughts of the civilians they were forced to interact with, was at least somewhat amusing. Especially when she started inspecting the place with an eye to break in somehow, and the hitman learned more about the fake foam ceilings overhead and their weight tolerances than he had ever had need of.

Renato hadn't known there was actually a crawl space up there and enough room to use them to get past a room or hallway that otherwise would be difficult to circumvent.

Interesting.

"Are you trying to open a school or something?" He asked her in her native tongue when she ran out of thoughts about the truly shoddy crafted windows with each and every way she could think of to force them open.
With the added inclusion on just what the criminals she knew best would do with that if they disliked something about the classroom or the grades earned within them.

Even quietly spoken, the non-Italian language earned him suspicious looks and various ugly stares. She just earned them more when she replied in the same manner.

"Not exactly. Our school will open this fall, actually. My mother is getting too busy to do the teachings on her own, so I made an alternate." Pausing to politely clap when the substitute teacher presiding on the stage that had taken over Shamal's class finished reading off the apparently prepared little speech about how brilliant the whole class was and how ready they were to leave their first year of school behind them, she turned to him instead of half-listen to him go on about what was displayed as if they didn't have eyes and could use them. "Making a school for those like us is a fairly involved process, which I've found to be very exasperating overall."

Renato already planned on signing Shamal up for Italy's Mafia School as soon as possible, but that was more of a secondary school level kind of thing. Now apparently there was a Soviet Mafia School in the works, and he wondered if anyone in Italy's knew they were about to have a sister school.

Any question or reply he could have made would've been lost in the sudden surge of people rising to their feet to tour the level of the school their brats had dwelled within for nearly a year. The both of them rose as well, even if it seemed neither had plans on moving until the press of people lessened somewhat.

"Mamma, we have to go to the fourth floor."

"I know, brat. But let's wait out the rush first." Snagging Shamal's hand before he could get swept away or even lost in the halls outside the auditorium for a bit, the thief hauled him up to a hip. "I don't feel like being pressed against someone else's shoulders today."

The Mist gave her an odd look. "But you're against Mister Renato's. And now mine."

She sighed and tugged a lock of wavy brown hair. "Allow me to rephrase that. I do not feel like rubbing shoulders with people I do not know. Or at least any more than I have to."

"Then introduce yourself and ask for their names." Was the brat's smartass reply. "Then you'd know them."

The hitman coughed to hide a bark of laughter, pointing out a relatively people-free pocket starting to develop on one side of the large room. "Let's get out of the way, shall we?"

The glare the thief tossed him was unamused, but she started moving anyways.

She replaced the brat on his feet once it was less likely he could get swept up in the crowd and pulled away from them. "The crowd is already thinning, I don't think we will have long to wait brat."

"So, I probably should've asked this before, but... where in Moscow are we going?"

"...hmm? The north-west side of Moscow's outskirts. My... fellows, occupy a stretch of territory that goes from the east side of the Golovinsky and Voykovsky Districts to the west of the Severnoye Tushino District, on the outside edge of the North-West Administrative Okrug. We basically straddle a section of the Moscow Canal." The infuriating woman smiled at his flat look for the unhelpful answer. "I have everything set up, from the reservation of a hotel suite to the train tickets. So long as you let me point a few things out and stay away from certain things I'll also make clear, it shouldn't be a bad visit."
'Shouldn't be' was a very suggestive turn of phrase.

Shamal tugged on Sonya's skirt, attracting not only the thief's attention but the hitman's as she turned away from him.

A girl that looked younger than the blonde with him, impressive considering Sonya herself was barely just legal herself, gave the both of them a nervous smile before directing her attention to the Mist brat.

"Miss Abelli." Greeted the kid just shy of excitedly.

"Mister Nikishin, good afternoon young sir. I take it these are your... parents?" The nervous little substitute teacher glanced from Shamal's coloring to the thief's blonde hair and grey eyes, to even Renato's darker coloring.

"Godparents." Sonya flatly informed the girl. "I am Sonya Nikishina, this behind me is Renato Sinclair."

She winced as she realized the usual way one's godparents had to stand in for a child, flicking a glance down to the brat. "I... see. My apologies. I just came to say goodbye, actually."

"Aww... are you leaving Miss Abelli?"

"I was invited to teach elsewhere, so I won't be returning next year." The girl confirmed softly, looking back up to the thief and hitman. "Sorry for interrupting."

Sonya lifted a shoulder in an absent kind of shrug. Only really allowing the girl her way since it did look as if Shamal actually liked her.

Renato dearly wanted to flirt with the girl, if only to see if she would stutter or blush if he did, but bit it back.

The hoops he was going to have to jump through to turn the thief's head... Guerra's advice had better show some sign of working soon or he was going to give up.

"Are you sick?"

Speak of the devil.

Renato gave the tiny blonde woman a sardonic look, reaching up to tilt his fedora down a bit more. "I'm not, thank you."

Sonya gifted him with a dubious one back, glanced to the girl that had been distracted by Shamal pestering her for where she was going, and back to him. "Are you sure? You never required an engraved invitation before."

"As if I'm going to have the time." He shot back lowly, watching the brat enthuse all about the Russian his mamma was teaching him to the substitute absently. "Besides, there are a few more important things to be done. And, leading a lady on is very rude."

It wouldn't be the first time the hitman had to turn down something in favor of the brat or something he needed. He was getting depressingly used to doing it too.

For a tetchy baby Mist he hadn't intended to keep on for long at first, it was rather surprising how far he was going for him.
Maybe he would've kept tabs on Shamal, but really… what would a barely mid-twenties hitman do with a toddler?

If it hadn't been for Sonya taking an extreme interest in the brat, he might've just left him in the local orphanage or the Iron Fort's equivalent for Flame using kids after sorting Shamal out.

Renato was almost juggling way too many things at once, and if it hadn't been for Timoteo taking an interest in the Mafioso that appealed to him for help with something wrong in Mafia Land… he probably would've been forced to give up the brat before long anyways.

This parenting thing was expensive. It was looking like he'd have to subsidize his income somehow or go on a binge of hits like Sonya did her own contracts.

Nearly a month, or a month and a half depending, of free time was going to be a damn blessing.

He had a point to this mental meander, right?

No, he had been distracting himself while waiting for Shamal to exhaust the things he wanted to babble to his pretty teacher lady. "Alright, brat. Your mamma probably won't get crushed into people if we go now."

"Oh yes, blame me. Like you weren't as uncomfortable." Sonya muttered lowly enough only he caught it, giving the other girl a short nod of farewell.

"Um… actually, have either of you noticed something… well, odd?"

The thief froze for a split second, before turning back to her with a politely curious expression. "I'm sorry, but odd?"

Wincing slightly, the substitute teacher waved a hand rapidly as if to physically dismiss her words. "Never mind me, it was just a thought."

"My dear, I professionally investigate odd things. I'm a writer." Bullshitted the Russian pleasantly, giving the girl an artfully encouraging smile she didn't feel at all like giving. "I've found younger people generally tend to notice more, even if they understand less at the time."

Renato placed a hand on Shamal's head, for one to get him to stop cringing and to include himself in the discussion. "Odd is never really bad. We are all odd in some ways."

Some more than others.

Emboldened by their encouragement, the teacher clasped her hands and held them in front of herself. "Well. I meant in that a few strange coincidences happen around young mister Nikishin. I've never been able to put a finger on it, and it ranges from knowing about a malfunction with the bells before they ring to some… strange weather patterns."

"…thank you for informing us, Miss Abelli. We'll keep an eye on him." Sonya promised after a beat, taking the younger woman's hands in her own, pressing on them lightly before patting them. "If there is something, we'll let you know at least. Can I have a phone number, or an address to send a letter to if something does come up? I'll give you my office one in return."

"Um… sure." Digging through her pockets, the teacher came up with a few scraps of paper and a few pens.

"Can I borrow that? I'm afraid I've left my pen somewhere." Asked the thief absently as she came out of her own purse with a heavily abused pad of paper herself.

Renato blinked, but keep his mouth shut.

The Russian always had a pen, it was more likely she didn't have any paper to go with it. It wasn't unusual for her to still have illegible writing on her skin from when she made do without some.

Why she never wrote in her ever-present books was a question. What she was doing was another, but it was possible this was her version of damage-control.

After writing out their contact information, the women traded bits of paper and the thief waved off the substitute teacher.

"…Shamal, you're going to have to do some emergency damage control." Kneeling down to the Mist brat's level, Sonya held out… a case for a pair of reading glasses.

He didn't even see the thief steal that.

Shamal took it, looked it over, took out the glasses, then glanced up at her. "What should I do?"

"While your ability is great for making things that aren't there, it's also able to be used in more subtle ways." She started quietly, forcing the kid to lean forward in order to hear her. "Will anyone that holds or wears these to overlook coincidences, to forget about those with brown hair once they touch them, or even to just encourage the holder to ignore anything to do with one Shamal Nikishin."

"…does she have to forget me?"

"It's better than the alternative, brat."

Renato pressed his mouth into a thin line as he kept a lookout for the pair.

Frankly, he wasn't sure if Vongola did background checks on substitute teachers. Hopefully they did, and he'd be able to report the girl as suspicious of Dying Will Flame use. If not, then he'd either have to do something he really didn't want to or bribe another Mist to do what Sonya was trying to coach the brat through.

"…kay." Shamal cradled the glasses, eyed them a long moment, then snuck a peek up to his mamma's face. "…how?"

"Imagine, clearly, what you want to be done when someone holds, uses, or touches the item. Say… putting them on makes her overlook things that are strange. Or that touching them makes her memories of you fade a tiny bit. Small things that will build up for… a year. Then, put that together with the sensation of building your Constructs, and add your will to that mental image."

As the hitman didn't have Mist Flames, he had no idea if that was decent, vague, or direct instructions for one to do what they wanted. The thief sounded certain, and also had no thoughts on why that would fail at all, but he didn't know how much of that was just faked for the brat's peace of mind or how much of it was pure certainty.

He had gotten pretty used to Mists and their work in general over the last few years, so he was able to at least tell when the glasses took on Shamal's Mist Flames. Not what they would do or what about the glasses was Constructed, but just that they were.

Strange.
Sonya held the glasses case open for them, snapping them shut once the brat had put them back. "I'm going to go return this, you two head upstairs. I'll meet you both up there."

She pressed a kiss to Shamal's forehead, gave him a nod when he helped her back to her feet, and stalked off with enough purpose in her stride to deter any of the other faculty members from trying to derail her.

"Well… maybe you were a bit too good this year." Renato suggested after a moment, yanking his leg back when the brat went to kick it. "Hey, I didn't screw up."

"I didn't screw up either." Shamal insisted snottily, pouting up a storm and trying to kick the hitman again. "You told me to get my teacher to quit."

…he hadn't wanted to half-hear a mental fantasy of how to romance the thief from mister mouse again, so the moment he heard there would be a graduation thing involving the faculty he had set the Mist brat on the case. "Never mention this to Sonya, and I'll buy you… something."

The brat shot him a heated glare.

"I'll take you up to see that stupid film from West Germany you wanted to see."

"And mamma too."

Renato shot the little brat a glare as he got them both moving. "How the hell am I going to explain that to Sonya?"

"Don't care." Insisted the Mist, stomping off a bit of his irritation. "We're all going to go see it, or I'm telling."

…so now he had to suffer through some inane children's movie and somehow convince Sonya to go along with a slight detour to her travel plans.

Damn it. That was going to be a fairly awkward situation, sitting through however long the damn thing was.

Chapter End Notes

So… I have a deck of tarot cards I'm going to be basing any reading Sonya does with them off of. I received them before I joined the US military, they've traveled pretty much everywhere I've been in the last couple years, and they've just been gathering dust on a shelf or a box. My fictional character having a deck and I having a real if more modern one being the case, I dug mine out and shuffled them up to write the reading she gives Shamal.

Originally I had thought to just go through the deck and pick-'n-chose until I got a decently-vague card to give… preferably starting at random and continuing on until I had what I wanted.

In reality, the reading Sonya gives Shamal is exactly what I drew for it first… no alteration needed. Not even the three extra 'draws' allowed to try and seek clarification on what the cards in certain positions meant. I only laid them out first in an actual pattern to remind myself what they all meant in what spot, and I will admit to looking up the meanings because it's been years since I messed around with tarot cards.

Sonya's thoughts about it are actually mine as I went through the reading to see what I should write.

I didn't actually notice it could apply to the both of them and not just Shamal until well after I started to end that little scene. So, creepy little back-story and a story of sheer coincidence from the chapter for you all to puzzle over. A wonder how things work sometimes…
Chapter 53

Chapter Notes

Edit (01/19/2017) : Fairly long conversations with about three different people who speak Russian, I still am not convinced I was wrong. However, I am correcting a few ways Russians are addressed in-story just to stop the arguments. Because I'm never 'wrong', merely 'country-ish' or a bit 'awkward' with how a few are addressed in-story. And while that was acceptable to me to have Sonya a bit off or confused on a few things, apparently not so to others.

(Monday the 2nd of June, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Why in the seven hells would we?"

"There's nine circles to hell, and because I promised." Renato informed the highly skeptical thief in a bland tone of voice.

He had figured Sonya wouldn't be too happy with a detour and being proven right was annoying. Not that it annoyed him nearly as much as she was at the moment.

"Who cares how many levels of hell there are, what I want to know is why you would want to go out of your way for something like this. You don't even like going to the park and sitting around while he runs off some energy." She glanced up the staircase, in case the brat in question had finished with packing enough for a month or two and was on his way to them. "Fuck… next time tell me when you do things like this. I've planned for some extra time, but I thought that would be delays and maybe an overnight in some town."

The hitman suppressed the wince, because the whole situation was just awkward. Thankfully it was for the brat, and Sonya was nothing if not consistent in bending to Shamal's reasonable whims.

This one was a bit unreasonable, but with Renato throwing some weight on it…

Seeing a film a bit up north probably wasn't greatly out of their way, Italia was firmly south of the Soviet Union after all. Throwing a kink in her traveling plans was also an iffy thing, she knew where they were going and into what… he didn't.

The basics, yes. How she knew to get past the Iron Curtain with two non-Soviet tagalongs, no.

Getting through the Iron Curtain seemed to be something she did on a regular basis at least, if not with passengers.

The Soviet Storm-Cloud sighed, tightening her hold on Shamal's chameleon before the damned thing squirmed out of her grip. She eyed the thing severely, which got it to stop moving for a long second as if it sensed the bigger predator that had it was losing patience. "Where, exactly, is this taking place?"

"All I know is that there are showings of the film in Germany. More likely West."

She eyed him severely next. "Does the brat even speak or understand German?"
"...after five minutes with Croquant Bouche, he does now. And Russian, you just need to teach him to read it now."

Sonya clicked her tongue at him. "Lazy. Fine, whatever. I can arrange something in West Germany easily enough. Not quite the way I'd want with the brat with us, but it's doable. We will not be coming back the same way, however. That's a little too difficult to do with a child along, with or without you. I'd be denied trying the legal ways, and the illegal ones are a bit more risky than I'd want to expose him to."

Luigi the Cape Dwarf Chameleon suddenly nipped her left thumb, which only earned the thing another glare. Its attack having an undesirable effect, mainly not getting the thief to drop it out of surprise or pain, the lizard sheepishly went back to nosing about her slim fingers.

Renato rescued Shamal's pet before Sonya went through with a half-formed plan to squish it before they had it shipped off to await them in Moscow. She might have initially discarded it due to Mist dramas they'd have to suffer through while on the road, but she was still wondering if they could conveniently 'lose' it at the train station if she bought Shamal off with the promise to get him another one.

Even if he had only rarely interacted with the dratted thing, the chameleon knew him better than he did the strange Russian woman. It settled down willingly enough, investigating the hitman's cuffs and trying to eat his cuff-links instead of trying to spring to freedom.

She sniffed irritably, digging a pack of cigarettes out of her purse but not opening them. "Aww... it likes you."

"It's a gift." He snarked at her mildly, with an added glare of his own for her thoughts of the brat abandoning the lizard to his clutches the moment she could find a house in northern Italy. "...do you know where Mafia School is?"

"Should I?" Asked the thief mildly as she pulled a fragile tube of tobacco from the pack and flipped it around her fingers. "I assumed it would be more or less near Vongola's territory, but the only thing I know about it is that it exists."

A decent stab in the dark, for a non-Italian.

"How about I find some real estate near it for you, and you can pick which one you like."

Sonya gave him a considering look, tapping a finger not tied up in her one-handed gymnastics with something easily broken against her lip. "...it better not have a balcony or trellises. A better 'rob me I'm stupid' sign I can't think of off the top of my head."

"How many rooms?" If that was her only criteria, this would be stupidly easy.

There were any number of people that would give their left arms to have a Cloud move in next door, or even within a local city limit. Admittedly there would be some adjustment needed for all involved, but even a temporary Cloud resident would force the unrulier criminals in a radius to step lightly. Especially if they were hunting retirees in a Cloud's territory.

...or what seemed to be a Cloud's territory.

"...four? I guess." The thief bit her lip as she thought, looking slightly conflicted as she tried to think of anyone that would ever want to bother her before they tried. "...shit. No, six at the least. Well..."

"At least ten, got it." Who the hell was 'Scruffy'?
She flattened out her expression in her version of ‘sheepish’, tucking the unlit cigarette behind her right ear. "...actually, I think that's not going to be enough. With the rate of people that have been attaching themselves to me..."

"...that third Flame type you have, it wouldn't happen to be 'Sky' would it?"

Instead of actually think of what it was, or wonder about that herself, the thief just rolled her eyes. "No. Not Sky."

Then she forcibly redirected her mind to wondering how long, exactly, did Shamal need to pack nearly or everything he owned for a... "...how long do I get him for, anyway? You've yet to answer that."

"Depends. If your syndicate is more or less stable, at least until the end of August." If not, well…

Renato would just have to wait and see. He would much rather just investigate for a week or two, dump the brat off for the rest of the summer, and have a month and a half of completely free time to himself.

"...define 'stable'."

"For fuck's sake, Sonya."

"It's Russia. I'm not sure how much news of the internal workings get out to you all here, but it's very subjective as to who the criminal and who the law enforcement is. Frankly, half the time the civilians approach the bratstvo just because the government's methods are worse than us. Or slower than humanly decent. Or... actually more expensive."

She shoved a hand through her hair, raking it back and dislodging the cigarette which she caught absently, and the glint of something shiny high in arch of her left ear derailed him a moment.

Earrings?

"That being the case, it's actually not that unusual for a bit of a turf war to erupt between the KGB, the militsiya, and the local chapter of vory."

Renato thought hard, smoothing a hand over his mouth and ignoring Luigi as the chameleon crawled up his arm to reach his hat. "So, what, is it never stable?"

"It depends on your definition of stable. Stable enough to walk the streets during the day, sure. There's no wide scale gang-warfare going on, but that's just because no one currently is in the position to do so near us." Sonya shrugged, waving a hand as if she could pluck the words she wanted out of the air. "I really wouldn't suggest you take a walk after dark, especially not in Moscow proper. A bit like Mafia Land, just a bit more civilized due to the civilians and with the risk of catching the KGB's attention heaped on top."

Dearly beloved fuck, no wonder the twelve-year-old thief had no issues wandering the island on her lonesome.

He hadn't given it much thought at the time, because she was a tiny Cloud and frankly with that Flame type what they said went and all, but... a young girl on her own in a den of criminals spoke of either a hard past or ingrained familiarity with the antics of hardened murderers.

The fact her family let her wander that far on her when she was so young own meant they didn't see any harm in it or was incredibly used to that level of violence.
…where did that cigarette go?

"There's really little to nothing threatening where we're going. The Zolotovs are pretty much normally on top of everything that goes on around us, I just have little to nothing to do with that side of the clan."

The hitman bit back the 'is it safe' question, because of course it wasn't.

Life wasn't safe, and if coddled too much Shamal would never learn to deal with risky things as cautiously as whatever threat required. Asking her to compare her native territory to Vongola's was also supremely unfair, for one this wasn't his territory either and for another very few syndicates ever reached a similar size without imploding.

"The thing is, Shamal will actually be safer than the both of us." Continued the Storm-Cloud after a moment of thought. "The old hands, my foster parent's generation and older, will leave him alone even if you piss them off. He's a kid, after all. Just... the newer vory are less concerned unless you belong to them."

"The old school?"

Hmm... he had noticed that too. Like their generation somehow didn't pass along the same standards to the new blood coming in.

She waved that off. "Pretty much. There's also... technically the brat qualifies for Zolotov protection through me... but we need Lisa, my foster mother, to agree to that first."

"Speaking of." A different voice had the both of them turning to see Ganauche the Lightning Guardian coming down a hallway to where the two of them were waiting on a Mist brat in the foyer. "I did a bit of poking... don't your own vory-code prohibit any vor from having children?"

Sonya took a second to adjust to the eyepatch Nono's Lightning was fairly self-conscious about, then ignored it in favor of answering in a non-helpful way that had become her norm to Vongola people all week. "None of your damn business."

"Sonya." Renato called her attention to himself, before Ganauche could do something ill-advised and poke her more, interrupting her deliberation on if she was irritated with the Lightning or not. "We are guests."

The thief obligingly turned away from the interloper to look at him again. "Not for long."

"I would like to come back and still be a guest." Preferably a favorable one.

His initial reception to the massive underworld superpower had been risky enough for him.

"So, what would you call us in your Russian ranks?" Continued the other Italian, which just made the hitman want to plant his face in a hand.

Why was Timoteo's Lightning Guardian so defective?

Poke a bear, see if she mauled you for all he cared... or rendered him limb from limb, depending.

"...avtoriuyets. Brigadiers." Another long pause, in which the Lightning's faulty sense of danger finally kicked in and he stopped approaching the two of them, and Sonya narrowed her thankfully still grey eyes at the man in her still mainly blank-faced expression of irritation. "Did you require something?"
Ganauche winced at the slightly iced-over question, surprisingly the action was less noticeable with the black patch over his eye socket. "Erm... I wanted to say I'm sorry. About your brother, and you, getting caught up in..."

"...did Don Vongola put you up to this?"

"No, you two left before I could say anything. Before I was even released from the Suns' wing. I wasn't allowed to even go this far, until I learned to shoot a gun with... this." The man gestured to his missing eye and then scratched the back of his head, knocking the straps holding the patch askew. He cursed, readjusted, then cleared his throat to continue as he shoved his hands firmly into his pockets. "I got chewed out for bringing back something suspicious?"

She stared at him hard for a long moment, then gave a one shoulder shrug and basically dismissed him from mind as she pulled the missing cigarette out from somewhere to light. "You're going to get yourself killed doing stupid shit like that."

"Yeah... that was pointed out to me, several times." The Lightning seemed to almost physically weigh his chances for a moment, then sighed and held up a finger. "One last question?"

Since Shamal was thundering down the second-floor staircase, that was all they really had time for.

Sonya glanced to the same sight he did, then back to the Ninth Generation Guardian irritably and exhaled a smoky sigh. "What."

She might have decided she wasn't infuriated with him, but that wasn't the same as not minding his presence.

"...how can you take a brat on? Regardless if he's related to you or not?"

Besides the automatic reflex in sinking a hand in Shamal's hair as a footman placed his luggage down on the landing for another to load onto a trolley, Sonya didn't stop her near-glare at the man. "...women cannot become vory. I am not held to the same standards."

Queerly, the thief wasn't even annoyed at the thought. Just that Ganauche was still bothering her.

Well... frankly, female Mafiosi were technically non-existent by traditional rules.

That didn't stop Italian women from keeping up with and sometimes outperforming their male counterparts, and it seemed as if they had that in common with their fellow females in the USSR as well.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of June, 1969 continued. Napoli Centrale, Naples, Italian Republic.)

Shamal was beyond excited for his first train ride.

Sonya... not so much. If only because she knew how damned boring they tended to be.

Renato didn't look too enthused either, if only because he knew they'd have at least three trains to catch to get from Villa San Giovanni to Munich, West Germany. Several hours on each, as well.

Half a day on a train, and then they apparently had a movie to catch too.

Brat was going to be bouncing off the goddammned walls if they didn't find something for him to do.
A once-frequent train passenger herself, Sonya hadn't thought to get them a compartment at first. It was rare she managed to take the same train for longer than a few hours, which made it not really worth the expense.

The quarter hour drive from Reggio di Calabria to Villa San Giovanni changed her mind for her.

Shamal wasn't annoying, per say. Just Renato was already surly seeming about something, the kid was about to get his hopes of a dashing adventure cruelly curtailed by the very civilized and mostly routine trip, and she really didn't feel like being anyone's buffer today.

Screw them all, she'll take a first-class compartment.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of June, 1969 continued. A passenger train.)

By hour five, second train of the day, Shamal was thoroughly bored of watching the sea whip by the window interrupted by short spurts of land and maybe a city or two.

He had gone through the simple Russian story books she had brought him twice, long since adapted to the sway and occasional clangs of the train moving under them, and had picked his way through an on-board lunch in the dining car only to eat her traveling snacks the moment they came back to the compartment.

"Mamma? Do you have your tarot cards?"

Sonya frowned thoughtfully as she pulled her nose out of her book. "Somewhere, why?"

"Tarot cards?" Skeptically repeated the lump of a hitman who had sprawled out in front of the doorway like a perpetually napping gargoyle.

Renato tipped his fedora up in order to actually see his fellow passengers.

She shot him a glare. Of course he was awake now, after the Mist brat's eighth time needing the facilities.

The asshole had pretended to be solidly asleep all morning, so he wouldn't have to entertain the brat or deal with responding to his hyperactive chatter. Forcing her todamn near climb over his long legs near barring the compartment doors whenever she and Shamal had to leave for whatever reason.

"…they were a gift."

By smirk alone, the Sun still seemed sardonically amused at the fact she had a deck at all as his tilted his head back to see her fully.

"Can you show me again?" Mist brat asked sweetly, batting big brown eyes at her.

…well, whatever. Letting him mess around with them might occupy him for the last hour they had to go before they could get off the train and go find something to eat for an early dinner.

The thief was not looking forward to the next leg, which was the detour Renato had insisted upon.

It would still take two days, either way. An overnight in Munich or across the Iron Curtain in Czechoslovakia near Babylon wouldn't do more than make it late evening instead of morning for their arrival in Moscow.
"I think they're in my bag." Think, because it was entirely possible she shoved it into the largest of the three suitcases she had with her at the moment.

That one was in the luggage compartment of their train currently. A bit more than she usually traveled with, but really only a fraction of the clothing she had shopped for with Cherep.

Shamal still looked expectant, so she assumed he was waiting for her to dig them out.

"Do you know what you want to ask?"

The unhelpful lump near the compartment doors snorted as he pulled himself upright instead of continue blocking the compartment doors like a surly guard dog.

"Hey! Mamma's really good with those cards! She predicted the… uh," a reminder of his substitute teacher had the kid hunching his shoulders a little defensively, "the thing with Miss Abelli."

The inverted Six of Pentagrams had shown up in Shamal's immediate future, meaning a check on ambitions.

Huh… she had, actually. Weird.

Cocking an eyebrow at the brat's behavior, the hitman nonetheless wiped the skepticism off his face for him in exchange for a blander, faintly superior cast to his features. "I'm sure she did, brat. But things like these always relies on you fitting them into your life somehow, and they're fairly useless before an incident happens. For example, you knew something was going to happen that wasn't good but didn't stop or mitigate it… did you?"

"It really is based a lot on coincidence, kid." Chipped in the thief as she dug out the box from the depths of her luggage.

It hadn't been in the newer, bigger case but the smaller and worn one. Her old one she was seriously contemplating giving to someone. Maybe Scruffy.

Sliding the cards out of the little wooden box as she sat back down, she shuffled them anyways. "Not to say it isn't something fun to do to pass the time, but you shouldn't put much stock into it."

Shamal rolled his eyes at the both of them, plopping himself down across from Sonya on the other bench. "I want to know… if I should do what I'm thinking of doing."

Sonya blinked at him. Renato gave the kid a sideways look.

Mist brat pointedly shuffled away from his guardian with a semi-suspicious look to him before turning back at her expectantly. "What?"

"…okay..." Five card spread, then.

Maybe just four?

She could draw an extra one if there was need.

Offering the deck to be cut, which he did in his usual messy fashion, and the Russian laid them out on the bench next to her. "So, starting off, this represents you right now."

Inverted Tower. That was… actually slightly alarming.

Preferably they could take it literally. Shamal was a bit confined in a train car. He wasn't particularly happy with that, or wouldn't be, given enough time.

Otherwise… she'd be bothering Renato for a list of places she could buy in fairly short order.

…because if the brat was being confined or stifled in the Iron Fort...

"...moving on to your actual question." Sliding the foreboding Tower card into the bottom of her deck before Shamal could bug her about what it meant, she was much happier to see the next card was less dire. "King of Cups, fitting."

He gave her a look, because this card had a very obvious water-theme going on. There was even a dolphin depicted leaping out of water, usually it was just a statue or a carved fountain instead.

"Probably referring to your Mist, it's obviously a sign of noble things and water. Generally, the King of Cups is thought to be a fair man. One of business, law, or divinity. Also, generally favorable to those that are scientifically inclined, have a mind for the rules and laws, or those with artistic talents."

Mostly Mist things, in nature. They had to know what rules they could break and still be believable with whatever, be creative in the application of their Flames or risk someone breaking through the Constructions, and it was a water-type Flame. She only suspected where the 'scientist' part came in, which would or wouldn't be born out in the fullness of time.

Shamal puffed up a bit, pleased with it so far. Renato looked less sold, but at least less dismissive overall now.

"Things you need to address… Eight of Wands. Motion through the immovable. Activity in undertakings. Speed, hope, and a general understanding that which they signify is at hand."

Was haste a bad thing or a good thing if this was what needed addressing?

Well… whatever the brat was planning on, he needed to pick his time well. "Could mean anything from the fact we're traveling now, or the best opportunity is now, approaching quickly, or you only have a limited but fast window of opportunity."

Sonya picked up the last card.

"The downside, or what you need to consider. The Fool… inverted. Negligence, absence, carelessness, apathy. Whatever you plan on, there is a risk of it not being appreciated or cared for."

Shamal's eyebrows about meshed with his hairline. "Wow…"

Fairly obvious advice. A creative kid, needing to be careful of his timing, because there was a risk whatever it was wouldn't be taken care of or appreciated by the recipient. Maybe just Sonya and Renato wouldn't appreciate whatever he was planning, too.

When that seemed all he was willing to give for the moment, the hitman looked over at her instead of the old tarot cards in her hands. "Is this why you keep thinking 'Classical' and 'Inverted' for Hard or Soft?"

"…sort of." The thief was still of the opinion the Polarizations had gotten screwed up somewhere, and that someone really needed to go through it all and sort out which should be which, but also 'Classical' and 'Inverted' sounded a hell of a lot better than 'Hard' and 'Soft'.

They were Flames. Will-fire. Physically affecting they might be, but they had no physical presence themselves. Using hard and soft for an additional descriptor for Flames was a bit weird.

Unless they were counting Mist Flames. Which were as heavy as the user wanted.

Fucking Mists. Always a damn exception to everything.

"Alright. I've a question for your deck." Still suspiciously eyeing the thing in her hands as she absently shuffled them. "How do we do this?"

"…you don't have to tell me what the question is, I can just interpret better if you do. Think of your question, cut the deck however you want, and I'll lay out five cards which should hold some advice."

The man plucked the cards out of her hand, shuffling the oversized deck himself as he thoughtfully studied the likely hand-painted backs. He did hand them back eventually, well after he had mixed up the deck even better than Shamal's messy piles could hope to match. "Alright. Impress me."

Sonya gave him a flat glare for his challenging tone as she laid out five cards. "First card represents the main issues. Five of Cups… a loss, but something remains. Three have been taken, but two are left. Generally favorable in spite of the cost, sometimes taken to mean success in enterprise."

"Second describes current challenges and obstacles," she blinked at the next one strangely, "Six of Cups, inverted. It's… the future and renewal. New relations, new knowledge, new environment. That which will come to pass presently."

"Now that's more like it." He muttered as he slumped back into the upholstered bench. "Next."

Sonya threw her book at him, irked even more when he ducked his head and it bounced off the wall of their compartment. "Behave."

"Yes, mother."

"Third card, underlying and hidden factors you need to be aware of." Eyeing him severely first, if only to be sure he wasn't going to keep on mocking her and that he handed the book back, she only looked down at what was drawn when he gave her a tiny shrug of a shoulder in apology. "The Ace of Pentacles. Contentment, ecstasy, swift thought, and gold. Hmm… it's actually the best card to draw, but why you got this as hidden factors is strange."

"Because it's random, Sonya."

Right. Still…

"Fine. Next is the people, things, or ideas that may help."

…the hell?

"Renato, you did mix these up, right?"

"Of course I did."

"…you got another Pentacle card." After two Cup cards in order. One of which was inverted, how they got back in order if slightly twisted was something to wonder. "The Ten of Pentacles. Gain, riches, family matters, archives, and the abode of family."
He looked about as confused as she felt, at least until he considered her thoughtfully for a long moment. "Last one?"

"How to improve your chances of success. The… Six of Pentacles, inverted. Again?" She pulled the next card, which was the Eight of Pentacles. At least the one after was the Two of Wands, inverted. "Well… this means a check of ambitions like this. But… I pulled this for Shamal earlier in the week, and it was with some of the Major Arcana cards..."

Eight of Pentacles was literally translated to 'a young man in business who has relations with a dark girl/the questioner', and since Sonya drew it… it was referring to the Inverted Sun across from her as he was the answer to her wordless question. An inverted Two of Wands was surprise, wonder, emotion, trouble, and fear.

Seriously… the hell?

The hitman shrugged. "Luck. By statistical probability alone, there is a chance to shuffle any deck and end up with all of them in exact order. Don't worry about it, little lady Sonya."

"…still kind of weird, Mister Renato." Shamal contributed. "Aren't we going to visit a thief's home? Which would be a place of riches, and with mamma likely a library or two for the 'archive'."

"MY library is in a storage locker somewhere else, thank you." She paused and tried to recall if she had shoved another load of books from her room in there or not. Additionally, if there were still a crate of books or something in Lisa's attic. "…mostly."

"And I already think little lady Sonya can help me out with something." Renato drawled out, batting a hand at the kid absently. "I asked her about it nearly a month ago."

"It wasn't that long." The thief in question muttered, shuffling the deck a few more times just to see what the top four would end up being. "And I set a few of my people on it, a Mist and a Lightning. They should have the bare basics to be found locally for us when we get there."

He tipped his fedora to show he heard, kicking out his legs again for another nap. "My thanks, Sonya."

A rather sharp bump on the tracks had her tarot cards sliding off the bench to scatter on the floor. Shamal helped her pick them up again, but Renato merely lifted his shoes to the bench seat across from him so he wouldn't be in their way.

She ended up holding the Hanged Man Card, inverted, when the rest of the deck was picked up and neatly returned to her. Which when upright was a symbol of martyrdom and wisdom in suffering.

As a symbol of the man across from her and even to what she was returning to, wasn't too bad of a representation.

Selfishness, indeed.

(Tuesday the 3rd of June, 1969. Munich, Federal Republic of Germany.)

"Several hours out of our way, into a country we really don't have to visit and isn't great for crossing the Iron Curtain… all to see a Pippi Longstockings film?"
"It's not showing anywhere else." Renato answered the thief he was following a bit defensively. Awkward hadn't been the word to use for the hour and a half the film took to play out. Excruciating, maybe.

Shamal had made up for a bit of it, because the Mist brat was truly that thrilled to be taken to see the movie made of a little Swedish TV shows one of the maids got him hooked on. Sonya's truly baffled expression the entire time had been actually slightly amusing, as a pig-tailed redhead girl who could maybe last a whole second arm-wrestling her got up to inane domestic things on screen.

The whole issue the mother of the friends took with a girl living on her own kind of sat ill with him, given the sheer number of parentless children he knew for a fact ran about every major city and then some. He was once one of those children, Shamal would've been too had he not realized one particular contact usually had a son with him that was conveniently missing from the local police reports.

Hypocrite fictional mothers aside…

"Where are we going?" Shamal asked in some truly horrible accented German from the hitman's side curiously, which the older man had to admit was a good question.

The train station was behind them.

Sonya stopped only long enough for the both of them to get closer to her, reaching out a hand so the brat could hold it. "Well... since we're here... we might as well do the things we'll need done to cross the Iron Curtain. I dislike going through the Germany section, but I still know how to do it."

Renato's metaphorical ears pricked. "We're still a few hours away from the border, aren't we?"

"Which just means the people we're looking for keep to about here in order to avoid any suspicious traffic giving them away." She tilted her head as she studied the road signs, tugging the brat along with her as she picked a direction. "We can't go the usual way most of the travelers go, for one that takes weeks even if I... ah, hasten the paperwork along. So..."

The thief came to a stop at a rather dingy looking bar.

"Hungry, gentlemen?"

No, Renato wasn't going to touch a damn thing in there in order to avoid whatever disease it was festering and the brat filled up on popcorn and lemonade during the movie. Sonya didn't even wait for an answer, setting off... pass the door she had stopped at.

The hitman blinked, shared a faintly confused look with Shamal, and headed off after her. Instead of the actual bar, the Russian had rounded a corner and entered the backdoor into the kitchens. By the time the Italians had caught up, she was already deep in conversation with a matronly cook with a nasty scar on her face that gave her a permanent scowl.

Whatever language it was, it wasn't German or Russian.

She gave them both a backwards glance, before returning to the other woman. The elderly cook didn't dismiss them from mind as easily. "...I'll tell my boy you've got another trip for him, but you're still paying extra, girly."
Switching to German as well, the Russian shrugged. "Obviously. I know for a fact he's more than happy to do so, so stop trying to convince me to pay more for that too."

"Of course he is, getting paid to stick it to those Communist Bastards? He'd do it for free anyways." What seemed to honestly be a smirk ended up looking more like a sneer on her face, with how the scar bisecting her lips pulled at her features. "You can take offense."

"I'd rather not." Sonya replied flatly, handing over their ticket stubs and a fair bit of money. "I expect it all to be waiting for us in Babylon."

Giving a sharp nod, the steel-haired matron of the kitchen glanced to the males with her. "You all eaten yet?"

"A little, but not dinner. Anything good?" The thief planted a hand on her hip. "Preferably what you haven't spat in?"

"There's the onion pie… or you could try the goulash."

"I'd rather keep my taste buds, thank you."

"…you really are your mother's daughter, aren't you?" With an extra expressive roll of her eyes, the older woman gestured to a rickety table in the back of the kitchen. "Seat yourselves, I'll bring it out."

"Her name is Maddalyn, she runs a smuggling ring through her extended family." Sonya informed him helpfully in Italian as she hoisted the brat onto a bench and took a seat herself next to him. "Luggage isn't quite as risky as people, so her son will take our things from the train station to a bit north of where we'll end up."

"How do you know her?" The woman didn't seem like someone the Storm-Cloud would've ever bothered to talk to, especially if she practically lived in her kitchen as it seemed to be the case.

"She's one of my mother's old contacts. Maddie helped me out a lot when I started, until I learned to do things myself." Sonya gave 'Maddie' a nod of thanks for three plates of pie, which honestly looked a lot better than Renato had been afraid of. "But there's only so many times you have yourself smuggled through the Curtain before you figure out how to do it yourself."

"Speak in a civilized tongue or not at all in my kitchen, girly."

"Of course, Maddie." The thief responded in English, earning herself a harsh sounding snort. "I do not have much use for smugglers now, so what little I do need smuggled is pass through her."

"Aren't there quite a few of them around here?" She had made mention of the 'people they were looking for', more smugglers maybe?

"Yes, but I would not trust them with a toothpick. Some of them rob their clients blind the moment they can, usually right after you cross somewhere tricky and only one-way." Sonya polished a fork with the hem of her shirt that she pulled from a pocket to stab her presumably 'onion pie' with. "We have a few hours north to drive, to about near Lindburg. That's where we'll be crossing."

"Are we going to take a walk?"

"Something like that. You will see when we get there." Whatever it was, and she was deliberately not thinking about it either, had her smirking again.

The damnable thief had hit on a way to keep her own secrets. Small ones, but after several years of being able to skim thoughts it was rather novel to him not to know again.

Shamal, after an experimental nibble, went to town on the food. Since both him and the Russian saw nothing wrong with what they were eating, Renato tried it.

…not bad. For a hole-in-the-wall little German pub of questionable sanitary habits.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 3rd of June, 1969 continued. Outskirts of Lindberg, Federal Republic of Germany.)

"…you have to be joking."

"Nope." His expression was so worth the small headache she gave herself in not thinking about it.

Not quite Lindberg, but near the outskirts, there was a nice forested stretch of land. Within the forest there was an old, overgrown barn. Fifteen feet away from its non-existent doors was the burned-out cellar of a long-destroyed house, which had another basement level underneath.

That level was still occupied.

By a very smarmy, oily man that claimed to be the owner of the land.

Sonya didn't buy that for a moment, she had known the guy that had been here before him, but he did have the safest underground tunnel from West Germany to Czechoslovakia carved out of his 'back room'.

Thankfully the man who made the Storm-Cloud's skin crawl was also as greedy as any good thief. Part of her arrangements with Maddie included paying him off the moment she called back to her from the other side, ensuring the man didn't try anything funny.

"Same as usual for me. Three hundred extra for the kid." She informed the man in German, then pointedly glanced to Renato's highly skeptical features. "I wouldn't suggest you try anything with him, frankly."

He was greedy, unscrupulous, and quite possibly a degenerate of the worst sort… but not stupid. Greasy tucked the couple thousand euros she bought him off with into a pocket and sauntered off back to the habitable parts of this underground passageway.

"…Sonya."

"I know. Part of the reason I don't come through here anymore." She suspected he had 'disappeared' the man that originally ran this smuggling route, back when she had been fifteen.

It had been an unpleasant surprise, but thankfully she had been with the Großes Volksfest at the time and had hadn't had to rely on him to get out of the country and back into the Soviet Union.

"But it's the closest one to where you had us get off, no complaining now."

The Mafioso's shoulders twitched as the greasy man barred the doors behind them. "You could have said something, and I would've picked a more northern city. Can we trust him?"

"Of course not. But this was here long before him and will continue to be here long after he's gone."

It was one of the ways the underworld helped smuggle the Jews out of Germany back before World War Two officially broke out. It had been utterly fascinating to find out, because she couldn't remember reading anything about tunnels in any history book she ever picked up.

"Come on, it's about a five-kilometer walk."

"In a tunnel?" Shamal pointedly kicked the wall, dislodging dust and all manner of other things into the air. "How are we going to see where we're going? There's no light."

"You're a Flame user, are you not?" Sonya let her Cloud Flames light up her right-hand fingers and held them out, so they would work as a torch. "I wouldn't suggest you do this anywhere but in underground areas you can secure somehow… but it's a good light if you need it."

The light purple light her Flames gave off made them all seemed washed-out a little, right on up until Renato added bright yellow to the mix and they could see exactly how dingy the walls really were. Shamal's watery Mist Flames actually didn't give off enough light to see by alone, until he made it.

…interesting.

This would exhaust him something fierce and letting him tire himself out would at least ensure he'd sleep… even on a moving train. She'd still be carrying the brat probably more than half way.

"I think… next time, we go a different way." Renato informed her drolly as they started walking.

"There is a very nice Mafia Land maintained contact I had originally planned on us meeting with out in Federal Yugoslavia, who has a very nice scenic sea route past a bribed stretch of a blockade. But you insisted on this detour, Renato."

The hitman snorted at her as he stalked off down the pitch-black tunnel before the woman and child.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 3rd of June, 1969 continued. Šumava, Czech Socialist Republic.)

"Is that it?" Renato inquired skeptically as they reached daylight on the other end of the West Germany–Republic of Czechoslovakia smuggler's tunnel. "This is how people get past the Iron Curtain?"

It actually was closer to evening than just late afternoon, but there was some light still out. A sliver of moon and the last blush of sunset, but it was still more light to see by than they had five seconds ago.

"It changes, depending. But pretty much." Sonya shifted where Shamal was napping on her back, getting him to stop sliding down her shoulder and instead sit firmly between her shoulder blades.

She wanted a cigarette… but didn't have a hand free.

Also… smoking when the brat was so close to her was a kind of bad thing, right?

"The tunnel will be close up for about a month, meaning no one else can go through it until anyone suspicious of how we got across runs out of leads, and then it'll open up again for another group. Close down, open up, so on."

"Is there anything we have to do on this side?"

"Yes. Last thing we need are forgeries that says we passed the border legally, we'll get them… in another kilometer or so." She stepped out of the tunnel, to let the hitman drop the trapdoor over the breach in the ground and kick over some of the soil and loam that hid it from casual inspection.
They really didn't have to, but it was polite.

Scowling at the dirt that was now coating his shiny Italian leather shoes, he gave her a pointed look. "I'm feeling distinctly underwhelmed by all this."

Sonya sighed heavily, hunching a bit against the chilly wind starting to bite into her despite a brat laid out over her back and at least two layers of clothing. "Tell you what. One day, when we don't have the brat with us, I'll take you through one of the more risky routes. There'll probably be a murder or two needed just to endear ourselves to some petty crime lord, someone will double cross us at a bad time, and we'll lose our things at least once if not more to some idiot looking to make a quick mark."

Renato, the murdering asshole, looked delighted by her description as they left the forest clearing behind them. "Sounds like a date, little lady Sonya."

Date?

Was that what he liked to do on a date?

Well… no wonder why the man never kept the same girlfriend for very long. Very few women would consider a night of death-defying criminal activities to be something to relax with.

"…you sometimes miss the point so badly I sometimes wonder if we're even speaking the same language."

"I beg your pardon?" Snapped the thief, incensed. "There is nothing wrong with my understanding of Italian."

Shamal's pointy chin dug into her left shoulder. "Mamma… argue later. M' tired."

"Sorry, kid. Few more minutes of walking to go, then we've only have two more trains." The tired Mist brat made a sound halfway between a groan and a hum of acknowledgement, then apparently decided to doze a bit more and buried a cold nose in her hair… and coincidentally the nape of her neck. "...also, I feel I must point out that your statement wasn't a 'no'."

She wouldn't put it past the brat to be trying to make her shiver just because he was bored, tired, and slightly cranky. A bad combination for any Mist.

Renato actually stopped dead for a second to contemplate the issue. "I've never tried that, if you wanted to know. A tour of some city's seedy underbelly with someone competent and beautiful actually sounds delightful, now that I think about it. I would also like to point out that you didn't deny it was a date."

"A date to be set, yes?" It was an outing with a friend, why he wanted to make a point of it was beyond her. Sonya came to a stop as well, even if they were one damn hill away from the rendezvous spot where they'd actually get a lift away from the scene of their little border crossing crime. "When two people plan on doing something together at a predetermined time. Why are we going over this?"

"You know, I'm starting to half suspect you're doing this deliberately."

"Do what deliberately?"

Recognizing her patience was thinning either by using his mind-reading bullshit or just from simply knowing her that long, the hitman dropped the subject… with a little ill-grace. "One of these days…"
you’re going to look back on this conversation and feel foolish."

"…if it's not today, can we keep going? We're almost there."

There were indeed flickering lights up ahead between tree trunks, and at least she knew Maddie's son was the dependable sort that wouldn't abandon them if they were slightly late reaching him. Damned if she could recall what his name was, though.

Renato sniffed in irritation, glancing to her and the brat. "He's not getting too heavy for you, is he?"

"…Renato, I can bench press a train engine. The brat's not that much of an issue."

There was a very long pause, wherein only the crunch of dead leaves underfoot sounded since they were avoiding the dead branches. "…can you?"

"Thereabouts." Sonya shrugged, which earned her a grumpy Mist complaint as that jarred him out of his warm spot on her back. "I've moved a couple tons before with little issue. For short bursts, admittedly."

He made a tisking sound, softly because they were coming up on something he probably wasn't entirely sure of. "I thought you weren't sure if that was a sustained thing."

"I'm not. But it seems as long as there is force, I can sustain anything. I've also never run out of Cloud Flames before. Only came close once, and I was pretty young then."

"Ho?"

"I was… nine? Or ten. No… it was somewhere around there, I didn't really pay much attention back then. Tats and I, and her gang, robbed a local jewelry store." She visually judged how far away the lights were, and how much time it would take them to cross the distance to them. "Ask me about the Cartier job later."

Renato adjusted his hat, side-eyeing her thoughtfully. "I know a Cartier Jewelry branch... don't tell me you cleaned one out before you even had double digits to your age."

"Okay, I won't tell you then."

"Sonya."

"Renato. We're almost there." Grinning slightly at the brief flash of something torn between exasperation and rueful resignation aimed in her direction, the thief lengthened her stride even if that bounced Shamal slightly.

He had to wake up for a little bit anyways, or he'd never get to sleep tonight.

---

(Wednesday the 4th of June, 1969. Babylon, Czechoslovak Socialist Republic.)

Babylon, a tiny town in the Federation of Czechoslovakia, had about a hundred residents. Officially.

In reality, there was closer to four hundred that would call the place home.

Mainly smugglers, even if there wasn't an actual underworld route through the Iron Curtain for about ten kilometers in either direction. It was actually a staging area, where those that used the place either setup or recollected after ducking the border patrols.

More than half of them were either there illegally or straight out criminals.

Unfortunately, there was only one tiny inn that charged truly exorbitant rates for even one night.

Even knowing the reasoning behind why, which was to discourage anyone not a resident either legally or illegally from lingering too long and messing up their 'cover' as a tiny farming village that had little to nothing to do with the borders, Sonya still shelled out the money and endured the glares.

Shamal was dead asleep the minute he could gracelessly flop onto the bedspread. On top of the blankets, the brat.

Setting both her own and his luggage down next to the door, she sighed and removed his shoes for him.

She had to admit, she was pretty damn tired herself.

It was probably tomorrow already, but they could catch the Trans-Siberian Express and make up some of the time they were losing if they reached Brest in the Byelorussian SSR in time.

However, this wasn't the best place to catch some sleep.

Again, about three hundred criminals of various flavors lived around here. If someone wasn't awake enough to respond to any tricks the natives tried, they'd end up robbed of anything of value in three seconds flat.

"Why do you think I slept all morning?" A jab to her back nudged the thief towards the bed as well when she would've moved away to deal with the kid's footwear, the hitman taking a rickety chair from a corner and setting it where he'd have a decent view of the door. "Get some rest, you're the one we're following."

…but point. Even still, she hesitated a moment. "...you'd have a better sightline from the bed."

Between a rickety, possibly splinter-filled chair and a worn if comfortable looking bed wasn't much of a choice. The hitman eyed her, the bed, the brat, and the door in order while she sat on a corner of the bed herself.

Hiking up her skirt to unlace her boots while Renato deliberated on how comfortable he wanted to be tonight, Sonya only got one boot off before he reached a decision.

"You better keep the brat to your side of the bed."

"Will do." Wasn't much of a hardship, Shamal tended to be a grabby bed-partner.

Stripping off her jacket, wiggling out of her skirt, and toeing off her other boot, she was about as ready for bed as she felt like getting. Mist brat didn't even stir as she swept him under the covers with her.

"...Sonya?

"Hmm?"

The bed dipped under his weight, she supposed he was finished losing what parts of his outfit he didn't want to spend a night in, and there were a few light thumps as he removed his own shoes to that end. "Why is your skirt on the end of the bed?"
"Because I don't feel like sleeping in it."

Sonya shivered as icy air brushed over her bare legs, snapping an eye open to glare at the asshole that had lifted the bedding up. "Renato... unless you want to lose a hand, drop it."

"Very sorry, little lady Sonya." There was still a beat before he released the covers. "...goodnight?"

She snorted at him. "Night... asshole."

(ooo000000)

(Wednesday the 4th of June, 1969. Babylon, Czechoslovak Socialist Republic.)

"Do you think she's awake?"

"...probably not. Go get cleaned up, Shamal. Let your mamma wake up on her own." She had carried the brat for most of the night, Renato wasn't surprised she was still sleeping.

A bit with exactly how she was, but even Clouds got tired if you kept them awake long enough.

The Mist bounced off the bed, causing the still sleeping thief to twitch and tighten her grip on the hitman's shirt reflexively. The older Italian found himself bodily hauled downward a little more, when her arm tried to return under the bedding and pulled him with it.

Renato was just impressed she hadn't broken anything yet. Himself, the brat, or just anything she slept on. As far as he knew anyways.

He was pretty sure the maids would've gossiped about it had she broken some furniture in the Iron Fort at least.

Trying to not pay attention to the half-naked Russian in bed had caused him to miss her initially reaching for him, but he certainly noticed when her hand took up residence on his stomach. Trying to ignore this particular thief burrowing into him for the extra warmth was also highly impossible.

He blamed Shamal. If the brat hadn't woken up earlier needing the bathroom he would've remained between the two of them and fulfilled what seemed to be Sonya's cuddling quota.

Whether or not he should reward the kid for this was another thing.

On one hand... half-naked Russian woman curled up to him. On the other... the probability of startling her and getting punched or beheaded by a sleep-befuddled Storm-Cloud.

She still had her armlet of weaponry around her left bicep.

Thus, why he hadn't removed her hand before it fisted in his shirt and the whole idea of moving it became moot. His finger strength against hers was no contest.

He also wasn't sure how much touching she'd accept when asleep, especially if it didn't come from someone she was used to like the brat.

Renato was sure he'd appreciate this more if he wasn't so fucking tired.

One of these days, he'd get her cornered in a room somewhere and get his preoccupation with her sexuality out of his system. Bed optional, he'd probably be happy to make due with a wall at this point. In spite of her likely habitually learned blind spot when it came to him and sex in the same conversation.
Preferably without the brat.

Shamal's ill-timed interruption last night jarred the Russian's thought process off connecting the idea of an actual romantic date with him and herself together. In the middle of a near-perfect conversation to lead her in that direction as well.

'When two people plan on doing something together at a predetermined time' being all she thought of a 'date', he seriously pitied the idiot that seriously tried to romance the thief when they had been already long regulated to the 'friend zone'.

Oh wait, that idiot was him.

Sonya snapped awake all at once, like someone had thrown a switch, when Shamal's luggage hit the ground as the kid searched for something new to wear. He would admit to holding his breath as the thief sleepily blinked to clear her eyes and she pulled her face away from his side.

She eyed him severely once she realized what was going on. "You're warmer than the brat."

Shamal looked positively insulted as his head popped up from beyond the foot of the bed, his slightly rumpled but clean shirt only half-on. "Hey!"

"Suns. Suns run at higher body temps, brat." With a massive yawn, the thief rolled over to slide out of the bed on the end that wasn't held down by nearly two hundred pounds of Italian hitman. "Tats, my Sun sister, is warmer than me too. It's just… something about them."

"What's your excuse, then?" Renato shot back, hauling himself upright again now that she had released him without so much as an apology for manhandling him. Literally.

"Mmm… 'm a Storm." Almost stuttering out her answer, the completely shameless half-naked woman stretched out first before even glancing at her discarded skirt. Then she eyed her luggage thoughtfully. "Second highest? Erm… don't know about Skies, I think Tyr's never going to let me check his temperature. After Storms is Lightnings, Rains, Clouds, and Mists… I think."

Out of range for his little mind-reading trick or not, Renato could guess what she was thinking probably well enough. There wasn't an en-suite bathroom in the little closet of a room she rented for them, if she wanted to change she'd have to do it in front of the both of them.

Either Shamal was going to get more of an eyeful than he could've gotten before given her habit of sleeping in too-large shirts, or she'd redress in yesterday's clothing.

Since she snatched up the skirt, it appeared as if the brat wasn't going to need an emergency anatomy lesson besides the whole 'big girls have curves and bumps' general knowledge he had to date.

Renato blinked and paused in the act of getting up off the bed himself. One of them had to give the brat 'the talk' still…

…he needed to get some sleep. The kid was not even seven yet.

Admittedly, it seemed as if Shamal slept with his mamma with his head nearly buried in her modest chest. There was probably some major encouragement of hormones going on, but not that much.

Dragging a hand over his face, and firmly pulling his mind out of the gutter when it came to his light-fingered friend, the hitman snatched up his suit jacket and belt. "Are we grabbing something to eat here or later on somewhere else?"
"Later."

"Aww... mamma, I'm hungry."

"Sorry kid." Responed the thief behind him absently. "But I really wouldn't put it past the people here to sell us something poisoned to hasten our leaving. In whatever way it would come about."

"If they're that against outsiders hanging around long," he started, eyeing the creases in his pants irritably as he tied his shoes, "why did they rent us a room?"

"They're criminals, not heartless. It was pretty obvious Shamal couldn't go on much farther." A stomp of something heavy on the floorboards, probably the Russian seating her heel into her boot. "That being the case, we probably have exceeded their generosity already."

"They charged you through the nose for this room." A cupboard of a room, too.

Barely big enough for the bed, the two-shakes-from-firewood-kindling chair was pushing it.

"Again, criminals. Generosity with a price tag." Sonya swept into his line of sight, thankfully dressed, to snatch her oversized purse. Digging into her seemingly bottomless bag, she pulled out the only thing the brat hadn't chomped through yesterday. "Here, have a few of these."

"What are they?" Mist brat was hungry enough to nibble on a dried end of whatever baked good it was tentatively, taking a bigger bite when it apparently agreed with him.

"Rye bread crackers. Biscuits, cookies, whatever. With bits of dried fruit. My mother makes them occasionally, and I made away with a few. They keep really well."

Rye bread cookies?

Renato poked her in the shoulder to get her to hand one over, and indeed it looked as if a small loaf of rye bread had been roughly sliced when fresh to make these. He took a cautious bite, rye wasn't his favorite kind of bread but he also didn't dislike it.

…this was what passed as a Soviet Russia sweet?

A bit like a biscotti, really.

Not bad, the bits of raisins and apricot did cut the bread's strong flavor rather nicely, but it also wasn't what he expected a 'cookie' to ever be. It wasn't crammed with sugar, for one.

No wonder she didn't like Shamal's excessively sugary desserts if this was what she grew up on for 'sweets'.

He tried to swipe the little bag from her, got his fingers slapped for his troubles, and the thief doled out another one for both him and the brat apiece. "You two are not eating all of them. Come on, let's get out of here and feed you both something more filling."

Renato blinked at the little biscuit then at her back as she bent to help Shamal re-pack his suitcase.

He felt strangely insulted he suddenly got put on the same level as the brat after the damn woman spent half the night practically hugging his hip.
"Son of a-" Sonya straightened up upon sighting her foster parents and baby brother waiting for them on the platform at Moscow's Yaroslavskaya railway station, the main service station for the Trans-Siberian Express.

She thought she would at least have time to force the brat through a shower or something before introducing him to her mother.

Renato, who had taken another nap on the sleeper berth in favor over playing yet another card game with a Mist that cheated every moment he thought he could get away with it and a thief that knew quite a few card tricks of her own, nearly rammed his head into their compartment's ceiling as he almost jolted upright while reaching for a gun she knew he had on him. "Shite. Sonya?"

In Russian, since she had barred Italian from being spoken for the rest of their time in the Soviet Union.

"We're… being picked up."

The man slid off the berth quickly, stepping lightly around Shamal's side of the 'go fish' pool to try and see what she had spotted. "Wasn't that the reason you kept calling in? To ensure we were picked up by someone?"

"…I thought they'd send a vor to drive us, Galina said that was the plan the last time I called."

Well… Arseniy was a vor, but not one that usually could be bullied into running a very strongly-opinionated Lightning a small little favor.

"Kid… Lisa's approval will make or break this little visit. I can do everything for you myself… but it will be so much easier if she honestly likes you."

Shamal looked startled at the sudden change of tone, the cards drooping in his hands and about every pair she suspected weren't actually pairs on his side suddenly getting revealed due to him losing his grip on the Constructions obscuring what suit and number they really had.

"Who is Lisa?" Renato demanded shortly, running a hand through his hair to help him wake up a little more and snatching his hat from the peg near the compartment doors.

"…my mother."

"…just your mother? Foster mother, I'm assuming."

Sonya barked out a short laugh, rummaging in her purse for a comb. "Lisa's not 'just' my mother. She, and Arseniy, pretty much run an entire Brigade for my clan. She almost knows everyone and has little strings and favors she can pull for whatever reason comes to mind. My siblings and I were raised as professional thieves in their home, and we never got away with anything under her nose."

Now the hitman was looking slightly blindsided before he slid it all under a professionally pleasant mask, not that she cared much as she was preoccupied with neatening the Mist brat's perpetually disordered brown hair.

"I recognize the big man with the tattoos everyone on the platform is giving a wide berth around as your father, but the kid on his shoulders is…?"
"Valera. Primakov Valerian Arsenevich, my little brother."

"And the brunette lady standing next to him is Lisa?" Renato questioned her absently, then waved back slightly sheepishly as Lisa gave him a pointed smirk and a little politely terrifying wave of her own.

"Yeah. That's her. Primakova Elisaveta Rostislavovna." Tucking away her comb, with naturally kinked waves it was never going to be neat without serious product aid, Sonya caught sight of Shamal's slightly terrified expression and forcibly calmed herself down. "Breath, brat. She's my mother, she's halfway to liking you already just because you're my brat."

Renato waited until the debarking was in progress before giving her a sideways look. "I probably should've asked this before as well... but how do you politely address a Russian?"

"Usually with their last names," Sonya informed him wryly as their passports and papers were being checked and their ticket stubs voided, "like how I gave you Nikishina way back when... actually, to do what you did and address me by my first name without permission is frightfully rude."

"...noted."

"Arseniy should be vor Bazanov if you want to be strictly polite, and obviously Lisa is Primakova. However, since Tats goes by the same name you can also address her as Elisaveta or Elisaveta Primakova without too much issue." Seeing that the brat was also paying her words strict attention, she continued even as they stepped down from the train onto the platform. "While I'll call them Lisa and Arseniy, and Valera, do not until they invite you to."

Renato slid his own paperwork, which was mostly just forgeries, and Shamal's equally fake paperwork into a vest pocket. "Can your little brother invite us to? Or will it be your mother who does so?"

"He can talk. He just... doesn't very often." Then they had no more time for last minute advice, because Lisa wasn't the type to stand by when she wanted something.

The older Russian woman waltzed past the security guards usually stationed to prevent people from getting in the way of those disembarking, Arseniy and Valera on the vor's shoulders in her wake, and swept Sonya up in a firm hug that only lasted a few seconds.

"Daughter. Introductions." Lisa gave her perfectly bland smile, the one she recalled most often from the start of her life under the woman.

Ruthlessly suppressing the wince, as it seemed as if she had done something to annoy her recently, the thief gestured to the hitman first.

"This is Renato Sinclair, a... co-worker and a friend of mine. And this," pulling the Mist brat from out behind her so her foster mother could see him fully, "is Nikishin Shamal Tringali."

The older woman blinked at the kid, and Sonya breathed easier. Apparently, her foster mother hadn't expected the kid to continue using her name even if she knew the Storm-Cloud had offered it.

Shamal slightly stumbled through a Russian greeting, even if she had worked all morning with him on how to pronounce it all correctly.

Obviously recognizing the work of a Mist-imbued language after the work her section of the clan had put into perfecting and exploring that feature of Dying Will Flames, she glanced at her skeptically.
"Wasn't my idea."

"My apologies, but it is standard procedure for trips outside the border where we're from." The hitman chipped in his two cents in a perfectly controlled tone of voice. "It was done before Sonya made mention that it wasn't up here."

Lisa gave him a look of his own but turned back to the visibly nervous brat.

Shamal started cringing under five seconds and fidgeting after ten.
"...is it true you caught mamma every time she was being naughty?"

Sonya face-palmed. Arseniy made a sound that suspiciously held similarities with a laugh. Valera suspiciously eyed the goings-on from his perch on his father's shoulders.

"That's awesome, mamma! You're sneaky, and if your mamma can still catch you..." While his still horribly accented Russian made the inflections sound off, the gist was pretty obvious.

At least her mother now looked visibly amused. "Sneaky, huh? You're going to have to tell me all the times you've seen Nya being sneaky, young mister Nikishin. I'm sure I have a couple stories I could tell you about your mamma."

"Nya?" Renato repeated amusedly in a near-whisper.

She elbowed him in the ribs. He would've heard that nickname before had he bothered to show up in Mafia Land any time in the last couple of months, so he had no right to tease her about it.

Now, how to ensure the kid didn't make any mention of the Great Christmas Blanket Chase of ’68?

Renato coughed, unconvincingly, to hide a snicker. The thief glared a hole into the underside of his jaw.

Lisa hummed her dratted, horribly inquiring noise at the byplay going on.

Fucking perfect. She gave it half an hour before Shamal spilled the entire story under her foster mother's sweetly inquiring expression.

"Ladies," the Italian hitman glanced at the vor and his son, "gentlemen. I believe we might happen to be in the way."

Arseniy glared to the group's left, Lisa and Sonya glared at those on the right.

Everyone else suddenly found that going around was a phenomenally brilliant idea.

"...I now see where she gets that from." Renato muttered, mostly to himself, after a moment.
Chapter 54

(Thursday the 5th of June, 1969 continued. A Zolotov run hotel, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

One rather excruciating, at least from the few cringes she gave the thief thought so, car ride later and they were left in front of the doors of a very well-appointed hotel.

In the middle of several equally as utilitarian as the other buildings set next to it, down several streets that were nearly jarring in how closely they resembled each other. It was something he had noticed on the short drive, which seemed to be repeating itself rather often.

Size, shape, and use may be different… but the facades of the buildings were similar to the one next to it. And the one next to that, so on and so forth.

Just like how the people on the street had clothing that was very similar to each other's, only differing in size, cut, and a few colors.

Even his own apparel would fit in, if a bit finer in quality it still fit in the suite and ties of the business class. The brat's was more subjective, but the Storm-Cloud's usual blouse and skirt combo seemed to be wildly popular. She had the same issue as him, but it seems quality was one of the few acceptable differences allowed.

"We've been invited to dinner." Sonya informed him shortly, handing the last of the luggage and the reclaimed cage of one Luigi the Chameleon to the bellhop.

Shamal's lizard seemed to have survived the trip and a short wait with her parents decently well… for first class shipping. A few days in a crate in pitch darkness didn't even seem to put the thing off it's feed, it was still ridiculously happy to crunch on a few summer bugs that crawled around Moscow in the Mist's hands.

"With your parents." Renato checked as he accepted a copy of what was presumably their hotel room's keys from the concierge that had come out to hand them over, just because.

Elisaveta had pulled her daughter aside for one mainly serious and half-whispered conversation while the younger woman checked them in. He supposed the invitation had been issued then, while Arseniy was giving Shamal a hand with removing his luggage and the lizard cage from the boot.

Dinner with someone's parents was new. An… odd new.

Didn't things like this happen after you started dating someone?

He might've technically shared a bed with her but she had been dead asleep, and he spent the entire night counting the wood grain in a battered door and listening to Shamal snore.

…why was this all so backwards?

The Soviet Storm-Cloud sighed and gave him a nod. "With my parents. It'll go one of two ways, and frankly I have no idea what Lisa is planning."

"But you know enough to guess how it is going to go?" He asked next, following along as she took the Mist brat by the hand not occupied by his pet and tugged him into a rather elaborate plain looking hotel lobby.
Not a whole lot in what would be termed 'pricy' decorations, but a lot of decorations anyways.

"I've seen her work before, so I know the method... just not the point this time." She tossed over a shoulder with a slight bit of disgruntlement in her voice, bypassing the front desk without glancing to acknowledge them greeting her.

Renato could think of a point but didn't say it as they stepped into a lift. Frankly he was starting to suspect she'd miss it entirely by at least a kilometer or so unless someone took it upon themselves to expressly outline it to her.

Probably with a bullet point list and graphs. Flow charts. Maybe even a diagram or two. Definitely a comparison or three and topped off with a thick book of references she could check against.

The bookworm.

He was sure he'd feel a lot different about the whole 'suffering through dinner with Sonya's parents' if he was actually screwing the woman. At the moment, the hitman really did just want to say no.

...however.

It was sort of like how he kept making her behave even if she didn't want to in the face of the Vongola's upper echelon. She played nice and bit her tongue on occasions when all she really wanted was to tell whoever was bothering her to take a hike with varying amounts of violence, because they and her behavior to them meant something to him.

So... dinner. A likely highly awkward dinner, with the parents of the woman he was not dating but wanted to be.

Just... bloody... fantastic.

"I'll make it up to you." Sonya promised her slightly strained tone of voice, tipping their bellboy who had finished unloading their luggage next to what seemed to be their door with probably more money than the teenager saw in a month and waving him off. "Just... please don't piss Arseniy off."

"I beg your pardon?" Renato splayed the fingers of his right hand across his chest. "Are you implying that I would specifically go out of my way to irritate or annoy a lady such as your mother by insulting her man?"

"Did you or did you not reduce a grizzled old vet to tears on the island for... what was it again?" The thief pretended to think for Shamal's amusement, even tapping a finger against her lower lip for a moment. "Oh, right. For 'fouling the air with sheer moronic stupidity incarnate'. Was that before or after you apparently shot his kneecaps out? And what did he do anyways, spill something on you?"

"...a two-hundred-euro bottle of scotch. That's not the point, little lady Sonya."

"Was it any good?"

"Decently, which made it quite irritating when I lost half the bottle to the clumsy ass, but back to topic. Since your lady mother has not irritated me, I see no reason why I should go out of my way to be an ungrateful guest." Besides which, if he sabotaged Shamal's chances to get his mamma's mother to like him, he'd have to be on guard for the brat's Mist-inspired revenge tricks for years.

Sonya tossed him a still skeptical look, shouldering their hotel room door open.
Renato blinked at the interior her actions revealed. "Are we in a penthouse?"

"...sort of. My clan owns the hotel, there's suites of rooms on certain floors you can only rent for any number of days if you have their backing. I usually live here when in Moscow." Shamal ran ahead of her and jumped up on the couch, both hands wrapped around his equally curiously energetic lizard, earning himself an exasperated look of his own. "Brat, go pick a room and unpack your dratted lizard's cage. I do not want to see it crawling around without you somewhere nearby."

"Exactly here? This room in particular?" He continued when the kid ran off to investigate all the rooms and pick one for himself.

More than likely intending to move himself into her own, just to undercut any attempts to convince him he was getting a bit old to be sleeping with her from happening.

"Yes, why?"

It looked actually lived in, not like her austerely decorated and seemingly rarely used room in her clan's condo on Mafia Land. Said couch of Mist jumping had a blanket that looked hand-knitted tossed over the back, a towering stack of books had taken up residence on the coffee table before it and a stack of even more books ended up used as an end table for the freaking lamp and a glass ashtray. That was just what he could see from the front door.

Sonya had so many books she had started using them as furniture. He didn't know why the thought amused the hell out of him, but it did.

"No reason." Of course, it looked as if she didn't remotely believe him. "What are you doing?"

"Looking... for the... bugs." She twisted something out of the receiver of the in-suite phone, crushing it with a small but audible pop between her fingers then tossing the broken bit of metal and plastic onto her book-coated coffee table. "The KGB, or whomever is it, are not particularly inventive with where they put them... until they are. I guess they'd figure eventually I'll get lulled into a false sense of security and miss one or two... or something."

The Italian stalked into the suite finally, eyeing first the phone then curiously around to see if he could spot another before she found it. "You're on someone's watch-list?"

"Everyone in Russia is on some list somewhere. I'd be more surprised if I wasn't." Next one was under the lamp's shade, which made the hitman snort at how predictable that one was.

What next, a couple in the walls hidden by the paintings?

...yeah, there were. How droll.

There were three she stabbed with something pointy and with a red-tip that didn't look like painted metal pulled from her hair.

"I wouldn't really care, if I didn't find it just creepy." Sonya continued, tucking the pin back to wherever it was she pulled it and reseating the picture frame. "So generally, if I have to leave these rooms for any amount of time, I sweep for bugs on a general principle."

Renato eyed the painting of five dogs in a library reading, an interesting take on the more famed version of five dogs playing poker, which probably said more about her sense of humor than he expected to find in a hotel. "So, I should check everywhere then?"

"I've found them in the bathroom before, which is why I think it's so creepy."
"Noted. One last thing… if they're watching you…"

"…don't worry about it. It's mostly just due to my father being… well, Arseniy, and it's known I both lived with him for a time and also visit the same places he does. Besides… Usov and I have a little… side project coming up. I'll deal with it then."

She was planning something with the KGB. Renato almost wanted to ask… but there was the great possibility anything said at the moment would be recorded by her homeland's government.

It wasn't Mafia Land related, he'd be able to follow up on this some other time and get the full story of what she was planning or did about it. Possibly it might even happen before he left, and he would hear the details then.

…again, interesting. Another puzzle piece of what made Sonya herself.

Regular attempts to monitor her words and actions, even in a place that was supposedly secure like a hotel suite in a building her syndicate owned, would make her naturally more inclined to assume her words were being recorded on general principle. Regularly evading or avoiding people tailing her would've had a hand in shaping some of those maneuvers she used against him last Christmas.

Meaning her habit of staring hard at fixtures or random things held the chance it wasn't the thief contemplating stealing something but her wondering how to bug it and how to remove any recording devices if it was.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 5th of June, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I left you alone for fifteen minutes, after we left the hotel. How did you find a flower shop to give Shamal a bunch for Lisa?"

The Italian Mafioso Sinclair drew himself up stiffly, sticking his nose in the air under her daughter's skeptical grey eyes… but flicking glances to the roof for some odd reason. "A gentleman is always prepared, little lady Sonya. If you must know, there is this little thing called asking that helps a small amount when you need to find something fast."

A pet name?

Interesting.

Also interesting was that he didn't deny he got them for the tiny Italian boy to give her.

A spike of yellow agrimony, a couple of thin lacy branches of pale pink peach blossoms, spaced with tiny clusters of white alyssum, and framed by a few green ferns. Thankfulness and gratitude, a compliment of her virtues, surrounded by worth beyond beauty, framed by sincerity.

Lisa was leaning rather towards impressed with Sonya's young hitman friend with the curly sideburns. She could count on one hand and still have fingers left over for males that knew the language of flowers around here.

Then again, it was more a thing done when one wanted to impress a woman and very few actually recalled what more than one or two meant off the top of their heads.

Given the blonde had described said young man as a 'womanizing gentleman' to her before, it was entirely possible he was using those skills in a way they weren't normally.

Lisa wasn't going to assume he knew more, but she also wasn't going to assume he specifically asked a clerk whose job it was to know exactly what certain flowers meant. Any way it happened, she was given a gift of nature with a double-meaning by a little young boy trying really hard to impress her.

Where, how, or who bought it was mostly irrelevant. Just… interesting to know.

"Thank you, they're lovely." She informed the kid peering up at her hopefully, moving back a step to invite the group into her foster daughter's childhood home. "Would you like to help me display them?"

Shamal wrinkled his tiny nose a little, brown eyes glancing skeptically to the small bundle of plant life in her hands as they entered. "...but they're dead. Not even the plastic ones back home that will last weeks and weeks. Why would you display them?"

"They're not quite dead yet. We'll have a few days of them in bloom before they really die. I would like to display them, so I can appreciate them and their scents more before they're gone."

Her smirk might have been mostly for him, but also…

She and Arseniy had gotten Sonya only well after she held an unnaturally learned abhorrence of asking questions. Kind of fitting in a way, the child she picked up would be full of the ones she'd never ask.

Tatiana had been full of questions for this and that for everything under the sun, even Cherep had asked more than a few of his own when he was still uncertain of them. A lover of all things written of her younger foster daughter's quality never quite ran out of inquiries, and yet when she was about his age she had kept her mouth shut and tried to find the answers herself instead of asking the adults raising her.

It was only well into her teens that she started verbalizing her issues to them in order to get help when she exhausted any other option and, slightly awkward as it was answering some things almost a decade late when other children would've asked them, the older woman had just been happy that learned impulse to keep her mouth shut had finally faded.

Of course, sometimes Sonya convinced herself of some things that weren't quite right using faulty information sources. By the time they realized she had slightly off or outright incorrect assumptions about things it was often an uphill battle to try to fix it.

Renato suddenly cut a glance over to said blonde in question, who only arched an eyebrow in response. He flicked a glance back to Lisa and then to her again, which strangely made her daughter a bit annoyed by the narrow glare he got in return. A tiny shrug and a gesture to the entrance way of the house was her only answer.

"...I'll tell you later." Sonya muttered lowly before sweeping past both him and her foster mother, patting Shamal on the head as she likely went to go actually greet her little brother this time.

…again, interesting.

This was the second silent conversation in the same day she had witnessed the two of them have, and she still had no idea what they were communicating. The fact they could at all, when by all reports they had infrequent meetings to catch up in, said very good things about what kind of relationship they shared.
One might have been a 'shut up', 'are you joking', 'I said shut up' kind of conversation… but she really had no idea what this one could be about.

She hadn't held any real concerns, Arseniy had seen them both together once and held none either but being able to get confirmation yourself was always appreciated in their line of work.

"Mafioso Sinclair, would you do me a small favor," best get this part out of the way first, no matter who it was they always had to comment about it, "take the vase in the living room, where Nya went, and bring it to the kitchen for us?"

She gained a slightly confused and semi-scrutinizing look, but the man touched the brim of his hat in acceptance and stalked off down the hall to follow her daughter.

Lisa gave a highly curious Shamal a serene little smile and held a finger of the hand not holding flowers to her lips.

"…Sonya."

"Hmm?"

"…the only vase in here is a Ming Dynasty vase."

"Yes? I assume Lisa wants it?"

"…a. MING. Dynasty. Vase."

"I gave it to her for her birthday."

"Sonya. She's going to display flowers in it."

"That's why I gave her it. What else would one do with a vase?"

There was a very long pause.

"You gave your mother a MING dynasty vase… to display cut flowers in."

"Renato, I just said that."

The young Italian child of her daughter's probably didn't know why the older one was so confused, she doubted he knew or cared much that a vase like the one in question was almost priceless, but he found the humor in hearing the exchange and the man in question's frustrated and confusion laced statements anyways. He had a tiny fist shoved between equally tiny teeth with a slight gap showing where he had lost a baby tooth, biting down hard to muffle his snickers as they listened.

"The only other thing a vase can do is collect dust or hold some kind of liquid, and I don't think it would work right to hold lemonade or juice." Sonya's voice continued in a matter of fact tone, slightly distracted sounding as Valera probably demanded more of her attention. "It's too big for the fridge. Also… it's kind of… ugly. Flowers makes it better."

"I…" A pause. "…you…" Another. "…I give up. Fucking thieves."

"Excuse you, there is a toddler in this room."

"…sorry." After a few floorboards creaked, the hitman came back with a very flat expression carrying the vase in question. He glared down at the child laughing at him, then flicked a very frustrated glance at her.
"No one,"Lisa started in a low tone, gesturing for both males to follow her,"has been able to convince Sonya that the vase in your hands shouldn't be used for flowers. Nearly everyone that has ever seen it has tried and failed."

Nearly, because Tatiana had just found it funny and Arseniy hadn't cared much beyond his favorite gifting his lover with a bit of the fine quality loot she had stolen.

Renato Sinclair had some impressive control over himself. Aggravated and more than a little confused he may be, he still didn't snap at her for setting him up for that conversation. He also didn't snap at the child still snickering as he trotted along into the kitchen with them, however annoying or galling it had to be for him.

"I did that for two reasons. Firstly, everyone has tried it and now that it's out of the way you can hopefully focus on something else." Filling a pitcher with water after checking the color of the soup on the stove, she poured it into the exotic and priceless vase in question as the older Italian held it out for her like the gentleman he apparently was. "Secondly, we do not value the same things most others do. We're thieves, after all. Something's typical price in general means almost nothing to us."

Lisa smiled at Shamal as the kid held up the bouquet for her to take.

"Honestly, I like these better than any old vase. Even if my daughter gave it to me for a birthday."

The child looked thrilled with the success of the token, but it was the older man's reaction that interested her more.

"I didn't require that lesson." The elder of the two informed her blandly, still holding the vase for her as she ensured the fern leaves weren't dipped in water. "I noticed. About two years ago."

"I regret to inform you it's going to be a theme here, as she comes by that quirk honestly."

That was news to him, and he eyed her skeptically.

"You've seen Sonya's apartment, yes? The end-table of books? Bad habit she's had since childhood. But within that stack is a complete seven-volume set of Fyodor Solntsev's Drevnosti Rossiskago Gosudarstva that I honestly think she's forgotten is there. But collectors would pay a pretty ruble to have it, not that she would ever give up a book... and she uses it to support a lamp." Lisa smirked slightly at the both of them, taking the arranged vase from the man to set back in its place. "There is an antique Louis XV couch stolen from the Winter Palace in our clan's headquarters... we use to seat people waiting to see a nurse or one of the Sun medics."

Such as they were, and usually only when Tatiana was visiting.

The hitman twitched once before he followed along with his young charge out of the kitchen.

"If you are lucky enough to follow her to work one of these days, if you get anything to eat at the clan's internal bar it will be served on priceless antique china with real silverware." She continued on pleasantly, maybe a bit ruthlessly but if they reacted like rookies did when here on Sonya's reputation... "The goblets are gold and sometimes have gems impressed into their forms, not that very many actually ask for a glass to go with their liquor. The rugs on the second floor could probably buy a small country, the furniture on that floor or higher probably cost more than you could make in a week, not to mention all the stolen paintings and wall hangings, and... my daughter once robbed the contents of three jewelry stores, in a row, on a whim."

Sonya gave her an odd look from the floor across from Valera, as she had grown more than used to priceless things being used as everyday objects and probably didn't know why she was bringing it all up if it was just a fact of daily life here. "It wasn't on a whim, Lisa. Dmitriy needed those rocks. And it was five."

"My apologies, sweetie. Five jewelry stores, mainly so they could melt, break, and pulverize the remains into pretty gem dust." Lisa set the truly elegant if bulbous vase down on a stand she had gotten after being gifted the item it displayed.

She really did think it looked even better with the flowers, honestly.

Renato opened his mouth, shut it, and then glanced at her daughter. "Sonya, quick question."

"...okay?"

"How much money have you blown through finding those gemstones of yours?"

The younger thief on the floor blinked at him once, before frowning and absently accepting the plush toy thrust on her from her little brother. "Was I supposed to keep track? I don't know, Renato. It's been a couple years and we've gone through several jewelry store contents. Maybe Galina would know..."

Sonya frowned even more at Valera when yet another of his toys was shoved into her already occupied hands.

"Are we really doing this?"

Apparently, the answer was yes because the moment she took the little horse figurine Valera next held up a set of building blocks in pudgy child hands.

Eying the youngest child in the room and the results of his antics, the hitman tilted just enough to see into the toy box her son had dragged into the middle of the room where his big sister was sitting.

Even Shamal looked curious, if uncertain he would be welcome to sit next to the younger woman.

"What is he doing?"

"It's a Cloud thing, I think." Lisa blinked in surprise, shooting her daughter a look she missed because she was already accepting a set of tin soldiers with the plush sitting in her lap and a horse figurine balanced on one knee. "He's giving me first use of items that are important to him, because I'm older and stronger and... well, pack. It's... a show of respect, I guess... if a bit childish."

Since exactly when was her son a user of Dying Will Flames of Cloud?

"He's not active, Lisa. Like Arseniy." Sonya had glanced back up at them, apparently catching the unspoken question on her face. "...of course, I don't really expect him to stay that way."

"We'll discuss this later." Especially why it was happening when Valera was two years of age to the point her admittedly very experienced daughter could identify and attribute certain things to it. "Dinner's almost done, go wake up your father."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 5th of June, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Aside one tricky bit, when she told Renato exactly what made borscht so red and tangy that made him pause for a full second deciding if he was squicked out by that or not, dinner wasn't totally horrible.

Shamal hadn't cared a whit for why the soup was the deep red color it was or what went into it, he liked it anyways. Aside for asking for more sour cream that made her wince slightly, he cleared two bowls by himself.

Sonya supposed she should ask Lisa to teach her to make the stuff, including the beet sour.

Nasty, smelly beetroot-based liquid that it was. Most fermented things reeked to high heaven, she supposed it shouldn't be that surprising.

Arseniy, Valera, and Sonya herself were all the kinds of people that ate with a purpose. They didn't really tend to talk much if they were eating a meal. Lisa was less so and had taught her foster children to be but bad habits persisted, so she could keep up with asking Renato a bit about daily Italian life since the hitman was the type would could both eat and talk. Shamal chipped in a few times, eyeing her foster father speculatively and her foster mother hopefully.

Valera got semi-cautious looks from the Mist, probably because Shamal had likely gotten the idea Sonya was just an odd Cloud and most Classical Clouds wouldn't like him on general principles and he was mainly flatly ignored as inconsequential in return.

She hoped delaying that wouldn't adversely impact how her baby brother viewed her brat, but that was an unknown at this point she really couldn't help.

The youngest thief in the room still actually did wonder how that would go when they were formally introduced to each other. The two of them hadn't had to interact much yet, Valera ended up traveling either on Arseniy's shoulders or in Lisa's arms and rarely left the house without one or both with him.

She kind of wanted Usov to go through what Shamal knew of Mists, Clouds in general, and any misconceptions he had first before trying to introduce her little brother to her brat.

"Nya, basement." Lisa instructed her once she was done eating. "Take your Italians with you."

"...can I?"

"You'd do it anyways, wouldn't you?" Asked the older woman, giving her son a slight smirk in return for the expectant look suddenly pinned on him. "Sorry, Valera. Still too young yet. You can go with your sister downstairs in another year or two, not a day before."

"...maybe." Sonya admitted to her mother, earning herself a snort from Arseniy, before sliding her seat back and crooking a finger at her brat. "But it is easier with your permission."

The older Mafiya woman shot her an amused look, hefting her disgruntled son up into her arms, even as Shamal started to ask where they were going. Renato was just as quick on her heels, although he kept quiet.

"You're the brat of a thief, aren't you? Anyone that knows that will expect you to have a few thieves' skills under your belt." Unlocking the basement door via her own picks instead of locating where her mother put the key, she led the both of them into the training room under the house. "Every morning while you're here, you and I will come down here and I'll teach you a few things."

"So... does this mean Shamal has gained your mother's approval then?" Asked the hitman, already more interested in investigating the wall made up of safe doors she probably was going to be asked to put in a few hours going through again.
"Not yet. This is about as far as I can get him, honestly." Picking up and seating Mist brat down in front of the table used to shine lights into lock mechanisms and hold picks for practice, Sonya dug out the slightly battered practice sets from a nearby chest of drawers. "I've got the head of the Mist trainees to agree to help him develop his Flames more, and I could've taught him some of this myself without needing this room... so anything further will be on his charms alone."

Shamal had wide, shiny eyes locked on the tools she had set in front of him. "You're going to teach me to pick locks, mamma?"

"At the very least this much, yes. If you get good enough quickly, I might even source you your own picks and we'll move on to picking pockets."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 5th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya’s hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Question."

"Hmm?"

Shamal grumbled as the voices of his guardians permeated his brain and drew him out of his wandering thoughts, settling a little more firmly on his mamma's legs when she threaded her fingers into his still wet hair from his shower.

Her other hand was a bit occupied holding up a book to read, and while Mister Renato had picked up one to browse through it apparently wasn't enough to keep his attention.

"Shamal, go to bed."

"I think he's about five seconds from dropping off anyways." Sonya responded absently, shifting her book away to glance downwards to him. "Making him move will just make him more curious and have us eavesdropped on specifically because you sent him away."

Shamal gave her a fuzzy return look, more than warm and sleepy enough to not really care about whatever was going on if it wasn't for his curiosity for what his guardian wanted to discuss without him present.

Yeah, he totally would try to listen in even if sent to bed.

He was stretched out on top of her, the both of them laying down on her couch. She had tugged off the funny thick but knotted up blanket that had normally just lay across the back of the furniture on to keep them both warm as night and the temperature fell.

Her heartbeat made it a little hard to hear what was going on, but he was a Mist.

"Well... if you don't care... what the hell happened in your childhood?"

Blinking as he woke up a little from his cuddle induced daze, Shamal scrunched up his nose and rubbed his face into his mamma's stomach to pretend he wasn't really interested in the conversation his godparents were about to have.

"I thought you satisfied your curiosity about that a while ago." She responded a bit tartly, the book she had been reading being lowered to the point the Mist could feel the hardcover settle on his back through the thick blanket. "What, exactly, do you want to know now?"
"...I apologized for that." Mister Renato answered quietly, a thump sounding which either meant he put the borrowed book down or put up his heels. "Not the part I was asking about."

The book in his mamma's hand ended up fully on his back as she released it, but since Shamal was feigning sleepiness he couldn't turn his head to see what she needed the hand not petting his hair for. "Now what?"

There was a bit of a bite to her tone, which Shamal had a unique position to appreciate with an ear set on her sternum.

Mister Renato remained silent for a long moment, in which the Mist considered faking a stretch to reposition into a better spot to actually see what was going on. He didn't, if only because his guardian would then catch on to him not being too sleepy to follow the conversation and likely send him to the room he was sharing with his mamma.

"What happened... before you ended up with your foster parents?"

Before?

Like... like how Shamal was with his father before he ended up with Mister Renato?

Sonya didn't respond right away, keeping up her absent petting of his hair that was actually doing a good job making him drowsier.

"Little to nothing. I was born in Saratov, and I didn't spend a whole lot of time with my biological parents before... things happened. Then I came here. Which I'm fully aware you know of, so that will not be rehashed out."

"Nothing?" Questioned mister Renato skeptically, in a half-mocking tone. "Then why does your mother consider the fact you refused to ask questions of her as a bad thing?"

"She does?" Her tone was bewildered now, faintly but enough for Shamal to pick up on it. "...I didn't know that."

"Are you still going to insist nothing happened?"

"Nothing did happen. They may not have wanted me and let me know it in various more or less subtle ways, but I wasn't stupid enough to hang around someplace I wasn't wanted." Mamma snapped disgruntledly, the book that had been on the Mist's back getting picked back up. "So, I avoided them as much as I could and didn't really talk to anyone ever until Tats introduced herself to me one night after things finally happened."

There was a very long period of nothing being said, which made Shamal intensely more curious about what was being gestured but equally unwilling to interrupt it just to see.

"...I'm going for a walk."

"Be careful." Was all the thief he was sprawled on top of responded with until a door shut firmly, and she sighed. "Any questions, brat?"

Shamal popped his head up, as pretending to be sleepy anymore wouldn't get him answers. "What was that about, mamma?"

"I'm fairly certain you understood all that." Sonya informed him dryly, tugging a semi-damp hank of hair before returning the bulk of her attention to her book. "And as for what Renato was fishing for,
"your guess would be as good as mine."

Yeah… but… his mamma's original family hadn't wanted her?

The Mist almost couldn't wrap his head around that, because she was… well, mamma. Sneaky and playful and never really minding when he wanted to do silly thing with her just because.

"Bedtime, I think. It's already really late, and don't even try to tell me you're not sleepy." Her book abandoned yet again, Sonya whipped off the weird knotted blanket and Shamal blinked in surprise at how cold the air really was without it. "I really do have to work tomorrow, so we can't sleep in."

"Aww..."

"Yeah, I know. Day after, we'll just be lazy all day. But there is a little something I have to do in the office, so you can meet Usov and Galina in my office while I do… work-things." She continued, and his ears pricked at the very flat tone of voice she used for 'work-things'.

…hmm.

( Friday the 6th of June, 1969. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya didn't normally pay a whole lot of attention to her fellow clansmen.

They were there or not in headquarters, it was obvious she belonged just by the virtue of making it past the reception desk, and more often than not she had very little to do with any of them. The number of times she talked to anyone she didn't have actual business with and remembered it could probably be counted on one hand, so besides knowing they were thieves and very she knew little else about them.

With Shamal with her, she started paying a whole lot more attention to things she never had before. She didn't get three steps before something made her non-existent hackles rise up and put her in a sour mood.

The stares, which started up right after the young Mist got nervous and fist a hand into her pants leg, made her tense and unhappy, then irritated that she was so. Renato had picked up on her disgruntlement, somehow from a decent distance behind her, and decided to act like some kind of overcompensating bodyguard which just made her more on edge.

Not even two hallways into the Zolotov Clan's headquarters, she decided screw everything and just hauled Shamal up to her arms in order to spend less time walking under such attention while he hampered her stride.

Galina's expression was a cross between confused and slightly horrified as Sonya gently placed Shamal on the floor of the office and shot a nasty glare back out to the people still craning around corners to sneak peaks.

"Sonya… that's a child."

"Obviously." The named thief snapped, taking a deep breath and shooting another acidic glare out the office door before the Italian hitman shut it firmly behind himself. "Galina, why are people staring?"
Her Lightning's delicate eyebrows arched up in a decent attempt to merge with her hairline, glancing from the so identified child to her nominal underboss and back. "Because I don't think anyone ever expected you to pick up a child at all, much less bring him in?"

Sonya shot her a disgruntled look.

She merely shrugged, pulling a few pages off the desk which she apparently had to deal with. "Face it, Sonya, you didn't even like being a child yourself. The fact you showed up with one at all is gossip-worthy."

She decided snatching the summary report, which included everything that happened while she had been gone, in favor of actually acknowledging that fact as true was probably the only thing she could do.

"So," continued the Lightning when it became apparent the Storm-Cloud was going to refuse to speak more on the topic, "introductions? I knew they were coming, but I believe you've made it a point to not even breathe their names to date."

"That much, miss ah…?"

"Galina, Sonya's secretary."

Renato tipped his fedora to her in a pleasant acknowledgement. "That much I can do for you, miss Galina. I would be Renato Sinclair, Italian hitman and the brat's nominal guardian. Said brat is Shamal Nikishin, our godchild."

"He's a Sun, Galina. Same Polarization as Gedeon. Speaking of him…" Dropping the list, which really was only a reminder she really didn't need to know given how few points there were on it, Sonya eyed her aide pointedly. "…I need a word with our Pahkan."

"Now?" Galina asked bemusedly, glancing over the abandoned list first then inspecting her face for what else could be up. "Right now?"

"As soon as you can get me a slot." The thief demurred with a probably not very pleasant looking smirk. "For as of right now, I need a word with Usov."

Renato had made some movement in the direction of the couch in the office, likely more out of curiosity of the shelving built into the wall next to them and their occupants than intent to seat himself, but he checked his momentum rather abruptly when upon speaking the name of her head of the Mist trainees said Mist did his usual thing with phasing through her office door.

Usov looked merely amused at the fact he was suddenly staring down a barrel of the Mafioso's gun the very moment he looked up.

"Renato," Sonya called out in a pointedly neutral tone of voice, "meet Usov. The reason why I knew how to help Shamal when you asked me. Usov, this is a very good friend of mine and my godson Shamal."

She hadn't exactly said who the older Mist would be tutoring over the summer to the preteen before, and frankly she was slightly worried Usov would deem Shamal was infringing on whatever insanity his Mist Flames had developed. As she wasn't blind, the kid had an unhealthy fascination with her which she tolerated because it was convenient and to her benefit normally, this meeting could go… sideways, very quickly.

Usov inspected Shamal intently, the younger Mist giving him a mulish look back for a long moment.
Renato shot her a mostly blank look, edged in that expectant confusion she had become regretfully understanding of when he missed something or just wanted her opinion.

Sonya merely sighed heavily. "Usov, I'm afraid I must insist on this one."

The older Mist gave her a speculative look, turning back to the suspicious younger still standing where she placed him. "He is yours, is he not? I can accept that... for now."

Fantastic. Usov had decided to take umbrage with the fact she personally took on the second Mist she ever helped.

"You still have your parents, and my aid if need be."

Looking not a bit mollified at that, the preteen shrugged that off and cocked his head at her brat. "I think Anna will oversee this, Sonya. You do not need to get on my case as you tend to be forced to with the others."

Shamal's expression did not lose a whit of his suspicion, but a more calculating edge appeared at the mention of the second Mist in the Zolotov Clan. He flicked a glance to her, to his godfather looking entirely too blank to take any indication from, and then back to the older Mist.

"You've been stalking my mamma."

Sonya blinked at the Misty twosome.

While she had been aware of that, the fact Shamal could pick up on it in the first meeting? Kind of impressive.

"Of course I have been. As long as it's me, we know no one else has tried." Usov scoffed in disgust, waving a hand to dismiss the kid's observation. "Besides which, sometimes she calls for me and it's only really polite to respond in a timely manner."

A short if eerie stare down later, the younger Mist cracked a very worrying little smirk. "Can you teach me? I'll support your ties when she's with me, as long as I can do the same."

…Shamal wanted to stalk her. Sonya did not like where this was going, and privately resolved to do something about removing Mist Flames from her person.

Either learning a new trick or doing something to regularly remove such things, because some of the time where she got to would be very risky to have any Mist drop in on her unexpectedly.

From the utterly flat look Renato had pinned the older Mist with, he wasn't a fan of that idea either.

Usov, being neither slow on the pickup nor stupid by any measure, only shrugged. "Only if your... 'mamma', agrees to it."

"Hell no." Sonya put in before the kid could even twitch in her or Renato's direction. "Be gone, the both of you. Usov, I want to know if he's been taught anything we know for a fact is wrong. Shamal, behave. They don't have to do this for me."

"A summer camp for Mists?" Renato questioned quietly after Usov had wrapped Shamal in his Mist Flames to whisk the kid to wherever the Mists headed to meet up.

"Something like that." She responded absently, merely nodding to Galina's quiet request to excuse herself from the room. Rounding her borrowed desk, the thief slumped into the desk chair as the hitman finally draped himself over one corner of the office couch. "Sorry about this, but there's one little something I can't actually ignore for a full month or two."

He snorted. "You're teaching Shamal skills for later in his life, arranged for something to also occupy his afternoons, and this trip was mostly for him. Why apologize to me?"

"Because I'm pretty sure just following me around while I deal with politics and stupid people isn't your idea of fun."

"You'd be surprised." Renato countered wickedly with a smirk she didn't even have to look to know he was wearing. "Where is the brat now, anyways?"

"I don't know. So long as I don't, I've never asked Usov about his security arrangements or what measures he's taken to protect his faction of our little group. Shamal should be with about thirty other Mists right now, and with Mists... no news is kind of the best news with them." What little was left out on the desk, because her Lightning had secured most of the important information in the drawers the moment she caught sight of the Italian Mafioso, was merely phone transcripts from calls Galina had decided she needed to know about. "I'll have them introduce themselves to you if you'd like, over the course of a week or so."

"Of course they will, and you will also impress what will happen if they so happen to do anything foolish like 'lose him'... or worse, right?"

Sonya pinned the man with a highly unamused look. That was also her brat, he'd have to beat her out to whichever idiot that was for the right of murdering the morons that tried something like that messily.

Renato cocked a smirk at her, throwing an arm over the back of the couch he was occupying. "So, anything interesting in there?"

"Just so you know... I have thrown hammers at people trying to sneak a look at my paperwork."

"Duly noted, little lady Sonya. I'll contain my curiosity." Then possibly find out via other means just to irritate her with his knowledge, she was sure.

Usov may not be happy with Shamal, but at least she knew the older Mist would be unfailingly correct about how he handled the younger Mist until such time she no longer had him on the kid's case.

With the brat off with other Mists, learning things that would probably just exasperate her to hear about all for the reaction she'd inevitably give when Usov did the reporting, at least he was no longer at risk of overly curious vory and their assorted underlings within the building.

Sonya would count that as a win.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

'Renato Sinclair' was easily convinced to remain behind with Galina as Sonya went to talk to their boss, so the Lightning occupied herself with neatening and sorting the daily intake of information coming into the office.

Frankly, she was pretty certain the man was remaining in place to give a challenging stare at each of... the Shestyorka that were finding inane little excuses to walk in only to gawk at him and cast little glances around to see if they could find the little brunette brat the Storm-Cloud brought in with her.

What Sonya was thinking bringing the man into headquarters was more than Galina could say.

One of his country's vor equivalent or not, he really didn't belong in this den of vory and thieves.

For fuck's sake, Scruffy noticed the man certainly didn't belong the moment he walked into the office for his daily investigation into the information already compiled. The still painfully thin Sun warily eyed the darker one lounging on the couch he normally monopolized when Gedeon decided to not grace them with his presence before turning to her with a lost expression. "Who is he?"

"Sonya's… friend." Galina informed him shortly, still trying to sort through the incredibly tangled mess the last idiot that came into the office gave her.

She was pretty sure half of it wasn't intended for this office but the one next to them, which tended to deal with counter-espionage efforts the clan undertook. Maybe they wanted the Mists to interfere without actually stopping whatever it was?

"…ah." As apparently that didn't answer anything of what Peter wanted to know, the man eyed the other for a moment. "Exactly why are you here?"

"Any particular reason you ask?" Asked Renato almost pleasantly… if it wasn't for that edge of mocking amusement in his tone.

"I wouldn't risk it. Or her temper." She informed him tartly before anything could be said.

Scruffy's shoulders fell slightly. Given that the constant interruptions to his research had to be annoying he was doing fantastically well with the disruptions that kept popping up. Stuffing his hands into the pockets of his threadbare slacks, the gaunt Sun shot a look first to the infringing one then to her. "Anything else you might need me for then?"

"Not today." Galina answered him slightly apologetically. "Did you need anything?"

"I did wanted to speak with Bazanova today, if possible."

"She's in, if not here right now. Take a seat."

Creepily, the hitman sitting on the couch merely looked even more amused as Scruffy hesitantly skirted around him to take a seat on the other end of the couch.

Galina eyed him severely. He should not be that amused to be waiting in an office located with vor territory, no matter his connection to a nominally important link in the office.

What the hell was the man sitting on that gave him that kind of composure?

"Heh, you need a better poker face." Renato drawled out, wearing an absolutely infuriating smirk. "Worried what I'm up to, are we?"

"Of course I am." She snapped back, roughly returning her attention to her work and attempting to ignore him. "I don't know you, nor am I inclined to think well of you. Right now, you're a threat and I intend to keep treating you like one."

"…he's just sitting there." Scruffy pointed out quietly, utterly unsurprised when they both ignored him.
"You need to work on your intimidation as well." Lazily observed the Italian next, pulling the brim of his hat lower to shade his dark eyes. "I'm still more amused than concerned, kitten."

Changing tactics, and taking a leaf out of her boss's book, the Lightning tossed her head to get the bangs falling out of her bun to resettet out of her vision and refocused on her work. "I don't really care, you're not that important in the long run anyways."

"Ho? Confident in that, are you?"

"I'm the one sorting through her work."

"I'm the one she's given parts to." Renato countered smugly.

Galina paused, jerking her head up to pin the asshole with a glare.

If her prickly and normally non-helpful leader actually gave something away to someone outside the clan, after damn near throwing a bitch fit for Gedeon doing it on a larger scale…?

Fuck. The asshole was here to stay, wasn't he?

"Of course," Renato all but purred as he got to his shiny leather clad feet, "I wouldn't say no to learning a bit more about little lady Sonya or the things she's up to. Only the foolish or the dead stop learning."

Weirdly disgruntled with the man's attitude and composure, on top of being infuriated and more than a little bit scared for some reason she couldn't pin down, Galina set her teeth and flatly ignored him.

"Renato, stop riling up my Lightning." Sonya flatly ordered from the doorway. "I thought you were a gentleman."

"She wanted something to snap at." With a complete about-face in tone, the Italian returned to looking entirely too self-confident and a touch bored and waved a hand as if to dismiss the whole subject. "I was merely giving her an outlet. That it just so happens to include a bit of baiting is merely par for the course."

"And then playing mind-games with her. I heard. Stop messing with my assistant." Insisted the thief dismissively, turning to said Lightning. "Anything important?"

"Just… one thing." The Wolf Pack gang had finally gotten back to them about possible places Sonya could meet up with their Cloud safely, or as safe as two Clouds could be meeting each other for the first time. Having seen what happened when such a thing occurred once, Galina did not wish to be there again so she just merely handed the note that information was on to her. "And Scruffy wished to speak with you."

"I can wait, if this is… err…" The Sun in question glanced from the tiny blonde to the Italian hitman now fetched up against a wall idly watching the conversation happening. "…if you're busy."

The silent implication that the two of them had something going on made Galina pause. She dearly hoped Sonya wasn't doing something of a personal nature with the foreign hitman, because for one the man was completely infuriating and for another that would mean she had to get used to him.

Dark eyes flicked to her, and the utter asshole smirked.

"Scruffy, spit it out."
"Wait, Scruffy?" Repeated the hitman incredulously, slanting a sideways look at the so named Sun. "You're the one called Scruffy?"

Admittedly, for someone that didn't know how and in what condition the man came into the Storm-Cloud's clutches as, it was an odd nickname.

Peter had religiously kept himself clean-shaven and his curly if slightly silvered sandy blond hair neatly groomed ever since Galina met him. Almost fanatically keeping himself well put together as best he could with limited options open to him.

Although from what she heard from Tatiana about what he had looked like only just after getting rescued from Sierra Leone… the nickname fitted him at one time.

"…um… yes?"

Renato eyed him skeptically, then sat back against the wall firmly. "Well… never mind that apparently."

"Never mind what?"

"Never you mind, little lady Sonya."

Galina paused for one flabbergasted moment, but it seemed as if her underboss was more than used to being brushed off by this man. All she did was roll her eyes, and flatly ignore the infuriating asshole in favor of the other Sun in the office.

Scruffy pulled a very reluctant little face of disgust. "The people you set me up with for room and board are demanding more money for rent. Mostly for, ah… insurance against government raids of their building."

"…I'll deal with that later tonight." The thief informed him, looking faintly puzzled. "But firstly… where did I set you?"

"Wait… did you get approval?" Galina blurted out, before catching herself from saying anything more and giving Renato a suspicious look. "For… um, that one issue?"

"I am currently the head of this department, as much of a joke as it seems to be to have a woman my age standing here. Obviously, I know what I'm doing even if the side results aren't what were implied to be the effect I am looking for." Sonya informed her dryly, with more of an edge in her tone than was probably wise in front of an outsider. "What I say goes, so long as I get results. And I do plan on getting results."

Milos was going to allow her to beat the ever-loving shit out of Gedeon?

The Lightning hadn't expected that, for as much as vory tended to be sink or swim teachers and learners that tendency didn't normally lend itself to brutal hands-on lessons unless someone royally screwed up.

It kind of made her wonder what happened in that short meeting to produce such results.

"Speaking of," now the Storm-Cloud turned to the Italian looking highly curious over the topic being discussed, "you're going to have to excuse me for a few hours every day. I don't expect it to take longer than an hour or two, so say a bit after lunch when I drop Shamal off with the Mists? They'll bring him back around supper, Usov does stalk me so the brat will probably be dropped off exactly where we end up."
Renato seemed to ponder the suggestion a moment, seemingly shrugging the whole issue off if it wasn't for that keen edge of curiosity in his contemplation of the woman making it. "Fair enough. Do you intend to follow me around then?"

"More or less, I want to see how you operate. It's been something I've wanted for a while now, but we don't tend to operate in the same areas at the same time." Turning back to the Lightning, Sonya gave her a very polite little vicious smirk. "Galina, would you kindly go fetch the idiot in question? I've had to agree to do it all in nonpublic settings... but... well... social pressure may actually give the lout the kick to the rear he's been needing since he became attached to this office."

"...sure."

With a sharp nod, she turned to the two Suns in turn. "...Scruffy, I do need your address but then I also need you to clear out for a few. Go with Galina and deal with that, please?"

"And me?" Renato asked almost silkily.

"...technically, you're not public to this clan." The thief offered delicately, but when her eyes slid back to the man they were solidly purple and not her usual grey. "But I'm afraid I'm going to have to insist you wait for me on a lower level, Renato. Normally I wouldn't care, but this is a slightly delicate internal matter."

Galina very quickly removed herself from that room without waiting to hear the man's reply.

Baby, bratty users of Dying Will Flames were pretty good at being self-control deficient. Thankfully they all came with built in warning lights for when things were getting a bit much on what was left of their rational mindsets after popping with Flames and starting puberty. The less trained users could end up causing all sorts of property damage and injuries on accident much less when they turned their attentions to doing it on purpose.

What happens when her normally very self-contained Storm-Cloud boss decided to be less self-possessed and more like her main Flame type was something she didn't want to know.

Ziven had enough horror stories of his little Cloud duckling going berserk on him. Sonya doing the same might be less terrifying to witness, but also could end up being more.

She had seen two Clouds go at each other once before, and the slightly younger blonde had been restrained through that. Being that close to a Cloud getting into violence was as far as she wanted to go.

Scruffy scurried out of the office after her in short order, scribbling down something in a horribly cramped writing using the surface of his palm as a writing surface. "...I'm going to go... sit in a park for a few hours."

"Lucky you." The Lightning huffed, taking the baffling mix of Cyrillic and English words that would hopefully be enough for Sonya to find what she had to look for later on.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The chandelier overhead was swinging.

Renato kind of wished Sonya had let him stay around, or even on the same floor, as whatever it was she had specifically come into this building to do today.

He eyed the swaying light fixture absently, without sure knowledge of what the building was built of and exactly what else was in here he couldn't say with confidence that a very irked Cloud was responsible…

…but it really was very likely.

There were the usual heavily reinforced signs that would prevent sniper shots through windows or easy eavesdropping without getting further into the building than the 'public' floor, and the force needed to create tremors in such a reinforced building was considerable.

Sonya's Lightning had disappeared from his sights the moment she could once he hit the ground floor, heading further down into the building's depths determinedly after noticing him. While curious over the bar supposedly down there, and to see if Sonya's mother's claims about it were true or not, the hitman had refrained from following her.

It seemed as if it was true from what little he had managed to see so far. Renato wasn't entirely a snob about his environment, although he did prefer the finer things if possible, but these thieves had proved a bit more eclectic than him.

Point in fact, the chandelier he was eyeing was made of what he would bet his hat was gold and at least crystal if not actual gemstones. Allowed to be tarnished through age and neglect to dull the shimmer of genuine wealth to aid in hiding it in plain sight, but still installed in the most public part of this syndicate's stronghold.

It wouldn't seem to be a wise idea at first glance, keeping around things that could incriminate yourself, but Renato supposed that if there wasn't a buyer for something obviously stolen or someone tried something foolish like backing out of a deal or trying to double-cross their hired thieves… very little else could be done with such high value items than displaying them as some kind of trophy.

He did wonder how long that had been there, if it was placed here and not say within one of the other unused rooms filled with extra if random assortments of items like the one across from Sonya's office. The one with the not-quite-professionally patched hole in the wall.

There was a story there he kind of did want to know if the thief was involved with. It was very conveniently directly opposite of her doorway, and he was sure the woman had admitted to a temper-control issue when apologizing to Shamal a few months back.

"Renato, forgive the delay." Sonya spoke up unexpectedly, making the hitman twitch, as she slid up next to him quietly. "We can go now."

Renato eyed her severely, then the staircase he was facing that both her people also used and the greater bulk of the traffic he had seen so far. She hadn't come down using it, so that had to mean there was more than just that way to navigate the building's floors. Par for the course in criminal holdings, but... why did she deem that necessary when she was normally very careful in how she approached him to prevent a repeat of the first time she asked a favor of him?

"Where to then, little lady Sonya?"

"...around, I guess. For now." Shrugging, the thief flicked a glance upwards to the same chandelier that had occupied most of his attention until she returned. "I should avoid being here for a bit of time, so you can check the lay of the lands and decide for yourself if this is safe enough for the brat to be here without you."
Turning on his heel, the hitman stalked his way out of her syndicate's headquarters. As interesting as it might be to investigate the place fully, with her help getting past some of the blocks put in place to prevent such a thing from happening, he wasn't interested in earning the ire of Sonya's clan.

He was a lot more interested in the syndicates around that wouldn't be neutral to him at best. "Think you can keep up?"

"Do you really think you can outrun me?" Countered the Storm-Cloud with audible amusement.

Renato huffed a wry laugh. "I wonder what your mother would say if I told her about the 'Blanket Chase of sixty-eight'?

"…low blow."
"How well do you know these streets?"

"Fairly. I did... once, used to patrol around here a few years ago." Sonya informed him easily, actually near lazily for someone like her, as they walked down the pointedly geometrically different streets bleeding into each other as far as color went.

Not too bad temperature wise, but then again Russian summers probably wouldn't be able to match the heat or intensity of Italia summers. Renato found it balmy rather than harsh, which apparently was not the reaction the locals were going to go with by how they were dressed.

Most of the time the scenery was a nightmare of publicly regimented sameness, but occasionally... it was obvious the residents didn't care a damn what they should look like. The hitman found the brief spats of disharmony rather interesting, in an absent way.

Easier to mark out who the conformists were and who were shamelessly criminally inclined aside, the small pockets of nearly hidden color proved to be a relief from the eyesore of beige public buildings and grey concrete office complexes. He was really just getting the lay of the land right now, same as he did last night marking out the streets around the little thief's hotel and what usually went bump in the night around here.

Sonya seemed entirely too willing to merely follow him around, if that was due to her expressed interest in how he 'operated' or due to a post-violence catharsis was debatable. She seemed more peaceful than earlier this morning, as odd as it seemed to call a Cloud that at all. Might be because she was used to these streets, or just because she was 'patrolling'.

They were currently locked in a near city block of urban hell, for the last few streets nearly nothing stood out with the small marks the hitman had come to believe the Russian Mafia left behind where they worked. As equally unwilling to miss anything out of disgust as he was uninclined to study something he had seen now a hundred times before and would again while here, he gave his erstwhile companion the majority of his attention instead of contemplating what kind of building codes Moscow had in place.

"Used to?"

"This isn't my territory. It's Arseniy's." Shrugging the difference off absently, the woman merely glanced to the side where he nearly overlooked a set of eyes inspecting them suspiciously.

Per usual, frankly, since he didn't look Slavic or behaved with the ticks that separated long-term residents of the region from tourists and yet was waltzing about in broad daylight. The both of them moved past the alleyway quickly enough, but not before he caught the more suspicious look thrown to him than to the thief.

Likely another Zolotov, then.

They weren't out in force, but there were enough little hints of being followed they both caught on a while ago to pointedly suggest behaving in the best possible manner was required. In another time, he might be tempted to just shoot the idiots or have a little… fun, but this was her syndicate so behave it was.

"I did once used to patrol for him occasionally, but now he has his heir and he takes care of the patrolling with him instead. Usually before naptime." Sonya continued, as if that wasn't an interesting tidbit and actual insight into the very violence prone Flame type that rarely bothered to explain themselves ever. "Cherep and I used to actually, but I think he was merely following me. He was a lot more… random, before we ended up in the same household. Keeping up with him before we became friends was challenging for a bit, but then he decided he liked me."

Before their Flames entwined enough to be counted as two halves of a whole, in other words.

Sonya had possibly been even more Classical in her Cloud nature, which was then possibly tempered by her brother.

Did said brother end up more centered in a way, then?

Or more violent?

Interesting. He really wouldn't have liked Cherep before Sonya's inclusion in his life, much less now when the man's irrelevance and almost innocent outlook set his teeth on edge.

Renato eyed the next intersection exasperatedly, they had left the interesting pockets of color far behind and were now heavily into what seemed to be the very civilian sector of Sonya's syndicate's territory. Either way he picked there would be more of the carefully cultivated urban hell, but one direction probably had even more if they were getting into a more governmental side of the 'oblast'.

A soft tug to his suit jacket sleeve had him looking at the thief, who tilted her head to indicate the right-hand road as she released the fabric she had taken a careful grip on. "This way. The other way has a Rain bar, and while I'm sure that would be interesting I am required to protect those kids from outside influences until they can reliably defend themselves. Which I am sure will be no time soon, unfortunately."

Ho?

Apparently being wrong in his assumption was marginally exciting. Depressing, but exciting.

The hitman noted which street intersection it was and crossed it out for further investigations regardless of how interesting a 'Rain bar' did sound.

'Kids', she had said. Meaning her business with the 'Flame Training office' they had just left expressly, not just a syndicate secret. As getting in the way of baby Rains practicing Tranquility was not generally a good idea if one wished to remain coherent for the day, it was an easy lost.

Cute of them though. Very clever way to hide themselves.

Scowling at his own errant thoughts, Renato turned to her sharply. "You've infected my thought processes."

Since when did he use the word 'cute'?

Sonya shrugged again, the blasé irritant. "You've infected mine, turnabout is fair play. I never used the word 'ho' to inquire for more information before a few weeks ago."

…point. At least it was a two-way street.
Glancing around at their surroundings, which was… surprise, more beige and grey buildings with signs being the few differences apparent, the hitman nearly slouched as he concluded merely a surface look around wouldn't help him more than any plain map would. Although child's play to get, marking it out with any Mafia related landmarks wasn't a good idea if it happened to be 'misplaced'… however that came to be.

While interesting to catch sight of the non-same fractions of Moscow himself, he wasn't making nearly enough progress alone. That wasn't to say Renato was done exploring, just that he was a little tired of beige, grey, and the occasional swath of green in tiny groomed plots of lawn and bushes for the day.

"Sonya."

"Mmm?"

"Where would you go for a quiet word around here?"

The thief glanced up at him, then turned to scan their incredibly drab surroundings with faint curiosity. "I don't think that's fair, I want to see if you'd spot it yourself."

He drew himself up and stuck his nose in the air, playfully because if she wanted to get stubborn about her desire to 'see how he operated' he wouldn't get anything done in a timely manner this week. "I have contacts for local things not readily apparent where I go, little lady Sonya. Of which, you certainly are one."

She gave him a look, not even having the decency to pause in her stride as they continued wandering down a sidewalk.

"I've seen the surface, surprise me with how far this rabbit hole goes."

The smirk was tiny, but very wicked. "…how much do you trust me?"

Interesting question.

As a hitman, only as far as he could throw her. Which was probably some distance truthfully, she was a dainty little lady physically. Had they not known each other as long as they had, probably not even a fraction of that amount.

As her friend for something near a decade?

That was another matter entirely.

Renato offered a hand with a slightly mocking flourish. "Surprise me."

A young woman like Sonya really should not be surprised to be offered a hand to take hold of, nor should her first reaction be to back up a step from him. It was polite, and what the hell were the men approaching this woman doing wrong if she was scared of being offered a hold on him?

He wasn't blind, not nearly as much as it seemed she was. There were admiring looks she flatly ignored, double entendres spoken in her direction she would merely blink at, and he had recently permanently removed a too forward pest trying a more forceful method of turning the thief's head. Sonya, upon being flirted with, was more bemused if she recognized it and merely irritable at the confusing interactions if not.

As long as it didn't come from him, or Shamal, anyways. He could comfort himself that he was at least special in earning that reaction if it didn't sound so damn pathetic.

While she never responded when she recognized it beyond some bemusement, the fact she sometimes genuinely couldn't tell when another was flirting with her was galling to him.

Renato flirted a lot, but half the time it was only to show his appreciation for the beautiful women around sparring his eyesight with something pleasant and occasionally to compliment a lady for being ruthlessly competent. That it made them happy to be admired was a nice bonus, and really if they put all that work into looking good they deserved even just a little something for the effort.

While he could understand some hesitant when contemplating the idea of 'flirting with a Cloud', he had the same qualms recently debating what to do with his attraction to her, it was not nearly enough to understand why even civilians refrained from flirting with her. Her tattoos might put off some in her native land, but she traveled for work just like him.

Tucking that spike of irritation away neatly, it wasn't her fault she seemed to have few facts when it came to dealing with other people from all blatantly obvious clues he had gathered so far, he merely wiggled his fingers invitingly and waited with patience he didn't feel but forced anyways for her to make up her mind about the offer.

Since she tensed up when he touched her regardless of where, waist or upper back or her hands, another step back was getting her used to touching him. He'd figure out why she was so against being touched eventually, but for now all he could do was help with the symptoms that made her avoid physical touch and stiffen up even when she knew the individuals touching her for something as innocent as a dance held no intent to harm her.

Frustratingly, the damn thief finally opted to take hold of his sleeve instead of his hand. In that same careful, loose hold she had used to gain his attention when he wasn't looking at her.

While it wouldn't crease his suit jacket and he did appreciate the silent acknowledgement that she would care for his appearance since he did so, it also wasn't what he was after.

"This way." Sonya decided on after a moment of careful inspection of her hold, a tiny tug with no force behind it leading him back down to the alleyway they had been spied from.

Progress, she didn't let go the moment she had him headed in the right direction and seemed satisfied she hadn't ruined his jacket accidentally. It might not be what he was after, but the fact she was holding on was something.

"Do I get to know where we're going?" Renato drawled out idly, musing more on the complications this upset might have.

Two weeks was certainly enough time to figure out if they could even coexist well at all, or at least rule it out if not, but her disinclination to being touched prevented a few things he might have tried to investigate if she actually held any attraction to him.

Thankfully, neither of them were the type of people that would or could do a 'house in the suburbs with two kids and a dog' thing peacefully. At least that wasn't a worry he had to contemplate even if things got serious on him.

He'd probably continue on being a hitman until some greenhorn scut managed to get lucky and she certainly seemed to be the type to go on stealing, even if only for the books she could get, until she finally overreached herself one time too many.

Their different jobs and their likely bitter, inevitable conclusions aside, having spent at most a few days together spread out over the course of her visits to Shamal in the Iron Fort were not the kind of things you could make many assumptions about. They got along well in short visits interspersed with long lengths of time apart, and his forays into more casual settings with her ended well so far. If that could translate over to close quarters was what Renato wanted to know.

So far it seemed alright. A bit eye opening in how annoying his expectations for her behavior remaining pleasant in Vongola territory might be, but fine.

Sonya hadn’t immediately responded to his question, so when she glanced back mischievously once they reached the spot their inept tail had been spotted down the hitman was taken aback for a moment. "You said you wanted to go down the rabbit hole, Renato. I'm merely providing what you asked for."

Playful Sonya was still a new thing to him. Shamal got it more than he did, she was usually just witty or dryly sarcastic with him.

Definitely something he looked forward to more of, though.

The thief let him go and bent to lift an unsecured grate out of the alleyway's paved ground, gesturing down with a nod. "Down you go. Try not to land too heavily, Alice."

Renato gifted her with a dry look, holding his fedora in place as he lightly dropped down at her bidding.

The hole went a lot farther than he had expected, and he did land rather heavily due to not properly looking where he leapt. Eyeing the surprisingly dry and well maintained if dim tunnel he was now in, and the shifting light overhead that was Sonya likely maneuvering to replace the grate after she dropped down, he backed up against a wall to allow the thief room to follow him.

Contrary to his expectation, there wasn’t much clanging of metal that preceded her decent.

She landed on the balls of her feet, carefully also dropping into a near-crouch to take the impact on her knees instead of her ankles. Dusting her hands off and rolling back up to her feet, the thief slid a sly glance to him. "Welcome to Wonderland."

"Ha ha." Not really that upset at the little trick she pulled on him by not thinking about the longer than sewer level drop before sending him down, Renato gestured to the bricked walls. "Where are we really?"

"Way back in the day, before the days of snow plows or even central heating, the nobles of port cities needed a way to move food and goods along for their parties and balls in the dead of winter without the risk of thieves or the desperate usurping them for their own use. These tunnels are kind of common in larger, older port cities." Gesturing to the only exit from the node they had dropped in by, Sonya let him take the lead and merely returned to following him as she told the story. "Thus, underground tunnels connecting a few of the palaces and important landmarks to certain exits near certain docks far underneath any basement level would go were dug out and carefully controlled for generations. Not too long ago, before the first Great War but after the end of the Tsars, some enterprising young vor carefully collapsed the known entranceways and a few segments of the lesser known ones here and destroyed all the maps he could track down."

She paused, checking to be sure they were still alone as they rounded a corner into a more main-tunnel looking segment, before continuing.

"This is what is now commonly called the 'Jewel Run', it's a section of tunnels the Zolotovs control for those that need to get off the streets quickly near the dockside. They're not connected to anything but a few exits you don't have to climb out of, to prevent anyone really stumbling on something we don't want them to or shutting down these tunnels if they find them, but one of the exits is somewhere that will match what you requested."

"Ho?"

"A bar, of course." Sonya quirked a small smirk at his mildly inquiring look. "This is Russia. Worse, you're dealing with Russia's Mafiya. Most of our business is taken care of in gentleman's clubs or bars if we need a neutral place."

Even more interesting. "How well does that work out for you?"

She rolled her eyes. "The one time I had to, things were rearranged so the meeting would take place in a hotel's conference room instead. Honestly, I think Galina did it for her own comfort as I wouldn't have minded the strip club originally agreed upon."

Renato was almost gleeful at that admittance. Really, the woman used polearms as her weapons of choice and it really should not be that much of a stretch to remove the 'arms' from that… and with her grace?

Obviously, she had either martial arts training or dancing lessons at some point in her life.

Stripper Sonya. He'd do more than pay to see that.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of June, 1969 continued. A bar, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Mirror Lady Anna was the one to return Shamal to them, looking… distinctly amused as she did so. Another of her too-young Flame users, she was barely two years older than the Mist lead… who was twelve.

Anna at least had the maturity a probably traumatizing childhood accident caused, which made her very wickedly minded when it came to Constructing horrors to emerge from her mirrors, that it was likely people who didn't know differently would assume she was on the short side of fifteen or sixteen.

She barely waited for Sonya to introduce Renato to her, and only long enough for Shamal to thank her for enabling his return, before she sank backwards into a plate glass window in a flurry of indigo Flames and fading away from view.

Shamal gave Renato a pointedly excited look. "She's going to teach me how to do that."

"There's a reason we call her 'the Mirror Lady'." Confided the thief into the ringing silence the Mist duo's unusual arrival and the teenage girl's abrupt leave taking had caused in the very criminal friendly dockside bar. "If she could get away with it, I'm fairly sure that Anna would've been perfectly happy to dwell within a mirror instead of actually live like any other human. Great spy, though. Unfortunately, we have little to give her so far."

"Curious." Renato mused, plucking up his whisky on the rocks up and away from curious bratty Mist hands once the kid hauled himself up on the barstool left open between them. "You need more stealth before I'll let you have a taste, Shamal."
"Are we going to encourage that?"

The hitman shrugged lazily at the question. "He's going to experiment anyways. Would it be better if he did it with us or against us? It's stupidly easy to get ahold of alcohol or drugs if you put some effort into it. Especially with those like us."

"How does telling him to get sneakier about his curiosity in your whisky factor in?" Sonya asked dryly, not even twitching when the brat immediately dismissed his godfather's drink in favor of eyeing hers speculatively.

It had cream, it was sort of healthy. Kind of. Maybe not for a six-year-old… but the point stood. It had calcium in it.

…yeah, no. A glass of wine, maybe.

A glass of hard liquor?

Hell no.

"The minute he can out sneak the both of us, he'll be more than old enough to tolerate it." After snorting at the brat's pout when the thief removed her White Russian from easy Mist-grabbing range, the older Italian looked at her more seriously. "Do you want to remain here or go somewhere else now that we have the brat back?"

'Here' would be in a bar filled by more criminal types than either could shake a stick at, who were either all shameless or just blatant in their perusal of both the Sun and Storm-Cloud that just had a delivery of a Mist brat in their midst. It really wasn't the best place to be if she didn't want to be overheard, but as she figured at least a Mist or two were probably eavesdropping on her for Usov anyways…

"Give it a minute. We can't be that interesting." Sonya decided, hooking an ashtray over from the far corner of the bar and lighting up a cigarette. "What did you do today, Shamal?"

"Usov mostly just introduced me around and asked what I knew… and shook his head over a few things." Named bratty Mist informed her willingly enough, sulking slightly as she gestured for the bartender's attention. "But… can you tell me why he laughed when I told him I was minded by other Mists when I was younger?"

"Mists don't make very good Mist wranglers." She had wondered why Shamal had been tailed around by that one Mist woman, whatever the fuck her name had been. There might have been something she didn't know about her, so there was the benefit of the doubt she was better with other young Mists. As much as that thought felt grudging. "Storms actually make better Mist wranglers… Disintegration verses Construction, and with an older Storm paired with a younger Mist?"

From the expression that crossed the Mafioso's face, either he swallowed the last of his whisky wrong or was intensely disliked something about what she said.

"Renato?"

"Why… did you not say something?"

"It's Vongola." Actually… why hadn't she said something to him about it before?

That was odd, she had intended to do so… right?
Sonya rubbed her forehead irritably. She needed a goddamned list, or a minder, to remember everything she wanted to do these days.

"Shouldn't they have known more about this shit? For fuck's sake, the Flame users in Russia practically died off in the last two hundred years. They should have forgotten more than I've rediscovered about Flame natures."

From the hitman's expression now, that wasn't buying her leniency.

She flipped him off. "For all that I knew, she could've had a reason to be with Shamal and not some Storm. Anyways, screw Vongola and what they do or don't know. Bartender, our bill please."

"In a hurry?" Renato asked as the flat-footed bartender who obviously had thought the same thing scrambled for what she requested.

"...I forgot. We're users of Dying Will Flame, even worse showed a bit of it, at the moment we're the most interesting thing in the bar." Sonya really didn't like being the center of attention.

However, there really wasn't another good place for criminals or the lawless to talk around this part of the docksides. Especially not with a child in tow.

"If we want to avoid being stared at like circus freaks, it would be so much easier to just go back to the hotel."

"You need to get out of your ivory tower some more, Bazanova. You would've known that if you hit the streets every now and again."

The thief frowned but refrained from telling the old vor down the bar a bit that spoke to her to take a hike. If she remembered right, he was one of Arseniy's friends. She wasn't sure about that, the number of times she had seen any of her father's closer-than-co-worker friends could be counted on a hand.

"...I'll keep that in mind."

Renato cocked an eyebrow at the exchange, but besides swiping the bill for their drinks from the barman while she was distracted he kept from commenting.

Shamal, eyeing her less 'adult looking' drink a bit sullenly, paused to give her a weird look of his own. "Are we leaving? But I just got here."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of June, 1969 continued. The Pahkan's Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Father-"

"I just had a very interesting talk with our resident Cloud." Milos cut his son off sharply, paging through the reports others found important enough to give him.

Pyotr raised an eyebrow, but when the Pahkan didn't dismiss him from the room like he had most of the Avtorities or the boyeviks earlier he assumed he was finally going to hear what had happened earlier that day with Elisaveta's youngest foster child.

Given the meeting in question had been the point Milos had tossed his usual retinue out on their ears, curiosity had run rampant through the clan. Added in the two foreigners the girl in question had tagging along with her, and a large number of Zolotovs that normally just reported in every week or so had found excuses to come by their headquarters as soon as they heard.

"I rarely," the elder Zolotov continued when his son was caught too flat-footed to respond quickly, "have young ladies barely into their twenties asking if I really was trying to kill her via stress induced homicidal suicide. Oh wait, no... I've never had that happen before."

"What." Gedeon managed, still cradling sore or possibly broken ribs which prevented him from straightening upright in proper posture.

He also had a pair of magnificent black eyes, and more than enough damage had been done to wonder if that was caused by a broken nose or just the general battery the young man had apparently just suffered through.

To be fair, Pyotr was wondering the same thing he managed to say.

"Young miss Bazanova has no territory, but she has people and that worked for her to be less aggressive to date. You assaulted one of her people. All those little Clouds imploding in spectacularly messy ways? Some idiot they can't fight against infringing on what a Cloud considers territory... so said Cloud ends up taking out the major threat so even if they are dead that particular threat to what they claim is no more."

Putting those two ideas together painted a particularly grim looking picture.

The Pakhan gave Gedeon a pointedly even look, ignoring the younger vor's visible injuries. "We have one Cloud. One very easy-going Cloud compared to the other examples of her type seen so far. I've had Triad representatives in this office who marvel over her self-control and how little damage she causes us. You slapped young Galina, finally ticking off Bazanova's territorial instincts. She wants to murder you."

Pyotr was fairly certain his expression was frozen in something resembling 'polite inquiry'.

"She can't kill you. Said as much to me in as many words." Milos smoothed the silver hair at his temple back, plucking the gold rimmed glasses off his face and settling his old frame into the plush office chair firmly now that he had given up the pretense of picking through his reports on how the clan was doing. "You're not only my son, but a vor. If she started murdering off the clan's vor they would take it as an affront, and her actions would end up backfiring on her. The results would end up the same anyways even if you weren't one or the other. Do you know how disturbing it is for a father to hear a young woman point out exactly what would happen if she killed his only son, Gedeon? And the petty, self-indulgent reasons why she wasn't going to? She wants to see her little brother grow into himself and visit her family, that's why you're still alive."

"…Father, I-"

"Shut up." The elder snapped harshly. "You caused her to get stuck in a rut where she wants to kill you, won't because she knows it's a bad idea, but is also forced to play nice with the same idiot to start it all and which irritates her all over again. What do you think will happen once her rage surpasses her common sense?"

Gedeon showed a bit of the intelligence both elder vor knew he had somewhere by remaining silent.

"I approved of this last lesson because Bazanova can no longer deal with you. The last thing she said she might manage is ensure you can heal yourself automatically and know exactly how far your talents go in healing or what kind of damage you can walk away from, then she's washing her hands of you entirely. Even that much I didn't want to allow, but then she pointed out you've done nothing when it comes to learning how to apply your Sun Flame abilities and she refuses to completely fail in teaching you something!"

Well… this was awkward.

Pyotr contemplated coughing or even lowering his dignity to fidget to remind Milos that he was in the room. Frankly, as disturbing as it was for the Pahkan to hear Sonya point out why she couldn't allow her 'Cloud' instincts their way it was equally so for him.

Elisaveta's youngest foster daughter might not know Pyotr raised her mother figure, but that was still his granddaughter. Contemplating her killing the son of a friend and boss was… an experience.

"I am not a stupid man, Gedeon. I also know that if Bazanova gives in to her impulse to kill you, it could potentially cause enough internal strife to destroy a good portion of what I've spent my life working on. Intentionally or not, she has enough weight behind her to do that." Milos carried on in a markedly milder tone. "All because you slapped some uppity girl, you've burned whatever bridges you had or could make with Bazanova. What's more, apparently the girl in question was well aware she would be at least reprimanded… but you had to hit her because she pointed out how stupidly you were behaving."

Gedeon went pale under his patchwork of bruising, unsure how to deal with the admittedly rare disapproval from his father.

"The only saving grace I can see," Pyotr interjected blandly when it seemed neither father nor son would break the silence after a very long, awkward moment, "is that Sonya is temporary. We will lose 'her people', I highly doubt she will leave whoever it encompasses at risk if they are not able to defend themselves. But once young Dmitriy is released from prison most of this will be smoothed over."

Milos sniffed derisively, glancing at his longest surviving companion as if just noticing he was still standing there. "Apparently, Elisaveta's son is the next Cloud for this territory. Even younger than the rest of that pack of supernatural brats, but we will at least still have one in the long run. What I'm more concerned about is how the others will take it. News will get out, eventually. Galina teaches a sixth of it, and they might not want to be as restrained as the elder Cloud we have."

He had to give the other man the point. Pyotr sighed, raking a hand through hair as equally as grey as the Pahkan's. "So now that Gedeon's finally irked Sonya's last nerve, what are we to do with her?"

"Is there anything we can do about her?" All but growled out the leader of their clan. "Pressing things when we have representatives from the Triads here able to carry tales if things go wrong doesn't seem to be the best idea I can think of."

"…it would be so much easier if she was born male."

His answer was a snort. "If wishes were fishes, no man would go hungry."

He rolled his eyes at his old friend's whimsical counter to his comment. "More seriously, Milos. Sonya will not follow Gedeon now, nor lend her contacts to his use as she will to you. Unless you can scrounge up another two decades for us to try again or pick someone else… she will likely quit entirely once you leave."
"Were we ever going to keep her? The bitch is nearly too much trouble as it is."

"That," Milos observed after both elder vory gave him a flat stare for interrupting, "might actually be the first smart thing I've heard out of you yet this week."

"Speaking as your financial manager, that is actually a stupid question." Pyotr interjected, feeling slightly alarmed over where that topic might go. "It's through Sonya's contacts we currently have an on-going lucrative trade with the Triads, for a service she pioneered, using information she compiled over nearly a decade. That's really the tip of the iceberg. More importantly... Gedeon, that 'bitch' is my granddaughter."

Elisaveta might now have the biological baby she always wanted, but that didn't devalue the effort she poured into her foster children when she thought it was never going to be possible.

Milos regarded him reproachfully. "And here I thought you were the last hold out on the fostering project not really being family."

"Elisaveta will have her way anyways." Even before he lost his lover, Pyotr hadn't really wanted family. Fostering children was enough of a cover story for raising their own thieves, very loyal thieves, that back when the Zolotovs were new he had picked up a girl so she wouldn't be able to ride his coattails and called that good. "She always was too stubborn for her own good."

"I am going to assume you mean 'your' own good." The Pahkan muttered mostly to himself. "Aside all that, Pyotr, how exactly do you propose we 'manage' her? It might have been possible before Gedeon blundered all over her 'Cloud' side, by getting her more interested back here with either more work to be done she's better suited for or throwing some vor at her as a lover. Now?"

"I'm pretty sure whichever unlucky sod you tried to 'throw' at her would end up dead in short order... but to be honest we have never 'managed' Sonya. She never was one that needed it." He countered frankly. "At most, we are merely someplace she can go in Moscow that a few of her fellows linger around and take on some of her excess. Frankly, even if she just keeps paying her dues up to the point you retire, we're still better off than actually trying and aggravating the situation."

"So, what, you're just going to let her go? What-"

"You brought your own pain on yourself, deal with it!" Milos snapped, cutting Gedeon off before he could really get going. "We've seen what unrealized, preteen Clouds can do when they decide enough is enough. Do you really want to see what a fully grown, fully trained Cloud can do when they decide the same?"

"One who might go berserk in the middle of the clan's headquarters no less." Pyotr tacked on in a less forceful tone. "You made a time bomb with your actions, Gedeon. One which frequently visits this building a floor down."

"So, no, we're going to have to let her go. The only question is what we can get out of her before we are forced to."

He hesitated a moment. "...that might not be the case. She belonged with us before Dmitriy got himself jailed, she was merely never around. It is entirely possible if we go back to that, she will not try to forcibly sever her ties. Might even keep paying in order to not deal with Gedeon anymore."

Milos snorted again, waving a hand dismissively. "Are you really going to try to convince me she's not going to scorn anything Gedeon becomes the head of just because now?"

"Up until that point, I mean."
"And if Gedeon loses or kills Bazanova, even if she just distances herself, with a hand-over happening? What do you think those outside the clan will believe is going on?"

"That Clouds might not follow the son even if they followed the father. That you are one of the few people smart or crafty enough to keep a Cloud happy and to dwell in territory not their own." Countered the equally as old vor stridently. "No one really knows much about them since they keep dying off when spotted. Sonya's a benchmark for all of Russia when it comes to Clouds. Most of what little we know come from her. If she stays until you step down, it will suggest a more peaceful reason than your heir pissing her off."

The Pahkan drummed his fingers on the wood of his desk, pondering over all of it. "When is Dmitriy due to be released?"

"…next year. I can get a closer estimate to you once I return to my office."

Milos scowled at the news, heaving a rather weary sounding sigh. "Gedeon, go clean yourself up. And for fuck's sake, learn how to heal yourself so it doesn't look like Bazanova's beating the shit out of you every day."

Surprised and confused why he wasn't being dismissed, Pyotr gave his old boss a sideways glance.

"It's possible she's faking it. Equally as likely as she's being her usual bluntly honest self." The Pahkan informed him the moment they were left alone in his office. "There's no way to tell without calling her bluff, and if it isn't a bluff…"

"So, what do you intend to do?"

"With her? Nothing. We already blew her patience with us. The fact she's giving warning instead of just murdering her way through the clan has to be enough of a blessing given what could have been. Even if it makes me more than sure she's bluffing." Raking his silver hair back, the slightly older of the two men opted to stare at his ceiling. "My retirement has already been delayed once, again won't be too much of a problem. Next year, Gedeon will take the reins."

Pyotr didn't ask if that was wise or question the Pahkan aloud. Privately was another matter, but his job was to keep things working so long as Milos was happy with it.

"I would like to know why it is our best expert also happens to be the most volatile one."

"Because before this, she was also our most stable Flame user." He pointed out, a bit unnecessarily.

Milos gave him a decidedly unimpressed glower. "Pyotr, I would much rather not let your granddaughter cut her ties with the clan. The hit to his reputation if Gedeon completely loses the girl for any reason might be a bit too much with the unrest this Flame thing has caused in the local balances of power. Not to mention her contacts and the work she might yet put into their research in coming years. Find me a way."

"So, all that before this…?"

"To get my sometimes idiotic son to start thinking." Answered the Pahkan repressively. "If he had just stopped to think… we wouldn't be in this mess."

"…it might not be possible, especially if this isn't a bluff."

"If it's not then so be it. But if not… well, then we need to take steps that she doesn't join anyone else either."
"I'm starting to think Ganauche had a point to his question."

"Which question?" Sonya asked absently from behind a book as Renato used the copies of a Moscow map for whatever little project he wanted them for.

Why the hitman had wanted local maps was beyond her, but as it was possible he was plotting either escape routes or his movements when he went for a 'walk' tonight she refrained from commenting. He was old enough to watch himself, and since he didn't bite the dust that first night she wasn't worried he'd do something stupid.

The Italian in question glanced up to her briefly but returned to his plotting after a moment. "The question of 'are vor allowed family or not'?"

"...there's a few levels to that answer." Sonya admitted after a long moment, because that one was a bit closer to home than usual and not entirely cut and dried of a topic. "Normally it's no. But there's the issue of those who are just recruited and those who have enough rank behind them. Newfound vor, recruited from prison, occasionally have family. That's not so much of an issue, because if they earned it then they've already agreed to give up said blood family, so they normally end whatever association they have with them quickly. Sometimes an idiot knocks up his girlfriend, but those are dealt with basis by basis and generally end with the vor giving up said girlfriend and just sending money to help her raise the child. Then there are the Pahkans and adtoritets, both of whom are pretty much authorities into themselves. It's not odd to hear they have wives or children."

Dumping the maps off her coffee table and onto the books he moved off of it in order to have the surface to work on, he stretched out his back as the half-bent-over position had looked a bit awkward. "You have a little brother."

"...Arseniy's situation is technically different than any usual vor."

"So, he's high ranking enough it doesn't apply to him?"

"That's really only for the Pahkan and whoever he decides to bless such with, usually his inner ring. No, technically... Arseniy doesn't have a son." At his completely unimpressed look, because it was more than just a bit obvious that he really did at first glance, the thief rolled her eyes. He only got that view of the situation because of her, otherwise this probably wouldn't have been brought up. "Look... as far as the clan or anyone else is concerned, Lisa has a son. She actually has two sons and two daughters, only one of which she bore. Arseniy's just... along because he's her lover."

"That is flimsy as hell."

"Yeah, so? So long as 'everyone' knows vor do not have blood family, and it's at least observed to the letter of the law in the lower ranks, our higher-ranking criminals having family is actually a decent cover." Not to mention a 'privilege' those who really wanted the whole 'wife and kids' thing and to motivate vor who would otherwise end up resenting their syndicate if that ever hit them.

Renato got comfortable on her couch, almost putting his heels up on her coffee table before he noticed her glare and aborted the movement to place his right leg over his left knee. "Alright then, what about you?"
"…me?"

"You, Tatiana, Galina? The ladies of the Russian Mafia."

"We're not held to the same standards." Sonya reminded him a bit tartly. "Lisa having children at all should've been a fairly big sign of that."

"Personally speaking then, little lady Sonya." Drawled out the hitman, arranging himself in a more comfortable position on his end of her couch since she wasn't letting him put his heels up. "You going to follow along to the letter of that so-called law?"

Honestly?

"…probably. I will never take on another name without a damn good reason, my brother's and my father's is enough for me. And I have Shamal, so why would I need another brat?"

"No wispy sighing over missing his baby years?"

"Renato, do you remember how annoying it was when he was young enough to question everything? Repeatedly? Do you really want to contemplate the diaper messes and sleepless nights on top of that?"

"…I'm pretty certain that it's less of a chore when you're actually related to the brat in question or wanted one in the first place." The hitman offered dryly, stroking a thumb along his jawline. "Not quite what I was asking, Sonya. Do you want children?"

The thief eyed her current house guest oddly. "It's not a life goal of mine. Right now. If it happens fine, but…"

"Huh."

"Why are you asking, anyways?" Sonya wondered aloud, because this was a fairly odd topic for her to discuss with a friend.

Maybe not so odd if it had happened with her mother, Lisa's attention might shift from her biological son to getting grandchildren as soon as Valera hit the general age her foster children had come to her at. Which was… in two years, because Sonya technically hadn't quite been quite five before being sent to live with her foster parents.

Renato shrugged the whole topic off with an added flick of his wrist. "We're on the topic of children and I was curious. Especially if you were planning on dropping out of our lifestyles in order to pop out another brat or two."

"Hmm… no. Shamal's enough for me, and I wasn't even going to mother him at first."

With a frown, the hitman raked a hand through his spiky black hair. "Why did you? I know he was a bit demanding when it came to your presence, but you didn't have to keep coming back for him. I know you really weren't all that fond of the Iron Fort or the servants within it."

"…Cherep is of the opinion that since I do not have physical territory, I have pack instead. Shamal is young enough that I would at least help him if he wanted my help, which then evolved into being his 'mamma' since he asked."

Which, honestly, the pack thing Sonya still didn't buy.
Her rather irrational desire to murder Gedeon in cold blood aside, because that really could just be because she found any male striking a woman out of mere irritation distasteful and wanted her people away from such abusers but couldn’t move them due to reasons, the only ones that could be called ‘hers’ was either family or Shamal… and Galina. Maybe Usov.

…possibly Scruffy.

Even if she was using it as the excuse to start distancing herself from her clan, there was enough reasonable doubt that she was still highly skeptical that it was what her Cloud nature expressed. If Scruffy got himself beaten up, she’d really only shrug and continue on with her day.

If he got killed was another matter but the only ones that could kill him were her clan since he lived within their territory, and that held another kind of situation entirely that she’d rather not deal with.

"…is that why you’re beating up some moron every day?” Renato scowled as he picked up her thoughts… that informed her his range was improving. Normally being on separate ends of a couch was far enough away to not let him skim thoughts, but it seemed as if polite distance was no longer going to work for that or he could pick up further thoughts if he actually tried. "Tisk, want some help?"

"Again, that is a marginally sensitive clan matter. And no, I’d rather administer the beatings myself.”

Debatable which it was, but as nothing in her thoughts were things she’d rather not let him know about it was fine. Just… something to note.

Renato looked her over carefully, then shrugged and relaxed again. When did he tense up?

"…very well then, so… people?”

"Supposedly. Still not sold on that." Mostly due to the fact if she had pack-like instincts… wouldn’t she be more paranoid over Cherep?

Tatiana?

She really wasn't, although catching up with her siblings was nice and she preferred to do so once or twice a year from all signs. Then again, both were old enough and stubborn enough to go their own ways and make it work for them, so it was possible she wasn't worried because those parts of her pack were able to take care of themselves.

"Might explain why I’m more social than most Clouds, but not entirely.”

"Sonya, whoever calls you 'social' would either be suffering brain damage or had personally met an unbound Cloud." With that parting shot, the hitman abandoned her on the couch and strolled lazily into her very tiny kitchenette that saw little to no use regularly. "The brat should be here in a few, right? What are we doing for dinner?"

"Probably going out." She admitted a bit wryly. She still wasn’t a very good cook without Lisa hovering at her elbow, despite the effort she had been admittedly absentmindedly pouring into learning the culinary arts. Easy breakfast foods aside, she didn’t want to give either Italians food poisoning. "I really don’t cook much here."

"I noticed. Your cupboards are nearly bare.”

"I have dishes." Not very many, and it was mostly just plates, cups, and cutlery.
Honestly, she didn't even have a saucepan to her name.

Renato gifted her with a sardonic look, gesturing to said bare cupboards as he investigated them for what was probably the second or third time just to make a point. "You don't even have a lone, abandoned bag of flour. Salt and pepper maybe, but really Sonya... I've seen crusty old men who have more food stocked than you do, and they seemed to have only lived on take away for several years."

"Is there a point to this?"

No, Sonya wasn't a very good cook. If she didn't have to live off her own cooking, she wasn't going to.

"Want to learn?"

"...really? Lisa's been teaching me a few things, and I've gotten to the point I no longer forget and leave things to burn."

With another tisk, he finished opening and closing each of the little doors which made up her kitchen storage options. "And frankly I'm slightly terrified for the brat, if he has to live off your cooking in a few years."

Sonya scowled at the man. "I'm not that bad anymore. I can make breakfast, and if the brat eats at school then I only have to figure out what to do for dinner."

"And on the weekends, vacations, or holidays? What then?"

"...alright, maybe I do need to learn a bit more."

Public schools, or even private ones, wouldn't have class on the weekends either. She could hire a cook, or a maid that could cook... but she really didn't like the idea of adding more to the people she had to manage already. The security concerns were also something to think about.

Before Renato could capitalize on her admittance and force her to figure out some way to avoid being taught to cook more by an Inverted Sun, there was a Mist equivalent of a knock on her door.

"We're not done here."

"Apparently, the world thinks differently." She shot over a shoulder as she made for the door that lead into the hotel proper.

Another second of unlocking, because while she didn't really trust a lot of locks since she learned how to pick them deadbolts were still amazing in the alarm sense, and she yanked it open to see which of the Mists that brought the brat back today.

Shamal hugged her thigh before she even got a good look at him, wandering past her and further into the apartment with a tired air about him.

The Mist, male this time, was one of the older ones. Which conversely meant he was a lot greener than the younger ones, and that explained why he didn't just Mist-warp the both of them into her apartment instead of knock like any other person.

Well... knock as in the Mist-sense of things knock.
"Chudov Miron Innokentievich," the Mist introduced himself quickly when she gave him a skeptical look, "we were seeing what Shamal could do today."

Sonya found it a bit interesting the brat crashed on the end of the couch Renato had been occupying before taking potshots at her inability to cook. "How soon until Usov starts teaching him things?"

"Another day or two, he said. One more day for assessments and maybe some more talking, then we'll see what he can do when it comes to our skills." Miron gave a kind of fluttery shrug, seemingly having no idea what to do with his hands other than fidget with them. "I am... ah, very sorry about ringing instead of knocking?"

When she gave him another skeptical look, because honestly in the list of weird ass shit Mists did around her when they announced their presence he was actually pretty mild compared to phasing through a mirror-like surface or just walking through walls or doors, he cringed slightly and slid away without actually lifting his feet.

"I'll... shall go now, excuse me."

The Mist immolated himself in his own Flames, and she dearly hoped he was just doing their teleporting trick through the floor instead of committing suicide.

In the silence he left behind him, Renato started snickering.

"Oh, shut up." Sonya slammed the door a bit irritably. "...I hate it when they do that."

"Tiny, little lady Sonya, the scariest thing in the room." Mocked the hitman, turning away from the door.

"Mamma isn't scary." Was all that Shamal supplied to the conversation in a matter of fact tone, at least he did ignore his godfather cracking up in the kitchenette in order to blearily glare in Sonya's general direction. "...but apparently only me, Usov, and Miss Anna seem to think so..."

"Fucking perfect."

How the hell did that happen?

She had next to nothing to do with the Mists!

"Brat, what do you want for dinner? Neither Renato or I can decide."

Bratty Mist hauled himself up in a semi-upright position, resting his head on the couch arm. "Um... can we have lasagna?"

Renato gave her a pointedly expectant look. "Just so you know... it is his favorite..."

Sonya kneaded her temple, already more than done with today. She was going to stay in tonight, and if the hitman wanted to go wander a bit after dark she wouldn't give a damn for what he might wander across. "Fine, whatever. Renato... what do I need for that?"

He gave her bare kitchenette, and the cupboards of bareness, a dismissive look before turning on his heel and heading to the coat rack next to her that held his suit jacket and fedora. "A lot of things you don't have currently. Really Sonya, you don't even have a pan to bake it all in."

"I already said I don't cook here, why would you think I have pans when I don't even have pots?" Lisa had more than she ever seemed to need, and if it was that important she'd go borrow from her mother. "Brat, you may stay here alone as long as you screw with any visitors to leave right away."

"Kay." Shamal was already in the process of settling himself for a nap, pulling the knitted blanket she stole from who knew where over himself and turning his back to the door.

"Really? He's six." The older Italian informed her needlessly as she followed him out of her apartment. "What do you think he's going to do when he wakes up?"

Sonya pulled the door shut behind her again, giving Renato a pointedly exasperated look of his own. "Usov, guard my apartment please."

"Of course!" Said Mist merely beamed when the hitman twitched violently and gave him a blistering glare for materializing right next to him again. "May I…?"

"Yes, we'll make enough for you too." She eyed the preteen for a moment. "Usov, you wouldn't happen to know why your Mists are afraid of me, would you?"

He rocked backwards on his heels and then gave her a perfectly innocent looking smile. "It just seems to be a Mist thing, Sonya."

"Mmm…"

From the look on Renato's face, he was lying through that innocent smile… or the hitman was irritated with the thought of another mouth to feed. When he gave her a blandly irritated glare, she decided the former since he returned to skeptically eyeing the kid between them when she decided.

Sonya decided not to be bothered. For while it was fear from shit she didn't do, and that was annoying… frankly Mists were the kind of Flame users you had to take in small doses. Between him, Viper, and intermittent periods when Usov was inexcusably busy and sent Anna instead, she already had a set of Mists she could deal with.

Furthermore, if she didn't have to see or interact with the Mists that feared her for no reason she was less bothered. For the next week or so it would be irritating, but after that it was highly unlikely she'd deal with them at all.

However, that really didn't excuse the fact that yet more rumor mongering was irritating her. "Stop it, Usov."

"Stop what?"

"I wanted to know if that was natural or synthetic reaction between Clouds and Mists, kid."

"Ah… well, they're easily mislead through word of mouth if they have no reason to disbelieve it?" Usov gave her a slightly strained smile. "Sorry, Sonya. I was merely looking to keep thing contained when the Rains decided to be stupid."

…this was not a conversation she wanted to happen around an outsider, and from the raised eyebrow Renato probably now knew more about that situation than she ever wanted a non-Zolotov to know. "Fine, just stop it."

"Of course." Practicing the better part of valor, the Mist immediately removed himself from view to lurk wherever he was going to in order to keep an eye on her apartment containing a tired Mist brat.

Renato waited only long enough to reach the lobby of the hotel. "…you know, the kid was lying…"
"Of course he was. Whatever the reason, I'm not too bothered. That experiment is already screwed regardless, and it was my fault for not informing him."

Where were pots and pans sold at?

If they couldn't find what she needed for lasagna, she'd have to go borrow from Lisa... so was it better to look for them before or after getting what ingredients were required?

"Before. That pan isn't the only thing we're going to need, and you can use them for multiple things rather than just lasagna."

...son of a bitch, she was going to get cooking lessons from an Inverted Sun anyways, wasn't she?

"Yes, yes you are." Renato informed her smugly.

"...you know, if anyone's listening in on us, they'd be terribly confused on what the hell we're talking about."

Frowning sharply, probably recalling that Usov did enjoy popping up whenever he was called, the hitman knocked his hat askew in order to scratch the back of his head. "Well... screw them. Speaking of ingredients, do you know where to get egg pasta? Specifically, the sheet pasta?"

"...probably might find it in the underground spice trade. Thankfully we're near the docks, so it shouldn't be that hard..."

"...the underground spice trade?"

"Don't ask." Sonya had never figured out why there was a roaring black-market business in spices and random exotic foodstuffs in Moscow. Sometimes she could find the black-market spice trade in other major cities too. It just was, and at least some of it were foods she enjoyed outside of the USSR so while tasty she wasn't going to question it. "It exists, it'll probably have everything you could need, and that's all I want to say about it."

"Huh. I didn't know it reached up here."

(Sunday the 8th of June, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Do you have anything interesting for me today, Nilda?"

"That would depend on what you find interesting this day, Daniella." Admitted her current guest blandly over her coffee.

The Ottavia of Vongola found it slightly disappointing she already had a Rain Guardian at the time she had found this particular lady of the Mafia, but Beretta had her own niche in her Sky's retinue. Nilda Guerra was delightfully through at gathering local intelligence and was a fair hand at being a hatchet woman, but her darling Beretta was more suited for even more indirect subterfuge than the Rain sitting prettily in her foyer.

Well, she hadn't survived being a Donna in the middle of World War Two by letting tradition stand in her way. Although some traditions were very useful, some just... were not. Claiming another Rain Guardian had to be possible somehow. "Anything abroad that might upset things here?"
Nilda nibbled on her lower lip, contemplating what she knew and what the Sky might just be after. "It has actually been fairly quiet since the Cavallone gutted the famiglias in the northern end of Sardinia. Most are just waiting to see what happens from that, but since that is so there's little going on that I can get information about."

"Nothing?" Daniella questioned archly, not used to this particular agent admitting she had nothing.

"Very little of worth." The Soft Flame Rain admitted sourly. "What I have been getting is a lot of the same as last week's rumors, Ottavia."

"Alright, what about things you heard but are not sure of?" If that didn't get her more Intel, then she'd worry.

Italia was a moderately large country, there was always something going on. If no one was talking about what was going on, then someone was trying very damn hard to keep hidden.

"There might be a new famiglia in the works up in L'Aquila. Estra-something or another. They've yet to declare themselves, so that is still only a maybe. Opposite side of a mountain range from a famiglia based out of Tivoli, the Murtas famiglia." Tapping a finger on the handle of her coffee cup, the silver-haired Rain frowned slightly at the Sky she was having a drink with. "Aside that, the Underworld Cooking Tournament Committee has settled on a city this year, it will be held in Dublin. There's... some rumors coming from Switzerland I cannot get confirmation about, some suspicions that a group of Rains might have become active in Croatia but since the supposed location the Flames were identified were part of an ongoing joint military exercise there's been little done to confirm it."

Mostly since if those Rains were military and Flame active than someone would likely have to kill them, Daniella mused wryly. "If the bit in Switzerland comes to you, fine... but concentrate on those Croatia rumors. See if you can't get someone to actually take up responsibility for it before the Vindice get involved."

Nilda nodded at the order like the lovely agent she was. "I'll see what I can find to send me out there. More locally, rumor has it the head of the Giglio Nero has actually accepted this year's invitation to the Christmas Ball. Apparently two northern Italia assassin groups have joined up and have been wreaking havoc up near Turin, although they haven't turn their sights on any of the Vongola Alliance members."

"Going back to dear Luce," Ottavia interrupted, lifting a finger to keep the younger woman from continuing, "how sure of that one are you?"

"Not very, Daniella." Responded the Soft Flame Rain a touch regretfully.

"Well, spread the rumor if she's going then I might as well." Really, it was beyond time for the younger Sky to get out of her famiglia's territory and gather up some Guardians. If she was going to leave Giglio Nero territory, Daniella would also bestir herself to help her son and dear Tyr in keeping the rabble from swarming the unattached Sky. "Didn't Sinclair spend some time in her household? Does she need a Sun or did she fail to capture that rascal as well?"

"...Renato's in Soviet Russia at the moment."

Feeling her eyebrows starting to rise, Daniella blinked a few times to keep her expression to merely 'mildly inquiring' instead of 'gossip hungry'. That was a very specific location to give, she could've just said that the Sun hitman wasn't newly bonded to a Sky. "So, he's not caught then."
"No, Ottavia."

"It will be interesting to hear what kind of information he will get away with." Daniella continued in an even tone. "We rarely hear anything from our Soviet counterparts."

Nilda smiled, although it looked slightly strained. "Of course."

"…spill, girl."

"I gave him relationship advice for female Clouds."

She was nearly seventy, a grandmother thrice over, a well-grounded Sky with a full Harmony of Elemental Guardians, and had survived a world war. Daniella refused to cackle in glee like a schoolgirl. "Oh my…"

…but really, Cloud producing bloodlines were middling-rare and most were spoken for even in Italia. Not quite as so as Sky, and very implosive if handled wrong, but the ratio of Skies and Clouds was still rather dreadful even now decades after the end of World War Two.

Even a Russian import would be something to address the imbalance. Her son's Visconti and her own Solothurn both came from the same famiglia, which hadn't produced any children this generation yet.

Three or four bloodlines were appallingly slim pickings if any of her three grandsons came into their Sky lineage and needed a Cloud Guardian.

"Well, I'll just leave you to that."

Sinclair was quite the skirt chaser, it might not be a permanent arrangement. However, if things continued in this vein then it was likely little Miss Nikishina would end up spending a decent amount of time in Italia. More exposure would mean more chances to have a battle of wits with the girl, as well as possibly tempt her to stay.

Odd that she wandered, but Daniella could and would work with that.

"Thank you, Ottavia." Nilda all but sighed into her coffee, earning herself a fondly exasperated expression from the Sky in question.

Really, the dear was already on the case. Unless something went catastrophically wrong, she'd content herself with becoming a verbal opponent to merely help cement the Russian girl's interests here. "Continue, Nilda."

"Of course, Ottavia…"
Chapter 56

(Monday the 9th of June, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Shamal curiously eyed his godfather's reflection in the mirror as he washed his hands and rinsed off his toothbrush. "Do you really have to shave every day?"

"Yes." Running a wet hand down the side of his jawline he had finished with, Renato tilted his head to the other side to finish scraping off the whiskers that had grown overnight. "It looks unprofessional if I don't. Or just stupid. Suit and tie with a shadow of a beard? I'd look like… urg, a cut-rate detective."

Sliding backwards, he had to balance on his stomach in order to reach the taps, the Mist watched until the older man was done with the razor blade and was rinsing it off. "Can you teach me?"

"Brat, you don't even have one whisker on your chin yet." Lazily drawled the hitman as he inspected the cleaned blade, with enough of a mocking edge in it to let him know he was being teased but without any true malice as far as Shamal could tell. "Maybe once you've got something on those baby-smooth cheeks, we'll talk then."

"Even shaving on a moving train?" Pressed the boy, keenly interested in how the man had accomplished that during the trip out to his mamma's home city.

That train had moved a lot, and yet Renato hadn't nicked himself like how some of Nono's Guardians sometimes did even when in the Iron Fort. Mostly Ganauche, but one-time Schnitten Barbanters had tiny white papers stuck to his face and claimed it was a shaving accident.

"Possibly. Your zio might teach you a bit, but I'll finish whatever education he gives you."

Uncle Cherep was kind of weird, though. Fun, but a lot different than mamma. He wore makeup.

"Maybe your mamma will teach you about cosmetics before I can teach you how to shave… makeup is very good for altering appearances, and she once used some to make her look male way back when." Renato slanted a very amused look down to him. "You made a very pretty young girl…"

He yanked his shin out of retribution range faster than Shamal could kick him.

"I just wonder where the pictures of that little incident ended up… oh wait, I have a few. Kick me again, brat, and all your little friends at school will get a copy."

"You're sharing then, I want one." Mamma drawled from the doorway in her best approximation of Renato's lazily mocking tone. "And hurry it up, boys. You two are not the only ones living here."

Snagging one of the towels off the little railing for them, Shamal's godfather replaced the straight razor in his shaving kit and picked the whole thing up to tuck under an arm. "All yours, little lady Sonya."

"I'm done, mamma." Shamal announced in the next second, just to get another fond hair ruffle as he passed her.

"Then think of what you want for breakfast." Sonya tossed over a shoulder as she shut the bathroom door behind them to get started on her own morning routine.
"A little late to be waking up..." Renato mused as he rubbed the towel over his freshly shaved skin, his curly sideburns popping free even before he removed the cloth from his face.

"Yesterday was a being lazy day. She's been up since before I got up." Shamal corrected the man, wandering after the hitman as he retreated to the second bedroom. "Mamma does... ballet warmup stretches when she gets up like you do push-ups."

"Ho? A ballerina? Called it."

"And pretzels from the circus."

After placing his kit on the dresser, Renato sharply turned around to look at him squarely. "She does what from the circus?"

"Pretzels." It hadn't looked comfortable to Shamal, he hadn't known people could bend that much. "She can sit on the floor and put both ankles behind her head. It's weird."

He couldn't get one leg up that far, and his mamma could do splits. Both ways.

Shuddering from phantom pain from the one time he tried to copy her, and then cringing from the memory of him turning down her offer to teach him how to do it immediately afterwards, the Mist looked back up to his godfather only to wince at the pointedly disappointed look he was getting.

"The minute Sonya's done with her shower, go accept her offer to teach you flexibility. Damn it, Shamal, that kind of thing might just save your life."

"But... dancing is girly."

"I know how to dance, brat. Timoteo, all of his Guardians, Tyr, and any other decent Mafiosi I could name can dance." Renato shot back repressively, pulling the suit he would be wearing today out of the closet he hung his clothes up in to toss on the already made bedspread for later. "Federico Vongola is being taught to dance, and I'll bet you anything so will his brothers the moment they're old enough. It's just a skill you have to grit your teeth and learn. Besides, ladies appreciate it when their dance partner doesn't step on their toes."

When the hitman sat on the corner of his bed to polish his shoes, Shamal scrambled up to sit next to him while holding his toothbrush between his teeth. Carefully, because he would be dumped on the floor again if he creased the suit set out. "Can't I just use Mist Flames to make people think I can dance?"

"Not against a Storm. Nor me, your mamma, any Mafiosi worth their weight, most other Flame users that have dealt with Mist users, or other Mists. You're learning, end of story." Eyeing the creases that happened from a day of walking around, the older Italian snatched up the rag that had been stored with a half-empty tin of shoe polish in his luggage and started working the glossy black goo into those cracks. "Speaking of, dining etiquette."

Shamal groaned, flopping backwards onto his godfather's bed. He also lost his toothbrush….

Somewhere.

"Don't moan at me, brat. Your mother has it, I have it, and by God you'll have it and not embarrass us as well."

"Is she?" He hurried to distract the man with, because he knew he had to learn but… he wasn't really sure if Sonya was just going along with the nickname because he wanted it and she was letting him or if she was willing to actually be his mamma.

"I asked her yesterday why, and if she wanted other or more children." Renato drawled out dryly. "You wouldn't believe what she-"

"What did she say?"

The man just rolled his eyes and snorted when Shamal plastered himself to his bare back as if that would help force the words out faster. "I was getting to that, brat. Back off."

Shamal thumped back onto the bed mulishly, satisfied when the jostling made the hitman smear his shoe polish over the base of a thumb.

"Since you asked, and you're young enough she'll help you anyways Cloud instincts or not, Sonya's really accepting of the whole damn issue. She really is your mamma now, and you'll live with her in a few more years until you no longer need looking after. Although why you need that reassurance when she's teaching you thief skills any brat of hers would need to know..." After considering the smear of black polish on his tanned skin, Renato reached over and wiped it off on Shamal's shirt before he could jerk backwards and avoid it. "You might even go live with her earlier if I can find someplace she really likes."

"Really?"

No more Iron Fort, no more Federico?

Shamal wasn't even that upset he got used as a rag, as while he may have started it his godfather was always going to finish it his way. "How soon can you do that?"

"I haven't even started looking yet." Renato pointed out exasperatedly, dropping one shoe to focus on the other. "Give it time, brat. If we want your mamma to be happy with it and stay for a few extra years on top of your Mafia School career, it has to be perfect."

That didn't put much of a dent in Shamal's excitement. He had always been the 'outsider' in the Iron Fort, as his godfather wasn't a Vongola Mafioso when every other kid there had at least one relative working for the Famiglia.

The news he was getting shot of them a lot sooner than 'in ten or so years' when he was old enough to live on his own was fantastic.

Blinking at the semi-searching stare he got, one day his godfather would tell him how it seemed he could read minds, the Mist shrugged. "It's not that bad, mister Renato. Just... they use it like it means anything when I'm sure you could beat up their Mafiosi relatives."

Snorting again, this time dismissively, he refocused on the left shoe in his hands. "Damn straight."

Flopping backwards on his godfather's bed, Shamal pondered the black smear of shiny polish on his pajamas as he basked in a plan well-executed and resolved. He was going to live with his mamma, the topic of conversation had been derailed, life was pretty good.

"Back to the matter at hand, brat. Table manners."

"...aww..."

"...I take it breakfast has yet to be decided upon?" A dressed for the day Sonya asked from the open bedroom doorway curiously, leaning up against the door jamb and dabbing at her dripping hair with her own towel.

"Crêpes. With eggs and bacon." Renato informed her without pausing to check with Shamal, kind of annoying even if that was what he wanted. "Can you cook that without burning the hotel down?"

She threw up her hands exasperatedly, turning on a heel to head for the kitchen. "For fuck's sake, Renato, my oven is old and temperamental. You said so yourself last night. And yes, I can do crêpes and eggs without burning them. Savory or sweet?"

"Savory. And I noticed you didn't say anything about the bacon!" The hitman shot at her back, pausing to think before continuing. "Can you make coffee?"

"...I'd much rather you handle the beast of a machine you bought last night." Dryly called back the thief from further in the hotel suite. "I'd normally use a French press if I wanted some."

Renato rolled his eyes, glanced at him and rolled them again. "I'm pretty sure if she gave the option, there's a sweet version you can have."

"Hmpf." Pointedly snubbing his godfather, Shamal slid off his bed. "Mamma is not a bad cook."

"She burned the lasagna."

"Only a corner! And mister Usov ate that part."

"Mostly because your mamma was annoyed with him." Hooking a finger into the neck of the Mist's pajama shirt, Renato prevented him from leaving the room with a strong hold he didn't have a hope of getting out of without unusual force. "Table manners, brat. For the next week watch how we eat and try to mimic it, you better not force Sonya to clean you off after any meal. We'll teach you the methods later on once you master that much. And stop stuffing your cheeks like a chipmunk, I dread to see what your dental bill will be like this winter."

Shamal was not pouting. Just... irritated. Yeah, irritated. He didn't want to do any of the fancy adult things yet, being a kid was more fun.

"The bad part of growing up, you end up doing a lot of things you don't want to do."

Blinking, he really did wonder how his godfather could answer his thoughts without actually reading minds, the Mist peered up and over to him. Nearly bending over backwards to accomplish it. "Do you do a lot of things you didn't want to do, mister Renato?"

The flat look he got in return said he was fooling absolutely no one with his attempts at subterfuge. "I'm here, am I not? I could've split after you got here, yesterday at the latest. Sonya's syndicate is very on the ball about security and have no issues letting me know it. Instead, I'm playing house with a thief and you for two whole weeks. Enjoy it, brat, I probably won't be able to muster up this much time off with Sonya for a long while."

Shamal managed a nod without doing something embarrassing like crying a little or hugging the man's knee, feeling his godfather release his shirt and ran after his mamma in order to ensure he got the sweet type of crepes for breakfast.

"And for fuck's sake, ask Sonya for flexibility training!"

The thief in question peered around at him as he came up to her side. "I thought you said no?"

"I'm being told to say yes." He reported to her obediently without sniffing like a baby, looking at the ingredients laid out for breakfast instead of at her. "Sweet?"

"I have some blackcurrant and raspberry jam I can make into a sauce." She pointed out the jar of thick purplish stuff to him next to a red jar he recognized as raspberry jam easier. "Besides, splits don't hurt if you do them correctly, and you really should work up slowly to doing full ones. You can boggle the minds of those little brats you live with by being able to do them at all."

"I'm not going to have to wear a pink tutu, am I?"

"No, that's more of a performance thing than something to wear in ballet training." With a sigh, Sonya eyed the package of bacon warily. "It will also help with your balance, I was pretty clumsy as a kid."

"Really?" That… did not jive with what Shamal knew of her now.

"Really, even broke a chair and a few plates… but that was more my Cloud strength going haywire than unintentional clumsiness." Visibly thinking about it a bit longer, the Storm-Cloud shrugged. "Hit the floor a few times misjudging things, and occasionally lost my grip on a few others… but that's more distance. Hmm…"

"…mamma? You have to put the bacon in a pan to cook it."

"…I was never very good at judging when it's done." She admitted slowly, opting to start with the crêpes instead of the meat. "It's either going to be undercooked or burnt, I'm afraid."

"Eh, mister Renato wants the bacon. Serves him right."

Sonya smirked evilly. "Yes, yes it does."

Something thin and hard suddenly impacted the back of Shamal's head, making him scramble to catch his temporarily missing toothbrush before it hit the ground.

"Keep better track of your shit, brat." The hitman in question drawled out as he entered the kitchen, buttoning his cuffs. "And I heard that."

Mamma sniffed and pretended to ignore Renato as Shamal trotted off to put his toothbrush back with his things.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 9th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…so, who are you?"

Lifting a corner of the 'reports' he was reading through, although as the kids involved needed some serious handwriting lessons maybe 'deciphering' was a better term, Peter peered suspiciously down at the brunette Mist child.

He didn't have the history with these people to explain to him why it was such a big deal Sonya had a child, aside the age issues but he was pretty sure the kid was adopted so that was that.

Intermittent periods of actually seeing his 'patron' aside, he didn't know the woman well enough to say anything about the fact she had a kid at all.
What he did know boiled down to about three things.

First of all, Clouds were territorial bastards and completely shameless about it. Secondly, Cloud Flame users were aggressive about their territory to the point preemptive attacks against threats were likely the norm. Lastly, Sonya was unusual for a Cloud.

Most of that came from vor Ziven and his unknown Cloud Flame source, which he was going to say nothing about because even he got to hear the rumors of what happened when baby Clouds were spotted.

The last part was due to the fact Sonya scorned most of the 'usual' things Clouds were known for and merely shared the 'violence-inclined' facet with her fellows so far.

In short, Scruffy was confused and keeping his head down until things made sense again. That wasn't helped when the kid responsible for kicking up the furor started pestering him with questions. 'I'm Peter McScruffy.'

A dual set of snorts told him both Galina and Sonya were listening in on the conversation from where they were around the desk on the other side of the room.

The Sun sighed heavily at the continued needling about his current name. 'Allow me to rephrase that. I picked Peter, your… mother, has named me McScruffy to go along with it.'

'Oh… I'm Shamal.' So needlessly introduced, the little Mist scrutinized him hard. 'What are you doing?'

'Helping your mother with her paperwork.' Which really should be obvious, even if the kid probably wouldn't be able to catch on to the fact he was restricted to the non-clan and non-criminal parts of it. 'Mostly the compiling of data into more easily read formats for later comparisons.'

Shamal gave him a deadpan look. 'Are you trying to confuse me into leaving you alone? It's not going to work. A lot of people try that against me.'

Peter was utterly unsurprised to hear that. 'Care to help then?''

That got him space, as the kid wrinkled his nose and shot the work in his hands a glare. 'No, thank you.'

Shrugging, the Sun pointedly raised up the pages of filled in reports to compare them to what he had done already.

If things continued as they were, and he got the same amount of work done as he had last month, then he might be able to make a graph of Flame quirk tendencies contrasting age and experience against a general non-Flame user baseline.

It was very unscientific to assume, even if based off of a large grouping of each Flame, and state it as a fact to others. Scruffy intended to get some hard data to be used instead. Where to go from there mostly depended on the result he got.

'Why are you called 'McScruffy'?'

Pausing, Peter lowered the paper again to give the kid a flat look.

…and then got a blistering glare from the Mist's Storm-Cloud mother.
He didn't even have to turn and look to know, Galina's voice cut off abruptly from whatever she was muttering to their underboss and very few things had the professional Lightning stop everything. One thing he knew of for sure of was the kid's mother's temper, and the quick look he risked merely confirmed his suspicions.

Not purple, thankfully. Still grey eye color.

So… he did anything she deemed 'untoward' to her kid and he could kiss his ass goodbye. Nice to know…

"When we met, I was very… scruffy. So, it's a nickname. And when I opted to pick a new name my nickname stuck and ended up as my surname since I hadn't picked one." Thankfully it seemed as if the Mist kid was satisfied with that and having already exhausted his curiosity in his work the child wandered back over to his claimed mother.

"How did McScruffy meet you, mamma?"

…or not.

"I found him in a Freetown jail cell." Sonya informed him absently, her attention already sliding back to the work Galina was trying to get her to finish off for the day before she absconded to do whatever it was she was doing. "He was not happy I prevented him from wandering into a firing line."

"Well… that's stupid."

"Mmmm."

Peter risked another look, but as it seemed the icy blonde was now disinterested in him he gave up his pathetic attempt at subterfuge to give the pair his full attention.

Talking to Sonya when she didn't feel helpful was headache inducing, and yet she was volunteering information the kid hadn't asked?

She was already dealing with the paperwork she had, which normally put her in a curt mood… maybe…

Galina was also a bit discomforted with Shamal pulling information out of his mother, but she resumed reeling off the verbal reports she had taken in Sonya's stead while she was off doing other things. After a beat to be sure the kid wasn't going to pester the Storm-Cloud with another question.

Scruffy waved a few fingers, getting the tiny Mist's attention. It netted him a suspicious look.

With a roll of his eyes, he waved the kid over with a broader gesture that wouldn't seem so shifty. When Shamal did trot warily back over the Sun put his work aside, leaned forward, and put both elbows on his knees to address him. "Bored, kid?"

"No, really?" The colossal brat sneered back at him, giving a frustrated 'hmph' and pulled tightly crossed arms close to his chest. "But mamma has to do her boring paperwork, and the one taking me to the Mist Classes isn't here yet."

He was pretty cute when he pouted like that. "Look, do you want something to do? We don't have a lot of child-things in the office… but you're a Mist, right?"

The gleam in the kid's brown eyes as he was treated to a lengthy considering look probably meant little good for him, but Peter was pretty sure getting into his boss' kid's good book would likely just help him.

He was relying on Sonya for his living situation, and young children were supposed to be less judgmental… right?

"There's a game we play in Italia." Shamal informed him as he hauled himself up to sit on the opposite end of the couch. Holding up a hand, he directed indigo Flames to pour from them and into a table shape between them. "It's kind of like chess, but less boring."

Having next to no actual interactions with Mists, he didn't know if that was supposed to be impressive or not. He was going with impressive, if only due to the fact the kid was maybe around five years old.

After the flat surface firmed up two castle structures then built themselves out of Mist Flames, the one on Scruffy's side lacking a ceiling and parts of the walls in his direction to enable him to see into it. His was medieval in looks, the kid had a tree-fort.

"Pick a race of creatures." Shamal instructed him with a slightly worrying grin.

"Human knights." It would fit the theme the Mist had started him with, and since the kid knew the rules and he didn't Peter was accepting of the fact he was likely to lose badly the first go around.

That was fine, he could withstand the hits to his ego. This game was shaping up to be actually really interesting, even if it smacked of playing with dolls or tin soldiers.

Much to his chagrin, he got tin knights formed out of the kid's Mist Flames. There were a couple of what looked like turquoise horses decked out in tin armor, maybe enough for an entire wing of mounted knights… but they were still mostly miniature shield bearing, sword or pike waving soldiers in tin cans.

"Touché, kid."

Shamal was apparently a smart one, or just smart-assed, and just as likely he was frequently patronized instead of taken seriously from other adults not his mother or the other Italian man here with him.

Scruffy didn't mind he was getting a laugh at his expense. It was funny.

"How do we play then?"

"We're playing the quick and dirty version." Shamal explained, the started pointing out things on the Constructed tabletop battle zone. "So, it's more like 'capture the castle' than 'wipe out your opposition'. We both have a set number of pieces, and they can heal between skirmishes and age to death if you wait too long. They can't build things in this version, otherwise I'd have to build an entire map to play on… and I might have to leave in the middle of it."

Probably not the kid's invention, but he had to admit this already sounded ten times better than chess. "Alright, but since you're supplying the Mist Flames do I have to tell you how to move my... units?"

"Scruffy, Activate Shamal's Constructions instead." Bazanova called over, shoving an entire section of paperwork to the side as either done with or to not bother with. Galina's expression was no help in figuring out which was it.

…right. If she could Disintegrate a Mist's Constructions, he should be able to do a similar thing in making them Activate. They really were only made with the intent to do certain things, so supposedly…

Peter prodded a knight with a yellow tipped finger, getting the selected warrior to mount up on a jeweled horse. "Huh… neat."

He looked back up in time to catch Shamal's gob smacked expression. "How'd you do that? I didn't know Suns could."

"Your, ah… mamma can Disintegrate Mist Flames. And I'm older than you, so my will is apparently stronger than yours." He explained his thought process to the kid before the spiel of words spilled over what he could handle, because he looked more excited than dismayed.

"…decent. Thank you, Scruffy."

Peter risked a skeptical look in the Storm-Cloud's direction… but she wasn't looking at him again. What in the world had she been looking for?

"Okay, I'm not going easy on you." Scrambling up to his knees on the couch cushions, the Mist eyed his tree-fort and made a cloud of winged people for his own units. They fluttered into the tree top, and Scruffy got hurriedly involved with mounting up and directing regiments out of the disorganized starting positions they had formed into existence with.

He didn't want to really lose that badly. The kid might decide he was boring.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 9th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"What do you know of French syndicates?" Sonya asked as she joined her guest in her tiny kitchenette.

Renato gave her a strange look over the top of a plain vanilla file. "A lot of hookers. Mainly."

"All of it?"

Dearly beloved fuck, Verde was going to pop a blood vessel if she tried setting him up there. She had thought there were a lot of women on the hunt when she passed through the less beaten tracks with the Großes Volksfest, but all of it was like that?

Cocking an eyebrow at her, the hitman leaned back in the dinner chair her hotel suite provided as seating. "Who? Why are you asking, Sonya? So I can figure out what it is you want to know."

"There's this… um," hesitating only another moment, frankly he knew a lot about her now and she was only slightly wary of the whole 'he's a hitman' thing these days, Sonya sat herself in the chair across from him, "Tats used to run a gang. Like, before she set up in Mafia Land. One of said gang members found a French Lightning not in France. Said Lighting, Verde, saved Adrik's life so I'm going to get him set up where he wants in return for keeping Tats' boy alive for her."

"So now you need to know about French syndicates because it's his home country and they won't exclude him for not being a native." Renato finished with audible amusement, setting aside the paper in his hands. "Seriously speaking, Sonya, France is the country for prostitution. Some of the seaside country got caught up in the drug running, and since the number of prostitution rings outsourced security there's a few number of protection rackets on-going, but it's still mainly hookers and pimps."

"Excluding them." She insisted, waving a hand to dismiss that option from the table. "Verde's an egghead. Scientist type with apparently broad interests and an appetite for information he's sort of bull-headed about getting access to. Enough to go toe to toe with me about it, and I've murdered in front of him right after he wasn't a civilian anymore. Where would he not mind building up his reputation, until he's stable enough to do whatever?"

"Well... Lightning. Of course he is." Cradling his jaw with a hand, he mulled over her question more seriously than he had spoken about the nature of a Lightning. "You're going to have to look in the southern parts. I think. Vongola does have some connections out there, and with that complete ban on drugs and human trafficking they have it's safer for a green Lightning. Still expansive Flame user territory, not as dense as Italia but decently enough numbers he won't be immediately hunted for his Flames."

"...isn't prostitution still part of the skin trade?"

Renato pulled the arm holding his chin away from his face and wiggled the hand back and forth. "Eh... yes if you look at it sideways. But it was an established underworld trade long before Vongola was a glimmer in Primo's thoughts. Some syndicates will put a lot of sanctions against prostitution rings that treat their girls badly, but sex and the trade of sexual favors for monetary value isn't something any one syndicate could ever stamp out."

Sonya studied the man's expression. "Should I be worried that you know a lot about this?"

The return look she was gifted with was highly amused. "Jealous?"

"...I'm going to say to you what I said to my sister. There are these things called sexually transmitted diseases..."

"But that's actually part of why those prostitution rings exist." Renato countered, her comment not denting the lazy smirk on his face. "They know who their girls have been fooling around with and can track back anything that pops up in health checks. IF the girls get them."

"I think you're reaching with that. What happens to the girls after they get sick? The men that 'fooled' around with them between the infected one and whenever it's caught?" Sonya waved a dismissive hand. "Aside the fact that they may or may not be doing health checks that wouldn't be standardized to anything, and it would have to be by rumor you'd know what you were playing with was clean enough to not infect you with something nasty unless you're unlucky number whatever before it's caught, hookers don't tend to keep a lot of the money they make doing their work."

"...that's your major complaint against whores?"

She huffed at him. "No. My major complaint is that prostitution is rather uncomfortably linked with the slave trade to provide those 'girls'. And frankly, sometimes those 'pimps' and madams running things are little better than slavers themselves."

The hitman nodded, mouth pressed into a thin line. "I know what you mean, and I can assure you I've never visited one that did so."

"...so, you have done so."

"I was fifteen, and it was my first time outside of Italia. Of course I did." Renato tossed his head back, leaning back on two chair legs and kicking his heels up on her dinner table. "I've had a lot of girls, Sonya. But I've never had to pay for it."
"You just admitted to visiting a brothel."

"Never. Paid. For. Sex." He repeated smugly. "Maybe traded a few favors for it, but I've not spent a bit on buying sex."

Sonya gave the man a flat look. "That's nice, Renato. Not what I was talking about."

"Some of them like their jobs!"

"I'm aware of that, more power to them." Dismissed the thief, getting up to try and figure out what she could cook for dinner. Renato had bullied her into buying a lot of groceries, but her cooking skills limited the fare she could make from it all. "But again, sexually transmitted diseases are a thing and some of them are nasty. You've shared a bed with me and Shamal. Are you sure you're clean?"

She caught sight of the impressive glower he was aiming at her back through her shiny new kettle. Which was probably why Lisa always had hers out on the stovetop.

"Oh, stop pouting."

"Are you germophobic?"

"What? No, I've had to trek through sewers before for my work." Sonya considered it seriously, because it was sort of a valid question. "No more so than anyone else, I think. I just... don't like taking stupid risks. Especially when it comes to things that could put me down for a good few months."

"You never had sex before, then. Or you wouldn't call it stupid."

"Well... no. But it's still stupid." Not in this lifetime, anyways. "There are more than enough people willing to do it for free, of whom at least a decent amount would be honest about their sexual experiences. Why pay when you could get sex for free, and with someone you don't have to wonder how many other men have 'played' with her too? Or him, not judging."

Soup. She could make some soup, and possibly not burn it.

Right?

Was it possible to burn soup?

With that decided, she puzzled over the greens she had heaped in her refrigerator.

Salad maybe?

Renato would bitch, but she actually liked salads. Not nearly as much as Tatiana though.

She had chicken, right?

Baked chicken, salad, and soup for dinner. She still had some bread to go along with the soup too. The chicken would likely end up burnt, but she could blame her oven for that.

Brat was due back soon, he'd be ravenous if the same thing the last few days repeated today. Usov had taken her very seriously when she asked him to double check everything he knew about Mist Flames. She and Renato would go back to wandering around Moscow during the day the moment Shamal wouldn't want a nap right after he was done with the other Mists, spending a few days indoors wasn't too much of a hardship after three straight days of travel to get here.
"Some people either are ugly or of nasty enough temperament to require paying their partners to stand them." Renato observed mockingly from behind her.

"Then those people probably shouldn't procreate." Sonya shot back absently, eyeing her brand-new collection of spices dubiously. "What do I use to season chicken with?"

"...basically anything. Thyme, rosemary, and olive oil are good standbys, but you have parmesan and garlic as well... which is better in my opinion." The hitman abandoned the table and the dossiers Galina had put together about Moscow local possible Cloud vory around Arseniy's age that were either missing or only presumed dead, popping the buttons on his cuffs and rolling up his sleeves as he came to stand beside her. "What else are you thinking?"

"Soup and salad, because I can make salad easily enough and if the chicken bakes I can try to not ruin the soup as well." Depressingly, that was probably the very limit of what she could realistically handle right now.

She eyed the man's hands, and the knife he had picked up to help her with the cooking, dubiously.

He sighed gustily when he caught her look. "If it bothers you that much, I can go see your physician and get a clean bill of health."

"It's your health." Sonya shot back, pulling various bits and bobs that would be going into dinner out, so she wouldn't have to touch her cabinets with raw chicken juice or anything else's ick on her hands. "You want to risk it, that's up to you. But Renato, you are my buffer for the brat. If something happens to you and I'm not ready to take him..."

He made a sound that wasn't agreeing, but also wasn't remotely mollified, as he deboned the chicken for her.

"Also, you're a really good friend of mine. I'd be rather upset if you died."

Rolling his eyes, Renato hooked a cabinet door and opened it with the edge of his Italian leather shoe. "Fetch a pan with the baking sheet, would you? And also, as your friend, trust me to know what I'm doing in that subject."

"Well... if you hadn't a clue what you were doing after all the experience you apparently have by rumor alone, I'm really screwed. Which pan? I now have... three."

"Thank you kindly for at least admitting that much. The cake pan. Fill it with water and put it in with the chicken while it bakes. It'll keep the meat from drying out and also diffuse some of the uneven heat your oven puts out." The hitman ordered, pulling the last of the bones out of dinner and moving on to the breading it was apparently going to have. "Now pay attention."

"Right, awe me." She smirked at his deadpan look, keeping that trick with the water pan in mind for the next time she had to bake something.

Would it work for more than just meat?

---

(Tuesday the 10th of June, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You can't use logic in this argument!" Shamal declared huffily from a few rooms away.
"Ho?" A very out-of-patience sounding Renato drawled back icily, just loud enough to be heard as well. "And why not?"

"Because I'll lose! I always lose when you use logic. That's not fair!"

Lisa snorted into her cup of tea. She coughed a few times as it burned it's way down the wrong end, waving off the hovering Sonya who was a little alarmed at the sudden attempt to inhale her boiling hot beverage.

"I know I never tried that one..." The younger woman commented neutrally, probably just to make polite conversation, when the pause in the argument went on a bit long.

Her two Italians were probably in the middle of a glaring match of battling wills in the living room, which the hitman was likely to win honestly.

"Tats tried once, against Arseniy." She informed her throatily, clearing it in the next second to continue in a more normal tone. "It went about as well as this attempt seems to be doing. You were in the middle of very pointedly not being in the house at the time, so you missed it. It's just... he sounded so exasperated..."

"It's been going on all morning now." Sighed the Storm-Cloud, absently swirling her cup of tea. "Had he decided to just say something I would've agreed."

"About what?" Lisa inquired curiously.

"Taking a break. Shamal's been putting in some good hours with the Mists, and he's pretty young still. He's been wiped the last three days when he gets back to us. We've got two months, a day off here or there wouldn't be a big issue. Renato just took offense to the brat's stance of 'I don't want to'."

"Ah... yeah, that would do it." How did her difficult child end up the one with parenthood troubles first out of all the children she had mothered?

Lisa might know, intellectually, that Sonya was serious about raising Shamal and everything that went into child rearing... but that sometimes clashed with what she knew about her daughter.

Sonya disliked childish behavior even if it came from a child, and Shamal was a child through and through. She had little patience for mischievous or disruptive behavior, and her brat was a Mist with the personality type they normally encompassed. Shamal was a curious if not particularly driven child and all over the place with it, Sonya tended to prefer the company of others that knew what they were doing and firmly believed about how to go about it.

He was... well, nearly her complete opposite. Outgoing where she was introverted, a little suspicious social butterfly who could chat with anyone if not turn his back on them when she doubted her daughter knew the names of even five Zolotov vory she didn't have years of working with them behind her.

Cherep had been like that as well, bewilderingly so very different from Sonya.

Oh... they shared a few things, innate suspicion of everything at first and a habit of wandering off at any moment they could, but more than enough had been contrasted between their personalities that Lisa had initially assumed the boy-child had gotten a bit of blackmail or something on her then-youngest.

He had, sort of, but in a far more innocent way that she had given him credit for at first.
Being actually just friends that Sonya worried about had not been her first assumption. Their shared Flame thing, she wasn't sure if it was part of that 'such-and-such Flame users prefer/hate such-and-such' or something else, had apparently been more than enough to get young Cherep under Sonya's skin quicker than anything else in her scant handful of years alive.

Lisa knew for a fact the assumption of 'Clouds' like her daughter not particularly tolerating 'Mists' was more or less actually true, so why Shamal was different was something she wondered about.

Then there were things like this current incident, that she knew Sonya had to have dealt with at least once or twice before or would in the coming years... but was at a loss to explain or even imagine how the younger woman would go about it.

Sonya was, at least to those she chose to keep close to her, only verbally argumentative so long as she knew the topic. When it came to things like circular logic or childish beliefs, she refrained from getting involved. Tatiana and Cherep had any number of silly arguments about nothing that had baffled their little sister to no end, and her brother's stout belief in the tooth fairy well into his teenage years had been completely avoided.

Both adult influences in Shamal's life seemed to be putting in some work in trying to let the child have a measure of an actual childhood around the less innocent-friendly lessons that would arm him to survive in their world. Lisa could assume, if a bit guiltily, that on Sonya's side it was to ensure her brat had something she never did have much of herself.

Only a bit, because the Storm-Cloud had been done with being a child long before she got her to foster and nothing they tried had changed her mind about maybe trying the child thing for a second time.

Lisa didn't worry... but concern was a good word. She was slightly concerned about how her youngest foster child would tackle that childish belief side of rearing children, especially when it came to young Shamal's Mist Flames.

…which was another curious thought.

If enough Mist children or adults believed in it, would there be a tooth fairy supported by their collective Flames?

Something to mention later, she supposed...

Aside childish behavior, there was also the question of discipline.

Obviously, Mafioso Sinclair was a strong believer in that personally and was in the middle of correcting their godchild's behavior. While Sonya did have her own version... did she implement it in young Shamal's life or did she leave the instilling of self-control and behavioral correction solely to the hitman?

Lisa didn't actually know how to ask Sonya that besides bluntly stating her curiosity and hoping for the best. Which frustrated her, because she had been able to discuss everything with her children before and had never worried they would take it wrongly.

"I wonder if they're done?" Sonya mused aloud as the silence stretched.

The elder Russian seized the opening gratefully. "Not going to get involved?"

"I will if Renato can't get the brat to see sense, but I think he's got more experience than I do in arguing with Shamal." She spoke wryly, and a bit self-deprecatingly.
Ah, they were taking turns then. That was better than Lisa had been half-afraid of, even if the possibility of Sonya tolerating spoiled behavior was astronomically low.

"He's a good kid."

Normally, when they weren't tired or cranky or feeling stubborn, most children trying to live up to their guardians' or parents' expectations were. As far as Lisa had seen in a handful of days, Shamal was trying really hard to show both his godparents their investment in him wasn't wasted on someone that wouldn't appreciate it.

"I don't get to see him as often as I'd like." Admitted her daughter lowly. "So, while I've found I don't appreciate the difficult parts like I had expected it's not as much as I had assumed. Even if he's being bratty, I'm happy enough to just see it."

"That sounds normal." A slight bit out of her normal range of behavior, but motherhood did that to women. "How difficult is it to spend so much time away?"

"...I get weirdly antsy a couple months without seeing him."

Lisa frowned at her, puzzled. "Weirdly?"

She hadn't known the younger woman could get antsy. She had long since grown out of getting cases of nerves before heists and, from what her Lackey had to say about it, even when dealing with law enforcement.

"It's... not as bad as when I wonder how Cherep's doing. But I can't go visit Cherep as much as I'd like, I'd attract the wrong sort of attention to him if I go too often. The Großen Volksfest goes off the beaten track and differs enough from year to year I can't keep up with it unless I'm actually following it closely anyways. Worse than when I can't go see Tats. I get... frustrated. And snappish."

If Sonya thought something was 'snappish', it was probably her 'ice-bitch mode' as Galina delightfully put it. That social layer of ice she and her lover spent years chipping through and only broke through a fluke.

Lisa puzzled over the information as her daughter refreshed their tea.

Was... Shamal an outlet?

If her brother was correct on Sonya's expression of her Cloud Flames, the pack idea, and she couldn't 'patrol' a good chunk of her territory...

Then possibly Shamal had come along and gotten the receiving end of that pent-up Cloud fussing, because he was young and in need of it from how that story went, decided he liked it and was now trying to keep the woman doing said fussing in his life.

Sonya was happy with it, Lisa had the possible motivations pinned down, and really there was little for it now.

Renato stalked into her kitchen almost like a living storm cloud, not as Sonya was, sneered at the black tea the women were nursing but visibly checked himself when Lisa gestured to the small pot of coffee she was now used to supplying him for the morning visits.

"So, how is young Shamal?"

"Occupying a corner of your living room." He drawled out, choosing to glower at the coffee he poured himself as if it had done him some personal offence. "Very sorry about this."

"No need to apologize, I'm surprised he lasted this long doing work all day when he's on summer vacation." She gave the two of them a smile, a bit of a calculating one but with her daughter's brat nailed down she could focus on the man she brought home. "Why not leave him with me for today? I'll be sure to give him a few lessons in-between the chores I have to do today, but the two of you don't have to derail everything because he's being cranky."

She received an absolutely beautiful look of dubiousness from Sonya, as she likely recalled a few of the lessons Lisa was responsible for giving Zolotov trainees.

More specifically, 'How to Structure an Effective Argument' basics she gave Cherep and the 'Manipulating Emotions 101' she gave all three of her trained children.

Since Shamal had a problem winning against logical arguments, Lisa should probably give the kid some pointers in 'Creatively Countering Logic with Bullshit and Getting Away with it'.

Surprising how often that one helped her more than 'Countering Logic in Ways to Provide Reasonable Doubt'.

"I'm sold." Renato gave in after pondering it over his coffee, at Sonya's exasperated look he continued in a pointedly patient tone. "It's better than giving in to the brat and rewarding him with what he wanted and threw a fit over. Chores are a good idea."

"Not the issue, Renato." She sighed, rubbing at a temple. "If you want to Lisa..."

"What's the issue then?"

The look her daughter then gave her young man was equally as beautiful as the dubious look she earned before. Just more… despairing. "Lisa. Trains. Thieves. For. A. Living. And you want to leave Shamal with her for several hours."

"You've said that, but also that she's... wait."

"Too late." Lisa chirped happily, setting her empty teacup down. "How far are the two of you going to go today?"

"Probably around the very edges, so Renato can see how the buffer zones between syndicates work here. They're a bit more risky, but I don't believe we've had recent troubles with our neighbors." Sonya admitted before draining her own cup and setting it down. "We'll be back around... dinner time? Or just after, I think. Can you feed him for dinner as well? We'll be back well before his bedtime."

"Sure, sweetie. You might want to go introduce Valera to your brat in a way he can't ignore before you go. They'll be back soon." She reminded her daughter, gathering up the tea service to either put away or wash but leaving the small pot of coffee. "And inform Usov and Shamal of the change in plans."

"Mmmph." With that less than articulate response, the younger woman got up to go handle the arrangements.

"...in hindsight, Miss ah..."

"Call me Lisa."
"…Lisa then. In hindsight, I may have been a bit hasty about agreeing…"

"Shamal's also partly Sonya's. He's entitled to the training anyways. He's just old enough to begin it as well." She countered pleasantly, curious how the man was going to try and handle this.

"Well… yes." Renato's expression briefly crossed into 'conflicted' before getting smoothed out to a very flattering consideration heavy look. "You're a very… evil woman, Lisa."

Lisa gave the hitman a pleasant little smirk. "I'm the mother of your girlfriend, and apparently a grandmother at not-yet-forty. Suffer."

"Not my girlfriend." He countered, almost on automatic before his mind caught up to his mouth and he tacked something else onto that seemingly oft-repeated defense. "Sonya and I are friends."

"But you want to be." She pointed out the obvious. "Otherwise you wouldn't put up her horrible cooking, much less be so conforming when it comes to the scrutiny you're under here. I know Sonya's noticed the clan scrambling to keep an eye on her, but she's too used to being watched here to be bothered overmuch."

He studied her thoughtfully over the rim of his coffee. "I'm teaching her a few things, and I could be 'conforming' because this is the way I expect her to behave around the syndicate of my choice."

"I find it interesting you're trying to counter my points without trying to 'delicately' discourage my opinion that you want my daughter at all."

"Your daughter is a beautiful woman, anyone with eyes can see that." No mention of the fact he was male and the likely reasons he would notice, smart man. "But Sonya is also not interested in anything like that."

"Yet." Lisa stated.

"…yet."

"But either curiosity or just her very belated hormones will eventually catch up to her, and you are the male I think she trusts most outside of our little family." It was entirely possible, if not likely on both sides, that it really was just friendship. Something like Sonya had with Cherep. "You are the only male my children have introduced to me at all."

"She might opt to try a man she could easily kill instead," Renato countered like the devil's advocate, but he couldn't quite keep all the disgust at the idea out of his voice, "instead of risk a long-standing friendship."

Oh my, he had given this a fair amount of thought for his supposed position of 'just friends'.

Lisa hummed noncommittally as she started filling her sink to do the breakfast dishes, waiting.

He'd either give in and try pumping her for help or keep his silence. The first option would be like admitting defeat, the second would preserve his non-statement of intent and leave him reasonable doubt.

"In the interest of conjecture," Renato finally capitulated with after several long moments, "if I was interested in preventing some unknown bastard suddenly coming to the attention of a highly curious woman we both happen to be very fond of and taking advantage of her… any advice?"

…or he could be stubborn about it.
Lisa was very amused, few people were willing to argue against her anymore. She was pretty sure what she had assumed was true, but without actual confirmation she couldn't really meddle either.

Alas.

Well, she had a bit more time to try and pin down his motivations.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 10th of June, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Arseniy didn't like being asleep when some foreign criminal was poking about, so for the last few days Lisa had been waking him early enough to be upright before their youngest foster daughter was due to show up with either the younger or both Italians.

With little to do in the mornings, he had settled on distracting Valera from the fact his sister was teaching some other brat the skills he wasn't allowed to learn just yet.

'Cloud patrols' his ass. He'd been casing his 'territory' out of duty, not desire.

He was a vor in charge of a section of the clan's territory reserved for brats, it was his job. After several years of duty, it was habit not instinct. Familiarizing Valera to the area was just common sense, this was where he was growing up.

He was not going to address Sonya taking on some 'patrols' for him, for he didn't really know how to explain it. During the time she had been leaving the house the moment she could, and even when she was out with Cherep a few year later, he was fully aware he didn't go out as often.

Why could've been any number of things.

Swinging Valera down from his shoulders onto the front stoop, the vor shouldered open their front door and concluded Sonya and her guests were still present. She and her brat weren't downstairs, at least, so he didn't stop his son from homing in on his sister's voice and heading off in her general direction to get his daily dose of her attention.

He ambled after the boy, vaguely wondering what Lisa was discussing with Sonya's Mafioso in the kitchen and came up short when he realized what was going on in the living room.

Sonya had placed her brat squarely in her lap, which from all appearances Valera did not appreciate.

"Do not flinch back." The blonde thief muttered to Shamal in his native Italian, pretending to not see the ugly glare on her little brother's face. "No Cloud will respect someone afraid of them, nor will be willing to deal with someone that does so."

Shamal peered up at her in favor of acknowledging Valera's less than pleased look. "Are you sure about this, mamma? This isn't what they tell us back in Italia."

"Who would you trust more, me or a bunch of old men who continually flinch from their Clouds?"

Arseniy finally entered the room but lingered behind the strange collection, rather interested in how this was going to go.

After getting over his shock, and inspecting the situation in every angle he could, Valera decided to try removing the obstacle in his way. He was stymied not by the interloping child, but by Sonya catching his hands before he could lay them on her brat.

"No." She stated, switching back to Russian and giving the child a firm look to hammer her point home.

Valera huffed angrily. Thwarted but not giving up yet, the near-two-year-old hauled himself up onto the couch and plopped himself into Sonya's lap right next to her brat.

Wide eyed, Shamal regarded first the other child then his picked mamma cautiously. "Now what?"

"...nap time, I think." With that warning Sonya clutched the both of them and rolled them all over, so they were sprawled out on the couch with her blocking the easy way out. "You're a bit old for one, but eh."

"...mamma? Seriously?" Shamal ended up under a still vexed Valera, who decided sleeping on top of the boy that had interfered with the bonding time he had with his sister was a great idea too. The older boy tried really hard to hide it, but from the signs he couldn't erase he was still a bit freaked out at the sudden closeness. "Mamma!"

Arseniy wordlessly walked out of there.

Lisa was cheerfully washing up various dishes, Mafioso Sinclair was glowering at his coffee.

He didn't want to know. "They're taking a nap in the living room."

"All of them?"

"Sonya handled it." The vor explained to the startled hitman, which didn't touch on what seemed to be Valera's passive-aggressive thing against his sister's brat nor the fact Sonya seemed to think it was over.

He didn't think so, Valera loved having his sister's attention fully and any upsets would take some time to prove enduring.

"Paper's in the usual place." Lisa tossed over a shoulder, waving a soap slicked hand in the air. "Did you eat enough this morning, or would you like something as well, Renato?"

"...I cooked this morning. We had more than enough, I was showing Sonya how to do French toast."

...smart man. Arseniy had eaten a lot of questionable things before when Lisa wasn't with him, but some of the things his youngest foster child could make…

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 10th of June, 1969. Unknown Location, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Usov returned without the little brunette child, and Anna took a stab in the dark. "Shamal's not turning up today?"

"He's apparently in trouble." Her nominal leader answered, raking a hand through his hair and scratching the back of his head as well. "So, no, we are to go on without him for now."

She gave an absent shrug. "That means we're free to return to our normal things, right?"
"I'm going to insist you don't run away into the nearest reflective surface. We've got a few things to cover first." Usov informed her snottily, using his Mist Flames to call the rest of their fellow's attentions to them.

As thirty Mists, physically or not, converged on the same room things got a bit… muted. Reality took on a less important edge, and the floating chairs as various more experience Mists tried to subtly broaden the minds of the inexperienced ones with all the tact of a bull in a china shop started making things a bit crowded.

"First of all," Usov stated to both nothing and everyone there or not, "I have been instructed by the resident Cloud to stop spreading rumors that she is scary. So, I will say she's not. Trust me."

Like that was going to work.

Anna repressed her desire to sigh or palm her face in exasperation. Somedays like today, Usov was just a wee bit off. They all had learned not to take each other by their words, as verbal things could be so suggestive in certain ways.

"Secondly, if any of you have government relatives I require a list of who and if you have no problems with them losing their jobs or just being embarrassed in general. Either this winter or next spring is the tentative window of opportunity I will have to double check and conceal our existence from the government."

Anna was pretty sure their newest Mist Nikon had a brother in the KGB and made note to check over whatever list was compiled to be sure the ones named were not messed with. While they were apparently to stay away from government jobs and the military, she was depressingly sure that some of them had taken it as a direct challenge.

Usov wasn't too worried, since the wording was 'taking government office' or 'joining established militaries'. He insisted those loopholes of 'puppeting government flunkies' was left open for a reason, and they couldn't be the first ones to think of it.

"Finally, a new direction of study has been handed down from on high." Continued the preteen Mist, as if she wasn't giving him a deadpan expression behind his back. "A Sun has been able to Activate a young Mist's Construct after it had been willed into existence. We are to investigate the limitations and possibilities behind that. Any takers?"

As Usov cheerfully bullied a few of the less interactive Mists into co-opting that avenue of study, Anna slipped away and returned herself into the second reflective surface she found.

She liked Usov, and the rest of the Mists that came after her, but Anna was fully aware she probably owed her life to Miss Bazanova. She had very nearly killed herself with her own Constructs before she had been brought into the Zolotovs, and they used the fact the Storm-Cloud had proved to be one young Mist's Construction's undoing to help her.

Anna had not liked Mikhail the Storm at all, and her lack of regard for the other had been shared fully by him. Additional reason to gain control of herself or not, she still disliked the Storm even now they had next to nothing to do with each other.

She had long ago decided to be less annoying than Usov in how she supported their Storm-Cloud leader, but she did share keeping an eye on everything she was up to with him. She also knew Usov had said nothing of her help to Bazanova, he was a Mist and if she didn't take credit for her work he would.
Eventually things would come clean, so she wasn't too worried there.

While Usov watched what Bazanova held personal to her, Anna watched the clan and the other Flame user training groups that she had taken on professionally. The fact her job kept her out of a lot of the drama that came with their Flames aside, she had a particular niggling concern over Gedeon’s future reaction to having the shit beaten out of him on general principle.

Although he was a thug of a vor, he was at least pretty to look at when not covered in bruises.
(Wednesday the 11th of June, 1969. Tirana, Kingdom of Albania.)

When one was asleep, normally the introduction of a hundred and some-pounds of soaking wet human impacting them suddenly put them in very bad moods.

Cherep, on the other hand, was at first just exasperated.

"Seriously, Vipes?" He rolled the Mist off himself despite some grabbing of arms going on, reaching a hand to the tiny table lamp plugged into the extension cord that provided most the resident tents with electricity from the main generators. "I have a trip-"

The light switched on, giving the tent he lived out of a cast of yellowish light. The stuntman cut his words short when he realized Viper was glaring at him.

"...uh, hi?"

"Turn that off, you fool!" The Mist hissed, pressing… (no skirt + lack of a rack = male) himself backwards more firmly on Cherep's now soaked cot, out of view of the tent flap as far as he could go. "I might've been followed."

As his arm was still extended, he switched the light off obediently.

Cherep pressed his lips together and wondered what the fuck was going on in the dark as he readjusted himself to be more comfortable. Well, as comfortable as he could be with a very wet Viper shivering next to him and getting water into what passed as his bed and pajamas.

He wasn't really much of anything to hide behind, why the Mist came to him after outrunning something was... concerning.

…he had an extra blanket somewhere, right?

Probably under his bed. Groping around with one arm did net him something thick and possibly blanket-like, and he tossed it on his likely freezing friend before going back to trying to find the wool blanket he had for winter weather.

"...why did you just give me a pair of sweatpants?" Viper hissed in his ear.

"It's thick and warm. More importantly, dry. Shush." The water leaking onto the immortal stuntman was chilly, after all.

He was pretty certain had silence not been required for whatever maneuver the Mist was doing he'd be getting an earful about the methods of 'giving' used. Finally he gripped something thin and itchy, the wool blanket he bought a few years ago, and pulled that up and over the both of them.

Eventually, Viper stopped shivering as he leached off the stuntman's body heat reflected by the winter-weight blanket. That was also about the time someone nearby decided either to go for a way too early morning stroll or start poking around the circus' living tents.

They didn't have a dedicated security team, as the circus was civilian and didn't need one, but the odd patrols they did have had predictable routes and anyone needing a bathroom would've been direct about it.
As the steps got closer to his tent, Cherep eventually figured what the hell... he could at least do something to help. It wasn't like anyone could kill him.

Tugging the miser that was his friend abruptly to end up half-sprawled on top of him earned him a very nasty sounding hiss, and he got pinched harshly for tugging off Viper's cloak. Tossing the sopping wet garment to the floor, the Inverted Cloud kicked out just so to get the wool blanket to fall out of it's folds more and cover them both up.

That left the two of them in a reasonable facile of a lover's embrace, and without his hood and his violently indigo hair spread out everywhere Viper did look a bit different. Half sprawled across another warm body, very few people familiar with the gender fluid Mist's normally hooded visage and neatly contained behavior would think it was him in bed with someone else.

Cherep shut his eyes the last moment possible, after ensuring his friend wasn't trying to wiggle out of this. He pointedly did not hold his breath or shiver at the expectant pause and the brief draft of cool air happened, and just as pointedly did not open his eyes until the footsteps moved off far enough to be inaudible.

"...I am going to kill you."

"No," He whispered back just as softly as his friend hissed, "you're not. Stop moving."

"Why should I?"

"You were freezing. Shut up and get warm before doing anything."

Viper did finally stop pinching around his ribs viciously in exchange of burying his icy cold nose into his already clammy bare chest.

"Brat."

"…mou, you asked for it."

"Stop flirting and fuck already. Or go to sleep like the rest of us." A very different voice called over sourly, yet softly enough to show they were also aware of the unauthorized late-night visitor.

The stuntman tried really hard not to laugh at Viper's wide eyes as the other likely recalled he shared a tent.

A Flame user friendly circus wasn't in existence yet, but the Großes Volksfest was probably the closest any purely civilian outfit could get. Master Liam was aware of Mists and Clouds, and likely knew more that he hadn't stated right out yet to him.

None of the circus members were combat trained, but that didn't mean they had no combat skills for when unpleasantness popped up in their travels. He was pretty sure Jaq could take a few people out from sheer surprise or use his bulk just as handily as a weapon as he used his mauls or dumbbells, and that Faris could use every shiny and pointy thing in his arsenal he normally used in his acts.

Another voice popped up from the farthest corner of the tent, slurring his words together and causing both Cloud and Mist to strain to make out the words. "...is it over yet?"

"Pretty sure." Cherep informed his tent-mates in a still quiet whisper. "Give it a couple more minutes, though."

"Fuck. Well... stop flirting even still. Some of us are trying to sleep." The first voice carried back to them from the cot directly across from the stuntman's, the man in question punching his pillow for a better fit around his head.

Grinning down at his friend, he earned himself several more punishing pinches from the now highly vexed Mist he had pinned to his chest. Extra for each hitch and jerk of his chest as he silently laughed some more.

Fifteen minutes of getting pinched drove the Cloud out of his still dripping wet but now mostly warm bed, hauling Viper still wrapped up in his wool blanket with him. "Don't wait up for me, men."

"We won't. Fuck off already."

Their third tent-mate sat upright before the two of them escaped, apparently more awake now than his earlier slurred comment had suggested. "...should someone warn Master Liam?"

"I will. Go back to sleep." The stuntman assured him, pushing the Mist out of the tent before anyone could get a good look at him in the sliver of dawn just peeking over the tiny cityscape of tents set up. He shivered as they started off, because damn was it cool being slightly damp and it just barely past sunrise. "So... what is that all about?"

Viper blearily peered up at him mulishly, blinking rapidly in response to the sudden change in light levels and clutching the woolen cloth closer to himself. "I miscalculated. Mou, they had a Mist working with a Lightning at the... node I was checking into. I didn't expect the Lightning. Or anything but just other Mists."

Cherep hummed as he picked his way across the lanes set up between the various circus performers' tents, already resigned to frozen-feeling bare toes before the walk started. "I thought we were naturally supposed to gather up in groups."

"Limitedly. When there's a Sky structuring things, completely mixed groups happen. Outside of a Sky or Rain, or at worse a Cloud enforcing things, you mix more than two or three types together and things get... nasty." Insisted the miser sourly, hunching more into the thin wool blanket replacing his usual cloak. "A Mist group working with a Lightning, mou, Hardened Constructs that were extra responsive through that extra set of eyes. I had... issues. I can adapt now, but I was taken by surprise and forced off balance."

"Ah... so... why come to me? Vipes, I'm not a fighter or very imposing."

It was kind of the one thing that was bothering him as he didn't mind helping out his friend, but being pacifistic by nature meant he would have greatly preferred taking a lethal blow for the other than wonder how to stand harming someone else.

He could survive a lethal blow, Viper couldn't.

There was a very vicious, low mutter he couldn't make out.

"...come again?"

"...I panicked when I got forced out a window and survived a three story drop into a river. I thought warm and safe and... mou, ended up with you. Feel lucky part of the river didn't come along for the ride."

Cherep couldn't help the smirk that crossed his face. "Aw... you're my best friend too, Vipes. Outside my little sister, I mean."
He got a boney elbow in the gut in return.

"I help you out of the goodness of my heart... what's with all the abuse?" Especially his chest, he was going to have bruises everywhere over it and Tatiana was never going to let him live down if she caught sight of it.

"My nerves are shot, forgive me if I'm irritable." The Mist hissed out, then sneezed violently enough he came to a complete stop or would have risked face-planting in the muddy track they were on.

"...right. Lucky for you, I was leaving the circus for a stint anyways. You can come with me until you get over your cold."

"...that's not a good idea." Viper muttered through cloth, flesh, and bone, holding a hand and a corner of the woolen blanket to his reddening nose.

"I'm pretty sure you can't be worse than a delirious thief that will abandon her sick bed when you turn your back for a moment only to sneak around and curl up with the strongest person in the area." Cherep commented blandly, slinging an arm around his probably sick friend to keep him aimed in the right general direction and on his feet.

"...really?"

"Sonya never seemed to remember it. That she gave us all heart-attacks and basically was responsible for our father's first grey hair." He confirmed wryly. "Then it turned out to be a non-issue because she would seek out our foster father anyways if he just remained in place. But yes, that happened."

A sniff, a snuffle, and then the Mist sighed heavily. "Sick Mists lose control over their Constructions, Cherep. Mou, things are about to get very... strange around me."

The stuntman rolled his eyes, then spotted their destination around the 'corner' of a makeshift intersection of cloth, tent poles, and dew-soaked dirt. "Viper, my life is strange. I'm a stuntman that can't die violently, who hates violence but has very violent family and friends. I've come to terms with that a while ago, and since you're not scaring me off or can't kill me... I'd probably be the best one to nurse you back to health."

The next violent sneeze out of the miser served perfectly well to both prevent the next protest he was going to ignore anyways and announce them to the circus master just finished dressing himself. Likely to see to someone's report of an unknown poking about himself.

Master Liam gave first the stuntman then the shivering wet ex-apprentice an expectant look as he joined them outside of his tent. "Good morning? Cherep, and... I wasn't expecting to see you again, Miss... -ter Viper."

"I'm taking off a day early, Master Liam." Cherep informed the man a bit sheepishly. "Viper is... err, in a bit of trouble."

"Is that what this morning's early visitation was about?" Mused the older man, stroking his bristly mustache thoughtfully.

"I didn't mean to lead them here, mou." The Mist offered on just this side of sourly bland, sniffing hard. "But they can't visibly hunt me, so if I go and someone says they saw it they'll leave."

Smoothing down his facial hair one last time, the circus master finally gave a nod. "We'll be sure to lay various false trails to conceal the right one."
"Very proud, this one." Liam tossed to Cherep, then looked back at the former apprentice. "We are a Russian circus that travels to some distinctly unfriendly lands to Russians or anything that comes from the Soviet Union, young master Viper. Risk and Danger are old friends. You belonged once, and still do if you need it. I do think you need it... don't you?"

There was a moment when the only thing the Mist could do was grip the woolen blanket shielding him from wind and the cold compulsively. "...then what's the price?"

"Why, advertising of course!" Cheerfully announced the circus master, clapping the much slighter man on the shoulder once. "Spread the word of the Großes Volksfest's wondrous sights and amusements as far as you can, if you please. Ah... not the part where we give you sanctuary. That is for members only. And let us not make a habit of this without warning, yes?"

Almost knocked clean off his feet, and not by a sneeze this time, Viper stumbled into Cherep as Liam moved off to handle things.

"Best be on your way before we get into the swing of things, Cherep! We have a, ha, play to put on!"

"If I sit you down so I can gather my things, are you going to bolt on me?" Asked the stuntman dryly as he steadied his friend again. "Because if I have to hunt down a sick Mist like I do a sick Storm-Cloud, I'll be annoyed enough to get a recipe of some soup from my sister. She can't cook, Vipes, even I think it's inedible and I can eat most anything."

"...I need my cloak back. Mou."

"Sure you do."

Well... maybe he did, as since he was coming down with something he possibly couldn't Construct a replica to sneak away with.

Eh, he'll work with that.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 11th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"So... I'm going to be a little late getting there, little sis."

"It's fine." Sonya muttered through a filter then sighed, removed the cigarette from her lips and repeated herself more loudly when he tried to protest. "Cherep, it's fine. I've got the brat for two whole months, only a week's past and anytime in the last seven weeks we have will work. This one isn't as time sensitive, but you pull this one on me this fall and I will be annoyed. That one is."

She waved off Renato's curious look, and she was pretty sure he only went back to his own work because she said her brother's name.

"Eh, I'm taking advantage of that one to purchase a new bike in a capitalist country. It's business, I'll be there. I need a bike next year."

"Tats will be very unamused if you miss her entirely." The thief continued, tapping the ash off her cigarette into her ashtray. "She's already annoyed she missed 'tall, dark, and snarky' meeting Lisa for the first time."
The hitman snorted harshly, then busied himself with refreshing his espresso under her narrow gaze.

"It should only be a couple days. I don't think Viper's any worse than you are when sick."

"I refuse to believe that." Dismissed Sonya stoutly, huffing out the last of her lungful of smoke. "A week, or two? Right? I'll tell Bjorn not to expect his tutor for a bit, anything I should pass on as well?"

"Ah… hold a moment."

She pressed the phone receiver to her shoulder while the stuntman asked for the answer to that, looking at her guest as she replaced her cigarette between her lips. "You're being spared my brother's presence, enjoy."

"I only have few issues with your brother, little lady Sonya." Insisted the man sitting at her dining table, flicking a wrist in her direction. "None of which would irk me enough to pick a fight with him. You may rest assured even if he finishes up whatever he's off doing early and shows up I won't make an ass of the both of us."

"Delightful." Sonya deadpanned, taking a drag of her smoke and resetting the phone back to her ear to wait for any marching orders Viper had for her Lackey.

They really had to figure out a better system to contact and speak with each other, besides this phone tag thing they were playing now. How long until beepers were a thing? An actual cell phone might actually make her break her vow of never doing cutting edge technology again… and possibly murder a few people for.

"Vipes said she's only really lingering now because Bjorn's not entirely situated in his role just yet but is mostly trained for what you wanted. Apparently, the last few things require a spectacular mess up and how to mitigate the damage and handling business meetings in person." Cherep reported in an absent tone, likely repeating the Mist's quieter explanation to her in something she could actually hear. "And also, because you're… hey. Vipes. Not cool."

"Because I'm paying regardless?" Guessed Sonya, not remotely surprised at his grunt of confirmation. "It's fine, Cherep. My Lackey will earn back the money in the coming years anyways."

"Still… that's my sister, Viper."

"Cherep, again. It's fine. Viper and I have a different arrangement, I can afford it, don't mind paying, and we both are happy with it."

There was a tinny tisking sound, the then stuntman finally relented with a sigh. "…fine then. I'm pretty sure the world's not ready for the two of you to be friends, it might crack apart or something."

"Quite possibly." Drawled the thief, busying herself with the act of smoking as Viper made whatever rejoinder to that accusation they wanted to.

The snort, with actual amusement this time, told her the Mist had finished with their defense. "That's all on my end, Nya. Anything I should know on yours?"

"Not really. Valera decided his favorite statement is now 'mine' and is repeating it in Shamal's face all the time now."

"So, he's finally actually speaking to others?"
"If you can call it that."

It was frustrating the little Mist something fierce, he wanted to share but the baby Cloud wasn't willing to. Apparently, her brat could care less when it came to the toys Valera had but Sonya's lap and Lisa's attention alone... she was waiting for the moment Renato's person or his attention became a bargaining chip between the two.

She'd laugh, like the ass was doing to her now.

Shamal had at least lost that wary edge to him when it came to Valera, so really now it was just getting the baby Cloud to appreciate the little Mist as someone that wasn't afraid of giving back as good as he got. That much the brat had to do on his own, Sonya was only going to help him where his upbringing in Italy might've screwed a few things up for him.

Likely the two wouldn't really get along well until after Valera came to the unpleasant realization there were pitifully few people either reckless or irreverent enough to not be afraid of Clouds in the beginning. She had the same issues, but that also let her know that people like Shamal... or Renato who was her 'first reckless friend', were pretty fantastic ones.

Of course, it was rather annoying when confronted with a new reckless or irreverent person. She knew that one just perfectly well too. Fong was still annoying but edging into a decent one. Just as soon as she showed her displeasure with him and his idea of 'gift-giving'.

She maybe put way too much thought in it, but she wanted her brat to get along well with her family and that was the only comparison she could think up. There also wasn't another young Inverted Cloud around she could likely find for him, so a 'Renato-type' for Valera it had to be.

"Tats will be here when you get in." Sonya changed the subject with, stubbing out her still smoldering cigarette out. "Prepare yourself for a grilling about sick Mists and their behavior."

"Will do." Cherep confirmed with amusement. "Talk to you later sis."

"More like see you later, I highly doubt you'll call before you get in." She hung up before he could finish sputtering or protest that crack against his terrible communication keeping skills.

---

(Thursday the 12th of June, 1969. Sheremetyevo International Airport, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana swept Shamal up in a crushing hug the brat apparently had no idea how to deal with.

"Baby! It's so lovely to see you again!"

Sonya's brat made some kind of noise of either greeting or protest for the treatment, one arm waving a bit frantically poking out near her waist, his words muffled by the nurse's generous chest where his head ended up.

Thankfully, the airport terminal was decently busy with other reunions and people rushing about, so the fiery redhead's behavior wasn't attracting undue attention. The thief wondered if her sister would've even cared if they were attracting attention in droves.

She could almost feel Renato's conflicted expression from the other side of the pair. Giving him a questioning look had the man press his mouth into a line and refuse to look at either sister.
"Okay. "Tats, stop suffocating my brat."

"Whoops." Digging the red-faced kid out of her cleavage, she gave him a slightly lopsided smirk as she set him back on his feet. "Sorry about that. Habit when I'm off the clock, really. I've never gotten complaints before, though. Hopefully you won't be the first."

Shamal, after a couple gulps of fresh air, gave her a slightly wary grimace that was probably supposed to be a grin. "It's okay… uh, zia. I'm… I'll live."

"Trust me, you'll appreciate it in a few more years." Tatiana assured the kid with a few pats to his now very messy hair. Then she returned to standing straight up to mostly address her sister. "So, I know he's had the first of his bi yearly checkups earlier this spring, but you are kind of due for one around the end of the summer. You want me to…?"

"If you want. I don't really mind going to Doctor Kappel for it if you'd rather."

She then eyed the hitman who was apparently pointedly ignoring them. "And he's going to be continually stubborn, isn't he?"

"Actually…" Drawled the man for himself, tilting his head to the exit. "I've something to request. On your sister's insistence nonetheless. For later."

The nurse hummed Lisa's unspoken demand for more detail, but the Italian hadn't been raised to obey that and it was easier for him to dismiss it. Even if he apparently realized what she was doing and gave his fellow Sun a sardonically mocking flat stare in return.

"…zia? Can I ask you something?"

"Sure baby, you can ask me anything." Looking back up to the blonde sister, she held out her luggage claim ticket. "Can you fetch my stuff for me, Nya?"

"Sure." A little put out Shamal apparently didn't want to ask his question of her, and from the frown Renato didn't know what it was about either, the thief accepted the ticket.

The hitman would likely tell her if she asked.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 12th of June, 1969 continued. Sheremetyevo International Airport, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Shamal waited until his godfather was distracted bringing the car they had taken from the Zolotov motor pool to fetch his 'aunt', before looking up at her as they lingered in a quiet corner offset from the arrival/departure curb. "When did you start working… 'professionally'?"

"Is that what this is about?" Asked the nurse thoughtfully, studying his expression before she knelt down to his level and lowered her voice a little so her words would remain between them. "Let me guess, Lisa said something about Nya working the streets as a pickpocket before she hit eight and being a jewel thief by nine… and now you're wondering if you need to know what you're doing with your life soon."

"Mister Renato was apparently on the streets and already a hitman about the same time frame." He confided quietly, edging closer to his favorite nurse. "Even earlier, if not a Mafioso then."

Doctor Kappel had a couple nurses the four times he got taken in for a checkup so far, but the redhead was his mamma's sister. She was always happy to see him for his checkups, always had a hug for him when he arrived at the hospital she worked at, not just professionally pleased to see a patient.

The Mist knew perfectly well the difference between the two, and never minded checkups or shots so long as he got to see her.

"I only started after I hit thirteen. And your mamma helped me with my start. I also didn't stay in that profession, you know." The female Sun smoothed down his hair, absently as she thought. "Baby, people like Nya and tall, dark, and snarky are a bit... different, from you and me. They're the types to be good at almost anything they put their minds or hands to, especially with what they landed doing, and are both industrious people by nature. Matching your development to them either now or then will do you no favors. Take my word for it."

Shamal gave her a worried look.

He was six and had no idea what he wanted to do with his life.

While his mamma's thief skills were interesting, they were more fun to do as practice and scary to contemplate actually using as intended. He wasn't... even entirely sure what his godfather did for a living besides the contract 'murders' he took on and was definitely sure he was probably not ready for that either.

"No, baby. I mean it. I tried matching myself up against Nya when we were growing up. It made me miserable." Insisted his zia strongly, a faint frown on her bright red lips and a worried pinch to the rest of her pretty features as she stared at him seriously. "Your mamma was good at so much I wasn't, and what I was good at meant little to her. I focused too much on the skills, so she'd have a reason to look up to me or seek my help, and overlooked the fact Nya just liked me for being her sister and putting up with her... not because I could help her professionally."

"But... you heal." As far as the young Mist was aware, Sun Flame healers were jealously guarded back in Italia.

Mister Renato didn't like it when that was pointed out to him and would have nasty things to say about people who assumed things later.

It was the same here, right?

"And healers are the best. But I didn't know I was good for it back then, didn't know what I was, and I was trying to be just as good as my sister at our original profession." Tatiana tapped his nose, rising up to her full height as she caught sight of the car being driven by an Italian hitman and her sister muscling her luggage about. "Baby, if it worries you that much... talk to them about it. I bet you, Nya will call you silly for worrying about this."

The sisters shared a look, strangely pointed on his zia's side and faintly confused on his mamma's.

"I'll give you one more bit to puzzle over, baby. I'm better than Nya on a few things naturally, just as she's better than me in a few of her own. Try figuring that out, what you're better at than your mamma or your Mister Renato. Then make that your profession if you want to be needed."

Shamal's mamma still looked confused as she handed the luggage over to the Mafioso. "...I'm not good with people?"

"Ho? No, really? I never noticed." Renato tossed over a shoulder, loading the boot of the car with the nurse's things. Then, after shutting the boot door, caught sight of the less than pleased look both women were giving him. "...what?"

The blonde thief glanced at Tatiana, who pressed her very red lips together and sniffed in mock insult in his direction. "Stick with Nya, baby. Apparently at least she has some modesty."

"I am perfectly modest... when it's called for." Insisted the hitman, glancing first to Shamal as he passed the man to climb into the back seat with the nurse then to her. Then finally to Sonya before he left the Mist's view. "Brat is having qualms over if he needs to work now or later."

"Ah..." Hesitating, the thief bent to look at the faintly red-faced Shamal inside the car trying to hide his blush instead of shutting the rear passenger door. "Brat. When you're ready. I don't care how long it takes."

"I might." Renato muttered somewhere behind her, skirting around the backwards kick his mamma aimed blindly in his direction to round the car and get back to the driver's seat.

"I do not expect you to do anything job related until you're fourteen, and that's just picking something by then. I won't even care if you decide to follow your zio's footsteps and go completely civilian. I'll help you on your way anyways." She caught the hitman's skeptical look as he seated himself behind the wheel and made a face at him. "Not that it's likely, but it's possible and should be made clear."

The Mafioso snorted sardonically as he settled in behind the wheel. "Yes, possible. When we all tend to scorn the law enforcement, disregard the military as a matter of fact, and rarely have good things to say about most civilian occupations we come across."

Rolling her eyes in response, the thief straightened up and finally shut the car door.

"So... what did you expect that to be like?" Zia Tatiana asked teasingly, helping him with his seat buckle that his mamma was very insistent about.

"...not that." Shamal had kind of been afraid his mamma was teaching him her skills because she expected him to follow her footsteps.

Which wasn't a bad idea, he hastily tacked onto the thought before his godfather could somehow reach around the driver's seat to whack him for thinking unflattering thoughts about a massive favor his mamma was doing for him. After a frozen moment where he wasn't knocked upside the head, the Mist blew out a sigh.

It wasn't a bad thought, or plan... just not one he was sure he wanted to do with his life.

He'd keep the skills he was being taught, and practice to keep them sharp. His godfather would have some nasty things to say about it if he didn't, but it was something of his mamma's so he wouldn't have to be nudged.

The young Mist hadn't actually given any thought of what he was going to do for a living. His plans had mostly been either getting his godfather to start dating his mamma so she'd show up more or manage to get her interested in raising him more personally. Which happened, and he wouldn't mind that first one coming true either, but the one that was almost achieved was nice enough.

Taking a year or two to get everything settled and set, not to mention just relax with everything going alright finally since his dad died, was what he had intended on doing... until nonna said a few things about his mamma's career and when it started.

If he took a year or two to simply enjoy things... he'd be at the age his godfather and mamma was when they set out to handle their own lives. If they started then, when did they expect him to start handling his own affairs?

He barely knew how to tell time using a clock, he couldn't keep appointments!

He'd end up like his mamma and end up late for everything… mostly.

"This is apparently going to be a thing." Renato informed Sonya blandly as they left the airport terminal for the highway, which got a bemused blink from her.

"How the hell can you tell that? You're not even looking at the kid's face. You better not be looking at his face and not the road. Moscow traffic can get… weird."

"There's a rear-view mirror, Tatiana." The hitman pointed out sardonically, readjusting it a bit to help make his point and so the two in the back seat could catch sight of his unimpressed look. "And I noticed."

"There was a bear on the streets on our way down here." Chipped in the thief, pulling her chin off the palm of a hand propped up on the windowsill and ignoring the fact the man driving the car tensed up while she talked. "Renato was not amused at the usual way we deal with such things here."

"Someone shot it in the head with a shotgun or an automatic rifle and someone else put in a claim on the carcass to make dinner with?"

"Surprisingly enough, yes. Exactly that happened, a rifle this time, right in front of us. As a matter of fact, we were asked if we were putting in a claim for the bear carcass since we stopped first. Renato said no, without checking with me." Sonya tossed back neutrally, waving a hand around in a very sarcastic manner. "Why… it almost sounds like it's done fairly often around here if you knew that before I said-"

"Shut. Up."

Zia's eyebrows, which were equally as red as her braided hair, rose up like nonna Lisa's did when she was highly amused. "...tall, dark, and snarky didn't happen to ask what happens when we come across them outside of automobiles, did he?"

"I did, zia." Shamal informed her gleefully. The opportunities he had to tease his godfather were few and rare. "Go to the nearest house and ask for something to hunt it with, and if they want a part in exchange for the use and bullet."

Little weird, but hey. When in Rome and all that.

Even better, he was gifted with a very proud smile from the nurse and a less suffocating hug. "Aww… baby. A little man after my own heart. Good work."

There was a very near audible sound of either a rocky growl or the grinding of teeth that came from the driver seat. Shamal was very impressed, his godfather didn't even have any Mist Flames to help him.

"…so!" The nurse broke the silence when mamma just returned to staring out the open passenger window next to her and the hitman fumed silently. "What else has been happening around here?"

"No, returning to that subject." Interrupted his godfather exasperatedly before anything could be mentioned, wheeling the car off the highway and down a faintly familiar road of downtown Moscow. "Exactly how many guns are generally available to the general households around here?"
Tatiana snickered. "So long as it's called a 'hunting rifle' on the paperwork..."

"An AK-forty-seven?"

"As long as it's used for hunting..." Sonya repeated some of her sister's words with a shrug. "...occasionally. More common to see that outside the city limits, though. I was expecting a shotgun."

"Those old soldier types frequently refuse to give up their service weapons." Continued the nurse, grinning at the back of the older Italian's head. "Especially when they purchase them."

"Our school children are taught to shoot as part of the public-school curriculum." Tacked on the thief, still with a very bland tone of voice. "You take the brat to the ranges around here for practice, you won't even be given an odd look for it. Fuck Renato, we have a firing range the trainees can go shoot things at a little higher than his age that doesn't require parental supervision for any firearms practice. We actually have two now, one I had to have built!"

The look he shot his mamma was blistering. She stared back at him even when he returned to scanning the road, looking entirely bored.

"Can we?" Shamal had never handled a gun but had to admit to some curiosity.

He had watched Mister Renato clean his guns and make bullets a few times, and it was always fascinating to see.

"If your Mister Renato is suffering from culture shock too much to take you, I can." The red headed nurse informed him cheerily. "I taught Nya, baby."

"No. I'll teach him to shoot." Snapped the hitman, waited a beat, then shot another look at the thief that was a lot less scathing. "...Sonya, you know how to shoot?"

"Of course I do." She frowned back for a moment, then huffed as they both turned back to the road. "I may not use guns often, but I can."

Tatiana beamed at Shamal. "Apparently it's going to be a family outing. Sorry, baby. I can teach you something else if you'd like."

Oooh, Shamal possibly had an ally for hooking his godfather up with his mamma.

---

(Friday the 13th of June, 1969. Giglio Nero Headquarters, Lecce, Apulia Region, Italian Republic.)

In a natural alcove made by a pair of oaks, just off of an inner courtyard within the Giglio Nero Manse Headquarters, Luce fussed over the silver serving tray on a tiny wrought iron and glass table.

It was situated between her own wrought iron chair and the empty one across from her, neither with padding and no extra frills on the tray or table.

A few more references to the old family journals about how to set up things for her expectant guest, and she finally had to admit there was nothing else to do but wait.

Today wasn't a good day, but that did not excuse poor manners.
She might find the black iron and glass table ugly, the two matching chairs equally so and uncomfortable, but it was tradition. Her impending guest was also not the type to appreciate changes suddenly sprung on him, so the ancient heirloom items now set up and waiting with the hot tea and coffee were dug out of storage and cleaned for use.

Now she had to figure out what to do with them after this day, because if she didn't reuse them again some of her people might question why she had them refurbished and cleaned to very specific detail in the first place.

Pressing the journals back into the pearl and opal inlayed, Mist Flame imbued, wooden chest, Luce locked it up again and tucked the containers under her chair. Then she eyed the key left in her hand before returning it to the necklace she wore.

She really should get on moving and securing all the information her famiglia had on the generations of Arcobalenos and who they were. Sonya de Mort would not be a patient Cloud when it came to her at first, and Sky really wouldn't bet on even her best men successfully guarding her things against a woman that could possibly be the World's Greatest Thief.

There was still a buffer, but it was steadily shrinking day by day. Finding somewhere to hide it all the Russian wouldn't find in three seconds flat the moment she suspected the Sky had a secret cache of information connected to their situation was proving to be rather… vexing.

She had been staring out over the well-groomed lawns, it was the only reason she caught the sudden appearance of a man's shadow stretching over the empty chair across from her and the brick patio she was at.

…well, man wasn't entirely correct in this instance.

No flare of Flames, no wispy lingering Mist Flames. She couldn't even sense him until he decided she could.

Very, very well-controlled Flames.

"Ottavia of the Giglio Nero, I presume?"

Luce looked up at her guest with a serene smile she didn't feel. "I was named Luce, Uncle Kawahira. Tea?"

After a beat, the white haired being nodded absently and took the steps to seat himself across the Donna. "Every generation I come and ask, now?"

She very carefully didn't grimace or frown at the other. At his age, manners were probably of little importance.

However, she did know what he was asking from her ancestor's journals and that might contribute to his curtness. She could forgive that.

Was he finally going to have to sacrifice the last living relatives of a very old friend he once had, was the real question he wanted to know the answer of. Sepira, her ancestor who hadn't left a journal for her and the founder of her famiglia, was once a very good friend of his and for a long time his only surviving fellow.

"I'm afraid I will be the next Sky of the Arcobaleno, Uncle Kawahira." Luce answered him calmly, obediently to the script of the conversation she had foreseen numerous times to learn the pitfalls within it. "Your second choice would succeed for a small while, but the Elements will end up murdering him before long due to a messy betrayal. The third would never manage to keep them from splitting apart before they come together as you need."

No offence Nono Vongola, the Sky added in her head, but only a few of them would really like you after they got to know how you work.

The only real reason she was the best option was because she had foreseen the hot button issues, and the few shaky ways to guide them all past them. Some of them… were entirely… not professional.

Why did it matter what gender Viper had?

Luce didn’t get to see that one fully but did know who to send after the Mist in order to smooth it over enough to keep things on track. Surprisingly, not the obvious choice.

The green tea she had acquired on the sly steaming away in front of him, Kawahira stared at her flatly behind his round spectacles. He had black eyes like the hitman Sinclair, but they were so much more… dead and flinty.

"I see." Kawahira answered after a long moment, examining the layout of the tray between them for a few moments.

"Also," Continued the Sky now that was tentatively accepted, "you have to wait another two years before even contacting them personally."

The wind blew, the birds twittered overhead and around them. She picked up her coffee to fuss with while the being across from her decided if he was going to actually believe in her prowess of her family’s legacy of future visions or discard her advice.

Eventually, thin fingers crepted around the fragile porcelain as Kawahira picked up his own beverage. "Explain."

"None of them are ready, the ones you need to last and take on the worst of the strain into this generation will refuse in the next two years for various reasons. Godchild, family, duty, business, violence, indifference. If you do not get them specifically… when that backlash of being cursed sets in, in Flame, body, mind… they will murder each other if they are not skilled enough to survive each other becoming… feral. None of the others I see you pick if the first set refuses… none of them will survive it and you’ll have to replace a few to all of them immediately anyways. With the third Strongest, who the first will know or find out about and will not be pleased with the results of what almost happened to them."

That was the test, she was sure. Luce was more than certain that her guest knew perfectly well what happened to his picked Arcobalenos when they were inducted, and he already had considered the most likely things that would happen this round and planned for it.

He was a Mist himself.

"And what of me if I wait your two years, little Luce?"

"Japan has lovely countryside. There is a small town by the name of Namimori, nothing bigger than a hiccup will happen there for almost thirty years. By the time something does happen, you will be fully recovered from your trials."

For you, Yuni. Hopefully, please, let this work…

Kawahira, the Man in the Iron Hat, Checkerface… he had spared the world of at least two or three sets of Arcobalenos. The side effects of denying Tri-ni-set those fourteen or twenty-one or more sacrifices had already started showing up in the world much less in the faint lines of stress on his face.

Not to mention the reedy feel of his Flames, when she had been expecting intensely overpowering Mist Flames from her journals many descriptions of her ancestors' own single visits.

The fluxing numbers of Flame users available all around the world was merely the most visible sign of what he was doing and the ripples from it all.

"Because you have put it off, we will not actually last very long. Strongest of our Era or not. I will last... less than a decade." Luce pressed a hand to her stomach, her last preparation in those two years would be to conceive and birth her Aria. Her daughter, who she was damning with her words in hopes her grandchild could finish this off for good. "My daughter will take up the Sky Pacifier after me for almost as long, her daughter after."

A tiny crack split a side of the tea cup Kawahira held, which widened until a good half of the ancient cup fell to shatter against the glass table with the tinker of a glassy substance striking more solid glass, but no tea spilled out across pale fingers that didn't even twitch.

The light green liquid remained cupped as if the porcelain had remained whole.

That... would be a bitch to replace with either an adequate replica or an antique cup matching specific criteria still intact from someone else's heirloom set. Time, accidents, and just general age had already claimed the others from this set.

Her words were a massive blow to the other, and his long-held hope to never involve the remnants of his last companion into the cycle of sacrifice to the albatross he administered. She understood that much, if not the weight of age that made it all so much more bitter.

The breaking of the priceless tea cup was forgiven in the same instant it broke.

What she said was basically the end of her line, a decade for Luce and a decade for Aria who would probably only just afford the time to continue their family... then Yuni wouldn't last much more supposedly. Not even a pause between sacrifices, the very last of whatever her line meant to the other would supposedly end in the next thirty years.

Luce turned her mind to what else she had left to do while Kawahira adjusted to that bombshell.

Write her own journal for her daughter and granddaughter and hopefully more, which would only be updated well after the Curse was set and the Elements left her until her end. Letters for each of the next Skies, mostly just to beg forgiveness.

Hiding the damn secret section of the library from a damnably curious and suspicious thief.

If only half of Sonya de Mort's Flames weren't tied into all of Skull de Mort's, then she wouldn't have to hide the books and documents at all. She could've... well...

Luce only had to hide it for a decade, didn't she?

It wouldn't matter after the Curse was set, and personally she didn't have the bravery to face the recriminations for hiding it all in the first place from the people she was sacrificing. Hmm...

"The others will last longer. The Cloud... well, the Clouds, I can't tell yet how you will decide to deal with that... it changes nearly every day still, will be the first to fall."
Via murder, murder and revenge, suicide via overwhelming opponents, grief and stress, or… well, that also changed day by day and she could not get a clear picture of what will happen.

It wasn't hers to see, for although she would be the first Sky Arcobaleno… they would not be her Elements.

"Usually, the Clouds are one of the last." Kawahira observed dispassionately, still holding only half of a teacup and not spilling the hot contents as he sipped it casually.

"Our Sun will be last." And… then either nothing would happen to him or the Vindice would have a new member. "Our Cloud is… well..."

"Twinned. I noticed. You wouldn't happen to know who is on the other end of that, would you?"

Faintly expectant, he was accepting that she could foresee strongly enough to offer some advice.

Luce felt the ball of ice lodged in her gut melt, because it really could've gone so wrong… "Brother and sister. She called herself Sonya de Mort in my visions. If that is her name now… I can't say."

"…sibling Clouds? Polarized Clouds twinned from birth? No… that's not actually possible. They don't both survive long like that or suppress each other and never actually find their Flames."

"Adopted." Luce explained simply, before those fact made the Mist suspicious of how truthful she was being about her visions.

Sonya would bitch in the coming years about it fairly often, how the thief was 'required' to care for Skull because he was her brother. Only for the immortal stuntman to counter with the fact they were 'adopted, genetics don't count' in a teasing tone.

The sister had never said anything against it in Luce's visions, letting her brother's words stand uncontested, and it really was the only possible explanation that fit all facts. They didn't look like twin siblings separated from birth, one was the older brother the other the younger sister with a year difference between them, and their coloring alone was too far off for them to be biologically related.

The faintly baffled expression that flashed across his face was probably the most humanizing thing she had seen so far from the other, but the Sky knew better than to comment.

"I don't know their history. The sister will not like me at all even if the brother will just fine in spite of it, and they will refuse to open up about it in my lifetime." To be fair, Luce was practically stabbing the siblings in the back right now.

Selling them out, more, but eventually… the term used wouldn't matter much. She deserved the always faintly suspicious and semi-hostile behavior from one half.

It wouldn't be much of an impediment in the end, anyways.

Frankly, since Sonya never would warm up to her, thinking of her at the end hurt less. Skull on the other hand, his turning from her… was probably one of the ones that hurt the most.

Funny how that worked.

"Aside the twinned Clouds and their situation, there's a pair of Rains possible… we will end up preventing their bond though just giving one a spot as the Rain." Lal Mirch and Colonello, and frustratingly she still couldn't see which of them her Arcobaleno of Rain was.
"Easier to do than work around an established one, if it can't be broken."

…bad plan. Very, very bad plan.

Luce couldn't quite keep the wince off her features or keep herself from paling as she recalled that vision.

Discorded Clouds… were never a good thing. A pair of them, one the functionally immortal Strongest Cloud of the Era and the only other one capable of very nearly matching him or knew how to go about copying his ability?

Kawahira caught the flinch she made from the thought, unsurprisingly enough. "No? Well… no matter. I've worked around such things before and will again after this."

"There's more to both sets, and."

"Of course there is." The other countered, no inflection in his tone to tell her anything about where to go from this point. "There always is. But… as I have another two years to gather more information and adjust my plans…"

Luce would not see Uncle Kawahira ever again after this, the next time she would lay eyes on the being he would be Checkerface instead. Handing out the invitations that would seal their fate, and already fully aware of what he would be doing and solid plans to act from.

After the 'Fated Day', she would only see him one more time on her deathbed to hand the Sky Pacifier to her daughter.

Everything, every single thing, had to be started from this one conversation. Even if it would take three decades and three Skies from her family and… two attempts. Somehow.

"I… might be too removed from it, but there is something… off, about the Representative Battles for the next generation after us."

She held her breath as his flat eyes flicked back up to hers from examining the shattered teacup he was still steadily draining.

"Both a false and a true one, both not done at first and done second." She explained, fully aware that was as clear as mud but unable to explain it more clearly. "It's not like the face of the Rain, how the Sun survives, the gender of the Mist, nor the fate of the Clouds, and how they clearly change every time I look. There is only two ways it goes, and I cannot see which will be. In one, the Battles are not called even when all but the third Sky of this generation and the other Rain die. Then do you call for it both after and before the first time you don't, once the issues within Tri-ni-set have been straightened out. The Vindice interfere, but back off for reasons I cannot see from here that involve the Sun and a young Sky he associates with then."

She already had his full attention, especially mention the… whatever it was Yuni would have to navigate somehow. Clouded as though that path was to her, the Eight Sky of the Giglio Nero could make out just enough about the Tenth's lifetime. The next version was harder.

Luce swallowed uneasily. "The other… again, at first the Representative Battles are not called… and you let this generation of Arcobaleno die off one by one again. And then, somehow both after and before, you call the Representative Battles before they weaken to the point killing them is possible… but the Vindice hijack it and refuse to allow it to play out. With that, Tri-ni-set cracks apart and the world with it."
That would be if the Decimo of Vongola failed in using the leavers she was going to try to put in place for him, to end the Arcobaleno Curse. Conversely, also if she failed to do enough in her lifetime that was about to be horribly shortened to maybe a bare decade more from now.

Kawahira was too old, too bitter, and way too tired to believe her if she said the grindstone he fed the strongest of each era to could be stopped cold.

Mentioning the end would have him discard it out of hand and ignore any further mention when the time came. This way… he might conclude that giving in when it comes up will just allow things to continue, only for things to end how she wanted them to anyways.

He had once tried to end the Curse he had to apply and reapply again and again in order to keep the world working… and failed miserably.

Admittedly, using the remnants of those that once bore the Curse to engineer a permanent source the Pacifiers could feed off of required that miserable mistake to have been made in order to be possible at all.

Luce had a headache trying to sort out everything she had seen, gathered together, and was either about to or was putting into play.

"…interesting."

She could almost believe her guest really thought that, as far she knew from her ancestors’ journals no other seer from Sepira's line had such convoluted visions.

The end was a confusing, jumbled mess.

Things she would and wouldn't do, things Aria would or wouldn't do, things Yuni would and wouldn't do. Then all the things this next generation of the Strongest of the Era would or would not do.

All of it kept assaulting the Ottavia of the Giglio Nero when she strained her abilities to see if she could do anything more to help.

It was too far beyond her, and the continued attempts were doing her no favors when she still had to check her work in her last decade against the future in hopes of the best outcome possible. While a parasite of a stone fed off her Sky Flames at the same time and made her life fall too short to finish everything.

Kawahira didn't intend to associate with her or Aria much… or just wouldn't. Guilt, self-hatred, pity, whichever reason he wouldn't linger with her or her daughter.

He did plan on trying something to save Yuni from the Curse of the Sky Arcobaleno after the Representative Battles. Something to preserve the last trace he would ever have of others like him aside the burden he intensely hated so much he was beyond numb to it.

Luce knew it, and probably more about him than most others since Sepria from the visions of futures that wouldn't end the Arcobaleno Curse. All because she kept pushing and straining for anything that might help or hinder.

Not what she had been looking for, but interesting to know anyways.

"I have nothing else for you, Uncle Kawahira." She finally admitted, still worried and impatient for the privacy to check to ensure she hadn't messed up the opening steps of this nasty and macabre waltz with time, fate, and the end of all things. "As always, you have a-

"Thank you, miss Luce of the Giglio Nero." Interrupted the impossibly powerful and ageless Mist before she could complete the offer they all gave him. "Until next time."

"I will not see you, Uncle Kawahira, until my end." She corrected softly. "So goodbye, instead."

"...that is probably better, yes." The other observed softer still. "I'm sorry."

The Sky blinked as he just vanished from her sight and her senses.

She… had not foreseen an apology from him. Ever.

What did that mean?

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 13th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Blinking at the list of names and criminal specialties currently sitting between them, Verde glanced up to Adrik blankly. "...what."

"Apparently, prostitution is very popular in your home country." The Russian generalized for him with a smirk, as if the scientist didn't have eyes and could read that much for himself.

The Lightning wordlessly turned to his… 'tutor' in Lightning Flames.

Björn shrugged, grimaced, and tugged his suit jacket back into place. "I am only reporting what I am told. I have only been to France once myself, and not to do any of… that."

"I think..." Continued the only really fully-fledged criminal between the three of them, grinning broadly. "...I am not going to mind helping you pick a syndicate, Verde my man."

"You are not assisting, Adrik."

"What? Come on! Man, you're going to need help hawking your abilities, so you don't end up a..." He coughed once, then hurried on before finishing that thought or either sitting with him could ask. "Anyway! You're going to need help, Sonya's going to pave the way in sounding a few out... but negotiating with them to join up is going to be... tricky."

Pinching the bridge of his nose, the ex-college student heaved a tired sigh. "I have no objections to whatever aid you are willing to give me, Adrik. Just you are not assisting with the understanding of why Sonya has sent a list of prostitution rings in France rather than something more scientifically geared."

"Probably because whoever she talked to was a lot more interested in the prostitution available rather than anything else there. And this is what she's gotten so far." Relented his old lab partner, giving the list a strange look of its own. "You know, for Sonya... that is kind of weird. Who the hell can actually talk to her about sex? She's just so... bland when it comes up normally and that off-puts a lot of people."

"May we change the topic, please?" Asked the Icelander a bit desperately. "I do not wish to know that much of my Dama's life, or speculate about it."

"Dude, don't you have work to be doing?"
The Lackey grabbed that excuse with barely concealed relief. "Yes, yes I do. Forgive me, gentlemen, but I must leave you now."

He scrambled to snatch up the other list he wrote upon speaking with his boss, then barreled out the door fussing with the lay of his tie.

Smirking, the Russian shook his head and pulled the list they were given over to read through closer. "Well then… now we're alone and can gossip to our heart's content-"

"I'd rather not." Verde interjected flatly.

"-or give this some real attention and weed out the suggestions you'd rather not like." Finished Adrik without missing a beat. "Admittedly, you don't have to wait on the boss lady to pick a way for you. There's French syndicates that visit, and entire section of the island dedicated to the French underworld over with the rest of the European slices."

"We've avoided it because you said it was 'West-side', and therefore more frivolous than-"

"Ah! I said it was nightclubs, bars, casinos, and the occasional whore house. Stop prettying up my words, man."

"Regardless," snapped the Frenchman, "we have since avoided that side of the island since you could not guarantee any safety."

"I can't guarantee your safety now, it's just easier on me for you to stay in the more residential sections." Batting the whole topic away with a hand as if it could help to physically assault a line of communication, the Russian discarded the first page of syndicates and their nominal areas of expertise. "Seriously, you've been reckless before once in your life that I know of. In Sonya's face, nonetheless. Kind of the same situation man, you risk nothing you get little back… but risk more and it might pay off dividends."

Odds were never Verde's favorite parts of mathematical calculations. Too much chance getting in the way, but his… friend's words did make a certain amount of sense.

"…I suppose. I would rather not venture into an area you are not equipped to facilitate me in defending my life, but if they venture out…"

"And they have to, in order to get off the island. Eventually." Adrik peered at him from over the remaining last page of the report. "So… about this list…"

"Is there anything in there that is not a prostitution ring?"

"Well… yeah. Alright, there's a couple we can investigate for you here using the info brokers-"
Chapter 58

(Saturday the 14th of June, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Nya, the next time someone says to you 'are you bored, because I really want to nail you'… they're not trying to pick a fight. They want to fuck you."

Sonya paused and thought about it, and by Lisa's expression the halt in ministrations was not remotely appreciated, then shrugged the correction off. "Either way, probably would've resulted the same. I didn't even know the guy."

Probably… and she wondered why her sister was still a virgin. Tatiana sighed heavily, giving a despairing look to their mother on the opposite end of the couch only to get a very mildly chiding one in return.

How did that even work?

She should've seen Sonya and Renato together and how they behaved, it wasn't just in her head! It was so tooth-rottenly domestic Tatiana's teeth hurt just by being in the same room, and with their brat heaped on top it was even worse.

She slept on the couch in Sonya's hotel room last night, and she was pretty damn certain she had cavities from the whole production of making dinner much less this morning with a production made out of morning habits and breakfast.

The Italian stud in question was teaching her little sister a couple tricks in cooking in a teasing, high handed kind of way and the conversations… it was all about either Renato's pending work in Moscow or the brat and what to do with him in between their own duties.

It wasn't just her little sister being comfortable around someone, she was around herself and the rest of the family just as much and Tatiana knew what that looked like.

Sonya was taking advice from the hitman. About cooking sure, but she was accepting it without being a total brat about it or defaulting to a book instead.

The nurse was also pretty certain Renato stared at her ass this morning too, while they debated on if the man had enough information to start casing whatever it was he was looking for in the Soviet Union or if another few days of getting the system the Zolotovs had would help him any moving around.

"That is a horrible pickup line, though." Continued the youngest thief after a long moment of puzzling over the incident she was pulling the words from, working in the lotion the nurse supplied for pedicures into their mother's feet.

Bless her little sister for recalling this promise, and even following through with it while her brat spent time picking locks without someone guiding him through the procedure. Then again for testing out how hard might be too hard on her own feet before offering to do it for her older sister.

Sonya might be weirdly against being held and touched, but she was pretty good at the whole masseuse thing.

…and now she had to stop using her little sister's obliviousness for laughs. Damn.
Why did this have to happen now?

There were so many things she could've used... it would've almost been too easy.

Laughing lightly, because at this point it was either laugh or cry, the nurse racked her mind for the pick-up lines she found tacky. "Oh, I know. I think the worst one I heard was 'spread your legs. I'll give you a one-eight British invasion.'"

"Excuse me?" Lisa questioned sharply, eyeing her foster daughters skeptically as she lifted her head from the back of the couch.

"I know. Horrible." Commiserated the elder sister with their mother, flexing her mostly finished toes to help the nail polish dry faster. "I tossed my drink in that smartass' face, Lisa. Let's see..."

"I lost my virginity, can I have yours?" Sonya tacked on in complete deadpan as she finished with the cream and rubbed the remains into her hands, which startled a laugh out of the older woman in the room. "There was also some asshole in Mafia Land... what did he say? 'You've got a nice set of legs, what time do they open?'"

"Oh... oh no. I've gotten that one too a few times. There was a guy in the hospital... 'Don't be so picky... I'm not!'"

"Is it hot in here or just you?" Countered her little sister as she picked up the bottle of nail polish to shake up since it had sat between now and the last use, still in a bland tone of voice which made everything sound so much more ridiculous when repeating tacky pick-up lines. "You must be tired, because you've been running through my mind all day."

"If I told you that you had a beautiful body, would you hold it against me?" Tatiana breathed out in an over the top sultry tone to Lisa, getting a few more disbelieving chuckles from the elder Russian woman.

Sonya's next flat bid of 'I lost my number, can I have yours?' right on the heels of her own overblown suggestion had their mother finally giving an actual laugh instead.

"Hey baby, as long as I have a face, you'll have a place to sit."

There was a pause instead of the expected deadpan counter. "...wait, that's a pickup line?"

Tatiana face-palmed as their mother laughed harder. "It's a sex reference, sis."

"...sorry. Ah... 'Did it hurt? When you fell from Heaven.'"

"Better." Dear God, she had to get Sonya to read Cosmopolitan or something. "Um... darling, if you were cocaine I'd overdose."

"...oh."

The nurse refused to stop, because then she'd have to wonder exactly how many times her baby sister had heard the same corny pickup lines only to think about the logical interpretations rather than the flirty ones. "Baby, you're sexier than socks on a rooster."

"I call bull. That's not..." She pulled a face as she puzzled over that one, mindlessly twisting the cap to the nail polish she had in hand. "...that one doesn't even make any sense."

"They're pickup lines, they don't always make sense. Or get translated over correctly." Tatiana commiserated with her, that one was weird. "How about… this one makes more sense in English so: 'Baby, you put 'Hot Ass' in my 'Shot Glass'."

"…this is going to go nowhere quickly." The youngest woman decided firmly, gripping Lisa's left ankle to finish up giving pedicures. "I'm ending on I'm not feeling myself today, can I feel you?"

"Are you a light switch? Because I want to turn you on." She tossed back with a waggle of her eyebrows, eyeing their mother's vastly amused expression as she laughed on her end of the couch.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 14th of June, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Tatiana, please do not tell me you were trying to pressure your sister into something she wasn't ready for."

"No! I didn't! Nya had the power of veto the entire time and used it right up to the end too." Insisted the nurse hastily under Lisa's very well practiced 'disapproving-mom-glower'. "It's just… on our vacation to France, all the men I thought she'd like were basically ignored. Oh, she tried, but it was… just…"

While the younger woman struggled to figure out how to phrase it, the elder Russian breathed deeply and tried to keep in mind she was blessed with very smart children.

Occasionally they were too smart for their own good or her peace of mind, but at least they were decently intelligent enough to get themselves out of situations they didn't like.

Sonya hadn't mentioned anything she was annoyed at her sister about, so it was possible the younger thief wasn't particularly bothered by any undertones or even the whole incident itself.

"…how she was with them is nothing compared to her with her Italian stud, and you have to have seen it by now." Apparently deciding that either she could do it no justice with mere words, or to skip it entirely, the redhead continued despite her mother's less than pleased expression. "Those men barely gained ten minutes of her time, and she bored of them and the flirting quickly. Tall, dark, and snarky's been her friend for almost a decade, and they're raising a brat together."

"Be that as it may, if your sister is not looking at him like that it's her right." Lisa commented neutrally, rubbing at her suddenly aching forehead. "They're friends, Tats. Yes, they have an oddly close one for how few times a year they meet. But frankly… suddenly pushing them together would do nothing more than make your sister stubborn or uncomfortable with him or us, whatever he may want, like, or protest about on top of that aside."

No, she wasn't blind and had already started poking one half of that equation about things. However, up until her youngest daughter decided to experiment or that she wanted a lover it was only something to wonder about and a thing to keep an eye on him so he didn't make Sonya uncomfortable.

‘Adorably domestic’ wasn't something she'd label the two, but it was possible they were more like that when the Italians weren't on their best behavior for Sonya's mother.

"Around her age, I didn't want a lover either." She continued, picking absently through the few pieces of paperwork that she and Arseniy had to hand into the clan later tonight to get a few things around the neighborhood fixed up. "As a matter of fact, around eighteen was exactly when I was in Mafia Land with the intent to never look back."

Tatiana goggled at her, flicking a glance upstairs where her man was sleeping with a napping Valera. "But... Arseniy?"

"Was in prison at the time, and neither of us really had known what we were doing in a relationship."

"...no, no, no. Lisa, you can't leave that story there." Insisted the redhead, placing her crossed arms on the table between them to peer up at her hopefully. "What happened?"

"Exactly that." Admitted the older woman wryly, thinking back to the time just after she learned about her supposed inability to have a child.

Decades before her youngest foster daughter decided that wasn't entirely correct and sought out the Italian Sun Flame using nurse to prove it with Valera's conception and birth.

Between Arseniy getting six years for home invasion and assault, taking it for another vor so there was enough reasonable doubt to prevent him getting longer of a sentence, and the confirmation of something she had been scared of... Lisa hadn't exactly been in the best frame of mind.

Sure, now those old contacts and her work for those seven years meant she could help the youngest of her foster children rather well... but if Arseniy hadn't decided that he didn't want just anyone and only her...

"After Arseniy got out, vor and all, he didn't like that I was gone. I may have wanted children, but to him it wasn't really a thing to be bothered with. After confronting me about it in Mafia Land, he came back here and specifically worked another year to get the position he's in now. The vor who had been in charge was around our Pahkan's age after all."

"...it was Aleksandr, wasn't it?" Her eldest asked slyly.

"Whomever it was, Arseniy got this job then went back to tell me if children was so damn important I could adopt someone instead and dragged me back here."

"Okay, but... Nya's never had a lover." Insisted the nurse, leaning back now that the ancient history part of the conversation was likely over. "She's, like... never has looked twice at someone before."

"All women are different, Tats." Lisa informed her firmly. "Up until Sonya decides to do something about the subject, do not pressure her into anything."

The younger woman sighed heavily, moping. "I'm going to get cavities from watching the two of them. It's so sickeningly domestic, Lisa."

"They are raising a child."

"He's teaching her to cook, and she's not being a nitpicking brat about it."
She had to admit, that was a strong piece of evidence that Sonya actually respected Sinclair's word. However, it wasn't romantic in nature, just advice. They apparently did have a professional relationship before becoming friends, so it was likely part of that. "Don't you have work to be doing?"

"Nya said to wait an hour or so after she left with her brat." Eyeing the lunch dishes that were her job to clean up since Lisa cooked and Sonya had been here for lock picking practice with said brat, the nurse pointedly turned her back on them and batted her lashes at the elder woman. "But this is more important, Lisa!"

"Your sister isn't a robot, and up until she decides to do anything on that subject I fully expect you to leave her alone about it."

"No… Lisa! You're supposed to be on my side! Tall, dark, and snarky's a well-known gentleman, for all that he's a hitman. He'd be perfect to at least get Nya involved in that part of life without risking some asshole that would think he's entitled to a little something just because she's female and he's interested."

"If your sister wants to start on an asshole instead of the Mafioso she knows, then she can." Lisa settled on firmly after a moment. "Seriously, Tats? Can you imagine what would happen to anyone she doesn't care for trying to force your little sister into anything?"

"What if she doesn't realize it? There are some slick operators around, Lisa. And she's socially impaired, if not outright incompetent."

Alright… when put like that it did seem to be a bit more possible.

She pondered the scenario a few more minutes but had to still shake her head in the end. "She's a fully-grown woman and allowed to make her own mistakes, Tatiana. I'm not saying you can't keep an eye on anyone showing her interest, just don't try to force things."

"It wouldn't even be 'forcing'? A nudge, at most."

"Tats…"

"A wake-up call? I swear, she's not even thinking of him that way… and if he moves on before she's fully ready we might have to suffer through some ass playing with her before she realizes it!"

"Tatiana."

"Someone should at least point things out to her, and Nya never believes me when I try! I've-"

"Oh dear, I wonder why." Lisa spoke strongly over whatever else the nurse was going to tack onto that. "Leave your sister alone to figure it out. If you keep doing this, Tats, she's never going to actually speak up when it happens and if she gets in far over her head and needs help."

Tatiana sulked, splaying herself over the kitchen table to obstruct the work the older woman had been looking over. "No fair, Lisa."

"Life rarely is." Just for that, the nurse could take the work in and she could take the rest of the afternoon off until the evening lessons.

"…but… but… Lisa. The cavities!"

"Suffer with the rest of us."
(Saturday the 14th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Well… not entirely cavity inducing shenanigans were at hand. There was at least one sour thing going on.

Tatiana eyed the rather bloody wreck of the man her usually blasé little sister had beaten the fuck out of warily. "…I don't even want to know."

Sonya opened her mouth with an aggressive air about her, paused for a full moment, then shut her mouth and turned back to the vor on the floor.

Apparently whatever it was would've ruined the nurse's opinion of Gedeon, and was choosing to leave it up to her if she really did wanted to know the story behind this or not. Although admittedly the fact the man had managed to royally piss off her normally even-tempered little sister to this point was… a very big black mark against the man.

"…teach him to heal himself, since it's apparent he requires to have his hand held." The younger thief settled on after a small wait and a struggle with her own temper. "After that… I will have no more reason to do this."

…did Sonya think Tatiana disproved?

The nurse wonder about that, because frankly she didn't give a damn. Gedeon would've tattled to his father had this not been allowed, and that was really all she cared about. That this wasn't going to blow up in her sister's face.

Cherep would've, though. Their dork of a brother would have protested anyone getting harmed for any reason, even for learning purposes.

"Easy enough." Tatiana dismissed after a moment more of puzzling over that. "Although… I have been tasked by Doctor Kappel to find out if those Lightnings can speak English or not. Recognizable English, we only just got the others speaking in something roughly approaching actual fluency."

"We ensured it after his… complaint."

She kept chatting about pre-nurse specifications, while her sister calmed down from eerily liquid body language to just mostly bored and stiff again. Eventually, Sonya rolled her eyes and left the empty office turned beating recovery room, calling that she would assemble Galina's Lightning nurse selections so she could see for herself later.

Now left alone with the vor, Tatiana seriously wondered about killing him even as she knelt to heal him enough to talk.

It was disgustingly easy, with Sun Flames, to give people over-Activated vaccinations or medicine that normally wouldn't be lethal in small doses. Hell, giving people tumors was easy for her… or Activating the breakdown of cellular regeneration until things started rotting.

Overstimulating nerves, Activating the chemical or hormone production out of order or in higher than humanly tolerated amounts, there were a lot of options.

"I'm not going to ask," the nurse informed her first patient of the day wryly, "because then I'll be tempted to kill you. Hope I don't learn whatever it was that finally ticked her off."
Prodding around the vor's jawline, she Activated the bone regeneration in his jaw so it would take mere seconds instead of months for the bone to knit back together. She resisted the temptation to give him a cyst or see if she could grow one of his teeth into his bone, but just barely.

Gedeon spluttered and coughed as the achy itch of fast-forwarded bone growth spread through his face, but by then she was checking the rest of his skull and his neck for fractures. "...the fuck."

"Well, that was coherent. No concussion, then? She's being really careful about it... huh."

The last man she'd seen her little sister beat up had a broken spine, and this one didn't even have an easy to cause head-injury?

Sonya was being very delicate about this indeed.

Probably using the things the girls were taught to ensure any male attacking them regretted it for a long time. Tatiana had put some of that to use before, so she did recognize a few of the injuries the vor had. Thing that were painful, but not always entirely disabling.

He was in a likely phenomenal amount of pain.

"So then!" Leaning back now that Gedeon could both see and talk, and hopefully hear but Tatiana wasn't too worried over that part, she beamed at the asshole. "Self-healing one-oh-one. Pay attention, I'm only going through this one more time for you."

"I paid attention." Gedeon bit out, trying and failing to haul himself either upright or away from the nurse.

Broken fingers, two sprained or worse wrists, and a couple clean breaks of both arms kind of hampered him.

"Apparently not enough if Nya has to ask me to do this again." Some of his breaks looked a few days old, so she was calling bullshit.

The last time Tatiana had been back here she gave the entirety of the Sun division a class on healing via Sun Flames and the possible pitfalls, and also helped a few of them learn to heal their own bruises. He was there that day... but still covered in bruises.

"...Flame users who use their Flames against themselves end up dead."

"...oh boy. Gedeon, shut the fuck up and stop trying to be smart." Had he been waiting for her to do it for him? What a lazy asshole. She had better things to do that wipe his ass. "I'm not touching you again, I've the rest of the clan to work though sometime in the next week or so. Heal yourself."

"You-

"Shut up. Sonya is our foremost authority on Dying Will Flames, and if she says it's possible... it's possible." Tatiana snapped disgustedly. "Stop trying to draw conclusions of your own. Apparently, you suck at it."

"She's a little girl that wandered into the right place at the right time." Gedeon snapped, actually finally managing to lever himself up and back from the nurse's position. "She-

"She put in the work. Nearly a decade of it, with me, Dmitriy, and Galina. And then you come along and try to decide for yourself that we fit pretty boxes and shouldn't put a toe out of line."
Yeah, she ran into that before. The thinking of 'Suns were all healers' that was thrown in Edik's face every time some asshole learned he was a Sun in a morgue instead of a nurse. That apparently Klavdia was a better nurse than Avdotya just because of their Flame types, despite the fact the Sun girl didn't have the temperament and was learning the skills to put into a career in torture because she was kind of fucked in the head.

That 'all Clouds' were murderous, possibly physically abusive psychopaths… and so her little sister was one too. Ignoring the blatant fact she gave no fucks about anyone else and was a mostly sweet, socially incompetent, adorable little grouch to her older sister.

The number of times she got sympathy for announcing Sonya was her sister and not some monster… Impressive that showed up back here without the social stigmas already developed for it.

"Stop trying to be a special snowflake or a trail blazer, Gedeon. You're not. You have specialist for this very reason. Learn to use them as they're intended, we'll all be a lot happier."

He wasn't going to believe her. He had the unconscious or not mindset of 'males are right and women sit on their asses at home to worry over nothing'. She knew it way back when she first met him.

Depressingly a common one shared with a lot of the vory and even those outside the Soviet Union, which made him doubt everything Sonya and now she herself told him as a matter of fact unless there were more outside influences that pointed to the same thing.

Dmitriy got out next year, right?

Hopefully a vor who was also a Rain before he got prison time could make a dent in this man's ego.

Whatever Sonya was hoping for with this, it wasn't going to happen. He'd use it as more evidence that her little sister was too 'emotional' or just not right for her position and justify all his 'actions'.

Shit was starting to go to hell, wasn't it?

Maybe she could argue being the nurse/doctor in Mafia Land for future little nurses and doctors to follow or contact about it was a thing.

---

(Sunday the 15th of June, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...what?"

"Church. Sunday Mass. Where?" Renato repeated the key points of his question sardonically, eyeing Shamal's progress through his breakfast. "We're Catholic, little lady Sonya. Shamal and I, and most of Italy. It's Sunday, where is Sunday Mass held around here?"

"...oh." The thief managed inanely. Well… alright. "There's the... uh... actually? I don't know."

"You've never been to Mass before?"

"...we're pretty much atheists up here, Renato. Or agnostic." At the completely blank look that earned her, she sighed and tried to recall what churches weren't ruins left to rot and which were Catholic. "Atheists don't believe in God, and agnostic covers being skeptical of any defined religion's view on it to the point being faithful to the general idea but not sure what denomination or what structured method they prefer."

The Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception was in ruins, she knew that much. She and Cherep found it once, and both basically stared at the wreck for a few hours one night.

"...you have got to be kidding."

"Technically… religion and religious worship are called 'cults' up here." Sonya added in just to see his very disgusted expression at the terminology. "...I think Lisa would know, but frankly I don't."

"Are we skipping it this week too, then?" Shamal asked curiously of the hitman.

"We missed last week due to traveling, we are not missing today as well."

"I can find out for you, but you'll be missing the morning mass anyways." She offered, wondering if he was expecting her to take the brat to mass when he left at the end of the week.

Renato shot her a look that was pretty much a 'duh' in less words.

"Shamal… are you Catholic?"

The brat gave her a blank look, confused.

"He's six."

"Exactly. Is it right to force a religious preference on him? So long as 'everyone else' is as well?" Sonya countered blandly, wagging a fork. "I'll take him if you insist, but you're going to have to actually sell this one to me, Renato."

Giving up on his breakfast, the man gave her a thoughtful stare instead. "...personally, I believe in God. I rather like Catholic services, but I'll be honest about my preferences likely stemming from taking advantage of churches being Mafia enforced neutral places in Italia back when I was green and barely keeping my head up."

"Okay, safe places and knowing how to reach them if needed is all well and good... however, this isn't where Shamal's going to run about in a decade or two."

"As I believe in God and like the occasional breathing room, I'd like to share that with the brat." Renato insisted instead of answer that. "Until such a point he can make an informed decision on what religion he wants to believe in, I'd rather keep up with what his father likely was and what's expected of a young Italian child."

"I was alright with that... before you tacked on the peer pressure 'but everyone does' shit." Sonya informed him blandly.

He rolled his eyes. "Not religious? And was that a yes or no?"

"...I'll do it, because of Shamal's father was likely religious and so continuing that until he's got the experience and sense of self to decide his own way sounds halfway decent." She could do that much, even if attending mass when she wasn't Christian smacked of patronizing that which she didn't really understand. "And no, actually. I was never much of a believer in a 'magic man in the sky that created all things on Earth', to be honest."
Renato eyed her for a long moment before flicking a finger to touch the brim of his missing hat. "Fair enough. I never was a great believer in 'we exist only on random chance just because' either. Give it a chance, Sonya? It really isn't so bad."

"According to the Christian doctrine I do know about, we're both sinners and immoral people." Murder was a sin, after all. They were both guilty of that. "But I guess I'll be attending a couple anyways, might as well listen."

"You need to talk to a Mafia priest about that." Suggested the hitman, eyeing his breakfast then apparently deciding he was done. "Not that I'd think you were stupid enough to speak to a civilian one about that little issue, but you might not have thought about it before actually meeting one."

Sonya blinked as the man got up to go do whatever he wanted while she took Shamal to Lisa's and figured out a church that would match his requirements.

Actually… a mafia priest was probably the closest she could get to a psychologist. That wasn't actually a half bad idea if he knew of one that was decent.

She was perfectly aware she had issues, but right until Renato suggested an alternative she had been pretty resigned to just suffer through it all the best she could.

"Mamma?"

"…church and mass, huh?"

"It's not too bad. A little boring sometimes." Shamal informed her as a matter of fact, poking his eggs and not actually eating them either so she figured he was done with breakfast too. "But they tell some interesting stories."

Sonya sighed, and started stacking the dishes up so the hitman could take care of them if he was leaving her the job of figuring out what they were doing today and where. "Duly noted."

She hadn't yet read the bible, had she?

Hmm… the King James' Version or should she see about finding an even older vision?

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 15th of June, 1969 continued. St Louis des Francais Catholic Church, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Well?" Renato drawled out as they got a few streets away from the church Lisa recommended.

"...it was long?" And more than a little awkward, as Sonya knew it would be.

Not as entirely as she had been afraid of, because apparently outsiders in Catholic mass was actually worked into their procedures.

Being allowed to merely sit and not follow the praying thing was greatly appreciated. If… incredibly awkward in being one of few people not kneeling when it was asked for the attendees to observe the rites.

She was still confused over the bread and wine thing. Intellectually she could understand the comparison between the blood and flesh to wine and bread and the giving of it to all who attended mass as they were respecting the supposed originator's sacrifice for them.
However, she was also pretty sure the priest wasn't advocating the cannibalism of their religious icon.

Renato snorted, shoulders shaking before he managed to stop laughing at her thoughts.

"What?" Shamal questioned from between them. "What's so funny?"

"I'm inept at religious worship." Sonya deadpanned for him with a sigh.

"You're not inept, just... uninformed. Which is correctable if you wanted." The hitman tossed back to her. "But still... that was amusing."

"I'm not entirely certain I want to." One or two examples did not a good comparison make, so she'd investigate a few more times before calling it either way.

"You're not going to come with me anymore, mamma?"

She eyed the kid who was tugging on her hand in an attempt to hold it instead of allow her to keep her hands free if violence was offered. "I will for the rest of the summer, but I'm not sold on doing it for any longer than that."

"Oh, neat."

"...so long as I can suffer with you, right?"

"I have no idea what you mean, mamma."

Sonya hummed, and rolled her eyes at the kid beamed at nothing.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 15th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow School # 3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Of course it was the newly built, barely just furnished firing range Renato demanded for teaching Shamal about guns and firearms altogether.

Which she only had the key for because someone had to play 'principal' for paperwork reasons.

...because this way the hitman could have the entire place locked down just for them and would be assured just the brat and the thief would be listening to him explain his favored weapon.

"Do you even have a gun?"

"I used to. Ugly little thing and I only used it once to cap a very annoying Rain."

Renato paused in the act of un-holstering his two usual handguns, pointedly sliding one of them away from the keenly excited Shamal. "...what kind of gun?"

"Revolver, an eighteen-ninety-five Nagant. Fairly common around here for law enforcement personnel."

The hitman gave her a considering look as he broke open the clips and extracted the chambered rounds. "A dainty little thing you slipped into your purse?"

"And then got about..." Sonya took a small step backwards and to the side, "...this far from the man and shot him first in the chest and again in the head."

Before the brat could lay a finger on one of Renato's cherished hand-cannons, he again pointedly snatched them away from curious little fingers. "Wait, Shamal. I'm not telling you again."

"Then stop teasing the brat." The thief informed him blandly, returning to leaning up against one of the pillars that helped support the roof of the indoor firing range next door to the yet-to-be-opened Mafiya School.

Spilling the bullets out of both clips with a thumb, he slotted her a very weighty look as he passed one of the empty pistols to the gleeful Mist to hold and examine. Counting and gathering up the bullets to slip them into his pockets, Renato took a few steps away from the table for loading or disassembling the firearms before and after firing them. "Get used to how they feel, Shamal. And you, little lady Sonya, are not the one that should be saying that."

"...I beg your pardon?"

Before the Sun user could explain, or say anything as a matter of fact, his gun discharged and chipped a hole in the concrete floor under their feet. It ricocheted off the hardened fake stone and shot out a light overhead.

"Sonya. I have all the bullets. The guns are mine, I know how many they take and removed even the chambered rounds. The clips are still empty on the table." Reassured the hitman hastily, holding up both hands in a 'wait' or an 'I'm unarmed' gesture. "Shamal. Your mamma does not need a heart attack before she's thirty. Stop conjuring Mist Bullets."

"...sorry mammma."

Sonya hissed out her breath, feeling the ice that shot up her spine at the sound of a gunshot slide away at the brat's voice lacking pain or fear. She did not appreciate the feeling of being startled, or the fear.

"...alright. He's alright. You're alright. You're... still very... purple."

"I think." The Storm-Cloud managed evenly enough, which didn't last through the rest of her words.
"You should concentrate on teaching the brat range safety. Now."

Renato turned on a heel and snatched the recently fired gun away from the bratty Mist. "I said 'feel', not how they fire."

Sonya ignored whatever else the hitman decided to hiss at the kid for a couple minutes, cradling her forehead in her hand as she felt the onset of a very bad headache settle in her temples.

Holding her hands so close to her eyes also let her see the faint lilac glow from them and how it wasn't fading as the seconds ticked by.

From a couple years of faking it, learning her own triggers for that reaction, and the comparisons she could make from Ziven's reports on Timur… the thief wanted to beat the shit out of something.

It was one of the few failsafe ways to rid a Cloud of anxiety or anger enough to return to 'normal' behavioral patterns, violence. An outlet.

Preferably, all-out violence. The mindless kind she only experienced once, and Fong had taken the brunt of on to spare any unlucky asshole that might've come across her from causing a messy murder or three.
Renato could probably give her a good fight, but well… Shamal apparently sorely needed a few lessons on firearms safety and handling. He wasn't an option. Tatiana was busy doing a few rounds in the Zolotov headquarters with shots and the few physicals the vory would request from the nurse, asking for some Fut Gar sparring was out. Especially since she couldn't do mindless with her sister or wasn't willing to.

She wouldn't risk accidently or otherwise murdering Gedeon, so that was out too.

…time to go see if that Cloud brat on the north side of Zolotov territory was any good. If it was still bad, she knew there was a Cloud somewhere south of her too. Any morons she caught in-between getting to either were… well… she didn't rightly care what would happen to them.

If that didn't work, she'd think of something else.

Another check… her eyes were still purple. Nothing for that, she had highly doubted it would be fixed with just a few moments of semi-peace and vicious thoughts.

"…Shamal." Sonya called as she dropped her hands and finally got a good look at the Mist brat. "I know you've grown up kind of idolizing guns and shit, especially since you're likely seen Renato use them to protect you a few years ago and live with more idiots that think they're the pinnacle of warfare…"

"Hey."

"I'm sorry, mamma. I didn't mean to scare you." Almost tripping over his words, the brat both clutched at Renato's forearm that was holding the gun for showing him the interior of one of his pistols and leaned over it to see her.

Knowing she was probably looking very, very scary to a kid that knew other Classical Clouds and what their tempers were like, she moved slowly. Kneeling down next to the Italians, facing the brat instead of down-range as they were, she gripped Shamal's chin gently and pressed a kiss to his forehead.

"I'm probably always going to react like this when a gun fires around you, brat. Unless I can see you're firing it and it's at something else. You're very lucky I trust Renato to not be stupid. Just… please, be more patient."

"Oh, trust me… he's not ever doing that again." The hitman still more or less bracketing the kid in place promised darkly.

"I'm going to step out a minute… or more… to get rid of… this." Sonya gestured to her surprise change of eye coloring, ruffling the kid's hair as she got back to her boots. "Behave, brat. And listen to him, he's the expert."

Renato shifted a bit, still keeping both knees off the ground even if the place was brand new and as clean as it would ever be. "Just to put it out there… you're kind of terrifying being both pissed off and reasonable like this."

"That's sweet of you to say, Renato." Sonya tossed over a shoulder as she left them to it.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 15th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow School # 3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
"...ho?" Renato shoved his fedora backwards as he eyed the door the Storm-Cloud used. "...fuck, really? That's how to do it?"

"I'm sorry." Shamal repeated miserably, slinking back from the hitman's arms around him and into his chest.

"...she didn't seem mad at you, brat." He tried a bit awkwardly, caught in an unintentional half-hug the kid seemed to really need.

Losing a few years off his life in the irrational fear Shamal had somehow shot himself aside, he also lost a couple more suddenly staring down a startled and enraged mother Cloud who had been unconsciously flirting with him before. The sudden mood swing kind of sharply put things into perspective, but the brat was fine... the other was...

"But you should've known better than to scare a Cloud. That never ends well."

Renato wasn't the one Shamal went to for personal reassurances. Answering questions, sure. Protective when it came to threats to his person, fine. A provider he could request things from, at most.

The one he preferred to go to when he had a nightmare or was upset?

No. The brat saved it all up to bend his mamma's ear with.

The hitman greatly preferred to just shoot anything Shamal got upset at and shoo him to Sonya for everything else. He was good with women, not so children. He might be learning, but it was a work in progress right now.

However, the Storm-Cloud probably couldn't handle it at the moment. She likely removed herself upon realizing that and so she should calm down as quickly as possible to handle it later, which left him stuck doing the 'it's okay' routine until she recovered.

"I am going to be drilling you in disassembling and cleaning a gun until you're no longer fascinated by them. Maybe until you hate them." The Mafioso promised the kid pointedly, hitting the catch on the side of his gun and letting the slide close over the open breach as the general demonstration of how it fired was done and the Cloud-meltdown he had been distracting the kid from was out of the room. "We weren't even going to get around to doing more than practice shots at the end of this little lesson, but I think we'll skip that for tomorrow."

"I didn't mean to!" Shamal finally burst out, spinning around to glare in Renato's face only for the look to falter a second later and the kid teared up. "I didn't... I just wanted... I pulled the trigger! That's all I did!"

"And you expected it to fire?"

"I was just..."

Renato cocked his head to the side, unable to hear the words but able to read the brat's mind and finish off the sentence anyways.

Pretending. A Mist was pretending to fire the very real gun he had been handed and had been equally as surprised as them that it worked. Stupid, childish things that any kid would do in the same situation when given an inch.

The very thing the hitman had given the brat the gun for in the first place, because he wouldn't like seeing that make-believe at all… only a bit deadlier in this case because Shamal's ability worked on his imagination.

They never had taught the brat how to differ between just pretending and his Flames, had they?

"...well. Shit."

Alright, so maybe drilling the brat in gun care until he hated them wasn't called for. Explaining how the incident occurred at all to Sonya later would be interesting.

Fuck. What the hell was he supposed to do in this situation?

That little Mist trick was probably going to be damn useful in the brat's later years, equally so as Sonya's multiple bullets from one trick she did for him. Being able to fire a gun that 'everyone knew' was empty was a favored little sleight of hand of his own.

…however, Shamal was six. With any luck, he wouldn't need it for eight or preferably ten more years.

"I think… actually firing might be a method… Here's how we're going to do this. You're going to learn how to tell a gun is loaded or not by feel. That way, you can know they're not going to fire."

Exact counts weren't all that important right now, just enough so that the kid would assume 'unloaded weight' equaled 'will not fire'. Which would… with Shamal's Mist Flames, require numerous exacting demonstrations and a few false-starts alone.

Probably a bit of Mist Flames to be possible at all, given a bullet didn't exactly have much weight to it.

Wouldn't work with all weapons, way too many gun variations to work long-term, but with just his pistols' rather popular type it should for now.

He'd be able to use that trick later on, there would be a 'safety catch' on the ability now, this wouldn't happen again.

Renato, now content he had both the problem and the solution figured out, picked up and sat the brat on the table still holding the clips.

"Now- …Shamal. Pay attention."

"…maybe I shouldn't learn?" The brat asked in a quiet voice, fidgeting with the hem of his shirt.

Right… the kid still needed reassurance. He had kind of forgotten that part. "…your mamma said you should listen to me. She still wants you to learn."

"But I scared her!"

"I scare people firing a gun that's unloaded." Renato drawled out blandly as he picked up the empty clips sitting next to the Mist. "It's a good trick, just not one to use on your own people. Yes, you scared us, but that's how we learn about abilities that can be applied outside of safe environments like this."

Shamal shot him a skeptical look. "'Us'? Even you?"

"I didn't like the thought that I just handed my godchild a loaded gun to shoot his fool head off with." Taking a bullet out of his pocket, he loaded one clip with it and held both out to the kid. "Sonya is, however, much scarier than you are with a loaded gun. I could tell you were alive, not if she was going to swing an ax at my head for giving you the gun."

The brat still looked faintly miserable and guilty. He also didn’t take the clips.

Renato did not sigh, grind his teeth, or glare. "I can teach you how to not to do it again."

…once she was done with her little Cloud rampage across Moscow, Sonya could probably convince the kid it was in the end fine.

Accidents happened, and Shamal hadn’t rationally tried to scare a decade of life out of them.

Renato really did just pity whichever target Sonya had gone after, but other than that it could’ve be so much worse.

Still not looking convinced at all, the kid took the clips and stared at them unhappily.

Good enough for now. He really had to start paying attention to how Sonya dealt with all this crap.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 15th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...what do you mean my little sister is missing?"

"She's off taking a personal evening." Renato Sinclair informed her again, pointedly. Then he physically handed Tatiana her nephew, who was weirdly quiet at the moment. "I have... to go catch up with her. Excuse me."

The Italian turned on a shiny heel and stalked out of the Zolotov clan's headquarters, ignoring the attention he had gained just being there without a particular blonde thief in tow.

Not even a word of when she could expect them to pick up the kid, how rude.

Admittedly not entirely upset in suddenly being the designated babysitter either, the nurse craned her head to the side to see if she could sort out Shamal's expression. "Baby? You got anything to add?"

A forehead impacting her collarbone was her only answer.

"...well, okay then."

This was just weird and smacked of the last time Sinclair managed to upset her little sister. With an armful of kid, work yet to be done, and no idea what was causing this or when it would end she turned to Sonya's office jockeys.

Galina would know, right?

Or she'd know how to know, and there was Scruffy who Shamal got along with pretty well when she poked her head in there earlier this afternoon.

When Tatiana walked into the office with an armful of Mist child, the Lightning's expression was just this side of harassed.

"There." The normally well put together woman snapped at the man glaring at her from across the desk. "The brat, and her sister. Sonya will come back and no, for the last fucking time, I DO NOT
"She's a major asset to this office, and could be preyed on by-

"She can rip you in half with her bare hands!" The Lightning shouted in his face exasperatedly. "What the hell do you think a 'watcher' or two would do that she can't!"

"Scream?" Shamal eventually offered helpfully from under Tatiana's chin.

The Sun was officially worried. The kid should've delivered that in a snarkier tone than the quiet one he used. "Look, whoever you are, get out. You're wasting time."

"I-

"Need a physical sometime and if I'm the one giving it, it'll be painful as fuck." Under a disapproving glower she would shamelessly admit to stealing from Lisa to use on asshole patients, the vor stormed out of the office only to go straight next door and slam it behind himself. "Galina?"

"The Mists have a way to contact her." Admitted the Lightning, now calming down that someone wasn't hounding her for information she didn't know. "Did you come up here when rumor reached you?"

"The brat in my arms isn't enough of a tipoff on how I learned?" Shamal went back to hiding under her jawline, and the nurse finally started to wonder what the kid had to do with her little sister up and disappearing. "Baby? Seriously, what happened? You all were supposed to be doing range practice tonight, right?"

"...I... um, did something stupid." The near-compulsive grip the kid had on her shirt tightening when he admitted that aside, Tatiana couldn't really see what that had to do with anything. He did silly things all the time, and if Sonya still kept mothering him then she didn't find much of an issue- "...I shot an unloaded gun using Mist Flames."

...woo boy, that would do it.

She had chills just thinking about that.

Dragging the brat to arm's length, she looked him over hard even knowing full well Renato was also a Sun and wouldn't have tolerated something of his wandering around injured and in pain if it wasn't required. That had drove Tatiana nuts when Sonya broke her hand and she couldn't get her stupid Sun Flames to heal it up for her.

He was Inverted, maybe the kid shot himself somewhere minor?

But no... no blood or unexplained holes in his clothing. Just a miserable expression.

"Usov!" Galina snapped to the air and pinned the responding preteen Mist with a highly expectant look when he tumbled through the door excitedly.

"Levoberezhny District! Wow... she's pissed with them."
How the hell did Sonya get so far north?

She and tall, dark, and snarky had taken their brat to the closest part of Zolotov territory to downtown Moscow, in the southeast corner of their territory. "Why is my little sister pissed with them?"

The Mist gave her a semi-wild grin. "Valdayskiy Street Gang recently got into... sex trafficking. Kidnapping girls to sell to old perverts. Guess who they went after tonight."

Tatiana let Shamal wind himself back into her side, even if the kid was starting to get really heavy. "...serves them right."

Galina palmed her face in exasperation. "This isn't a good thing, boss lady. If Sonya goes around dismantling syndicates for any reason-

"We have young girls, and some of the young girls of other syndicates. They should've been perfectly aware of what would happen if we ever found out they were preying on them so close to us." More seriously, Sonya had bad experiences with such thing which was only compounded by Cherep's mysterious and possibly abusive past heaped on top. She would've never agreed to ignore it. "A little odd it's the only Cloud we have, but we can sell it as she was checking up on what Ziven has been up to for her when they tried for her. Obvious ending, part of a Cloud just being a Cloud. This time in a positive way instead of a self-sacrificing suicide thing."

"...and that she's not splintering away from the clan and becoming completely rogue?"

"Yep, I need to go talk to Arseniy to sell it this way." Tatiana eyed the back of Shamal's head but didn't put him down.

She had been there once before, the orphaned child scared out of his wits that his being bad would make his foster parents send him back or would decide he was too much trouble.

Which wasn't going to happen. Sonya was a possessive little thing and, her temper control issues aside, what she decided on was pretty much what she was going to do regardless of what was said or done.

She might not know tall, dark, and snarky as well... but he didn't seem the type to give up easily either.

However, no matter what reassurance she could give... she was just the zia. His godparents would have to reassure him it wasn't going to happen before he'd believe it.

"Baby? We're going for a walk, then we'll hole up in your mamma's apartment for the rest of the night. I'll even buy us ice cream for the wait."

Hopefully Sonya wouldn't mind the fact the nurse was going to likely crash out on her couch again, the day before yesterday had just been because of jet-lag and to save a day of funds for other things instead.

She could sleep here, but... eww.

She'd never get to sleep if just anyone could knock on her door and demand some healing.

Equally hopefully Shamal wouldn't make himself sick worrying about all of this and what it would mean for him.
Renato eyed the situation, shot a dark glare at the little Mist lady that led him here when he decided on cutting a few hours out of a search in an unfamiliar city, and decided to try addressing the Storm-Cloud.

It was entirely possible she wouldn't immediately attack him. It had been a couple hours since Shamal fired off a shot unexpectedly.

Most of her undirected rage should've passed, right?

"Sonya?"

'Mirror Lady' Anna immediately melted out of view the moment the thief turned on a heel to narrowly glare at him instead of contemplating the groaning bodies on the ground.

…still purple eye coloring. Either little lady Sonya could hold a grudge or something else was now upsetting her. Smart Mist girl.

"Renato… shouldn't they be better than this?"

"Better at what?" No, seriously. At what?

Lying about in pain?

As far as the hitman could see, the thief came across something not entirely expected and decided to vent her frustrations on these fine gentlemen instead of whatever she had been heading for. One man was coughing blood out in his own little crater in the asphalt, but it looked as if she hadn't intended to kill them and they'd probably survive.

Except crater guy. The Mafioso was somewhat sure his ribs were mostly or all shattered and had a punctured lung.

Actually, on the second look?

She only just managed to find herself a target to go Cloud-mode on.

Sonya shouldered her polearm shaped trick jewelry weaponry made life-sized, idly kicking an arm near her only to look even more frustrated when it cracked. "I do not actually have a great amount of combat experience. No one wants to fight me. Why wasn't this harder?"

"…because you are a tiny thing, Sonya." Actually she was probably just this side of short for an average woman, but Renato was still one side of being six feet tall himself.

Being taller than her let him in on that entirely bewildering disconnect between what she appeared as and what she could do.

The woman didn't look as if she could quite easily tear metal bare handed, it was still something jarring even for the hitman to witness.

A tiny doll of a blonde fearlessly waltzing up to men that had height on her and outweighed her significantly?
At most, they'd be on the lookout for a holdout gun or an accomplice if not completely distracted thinking she was after something raunchy from them.

For her to then suddenly whip out a lethal weapon that couldn't be obviously concealed behind her shorter stature and go to town on them?

Not what most tend to assume might happen.

…Sonya didn't have a mark on her. Even by surprise, taking down a good eight men without significant resistance might actually be her issue.

"Surprise, probably." It was her entire thing. "If we hunt down their little fellows, I'm pretty sure they'd get better at fighting back."

She shot him an irritable glare. "I can't justify that."

Justify?

Since when did any Cloud bother with that when they were irritated enough?

Renato shoved up the back of his fedora and scratched as he wracked his mind about how to convince her to do it anyways.

Repression was very bad for Clouds. Even half-ones like her.

"Miss Bazanova," interrupted the same Mist lady that led him here, "your sister's compliments. You are fully cleared to do as you will."

They both skeptically eyed the puddle of blood that Anna was using as a mirror.

"Also, she has taken your and your friend's joint problem to your apartment to sit on."

Well, the hitman hadn't expected that. He'd buy the nurse some chocolates or something in thanks. She was probably blowing off her own duties on their behalf to fuss over Shamal.

"…Anna, you wouldn't happen to know where these morons have holed up… would you?"

---

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Kappel sighed heavily.

"No, Nurse Klavdia. I do not particularly care what stress or upset they have caused you, after you gave them painful bone growths in revenge it does not becomes something we can charge them to deal with. Be happy that much is allowed, and you are not going to be dismissed for doing it in the first place."

The rose haired Sun Flame nurse narrowed her eyes, elevated her nose in the air and walked off in a snit.

Rubbing at the bridge of his nose, the German doctor flicked his half-moon glasses back into place and tried to yet again to complete his paperwork without the ever-industrious Tatiana available to assist.
He didn't get five minutes until one of his own coworkers stormed into his office next. "Kappel, either pry that Sun out of the morgue or actually draft the bloody Mist!"

"I have no authority over Sergej." He informed the other blandly, placing a long finger over the point he was on and looking up with a perfectly bland expression to match his tone. "Our arrangement with the Zolotov clan about training their Flame users was that they are allowed to choose their own specialties and we are allowed to tempt them to stay. Mortician, as much as you would not like to admit it, is a medical specialty."

"He's a Sun, he should be tending the living not the dead!"

"You are welcome to try and change his mind, but until young Edik says such to me in as many words he will not be reassigned."

Sergej would take exception to anyone bothering the young man he was nearly graphed at the hip to, especially if it involved the job the young Sun was actually both competent in and eager to learn more about. The Mist wouldn't let the other doctor get within shouting range of the young mortician in question if he even suspected it was yet another attempt to change his mind, and if the man retained his sanity for the rest of the day was questionable.

The other man tried to storm out of Kappel's office, only to nearly run into one of the two girl Rains. A glare had the more delicate of the Rain nurses cringing away from the man, and to nearly be assaulted by her more forthright fellow.

"Nurse Stella, please do not impair your peers through injury or Tranquility." He could at least instruct her of that if not the Mist the doctor was on a direct course to run into.

Again, he did not control or had any advisory position over Sergej.

Raisa ducked into the office to physically put the former Nazi doctor between her and the other man. The highly unamused look Kappel pinned his coworker with at least made the rather disgruntled Englishman sulk off.

"Nurse Raisa, did you require something?"

"...the patient information for the Salk vaccine for Polio, doctor. We have a possible request for a major shipment of the vaccine to a syndicate in India. I was asked to assemble the information."

"Pathology is where you should be then, Nurse Raisa." Kappel informed her a bit more gently than the tone he usually took with his nurses.

She, rather than Stella, was the one interested in becoming a professional nurse instead of just learn how to medically apply her Rain Flames for... reasons.

If it was possible, Kappel would switch the Rain girl's temperament with her friend's... or surgically replace their male fellow's personality wholesale. Traiko was just a sour individual all together, and wholly unpleasant to deal with.

Which... it was about the time the day's surgeries were done. He'd have yet another doctor in to complain about that Rain's disruptive behavior and foul temperament.

He gave up on trying to finish his paperwork. It wasn't going to happen until he had Nurse Primakova back to manage her fellows instead of Nurse Avdotya... who was proving to be not as good as the elder Russian woman.
"…Doctor Kappel? Can you escort us there?"

"Since I seem to need to locate my Storm nurse, you and your fellow may accompany me for the time being." Kappel offered politely, wondering just what it was that was detaining Avdotya.

If yet another of the doctors here were trying to poach the girl, even if she didn't have those Sun Flames… he didn't know what he would do, but it would probably involve the Mist using young man who had no influences to moderate his behavior by.
Renato eyed a particularly grisly part of his surroundings since he had little better to do, mostly just along for the ride due to Clouds not entirely being peripherally aware when they went berserk and Shamal would be upset something fierce if his mamma kicked the bucket.

Also, because he was pretty damn intent on at least sorting out their relationship into either 'eternal friend zone' or 'possibly compatible' sometime this century.

…he wasn't even fooling himself with that either. She was a damn good friend of his that had survived a lot his few other now dead friends hadn't, and he was pretty sure they were compatible in at least a short-term way.

The brat hadn't intended to startle her into this, and it seemed no vory had any procedures in place for handling enraged Clouds, so he was playing Sonya's backup.

She was probably the one Cloud with the longest fuse he had ever met, but it obviously did and could run out.

Oddly, the really bloody stuff didn't start until she whipped out a halberd and bisected a man who tried to use chloroform on her. The hitman had been particularly concerned at that point, but aside a few choking coughs of red Flames even the chemical widely known to knock normal humans out still hadn't put more than a dent in the thief's stride.

Her breathing Storm Flames in the face of the man next to the wise-ass idiot that tried drugging a Storm-Cloud was a bit… more… eye opening.

Not something Renato had ever seen happen before, and it shouldn't have been as amusing as he found it. Thus how he fell behind the thief a small bit, taking a moment to laugh his head off at her clever little Storm trick.

That was the woman a little twelve-year-old girl who threw a rock at one of his assaulter's heads had grown up into. The child-thief he had annoyed into being a friend somehow and was now guarding his godchild.

Fuck all those assholes that had looked at him sideways for even talking to Sonya in the first place.

Little Russian dragoness that she was, cruelly intelligent and ruthless with when her ire was roused. Sort of something straight out of those books Shamal kept digging out of his mamma's collection.

What did she hoard, then?

The Mafioso puzzled over that thought idly as the stylized slim warhammer/pick thing that was pinning a corpse to the wall a good foot up off the ground suddenly shrank, snatching the bloodstained miniature out of the wall once the body was left in a heap.

He rolled the tiny weapon no wider than his palm a few times thoughtfully, recognizing it as from the set she had worn as hair sticks to her first Vongola Christmas Ball.

A Bec de Corbin, he was pretty sure that was what they were called.
He had a reason to look up medieval weaponry when he had her mauls being made.

The gemstones once held in the slots on either side had cracked either well before this or just now, so they were unadorned at the moment.

Sonya hoarded books, probably. Information was another possibility. Jewels not so much, for a self-claimed jewel thief she rarely wore ornaments aside her two necklaces or bothered with the flashy things aside her little arsenal. She also gave up her weaponry with little fuss, so it wasn't that.

…Shamal?

The dragoness' hatchling?

What did that make him, a prince or a princess?

He'd rather be the knave, honestly. They had more fun.

Musing on that whimsical tangent, he had to ban Shamal's fairytale book addiction or something before that thought stuck in his head, the hitman followed the typical ruins any Cloud left behind when they stopped being 'polite' in hopes of catching up with Sonya. Craters, odd gunshot holes in the plastered walls, the remnants of something smoldering with tiny flecks of fire and Storm Flames, the more typical pure Cloud Flame weaponry he didn't need to collect for the thief, and the occasional body part littered the hallway he was stalking down.

At least she stopped repressing her ire and was taking the opportunity to loosen up a little. He hadn't much to do here anymore, after she had stopped being very nice about beating people up and switched to rending them limb from limb there weren't any more prisoners to ensure remained down and not plotting behind her back.

Very few were left alive the further in you got, unlike where Sonya had started. Apparently she had eventually concluded these men weren't the kind she wanted her syndicate to absorb or deal with in possibly less lethal ways to continue on with what annoyed her so, or that she increased her violence levels in response to actual near-misses.

She had to be happier with this, right?

A small-scale scuffle with eight men that ended totally in her favor might not have been what she had wanted, and he knew for a fact taking apart a syndicate was harder to ensure in only a few hours.

Mirror Lady Anna was off ensuring no interruptions happened, trading prisoner detail of the few Cloud rampage survivors off with Usov when the kid showed up. She was also guiding the kidnapped girls that were apparently part of the issue that set the Storm-Cloud off on these wretches to their freedom in a way that would prevent them from calling the local police until their little lady boss said otherwise.

Renato had been disgusted when the young Mist woman informed him of why things tipped to the side of irrational hatred on the Storm-Cloud's end but was fully aware it probably still happened in small corners of Italia.

Sonya was… merely cleaning house and sweeping out the trash that had accumulated. He'd love to assist but kill stealing from Clouds was something he was hesitant to do still.

Even ones he knew really well.

Best to let her get it out of her system before pitching in with the mop-up.
The hitman eventually found the thief again, or at least assumed it was her direct handiwork. A man pitching over a railing a floor up in a shower of shattered plaster and paint chips, only to smash into the floorboards at his feet. Judiciously aided in dying by a more realistically proportioned war hammer than the Bec de Corbins slamming into his chest a half-second later.

That had to be some of her work... or the man was that stupidly clumsy and had just been positioned perfectly.

He wouldn't rule it out, as he'd seen stranger things.

Gunfire was actually becoming a more audible, but this was a criminal holdout base. The walls were reinforced to withstand and muffle such assault... although the Storm-Cloud running riot over them all had already proved said reinforced bullet-proof walls were little obstruction to her.

Idiots likely panicking, mused the hitman idly as he scaled the staircase steadily.

In confined corridors, and with her strength and acrobatic abilities to render it all moot, Sonya likely found maneuvering around any effective resistance as easy as she found evading himself last Christmas when she stole his blanket and ran off with it and the brat.

Managing a defense against her was apparently not something Russian mafia men had ever seriously considered before. Likely this was the very first time she had decided to let loose on her home soil, or the rumors of the mile-wide furrow she carved into Mafia Land's headwind forest hadn't yet reached back here with enough supporting evidence.

No longer surprised she had decided taking apart an entire syndicate was a good idea, he didn't know how long she had been repressing her irritation for less violent methods of dealing with it but this was likely going to help a large amount with readdressing that balance, Renato merely wondered if she was calm yet or not.

It had been quite a few hours since Shamal set her off, say one or two to just find a good target and now another one of ripping into them... might be the longest Cloud rampage he had ever personally bore witness to.

Reaching the second-floor landing, the Italian Mafioso eyed first the shattered doorway that opened up into a hallway or the gigantic hole in the wall that led directly into what looked to be a sitting room or a smoking lounge.

Which... the floor covered in gore, bent metal, and glass with yet another hole through the wall opposite of the one he was looking through.

Ah... that's how the man smashed into the landing of the first-floor stairwell got covered in plaster. Knocked through a wall, then over a railing... through a bulletproof wall and with enough force to still knock him backwards without simply shearing the man in half.

Possible Lightning?

He didn't survive much past his activation, if so. Pity.

...Sonya was likely still pissed off, but not as bad as she was downstairs.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969 continued. Levoberezhny District, Moscow, Russian Soviet)
Why did no one ever look up?

Sure… okay, Sonya had tossed several pounds of Cloud Propagated steel through a wall and caused a cloud of plaster dust to fly up into the air in response to cloud judgement. These morons immediately shot through it with enough bullets to make an unwary person Swiss cheese after the shock of a hammer decapitating a man in front of them wore off… but she was already pass her entrance point and currently sitting pretty on an ugly ass chandelier.

A… not very comfortable one, and it was more a half-crouch with a hand on the ceiling and another clutching the chain to prevent the monstrosity of glass, wire, and brass from jolting from the swing it had before she landed on it.

A momentary press upward added with the movement of straightening up had her forcing the heavily reinforced light fixture down at likely lethal speeds, smashing it right into the knot of idiots trying to line up a limited space of a hole in the wall with ten or so guns.

In other words, they were standing shoulder to shoulder directly below her and nearly eighty pounds of metal and electrical hardware and another twenty or so of what became sharp glass shards.

This was the third time she had done this chandelier cluster-bomb thing. The ground floor had proven more challenging to work her way through.

…Sonya's boots were ruined, she was not pleased.

Immediately letting go of the chain that had once supported more weight than she amounted to before the sparking wires unraveling from it found her wrists or more metal to conduct through, the thief landed lightly and ignored the crunch of glass under her heels.

Eyeing her handiwork and vowing to both never tell Cherep of this night and somehow terrify her clan into following along with her non-comment on it, the thief wandered back to the hallway.

A shower, bed, and maybe a unharmed Shamal were sounding more and more perfect to her as things dragged on, but she wasn't one to half-ass the things she started. There were really only a few rooms left to this place that she hadn't murdered the fuck out of yet, and the mix of disgust and oddly addicting satisfaction had yet to leave her gut.

…she didn't like it.

Didn't like the fuzziness that came with getting as pissed off as she had been, or the near-mindlessness reaction state she had tried to avoid only to fall into it her first near miss with the chloroform guy. Had she less self-control than she had amassed to date, she would've thrown up a few rooms ago when it started to wear off and she could fully appreciate everything she had just done.

She also might still have an intellectual issue with murder, but both instinctively and emotionally she didn't. The difference between knowing you did wrong and believing you did it. No guilt from the gory path she carved through this place, which made her guiltier.

A strange disharmony to have with herself, which just made her more determined this night would just end up a particularly grisly skeleton in her closet of them.

"...ho?"
"No offense, Renato. But if I have to murder in my line of work, I'm either doing something wrong or getting sloppy. So, I dislike it."

Had she told him that before?

She toed some guy's separated arm idly as he sauntered over to join her in the middle of the hallway, more to inspect the damage to the sole of her boot than to really see the results of her actions. "How many more, do you think?"

"About… three. I checked for you already. End of the hall, door to your then left." The hitman eyed her thoughtfully as he jerked a thumb down the way he came, not a trace of wariness or disgust to him which she probably appreciated a lot more than was warranted. "I knew what I was getting into with having a Cloud as a friend, little lady Sonya. More faith, please."

"You can never really know until it smacks you in the face." Shrugging the comment off, the she wandered in the direction he pointed out to her. "I'd advise you to leave this place, by the way."

"Ho?"

"I'm going to burn the fuck out of it once I'm done here."

The man hummed lightly, following a long about a half-step behind her. "How about no? I caught up to you for a reason, Sonya. You're a thief, not a hitwoman or an assassin. However much a Cloud you may be, I'm probably better at killing and living with it than you."

"Probably." Agreed said thief without much humor. "Want the last few? I am really only morbidly curious what the reaction will be. It's their equivalent of a leader, right?"

"Not the information on how they started up, or how they were distributing the girls?"

Coming to a stop right outside the doorway he had indicated, Sonya gave him her first smile with real amusement in it of the night. "I'm telling you this for your own use only… but there's a Sun now in Mafia Land's morgue that can Activate the dead. If he can use humans for it yet is questionable, but really only a matter of time. With the Mist assigned to him to help patch things through… if I killed the people that had that information, I'm not too worried."

Renato eyed her skeptically. "You said you were going to burn this place down. Storm Flames are notoriously good for stripping a scene of any details that might catch up to one."

She gestured to the still closed door pointedly.

"…heh." He tipped his hat to her, which did nothing to hide his smirk. "Ladies first."

"How kind of you, good sir." Sonya drawled back sardonically, plucking a hammer made of her Cloud Flames from mid-air and giving it a two-handed swing against the wall just to the side of the doorway… on the side they weren't standing on.

Of course, more shots.

"Predictable."

"I don't even use guns, and I figured that one out without needing to be shot first." She agreed wryly.

The Sun slid a hand into his suit jacket and came out with one of his two usual pistols not bothering with keeping his tone down or with any stealth at all. "No accounting for taste or skill, here."
"…they weren't really required to. They mostly went after civilian girls."

"Right next to a syndicate, yours, which has non-civilian ones." Countered the hitman casually, right before he kicked open the door and shot twice as he entered the room boldly. When the occupants were likely more interested in the hole instead of a locked door. "They are…"

"…horribly ill-prepared for something like me? Most seem to be." The weirdly exhausted Storm-Cloud came to a stop in the doorway once her friend had cleared the space, blinking at what was found there. "…I'm having distinct flashbacks to our conversation about prostitution rings and those that had to pay for it."

Renato merely made a humming sound of absent confirmation, eyeing the sniveling wreck of the man who just witnessed his last two enforcers get shot through the head.

He was good-looking, Sonya supposed… in a completely artificial way under the blubbery he was doing.

His behavior on the other hand?

She hadn't even brought out an ax and he was already debasing himself. It was still pretty faint, the asshole's office was huge and well appointed, but she was pretty sure he was already begging for his life instead of something she would've expected from a vor.

Which probably would've been a hand grenade with the pin already pulled, honestly.

A semi-automatic in hand, at least.

So… not a vor, operating in that in-between grey area buffering larger syndicates. Surrounded with those more skilled than him, but for some reason no true Moscow vor had killed him and taken over his operation for their syndicate. In a building that conformed to typical criminal standards, but without the standard typical criminals within.

This looked somewhat well established, beyond the point of just being set up and before the point of getting entrenched enough to be a nightmare to root out. Way too late for any hostile takeovers.

"…are you thinking what I am?"

This wasn't a criminal thing. It was a civilian import motivated by greed and sex getting reckless.

Might've been aided by another syndicate, but if so then she didn't fucking want to know who would set this shit up. Those assholes before probably hadn't known the girl with tattoos was an official member of the Mafiya at all, and just tried grabbing because she was there and fit some criteria.

"…yes. A bullet, or do you have another idea?"

"Don't waste ammo on the worthless. I'm thinking a pike and just staking his head out as a warning."

Renato released the tension behind the hammer of his gun, tucking it back to the holster he had worked into the suit jackets he wore. "I didn't know you had pikes in that arsenal of yours."

"I don't." Sonya reached behind her and wrenched a good section of the door frame out of the wall, summoning an ax to her other hand to carve away at it. "I'm improvising."

Most of this place was going to go up in flames, or Flames… but more than enough would survive.
Particularly this office, and that little dungeon cell in the basement they kept their 'merchandise'.

Anna or Usov would just have to ensure the fire covered her tracks, she was leaning to her preteen male Mist simply because the last she saw him he was getting a bit too hyper.

She'd still go through his office paperwork, and with Usov's help translating codes or illegible writing was fairly easy. What wasn't needed for any vory to read between the lines of the likely censored news report of this would also go up in smoke, but that was all she was going to do.

If another syndicate could be linked to this shit, well… sucked to be them.

"That's probably not a great idea. Why not take it to your father instead?" Renato suggested quietly, taking possession of the rudely crafted pike for her as she headed to collect one last head.

"...eh, point." Sonya just really wanted a shower and a nap now.

"...really? I'm terribly sorry, miss. I promise I won't do it ever again." Sleazy and spineless slobbered out, which earned him a strange look from the thief.

"You're still talking?" What did he think she just agreed to?

"Sonya, you know the brat's probably trying to wait up for us. It's almost midnight."

As the Mafioso had a point, and the man babbling gratitude at her with a calculating edge to how he looked at her just made her feel more disgusted overall, Sonya swung her ax for the last time.

Sleazy and spineless' head rolled to the hitman's slightly blood speckled Italian leather shoes, and her friend picked it up to shove on her makeshift pike in a way so that when it was planted his slack-jaw expression would be aimed somewhat upward. "Now for the mop up."

The one pane of window that didn't have a bullet lodged into a section rippled with violently indigo Mist Flames as Anna poked her head on through to see Sonya fully. "Miss Bazanova? Your father is outside, he would like to speak with you."

"...you lucky little-"

"I am," she spoke over her friend who was looking decidedly pleased at the interruption anyways, one of which might mean they'd get to go back to her hotel suite in a few more minutes, "going to assume you went with something less insulting to my face than 'bitch'."

"...let's do that."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Mamma?"

"Too early, back to sleep." With that, Sonya yanked him back down and buried her nose in his hair.

Shamal clutched her back as he teared up and sniffed hard, wondering when she returned last night. He and zia Tatiana had stayed up really late, and still she and Mister Renato hadn't returned before he fell asleep.

Given he wasn't still on the couch with his zia, that meant either his mamma came back and moved him or the nurse did and the Russian he was hugging hadn't minded anyways.

"I'm sorry."

"You said that." She responded absently, pulling away again only just far enough to peer at his face. "It's fine, Shamal. Shit happens. Go to sleep."

He bit his lower lip, trying not to annoy his mamma by repeating things when she wanted to rest.

There was a sigh, and Sonya pushed herself upright which also spilled the Mist into her lap.

Leaning back against her pillows and smoothing down the blonde hair that decided to stick up as if she slept with wet hair, she groggily glowered down at him through red-rimmed eyes. "...should I go get Renato, so he can say the same thing? You're mine. End of story."

Burying his face in her stomach, Shamal tried to stop crying.

It wasn't working.

Another sigh, and he got picked up by the back of yesterday's shirt to clearly see his mamma's very tired and unhappy expression. "Only this once, do you hear me?"

She didn't even wait for him to respond, sliding herself and him by proxy out of her bed. She shifted him to a less dangly position on a hip, not even twitching as she usually did when he shoved his face into her neck.

Shamal spent the trip trying to calm himself down before he annoyed her more but couldn't and soaked her neck and shoulder as he bawled like a little baby.

Sonya kicked open a door, had to because she had both hands supporting him, and the crack as it impacted the wall was startlingly loud. Zia Tatiana yelped from the couch as she bolted upright, wildly looked around for a moment until she spotted them. He jolted out of position too, swinging himself around to see what his mamma was doing.

His godfather looked equally as rumpled and tired as his mamma did, and also just as unhappy as he pushed himself fully upright and dropped the gun to the bedspread. "...Sonya. What are you wearing?"

"I think Tats called it a chemise." The thief hooked her heel behind the edge of the door she had just embedded into the far wall and slammed it shut behind her. "Now, reassure the brat he's not being sent to some stupid orphanage so we can go back to sleep."

Shamal hiccupped embarrassingly loudly in the moment of silence before Renato could say something.

"...ah."

Tearing up again, which was stupid because she was here but he couldn't stop, the Mist tried to wiggle out of her arms before she finished delivering him to the hitman. He failed rather horribly and ended up dumped on the man's stomach.

Then the blankets moved rather sharply under him.

"Sonya. What the hell?"

"I'm tired, deal."
Staring at the woman that had just climbed into his bed for a long moment, Renato glanced back at Shamal skeptically. "…so. Why?"

"…I'm sorry." Shamal couldn't really explain it better than that at the moment.

He knew it was stupid, but the fact his mamma was here after walking out of the firing range last night all Cloudy and not-pleased was still…

He gave a wet, miserable sniff as he dashed the water from his eyes. Only to squawk in surprise when a finger rudely poked him in the side of the head to knock him off the older man and into the space between his godparents.

"It's relief, Sonya. I'm not sure what you expect me to do about it."

"…oh." Mamma rolled over, snagging Shamal again and tucking him under the covers with them. "Well fuck then. Cry, brat. And get it out of your system."

"Really?" Renato drawled skeptically as he carefully laid back down himself. "That's your solution to this?"

"Sometimes it's just better to just cry it out than bite your tongue about it." Sonya set her chin on the crown of his head, blowing out another sigh. "Brat, I'm not going to sleep until you feel better. And I'm sure we're bothering Renato enough he's not going to sleep either."

"…probably not, but not for the reason you think."

"Whatever." She snarked back in a sour tone, snuggling Shamal deeper into the bedding with her and giving him the privacy to do whatever he wanted while she focused on something else.

"I'm not going to be able to sleep because someone decided to kick my door in." Renato shot back from the other side of the bed sarcastically, tugging the blankets higher a little so they'd at least cover their godchild up to the chin. "Now I'm wide awake, thank you very much for that."

"Excuse me, my hands were full."

"Little miss 'I can bench press a train engine', would it have killed you to use one hand to turn a doorknob? You put a hole in the wall."

Shamal gave a watery giggle, pressing his forehead into his mamma's collarbone and stopped trying to do anything but lay there and listen.

Of course they'd pick to argue with a few spare moments.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Tatiana cleaned up the remains of her and Shamal's little pity-party ice cream binge from last night while Sonya ordered breakfast from the hotel's catering staff.

Well… more like brunch.

She and Shamal had managed to go back to sleep for a few more hours eventually, but Renato had only lingered as long as it took for the brat to drop off before getting up for the day. The hitman was still missing but had left notice with the redhead that slept on the couch he'd be back in time for lunch.

"I called Lisa earlier, she said not to worry about missing the day's practice. She heard from Arseniy when he got home this morning." Her sister informed her in a matter of fact tone of voice, something she tended to use when on 'business'. Mostly medical these days, but way back when the same tone was used when in the sisters were in the middle of a heist. "I got nothing about what she heard about, and I really would like an explanation on why I got to babysit my very upset nephew, little sis."

"...I'm enough of a Cloud to be murderously violent sometimes. Shamal accidentally startled me into being less... nice." Sonya admitted bitterly. "I'm honestly not even sure how many people I killed last night, and I don't want to know."

The lassitude and catharsis from her temper tantrum hadn't yet faded, it was both worse and better than the period of time right after trying to murder Fong. As the Chinese Triad Storm had given back as good as he got, it was slightly different than now when she basically bulldozed a gang of men that hadn't known what the fuck to do about her before dying messily.

In short, she was satisfied and sleepy and not a bit disturbed over anything. Also, both guilty and not feeling a lick of guilt for being that way.

The expected nightmares hadn't happened yet either, but if that was from bare four hours of sleep before Shamal woke up or from the napping afterwards being too light for dreaming she couldn't say.

Sonya honestly felt better than she had in the last two years, and even thinking of the things that normally just frustrated the fuck out of her produced a merely vaguely annoying itch instead.

...as soon as the cloying guilt she felt about not feeling guilty faded a bit, it might even be better.

The last time she felt anything remotely like it without violence was the Pabst Theater heist, being supported off the ground by the chandelier she had been dismantling to steal over the heads of a full house and the actors putting on the play. A wrongly timed glance and she would've been busted… but pulling it off made her almost as satisfied.

Only without the guilt, and she was going to cling to that idea with all she had in hopes of avoiding another lethal blow up.

"It should be in the news now. There was no way we were going to be able to hide it all after I set shit on fire."

Tatiana merely gave her an odd look, gripping her left wrist to eye the bruises and small cuts she had from knocking holes in walls. "Okay… one, you have unrealistic expectations. I know a personal goal of yours is to be the world's most agreeable Classical Cloud, but you already are just by being yourself without going way too far in the whole I'm not going to kill everything that irks me' way."

"…what?" Sonya didn't even twitch as Sun Flames encourage the small nicks in her arms.

"We don't exactly live in hippy glory, Nya. Our world is one of murderers and killers. Despite what you may fondly believe of the civilian world above us, they aren't either. Death is as much a part of life as anything else. Even for us 'enlightened' humans." Finished with the left arm, Tatiana picked up her right and applied her Sun Flames to the small collection of cuts there as well. "They were morons. They likely would've kept on doing what they were doing had you not put a permanent stop to it. Just somewhere else, and not where you could easily find them. Do you really feel all that guilty about shutting it down?"

"...no, not really."

The Sun nodded, seemingly half-expecting that. "And you feel guilty for not feeling that way, right?"

"Yes?"

"Our dork of a brother aside, it's equally as human to be selfish as it is to be selfless. You spared a number of girls a rather horrifying fate you got way too close to yourself and got an itch you've probably been ignoring for years scratched at the same time. I'm happy you're feeling better, and you should be too after a night's work of being someone's savior. Fuck them assholes royally."

"...that would be a little hard. They're kind of in pieces."

Her sister snorted a laugh, licking her lips and trying not to smirk. "You think too much. You used to beat the shit out of those that talked about me or Cherep behind our backs, and you never had these kinds of problems then."

"That may be an issue, yes." She did think a lot, and maybe she hadn't given her 'Cloud instincts' enough benefit of doubt.

Her urges to do violent things might have bled off some of her stress and helped avoid the incident last night had she paid them more attention.

Gedeon's daily beatings aside, because that had helped her stress with the Zolotov clan alone if was her final option to deal with the stubborn Sun.

Sonya was also fully aware she was making herself feel bad, intellectually knowing murder shouldn't be an answer to any problem from twenty years in a life where things were less... criminally inclined.

Unfortunately, in this lifetime entrenched in the trade of violence, it probably was. This time she had been raised with the idea that violence was an answer, and one of the more frequently used ones as well.

Maybe she should start punching people that irked her through walls. She'd feel better more often, they probably wouldn't die from that, and it should be a win all around.

"Why do you have cuts? You were out with another Sun, and we don't like it when our people are running around in pain for no reason."

"Renato's not a healer by nature, and he gets irritated when people immediately assume that because he's a Sun he should heal every little injury that occurs."

The nurse eyed her suspiciously. "Did he offer?"

"...yes? I said you'd probably like-" Sonya was cut off as her sister whacked her upside the back of her head.

"Bad. Bad Storm-Cloud. When tall, dark, and snarky gets back, apologize. And never do that again."

Tatiana was actually frowning seriously now. "It's as much instinct to us as ensuring everything you look after is alright, Nya. Or this obsession you have with your control or your books."
"…ow."

"Don't even- …you didn't hurt your neck or anything, right?" After putting up with the nurse manipulating her head's movements and scrutinizing her face, Sonya pulled away once released. "No? Okay, so cuts? Anything else you've been ignoring?"

The thief made the mistake of glancing down to one of her legs, which she was fairly certain she had over strained the knee of somehow.

Able to punch a hole in steel or not she wasn't really physically imposing nor weighed that much, and the Sun managed to pull her right leg up and her heel set on one shoulder to inspect the limb. Knocking her backwards onto the couch her sister had slept on when her balance was compromised by the nurse manipulating a leg.

Which was of course the very moment Renato came back to the hotel suite.

"Kinky."

"You either have terrific timing or a horrible one." The redhead tossed to the man over a shoulder, poking rude fingers into Sonya's sore knee. "Nya, you have something to say to him too… right?"

"…sorry for the refusing healing thing, apparently." She spoke in a deadpan, then winced as her sister flexed her knee in a way it shouldn't move. "Fuck, Tats. That hurts."

"I've seen you break your foot in complete silence. Hush you." A few more pushes around her knee cap, and she dropped the limb. "Swollen and a bit achy, but not actually damaged enough for me to heal. Ice and stay off it as much as you can."

The thief pulled herself up into a more upright position, more to get her feet underneath her than any other reason. She managed to catch sight of the newspaper tucked under Renato's arm as she did so and wondered if she was morbidly curious enough to see what it had to say about last night. "I ordered brunch from the hotel, and the brat's still asleep in your bed."

The hitman eyed her as he tossed the paper to the coffee table still smeared with some melted creamed sugar. "Sonya, maybe you should go change."

"Why? Everything's covered that needs to be." She looked down to check and had to tug the lacy hem of her really short nightgown thing down in order for her words to be correct. It was kind of like a slip, actually. It fell to mid-thigh, but with the nurse's actions it had ridden up a little to her hips.

Tatiana suddenly gained a wicked smirk, obviously checking out her little sister's form instead of suspiciously eyeing her injuries. "I knew that would look lovely on you."

"…I need to do laundry. So sue me, it was the first thing I found last… err… earlier this morning."

"I absolutely hate that I'm going to say this… but it's not something one wears in polite, mixed company." The Italian gritted out, looking fairly unhappy indeed. "If you ordered in, that means those pimpled faced bellhops will be knocking on the door soon."

"This isn't any worse than the red dress I wore to the Vongola Ball, Renato."

He gave her a flat stare, which dropped down to her bare legs the moment after. "I truly pity your father."
The nurse cackled gleefully. "Oh no, tall, dark, and snarky. It's worse than that."

Renato shot her a skeptical look, which Tatiana merely grinned in the face of and turned on a heel to Sonya's bedroom. Likely to raid it for any fresh clothes that might fit her, even if she had more generous curves and was slightly taller than the thief. "Nya's got no body modesty!"

"I'm still really damn certain I wouldn't be Renato's first naked woman!" She shot at her sister's back, huffing when there wasn't a reply. "He's seen more than this before!"

The hitman looked highly conflicted for a few, long moments. "...Sonya, I don't think either of us would like you to be Shamal's first nude woman."

"There are topless beaches in Europe, if I'm moving to Italy then I'm going to take advantage of that closeness. The brat's likely to come with, and so is Tats depending." She refuted pointedly. "Either me, my sister, or another woman, he's going to see eventually. I didn't think you'd have a problem with that."

A muscle ticked in his jaw, and Renato palmed his face in exasperation. "No... no I have no problem with it. The opposite, really. Especially if I'm invited. Allow me to rephrase my comment. I don't think either of us would like you to be some greasy faced bellhop's first nude woman."

"But I'm not naked!"

After a beat of apparently exasperated silence, the man started laughing. "You are ridiculous. Go get dressed, Sonya. Please."

"...fine." A bit miffed, as 'ridiculous' was a new name she had never been called before, the Storm-Cloud got up to follow her sister. It was something she had been planning on doing after calling for brunch anyways. "I never would've pinned you for a prude, Renato."

"The depressing thing is, neither would I." Marvelled the Italian in a dry tone of voice, taking her spot on the couch in a rather graceful sprawl and covering his face with his hat. "Why is it always at the wrong time?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya flipped idly through a few pages, more curious over what was on her desk than paying attention to the vor from next door who was trying to lecture her on security procedures.

"-are you even listening to me?"

"No." Another few pages of the work Scruffy had done when left to his own devices, and the thief had to admit he was probably a damn good find of hers.

At least somewhat equipped to actually make hard facts out of the research the Dying Will Flame users had compiled from themselves and the stone-matching efforts.

If this was what he could do with just two reference books and nearly unlimited free time, then she should get him more to work with. Peter had detailed and decanted a lot of the random findings they had into short, easily to process terminology and wrote it all out over the course of the last couple months.
There was now a list of all the stones, their preferred Flame type to work with, and speculations on how cut and quality affected things to test next.

…either she had to burn this or steal it from her own temp-office. There was no way in hell she was going to leave the Zolotovs more information than she had to, and technically Scruffy was hers and not the clan's.

"Bazanova! You will-"

He didn't get much farther, Sonya shot to her feet and decked the asshole trying to yell at her in the jaw.

None too gently either, and he had been leaning half over her desk.

"Galina, we require a new door." She announced simply into the ringing silence caused by the ear-splitting crack of her office door giving way under the impact of however many kilograms of Russian male, reseating herself and eyeing the likely broken door jamb the man had flown out of. "Scruffy, how much practice have you had with healing?"

As the Lightning scrambled for the office phone, her Sun gulped a bit desperately. ". . .um. . . a little?"

"You now have a new practice dummy. Shoo."

Shamal, the little brat, snickered as he left the couch and hauled himself up to her lap to see what she was looking at better. "But mamma, McScruffy's my game-partner! What am I going to do if you send him off?"

"I'm fairly sure the Mists are going to teach you to teleport today, you'll need your Flames for that brat." At least, that was what Usov had informed her of when they were watching the people casing the office of that sleazy and spineless asshole last night. Early morning, whatever. She bent lower, so only the Mist would hear her. "Hide this for me?"

He immediately reached out, indigo Flames licking the papers into nothingness. "...why?"

"I'm going to steal it." Shamal looked entirely too happy with being able to help her, clutching nothing and drawing said 'nothing' up under his shirt as if that would help.

Amused, Sonya pressed a kiss to his temple in thanks. Straightening up just in time to catch sight of her father eyeing the man laid out on the ground and Scruffy's first aid attempts outside the broken door dubiously.

"Sonya."

"I've realized I've been doing more damage to myself by refraining from all violent impulses than merely obeying the lesser ones." Announced the Storm-Cloud mildly, perfectly aware this would probably earn her that ever so scary reputation she had now. Strangely, she was alright with it as long as she did deserve the fear. "So, in hopes of avoiding another incident like last night, I will deck people I dislike."

Arseniy glanced downward, as Scruffy poked a spectacularly bruised cheekbone with a glowing yellow finger.

"He decided he had the right to try and lecture me, then tried to shout in my face."

The man who had a large hand in raising her to be what she was now gave a kind of grumbling sigh, stepping over the trailing legs and giving only a glance to the broken area on the door frame that normally held a latch. "Sonya."

"I am neither a vor nor am I treated like one. I do not have to act like one either." She pointed out just as blandly.

"Try not to cause everything to fall around our ears, girl."

"I make no promises I'm not sure if I can keep."

Grunting his acceptance of that, the vor hooked the chair to pull out that had been pushed aside by the afternoon visitor currently out cold outside her office. He sat in it, flicking a glance down to the brat sitting pretty in her lap.

"Usov." Sonya obediently called out, distracting her little Mist as the preteen walked through the broken door. Said older Mist looked comically surprised for a second to end up in the hallway outside and at a right angle to the office, and he chuckled as he stepped over a pair of legs as well before giving her an attentive look. "Lessons now."

They were running a little late already, giving the mid-morning wake-up today. It shouldn't take this long for him to come by to collect the younger boy.

"No game today?"

Ah, that would be why.

"No, but it's okay." Shamal informed the other brightly, making it way to conspicuous that he was hiding something under his shirt as he climbed out of her lap. Sonya made note of teaching him better ways to smuggle paper if he wanted. "Teleporting?"

"I see the beans have been spilled already." Usov sniffed in mock disapproval, taking the kid's hand and immolating them both through the floor instead of the cracked door.

Sonya actually did wonder how Mists could get from one place to another in the blink of an eye, but privately suspected some enterprising Mist had gotten into science fiction and mutated the 'wormhole' idea. Constructing a portal that when touched sucked them through to another designated Constructed portal.

Entirely too useful, that trick. Especially for ensuring one was noted to be in one place far removed from a scene of a crime only minutes after committing said crime.

Also for cutting hours out of transport time, thank you dearly for the lift Anna.

"About last night," Arseniy started, which killed Sonya's good mood entirely, "do you want to finish that off yourself?"

"...why ask?" She had formally handed things over to her foster father once she and Renato piked the head out on what passed as the lawn, as the vor was better equipped to handle any investigation or cover up he or the clan wanted done.

"Because you are here." He gestured to the office around them to qualify that general term. "And as such, you are part of what it means to be a Flame user of Will Dying."

"Dying Will Flame user, Arseniy." Sonya corrected absently. "I could, Tats said something about needing examples of our type to strive for. However, are you sure that would do any good?"
"You tell me."

The Storm-Cloud puzzled over that for bit.

On one hand, they had precious little actual examples of competent Flame users right now.

Tatiana was the best by reputation, and only for the support role of healer. Even when Dmitriy pried his ass out of prison, he'd be chained behind the same desk she was starting to loathe and known more for his administrative skills than anything Tranquility related.

Mikhail the Storm was off earning the reputation, and frankly she suspected Kazimir the Rain was off doing the same thing to get the rank to actually hinder her for once, but both were years away from being regarded as more than just boys.

If Sonya actually involved herself, she might be able to positively influence that balance. More so than being a rather successful thief who just happened to have Flames.

Still female, but a positive role model that might be emulated.

On the other, she frankly didn't want to get that involved.

Clouds were few and far between as it was, they were the second-to-last type she had precious few details about despite being one. If she involved herself more, would that inspire other syndicates to want their own Cloud and hunt them even more?

"Usov told me we had a visit by the Vindice last night, and Anna convinced it we weren't operating against a syndicate but something that started civilian approaching and infringing on criminal territory. Which excused the 'more than three' Flame users thing against a syndicate that had none, as it wasn't." Why it was that Mists seemed to deal better when confronted with undead former Arcobalenos than just about anyone else was something to wonder. "If I become involved, that is one of the three allowed. Add in a Mist for their crowd-control… maybe Tatiana as medic… the only problem is, Arseniy, that I don’t actually care all that much. You'd be better off pulling a backup Mist for general mind-fucking or a Rain for ensuring peaceful diplomacy."

Her foster father stared at her evenly. Neither surprised nor disappointed, or even mad. "Not even for…?"

A tilt of his head indicated where the two Mists had left the office. "For Shamal? I'm moving to Italy the moment I can, Arseniy."

For Valera, maybe. However, this wasn't an invasion or possible hostile takeover attempt. As far as she knew, anyways.

"Your mother will be most displeased if you never return."

"I plan on it, we do Christmas up here after all."

That pulled a wry smirk from the vor. "And your birthday."

"Presents are nice." Sonya agreed pleasantly.

"Greedy." Rumbled the older Russian approvingly. "The Pahkan would like to speak with your Italian Mafioso before he leaves."

"I'll pass it on, but as the only thing the clan owns that he's made use of is the firing range… I've paid for most everything else." Technically, the Storm-Cloud had also paid for the school and it's refurbishing out of funds Galina had accumulated from the jewel finding efforts. As that had been expressly for the clan at the time it had been purchased, it was still on Pyotr's books as the clan's territory now. "He is also here on business, not just for pleasure."

Arseniy leaned forward, dropping his voice to a point it wouldn't easily carry. "Another year at most, Sonya. The Pahkan's due to retire soon. Wait until then."

"...I'll suggest that being polite would be appreciated. I did it for him." She amended, wondering how her foster parents knew of her plans before she said anything.

The vor hadn't even blinked when she mentioned moving. Maybe just a really good poker-face?

...no, they knew.

Now then, which of the Mists did Lisa half-own outright?

"As you've declined the offer to help out, I can't actually say much more about last night." Arseniy continued in a more normal tone, getting up from the chair he had monopolized. "Not that I think you really wanted to hear it."

"Just think, Valera can grow up to do the same amount or more damage than I did." Sonya offered instead of comment on the suggestively leading statement.

"...I'm going to teach him how to use a gun."

She stuck her tongue out at her foster father.

Arseniy snorted, then stalked only far enough to stop in her broken office door. Between her and the other vor who Scruffy had been tending to. "You and I are going to have a little talk about how you speak to my girls, Tsitnikov."

...was that shout-happy asshole from next door's name?

Huh... Sonya was never going to remember that.

"Galina?"

"I told them."

"...Lisa is scary sometimes."

"Oh, fuck yes." Sighed the now no-longer petrified Lightning attempting to meld with the office furniture, smoothing down her vest-like jacket for the day nervously as Scruffy squeezed himself back inside as one vor carried another one off down the hall.

"I wonder which of the Mists she already has in a pocket?" Mused the Storm-Cloud thoughtfully, looking back down at her desk before she recalled that Shamal had made away with the report from Peter that was actually interesting.

Damn. She hadn't finished reading that yet.

"A few of them, I think. She is the contact point for civilians looking for more information from your books. Telling them she's your mother gets the more nervous ones through her door and telling them some of the misadventures you all had learning about the ability gets them to open up enough to be sorted."
…and of course, her mother wouldn't let potential resources go without a firm grasp on how to twist them to her will. So… a fair number of Flame users probably knew her mother, and a few semi-embarrassing stories from her childhood.

Lovely.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

As Renato was off scouring Moscow for the people in the list Galina and Usov put together for him, or at least the live ones he tentatively decided matched his culprit of whatever it was, Sonya curled up with Scruffy's report to read that said Mist had delivered to her with her dead-tired brat.

Which… actually raised another question.

At most a year, or two if the search for a properly situated and built home took that long, then she would move to Italy and take the brat in full-time. Some of what she had in her hands would be good for Shamal to know and be familiar with, especially the Mist sections.

Sonya idly stroked said brat's hair as he napped with his head cushioned on her thigh.

He was pretty skilled, and frankly she wasn't quite sure who was stronger… Usov or Shamal.

Should she share some of this with Renato or not?

He was the brat's godfather and had more time with the kid than she would in the next few years… but he was uncomfortably close to Vongola. It wasn't safe to say she disliked the Italian Famiglia, but saying she wanted nothing to do with them was valid.

The thief was well aware judging the Ninth Sky of Vongola on the issue of her brother's harm was a bit petty of her, but she was alright with being petty.

She also wasn't a great fan of the Eighth Sky either, with Daniella's calculating gaze paired with the Sky-imbued impulse of 'do impressively' made her automatically defensive and snappish.

Sonya was impressive enough as it was, surviving just short of an age she hadn't in another life with more than enough skill not to die that way again. She had direction, close-knit family, a passion, and a kid. More than what she had in her last one, a lot more.

Something telling her to be even more impressive than that was… irritating.

Anything she shared with the hitman might end up in Vongola's hands, because the Inverted Sun was that impressed by the syndicate on top in his home country and had good relations.

Such lofty friends staying such required upkeep, especially when they were doing you a favor and sheltering a soft spot like 'godchild' in their own territory for you. More so when you didn't have the reputation or syndicate behind you that made them want to keep you happy as well.

Bits and pieces she didn't mind too much, they'd get out anyways. From Shamal telling stories to impress his fellow brats back in the Iron Fort about his summer vacation in Soviet Russia to just rumor and hearsay.

Spinel gemstones were already well-known in the Zolotovs to be what to use if you had Flames until they shattered under even a gentle touch, then one reported to whichever section leader to get a personal match. Sonya and Galina had a bet on when the wider Moscow syndicates would 'mysteriously' learn that fact too, without the gem testing that had actually cost them a few million in rubles so far.

She had her money on one of the vory not realizing it was information to sit on and speaking of it unwisely, the Lightning bet one of the dissatisfied Flame users they knew of to spill the beans for either money or favors.

Sonya, back when she was still neutral about the criminal superpower, had traded a few of the other stones they only found on accident for her visitations with Shamal. The end results, not the processes on finding them or how to get personalized matches.

Which, frankly, with how much money she only now knew went into finding them she had likely overpaid by a lot each time.

If she shared what was in her hands, that her Scruffy put together and combed through a truly atrocious amount of reports that were hand-written and sometimes hard to read, then just about anyone could figure out what handful of stones to test for which Flame type. Using only a couple thousand in any denomination instead of nearly a million if unlucky with any of the cheaper matches.

Sonya now had categories of jewels for each Flame type, sorted by strength and durability matched with Polarization and uses. Much better than just 'grades' as she got in return from Coyote Nougat. Scruffy had worked out by process of elimination what it was that the gemstones had that let certain Flames use them, and she now had suggestions for testing cut and clarity in order to narrow down the field even more.

The man was also working on recording the true spectrum of personalities within each type, which required a lot more information and even using only what they had she could probably judge pretty accurately what Flame type another would possess. Not just one or two terms for their quirks, everything that showed up repeatedly and couldn't be reasoned away via life experiences.

Frankly, Sonya had forgotten she let the man at the information. She wasn't going to forget ever again, and she was going to ensure she had a Mist keeping a discreet eye on the Sun from now on. More for his protection than anything, he was nearly completely dependent on her and she wasn't going to give him up now that he proved to be competent about something.

A list of Flame abilities they knew of so far, the gemstone charts, a pending professionally done estimation of Flame users of a whole type including Polarized opposites. Most of which wasn't entirely correct according to what Vongola taught Mists from what Usov had coaxed out of Shamal.

…Sonya wouldn't be sharing the gemstone-Flame compatibility matches. Her thief-senses screamed at her even contemplating it. Way too much money to give away to something she disliked, and frankly the brat had no need of it being a Mist. Renato might, but only if he asked and only the Inverted Sun selection.

A list of Mist Flame abilities… maybe not. Those could be taught or at least mentioned before the brat had to go back to Italy for the start of school.

Shamal was a smart kid, he'd figure out how to do it.

A detailed explanation of what 'being a Mist' meant?

Sonya bit her lip and tried to figure that one out.
There wasn’t a whole lot of such descriptions out there. Fully grown Mists were very smart criminals, with their quirks and habits actually defended to prevent someone from trying to take advantage. It seems they did that naturally, from what she had in her hands, so even a late-blooming Mist was not a truthful talker.

However, the Zolotovs had a number of child-Mists and they were a lot less closed-mouthed about it all.

Telling Renato any of what they had would mean the man could likely extrapolate that they had more on other types, and that the thief wasn’t saying anything about them. If she told him something that directly contradicted what Vongola taught?

Would he ask, or leave it?

Furthermore, would he share that without asking her?

---

(Tuesday the 17th of June, 1969. Tirana, Kingdom of Albania.)

"So… you weren't kidding about that 'strange' thing, were you?"

"…mou, I said it in the first place. Why would I lie?" Viper sneezed again into the tissue from the sixth box of them vaguely perched on their tightly blanket cocooned knees, dazedly trying to glare in the direction of their best friend.

They had a migraine that had lasted all night and now well into the next day's night even through frequent dozing naps, stuffed up sinuses, and a fever. Their last painful sneeze had also summoned into being a set of dancing polka-dotted frogs in lurid green and blue, hovering over the Mist’s now used tissue.

Cherep’s blurry form carefully batted away the gyrating amphibians, taking a seat on the rented hotel bed and pulling a tray over his lap. After replacing the used tissue for a new one. "Just saying. Making conversation, keeping spirits up? You know, nursing things. Now then… tomato soup or… more tomato. There were slim pickings on who did take-away soups and was still open in the middle of the night."

"I could’ve waited."

"You're sick, Vipes. And you weren't awake enough yesterday to do more than sip water. Food is good for you."

"They probably charged you through the nose for it." They countered a bit more viciously than was warranted.

The stuntman hadn’t had to go out to find them something. It was, in fact, a totally new sensation to be waited on like this. An addicting one, if still embarrassing.

"Probably." The overly cheerful Cloud agreed. "But it smells good."

Viper merely glared in the general direction of the purple blob in their vision, which was thankfully sharpening the more they woke up.

"I have strawberry ice cream for dessert."
"Blackmail." The Mist hissed, fighting a grin. "Oh my… have I corrupted you, Cherep?"

"Totally." Deadpanned their best friend.

They shifted, wondering how to work an arm out of the cocoon of blankets they had woken in. "You should've started with that, mou."

Cherep reached over and foiled any progress they had made by tugging the blankets back into position to keep the Mist warm against the artificial chills and to combat the shivers. "I'll keep that in mind for next time."

Why in hell…? "No."

"Yes."

Viper tried to glare, but frankly felt too wretched to honestly believe they had pulled it off. "Cherep-"

"You sneeze with a spoon in hand and the soup will go flying. I'm pretty certain it's only pure fear of the menagerie you've sneezed into existence that has us keeping this room, because nearly every time I or someone else opens the door some techno-colored and scaled monstrosity tries to escape." The stuntman informed them in a matter of fact tone, waving something spoon shaped and white in the air.

A spork?

"I'd rather not give the cleaning lady real reason to complain. The reptiles are more or less well-behaved, soup splatters on the other hand…"

Embarrassingly, they sneezed again if to prove the other's point.

Cherep stuck the spoon or possible spork in his mouth and pried off the luridly colored snake trying to slither down the back of his shirt and dropped it to the floor. Without allowing the shining silver tipped tail to knock either bowl of soup off the tray he had on his lap and plucking the tissue into the wastebasket set aside the bed in order to make way for the new one.

Miserably, the sick and bedridden Mist slumped as much as their cocoon allowed.

While pondering revenge for the blackmail the stuntman now had on them, their friend carefully blew on a spoonful of supposedly wonderfully scented soup. Their stomach growled faintly, oft ignored when starving or not they were hungry after so long of being well-fed and a day of little.

Sick or not.

"I will do the whole 'baby-airplane' thing if you give me trouble." The shameless Cloud admitted frankly, holding out a cooled bite for the Mist. "Also, just so you know… there's a thought-bubble thing depicting a pair of gears working away over your head. I can see you plotting."

Viper shot the man the ugliest look they could muster up as they bit down on the spoon viciously, but privately suspected it was even more pathetic than the other's drowned kitten pouts.

Cherep had been the one to offer a few comic books from America for them to read once.

"Very. And yes, all my fault. Not sorry."

"…words now?"
Cherep grinned brightly. "Did you try to change it? I think I like this version better."
Chapter 60

(Wednesday the 18th of June, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Snapping awake, Sonya held herself completely still for the first few seconds.

Just listening to the sounds of near-midnight dockside Moscow and the building settle, as well as little puffs of breathing that was ghosting hot gusts down her sternum.

Shamal had his head on her chest, somehow not waking up even if his mamma's heart was thundering after a rather gruesome nightmare.

Blinking wildly as violent imagery from her dreams were drowned out by this little bit of peace, the thief started to pet his hair lightly with one hand as she reached for the pillow behind her head. Carefully easing herself out from under the kid, she replaced herself with the fluffy bag of feathers in order to get up.

The Mist brat yawned as he rolled over, woken up slightly by her movements but not enough to actually become coherent. He buried his face in her replacement and huffed a bit unhappily, or maybe that was her imagination, but his breathing evened back out to deep and slow sleep patterns in moments.

She waited another few moments just watching him sleep, but eventually dragged herself out of the warm bed to ghost around her own living space.

Renato was probably sleeping too, and if so she didn't want to wake him even if the asshole could sleep deeply after the waking bloody nightmare of not even a day ago. Tiredly rubbing at her eyes, she more or less blindly headed for the kitchenette.

Above her beast of a refrigerator, in the cupboards, was her last bottle of vodka. Sonya actually didn't really do casual drinking on her own, but sometimes just having a glass or a bottle was nice. The last time it had seen any action was the last time Tatiana had visited her, and it got opened up the night of the museum robbery.

…fuck, that was an idea. She should probably drag those greaves and the ruins of the gauntlets back here to fiddle with during the nights she ended up not sleeping. The Storm-Cloud paused while perched on the lip of her counter, having scaled it to give her enough of a boost to reach her booze, and wrenched the cork out of the bottle but didn't yet take a drink.

Not Usov. For all she was sure the kid would respond promptly and all… he wasn't even a teenager yet. The Mist lead really needed full nights of sleep for growing, and after the incident last night was probably catching up on his missed hours.

"…Anna?"

The tiled floor beneath her dangling feet rippled with indigo fire, and Sonya peered down at the slightly bedraggled appearance of the Mirror Lady.

"My apologies, Anna."

"…no need, Miss Bazanova. I usually work late nights as it is."
The thief winced, because Anna had also been with her last night and apparently had been catching up on what she had missed tending to the side-results of her temper tantrum. "It really is quite petty, Anna. If you would rather..."

"I am awake now." Demurred the young teen graciously, settling herself in the projected image as if she was leaning up against something. Headboard of a bed, a wall, something more vertical than she herself was. "And if you refrain from speaking on whatever it is, I will wonder and get no more sleep myself."

A guilt trip?

Slightly amused, the Storm-Cloud took a swig of vodka and drew out the pause a bit. They were already awake, and the other had the option of going back to sleep if she wanted even if curiosity was a besetting sin to nearly all thieves.

"...I should also mention that if I fail to learn what it is you might have wanted, Usov is likely to become upset at the implications that you might not trust either him or I to handle your business."

Oooh, emotional blackmail. "Anna, try to recall that I am partially a Cloud."

"It was worth a try." She spoke without shame or embarrassment. "And I would like to believe it worked for petty reasons of my own, boss. Now then, how may this little minion be of service?"

…was this now an appeal to her supposed 'pack' nature?

Sonya eyed the image of the girl in her floor suspiciously, but the damned Mist merely politely gazed back expectantly. "There's a set of greaves and a pair of slightly damaged gauntlets in my office, Anna. I would like them and a sketchbook, since I doubt I will be getting much sleep tonight."

"Pencils? A pen?"

"I have a pen, but pencils would not be amiss."

Anna nodded once. "Of course, one moment."

Her tiled kitchen floor rippled once more with Mist Flames, the teenager who owned the Flames vanishing from sight. Sonya merely took another longer gulp of alcohol, then winced as the lights suddenly turned on.

"...Renato, I was perfectly happy in the dark."

"Pity, I was kind of hoping you had another chemise." The lights switched off, the half-dressed hitman moseying casually across the empty room to join her in the kitchen corner of her hotel suite. "And be that as it may, I would rather be sure you were awake and not sleepwalking and talking. Nightmare?"

Was it weird the most she could see now was his curly sideburns and spiky hair?

She usually had better night-vision than this, although the temporary but sudden flood of light might be the reason she couldn't make out as much detail anymore.

"What was your first clue?" The thief eyed the greyed-out hand that beckoned impatiently a few times, taking another swig of her liquor before handing it over.

Also, what the hell was wrong with what she was wearing?
It was his shirt… maybe that was it?

She had to roll the sleeves up a little to actually use her hands, was he enough of a clothes snob to mock her over that?

"Oh, no. I have no problem with you wearing my shirt, little lady Sonya." He cautiously sniffed the opening of the bottle and winced away from it. "What the hell is this?"

"Nearly pure grain alcohol, the type some people used to clean metal with." She answered dryly. "It's Russian vodka, Renato."

Dark eyes flicked from the clear contents in the clear bottle to her, and back again. She only could tell because the whites of his eyes flicked around with the motion. "Hmm… well, when in Rome and all that."

Sonya was honestly impressed he didn't cough or choke halfway through the drink he took.

Most people did on their first swig of straight, actual vodka. Cherep had spluttered his first drink all over himself, and Tatiana had lasted a few seconds before she choked on it. She herself managed to get it down her first time, but nearly coughed up a lung afterwards.

The face he pulled when he lowered it to stare hard at the liquid, however, was funny. "Sonya… this is awful. It doesn't have a taste."

"You don't drink vodka for the taste, Renato." In that, it was at least better than tequila.

She couldn't stand tequila. "…somehow, I'm not even surprised."

"Generally, you just add it to another drink to raise the alcohol content. My White Russians, for instance, merely tastes like cream when mixed well. Otherwise you drink it straight to get drunk faster." She held out a hand, but instead of giving the bottle back the hitman pointedly took another sip. "…Renato."

"Alcohol will not get you back to sleep anytime soon, and I actually believe they make nightmares worse." He explained just as pointedly, trying to snatch the cork out of her hand. "I've got a nearly foolproof way to get you back to sleep if you'd like, little lady Sonya."

Sonya tightened her grip, catching the man's fingers in her fist. He really should know better than trying to steal from a thief. "I'm not sleeping again tonight. It would be different if I was sleeping alone but I can't do more than one nightmare a night, my reactions get steadily worse. I might harm the brat."

"…ah." Studying her expression for a moment, Renato finally allowed her to take back possession of her liquor and got his fingers back in return. "If that's the case, want some company?"

"You don't have to." Someone should be well rested tomorrow, and he was off getting into trouble while she sat pretty in a well-defended office.

"If I offered, then I want to." Corrected the hitman snootily, snapping his fingers for the bottle. "There are these delightful things called naps, little lady Sonya. I'll be well rested no matter what."

"Lucky you." Snarked back the Storm-Cloud, handing the liquor over and sliding off the counter when Mist Flames snapped into existence on her kitchen table.
The oddly dark indigo Flames flared once then left behind the metal armor she requested, as well as a sketchbook and an assortment of pencils. She picked them up to transfer over to the couch, which had a corner bathed in street-lamp light she could work at.

"Ho? What's all this?"

"Antique whatever century armored greaves and gauntlets. I stole them not too long ago, actually." Pausing and examining the damage to one of the gauntlets, the thief knocked out a bit of the stuffing that had stymied her in shoving her hand in during said heist. "I'm seriously thinking about making myself a more modern set, because shrapnel and such are pretty much the only time I ever get injured being a human wrecking ball."

Renato flatly eyed the armor, then pinned her with a sardonic look as he joined her on the couch. "Any way you could make it out of scale mail?"

She eyed the examples she had to work with. "...the greaves, sure. The forearms for the gauntlets? Maybe. Not sure how to work it around the joints in the fingers, though."

He cracked a too-loud laugh, which made her hush him impatiently as she sorted things out to work on.

For fuck's sake, if he woke the brat she'd... do something. She wasn't sure what yet, maybe make him put the kid back to sleep.

"Shamal can sleep just fine on his own, I have no idea why you let him sleep with you."

"Because he wants to. And I only have two bedrooms in this suite."

"What if I said I wanted to sleep with you then?" The hitman questioned in a lazy drawl, which sounded faintly mocking.

"I really wouldn't mind if you want to. We've done that before in Babylon and it was rather nice."

Seriously, she had climbed into his bed, turnabout was fair. She wasn't sure why he'd want them all in the same bed, but it could be a protection thing. It was easier with them all in the same room.

Wait... was he protective of her?

He had started bitching about what she was dressed in and in what company she wore things around. It was possible if kind of... interesting. Arseniy had been the only other person to date to try sighing over how she dressed herself. Tatiana didn't count, she was more fashion-conscious than disproving.

Sonya was weirdly flattered that he cared that much.

Renato had been halfway through a gulp of her steadily diminishing alcohol as she spoke, and he twitched violently at what she was going to assume was her thoughts as he lowered the bottle and eyed her suspiciously. She couldn't hear anything too worryingly going on besides some distant sirens as some criminal got busted, and there was nothing in her suite he hadn't seen before.

Besides the things she had in her hands that he had seen be brought in by Mist.

"...fuck it, I don't even care anymore. I'll take what I can get."

...what?

"You owe me a story, by the way." Barreled on the Mafioso before she could ask, handing back the dregs of her vodka as if he hadn't drank half of what she had left before this little midnight thing.
"Something about a Cartier job?"

"...the winter of nineteen-sixty-three. Not my first jewelry store, but the second one Tats and I hit up. Just before that period of time I was missing from Mafia Land shortly after we first met, and I broke my hand."

"You were twelve?"

"...technically? No. I was eleven when we first met, and this was still a couple months before my birthday."

The hitman opened his mouth but paused to seriously think about that before he spoke. "...Sonya, when were you born?"

"December twenty-eighth, nineteen-fifty."

"You're... jailbait."

Well... "...I'm eighteen. I'll be nineteen this winter."

He palmed his face roughly. "No, you were jailbait back when you started mothering Shamal."

Sonya finished off her vodka as she pondered that. "...yeah. And?"

"You were sixteen when I took you to your first Vongola Ball."

"I turned seventeen shortly afterwards." She pointed out before setting the empty bottle down on her coffee table. "My Mafia Land paperwork is only off by a year. I suppose I should correct it now that it doesn't matter I am a year younger than it claims."

Renato made a sound halfway between a laugh and a groan, sprawled out in a kind of half-depressed mope on his half of the couch. "...we need more alcohol."

Mirror Lady Anna proved she was listening in when a near case of whisky and a few bottles of vodka flashed into existence on the Storm-Cloud's book littered coffee table, next to the lone empty one.

"...which one?"

"Anna."

"Thank you, lady Anna." The hitman cracked open a bottle of whisky and raised it as in salute. "To your health, lovely...way too young ladies."

Sonya narrowly eyed her friend.

What the hell was that supposed to mean?

He had better not be thinking of sniffing around the Mirror Lady's skirts, she was way too young for him.

Renato face-palmed before he even took a swig of the new liquor. "Not even... no, Sonya. Just no."

(ooo000ooo)
Viper shifted restlessly, wondering where Cherep was and what was taking him so long to return.

Finally released from the cocoon of blankets now that they had stopped shivering compulsively, the Mist was in the middle of a terrible bout of cabin fever to make up for the broken temperature one.

There was only so many times one could stare aimlessly at neutrally painted walls or ceilings or count questionable stains on the carpeted floor. Or wonder how much bodily fluid the bed was soaked in.

It was usually worse at the end and bottom corners of such cut-rate motels as this, and as long as the Mist stayed out of the middle of the bed and more to the top it was more or less ignorable. They would be having words with the stuntman about the suitability of such places as this to hole up within, although Viper did owe the other some consideration for suspending whatever he was off to do in order to tend to them.

…they also owed the man because their best friend was a considerate fool and had wrapped them up in order to respect their privacy about their true gender, when it wasn't possible for them to change another's perception of it. Instead of taking advantage of the illness preventing coherent use of Mist Flames to find out.

A stern lecture, maybe. Alas, not a demand for four-stars or better accommodations immediately.

Circus performers did not make a lot of money, especially not communist ones. Viper flatly refused to feel guilty over the amount of money they had tricked, fooled, or otherwise weaseled out of the stuntman. Cherep took it all in stride, treating the incidents like financial lessons instead of just them being a miser and never cracking so much as a frown at their behavior.

The Mist finally picked male for now, he refused to give into the temptation of being female while being cared for by a rather good-looking male friend. Feeling dainty and sensuous was all well and fine, but he drew the line at feeling like a damsel in distress that needed someone.

Fuck that.

Feeling another sneeze coming along, Viper groped for the nearly-out tissue box. If Cherep was delayed… there was any number of reasons for why and some of them were not something the Mist liked to contemplate on.

He had a way to find out easily enough. Hopefully his initial Mist ability would still work, if he finally had his personal illusions back.

Swiping irritably at the literal fruit-bat thing that appeared as well with the use of his Thoughtography, causing the apple-shaped flying red rat with bat wings to flutter off and nearly crash into the curtained window, Viper studied the image forming on the fragile tissue to see where his best friend was.

The door opened before the mucus finished resolving itself into a decent map of the entire motel and the nearby streets.

Cherep merely cocked an eyebrow at the Mist hiding the tissue behind his back, shutting the door behind himself before the apple-bat could escape. "Seriously, Vipes? I can assure you, I've seen grosser things over the last couple days. Or are you sneezing up bits of brain? I told you just laying tissues out on your knees was a bad idea."
"Mou, I am not sneezing up brain tissue."

He got the bag of more tissue boxes and actual solid food set on his lap, before the stuntman made use of rusty and nearly unused thief skills to pluck the fragile paper away from the other man neatly. Without tearing it, taking advantage of his near-reflexive jerk to stabilize the food and tissues before they spilled even if they were positioned perfectly to balance on his knees without issue if he didn't move.

His attempt to hide the thing via Mist Flames merely caused a fleet of snails to suddenly ooze into existence, flecked up and down the stuntman's forearms. They waved multi colored and striped tentacles at the circus performer, as if their behavior would be enough to drive the curious man off what Viper had tried to make transparent.

Said Esper despaired over those few, left to rot thief skills even as he tried to control a flush of embarrassment at getting caught out by them.

Cherep could've been phenomenal hitman or assassin with both an entire thieves' syndicate worth of refined stealth abilities pounded in his head and his near-immortality, if only he wasn't a complete pacifist. He only used those skills now for the occasional card game with friends, or in his training to do life-risking stunts in mid-air.

…and occasionally used them against the more criminally inclined around him like this when the whim hit him.

"Cute." Was the stuntman's only observation of his new decorations, flopping gracelessly to Viper's side still studying the Thoughtography map in his hands. "I've eaten escargots before, you know. Slimy and a bit chewy, but oddly good with enough butter and garlic."

The snails abandoned ship the easiest way they could, which was oozing up to the man's hands to fall to the floor.

"…mou, Cherep-"

"Well… there's no… blood… what." The Mist winced at the Cloud's suddenly flat tone as he realized exactly what he was looking at. "Is this a map?"

He tilted said map so they both could see the nearly transparent mucus outlining the nearby surroundings on clean white tissue. Which was only now getting damp enough for the lines to be clearly seen. The view was occasionally interrupted by various sized mollusks shells making their ponderous way in snail-emergency mode to the man's fingers.

"Maybe."

"Is this how you always know where I am and when is a good time to show up?"

"…maybe."

"This is pretty cool. Do you have a range for this?"

Viper stared at his best friend oddly.

Purple eyes blinked back questioningly, not a trace of wariness or suspicion in them.

"Most people find it a breach of personal privacy, mou."
"Dude, you're a Mist. Privacy to you is nothing like it is to normal people." He snickered, folding up the map and handing it back in order to shake off the last of the snails on his wrists and hands so he could pull out a carton of take away for himself. "If I was all that bothered about you keeping tabs on me, I would've said something when Sonya made mention of how stalker-ish her Mist minion was a year or so ago."

It was sometimes hard to remember that for all Cherep was a civilian now, he still had ties that went deep into the underworld and still kept up with a lot of things Viper wouldn't expect any civilian to know. For all he was a Flame user, the stuntman was charry about using his abilities and turned his nose up at even petty crime.

Absently straightening out his own meal of Thai cuisine and the newly purchased boxes of tissues, which he would have to break into in as little as an hour's time from the look of things, the miser pondered over the situation.

'Overly controlling' had been tossed in his face a few times when his Thoughtography ability came to light to others. 'Creepy', 'invasion of privacy', and quite a few other terms had also been tacked into such accusations from time to time.

Viper had stopped offering the ability for sale, as it was part of the reason he was now on his own even when there was an entire community of Espers around.

Reading minds, sure as long as it was possible to train and block such things. Moving things with a thought was alright, as was foretelling the future.

Being able to divine exactly where someone was at all times, even when in bed with someone they shouldn't be?

Apparently not nearly as acceptable to the greater majority with such things to hide.

It had cost him far too much, but also was damn near priceless in his line of work. Always being able to track down any target earned him a lot of work that otherwise would've gone to less young and green-looking information brokers.

…maybe he should've found more Flame users to associate with instead before he decided he was better off with just money instead of friends. It merely being accepted as just part of what made Viper a Mist was a new experience.

"That serious of an issue, huh? No Vipes, I don't mind you know where I am when you want to. Actually, it's a good thing. I don't have to worry you might pop up in the middle of a show or something and draw all kinds of the wrong attention to you, or how to instantly work it in somehow to make spectators think it's just part of the show."

"Mou… the thought bubble is back, isn't it?"

"Yep." Cherep confirmed with audible amusement, sticking a fork of fried rice and what looked like diced pork meat into his mouth. He chewed for a moment, probably well aware he was annoying the Mist. "About since… I got back."

"…fuck." Reapplying his gender illusions cause it, then.

Viper glared upward, where he could just see an oddly bulbous white cloud showing an image of three grey dots blinking darker then lighter in sequence. Hanging in mid-air right over his head.

The image changed into an animatedly flashing exclamation point just before he popped it viciously with his spork.

"Not a word, mou."

The stuntman merely grinned back at him. Then winced and picked a Mist snail out of his khao phat mu as it decided the food was as good a landing spot as any.

Served the asshole right for not immediately telling Viper about the little misfired Mist Flame issue he had

(ooo000000)

(Wednesday the 18th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Peter McScruffy was bemused to be handed a sketchbook, but that didn't even touch the confusion as Sonya wordlessly passed him and stretched out on the office couch instead of say anything.

Galina looked as utterly confused as him, but apparently young Shamal had an idea of what to do.

The Mist climbed up onto the couch with her and got snatched into a kind of overly suffocating looking snuggle, which then had the Storm-Cloud rolling to her side to put the kid's back against the back of the couch and presenting her own to the office at large.

Scruffy very slowly backed away to the other side of the office. There were chairs over there by the desk, he'd be fine in one of them for the day.

Since the last week had been downright bizarre to him, he was frankly starting to get immune to the weirdness going on.

His patron had a kid, okay. An Italian Mafioso hitman she called a friend, alright. Apparently murdered a couple handfuls of want-to-be-vory nearly on her own incredibly late the day before yesterday. Not exactly warm and fuzzy thoughts, until one recalled he was left alone in a den of murderers because no one wanted to say otherwise to her face.

Scruffy wasn't alright with it, but he could understand this wasn't remotely like the 'civilian' life he left behind years ago when he became the unwilling guest of a diamond cartel. The more 'scary' or 'deadly' the woman napping on the couch was regarded the less he was bothered at all, and the more he was looked at as a necessary buffer.

He didn't understand this culture, for nearly a handful of months living here in the middle of it all.

Why it was the entire clan knew who did what that resulted in about three kilometers of territory being suddenly added to this syndicate's area of influence. Why it was exciting news and not… horrifying. Or why no one wanted to get within twenty feet of this office, or why the vory next door suddenly decided to move.

Oh… he could guess… but… he'd probably be off or wrong in some way.

Therefore, he wasn't going to judge things by his more 'civilian' sensibilities.

Sonya's sudden willingness to punch people through closed doors had nothing to do with it, really.

Flipping absently through the sketchbook and the few filled pages at least informed him of what he was now to be doing. Getting the Lightning's attention took a prod or three, and he handed the woman the pad of drawing paper when she glared at him.

Scruffy was an engineer, not a mechanic, blacksmith, or jeweler. He was still pretty certain he could figure something out for the woman who was paying for him to live in relative luxury without demanding much beyond busy work in return.

Those metallurgy books to be bought looked interesting, and the gemology and geology ones had proven to be fascinating reads once he worked out the Cyrillic alphabet.

After who knew how long of never reading a damn word due to the lack of material to read around, that is. He needed a hobby or something.

…the implied stipend he now had to use for his own personal reasons as well as a more generous amount for any research effort he might want to undertake regardless of what was rather motivating in that respect. He now had the money to support a hobby.

Perfectly aware Sonya was purchasing his loyalty, she already kind of had it since he was… well, alive, the Sun actually didn't mind. It was probably the most forthright attempt yet and left up to him if he'd take it or not and not… taken for granted he would be loyal or risk death.

 Apparently, he was upgraded from 'dependent I don't want' to 'somewhat useful' now. Worth it to be tempted instead of just tolerated.

…go him.

Galina sighed, softly. "Well… make a list of anything you might want beyond the basics of life. I'll send someone out to get it with the other items in this after I call Bjoarn up to release the funds."

"Am I getting a bank account?"

"Probably. It's easier. Likely two Swiss accounts, one you will need to detail what every kopeck is spent on and another one you don't have to justify."

He was getting Swiss Bank Accounts. Fancy.

More than that, it was a piece of civilian normalcy he greatly appreciated. Getting paid, balancing a checkbook, actually having a job instead of… existing as some kind of unpaid intern of either a mining/smuggling ring or a professional thief's office assistant. Or the office babysitter.

Peter was thirty, getting a job shouldn't be an event that moved him to tears.

"…how much would gem cutting tools set me back around here?"

" Doesn't matter, get it anyways Galina." Sonya sleepily called over shortly, twisting around only just far enough to see them both clearly. "You don't have to, Scruffy."

"I'd like to. I'd rather not allow them to rule my life through fear." Admittedly he learned to cut glassy stones on diamonds and refined it out of sheer self-preservation, but diamonds were not very good Flame focuses for any but Scruffy.

They were the hardest ones so learning to cut different gemstones would be different enough… he hoped.

If this was what he got in return for just organizing the information, actually supplying something to add into it had to be better.
Eyeing him sternly a few moments, the Storm-Cloud eventually turned back to smothering her baby Mist. "Fine then. Do as you will."

Peter intended to.

Kind of scary and liberating after ten years of being informed of what he'd do or risk excruciating pain, but his new boss had never cared what he did as long as he wasn't useless. A few months of that against a few years of more restrictive living didn't exactly solve anything, but his being able to set the pace himself did.

Noticeably, he had no deadlines mandated by Sonya about anything. Merely funds to experiment with instead now.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 18th of June, 1969 continued. The Pahkan's Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Pahkan of the Zolotov thieves' clan, I presume?" Renato drawled as he came to a stop in the middle of the room he had been shown to.

It had to be one of the old men behind the desk, either the one sitting in a rather ostentatious 'throne' or the one standing at his elbow. There could be a bit of protective rearranging going on and the seated man wasn't the boss of this syndicate, but Sonya had claimed 'old man Zolotov' looked like a loan shark. If her opinion of a loan shark was the same as his was questionable.

The hitman would very much just like to know why he suddenly was important now when there was no mention of a visit desired last week. Sonya had ducked and dodged Don Vongola for a few days on her own, but that had been more motivated by her attempting to avoid the Iron Fort's staff than just being ignored.

A few days without so much as a word mentioned that the Boss of this syndicate wanted to see him to even lightly grill him about his intentions within it or to one of their members said some… not particularly good things. A snub of one member's contacts, an underestimation of his value, possibly incomprehension although he was doubtful on that end.

He had the sinking suspicion this sudden summons had to do with that incident a few nights ago, which might've been a very belated wake-up call that a Storm-Cloud was still a Cloud.

Sonya was stuck in an office most days, her contemporary Soviet Flame users here were either around her age or younger than her. She was phenomenally well behaved for a territorial Cloud mixed with an obsessed Storm, nearly fanatical over being so.

A fair number of people looked to her for direction, it was likely she was trying to be a role-model when she knew she wasn't really cut out to be one and trying to watch her step anyways.

…and then she blew up and took out some little operation on the fringes of civilized crime, leaving behind a smoldering crater which was still burning two days later according to the news reports.

Said Storm-Cloud was going about her business as if she was going to flatly ignore she did so. Most no one had the balls to try asking her anything about it, so it seemed she'd get away with doing it.

Of those that had been present that night, there were the two young Mists and one Italian Mafioso
Sun. If this 'Pahkan' wanted details…

"Mafioso Sinclair," the seated of the two old men started grouchily after the expected intimidation pause, "I must admit I rather prefer Bazanova to handle her own things and bring them to me once something comes of it… but I also don't have her suddenly deciding to rip a new hole in the city either."

…point. The Italian standing in a Russian criminal's office adjusted his hat to give him time to study the expressions aimed at him. "To be clear, it wasn't me who set her off. Something of an accident, honestly. It just happened near our godchild. She didn't take it… well."

"'Didn't take it well' is what most of my vory like to claim about breaking bad news to another and somehow ending up in the middle of a bar-room brawl." Stated the one he was assuming was 'old man Zolotov' in a flat tone. "Not when we somehow ended up with a scar in our city, although thankfully not in our territory."

"You ironically have her to thank for that, she was the one that decided to get out of it once she lost her temper." Renato pointed out just as blandly, still trying to figure out what this meeting was all about.

He'd give it to the old man, this was a damn good opening gambit. Suggestive and slightly misleading, making it seem like the concern was more for what rather than how, who, or where. Suggesting that maybe Renato was the cause of Sonya's sudden gutting of an operation on their fringes.

A feint to make the foreigner defensive over his presence at all, and more likely to either bargain to no longer be the center of attention or to leave earlier.

Renato was no green hitman, however. Even if this was the official 'boss' of the syndicate… Sonya was nearly a law into herself within it. She didn't report in to him about anything she wasn't prompted to, might actually heed his word but not graciously, and was showing the usual irreverent 'Cloud' signs of not being happy with their nominal 'leader'.

He'd give it a bare week after this man retired before the thief officially blew off her syndicate.

Not violently, she had family here, but enough so whoever was next to lead would know full well she wasn't returning.

As he had wondered how she'd manage her duties to her syndicate and mothering Shamal full time, it explained a lot as to why she was willing to move at all.

"Unfortunately, 'didn't take it well' is also a Cloud euphemism for 'went berserk'." The Mafioso had seen other Clouds decide violence was an answer all of a sudden, although they were normally carefully redirected in either a useful direction or damn near dog-piled by those willing or able to be targets until they calmed down.

With Sonya's peers pretty much limited to 'her' Lightning, Sun, and Mists… a direction was pretty much all that was available.

Any pure human without Dying Will matched up against her wouldn't last very long, as he had personally witnessed two nights ago.

She had tried to prolong it but ended up just murdering them wholesale when it didn't give her the things she was looking for.
"You sound very sure of that." Spoke the man standing behind the Pahkan, almost idly.

"I've seen how other Clouds behave. They seem to be more common in Italia." Renato pointed out unhelpfully.

"You'll excuse me for asking about it then?" The same older man suggested and slightly ordered. "This is the first time my granddaughter decided such a thing was necessary."

The hitman had been all but ready to be as helpful as a rock as he was not motivated to help them… until exactly what the standing Russian man had referred to Sonya as finally hit him.

…she had never mentioned a grandfather.

"I am Pyotr, the Sovintnik." Said supposed relation to his… still slightly too-young fellow godparent introduced himself. "I was the one who raised Elisaveta."

Son of a bitch. Exactly when was Sonya going to mention she was slightly close to the 'heir' position in her syndicate to him?

Did she know?

No, wait. Her mother, her mother's lover, and her siblings would've been closer, if females were allowed to take such positions in Soviet Russia. If not her, then just Arseniy and Cherep… which would be slightly hilarious to see happen.

That would only be if the Pahkan had no children, which wasn't something he knew of or not, and if Russian syndicates followed the 'parent to child' method of passing power.

Renato narrowed his eyes on the older man, now that he had reasoned his way out of that shock tactic. "Exactly why are you asking? Sonya's never said anything about a grandfather to me, and forgive me for pointing this out but… if you cared, then wouldn't she know you?"

"Because she doesn't need one." Pyotr explained simply, in an almost bored tone.

He was calling bullshit. A woman like Sonya delighted in having family, in admittedly a stilted way. She was a Cloud, they were all strange in how they showed their affection.

It was normally boiled down to variations of the word 'tolerant'.

If someone outside a Cloud's family tried something someone within it did to said Cloud, there was usually a new greasy splat on the ground in short order.

No, this wasn't about the new crater in Moscow or surprise relations being pretty damn important within this syndicate. This was about what he might know that would help them in unstated aims.

Given he had figured out Sonya had no intention of staying here for much longer on his own well before this meeting, it was likely that very topic they wanted to pump information out of him for. Either that or for 'managing' other Clouds… like her little brother.

Renato gave Sonya's self-claimed grandfather a sardonic look.

Now that he knew, he could either try to warn the thief about her extended relations and their possible motives or keep quiet about it. Both options had their own pitfalls. If he did either she'd believe him and avoid really interacting with her grandfather, which might cause her mother some grief, or she'd doubt it and his word about something as outlandish as 'your grandfather is plotting behind your back' deserves.

…or she might find out he knew about it before anything happened and hadn't said anything, which would damage their relationship farther down the line.

And he thought his life was depressingly close to being a soap opera.

Pyotr's expression behind old man Zolotov's back was equally as dryly mocking as the hitman's glare.

Was that aimed at him or his boss?

Either option added an entire web of sticky implications behind it to the problem at hand.

Fuck, could this get any worse?

Renato almost winced at the door behind him banged open, nearly spilling a man into the office despite the attempts of the vory stationed as guards trying to stop the…

…beaten up man.

Sonya was beating the shit out of someone every day, wasn't she?

Don't tell him…

"Ah... Gedeon, nice of you to join us." Old man Zolotov observed dryly. "Son, have you met Mafioso Sinclair? Another Sun user, hitman, and one of Baznova's contacts from outside the Iron Curtain?"

He really had to stop tempting fate.

(Thursday the 19th of June, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

A bit confused by the contents of this visit, Lisa cocked her head to the side as the hitman casually sauntered up to her front porch with her daughter and their godchild in tow.

Mafioso Sinclair hadn't shown up during the mornings for the last few days they had done this, sans the day no morning lessons had taken place, meaning something had changed.

Sonya looked as indifferent as usual, so nothing she knew or cared about. Shamal kept sneaking skeptical looks at his godfather's back, might be wondering if he had to demonstrate his newly acquired lock picking skills.

Lisa kept her speculations to herself, merely asking the Italian man to wait a moment in the kitchen until she could put the coffee on.

Her daughter did pause, glancing at the hitman once, before leading her godchild down to the basement for their lessons.

She went to wake Arseniy first. He had asked her to do so, and she might be reaching with her speculation that there was something amiss.

Maybe he really just liked her coffee?
Her lover didn't look remotely sold on her reasoning before he yawned and rolled out of bed, or maybe he was just grumpy at yet another earlier than usual morning for him. "Want me to stick around?"

…hmm, tip their hand that they knew something was awry or proceed as if everything was normal?

"I don't think any friend of Sonya's would look to murder us, not without actually saying something to her in order for her to either murder whoever asked or try to change his mind."

"Italian criminals might be a bit different than Russian ones." Was Arseniy's only offer to tip the scales in either direction.

"I think I'll be fine, Sonya's not going to be too far anyways." If it was a hit attempt on either of them, her daughter would be most put out by it.

As it was morning when both her and their joint godchild were present for a specific reason he knew full well about, she slightly doubted it.

Only slightly, because stranger things could and had happened.

Renato had plenty of opportunity if he had wanted before this, she'd get concerned if he tried to linger.

Her lover gave her a steady look, before ambling into the shower to wake himself up as best he could instead of wander down the stairs to simply sprawl out on the living room couch until Valera woke up and could join him for a morning walk. Lisa left him to it.

The older of her daughter's Italians had helped himself to the newspapers they subscribed to, not entirely too far into it so she couldn't say if he had only cracked it open when he heard her coming back down the hallways. She had been retired from the field a bit too long maybe, but frankly three children had damn near run her off her feet and she really had better things to do than steal on whims nowadays.

"So then, Renato. Is this a business visit or just an opportunity to eat something less questionable than my daughter's fair?"

"She didn't burn the bacon today, so you don't have to worry I'm after something edible." Drawled the hitman as he folded up the paper and turned to look at her squarely. "Does Sonya know she has a grandfather?"

"Oh? Is Pyotr finally admitting it?" Damn her crafty father, of course his finally giving in would only occur on his terms instead of hers. "I've been bothering him about that for... years."

"I learned... as a consequence of meeting with him and your Pahkan while they tested me about what I might know of Clouds in general."

…ah. That was... possibly bad.

Lisa paused as she realized the why, the grounds in her hands to add to her French press coffee maker suspended for a moment before carefully being poured in. Adding in hot water from the kettle that normally heated tea water, she stirred it up and thought.

Reassembling the press, she brought it over to the hitman so he could let it steep as long as he wanted before filtering it and pouring himself a cup. "I take it you're bringing this up for a reason?"
"You're her mother, you probably know that…"

"…that?" She may suspect, but unless she had to she wouldn't spill any of her children's plans to a relative unknown. A week of acquaintance did not a contact make.

"…Sonya is intent on moving to Italia, for Shamal." Temporized the hitman after a long pause. Neither giving in and confirming her own observations nor possibly betraying her daughter's trust in him. "And is likely not going to keep any but family ties and a few friends if she doesn't need to."

Leading but not exactly confirmation if Lisa didn't already know the blonde thief's plans.

Arseniy had to recently tell their daughter to be less hostile in general for at least another year, the fact her friend picked up on her disinclination to be helpful even to their own syndicate wasn't very telling of anything important.

Pyotr picking up on that wasn't a stretch to imagine. What was her father after?

He was a very loyal man, but not really a family one. Lisa could… almost…

…ooh. Ooh, her old man was a crafty one, wasn't he?

"And you're bringing this up."

"I do not appreciate the position he tried to maneuver me into." Renato confirmed flatly before she could finish, reaching out a hand to push the plunger down in order to get his coffee fix. "You tell her and figure out what he's up to. If Sonya can't take Shamal for another year or up to four, it won't greatly affect me but will depress the brat. However, she did give her word that she'd finish raising him and you know how stubborn your daughter is."

Pyotr confirmed he would finally give in, gave her warning in a very round-about way, and still was serving his friend as he swore so many years ago. All with a few words to an outsider only peripherally involved.

Lisa smiled wryly. She had a way to go before she got to her father's level, didn't she?

All that, and still tested the Italian Mafioso about how much he respected and would do on Sonya's behalf and had him report such in front of her mother. She would've found that to be a bit of a leap, but there were likely things that happened when the hitman found out about all this that she wasn't privy to.

…so, the Pahkan was now aware and not really accepting that the Storm-Cloud was merely biding her time until he stepped down to abscond with probably the oldest cadre of Flame users to another country altogether. Pyotr would in fact show up for Christmas this year and was at least resigned if not entirely pleased to be forced into the role of 'grandfather'. Renato was really a good friend and not just a would-be suitor taking advantage of the fact his godchild picked out a really pretty godmother from his associates available.

There was enough doubt and suspicion in the hitman's mind he'd likely refuse to believe he was being used to pass on a message, which really was quite mean of her father unless this was part of his testing of the man as a would-be suitor of his granddaughter's.

How to inform her father Sonya had a temporary 'hand-over' plan in the works with the school?

That would probably be the biggest sticking point for him, Sonya possibly yanking the most experienced Flame users out of the clan.
With such a plan it would be more of a general easing of the old with all their tangled grudges out and the new with none in, even if the Zolotovs wouldn't likely be in charge of all of it anymore. They'd still control the jewels, and the matching services, and possibly would for years yet so losing some control over the subjects taught would be no great loss in balance.

It would still spread their influence through the next generation of criminals, establish the thieves' clan as a fixture and not something that could be temporary.

Then there was that smoking crater just north of Zolotov territory. A greater wake-up call that Flame users were here to stay wouldn't be possible, there were no other Clouds to get vexed beyond all reason and demolish something equally as large in warning. No other Storm-Clouds to keep the ruins burning through nearly forty-eight hours either, despite civilian attempts at firefighting.

A fair number of syndicates were now scrambling, either trying to suck up to the once minor thieves' clan or figure out how to get around the sudden weapon of mass destruction they only now realized actually did exist here.

Saying there was one and seeing the results were two different things after all.

"Tell my father, the next time you see him because you'll have another audience with at least him in a more private setting, that he is worried about the wrong aspect of my daughter's nature. Sonya is fully aware of her duties and will always ensure they are carried out even in her absence. Exactly that, if you please."

…why had the hitman not poured himself a cup yet?

Lisa might think fast, but not that fast.

He had plenty of time to fix himself a cup, what was going on that made him pause?

Renato blinked slowly a few times, then pointedly did pour that cup of coffee. "Exactly? Is there a reason for that?"

Hmmm… very suspicious this one.

She approved. It was on Sonya's behalf, after all. "Yes."

He waited even more pointedly, she merely beamed back at him.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 19th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...your family... is fucked up."

Sonya gave the Italian Sun a sideways look. "There is nothing wrong with my family."

"Yeah!" Shamal chimed in, pouting up at the older man who wasn't even looking at him as he followed along. "Mamma's family is really nice, Mister Renato."

The hitman seethed instead of answering the kid, making the thief wonder what in hell his talk with Lisa had been about. "...I need to go shoot something, excuse me."

She blinked at his back as he peeled off from them and all but stalked down a side road that would take him pretty far outside of Zolotov territory if he walked for about half an hour. It was the shortest way out from the damn near center of their territory. "...huh. I wonder what that is all about?"

"Maybe he's just moody?"

Sonya gave the brat a considering look as she pondered that. It was possible, Tatiana got into weird moods when she felt pent up so it stood to reason the hitman could have the very same ones on occasion.

Maybe that was why Renato was off to possibly murder a few unwary idiots?

Or find a girl to screw.

Hopefully he'd feel better after this little walk of his.

If when he came back and he was still moody, she'd ask what the hell he had been on about then.

---

(Friday the 20th of June, 1969. Levoberezhny District, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You missed a fair few things while indisposed, Gedeon."

The vor the Zolotov Pahkan was speaking to winced, then popped a finger bone back into position so it would heal straight. Primakova had been as good as her word, she had only ran her fellow Sun through how to Activate his own cellular regeneration once before leaving and not returning.

Gedeon had to figure out how to apply it, and he was still clumsy and slow with it. Yesterday hadn't helped, Sonya had re-broken everything he managed to heal up over the course of two nights since his ‘lecture’.

Gallingly, he was getting faster with all the practice. He was pretty damn sure he would never get over wincing from the sickening crunch as bone splintered or snapped, but then again few people were as intimately familiar with the sensation of having their bones broken than him now.

"Where are we going?"

...he still sounded like someone crushed his larynx. Likely because someone had, and cartilage didn't heal up as fast as pure bone did. The Sun still hadn't touched his cuts or bruises, his bones had worried him a lot more than scars or how he looked.

There was the fact a Sun could possibly Activate themselves into the grave, but still no one seemed to want to acknowledge that as a possibility or give more than a second's thought that it might happen at all. Gedeon lived in half-fear that he was just about to start breaking down at a cellular level instead of healing and end up looking older than even his own father did.

Milos checked the progress outside the car window, inspecting the street corner they were coming upon. "I would like you to gain a bit of perspective on a little issue."

The badly abused Sun didn't question his father, this was a fairly frequent thing for the outlying operations that ran into small troubles or needed outside interference. Also, partially because talking was fairly painful still.

He hadn't been aware they had any operations so far outside of their territory, though.
"There was a... non-Mafiya set up around here. Human trafficking, kidnapping girls to sell out of country." The Pahkan informed him in a lecturing tone.

Gedeon had heard that tone _way_ too often lately.

"One night... about... three nights ago, they decided to go after this little bit of a blonde woman cutting through here to head up where one of our vory is situated making something of that block of territory in Khimki."

...blonde woman and Ziven. He had a feeling he knew exactly who was blonde and would go visit the man who had only been a _vor_ for about a year.

"...that, Gedeon, is what she did to them in revenge."

He glanced through the window his father was pointing out of, then whipped around fast enough to cause every broken or cracked rib to _twinge_ in sequence with pain.

There was still a thick cloud of smoke billowing off the ruined wreck of a once stately manor home. Most of the initial ground level was nothing more than a burned out skeleton, one tiny corner of the second level had miraculously escaped whatever fire had gotten into the building.

A kind of fence thing was still in place to ward off pedestrians and onlookers from getting too close, but the people who had either been working here to clean up or trying to water down what looked to be lingering embers in _concrete_ had been shooed off.

Just in case seeing it through bullet-proof glass wasn't enough, the car the two of them were in slowed as if they were to stop. Likely why the area was cleared of everyone.

Milos heaved a sigh at the ruins. "Young Miss Bazanova was most displeased, wouldn't you say? It was worse before the walls burned down, you could still see the holes and the splashes of blood where the poor idiots that got in her way were cut down."

"...how... is it... still burning?"

"...I have no idea. No one wants to ask Bazanova. The civilian emergency personnel have ruled it a chemical fire." Admitted the Pahkan flatly, reaching across the seat to knock on the separation between them and the driver. He got a fairly used newspaper in return from the _vor_ designated as their driver. "This is what it looked like two days ago."

Obviously a lot _less_ burned out in the picture, although in black and white it still told its own story. Gedeon merely glanced to the headline only for his eyes to catch there and felt his blood run cold.

139 or More Dead, 17 Kidnapping Victims Recovered!

"We have no more than twenty of those men who were just outside when all this went down." Milos added in helpfully after the silence stretched a bit long. "No one more important than a grunt."

"Or more?" Repeated the Sun weakly.

"Most of who was inside the building were rendered into pieces." The older man admitted dryly, then shrugged absentely as he thumped the driver's seat to get them moving again. "Some of those pieces burned up. The grand total will probably never be known to any but those in the house that night who survived. And there's only four of them who are all refusing to speak about it."

Gedeon paged through the newspaper a bit shakily, grimacing at the piked head he was only reading about because apparently the image was deemed too obscene to print.

"If I were a lesser man, and not your father, I would tell you that you had better mend your bridges with young Miss Bazanova. However you can."

"...I-

"I highly doubt that's possible." Milos continued in a strictly disappointed tone. "Even if you can somehow convince the stubborn girl that she shouldn't take your head off for so much as speaking in her general direction, she's not stupid. She's also... not... staying."

Ripping the newspaper out of his hands, the Pahkan rolled it up and whacked his son upside the head with it.

"You've pissed off and alienated the best Dying Will Flame expert in all of Russia, Gedeon! If we can't somehow convince her to not join up with some other syndicate we'll have to try and kill her, and that ruin of a place might just be revisited on our own headquarters." Tossing the abused paper to the floor of the car, the much older man sighed heavily and leaned back against the leather seat. "And that has little bearing on what would happen afterwards if we are somehow successful, when vor Arseniy learns or finds out we had his youngest daughter killed. Or her little minions."

"...there's always Mafia Land hitmen." Gedeon gritted out, not really hurt by his father's actions but cringing anyways.

"That man in my office when you decided to finally rejoin us? Is Bazanova's best friend. An Italian hitman who works with her on that island." Milos ruthlessly shot his suggestion down without so much as missing a beat. "You try to post a hit on her ass, he'll find out. Mafia Land might let us take a hit out on one of their employees as long as we're the syndicate they originated from and still heed to, but they're given warning and a grace period of a day to try outrunning it. How much do you want to bet against him taking the contract and then just telling her who posted it?"

"That's against the rules."

"...and you think he'll care? It's a slap on the wrist, at most, so long as the one told can wipe out the originating syndicate in their grace period or die against them. After these past few days I would honestly give her the better odds on pulling it off than you somehow waiting her out."

He was not going to admit he was grasping at straws to keep his idea afloat. After a week of daily beatings, it was nearly the only thought that let him try again and again to heal himself so Sonya would just stop. "So, we take him out first."

The Pahkan palmed his face tiredly. "We can't do that, Gedeon. He's been here a week already, most in the clan knows who his best friend is, and the other godparent of that little brat nipping about her heels. There is no way we could go outside the clan and hire another hitman to take out some smart-ass from Italy without it still backfiring the moment they decide to gather up the trail and hear a bit of the gossip going around. It'll still get out, see the previous example for what will happen then. And again, Mafia Land wouldn't let us take one out on him because he's not ours."

"...well-"

"No, it's not going to work no matter how convoluted you try to get." Snapped the old man irritably. "You can't kill her, or her hitman friend protecting her from getting a hit taken out on her. Not without damn near gutting the clan in two."

"You just said we had to if she decided to join another syndicate!"
"Exactly!" Roared back the old man. "Which isn't feasible without shooting ourselves in the foot! And now, now Gedeon, we have to find some way to temper her disgust with you for patronizing the shit out of the little bitch!"

Said Sun cringed, the yelling not improving anything about how shitty he already felt or his frustrations with the situation in general.

"I have no fucking clue how you came to the conclusion to do that, nor why you keep overlooking her as someone minor. I have no desire to learn what stupidity infected you either. I told you to learn, and you decided to what? Audit her work? That you had no damn clue about?"

…put like that, disregarding a lot of the situation in general, it did sound bad. "She's not even twenty. Not a man. She's admitted herself she's not a good fit-"

"That doesn't make you better!" Milos snapped again, going rather worryingly red in the face. "Ill fit or not, she knew what the hell is going on. Predicted some of the trends so we didn't drown in those Flame users. Kicked a fucking trail through bedrock so those little ankle biters could follow in some kind of order. You promote or reassign those kinds of people in places they do fit, not try to marginalize them!"

Gritting his teeth, the Sun had to admit his old man had a point.

Said old man sighed again, rubbing tiredly at his face one more time. "So, she's pissed with you and likely not going to behave no matter what you try. Fine, all well and good. That's you and her, leaving the rest of her self-proclaimed family and someone else. Primakova's not bad looking, you could do worse for a wife."

…Gedeon was fairly certain that would only be a fast track to being murdered in cold blood. "Father, I do not think there's any way I can pull that off believably."

"The younger, idiot."

The nurse? "…Father…"

"…she hates your guts too, doesn't she?"

Given that cold as fuck look he got when she learned her sister was beating the hell out of him for reasons that weren't even given?

Tatiana was rather bloodthirsty for a healer. Not to mention that little lecture…

"I have reason to believe so, yes."

Milos pinched the bridge of his nose and turned more fully to actually face his son then merely be facing the same direction as they talked. "The expert and the damn to be doctor, perfect. The very green secretary girl, the Lightning Galina?"

"…she rather dislikes me after-"

"Fuck, boy. Can you do anything right when it comes to a woman?"

"Yes, just-"

"Not the ones with spine, apparently." The Pahkan of the Zolotov clan finished for him dryly. "Which leaves that little Rain bitch Zarya, who would only just compound your damn issues."
Well… if he wanted to be transparent about things… "Father, why are you suddenly trying to pair me off?"

"I'm-" Gedeon flinched as a sniper round suddenly punched through the space between the car's window panes, piercing through his father's upper chest and lodging into his own shoulder.

He lunged forward, wracking his mind for the lecture on healing another with a Sun's Activation he got not three days ago as he clamped a hand down on the hole in his father's body and willed the old man not to die on him now.

"DRIVE!" He barked to the vor behind the wheel, who floored it nearly a second before he managed to unglue his tongue from the roof of his mouth.
Chapter 61

(Friday the 20th of June, 1969 continued. Levoberezhny District, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Stop the car."

Gedeon jerked at the flat order, tightening his grip on his father's injury reflexively and nearly yanking his hands back when the older man groaned painfully. "Do not stop the fucking car!"

His father, their Pahkan, was not only shot but half a second from bleeding out and dying. Why the fuck would they-

"Asshole, listen to me. I'm a Mist, I can teleport us." Snarled the young woman with black hair suddenly somehow sitting in the passenger seat next to the vor driving them, he vaguely recognized her after the start of realizing someone that hadn't been there before was now glaring at him. "But I can't teleport a damn half-ton of speeding metal! We'll crash!"

Mist teleporting. Usov did that all the damn-

"Stop the car!"

The man driving hesitated, then slammed on the breaks. Mirror Lady Anna nearly bashed her head into the dashboard as she slid backwards while half-twisted around to see into the back seat, but she gripped the back of the passenger's seat just in time to only hit the hard plastic with a shoulder.

Gedeon himself had a hard time keeping his grip on his father's wound and not tumbling them both off the seat bench when their forward momentum suddenly cut off. Meaning they both slid a fair amount until both he and his father were nearly half-laying and half-crouched on the car's floor space.

The Mist girl slammed a hand into the dashboard she nearly head butted once the car swerved into a harsh rocking stop. Her Dying Will Flames rippled out from her fingers to consume all of them and the car in a near-blinding, gut-wrenching moment.

Then the indigo Flames vanished in the next second as if a strong gust of wind blew them out, and Gedeon only recognized the roof of the Zolotov clan's headquarters by pure chance before the rear passenger driver's side door was ripped off in a horrible screech of tearing metal and the shattering crack of reinforced glass.

Sonya ignored him, and his indignant shout for ripping away half the support he had been using to try and keep his old man's blood in him.

"Propagate his blood, I don't know how much he's lost so far." Ordered the professional Sun Flame nurse right behind her, her fingers already half-lit with glittering yellow Flames. "If you have to, stick a finger in the wound for the touch component you need. It'll work as a kind of pressure bandage for now."

The old vor grunted as after the blonde thief investigated his back to find the entrance wound she did exactly as her sister said. With the entrance would plugged up, and apparently a never-ending supply of blood to bleed out now, the Storm-Cloud carefully extracted their Pahkan with her only free arm under his shoulders.
Apparently to drag him into a less constrained and now glass covered environment for the nurse to validate the cost the clan had put into her picked profession.

"Gedeon." Coughed out the old man with a mouthful of blood, glaring over Primakova's shoulders as she ripped his dress shirt in order to see the exit wound and plant a hand with Sun Flames on top of it. "You and... Pyotr are in charge. Don't... run things into the ground... before I get back."

...his father wasn't going on vacation, he had been shot.

Although... even as he watched the old man's complexion lost the greyed-out tinge for a healthier flush, and his hawkish hazel eyes sharpened the longer things went on. Unlike when he had been merely containing things and the old man had bled even more despite his efforts.

Maybe his father would only be down for a few days instead of a month or two or more.

"Mist girl, I need blood transfusion equipment from the nearest hospital. Steal whoever or whatever you need to in order to get it." Tatiana shot backwards to the Flame user that had ensured the Pahkan had reached medical aid in time, then glanced to her sister over the old man's head. "Nya, I know you're a universal donor. Do you mind donating a pint?"

"If you want." Bazanova responded blandly, looking rather bored rather than alarmed that she personally was part of the reason their syndicate boss had yet to die of blood loss. "I could probably do all of it..."

"No, driver! Go be useful, find me more blood donors. Preferably those with O negative blood types like my sis, but if you can't then AB positives will do as well." Primakova turned back to her work, peering deep into the messy exit wound to ensure the under layers of flesh were knitting together as she wanted. "...and of course, the old man would have to be one of the rarer types..."

Gedeon stiffened up even as the man scrambled after the Mirror Lady's own more pyrotechnic exit a few seconds ago, because if anyone was going to donate blood to keep his father alive it would be him. "I'm AB positive-"

"You're bleeding, dipshit. You're also injured, you don't get to lose any more than you already are." Tatiana snarled at him, her Flames flaring with her temper and causing the Pahkan's suit jacket to start smoldering. "Sit there and wait for your father to get stabilized."

He looked down at himself, having forgotten about the bullet in his shoulder. He was a Sun, and after healing his bones for the last couple days surely a flesh wound wouldn't be that hard.

"DON'T! And Nya, stop Propagating." A pebble bounced off his forehead hard, as the nurse turned from the now sealed bullet hole in the Pahkan's chest to collect the hospital supplies Mirror Lady Anna had flashed into existence at her side. "The bullet is still in your shoulder, you heal it up and I'll have to send you to Mafia Land for surgery to extract it. I should anyways, but as long as I can pull it all out you won't have to."

Gedeon narrowed his eyes at the women. "How the fuck do you know all this? Not the medical shit, what happened?"

"...you really are rather dense, I honestly shouldn't be surprised anymore." Sonya answered instead of the nurse now poking a hole into her arm in order to drain some of her own blood to replace the fake Flame blood she was supplying his father. "The Mirror Lady was assigned to keep an eye on you if you needed anything, like how Usov keeps tabs on me. How else do you think we were assembled on short notice and she reached you all in seconds? She told us."
The woman glanced down to the now dark red tubing stuck in her arm, draining away into a clear plastic bag hooked up to catch it.

"Tats… should it feel hot?"

"You have a higher than normal body temp by simply being a Storm. Even then, your internal body temperature is higher than you are at skin level." Carefully manipulating the filling bag as it slowly pulsed fuller with every beat of the Storm-Cloud's steady heart, Tatiana bit her lip and eyed the amount already splattered all over the man and the car's interior. "…a pint and a half, Nya, if another donor doesn't get out here in time for this to fill. Eat something heavy and sweet after this."

"Sure."

Old man Zolotov coughed again, this time without more blood to add to what was already staining his mouth and ruined shirt. With a sniff, and an equally as bored look as the woman plugging the entrance wound in his back, he eyed the bowed red head of his Sun nurse who was studying the collection of medical equipment she had to work with. "…I think it punctured a lung, Primakova."

"You did, sir. I'll heal it up once Nya's Flames are no longer the reason you're not dead from blood loss."

He craned his head around to lock eyes with the woman keeping him alive. "…my thanks."

"…don't mention it." Deadpanned the Storm-Cloud supporting him in a half-reclined position.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 20th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya rubbed fingers sticky with drying blood together idly, sitting with her slightly overstrained sister as they idly watched their entire clan turn out like kicked ants to either pull apart the car their Pahkan had been shot in or go hunting for whoever did it.

"-fuck that royally. Nya just gave up a decent percentage of her total blood volume for the Pahkan, and Gedeon needs sugar to combat the fucking shock and his own blood loss. Sugar, meat, liquids, and a lot of it." Tatiana viciously snapped at whichever poor mook was quailing slightly in the face of her impatience. "I don't care where it comes from, get it now."

"…ah, steak? And cake. Some milk, maybe." She tacked on absently, getting a desperately thankful look from the man who had merely asked for what was specifically needed or if what they had in the cantina would suffice. "I want chocolate cake, if you can find it."

The Mirror Lady gestured in the far distance with her Mist Flames making a ring around one clearly marked area, taking herself and a number of vory with her to the spot she had witnessed the shooting go down.

In a very eye-catching blaze of indigo Flames situated in the middle of a street strangely devoid of civilian traffic.

Sonya puzzled over who might be ensuring all the activity wasn't overly obvious to just anyone watching the outside street of the Zolotov clan's headquarters. Usov she knew was off distracting Shamal somewhere else, she specifically told him to the moment Anna sounded a warning.

Likely one of the more senior Mists got dragooned to help, they just weren't as sociable as the other two tended to be with her.

…or scared shitless of her. That was still a thing too.

She looked down to judge the rate their Pahkan was taking in blood, and if they had to switch yet to last bag of red liquid donated for his survival.

Milos looked incredibly vexed and irritably resigned to what was going on as he laid at her very fancy booted feet, within reach of the Sun nurse if there was any sudden turn to the worse. "...do you have a cigarette, Bazanova?"

"Yes sir." Ignoring her sister's offended squawk, she dug out the pack from her pocket she was steadily working through on the sly and lit it for him with her Storm Flames before handing it down. "Unfortunately, I think Tats will murder us both if I left to find you some alcohol."

"...yes, yes I will. Stop giving my patient things that are unhealthy."

"Vodka's a liquid." Mentioned old man Zolotov idly, inhaling a long pull from the cigarette before the nurse could reach over and snatch it away from him.

"It's a blood-thinner, you don't have enough blood to thin." Snapped the Sun Flame user, then she blinked and gave the burning tube of tobacco in her hand a rather disgusted look. "...sir. And you just had a punctured lung, why are you smoking?"

"Because it's relaxing." Milos countered with the air who had heard the argument way too many times before and was just replying by rote. "...I knew, in my head, having a professional nurse or doctor was a good thing..."

"But it's always slightly different in reality. I know sir." Sonya finished for the man with a commiserating nod, plucking the cigarette out of the air when her sister turned back to what she was doing and flicked it away to discard it.

Holding the smoke behind her back, she waited until yet another vor came around to ask in various tones of pissed off why the Pahkan had yet to be moved to a more secure location to return it to the old man.

He got a couple more puffs before Tatiana noticed and took it away from him again. Pointedly snubbing it out and ripping it into shreds before discarding it again.

"...damn."

"I believe you have better things to be doing than harass the women responsible for our Pahkan's continued survival." Pyotr observed in an utterly disproving tone to the vor looking first pissed off at being ignored and then pale as he realized who was behind him. "Be gone. Girls?"

"Gedeon's more or less stable but report any lightheadedness or dizzy spells the moment they happen. Also watch for illness and any fevers developing, might be symptoms of poison." Tatiana announced to the Sovintnik, jerking a thumb behind the sisters where the Sun in question was sat up against a wall and glowering down at the freshly healed up bullet wound in his shoulder. He had his own package of blood draining into his veins as well, just not a personal attendant for it. "The Pahkan has a few more moments before I'll feel safe in moving him, I want him to at least be on the last bag before we get him inside and risk tearing anything new and fragile in the process."

"...I take it that's why you've not let me wander off yet." Sonya more stated than asked, because she didn't even feel anything from losing a pint and a half of blood.
Unless it was due to the fact she was acting as a living IV stand, but she kind of doubted that.

The Sun shoved a hand through her unraveling braid in order to run rusty blood streaked fingers through the already blood colored strands. "Pretty much, you’re on Cloud nurse standby to Propagate blood again if need be. Speaking of, you ever find another Cloud with the right temperament… I will murder for getting the first opportunity to poach them."

"Noted."

Did Cherep count?

Pyotr gave them both a sharp nod, exchanged meaningful looks with the Pahkan, then left them to it as he focused on something he could contribute. Mostly ensuring there was some kind of order to the seething mass of unhappy Zolotovs boiling over their front yard.

"…thank you."

Sonya frowned, glancing back to the Sun she supposed she wouldn't be getting the opportunity to beat the fuck out of today. "Don't thank me, Gedeon. If he dies, you're the Pahkan. And to be honest, I'd rather not deal with that at all."

He cut her a dark look but dropped it a moment later to study his father's completely bland features. "…that's my father, Bazanova."

His Arseniy. Well, she supposed she could then understand the offer of thanks in that light.

"You're welcome." Tatiana tossed back blandly for the both of them when she didn't respond. "But… you know… this is both what I am training for and what Nya needs to prove to the clan that Flame users are a lot more useful than just as fucking eye candy."

"He's an idiot sometimes." Milos helpfully offered up to the sisters in a desert dry tone. "It'll just be for a few days."

"A week at least." Interrupted the nurse stridently. "…sir. You're really old, and this isn't a sterile operating room. A week of observation and a light workload, if any at all."

The Storm-Cloud eyed the old man warily, absently handing off the nearly drained bag of blood to her sister so it could be switched for the last full one. "…I am still hosting my brat's summer vacation. I'm on vacation with minimal oversight. I have no idea what you're talking about."

"I'm sure." Old man Zolotov observed wryly, then glanced to his nurse. "And isn't that kind of an overreaction, Primakova? I'm fine."

"You were just shot, like hell you're fine!" Tatiana glowered down at the man herself as she finished hooking the new bag into the drip to pass back. "…sir."

She sounded completely sincere with that 'sir' too. Sonya really did wonder how the fuck she managed that one.

Maybe it was a nurse thing.

The next vor that came over to investigate why they had yet to move the Pahkan or his son inside was bullied in short order by Tatiana to fetch or make a stretcher. In still polite tones that also questioned why it wasn't done already and what kind of intelligence the man had at the same time.
...definitely a nurse thing.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 20th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Renato cocked an eyebrow as Sonya finished recounting why it was he got the brat dumped on him instead of her at the end of his day learning Soviet Mist tricks. "...so?"

"The Pahkan's still alive, well enough to be basically giving orders from a sick bed. He's driving Tats up a wall or three with 'unhealthy' habits in her sick room and not really paying a whole lot of attention to her orders to take it easy." The thief explained, squeezing her hair with a towel in hopes of checking to ensure she had no more blood in it. "He's very intent on running himself into the ground health-wise, according to Tats."

Scratching one's head or moving bangs back out of your face was kind of a disgusting act when you used your fingers to basically plug a hole in a human body. With her pale ash blonde hair, it stood out even worse than blood on Tatiana's fiery red.

This was her second shower of the day, after she got to her hotel room and Shamal curiously asked why she had tomato sauce in her hair. She had blamed a failed cooking lesson with her mother, but at least this time she could use her own damn soaps.

It was depressing how easily the Mist brat had accepted the bullshitted excuse.

"You're also very damn lucky you're not a Mist. Once someone asked if since we required a Mist to get our people out of there in time, would it mean there was possibly another involved?" She continued, checking the light tan fabric for any suspicious red tints. "There was a bit of 'lynch the foreigners' thing going on, which Pyotr basically spiked the wheels of by asking in various tones of pissed off how exactly that could even be possible given we have most of them watched. If it was a Mist, it wasn't one near or in the clan since we know where all of those were."

"...and I stalked off on you."

"And you wandered off without so much as a word, yes." Agreed Sonya flatly. "But then again, Sun or not this apparently took place that when I named what time and at which street you left me at you were pretty much ruled out."

"Ho? Well... the brat isn't?"

She glanced to the kid, who was probably eavesdropping instead of actually read the book open on his lap. "I had Usov with him the entire time, and the only moron to say anything along those lines retracted it very fucking fast when I stabbed him in the leg with an ax."

...alright, Sonya might have sort of amputated instead of just 'stabbed'. Tatiana had not been amused to be called down to reattach a leg after getting their Pahkan finally situated in Pyotr's usual rooms for his recovery.

Renato snickered, tilting the dining chair he was seated upon back on two legs in order to stretch out his longer frame without moving to the couch or getting up like a normal person. "So... ensure my time can be accountable? Easy enough, for the moment. I'm still working through various bars and the gossipy, but I'll keep an ear out for something like this if you'd like."

She repressed the desire to snap one of those legs and see him tumble out.
"If you're feeling bored or restless again I'm sure we could go in another direction and murder some other syndicate, little lady Sonya." Offered the hitman wickedly, leaning back even farther to smirk up at her for once. "Or we could do a bit of hunting ourselves and see if we can catch a sniper."

"I have better things to do." Dismissed the thief, flatly ignoring his chuckle. She discarded the towel on the back of the couch for the moment to see what her brat was trying to hide his eavesdropping behind.

Shamal was delighted to share a book with her. Apparently, it was the hitman's suggestion to learn the difference between imagination and Mist Flames by picturing the events and scenery in his head without making it come to life using his Flames.

Sonya still had to shoo a collection of wolves basking on her floor in order to get to the kid, so slow progress there.

(Saturday the 21st of June, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I don't care we call them 'soft drinks', BEER is still ALCOHOL and you're NOT giving that to MY patient!"

Galina softly shut the office door, smirking faintly. "Well... she sounds happy."

Sonya snorted, nose buried in a book she had ordered in her sketchbook while seated at her desk.

Activating an entire wing of lizard mounted dog-creatures to start a flanking charge, Scruffy tried his best to not pay attention to the muffled shouting going on by the Sun nurse. Shamal was way too into calculating his next move, dithering a little between his sea kraken 'tank' and some kind of wet-bog monster that was apparently his 'theme's' general piece.

The little 'better than chess' battles were getting more and more intricate the longer they played, and Peter would admit the fact the kid he was playing against had no poker face was a direly needed tool in his arsenal in keeping the win-loss ratio in his favor.

It wasn't that he wasn't good at the game, he'd be a very pathetic adult indeed if that was the case, or that the kid didn't conceal what he was thinking decently enough. It was just Shamal couldn't keep the mischief off his face when he tried non-preplanned cheating.

He'd grin a secretive little smirk of glee when he had an idea to try working around the rules already established before each 'play'. Even with such Scruffy had to stay on his toes to try countering whatever it was before the kid could bat childishly innocent eyes and gloss it all over.

Of course, that still left him open to pre-planned cheating.

Which not even the kid's mamma was very sympathetic about him stumbling on or into.

Scruffy just sighed when the kraken ate half of his lizard mounted kobold riders, because at least the rest of the wing did manage to kill the nasty thing.

Next time, he would be getting the tentacle menaces to play with.

…actually, the kid had a general theme preference for lizards and sea creatures. Almost all of his armies had some sort of leviathan creature as the tank at least. Maybe he should start plotting for how to take advantage of that.

The office door the Lightning had shut barreled open again with a bang, and Gedeon shut it hastily again in order to plant his back up against it. The vor blinked a few times when he realized which office he ended up in. "...I thought this one was empty?"

"The one next door is empty. As is the one across from us." Sonya announced flatly without so much as looking up to see who it was. "...are you running from my sister?"

"No." Gedeon straightened up jerkily, tugging a vest and dress shirt combo Peter had never seen on him before back into place with overly complicated motions. "I had an inquiry, Bazanova."

The Storm-Cloud blinked slowly at him once she looked up.

Galina coughed after the silence dragged on long enough to make the watchers feel awkward.

"...Gedeon. I'm not a mind reader."

"The Vindice. An attack on my-our Pahkan is an act of war, yes? Would they?"

"Can you prove who did it and they had the expressed permission of the syndicate they belonged to?" Interrupted the blonde thief flatly before he could finish. "Without the sniper to present as proof of such, we're not going to be able to request the Vindice to interfere. Even if I knew how to get in touch with them in the first place."

Gedeon then said a couple things that had Scruffy lunging across the fantasy board full of Constructed villages and castles to clap his hands over a very startled Shamal's ears.

"I swear worse than that, Scruffy. So, does Renato. The brat knows better to repeat it until he's at least twelve."

"Or until I kill someone." Said brat confirmed happily, giving the older Sun a weird look for the actions of trying to preserve his child-ears in a room full of shameless criminals. "Come on, McScruffy! It's your turn."

"I take it we have yet to find the sniper, then." Sonya looked back at the other Sun in the office blandly, inspecting his expression.

Peter went back to poking Mist Flame Constructions around the slightly squished game board, as acts of 'god' were allowed that changed the field as long as they weren't intentionally caused. He did now at least have a very shoddy bridge over a river to guide an entire archer's wing through to assault Shamal's eastern flank of fish people.

Mediterranean or Slavic mermaids?

Hmm... he should figure that one out later.

...also, was it bad he wasn't even surprised the kid across from him probably knew how to swear like a sailor?

"...no." Gedeon confirmed sourly after a long pause. "Unfortunately, the Mirror Lady was too focused on the Pahkan and getting him back here to care much of who shot him. And by the time we got very back out there whoever it was had more than enough time to hoof it."
"We don't actually have more decently trained Mists available for gory things, and frankly I'd really rather not drag Usov into things more than I already have."

Shamal revealed he had been hiding a whale as a lumpy hill of sand, who then flattened Scruffy's entire wing of archers in one move. The Sun scowled as he lost his best positioned units and turned his attention to countering the wave of fish-sticks trying to pincer his hyena-headed barbarians.

…they were fish with sticks for legs, not tasty sticks made up of breaded and fried fish. Though he wouldn't put it past his child-aged opponent to have based those units off the food.

"That was not criticism, Bazanova. I… appreciate you tagged the Mirror Lady to keep tabs on me."

"I? I did nothing in respects to that. You have Anna herself to thank. She's the one that decided to keep some kind of eye on you, since you scorned actually making a contact or two to watch your own back. The Mists were doing it for practice of tailing suspects via Mist Flames. Lucky you."

There wasn't actually any space on the Constructed table to drum fingers, but the underside worked since there was space for child Mist knees. Until various more fragile things, by perspective alone, on top of it started vibrating.

Peter pursed his lips instead, studying the maneuver Shamal was coaxing his fish-sticks into. His kobold barbarians were doing just fine defending themselves, and really they only had to survive for…

"Checkmate." Scruffy announced when his little rat dog scout managed to knife the kid's king figure, a fish man that had scales all over but stood as a man would.

Natural armor or not, the dog did manage to dig the knife in deep enough it triggered the 'endgame' dramatic death of the king.

The Mist kid twitched in outrage, huffing as he realized he had been allowed to draw the more obviously 'beefy' units into a brawl to allow a suicidal ranger unit to make a final attempt to end the game.

"No fair, McScruffy."

"You cheated with that whale thing, it wasn't declared as a unit at the start of the round. If you can't both cheat and win then what's the point?"

"Practice." Announced the brat snottily, waving a hand to rearrange the board again. This time less 'rural village' and more 'industrial-age city' for a map.

Peter stretched out his back, feeling it crack rather disturbingly as a few discs popped back into alignment after so long bent over a table. Blinking as he realized things were rather silent now, he glanced to the head of the Zolotov Flame user's division and the substitute mob boss.

Sonya had the mother of all 'drop dead' looks he had ever seen on her face. Gedeon looked fairly frustrated but then again, he was kind of in a temporary position of power over the woman that had been beating the fuck out of him… and also just recently saved his father's life.

Awkward was pretty much the by-word over there. At least on the vor's side, it didn't seem as if the Storm-Cloud gave much of a fuck about how strange life had become.

Surprisingly, Galina had decided to study the ongoing game between the Mist kid of their underboss and the Sun office gopher guy. She was standing slightly behind Scruffy's shoulders and to the left, right now eyeing the detail Shamal had put into his cityscape.

She gave him a flatly challenging stare-down, so the Sun merely turned back to his game partner. "No lessons today, Shamal?"

"Mmm… mamma said things were a bit too jumpy for it today. Tomorrow though." The kid seemed entirely unbothered to match his matter of fact tone and looked perfectly content to waste a day playing games against a man probably a quarter of a century older than him.

His goals for this had rather sharply changed over the last few days, but Peter didn't mind keeping up with this little game thing going on even after he had managed to secure a more stable position for himself. Shamal was a smart assed kid who was the joint ward of what seemed to be two highly intelligent people, he had some surprisingly deep insights into said people.

Although not sure when or where he'd ever put those tidbits about 'Mister Renato' to use, the bits about 'mamma' and her nature through the eyes of a six-year-old brat she mothered were probably damn useful.

"Gedeon, do you have anything else to do but stand there like an idiot?"

Tip number one that Shamal had passed to Scruffy in a completely dead serious tone was 'mamma has limited patience with stupid things, you lose it once before she decides to like you and you'll never get it back'.

…or, as he was going to take that to mean, everyone was pretty much on their one and only chance to impress her and if you botched it… well, it sucked to be you.

Tip two was 'it takes anywhere from a few months to a few years for mamma to decide to like someone'.

Scruffy was a bit paranoid over that one, as he was probably in that zone of decision. Did the kid mean a month of time as acquaintances, or a month of time interacting with her total?

He was pretty sure the fact he now had a stipend to live off of said he was at least thought of better than the people the Storm-Cloud reliably failed to recall the names of, but was it enough to ensure his patron thought better of him personally than she only just considered his work?

The office door shut again, which told Peter he either missed the last exchange being worried or nothing had been said and the vor had merely left.

Galina merely left her spot behind him, returning to sort out the day-to-day busywork while Sonya re-buried her nose in her book again.

Rubbing the back of his neck, Peter turned back to the expectantly waiting Shamal. "…spiders for me, I think. Main theme of rogues."

The Mist kid clucked his tongue, then got busy Constructing the next round's players using the requests theme the older man had picked and his own.

Which the little brat had adjusted to take on a group of spider-like humanoids, because of course he would.

Part of the reason Scruffy's win-loss ratio wasn't better, the kid had to supply all the units and could subtly sabotage or make his own a kind of natural predator for what the Sun picked.
Working against that sometimes just didn't work.

Like the round when he had picked a group of mice monks and Shamal gave himself cat ninjas.

Scruffy had been looking over what he was given, for he couldn't ask for adjustment mid-game without tipping his hands about his possible plans, when the door cracked open again.

That was so unusual that everyone in the office looked up to see what it was now.

They rarely had more than one or two visits a day, and it was mostly Sonya's various family members if it wasn't Gedeon or Galina coming or going. Excluding Italian hitmen who attracted more than their fair share of attention by loitering around.

The kid, older than Shamal but much younger than even the blonde Storm-Cloud herself, flinched back and nearly shut the office door again when he realized he was the center of everyone's attention.

"...I have a small errand to run, excuse me Sonya." Announced the Lightning after a moment to process the rare visit by what was possibly one of their Dying Will Flame user trainees. "I'll be back in a few minutes."

"Alright." Obviously not really understanding of why but willing to follow the other woman's lead, the thief slowly returned her attention to the book explaining various ancient armor sets and how they were made. "Scruffy, start critiquing Shamal's maneuvers and explaining how you countered or how you tried to and how well it all worked overall."

"Sure." The man had to grin at the sudden pout on the kid's face, wracking his mind on how to fulfil that order without 'tainting' their little games with 'education' overtones like Shamal apparently didn't want.

When the Lightning blew out of the office like a well-dressed breeze, the kid who came to visit for whatever reason snuck in before the office door closed. Peter kept half his attention on him, and half directing his multi-limbed spider people into a decently spread out network of office buildings and one centralized café-looking building.

"...Bazanova?"

"Yes." Sonya's book closed, and the woman herself looked up again.

Shamal gave a startled and highly offended yelp that rooted Peter's attention to him, their game board and units winking out of existence in favor of wrapping the newcomer in enough Constructed thick rope the other kid could barely wiggle.

Which left him in a suspended position and an arm raised trying to jab an odd knife into the Storm-Cloud's head. Sonya plucked the knife out of his hand to inspect, eyeing the blue chips embedded in what looked to be a melted glass blade.

Scruffy sucked majorly in keeping an eye on more than one thing at a time.

"...sapphires chips embedded in... recycled glass. That's not... half bad, really. Explosive... but maybe that was the point."

Peter stared at her hard. "Boss lady, shouldn't you be more concerned that someone just tried to kill you?"
"…meh. It wasn't a very good attempt." She glanced up to the now highly miserable and angry kid. "You have to be a Flame user. One of our own if you weren't tailed up here. So explain, now, or this is going to be stuck into your neck."

Said kid started to say something, fumed for a long moment with his mouth open, then tried to use wavering blue Flames to wiggle out of Shamal's grip.

"I can't solve whatever the fuck it is if you do not tell me." Sonya informed the Rain kid shortly.

Said kid muttered something the Sun sitting halfway across the office couldn't hear.

The thief pursed her lips, studying the brat caught in her own brat's Flames. "…Shamal, put him down. And stay with Scruffy until either I get back or Renato comes to pick you up. Scruffy, as far as you know I left with the kid right after Galina."

"Ah… sure?"

"Usov!" Snapped the woman once he agreed, tucking the makeshift Rain knife into a desk drawer and getting to her feet.

The responding Mist wasn't cheerful or as playful seeming as he was usually, a lot more serious than Scruffy was actually comfortable with seeing the preteen."You called, Sonya?"

"I have an example to make of a few morons that thought kidnapping someone's family would motivate my would-be murderer, and I need transport out of here to prevent rumors until I can do something about it. Drop us off outside the Rain bar, please."

(Saturday the 21st of June, 1969 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Again?"

"…I wonder if we should be concerned Sonya decided on staking heads out on pikes is her favorite way to show she's irritated with something." Arseniy mused, instead of panic or shout, or get angry, as it seemed the vor who had decided to break the news to them had expected.

Lisa merely puzzled over it for a moment more herself. "I don't know, it's a great way to point out it was her and not some other person. And now they're not only dealing with the embarrassment that everyone knows they failed miserably moving against her, but also a police investigation since her new calling card was repeated."

Her lover snorted, turning back to eye the younger man who had brought the news to them. "The Kozlov Brotherhood, right? Didn't they also try something earlier this year?"

"They tried to shoot Sonya, I think."

When the Vindice showed up and reminded everyone they were the thing that went bump in the night. She was pretty certain that was the name of the group that already attempted something unwise.

Arseniy merely grunted, turning back to eating his dinner. "It better not happen again."

Lisa gave the young vor who had delivered the message a tight little smirk. "Was there anything
I thought you were horrible at history." Tatiana complained absently, munching on a slice taken from the half a chocolate cake her sister had left over from the 'save the Pahkan' efforts.

"I became interested when I failed to grasp a lot of things only reading textbooks."

Sonya glanced, again, at the door as if it would spill out her Italian stud and her little brat. Then she sighed and sank a little more into the couch in order to whittle away the hours until they were back.

The nurse could understand her sister wasn't happy she was being left behind for the gun range lessons because it wasn't yet a certainty that Shamal wouldn't startle her again, but seriously.

She was here and trying to distract the woman from her woes. The blonde could at least pay her some more attention.

With another heavy sigh, the younger Russian shut her book and set it delicately down on her already overstocked coffee table. "Why ask, Tats?"

…of course her sister would continue the conversation right after she stuck another forkful of sinfully good cake in her mouth. Waving her fork to buy her a moment, the nurse washed down her bite with a sip of milk.

"Staking people's heads out on pikes? That's… old school, sis. Old Testament kind of thing even."

"…Tatiana, are you Christian?"

"Nope, but a lot of the criminals I get as patients are. And we, nurses I mean, have to know the few holy men on Mafia Land for last rites and other such things." A lot of those long-term patients also tended to talk about something as safe as religion, rather than what got them put in the hospital at all or their usually more fascinating lives. "Klavdia, that Sun girl you sent us? She's really into the tortures and punishments spoken of in them. Finding her Russian translations are a bitch and a half."

Sonya pulled a slightly disgusted face. "…I think there might be something very wrong with her head."

"Of course there is, but as long as she can manage herself who cares?" Tatiana waved her fork again, with an added little jab at the end to point at her sister. "But back to topic, is there any reason why you picked 'pike their heads on the lawn' as... huh..."

"I believe you said that we were not nearly as feared because we didn't do just that." Pointed out the younger thief blandly, stealing her sister's fork and a bite of her cake while the nurse adjusted to the thought she had influenced this particular new tick of hers.

The little sneak.

First their father, and now her. The redhead snickered as she slotted the reasons for this development away. "Aww... love you too sis."
"Is that why you're here and not with the Pahkan?" She questioned her dryly, as she and about half the clan already knew the nurse was of the opinion their boss was a stubborn, hard-headed idiot a step or two away from dying from a stroke or a heart attack.

"Clots are a very real side-effect of receiving blood transfusions, especially if someone wasn't what they said they were. I really am only sure your blood was of a type to not cause it and you could only give so much at a time." Given the number of times she and Doctor Kappel had been over the Storm-Cloud's medical record in the last year alone, Tatiana was more than sure her sister was that 'universal donor' type of O negative. "Speaking of… exactly when did you become sure you can Propagate blood?"

"…Cherep's initial ability is Propagating himself when injured." Sonya admitted bitterly, drawing her knees up and hugging them. "It's really how he's survived before we met, and why he's not even remotely bothering with planning for the long-term recovery for a nasty spill. Cherep doesn't remain injured long enough to bother with it. He's functionally immortal."

The Sun nurse stopped dead cold, forkful of tasty cake halfway to her mouth.

"We've taught each other our initial ability, and I've tried his 'Cloud replicated flesh' trick on my own injuries once. It hurts, Tats."

…this had suddenly become as depressing as fuck, and also she was going to whack their brother upside the head for not telling the fucking nurse about his medical issues before their little sister could.

"He's going to be up here in what, a few more days?" Tatiana intended to have this out in the living room of Lisa's place.

Their dorky brother was probably not going to appreciate it, and neither would Sonya probably, but she was pretty sure their parents would like to know and be able to fuss and worry.

…well, more their mother than Arseniy. He'd probably just grunt and hand their brother a commiserating bottle of booze for the argument of why the fuck didn't you tell us and medical checks are not optional no matter what freaky Cloud voodoo you've got.

After getting a hug because that was fucking wretched. The Sun really did just want to wince as she recalled the half-forgotten memory of his first medical checkup with them in Mafia Land, and how pissed the doctor had been over the results.

Enough to go toe to toe with their foster father about it.

Cherep didn't deserve that, he was a dork and theirs, and she would very much like to know which wiseass decided to try murdering their brother for that to be found out.

"Last time he called, Scruffy had to answer as I was out of the office, his friend is better and he's finally rearranging his traveling schedule to visit." Sonya admitted in a less tired or sad tone, completely oblivious to Tatiana's less appreciative thoughts. "He'll be up here in a few more days."

The nurse sucked the chocolate off the tines of her fork for a moment. "…perfect. Tell him I want to talk to him at the parent's house when he gets up here… actually? Where is he going to bunk down?"

She shrugged absently and waved a hand around the suite. "Here? I mean, Shamal and I can deal with another body, or move and invade Renato's, or there's the couch still. Lisa might also not mind putting him up for a week or however long he's taken from the circus. Renato's also leaving at the Tatiana hummed… then actually processed that comment and what said sleeping arrangements would look like. She ended up gagging on her cake in surprise, spluttering the gooey mess back out onto the plate she was eating it off of. "...w-wait. WHAT?"

Sonya eyed her warily. "...what?"

"You're… no, wait."

Lisa had been disproving for pressuring her little sister into things she didn't want, but there was nothing said about gathering gossip to bring back as proof something was going on.

Satisfied with her reasoning, she looked squarely at her little sister. "You don't… no, again. Urg. Okay… why would you jump in tall, dark, and snarky's bed? Aside the 'making room thing', are you sure you're alright with that?"

Looking highly suspicious of her rather disjointed false start to the question, the blonde frowned first before answering a few seconds later. "...why wouldn't I be? Renato's not as grabby as Shamal, and since the brat's small still it's not as suffocating as when you or Cherep like to smother me."

They would revisit that 'smothering' thing later… but… the only way Sonya could know how 'grabby' her Italian stud was, was if this wasn't merely a suggestion and actually happened once before. Her sister was also alright with sleeping next to Renato.

Tatiana bit her tongue to hold back an entirely childish squeal of approval and glee.

However, brat and Cherep. Shamal was practically a living cock-block just by existing, and she was pretty sure their dork of a brother would not like that suggestion and opt to 'take' that open spot in Sonya's bed if there was any overlap.

Pure logic, he didn't really like criminal things and loved their sister… so he'd probably really not like the prospect of one day calling a hitman 'brother-in-law'.

Still… ouch, poor man. In hindsight, she was really impressed tall, dark, and snarky had suffered through living in close quarters with a woman that had no body modesty and that he was attracted to without doing any 'pressuring' of his own.

Renato really was quite the gentleman, nice to know he did deserve every bit of that reputation in more ways than one.

He also had to be suffering through the biggest case of blue-balls in his life, though. Especially for how often he normally went through women, according to the rumor mill on Mafia Land.

"You know… Cherep and I are probably equally willing to babysit if you and tall, dark, and snarky want to actually do something in the evenings than entertain Shamal." Tatiana suggested, only half so the man could actually do something about this. Not really enough to actually pressure someone as stubborn as her sister into anything, but at least enough privacy to at least talk about it. "Go catch a play or see the ballet. Both of which one doesn't really take young children to since it usually ends well past their bedtimes. Go sightseeing or something."

"...I'll mention something to Renato, about maybe seeing a play or something without the brat, but he is here on business and not just for Shamal."

Hmm… alarming. Who would send business outside of the Iron Curtain?
There really weren't very many Soviet States that were represented in Mafia Land.

"Do you know what he's looking for?"

"...in this part of it, yes. Soviet Clouds, which is interesting enough I gave it to Galina and Usov to see what they could find. I think they're currently hunting down rumors in Siberia, however it is they arranged for that to be handled."

"...like, say, you?"

Sonya shook her head. "Older than me."

"And that doesn't bother you?" Tatiana questioned curiously, derailed off the subject of bed-partners but vowing to somehow go back to that and get the details. Because… damn, why the hell was her sister still a virgin? "That he's hunting Clouds."

"...Renato's a hitman. I will not interfere with his work. He's also mainly looking for those that have left the Soviet Union, so... no. They're not here to help me with anything, so I will not block him from finding any."

…ruthless. Then again, her sister was never really the nicest person on the block.

The nurse double checked the time, ensuring she didn't have to go back to headquarters to check on the Pahkan again. Old man Milos was not a gracious patient, and if she didn't hound the man he'd sneak work to try to keep on top of things that he had shoved Gedeon to manage until his return.

There were also any side effects from the transfusions and the whole being shot thing she was watching for, but the risks decreased the longer things went on and no symptoms became apparent.

Before she could decide if she had the time for a little more heart-to-heart with her little sister, the lock of Sonya's apartment suite turned over and the door opened to spill a happy Shamal inside.

"Mamma! Mister Renato said you can join us now. Hi, zia! Ooh, cake."

Smiling wryly, Tatiana let the little brat abscond with the half of the cake slice she hadn't finished while also climbing into her sister's lap for cuddles.

Sinclair ambled in more sedately, tossing his hat onto a coat rack the nurse was pretty sure she hadn't noticed on her way in. It also was brand new.

…huh.

She needed to brush up on her more crooked skills, and also when did her sister start conforming for the hitman?

"Tatiana." Said Italian stud greeted her neutrally, eyeing Shamal's steady demolishing of cake sternly until the kid slowed down and stopped getting it everywhere.

Sonya absently brushed chocolate cake crumbs off her now crossed legs. "Tats has volunteered to babysit if you'd like to catch a play or go see the ballet with me, Renato."

"Ho?"

"...aww, can't I go too?"

"We can do better things, baby. Like cram you full of sugar and stay up really late." Tatiana ignored the dual ugly looks she earned for that, grinning at her nephew. "Instead of watch some boring actors prance about a stage or a bunch of people in silly costumes flail all over it."

"...I am suddenly not that interested in seeing what culture Russia has."

"Tatiana is just someone that doesn't greatly appreciate the finer things in life." Sonya dismissed with a sooty sniff after a bland moment of glaring at her sister. "I can assure you that she's grossly underestimating the Russian Ballet and the quality of plays we have."

"Philistine." Tacked on Renato equally as snootily, sprawling out between the sisters and putting both arms behind them on the back of the couch. "What's on tap, so to say?"

"I don't yet know... I should go find out if there's any major production going on." Nibbling on her lower lip, the thief set her chin on Shamal's head as he polished off the nurse's cake. "I should... also probably go arrange a few classes or at least some time on the trapeze at the circus' college."

"...I am fairly certain I misheard you." The hitman spoke slowly, looking fairly confused. "A... circus college?"

"Technically," Tatiana insisted with a faked-snootily air of her own, "it's the Lunacharsky State Institute for Theatre Arts. They just happen to be more famous outside of the city for being the place Russian circuses go to brush up on their skills or teach others."

"There's not even a circus department, Tats." Sonya corrected absently. "It's really just more a place former or current circus performers can go to reserve time on the actual props found within a circus. And recruit or teach other circus performers, but still."

"...I have got to see this." Tall, dark, and snarky made an abortive move for his hat but after a half moment of hesitation he raked a hand through his spiky hair instead. "Theater Arts, hmm?"

"Why not take tomorrow off, Nya?" Suggested the nurse idly, taking the now clean plate from her sister's brat to put away in the sink and start gathering herself up to leave for the night. "I'll tell Galina not to expect you... and also reroute any more assassination attempts."

The Italian hottie shot her a skeptical look, then Sonya one of her own when the thief didn't scoff or snort at the semi-teasing and half-serious quip.

"...they sucked as an assassin." Shamal dismissed instead, making a little adorable 'hmph' sound as he crossed his arms with a faintly chocolate smeared scowl.

"They did. It was more a cry for help, though." Agreed the blonde he was treating as a living seat. "Which, hopefully, will not be repeated once what I did in revenge for trying to take advantage of the Rains makes the rounds."

"I have to go make sure the Pahkan's not doing something silly, like straining himself so soon after a major injury was healed." Announced the nurse before tall, dark, and snarky could ask. "I'll see you all hopefully tomorrow night or something."

"Have a nice night, Tats."

"Bye, zia!"

"...Sonya, what the hell?"
Tatiana shut the hotel suite doors behind her firmly, smirking.

(Sunday the 22nd of June, 1969. Lunacharsky State Institute for Theatre Arts, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Good morning, Jiayi."

The tiny Chinese woman sniffed, glancing backwards to see the Russian that addressed her. "Finally. I was starting to think you forgot about us all."

"Not intentionally, I assure you." Sonya answered the trapeze coordinator calmly, guiding a small brunette child holding her hand to be less in the way in case someone fell off the high wire. "Things just got away from me. I knew I should've came in for at least some practice several times these last few months, I just didn't have the time."

She glanced upward again, to ensure the trapeze artist she had been inspecting were actually practicing their arts and not gossiping like birds. "Excuses, girl. There is an opening in the next routine, go get ready and refresh your skills on the lower wires until it comes up."

"...do you know…?"

"I am a friend of Crina's. It is why I am here this year and not out with the circus." Interrupted the coordinator firmly, not wanting to hear confirmation of what she already knew. Worse, news that it finally had happened when she had to be working in the here and now. "She asked me not to bear witness to her end."

They stared at each other for a long moment.

"Stay with Jiayi, Shamal." The former fortune telling girl instructed her tagalong firmly, before heeding the older woman's orders.

Jiayi blinked hard a few times, already bitterly missing her friend but resigned to things. Another check, a few of the trapeze artist were new and prone to doing dangerous things in a spare second of idleness, and the Chinese woman turned her attention on the child. "You are not Sonya's child."

"I'm mamma's godchild." He insisted firmly, almost glaring at her. A dare to try denying that to his face.

She was not that disrespectful to someone who would honor such bonds when one's parent was unable to fulfill a child's needs. Whoever would try to do so to said child's face required a beating. "Good. Pay attention, your kai ma has put serious effort in learning this art and is beautiful to watch."

'Shamal' looked blindsided for a moment, then he hesitantly scooted closer to her before looking around for his godmother. Jiayi checked he wasn't actually holding onto her, she sometimes needed to dart off and had no desire to harm one of her acrobat's wards even by accident.

Sonya was an infuriatingly absent acrobat, but the Chinese woman was at least sure if there was an emergency that required her aid she would at least seriously consider it. Not that she could even think of any situation that might arise and need the shady girl to aid in.

"...what does 'kai ma' mean?"
"Godmother, in Chinese. Cantonese, my native language." Jiayi glanced down at him once before returning to inspecting the performance overhead. "Has she yet to teach you? She is fluent in a variation."

The child fidgeted with his fingers instead of stare around the room, likely since his godmother was not out in the large gymnasium yet so he didn't have much reason beyond curiosity to look around. "I was learning Russian up until this trip to see her parents, Miss Jiayi."

It would be obvious why Russian was first, maybe they would move on to Mandarin next? "Ask to learn Chinese next, you go far enough south from here and it becomes the most common language spoken."

"I'll maybe mention it." Temporized the child, earning himself a hard look from the trapeze coordinator.

"I'll suggest it myself then." Jiayi countered blandly. "Your kai ma does heed my word, as you saw."

Shamal looked as if he didn't know if he should be insulted, wary, or apprehensive.

She suppressed the desire to smile. Sonya might not actually take the suggestion, but the number of people she had to speak her native language to was depressingly low. More, even infrequent visitors like the child now keeping her company, could only be a good thing.

"There." Jiayi pointed out Sonya's redressed form to her godchild, as the young woman had exchanged her skirt and blouse for the skin-tight leotards stocked for visitors to practice in.

She returned to watching the high-wire acrobats practicing exchanges from bar to bar and the progress of the tightrope walkers as the former circus apprentice got the details of which act she was to aid in from the other acrobats. The coordinator was certain there would be no drama, she had stamped out a lot of the ego and arrogance out of this year's crop of performers.

There was no place in the big tops for grudges or petty arguments, not when they had to rely on one another merely to survive their performances.

That wasn't to say they weren't egotistical at all, they were disgustedly so to those that couldn't or had never tried to walk the high wire. Jiayi just simply had no patience for such and ensured all her acrobats knew it full well.

"...Shamal, are you bothering this lady?"

The Chinese woman stiffened up, whirling around to face the man who had drawled out the question in a tone she did not like.

"No, mister Renato. Mamma told me to wait with her." Professed the child at her hip fearlessly to the newcomer. "She's Miss Jiayi, the... uh..."

"Coordinator of the trapeze acts." She answered for herself, still warily watching the man who had come to a stop only a few feet from her.

This one was dangerous.

The darkly dressed man merely touched the brim of his hat in a kind of greeting, before eyeing the child that was fearlessly half ignoring him. "Then where did Sonya go?"

Shamal pointed out his godmother, now climbing up with the other acrobats to the trapeze set up more than fifty feet of the ground. "Mamma is right there."

Jiayi found herself dismissed from importance, a not particularly rare occurrence but one she was miffed to be treated to now, as the man named 'Renato' tilted his head back to fully see where the blonde in question was and where she was going.

Trying to decide if she should speak or not, or demand this threat to leave, occupied the coordinator for a long moment.

"I am merely here to watch, Miss Jiayi. Sonya did invite me to do so."

Giving him a pointed look in return, Jiayi huffed quietly to herself.

His comment wasn't really all that reassuring.
For a place Sonya merely knew as the 'circus' college', Renato had been... highly interested in their drama department.

Not just simply because it was fantastically absurd to think about a professional school type-setting for circus performers.

Was there a class for 'Clowning 101'?

How about 'Juggling Basics' with a lesson of 'How to Juggle More than One Pie at a Time' offered?

Lion Taming and a practical test of actually sticking your head into the maw of a big cat that can eat humans?

All that did not mesh with the kind of mental image the Russians tended to show him to date. Practical, ruthless, and very down to earth kind of people. Yet... the ruthless, practical thief he knew best did actually come here and was seemingly known to be a former circus acrobat and was asked by a name if she would like to join the day's practice on the 'trapeze'.

'Miss de Mort' was a new one, he was pretty sure he had heard it before... but where was questionable.

The hitman had a very well-hidden fondness for the bizarre, and for theater as a whole. He would greatly appreciate finding or inflicting the bizarre on his own terms, but there was a lot of strange and absurd things in the USSR.

Although that might be part of the reason, mused the hitman as he now watched Sonya play some kind of follow the leader game high overhead, why I am so fond of damn woman.

She was rather absurd herself. Not just physically, as a tiny doll of a woman that could bend a handful of iron rods to her will without effort, but in how she behaved and how she looked at things.

He may have mentioned to Sonya that churches were the place he had went as a green hitman to get himself breathing room, but to be honest going to plays and hiding out in the back of stages had happened just as often. He had to sneak in those more often than pay, but it was easier to lose tails in dark places that were crowded than in brightly lit and sometimes empty cathedrals.

The backstage incidents were generally more entertaining as well. Not to mention the chaos shoving an extra body into the spotlight caused, which ended up even better when the mooks tried to play along in order to not startle a full house of paying customers or irritated the actors they were interrupting even more.

Upon reaching the Lunacharsky State Institute for Theatre Arts, surprisingly not an entirely beige eyesore of a building, he had peeled off from Sonya and Shamal as she dealt with the process of signing herself and the brat in as visitors. The thief had merely left him to it without batting an eyelash, taking the kid with her deeper into the building on a rather direct route.

Renato wasn't about to sign his name in some visitor's book, even if there was a valid excuse as to why his or any of his aliases would be in there.
He had still wanted to poke around a little himself but moving as if he was going to leave the thief and their godchild to a day of ridiculous circus things let him find a side entrance and slip in with little issue. Ending up in the dance hall section had not been the plan, but enough wandering with a purpose had him occasionally checking into the desired drama department classes.

A wrong turn somewhere then led him into this gymnasium with the trapeze set up within, where he spotted Shamal standing next to some unknown woman and got a bit concerned he had wandered off on Sonya. The hitman had put his exploring to an early end to figure out why the brat was loitering about sans a thief.

Apparently, the circus lessons and practice rooms were part of the drama department or at least situated nearby.

Shamal gave a near-silent gasp when his mamma released the first swinging bar to start her own trip across more than fifty feet of open-air high overhead. Renato pointedly dug his knee in the kid's back, to remind him they were in public and neither of them would appreciate it if he tried to catch the Russian Storm-Cloud with Mist Flames.

Even if the hitman himself really didn't appreciate the somersault in air done to take up the time between when she released the first bar and when she was in range to be grabbed by the man literally throwing the other acrobats to another to be caught. Taking your eyes off the only thing between you and even a twenty-foot fall to a safety net sounded a bit counter-intuitive to him, no matter who was supposed to catch you.

She had apparently done this professionally. Rationally speaking then, she had done worse than this in front of an audience. If she was going through the trouble of keeping her acrobatic skills trained up after she stopped tailing around that circus she had been with, then likely she had done similar things without the benefit of the net spread out underneath to catch any mistakes.

Renato had full faith Sonya's skills. He might not have seen them before, but she wasn't the heedless or reckless type. If she was up there, then obviously she had the proper experience to judge she could do all of it. The hitman was less so confident in the unknowns she was up there with.

This was a school. She was a returning old hand, they were learning.

Jiayi the coordinator huffed slightly aggressively at his side, reminding him that glaring murderously and silently daring those civilians to miss catching the thief might not be the wisest idea right now. The elderly if spry looking lady was intently keeping an eye on him, suspicious and wary already not moments after being introduced to him.

Hopefully this wasn't a rare civilian friend of Sonya's, given he tipped her off that Renato wasn't quite a safe person himself. If it was, hopefully a distant acquaintance she wouldn't mind he had scared.

The Mist brat whimpered again, causing the hitman to double-check where the thief was. Hanging from her knees upside down as she swung from the far end of the trapeze bars, and then at the top of the next arc she let go. Someone else might have caught her wrists for her return trip back across the four-bar set, but he was pretty damn sure neither him nor the kid appreciated it. Nor the mid-air maneuvers she had to do to catch the next man's wrists instead of let him grip her by the ankles via more practical hand-over.

Was it over yet?

The acrobats were slowly working their way across the far platform from where they started and then back again this time around, surely that and the solo back-n-forth from before was enough for a practice run.

A vicious little grumble from the side told him the coordinator spotted something she didn't like and running his gaze over the others let him know the man that had snatched Sonya up had a wobble to his trajectory. She was looking up at him instead of looking to the next and final bar she had to get to, in order to get off the oversized swings, for a few back-and-forth arcs as they tried to correct it.

Renato winced, and Shamal gave a shocked little cry, when Sonya missed the next bar because she was tossed a little too far off center. Jiayi erupted into a spitting fury, shouting in near-incomprehensible Chinese up at the acrobat as the Storm-Cloud hit the safety net.

…this reminded him that he had yet to learn that language, a bit tied up in ensuring Shamal had Russian and German down pat first and handling his own business. Vongola Mists were just as ornery and machination-inclined as any other and dealing with them was something you had to take in small doses. He had to find someone to teach him yet or afford the loose cash to bribe a Mist to do it all in one session.

The brat deserved something for not forgetting the safety catch in place and that his mamma would be alright when she was dropped in mid-air. Instead of Constructing something to save her from a rather minor incident all total that would put them under some unwanted scrutiny.

Sonya more or less crawled over to the rope tied to one end of the net to lower herself down, the rest of the trapeze artist filing down whichever way was fastest depending on where they were. She slid down her way fairly quickly and was the first to reach the floor, speaking something of her own to the tiny old woman now puffed up like a highly offended pigeon just waiting for her chicks to get in range for a good pecking.

Shamal left Renato's side, darting over himself to wrap his arms around the thief's… tights covered legs. A lot closer now, the hitman blinked as he realized what she was wearing was both skin-tight and left very little to the imagination.

"Especially up close."

"-was fine, Shamal. This is why we practice." She reassured the brat clinging to her leg a bit awkwardly, patting at his hair as the angle was a bit too awkward for her to comfortably reach his back and not bend over at the same time. "Honestly, that should've worked. I touched the other bar… but didn't quite have the reach to actually grip it. Had I been taller… I might not have fallen."

This was not helping anything.

Silky dark blue and form-fitting was a rather good look on her, and the white tights the brat was clinging to helped highlight her toned legs. The hitman clamped down on the desire to compliment her appearance, for one she'd ignore it and for another flattery of how she looked got him very little when trying to flirt with her.

You could only be brushed off so many times before it became a sticking point.

Why complementing how intimidating she could be instead worked better?

It was probably a Cloud-thing.

"High wire." Barked the little Chinese woman at the thief in her native Russian, before rounding on the other acrobats and giving them similarly short demands for solo things to practice until she reached the slightly cringing man that fumbled the blonde woman. He earned himself a glower and a pointed finger jabbing at a set of rings suspended from the ceiling. "Let us build up your shoulder strength some more, Pavel. Then your back. Hopefully then you won't toss the next girl relying on you to the net instead."

Sonya smirked wryly. "Why don't you and Renato find a class to sit in on, brat? There's some good drama ones going on today, I think."

"Would they mind?" Renato would have no issues leaving her to some dizzying height practice in order to take a look for himself, so long as he could get out of being noticed.

"Most of them take place in the amphitheaters nearby. They have balcony seating you can remain overlooked within." Confided the thief with a wicked little tilt to her smirk now. A roundabout way to admit she had been stealing lectures on acting here and there? He supposed that explained some of how she got so good at faking certain behavioral patterns to those that didn't know her personally, like the ditzy home-schooled blonde or the professionally caring investigator act.

Her mother obviously held the blame for most of it, especially since he had figured out Lisa had been passing tips to Shamal on the sly about how to argue with him better. Was it wise to be wary of how the brat would behave at the end of his summer vacation here, or gleefully expectant to see him upset some of the things back home in Italia?

Renato really did have to go back to taking hits soon, or at least working more on the information Sonya's people had dug up for him, but the distractions available here… were worth it. He was almost sorry his time loitering about was nearly up.

"Renato." Sonya's slightly exasperated call redirected his attention forcibly to the… not really scantily clad woman but at least a distractingly attired one. "Take the brat. Also… what did you do to Jiayi?"

"Nothing." Drawled the hitman with little concern, plucking the kid in question up by the back of his shirt and removing him from his attempt to re-apply himself like a barnacle to his mamma's leg.

He hadn't really done much of anything, and that was probably the problem. Civilians were just so easily spooked if you didn't pay them enough attention to prevent it. Renato had just been more concerned with the thought Shamal had wandered off on her and ended up somewhere he shouldn't be to care much for anyone he startled.

In hindsight, not the best thing to happen.

"How long do you think this'll be?" Asked the Mafioso instead of admitting any of that, wondering how well Shamal would like drama and plays. He was a Mist, he might be able to put some of it to real good use. His version of it, at least.

"All afternoon, knowing Jiayi." She answered dryly, rolling her eyes when said woman gave her a pointed look for loitering about instead of immediately heading for the ladder again to reach the wire strung between the two supporting poles that also had the net stretched out between them a bit lower. "Say… find me again near dinner time?"
"Sure… little dragon lady."

(OOO000000)

(Sunday the 22nd of June, 1969 continued. The Rain Bar, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Galina delicately followed one young Rain by the name of Tolmacyhov Larion Afanasievich down a set of stairs. These stairs just so happened to lead into the basement of what was fast becoming known as the ‘Rain Bar’ instead of whatever name it had officially.

The boy, the same one that had attempted to murder a Storm-Cloud yesterday, stopped near the landing and looked as if he had no desire to go any farther.

That was alright, the Lightning didn't mind.

Sonya had wanted a Rain for her own reasons, and this one had at least the intelligence to accept her help when he ran out of options. If he would prove to be somewhat interesting or not had yet to be discovered, or if her underboss would even tolerate his presence for any length.

Either way, he was a Rain that was at least predisposed to being neutral instead of semi-hostile.

"Yanovna." Galina half-ordered and half-called, narrowing her eyes on the teenaged Rain girl that scowled when she realized who had come visiting. "A word. Now."

The little bitch had no room to be pulling faces. She was not only overdue to suck it up and grow a damn spine, but she was still sending Irinei in her place whenever she thought she could get away with it.

Obviously, she intended to do nothing beyond the bare bones of what she had to.

Which was not helpful at all.

The Lightning plastered on a tight little smile for the moody teen. "You are hereby relieved of duties. Go sulk on your own time."

"…I… excuse me?"

"You are a pathetic, utterly inexcusable example of a leader." Continued the older brunette ruthlessly in a pleasant tone. "One of your own had a problem, and you had no fucking idea. Because he apparently didn't trust you a damn bit to help him. It's fine, you were forced into this position. Apparently asking you to at least look after your own was too much to ask."

The younger girl spluttered, too offended and insulted to think clearly.

That suited Galina just fine as well. "You will now be reporting to young Larion over here. Who at least has guts, if not a spine."

"…Miss Galina?" Larion asked quietly, as she hadn't told him why he had to escort her to this little meeting and was probably terribly confused.

"You aren't the youngest we ever had, Larion. That still goes to the Mist Usov, who started at seven as the Mist Lead." She reassured the kid in a less bitchy tone, until she turned back to the teenager he was replacing. "Nothing to say? Good. Good day, Yanovna."
Proving that she was the more aggressive 'Inverted' Rain type, she stiffened up and tried to get in the Lightning’s face. Tried, because Galina jabbed her with her green painted nails in the neck and sent a bolt of her Flames through Yanovna's body.

Lightning was the only Dying Will Flame that wouldn't necessarily burn another on contact, but electrocution was the more common result when used like this. Even just visually, Lightning Flames acted much more like electricity than just fire.

They were really wonderful as a touch-based deterrent, her Flames. Shocking the hell out of whatever or whoever she touched was Galina’s first use of her emerald Flames, and dead useful as well.

Especially since she was a woman, and at the time she hadn’t exactly been in a lawful part of town before she ‘popped’.

Tatiana had laughed herself sick when she weaseled the whole story out of her fellow if panicking female before calming them both down and starting her on her little sister’s Flame exercises to learn control. As apparently both sisters had figured out she had Flames before she ‘popped’ and had ensured she’d have the tools ready and waiting for her to master when she did.

Galina wasn’t a robust woman, or really a fantastic thief besides as an extra set of hands or as a lookout. What she excelled at was logistics. Planning a heist, how to move a haul, finding loopholes to exploit. Making or keeping contacts, exploiting or managing them, and ensuring what was needed was at hand before it became a life or death thing.

Getting cornered by two men who refused to take the word 'no' for an answer left her without many options, especially as they had avoided most the damage she tried to do to them in order to escape. Electrocuting the fuck out of them in revenge had been rather… liberating.

Her once attackers were dead now, electrocuted to death, but from then on Galina hadn’t just been a nominally decent thief without a specialty except for the planning of heists. She now had a skill she was damn proud of, the first Zolotov Dying Will Lightning user, and ‘managing’ Sonya was practically a job tailored made for her in and of itself.

That job had some real good perks to it, and her nail polish was one of them from back before she had even started. Made from finely ground bits of the mineral malachite and added to a simple clear nail polish, it usually lasted a few uses before needing to be reapplied.

Eyeing the twitching teenaged girl for a moment, mostly to be sure she wasn't going to choke on her own vomit or something, Galina delicately picked her way over the twitching body and motioned for Larion to follow.

"Listen up, please." She needlessly addressed the rest of the Rains now warily watching her for any crackling emerald Flames that might make an appearance. "Yanovna had been demoted, for reasons that boil down to 'doing less than the bare minimum required and ignoring the rest of her duties'. Larion will be taking over for her as the lead Rain. Again, speak to him about any questions or concerns you may have or any issues that arises."

The poor boy squeaked when he suddenly became the center of attention. After a moment, he hesitantly waved.

"That being said, the next time some moron tries to take your family members hostage in hopes you will murder another of our Flame users, I hope we will hear about it before you actually try something so suicidal."
The new Rain Division leader shrank in on himself even more when he got incredulous looks for that announcements as some people put one and one together and got two.

Galina was pretty damn sure even the farthest flung Flame Division, which would be the Rains, had heard of Sonya’s sudden and out of the blue temper tantrums. Including the staking of heads thing that was fast becoming a kind of half-joke and half-warning tossed about within the clan.

As the Kozlov Brotherhood hadn’t been reduced to shark chum or weren’t in the middle of a turf war with the Zolotovs, it was generally accepted that whatever they did had nothing to do with their clan’s Pakhan getting shot. Within the clan, it was known someone had tried to ineptly assassinate Sonya.

It wasn’t Scruffy’s fault. No one told him not to say anything about it, just that the thief and the kid had left the office. He also rather failed to prevent Shamal from bitching to the Mirror Lady when she stopped by to check up on him.

Galina hadn’t known until she returned to the office, and by then not only did Anna know and had been busy updating the people she thought should know but a few vory had heard and were trying to source where the Storm-Cloud had got to for guarding.

She was pretty sure her boss was going to be equally as unimpressed with that as with the man that tried to lecture her.

"Any questions?" Galina asked the basement room at large, while they were still rather incredulous and off-balance. "No? Good. Try not to have any more issues that require our interference over the head of your section's lead, please."

(Monday the 23rd of June, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya blinked slowly.

Shamal glared from under her elbow, wrapping his arms around her waist as far as he could reach.

Galina clicked her green plated pen a few times as she waited expectantly, Scruffy coughed a bit uncomfortably from his end of the couch.

The so introduced ‘Larion the Rain’, the apparently new lead of the Rain section as of yesterday afternoon, shuffled his feet awkwardly in the middle of her office.

"…this means Irinei is finally freed up, right?" Asked the thief a bit desperately.

Sue her, after Björn she had thought she was more or less immune to soppy, desperately grateful types. Nope, the younger they were the less sure she was on how to deal with them.

Admittedly her Lackey had been an older looking preteen, and this kid was obviously not even in the double digits of age yet.

No offense to him but… actually, he tried to kill her when all that he probably knew about her was that she kicked the fuck out of the Rain leads before Yanovna. That took some guts.

After getting messed around with on all those stupid rumors left over from the dismantling of the Four Rains, he still somehow found the courage to try assassinating her in hopes of saving his mother.

Thinking about that aspect a bit more… made her less sure she was done terrorizing the Kozlov Brotherhood.

She didn't actually know what, exactly, the threat had been. Just that the Rain boy's mother had been kidnapped and he had been told via letter left with his beaten-up father that if he wanted to see her again, he had to kill the Storm-Cloud herself.

Kind of a win-win situation for them regardless of what happened… up until Sonya decided to not play the game. Had he killed her, it would be one less scary thorn in anyone's side. Had she killed him, it would've rather badly impacted her reputation and the reputation of the Zolotov Flame training efforts. Opting to do it her own way at least prevented anything too bad from being bandied about baselessly.

There would still be shit said, but at least there would be no proof for the more skeptical to dig up.

Recovering the kid's mom with Usov's help so she could go after the vory without having to suffer through some bullshitted hostage situation had proven less than a challenge. Staking their heads out on the street that syndicate claimed as home base took only some of her thief skills, as by that time the Mist had been rather sternly redirected to sending the Rain, his mother, and his father somewhere safer than where they had lived before.

…stealing people should be harder than she had recently found it to be but then again, all her 'targets' had been very willing to be stolen.

"Larion." Sonya tried before Galina could figure out the answer to her question. "Would you like some revenge yourself?"

The kid batted wide hazel eyes up at her. "...I'm not really the type, Bazanova."

Oh dear fuck, he was Classical. Sonya didn't tend to get along well with Classical Rains… or… maybe just Discordant Classical Rains?

Supposedly Irinei was Classical… but she didn't really like him due to previous reasons nearly unrelated to his personality.

She eyed the kid standing in the middle of her office skeptically. "Alright then…"

Looking to the other child had her hesitating. Shamal still did not look remotely appreciative of the older boy and hadn't let her go yet. The Storm-Cloud looked first to Galina, who merely shrugged, and then to Scruffy.

Peter blinked, looked between the boys, then back up at her curiously.

Sonya pinched the bridge of her nose for a long moment.

What the ever-loving fuck was she supposed to do with two boys, one of which had a grudge against the other?

She didn't have these kinds of skills, why the hell were they leaving it up to her?

"Not to be rude or anything, but did you require something else?" She asked resignedly, pressing on Shamal's back lightly to get him to head over to the Sun on the couch for their daily tactical lessons.
Maybe she could get him to leave in a few minutes?

Larion glanced up at the expressionless Galina, but when she gave him nothing to go on he slightly stiffly turned back to her. "Err… I am… nine, Miss Bazanova."

"Usov started at seven, teaching the Mirror Lady Mist skills." Sonya informed him slowly. Only actually slightly sure she was addressing the right topic behind that comment.

"I know, Miss Galina informed me. I mean… I am going to need Irinei." The Rain kid explained, rubbing at an arm awkwardly. "I'm… ah, not imposing."

She blinked a few times slowly.

"Physically, I mean."

"...do you mean in order to terrorize your fellow Rains into behaving, or for other reasons?" She tried to clarify, because if that first one was the case she might as well put Irinei back in charge and just hope he at least wasn't as stupid or hidebound as Fadei or Kazimir.

Larion shifted from foot to foot, obviously thinking over her question, before answering slowly. "I can… I think, handle the other Rains. Yanovna didn't actually really do much for us, so I don't think I can do worse. And I can at least talk to Miss Galina if you would prefer that."

Seating herself in the office chair behind the large desk as she listened, and the thief wondered herself if she didn't like the Rain boy.

Obviously, Galina preferred him to the so far mainly absent teenaged Rain girl. Which she could understand since Yanovna never really had put effort into things since she got shanghaied into a position she didn't want. She had been more or less just a filler, a warm body in a spot so there was at least a name in a slot for anyone looking over their records.

Of which… there was… maybe three people she gave a fuck about, and a whole lot more she'd really rather not deal with.

Irinei had pretty much been filling in the cracks in the previous Rain lead's less-than-absently done work, and if her Lightning had removed her nearly useless ass to put the Storm-Cloud's would-be assassin into her place… and he needed help… the much older Rain was probably the best decision.

Sonya honestly didn't really like the fact the tall Rain man was still a main part of the Rain section, but frankly there was no other good options at this point. Grudgingly, she might have to give the kid before her that point.

Might. No one else had needed to have their hands held, just the Rains. Feeling the lot of them were really useless without a strong leader was her prerogative.

"At the bare minimum," she instructed him blandly, "I expect you to know each Rain we have. Their names, what they are trying to accomplish with their Flames or without them, their living situations and if that needs improvements, and if they have any problems you or they can't solve. I would like you to be able to track their development, but Galina will run you through the process a few times until you can do it in your sleep. For the non-clan Rains, who they report to and what it is they would like to learn about their Flames. Anything you, or Irinei for however long you need him as a crutch, cannot arrange yourselves you can bring to us for additional help."

Larion studied her with a frown. "...I definitely can't do worse than Yanovna."
She was becoming rather fed up with argumentative or disruptive Rains.

Dearly beloved fuck, was it something about her that made Rains snotty little shits?

…no, more than likely prior history and a reputation she was only now starting to deserve.

Sonya tiredly rubbed at her left eye, leaning back in her seat to scowl down at the kid.

He looked entirely bewildered at her flat look. "Miss Bazanova?"

"If you have a problem with me-"

"No! I... am..." Larion desperately cast about the office for some help.

Galina looked entirely too willing to let him continue to fumble about, Scruffy was more or less highly confused over what was going on, and Shamal was helping not a damn bit if he didn't have to.

The Lightning had set things up, the Sun had probably less than half the details needed to understand, and the Mist brat was being a brat.

"...thank you?" He questioned more than stated hesitantly, barreling on like a goofy and non-hostile Classical Rain after a moment to wince over how he had said that. "For rescuing my mom, I mean. You didn't really have to, so I appreciate it."

"I didn't do it for you." Sonya corrected a bit exasperatedly. "The only reason why I bothered was because she was kind of in the way of me getting to those vory in order to express my displeasure with them. Thanking me for something I didn't actually plan on doing myself is a bit... awkward."

"Intended or not, my mom's alive." Larion insisted, as if that made anything any better. "...which was, actually, more than I was hoping for even if I did kill you. I really figured you'd kill me, and then maybe might investigate why I tried to kill you."

That was depressively pessimistic of the kid. Apparently, he at least was realistic about the effects of his efforts and really couldn't do any worse than Yanovna or Kazimir, or Fadei, which was honestly a step forward.

A baby step forward for the Rains, who were lagging so far behind everyone else Sonya honestly wondered if they'd have to import a foreign one to be a role model if this kid didn't work out even halfway decently... or just waste time until the original Zolotov Rain was free again.

…there was... what the fuck was his name?

The Triad Rain man, who was... somewhere. Galina might know, but he also didn't really speak to her much if at all. Not that the thief really wanted Chinese influences in a section that had proven highly troublesome in multiple ways until they shaped up, but if they had actually been less of a pain in the ass she would've asked for him about teaching the Rain brats something to 'see if he could teach' or some other bullshit.

The Rain boy merely shrugged at her skeptical look. "Again, I'm nine."

…point.

"I do not murder kids." Insisted Sonya blandly, trying to figure out if she was insulted by that or not. "I'm well aware I don't have the best reputation, but more than most of that is entirely unwarranted."
"...so, you didn't pike heads outside various locations like demented lawn ornament?"

"No, that one she fully deserves."

"It's been five days since I started." The thief reminded Galina probably a bit bitchier than was warranted. "I've done a grand total of six heads at two locations. I don't deserve the entire reputation I have right now."

"...yet." The lone Sun in the room corrected helpfully, looking a bit surprised and ducking his head at her glower.

"Shut up, Scruffy." Looking back to the Lightning in the room, the Storm-Cloud decided to dismiss the entire conversation. Either Larion the Rain would be useful or he wouldn't, she'd just have to see how that one resolved itself. "Galina, I need whatever plays are currently showing. Please."

After a moment of being surprised, the woman nodded and reached for the office phone.

Sonya turned back to eye the latest of the way-too-young-but-only-good-option Flame users about to be in charge of damn near fifty bodies. "Larion, you have work to be doing. More than you should, but your section's been a pain in the ass since I got shoved in here to wait out Dmitriy's prison sentence."

"...who?" Asked the kid, a bit bewildered at a name he apparently didn't know.

"Dmitriy. The real head of this office. Inverted Rain, soon-to-be vor, currently serving the tail end of his prison sentence." When that didn't clear the Rain's confusion, the thief merely sighed heavily. "Forget it. Another Rain, an older one who will likely take over for you in as little as a year or so."

"Oh!" After a pause to absorb that, he beamed at her. "That is… wonderful news, actually. I shall… get started then."

Having said so, Larion then nearly skipped out of her office.

Sonya stared after him, wondering if it really was just something about her that made Classical Rains dislike being in her presence until they could leave it.

"...well, that went well." Galina observed with satisfaction, hanging up to dial a number in her search for what the Storm-Cloud wanted to know.

She gifted the other woman with a highly skeptical look of her own. "That was 'well'?"

Her ruthlessly practical Lightning merely shrugged, pulling the rotary dial around as she plugged in the numbers for her next connection. "He's alive, probably will deal with you more than the other little bint, and it seems as if you're not entirely opposed to his presence. I call that a win."

Sonya regarded the brunette dubiously for a long moment.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 23rd of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"According to Galina, there's a few options." Sonya informed Renato over dinner. "From the ballet to a few decent productions and even a couple films that just got a showing on the silver screen."
He had cooked this night, just simply to ensure the fact that her kitchen would cook something to his standards and that her occasional burning or failed dish was solely her own fault. The thief hadn't even bothered getting defensive or upset he was doubting her culinary skills to her face, she had merely asked if she should pick something up for him in a bland tone.

All in all, no. There was nothing overtly wrong with Sonya's kitchen besides it being a bit more than a bit out-of-date, it was just that she was a not particularly skilled cook. The basics, fine. Some occasional favorite she had a decent amount of practice with, sure.

Anything else?

Not with any regularity.

He had to find her a chef, one that would somehow survive cooking for a highly temperamental Cloud and her brat, otherwise Shamal might actually starve himself or get sick off her cooking. One he'd feel safe leaving the Mist brat's dietary health up to, if he was going to try snubbing them to Sonya's face.

Without her getting irked with him, which might be as simple as asking if she wanted him to vet a decent Italian cook who might help her with the housework once he found her a place.

Either way, he'd keep an eye open.

"The ballet then?" The hitman didn't really care what they did.

He was just kind of resignedly looking forward to the moment things went 'click' in her head and she realized they had gone on a few dates without even really stating that they were doing so in so many words.

Now, would that happen before or after she got involved with another man?

"We could… but honestly I was thinking the opera." Waving about the fork as if to wind up time to think her thoughts through, the thief gave a kind of idle shrug. "You really should at least see the Russian Ballet once in your life, but it's fairly typical right now. Back awhile, there was more surrealism apparent in some of the shows… but right now it's all just classical. Nice, but not really…"

…inspiring to someone who could dance, probably.

The Sun flicked his fingers absently to agree to that, smacking Shamal's fingers before he could use them to shove his food onto his utensil. "Use a knife for that, brat. The opera instead then? Anything good?"

"We'll probably go to the State Academic Bolshoi Theatre, there's a showing of The Voyevoda… or we could see about getting in to see Mazeppa." She considered him for a long moment. "…I think you might enjoy the latter more, honestly."

"Ho?"

"It's historic, but also has murder, execution, abduction, and political persecution in it." Explained the thief wryly, leaning back in her chair. "I've seen it before with Cherep, but I don't actually know about The Voyevoda enough to say what it's about or if you'd like it."

Renato pondered his choices, there was still the as of yet unnamed film option if he didn't particularly want to see a Russian opera, and Shamal took advantage to ask a question of his own.
"You sure I can't come, mamma?"

"Well past your bedtime, brat." Sonya reminded the kid, smiling faintly at the disgruntled pout he tried to hide. "You'll have a lot more fun with Tats than you would sitting quietly in a dark theater for a few hours watching actors put on a kind of stuffy historical drama."

The Mist brat didn't answer that but chewed on his ravioli as if it had done him a disservice.

"Besides which, your zio might be here in the morning. Might." She continued when the kid remained stubbornly silent and the hitman wondered if she would dress up for an opera more than a film. "Cherep chose to drive the whole damn way, the idiot, and even factoring in breaks for the night as well as gas and food... he should be nearly close to Moscow by now."

As Shamal did perk up at that, Renato figured out which way he wanted to go with a free night from Shamal. "I think we'll see the Mazeppa opera, Sonya. Do you need a dress?"

"Yes, but I have a few."

"Not a fan?" The most he saw her in outside of a Ball was skirts, knee or longer in length, and even then she seemed to prefer trousers to them if she could.

"I dislike how much they constrain me, in movement." Sonya answered honestly enough with a shrug. "Even if with a decently prepared dress I could hide almost anything within the skirt, I still prefer having actual pockets."

The first time he'd seen her in a dress, she had to use his pockets. He acknowledged the point with a tip of his head. "You pull it off well."

"I was trained to do so, like most other Zolotov girls." Dismissed the thief, without so much as considering why he would notice something like that... or maybe just figuring it was a critique and offering the background, so he could appreciate it more. "All of us, from me to Tats to even Lisa, were given ballet training and had high society manners drilled into us over our childhoods."

Renato pondered the distance between the two of them, and slightly regretted picking the farthest seat from her own even if he could keep a better eye on Shamal's dining etiquette from directly across from her.

If figuring out what Sonya thought of girl-thieves being trained for that kind of social sphere was important enough, he'd bring the subject up later and find out then. Unfortunately, or not depending, the thief had hit upon ways to keep him out of a few aspects of her life and mind.

The obvious was specifically not thinking about something, and another was obliquely changing the subject on him in a somewhat related but not really topic.

If that was deliberate or not, he had yet to find out. She was getting pretty good at not thinking about things.

The good side of that developed tick was that even if he did manage to figure her out sometime in the next few years, he'd still never really be able to predict her. Not that he ever had managed that in the first place, but her settling down into a less random behavioral pattern was possible as she was pretty young yet.

Thus, a forever not boring associate and friend of his.

The fact she hadn't changed much but for physically since he met her was going to be ignored.
The bad was that Renato had belatedly realized he had been depending on that trick a bit too much over the last week. It wouldn't always work, Sonya had hit on ways to derail his sketchy mind-reading and that would mean others could do so as well if they knew or suspected what was going on.

His developing range was also probably a bad sign, and if he wanted to keep the ability quiet he really had to get on figuring out something to cover it with.

Which tickled a memory the Sun couldn't really grasp right away.

…before he left Italia the first time, but not quite to the point where he had managed to solve most of his childhood scrapes in favorable ways. Something to do with his once-habit of haunting the back of auditoriums and the back of on-going stage productions.

"…Renato?" Blinking, the hitman yanked his gaze down to the Storm-Cloud trying to get his attention. She didn't really look concerned, but a bit curious. "Are you done? The brat is, I am, and you've not really eaten anything for the last five minutes."

"My apologies, I was trying to remember something." He was mostly finished anyways, merely lingering to ensure Shamal didn't backslide into bad habits like smearing his food over a cheek. "I am, Sonya."

As the thief gathered up the dinner dishes to polish off with the pots and pans waiting on her tiny bit of a counter, the brat dove off for her couch to whittle away the time until she joined him for their newly accustomed 'reading hour'. The hitman lingered in his chair, partly because watching a pretty lady clean up after him was a new thing and partly to think some more without risking Mist-conjured fantasy creatures as Shamal practiced not Constructing what he imagined.

"…Sonya, you were part of the entertainment industry for a bit… maybe you can help me."

"Really? With what?

"I'm trying to remember something I only heard about a decade ago, and when it wasn't what I thought it was I promptly forgot it was a thing." Renato rather hated these little niggling reminders his memory wasn't nearly as sharp as he'd like, but it was part of a one-time incident nearly twelve or thirteen years ago. Writing things down was so much a bad idea in his profession, that left memory only no matter how sketchy it might be. "One of the directors for an acting troupe, he could do something very near to what I could do naturally… just it wasn't. I dismissed it at the time, but… he learned to do that."

"…more detail. Do what?" Sonya waved a bubble encrusted hand in the air, turning her water off in order to start scrubbing. "Do you mean."

"Sonya."

She had eavesdropping Mists that were shameless about keeping an ear out for her, as well as the little brat not more than ten feet from them. Yes, he meant his mind-reading trick which started out as empathy… but he'd really prefer it to remain only between them for now.

She pointedly gave him a deadpan grey stare over one tattooed shoulder. "do you mean something he claimed professionally, as in a skill in reading body language, or just said he was naturally a people-person?

"…the former." He'd apologize later, of course she'd recall they weren't really in private in her own hotel suite.
The thief abandoned the dishes for a moment to study him thoughtfully. "...a thespian? I tried to hold one at... well, pick point... but it didn't really work. Master Liam, the head of the circus troupe I used to work for, was one. He said he could just tell I didn't intend to harm him really, so he wasn't worried when I held a very sharp point to his neck with an implied threat of doing more."

Renato cocked an eyebrow at her in a wordless request for more information.

"An old-school word for a method actor, someone who studies body language and behavioral patterns to the point they can mimic it flawlessly... or read it in another." Continued the thief, in a direction he didn't really ask for but wouldn't argue against getting either. He had yet to figure out if that was just habit or a deflection, or if it was something about the incident that she didn't want to speak of. "I think the word's Greek, honestly, with the tragedies they were known for..."

...a thespian. Acting?

Well... they did put on acts when being caught in places they weren't supposed to be, and even she could put on a role that could fool most civilians and probably a good half of the criminal underworld if she wanted.

The hitman hummed slightly, slouching in his chair and turned the word over in his head now that the niggling little itch was solved.

Apparently his mostly successfully hidden interest in theater was going to probably come to light if he used that to cover his knowing of things he shouldn't.

Now then, to only admit to it when asked or be shameless with it?

...Renato wasn't really one for being embarrassed or playing coy. Blatantly shameless it was, and just look.

He even had a convenient target to point blame at for getting him into the subject if anyone asked.

Itching for his fedora, to pull it down and smirk like the probable bastard he was, the Sun using hitman instead smirked at the back of his 'lady friend' as she started in on the tomato stained pots. "So... the opera. Tonight, supposedly?"

"...sure, just let me ring up Tats so she knows to stay with Shamal and change." Sonya responded absently, as if getting tickets to a likely high-society thing last minute like this would be no great trouble. It probably wasn't for her, for all that she acted like she wasn't anything special when it came to the Russian Mafiya... she was no little minnow in these waters. "Lisa might be willing if Tats is too busy."

Renato didn't know what Timoteo would do when informed the Storm-Cloud thief basically ran the equivalent of the USSR's Mafia School and the Iron Fort's Flame users' orphanage. And that she was meshing them together in order to have less of a headache over it all. Or that the Flame focus stones and matching services were available to be sold if you could afford it, but she hadn't mentioned it to the Vongola Sky or Tyr.

Likely due to the troubles that her brother got caught up in.

...or that it seemed she thought very little on Italia's collective view on Flame users and what they were good for and had pointedly used her own Mists to contradict some of what Shamal had already learned.

Pointedly as in using Usov and one of her Storms to show the brat how much a surprise sucker punch could disorientate someone that thought they could disbelieve a Mist's Constructions through sheer willpower. That a Sun could play his little Mist game, so long as they were determined enough.

To be a fly on the wall for that conversation… oh wait, he'd get a front row seat.

No offence to Nono meant, but he had known Sonya longer and the Sky had fell into the trap of dismissing her as the minor player she portrayed herself as without saying such in any number of words.

It was probably as much just sheer prudence as it was Sonya being just herself, but Renato knew of and had once known less self-disciplined people who would've bragged about holding such a position to anyone trying to pressure or intimidate them.

Renato glanced down at himself, lips twitching as he recalled the Storm-Cloud's first complaint of her very first Vongola Ball. He really only had to go polish up his shoes, and probably pick out a few cufflinks a bit better quality than the cheap pair of dice ones Shamal had scrounged up the money somehow to buy for the hitman's birthday, before he was ready for a night on the town in any circle.

'You look like you usually do' had been the thief's words to him once she had seen what he had been wearing.

Sonya had to go… probably take a shower first, then pick out a dress and the accompanying accessories, get dressed, do her hair and makeup, and then chivvy the brat into either her sister's or her mother's grips.

He could look forward to a few more bitchy complaints over the differences between a dressed-up woman and a dressed-up man.

Maybe he should tease her about how long it took for women to get ready for a night on the town?

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 23rd of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep let himself into Sonya's hotel rooms with the key that had been pressed into the doorjamb.

It wasn't really anything someone not a Cloud could get ahold of, seeing as retrieving it required more muscle than most could afford when being nonchalant and that was only if you knew it was there in the first place.

The body of the key had been dug into the topmost left corner, pressed in via his little sister's strength and really only retrievable if you had just as much yourself, with a tiny tip of the teeth showing over the wood to be gripped or ripped apart if he wasn't careful.

More to the matter at hand, it was something you could only get if you were another Cloud.

Maybe a Mist, amended the stuntman in his head, thinking of Viper's likely reaction to this little 'security' feature.

Two seconds and his best friend would probably have an exact copy to wave under noses and generally be a pain in the ass about how 'flimsy' the trick was… even if most Mists would just opt to ignore something as banal as a locked door to walk through it instead of bothering with a key.
Sonya had not wanted to leave a key out for him, even if he couldn't really say when he'd get into Moscow. Cherep hadn't wanted to risk picking her lock, and maybe getting himself in trouble with anyone watching over her stuff.

Somehow, that resolved into meaning the thief stuck her spare key into a spot it took someone near-inhuman to retrieve.

As they had to play phone tag with Tatiana and the ever-efficient Galina about it over the last few days, the stuntman was just happy his little sister had picked to be considerate instead of stubborn.

Pressing on the last three hours tonight instead of getting a rinky-dink little motel room to crash in and do the last bit in the morning might not have been the best idea… but Viper had a few things to say about the sanitation of those places that he still couldn't get out of his head.

Also… everyone in the family was in Moscow right now, he was a bit late to the party.

He hadn't seen Tatiana since last Christmas, it'd be nice-

"Cherep! How lovely for you to come see us."

...fuck. That tone meant nothing good for him.

The Cloud regarded the Sun lounging on a couch in their little sister's apartment suspiciously for a long moment. "Are you bunking with Sonya too, then?"

"Nope." The nurse gave him a tight little smirk, nudging a blearily blinking Shamal off her lap. The brat basically tipped back over into the warm spot she left behind when she got up to her feet, dragging some knitted purple monstrosity over himself to keep warm. "I got myself a little single a few floors up, I'm just babysitting for the night."

"...mmm not a baby."

"Of course you're not, baby. Nap, I'll wake you when they get back." Tatiana reassured the kid soothingly, brushing the longish strands of wavy brown hair out of their nephew's face. "And now… I've a bone to pick with you, little brother."

"When they get back?" Cherep repeated, instead of asking the obvious question. "Where is Sonya and… uh… what's his name?"

...he really could not remember for the life of him what the guy's name was. He knew who, he'd been a fairly common topic to come up when talking to Sonya about friends or friendly behavior, but aside a letter 'R', being Italian, and a hitman...

The flame-haired Sun nurse gave him the mother of all flat looks. "Nya and tall, dark, and snarky went to go see the opera for the night. I'm giving them the night free of their brat, because the two of them together give me cavities. Now then... exactly why did I have to hear from our adorable if oblivious little sister that you have some Cloud voodoo that might be medical in nature?"

Sighing, the stuntman gestured his older sister to follow him over to the kitchen table. Not that it would give them a lot of privacy, but they might as well be comfortable since the Mist brat was sprawled out over the only other seating available.

It wasn't that he didn't want to tell Tatiana, she was probably the only medical professional he'd trust, but…
"Long, long story short... it has to do with 'before'."

"Before what? Before..." She trailed off as the only 'before' they never discussed with each other occurred to her. "Before you ended up with Lisa and Arseniy."

"Yep." Those weren't good memories.

As the sibling that had the most 'normal' pre-Zolotov childhood, as well as being their older sister, Tatiana had the uncomfortable position of being the 'less damaged' one.

Which, as their older sibling, had to suck some major ass.

The nurse now bit hard on her bottom lip, likely warring between wanting to ask anyways and respecting that 'do not ask' thing that had been in place since they overheard Sonya talking to Arseniy about her situation.

"I only told Sonya what I had to, and most of which she figured out herself..."

She gave him a level stare as she sat across from him. "...but Nya's a vicious little fuck when she gives a damn. I'm not any better, Cherep."

"No, and I can't tell you all of it either." Holding up a finger before she could bite his head off for that, the stuntman could only shrug. "Tats, I don't even know half of what went on. Only what happened near me. Some of which I could only guess the reasons for."

She gave him a look, half sardonic and half already pissed off. "And I still reserve to sic Nya onto whatever detail I can weasel out of you. If not for you, Cherep, then for any other kids who might have come afoul of who you did once they lost you."

...ouch. He hadn't thought of it like that.

Raking a hand through his hair, Cherep gave his older but no less protective sister a slightly frustrated glare. "You're not helping."

She huffed irritably. "I didn't really appreciate hearing about all this from our little sister instead of from you. Nya gets herself checked out every year, she makes her Lackey get a checkup twice a year. That Sun she picked up from fuck knows where has had three since we released him. Realizing you've never had your medical records updated or told me you had it done wasn't a pleasant thing."

"I'm not even twenty yet, Tats!" Wincing, the stuntman lowered his voice to something that wouldn't wake their nephew up from his doze on the couch. "It's not really."

"My father died from a wasting disease at age twenty-two. In front of me." The nurse hissed back viciously. "I will not lose another family member the same way. Suck it up."

Cherep blinked at her, derailed at the sudden history interjection from a side he hadn't expected.

She shrugged faux casually, straightening up in her chair a bit too quickly. "If you're going to tell me some of what happened to you, you can hear of what happened to me. I don't remember my mother, but dad and I were dirt poor and I already half-lived in the orphanage even before he kicked the bucket. His death is my first memory."

...and now he felt like an asshole for his earlier thoughts of her being the 'normal' one.

He could admit he pouted for a moment, being the asshole when not being Skull was a new one for him that he didn't much like, before slouching in his seat. "My parents basically aided and abetted my kidnapping at… five. I think. Might've been four. I don't remember too well now what age I was. Frankly, if Sonya hadn't happened along to make a fuss over it, I might've forgotten what year I was born on and my own birthday."

"It's going to be one of those nights, isn't it?" Asked the nurse, still painfully fake in how casual her tone was.

"That was also after my Dying Will Flame trick came to light… in that I'm practically immortal."

Tatiana stared at him for a long moment. "...if this was that far back, and you know this for a fact, then you had to have…"

"...died in order to know it?" Cherep finished for her without humor. "Yep. Broke my neck falling down a staircase, got up seconds later perfectly fine."

"...fuck. Fuck, no wonder that doc way back when was so pissed." Running a hand over her face, the Sun Flame nurse shoved herself up to her feet to yank open the kitchen cabinets. "Nya's got alcohol somewhere around here… right? There was that bottle we didn't finish…"

"It gets worse." The stuntman informed her back as she searched through a surprisingly large number of cooking utensils.

...what the hell?

He thought Sonya went to Lisa for cooking lessons. Well… the place wasn't burnt down yet, maybe she had gotten better.

"Of course it will. There's what, four? Five? Years between you being a baby midget and when Nya brought you home."

Cherep gaped at her back, having never really thought of it like that before.

...home, huh?

It was, wasn't it?

One where it didn't matter if he left, there was always a spot open for him if he needed a place to crash for a week or two. Where it didn't matter he was gone most of the year, he was welcomed back as easily as he left it.

In the middle of this conversation, it was probably weird to get sappy over that right now.

"A year or so between when she first found you and dragging you back with her, three or four of nasty shit to get through." Finally finding what she was looking for and giving a whisky bottle a similarly considering look as the vodka one in her hand, she grabbed both bottles and came back to the kitchen table. "Here… more for me if you drink this instead."

"I like to taste what I'm drinking." He sniffed faux-snootily, then actually stopped and wondered what Sonya was doing with a half a bottle of whisky.

She, like their elder sister, rather preferred the tasteless vodka if she wanted to get hammered.

Drinking with a friend, maybe?

Ooh… that friend?
Tatiana dug a nail into the wax seal, then wrenched the cork out of the bottle and took a fortifying gulp of the clear industrial solvent within. She paused, then took another long drink of the liquor.

"...okay, regardless of what you have to say." Holding up her finger for a bid of another moment more, the nurse huffed out a sigh. "Please, please get a checkup. Once a year. I'll do it, there's Nya's physician if you'd rather not let me, any number of docs where I work that have to keep their mouths shut no matter what."

"I'm not really comfortable with the thought of letting just anyone poke and prod me, Tats." Putting the bottle of whisky down unopened, the stuntman set his elbows on the table between them for somewhere to set his chin. "You, maybe. I just... I had a hard enough time sitting still for it way back when, and the flashbacks... Now it's even harder because we only have first aid trained medics, so any major injuries have to be looked at by an ever-revolving cast of docs."

The expression that crossed her face was mostly pained and partially bitter. "...Cherep, I like knowing everyone I care about is healthy and happy. It's about as obsessive a Sun tick for me as Nya is Stormy about her books. If you decide I can't do it for you, can you at least try to let Doctor Kappel have a crack at it? For me?"

"You're very different than the people that... well, explored exactly what I couldn't die from, sis."

When that didn't seem to reassure the nurse much at all, Cherep scrambled for more to say. "And, ah... female! Which wasn't... there were no women involved. Back then. I'm... fairly sure you won't... um..."

Deciding silence was the better option, Tatiana's expression went from pained to pissed to depressed in fast order, the stuntman decided to hell with his little sister's friend. He cracked the bottle of whisky open to occupy his mouth with something that wouldn't upset the redhead.

"...I'm not even sure if I want to hear this anymore." She spoke after a few quiet minutes nursing their respective bottles of booze. "I'm still telling Lisa."

Cherep winced.

"And I want to know the limits you know about."

"...fair enough."

"...Nya's stubbed her toe on a few health-related issues." Tatiana continued after another swallow of vodka, slowly as if she was thinking aloud. "Mostly, she nearly killed herself with her Storm-immunity trick. So don't overthink it or anything, it's worked so far, but I want to know exactly how it works and anything you can think of that might harm or help. I only thought of a Cloud nurse for Propagating blood in emergencies, but I really only have a vague clue what you do. Other than Nya's tried it and decided it 'hurts'."

Pausing in his actions to take another sip of the rather decent whisky, he lowered the bottle instead and gave his older sister a sideways look. "What do you mean 'stubbed her toe'? Actually... screw that, when the hell did Sonya have the opportunity to copy my ability?"

She gave him a weird look. "Nya's possible death via Storm Flames doesn't compare to her faking a fix for an injury?"

"Nya's here and well, the brat wouldn't be snoring away in a bid to wait up for her if she wasn't." He'd see for himself in anywhere from a few hours to in the morning, so that could wait. "She didn't
"Our sister broke her foot in front of me and treated it like a fresh bruise. I asked when she became sure she could Propagate blood, and instead learned of your Cloud voodoo and in her opinion it 'hurts'.' Tatiana jabbed a finger at his chest. "I would very much like to know why pain is more important to you than a possible death."

"...because I die anywhere from a few times a year to... more recently, once a year? Death is kind of... not alarming to me. Personally, anyways." Cherep answered pretty honestly with a shrug. "Also, if Nya can copy the ability... no death through violence for either of us."

"...I am sorely tempted to lob my bottle at your head right now." Sighing, the nurse mournfully regarded the low level of liquid in said bottle before finishing it off and going in search of another one.

"Please don't? You might wake the brat up."

Also, might hurt like a bitch to get vodka into head wounds/eyes. Cherep could probably go a few lifetimes without feeling that sensation.

The look Tatiana leveled at him could've curdled milk.
Chapter 63

(Tuesday the 24th of June, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You didn't mention it was a love story."

Sonya stretched out her legs in the room her passenger seat provided, shifting in her not very proper way to an even less respectable position. As in, if Renato wasn't paying more attention to the streets he could probably get a good look down her skimpy red cocktail dress' bodice.

It wasn't deliberate, she just really didn't care if he got a peek because she wasn't focused on what he might be able to see. Getting more comfortable was what she was after, and anything else was just happenstance.

Keeping that in mind was… hard.

"It's a shitty love story. The girl went crazy in the end." The thief spoke absently through a yawn, batting a limp hand to dismiss the facet of the opera they had just watched. "This was nice, though…it's been awhile since I've seen a play."

"I'll take you to some of Italia's once you move and take the brat." The hitman promised her, seriously considering getting her a place near a big city to enable that exact thing.

Half because date nights being a regular thing would be nice, and half because a Mafioso attending the theater because a lady wanted to see it with him was more respectable than a criminal that just liked dramas.

Before this, Renato hadn't figured out if having outside interests in distinctly non-criminal spheres would be damaging or a boost to his reputation. Only the really good managed to survive having quirks that made them slightly predictable or easy to find, especially when they were on their own like him, and he only recently had breathing room to consider taking up a few hobbies as hits became less… challenging overall.

Not to mention if his inclination to frequent the backstage of any production put on struck some other Mafioso as a bit queer, there was the risk they'd try to use that to inconvenience or kill him. To prove a point, or just simply because they didn't find it very respectable for one of their own to be doing.

Criminals could be just as opinionated and as much of an asshole as anyone else. Worse than, sometimes. Renato was no exception, probably was a little worse than the usual... or a lot.

Hiding his 'sudden' interest behind Sonya wouldn't make it magically acceptable for a loose self-made man to be doing on his own, but the fact that there was a girl involved at all would muddy the waters nicely. At least until Renato had enough of a reputation that a weakness or two getting out wouldn't kill him.

Without needing to hide or arm said weaknesses behind a Storm-Cloud's interests.

"I used to go a lot, with Cherep." Said Cloud woman mentioned casually into the amiable silence, shifting again as if she couldn't get comfortable doing more sitting after they just finished near three hours of it in a dark opera house. "Back when... well, before we left home anyways. We'd hit up most everything to kill a few hours, from plays to films and a couple ballets. I think he used to cherish ambitions of becoming an actor... but after that one circus we saw on his birthday with a few motorcycle tricks in it, he decided on stuntman and refused to consider anything else."
"...do the Zolotovs sponsor actors and playing troupes then?" There were any number of things acting skills could be put to, but what in the world did her brother do now?

Renato didn't particularly want to discuss Sonya's brother, but he did have a few absent questions about the man as well as a passing curiosity of what he did aside being another circus performer. As she had mentioned he would be in Moscow either now or later on in the morning, he was sort of resigned to hear about him anyways.

There was also that one lingering question about said purple colored stuntman's Dying Will Flames, which he shared with his little sister. They were both Clouds, somehow.

"No, Cherep's just not a fan of the whole 'criminal' thing." She admitted wryly, pointing another turn out for him.

Apparently, they weren't going back to her hotel right away. Curious as to where she wanted to go, he followed her directions. "Ho? How does that work out then?"

"...surprisingly enough, not as badly as you might think." Sonya took a moment to recall what her brother had once been like compared to how he was more recently. Which meant the hitman got the comparison in more depth than mere words could convey. "I think he got over shying away from that kind of thing for me, really. Which sometimes makes me feel like I don't appreciate him as much as I should. He could've made it a sticking point between us."

That was a thought.

What happened to dual Guardian Prospects when the two entwined Flame users split up for any reason?

Was it like Sky Rejection or becoming Discordant?

Renato frowned as he pondered that, following the next two turns the Storm-Cloud pointed out for him automatically.

Had that 'got over it' been actually just part of her brother's nature to do so, or a Flame instinct kind of thing to adjust for the twinning of his Flames with his sister's?

While thinking on the ramifications of that question, the hitman found himself pulling into a rather understated looking drive set outside a mostly dark building on her directions. "...where are we?"

"Park it here, and don't worry about the keys. Just leave them in the ignition." The thief informed him instead of answer that, snatching up her clutch and already pressing the release for her seatbelt. "After getting dressed up like this, I'm for damn sure going to get the mileage out of it before I take everything off."

"That doesn't... Sonya." Rolling his eyes hard enough to nearly give himself a headache, he followed her directions and also left the car to join her outside of it. "Sonya, that doesn't answer my question."

"Stop asking so many questions then." She huffed at him with a wry little smirk, ensuring she remained far enough out he couldn't pick up any hints from her mind. "After three hours in a theater, and a couple more since dinner, aren't you hungry too?"

Dogging her heels, the fancy silver-plated black leather booted heels she had been wearing since ruining the more practical dark brown leather boots she used to wear until one very bloody night, Renato was all set to question what kind of restaurant set up shop in a building abandoned for the night.
Right on up until he very nearly ran into her back when she turned a corner and stopped sharpish as soon as she was out of his sights.

The ‘bouncer’, another tattooed thug-type that seemed rather inexperienced using her father as a reference, eyed him and then her again. He then reached behind him and unhooked a chain from where it had been barring the way down a flight of steps.

Sonya flounced past him without another look, Renato a bit slower to be sure the man wasn’t about to try stabbing the back of his date for the night.

Down the stairs, and pass another two heavily reinforced doors, led into a smoky lounge-type affair. The Russian that brought him here gave the girl filling in at a podium as the maître d’ a very sharp looking little smirk. "Two, from the Zolotovs."

Wide eyed, the girl blatantly stared for a moment as she almost fumbled for the wine and spirits list set out for the waitresses to give patrons before recovering her nerves and gesturing for the both of them to follow her.

Following suite as the thief did as bid happily enough for her, Renato seriously wondered where the hell they were now. Not civilian in the least, this place.

There were guards posted in full view armed with AK-47s, more than half the visible patrons wouldn’t look out of place in a sleazy bar, and yet it was decked out in fine china and expensive looking décor. Dim and smoky, lit by the candles on the tables and a few muted ceiling lights, a soft jazz-like song played only loud enough to cover the hum of conversations taking place.

Another tick in the box of 'Sonya's a bigger shark in these waters than she acts'. Even as a freelance associate of Nono Vongola’s, he had never warranted an invite to a Mafia hotspot like this. The places where deals and alliances were made or broken over fine wines and whichever hors d'oeuvres were popular at the time, and deliberately kept neutral through hook or by crook.

Renato was rather touched she thought highly enough of him to bring him here. As it was equally possible she just liked the food here, he wasn’t going to let it go to his head.

Not just any mook was allowed in places like these, and Sonya didn’t even have to prove herself to the bouncer outside.

"We have some very good Georgian saperavi, or if you'd like we do have a few bottles of Sovetskoye Shampanskoye in stock."

From the raised eyebrow Sonya gave him as she seated herself, she was apparently leaving the selection of what they were drinking to him. Or possibly questioning if he could drink and then drive safely enough. "A moment, please."

The girl, seemingly expecting that response or highly trained to make it seem like it, bobbed a nod and left the list with them.

"One of us needs to be sober for the drive back, and to be honest I prefer driving at night when all the crazies are off the road."

"I'm fairly sure a glass of something won't kill either of us." Renato informed her patiently, looking over the list curiously and noting which he knew of and which wines he didn't.

This wasn't a dive of a bar, where getting sloshed was the whole point of frequenting it. They, likely, would be eating as well. There was no way in hell a glass or two of wine would knock either of them for a loop, unless there was a non-listed additive.

Or they dumped a measure of vodka into the wines here.

Sonya shrugged lightly, lighting up a cigarette she pulled from a silver little case of them. She gave him a flat look for it but did eventually hand one over when he motioned for one.

"I've not heard of a few of these, so… a recommendation?"

"...the Sovietskoye Shampanskoye is something once only available to the bourgeoisie, and we have some pride in drinking it in their supposed downfall." Admitted the thief sardonically, around the filter placed between her lips. There was a pause as she lit the palm of her hand with Storm Flames to light it, then she flicked a glance back up to him. "Kind of a sparkling wine, more of a champagne instead."

"Well," turning over the provided ashtray so they could utilize it, the hitman leaned back in his own chair to study his dinner partner as he held a bit of Sun Flames to his own cigarette, "what the hell are we eating then?"

"In this place? Nearly anything you might want." The grin she leveled at him from across the table was wicked. "I'm kind of hoping you'll at least stump the cooks, the last time they did a fantastic Shepard's Pie for me."

"Highly tempting… but how long can your sister babysit the brat for us before becoming… disinclined to repeat it?" He was counting her little moue of disappointed thought as a win, even if lingering around for a few hours to let the cooks try to top some of the things Renato could order sounded interesting. "Mind selecting something for us? I'm not particularly picky right now."

"...the last time Arseniy took us here for dinner, Lisa's birthday before Tats left home, she got the shashlik and let us have a taste." Sonya offered slowly after puzzling over his request for a moment. "Lamb skewers, basically."

Well… that explained a bit of what she thought of this place as. Just merely a mafia only restaurant, not as Renato did. Alas… but… this was still someplace he didn't mind frequenting more with her, so it really didn't matter much.

Twitching her fingers in the air got the waitress girl to come back, and the Storm-Cloud ordered for them both in as few words as she could get away with. The poor waitress looked torn between being scared she had done something to offend her and wary of offering another insult, which conversely made his date more snappish with her.

"I think that man was right…" Renato commented lightly after a sip of the sparkling wine, "you need to get out of your territory more."

"I should, but then people cringe from me."

"They're not going to learn to stop doing it if you don't let them become accustomed to you." He pointed out, still trying for a more casual tone rather than something that would truly irk the woman. "I know it irritates you, little dragon lady, but-

His reward was a flat look and a scoff. "Renato. Would you respect someone that basically quails in place every time they see you?"

…no, no he wouldn't. If they cringed from him, they weren't worth the time to notice what they wanted. "Point."
"It doesn't help I get reinforcement for my 'weaklings are stupid' Cloud habits every damn time I go for a walk nowadays." Sonya continued in an honestly bitter tone. "If not from my own clan, then from outsiders that know what I've done recently. Damn near a decade of work on my self-control, and not a damn dent in that 'terrifying Cloud' reputation I never earned myself."

The hitman studied her thoughtfully for a moment, keenly aware there was about four tables worth of people trying to ineptly eavesdrop on them. "You know... we do get worse as we get older. You're about at that age now."

He was more than damn certain she had yet to actually acknowledge that facet of their abilities or knew to what degree 'worse' got.

Without a Sky to 'stabilize' things, all Flame users eventually started embracing their archetypes to even more ridiculous degrees than what they started with.

Renato had a few Sunny impulses he'd rather do happily without, as healing all of Shamal's childhood scrapes would do the brat no favors down the line when he didn't have a Sun Flame using hitman invested in his health nearby. He caught onto it when he thoughtlessly healed Sonya from that hole in her hand on the island.

Normally personal injuries didn't make him so much as bat an eyelash, but his arguably best thief friend wandering around with a significant divot of flesh missing from one palm had suddenly been unacceptable. He'd seen other Mafia ladies with more grievous injuries before that and since, and while he would heal up the lethal shit if asked that incident with her had been a first for demanding to be allowed.

Right on up until the Mist brat had been five heeding that Sun Flame user's impulse was excusable, but now he kept catching himself trying to make excuses to heal the bruises and minor cuts Shamal earned himself fairly. Excuses weren't something Renato allowed himself, so he didn't fall into that trap, but damn if it didn't make him want to gnash his teeth when the brat wandered around with so much as a skinned knee.

"I've had people do everything from faint in my presence to refusing to deal with me in my face." She admitted slowly, now rubbing at a temple tiredly. "Exactly how will that get worse?"

"You'll probably decide you don't mind having the reputation, and deliberately encourage that to weed out the useless you shouldn't bother with."

"...um..."

Renato couldn't suppress the smirk even if he tried, so he didn't bother.

It had been a guess on his end, the fact he was right was amusing as hell. "You already decided to earn it honestly, haven't you?"

Sonya very pointedly did not look him in the eyes as she busied herself with knocking the ash off her cigarette and taking a long swallow of her wine.

He could not wait for her to hit Mafia Land with that new outlook on things. The hitman leaned back, perfectly content to leave the conversation at that while they waited for their food.

Let those idiots that overheard some of that panic over what it would mean, he was going to enjoy the show.

(ooo000ooo)
"Young lady, do you know what time it is?"

"...actually, no. But apparently it's late enough for you to recklessly rush through the last leg of your trip and end up on my couch." Sonya answered Cherep's mostly rhetorical question bemusedly, eyeing the puppy pile going on half situated on his lap and half on said couch. "I thought you told Scruffy 'in the morning', Cherep."

"Technically, I believe it is morning." The stuntman offered easily, absently petting Shamal's hair and wondering if he should wake the kid up. He wasn't touching the head of red, braided hair on his other thigh, but only because he did have a sense of self-preservation.

Obviously, if Tatiana let the kid sleep out here instead of in one of the two beds their little sister had, then there was some 'wait up for mom' thing going on. Somehow moving to the couch once the heavy parts of their conversation was over with meant the nurse and now his nephew were using his thighs as pillows.

Neatly trapping the Cloud in place for the time being, because he was that much of a softy to let them do this to him.

Cherep then blinked at the distinctly familiar man that suddenly loomed over the tiny blonde woman's shoulder and was peering at the same sight curiously. "Oh... you're still here... whoever you are."

...he really only knew he was her friend because of those weird ass sideburns.

Seriously, why were they curly?

Did the man wax them to stay like that?

His little sister blinked at him blankly, then looked up to the man with the weird sideburns behind her and then back to him curiously. "...seriously, Cherep? I've told you his name several times by now."

"I'm hurt, truly." Not remotely sounding like it, the lightly tanned Italian waltzed into the hotel suite and tossed the hat on his head onto a coat rack which also held the stuntman's leather jacket. "I see you finished off my whisky while we were out."

"...Anna's whisky." Sonya amended for him after another moment of taking in his position, finally shutting the door behind her and going back to inspecting the menagerie her fellow Cloud had spread out over himself.

"Want to join?" Cherep asked half-teasingly, expecting her to turn her nose up at the prospective overly long session of touching only to blink when it seemed as if she was seriously considering it.

For the record, he had been joking. His left leg was starting to fall asleep, adding another woman to the slight nephew-weight cutting off his circulation to his right would do him no favors.

He had hoped Sonya's return would free him somewhat, in order to get some horizontal shuteye himself instead of the half-propped up doze thing he managed when the nurse dropped off and stuck him in place.

Although... he wasn't going to say no if she did want to join.
The thief willing to join a cuddle session on her own terms?

Rare.

He'd suffer a bit of pins and needle sensations in the morning for that.

"…sure, just let me change first." She then glanced from the Italian to her brother, then apparently decided leaving them more or less alone in the same room would be fine for a moment.

To the guy's credit, he didn't say anything too sarcastic until she had entered one of the rooms deeper in the suite.

"I take it you're not a fan of me, then?"

"Not in the least." Cherep studied the man intently, then looked down to the brunette kid in his lap. Likely this one was going to be hanging around his sister for a while, and he was the reason Sonya knew of and eventually adopted his nephew… so he supposed he could at least be polite. "I'm a pacifist, after all. Murderous mercenaries aren't my favorite thing in the world."

"How the hell does that even work?" Asked the man, hands in his pockets as he glowered down at the seated stuntman. "You're a Cloud, you-"

"I am a Cloud in my own way, thank you." He cut him off dryly, having heard everything about what 'Clouds' should be like before Viper got used to his Inverted-ness and general lack of all-around territorial aggression. "Quick question, are you dating my little sister?"

"If I am?" Drawled the Italian with the curly sideburns sardonically, hands stuffed in his pockets and looking highly unimpressed with Cherep's expressed brotherly concern.

"…does she know that?" Depressingly, that really did have to be asked.

"Debatable, but more likely not." Giving a one-shouldered shrug as if he wasn't bothered by that, which was rather… interesting, the Mafioso flicked a glance to where Sonya disappeared before returning his attention to him. "Is this the point where you try to threaten me into treating her right?"

"Nya can take care of herself, so… no. You treat her wrong, and she'll likely break you in half before any of us learn of it." Stretching out both arms on the back of the couch he was pretty much pinned to, the immortal stuntman snorted at the narrow gaze he was being treated to. "Besides, I'm a pacifist. I really don't even like harming animals even if they are tasty, why the hell would you think I'd try to threaten you?"

As an added… bonus, or perk or whatever, this man was the reason Sonya found and basically adopted his adorable little shit of a nephew. While Cherep was not really all that comfortable with the other man's job description, even with as little as he knew from just 'Mafioso', he could more or less overlook it as long as he was half-decent personally.

…eventually.

"…smart of you."

"I have morally bankrupt friends to do it for me instead." The stuntman tacked on with a pleasant little grin. "More specifically, I have a Mist I'm really good friends with that probably wouldn't mind making your life a living hell if I paid enough. And for my little sister, I'll empty my savings if I had to."
That narrow gaze widened for a beat, until the man straightened out his expression to something resembling 'neutrally unimpressed'. "Ho? Using others to do your dirty work?"

"I'm an entertainer by trade. I'm not anywhere near your level, and I don't see a point in trying to bluff it for something you could probably poke full of holes anyways."

Cherep might have a few years ago, until he ended up running errands for Arseniy and learned exactly how to act like he belonged to the Mafiya… but this man was an Italian Mafioso.

Slight bit different from USSR vory.

"So, no. I can't do anything against you personally. Even if I wanted to. But I can get someone that is."

"…your older sister was a lot more effective in her threats. Which also included using others to do her dirty work."

"She's also not nearly as nice as me." He informed the Italian dryly, flashing a smile to Sonya as she came back out with two blankets and in something more comfortable to sleep in than a cocktail dress. Pretty though that red dress might be. "So… although I'm aware I've been told this a few times… seriously, what the hell is his name?"

His little sister sighed, spreading the first blanket likely taken from her bed over the still slumbering nurse. "Cherep, this is Renato Sinclair. And isn't this the third time I've told you?"

"Probably." Odd were that he still wouldn't recall it after a few more days without the man around. "But again, he's not really that important for me to remember."

Sonya gifted him with an unimpressed look, before scooping up her brat and nearly doubling the weight keeping the stuntman pinned down on that side.

"…she does the same damn shit with people she dislikes." Sinclair pointed out repressively. "I know what you're doing with that."

"We do share a Flame type." Cherep reminded the man easily, flexing his legs carefully, as not to wake anyone sleeping on him, to help his circulation start moving again. "Although... I really do have to ask... exactly when did you learn I was a Cloud?"

"Vongola are not green, clueless morons. You might not have said anything, but there are ways to learn what type a Flame user is without outright asking."

The stuntman had to give the man that point and take it at face value that there were such ways aside from just guessing. Sonya had apparently known they knew, so… he was more or less safe?

Didn't really mean he had to like it, but something to watch for and see if he could pick that up somehow. "Well... perfect."

Renato eyed the woman who now had Cherep's nephew in her arms, then him, and then he rolled his eyes and stalked away for one of the actual beds.

…asshole.

"Goodnight to you too." Cherep spoke in the air dryly, giving Sonya a smirk when she glanced up at him skeptically. "So... what's new, sis?"
Sonya gave him another highly unimpressed look, snuggling Shamal deeper in her arms. "The fact I'm sleeping on my couch instead of my bed. And didn't you say it was morning?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 24th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...I don't think I like this."

"Hush."

"Yeah, zio, shush." Shamal tacked on right after Tatiana's bid to get him to be quiet, earning himself a tolerantly amused look from the stuntman.

He did not appreciate the overly affectionate hair ruffle Cherep did in revenge for the six-year-old's gumption.

The nurse left them too it and the resulting poke-fight, inspecting Renato overseeing Sonya's efforts in cooking them brunch. The thief was bitching that 'half-cooked eggs are disgusting' to the hitman's preference of sunny-side up for his portion, and he was in return insinuating that at least that she shouldn't be able to screw up.

The blonde gave him a look that screamed 'want to bet on that?'

"It's adorable." Tatiana eventually insisted to her brother, who shot her a wry look over their nephew's head as he forced the kid into a tumble into his lap with a quick surprise tug.

"That's the part I don't like." Countered the other Cloud dryly. "I'm all for Nya learning how to cook edible things, because yes she probably desperately needs the help, but him? Who let him into her kitchen?"

"Mister Renato's a very good cook." Shamal insisted loyally, pouting up at the stuntman from his sprawled position across his legs. "Really, zio."

Faced with an adorable nephew that looked rather hurt at his doubting of his godfather, Cherep pulled a face and let his shoulders slump in defeat. "Yeah okay, sure kid. If you insist."

The Sun slid around to sit properly on the couch instead of rather terribly try to spy on the breakfast making efforts behind them.

The only reason she was more or less getting away with it was because neither were all that interested in what she was doing watching them. "Aww... someone's already wrapped around Shamal's little fingers."

"I happen to like Mists." He insisted, snagging the young one up and wrapping his arms around the kid to take him away from the Sun next to him. Then slouching down as if trying to position himself defensively between the Sun and said young Mist. "Besides, Clouds are basically low-lying Mists anyways. We're two peas of the same pod. If anything, Suns are more damaging to the both of us. We reject you and your criticism, so there."

"Yeah!"

"Get your feet off my coffee table!" Sonya snapped at her fellow Cloud loudly, causing said man to guiltily pull his motorcycle boots off of their little sister's book-covered low table.
Cherep pouted as he straightened up, even as Shamal snickered under his arm. "How the hell does she do that? There's no way she can see over the back of the couch."

"It's a girl-thing." Claimed Tatiana wickedly, smirking at the two wide eyed looks she earned. "The same way I know every time she tries to smoke while talking to me over the phone, or how Lisa always knows what's going on behind her when cooking."

"...how does that explain Arseniy's ability to always duck Lisa swinging a pan at his head when he annoys her?"

Shamal had yet to see such a thing, and his eyes almost popped out of his head. "Really?"

"Arseniy has mad skills, he's also lived with her for decades." Tatiana insisted, but actually… that was a very good question.

How did the vor do that?

"Breakfast, go wash up." Announced the thief cooking shortly, giving her Italian stud an irritable look for whatever crack the nurse missed teasing their brother. "Tats, don't you have your own room somewhere else?"

"Yeah… but… free food." She gave her best innocent look to answer her little sister's highly unimpressed glare.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 24th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Shamal found himself given the entire day to simply do things with his uncle. After the morning lock picking practice, in which the older man joined him for.

"I am a pretty good lockpicker." The stuntman informed his nephew cheerfully as they left the neighborhood nonna Lisa lived in. "Nya's been teaching me in exchange of favors since I was about… a little older than you."

"Does she teach a lot of people?"

"Nope. Just me and you so far."

The Mist set his chin on the crown of the man's head, watching absently as they pass through the semi-crowded residential streets.

Zio Cherep was just as strong as his mamma, and just as willing to abuse it in plain view if he wanted it. He had only half-jokingly asked to ride on his shoulders for wherever they were going to go, but his zio was only too willing to play along with any childish suggestion.

Especially if it earned him an eye roll from his godfather. But… Renato hadn't joined them this morning, so maybe the older brother of his mamma just liked being childish sometimes?

"Where are we going?"

"Here or there. If you've only been around our old stomping grounds, you haven't really seen much of Moscow's side streets then yet, right?" He shifted Shamal slightly as they made a random seeming turn down another street, which seemed less house-ish and more like a tiny corner market. "Point out anything you think is interesting, and we'll go explore. Nya's stuck in an office, and Tats is in the middle of medical things, but at least I can kick around with you randomly. So let's see what there is to see, shall we?"

What he wanted to see?

The six-year-old cast about curiously, but they were still in a heavy housing area and there wasn't yet much to see that wasn't more of the same they already passed. "...um."

The shoulders under him shook lightly as his zio snickered at his failure to articulate anything. "Don't worry about it, it'll take a bit of walking before we get anywhere interesting. So, when you do see something you want to take a look at just say so."

"I can do that."

"You got the height to see everything now, too." Pointed out the stuntman teasingly, making another random turn.

Shamal tugged lightly on the purple strands in his grip, still marveling over how much more he could see at the man's height rather than his own waist height view of the world. "Do you mind?"

"If we minded at all kid, you would've heard about it by now." Cherep informed him cheerfully, pausing a moment to check out a storefront they had almost just passed.

The Mist riding on his shoulders got distracted by their reflection in the windows. Which was likely a common sight when young children were out with adults and the kid got tired but was a pretty new experience for him.

This was not something he'd ever ask of Mister Renato, for one it would crease his godfather's suits and the older Italian hated that happening something fierce... and for another the hitman didn't really do touching. If you surprised him early enough when he wasn't all dressed up for the day it was fine, or if he started it like a bit of roughhousing here or there he'd overlook the damage to his outfit, but other than those rare situations this wouldn't happen even if he begged with a cup of espresso in hand.

Mamma probably wouldn't care much if he asked her, but this wasn't something you were supposed to do with a girl.

Shamal couldn't actually recall if he had once road on his father's shoulders or not. He didn't think so.

"You know..." Zio started thoughtfully from underneath him, turning away from the bank of windows and walking on farther down the sidewalk, "...your mamma is a bitch and a half to shop for."

"What?"

"I have to take what opportunities I have to shop for the family. When I have breaks like this I generally pick up birthday or Christmas presents early. So, the question then becomes 'what the hell do you get a woman that can pretty much get whatever she wants on her own?' As a matter of fact, all the women in this family tend to be really hard to shop for. Lisa's pretty much the same, really. And don't get me started on Tats."

...eep. "When is mamma's birthday?"

The stuntman hummed curiously a moment, only a momentary hitch in his stride at the question. "A few days before New Year's. Why?"

"...I've never gotten mamma a birthday present." Ever, and he got mad at her for not showing up for his even when she had her presents for him left with the Iron Fort's butlers.

He got Mister Renato one each year since he ended up with the hitman, but he never considered his godmother.

"...mmm, don't think Nya rightfully cares much. Not if she hasn't said anything." Huffing, which nearly tipped Shamal off his perch when he wasn't prepared for the sudden moment, Cherep craned his neck around in order to actually see some of the Mist riding on his shoulders. "With her, though, you can't go wrong with pens."

He pulled a face at the older man even if he wouldn't be able to see. Necks weren't that bendy.

"Pens?"

"She likes to have something to write with at hand. I tend to steal her pens sometimes, and occasionally I forget to give them back, so whenever I do I get her a new one for whichever is closest. Her birthday or Christmas. Usually her birthday, which is right before Christmas. See? Halves my problem with getting something for her."

Now apparently, they had a direction, the stuntman started walking with purpose instead of the ambling wander they had been doing before. "But... pens aren't fun."

"Yeah. Boring adult stuff, I guess. Erm... books?" He sounded a bit more hesitant with that suggestion. "...although, keeping up with what she's read or already has a copy with is hard. So... magazines?"

"Still stuffy, zio." Shamal pouted, crossing his arms on the stuntman's head and glowering down the street. "Why do they both have to be hard?"

The man carrying him around laughed at his sullen question. "Because we care, which makes it a hell of a lot harder to shop for them than just someone random person you don't particularly want to please."

That was true. Shamal tugged on his zio's hair as he spotted something, getting the older man to turn slightly. "What about over there?"

"...a stationary store?"

"If you're getting mamma pens, then I'll get her something to write on with them." Except... Shamal had no pocket money.

Not even examples to make Mist copies from, nor had he thought of it before they left nonna's this morning. Then again, he had a zio who had claimed he was going to be shopping while they wandered around. There had to be a way to get him to pay instead.

At least, until mamma taught him to pick pockets for what money he wanted.

"Solid plan." Cherep turned obediently and, after checking the street for any cars, crossed the road to scope out the Mist's find. "Maybe then she'll stop writing on her own skin."

Shamal hadn't noticed, really. She mostly kept to longer sleeves, to hide her 'jewelry weapons', unless there was a reason why she would need to show her tattoos, or she was in 'safe' territory.
Whenever he saw her, she also tended to not be working at the same time.

Mister Renato was never going to be told of that. He had studied and committed his mamma's tattoos to memory in order to reproduce them on a Construct of her but had overlooked anything on her skin lower than them.

He also needed to actually learn more Cyrillic letters and words, too. Both his godparents could read it, and if the writing on his mamma's wrists and hands changed from something understandable to something illegible Renato would question that. His godfather missed nothing, especially if it meant Shamal wasn't quite as good at something as he should be.

Speaking the language only helped so much, knowing how to read it was important too. "...can we get some books too, zio?"

Then man heaved a sigh, swinging him down to the store's floorboards so they both could look instead of Shamal having to look at only what the older man was near. "You really are your mamma's child, aren't you? Yes, we can get a book or two. I figured I'd be buying one or so anyways."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 24th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Can't say I have."

"That's not much of a point, boss lady." Galina remarked idly, half her attention still on updating the new information testing Triad members for their Flame focuses into the records the office held. "You wouldn't recall any syndicate's name unless they've recently pissed you off."

"...you should probably ask Arseniy then, Renato." Sonya did have to give her secretary the point. She could barely recall more than three, discounting the Zolotovs. "Although, I really don't think we have any relations with them."

"We don't, actually." Confirmed the Lightning. Then the woman looked up sharply, eyeing the Italian Mafioso standing in the middle of the office. "Exactly why do you want to know?"

"I'd rather not spark off a turf war when Shamal's in one of the syndicate's territory, especially if I have to drop Sonya's name in order to get the information I need." Renato drawled out sardonically, adjusting his fedora as his eyes slid back to Sonya's. "...I'm going to take the next few days to do a bit of long-range hunting, so don't expect me back at night."

"...fine. You had better say goodbye to the brat." Drumming her fingers on the surface of the desk, she really did wonder if she cared much that he was going to use her as a piece of bait.

Actually, it might be a good thing.

She was pretty sure the reason she didn't get visitors from outside the clan was due to the Grekov Gang and what she did to their thug. The incident that happened right afterwards with the idiots getting arrested and the St. Petersburg gang suspecting the Moscow thieves’ clan of backstabbing had likely not helped anything.

If the hitman kept to only promising she'd hear a few vory out, then she'd actually have an invested reason to not blow them off entirely if anyone was asking for an audience with her. "...I don't actually have a reason to tell you to go lightly with that name dropping, actually."
"...ho?"

"You're the equivalent of free advertising for me right now." She informed him dryly, a sly smirk pulling one side of her lips up. "Feel free to use it as often as you want."

Renato snorted, sweeping his hat off and giving her a kind of half-assed bow with it over his chest. "Well... I certainly won't say no. But... if only to not cut my own bargaining powers from underneath me, I'll keep it to one or two from any syndicates I investigate before leaving."

Studying her friend thoughtfully, she absently accepted whatever file Galina wanted her to look over once the conversation was done but merely held it before her instead of actually peruse. "Can you get back across the Iron Curtain on your own?"

"I'll cheat and take the Mafia Land routes out."

"Scared to attempt it alone?" Insinuated the Lightning wickedly, only to earn an entirely droll look from the man.

"Not hardly. Sonya and I have a standing date to cross the worst point sometime in the future, I'd rather not spoil it for myself before we can get around to it." Flicking his coal black eyes back to the seated Storm-Cloud, the Sun replaced his fedora and nodded to both women. "I'll start tonight, Sonya. After dinner."

"...you're not trying to... avoid my brother, are you?" Sonya didn't really think the two of them would get along well, but she had held out the hope they might be able to get along as she and Viper did.

Content to share acquaintances, and maybe a favor or three, but more or less neutral to each other.

The hitman snorted again as he turned to the door, this time with a lot less humor behind it. "No. But you are running out of beds, Sonya."

"...I'd figured either Cherep would share with me and Shamal, or we'd crawl in with you."

Seriously, the beds in her hotel suite were not small ones. Big enough to hold two or three adults, or at least four kids. Two adults and a child wouldn't even start cramping anyone's personal space.

"Or someone would pick the couch, but it's not nearly as comfortable as the beds."

Galina was staring at her in surprise, which made Sonya slightly confused.

"What?"

The surprise was tucked away, leaving something depressed and slightly amused behind on the other woman's expression. "...nothing. Just... nothing."

"If you're going to climb into my bed, little dragon lady, you had better leave the brat out of it." Renato tossed over his shoulder after a few long seconds of complete silence, actually working on the whole 'leave the office' thing. "...but I've put things off too long as it is. As tempting as you are, I'm badly behind."

...did Renato not like sharing sleeping space with Shamal?

Eh... she was pretty sure that wasn't the case, he'd be a lot more scornful about her letting the kid sleep with her if that was true. He did question it, but she was at least half sure he had allowed it back when the brat was three.

Excuse her, three and a half.

Shamal wouldn't have ended up bawling into her stomach that morning in Mafia Land had the hitman been entirely against the brat infringing on his privacy or personal space like that.

Sonya tapped her pen on the desk a few times, belatedly recalling that Galina had given her something to look over when the paper got in the way of her playing with the writing utensil. "… what is this?"

"The missing Rain information young Larion finally got us." Hesitating, the Lightning looked from the doorway an Italian hitman had wandered through then to her questioningly. "Sonya… I have to ask, do you know what you're doing with that man?"

Sighing heavily, the thief tossed her a slightly disgruntled look. "Yes, Galina, I do know. Thank you."

She did and could make friends. Even keep them with some reliability. Cherep was an example of how well she could do it if she was invested enough. Renato had been a friend for damn near a decade now.

Really, Sonya wasn't that dense.

"…if you're sure, boss lady."

(ooo000000)

(Tuesday the 24th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…so, he's gone. Right?"

"Yes, Cherep, Renato left to get on with his work." Sonya repeated for the third time that night, dropping the book held in one hand down because she highly doubted she'd get any reading done tonight.

As if it wasn't obvious by the fact the two of them agreed to meet back up in Vongola's Iron Fort on a specific Sunday to drop the brat off for school before he left with his suitcase after dinner, or that said brat was now moping with them lacking a hitman lounging on the other end of the couch.

It was also the only reason she got out of cooking this night too, the asshole she called a friend was a fucking taskmaster when it came to 'giving tips'. Actual lessons would've been less irritating than him looming over a shoulder while she tried to figure out how to not screw up her next dish.

Sonya had been seriously tempted to punch or flick the man in revenge, but she was still highly wary of actually harming someone she didn't intend to still. Maybe not yet, and pending a test or two against her brother, who was fast becoming annoying about his aversion to Renato.

She could understand Cherep didn't like murder as a matter of course, but… Viper probably wasn't much safer or as polite about things. The thief even managed to get along with the damn Mist, the very least he could pretend to return the favor.

For fuck's sake neither she nor Tatiana, or for that matter Arseniy, were particularly innocent criminals that stuck to the lighter fare. Then there was that little incident late last week that she still... didn't want to tell her brother about…

Shamal tightened his hold around her waist, burrowing deeper into the knitted blanket and her stomach. Either because he was that depressed that his godfather had to go back to work or just for the extra warmth.

Shooting her brother a stern look got the man to change the subject in a fast hurry.

"So… you didn't really miss much with the classes you cut out on back in West Germany."

Much better topic, in Sonya's opinion. "Did you have any trouble with the instructors after I left?"

"Naw, told them it was a family emergency and you were fully aware you wouldn't be getting the class fees back."

She sniffed in disgust. Money really did make the world go around, didn't it?

Shamal dug his pointed chin into the bottom of her sternum, peering up at her through the hem of the blanket. "What classes?"

"…classes to drive those really big shipping trucks on the roads." Sonya admitted easily enough, hoping this might distract the kid from his mope. "Cherep and I took them not too long ago, after the second time I had to drive one around in my work."

"You can drive one?"

"I'm thinking about getting one, and the trailer attachment, myself." Offered the stuntman, draping himself over the back of the couch she and the kid were sprawled out on like an oversized and purple cat. "And… I'm the only one that finished the course and got my license to drive a Class C lorry in Europe."

Sonya placed a hand on Shamal's terribly messy hair to let her speak before the kid demanded another answer. "As in…?"

"As in I want to build a living apartment in the trailer and simply live out of that." Cherep clarified for her, grinning as the Mist brat finally peeled himself out of the blanket and his sulk just to give him a weird look. "I live on the road kid, this way…? I can live in style on the road instead of out of hotels and shit."

"Can you afford that? The insurance alone…"

"Eh… yeah, that…" Scratching a hand through his messy purple hair, the stuntman pointedly did not look at his fellow Cloud. "…probably won't bother, honestly. Not until I have more operating funds. I barely can afford another semi-decent bike right now, and after this next year…"

"…what's happening this next year?"

There was a pause.

"…before you say anything, I did check this out… and mentioned it to Vipes so if anything is rotten they'll probably tell me before it kicks off." With that entirely not reassuring statement out of the way, her brother flashed her a brightly cheerful grin that was a touch wary. "I was invited to do a world tour, as Skull de Mort the stuntman. So… I'm taking a break from the circus for a year. Master Liam said it was okay, and I still have a spot with them the year after."
"No, I just have criminally inclined friends and family that I knew would ask if I checked it and didn't feel like suffering through a lecture about being too trusting times five or six times. The guy's on the up, no criminal records and no criminal connections that I could find." Cherep grinned with good humor, so she supposed he wasn't that annoyed with the likely reaction they would've had if he had just went along with someone else’s suggestions without so much as a suspicious thought of 'why' asked. "I'm going to be part of a group on a less European tour than my usual, sort of a variety show kind of thing. But... it's a break into going solo. This is a good thing, sis."

Sonya frowned, but frankly she had little but the vaguest idea how the world of show business operated. If it wasn't criminally inclined, she had less than a firm idea how any other lifestyle went. "...I'll take your word for it. Viper knows?"

"Yes, Viper knows." Confirmed the stuntman wryly. "Frankly, they asked for more detail that you have so far."

"...do me a favor." She asked instead of comment on all the sudden suspicions she had over his 'lucky break'. One had to hope Cherep knew what he was doing, and if it was a good thing or not. She wasn't going to be trying to argue.

This was the point of him going into the entertainment industry, getting well-known or at least popular enough no syndicate would want to risk murder or kidnapping him due to all the civilian and law enforcement attention it would draw. In that light, this was a step forward.

He gave her a steady look for a long moment, but eventually nodded. "Sure?"

"Take Viper with you to read over whatever contract you're to sign. You're a communist stuntman, I don't think you know what you should be paid in capitalist countries and since this is a world tour... I sure as hell don't, but Viper would know."

"...that's... actually... a... very good idea." Cherep admitted after blinking at her a few times, setting his chin on his crossed arms propped on the back of the couch. "...but I don't think I should charge that much. The man's kind of doing me a favor-"

"Cherep." She interrupted exasperatedly, loosening a hand from where it was pinned between the pages of the book she really wasn't reading to point in his face. "Take it from the professional thief. Part of what makes things special or desirable is how much is charged in order to see or own it. Some of the crap I steal is as ugly as sin, but since it's rare or expensive idiots want them. Do your homework, and maybe ensure Viper doesn't go overboard, but for fuck's sake... don't settle for the lowest example you have to work with."

"But I don't need that much." Argued the stuntman, pulling himself upright fully in order to wave around his hands in protest. "I do my own mechanic work, buy my own bikes, I do my own choreography, there's even the whole..."

Both siblings then looked down at Shamal, who curiously looked up and tried to stealthily redo the two buttons of the thief's shirt he had loosened out of what was probably boredom.

"...what?"

"Family secret." Cherep informed him brightly, holding a finger to his lips as he bent over the back of the couch again. "This part you can't tell your fellow Italians, kid. You can brag about everything else, pretty sure your mamma won't care, just not this part."

"What part?" Asked the Mist curiously, frowning slightly as he dug his knees into Sonya's thighs in order to sit up and look fully at the older man. "And I can still tell Mister Renato, right?"

It also dragged the blanket down to around her knees, which… fuck. Her apartment got cold at night. It was the whole reason she made off with the damn blanket in the first place.

"Honestly? I'd rather you didn't. If you don't think you can do that, we can pick this up later."

Shamal gave a wide-eyed look to her, and the Storm-Cloud sighed. "It's his secret, kid. What he says goes about this one."

The brat drew himself up with an almost-insulted air about him but sighed and furrowed his brows in the next second when neither of them so much as blinked at him strangely. Cherep looked at her, but all the thief could do was shrug.

He'd know if he was willing to go along with that or not. Renato learning through Shamal's stray thoughts was a concern, because if anyone would take that undying Cloud skill as a challenge it was a hitman or an assassin… but she was also half-convinced the Mafioso would keep it to himself now.

Hopefully. She was still keeping Renato's secrets, and she couldn't tell her brother them for the reason why the brat shouldn't be told. Maybe she should make a point of mentioning the kid got something family related while the hitman was gone… and that she would greatly appreciate it if it would remain between family only.

The Italian had no great like for her brother, but her…?

Again, hopefully. Especially if she made mention that his hidden skill was the whole reason why he'd be learning about her fellow Cloud's since she couldn't warn either about it as a reason why not to share Cherep's.

"...I won't tell anyone, zio." Shamal decided firmly, a flicker of something indigo passing through his normally brown eyes as he all but glared up at the older man. "You're family."

He earned himself both a wryly amused grin, likely for the near-pout on his face, and a hair-ruffle that made the thief sigh in despair over his already unruly hair getting worse. They would have to brush it out before bed tonight at this rate.

"Good to hear, kid. So... the great big secret is..."

Leaning forward curiously in the first moment, the Mist picked up on him getting teased pretty quick when the silence stretched longer than any unintentional dramatic pause would. "...is?"

Cherep practically bent in half to bring the two of them nearly nose to nose. "...is..."

Another too-long pause occurred, earning him a flat look from the kid balanced on her thighs.

Sonya manifested an ax in her hand, pointing it in her brother's face. "I swear to hell, you rile him up you can sleep with the brat tonight."

Snickering at her mostly fang-less threat, the stuntman shrugged at her and looked back to the Mist. "...is, that I'm immortal."
Shamal blinked blankly at him, then shot her a highly skeptical look. The Storm-Cloud just sighed yet again.

Why were the two of them so damn dramatic?

"...wait, really?" Whipping back around to the immortal in question, the kid narrowed his eyes. "...you're pulling my leg, right?"

"...unfortunately, no." Sonya answered for her brother wryly, who just kept grinning. "I've actually seen it happen, Shamal. Cherep can't die from any physical injury."

"And from ingesting poisonous substances, don't ask how that was found out." The Cloud tacked on for himself, something wry and bitter touching his expression. "Or the whole 'immune to physical damage' thing. Just know... even if something happens to everyone else in this family... I'll always be here, kid."

As the young boy looked completely poleaxed and not up to further conversation, the older man looked back at her. "Continuing, I'm not going to need health insurance either. Or life insurance. I have less costs overall, shouldn't I then charge less?"

"If you don't charge as much or around what other stuntmen would charge, it looks suspicious. Like you're cutting corners to be that cheap, or that something's shady." She countered irritably, tugging Shamal back down. The kid went without protest, which also let her tug the blanket back up over them both to help cover her chilly belly. "In that eventuality, then use the extra you don't really need to build up a fund for your next bike. Which is part of what insurance is for, replacing things lost in accidents. Like your bikes."

Cherep mulled that over for a few seconds, adopting a 'thinking pose' to dig the conversation out of the heavy atmosphere. "...I could, but... the guy might think I am cheaper because I'm a Soviet citizen. So... I think a compromise. Not nearly as much as other stuntmen, at least this time around, but not enough to be 'cheap'."

"You need that money to continue touring around on your own where you want to go... and for that lorry and trailer you want." Sonya pointed out ruthlessly, smirking at the flat look she was gifted with. "Be nice later, when you can afford it. Right now, I still vote for you to borrow Viper for a day as your agent."

"...an agent isn't a bad idea. But Vipes? That's just cruel, Nya."

"While there's still a risk of mafia involvement, I'd rather you be safer than sorry." Shamal tugged at her shirt, making her glance down at him. "What's up, brat?"

"...if zio can't be killed... then why be so careful?"

"I can still be taken hostage or imprisoned, kid." Cherep answered for himself, with another of his faintly bitter smirks. "Part of the reason why I know how to pick locks now."

"Never believe it when someone tries to tell you he's dead." Sonya tacked on, tugging a hank of his wavy brown hair absently. "It will never be true. So far as we know."

"Speaking of, Tats said you tried it."

"...I am fairly certain I failed." She admitted slowly after recalling the incident in question. "I mean to copy Cherep's Cloud ability, Shamal. It was... extremely painful. Like taking sandpaper to the injury."
The stuntman scratched at his barely-there stubble sheepishly. "...actually, that sounds about right. Hurts like a bitch, but that way you remember you are injured. Keep it up until it fades, and then... maybe a week or two more? That's a sign at least the flesh around the injury was finally replaced with natural cells."

"I forgot about it, then I bled all over things." Sonya protested, feeling the palm of her right hand itch as she recalled the sensation only now dulled with time. "I couldn't keep it up."

"Neither could I, in the beginning." Admitted her fellow Cloud bluntly, rolling his left shoulder almost gingerly. "It just... takes a bit more stubbornness to not be injured, little sister."

Shamal turned wide brown eyes up at her, and the thief managed a sickly feeling smile. "If I learn it, kid... then you won't have to fear you'll lose me too."

...but she was not happy to hear she had been on the right track. How high was Cherep's pain tolerance, to even so much as consider a career that had as much chance for crippling or deadly injuries as stuntman?

To re-experience that kind of pain and then dismiss it as inconsequential?

"Cherep, idle question."

"What?"

"...how did you get up here? You crashed your bike so I'm certain you didn't drive up here..."

Her fellow Cloud beamed at her. "I hitchhiked."

Sonya tossed one of her throw pillows in his face irritably. "The fuck, Cherep? That's not safe-"

"I'm still alive and with everything still safely with me, obviously it is." The idiot then handed over the little cushion thoughtlessly, which just meant the thief had something else soft and possibly not-lethal to throw at him.

(Wednesday the 25th of June, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"You again? I'm not-"

Renato shot the man through the kneecap without so much as a word of greeting, stepping over to the lamed vor lightly as the other patrons of this little dive-bar suddenly decided they wanted to drink elsewhere. "I'm no longer a guest of the Zolotovs, so I no longer care what you will or won't help them with."

Placing the barrel of his gun against the pale bartender's forehead, the hitman shot him a dark smirk. "Now... now I'm asking as a hitman looking for my target. You know what question I want answered. Either talk or die."

Bloodless lips peeled back from stained yellow teeth as the lamed man sneered back defiantly. "Fuck you."

"Now, now... that's very rude." Drawled the Sun sardonically, pressing the gun harder into clammy skin. "I'm one of two Sun Flame users that could possibly fix that knee in Russia right now. And I leave in a few days. Tatiana is the sister of a dear friend, and she'll be less than cooperative if you try asking her."

The man froze.

Renato let him think.

He was well aware vory would just be as pessimistic over physical injuries as any other criminal but being able to fix the damage he did opened up a very interesting method of interrogation for any decent Sun Flame user. Torture against hardened criminals would get him nowhere fast, taking away and then giving back one's ability to walk or use their hands was a different situation entirely.

He had six names to check out before he left Moscow, six of the most likely culprits he was to hunt down for the Cerrito Crime Family as well as for Nono Vongola. If none of them checked out, he'd move on to the less likely names.

All fifteen of them, which he had either confirmed as still alive or hadn't been able to rule out as safely deceased being 'gentle'. In the three days he was giving himself, before going back to Mafia Land to take a few hits to keep in good standing and keep his apartment on the island.

Putting it shortly, Renato had little time and a lot of information to go through. Being gentle now that he wasn't a guest of a local target would either get him more of the same or less information than merely asking had gotten him this past week.

If this didn't pan out, he'd start in on the other end. Combing through airline records in hopes it wasn't a Mafia Land operation. Security feeds, hotel guest books, and the old-fashioned leg-work he had been hoping to cut out via Sonya's connections after that.

Renato grabbed the barstool the vor tried to stealthily grip in order to fight with his offhand, putting a bullet between the unhelpful bartender's head since his answer was an unsurprising 'no'. Easing the hammer down again and putting the gun away, he ensured there was enough Sun Flames in the hand holding the metal barstool to melt off anything he didn't want to leave behind before tossing it away.

He did take the time to select a few bottles of liquor from the bar shelf, including a bottle of vodka with a label he was pretty sure Sonya rather liked. Some whisky for himself, and an interestingly dusty bottle of brandy for Timoteo Vongola that sat higher than the rest of the more 'popular' seeming bottles.

Then, since he could already hear the sirens as the police were belatedly alerted to the murder, waltzed out the back door of the bar for his next target and put the liquor into his suitcase to free up his offhand arm again.

Hopefully Sonya wouldn't mind he was off possibly killing a few semi-aligned freelancers. He'd be actually putting effort into the syndicate aligned ones, but the small-fry being irritably uncooperative was just... annoying.

Hmm... should he bother getting any more souvenirs?

The hitman was fairly sure that only a handful of non-Soviet criminals tried to work or visit the USSR, and having proof was all sorts of fun to have on hand when doubt was expressed.

The brandy was a consolation prize, mostly. For when he dropped what information Renato would be willing to tell the Ninth Sky of Vongola about his surprisingly 'not-small-fry' Russian contact he pissed off.
…damn, should he go straight back to Italia first?

Or leave it for when the brat was back and could confirm a few things in his own Misty ways?
Arseniy gave her a blearily kind of glare over his morning paper. "Someone just took out that informant jackass on Konstantina Tsareva."

"...that's nice?" Sonya answered warily, wondering what the vor was doing up at this hour and what that subject had to do with her.

Other than actually seeing Cherep this morning instead of sleeping through the early morning lock picking practice. Her foster father had been up for the morning hours more this last month than she recalled him doing way back when she and her siblings had been all living in the same house together.

"Likely," Lisa offered when it became apparent the blonde woman had no blessed clue what the issue was, "its Sinclair doing it. We have enough information to at least tentatively confirm he was in the same area at the time. Isn't he still holed up with you and Shamal?"

"No? Renato's here for business too, he left yesterday to get on it without dragging the clan into his work." Shamal looked rather grouchy at the reminder, and Cherep ruffling his hair only earned him a dirty look. "We… might see him at the end of the week, on Sunday. But I'm not counting on that. Moscow's a big city, and it's possible the person he's looking for didn't come from here but another of the USSR's cities."

"...so, he's freelance now?" Her foster mother checked in surprise, looking thoughtful when she nodded confirmation. "We had wondered if you sent him off to do that."

"Why?" Frankly, Sonya couldn't really recall who the informant guy on Konstantina Tsareva was, or even what he looked like. Even what it was he traded information for. Way too far south for her to have bothered. "Renato's a hitman, and friend or not I have no desire to get in his way. Unless it's another Zolotov he's after, but..."

"We'd take care of that." Arseniy grumped, folding the paper with a quiet rustle as his lover started transferring full plates of breakfast to the kitchen table. "Otherwise there's the hope he wouldn't act against your syndicate, right?"

She was aided by the visiting stuntman, who pulled an unseen face behind their foster father for the 'shop talk' going on. Cherep slid a plate before both Sonya and Shamal, before snatching up his own and Lisa's while she was still fussing with Valera's plate of bite-sized pieces.

"Pretty much, Arseniy… ever think of becoming a barista, Cherep?"

"Oh ha, ha. No." Scoffed her fellow Cloud, stealing the syrup from under Arseniy's hands to first pour over Shamal's pancakes then his own. "I like people, true… but if I wasn't allowed to be an asshole back when I want to..."

"Children, plans?" Lisa asked of them lightly, nudging a mug of milk closer to her son's reach and earning herself an exasperated look from the youngest Cloud in the room. "I know most of what Nya's up to, or what she should be up to, but you Cherep?"
"...it's my vacation. A whole lot of nothing but lazing around and twiddling my thumbs. Probably going to hit up the circus and do a little research into... uh, the information they might have if I'm bored enough." Claimed the stuntman airily, waving a fork as if to make a point. "That is, if Sonya is going to be mean and keep Shamal all to herself for what time I have free."

Sonya quickly stole her godson out of his seat, shifting his plate closer so he could still eat off it even relocated half a foot over. The Mist blinked at the abrupt change in seating, but basically shrugged and kept stuffing his face with strawberry syrup covered pancakes.

"Mine."

Valera growled irritably, sourly eyeing the interloper who decided to flatly ignore him in return.

"...but... but Nya! Please?" Batting suspiciously shiny purple eyes at her, Cherep tried to sneak a hand to Shamal's shirt in order to steal him back to either his original seat or to his own lap.

He retracted his hand pretty damn fast when Sonya nearly stabbed his hand with her own fork. Slowly so he could avoid the pain, but still speedily enough he almost overbalanced backwards and nearly fell out of his chair.

"Children. Behave." Instructed their mother sternly, eyeing them both severely until the thief reclaimed her utensil from the wood of the table. "Shouldn't Shamal decide who to spend time with?"

Said Mist brat looked startled to be dragged into the discussion, giving first Lisa then Sonya a wide-eyed stare. Then he overstuffed his mouth in order to make no such decisions that would force him to verbalize a pick between the Cloud siblings.

Cherep cracked up, nearly face-planting into his scrambled eggs with the force of his laugh.

Sighing, the thief poked a ballooning cheek absently. "Small bites, and chew your food, Shamal. I believe Renato told you not to do that anymore. And I mostly have to get back to actually working instead of just absent overseeing, so a few times a week I'd appreciate it if you went with your zio or zia for the day instead of spending it with me or the Mists. Or Scruffy."

"...Scruffy?" Questioned the stuntman curiously. "I... don't think I met someone by that name."

"I picked him up this year, you had already long left with the circus by then." Admitted his fellow Cloud slowly. "Tats has met him, if you come into the office real quick for a few things I need your help with you can meet him before you leave."

"Huh..."

"I don't have to pick, right?" Shamal questioned from her lap, having finally swallowed his oversized bite with a generous sip of milk to help.

"No... we were just teasing, kid."

Sonya huffed into the Mist's already disordered hair. "Cherep's right, brat. It would help if you wanted to spend time with your zio or zia this week, but I won't say no if you pick a quiet day and spend it with me in my office. Just be aware, this week I have several boring-ass meetings to attend and a whole slew of people to talk to. Comparatively for my usual work week, anyways."

That way, she could hopefully avoid another 'I don't want to' fit without Renato nearby. She wasn't entirely certain how well she might be able to handle it, so avoiding the triggers was her plan.
Not even she could dedicate weeks on end to the same study, so expecting Shamal to do so would be hypocritical of her.

"You put things off for nearly two months, you shouldn't be that surprised." Lisa chimed in peaceably while neatly nibbling on her cheese coated toast, the same she had served her daughter instead of the sweeter pastries she whipped up for the menfolk. "Things do build up when you don't pay attention to them."

"Things build up even when I stare at it dead in the face, Lisa." She countered, not huffily but at least with a measure of exasperation.

Cherep waved a fork at her until he managed to swallow his latest mouthful. "That's also life, little sis."

"Eat, Nya." Lisa instructed firmly, as while they might have the lightest breakfast options the thief was still behind the older Russian woman in clearing her plate. "Your worries will still be there afterwards, but at least then you'll have a meal under your belt before having to try to manage them."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 26th of June, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"So... you're Scruffy?"

Said nicknamed Sun looked up skeptically after a moment taken to be sure he didn't know the voice addressing him, taking in the violently purple colored younger man dressed in jeans and a plain black tee shirt standing as bold as brass in his underboss' office for a quiet moment.

"...yes?"

"Is that really your name?" The man questioned uncertainty, looking slightly awkward. Hands stuffed in his jeans' pockets and actually looking at him instead of Sonya or glaring made this newcomer a step above the usual interactions Peter got with other Zolotovs. "I mean... if that's what you want to be called I'm all for using it... but that's a weird name."

"You have no room to say such a thing." His usually bland boss snapped at the guy, impatiently rounding the other and leaving Shamal on his own next to him without so much as a second look back in spite of her tone.

...so, obviously someone he had yet to be introduced to but that she honestly trusted more than even the other Zolotov thieves or vory of the clan. Maybe even more than Galina.

Sonya wasn't nearly as disinterested in what he was up to as the Lightning woman's actions. Not even as stubbornly neutral as even Usov still got, near about the same level of pure passive curiosity as Shamal earned just by existing.

"...I picked Peter. Sonya decided on Scruffy as a nickname before that, though. Nurse Tatiana picked McScruffy and that ended up my surname somehow." Absently rolling his battered but still his pen through his fingers, and dimly resigning himself somehow to the fact he was still the oldest person in the room, Peter shot the tiny blonde woman a questioning look. "Can I ask who this is?"

"...oh, right." The icy blonde waved a hand at the interloper easily enough, without any hint of irritation or aggression or badly hidden impatience for either his asking or the other's lingering presence. "Scruffy, my brother Cherep. Cherep, this is Peter McScruffy… he's a Sun user."

Shooting this new man a quick glance again, said Sun frowned and wondered where he fit into this syndicate. One sister was a criminal medic, the younger was a thief of a researcher, but what did the brother do?

"…hello?"

He got a blindingly bright grin back from the apparently very affable and cheerful man, one hand slipping loose of his pockets to shake his own briskly. "Why hello yourself. How'd you end up here?"

"He protested me saving his life, by not appreciating the fact I wouldn't let him run out in front of a firing squad."

"Boss lady, it was a fair bit more involved than just that." Peter protested tiredly, scrubbing a hand through silver-touched blond curls as the Mist brat crawled up on the couch next to him for their semi-usual game hour. "I protested the fact you only saved me, and then were about to leave me there."

Sonya batted a limp wrist dismissively as she started to look over the pile of work that had built up over the last month, but the correction earned him more curious attention from the new man.

"She did? That's... awesome." 'Cherep' gave his sister a proud look. "Really, Nya?"

"...we were held in the same Sierra Leone jail cell. It was just a matter of convenience… and a bit about a diamond he can use."

"And let about twenty locals test their own luck against said firing squad." The Sun added dryly, but not nearly as sarcastically as he might have a few months ago.

He'd gotten over it after several nightmares and a cringe-inducing sensation of guilt arising every time he thought of it, and she frankly didn't care about it so bringing it up netted him nothing but the possibility of irritating her.

"Why do you keep dismissing that part?"

"I have no care for it. Said locals left us behind." She snapped back quickly, sorting her work into three piles neatly and starting in on the biggest one by picking up the topmost page and eyeing the words printed on suspiciously. "If they did not wish to be cautious, then they fully deserve what they found once they took advantage of the hole you started and I finished."

Flicking purple eyes between her and him, his boss' brother scratched idly at his clean-shaven jawline. "Frankly, the fact she rescued you at all is pretty damn impressive. For... someone like... well, us. I mean I'm one too, but I'm Inverted so what I would've done and what a Classical Cloud would've done is pretty damn far apart. Seriously speaking, you are here which is probably better than you would've gotten with just about anyone else like her."

"I made her. By basically yelling at her that she couldn't leave me in a foreign city and country after busting us both out of jail." Admitted Peter sourly, wondering if he had just asked... would she have done the same for the others before they ran out to be mowed down by gunfire? "It wasn't entirely her idea."

"Do you really think you can make Nya do anything she doesn't want to do?" Countered Cherep with a smirk, gesturing to both himself and the office in general with a broad sweep of a hand. "You're standing here, I'm still going to take that as a good thing regardless whatever else happened."

Scruffy almost, almost made the mistake of asking what he thought of his sister's latest activities… but the glare he got behind Cherep's back had him holding his tongue.

"...I have a good twenty more stones I need you to check," Sonya forcibly changed the subject with, scooping out a tiny list of things compared to what she had waiting for her from one desk drawer, "see if these really are Cloud stones and not just Storm-Cloud compatible."

"Will do." His boss' brother examined his to-do list for only a few seconds before folding it up and tucking it away in one of his leather jacket's pockets. "Galina still working as the gatekeeper for them?"

"I can get you in there, if you don't mind waiting a few hours." She gestured to the pending stacks of her own work. "I've got a meeting with the Pahkan and a few other things to deal with."

"...Nya, did you blow him off?"

"...maybe." Admitted the thief after a very long moment of silence. "Only for the last few days or so..."

Shamal snickered into a hand next to him, reminding Scruffy after a guilty start that the kid was still rather patiently waiting for him to get with the program and pay attention so they could have their game today.

Cherep, who was apparently another 'Cloud' type, cocked his head to the side. Sonya merely gave a listless kind of shrug, not a dismissive or an irritable one but not remotely as absent-minded as she tended to be when not against a particular activity going on around or near her.

As far as he knew it… she really only came in 'not interested', 'could care less', 'annoyed', 'irritable', 'argumentative', 'pissed off', and now 'spoiling her baby' modes.

Simple, but dangerous and full of pitfalls to trip the unwary.

The purple man rocked back on his heels thoughtfully. "Huh."

"A year. Arseniy asked for that much." She sighed heavily through her nose, then dropped the pages she really wasn't reading just yet. "Then... it'll just be the parents, Tats, and Valera here. I'm moving somewhere in Italy. Preferably northern Italy, if I can swing that."

Scruffy blinked, then blinked again.

She was leaving?

That was... news to him.

What did that mean for him?

He... honestly, did not want to change 'overseers' if he didn't have to. The Sun had only just recently found something to do, something productive and entirely on his own. Uprooting all that would... be an entirely bitter step backwards into aimlessness.

...he was getting paid by her for both his work and living expenses, it was possible that he was going to be going with her and not be left behind.

Peter honestly wouldn't mind leaving the USSR for someplace warmer. Both environmentally and socially. Possibly somewhere less controlled as well. While the vory and others that hailed to this clan were… not dismissive but pessimistic was a good term, pessimistic to the fact they were under a lot of scrutiny from the KGB he had no such outlook to the same scrutiny.

He couldn't-

"McScruffy… pay attention already." Shamal poked him rather rudely in the thigh, their game-table already Constructed, and the young Mist seemed to be getting a bit impatient with his absent wool gathering moments.

"Yeah… that is a question." Cherep jerked a thumb at him, looking to his sister. "What's going to happen to him if you bolt? I mean… he's not Russian. Kind of sticks out like a sore thumb here."

"Obviously, Scruffy is going where I am. I refuse to leave him, or anything I don't have to, here." Sonya answered with a measure of exasperation, not even looking up from glancing over her pending work.

"…did you tell him that? Or you know… even ask if he'd like to?"

The icy little blonde woman gifted her brother with a flat look, then flicked those grey eyes to him. She then turned fully to face him, giving him frankly more attention from her than he wanted to be on the receiving end of if he wasn't building up more goodwill with her. "…Scruffy, would you like to-"

"Oh, hell yes. Any way it can be sooner?" Italy, not Russia.

Mediterranean weather compared to this?

This entirely too tepid summer thing going on?

Peter had been around other sub-tundra areas before ending up in Africa, he knew the signs of impending and truly terrible winters to suffer through.

…speaking of, he might want to start stocking up on warmer clothing. He could always donate or sell what he didn't need to take with him to another country, but in order to not lose fingers or toes to frostbite in as little as another few months he really should locate better quality socks and gloves. Maybe a furry hat or two.

Smirking slightly, the thief turned back to her fellow Cloud to see if he had anything else to add.

He wagged a finger in her face, seemingly more amused than exasperated. "Asking is a thing. A polite thing. Some-"

"Cherep, I found an aikido master. If it works out, the arrangement and meeting thing I've yet to do because it'll take place this fall, would you at least consent to meeting the instructor and possibly learning this winter?"

Cherep, having been interrupted mid-word, let his hand drop and ran the other one through short purple strands before scratching the back of his head sheepishly. "…stop poking holes in my arguments, Nya. Not fair."
"I live to please."

"To do as you please, or just to please?" He countered quickly, absently patting the list tucked away in a pocket before continuing in a more serious tone. "I've got to go steal Tats, we're going to have a fairly involved conversation with the parents. You know what it's about already, just show up around dinnertime for the end of it. Please?"

"...sure?" Scruffy's boss confirmed warily, seemingly a bit thrown by the subject change but seeing no reason to refuse. "I've... really got to go talk to Gedeon as he's standing in as the Pahkan, so I can come with you at least until you run into Tats."

"Mamma?"

"You can stay in here with Scruffy, if you'd like." Sonya answered the Misty kid evenly, sorting together a stack of paper to take with her for the proposed wander with her brother. "Just... call for Usov to confirm anything anyone tells you about what I might've said you're to do or not. If he doesn't know, bunker down with him and Scruffy until I come and fetch you."

Shamal huffed lightly with a half-scowl on his face, as apparently that wasn't what he wanted to know. "Do I have classes with the Mists too today?"

"You don't have to. I'm pretty satisfied with what you know, and you've got things to work on now at least."

"...oh. Well... that was easy." Said brat marveled to himself, before turning a speculative eye to Peter himself. "...are we going to play anytime today, McScruffy?"

The Sun sighed, mentally waving goodbye to afternoon research time for however long the little brat would be staying here.

Well... he had impending supplies still being picked up and gathered together. Peter wasn't going to be wondering too hard about how he might be getting those gem cutting tools, this was a thieves' clan, but a few days of purely playing games with the kid might not be a bad idea for a mini-break.

"Sure, Shamal. Ah... start me off with a centaur race, with a theme of shamans."

Cherep looked curious over what Shamal then Constructed into being on the similarly Mist Flame built tabletop game map, but Sonya easily maneuvered her fellow Cloud out of the office with a few sharp jabs to the ribs.

"But! But Nya, it looks cool."

"Gape later. Work now."

(ooo000000)

(Thursday the 26th of June, 1969 continued. The Pahkan's Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"How soon until there's anyone of age to be useful?"

"Obviously, there already are those of age to be useful."

Gedeon tried not to wince, or sigh, at Sonya's completely flat tone of voice when delivering her answer.
At least his father wasn't in the room to interrupt or bitch, but Pyotr would likely carry tales to him the moment he had a free minute.

Rubbing a hand over his face, the Sun using vor slumped back into his father's chair and leveled a glare at the woman loitering in the Pahkan's office. Of course, unlike the majority of Zolotovs that he had seen in the last couple of days she was neither testing him in her own way to see if he was someone she would accept orders from or fawning in some sycophant way.

Sonya might have to be here, but there was no sign she would be willing to get over herself or put aside their issues to work with him. Gedeon honestly half-expected that, but to the degree she was being difficult…

"...I didn't mean it like that-"

"Didn't you?" The Storm-Cloud cut him off derisively, leaning most of her weight onto her left leg and crossing her arms under her modest chest. Cocking her head to the side, she eyed him as equally as scornfully as her interruption had sounded. "You meant to ask how long until we have vory that are Flame users, right? You would've been one… had you not proven to be entirely unsuited to the mentality needed."

"I-"

"So that means you'll have to wait for Dmitriy… but he's going to be needed to replace me so there's that." Sonya smoothed a finger along her lower lip in a mocking parody of a thoughtful pose, and if he hadn't known exactly how easily she could shatter bone with just a finger… "Which means Kazimir the Rain or Mikhail of Storm. Easily five or so more years if they have to be vory."

"...are you done?"

"I have no idea. Are you done being moronic?" She drawled back venomously, with an added sneer on top just in case he missed how little she thought of him. "Yes, let's pin all our Flame users as 'must be vory to be of use' when there's no way to get any in time to be of use. There's four women that already are perfectly capable… but oh no, wait… they're not men. Your poor, delicate sensibilities..."

Sonya, Tatiana, Galina, and Anna the Mirror Lady. He was fully aware of that given Anna saved his father's life, Tatiana had healed his father of the flesh wounds in seconds, and Sonya first went off and destroyed an entire block in some fit of rage.

Gedeon grit his teeth and flatly glared back. "Outside of this clan, no one is going to fear-"

"Apparently, they fear me just fine."

What was galling the most… was that she was right in that claim.

The lingering handful of Triad members coming and going for various reasons were all very respectfully admiring over her self-control. For her clearing out of Zolotov territory before making a crater in Moscow's streets and leaving it to burn for all to see in a macabre warning.

Gedeon had been treated to a few gossiping-type stories of other Clouds deciding to be difficult and what kind of damaging event that ended up being for the syndicate that tried to control them.

That didn't include the three Moscow Mafiya brotherhoods that had hastily put in for some kind of non-hostile arrangements in the last few days. With four more minor gangs that were after full mutual protection clauses that had appeared in short order not twenty-four hours after she got done murdering a lot of people for some kind of demented Cloud therapy session.

"And since you're going to be enough of a bitch and clear out, that's not going to remain pertinent now... is it?" Gedeon finally managed to get out something fully, and of course it was the very moment his patience with the bloody Storm-Cloud snapped.

"Oh dear, you mean that will force you to be proactive about making some kind of use over the ability I taught you?" Sonya even went the extra yard to badly act comically surprised over the very idea, just to rub it in that bit more. "How scary..."

"You BITCH-" "SHUT THE HELL UP."

It was pure shock that made him snap his mouth closed.

"I not only set you up to learn something three or four times, but you had access to the office and the information we have stored there." This was not sarcastic or derisive, her tone was soft and silky with the edge of something truly ugly if he even dared to try anything more. It looked as if she would gleefully pounce if he tried. "YOU were the one to squander the opportunities afforded you by virtue of whose son you are. YOU were the one that unilaterally decided to do your own thing. YOU were the one to decide if you were a Sun, then obviously the only ones you would benefit from just OBSERVING were other Suns."

Pyotr was blessedly pretending he was blind, deaf, and dumb. Gedeon flicked his attention back to the truly pissed off Cloud standing smack dab in his father's office and tried not to swallow hard.

"But that wasn't good enough for you now, was it? So, you know what? I don't care. I'll ensure the trainees are on track, I'll even ensure the clan has every scrap of information they need for the Flame focus matching. But that's it." Sonya's tone changed from silky and smooth to downright liquid, with a purr of something else promising violence touching the edge, as she bared her teeth in a mockery of a smile. "I'm done with you. With the Zolotovs. With this fucked up branch of the mafia. I have other things to do, so I'm going to go do them. Live with it."

"You're not going to stick around locally, then?" Asked the Sovintnik evenly, sounding just enough bored and faintly curious to be dismissed as an entirely uninterested inclusion in their mockery of a conversation.

She slid faintly purple-grey eyes to him, for the few seconds it took for the glow of Cloud Flames to fade from them. Then she sighed heavily and pinched the bridge of her nose. "...no."

Suddenly straightening up and giving him one last pointedly disgusted look, the damn woman turned on a heel and stalked out of the office. Without waiting for a dismissal or another question. Obviously feeling that their meeting was over.

Gedeon unclenched his jaw, glowering at the door. "...how many assassination attempts have we foiled on her behalf so far?"

"...nine."

"I want us to stop doing it." The vor headed off any protest from the woman's 'grandfather' with a sharp look of his own. "If she's not aware we do that for her, then she might really think she'll make it on her own. Let her have a taste of what she's really asking for."
"...and if she's fully aware of that?" Pyotr asked blankly, which didn't fool the man who had spent years in this office listening to him dissect and postulate with his father about all sorts of things. "Worse yet, if she realizes what you're doing and survives it?"

"I'm not doing anything. I'm letting her go like she wants me to." The Sun countered a bit nastily.

It would piss Arseniy off something fierce, and it really would only be good for one attempt before he'd get bitched out either by the other vor or his father, but the shock of it might set the bitch back a bit.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 26th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The Mirror Lady flashed through the reflective surfaces of the usual haunts quickly.

Not the office, although Shamal was there with Scruffy so she stuck a cordon of Mist Flames around the room to inform her if anyone tried to enter it. Not her childhood home, but she left a Mist Flame letter for Lisa about the conversation she overheard in the Zolotov Pahkan's office.

The fact her father, brother, and sister were also in the same room as where she Constructed the letter to be was just coincidence.

Anna found Usov before she found Sonya, so a copy of herself explained the situation to him as she kept looking.

Both Mist users found the Storm-Cloud at the same time, walking through Zolotov territory in order to find the house of one of their newest Lightning users. The Lightning's parents had concerns, and someone 'older' had to go reassure them that Dying Will Flame use wasn't harmful or unholy as long as they were properly trained and grounded in the use of their Flames.

Obviously, with Galina off interviewing teachers for the last few positions still open in the Flame School's teaching staff someone else had to do it.

Blessedly used to Mist Flame users and their habits the moment Sonya realized they were tailing her she ducked into a side alley, so they could confront her without civilian witnesses.

Usov utilized a tall wooden fence as a portal, while Anna herself crawled out of the reflection of a metal door.

Too out of breath to manage to deliver the warning, the older Mist Constructed a bracelet of woven silk and fastened it to her left wrist. Bemusedly listening to the younger Mist explain why they had come after her, the older Russian let her do it without blinking.

"...hmm... that's worrying." Sonya spoke the words but didn't remotely look or sound like it once she knew what Gedeon had ordered. "Usov, Anna, ensure each division knows to start putting security measures in place. And start planning on how to defend their usual areas from assaults if need be."

"Boss lady-"

"-Sonya!"

"No. Look, I live within the middle of our territory. If someone can catch me here to try and kill me, then that doesn't really speak well of the Zolotov clan's internal security. If Gedeon wants to shoot himself in the foot like this, let him." She eyed the new bracelet, then gave the older Mist user a level stare. "I'm better with necklaces than I am with bracelets, Anna. Maybe a more permanent pendant? I'm not going to wear it all the time, but while in Russia I will."

Exchanging a look between themselves revealed they both didn't particularly like that idea.

Not the pendant thing, the Mirror Lady had plans already for that tidbit.

Sonya sighed through her nose, absentely digging a pack of cigarettes out of her purse. "Again, I'm enough of a Cloud that periodic assassination attempts sound nice, actually. Someone I can brutalize and not feel bad about? I like that idea."

Squishing the desire to laugh like a lunatic, she was the levelheaded one between her and Usov, Anna shoved a hand through her slightly untidy black hair in frustration. "Boss lady, please be more concerned. Assassins don't come at you from the front, or let you surprise them out of the blue."

"Gedeon's not going to get away with this for very long." The leader they were speaking with remarked idly, tapping the filter of her smoke against her lips thoughtfully. "I'm afraid I might need to strip him of your presence for a few days, Mirror Lady. Tag Shamal, Usov? My siblings, please."

"...I can tag all of them, Sonya." Usov insisted firmly. "Have Anna at least with you until this is over. They might attack in plain sight in hopes that you won't be able to retaliate."

The Storm-Cloud shrugged, and at least she was taking that with the implication that as long as he felt as if he could do that they could do whatever they wanted. "Did anyone warn Galina?"

"She's still in meetings with a few civilian teachers, boss lady." Anna muttered regretfully, knowing in a Misty way that she couldn't yet risk passing a warning onto the Lightning woman just yet. "She has her own Mist tagalong at the moment, so that's covered."

"Scruffy still has his own, right?"

"Yes, Sonya." Usov agreed quickly. "What... what are we to do if we catch anything assassin-y near you?"

"...warn me, but that's it." She was already shaking her head before either Mist could protest. "No, paradoxically, Gedeon is right. Assassination attempts aren't something I really know or have had to deal with. Some experience in what to expect before I formally split from the clan would be nice."

Frowning, and an abortive glance to her new Mist Flame bracelet as if it was a watch, the Storm-Cloud turned to continue on her way. "Ensure no one else gets caught up in this, but that's the limit I want you two to be involved. Shoo now, I've work to do."

Anna placed a hand against Usov's bicep, keeping the younger Mist from moving as the older woman walked away as if she didn't need to worry about someone coming to kill her. "...I told Lisa."

"Sneaky."

"And coincidentally her father and siblings."

Usov brightened perceivably, a grin curling up his mouth. "Oh? So... yes. Yes, that's good. I wonder if we can find her Sunny friend and mention something to him?"
No, Sonya was not going to start hunting through Zolotov territory to find her would-be assassins.

For the first reason why not, it had only been a few hours. It would take longer than that for someone to realize there was a hole made in any patrols or security arrangements the clan had. For the second, she still had clan watchers.

Even if she fairly itched to do so, hunting them down before she could even learn from another source would just tip the Mirror Lady's hand. Although she did want to arrange an 'obvious' reason she knew before any attempts might alarm Shamal, target her siblings or the foster parents, or bother any of the trainees.

Assassins, though.

She hadn't actually thought of them possibly coming after her, even knowing full well even Renato had assassins after him and fairly walking into the aftermath of an assassination attempt on him.

Twice even, but the second time had been a little… weird. Admittedly, it was a female would-be assassin so the womanizing gentleman she was friends with would screw his would-be killer.

Entirely within Renato's typical behaviors, that.

What to do about her own assassins?

Killing them was… cheap.

Perverse of her, sure. If they tried to kill her, then killing them back was perfectly valid.

Cherep wouldn't even be able to argue that… right?

Sonya was actually leaning more to robbing them blind of even the very shirt off their backs and call that good.

Killing her assassins, so long as they didn't try to target anyone she was with, would just make her more of a 'threat'. Making it embarrassing to come after her and fail was highly tempting.

It would also counter the one lingering 'good' spot this new upset might have for Gedeon, as if Sonya really did murder anyone trying to kill her then it would reinforce the idea the Zolotovs had good internal security and any attempts along that line would be countered with extreme prejudice.

As long as they behaved, she wouldn't be murdering anyone.

She was not going to make this easy on Gedeon. Let him feel the frustration she held with him. Served the idiot Sun right.

Happy with her tentative plans, which she had to see if they would last past an assassination attempt or two but that was for later, Sonya wandered to her old childhood home to find out what her brother had wanted of her.

Lisa sharply opening the door before she could even touch the knob was not a good sign. Neither was her foster mother's stern expression, which just got more narrowly angry the moment the older woman took in her own expression. "Inside, now."

She obeyed without asking why.

"Arseniy went to go pick up Shamal." She informed her foster daughter sharply, pointing a hand to the basement door imperiously. "Shoo, now. Your siblings are down there already. The moment your father gets back… we're going to have a little family meeting."

Sonya went downstairs wordlessly.

Tatiana, Cherep, and Valera were already there, the baby Cloud pointedly investigating the training room and ignoring his siblings while the Sun and other older Cloud had their heads bent over a piece of…

Mist Flames?

Constructed paper?

…a letter?

"Little sis, what's this about assassination attempts?"

"...Gedeon thinks if some make it pass our territory to try themselves against me, I'll either die or change my mind?" She shrugged in an absent way, taking the few steps between the base of the stairs and the nearest seat. Which just so happened to be the table where lock picks were stored, where Valera was investigating the desk lamp clamped to it. "My Mists already got me word, I'm not too worried."

Cherep peered over the Mist letter, which Sonya could probably guess the contents of reliably given the topic of discussion, and gave her a similarly worried look. "Seriously? Isn't this part of why you're a part of the Zolотовs? Preventing assassinations or just random murders among the members? Pretty sure you should be more concerned, Nya."

"Obviously, this was going to happen at some point. I'm leaving, Cherep. Getting out of Russia. Someone was bound to try to change my mind, and this is a valid tactic to try with."

Who left the letter?

She could tell they were Mist Flames, but not whose they were. Anna or Usov?

"This is a fucked up method to try by." Muttered Tatiana venomously. Shooting her a glare to keep silent as apparently, she wasn't done at just that. "No, seriously. You're not exactly unaffiliated outside of your own Zolотов connection. There's the parents, me, and whoever you have among the Flame kids. He's about to piss all of us off."

"We can't admit to knowing about his orders, unless Arseniy can get independent confirmation on his own. Or Lisa can, somehow." Sonya snatched the letter, glancing over it told her nothing more than whoever 'wrote' it had copied standard typewriter letters to make up the words, and lit it up with her Storm Flames. "I'm pretty sure what good-will the Mirror Lady earned this past week will dry up if she has to admit she eavesdrops on the Pahkan's office regularly. Regardless for why she would do so, I can guess neither Gedeon nor old man Zolотов would be pleased to realize that."

"...why is it always 'the Mirror Lady'? I don't even think I know her name..." Questioned Cherep curiously, before shaking his head and redirecting his attention back to her. "Nya, assassins are not a good thing."
"Actually... they might be." Shrugging to the wide-eyed look he gave her, she raked a hand through her jaw-length blonde hair. "Cherep... I'm not going to remain small-time. It's boring. Like how you'd never be really happy just as a mechanic, I would... like to do something more impressive. Obviously, that's going to piss some people off eventually."

Pointing a finger in her face again, he jerked it back when she tried to grab it at least, the stuntman heaved a heavy sigh at her. "That is not a great comparison, little sis. I make people happy or inspire them with my stunts, you rob them."

"I also have a friend in high places in certain countries, attend some high-criminal society functions, and am about to actually get a permanent residence. Two of them, actually. One in Mafia Land, and one in Italy. Rooting down in one place will make things even harder, especially since I don't intend to join up with any other syndicate." Giving a one-shoulder shrug that time, she waved a hand absently as she leaned back in her stiff and uncomfortable chair. "I was always a target, Cherep. Especially since I dug into this Flame user mess to make sense of it. So are you, Tatiana, and just about any other Flame user on your own merits. But we move, had a syndicate to shelter us when we gathered here, so cornering us like how Fong tried to corner me in Shanghai isn't usually possible. There are any number of people that will try to attack us in order to swoop in like a savior in order to get more Flame users for their own purposes, and more that will try to murder us to prevent that very thing from happening. It's just... I'd rather have the experience to deal with it, then ignore its possible and get surprised later on."

"Why do you always have to be so damn rational?" Tatiana all but whined to the beams that held up the ground floor above their heads, tugging at her 'off-duty nurse' braid viciously before looking back at her little sister with a stamp of her boot. "Nya. I do not appreciate this. You've got Shamal to think of too."

"I reassigned the Mirror Lady to him. She's already foiled an assassination attempt."

Hesitating, and blinking a few times as she processed the ramifications of that, the Sun snorted. "...fuck Gedeon anyways."

"I'd rather you didn't, although I am aware your taste in men sucks." Sonya responded to that non-question statement absently. "But if you must, can I ask you kick him from your bed quickly?"

Her older brother snorted, then cracked a few rather painful sounding laughs.

Tatiana wrinkled her nose in disgust after taking a moment in shock. "Nya, it's... a... I didn't mean... shut up, Cherep."

Keeling over sideways, her fellow Cloud nearly crawled to the Storm-Cloud's low-heeled boots to grip her ankle desperately. "Oh! Ha... ow. Oi, Nya, she didn't... ha, mean it like that. It was... derogatory, not admiring."

"...but her taste in men really does suck." Defended the thief, disgruntled she guessed wrong and likely ended up embarrassing her sister when she didn't mean to.

"Oh, like yours is any better!" Snapped the Sun user, a flush high on her cheekbones meaning she was either really pissed off or really embarrassed. "Wait, that's right... you don't have one!"

"...maybe I like women?" Sonya hazarded cautiously after taking a moment to realize how true that statement was, actually starting to wonder about it for once.

She was eighteen, surely she would've had a fit of hormones by now and got infatuated with someone again if men were what she was interested in. However, she really couldn't recall the last time she took a moment to admire the eye candy around her.

…or if she ever had.

Renato was eye candy, even if he was occasionally an asshole. Well-dressed, carefully groomed, very fit.

Fong was too, even if the man was aggravating when he wanted something. He was also very fit, equally as well-groomed, did his exercising without a shirt, and sometimes was peacefully cheerful if you caught him at the right time.

Her sister did appreciate the view whenever she caught sight of either, so she was pretty damn sure of that fact.

Rachel had been heterosexual, so… she was also pretty sure she knew what it was all supposed to feel like. Unless she hadn't really been straight but had only gone along with dating men due to any number of cultural or opportunity related reasons. If so… Sonya might actually be a bit screwed up and a little off.

Unless there was a biological reason for it.

"…wait, really?"

She looked down to where purple eyes were peering up at her curiously, biting her lower lip for a moment before rubbing at her forehead in confusion. "I have no idea, I've never actually looked at another woman in that way before. Then again, I've also not had some male catch my eye either.
Maybe there's just something-"

Tatiana suddenly gripped her chin and redirected her attention firmly, pointedly looking her little sister straight on. "There is nothing wrong with you. I've been over your medical records enough time to have caught anything by now. You're perfectly human, working correctly as anyone your age and gender does. If it's women that will do it for you, well then no wonder why you didn't like any of my picks."

"Bisexual?" Their brother suggested calmly, jerking a thumb to the ceiling even if that was slightly awkward to do while lying on his side on the floor. "Arseniy's not exactly a girl."

Frowning, the nurse released the weirdly reassured thief and gave a contemplating look of her own in the same direction. "…huh. Can you imagine him in drag?"

There was a moment of complete silence as they tried.

Cherep started it with snickers first, evolving into a full on belly laugh when Tatiana suddenly snorted and grinned. Pressing a hand against her face, the nurse giggled along with him which made Sonya smirk even if she failed to actually picture their foster father in a skimpy sundress.

When Valera tottered over, annoyed he had been excluded from whatever was so funny, she gave in a snickered a few times too.

As the fully-grown male Cloud was the closest, he got sat on by said annoyed baby Cloud. When that didn't stop the hilarity, Valera graduated to yanking purple strands in a fit of frustration until the older man rolled them around to loosen his grip.

Lightly toeing the nurse's calf, her little sister managed a slightly still amused but wry grin while their brothers were distracted. "Sorry, I just… I'm fairly sure you're too good for Gedeon, but if that was what you wanted…"

"Arseniy in drag makes up for it, Nya." Cocking a smile for her, in which she couldn't see any of the aggravation or the upset that had made her snap back, Tatiana took the opportunity to ruffle Sonya's hair fondly. "And I know you're socially incompetent, I won't take offense for long sis. I promise."

Gritting her teeth against the near-automatic protest that she wasn't, other people were just confusing, the thief huffed sourly and let the comment slide this time. She had upset the older woman, it was really the least she could do.

This once. She wasn't going to let it happen again.

The door opening had all four of them looking up the staircase to Lisa's confused expression. "What in the world is so funny?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 26th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Pyotr followed Arseniy down into his basement, which was set up to hold and display various practice tools needed by any good thief to keep their skills sharp. The four that were down there already with Lisa suddenly quieted when they noticed the Sovintnik behind their foster father.

Said vor dropped his… first great-grandchild to the floor so the young Italian could scamper over to his adoptive mother.

The suspicious edge to the ringing silence told him they already knew, even as Sonya situated young Shamal on her lap and whispered a few words to him. Curious.

…the little black-haired Mist lady then. Likely, she had not stopped following Gedeon. As the young, reckless hothead had been previously informed of and had promptly forgotten or underestimated what kind of consequences that might've held.

"Children, my father." Lisa announced bluntly, grinning in a way that told anyone interested to know that she was greatly enjoying introducing the elderly man as such. "I'm fairly sure half of you already know him, but you Cherep probably don't."

"Pyotr, the clan's Sovintnik." Sonya flatly identified, eyeing him doubtfully and with no little amount of wariness. "…why are you here? Now?"

His foster daughter leveled a look upon her own daughter, but only got an equally bland look back for her troubles.

Sonya would not be easily won over, then. Expected, and unfortunate, but not surprising.

Hopefully they could come to some arrangement to prevent Elisaveta any distress or meddling.

Pyotr glanced to the other 'grandchildren' he had before him. The eldest Tatiana was mildly confused, likely due to his rather late and truly unfortunate timing in only appearing now, but accepting of what her mother claimed…

However, the oldest boy wasn't either from the perfectly neutral gaze he received in return.
Cherep had more than enough skill to fake everything if he wanted, from the look of things.

Knowing of his foster daughter's skills in acting, he was likely the one inheriting the tricks the much older vor in the room had pressed on his own foster child. He would not be getting any hints from that quarter either, it was about as equally unhelpful as the blank one his younger sister was wearing.

The youngest was… way too young to care just yet.

His great-grandchild looked mainly faintly bewildered and uncertain, but also unwilling to leave his mother's side.

"Your mother," Pyotr started honestly enough, "will be very upset if certain plans actually go through. I am here, because what she deems important is still of some concern of mine."

He received two unimpressed looks, a wary sort of shrug, a confused stare, and an uncomprehending glare. Valerian was not paying him any real attention once he was deemed 'boring' or 'uninteresting', which was not much of an issue given his young age.

Tatiana then looked at the seated, blank-looking blonde woman. "Well… then-"

"No." Sonya denied her sister firmly, leaning back in her perch with a thoughtful frown. "Not even now. Compromising… our sources of information in order to head off a minor incident is unwise. Especially if there might be more in the future from this quarter. I'll survive, Tats. I'm even kind of looking forward to it."

Obviously, they were continuing a previous conversation despite the light-hearted air that had been prevalent before his arrival. The grandchildren had then known for a while now, meaning Mist guards could get word to other interested parties fairly quickly… even if said parties were not in known haunts or easily tracked down.

Shamal leaned back against her chest, tugging a little fretfully on her shirt sleeve. "Mamma?"

"...don't worry about it. It's a fairly minor thing, all in all." Sharp grey eyes flicked up to pin Pyotr in place, then the Storm-Cloud narrowed her gaze at him. "...if they behave and only go after the proposed target, it might even be amusing."

…interesting.

"Sonya."

"I'll happen regardless. Eventually." She answered her foster father's one-word demand for reasonableness carefully, taking one hand from her child's side to rake through already disordered blonde locks. "Actually… it should've already been attempted."

"Nine times before this that I know of, actually." Pyotr clarified helpfully, clasping his hands behind himself. "Once shortly after young Dmitriy's little early difficulties several years ago, although that one was more 'any Flame user' than specifically yourself. Latest was just last week, three of them in short order."

"...that makes sense." Accepted the young thief evenly, glancing from the vor to her mother and then to her siblings.

Only one of which looked accepting of her decision.

"Nya. Assassins are bad." Cherep insisted firmly, rolling up to his knees and setting young Valerian on his feet in order to stare up beseechingly at his younger sister. "Do you hav-

"I will not be chained." Interrupted Sonya equally as forcefully, but also gently enough for her. Her eyes, however, took on a particularly concerning lavender shade. "I don’t have to put up with it, not anymore. You’re safely on your way, Tats has her own security in being too useful to be done away with, Lisa and Arseniy are fine with being here… but… I’m not."

Apparently, the eye color changing was less alarming to other Flame users to some degree which would explain her comment to Cherep if he was one as well. For none of the younger members present recoiled from the possible threat of violence offered by that warning light. Conversely to what he tentatively knew of their type, his great-grandchild pressed closer to her and the youngest grandchild gripped her knee.

…maybe it wasn't always a warning of violence?

Gedeon was not 'acceptable', apparently. One only had to recall her fairly vitriolic diatribe against the vor that started all this to know that. It was possible Sonya merely found him too irritating to feel comfortable with him the same way she seemed to be with her siblings.

If that was his own fault, or one of those fairly confusing 'type' issues was… likely not the reason. 'Suns' and 'Clouds' were supposed to be compatible.

Maybe her Italian hitman friend, who was also a Sun, had gotten there first?

How many Suns did any one Cloud tolerate?

A fairly informative meeting, all around. Pyotr was satisfied with what he had learned so far, even if the timing of things now was… undesirable.

"As you are aware of the issues, I will return to the clan to prevent interest from occurring on my quarter. Elisaveta, good luck." He glanced at the next 'generation' of their so-called family then nodded to them as well. "Girls, Cherep, Valerian…. Shamal, do take care."

"Bye Gramps." Tatiana gave him a toothy, but not entirely too aggressive, grin in return.

Sonya and Cherep exchanged a look over Shamal's head but refrained from actually acknowledging the well-wishing with their own. Not too unusual for her, and he wasn't familiar enough with the middle boy-child enough to say what was or wasn't usual for him.

Valerian merely glared, which seemed to be his developing default setting.

Shamal, on the other hand… he rather willingly waved a hand in farewell, with a genuine smile. "Have a good day, bisnonno."

Arseniy heaved an aggravated sigh from his corner, earning himself a wicked smirk from Lisa.

...there was a story there, but he'd get it later.

---

(Friday the 27th of June, 1969. Mafia Land.)

The packet of information Bjørn had requested almost reached the same height of the table lamp set out at this workstation.
Sighing, the Lightning-Storm tiredly rubbed at his eyes and leaned back in his office chair. It wasn't quite late yet, but this would mean he was going to have another near-midnight bedtime again.

He really did need to turn part of his apartment's living room into an office-type thing, just so he wouldn't have to spend long hours researching his investment opportunities in the Mafia Land's offices for info brokers and the ballsy Swiss bankers that worked here.

However, his patron was a round or two of heists away from earning them a larger shared apartment. As it was likely she would allow him to spend more for furnishing or replacing some of the second-hand items he had already then... the Lackey would make due until it happened.

"Here." Bjørn teased a few files out of the lump and set them before Verde the Lightning. "Review theses, and ensure the prices match up to the investment asked for."

At the very least, he could use a few extra minutes to try solidifying the plans he had some hand in supplying the laundered money for.

The very green colored scientist picked through the first few pages of the file on top, cocking an eyebrow at the information within. "This is what you do all day?"

"No, it's just what I do most of the day." Money laundering, creating a 'clean' source of revenue, and ensuring there was more than enough to buy a decent house of size they might need in Italy.

A few extra moments of thinking time was more than appreciated, so he didn't mind the obvious 'babysit my dependent' thing Adrik stuck him with while he was off investigating French syndicate members in hopes of narrowing down the scope the two of them would need to settle the pure Lightning user into his own niche.

Bjørn was almost certain he had more than enough, but extra on top might be needed.

Over the last few years there had been him, Shamal, and now Scruffy added to her possible 'household'. There was for sure her brother, possibly the hitman who was her fellow godparent to the young Mist boy, and then an extra room or two for visitors like her sister or possibly her parents...

Well, the eight rooms he knew for sure they would need in one house would make it a small mansion. Adding in another two or three for whomever might come along later and then the guest rooms, and they might as well find an estate home for sale and also purchase the land around it.

Which would also need upkeep for repairs or refurbishing, a gardener, a maid, possibly a butler, and a housekeeper at minimum. Unless the Lightning-Storm Lackey put in the effort to be the butler, but he wasn't sure if he could do that on top of what he already had been tasked to in the coming years. Possibly a cook and, depending on what additional buildings were on the property Sonya settled upon, maybe even a stable hand or two.

That would be an additional five or six more rooms for just needed additional personnel, seven or eight if the few that would elect to live at their work had children or dependents on top of that.

Bjørn jerked his head up from his calculations, looking over at the human calculator that was supplying him some few hours of mental labor out of sheer boredom. "Do you foresee yourself visiting Dama a lot in the coming years?"

"She is my primary investor. Regular reports and the opportunity to share information will occur at the very least." Verde answered promptly, scribbling a series of numbers on the cover of one folder before discarding that one to check into the next. "It is entirely likely that, within a number of years, we might collaborate on future issues if there is something she identifies that requires more thought.
power or attention than she can spare at whatever time."

Verde, Viper, and... the Chinese Triad man. Who seemed very keen on inserting himself into his Lady's regard somehow. Three more rooms, likely preferably far from the master's suite so his patron wouldn't have to interact with them if she was disinclined.

That was... twenty-two rooms at most, nineteen at least. Twenty-five if one included guest rooms for future guests that wouldn't be semi-permanent. Added in at least five or so bathrooms at the very least, although more likely at least ten to fifteen, a large kitchen and a dining hall, a 'central' library and another for his Lady's less legal books, possibly two or three rooms for various offices, a smoking lounge, a rec room for any other pastime that might be needed, maybe a ballroom if a household-wide announcement needed to be made to all residents at once…

...now Bjørn was wondering if there was an Italian castle they could purchase or not for sale.

Guards?

A few footmen at least, add in another two or three maids to cut down on the sheer labor of keeping it all clean and tidy. Adding a few more rooms, and maybe another cook and someone to be a general handyman for any minor issues.

That was... total, fifteen at the lowest or nineteen at the most additional people to help with upkeep or daily labor.

The Lightning-Storm sighed heavily. Sonya would not be pleased.

...he forgot about Galina. Adding her and her own office... and Scruffy had been mentioned to be rather more industrious than previously thought so a work room or two more for him and possibly Verde depending on how often the Lightning visited... were there any more Russians that would be immigrating?

Bjørn mournfully stared at the complete mess of his calculations scrawled out on a formerly neat sheet of paper.

...maybe they could build something with less of a headache?

No, Sonya liked history. Possibly a historic castle somewhere, instead.
Chapter 65

(Friday the 27th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Larion the Rain cautiously lingered in the hallway until the brunette woman he was looking for left the very intimidating Flame user's office. "Miss Galina!"

Pausing at her name, the Lightning glanced backwards but instead of turning and seeing what he had come in for she crooked a finger for him to follow her.

The light glinted off her viridian nails as she approached him without stopping or slowing. "Walk and talk, Larion. Did you require something?"

"…err… there's these… rather… weird rumors?" Not so much weird as… perplexing, really.

"So, it finally hit the Rains." Galina mused aloud, instead of asking for what rumors he had come to verify. "Yes, there will be assassins. Figure it out, or admit you can't think of something, to ensure you don't lose anyone going to or from the bar. You should know how to avoid them getting cornered in their homes by now. I'm fairly sure when you Rains meet up you'll be fine, if I recall why you had to set up there in the first place right."

"Then… the Zolotov clan isn't going to be preventing any more attempts in her direction?" Larion questioned the older woman dubiously, trying to figure out why this was happening. "And shouldn't we… I don't know, be more… secretive about this?"

They weren't even ducking into one of the few empty offices on this side of the building. At the moment, they were being eavesdropped on by at least three vory and a few of the runners lingering in nooks in case someone wanted something run to another office but didn't want to do it themselves.

Coming to a quick and sudden stop, which nearly made him run into the Lightning's back, she turned and pinned him with a slightly aggravated expression. "Sonya doesn't care. For Clouds like her, it's hard to get them to in the first place… but… the major problem at this point is that she and Gedeon in the same room is pretty damn toxic… no matter what 'such-and-such tolerates so-and-so' says. So, she can't stay here and he's fully justified in pulling clan support from her in return."

"That can happen?" He… hadn't heard of that happening before.

Either the clan thing or the Flame user thing.

"Yes." Galina shrugged, waving a dainty hand to dismiss his surprise. "We've been insanely lucky before this, none of the major personality clashes that were warned of in several sources had popped up between anyone for several years. Now Sonya, who was one of the very first, is too old and still without a Sky to stabilize herself. She's starting to get worse in her behavioral patterns, which means the minor irritants or frustrations she used to be able to ignore are becoming major problems. Between Gedeon, who started late and jumped straight into the obstinate Sun behavioral patterns on some wrong information, and Sonya, who is probably one of the if not the strongest then major Clouds in the region… trying to force them in the same room together or get them to associate freely will not work."

"…but! But… how…" Was this sort of what happened with the Four Rains?
Kazimir and Zarya both refused to say much about what had gone on between them and Sonya, and Irinei would only say it was mainly Fadei's fault. No details, no who started what, and the tall Rain man would glare his fellow former group members into silence if they tried to expound to the younger Rains.

That didn't mean bits and pieces didn't make it through. However, those were fragmented and relied on hearsay in order to be passed along.

What was claimed and what Sonya was like the few times she had gone to the Rain Bar or even like how she was after he tried to ineptly murder her was very different. Likely, less than half of it was completely and shamelessly wrong.

"…what... am I going to end up like?"

Galina raised an eyebrow at him but sighed and corralled a few loose strands to tuck back into her neat bun. "Rains are… either one of two types. Since you're Classical, there's very little you're known to not get along with. We currently think it depends on what connections you make right now, rather than a tendency which the others can guesstimated by."

"Oh."

"...Sonya thinks you dislike her." She continued after he was silent for maybe a touch too long, straightening the lay of her suit jacket over the pinstripe skirt that made up her ensemble today. "Which, if you find you can't spend more than a few minutes in her presence without becoming scared or defensive, is entirely possible."

Larion didn't actually mind the woman.

She was… very professional, even after he tried to hurt her. The knife he tried to use to assassinate her even earned him a 'creative' compliment from her.

He did think well of the Storm-Cloud, but mostly due to the fact she did liberate his mother from the vory that kidnapped her to force him into something he didn't want. "I don't know if I do or not."

Personally speaking, anyways. Professionally he rather liked her and would at least make a damn good crack at following any orders she gave.

First of all, he had focused getting the information they wanted from the Rain section. Getting that finished off had been his current goal, because from the sounds of it they were behind everyone else in that aspect.

Then Larion would have the space and time to figure out where he fell in the collection of other 'leads', and indeed what he thought of the woman currently dictating orders for them all to follow.

Looking up at the Lightning again, the Rain was slightly surprised by the wry smirk on her lips.

"It was very mean of us to shove you into that, honestly. You have very little time to be of use, much less make up your mind which way to go, before things shift in a very permanent and final way. Make up your mind quickly, Larion." Galina flicked a wrist in farewell, clicking off in her fast-paced walk to continue whatever he interrupted her in. "You have less than a year to decide."

"...decide what?" He asked of her back in bewilderment, getting no answer from the older Flame user leaving him behind.

Maybe he should spend some effort getting to know another section leader. If Galina of Lightning wasn't going to tell him anymore, and he did get a few things from her that were worth thinking on at least, then maybe one of the others would fill in the blanks.

Storms, Suns, or Mists?

He had no idea where Usov was during the day, and he wasn't really very fond of Storms honestly. Mikhail, their previous lead, had never given him the time of day before and started it but he was still wary of Storms after seeing how he treated his own section working on the 'can a Rain Tranquilize another Flame user' experiment.

Suns. Andrei of Suns was a fairly cheerful young man not that much older than him.

Hopefully he wouldn't mind giving a few pointers at the same time he heard out the younger Rain's confusion over the recent happenings around headquarters.

(Saturday the 28th of June, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"What did you want me for?" Arseniy asked curiously, leaning over the back of the couch to see Sonya fully.

She had both Valera and Shamal in a puppy pile again, ignoring their sharp elbows as they fought a near-silent war for who got the space closest to her for nap-time. If they kept it up, she was going to roll over and leave them to scuffle at her back instead of risk another punch to the chest. "A day of Cloud socializing."

Cherep perked up, folding down one of the newspapers Lisa subscribed to in order to see them all over it. "Really? That kid up north?"

"Right. Ziven said he can dodge now, so I'm going to go see how much better he is and if he's made any success finding another Cloud touching his territory." She finally did roll onto her back, leaving the younger Flame users more room to play-fight as a flailing knee almost dug into her still overly-sensitive-to-touch stomach. "Then there's one more to the south of us, the Wolfpack gang has a Cloud they're being very circumspect about only keeping an eye on. I've got to go see if I can sort that one out today too."

"We're all going to visit both?" Questioned the stuntman warily. "I don't know, Nya. We've never actually seen another Cloud that wasn't bonded to a Sky before…"

"And they both are really young. Older than Valera, but probably around Usov's age." She looked back up at her foster father, who was squinty-eyed and suspicious. "Arseniy, most Clouds get murdered before they're even locally known. I'm hoping these 'leave alone then contact when old/strong enough' situations might improve that. You are a Cloud, inactive but still, and Valera's father. You and he do need to know who is north and south of you."

"…and how much do you think I'll help?"

"Little, actually. You're just there to give it more 'official' tones." Sonya smirked up at him, snickering at his eye roll. "Ziven's been trying to work out if the clan can steal into Timur's territory up north or if the brat will implode everything tried, and the Wolfpack Cloud already has a syndicate… but they're both feral. Before me and Cherep, you were the dominant Cloud of the area."
"I want to see what they make of you, to see if my theory of 'only the strongest in one territory pop' holds water or not."

Their father sighed heavily. "…fine. Whatever. In an hour or so?"

The Storm-Cloud caught the next flailing limb before it could connect with her ribs, giving the Cloud and Mist pair a dry look for the near-miss.

Valera was entirely unrepentant and slunk closer to her arm, but Shamal huffed in a slightly guilty way and decided to sprawl out on her legs for the mandatory 'Cloud naptime'.

"Please."

"That," Cherep announced as the vor shuffled away for his breakfast and what had been their lunch, "is adorable. Has Lisa gotten pictures yet?"

"Yes." She deadpanned back. Pinning their little brother using her right arm, she then scooped up Shamal with her left and rolled back over so this time the Mist ended up sprawled on top of her little brother. "And you two… mine. So there."

Valera blinked at her owlishly through Shamal's now wildly disordered brown hair, apparently he hadn't thought of that for a reason why she was being so insistent that the other boy was allowed to infringe on his time with her. Her brat merely shot her a half-dirty and half-exasperated look, trying to wiggle off the baby Cloud without leaving him the spot right next to her in order to do so.

Of course, her little brother wasn't having that even if he was being distracted thinking through her actions and the actual reasons behind them.

Sonya huffed tiredly, tightening her grip on both and refusing to let them unwind from each other or her.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 28th of June, 1969 continued. Khimki, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Kid, seriously. I don’t know when she's getting here." Ziven informed Dorokhov for the third time, rubbing at the bridge of his nose in exasperation. "Just… patience. Please."

Said Cloud was damn near itching for his rematch with Sonya, even if it was blatantly obvious to the both of them that he wouldn't do much better against her this time around than the last time.

No, the vor didn't know all of what the Zolotov Storm-Cloud was capable of now. He did know what kind of skill she had and had previewed some of her abilities with the trick weaponry back when she was still developing it.

He also had a very good grasp on what kind of skills Timur had, both in terms of his Cloud Flames and combat-capabilities.

It still did not compute, how his brattling Cloud could be excited for an impending beat-down from an older one.

Maybe it was just a Cloud thing he was never going to understand. Like the freaky, near-overwhelming charisma they somehow had even when the entire type could be described as 'of a few words but lots of violence'.
Galina could scoff at it all she wanted, she was getting pretty fanatical about Sonya to Ziven's expert eye. He had watched the same damn shit happen with the Khimki Cloud and his near-gang of gutter brats, and he knew the Lightning had all the signs of an impending Cloud obsession.

Perversely, he was pretty damn happy he had gotten stuck out here.

No offense to the girl intended, but if he was going to follow a woman it would be Tatiana. He had tried to get to know the little sister back when they had been kids, and although he was allowed closer than most that ever tried talking to her... the girl had still been rather off-putting.

She was fine now... sort of, but he still couldn't reconcile the quiet and bookish thief girl with the monstrously strong woman with a hair-fine temper of today.

Sonya was also... majorly emasculating to be around. He was man enough to admit it.

Speaking of, Ziven eyed the car pulling into the dockside. He was pretty sure that was one of the Zolotov clan cars... but he wasn't positive. Unfortunately, Dorokhov was already keyed up and noticed even the tiniest of twitches the vor gave so he was already obsessively watching the dark painted automobile before he could confirm that.

Sighing heavily, the Zolotov vor decided to try to at least pretend like this wasn't a scheduled beating said target for the beating was eager for and started walking to greet whoever Sonya had decided to bring with.

Her... brother?

Okay, she might need a driver so that was only interesting. Her father, intimidating and not entirely out of the question. He was out here on the clan's time, obviously he would have to report sometime when they stopped hiding Timur's presence.

However, two brats?

Sonya cast him a look, helping the younger of the two out of the car's backseat. "Ziven, bring the Khimki Cloud over here."

The heavily tanned vor scratched at the back of his head when that was all she gave, and a glance to the older vor netted him nothing else. Another sigh, which was a fairly typical action of his around Clouds entirely, Ziven waved Timur over as if the kid wasn't more than halfway across the empty stretch of dockside already.

"Dorokhov, Primakov Valerian Arsenevich. He will be inheriting my territory in as little as a year." Announced the Storm-Cloud neutrally, presenting the same tiny brat of a kid to the young teenager.

...as if that wasn't the son of her foster father's taken outside of Zolotov territory.

Surprised, said teenaged Cloud raked a hand through bluish-green hair in a rare expression of bewilderment as he arrested his forward momentum. He locked eyes with the tetchy baby who was possibly another 'Cloud', and therein commenced the second most intensive glaring match Ziven ever personally witnessed.

"...how long is this-?" Cherep started to ask as he shifted the other young kid present on his shoulders, only to cut himself off when Sonya shot him a flat look.

Arseniy grunted in an attention-grabbing manner, attracting both baby Clouds to switch targets to him. The older man bared his teeth in a too-sharp snarl as he stared down the teenager whose territory they were visiting.

The younger vor had never seen Timur back down so quickly before.

Valerian huffed in a satisfied manner, toddling over to the man and taking a good fist-full of the material making up one pant leg.

"...right, with that sorted out..." Sonya tilted grey eyes over to the Khimki Cloud and let a smirk curl up on side of her lips. "...I believe Ziven said you would like a rematch?"

Dorokhov twitched, almost with the manner of a dog shaking off water, before narrowing his brown eyes right back at her. "You went and beat up some foreign man for the attention. Scared to face me again?"

"Please. As if you can last nearly as long as the last time we did this. I'm not holding back anymore, boy." Sonya stripped off her light jacket, handing it up to the kid on her brother's shoulders to hold onto. "I hope you can dodge like Ziven said."

Well fuck... if he had known she was going to kill him-

A clap of the younger Cloud's hand caused a shockwave of air pressure to balloon out with a flick of his own Flames, but she hurled a hammer right into the near-visible pressure wash to break it up before it could even ruffle the apparent family of Clouds. The sonic boom was still ear-ringing, which made everyone else in the area cringe.

The Storm-Cloud then manifested a freaking halberd to hand and swung it, forcing Timur to dodge wildly backwards or risk being bisected.

"...holy fuck." Ziven almost staggered anyways when the two of them darted away to start going at it, he hadn't been behind Sonya before she defended the group still near the car they had taken in.

The very familiar ache of rapid compression in his chest was not appreciated, he was supposed to be spared that feeling this week since his bratty Cloud had a different target to practice against.

"That was pretty loud." Cherep offered mildly, returning a hand to the older kid's ankle to keep the child there. "By the by, were you aware Clouds can do a kind of shield?"

"...wait, really?"

"Pretty sure... because I'm fairly certain a hammer no matter how large shouldn't be able to bounce a wave of air pressure away from anything bigger than a postage stamp. That answers a couple of lingering Cloud-questions Tats and I have wondered about." The brother of one Cloud bounced on his toes lightly, aiming a grin upwards in the general direction of his passenger. "Take that lesson to heart, Shamal. Even if you're not sure you can do something, you can if you're stubborn enough about it."

A few hanks of purple hair were tugged sharply. "I'm pretty sure mamma would rather I know I can do something rather than guess, zio."

...that was... not Russian. Nor German, French, or Chinese. "...what did he call you?"

Cherep shot him a smirk. "Uncle. It's Italian."

Ziven didn't like where this was going. "...and... what did he call Sonya?"
"Mamma, are you slow?" Said brat answered for himself, huffing and bundling the woman's jacket on top of the older man's head to slouch into.

That was what he thought. "How old are you?"

…well, that would make more sense. The kid didn't share any structural similarities with Sonya, nor did he have her coloring. Obviously not really related.

"So… this is what you've been doing since… uh… Man, I haven't seen you in years." Cherep mused idly, glancing over at him curiously. "What have you been up to?"

"Trying to beat the concept of limits into a teenaged Cloud user." Ziven commented sourly, rubbing a hand against his chest and coughing once to loosen up his diaphragm.

A glance to the two Clouds currently trying to kill one another… and while Timur's hard-earned dodge skills were doing him good, he wasn't quite up to adapting it to someone that changed from polearms to hand weapons in the blink of an eye.

"And… that's pretty much it, really. Recently tangled with the Kurkino District's brotherhood, But the Mashintseva Brotherhood withdrew pretty damn suddenly a few days ago."

Like about when a sudden crater was torn into Moscow that a particular blonde woman was rumored to have done out of a fit of pique. The younger vor was pretty damn certain they had known of the Khimki Cloud and had been trying to either verify the rumors or catch him so from his perspective Sonya's temper tantrum, if that had been what it was, had come at the most perfect time.

The older vor grunted again, most of his attention on his foster daughter basically playing a violent game of keep-away with the other teenager's head. Ziven did earn a sideways look after a moment. "How is this territory shaping up?"

"…pretty sure Timur will object if we tried to assume a direct control over him." Another glance of his own, yeah Sonya was still emasculating to watch and his own Cloud foundling was still a scrappy bit of a kid still figuring out how to survive, and the tanned Russian turned back to the older man. "But that doesn't mean taking him on as a kind of extended branch is impossible. He'll object to any attempts to uproot him, or interfere with his little gang, but give him work to do and rewards for doing it..."

Arseniy gave a semi-disinterested huff, snagging the back of his kid's own jacket to haul him up since it seemed he wanted to watch his sister beat the shit out of another kid.

"Beat the shit out of" was pretty apt, given Dorokhov was already bleeding and battered. Sonya wasn't entirely mark free herself, she had blood leaking from her mouth indicative of internal injury Ziven knew pretty damn well from suffering through himself several times a month. On scale, however, the Khimki Cloud was doing worse.

Even as they watched, the female Cloud dropped her latest maul in order to catch a fist trying to punch her lights out and returned the favor with a heavy fist of her own. Timur was a scrappy bit of a kid, but still not up to surviving a point-blank punch in the jaw from someone significantly stronger than his advisor vor could manage.

The aqua-haired teen hit the ground hard and didn't get up.

Sonya stepped away from him, absentely wiping the blood trickling from her lip with the back of a hand. "…well, that was fun. Now… the other direction."

Young Valerian reached a baby-fat pudgy hand over to pat the woman's knee when she got within range, earning himself a rather vicious if coppery-red stained smirk in return. Grabby hand motions also had her picking him up to balance on a hip before the tiny blonde woman looked over at him again.

"Decent, but not really much of a threat. Have you not been bothered lately, or what?"

"Not in so many words, no. Mostly it's been others testing to see what's still in here, and these few idiots that tried to set up shop up nearby. They've all be dealt with easily enough, and what wasn't easy ran off when you blew your top a few days ago."

Ziven was wondering if he should leave the prickly teen on the ground to recover or drag him back to their makeshift safe-bunker, so he only caught the very tail end of the ugly look Sonya shot him when he turned back to her.

"Wait… what's this now?" Cherep asked, giving his little sister a sideways look. "What did you do, Nya?"

"Not here." Arseniy decided for all of them, pushing off the car with a sharp motion and flicking a glance of his own to his son. "Ziven, good work. When you're satisfied here… apparently there's another I want you to work on."

…he was going to go from managing a teenaged Clout brat to a baby Cloud brat?

Fantastic. The younger vor scuffed a hand through his short dark hair in exasperation but had to admit the older man had a point. He knew how to do it, and how to avoid their bastardized charisma that instilled fanaticism in their followers.

Sonya and Timur both had that in spades, even if they ignored the pull their particular type of self-assured confidence inspired in the less centered or uprooted and aimless around them.

Little Valerian was going to grow up to be a bullheaded and vicious vor, though. Added in with a following of the type his elder sister and fellow Cloud had managed to put together…?

"Seriously," Cherep tried to whisper covertly to Sonya, ignoring the fact they were in a wide-open space and the acoustics were pretty damn good to make even the slightest of sounds carry far, "what did you do?"

"They were sex traffickers." She informed him shortly. "And they tried to 'acquire' me. I also liberated seventeen other girls at the same time as I put them out of their misery."

Ziven winced and tried not to think about what she likely did in response. Seeing reports of the aftermath was bad enough for him, he didn't want to know the details.

Her older brother paused, both eyebrows raised up high. "Oh… never mind then."

Arseniy gave his foster children, his son, and apparently his grandkid a sharp jerk to get them back into the car they took out here. "Let's go, then."

"Ziven." Sonya nodded to him, retracing her steps to get back into the car with the two younger members without so much as a backwards look for the kid she laid out cold.

Cherep clapped him on the shoulder, drawing the car keys out of his pocket and letting his nephew down to drive them wherever else they were going. "Have fun."

"Oh yeah, fun."

Now then, what did you do with a Cloud that just got their ass kicked?

Would he be happy about it, pissy, or eager for yet another fight?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 28th of June, 1969 continued. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Gently, Milos. You strain something, I'll set you back another few days in recovery." Tatiana instructed sternly, eyeing the Pahkan's progress with the dumbbell and the motion of muscles under the skin as he did horizontal abductions. "Five more reps."

"Slave driver." Grunted the elderly man, flexing the muscles that had been torn open only mere days ago in smooth motions.

There was an only slightly off-colored patch of skin, a coin-sized dot that once was a bullet hole in his chest. The only way one could realize they were looking at a gunshot wound was by catching sight of the entry scar in his back.

Physically the Zolotov Pahkan was healed up, as fine as any man nearly seventy-two might be in their dirty careers. Convincing his body of that when it recalled the searing pain and breathlessness that came with a punctured lung and a sucking chest wound…

No amount of Sun Flames could smooth that over, merely experience and gently increasing physical exercise. Flame users were queerly more accepting of Sun Flame healing and could be in and out of a Sun user's grasp in minutes going from a bloody wreck to perfectly fine, non-users tended to take longer.

Huffing herself at the insult, which she knew wasn't really intended as sardonically as the old man said it but she couldn't ignore it coming from him as easily as she usually could from other mafia men back in Mafia Land, the nurse held up a few fingers glittering with yellow Flames. "Well... you could always go without a massage to loosen up anything that tightened up over the session if you really feel that way, sir."

"Now, let's not be hasty." Completing the reps she asked for, Milos dropped the barbell the moment he could get away with it and held his hand over his healed gunshot wound with a grimace. "I'll make it an order if I have to."

"Anything for the stress relief, right?" Tatiana dug her Sun Flame warmed fingers into the old man's back, prodding the abused flesh. Not to heal, anymore and she'd just make things worse with cysts and tumors, but to encourage and Activate a greater degree of oxygen absorption. "Any chest pains, upper body pangs in particular, or deeper aches in your upper body?"

"Not that I've noticed." The elderly Pahkan of the Zolotov clan spoke without inflection, which didn't help the Sun user figure out if he was lying through his teeth or not.

With nothing to go on, because he was more than self-possessed enough to prevent any overt signs of complications and to stop any news of such from reaching her, the nurse merely sighed. "Alright then, I think I'm going to clear you to leave for home finally. Another day or two please, then you can dig into whatever you'd like."
"Good. Pyotr, what has my idiot son done to tick you off now?"

Tatiana blinked, looking over a shoulder to the man who actually owned the suite of rooms she had pretty much commandeered from.

Grandfather… huh?

She wasn't that stupid. Obviously at part of it was the fact Sonya wasn't really behaving herself anymore, no matter what other lingering threads that might prompt his sudden admittance of familiar connections.

"Hey, gramps. Business or pleasure?"

Milos cocked an eyebrow at her but turned back to his old friend.

"Gedeon's decided to allow assassination attempts on Sonya through the clan's security." The Sovintnik walked around the room so his boss could see him clearly without moving too much more, then gave a one-shoulder shrug.

The Pahkan froze, then flicked a glance to the entirely unimpressed nurse. "We know, Nya finds the idea amusing."

"…fucking small blessings." Grunted their boss, pushing himself into an upright position on the bed instead of letting his left shoulder and side hang off it to give him the range of motion he had needed. "Pyotr, why?"

"They hate each other." The equally as elderly man mentioned blandly, flicking a glance to the redhead to inform her he knew it was a cover story and not the entire situation but that it was likely good enough he'd help spread it. "Apparently, a Cloud only really likes one Sun… and Gedeon's not the Sun Sonya can deal with."

…how, exactly, did that explain her?

Apparently thinking the same thing, Milos glanced to her.

Tatiana thought fast. "I'm family, not a friend."

"What about the other kid, the Sun one that Gedeon replaced?"

"He didn't replace anyone. But Andrei is the Sun lead." Admitted the nurse cheerfully, picking up the five-pound hand weight in preparation to leave. "As far as the other Suns know, Andrei is the one to go with for Flame issues… I'm the one to go to for healing interests… and that's pretty much it."

Milos palmed his face exasperatedly. "Well… no wonder she hates him. Even I know everyone in that office pulls their own damn weight. What the hell did he do, fuck about for the last couple of months?"

"Pretty much." She twisted that knife in with a pretty smile. "He set himself up like he was the power behind the throne, but everyone already knew where to go for answers and who to speak to about issues. But Sonya's not the one they go with for issues, it's Galina."

A beat of silence, and the Pahkan sighed heavily. "There's no way to fix that, is there?"

"Nya hates Gedeon because he obsesses over the wrong things, in her opinion. It's part of his Sun nature, and Clouds are selectively tolerant. Gedeon obsesses over presenting the right image, which we can't do right now because there's no one of his 'right image' to supply. Which pisses Nya off because what she's gotten to work in a pinch is being ignored because it's not 'right'. You started way too late for the both of them to coexist."

She got a fair amount of attention from both old men. "Is that what's going on with them?"

Pyotr also looked fairly interested in that answer, although he was probably aware it wasn't the entire issue.

Tatiana sighed, absently playing with the physical therapy weight she had one of her little sister's Mist minions to liberate for her. "At the base level, it's pretty correct. There's more to it, nothing is ever that pretty, but... Nya's the eldest Flame user we have. Personality clashes is known to be... possible. And... violent."

Likely because people that could set themselves on techno-colored fire getting into clashes with others of different techno-colored fire was eye catching, and the news tended to spread. Parallels would then be drawn, assumptions made, and that resulted into the 'but so-and-so hates such-and-such'.

It was convenient to hide things behind, and the Sun user wondered how many other Flame users made use of that 'dis-information' to their own benefits before.

"If Gedeon's already obstinately stubborn as most Suns tend to be when 'fully mature', then Dmitriy's likely the next to come down with a case of 'Flame maturity'. Then me, I guess."

Hopefully she could either come down with a serious case of 'obstinate Sun syndrome' about or focusing on the Mafia Land hospital, although she really didn't mind the idea of semi-annual returns to Zolotov territory for medical reasons.

Not everything in the family had to be as eye-catching or as dramatic as her younger siblings.

"...Bazanova doesn't mind?" Milos questioned dubiously, swinging his sweatpants clad legs off the bed and stretching his shoulders out slowly.

"She has 'plans' for them." Tatiana confirmed wryly, eyeing his progress sharply.

Still no hesitation or tentative movements. Likely he was healed up fully, even if he was rather old to being with.

"Not in the clan's territory, if she gets out of it." The Pahkan decided firmly, the expression on his face distinctly unhappy but not quite to the point of being called 'pissed off' either. "Mafia Land, mainly. The greater Moscow districts if and when she gets that far."

"If she's on clan business?"

Milos heaved a heavy and exasperated sigh as he dropped his head into his hands. "Do I or do I not undercut my son's authority on behalf of the woman intending to be 'temporary'?"

"I cannot answer that for you." Answered the Sovintnik evenly, hands clasped behind his back and merely waiting for the other man's decisions.

"I'll let Nya know she's safe enough at home, she was rather more concerned with my own and her brat's security than herself." Offered the Sun user, gathering up her things and the physical therapy detritus they had made use of over the last few times.
"I'd almost say that's arrogant of her… but I've seen what happens when she gets pissed off."

The nurse merely smiled politely, getting up from the chair she had repurposed to have a comfortable place to observe in order to clear out of the room. "You can have your bedroom back, gramps. The Pahkan can and is cleared to leave for home."

Pyotr inclined his head to her. "Thank you, Tatiana."

"Is that all?" Milos inquired slowly, rolling both shoulders. "That was… quick."

"Sun Flame healers are valuable for a reason, sir." She grinned at them both, shifting the various weights to a better position to support them. "Daily physical therapy is something I'm going to highly recommend, but… I'll leave that up to you. You're good enough for now, report any sudden pains or aches please."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 28th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"This one is a bit more… dubious. I've never actually met this one." Sonya ran her fingers through Shamal's hair, leaning back against the warm engine block for the help in keeping warm.

He decided to pretty much blanket her legs in return, perfectly content in hugging a thigh to his chest.

If he was cold or not too was debatable, it could just be because he was annoyed Valera got the middle of the car's back seat. Which meant the baby Cloud had the spot between them and was very smug about it the entire few hours it took to get from Khimki's docksides to the Wolfpack's proposed meeting point.

Late summer afternoon it might be, but there was a rather unseasonable bite to the air today. Probably rain threatening, but that meant the water in the air made everything seem cooler. She wished she picked out a thicker jacket for today, but frankly they had spent most of their outing within a car.

"So… what, we're just set up in his usual patrol patterns and are going to wait for him to wander by?"

"Pretty much… but, I don't actually know if this one is male or female, Cherep."

"My money's on male." Observed the stuntman dryly, hitching the terminally bored Valera higher in his arms. "Just because I highly doubt until you dealt with those that shall not be named… no one thought a girl-Cloud was really worth anything."

"Probably." Sonya had to agree, although sourly.

A sigh, and Arseniy turned to eye the street they were parked at pointedly. "Is there any reason why we're waiting for this kid near a fucking park?"

"He's a kid, apparently younger than the Khimki one. Still surprisingly scrappy, though." She explained with a sigh of her own.

The Wolfpack Gang hadn't exactly informed her of much, just that they had a young Cloud they wanted her to talk to. While she didn't really mind the request since the opportunity to gather another's basic starting mentality, the lack of details of who it was she was here to see and what he was like was kind of suspicious.

What little she did know was this baby Cloud was about at the point she had been at when nine or ten. Able to do something a bit inhuman and within the range of Propagation, a tendency for something like a Cloud's patrolling, and was a bit of a little prick in personality.

…so only probably a baby Cloud.

It could also be a very anal-attentive Sun, a Lightning with no life, or an easily irritated Storm.

"What does this kid look like, anyways?"

Sonya coughed into her hand once, checking to see if there was any more blood in her throat or not, before she thought back to the bare-bones description she got. "Preteen, orange hair, green eyes, and an abundance of freckles. Will investigate anyone just loitering around, kind of nosy about it really. So…"

"That kid?" Asked her brother, jerking a thumb to a similarly looking child warily watching them from the small park's forest line.

She looked in the same direction, even as Arseniy ensured there was none too interested in them from behind her, and crooked a finger at the kid to get him to approach. "Probably."

Cherep hummed, stepping around their foster father to give her the illusion of 'privacy' for the next conversation. "Going to beat him up too?"

"Only if he asks for it." It earned her a laugh, and the stuntman wandered off with their little brother to investigate the playground equipment.

The vor wouldn't be leaving, he was there for the 'official' tone, but Shamal didn't have to be.

The thief looked down, but only earned a fairly stubborn look in return as the Mist brat hugged her thigh harder.

Apparently neither would her brat be leaving. Even if he did look slightly envious of her brothers heading off to play.

"Ten or so minutes, then we'll head over." She informed him idly, flicking her gaze back up to the Wolfpack Gang's foundling. "First off… who the hell are you, and do you know why I'm here?"

In return for the blunt questions, there was a dubious eyeing of her person and a hunched up shoulder in a badly half-assed shrug. "Vasilyev Ravil Olegovich, and no."

In return for the blunt questions, there was a dubious eyeing of her person and a hunched up shoulder in a badly half-assed shrug. "Vasilyev Ravil Olegovich, and no."

的年轻人Vasilyev Flatly at her glowing purple finger, then examined his own hands curiously. He glanced to Shamal, who heaved a very put-upon sigh and cupped a hand to shield his own indigo Flames from casual view.

His reaction, which was a mix between surprise and wariness that was badly hid behind hastily faked suspicion, confirmed he did at least have Cloud Flames. If her own was merely equally badly hidden relief/wariness and Shamal's Mist Flames earned him surprise… then likely he didn't know it came in different colors.

Sonya pelted him in the forehead with a chunk of emerald cut white sapphire taken out of her jacket pocket, digging a copy of the hippy-book Galina had disguised their initial Flame-type sortings into out from her purse. "Since you are one of us, there are a few things I have to pass on. First and foremost, there is something that polices us... and you piss them off you're on your own."

The gem earned a dirty look, she got another one for throwing it at him, and the preteen accepted the book with a dubious sneer. "Explain."

She cocked an eyebrow at the demand, keeping silent out of what was probably pure pettiness.

Arseniy heaved an explosive sigh, reaching into his own pocket for a clipping of a newspaper to throw in the kid's face. "Listen boy, she's the one that did this."

...probably the article about said sex traffickers and exactly what Sonya did to them in revenge, which she still had yet to read.

She didn't care to actually see what the civilians thought of her handiwork either, or the police. Their world wasn't a nice one, any outsider would judge it harshly out of either ignorance or different cultural standards.

"The Vindice." Shamal informed him flatly, apparently not a fan for his attitude towards her. Brown eyes flicked dark blue as her brat glared at the older one, sniffing in offense and then giving him a cold shoulder. "Everyone knows that."

"Not everyone, not up here brat." In that light, she should probably give the preteen some slack. "No one knows who they are, or where they take those they declare have broken Omertà, and I don't think anyone really wants to find out. They will interfere if you break their few commandments, and those are what I am required to pass on."

Frankly, Sonya could go another two decades without so much as catching sight of another one quite happily. Somehow, she didn't think she'd have that kind of luck.

"...I'm listening."

...but probably would make up his own damn mind if he'd follow them or not. That wasn't her problem, he could risk it if he wanted.

Closing her eyes, the thief thought back along that line and concluded Classical Clouds really weren't predisposed to co-exist well at all. It was either all confrontational or aggressive, and this was the second 'feral' Cloud she had to gather details from.

She really was lucky Cherep was Inverted.

Interestingly, the prickly preteen hadn't bitched or did his selectively arrogant but silently doubting thing in Arseniy's face yet. What had been offered, equally as rudely as her own bits, had just been accepted at face-value.

Obviously, there was something about her foster father that made Clouds pay attention to him when he decided to speak.

"We can't hold government office, can't join the military, and cannot tell anyone outside the Mafiya about these pyrotechnic skills of ours. Not without dragging them in with us." She wasn't looking, so if he had told someone like a family member or a friend she wouldn't know nor judge him for it in a bitchy way. "They're called Dying Will Flames of the Sky, our type in particular is Cloud. In that book, they're referred to as 'violet Soulfire', but you can safely ignore the free-love hippie crap. It's just the way we hid it for those that have no criminal connections."

There was a grunt from somewhere in front of her. "...why aren't you looking at me?"

Ooh… snarly. Scary… not. "We have a predisposition to hate each other by instinct. I'm trying not to give into it. You're too young for me to feel alright with beating the shit out of you."

Apparently Vasilyev had nothing to say to that or was trying to see if that was correct on his own end.

"Last bit. If you do join the Yasenevo District syndicate, the Wolfpack Gang, you are limited in going after either those that have no Flame users or up to ten. If they have ten before you decide to pick a fight with someone else, then anywhere from three to twenty. So on. Violate that, and you can look forward to visiting wherever it is the Vindice take their prisoners."

"...look at me... please."

Sonya cracked an eye open in sheer curiosity, earning a fairly impressively flat look in return.

"What do you mean we have a predisposition?"

She sighed through her nose, blinking both eyes open and studying the kid in an honestly thoughtful manner instead of sardonically or derisively. "We're the most territorial of all the types, another of the same nearby sets us on edge. We're in your territory, it's probably worse for you... but I'm older, and it's more grating for me."

There were a few thoughts to that the copper-haired kid almost responded with, as in he opened his mouth to say them but rethought it at the last second and shut said mouth.

After wrestling with himself about something, Vasilyev carefully gritted out his next question in a forcibly neutral tone. "Why are you trying, then?"

"I refuse to be put in a box when it comes to my behavior."

Really, wasn't that all it was?

Sonya rejected the idea she had to be like any other Classical Cloud, instead she would be so in her own damn way. Stubborn of her, and probably hard-headed for little real reason, but she was both a Cloud and a Storm.

"Additionally, for all the Storms, Rains, Lightnings, Mists, and Suns I know of... only Sky Flames are rarer than Clouds. If I am unable to speak rationally with other Clouds, then I will only be able to research my own nature. I also refuse to do a half-assed job of it."

The preteen stared at her flatly for a few long seconds, then took a deep breath and tried to relax somewhat. He failed pretty badly at it, but he was trying and she rather appreciated that. "What's the rock for?"

"They're called Dying Will Flames. Willpower is what it burns, that rock can focus it for you until you learn to manifest it on your own."

"Why Dying?"
"Most reach for it in those moments of impending near-death experiences." The Storm-Cloud drew a breath of her own, but Arseniy shifted rather suddenly and attracted their rather terribly frayed attentions.

"We're being watched. Hurry it up."

Sonya bit her lip sharply, then turned back to the kid pointedly. "There's another to the north of me. Between him and you, I have about twenty-five kilometers of territory. From this point, which is the edge of where you brush up against my area, and in any direction but north or northwest you'll probably find another of us after a few more kilometers. I ask, in return for my aid, you find another and tell them the same basics I am telling you."

Vasilyev gave a sharp nod in recognition, shiftyly eyeing the vor's back and the area he was looking in rather than her.

"The kid with the purple colored man over there will be inheriting my territory in as little as a year. Don't ask how I can do that, you likely can't do it and wouldn't want to move anyways." That earned her a sharp look, which the thief admitted maybe was a bit too arrogant of her. "Again, wouldn't want to. If you break that, and it's likely in the early stages, it's a white sapphire. Ask the Wolfpack Gang for a vor advisor if you want more help. Read the book, keep an eye cracked for more of us, and pass on the same rules. That's all you're required to do."

That was it, right?

She forgot to tell Dorokhov some of that, but Ziven could always be passed on the bits she forgot later.

Sonya was almost, almost giddy. They might be able to stand one another, if Vasilyev was really going to try to copy her in ignoring the irrational ticks.

…fuck, she should probably pass on that 'don't ignore all violent impulses' tidbit. Possibly the vor that would come around from the Wolfpack Gang wouldn't mind doing it for her, when they paid off the Sovintnik for her doing this little 'house-call'.

The Khimki Cloud didn't need that bit, he was pretty violent already and was perfectly happy with being so.

"That's all on my end. Any questions you can't wait for to be answered?"

He glanced to the book in his hand first, before looking back up at her with a look that questioned if she was rational.

She tried really hard not to take offense. Obviously he'd have a few after reading it, but she meant right now and any Cloud-centric ones.

Arseniy decided to cut anything more they might have said short, glancing back to the preteen sharply. "Beat it."

Sonya threaded her fingers through Shamal's hair, only belatedly realizing the kid had a pretty tight grip on her. "Shamal?"

"…I don't like him." Her brat muttered sullenly, more into the fabric of her slacks than really to her.

"Well… brat, that's it for personal visits this month. Or for the next one, as a matter of fact. Hopefully we can do the rest by word of mouth or by letter."
"Grab your brothers and head back." Arseniy instructed her, pushing off the boot of the car to head his own way. "I don't think they were Wolfpack vory, so I'm going to go give them a head's up if they don't have a watch on the brat."

"Will do… um."

Wait, Sonya had assassins. Supposedly.

Maybe it wasn't on behalf of the Yasenevo District Cloud, but hers?

Her foster father apparently had that thought before her, so the look he shot her over a shoulder was slightly amused. "Head home, girl. Tell Lisa I went for a walk."

Well… if he wanted the first round of possible-assassins, she really had nothing to argue against it. "Alright."

(Sunday the 29th of June, 1969. St Louis des Francais Catholic Church, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Why does it have to be the bloody morning?" Sonya asked of the world sourly, under her breath so it was likely she didn't intend for it to be overheard.

"To annoy you specifically." Renato returned wickedly, sliding out of the shadow of a rather ornate bulwark that clad the church Lisa had found for Russian Catholic Christians. "Of course dawn mass is held just to annoy you, little dragon lady. Why else would anyone do anything?"

"Obviously," the thief managed over Shamal's excited cheer that the hitman had shown up before he was scheduled to fly out of Soviet Russia entirely, "I am fully aware the world does not revolve around me, Renato. I know there's a reason, but right now I'm not entirely sure I care other than to be irritated at the result dragging me out of bed to do this."

Said brat paused deliberately, then carefully hugged Renato's leg with a flicker of indigo Mist Flames to prevent any creasing of his clothing that he could object to.

Crafty little snot, now he had to think up another reason to avoid overly touchy child demands for affection.

Obviously Sonya had let him practice against her first, because there wasn't even a kink in the line of his slacks when the bratty Mist let go.

He decided to give the kid this one, it was creative and outside the box. More so a thing a Lightning would've figured out… maybe even that brunette Lightning the thief had working for her.

With a snort, the older Italian slotted the Storm-Cloud with a droll look. "What, I don't get a hug from you too? Aren't you happy to see me, Sonya?"

"…did you want one?" Sonya actually paused to ask, in perfectly honest surprise.

Caught a bit flat-footed by the complete lack of protest or snarly Cloud irritation over the fundamental human need of 'touch', Renato took off his hat to scratch at the back of his head out of sheer confusion. "Yes, I would like a hug."
If she gave him one did, great. If she didn't, well… she'd say something, and he'd know her weird Cloud tendencies didn't stretch to personal space.

"…oh. Okay." Taking a second to remind herself of the logistics to the act of giving a hug was just sad, but Sonya did have to think of how her brother gave her one and then tried to translate it to how to give the hitman one that she wouldn't mind getting.

…because of course she would be considerate like that if she was going to do something similar to another.

Informative, slightly depressing, and entirely ridiculous. Renato rolled his eyes and held an arm out instead of waiting for her to think it through entirely, and received a glancing side-hug that was over way too quick.

…but she gave it of her own free-will. Progress.

"That's not how you hug someone, mamma." Shamal informed her dubiously, holding both arms out in demonstration. "You're supposed to use both arms."

"I don't like that one, I'd rather have a hand free or two." The utterly paranoid and practical woman responded frankly. "Aren't we here to attend mass? Shouldn't we go inside?"

The Mist stubbornly planted his feet in front of them, giving his godmother a look of his own.
Brat had gotten surprisingly bold over the last couple of weeks, especially with Sonya reinforcing his behavior because she didn’t care how he treated others as long as he had fun with it.

"But you give me full hugs."

"You're small."

"Then put your arms around Mister Renato's waist, they'll be free then."

…the Sun would be buying the kid the damn puppy he wanted if this really wor-

Renato was both surprised and terribly not surprised that Sonya took a liberty with his personal space
